CANADA POST CORPORATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Thursday, May 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Andre that Bill C-73, an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope; and the amendment of Mr. Boudria (p.10744)

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Madam Speaker, I rise to speak in support of Bill C-73.

I support this bill because I believe that all Canadians can take pride in the entrepreneurial spirit that Canada Post is building and that this plan will allow the corporation to share that spirit with its employees directly.

The purpose of this legislation is to enable Canada Post to create an employee share savings plan. In turn, this legislation will provide Canada Post's employees with a tangible reward for building on their company's success.

We are entering a new era of communications world-wide, particularly the information transfer business of Canada Post. Competition is a constant in any business and to succeed businesses such as Canada Post must continue to improve the quality of their products and services.

Let us make no mistake about it. Canada Post is a business. It is in competition not only with other courier companies and delivery services but also with new information transfer technologies like fax machines and direct fund transfers.

In that competitive climate Canada Post has been proving to the public and Canadian businesses that it can provide a reliable and affordable service. In fact, Canada Post was the first postal administration to hire independent auditors, Ernst & Young, to measure its letter mail delivery performance.

The latest results for the period of January to March 1992 show that Canada Post has met its publicly stated delivery standards 98 per cent of the time. This compares with the performance of less than 85 per cent on time delivery when the surveys were first taken in 1987.

Employee participation through the share plan is a common sense step to ensure that improvement continues. Canada Post is now recognized as a modern, effective postal system able to compete with the best in the world at a price that Canadians want, one that has made the fundamental changes necessary to improve service and reliability.

A major step in this process has been the achievement of financial self-sufficiency. Canada Post has announced a profit for three consecutive fiscal years and for two years in a row it has paid a dividend to its shareholder, the Government of Canada.

Financial self-sufficiency ensures that Canada Post is not a burden on taxpayers and allows Canada Post to purchase the new equipment needed to keep improving its products and services.

• (1010)

Since the mid-1980s, Canada Post has invested in research to develop the next generation of mail processing equipment. Instead of equipping the postal system with off the shelf technology as was done 20 years ago, manufacturers were asked to build to specifications which had been designed to respond to customer expectations.

Computer based sorting equipment now enables Canada Post to deliver 40 million pieces of mail every working day to over 11 million addresses across Canada.

As we approach the 21st century, we find ourselves in a world where large corporations are competing in a knowledge-based global economy where technology will provide the edge. Canada Post is investing more than $2 billion over its current five-year plan period in such things as new equipment, building modernization and technology upgrades. The new equipment can even compare postal codes with addresses. If the code is wrong, the right one will be supplied instantly. It means that the speed of processing mail will be dramatically increased.

The work Canada Post has done in building a centralized, computerized network has paid off. Canada Post is not acknowledged as a world leader in the development of technology for postal systems. It is the result of the corporation's extensive work with suppliers to create, modify and extend equipment that can be used within the postal industry.

To meet the challenge of the electronic age, Canada Post now offers customers a mixed electronic-print mail service which can provide next business day delivery. Here again is an example of the package of services made possible by technology and necessary by the needs of the modern Canada business.

More and more businesses are supplying Canada Post electronically with their messages and client lists either through direct communication links or via magnetic tape or diskette. Canada Post manufactures the mail piece at eight sites across Canada. The final products which are indistinguishable from mail originating from the purchaser of the service are delivered by Canada Post within established service standards. Here now is a convenient way for businesses to cut their costs.

This type of mail combines the speed and efficiency of long distance transmission of information in an electronic form with Canada Post's capability for delivering hard copy messages to over 11 million businesses and home addresses across Canada. The advantage is that the message travels the bulk of the distance in bits and bytes rather than on paper and planes. It is fast and it relieves the mailer of the responsibility of physically creating and handling hard copy mail. This system not only works for large volume mailers but can work for any customer with the ability to connect to Canada Post's network.

Canada Post's involvement in new technologies not only benefits its customers, it has also created opportunities for Canadian companies. When Canada Post wanted to create a means to track and trace its products, it got some help from SHL Systemhouse. This company learned so much during the course of the co-operative project that in February 1991 it won a contract worth $270 million U.S. to supply a similar tracing system to the United States postal service.

Canada Post has also worked to build an international industry with Canadian skills. Co-operation in providing postal services has been critical in developing this strategy. Canadian businesses need a reliable means of distributing materials quickly and to accomplish that Canada Post needed partners.

Last year, Canada Post announced its participation in a joint venture with the Australian based transportation company, TNT Limited and the postal administrations of Germany, France, the Netherlands and Sweden. This joint venture will give Canadians access to a high quality international express service with assured on-time delivery and end-to-end tracking. The venture now means Canada is a major player in the international express market.

I have heard some members opposite criticize this Canada Post initiative as a waste of the taxpayers' money. Here we have a major foreign, Federal Express, the U.S. courier company, which also thinks so much of TNT that it is willing to sign for the delivery of its parcels in Europe. Federal Express knows a good thing when it sees it. This government knows a good thing when it sees it. Canadians can be proud of their postal system and its international accomplishments. It seems only the opposition wants Canada Post to return to the 19th century and delivery of mail by horse and carriage.

Another partnership effort has been the creation of the International Post Corporation. IPC is owned by 22 major postal administrations which among them deliver 60 per cent of the world's mail. In fact, Canada Post's President Don Lander is also chairman of IPC. IPC is working to remove technological and procedural roadblocks that may prevent its members from meeting the needs of their citizens.

Canada Post uses technology not only to improve its own operations but has formed an international consulting firm, Canada Post Systems Management Limited, to market its Canadian technology and expertise. This firm is consulting with postal administrations in Central America and has worked in Europe, Mexico and the south Pacific.

The use of technology, the effective interpretation of the needs of Canadians and of business opportunities, the development of partnerships with industries and businesses both domestically and internationally, are all fundamental to the creation and successful development of a business that is growing and adapting to the needs of the marketplace.

Tremendous progress has been achieved by the corporation since it has been given a clear commercial mandate by this government. To achieve financial self-sufficiency, Canada Post transformed itself into the effective and reliable provider of postal products and services it now is. Technology, customer service, and partnerships made the difference and remain fundamental to the corporation's ongoing success.

However, for all the strategic decision-making, the investments in technology or work with customers, most of what the corporation does depends on the people who are Canada Post.

Obviously we on this side of the House, and hopefully our colleagues on the other side, support this legislation because we believe it will have a positive effect on employee-management relations at Canada Post.

Labour relations are no different from other aspects of Canada Post's business, so serious reforms were brought to bear on the relationship between employer and unions at Canada Post. An example of this is the attendance management program which has reduced absenteeism from an average of 19 days a year for each full-time employee to levels close to the industry standard.

Another part of the transformation occurred when the Canada Labour Relations Board reviewed the number of bargaining units at the corporation and ruled they be consolidated into four units. One of these is the operations unit represented by the Canadian Union of Postal Workers.

Canadians are only too aware of the sometimes difficult relationship that Canada Post has with its largest union. It is not surprising that any postal disruption generates headlines and affects almost every person in the country who receives or sends mail.

It is my hope that this legislation will build on the improvements which have already been accomplished at Canada Post. The process of change at Canada Post has had its ups and downs but it has paid off.

Canada Post is a far cry from the post office it replaced a decade ago. Management's approach to its employees is far more than the headlines give them credit for. Not everything is dark in Canada Post's labour relations. There is another side to every coin.

The corporation has achieved collective agreements with all its other bargaining units without work disruption regardless of a number of serious incidents during the strike.

Canadians should remember that the vast majority of postal workers want only to have a secure job with good pay and decent working conditions. They want respect, fair treatment, and recognition for their good work.

• (1020)

One of the biggest challenges that Canada Post has had to face over the years has been to change the mind-set of its workers to instil the values, threats and opportunities of a competitive business in thousands of employees who once worked in a government department that had little competition.

This legislation will promote a greater understanding and involvement of employees and the challenges and opportunities of the future. That is fundamental to their motivation to become builders and beneficiaries of the corporation's success. It is important that employees realize that Canada Post is a competitive business, that success rests upon their shoulders, and that meeting the needs of Canadians is the strongest job and income security package ever invented.

This government initiative is the latest step in a process that has already begun to change the way that Canada Post relates to its employees. Many of them have already demonstrated their commitment to the corporation and its future and have made significant contributions. Canada Post introduced a number of programs specifically designed to recognize and reward exceptional performance.

Canada Post understands the importance of showing its appreciation to outstanding employees and now singles out and rewards exceptional performance through its silver and golden postmark awards. Each year employees in every division of the corporation may nominate their co-workers for the 10 categories of the silver postmark recognition awards. The awards go to employees for exceptional achievement in such areas as community or humanitarian work, or for those who go beyond the call of duty to make that special effort which meets customers' needs.

From among these winners, those whose actions or involvement truly stand out are selected to receive the national golden postmark awards. Let me tell the House about some of last year's winners.

Mark Eisenbraun, a retail representative in Keswick on Lake Simcoe, received a call from local police advising him that some stolen mail had been found floating in a swamp. While two co-workers collected letters at the edge of the marsh, Eisenbraun got a wet suit, a large net and waded into the middle of the swamp to get the rest.

John Brady, an operations manager in Victoria, spent seven hours on a Christmas Day making sure a local high school basketball team would be able to attend the Cotton Bowl in Dallas as planned. Responding to a last minute call from the coach, Brady found the team's package containing airline tickets, food vouchers and football game tickets, saving the trip.

Crystal Trider, an industrial engineer in Halifax, was working on a Saturday, the day before Father's Day. Among the mail arriving at her plant that day were Father's Day cards which had been sent in Canada Post's special occasion envelopes. Of course these had not been sent in time for delivery but she volunteered to deliver them herself. Her initiatives made the holiday even more special for dozens of dads in the Halifax area.

These are some examples of the outstanding people who work at Canada Post, people who believe that a job is more than job security and good wages, people who believe that satisfaction comes from doing a job well and not just meeting but exceeding the expectations of Canadians.

This is one of the ways Canada Post is recognizing employees. There is also the employee involvement program which encourages staff to submit ideas which cut costs, improve operations and increase productivity. Winning employees receive a percentage of the first year cost saving their ideas brought to the corporation.

Canada Post has also developed a scholarship program which provides financial help to 90 sons and daughters of CPC employees who are attending post-secondary institutions.

There is also a commitment to internal training programs so that employees can confidently operate the new state of the art equipment that is continually being introduced in mail processing plants.

In 1989 Canada Post introduced the Heritage Club, with membership restricted to long service and retired employees and their spouses. Currently there are 29,000 members: 11,000 who have retired, 5,000 who are still part of the work force and have 25 years of service, and 13,000 spouses.

Community involvement is the key to the Heritage Club's mandate. The activities of individual club chapters receive some financial assistance for local community enhancement.

Other activities have a community orientation. Canada Post employees across Canada volunteer their time for the Santa letter writing program sponsored by the corporation. This year alone, thousands of employees volunteered their time to answer over one million letters written to Santa's special HOH OHO postal code.

Thousands of people volunteer their time to answer the letters. I understand that even some of the most militant CUPW members participate in responding to letters that come from all over the world and are written in many different languages. The program adds something special to our employees' holiday season and generates goodwill on behalf of Canada throughout the world.

These are some of the good things that are helping to ensure that postal workers share in the sense of progress at Canada Post. The examples I have mentioned clearly show that things are evolving in a positive way at Canada Post. The share savings plan will build on this in a positive way.

The share savings plan will provide an incentive for employees to increase Canada Post's financial performance and thus increase the value of their shares. It will attract, motivate and retain highly qualified employees and recognize their contribution. It will permit all employees to acquire and own a piece of the corporation in which they work and create a sense of entrepreneurial spirit.

It will build the level of pride by employees for the success of their company. It will develop a long-term commitment for the company, its products and quality of service.

These are the reasons I believe all Canadians should be enthusiastic about the opportunities offered by this measure. This spells out improved service for Canadians, improved employee-management relations and a healthier Canada Post.

People want to be proud. I believe that Canadians in general and particularly employees are seeing that Canada Post is becoming a place they can be proud of.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I want to congratulate the member for his recognition of the qualities of the postal system in this country.

I too share his view. I stated on the floor of the House last night that the post office, in terms of productivity and efficiency, probably has one of the highest rankings of any organization in Canada. I think a lot of Canadians are really surprised when I stand and say that, but by using the criteria that business uses to judge productivity the post office comes out ahead most of the time.

Of course we salute all the things people within the post office are doing within their community. We salute the efforts of management to improve the morale and to improve the productivity.

The problem I have with this attempt to experiment with equity participation, a principle that I support, is that I do not see anything in the bill which talks about the criteria for assessing the value of the shares. How is the value of a share to be determined? To me, I just do not see anything in it that would set up the criteria.

Another point would be shareholders' rights. Often people get involved in share option schemes and sometimes they do not have any rights. That could come back to haunt the government.

A third point I would like to ask the member about has to do with the federal presence. I need the member's attention because it seems to me this is the most serious problem we have with the postal system in this country.

In 1980 we put the Canada word mark on every postal unit in this country. Whether it was a post office, a post box or a truck that delivered the mail, we put the Canada word mark on it. It was a symbol of the national government's presence in not just the larger communities but small towns. The Canada word mark is the symbol of this great country and of this great government.

• (1030)

A few months ago the Prime Minister was talking about patriotism. I support his view that we should be more patriotic.

I would like the member to give me his reasons as to why the post office was stripped of the word "Canada" in close to 40,000 units across Canada. They were stripped of the Canada wordmark. In all postal operations across Canada, the word "Canada" was painted out on trucks and post office boxes. They were stripped of it.

We spent millions of dollars of taxpayers' money in 1980 to put the word "Canada" up there to give people, especially those in disadvantaged regions, smaller regions and smaller towns of our country, a feeling that the national government was present.

On the value of shares, what criteria are to be used? On the rights of shareholders, what rights are shareholders to have? Finally why was "Canada" stripped from the postal service?

Mr. O'Kurley: Madam Speaker, the hon. member opposite asked a question with regard to the details about the shares, how the dividends will be determined, and so on. Obviously there would be consultations with Treasury Board and the Department of Finance.

Canada Post is an arm's length Crown corporation. It is owned by the Government of Canada. Therefore the Government of Canada through Treasury Board and through the Department of Finance would have some input into how those details would be determined.

In terms of the offering of shares to its employees, it is important to point out that Canada Post is a corporation. As I mentioned in my earlier remarks, Canada Post is a business operating in a competitive business environment. In that vein the whole aspect of relations between labour and management is critical.

In countries where there is the most success with labour and management we see that labour has had an opportunity to participate in some sense of accountability in the system. That is why I believe this initiative in the bill will be a positive one.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Madam Speaker, I find something really very troubling about the exchange that occurred between the Liberal member and the hon. member subsequent to his speech.

I cannot believe the speech we heard earlier could have been written by anybody except a press officer for Canada Post. I cannot possibly believe these two gentlemen on both sides of the House could regard the paternalistic arrangement and relationship between management and labour described in the member's speech as an appropriate one for stimulating good productivity.

If they have not learned the lessons of Alcan, Chrysler, Ford and a number of other productive industries in this country, that the relationship between management and labour should be a partnership with a common purpose of serving the customer, then they do not understand at all. They do not understand that giving employees a 10 per cent shareholding without any voting power is no contribution to improving productivity and labour relations in the decision-making process at all.

It is ridiculous and absurd to suggest that workers are so stupid as to believe that 10 per cent of non-voting shares will give them effective influence.

I cannot understand how that member or the member on the other side could believe that this would overcome the distrust that has existed in the post office for years, highlighted by the fact that post office management said that it had a wage offer on the table which it withdrew in the face of arbitration. It think this penny-ante stuff is going to help labour relations in the post office. I say there should be a reform that recognizes that labour and management have a common responsibility and that is to serve the Canadian public. The Canadian Union of Postal Workers is ready to do that. Let the management wake up, let this government wake up and let those on the other side of this House wake up and understand what a good labour relationship is all about.

Mr. Mills: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Last night when we debated this issue there was not a single member of the New Democratic Party here when I gave my speech in which I said that I oppose this bill. The member is totally taking things out of context.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It is a nice Friday morning, is it not?

Mr. O'Kurley: Madam Speaker, with regard to the member's comments about labour relations, it is important for members of the House and also for all Canadians to recognize that success is not achieved by the old model of confrontation. Effective service to Canadians is not achieved by the NDP's preferred model of confrontation between labour and management.

When we look at the strongest economies in the world, Japan and Germany for example, one of the things that we find in those economies is a co-operative model, co-operation between management and labour. This initiative by the Government of Canada is the first step in achieving that co-operation which is necessary.

Often we see labour posturing for a strike and wanting that confrontation. It puts millions of dollars into strike funds. It would be important for the NDP, as representatives in many cases of labour—taking its marching orders from labour—to encourage labour groups to invest those strike funds into shares in corporations. It is important to recognize also that you cannot have authority without accountability. Buying shares in a company is one way of assuming the accountability that management always assumes.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I must say I am not thrilled to participate in this debate, but I am glad I am participating in it at the moment after hearing my colleague's speech from the Conservative Party suggesting that his idea of good management-labour relations is to have a chart. If you behave well you get a star beside your name at the end of the week. This somehow is supposed to cause elation and productivity among the workers.

I have heard a lot of talk about labour-management relations and I have listened to a lot of speakers suggest how to get more productivity out of their operation and encourage participation at a very high level among their employees. I have never once heard the set of recommendations that the way to do that is to refuse to sign a collective agreement with your employees.

Imagine how humiliated those people working for the post office this morning will feel when they find out that while the government has decided not to sign a collective agreement for nearly three years with the employees of the post office, the government members are standing up and saying: "We found a solution. Forget collective agreements, we have this star idea. We are going to give everybody a gold star if they perform well". It is embarrassing and humiliating.

Now we have Bill C–73. This is the ace in the hole. They said that already the people of Canada, including those who work for the post office, own the post office. It is a Crown corporation. We own it. The government says: "We have another idea. We are going to allow you, who already own the post office, to buy shares in the post office but there will be no voting and you will have no say in its operation". Somehow this is supposed to get people elated.

• (1040)

This is awful. It is awful for the House of Commons to spend time on this sort of nonsense. Imagine what every rank and file worker is feeling across this country who works for the post office.

Here they were waiting for a collective agreement, waiting for some leadership from the government, and this is what they got, Bill C–73.

An hon. member: More letters to Santa Claus.

Mr. Riis: The whole thing is laughable, but it is sad. It is sad when we consider that one of the most important services we have in this country from the federal government is the postal service. This is the kind of management approach, the kind of paternalistic approach to those thousands of hard–working employees across the country. All of us, from our own personal experience, whether it is in our work as members of Parliament, meeting with those who work for the postal corporation, whether it is our friends who happen to be members of various unions attached to the postal corporation or their affiliates, or whether it is simply the people who deliver our mail whom we know personally, these individuals are dedicated and committed Canadians.

They work very hard to deliver the mail. As others have stated, one of the most effective and efficient systems in spite of management and in spite of this government is Canada's post office. The rank and file workers of the post office are committed to the post office, committed to mail delivery, committed to a high level of service and committed to the people of Canada. I cannot say that of the government or of most of management. I wish I could.

Let us look at the legislation. Bill C–73 will make 10 per cent of Canada Post non–voting shares available for purchase by Canada Post employees on a voluntary basis. As soon as this was uttered by the postal corporation, those who work for the corporation came forward and said that this was absolute nonsense. Therefore, here we are continuing on.

An hon. member: Did Don Lander say that?

Mr. Riis: A number of people are suggesting that this is the beginning of the full privatization of Canada Post. I know the minister responsible for Canada Post has said that this is not the case. What did he say? If you listen to what he actually said, it was: "There are no immediate privatization plans in the cards". He went on to say on May 1, 1992: "If I had to bet, I would bet that in the next couple of decades you will see post offices being privatized all over the world and I would not mind seeing Canada first". That was a minister of the cabinet responsible for Canada Post saying that he would love to see Canada Post privatized. He said this is not immediate privatization. We are suggesting that this is the first step.

Then the Prime Minister has said that he is not aware of any plans to privatize the post office. As a matter of fact, he said he would not be in favour of that. This is the Prime Minister who had other things to say.

On April 13, 1988 the Prime Minister said that some people wanted to buy the CBC but that the CBC was not for sale. He said that Air Canada was not for sale. We all know that the government sold Air Canada, beginning in 1988 with the shares offered first to its employees. In other words, this is the government's approach. The first step is to sell some of the shares to the employees before moving into full privatization.

I say that the Conservative Government record speaks for itself. When you want to privatize a major Crown corporation, you offer some shares to the employees first before you go on to the general share market. We oppose this because it will have absolutely nothing to do with improving labour–management relations with the postal corporation.

How could you expect employees of the postal corporation to feel that they are part of an operation when the government is treating them this way? At the moment there are over 100,000 outstanding grievances at Canada Post. That is roughly two grievances per person.

That tells it all. The unions said they wanted to resolve this dispute, agreed to resolve the dispute, turned it over to an arbitrator and the legislation came through to require this. The postal corporation pulled all of its offers and today we have no collective agreement for the employees.

This is not the way to conduct an operation. My hon. friend from the Conservative Party who just spoke said that the government is committed to making Canada Post a profitable business. It has to be a profitable corporation. This is a government service that has to make money. It has to be profitable.

An hon. member: It is the measure of all things.

Mr. Riis: It is the measure of all things, as my colleague from Edmonton reminds me. That is the Tory measurement.

The government does not suggest that this is necessary for the RCMP. It does not have to be a profit-making policing corporation. The fire departments are not profitable. The ambulances do not make profits. The hospitals are not supposed to make profits. Universities are not supposed to make profits. The Canada Post Corporation, which services every person in this country on a regular basis, has to make money to be successful.

We say this is nonsense. NDP logic asks why should we choose one service to have to generate revenue from the people of Canada when already we own this? Quite frankly, we can say that in terms of cost recovery, we have always supported measures that would result in cost recovery, but to be convinced that this ought to be a profit-driven business is ludicrous.

We say that having these programs put into place in an effort to increase employee morale by using the silver star system is something you would find in a kindergarten class. A grade three class would probably be embarrassed by that approach.

We oppose this legislation, obviously. We oppose this legislation because we believe that this will do absolutely nothing to promote labour-management peace within the postal corporation. As a matter of fact, it is such an embarrassing piece of legislation, such a humiliating piece of legislation and such an aggravating piece of legislation that it is like walking up to every postal employee and poking them in the eye with a finger. That is what the minister is trying to do here. We think this is the wrong approach to labour-management relations.

We also oppose this legislation because unquestionably this is the first step toward the full privatization of Canada Post. I know the record is clear that the government's plan is to privatize every rural post office in Canada. That is the stated goal.

Already it has privatized significant numbers. One of the best examples of this totally silly decision was in my own constituency in a small community called Westwold, British Columbia, which has a few hundred citizens and services a rural farm area primarily.

It had a post office which was the centre for the entire community. It provided the nucleus for the community. People would come during the day, exchange views and see what was happening in the community as a result of notices, and they would conduct their postal business.

The postmaster had to vacate and so the postal corporation said this is the opportunity now to privatize the post office, to close it down. The question was where does it to go? There are no businesses, no retail outlets in the community. It said: "Listen, we have a good idea. There is another community about 30 kilometres away. We can put it there and let everyone drive there every day to collect their mail and do their postal work. Or, there is a legion in the area that has a bar and we could have it as an adjunct to the bar". A lot of people said: "This seems to be kind of silly because a lot of times the children are picking up the mail or, quite frankly, I do not relish the idea of picking up my mail in a bar".

Mr. Rodriguez: What is wrong with that?

Mr. Riis: That is exactly what the postal department said.

Today the post office in Westwold is in the Legion bar. This is wrong. This shows the bull-headedness and the single-mindedness of the postal corporation to privatize no matter what, no matter if it makes any sense at all.

This is about the most ridiculous decision of the postal corporation imaginable.

• (1050)

We oppose this bill because we have looked through it carefully and we have asked if this bill improves the service to Canadians. Does this bill help improve service to urban and rural Canadians? We have gone through this bill clause by clause and we have not found a single point in this legislation that would lead us to believe this will improve service one iota. We cannot support it for that reason.

We asked ourselves if this will result in the postal corporation's stopping harassment of its union members and sticking to its word. We looked through and found no evidence of that. We assume that will continue.

I am trying to think of a single reason why anyone would support this legislation. I have listened carefully to my colleagues across the way and perhaps this is their idea of comedy or humour because I have not heard a single reference to any reason why this bill ought to be supported, even by members of the government.

They talk of a need to have a more efficient post office. This will not do that. They talk about improved management relations. This will not do that. They talk about this being a progressive idea because it will give the opportunity for people to be meaningfully involved in the future of the post office. That is not the case. These are non-voting shares. The post office is already owned in part by its employees and now to say they can have a chance to buy and own a part seems to be nonsensical.

As we pour through the legislation at second reading and discuss the principle of the legislation, we are trying to identify a single reason why we should support this. We are trying to listen carefully to the Conservative members while they speak to identify a single reason and yet it is very wanting. I can only say we will not support this legislation.

Let me make a suggestion to my hon. friends sitting opposite on the government benches. If they wanted to send a very positive signal to the employees of the postal corporation, they would withdraw this legislation and say our first priority will be to settle the collective agreement. That would be the first gesture.

If they said they would withdraw this silly nonsensical legislation and instruct our negotiators to resolve this contractual dispute immediately, it would send the second most positive signal to the employees of Canada Post. It would encourage them to see some hope in an approved operation.

The way the government and the minister responsible for Canada Post could make Canadians and the people who work in the postal corporation the happiest of all would be to announce that on July 1, Canada's birthday, the Progressive Conservative government will call an election.

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Madam Speaker, I listened with interest to the hon. member's remarks. I have a question for him.

He is seeking a single reason why his party should be supporting this legislation. I would like to ask him if he agrees with any of the reasons for this type of move currently being proposed by the New Democratic government in Ontario.

I noted in the Speech from the Throne that one of the objectives of the Government of Ontario in the coming session is to achieve worker-ownership legislation. Worker-ownership legislation will come forward for final debate.

I would like to quote from the proposed reform of the Ontario Labour Relations Act, a discussion paper tabled by the Ontario Ministry of Labour in November 1991. This is a most interesting document. I will quote from the Ontario NDP government's labour reforms under section 1.3, entitled "The Government's Social and Economic Agenda". I note with interest that one of the points the Ontario NDP government is making as part of its agenda is:

"Encouraging worker investment and ownership in Ontario companies in a manner which recognizes the benefits of worker participation for both labour and business".

If the hon. member is looking for a single reason to support this legislation it is surely coming from his colleagues in Ontario. The Ontario government is saying that workers should be stakeholders. They should be more than employees, they should be participants in the ownership of companies.

The single reason that the member is looking for is the benefits. Consider the phrase that members of the Ontario NDP, your colleagues, are using. They are the benefits of worker participation.

What are the benefits of worker participation? Obviously, when somebody who is an employee becomes a shareholder, a stakeholder in an organization they have more interest in the success of that corporation, in the efficient management of that corporation, in the delivery of better services for that corporation and in the establishment of better labour management relations for that corporation. Those are four benefits. There are now four reasons why you can support it, and standing right behind you is the NDP government, your colleagues, in Ontario. It obviously has recognized that this move is the right move. Comments?

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, I know my hon. friend was not serious when he put those questions.

This legislation prohibits employees from having meaningful participation in Canada Post. It says: "You will not be able to vote on anything we do in Canada Post". I have a savings account with a local credit union. I have more voice simply by having a savings account with a credit union than these employees would have by having non-voting shares. He knows that. He knows he is simply making some nonsensical gesture in this House to mislead.

On another point. Surely to goodness if you want to—

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am sure the hon. member erred in the inflammatory language he was using. He alleges that I have sought to mislead the House. I have not. I would ask that he withdraw.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do not think that the hon. member for Kamloops was saying that the hon. member for Halton—Peel was deliberately trying to mislead the House, though he was getting very close to impugning motives to the hon. member. Maybe the hon. member for Kamloops could have the opportunity of concluding his comments.

Mr. Riis: Thank you, Madam Speaker. The hon. member obviously did not know what he was talking about then. I do not think that he would intend to mislead the House. His suggestion that this legislation will give employees meaningful participation in Canada Post is absolutely false. It is a falsehood. I am only assuming that he has not yet read the legislation.

Second, the employees already own this business. The employees own the business. He is now suggesting that they can have further ownership. I do not understand the points my hon. friend makes.

Ask anyone who has studied or bothered to read a single book on labour-management relations how to encourage the maximum amount of efficiency and productivity from your operation and they would say that it is wise to include people in a meaningful way, in terms of ownership and participation in management. That is what the New Democratic Party government is suggesting we do in the province of Ontario. That is what we would like to see done right across the whole country, not this scam or illusion that somehow this is going to enable people to play a meaningful role in the management of Canada Post.

Mr. Harb: Madam Speaker, are questions and comments finished?

Madam Deputy Speaker: There is a minute left before we go into statements pursuant to Standing Order 31. Does the hon. member have a question or a comment for the hon. member?

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I am quite interested in the tone of the debate. I wonder if it is not time to bring this whole debate to a civilized level so that we could have some meaningful discussion on the pros and cons of this legislation.

It is an extremely important piece of legislation. It is an historic one in a lot of ways. I would not want to take the time of the House of Commons to debate the details of it at this point in time. I can see that we are getting close to eleven o'clock.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Maybe the member will have his wish after Question Period.

As it is eleven o'clock, we will now proceed to statements by members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

NATIVE AWARENESS WEEK

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Madam Speaker, next week has been declared Native Awareness Week. Several departments will be participating in the event this year which will be sponsored by the Canada Department of Agriculture.

This initiative complements the federal native work force participation initiative. It is designed to increase an awareness of and promote the contribution of natives in the Public Service. In doing so, it will promote more harmonious and productive exchanges between natives and non-natives.

On behalf of the Minister and the Minister of State for Indian Affairs and Northern Development, I am pleased to highlight and support this event. I commend the Department of Agriculture for its initiative and all participating departments for their co-operation.

Let me take this opportunity to recall that our government has taken several initiatives in recent years to ensure that natives take their rightful place not only in the work force but also in Canadian society. These include the native agenda, the royal commission on aboriginal peoples, and the integration of aboriginals in the constitutional discussions.

However today I want above all to pay tribute to our aboriginal community for its increasingly important contribution to our work force and our common heritage.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Madam Speaker, I rise to draw the attention of the House to the mortal danger menacing Canada's science and technology infrastructure.

Yes, it is none other than the dreaded techno-punching terminator, alias the Prime Minister. Nothing has escaped his scourge of devastation and destruction: Nobel prize winning labs at the National Research Council, industrial research and research on the environment, alternative energy and health care, the Science Council, and now our very ability to gather and analyse research and development statistics.

What message does this send to Canadians? Does this imply that the results of the prosperity initiative are in and science and technology does not play a central role?

As for science and technology statistics, both the quantity and the quality of the data are at risk, especially quality. We need a government that will demonstrate in deed as well as in words that science and technology are critical in addressing the economic, social and cultural challenges facing Canadians.

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Madam Speaker, several weeks ago the Secretary of State announced a program called Voyageurs 92 intended to allow members of Parliament to twin their ridings and give 125 young people in each riding a chance to visit another part of Canada.

I would like to thank the minister for doing that. I would also like to thank the corporate sponsors, especially Air Canada, for making this exchange program possible.

In Halton—Peel the concept has been embraced enthusiastically by the eight secondary schools located therein. The Voyageurs program in my riding under the direction of committee chairman Alf Spence was quickly over-subscribed and now has a growing waiting list.

The students look forward to learning about a new part of Canada. They believe that as more Canadians experience the beauty and majesty of their country any thoughts of it breaking apart will certainly melt away like the spring snow.

BREAST CANCER

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, I rise today to urge the government to implement a focused systematic program to examine in detail breast cancer research, education, early detection, and treatment.

It is astounding that this year one in nine Canadian women will be diagnosed with breast cancer. The rates are up substantially from 20 years ago. In 1991 alone 5,000 women lost their lives through breast cancer and 15,000 new cases were diagnosed. However, in 22 years early detection methods remain largely unchanged.

I am hopeful that the subcommittee on the status of women will recognize in its report, expected in June, the need for greater public awareness about the impact of breast cancer, the need to increase our research efforts to find out what causes breast cancer, to discover better early detection methods and to improve treatment with a view to finding a cure.

SOUTH MORESBY NATIONAL PARK

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, a great battle was fought and won in this Chamber five years ago to protect forever the Gwaii Haanas Archipelago, or South Moresby National Park Reserve as it has come to be known. Some $106 million was committed to be spent over eight years. Canada has failed to live up to its legal commitments.

Also $50 million was promised to develop a world-class tourism destination to diversify the regional economy and to adjust from logging to tourism.

Yesterday the Minister of the Environment announced that an agreement has been reached with the Haida nation regarding Gwaii Haanas. Bill C-59 will now proceed, with agreed amendments. Some $5.8 million will be spent this summer on visitor reception centres and park reserve development.

However, the delays to date in implementing the spirit of the agreement are unreasonable. Residents expect $44 million to be transferred now to the locally controlled Gwaii trust. The funds for reception centres and operation and development costs must come from Ottawa.

The cost for the Sandspit small craft harbour must come from Ottawa. The forest companies and the loggers have been compensated. The funds for reforestation have been allocated. There can be no more delays in funds for the affected communities.

CANADA HEALTH AUXILIARY WEEK

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Madam Speaker, this past week has been designated Canada Health Auxiliary Week by the Canadian Association of Health Care Auxiliaries. The theme this year is auxiliary leadership through education.

There are more than 100,000 health care volunteers affiliated with over 800 auxiliaries in local communities across the country. These volunteers play a strong and vital role in our health care system in humanizing the health care given to hospitalized patients, in raising funds for much needed equipment and services, and in sponsoring educational programs within their communities. They provide a unique and valuable service to Canadians.

I invite my colleagues and all Canadians to recognize the work and dedication of health auxiliaries as well as their enormous contribution which makes our Canadian health care system unequalled anywhere in the world.

CANADIAN HUMAN RIGHTS ACT

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, section 11 of the Canadian Human Rights Act, 1978 says that it is discriminatory practice for an employer to establish or maintain differences in wages between male and female employees who are performing work of equal value.

The pay equity provision of the act must be respected by all federal government agencies, all federal Crown corporations and all private sector businesses regulated under federal law. Almost one million employees are covered by the Canadian Human Rights Act. Approximately 45 per cent are women. Very few women, as we know, have benefited from the implementation of equal pay for work of equal value.

We must eliminate discrimination in compensation between men and women. Employment equity concerns fairness in the representation of various target groups such as women, aboriginal people, visible minorities and the disabled in the work force, and in the treatment and employment practices such as recruitment, training and promotion.

I call on the government—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

CANADIAN YOUTH SERVICE CORPS

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Etobicoke—Lakeshore): Madam Speaker, several years ago the government cancelled the Katimavik program and said at that time that a new and better program would come along in its place for Canadian youth.

I believe now is the time to initiate something that could be called the Canadian Youth Service Corps. It would be a new program that would recruit Canadians from age 18 and upward on a voluntary basis for one year of service to the nation.

This would be an opportunity to serve in perhaps one of several different streams: for example, environmental, military, social help to seniors and Canadians with disabilities and community service.

Canadian youth participating in such a youth corps would move to different parts of Canada and work with Canadians from different parts of our country. In the course of giving service they would learn both about Canada and about themselves.

PRESCRIPTION DRUGS

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, Canadians and particularly seniors have a continuing concern about the price of prescription drugs.

Green Shield has documented the dramatic increase in the price of drugs averaging 11.4 per cent a year since the extension of drug patents in 1987 to the multinational drug companies. This increase threatens our provincial drug plans and our entire health care system.

Even the federal minister of health stated recently that such increases, which are well above the rate of inflation, would kill the health care system.

Who should Canadians hold responsible for this dramatic increase in drug prices? The Conservatives, for agreeing to the extension of the patent protection on behalf of the multinational drug companies as a pre-condition to the free trade deal, and Judy Erola, a former Liberal minister of consumer affairs, the chief spokesperson and lobbyist for the multinational drug companies.

NATIONAL NURSES WEEK

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Argenteuil—Papineau): Madam Speaker, I too would like to remind members of this House and the general public that this is National Nurses Week. The theme "Nurses: Allies for Change" shows the key role that nurses play in looking into the system and changing and strengthening it. The physical, mental and social well-being of all Canadians depends on this system. Nurses are committed to meeting the challenge of applying the principles set forth in the Canada Health Act, to maintaining effective, affordable health services and to renewing partnerships in the field of health.

MONTREAL'S 350TH ANNIVERSARY CELEBRATIONS

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, I have the honour and pleasure, as a Canadian, a Quebecer and the member for Saint-Léonard, to wish all Montrealers a happy anniversary celebration. On May 16, 1642—historians do not agree on the exact date—the French founded what was to become one of the greatest cities in America. In the past 350 years, Montreal has become a leading centre of culture and economic vitality for Quebec, Canada and America.

Despite the temporary economic difficulties that the city is going through, I hope that all members of this House join me in wishing Montreal and all its citizens very happy 350th anniversary celebrations.

Bonne fête, Montréal. Happy anniversary, Montreal. Buon compleanno, Montreal.

FOETAL ALCOHOL SYNDROME

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Madam Speaker, foetal alcohol syndrome, known as FAS, is a disease with far-reaching repercussions. It is caused before birth when a pregnant mother consumes alcohol.

While we do not know a great deal about FAS, we do know that children born with FAS exhibit varying symptoms of mental retardation. Some children are visibly handicapped, while others learn of their disabilities later in life. The trauma for the child in the family is great. It is often worse for adoptive parents who have no clue to the cause of their child's problem.

Witnesses appearing before the House committee on health issues told us there was no cure for the neurological damage of foetal alcohol syndrome. Although the tragedy is great there is hope. foetal alcohol syndrome can be prevented: Alcohol consumption should be avoided during pregnancy.

I encourage the Minister of National Health and Welfare to undertake with his provincial counterparts a campaign to inform expectant mothers about foetal alcohol syndrome. Let us avoid further tragedy.

CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGENCY

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Madam Speaker, there was an article in the papers recently about excessive amounts spent by the Canadian International Development Agency on a reception held in Ottawa. This has created considerable controversy among Canadians and certainly does not enhance CIDA's reputation. In fact, it was not the first time excessive spending by the agency was mentioned.

Canada has a moral obligation to help less developed countries where famine and extreme poverty are prevalent. Considering its mandate and its mission, CIDA should realize that the public will not condone such excesses, which are a flagrant contradiction of its mission to help countries where famine is endemic. I ask the government to order CIDA's senior officials to—

WINNERS OF MARC LESCARBOT AWARD

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to pay tribute to two of my constituents, winners of the Marc Lescarbot Award, in the local awards category, in recognition of their outstanding contribution to the advancement of the arts in the region. This year, the Lescarbot award, volunteer category, went to Germaine Proulx for her contribution to the arts. Ms. Proulx is well-known in local cultural circles. She was actively involved in promoting cultural activities in a number of areas, in addition to founding the Drummondville Ballet Academy which celebrates its 45th anniversary this year.

In the arts patron category, the Lescarbot award went to Noël Sylvain. Mr. Sylvain is a patron of the arts, in the true sense of the word. At his instigation, Union Life has repeatedly and in many ways supported, encouraged and sponsored artists and the arts in our region.

I am delighted to see that the unselfish and dynamic contribution made by Germaine Proulx and Noël Sylvain is finally given tangible recognition.

TRINITY—SPADINA CONFERENCE

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, justice and jobs, alternatives to free trade and the corporate agenda will be the subject of a conference starting this evening in Trinity—Spadina, Toronto.

The themes will include thrust and key elements of the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement and the proposed North American free trade agreement, discussion of alternatives for Canada and Latin America, strategies for democratizing the economy, how Canadian banks gouge Canadians and Latin Americans, why the banks support the FTA and NAFTA, and how NAFTA and the FTA will affect food processing jobs, family farms and access to affordable food in Canada and Mexico.

Speakers will include spokespersons of the Canadian Autoworkers Union, Miguel D'Escoto, a former Nicaraguan minister of external affairs, a leading opposition member of the Mexican Congress and a leading Mexican economist, members of the Canadian Parliament for Surrey North and for Oshawa, and Tony Clark, chair of Action Canada, on why renegotiations will not work and how to build for cancellation of the FTA and NAFTA.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance.

Every day this week members of the Liberal Party have risen in the House to plead with the government not to abandon Canada's unemployed. We talk about the lack of mobility assistance, adequate training dollars, job availability, and what not.

Today the Canadian Mental Health Association said that as unemployment rises in Canada there are increases in infant mortality, suicide, murder, spouse and child abuse, family breakdown, and so on.

When will the Minister of Finance start to consider that this never-ending recession which has been going on now for more than 27 months is hurting all Canadians very badly and the time has come to change his policies?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the hon. member refers to the Canadian Mental Health Association report. Are we going to lead Canadians down the path of only doom and gloom?

If he wants to compare the rates of suicide, family break-ups, alcoholism and drug abuse and tie them to the unemployment rate, I invite him—and I am not saying it has no affect—to compare it with other countries in the world where there are rampant problems in that area.

The answer is not to try to blame unemployment for everything. We should, rather, maybe join other Canadians under this prosperity initiative and try to identify ways where we can improve this situation. That is what the government is doing.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I would like to point out to the hon. minister that yesterday one of his colleagues in this House, the member for Halifax West, said: "One of the things that you learn in an election is not to bother with welfare houses".

Was he reflecting the views of that party and that government not to care for the people who are suffering in society and who have lost their dignity because they cannot find jobs? When will this government put on a human face and repudiate that awful statement by the member of Halifax West?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, if words mean anything, the leader of the Liberal Party stood on January 21 and called for a great one-year emergency economic plan. Do you know what he suggested for unemployed Canadians? He suggested that the Government of Canada should increase its training funding by a meagre $150 million.

We are providing 20 times that amount each year for unemployed Canadians. The Liberals should come clean with Canadians and tell them what they really think.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I simply wanted to say to the minister that the problem is not going away. One and a half million Canadians are out of work, and we now know that more than 600,000 Canadians have left the labour market and have given up on finding a job. This means that 1.5 million people have lost their dignity in Canada because they cannot work and that 600,000 more Canadians have given up altogether and may be too embarrassed to go out and look for work, because this government refuses to give them a chance to earn a living, to live with some dignity and to be proud citizens of this country.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I do not know why the Leader of the Opposition keeps saying this government has no consideration for the unemployed and is not concerned about their situation. The fact is that we increased our budgets. At a time when fiscal responsibility is paramount, we still increased all funding used to help these people. I fail to see why the hon. member thinks he can improve their situation by shouting that we have done nothing at all, although program effectiveness and program funding have both increased. I suppose we could also do what the Liberals did. We could keep raising taxes or increase the deficit.

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, I too have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

The Leader of the Opposition raised a question about the statement of the Conservative member for Halifax West in the press and I quote: "One of the things you learn in elections is not to bother with welfare houses". The Leader of the Opposition invited the minister to reject that statement and he did not do so.

I ask the minister, will he reject the statement right now, or does his silence mean that he and his government agree with his colleague and are writing off the poor and unemployed in this country?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, if rejecting a statement by a member of Parliament or interpreting silence as a kiss-off, then the Liberals are guilty of a lot of things in this country.

The question is simply, what efforts are being devoted by this government to try to help the unemployed? We have increased the spending under the Department of Employment and Immigration by $300 million this year to try to address that tough situation.

Canada is subjected to this recession. Canada is subjected to restructuring that is taking place in this global economy. The private sector has to answer this challenge with the help of government. It does not want us to substitute and do it for them. The tools have to be in place and that is what we are trying to do.

Talking about education and training, Canada is spending $11 billion a year. When looking at the books that is more than last year and the year before but the Liberals will still claim that it is less.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, I return again to the Minister of Employment and Immigration and invite him and ask him to reject the callous words of his colleague the Conservative member for Halifax West who said: "One of the things you learn in elections is not to bother with welfare houses". Does he not realize that by remaining silent he is confirming that this is the view of his government?

I ask the minister to speak up and reject these callous words or stand condemned of rejecting the more than 1.5 million unemployed people in this country.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member, who is an experienced member of Parliament, wants to know whether it is the policy of this government not to care about people on welfare and about housing, no, it is not. It is quite to the contrary and the record clearly shows that.

I was not there. I do not know what the member said, but I know that member. I think the member for Halifax West is just as concerned about poor people and people in need than any Liberal in this House. Therefore, do not try to make the member for Halifax West out to be an uncaring member of Parliament. Of course, he is not a Liberal. He does not have a corner on everything, but I think he is a hard working member for his people.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, this week the anti-poverty critic for the New Democratic Party, the member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing, released the action plan on behalf of the New Democratic Party entitled "Changing Course". In that document we made 38 recommendations on how this government can reverse some of the effects of its economic policies.

I would like to say to the Minister of Finance that while the official unemployment rate in Canada is 11 per cent, the Canadian Mental Health Association in its report outlining not only the effects of unemployment in financial terms but also the traumatic psychological effects points out that the real unemployment rate is 19 per cent.

Clearly, this constitutes a serious crisis in this country for every community, every family, every province and territory. It is clear that as we reduce unemployment we will reduce social expenditures.

Given that we have a serious crisis of unemployment in this country, would the Minister of Finance consider bringing in an emergency budget based on the principle of full employment as we have promoted to be included in the Constitution of Canada, which would address the need in Canada to have an economic policy based on full employment?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, in spite of what the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party suggests, there has been a substantial decline in the number of low-income Canadians since we assumed office in 1984, something in the order of 600,000.

That has been brought about by new job opportunities, by skills upgrading, by tax reform, and by improving and directing scarce resources to those people most in need. That is what the child benefit package I unveiled in the budget is really all about.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration has outlined the emphasis we are making with respect to job training and skills upgrading, an increase in that budget of about $300 million this year over the previous year, some $3.4 million. We are seeing a larger number of Canadians leaving the unemployment rolls and becoming more involved in training and skills upgrading.

That is precisely what is required under the restructuring that is going on within the Canadian economy.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is for the Minister of Finance.

We are seeing more people using food banks and more people even giving up looking for jobs. The Minister of Finance cannot turn aside from the reality of what is being affected by these high unemployment rates across this country.

I have a supplementary for the minister. A single parent with two children who earns the minimum wage would have to work 90 hours a week to rise above the poverty line. More than half the poor in this country have jobs. The unemployed are not the only people in this country who are living in poverty.

If his government is sincere about wiping out poverty, why does it not collect the $8 billion worth of unpaid taxes mentioned by the Minister of National Revenue, and use the money to deal with this problem right away?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member keeps referring to a so-called $8 billion worth of unpaid taxes. I do not know where she gets that figure, but the hon. member should know that when she refers to those people who have paid lower taxes or no taxes, a lot of it has to do with the application of the lifetime capital gains exemption.

I am not sure what the position of the New Democratic Party is. It depends on what day you listen to those members. Some days they are in favour of a lifetime capital gains exemption on farmers and small businesses and on others they are not. They are going to have to make up their minds.

The hon. member has colleagues who are in provincial governments. They too are faced with the reality of meeting fiscal constraints. They are also faced with the difficulty of rising costs, both in health care and education, and we are trying to deal with those.

However, let me just say this. The hon. leader of the New Democratic Party talks about New Democratic Party proposals. Its unemployment insurance critic said the government should look into just printing the money needed and to spend its way out of the recession. Instead of borrowing the money we should just create it and then we will not have to pay it back. That is the silliest economic philosophy I have heard in Canada, let alone coming from a member of Parliament.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I am suggesting to the minister today that the Minister of National Revenue has said there is $8 billion of uncollected revenue. His government in fact should look at collecting that and addressing poverty in that way.

The minister mentioned the responsibilities of the provinces. The Canada Assistance Plan states that governments should provide funds to ensure: "The basic requirement of food, shelter, clothing, fuel, utilities, household supplies, and personal requirements". This is not being done.

This government, by putting the cap on CAP on the three provinces of Alberta, British Columbia and Ontario where over half of Canada's poor reside, has walked away from one-half of Canada's poor. Will the Minister of Finance in a sincere attempt to address poverty, reinstate the 50/50 cost-sharing of CAP with those three provinces that contain half of Canada's poor?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member wants the federal government to print more money or find more money and send it on to the provinces.

If she looked at page 91 of the Ontario budget she would find according to its records that federal payments to the Government of Ontario in 1992-1993 will rise by 17.2 per cent. This is at a time when we are trying to constrain our government expenditures to no more than 3 per cent per year.

The hon. member cannot have it both ways. Is she suggesting we follow the policy of her party as enunciated by her employment critic, the hon. member for Timmins—Chapleau, as reported in the Hamilton Spectator: "The government should look into just printing the money they need to spend their way out of the recession". He goes on to say: "When we borrow money to do a project that money has to be repaid. We are just chasing in circles like a dog chasing its tail and not getting anywhere. Instead of borrowing the money we should create it and then we will not have to pay it back."

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I too have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

The Canadian Mental Health Association says this is the worst recession in Canadian history. It has brought with it record numbers of suicides, child and wife abuse, drug addiction, alcoholism and the breakdown of families.

Instead of accepting the association's report and helping these unemployed victims of recession, the government kicks them when they are down by slashing UI benefits and killing job training programs.

Will this government today introduce programs to save our 1.5 million unemployed whose pain is eating at the soul of this country?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, many members of Parliament have seen first-hand the devastating results of a family faced with long-term unemployment or no job prospects. I do not think anyone takes pleasure in seeing that.

Many of us have struggled to fight the destructive elements that flow from this kind of situation. Just last week with the Liberal premier and an NDP premier in British Columbia, this government entered into a demonstration project with both B.C. and New Brunswick to try to break that cycle of dependency of people, to try to help these people in need to become self-sufficient and independent.

The hon. member should recognize that these measures which have been taken are important steps in trying to help needy Canadians.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, the numbers are not good enough.

Last week I met with unemployed constituents in my riding of Winnipeg North. They told me the federal government has done nothing to help them. There is no job training, no counselling, no hope.

Will the minister fly to my riding and tell my constituents he is doing all he can do? Can he look them in the eye and say that his hands are tied?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, again and again, we have Liberal theatrics. The hon. member wants to look at Manitoba and the city of Winnipeg and he wants numbers. I know the Liberal way is always measuring any action in terms of dollars spent, the taxpayer's money, by the way, and only one taxpayer.

We have in place in the city of Winnipeg, just like in every other city in Canada, a whole range of programs for Canadian youth, for the unemployed and for social assistance recipients.

I have just completed with all provinces the signing of a social assistance recipients agreement. We are working co-operatively with the provinces in trying to complement each other's programs in order to be more effective for those poor people.

The Liberals like to print money the old way and then they want us to tax people more or even increase the deficit. Canadians have made it clear that they have had enough taxes. They have had enough of this deficit that is killing the future of our kids.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

This government has made a practice of blaming unskilled workers for high unemployment when the real culprit is their own anti-inflation experiment that has starved the country of jobs.

The workers sacrificed by this government face the perils of family violence, higher rates of infant mortality and family breakdown, while traditional unemployment support is being denied.

Did the minister calculate the human toll on Canada's unemployed and their families when he chose to pay for a 2 per cent drop in inflation with their livelihoods?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the hon. member refers to the plight of Canadians who are affected by job losses and unemployment resulting from a recession that is not confined to Canada, and a restructuring that our economy has to go through. That is not unique to Canada but it is imperative for the country if we are going to remain competitive in these markets. That allows us as Canadians from coast to coast to coast to earn the money in order to have the standard of living we do in this country.

She says we blame unskilled Canadians. We do not blame unskilled Canadians. But maybe unskilled Canadians could blame that member and her party for having in this House and in the other place stalled the reform of this UI program to take this money and activate it in order to train Canadians.

From $500 million a year two years ago to train unemployed Canadians, this year we will be spending $1.8 billion and unemployed Canadians will benefit from the policy of this government.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Madam Speaker, Canadians know that Tory times are hard times.

We have witnessed a Tory chain of despair that has forced workers off assembly lines, through the unemployment lines and straight on to welfare.

I ask the minister who prides himself on competitiveness to tell us how Canada can compete when the talents of nearly one-fifth of Canadian workers have been wasted in this Tory fiscal furnace.

• (1140)

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I know I have to be polite and respect the rules of this House and I will.

I will tell the hon. member this. I think Canadians see it. The people over there, les socialistes en cravates, want us to print money to get out of our problems, and the Liberals want us to spend our way out of our problems. However Canadians are telling the government that we have to be more efficient with their dollars, with the taxpayers' hard earned money. We are doing this, Madam Speaker.

I know the hon. member cares about poor people. She asks what the Minister of Finance did for the working poor. In the last budget this government started something that will revolutionize social security programs in Canada by targeting hard earned money to the working poor, to those people who need government assistance in order to meet their obligations.

Of course, no Liberals could see through this, it is much too complicated.

TRADE

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, when it comes to printing money they will print it for Olympia & York.

My question is for the Minister for International Trade. I want to ask the minister what mechanism he has in his office to monitor legislation in the United States that is being passed by the House or by the Senate that is in direct violation of the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, the hon. member should withdraw the innuendo in the first part of the preamble.

Mr. Barrett: It is not an innuendo, it is an accusation.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Okay, withdraw the accusation if that is how he is going to describe it, because he knows there is no truth in it.

I appreciate the opportunity to respond to the hon. member's question because he has misstated something I said in this House last week, when he said that I referred to some practices undertaken by municipalities in the southern United States as contrary to the free trade agreement. They are not contrary to the free trade agreement; they are practices which I would just as soon not see take place. They are not contrary to the free trade agreement.

He did ask a specific question: Do we have people monitoring what is happening in the United States to see whether actions are taken which are contrary to the free trade agreement? Yes. That is what our embassy is for. It is very active in aggressively seeking out places where bills have been presented by various members of Congress and making sure that the administration understands where they are contrary to the free trade agreement. In practically every case we have been able to get those beaten down.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, in the aside that we are exchanging, I will not withdraw that statement about Olympia & York. The government will find money for them if they need it and that is my accusation.

My second question is for the same minister. Is the minister aware that two days ago, in the House of Representatives, a bill passed that would require all ships involved in foreign trade to certify that they were neither built nor repaired with the aid of foreign subsidies? They were ships without certificates showing that would be barred from transporting goods in or out of United States' ports. Also the bill would require the commerce department to publish a list of foreign ships that receive government subsidies.

The only large floating drydock in the hands of the Canadian people is on the west coast of Vancouver and it has had a subsidy. It could not have been built without one. If this bill is enforced, it means any ship carrying Canadian products into the U.S. could not land in the United States.

This is a direct violation of the free trade agreement. What is the minister going to do about it?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I suppose the innuendo or accusation, however he wants to describe it, that he has just thrown this way would also apply to his friends in Queen's Park because the speculation that is running around about Olympia & York applies equally as much to the province of Ontario as to the federal government. Is he saying his friends in Queen's Park are wrong as well?

When it comes to printing money, that is a specific policy I understand of the New Democratic Party. With all the bluster that the hon. member can sum up, maybe he might get it through his head that he could tell the truth about the policies of the New Democratic Party.

PHARMACEUTICAL INDUSTRY

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

After studying the cost of over 3.5 million prescriptions, covering 16,000 drugs worth over $1 billion, the Green Shield report clearly shows that Canadians have been misled and that drug prices have been rising in Canada at an annual rate of over 11 per cent.

My question to the minister is this. Why does the minister and his government continue to deny and obstruct the fact that they have completely failed in their responsibilities to protect Canadian consumers from unwarranted rises in the cost of prescription drugs?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Madam Speaker, our officials should not be accused of misleading consumers throughout Canada, because the figures—I have the Green Shield report which our officials analyzed—do show that the cost of patent and non-patent medicine increased in one province, Ontario, in a limited period. The cost includes pharmacists' fees, prescription fees and the fact that new medicines on the market are being used. Many new drugs on the market are much more expensive than those that were there before, so it is like comparing oranges and apples, or tomatoes and corn. Yes, we are very concerned about this situation, and that is why my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and I and our provincial colleagues will look at this together—

An hon. member: It is a disgrace.

Mr. Blais: Yes, the former minister of consumer affairs just spoke about a disgrace, although they opposed—

[English]

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister.

In 1987, when the government decided to increase monopolistic patent protection in Canada, in response to concerns from seniors, provincial governments and consumers that this would lead to higher drug prices, the hon. House leader said, and I quote: "The Drug Prices Review Board will ensure that prices are reasonable and do not get out of line".

Do the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and his government really believe that an 11 per cent annual rise in the cost of prescription drugs is reasonable? Further does he believe that the Patent Medicine Prices Review Board warrants any credibility in the eyes of Canadian consumers?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Madam Speaker, I said yesterday and I repeat today that I am not satisfied with a general increase of that size in the price of drugs. I already said that and I hope that my colleague is not suggesting that we should invade provincial jurisdiction, since the provinces are responsible for generic drugs.

What I am saying is that we, in our field of jurisdiction, have to look after patent drugs. The figures that we have on the price increases of patent drugs throughout Canada show us that they are less than the rate of inflation. Those figures are real, and the hon. member knows it because he did not challenge successive reports of the Drug Prices Review Board even once since 1987. Nevertheless, since the prices have increased in general and it is in provincial jurisdiction, we must sit down with the provinces and look at this increase together and find a solution together.

[English]

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the same minister.

Yet another promise was made by the current House leader when he was the minister responsible in this House on November 18, 1986, when he said: "The price of drugs will not increase by one cent, not those now on the market, not those coming on the market. Drug prices will not go up but by a single penny".

Given that the price has not gone up by one penny but has gone up by 11 per cent every year since 1987, why did the government mislead Canadians on such a fundamentally important health issue to all Canadian families?

• (1150)

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Madam Speaker, I will use the words spoken by the member for Papineau—Saint-Michel. It is a disgrace for a member who knows the facts to lead Canadians to believe things that are not true. That is a disgrace.

The truth is that the price of patent medicine throughout Canada has increased at a lower rate than inflation. The over-all price of all medication, including generic drugs, with the cost of medication, pharmacists' fees and the more expensive medicine which doctors now prescribe more often, has increased for consumers and health costs across Canada have gone up as a result. We are prepared to discuss this reality with the provinces not to invade their field of jurisdiction, but to discuss with them how to control these prices, as we have done at the federal level. We have managed to control them.

[English]

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, on this issue, we on this side of the House agree with another quote, one from the member of Parliament for Halifax West when he said in reference to this government: "The public no longer considers us honest". That is what his colleague on the government side said.

Given that Canadian families know that the price of medicine has risen dramatically, why does the government refuse, given its false promises, to roll back the cost of medicine being currently charged to Canadian families and hospitals against the commitments of this government?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Madam Speaker, as for quoting a former minister of consumer affairs, I might quote one myself. Judy Erola was a minister of consumer affairs and she considers this government's position good. She was a Liberal minister, if I am not mistaken. What we did in 1987 was to align Canadian legislation with what was going on in other parts of the world, so that now Canadian researchers can work here in Canada to improve medication and create new drugs to treat Canadians. That is what we wanted to do with Bill C-22. The price of patent medicine over which we have jurisdiction has not gone up more than inflation, despite what members opposite seem to be saying.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister.

As the Acting Prime Minister will know, the United Nations Conference on the Environment and Development will begin in Rio de Janeiro in less than three weeks.

A little less than three months ago, the Standing Committee on Energy, Mines and Resources tabled its interim report. Contained in that report was a series of recommendations to which the standing committee requested a response. No response thus far has been forthcoming and the UNCED deadline is drawing near.

I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister if the government has accepted the standing committee's recommendation No. 3 to, and I quote from the report: "seek a global commitment to a reduction of total global anthropogenic greenhouse gas emissions by 20 per cent from 1990 levels by the year 2005 to be achieved by co-ordinated global efforts". Has the government accepted that recommendation and will it be working for it in Brazil?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows that the Standing Orders of the House allow the government 150 days in which to report, as was discussed with members of the committee. The hon. member is possibly trying to create the impression that the government is not willing to respond. The government is responding.

The Minister of the Environment has clearly stated many times that the issue of the Canadian position in Rio is one that has been established for some period of time, namely on stabilization based on 1990.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, a supplementary question. The problem, of course, is that the 150 days does not expire until July 23. If we are to have a response from the government prior to the commencement of the UNCED conference, we must have it very soon.

Let me ask as a supplementary question whether the government has accepted now, as policy, the fourth recommendation of the standing committee which is: "the federal government instruct the Canadian UNCED delegation to support proposals to facilitate Canada taking global action such as contributing financially and through technology transfer, to emissions reduction efforts in other countries".

Has the government accepted that recommendation? Will it pursue that goal in Brazil?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, my first answer applies also to this recommendation concerning the Standing Orders of the House. The government will reply at the appropriate time.

EMPLOYMENT

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, we have been listening to the responses of the Minister of Employment and Immigration and we certainly agree with him that he has revolutionized the social welfare programs.

He has just been forcing more and more Canadians on to the welfare rolls with those programs. The figures of Statistics Canada show that in Quebec, there are more families who live under the poverty line than anywhere else in Canada except in Manitoba.

Does the minister not realize that the Stats Canada figures are just confirming the growing food lines, the poverty lines, the hopeless and the homeless lines across this land? I ask the Minister of Communications—do not mix me up—the minister of employment—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mrs. Finestone: —what concrete, new measures is this minister prepared to announce today that might give one ray of hope to a Montrealer, to a Quebecer with these new statistics in front of them?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, again the hon. member refers specifically to the people unemployed and on welfare in Quebec.

She will be pleased to know that notwithstanding the opposition's strong resistance to trying to activate this passive money under UI, instead of paying people to do nothing at home, we are encouraging them, helping them get new training and upgrading their skills.

I know that Liberals have opposed this and are still opposing this, but we are doing it. Because we are doing this, we will be spending close to $800 million this year in the province of Quebec trying to help these people retrain and upgrade their skills.

She says that this policy of the government has resulted in more people being unemployed. Last year my department helped 630,000 Canadians go through these training programs and we expect with the increase in the training money that we have brought forward, $300 million, that we should be able to help more this year.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, all this propaganda with no policy is why I mistook him for the Minister of Communications.

Community cultural groups have been reporting to me that there is the highest level of social tension ever being experienced in the centre of Montreal right now. The government's policies are drawing and driving more and more Montrealers into poverty, and it is not prepared to announce even one new program.

I would like to know, does the minister not meet poverty and homelessness on his streets like I do along Victoria and Côte-des-Neiges? Will the minister listen? Could he tell me what he says to his constituents so that I can tell them the same story?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, for the information and edification of the hon. member, I need no lessons about poor people.

I come from northern New Brunswick. I come from Atlantic Canada and I have seen what these passive programs are doing to our people in Canada, in Atlantic Canada. We pay them money to do nothing on welfare and UI. We are trying to activate this money and we are being opposed every inch of the way by Liberals instead of standing up here and trying to help those people.

All they can do is call for more money, more taxes, a higher deficit.

TRADE

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade.

Certain representatives of the Government of Saskatchewan have recently been critical of the amount of consultation that has occurred between the federal government and themselves concerning NAFTA and GATT.

Can the minister rationalize this accusation? Has there been meaningful consultation or is this accusation simply posturing for the top row of the chicken coop in the hallways of the Saskatchewan legislature?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I am not sure how to characterize it, but there have been very extensive consultations on the NAFTA itself.

In the last year, we have had some 30 federal–provincial conferences or telephone conferences. On the Uruguay round, over the same period, it is a few more. It has worked out to at least one federal–provincial meeting a week on either of the two major trade negotiations that are under way.

My last meeting was this past Monday. We went through in some detail the current status of the NAFTA negotiations. It was my assessment, having heard the comments of the provincial representatives, that they are quite satisfied with the level of consultation and feel that their interests are being well represented in the negotiations.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

It is beyond belief that the government has refused to support a compulsory international ban on the dumping of radioactive waste into the world's oceans. It is all the more incredible that it has refused to do so at the earth summit in Brazil where Canada is seeking global support to prevent overfishing in the north Atlantic. Our case on the fishery depends in part on convincing the world to take environmental custodianship of the oceans. The place to make that happen, according to the minister of fisheries, is in Brazil.

Why then is the government undercutting the earth summit? In fact, why is the government undercutting its own attempt to protect the Atlantic fishery?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member spoke to the participants in the prep–coms from other countries he would find that Canada had played a leading role in all of the issues that are coming before the earth summit in Rio.

Our Prime Minister will be there making strong statements on a number of the things that we want to accomplish there and certainly the high seas summit and the conservation of the fishery has been well received. We took the lead on that, and I will be raising it again at the Organization of American States when I am there this weekend.

I think that the hon. member will want to join with all Canadians at the earth summit and be very proud of the record that Canada will have there.

TRADE

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

Yesterday the Minister of the Environment indicated that it is his understanding that Canadians will not be informed of the environmental impact of the North American free trade agreement until after the minister signs the deal with Mexico and the United States.

Will the Minister for International Trade assure this House that the Minister of the Environment was wrong and that the environmental assessment will be made available to all members of this House prior to his signing the agreement?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, at various stages in dealing with the agreement there is an initialling of the agreement, the initial announcement after the negotiations are completed. There is a signing of the agreement at which time it would go to the legislatures for handling and then there will be the full debate on the legislation as presented.

At this point in time, I cannot give my hon. friend a specific statement as to when the environmental assessment results can be made available to members of Parliament, but there will be opportunity for full discussion before the final legislation.

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, I have five petitions signed by some 200 Canadians who would like the government to reconsider its decision to abolish the Court Challenges Program.

This program, according to petitioners, helped clarify to the courts the constitutional, linguistic and equality rights of Canadians. It also made the courts accessible to all Canadians seeking justice and was a very inexpensive program that benefited all Canadians, regardless of their means, which approximately cost about 10 cents per person per year.

The Court Challenges Program was an essential development of legal precedents in this country following the adoption of our Charter of Rights and Freedoms. These people rely on this program to have their rights clarified in the courts all over this court. The abolition of the Court Challenges Program is an incalculable loss of equality and social justice in this country and the petitioners urge the government to consider the advisability of reinstating the Court Challenges Program which facilitated the accessibility of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms to all Canadians.

EAST TIMOR

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Madam Speaker, it is my honour to present four petitions signed by over 500 Canadians from Vancouver Island, Vancouver and the Ottawa area.

These people are pointing out the hypocrisy between the government's words and actions when it comes to human rights violations internationally, specifically the very tepid Canadian response to the slaughter of innocent Timorese several months ago.

These people are calling on Parliament to condemn the Indonesian military occupation of East Timor, to condemn the genocide of the East Timorese people, to support publicly the right of the East Timorese people to determine their own destiny by referendum and free elections, and to support these causes in the United Nations and all other international arenas.

CANADIAN RACE RELATIONS FOUNDATION

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present four petitions from people in Manitoba, Ontario and most of Quebec.

The Canadian Race Relations Foundation is one of the most essential components of any drive to eliminate racial discrimination in Canada.

The petitioners call on Parliament to urge the government to consider the advisability of establishing the Canadian Race Relations Foundation this fiscal year.

CONFEDERATION

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Madam Speaker, I have a petition from Edmonton Kinsmen and Kinette club members indicating their support for the proud to be Canadian project during the celebration of the 125th anniversary of Confederation.

Unfortunately this petition could not be certified since it does not meet all the criteria, but as a kin member myself, I wanted the members of this House and the Canadian public to know of the strong kin support to nurture a positive life-long—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have to call the member to order. It is quite unfair to rise under presenting petitions with a petition that has not been certified.

REFUGEES

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I have a petition signed by residents in the national capital region. These petitioners are calling on the government to step up its efforts when dealing with refugee cases.

Many of these refugees are suffering from personal and economic hardship and their future is undecided as they are awaiting the slow refugee process.

[Translation]

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition on the same subject. Your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to urge the government to take special steps to deal with the refugee problem and to show some compassion. Thousands of people need the government's compassion, and I hope the minister of immigration will respond with compassion to the thousands of very important cases that are still pending.

CAPITAL GAINS EXEMPTION

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, I have a petition with 30 signatures from Nepean and area residents. The 1992-93 federal budget has eliminated the $100,000 lifetime capital gains exemption on real estate purchased after February 1992 and restricted on real estate purchased before 1992. This capital gains exemption gave many middle-class Canadians an affordable means of investing their savings at a minimal cost to the government.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to reinstate the $100,000 lifetime capital gains exemption on real estate.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I am pleased especially today to be able to present a petition on behalf of 31 members of my riding who ask this Parliament to enact legislation providing for a referendum of the people related to constitutional amendments.

We just saw first reading of such a piece of legislation and to my constituents, I hope we have that in place sometime in the very near future.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 236, 278 and 288.

Question No. 236—Mr. Caccia:

Since the June 1990 announcement of the Minister of the Environment that cabinet policies would be subjected to an environmental impact assessment and that a public statement would be released, (a) which policies have been subjected to environmental impact assessments (b) who conducted each assessment (c) when and how was, or will, the public statement be released?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): As the hon. member knows, policy and program proposals, where appropriate, are advanced for cabinet review, after consideration of the environmental implications of such proposals. Of course, when the analysis shows that no significant environmental effect is anticipated as a result of a certain proposal, that conclusion is indicated and no further elaboration or statement is required.

Some examples of recent policies and programs that included a rather substantial environmental assessment which supports the early integration of environmental considerations in the decision-making process, include:

The Canadian Policy on Nuclear Vessels in Canadian Waters which examined the environmental considerations and effects of visits of nuclear-powered vessels to Canadian ports; and

The Transit of Dixon Entrance by U.S. submarines, a policy for which an environmental assessment was an integral part of the decision.

Of course, on the program proposals side, all program initiatives proposed under the green plan—77 to date—were subjected to an environmental assessment at the planning stage.

Similarly, Agriculture Canada integrated an environmental assessment of the Farm Safety Net Program.

In addition, an environmental review of the North America free trade agreement is being conducted by this government.

In response to the question of who conducts each assessment, it is the initiating minister of the policy or program that is responsible for ensuring that the integration, quality, and timeliness of the environmental assessment is considered fully and early in the decision process.

The public statements are released at the same time as the government's policy or program initiatives are announced. Supporting studies or documents are referred to in these statements. For some of the policy proposals cited above, the entire studies were referred to and made available to the public.

Question No. 278—Mr. Milliken:

For each fiscal year since 1988, did the Department of Finance commission any public opinion polls and, if so (a) how many (b) what was the total cost?

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Public opinion polls commissioned by the Department of Finance 1988-1992:

a) Fiscal year 1988-89—2

b) Fiscal year 1988-89—$230,000

Question No. 288—Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East):

Since January 1, 1989, has the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs received any complaints concerning unregistered lobbyists' activities and, if so (a) how many were referred to the RCMP for investigation (b) how many were referred to other agencies for action (c) how many were referred to the office of the Minister (d) what was done with the remaining complaints?

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): The Lobbyists Registration Act came into force on September 30, 1989. Since that time, the registrar who is responsible for administering the act has been made aware, through the media, of two cases of potential non-registered lobbyists, and both cases were referred to the RCMP. No other formal complaints have been received.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that Question No. 164 be deemed to have been made an Order for Return?

Question No. 164—Mr. Stupich:

Since September 1984, has the government entered into contracts with (a) Saga Communications of St. John's, Newfoundland (b) Ad Vantage Ltd., of St. John's, Newfoundland (c) Medford Associates Ltd. of Halifax, Nova Scotia (d) Triton Development Ltd. of St. John's, Newfoundland (e) Omni Facts Research of St. John's, Newfoundland and if so (i) on what dates (ii) for what amount (iii) for what purpose.

Return tabled.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Andre that Bill C–73, an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act, be read a second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope; and the amendment of Mr. Boudria (p. 10744).

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, it is an interesting bill we are debating here today. It is one of these bills that in the future we would always be able to go back to, if the government had the opportunity to govern much longer, which it will not, and there would be a wealth of denials about the actual intent of the government when it introduces pieces of legislation.

I listened with a great deal of amusement to the minister responsible and some of his colleagues opposite. They gave eloquent speeches in the House today on those wonderful employees of Canada Post Corporation.

All I can ask is, why did it take you so long to realize that the people who work at Canada Post Corporation are indeed wonderful public servants who deserve some respect from this government and deliver a tremendous service to all Canadians?

A member opposite was speaking just prior to Question Period, and I was almost apoplectic in my chair. He was talking about the wonderful service and what terribly efficient people work at the Canada Post Corporation. He even had to delve into the Never Never Land of the North Pole and Santa Claus. All these wonderful men and women that work at Canada Post even process mail that comes with the postal code HOH OHO. I say to him: "Oh, oh, oh".

He converted himself on the road to Damascus on this issue, because the record of this government in dealing with those wonderful public servants who are just trying to get a decent day's pay for an honest day's work has been absolutely abysmal.

The government got up today and got its members up like trained seals to read memorandums and speeches written by the department saying: "Forgive us, forgive us, forgive us, we know not what we have done. We really did not mean to kick you all over the mat and all over the carpet, you employees of Canada Post".

It is saying: "Yes, we finally realize that you are nice people and are deserving of some praise from the government, your employer in this country", but that is not the way it has been. To deny the past is not something I will allow the government to do here.

The Canada Post Corporation is perhaps the one service that touches every single Canadian because hopefully at some point in your life you are going to receive a letter from somebody. Every month I get too many bills from a whole lot of people and maybe a few letters as well.

Canada Post is one of the most visible signs of the Government of Canada for the people of our nation. The postman used to ring the door bell. We used to be proud that we had a national system of mail delivery which was second to none anywhere in the world. We used to talk about how proud our public servants were to deliver that service for Canadians from the Canadian postal service, Canada Post.

When the government led by Brian Mulroney came in, and I do not have the quotes here but I put them to the record often enough, the reckless rhetoric of the Prime Minister leading up to the 1984 election should have given us a signal of what his true intent was in terms of the Public Service in Canada, including those public servants at Canada Post.

He talked at length about how there would be pink slips issued everywhere. We all remember those quotes from the election campaign. The master of hyperbole on the other side of the House, the great Prime Minister of Canada, was going to clean out the House, he was going to teach those nasty old public servants and post office workers a lesson.

He was saying: "Torydom is in town and fear for your jobs. You are going to be the scapegoat of everything we do wrong. You are going to be vilified by this government because you are an easy mark and an easy target". That is exactly what the Tories did.

We saw the great postal service of Canada dismantled piece by piece, letter by letter, by this government opposite.

The government first of all announced that in urban areas there would be no more delivery to new homes. There is the unbelievable situation in places like Dartmouth, where a small piece of the community had not yet been developed residentially. Maybe it was a farmer's field, or maybe it was something else. Maybe it was just not developed. Everybody around them has been getting mail for 100 years. Now somebody puts a new street in and they do not get door-to-door delivery any more. This Conservative government with its penchant for cutting back and its absolute desire to destroy anything Canadian, anything that every Canadian could reach out and touch and say: "That is what makes me a Canadian". It put in supermailboxes. In the middle of some of the biggest cities we have supermailboxes. Is that not wonderful. I pay the same price for my postal service as the person down the road, but the person down the road gets supermailboxes.

Back when I was elected the post office was a big issue. People wanted to know how the Liberal Party would deal with Canada Post, whether the Liberal Party was committed to reinstating door-to-door delivery, or whether the Liberal Party would ensure that in rural Canada, where the post office is the most visible and perhaps the only symbol of this national government, we would not abandon them.

There have been thousands and thousands of petitions presented to this Parliament since I got elected.

An hon. member: Places like Cow Head.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): My hon. friend from Newfoundland says places like Cow Head. I was in Cow Head. Those people have been abandoned. They have been abandoned because Canada Post made a decision that came right from the mouth of the government babes opposite in the front benches that it was going to dismantle Canada Post and not run it as a service, but run it as a business.

If that means that some Canadians can expect to get less service than other Canadians then so be it. If that means breaking the backs of the unions then so be it. If it means raising the price of a stamp as high it can dare go then so be it. If it means Canada Post acquiring companies and competing with good private sector companies, such as courier services, then so be it. If it means having the president of a Crown corporation, Canada Post, who does not feel that he is responsible to anybody but God, and maybe not even to God, then so be it. That is what this government has set about to do.

We have seen an erosion in mail service right across Canada. The government can give you all kinds of statistics. Maybe in an urban area like mine it is okay. Maybe people do not mind going down to the IGA to buy their stamps or pick up their parcels, maybe they do not. However, in a rural area the post office was not just a building where you picked up your mail; it was a symbol of Canada. In many of those communities all over Canada, in the prairies, the only visible sign of the Government of Canada, of this great nation of ours, of this great institution of Parliament, was the post office. The Tories did not have any mandate from the Canadian public to shut it down, to deliver it to the hands of the private sector. However, that is exactly what it has done.

In the last few years we have seen the government develop a policy, an abominable policy, to go into areas of our Public Service and make people feel that they are no longer welcome to contribute their day's labour for the meagre pay they get. It means going into places like Canada Post and allowing the president of Canada Post and some of the people he has put around him to go in and poison the atmosphere between labour and management to such an extent that last year, a year and a half ago, there were nearly 100,000 grievances in Canada Post.

This is our government. This is our government's own postal service. This is the government that passes laws, that dictates the procedures that are acceptable and are not acceptable for workers on job sites. Yet in this corporation, which it owns, it has poisoned the atmosphere so badly that pregnant women down in the Gateway plant in metropolitan Toronto were not given permission to go to the washroom. That was two years ago. Racial discrimination was a practice in postal sorting stations in other parts of the country. Grievances that should have been settled right there on the workshop floor were forced into the grievance procedure. That was not by accident. It was by grand design.

This government is hell-bent on, and I have said it since 1988, privatizing Canada's postal service.

If that means delivering it to the highest bidder and that highest bidder happens to be an American south of the border, as much as I love my American neighbours down south, I do not want them delivering my mail in Dartmouth.

What the government has done here is a little sleight of hand. It has come in and said: "Look, here is what we are going to do here. We are going to sell off 10 per cent of the shares"—whatever the heck that means—"of Canada Post. We are going to let the employees buy into it".

The hon. member opposite said: "We think that if we allow them to take part of the ownership of the corporation, it will motivate them to provide better service. We think that it would give them a sense of entrepreneurial spirit. We think it would deliver a sense of commitment".

The hon. member opposite talked earlier about the awarding of medals and talked about some postal worker down in Atlantic Canada, I think it was in Halifax, who did something that he considered extraordinary. He went beyond the call of duty. If this government were not on a search and destroy mission on the unions of Canada Post, which it has been on since it was elected, it would have recognized that what he was talking about today was not the exception, it was the rule and it still is the rule in most of the postal service in Canada. Those people do not have horns. They are just like you and I. They are trying to make a decent day's pay for a decent day's labour and they do not want to be harassed on the worksite and they do not want to have grievances filed and they do not want medals from the government.

All they want is a little respect for the job that they do on behalf of each and every Canadian. That is all they want. They do not need shares in a corporation that they already own as Canadians to have a sense of pride and commitment to their work. As a Canadian citizen, each and every one of those employees does own that Crown corporation because it is owned by the Government of Canada.

Let us strip this bill down for what it is. It is nothing short of a scam. It is a waste of time even to be debating the damned thing if it were not so important that we try to uncover the government's true agenda here. The government's true agenda here is not to motivate its employees. Can you imagine? I was almost waiting for elevator music to be played in the background while the hon. member eloquently professed this new-found love for the postal workers in Canada.

This bill is the first step on the slippery slope to privatizing the Canada Post Corporation. That is what it is. One of the members opposite is smiling. He is probably smiling because he knows I am on to them. He is smiling because he is not running again. He knows that what I am saying now is not going to affect him. He has probably already got his pension, he is okay.

What this does is it brings into legislation a process that was begun a few years ago. If you break the union's spirit, if you convince the Canadian public that these people really do not give them good service anyway, and then if you mandate the Crown corporation to increase rates, get into competition in the private sector so that it can improve its profit line, it makes it more attractive when you want to sell the darned thing off.

The government, if it were ever allowed to govern again after the next election, it would bring another bill in and would ask: "What is so different? We already started this thing. We gave 10 per cent to the employees. I do not know why the opposition is complaining and bellyaching".

The opposition is complaining and bellyaching because not everything can be run exactly like a business when you have a country like Canada. You cannot run everything exactly like a business. You cannot run the country exactly like a business. You have to run it as a nation. To run it as a nation means that there are costs incurred. To run it as a nation also means that you have to understand the requirements, the desires and the aspirations of those people whom you govern. This gang opposite has lost all sense of sensibility on that score. We all know that. It was jumping for joy last week because it was at 16 per cent in the polls. Can you imagine? Just think how it is going to jump if it ever hits 18 per cent.

We had the president of Canada Post at the consumer and corporate affairs committee. It was an experience. I have never heard so many words say so little in all my life.

We wanted to find out whether Canada Post was in the business of providing service or if it was in the business of improving its profit line so that it could ostensibly sell itself in the public sector, in the private sector.

• (1230)

One of the things that we looked at was the courier service. Maybe I am a little dense but I thought Canada Post's responsibility, since it had a monopoly on first-class mail, was to deliver first-class mail. I did not think that the responsibility of a Crown corporation, which has the weight of the public purse behind it, was to go and compete with private sector corporations. That is exactly what this corporation has done.

This corporation is cross-subsidizing a courier service, Priority Courier Service. It has now been able, through cross-subsidization from the profits on its first-class mail service, to go in and capture 25 per cent of the courier market in Canada.

Everybody here and out there probably watched something dealing with the Olympics. I asked the president why he would be getting into private sector areas which are well served, in private sector areas where people are losing jobs now because the market has softened because of this government's induced recession. Why would he be getting in as a Crown corporation and competing with those individuals? It is a business decision, he said.

"Are you taking money", I asked, "from the monopoly that you get on first-class mail and all the profits that ensue and pumping it over into your courier service, basically undercutting predatory pricing and undercutting your competition?" "Never would we do that", the president said.

I asked if Canada Post did any advertising in the Olympics. He said it did. When I asked him how much, he said that was confidential information. I watched the Olympics and I cannot remember once seeing an ad from Canada Post, but I remember seeing all kinds of ads from the courier service which is competing with private sector courier services and putting many of them out of business in small towns in Canada.

Now the president of Canada Post knows what his mandate is. It is to make the company as profitable as he can. If that means a loss of service in rural Canada, so be it. If it means higher prices, so be it. If it means dismantling the corporation, so be it. If it means predatory pricing practices on the private sector, so be it. The ultimate goal of this government is to privatize Canada Post.

I can foresee the day, if we ever gave these guys opposite another chance, that UPS would be delivering mail to my door by a fellow with an American flag on his lapel or on his shoulder. I can see that day if these guys opposite have their way.

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): Get serious.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): The hon. member opposite said to get serious. I am very, very serious. The hon. member opposite knows full well what the government's intent is. If he were honest with himself and his constituents he would tell them. If the intent of the government in this bill is try to motivate the employees of Canada Post to be more productive and to feel that they have a better say in what goes on, treat them with a little bit of respect. Do not be forcing them through the grievance procedure every time something happens on the floor of the post office. You do not have to bring a bill into Parliament, you just have to have some respect in the way that you treat the people of Canada Post.

The hon. member opposite knows this because he was the chairman of the consumer and corporate affairs committee. When the Liberal task force on Canada Post was conducting hearings, he came and sat in on some of the hearings and he expressed to me his concern about the way Canada Post management was handling some of those grievances at the shop floor level. I want to remind him of that.

This bill here is awful. This bill seeks through the back door and through the premise that the government is trying to help the employees, to de-stabilize and start us on the slippery slope to privatization of Canada Post. It is not a bill I am going to support.

I believe that Canada Post has a primary responsibility to offer quality service to Canadians. I am not opposed to Canada Post's mandate being changed to suit changing times. I am opposed to Canada Post's getting involved in the private sector. They are all supposed to be private sector people over there. They all jump up and down and say: "Private sector, private sector". If they are so concerned about the private sector, get Canada Post out of the business of competing with private courier services across Canada for a start and start preserving some jobs. You cannot speak out of both sides of your mouth all the time, although a lot of members opposite try that all the time. I find that they bite their lip a lot.

I cannot support this bill. I know what this bill is all about and the Canadian public knows what this bill is all about. No matter what flowery language those converted on the road to Damascus opposite are going to use in this debate, those individuals who work at Canada Post will judge the gang opposite by its record and not by its rhetoric.

The record has been abysmal. It has crushed the spirits of people who wanted to work at Canada Post. It has driven people out and a once proud, productive and wonderful place to work, Canada Post, has become a nightmare for most of those employees.

In conclusion, let me say I would hope that the people listening out there do not get sucked in once again by another Tory promise that this is going to improve service. Remember what they said and judge them accordingly the next time you go to the polls.

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Madam Speaker, I did not want to stop this show. This gentleman is about to graduate from the George Baker school of oratory. He has been so amusing so far that I want to ask him a question so that he can continue for a little while.

He came here in 1988. He is telling us all the wonderful things that have gone on with Canada Post. He does not remember the days prior to that when Canada Post was running a deficit of almost $1 billion. He does not remember when 70 per cent of complaints in member's offices were about Canada Post from the citizens of this country who were not getting service and turnaround time.

Now we have a corporation that we can be truly proud of. It is finally showing a profit, finally being productive and putting forward a real effort to deliver on time. Ninety-nine per cent of the mail is now delivered on time. It is showing a profit.

My question to the hon. member is does he not realize that when he talks about the ultimate privatization of Canada Post, by selling to the employees 10 per cent it will make it almost impossible for anyone else to buy it? Who are you going to sell it to? You offer it to someone and they say: "We do not want to buy it, 10 per cent is owned by the employees. We cannot buy it".

His argument is totally out of whack. I really did enjoy the hand waving and the George Baker school of oratory style. Please continue and please try to answer that question.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): If the hon. member enjoyed the performance, perhaps he should have also listened to the content of what I said because the content was much better than the performance.

The content was absolutely factual and the hon. member opposite knows that. The hon. member can go back. If the hon. member thinks that they have done such a great job at Canada Post, I would invite him to see how many Canada Post employees he can get at his next rally if he were running again. I will show you that those Canada Post employees would not be on the inside of the hall. They would be on the outside of the hall with placards, where they were the last time after four years of Tory government in 1988.

I want to clarify something. The hon. member opposite would have us believe that I think profit is a dirty word. On the contrary, good management practices have to be promoted and, where established, recognized. There have been some substantial changes in Canada Post. Some have been extremely positive. Unfortunately, some have been absolutely devastating, mostly the ones affecting the employees of Canada Post.

The Canada Post corporation is also in the business of delivering something else which is not a dirty word and it is called service. What I seek is only a balance. I seek cost effectiveness in the delivery of the service but I also seek the delivery of service. I understand that as a Crown corporation it has a responsibility when it is owned by the federal government to try to equalize to the best of its ability, to try to equalize the level that is given, no matter where you live in Canada. That clearly is not the case now.

If the hon. member opposite believes that Canada Post just delivers letters and that is it, then he should talk to some of the people from Rural Dignity of Canada who came up here and met with his caucus. They met with the caucus of the New Democratic Party and they met with our caucus. They talked about the role of the post office in their communities. Every time they came and did that, it fell on deaf ears.

The other thing I want to say is basically that Canada Post offers good service. It is not the middle-level management and it is not the regional manager I have down in Nova Scotia. The regional manager has now been transferred to Toronto and he is one heck of a fine gentleman. He works as best he can with the restrictions that are put on him by the policies decided at the top. As a Crown corporation, the policy directive comes directly from the cabinet table through the minister responsible. That is where it comes from.

Mr. Horner: Oh, come on.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): The hon. member opposite says: "Oh, come on". He knows full well that when people are hired by Governor in Council they take orders by Governor in Council. He knows that is the case.

In conclusion, profit is not a dirty word. Neither is service, respect nor recognition for the great service that the employees, the men and women of Canada Post, have given to the Canadian public.

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member alluded earlier, he and I served together on one of the House of Commons standing committees which spent six or seven months looking into Canada Post and its operations. It came up with a fairly comprehensive set of recommendations for the future of Canada Post. One of those recommendations did in fact deal with the privatizing of the corporation.

My own personal position is in favour of that for this reason. If Canada Post could be privatized and then regulated by an independent, third party agency similar to the CRTC and the way the CRTC regulates the telephone monopoly in this country, perhaps we might have more accountability in terms of the operations of Canada Post. Perhaps there would be a mechanism whereby communities, unions or anyone else in this country interfacing with the post office might be able to go to an independent, decision-making third party or independent agency which would then be able to regulate the affairs of Canada Post.

I would like to know whether the member would see any merit in that particular reform of Canada Post and whether he might in fact see some real good coming out of a structural repositioning of Canada Post as I have just described.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, I am quite familiar with the hon. member's views on this point. I believe he is truly interested in trying to have a more efficient Canada Post corporation.

I am not opposed to measures that would see a more efficient Canada Post corporation. I am certainly not opposed to any measure that would see greater reportability as well by the corporation to the Government of Canada for the people of Canada.

The current problem we have, as the hon. member knows, is that it is like trying to find hen's teeth at times to get answers out of the senior officers of Canada Post. Every time we ask them a question they hide under commercially sensitive data. We do not know what half the decisions are, unless we sit around the cabinet table.

The one thing I am against is establishing bench-marks of absolute profitability for every service delivered. It is just like user pay. When the government opposite talks about instituting user pay, it is wonderful if you are in an area where fees can be kept low. It is wonderful if you are in an urban area, but God help you if you live out in the backwash somewhere. God help you if you live in a small community.

We know darn well that if we get into privatization of postal services, the next thing that will happen is that the services in the outer reaches of the country will diminish. Toward the centre and in the larger centres services will increase because that is where the money is made.

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): That is what a watch-dog would take care of.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): I hear the hon. member opposite. Let us get real here. Once we start dealing with the private sector, there are way too many members of Parliament who are lobbied far too heavily by high-priced lawyers and lobbyists in Ottawa.

The hon. member shakes his head. He should have sat down lately at the consumer and corporate affairs committee and listened to the banks wailing that they are not making enough money when they made $3.4 billion in profits. He should see the effect they have on government members opposite whenever any changes are proposed in any of the committees of Parliament dealing with their preferred position.

He knows as well as he knows his own name that the corruptness of the political system allows that as long as political parties are financed by private sector donations, the private sector companies that have the donations to give are going to seek a day of atonement.

I would like to see a Canada Post Corporation that has a renewed mandate to provide a certain level of service and that that certain level of service is delivered right across this country according to those standards in the most cost-effective manner possible. That is what I would like to see. In terms of those new areas it is getting into to provide a better service to Canadians like a private courier service, I would like to see it get the heck out of there.

Here is one of the problems we had. He talks about getting into the private sector. I personally would like to know how much money Canada Post lost on its courier service last year. I happen to know that almost every national courier service in Canada last year lost big bucks. I want to find out whether or not that competing priority courier service lost money. If it did, why in the name of goodness are people paying for it when they go and lick a stamp to mail a first-class letter?

The member opposite talks about the private sector. That is what starts happening when we have Crown corporations with national mandates to provide levels of service and they start tinkering with the private sector where they really should not be.

The hon. member has raised a number of interesting points. He talked about privatizing this and privatizing that. Perhaps he tells us the true agenda of the back bench and the front bench as well.

In conclusion, no, I am not for privatization. I am for the efficient management of the Canada Post corporation and fair treatment of its employees.

[Translation]

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak to Bill C-73. The constituents of Saint-Laurent—Cartierville are concerned about the fact that this legislation does nothing to improve postal services. This bill, which amends the Canada Post Corporation Act, is merely a first awkward attempt at privatization.

To quote my colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, even Margaret Thatcher had the good sense not to privatize the British postal service.

Instead of building a postal system able to meet the needs of a country the size of Canada, the Conservatives are now destroying another Canadian institution, an institution that maintains links between all the regions of our country.

[English]

Liberals and in fact all Canadians do not want to see the privatization of Canada Post, which is something the bill does through the back door. In fact this bill is not even attracted to those people who would like to see Canada Post privatized.

The fact that this proposed legislation only allows employees to acquire non-voting shares is an attack on the rights of postal employees. By only giving the employees non-voting shares the government is denying them the right to have any direct input into policy-making decisions or administrative functions and is preventing them from being on the board of directors.

Madam Speaker, unfortunately, this bill does nothing to improve postal services for the people of this country. Canadians want our postal system to improve its delivery of postal services.

[English]

Canada Post is one of a long list of institutions that this government has gutted. It has limited home delivery by setting up supermailboxes. It has viciously attacked the fibre of our rural areas by eliminating many local post offices. It is little wonder Canadians are going through a type of identity crisis.

Members on the other side are convinced that the best way to build our nation is by destroying and dismantling the very things that bind us as a nation.

The government has wounded VIA Rail. It has slashed the CBC and it has begun the privatization of Canada Post. Members on this side of the House will never stand for this kind of action. We will oppose it because it is bad for Canada Post and because it is not in the interests of all Canadians.

We have to wonder why this government did not take the opportunity when it introduced this legislation to address all the problems involved with Canada Post.

All of us on this side of the House are in touch with our constituents and realize that the problems of this Crown corporation have to be addressed with the best interests of all Canadians in mind.

The minister responsible for Canada Post said that he believed this plan would be good for morale at the corporation. His argument is that if morale at the post office would improve then the service would improve. I have news for this minister. The employees who he claims will be thrilled because of this legislation have said no thanks. The union has said that the best shares in Canada Post are their wages. The employees want to have a new contract that will respect their needs and rights.

I am particularly concerned that this bill will do nothing about the conversions and closures of post offices that have caused so many problems around the country.

While money might be the only thing on the government's mind, I believe that in this country the post office is an essential public service. I feel that we must provide equally efficient and proper service throughout the country.

I urge the government to take this opportunity to address the problems associated with a postal service that is only interested in looking at the bottom line, and I am not talking about the postal code. We need to put people first. If this government is not willing to take on that challenge, those of us on this side of the House are.

Postal services are essential to everyone in this country, from the business community in large urban centres to the child living in a remote part of this immense continent. The government can hardly expect this bill to do anything to solve the problems facing our post offices across the country.

The intentions behind Bill C–73 may, and I stress the word "may", be good, but there is considerable uncertainty among those directly concerned by this legislation. There is every indication that once we start going this route, other measures will follow and there will be no turning back.

Giving employees a chance to buy shares in the Canada Post Corporation may be praiseworthy in itself, but I must admit I find it very hard to believe the government is acting in good faith.

Does it really expect to be taken seriously when it says: "Sure, you can buy shares and you will be really part of Canada Post, but no voting rights, so no say in decision making".

[English]

Can anyone in this House possibly imagine what the shareholders of any major company would say if they were presented with such a proposal? Does anyone seriously believe that people who have put up their hard earned money, the ones who have accepted to foot the bill, must be muzzled when decisions are taken?

It is simply ridiculous that members opposite would take such action. No one can afford to purchase shares and then simply defer all the major decisions that directly impact on their financial well-being, especially with this Treasury Board and cabinet.

I do not know a single investor who would be willing to sit back hoping everything will go well and knowing that when things turn sour whatever he has to say will go nowhere because his voting power is nil.

It is pretty obvious the Conservative government is trying to get out of the fix it is in by selling shares to Canada Post employees. Canadians know for a fact that something is definitely wrong at Canada Post. However, to let them pay the bill without giving them any power or guarantees in return is rather close to being obscene.

[English]

We do not only have to debate the philosophical implications of this bill. We must also discuss the practical. When embarking on this kind of venture I believe Parliament must be provided with the specifics. To be frank, this bill does not provide us with any details at all.

We have to ask ourselves why this legislation does not disclose the value of the Canada Post corporation. How are we as parliamentarians supposed to know the value of the shares being sold? We know that it is 10 per cent, but 10 per cent of what?

We also have no idea how much each share will be worth. We have no idea how accessible this program will be to the average worker at Canada Post. If there are very few shares then this will not benefit the employees of the corporation to any great measure. If on the other hand, the number of shares put into public hands grows quite large the fears of the Canadian public and the members of the Liberal Party that this ideologically driven Conservative Party will privatize Canada Post would have been realized.

Liberals oppose the privatization of Canada Post. We believe that essential public services such as mail delivery belong in public hands.

I think that members on the other side must forget exactly how vast this country is. They forget that profit motive does not take into account service in very remote parts of our country. How does this government intend to guarantee continued, high quality service to the northern parts of Quebec and the territories if the private sector is allowed to take over this essential public service? That is why we opposed the recommendations of the consumer and corporate affairs committee when it tried to privatize Canada Post. It is very difficult to understand the committee's recommendation. It is very difficult to understand why it recommends an eventual privatization of the corporation while at the same time it says that industrial relations must be improved first.

When one considers the fact that the Canadian Union of Postal Workers is fundamentally opposed to the privatization of Canada Post one must question the government's commitment to improving labour-management relations.

As I mentioned earlier, such an action contributes to the destruction of our national symbols. It is destroying the ties that bind Canada into one nation. Even the actions of the corporation in recent years have shied away from promoting the national nature of Canada Post.

People in my constituency of Saint-Laurent—Cartierville have asked me to explain why the maple leaf and the Canadian flag have disappeared from our mail boxes. They have been asking me why they have disappeared from all material related to Canada Post. What do we have now to represent our national postal carrier? To tell the truth I am not exactly sure what it is. I think it is an envelope with wings, but I am not sure.

If the intent of this bill is to improve morale at the post office it is clear that the bill is completely ineffective. If the government was truly interested in improving morale, it would insist on improving labour-management relations by dealing fairly and equitably with the employees of Canada Post.

If the objective of Bill C-73 is to improve the quality of service we get at the post office it has clearly failed. There is absolutely nothing there. Not only has the service not improved, but the corporation is also losing money.

We must conclude that this is the first step in privatization, something that the minister responsible for Canada Post said he clearly supports. We in the Liberal party clearly condemn this action and we will fight it.

Madam Speaker, when Canadians look back on the years when this government was in power, they will remember mostly what it destroyed, starting with VIA Rail, which practically made this country, to our postal services, a means of communication that is still available to all Canadians, whatever their income or social status.

Canadians will remember high taxes, jobs that were lost and promises that were forgotten. And above all, they will remember elected representatives who failed to represent them. It is high time to put Canada back on track, and we in the Liberal Party intend to do so after the next election.

[English]

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, it is a sad day when we have to speak once again against a bill by the government, such as Bill C–73, which is selling off an essential government service.

We are told that the purpose of this bill is to make 10 per cent of Canada Post's non–voting shares available for purchase by Canada Post employees on a voluntary basis. We are not told what the shares are worth in dollars. We know what they are worth in dignity or voting power. They are worth absolutely nothing. They are non–voting shares.

What Canada Post is doing is pretending to give the workers a share of control of the management of the company in which they work. That share of control is, taken in itself, a worthy goal and it is one that the Ontario government supports. However, the Ontario government does not try to cheat the workers out of having a voting share in the company if they buy shares in that company. It does not try to con them into thinking that by holding non–voting shares they have some power over their working conditions, over their wages and over the future of their jobs. That is what this government is trying to do. It is trying to con the workers and trying to con the public.

The government probably has two purposes in this. One is to further stall the labour negotiations which are already disgracefully late. It has been nearly three years that Canada Post has held its employees without a contract. This presumably is meant to change the agenda so that we do not talk any more about labour relations; we talk about employees getting gold stars if the supervisor looks on them with favour.

We are told that by giving the employees the dignity of being shareholders they will work better. We are also told that they are fine employees and they are working very well now. In other words, the government has not got its story together correctly.

I agree that the employees are good workers. There are some who live in my constituency, and when they come to me with their complaints I can size them up as people who have worked there for years and decades and want to serve the public but are frustrated. Sometimes they are immigrants who are being shabbily treated on the midnight shift by a supervisor, but who sincerely want to work and have a good record in the community in terms of their character. I know that these employees are good employees that want to serve the public. They do not need to be given gold stars or meaningless shares.

We are not told what the shares are worth in dollars if an employee wanted to sell them, for example. We are not told what Canada Post is worth. What is 10 per cent of a question mark? It is a sham and a fraud, but it is in keeping with the past history of Canada Post and its dishonest dealings with the Canadian Union of Postal Workers.

The idea that this will improve the service to urban and rural constituencies is a sick joke.

The government pooh–poohs the idea that this is a step toward privatization. Yet the minister was quoted in The Ottawa Citizen, and I am not aware that he has repudiated this quote, and the article says: "Andre insisted that immediate privatization is not in the cards". We buy that. He did not immediately privatize Air Canada when he started selling shares to the employees, that was just the first of several steps toward privatizing. He let the cat out of the bag when he said that there is no immediate privatization.

The minister went on to say: "There are no plans either on the table or buried in a desk anywhere to bring forward a privatization of the post office". However, he then refused to say that there would not be any privatization. To say: "We do not have any plans" emphasizes that it is not going to be tomorrow or the next day but it could be farther down the road.

The Ottawa Citizen story goes on to say:

> He refused to rule out future privatization—except to say that nothing will happen until after the next election.

We understand what those promises mean. The Prime Minister made a famous promise to maintain unemployment insurance without change or reduction. Yet immediately after the last election he reneged on that promise and slashed unemployment insurance, destroying a program that had existed in this country for nearly half a century and on which working people depend.

If we will just believe the Prime Minister and the minister in charge of the post office until the next election, then they will do whatever they had planned to do all along.

He admits that. He thinks they can get away with making it a joke. He said:

> If I had to bet I would bet that in the next couple of decades you will see post offices being privatized all over the world and I would not mind seeing Canada first.

That is like the famous boast of the Prime Minister when he said: "Give us 20 years and you will not recognize Canada". He has not even taken 20 years to destroy some of our best institutions, such as VIA Rail and Canada Post, and he has not even taken 20 years to seriously damage the health system and post-secondary education by cutting back on the federal government's commitment to share in those costs.

It could well be that selling these shares to some willing employees is an attempt to make a future private industry profit-oriented buyer more willing to buy Canada Post with the idea that the employees are tame. There are some gold star receiving employees who will do whatever they are asked to do and will not ask to have a union. Right now they have a union but the union has no contract. Perhaps Canada Post is waiting not just for the next election but for the final destruction and disappearance of all unions within Canada Post's jurisdiction in order to make it easier to sell.

The fact that it likes to remove Canadian emblems from visibility on Canada Post property certainly encourages the suggestion that the buyer that the government might very well prefer would be an American one, perhaps one of the American courier corporations who are already operating in Canada.

One of my colleagues said, jokingly: "Why not privatize the fire department?" As a matter of fact, it is not quite a joke. There is an historical precedent for privatizing a fire service. In ancient Rome there was a man called Marcus Crassus, an entrepreneur and a smart man, who organized a fire brigade. When a house caught fire Crassus and his men would come on the run carrying buckets and towing a big tank of water. Crassus then would begin to negotiate with the owner of the house to buy it. If the owner thought his price was too low and began arguing with Crassus that it should be higher, then he could stand watching his house burn down while they argued about the price. If the owner finally agreed to Crassus' price, perhaps Crassus by that time had dropped his price, but if they finally agreed on his price then Crassus became the owner of the burned down house. Crassus became perhaps the largest landowner in the city of Rome in his time. He certainly became what we would call a multimillionaire, if not a billionaire.

However, I do not think that service is a model we would want to follow. Just letting private citizens' homes burn down is one thing, but if we were going to let the major buildings in the centre of Toronto or in the centre of Ottawa, or, Heaven help us, the Parliament Buildings, burn down, I do not think that the Crassus system would really be equal to the occasion. We must have certain public services that are provided by the elected representatives, with the money the elected representatives collect from the public, with whatever cost recovery is reasonable.

In other words, the first object of a service such as the fire brigade or the post office is to provide service to the public. The first object of the post office is to deliver mail to all Canadians because all Canadians are taxpayers. It is not merely to deliver mail first to those who can pay the most for it and let the others wait or not merely to give a low-priced service in the high density areas and let the people in the country pay far higher prices on somebody's reckoning of cost benefit.

The gambit of offering these shares to the employees as a move toward privatization is a dishonest one, especially against the record of this government. I do not believe people will trust the government with that any more than they trust it now.

It is said this is supposed to give us labour-management peace. That shows a 19th century attitude. They may be talking about 20th century or 21st century technology but the brains on the government side are locked in the 19th century, when owners believed they had a right to refuse any union representation among their employees, and they often used violent methods to enforce that so-called right.

Canada Post has the worst record in Canada as a bad and dishonest employer toward its employees. It has racked up an incredible total of 100,000 outstanding grievances. Some of those grievances have been entered by constituents who have come to me to ask me to help. They know their union is trying but with 100,000 grievances blocking the road, the chances of getting a reasonable, early and just settlement are pretty dim.

I believe that Canada Post was willing to have those grievances pile up in order to force the union out on strike. The grievance procedure is half a century old, developed first in the United States and then in all parts of Canada. The grievance procedure is an essential part of modern labour relations so that employees do not have to go on a wildcat strike in order to get an injustice rectified.

There is a procedure. You start with a steward and so on. You work up. Eventually you go to arbitration. In return for that procedure, plus other key matters such as seniority clauses, the union signs a contract. Even without seniority clauses, that procedure, at least in the province of Ontario and I believe in the other provinces, is part of the law. It is based on the law that there shall be a procedure of that sort although the details of it vary from contract to contract.

Without that procedure no union in its right senses would sign a contract. What the union gives in a contract is the guarantee that there will be no work stoppage during the life of the contract. That is the labour peace that is bought by union contract.

The most dynamic employers of our country such as the auto industry well understand the efficiency and the financial value to the owners of signing a contract. It does not mean they agree to everything the union wants. The union does not get everything it asks for. The company does not get everything it asks for.

Both sides understand that they have to make cars. They have to have an orderly work process and so they settle on a contract, sometimes with a short strike, but not with the kind of dishonesty that Canada Post has displayed in the handling of a strike. Canada Post advertised for casual workers and swore up and down it did not intend to use them for strike-breakers which was all it was intending to use them for. It hired helicopters to bring the mailbags in and out of the sorting station in eastern Toronto, paying non-unionized Canada Post employees their room, board and travel expenses to replace unionized staff and so on.

These are dishonest strike-breaking practices which I hope before too long will be outlawed in the province of Ontario, as some of them are outlawed in the province of Quebec.

An hon. member: So a company cannot run its business.

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is afraid that somebody might go on strike. There is that possibility. There is also the possibility that the company will violate the contract and force a union out on strike. The union has two recourses against violation of the contract by the company. One is the grievance procedure which the management of Canada Post has destroyed by blockading it. The other is the right to strike at the appropriate legal time, which is what the union followed.

The company not only showed its bad faith in the time leading up to and during the strike, but Canada Post showed particularly bad faith in the settlement of the strike. It was proposed by go-betweens that there should be a resolution, that the union would come back to work and that an arbitrator would be imposed because both Canada Post and the union said there were only about seven, eight or nine items left of dozens and dozens that had been on the table in dispute.

The union not only agreed to come back to work, it sent out the word to its members to come back to work as soon as possible. Many of them came back before the deadline. They wanted to demonstrate their good faith in getting the post office working again.

After the arbitrator was appointed, management withdrew what it had already agreed as part of the offer. That was thoroughly dishonest. Six months later there is still no contract. There is now this gimmick to try to put the union entirely out of the picture.

There is no way that the employees of Canada Post are going to trust the management that destroys its union contract by violation and by outright deception. There is no way they are going to trust them in return for gold stars or a gimmick like that which are used in some companies to set one worker against another to try to undermine the morale of a union. There is no way that there will be industrial peace.

What the Canada Post management and the minister in charge probably want is a complete breakdown of the post office. It seems to me that they are pushing it for all their worth.

They brag that there is 90 per cent efficiency in first day delivery. Many people that I know seem to be among the 10 per cent that cannot get it, including myself. I know that parcel post has deteriorated greatly since it was farmed out to little stores around the district instead of using the two post offices on Spadina Avenue, as they did before. Parcels are not delivered. They come back marked "not open" when mailed to an office that is open every business day of the week. We have to wait weeks to find out where the parcel is. Then we have to go around to some other part of town to get that parcel. It is a most inefficient system that has been brought in.

Nobody believes the claim of 90 per cent efficiency. Sometimes we have a happy surprise and there is next day delivery, that is true. You cannot make the employees work with a system that is being disrupted by the closing of post offices, disrupted by giving services away to competitors, disrupted by using patronage to give little sub-post offices to stores that often are not equipped either to store or to handle the mail efficiently. There is no way that post office will work. The first thing to do is settle that contract with the union and then go on from there.

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, this bill is an initiative to try and improve relations between the management at Canada Post and the employees, the labour group.

It is no surprise to most Canadians that the NDP and other political agents of big labour are opposed to any initiative that offered hope of real management and labour co-operation or team building.

One of the primary objectives of the union movement, one of the main purposes of the union and the NDP, is to stimulate conflict in the labour place, in the work place.

While the union-controlled NDP publicly supports the notion of improved labour relations, the secret constitution of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, the national constitution adopted in 1990, tells a different story.

This NDP supported document reveals the true motives of the NDP and the union movement. On page 2, A-5, it says: "The union views as a primary direction of accomplishment of workers is to control the work place. This principle ensures that the union and its members will seek at all junctures to limit the power of the employer to organize our jobs, the methods of production and planning our work, or otherwise discipline our members. In its place the union will seek for its members full control of the work they perform and the environment in which they perform work".

In addition on page 12 it says with regard to industrial democracy, something you might find in Beijing or Tiananmen Square a couple of years ago: "Because the union recognizes the power of the labour movement and of our union rests on the collective strength of its members, and because the union views the interests of workers as conflicting with the interests of employers, the union rejects all forms of industrial democracy and quality of work life schemes promoting the notion of union participation and co-operation in employer programs".

In addition, in terms of co-operation between government, management and employees this is totally rejected by this secret document which the NDP supports.

In line with opposition to industrial democracy the union condemns—

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. The hon. member for Elk Island insists on describing the union constitution as a secret document. To the best of my knowledge it is not a secret document, it is public document.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is not a point of order, it is a point of debate, and I know the hon. member will put his question.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. I cannot rule when I cannot hear.

Mr. O'Kurley: Mr. Speaker, following on what I said about the opposition of the NDP and the union movement to any form of co-operation whatsoever between government, management, and the workers, confirmation can be found on page 13 of this constitution: "In line with opposition to industrial democracy, the union condemns any and all attempts by labour bodies to establish partnerships between labour and government, or between labour, government, and employers".

"Within the trade union movement the union wants to promote and strengthen a militant and combative front with which to oppose any form of co-operation with management and government serving management's interests".

The most successful economies in the world have demonstrated that the way to become successful is through team work, through working together. We have seen that in Japan, in Germany, particularly the western part of Germany.

We have also seen the result of socialist policies in the former Soviet Union. We have seen the destruction and the degradation of the economy there.

We find that the NDP, through its support and through its control by the union movement rejects any form of co-operation.

We have seen what has gone on in the former Soviet Union.

Would the NDP come clean? Publicly it supports the notion of co-operative efforts between labour and management. It supports the notion publicly of improved relations and teamwork, yet it does not seem to be coming clean with the Canadian people in the sense that it also supports this document, this secret constitution by the union that seems to provide a different story for Canadians.

Which does it support, the idea of conflict and confrontation or the idea of co-operation?

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to answer that question. I would say the proof of the pudding is in the eating.

In fact, regardless of what quotations the member may choose to select out of a document that he claims is a secret constitution, the fact is that last year, for example, the Canadian Union of Postal Workers attempted to co-operate.

I know that in Toronto the union asked that the old age pensions and other government cheques be made available for distribution before the legal strike date. The post office refused. It asked after the strike had begun on the legal strike date if it would be allowed to deliver them as volunteers. The post office refused.

Instead, the post office set up special stations and invited the public to come and collect its mail. Half the time, according to complaints from my constituents, their mail was not at the stations on the day they were told it would be.

The co-operation in action was on the side of the union, not on the side of the company.

Furthermore, I have experience of my own with a union, the Canadian Paper Workers Union. During the 18 years I worked in a factory I was a shop steward and I was secretary of the local. I took part in grievance bargaining, in contract bargaining. As a delegate to the Labour Council in metropolitan Toronto, I had regular reports from other delegates on the progress of their union affairs.

My point is that the labour movement and the NDP, to the extent that we are affiliated with the labour movement, are trying to get fair and reasonable bargaining. More than 90 per cent of contracts are settled without a strike or even intervention by the government in the way of mediation or arbitration. Of course, that does not hit the newspapers.

During the 18 years I worked at the Continental Can box plant we did not have a strike. But the people who want to blame the unions for all disputes simply do not look at the huge majority of times when the unions are the ones making the concessions in order to get the operation working again.

I am sorry that the hon. member has such a closed mind on the matter.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to follow the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina, my neighbour actually. Parkdale—High Park and Trinity—Spadina are neighbouring ridings.

We used to do joint television programs, but then I discovered that the Liberal ideology is quite different from the NDP ideology so I canned that in a hurry.

An hon. member: He was with Continental Can.

Mr. Heap: The competition was too much for you.

Mr. Flis: The hon. member will be missed in this House. He asked a very important question when he began the debate. He asked: What is the government's agenda in bringing this bill forward?

• (1330)

I think I can answer him. The government's agenda is a hidden agenda. It is like many other things the government does in this House. It brings in certain bills but then it has a hidden agenda. The hidden agenda is to dismantle Canada Post Corporation step by step, the heritage of our country.

We saw this when the minister was asked whether this was the first step towards privatization. He said that philosophically, he is not against privatization. This means he is already giving Canadians the signal that this is one of the first steps toward privatization. If it is toward privatization, and I think it will be, there will be post office after post office shut down across the country.

In my own riding I just have two postal outlets, Station M and Station V. Station M has already been reduced in its service. Station V is on the chopping block again. The government wanted to close it two years ago. Those of my constituents who use the post office gathered petitions and I made representations to the minister. We held off the closure for two years, but now rumours are that Station V is back on the chopping block. Why? There is no reason.

Station V is the heartbeat of the community. People come in and they gossip. The post office manager, Mr. Cosy, knows most of the clients. He greets everyone by name practically. What a nice community atmosphere this post office provides.

I was born and raised in Foston, Saskatchewan. It is called a one-horse town. Today maybe it is a one-car town. I remember as a small boy everyone gathering in the post office and catching up with the news of the community. We later moved to a slightly bigger town called Hendon. It was the same thing there. The post office was the heart of that community too. Then we bought a bigger farm and moved to Wadena, Saskatchewan. Even in this bigger town to this day the post office is the centre of the community. It is the town hall of Wadena.

I want to raise something that no other member has raised. I think the points about improved management-labour relations are a facade.

The minister talked about 76,000 employers and this will strengthen the partnership. This will make the relationships more harmonious. He talked about the esprit de corps that this bill will bring in. How can he think that giving 10 per cent shares, with no value defined yet, with no voting rights for the shareholders, that by throwing this little tidbit it is going to improve management-labour relations?

Come on. These workers know better. They know that this is just a facade. If anything, it will make relations even worse. Let them settle the three years of the collective agreement which has not yet been signed. Let them work on that if they want to improve the esprit de corps.

What is it that I want to raise that no other member has raised? I want to do something about the heritage of Canada because if these post offices in the small villages are going to be closed one by one, we are going to have yet another bit of Canada's heritage wiped off the scene.

We spend a lot of time debating what should go into the Constitution and how to keep this country together. Well, let us not dismantle it. Here is our heritage.

When I was a member here between 1979 and 1984, I brought in a private member's bill to preserve the old railway stations. If you recall, one morning, without telling anyone, CP came and bulldozed down the railway station in west Toronto near my riding. After I left, Mr. Taylor from the Conservative Party picked up that bill, reintroduced it and it was subsequently passed.

It was thanks to the initiative of two private members, myself and Mr. Taylor on the Conservative side that the railway stations across this land are now preserved. Companies cannot tear them down without going to the public, to the community, holding hearings, looking at alternatives, before touching that building.

I am recommending to the government in my portion of debate that if it is going to go this route, and I hope it does not, but if the Prime Minister and the government want to destroy another part of Canada, let the government bring in legislation that will preserve all of the old historical post offices from coast to coast to coast to the U.S. border. If it does not bring in that legislation, another bit of Canada goes down the drain.

If I can make any contribution in this speech, and I do not want to repeat everything that has been said before, I just want to emphasize. Be Canadian, Mr. Prime Minister. You say you love Canada. Show it.

I do not think we should play games and waste time with a private member's bill for that important legislation. I am tossing a challenge to the government to bring in a government bill to protect the post offices across this country.

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest and some fascination to the hon. member's comments.

During the period of time that I was chairman of the House of Commons consumer and corporate affairs committee we conducted a study into the history and the future of Canada Post and the postal service in this country.

I recall distinctly two of the witnesses who appeared before the committee were historians. They had recently completed a study on the history of mail delivery and mail service in Canada.

I was struck by the fact that the vast majority of postal outlets historically in Canada were located in private enterprises. They were located either in people's homes or general stores, almost without exception in rural Canada.

Canada Post in its former incarnation as a department of the federal government almost without exception in small communities operated in the private sector. It was only in a few of the large Canadian cities that there were what we would now term to be corporate-owned postal outlets, in other words buildings erected by the Government of Canada, or the governments of Upper or Lower Canada at the time, and operated by those governments.

So I think the member is really not being true to his history when he talks about the need to preserve government-owned post offices because they are historic monuments. Well, history does not bear that out.

Canada Post in its former incarnation started out in the private sector providing services to small communities in storefronts and in people's homes. It is an interesting devolution that has gone on where again Canada Post is abandoning a philosophy of having a large corporate-owned structure and going back into the small enterprises, which often and ironically are open for longer hours and provide better service.

I am wondering if the member could give us his comments on that piece of history?

Mr. Flis: I do not know who these historians were but I am sure their research must have been dependent on what period of Canada's history they were looking at. If you go back far enough in the history of our postal service, you go back to the pony express. Now, I am not asking that the pony express be reincarnated here. But I am asking that our heritage be preserved through all the stages of history, from the pony express to priority post today, which cannot deliver a letter for me on a long weekend.

A year ago today I went to the local post office to send a letter to Ottawa. The recipient did not have a fax or anything fancy, but I had to get the letter there for Monday. I went into the post office late Friday. The post office apologized because Saturday the workers were gone, Sunday nothing moved and Monday was a holiday. The postal workers told me to go to a private postal delivery service to deliver my letter from Toronto to Ottawa.

This is indeed ironic when we hear the minister and other members boasting about how efficient the system is now. That is how efficient it is.

The hon. member who spoke earlier this morning talked about finding mail in the swamp. I sent out a lot of letters one December and two never arrived. A year later, two of those letters were returned to me in Ottawa. I guess those letters were floating in the swamp that the hon. Conservative member was talking about. Let us not play games.

Getting back to the heritage of Canada, I am glad the hon. member is interested in this. Maybe he can convince his Prime Minister and his ministers responsible to bring in such legislation. Knowing how aggressive he is, maybe he will do it himself.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I was interested to hear my colleague in his opening comments in response to the New Democratic member from the Toronto area in a neighbouring riding where he said that he used to share television time with him. I do not think he realized this, but the member said he used to work for Continental Can for 21 years and the member for Parkdale—High Park said that he quickly canned those shared television meetings. I did not know whether he was making a joke. Anyway, I thought that was kind of interesting.

There is another aspect that I do not think my colleague or anyone else in the House has thought of and I am wondering if this is maybe a point worth considering as to why the government is proposing this bill. We all look at the bill and question whether there is something devious with the bill. I agree that there probably is.

I would like the member to respond to this. I am wondering if this bill is not a way to possibly drive a wedge between the union and the employees. Even though they are going to be non-voting members as shareholders in this corporation, would those shareholder employees be reluctant to criticize their employer which is Canada Post. I really believe that the question begs an answer. They would be almost put into a very difficult position if they felt there was something wrong with the management of Canada Post. Would they, as shareholders, be reluctant to question that employer?

Mr. Flis: That is an excellent question. Responding to her preamble about joint television programs, they were excellent programs because the people from the two ridings could compare ideologies, philosophies, the approach of the Liberal policy of doing things and the New Democratic policy of doing things.

In fairness to the member for Trinity—Spadina, getting together at the same time was really the difficulty. I did not stop doing it because he worked for Continental Can. My brother worked for Continental Can, so I have to be very kind to Continental Can. Unfortunately, Continental Can was closed and my brother, after working 35 years there, lost his job; gone with hardly any pension or benefits. That is an aside.

The member is very astute in seeing what the hidden agenda is, to drive a wedge between labour and management.

If you are a shareholder, now you own the company. What do you do? Do you not agree with the workers who want this collective agreement signed? On which side of the fence will the shareholders be? Will they be on the management side or will they be on the labour side? If the minister was sincere in what he said about improving esprit de corps in relationships, then you would think the government would have sat down with the union and with groups of workers and come to an agreement before it even tabled this bill. It did not do it. The union is against the bill. Where is this esprit de corps? Where is this harmonious working relationship that the minister promises through this bill?

Nonsense, hidden agenda? Dismantle, privatize, get rid of all unions in Canada. That is the philosophy of the Tory policy. That is the hidden agenda.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-73, an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act, is the bill before us today.

Essentially, this bill would permit the sale of up to 10 per cent of Canada Post Corporation to employees by establishing an employee share savings plan.

The bill provides very few specifics of the share offering. We do know it permits shares to be given away. We know the shares offered to employees would be non-voting, therefore the workers would really not have a voice in the operations of Canada Post.

There are a number of inadequacies with this offer which I will address shortly. However, first I would like to point out that this bill does not address a number of areas with regard to Canada Post that this government really should be looking at. What about service to Canadians? What about protecting employees? Nowhere does this bill address the mandate given to the Canada Post Corporation in the original bill establishing the Crown corporation, the Canada Post Act.

At that time it called for the desirability of improving and extending its products and services in the light of developments in the field of communications; the need to conduct its operations on a self-sustaining financial basis while providing a standard of service that will meet the needs of the people of Canada and that is similar with respect to communities of the same size; the need to conduct its operations in such a manner that will best provide for security for the mail; the desirability of utilizing the human resources of that corporation in a manner that will both attain the objects of the corporation and ensure the commitment and dedication of the employees to the attainment of these objects; and the need to maintain a corporate identity program approved by the Governor in Council that reflects the role of the corporation as an institution of the Government of Canada.

That was the mandate provided in the Canada Post Act that created the Crown corporation. Bill C-73 does nothing to address these areas. It is the beginning of the end in terms of meeting the provisions of this mandate. The bill gives no hints as to how the non-voting shares would be priced or what would be the rules for redeeming them or transferring them if a worker decided, for whatever reason, that he no longer wanted the shares.

Further, even those people who support privatization would disagree with the fact that employees would be given the right to acquire only non-voting shares. Such shares deny the employees any input into policy making or administration functions and excludes them from being members of the board. The main beneficiaries of such an offering, from my reading of this bill, would be the executives as part of their compensation plans. It provides for dividends to be set by Canada Post in accordance with the rights, privileges, restrictions and conditions attaching it to the shares.

The government is not saying what this might be. That is typical of this government. It really never tells us what it is going to do. The general lack of details and the sketchiness of those present make it difficult to debate this bill. This is par for the course for this government. We in opposition and all Canadians are not about to be fooled by this government's hidden agenda. We know it all too well.

Let us call this so-called incentive scheme what it is. It is nothing more than a back-door route to privatization. The minister says the proposal is to assist in employee-employer relations. Is that not a cute term? The unions have indicated they are in opposition to the concept, calling it a sham. If the unions are calling it a sham, why? It is because the shares owned by the employees are to be limited to 10 per cent and are non-voting in the affairs of the corporation. The employees of Canada Post and all Canadians already own Canada Post.

The Union of Postal Communications Employees says it has advised the corporation that the value of Canada Post must include at least $70 million to cover its liability for equal pay for work of equal value payments to UPEC members. The Canadian Union of Postal Workers says its members will not be bribed by this share scheme. It is calling instead for expanding and improving services for Canadians, which it confirms the government is cutting in an ad hoc manner in the name of profit.

Also, as CUPW says, if the government really wants to improve employee-employer relations, it would give the union a contract since it has yet to implement the terms of the back-to-work legislation passed last November.

I mention that the government is being dishonest about its reasons for this share offering. It claims one thing, improved employer-employee relations, and yet is really interested in privatizing the Canada Post corporation.

In the report of the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations entitled, Moving the Mail, Canada's Postal Service in the 1990s, recommendation No. 36 suggested that the Government of Canada privatize Canada Post once adequate financial performance comparable to private sector levels has been attained and once the industrial relations climate has been approved.

The Liberal Party emphasized in the minority report that we are opposed to the privatization of Canada Post because we believe that essential public services belong in public hands and furthermore we agree with what my colleague from Parkdale—High Park has just said. We said at the time that it is hard to comprehend the total impact of the committee's recommendation. It recommends an eventual privatization of Canada Post, and at the same time it says that industrial relations must improve first.

How will relations ever improve when Canada Post employees are so vehemently opposed to privatization? Canada Post has approximately 46,000 workers across Canada and we asked at the time of the release of the report, in our minority report, questions such as what would happen to their security of employment, benefits and wage levels. We predicted that adjustments and lay-offs would be widespread. These concerns and predictions are valid today, more than two years later.

What of the equity of Canada Post land, its buildings and equipment? Most of the total $2.9 billion in land, buildings and equipment are in prime downtown locations. Privatization would result in a bonanza of prime space for the buyer at fire sale prices.

What about competition? Will the monopoly of our mail delivery be transferred to a private company? Who will regulate the activities of this company?

No other post office in the world has been privatized, so we have no precedent which might provide answers to some of these questions. Therefore, the Liberal Party recommended in the minority report and still holds firm today that Canada Post should not be privatized.

The government also let the cat out of the bag about privatization at that time when it said in recommendation No. 37 that the privatization plan be carried out by means of public share issue and should incorporate an employee share ownership plan. The Liberal Party recommended that this recommendation be eliminated and we say the same thing today.

On April 30 of this year we asked the minister responsible to admit to Canadians that this bill signifies the first step of the privatization of Canada Post and he flatly denied it.

Let us face it, Canada Post is being fattened up for slaughter. In other words, it is being prepared for sale to the highest bidder.

Much of the corporation's recent business success has been earned on the backs of average Canadians: higher postal rates, cuts in home delivery and the burgeoning use of supermailboxes in new suburbs. Vital postal subsidies in support of the fragile Canadian magazine and publishing industries have been cut. So have payments to Canada Post that subsidize air freight in the Northwest Territories, northern Quebec and areas of Canada that really need it.

Labour relations have not improved and have grown worse in recent years. Who is winning? Obviously it is not rural Canadians who have already lost the majority of their post offices. It is not urban Canadians, many of whom now have to go to supermailboxes a way from their homes. Certainly all Canadians are paying more money for less service.

Canada Post workers are not the winners. They still have no contract, no job security. They are living with the looming threat of privatization which will put many of them out of their jobs. All they have is an offer of bogus shares in a company which because it is a Crown corporation they already own. The quality of their relations with management has declined steadily during the time of this government's mandate.

Will the only winners be the future owners of Canada Post, I ask? There is no doubt that eventually this essential service will be in the hands of the one of the Tory government's big business friends.

This bill, lacking though it is, is yet another step by this government in the selling out of Canada Post and in the selling out of Canadians in terms of having a secure and competent delivery of mail service in this country.

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member opposite quoted at some length in her speech from the House of Commons the consumer and corporate affairs committee report entitled Moving the Mail. I was quite involved in the preparation and the writing of that report so her remarks naturally interested me.

She noted correctly that one of the recommendations of the report was that Canada Post ultimately be privatized, that shares be offered to individual Canadians, and that shares also be offered to employees of Canada Post. She is quite right in saying that.

Where the member is not being fully fair to those listening to this debate is that she did not mention that was one recommendation which was intended to go hand in glove with another. The other recommendation was that an independent third party, regulatory, decision-making body, a watch-dog body, be created to oversee the operations of a privatized Canada Post.

When she conveniently forgot to include that part of the recommendation, it enabled her then to make the fabulous leap of faith that she did in her speech by then saying that a privatized Canada Post would have to have a fire sale of its assets, would have to cut service to individual Canadians, would particularly cut service to rural Canadians and those in remote areas of Canada and would increase the cost of its services.

All those things can be handled completely in a privatized Canada Post if there were an independent, regulatory, third party agency. I ask the member to consider the model of Bell Canada. It is a privately owned monopoly providing a public service and is regulated by the CRTC to which any Canadian or any Canadian group can go. I know she would be cognizant of a few years ago when the Consumers' Association of Canada took on Bell Canada at the CRTC and won rate reductions. No similar mechanism exists today with Canada Post. I would consider a privatized Canada Post regulated by a CRTC-type organization to be much better than today.

There are communities in my riding, as I am sure in hers, that get up in arms from time to time when a postal outlet is being replaced by a retail postal outlet or by community boxes, et cetera. Whether those moves by Canada Post are right or wrong, the community or individuals now have no mechanism by which to go and question the actions of Canada Post.

Could the member envision any good at all in a restructured Canada Post, whether it is publicly owned or privately owned, which is governed by a regulatory agency modelled along the lines of the CRTC?

• (1400)

Is it not a model that could have some hope of winning and providing better service? If shareholders were also employees, would they not perhaps feel they had an independent court to which to go as well?

Mrs. Gaffney: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague opposite for his question.

I guess to compare the Canada Post Corporation to Bell Canada Enterprises is very difficult for me to envision. Bell Canada Enterprises is a major corporation with several different arms connected thereto. It started from a private company. As it grew into Northern Telecom, Bell Northern Research and all the subsidiaries of the corporation, obviously this was when the federal government had to step in and provide regulatory measures for the corporation because it did have a monopoly. It had to ensure that this was a corporation that did not get out of hand. This corporation has done a tremendous job in this country and as Canadians we should be very proud of it.

I do not know whether or not the Canada Post Corporation, because it is working in reverse, can fit the same mould as that of Bell Canada Enterprises. This is a corporation that has been managed by the federal government since inception. It has been managed by Canada for reasons of the immense size of this country and of the immense cost of getting our mail to the northernmost and the outermost regions so that all people of Canada and the territories would be served in an equal manner at the same cost.

There is a big difference in cost in getting mail out and in getting telephone services out. I have a very difficult time visualizing how we can even compare the two corporations. I am certainly open to looking at a model for Canada Post.

What has happened in recent years because of what I have to call interference by the Government of Canada in Canada Post? We have seen the deterioration of a system that has been the pride of this country. As my colleague from High Park has said, we have lost a bit of our heritage because this has gone down.

Nowhere have we seen such deterioration in a federally owned corporation as we have in Canada Post. I cannot fault the employees. I have to fault the restrictions imposed upon the corporation and the fact that it is required to make money. It is the only Crown-owned corporation, I might add, that is required to do so. The CBC certainly is not required to make money, yet Canada Post Corporation has to. We have seen the infliction of an incredible increase in postal rates over the last few years which has created probably one of the highest postal rates in the world.

However, to get back to the question of the member opposite, I am always open to listening to any proposal that is going to create better service for Canadians in the future. If he has some wonderful idea that can show me that our corporation can be as efficient as Bell Canada Enterprises and its subsidiaries then I certainly would look at it, but I am not convinced that we can even compare apples and oranges, because that is what I see.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, among the points made by the hon. member in her speech this afternoon was the contention that this bill can, properly in my view, be seen as the first giant step down the very slippery path to complete privatization.

This is a point that has been made by other speakers in this debate as well, and it is a point that I think bears some consideration. Certainly the record of the government in this regard is very clear. For example, the first step in the privatization of Air Canada was a share offering to the employees. In a sense what we had there was a template that is just being applied to Canada Post in this instance.

However, I would like the hon. member to take this one step further and consider, should the government after the promulgation of this bill take subsequent further steps to effect a complete privatization of Canada Post, to what degree she would think it likely that the buyers of the privatized Canada Post would in fact be large American courier firms.

Is she aware of any firms engaged in businesses like the delivery of mail, in other words Canadian courier firms, that are of a size and capacity sufficient even to contemplate swallowing so huge a corporation as Canada Post? Or, would it not be natural to assume that the only companies on this continent capable of such a giant lunge at the public trough would in fact be the American courier giants?

Mrs. Gaffney: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member from the New Democratic Party. I think he has made an excellent point.

In response to a question just like that one the other day, the hon. Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons said that the privatization of Canada Post would require separate legislation to come back to this House and that there would be ample opportunity for us to make a choice between private ownership or state ownership when that came up.

However, I think the member of the New Democratic Party is asking whether I perceive an American company moving into Canada or who do I see taking over the privatization? It could very well be an American company, but it also could very well be a Canadian company.

If I could go one step further than that, we as Canadians have been up until this point in time subsidizing Canada Post. There is no way on God's green earth we can ever have a postal service, whether it is publicly or privately owned, that is not going to be subsidized by the government of this country. I really believe that and that is because of the immensity of this country and of far-reaching outposts.

I would much rather subsidize a publicly owned Canada Post corporation than a privately owned Canada Post corporation. I certainly would not want to subsidize an American owned private corporation that is running our Canada Post.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in her remarks the member made reference to the back-to-work legislation passed by the House last fall and said that in fact it had not been implemented. Could she tell us what part of the back-to-work legislation has yet to be implemented?

Mrs. Gaffney: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is referring to my comments with regard to what back-to-work legislation was not implemented. Is that what he is saying?

Mr. Richardson: Yes.

Mrs. Gaffney: I am sorry, I do not have my back-up notes here and I cannot answer that question.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, in entering into the debate on Bill C-73 this afternoon I would like to start, if I may, by quoting some of its directly pertinent elements.

As members will know but as may have thus far escaped those who have been condemned to watch this on television, the bill seeks to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act, in other words that act which has established the Canada Post corporation and under which the corporation operates.

It would seek basically at its heart to insert new sections into the act which would provide for the creation of shares and the dispersing of up to 10 per cent of those shares to the employees of Canada Post Corporation. It would provide as well for the statutory regime necessary for the administration of this sort of thing.

The key elements in this bill can be found in proposed section 27.1(5) which reads:

> (5) Not more than ten per cent of the issued and outstanding shares of the Corporation may be held or beneficially owned by the employees of the Corporation.

and in proposed section 27.2(4), which reads:

> (4) The shares held by the Minister have the exclusive right to vote at meetings of the shareholders of the Corporation.

Simply put, this means that shares in Canada Post Corporation will be created. Ninety per cent of those shares hereafter will be held by the minister on behalf of the Crown, in right of Canada. Ten per cent of those shares may be disbursed to the employees of the corporation.

The 90 per cent held by the minister will be the voting shares. The 10 per cent disbursed to the employees will have no voting rights.

This raises a number of questions at the outset. I suppose that one of the most important concerns what happens to a share held by an employee when that person ceases to be an employee. The only answer given in the bill is to be found in proposed section 27.1(3)(a) which allows the corporation, with the concurrence of the minister and the Governor in Council, to make by-laws that among other things can, and I am quoting from sub-subsection (a):

> (a) prescribe voting rights, rights of shareholders to require redemption, rights of the Corporation to redeem, restrictions or prohibitions on transfer, procedures for the enforcement of the restrictions or prohibitions, and rights on liquidation;

The act proposes to create a situation in which the corporation can, under whatever terms it deems fit, grant or sell shares to its employees and then it may turn around and haul those shares back again, under whatever circumstances or conditions it deems fit, and the employees are left to enjoy it as best they can.

This is a very peculiar form of employee participation in management of a company, which is what the government insists, and has been insisting throughout the duration of this debate, is intended.

There are other questions. What if—and I must admit that this is an incredibly hypothetical case and one I do not at all expect to see—there were such a demand for these shares among Canada Post employees that the demand exceeded the available 10 per cent? Some employees would then be told: "No, I am sorry. The shares are gone. You cannot have any". What would that do to morale?

What if—and I think this is much more likely—the day comes when this government drops the other shoe and moves to full privatization and in the best free enterprise tradition calls for anyone who wants to bid on these shares to buy them up? What if at that point the union decides: "Well, this is a tasty little venture and we can in fact now have the opportunity to put into practice that which our own constitution calls for", which was so ably quoted earlier by the member for Elk Island, "and assume control of the company?"

This bill prohibits that. It says that: "Not more than 10 per cent of the issued and outstanding shares of the corporation may be held or beneficially owned by the employees of the corporation".

Not only is it a question of the government introducing legislation that in no way advances effective management-employee co-operation, but this is a bill that precludes for all time the possibility of the workers in Canada Post assuming ownership and thus management of that company.

When one finds oneself confronted with the smoke that has been billowing up in this Chamber today, concerning worker participation and co-operation from the benches opposite one should take it with a very strong fan.

The argument has been advanced that the whole point of this bill is to jolly up the post office, to create a situation in which, because the workers own a part of the corporation, even though they will be specifically prohibited from exercising any of the normal rights of ownership, they will thereby be keenly interested in its fate and operations even though they will be granted no authority to do anything about its fate and operations. The idea is that they will feel much more well-disposed toward the corporation, a sort of warmth will well up in their innards and suffuse their entire bodies causing a smile to spread across their face every morning when they go to work and resulting in ideal employee-employer relations at Canada Post.

Let us assume just for a moment that such an assessment, however laughable it may appear on the face of it, is accurate. Let us then ask what happens if the shares are unequally distributed among the employees of Canada Post, so that some employees get 10 shares, some get five, some get one, and some get 50? Does this mean that we will then be confronted with the odd spectacle of varying degrees of employee satisfaction at Canada Post based entirely on their amount of their shareholdings? Of course not. Clearly that is absurd.

However, the thesis being advanced in defence of the bill would seem to carry that in its wake.

Let us examine another possibility, in my opinion a far more probable one, which is that some employees take up the offer to hold shares and many do not. This effort to create a new harmony and enthusiasm at Canada Post would then create a situation in which some employees are owners of the corporation, though not effective owners, and some are not. What do you suppose that is going to do for employee morale and functioning? What do you suppose will be the result of a situation in which there is a clear cleavage within the work force at Canada Post, on one side being those who have at least a residual corporate interest in the corporation and on the other those who remain, simply and straightforward, employees. That is the situation we are going to have.

In that situation I cannot but suspect that the outcome will be greater rancour, lower morale, greater disputation and unease at Canada Post. That will be the outcome of this government's bill. I find it difficult to believe that the government does not understand that.

Therefore, I find myself looking for other explanations for the introduction of the bill. However, before moving to that I would like to note a couple of instances of circumstances that have created the ill will, the lack of co-operation, the distress, and the unease at the post office.

As members will recall, April 28 has been declared by this Parliament to be a national day of mourning for workers killed and injured in the work place. It is a most worth-while observance and one that we in this House observed with a standing moment of silence.

When the members of the Edmonton local of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers went to Edmonton management and said that they too would like to observe April 28 they proposed three possible means of doing so. They proposed that the flags on corporation facilities could be lowered to half staff, they proposed that a minute of silence could be observed during each of the shifts contained within the 24 hours of April 28, and they proposed that employees wishing to do so could be permitted to wear black armbands during the day.

The response of Canada Post management, in fact it came from the labour relations manager for the entire foothills division, was: "No no; and oh, all right, but only where nobody can see you".

They were three perfectly harmless, reasonable requests from the employees at the Edmonton local and Canada Post management made a perfectly Draconian and unreasonable response. If you think that this is somehow uncharacteristic of operations at Canada Post, you have not been paying attention.

I recall one afternoon about a year and a half ago which I spent in my constituency office. The afternoon was almost entirely consumed talking to a Canada Post employee, a young woman who had been injured on the job, who had gone for physiotherapy, had been on worker's compensation, and according to her doctor was now prepared to go back to work under light duties. Canada Post management at that time said: "Sorry, there are no light duties you can perform. Therefore we require you to go back to full operations, and if you cannot do that your contract of employment will be terminated".

I spoke to this young woman for about three hours in my office and several times during that period she was reduced to tears, to weeping in my office. It was not a pleasant experience. I can only imagine what it was like for her. This is also indicative of the kind of compassion evidenced regularly by the management of Canada Post.

On June 19, 1991 there appeared an article in the Toronto Star by Mr. Peter Edwards in which it was reported that:

> A high-level law enforcement agency likely bugged the headquarters of Canada's largest postal union during the last mail strike, according to a confidential report by a former military surveillance expert.
> "It is obvious that the telephone system has been compromised," concludes the study, obtained by The Star. "Therefore, the telephone system should not be used to relay information that is considered sensitive".

The headquarters of the union is bugged. This is the action of a co-operative, indulgent management or government? No. This is the action of an outfit, regardless of which it was, that is determined to crush the legitimate organized voice of the employees of Canada Post by any means necessary. We are going to jolly them up by offering them fake shares? It is absurd.

Let us continue the litany of goodwill from the management of Canada Post. During the last strike of the Public Service Alliance of Canada, this last fall, only one corporate entity in the entire country brought suit against the union because of the disruption of that corporation's work during the strike. Was it a grain company? No, it was not a grain company. Was it a trucking company trying to get across the border? No, it was not a trucking company. Was it a single member of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association whose operations had been disrupted? No, it was not.

Mr. Speaker, I bet you can guess which corporate entity it was. You are right, the Canada Post Corporation was the only corporate entity in the country to bring suit against PSAC when it was on strike. This is the same management that has decided that in the interests of efficiency in shipping mail from Toronto to the west that mail, in part, will go courtesy of an outfit called "N. Yanke" of Saskatoon. It will run the mail through the United States, not through Canada, not through the towns with their gas stations along the Trans-Canada Highway. No, it is going to send it through the United States. It may save some money doing that but it is not good for the local economies of the towns along the way. However, this is all of a piece with the corporate philosophy of Canada Post management.

Last, I would be remiss if I did not note that this is the same management whose concept of service includes closing postal stations across the country. I have a list here. No, this is not like Senator McCarthy's list, it is an accurate list. It is not a secret document, I hasten to point out. This is a list of the rural post offices that previously had been federally operated Canada Post offices. They have been closed by Canada Post since November 29, 1985. There are 151 post offices on this list in Alberta alone.

For the hon. member opposite who suggested that what in fact is happening is simply a reversion to those halcyon days of yesteryear when the post office was run out of mom and pop's local country grocery store, sad to say, that is not what is happening. What is happening is they are being shut down and the operations are being moved miles, occasionally scores of miles away.

It is not a question of closing down a government facility and moving the services across the street into a drug store. Those services are gone, not in all instances it is true, but in the overwhelming majority of these instances.

All of these instances, rolled together, are why no one should have been surprised that the announcement of the bill by the minister was greeted with, let us say scepticism, by the duly elected leadership of the union.

By the way, might I note for the benefit of those opposite who took particular umbrage at the quotes from the constitution of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers previously read out by the hon. member for Elk Island, that those provisions were democratically agreed to by the members of the union and what is more, can be democratically altered by the members of the union at any of its national conventions, which I believe, although I am not certain, are held bi-annually.

That seems to be a great deal more than can be said for the policies of this government. However, this too comes as no surprise, knowing as we do the mixed enthusiasms with which the government clutches at the doll of democracy.

At the time the bill was announced, the duly elected president of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers noted very correctly, in my view, and I quote from his release: "Our best share in Canada Post is our wages, and our security rests on the services provided to Canadians". They are very wise words.

An hon. member: He is well overpaid.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): He went on to say that it is clear—he is what? I am sorry I did not catch that. Did the hon. member say he is overpaid? He is paid at exactly the same rate as the line workers down in the postal stations.

Mr. Parrot went on to say that it was clear the Conservative government has no intention of permitting employees to influence the direction of the corporation: "If they really wanted to benefit postal workers, they would give us a contract". That is an admirable observation, given that the postal employees have been without a contract for close to three years, the final, the concluding, the conclusive example of the tender mercies of Canada Post management.

This bill is a sham and a joke. That it is even before us is a pathetic comment on the declining mental fortunes of the government opposite.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): We have adjacent ridings, as you know, Mr. Speaker, so you will be kind to both of us, I am sure.

Does the member recall the cartoon in the 1964 election campaign when Senator Goldwater was running for president? They had a picture of him looking quite surprised and the caption was: "But Senator Goldwater, don't you recall that the government has always carried the mail?" These people want to have the government stop carrying the mail. They want their friends in the business community to carry the mail.

It is true that some of the people who carry mail are Liberals. The member from the back row over there who used to be a free enterpriser would doubtless like the Toronto Sun to carry the mail. The Toronto Sun is not going to carry the mail because there are a lot of people who have a lot of their lives, their effort, their sweat tied up in carrying the mail and they do a good job. They even deliver mail in the riding of the hon. member for Calgary Southeast until the next election. I was there last week speaking at a Liberal meeting. He will be happy to know there are lots of people there who are going to run against the member.

The really good news is that three people at the meeting were individuals who had been on the member's executive for Calgary Southwest until very recently. I would call that a switch.

Mr. Richardson: Were you a free entrepriser?

Mr. Kilgour: I got them stirred up Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the hon. member opposite is not commenting on the speeches that have just been delivered or addressing a question to any topic that the member covered.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): This is comment period. He has a little comment period and then he can address his question.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, I have spent a lot of time with people who work for the post office in Edmonton too. Will the member tell us whether he thinks that on a balance of probabilities the fault is more with the management of the post office than it is somewhere else?

I have the feeling that the problem is mostly a management one. I have here a letter from a lady which took 12 days to arrive. I would be, and other members too would be interested in hearing whether the member thinks we can build bridges between people who work for the post office and management? How can we get more happy campers in the post office, more happy employees?

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I must thank the hon. member for Edmonton Southeast very much for that question. The answer is a remarkably simple one.

First of all, stop resisting the grievances. Clear up the grievance backlog. Send them through the process and get them solved. That is step one.

That is not hard to accomplish. All it takes is a wee bit of will on the part of management. The problem is that for the longest time there has been a stonewall approach to those grievances. Clearing up the grievances would be a tremendous first step.

Second, stop closing the postal stations. Stop slashing away at the work force. As the member may know, the entire northeast quadrant of Edmonton is now without a Canada Post post office. There is none there. With the closure of Station C on White Avenue, the entire southeast quadrant of Edmonton will be without a Canada Post post office, with the consequent losses in jobs and services and the rest of it.

The third point is give the employees who are there now the technological and infrastructural tools they need to do the job. That would make them deliriously happy.

I speak to postal workers regularly. I have a lot of them in my riding and my dark confession is that some of my best friends are postal workers.

What they tell me over and over again is that they cannot provide the service that they want to provide because they are not granted the technological means to do so. That would be step number three.

Again, step one, clear the grievances; step two, stop the cutback programs; step three, upgrade the technologies so that the workers can provide the service they want to provide.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would not want this opportunity to go by without commenting on the remarks of the turncoat member for Edmonton Southeast. It is not surprising—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. You will have to address your question to the Speaker instead of any other member in this House.

Mr. Richardson: That is fine. We do not know what side members are going to be on, flip-flopping across the House and supporting the NDP one day, the Conservatives the next.

In any event, I will deal now with the member for Edmonton East who was referring to the earlier comments of the member from Elk Island who referred to this socialist manifesto here. He raised the matter of the secret national constitution adopted by the postal employees. He even referred to it as "our constitution". I do not know if he used to be a postman. He is also the NDP energy critic. We heard earlier today the wisdom of various NDP critics.

For example, we heard today the critic for unemployment in Hamilton discussing training programs, welfare and unemployment insurance. This NDP critic said that the government should look at just printing the money it needed to spend its way out of the recession. I just want to quote from The Hamilton Spectator. The NDP critic said: "When we borrow money to do a project that money has to be repaid. Instead of borrowing the money we create—"

Mr. Fulton: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The government members were rising just a moment ago about matters of relevance. I think many viewers would be interested in knowing that the national debt has doubled under the Tories. They are the real money printers.

Mr. Richardson: I appreciate that the various NDP critics are a little touchy over these matters when we quote the wisdom they bring to the people when they say that all we have to do to get out of debt is to print more money. There it is, I have just quoted the critic.

We are now dealing with the energy critic. I wonder if the energy critic would support this constitution which he referred to. I will have a look here at one section, section (d)(20) with regard to natural resources. This is the relevance the member for Skeena requests. This is the national constitution adopted by the Canadian Union of Postal Workers.

Let me ask their comrade from Edmonton East if in fact he agrees with (d)(20), the position in the constitution on natural resources which is: "The union calls for a nationalization of all resource industries without compensation". Would that be the view shared by the two members from Edmonton?

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, no.

An hon. member: That is your union.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): It is not my union. My union, when I was a member of it, was the Office of Professional Employees International Union. I have never been a member of CUPW. I would be curious to know whether or not what he was quoting was in fact the constitution of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers or a policy document appended to the constitution? It is a small thing but I would be interested in knowing that.

Last, I do not know that it is really our part here in the House of Commons to be debating the provisions of the constitution of a duly constituted union within Canada. It may be a point of some considerable interest, but surely the hon. member would be serving his constituents and the people of Canada better were he to concern himself not with the provisions of the constitution of the Canadian Union of Postal Employees, but with the provisions of Bill C-73.

I can only suspect that the provisions of Bill C-73 are themselves so indefensible and that, by the way, is why there are no government members rising to participate fully in debate this afternoon. They feel themselves compelled to pull out of the hat whatever rabbit they can and wave it around hoping nobody will actually see Bill C-73.

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to ask the member opposite his feelings on recent moves by the NDP government in Ontario to involve workers more in the participation and the ownership of enterprises?

The recent throne speech in Ontario promised worker ownership legislation to come forward soon in the province of Ontario. The proposed reform of the Ontario Labour Relations Act proposed in November of 1991 has, under this heading, the government's social and economic agenda: "Encouraging worker investment and ownership in Ontario companies in a manner which recognizes the benefits of worker participation for both labour and business".

The NDP government in Ontario is saying there are benefits when workers are involved in the participation and the ownership of companies. If the Ontario NDP government has recognized that and accepted it, why is the federal NDP government adopting a position 100 per cent opposite?

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, it will be. I would just note that yes, I am in complete agreement with those proposals and programs by the Ontario NDP government. I think they are long overdue and I heartily applaud them.

I would simply point out that they have absolutely nothing in common with the bogus share offering that the government proposes now be granted to the employees of CUPW.

When the Ontario NDP speaks of investment and ownership it means investment and ownership and control. It means that if you have part of a company you get to direct the company in direct proportion to the part that you own.

• (1440)

The benefits of worker involvement are precisely that when the workers are involved in the direction of a company, there are social benefits to be gained. What Bill C-73 provides is that either the employees of Canada Post can have their money sucked out for these shares that give them no rights whatsoever, or they can simply be granted the shares, still with no rights whatsoever.

To say that has absolutely anything to do with worker ownership and participation is—I will not say misleading—in error.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to rise in the House to discuss Bill C-73, an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act.

This bill would permit the sale of up to about 10 per cent of Canada Post Corporation to employees and this basically would be accomplished by establishing an employee share saving plan.

On reviewing the Canada Post Corporation Act that was put in place when Canada Post was created, there were five different points which were properly put. The first point is the desirability of improving and extending its product and services in light of the development in the field of communications.

I would like to state that I had the pleasure of visiting Canada Post recently and I was most impressed by the quality of equipment and the quality of technology. I might say that it is perhaps one of the finest technologies that exists anywhere around the world.

I was informed that many corporations from around the world come to Canada to visit Canada Post. They see the technology that is being used in terms of its tracking of delivery and in terms of the monitoring of the services.

A second point is the need to conduct its operation on a self-sustaining financial basis while providing a standard of service that would meet the needs of the people of Canada and that is similar with respect to communities of the same size. That by itself is a very noble objective and I would suggest that really there is nothing in the mandate that will require Canada Post to generate profit.

The only reference to the business aspect of it is that it has to be self-sustained in terms of its revenues and expenditures. Canada Post, being a Crown corporation, is in charge of providing services to the public.

Any extra funds or any surplus revenues generated can and should be used in order to enhance the services that Canada Post is providing to the public. Or, the extra funds can and should be used as an investment in future technologies or as an investment in research and development in a way in which Canada Post can remain on the leading edge and as a leader around the world in providing quality services to the public.

We have noticed something recently in Canada Post which is not its fault. It was pressured into this situation. We have seen services shrinking in a way. Nowadays, if a new development has taken place, the resident would have to go to a central location in order to pick up their mail. When you look at the over-all community, other mail persons still deliver the mail from door to door.

There is already a lack of standards when it comes to the services that Canada Post is providing to the community.

In some areas the taxpayer would have to go to a central location. In some other areas the mail person will come to the taxpayer's door.

I would say Canada Post has to choose this venue because of government pressure on Canada Post to not only meet its objective but to push Canada Post so it will start generating additional revenue. It will show that there is a profit whereby it could put the government in a position to sell off Canada Post eventually.

The third point in terms of objectives states the need to conduct this operation in such as manner that would best provide for the security of the mail. At least in dealing with my constituents I would say that there is a very good level of satisfaction when it comes to services provided by Canada Post. From personal experience, every time we have received a complaint we have taken that up with the administration of Canada Post and Canada Post has dealt fairly effectively with the complaint.

Part D, in terms of objectives, states the desirability of utilizing the human resources of the corporation in a manner that would both attain the object of the corporation and ensure the commitment and dedication of its own employees to attaining this object.

Here we might see quite a bit of tension when it comes to employee-employer relations at Canada Post. While one cannot put the blame totally on one party or the other, we can look at some of the facts that still exist at Canada Post, as they exist in many other Crown corporations and at the government level. As of today, the pay equity legislation or the pay equity act has not been fully implemented. When it comes to Canada Post, we have not seen the result of its implementation.

Estimates tell us that it would take approximately $70 million on the part of Canada Post to deal with the question of pay equity. On this front alone section 11 of the Canadian Human Rights Act, 1978, states: "It is a discriminatory practice for an employer to establish or maintain differences in wages between male and female employees who are performing work of equal value".

It is already in the Canadian Human Rights Act and I would suggest that Canada Post is obliged under this act to deal with the question of pay equity and to proceed with it.

Having said this, a $70 million liability on Canada Post's hands would probably put the corporation in a deficit position, not only for the next two or three years but perhaps for the next five years.

Speaking of the financial situation at Canada Post, over the past three years or so the books have shown some surplus, in excess of about $260 million profit. One might argue whether these profits are only in the books as a result of assets being calculated as assets that were sold and came to the treasurer of Canada Post being shown as revenues. On the other hand, one might say it might have been revenues.

In any event, for 1991–1992 Canada Post will see some deficit in the range of close to $100 million. When you add the additional $70 million that Canada Post will have to come up with in order to deal with pay equity, I would suggest that will put Canada Post in a situation in which it will not see a positive profit for the next five years or so.

One would then ask what this particular bill will do. Which employee, which corporation and which part of the country and what country in the world would want to invest in a corporation that is not making a profit? No one in their right mind would want to take his or her money and invest it in shares when there is no revenue.

An hon. member: The government does.

Mr. Harb: In the back of my mind I am asking, what is the logic? Why has the government come up with this scheme? As the minister argued, it will improve morale. That might be true if you have a corporation that really has a good track record in terms of profit and ability to generate more revenue.

In the case of a corporation like Canada Post, that is not the case. It is not a private sector corporation. The hon. member from Toronto was talking about the province of Ontario. I am not here to defend the province of Ontario.

When they were talking about employees being able to purchase shares in a corporation, they were talking about the private sector. I do not think they were talking about public sector institutions or public sector Crown corporations.

The minute we allow or make provisions for employees to invest in a corporation, if that corporation is a public corporation, automatically we have admitted to the fact that we are privatizing at least part of that corporation, whether it is 5 per cent or 6 per cent or 10 per cent. In the case of Canada Post, we are privatizing, as of the date the legislation is approved, 10 per cent of Canada Post.

I want to say that is the case. It is not in the act, looking at the five different objectives. I would like to read the last part of the act: "The need to maintain a corporate identity program approved by the Governor in Council that reflects the role of the corporation as an institution of the Government of Canada". Already the act states that Canada Post is a Crown corporation, it is in the hands of the Government of Canada.

This legislation amends the act. However, one would suggest to stop moving it out of public hands and into private hands at this time at a rate of 10 per cent.

I want to say that the best way to deal with the question of morale, whether we are talking about the public or the private sector, is through encouragement, training of the work force, dealing with issues of fairness and dealing with issues of the ability of an employee for advancement. Those are the kinds of things that would improve morale in both the public sector and the private sector.

As my colleague has indicated, in the case of Canada Post, the employees have not had a contract for the past three years. That is not a good thing. That will not help morale. It will not improve productivity. If anything, it will be to the detriment of the corporation.

That does not reflect on the corporation as well as on the government who oversees the operation of the corporation. In cases like this, it is the obligation of the government to step in in order to ensure that the question is resolved. To that extent, I would say only by doing that can we address the question of morale in Canada Post.

The minister is on record in The Ottawa Citizen dated May 1, 1992. He is quoted as saying that one of the main reasons he is introducing the amendment is that it is a proven vehicle for improving morale. I presume he is referring to the employees in Canada Post.

Then let us see what the employees have said on this. They have said that their best share in Canada Post is their wages and their security rests on the services provided to Canadians and not the profit and the dividends of the corporation.

So right here we have the minister making a statement which is immediately refuted by the workers' representatives. On that I would suggest that the government with this legislation is privatizing Canada Post not through the front door but through the back door and that is not fair. I do not think Canadians should accept this. We have to be up front with Canadians.

Perhaps what the government is trying to do with this legislation is to throw a trial ball. If there is an outcry in the public domain and the public complains then it might think it over and might not proceed further. If government comes to the conclusion that it might be able to get away with it, I am sure that we see here today will be the beginning of the end of Canada Post as a Crown corporation.

I suggest that the government at this point in time withdraw the bill and go back to consultation both with the public as a whole and with the workers at Canada Post. Try to bring back legislation that will truly address the question of morale of employees at Canada Post, that will help Canada Post to continue to do the quality work it is doing in the community.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the member if he has a clue of anybody outside Canada Post management who has requested this bill? I know none of the postal workers in my riding and my city came to me saying: "I really want to have a share in Canada Post Corporation". Did any of the postal workers in his riding? I suspect he cannot come up with an example like that.

Would he not agree that what we have here is a situation like exchanging gifts at Christmas without ever asking what anybody wants. Granny winds up getting a train set maybe and the six-year old nephew gets the night-gown. If nobody, and I mean nobody, outside Canada Post management has requested this then why the heck is it being done?

Mr. Harb: Mr. Speaker, that is a very good question. In fact, I have not heard an outcry from the public, the workers, or even the management of Canada Post pounding on my door saying: "Please support the legislation. It is a good piece of legislation and we want to proceed."

• (1500)

I want to take this opportunity to say no. It has been on the mind of the government from the very early days to privatize not only Canada Post but also VIA Rail, CBC, Air Canada and Petro-Canada. It is part of the over-all mandate. What we have seen lately with the closure or the deferral of over 46 Crown corporations is a clear indication that this government is really interested in one thing. That is to wash its hands completely of anything that has to do with public service.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. It being three o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

INFRASTRUCTURE IMPROVEMENTS

ESTABLISHMENT OF TRI-LEVEL FUNDING PROGRAM

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should join with provincial governments to establish a tri-level program for the funding of infrastructure improvements, including improvements to sewage and water treatment facilities, road and bridge repair and the construction of grade separations at railway crossings.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am happy that I got lucky and my motion was drawn. At this point I want to thank my colleagues in all parties who, through negotiation, agreed to let me come on early since I may not be able to be here much over the next several weeks. I am happy that my motion was selected for a three-hour debate with a vote which I hope I can be here for.

I want to begin by saying that any government, provincial or federal, of any political party that becomes so hypnotized, mesmerized and traumatized by current deficits and total debt, become immobilized in doing very much if anything about reducing them or eliminating any significant portion of those debts.

Whether the debts are inherited from a previous government or as a result of the financial and fiscal actions of the government itself, it must take actions that result in a sounder financial position. This means it must start doing things that fly in the face of conventional wisdom of old line party policies going back many decades, namely, in tough times instituting cutbacks, reductions and eliminations of programs that in the end would allow them to reduce deficits and debts.

My Motion No. M-281 is one of the many ways available to government at both the federal and provincial level to start doing that. Policies aimed at full employment, increased production and thus more people paying taxes, are the only way to reduce deficits and debts, if not totally eliminate them.

We went through this before at the end of the Second World War, at the end of the Korean war, and in the early 1960s.

While I am on public debts and deficits, I am compelled to remind this House and the country that every provincial and federal debt has been brought about by Conservative, Liberal and Social Credit governments, every single one.

The Government of Ontario inherited about 80 per cent of the present debt it has and that was not done by NDPers. It was not any NDP government that got the country or any province into the financial mess we are in now. We did not do it and we refuse to accept any of the blame for it. However, in four jurisdictions in Canada, NDP governments will do something about it.

An hon. member: Les, where were you?

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I am going to get to that one in a minute.

Is it not strange that over the decades the CCF and the NDP were accused of being the party with the big spenders. Well, who were the big spenders over the last 50 years? I will not go back any farther; that could be even more embarrassing. Who was it who got us into this financial mess? It was our federal government and provinces, the mess that they are presently in. Who was it who really were the big spenders?

It is ridiculous and laughable to hear Tories, Liberals, and Socreds, whatever number is left of them, criticizing NDP governments that have been in office anywhere from six or seven months to a year and a half or two, for their policies and their budgets.

It is equally ridiculous and laughable to read editorials and articles by columnists on the business pages and to hear various economists and other so-called financial experts who lecture NDP governments about these issues. All of them continue to advance policies that got us into the mess in the first place. Business executives are equally guilty. They lecture us, while they rush to Ottawa and provincial governments with their hands out as soon as they are in trouble because of their own stupidity.

Well, we do not need nor want any more lectures from these people. We will advocate and implement policies as much as we can that result in full employment, which in turn is the only way of reducing the deficits of federal and provincial governments.

We have done that before. I remind the House that we financed the entire Second World War without a nickel of foreign investment. All this running around, kissing the backsides of other places and corporations outside of Canada for foreign investment is another way of losing sovereignty and economic independence.

After the end of the Second World War all the debts that had accumulated during the dirty thirties and the war were paid off within the next 12 years. We had full employment. Why? Because our infrastructure had to be rebuilt. Every town and village and city in this country, our road system, factories, all had to be rebuilt and retooled, and we did it. By the mid-1950s all those other debts were paid off and we had full employment. I can recall making a speech once in the mid-1950s, along with a lot of other people, including Tories because the Liberals were in power, who were complaining when unemployment hit 3 per cent. We thought that was terrible. Now 7, 8, and 10 per cent are sort of accepted.

My motion is one of many ways in which governments at the federal and provincial levels can start to deal with the financial straits of this country in a significant manner. When I look around and see all that needs to be done, I realize that we need another high-rise office building or shopping centre like a hole in the head. Public investment should be involved with private enterprise in rebuilding the infrastructure of our municipalities and providing more housing, both of which are high employment areas of commerce and production.

I deliberately left my motion general so that, should the House and the government agree to it, they can implement this sort of a measure in any way they see fit, according to their own policies. I did not get all that specific.

I want to suggest one way in which it can be done, and this was advocated many years ago. It would require by legislation if necessary financial institutions, banks, trust companies, and what not to allocate a certain percentage of their lending capacity to this national public infrastructure fund. That money would only be paid the going bank rate interest. If it was 8 per cent, that would be it. The federal government and the provinces would negotiate a sharing of some of the interest costs.

I would suggest that the federal government could pick up 2.5 per cent of the interest and the provinces, 1.5 per cent, or make it 1 per cent and 3 per cent, so that the municipalities can have money at not more than 4 per cent and do not end up in a worse situation than they presently are in with a servicing debt cost that grinds them under.

The money is there when we consider what is in the pools of investment capital, whether it is from RRSPs, pension funds or people who invest in financial institutions. When we look at the pool of capital that is there, we have no excuse for not doing it.

There is a list as long as your arm, Mr. Speaker, of towns, villages and cities in Canada with sewer and water systems that need rebuilding, renewing, enlarging. My God, we still have communities pouring raw sewage into our lakes and rivers. We are in no position to lecture any other country in the world.

The Federation of Canadian Municipalities says it will take $20 billion over the next five years. So what? It is only money. Most, if not all, of it will be money we owe to ourselves. We would be investing in our own nation. We would be investing in our own people. We would be providing needs that are staring us in the face anywhere we go in Canada.

The situation is the same with housing. There are lists as long as your arm, Mr. Speaker, for chronic-care beds, for co-operative and low income housing. Again these are areas which are high in employment.

I mentioned the grade separations at level crossings which were cancelled. We used to have a revolving fund of $10 million a year, but that was cancelled since 1984. We kill more people at level crossings than those who die of AIDS in any given year. I am completely in support of all the efforts, the medical research, treatment, comfort and assistance to those suffering from that terrible disease, but we killed more people at level crossings last year than those who died of AIDS.

I cannot get anybody excited about that. How come? Why not? God knows there is a need to improve the efficiency of our transportation systems and the safety factor for our public.

There is a variety of ways to do this and this is only one of many, but I submit that full employment is the only way we are going to defeat deficits, national debt or provincial debt. We have gone through this many times before in our history. The problem has been that on many occasions we have had a recession or depression and then some more recessions. As far as I am concerned the present one we are in, in many aspects, is as bad or worse than the depression of the 1930s. All the nation does is sit and wring its hands. It cries and screams about the debt and the deficits.

If we put one million of those million and a half unemployed to work they would pay taxes. The municipalities should be able to afford financially to do a lot of things with their infrastructure, their sewer and water systems, streets, roads and bridges. Something should be done in the way of improvements to our national railway system. There is so much out there that one would have to be blind not to see what needs to be done.

We have proven this many times before. I recommend to my colleagues a little book called The Unnecessary Evil by Professor Reuben Bellan of the University of Manitoba. Please get it from the library and read it, because it throws into a cocked hat all the conventional ways in which governments tried to deal with increasing deficits and increasing debts.

When I mentioned that we paid for the entire Second World War ourselves without any foreign investment, that is where I got that information. Nobody has ever refuted that and nobody can. The money is there. Unless we require financial institutions to put it up and the provinces and the federal government pay at least half of the interest costs so that municipalities can afford to draw upon those funds, nothing is going to happen. We will sit and muddle our way through. Too many places and too many people will be neglected in terms of the kinds of public, municipal infrastructure they must have and should have.

I hope in the three hours allotted for this debate that my colleagues on all sides will consider the national objective of full employment and this motion as one of the many ways to achieve that. We did it during wartime. We can do it in peacetime by declaring war on poverty, unemployment and insufficient and inadequate housing.

The fact that we have tens of thousands of people in the north living in slum homes without sewer and water or electricity is incredible and unnecessary. That applies to the four or five million Canadians who lack basic fundamental human rights: the right to a decent roof over their heads, the right to a job, the right to good health care and the right to good municipal services. Those rights are being denied to too many people in our country right now. My motion is one of the ways to help correct that.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I might say I am pleased today to rise in this House to respond to the motion of my hon. friend from Regina—Lumsden.

As the House will know, I have had occasions in the past to share many debates on many important issues with my hon. friend from the opposite side of the House.

The member opposite from Regina—Lumsden has once again spoken eloquently on this subject. This is no surprise to anyone who has listened to him over these many years in this House of Commons. This Chamber, I might add, has been in awe of his prestigious memory regarding transportation issues.

I can speak from experience on my own part from the many years we have spent on opposite sides in the transportation committee. I would use the phrase a worthy opponent as being the most appropriate way of describing our relationship.

It will come as no considerable surprise, though, that I would speak against this motion and take a different tack on it than what the member opposite has said. As I have said in the past, we have often found ourselves on opposite sides on such positions. This does not however diminish my own admiration for my hon. colleague, and I am glad to have an opportunity to say so in the Chamber this afternoon.

The hon. member today is speaking about the government going out and playing a greater part in terms of infrastructure. It would almost seem he is alluding to the fact that the government has not had any part in the infrastructure in our country, but this is simply not the case. We have in the past contributed money to help provinces and occasionally local governments with infrastructure, construction and maintenance.

Highways in fact have been traditionally an area where the federal government spends money to help other levels of government with infrastructure construction. Over the years the federal money has paid for a lot more than the road and bridge repairs envisioned in the hon. member's resolution.

The House well knows that the vast majority of roads is not federal jurisdiction. Indeed road mileage under direct federal control amounts to less than 3 per cent of the national total, and these are mostly in our national parks and on aboriginal lands.

The federal government for one reason or another also owns a number of significant bridges, mostly connecting Canada with the United States. Of the 97 per cent of Canadian highway mileage out of federal jurisdiction, almost two-thirds is under municipal and local control. The hon. member opposite has alluded to the fact that he is talking about the infrastructure within the municipal structure.

I might add that despite the fact highways are outside our federal purview, federal government contributions to highways go back a long way. The very first highway assistance program was established by Parliament in 1919 with the object of stimulating construction and co-ordinating provincial activity to achieve some uniformity in highway standards. This program lapsed in 1928.

Subsequently highway construction was a significant component of federal relief programs in the 1930s. It was during this period that work started on the Trans-Canada Highway. Serious work on the Trans-Canada however did not get going until after the Second World War. Parliament passed the Trans-Canada Highway Act in 1949 and initiated the era of major federal-provincial highway cost sharing programs. The Trans-Canada alone cost the federal government over $800 million before the act lapsed at the end of 1970. By that time, highway cost-sharing programs had become a fact of Canadian life.

I will not bore you or this House with a litany of all the programs which the federal and other levels of government undertook over the years, but a few bear mentioning. There were the Roads to Resources and the Atlantic Trunk Road programs in the 1960s and the regional development agreements in the 1970s. Over the years, all regions of the country have benefited from one or the other of these programs.

This brings me to where we are now and what we are doing. At present there are a number of federal departments and agencies involved in highway construction. Basically they can be divided into two groups: the builders and the funders. The builders include public works, environment and the National Capital Commission. These are directly involved in road construction on federal land. The main funding department these days is Transport Canada.

At present, Transport Canada oversees programs involving cost-sharing agreements with the Atlantic provinces and Quebec. A further program which provided money for improvements to the Yellowhead Highway and involved agreements with the four western provinces expired in 1991.

Generally speaking, the programs fall into the following categories: regional development programs, including economic and regional development agreements or ERDAs; co-operation agreements with the provinces of Prince Edward Island, Quebec, Newfoundland and Labrador; highway improvement programs with Nova Scotia and New Brunswick; and the specific Newfoundland transportation initiative. These programs collectively amount to a federal commitment of over $1 billion in funding spread out over a number of years.

The highway improvement agreements with Nova Scotia and New Brunswick expire in 1995–96. The ERDAs run to 1994–95. The Newfoundland initiative is until the year 2003.

In all, the federal government has averaged around $230 million a year in highway spending over the past decade. All provinces have received some of this money, with the bulk of it going to the provinces most in need of it.

As the recent federal budget indicated, the time may come for the federal government once again to launch a program to develop further our national highway system. I would certainly welcome such a program, primarily for the economic benefit it would bring in the form of a more efficient system for both domestic distribution and exports. This is really much in line with what the hon. member opposite has been proposing.

Even without a new program, however, the federal government is involved in highway construction and at levels beyond that envisioned in the resolution that is before us.

Although the hon. member's aims are worthy and I have no doubt about his sincerity, I was beginning to wonder at what stage of history he was going to take us back to, but he only took us back today to the 1950s. Many a time he has done this with us in the transport committee over the years. Rarely have we ever caught him out on his facts either. The member has failed today to take into account the current programs. For this reason, I will not be supporting this motion.

In closing, I would once again want to salute my hon. friend opposite for what he has contributed today to this debate. I also want to wish him the very best in the treatments that he is undergoing at this time for his health.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, first let me start by congratulating the member for his motion. Certainly the Liberal Party, when we looked at this issue back in the early days of 1988 and before, was the only national party that not only supported the idea of providing help to municipalities, but we had put a dollar and cent figure on it. We were the only national party that committed a $15 billion fund to be put toward infrastructure across Canada. That was done as a result of a request which was made by the Federation of Canadian Municipalities. That was not the case for the NDP. The NDP did not have a program, did not support a program, nor did it even want to talk about a program of partnership. However, my colleague's motion is a good one. Perhaps he has moved that extra necessary step.

Back in 1990 as a result of a request that was put by my colleague from Nepean and myself to our leader, the Liberal Party of Canada has launched a task force. This task force has travelled almost in every province and territory across Canada in order to meet with community leaders, business leaders, environmental and special interest groups to find out what they want us as a party to do in order to move forward with the question of infrastructure.

I would like to put on the record some of the recommendations that the Liberal task force has brought forward. Those recommendations at the time were endorsed by the Federation of Canadian Municipalities.

While we believe that no single action will be enough to ensure the future health and viability of Canada's infrastructure, we believe that a broad range of measures is necessary to make a meaningful difference.

Our recommendations include:

a federal recognition of municipal infrastructure as a crisis of national proportion;

a federal commitment to share the responsibility for municipal infrastructure with the provincial and municipal counterpart;

the establishment of a minimum national criteria for infrastructure to provide environmental protection and a uniform level of services for all Canadians, so we will not see ourselves in the same situation every 15 or 20 years and we will set those standards and then we will make sure that our partners are meeting those standards;

a federal commitment to rehabilitate and expand the Trans-Canada Highway; and the establishment of a process through which the federal government can take action. This includes defining the respective role of federal, provincial and municipal governments in infrastructure construction and management, identifying and priorizing needs on a national scale in consultation with and with the concurrence of provincial and municipal governments.

It also includes increasing incentives for maintenance and reconstruction of existing capital assets and the use of low capital, environmentally conscious techniques, such as waste reduction and recycling, exploring alternative funding sources including such options as more rational user fees for water services, applying fuel tax revenues to road construction, maintenance and increased private sector involvement.

Finally it includes increasing support for research and development to accelerate technological innovation and encouraging efficient municipal management methods to permit phased programs of rehabilitation, better management of infrastructure systems and effective use of funds.

We have on the record the position of our party when it comes to municipal infrastructure. Also, very recently the opposition leader has put forward a number of points that will help the Canadian economy. One of those points was a federal government involvement in the area of infrastructure.

It has been estimated that in excess of 300,000 jobs can be created as a result of a partnership between the three levels of government. As my colleague indicated earlier, this is an incredible investment in the future of Canadians.

When we talk about infrastructure, we are talking about roads, sewer systems and bridges. Believe it or not, those are the most important ingredients for economic development because industry will not locate in a town that does not have a proper infrastructure.

Housing construction will not take place in a town that does not have sufficient municipal services that would include proper roads, as well as sewer systems, water treatment plants, and so on.

My colleague from Nepean and I, when we were travelling across Canada, heard horror story after horror story from mayors, from councillors, from business people and so on. Every one of them told us quite bluntly that they would not be able to do it alone. They do need the involvement of the other partners, and that is the provincial government as well as the federal government.

Whether we want it or not, there is an environmental spin-off as a result of the federal government's involvement in infrastructure. The environment is at stake here and any federal government involvement in the area of infrastructure would help the environment.

Think in terms of the sewer systems that are leaking into our rivers, our lakes and the oceans. Think in terms of the water treatment plants that are not meeting provincial standards. In Ontario alone there are in excess of 90 different municipalities in which it was found the systems were not up to standard, and they were forced by the provincial government to meet those standards.

I cannot tell the House how devastating the situation is in Atlantic Canada in areas in which there is raw sewage being dumped right into the ocean. I say this and I am at a loss because in situations like this I would say that the federal government should have stepped in a long time ago in order to provide the necessary help and support for those municipalities to implement a proper sewage treatment plant and a proper sewage system.

I was informed as well that in areas such as Newfoundland there are a number of homes, thousands of homes, that do not even have sewer systems. That by itself is quite alarming and that is why the Liberal Party has recognized this issue as a national issue. That is why we are the only party to put forward a tangible proposal and a proper strategic plan that will deal with this question of infrastructure and will deal with the question of partnership among the three different partners.

With that, I would like to close by thanking my colleague who has introduced this motion for providing me as well as other colleagues with the opportunity to put forward the positions of our collective caucuses and our collective parties.

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak to the motion of the member for Regina—Lumsden on Canadian infrastructure funding.

I support in theory the idea of federal involvement in infrastructure spending but I disagree strongly with the hon. member's approach. I know that he would be very disappointed if I did not.

I have had many discussions. The hon. member for Regina—Lumsden and I had the honour to go to Yugoslavia and Bulgaria a little over a year ago. During our spare time we spent a lot of time discussing transport issues and I bow to his extensive knowledge. Having been in this House since 1968 and having served on the transport committee for many of those years, as my colleague from British Columbia has stated, his facts are very seldom wrong.

As I said before, I disagree with his approach. He seems convinced that with a few repairs here and there and the whole country will benefit. He made a statement that this motion is one of many ways that we can bring about full employment and thereby assist our country and our people.

• (1540)

I am convinced that in these times of severe fiscal constraint the federal government should confine its financial support for infrastructure improvement to areas in which it has identified clear national objectives which will be of lasting value to the country as a whole.

All this is by way of introduction to the national highway policy study, which is an excellent example of how this sort of thing ought to be done.

The federal government has identified highway improvement as an area in which scarce federal resources can be used to best effect. The federal government is now well advanced in studying the most effective way to make a valuable contribution to the national highway infrastructure needs. It is doing so in a rational, carefully considered, non-partisan fashion.

As we all know, highways are a provincial responsibility under the Constitution. Successive federal governments have recognized that highways also have a national economic significance as avenues of interprovincial and international commerce. Federal involvement in highway construction funding goes back a long way to, as the hon. member stated, the early 1920s when it was important to find jobs for our returning soldiers.

In the early 1950s federal participation was essential if Canada was to ever have a Trans-Canada Highway linking east and west. However, by the mid-1980s federal highway policy had been reduced to ad hoc support for various provincial priority highway projects. These were often, as it has been said, local roads which did not have any truly national significance.

Work on a comprehensive national highway policy commenced in 1988 and has proceeded through four successive phases. From the beginning this policy development has been a historic federal-provincial co-operative effort, and the major industry's stakeholders have also been consulted at the appropriate points.

In the first phase the criteria for selection of highways comprising a national system of economic importance was established. The system thus identified comprises 25,000 kilometres, which amounts to only 3 per cent of the total Canadian highway network but carries over 75 per cent of freight and 90 per cent of inter-city passenger traffic. Think about that. Three per cent of the total highway network carries 75 per cent of freight and 90 per cent of inter-city passenger traffic. This network links all major cities, ports of entry and other major transportation nodes in our provinces and our territories.

Seventy-five per cent of this system is still two-lane and, incredibly, some portions are still constructed of gravel. When analysed in 1988 over 38 per cent did not meet the minimum national highway engineering standards.

The second phase looked at the economics of the national highway system, in other words, highway related revenue, annual expenditures on capital and maintenance, the potential cost of upgrading and the economic impact of improvements to the system. It was in this phase that both the federal and provincial governments began to get a clear idea of the magnitude of the costs involved.

Effectively, governments were told that to upgrade the system to minimum standards, spending levels on the national highway system would have to double. The total bill now stands at an estimated $14 billion. This total will continue to grow while much needed upgrading is deferred by provincial governments.

The third phase included consultations with the main stakeholders. From this phase it was learned that there was strong industry support for a national highway policy. We also found that the public recognized that additional revenues may be necessary and was even willing to support new taxation, provided that it was dedicated to road improvements. That is food for thought in a country in which dedicated taxation is not a common instrument of public policy.

The fourth phase of this study, which has just recently been completed, developed a framework for setting priorities and design and maintenance standards. It also examined principles for cost sharing, and possible preliminary program scheduling.

In summary, we now believe that we are at about the stage at which we know what has to be spent and where it has to be spent. We have now come to the most critical element of all, funding.

At issue are federal-provincial cost sharing and the sources of revenue. Not easy questions for any government, especially in times of fiscal restraint. I have dealt at some length with the national highway policy study because the process seems to me to exemplify how infrastructure issues involving different levels of government should be addressed.

It also shows how the current government has acted on an infrastructure issue which it has identified as being of national economic importance.

This brings me back to the hon. member's motion. What I have described is both more and less than he called for. It is more because it deals with the whole complex process of resolving a particular infrastructure issue, and not just road and bridge repair here and there.

It is less because it has focused on a comparatively narrow area, but it is an area in which federal intervention will have a significant and lasting impact on our national, economic, and social well-being.

I believe that this is the responsible way to treat national infrastructure issues.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I too am pleased to speak to the motion of the member from the New Democratic Party on Canada's infrastructure.

This is probably the third time I have spoken in this House on this issue. Another time it was an opposition day. I and my colleague for Ottawa Centre initiated a study back in 1990 on the state of Canada's infrastructure. As a result of that study we developed this report which was available to anyone who was interested.

This issue is probably one of the most important issues facing Canada today, in terms of how it affects the environment, our deteriorating infrastructure, how it could affect jobs in this country and reduce unemployment and welfare in the country as a whole.

In travelling across Canada and interviewing many people in many municipalities right across the country it certainly hit home as to how critical the state of the infrastructure is in many, many areas of the country, in particular Atlantic Canada.

On many occasions since 1984 representations have been made to the federal government for the creation of a program to shore up Canada's deteriorating infrastructure. These proposals to date have been ignored by this government.

I do support this private member's motion. It simply reiterates what we already said in our report in 1990. Without a major infusion of funds for the preservation and expansion of bridges, water-mains, roads, and sewers in Canada both the productivity and safety of all Canadians will be jeopardized. A Canada-wide infrastructure program would create more jobs than the trade deal alone. It would help develop every region of the country rather than bail out corporations in select communities as this government has done.

The member who spoke previously asked whether this problem has just been created since 1984. It has been created since 1984 because historically all three levels of government—municipal, provincial and federal—have contributed to the costs of financing urban infrastructure.

From 1938 to 1984 the federal government made funds available for infrastructure programs in this country. Some of the programs included the Municipal Improvement Assistance Act from 1938 to 1949, the Sewage Treatment Program from 1961 to 1974, the Municipal Development and Loan Act from 1963 to 1966, the Neighbourhood Improvement Program from 1973 to 1979, the Municipal Infrastructure Program from 1975 to 1978, and the Community Services Contribution Program from 1979 to 1980.

These were all programs that helped municipalities right across the country. I might say that these programs were all initiated under Liberal governments.

In those years the governments of Canada had been committed to the infrastructure of this country. Today's federal government has refused to accept any share of the responsibility for infrastructure, leaving the municipal and provincial governments to struggle with this increasing financial burden.

The government argues that in the Constitution it has no responsibility in the area of infrastructure. It is, however, very important to note that the Constitution does not provide for federal involvement in health care, education or social services. Yet, of course the federal government must be involved in those areas. It must be a major contributor and it is, although it has certainly been reducing that too in recent years.

Therefore, can the federal government deny its responsibility for the environment, clean water, regional and national economic development? When I talk about clean water and I talk about sewage treatment, there has almost been an abdication of political leadership on the part of this government. I am talking about an environmental impact here.

I want to give you an example. The Canadian government spends $3 billion to $4 billion in subsidies on fossil fuels while supposedly fighting for conservation. The same is true with our lobbying for the forestry management. At the same time we are decimating our own resources.

Why not cut these subsidies to an industry which is producing fossil fuels harmful to the environment and use the $2 billion, $3 billion or $4 billion to help with a municipal infrastructure program, reduce the debt or energy conservation? There could be any number of aspects that money could be used for. Do not tell me, fellows, that you do not have any money across the way.

The federal government is not only a badly needed funding partner, but is also in the best position to co-ordinate the establishment of national standards and goals. The federal government is currently levying heavy taxes.

The gentleman across the way just said that there was no way he could get money from whatever. They currently levy heavy taxes on the uses of gasoline and diesel fuel but channel not a cent of these revenues into our road systems. Do not give me that nonsense across the way.

Beyond speech making from the government side of this House we have so far seen little federal commitment to the environment. Our rivers and harbours are polluted from Halifax to Vancouver. Beaches are closed summer after summer because the federal government does not make sewer construction and repair a national priority.

It is ironic that under the Great Lakes action plan the federal government has recently announced a $125 million fund for the restoration and preservation of this vital water system. This is in addition to almost $1 billion already spent by the government on the Great Lakes since 1972. Yet we are still pumping raw sewage into the Great Lakes system, and it does not make sense.

There is a cost to doing business and I recognize that. The transportation of goods and services is one important cost to business. Roads in poor condition increase costs, not only through increased use of fuel but through deterioration of vehicles and lost time. Poor roads and lack of waste disposal facilities also add to the cost of doing business, either through increased dump fees or increased costs to have their own waste hauled away.

As governments at all levels start placing stricter environmental controls and ask business to bear the cost of its pollution, business will be able to operate more efficiently in communities that have the infrastructure to handle and treat waste water.

We know that Canadians are the least energy-efficient consumers in the world. Every possible method has to be used to improve our record through sustainable development. The cost of cleaning up our damaged rivers and lakes far exceeds the cost of treating sewage before it gets to these rivers and lakes.

Polluters to date have remained unpunished. The federal government has failed to prosecute a single polluter in the province of Ontario during that last year. That is just disgraceful. The failure to go after polluters has occurred even though Ottawa has the Canadian Environmental Protection Act which carries a maximum penalty of $1 million.

No single action will be enough to ensure the future health and viability of Canada's infrastucture. A broad range of measures is necessary to make a meaningful difference. Specifically, these should include the following:

A federal recognition of municipal infrastructure as a crisis of national proportion;

A federal commitment to share the responsibility to rebuild infrastructure with its provincial and municipal counterparts;

The establishment of minimal national standards for infrastructure to provide environmental protection and uniform levels of service for all Canadians;

A federal commitment to rehabilitate and expand the Trans-Canada Highway;

The establishment of a process through which the federal government can clarify the respective roles of federal, provincial and municipal governments;

Identify and priorize needs on a national scale; and Increase incentives for maintenance and reconstruction of capital assets.

We in the Liberal Party have supported this. My leader is on record as supporting a national infrastructure program. I would suggest that this government get serious. If it is not serious about the environment, it has a responsibility to Canadians and to everyone to get people back to work to improve our environment and to get on with the job right away.

It has been a privilege for me to travel across the country and to talk to Canadians. I have heard desolate responses from a lot of people.

I thank the member from the New Democratic Party for putting this motion forward and giving me the opportunity again to speak to this in the House of Commons.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed an honour to rise in support of the hon. member's motion to provide new funding for the infrastructure of our country.

It is an honour not only because of the substance of the motion that he has put and the wisdom of the suggestion that he makes. It is also an honour for a member of Parliament like myself who has only been in the House for the last three and a half years to rise in recognition of the contribution that the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden has made throughout his political career.

In the province of Saskatchewan, the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden has been known for many things but above all else, he has been known as a gutsy fighter. He will take on a fight for what he believes is right whether it is popular at the time or not, whether what he has to say is in keeping with the political fashion of the day or not.

He is a member who has always stood by his principles. He has always been prepared to fight the good fight. I think it might be instructive to some of us that this hon. member has been here for 24 years, since 1968. In fact, his courageous and principled stands have not ended up costing him politically. In fact, they have won him respect way beyond the boundaries of the political party he represents, or the constituency that he represents.

The motion which the hon. member has presented today should be seen in that same light. It is not popular nowadays to talk about governments spending money. The popular talk these days is how to slash, how to cut, how to reduce deficits and how to bring down government involvement in providing goods and services in this country.

The hon. member is a student of history. He is a student of economics. He has seen these cycles happen before and he has seen what happens when governments fall prey to the easy wisdom of cutting when times are tough.

The inevitable other end of that cycle is when times get better. Then governments start to spend like crazy and reinforce people's notions about what is possible. Therefore, we are always in a situation where we are doing exactly the opposite of what we should be doing if any kind of economic sense were to prevail.

Certainly, the need has been established for the infrastructure program that the member outlines. Certainly, those of us who have not recognized the need in our own country need only go across the border to the U.S. of A. and see what has happened to their splendid cities since they have introduced the thinking of proposition 13 in California that forbids the raising of taxes at the municipal level to provide the kinds of services that the member is talking about.

The deterioration in those American cities is a scandal to behold. It came as no surprise to any of us who have walked those streets that they should develop the kind of tinder-box situations like we saw in Los Angeles. Certainly, what happened in Toronto is a wake-up call for us to pay attention to those same factors.

If I may just turn briefly to the notion that there is no money, in my constituency of Prince Albert—Churchill River when I first got elected in 1988, the federal share of welfare and UI was $70 million. People were appalled when I raised that figure. They were not aware that it was anywhere close to that.

Now that figure, three and a half years later, has risen to about $125 million in welfare and unemployment insurance costs in one constituency alone. That is the same constituency that has the highest rate of tuberculosis in the country, the highest incidence of infant mortality in the country, much of which is related to inadequate infrastucture.

As well, we need economic development to make taxpayers out of the people now currently on welfare and UI.

Therefore, I would like to conclude by congratulating the member and urging all members to support this motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member will have six minutes remaining in his debate when this comes up again.

The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 93 the order is dropped to the bottom of the list of the order of precedence of the Order Paper.

It being four o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 28(1) this House stands adjourned until Tuesday at 10 o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty to table five petitions today. These petitioners ask Parliament to convince or put pressure on the government to reinstate the Court Challenges Program. As we know, the government abolished this program in the last budget.

These petitioners maintain that this Court Challenges Program was and must continue to be an essential tool in developing constitutional rights and must continue to give all Canadians equal access to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

They ask Parliament to reconsider the possibility of restoring the Court Challenges Program, which gives all Canadians equal access.

RADIO AND TELEVISION BROADCASTING

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have three petitions today.

In the first, petitioners ask Parliament to ensure the CRTC regulate the use of foul language on radio and television. They believe the current usage of the amount of foul language that is used counteracts parental efforts in the home and it undermines what it is they are trying to do. They indicate that foul language is unacceptable on radio, television, or in other media whether it is used in English or in French.

SOCIAL SCIENCES

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): My second petition is from petitioners who point out that Canada's greatest challenges are in the area of the social sciences. They refer to violence, abuse, environment, aboriginal issues, poverty especially among children, illiteracy, et cetera.

They point out as well the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council's providing of the kind of leadership that permitted individuals to address those issues.

They point out as well that it has now been merged with the Canada Council. They indicate there was no consultation. They ask that this decision be deferred, that there be consultation, and subsequent to that a decision be made.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): In my final petition, the petitioners point out there needs to be substantial investments in education if we are to compete internationally, that we respond to globalization if we are to increase productivity. They indicate there is still the 3 per cent tax on student loans.

They point out there has been an additional six months of interest added to student loans. They indicate as well the goods and services tax still exists on books, tuition fees are increasing, student debt is increasing at an alarming rate and they indicate there have been major cuts to transfer payments to the provinces.

They ask the government to review its policies with respect to education and retraining.

ILLEGAL DRUG ABUSE

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure of presenting quite an impressive petition signed by some 300 constituents, collected by Mrs. Edith Iwama of my riding of York West, pertaining to the issue of illegal drug abuse which is unfortunately afflicting many of our youth right across the country, including metropolitan Toronto.

The petitioners are calling upon the government, the minister, in particular the Solicitor General, to amend our Narcotics Control Act so the proceeds from drug seizures, rather than going completely and solely into the Government of Canada general revenue fund be shared with both police forces and local organizations which are responsible on the leading edge, on the streets, and in the back alleyways of trying to put back this drug epidemic.

I might add that many of the people who signed this petition are police officers.

DRUGS

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition to the House signed by over 125 constituents from Victoria and the surrounding area. They are concerned with the provisions of section 462.2 of the Criminal Code dealing with literature for "illicit drug use", and in particular the application by the administration of justice of that section respecting the uses of hemp and literature in respect of the uses of hemp, which the petitioners say has many beneficial uses.

The petitioners call on Parliament to amend or remove from the Criminal Code section 462.2 so that the freedom of Canadians is there to discuss and consider the possible beneficial uses of hemp or other substances.

BILL C–55

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I rise to address the questions which are before this House in Bill C–55.

The petitioners state that many women in Canada are living in poverty after years of home making which allowed their husbands to pursue careers without the burden of child bearing, child rearing and housework. Many of these women are disentitled by divorce to an equal share of their husband's federal pension credits accumulated during their marriage.

The government has stated in the past that it is in favour of mandatory automatic pension credit splitting. The pensioners request that Parliament amend Bill C–55 which is before this House so that all federal superannuation acts in which inequities exist allow for the retroactive pension credit splitting for all divorced spouses so that they may receive half of the federal pension credits accumulated by both spouses during the period of their marriage.

REFUGEES

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): I have a second petition which addresses the fate of refugee claimants in Canada, which is deplorable. They state that Canada, until recently, had an enviable record of compassion for the underprivileged, especially refugees, and that Canadian taxpayers have spent in the past three years an unjustifiably exorbitant amount of funds on a determination system that has proved to be inequitable and ineffective.

They call on Parliament for an administrative review, which this party has also repeatedly called for, which grants a general amnesty to all refugee claimants presently in Canada subject to the exclusion only of those who have serious criminal records in Canada or abroad for offences that would be considered serious in Canada.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise under Standing Order 36 to table a petition signed by residents of northern British Columbia, and in particular the city of Prince George.

These people are still concerned about this government's bringing in of the goods and services tax and they call on Parliament to reform the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations.

TOWNSHIP OF FRONT OF YONGE

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from the residents of the Township of Front of Yonge in Leeds County petitioning the CRTC to prevent the erection of a radio–TV tower in their community because of the negative effects that they perceive the installation of this tower would have in that particular location.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition, certified correct by the clerk as to form and content, signed by residents of my riding wherein the petitioners sheweth that Canada has put forward proposals for amending the Constitution of Canada. The government has established a citizens' forum to ascertain the views of Canadians on numerous matters and committees to consult with the people of Canada concerning the proposals. The Supreme Court upheld that the Constitution of Canada belongs to the people.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to enact legislation providing for a referendum of the people binding upon Parliament to accept or reject constitutional amendments proposed by the government.

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I have the honour to submit two petitions today calling upon the government to reinstate the Court Challenges Program.

These are individuals primarily from the province of Ontario, as well as the province of Saskatchewan, and other Canadians who have signed this petition in the hope that the Government of Canada will not cancel the Court Challenges Program. They call upon the Government of Canada to rescind this action in order to reinstate this very worth-while project on behalf of the people of Canada.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

REFERENDUM ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons) moved that Bill C-81, an act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be speaking in favour of this bill today so that we get this important legislation moving.

It is important that Canadians be acquainted with the proposed legislation and are informed about how it relates to the constitutional issue. This legislation is a precautionary measure. It is no more and no less than that. This legislation would enable the federal government to hold a referendum on Canada's constitutional future should such a step be required.

Under current law, the federal government could not hold a referendum now even if it wanted to. There is no law to allow it. The bill would correct this obvious limitation.

In a democratic society, particularly one undergoing constitutional change, the idea of the federal government having this ability only makes common sense. It is simply a matter of management prudence.

If there were no legislation in place permitting a referendum, the people of Canada would rightly condemn Parliament for not having this instrument at hand to use in dealing with any eventuality.

In saying that this measure is a precautionary one, it is important to underline that there is nothing in the legislation saying that there will be a referendum at all. No decision to hold a federal referendum has been made. Likewise, the bill does not say anything about when a federal referendum might be held. Neither is there any provision in the legislation, nor has there been any decision about what a referendum question would ask.

There is no provision in the legislation saying what a so-called victory would be. Speculation on anyone's part on any of these issues is meaningless because the bill before us only provides that a referendum could be held—could be held, nothing more.

Probably there are some people who do not want the federal government even to have the power to hold a referendum and who will oppose the bill for this reason alone. They are entitled to their views, but it is our view as a government that it would be irresponsible to leave Canada without all appropriate and democratic means necessary to advance the constitutional reform process.

This government believes that Canada has the right to hold a referendum if it wants to, just as the provinces have a perfect right to hold referenda on matters of their choice. There is simply no sensible argument in favour of the position that the provinces should be able to hold referenda but the federal government should not.

No one on the government side has claimed—I certainly do not—that this legislation is perfect in all respects. I look forward to any practical suggestions to improve it, but I do believe that under our Constitution this bill meets the test of fairness that reasonable Canadians demand.

In drafting the bill, the government kept the principle of fairness very much in mind. We wanted to ensure that any referendum held under the provisions of this bill would be fair and workable, and would be seen as such by the Canadian people.

In addressing the issue of fairness, a key feature of this bill is that the wording of any referendum would have to be approved by Parliament. Without Parliament's approval of the question, no referendum could be held at all.

Second, the Canada Elections Act legislation which enjoys the great respect and confidence of Canadians throughout this country would provide the basic framework under which any referendum would be held. The Chief Electoral Officer would have the same responsibility for the conduct of a referendum as he has for the conduct of a general election. He would be responsible for making the regulations under the Referendum Act to adapt the Canada Elections Act process to a referendum just as he has the responsibility for making the regulations to adapt the Canada Elections Act to a general election.

Third, the bill assures that the process is open and transparent. Anyone or any group intending to spend more than $5,000 in any federal referendum campaign must register. Any contribution over $250 and the name of the contributor must be identified.

Fourth, free broadcast time will be allocated equally to both sides by the broadcast arbitrator, which is a position under the Canada Elections Act, by using criteria set out in this legislation.

The bill requires networks to provide at least 90 minutes of free broadcast time to each side of the referendum question.

Fifth, any point of view on the referendum may be advanced via normal advertising, a matter to be decided between participants and broadcasters, subject to the governing CRTC regulations which require broadcasters to allocate all broadcast time during a referendum campaign on an equitable basis.

Some are of the opinion that there should be further restrictions in the legislation. For example, some might argue it should require that strict limits be put on spending. We examined this question very carefully. From the government's point of view, strict controls on spending would be helpful. As a practical matter, however, we believe that they would be ineffective and do little to ensure fairness.

In fact it could be counterproductive to have a referendum process which does not engender confidence and trust in the people.

The reason we hold this opinion is that while spending limits per se may not be contrary to the charter, there is the practical issue of making these limits meaningful.

The only way to ensure these limits would be honoured is to force everyone to campaign via yes or no committees. The courts would very possibly view this as an infringement upon people's freedom of association and freedom of speech. The practical effect of a successful court challenge would be to disrupt and discredit a referendum campaign, hardly a palatable result for Canadians.

Some may ask why is it then that the parties can be restricted in their spending during election campaigns. Hon. members should bear in mind that while the elections act may limit the spending of candidates and political parties in a federal election, it does not limit the spending of others during election campaigns as a result of a successful court challenge in 1984.

These others are individuals and groups with various options about current issues and who advance these opinions during an election campaign. The courts have ruled that they have a perfect right to express their views.

Some may suggest that even if restricting participation to yes or no committees is impossible, the bill should set spending limits on any individual or group. This could be done. But it would not be meaningful because people would simply set up one committee after another in order to accommodate any amount of spending they wished to undertake. When one committee has exhausted its limit, another group made up of essentially the same people or groups could be set up and spend up to the limit and so on. The net result would be that the limit would not be enforceable in any practical way.

In addition, people would develop a disrespect for the referendum process as a result of the loophole preventing any limitation on the number of committees.

Ms. Copps: So having no limitation gives them respect.

Mr. Andre: The hon. member for Hamilton East is again heckling from her seat. I would like to acquaint the hon. member for Hamilton East with the document Canada Referendum Bill, An Explanation by the Minister of State for Federal–Provincial Relations 1978. The minister of state at that time was the Hon. Marc Lalonde. This following statement was made in that document:

"No country has ever conducted a referendum in which total expenditures by parties or groups were controlled. The government is convinced that any attempt in this direction must involve unacceptable infringements of freedom of association and speech. Limits on the size of contributions or expenditures may be made by individual persons who preserve all democratic rights while ensuring that no contributor will have an unfair advantage because of its withdrawal".

This document is available in the Library. It also examines how different countries handle referenda. For example, Australia has no ceilings on expenditures by parties in referendum campaigns, in contrast with strict limits on candidates during election campaigns.

California has referenda with no limits on spending campaigns.

France has referenda. There are no limits on spending by parties or other groups during referendum campaigns.

Ireland has no limits on expenses during referenda.

• (1030)

Italy does not impose a ceiling on campaign expenditures and the state bears the administration costs.

In Massachusetts, there are no limits on spending.

Norway has set no limitations on expenditures by umbrella movements or political parties.

In Switzerland there are no limitations on expenditures by political parties, individuals or associations during referendum or election campaigns.

In the United Kingdom, there were no limits on the expenditures of the organizations that campaigned for the Common Market referendum even though it has very strict limitations on candidates during elections.

The previous Liberal government reached the conclusion that the only way to impose limits was by having people forced to campaign within fixed groups and it was an infringement on their freedom of association, their freedom of speech. Even in common law countries like the United Kingdom, this was felt unsustainable and that is why they have no limitations.

That is where the government came to it. I do not quite understand the heckling from the other side because we are talking here about a practical detail. This is not a philosophical question. I wish the hon. member for Hamilton East would appreciate that what is at stake here is not partisan advantage. What is at stake here is the future of the country.

Lest there be any question as to whether it would be challenged, I have a letter from the National Citizens Coalition which—

Ms. Copps: What happened to your legal opinion?

Mr. Andre: The hon. member for Hamilton East laughs again. Attached to it is a legal opinion by the law firm Code, Hunter. Bill Code, the senior member of that law firm was the Liberal candidate in Calgary West in the last federal election.

An hon. member: A loser.

Mr. Andre: I am simply responding to the heckling. The hon. member for Victoria asks why I mentioned this. I am responding to the member for Hamilton East who from her seat continues to heckle and barrack, showing she is truly respectful of opinions different from hers and that opinions different from hers ought not to be heard.

Mr. Gauthier: You're cruising for a bruising.

Mr. Andre: I am sure Bill Code would accept a call from the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier. He could argue whether Bill Code's opinion of the kind of limitations of the charter he has talked about are appropriate.

Ms. Copps: It's already at risk. Who wrote this speech?

Mr. Andre: There are other legal opinions which will be available. I am sure the hon. member is not as interested in that as she is in anything else having to do with the future of this country.

Enacting laws which are simply impossible to enforce and as a result promote public disrespect for the law is poor law-making indeed. Canadians have the right to expect more from their federal Parliament.

Others might take the position that Quebec's referendum law should be used as a basis for any federal referendum. Quebec's referendum law deals with its own political culture in a way that its own National Assembly believes appropriate. Laws to fit all of Canada must reflect the reality of the entire country and not just part of it.

I would like to turn to the issue of government spending for a moment. I have heard that many who think they are promoting fairness believe that the bill should be changed to prevent or limit in some way the federal government from participating in any referendum campaign.

First, let me underline that no decision to hold a referendum has been made so any thought about the federal government's role is highly speculative.

If there is a campaign, no law should limit federal activity without a concurrent limitation on provincial government activity. Otherwise it would be unfair to the federal government if the provinces could spend anything they want and the federal government could not. A federal law limiting provincial spending in this way would be anathema to the whole concept of responsible government. One could just imagine Bob Rae or Don Getty or Clyde Wells or any other premier meekly submitting to a federal law telling them what they could and could not do with provincial moneys approved by their own legislatures. The very thought of such an intervention into the provincial spending power is abhorrent.

Furthermore any limitation on the federal government's role in any referendum campaign would have to include all federal spending. That would include spending by members of Parliament.

I can imagine the howls of protest and questions of privilege if the travel, householders, telephone use and other expenses of MPs were restricted if they were directed in support of one side or another of a referendum question.

Under this scenario, Parliament would be hamstrung to the point at which responsible government itself would be put at risk; a fine message indeed to Canadians in the midst of a referendum on the future of their country.

Canadians recognize that the pursuit of perfection must not become the enemy of progress. We have all seen the difficult process of constitutional reform over the past two years. The government has ensured that Canadians have had the opportunity to express their views and comment, debate and otherwise express their thoughts on how to make a better Canada.

From the citizens' forum to the constitutional conferences to the Beaudoin–Dobbie committee, Canadians know a great deal about what is necessary to keep Canada constitutionally fit for the next century. However, one thing that will not serve Canada well is blind insistence on perfection at the expense of getting this job done well and fairly. This bill is no different.

A perfect bill is beyond the power of anyone in this Parliament to craft, much less implement. We must, however, ensure workability and fairness. To the extent that it is possible, I believe this bill accomplishes this purpose.

I recognize that in an adversarial system as we have, it is common practice for ridicule, harassment, barracking and so on to occur. Perhaps that plays somewhat of a role in ensuring that issues are examined and that it helps the public get some sense if both sides were argued vigorously.

The laughter from the member for Kingston and the Islands is a disappointment because I would have thought that he would recognize that what we are talking about here is enabling legislation and technical details to allow for the possible use of a tool which might help to keep this country together. If that is a subject of mirth, then I say again how disappointed I am in the hon. member that he should find this a subject of mirth.

This is an attempt to come up with enabling legislation for referenda. I have given the arguments as honestly, openly and fairly as I can. I have indicated in my remarks and I have indicated previously and privately that the question of spending limits would be helpful to the government.

The practicality is that it would be an infringement on the freedom of association and freedom of speech. As I have indicated, every country in the world that has referenda has reached the same conclusion. We have legal opinions to that regard and I would ask the hon. members opposite to seriously consider the consequences of putting something into the bill that would be challenged. We know it would be challenged and possibly it could be successfully challenged. I ask them to think about the circumstances in which it became advisable and desirable to keep this country united, to have a referendum. In the midst of it, a court has declared the process null and void because of the infringement. If they were on this side of the House, would they be taking the same risk?

I do not think, if they look at it carefully and think about what is at stake, they would be doing that. As I say, some of the antics in the House are part of our adversarial system and I understand that but please, please, please recognize what is at stake here. Recognize that this is a sincere effort to bring forward as fair a piece of legislation as possible. Act in that responsible manner and we will be doing the citizens who support us and the country a service for what we have been doing.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, we in the official opposition support the concept of this bill but we do not believe that it is anywhere near perfect.

We believe that there are many important improvements which are needed and we believe that it is a step in the right direction. It is not a step as big as we would like.

• (1040)

It is not as bold a step as we would like, but it is a step in the direction of giving the Canadian people the ultimate voice in determining the structure of their government.

We were pleased a year ago when the Speech from the Throne opening the present session of Parliament indicated that legislation regarding constitutional referenda would be forthcoming. It is disappointing, however, that this legislation took more than a year to emerge from the government's legislative mill. It is disappointing because any bill of this nature demands thorough consideration. It requires public airing. It requires the advice of experts. It requires careful thought by members of Parliament, who must pass judgment on it.

The delay of a year gives Parliament less time to do this job. This delay means that we must undertake a task demanding great precision within a time frame that is unnecessarily short. We have used every possible forum in the last few years, especially since April 1991, to express our support for a national referendum as a device for legitimizing constitutional change.

It is our belief that a revised Constitution should require popular approval, not only with a national majority, but also with a majority within each of the regions of this country.

We put this position forward successfully to the Beaudoin–Edwards committee on the constitutional amendments and we did the same with the Beaudoin–Dobbie committee. It is difficult for us to understand why a government that included this proposal in its Speech from the Throne and whose own supporters twice endorsed the suggestion in important special joint committees has only brought forward its legislation at the last minute, forcing Parliament to work, as it were, under the gun.

Some of the issues that we wish to address and some of the suggestions that we have for change to the bill are matters that would be more adequately considered in the fullness of time. Some of our differences with the government on the form of this bill depend upon the interpretations of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The government has attained legal opinions on some of these issues, but we believe that Parliament should have the opportunity to consider legal opinions from a variety of sources before being called upon to decide.

I hope that the government House leader will undertake to live up to his commitment of some days ago to provide this House and all members of Parliament with copies of those legal opinions which he has now sought.

We have a number of strongly held views on the form of the legislation to which the government replies there are constitutional barriers. We believe that Parliament, given the time it needs, can reconcile these views with the charter.

I cannot help but observe that, given the time that has been lost by the government's internal agonizing, the public might have better been served had the government many months ago asked a parliamentary committee to prepare this legislation. Two such committees had no difficulty in agreeing on the principle of a constitutional referendum. Surely another would have been able to tap into the considerable expertise, both in Canada and abroad, in order to produce a more acceptable bill in a more timely fashion.

We were given some advance briefing by the government. We take note of the government's profession of openness in entertaining our suggestions for conducting and improving the bill. I do not intend to show any meanness of spirit when I say, as I am compelled to say, that we hope the government's proclaimed intention to proceed in a consultative manner will be more reflective of the generally understood meaning of the word "consult" than demonstrated last week by the government House leader.

Consultations consist of more than informing and more than rejection out of hand. The government House leader should be careful about attributing perfection to the same advisers to whom, when he was on this side of the House, he attributed the precise opposite. He may have made some compromises with his colleagues in order to squeeze this bill out of the government's legislative bottomless pit, but if we really want an acceptable law to emerge out of the legislative process, he is going to have to accept broader based judgments than those he has had up to the present time.

On April 21 the Leader of the Official Opposition issued a nine-point constitutional plan and one of these points was that the final word on the constitutional framework of the Canadian government should belong to the people of Canada.

His view and the view of the Liberal Party of Canada is that a national referendum on constitutional change should require the approval of the majority of the voters nationally as well as of the majority of the voters in each of the regions of this country.

Thus, a new constitutional arrangement would enjoy the support of the majority of Canadians while no one region of this nation would ever be made to feel that the other regions had forced it to accept an arrangement with which it was not comfortable.

The Liberal Party of Canada believes that the day is long gone when the Canadian people will accept a constitution that is brokered behind closed doors. We do not accept the self-serving separatist argument that Quebec was left out of the 1980-1982 constitutional agreement.

Not only did the majority of elected representatives in Parliament from that province support that arrangement, but successive provincial governments in the province of Quebec have quite happily made use of the new constitutional provisions that resulted from the 1982 agreement.

Nonetheless, the absence of the clearly expressed opinion of the people on the 1982 agreement serves to perpetrate that vicious myth. Had the 1982 arrangement been put to the people, had the voters responded with a national majority and a majority in each of the regions, I am certain had they done so the entire nation would have been spared a decade of bitter, bitter misrepresentations.

In the event that arrangement had been rejected either nationally or by one of more of the regions, while we would have had to go back to the drawing boards, the nation would at least have been spared these misunderstandings and these intolerable misrepresentations.

I do not understand why there is resistance to giving the people the final authority in determining the structure of their government. Constitutional amendment by referendum has been a normal feature of innumerable democratic nations for centuries. The Swiss have used this device for centuries and France enjoys its most stable structure of government since Napoleon under a constitution that is subject to comparatively frequent amending referenda. Even Britain, the citadel, if you will, of parliamentary democracy, resorted to a referendum concerning its major constitutional change in joining the European Community.

Canadians are well known for their generosity and tolerance. They are an intelligent and educated people and they usually demonstrate a remarkable sophistication in their political behaviour. The Canadian population of 1992 is as well prepared as a whole as any group of officials, elected or not, to make the decisions on the basic structure of its government. It is unreasonable and unconscionable to suggest otherwise.

If democracy itself lends support to the concept of constitutional amendment through a referendum, human nature provides a clinching argument. A national referendum is the only device whereby all Canadians in all regions are able to give an answer to the same question or questions. This provides them with the chance to say yes to Canada and, more important, it gives Canadians a chance to say to yes to each other.

It is for these reasons that we are unhappy with the fact that this bill would leave the matter of a referendum as merely an option. The bill does not even require that any referendum be held in all of the provinces. It provides that the vote need only be held in one or more provinces.

In our view this is an unfortunate provision. It leaves the purpose of the bill open to misinterpretation. Given the particular timing of the introduction of the bill and the strange provision about one or more provinces, there may be cynics who suspect that the government's intention is to use a referendum, not as an instrument of legitimizing a constitution, but as a tool to be used against a provincial premier or premiers.

This would be unacceptable and unfortunate. It represents a denial of the ultimate sovereignty of the people and it demonstrates a contempt for the political integrity of the duly elected governments of the provinces.

If a referendum is to be held, it must be held only for positive and constructive constitutional purposes. It should not be regarded as the course of a last resort. It must be viewed as the natural and legitimate democratic path. Canadians will not tolerate an exercise of whipping up passions, costing upward of $100 million, for the sole purposes of partisan, political one-upmanship.

We do not believe that a referendum should be optional. In order to be credible it ought to be mandatory. We disagree with the three-year sunset provision of the bill. We believe that the referendum should be a permanent part of the process for revising the Canadian Constitution. Nor can it be restricted to one or just a few provinces. The referendum ought to be national so that all Canadians in all regions of this country have the opportunity to speak on the same issue.

The referendum must also provide for majorities in each of the regions. Never again can we afford to let partisans in any one region create a malicious myth that they have been ganged up on by all of the others.

We are also concerned about the method provided in the bill for the framing of the question or questions to be asked in the referendum itself.

The bill provides that the government will frame that question or questions and place it before Parliament for three days of debate in each House where presumably amendments may be offered by the other parties.

There are two difficulties here. First, the rules of Parliament severely restrict the scope for offering and considering amendments. Second, the period allocated for debate is so short that under the rules at most one-quarter of the members of this House could participate on so important a question affecting our country.

Under these rules a government could draw up a loaded question and ram it through the House under conditions similar to the most abusive use of closure. Let it be said that the gang across the way has demonstrated time and time again its receptiveness in order to utilize closure at every opportunity.

In our opinion the bill should establish a formal process of inter-party consultations, and I underline inter-party consultations, real consultations with give and take for the formulation of the question. Only under this kind of arrangement can so abbreviated a period of debate be tolerated by members on this side of the House.

There is no reason that a system of inter-party consultations should not be included in the bill. The history of amending the Canadian Constitution is one of remarkable consensus between parties in the House of Commons. There has rarely in our history been partisan division remaining at the point of ultimate decision by the House of Commons. This was true in 1981-82 and 1987-88 and on the most previous occasions. This legislation should recognize explicitly our traditional consensus approach to such important matters.

We in the Liberal Party are also concerned about the absence of acceptable financial controls on the referendum campaign itself. The provisions in the bill for any person or group spending more than $5,000 to register and to account for donations and expenditure constitute in our view no control at all. It remains open for either side of the question to spend huge amounts without limitation.

If the results of the referendum are to be considered credible—and this is key—it is essential that the process be transparently fair. We must never allow the losing side to be in a position to claim that victory was bought. There must never be permitted a system that is loaded on the side of the rich and the powerful. This means that over-all expenditure on each side of the campaign must have some form of limitation.

The government House leader asserts that such a system would require so-called umbrella committees which, according to the legal opinions which he has received but which we have not, would conflict with the freedom of political expression guaranteed by the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

As a lawyer I should like to see legal opinions on this issue obtained from several sources, and as a legislator I should like to have the opportunity to see how the law could be formulated to effect spending restrictions within the ambit of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Any referendum must not only be fair; it must be seen to be fair in all regions of this country. Even a shadow of suspicion will destroy the value of that referendum. In our attempt to build a strong national fabric we cannot risk giving ammunition to those who would destroy that.

We have in Canada a long and unsavoury history of untoward financial dealings during election campaigns. We cannot take pride in 125 years of overspending, going even further back than the Pacific scandal of 1873 and coming up as recently as the massive third party interventions in the federal election of 1988. This has been well documented by researchers, by experts, and by those of us who follow the political scheme in this country.

The Lortie commission made a number of recommendations that are now before a special committee of this House which will, one hopes, recommend corrective and needed actions. It would be completely unsuitable for us to ignore the potential for overspending that borders or even constitutes corruption while we are setting out on a new and hopeful course.

We should take care to examine this bill with regard to how it interfaces with the Canada Elections Act. It is only sensible that a referendum should be conducted mutatis mutandis by Elections Canada under the established system of the Elections Canada Act.

However the bill before us—and this should be noted by those who are viewing our proceedings today—merely establishes the bare bones of that interface. The rest, as I say to the government House leader and his parliamentary secretary, is to be fleshed out by regulation. I ask the Chair: Where are those regulations?

This is a rather massive gap in the information put before us. We really ought to insist on seeing the draft regulations before passing this bill, and there should be a device whereby the House or a committee can approve them before they are given royal assent.

There is a number of important issues here. The appointment of deputy returning officers, the appointment of poll clerks, and the appointment of enumerators, revising officers, scrutineers or their equivalent. This is all part of assuring the integrity of the system.

Why would I raise such a point on second reading? Why would I do that? I think it important that we note what is contained in clause 38 of the bill, and I say this in no mean spirit to members opposite. It reads:

> Where the polling day at an election is within one year after the polling day of a referendum, no enumeration of electors shall be made for the purposes of the election—

With the passage of this bill the enumeration takes place and then it will be used for the purposes of a general election. Hon. members opposite may shake their heads and say: "We would not do that. Trust us". We have heard enough of sacred trusts.

As I mentioned, the Canada Elections Act is itself presently being reviewed by a special committee. My colleague from Kingston and the Islands is actively involved in the pursuit of corrective measures under that particular piece of legislation. We are all, I am sure, hopeful that this committee will shortly be making recommendations revising this act. In the short term there is a host of largely administrative amendments mostly based on the recommendations of the former Chief Electoral Officer. I suggest these amendments to an act that is over 20 years old are long overdue.

We are also expecting more substantive recommendations from the committee on issues raised by the Lortie commission. Some of these will have profound effects on the Canadian electoral process.

Should we not have some indication of progress from the chair of the special committee? Can the government House leader give us assurances as to the priority that the resulting legislation will be given? Is it acceptable that a referendum should be conducted under the provisions of an antiquated and not quite adequate law?

These are some of the questions we want answered in the second reading debate and in subsequent deliberations with regard to this subject matter.

This bill is overdue and it is incomplete. We welcome its arrival, even if it is tardy. We will work with the other parties to make it a better bill.

In our opinion, a referendum to approve a new constitutional arrangement should not be optional; it should be mandatory. The question should not be dictated by one party; it should be worked out through all party consultations.

I want to stop there because I want the record to show that notwithstanding the assurances and undertakings of the right hon. Prime Minister and the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs, we in the Official Opposition were not consulted about the provisions of this bill, Bill C–81. We were summoned late in the day. We were told what was contained in the bill and it was a fait accompli. There were no consultations. I wish to draw that to the attention of the House so that there are no illusions, no misunderstandings, no misinterpretation of fact.

A national majority is not sufficient. A majority in each of the regions should be required. The electoral machinery administering the referendum must be efficient, modern, and it must be fair.

Most important of all, the entire system must be fair. There must be strict limitations on expenditures on the campaign accompanied by strict enforcement of those restrictions.

We must give real meaning to the fundamentals of democracy in letting the people decide. I hope that other members in this Chamber, regardless of their political faith, will take the opportunity to participate at second reading stage to present their views.

I hope that in our attempts to improve upon the bill for a referendum on behalf of all Canadians that the government will entertain meaningful consultations and arrive at suitable solutions to the problems that we have focused on here today.

I know many of my colleagues will want to participate later this day and perhaps on other days during the week, but I hope that the government is finally getting the message that it must consult, it must concede to some major amendments on this particular bill.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I rise to say a few words on the bill before us today, a bill to enable the government to have a national referendum on a constitutional matter.

To begin with, our party is not not against the principle of a national referendum at this particular time on this very complex package of constitutional changes. Unlike the parliamentary leader of the Liberal Party, we would oppose a mandatory referendum on every constitutional change. I do not think that is necessary in our parliamentary system and certainly that is not the position presented by the three parties on the two parliamentary committees, including the Liberal Party during the hearings of both the Beaudoin–Edwards and Beaudoin–Dobbie committees.

This is an exceptional case. We have a broadly based Canada round of many amendments. We have had two parliamentary commissions that have commented on the possibility of national referenda. I want to refer briefly to what both of them recommended.

Last year, the committee on the amending formula which tabled a report in June 1991 said the following when it came to the possibility of a referendum in this country. I quote: "We recommend that a federal law be enacted to enable the federal government at its discretion to hold a consultative referendum on a constitutional proposal whether to confirm the existence of a national consensus or to facilitate the adoption of the required amending resolution. The referendum should require a national majority and a majority each in the four regions—Atlantic, Quebec, Ontario and the west".

That is a position supported by the three national political parties, that we should consider a referendum to facilitate the amendments or to confirm a national consensus.

On March 1 of this year, we tabled a report on the comprehensive changes to the Canadian Constitution known as the Beaudoin–Dobbie report. We also had the following recommendation:

"Recommend that the federal law be enacted if deemed appropriate by the government of the day to enable the federal government at its discretion to hold a consultative referendum on a constitutional proposal whether to confirm the existence of a national consensus or to facilitate the adoption of the required amending resolutions."

We have had two extensive parliamentary studies in this country endorsed by the three national political parties suggesting the possibility of a national referendum to confirm a consensus worked out through negotiations, or to facilitate in this country the passage of amendments to the Canadian Constitution.

It will be noted that all parties said "a consultative referendum". At this stage, it is impossible to make the referendum binding. To make the referendum a binding one, we would have to amend the amending formula itself. That requires the unanimous consent of Parliament and every single Canadian province. It is not possible to do that at this particular time, so it could only be consultative.

I suggest that if there is a national referendum, it will become politically binding upon the Parliament of this country. If the federal government decides to go ahead, it should at the same time say that even though it is not legally binding, as we know, it would be politically and morally binding upon the federal government of the day. Why consult the population of this country if at the end of the day it is not going to listen to what the people of this country say? It seems to me that is a very important point.

A year ago, our party did an internal report on Parliament reform in this country entitled "Making Parliament Work". At that time, we took a very similar approach to the two parliamentary committees when it came to national referenda. We said that as a rule, we should not use referenda in this country, but there might be an exception and I quote, "on matters of national importance such as the Constitution where a referendum might be used".

In this country, historically, we have had two referenda. In 1898 it was on the question of prohibition of liquor, wine and spirits in Canada. At that time the referendum passed by a slim majority of 51 per cent in favour and 49 per cent against. But it also pointed out one of the perils of a referendum. There was a regional division on linguistic lines, where over 80 per cent of Quebecers voted no to prohibition and the overwhelming majority of English speaking Canadians voted yes to prohibition.

The result was inconclusive. It was consultative. The government of the day did not try to bind itself to anything because of the closeness of the result. Indeed, it left the whole question of prohibition to the nine provincial governments, or the provincial governments that existed at that particular time.

The second referendum was in 1942. Again, it was a divisive result, with Quebec voting against the question put at that time, which was to release Prime Minister Mackenzie King from a campaign promise against bringing in conscription. The Quebecers voted no to releasing the Prime Minister from his commitment, while the rest of the country voted overwhelmingly yes. Again, this is one of the perils of a national referendum.

At the provincial level we have had more than 50 or 60 different kinds of referenda; at the municipal level we have had thousands over the history of this country.

One of the points to be made is that in reality the bill we are talking about here today is not really a referenda bill because it is not binding. It is really a bill about plebiscites, which is consultative and really nothing more than a glorified public opinion poll.

I now want to mention about five or six concerns that I have about the bill before us today.

There should be at least three major amendments made to the bill. I hope that the government across the way will be open in considering these amendments. It is very important that it does. If we have a referendum in this country, it is very important that it be fair, perceived to be fair, and be a non–partisan event where it is worked out by all members of this House regardless of what party or what part of the country we represent.

First of all, we believe there should be spending limits imposed on the participants on both sides of the referendum. We have an example of that in this country today. I have a copy of a bill from the Quebec National Assembly. There was a referendum in 1980 on the question of independence of the province of Quebec. In this particular bill, the limitations were 25 cents per elector. That provided a sense of fairness between the yes and no camps.

It is fundamental in a democracy that if we are to have real freedom of speech in this country in a meaningful way, there has to be some spending limitations. Then the people with money cannot go out and buy the media, buy the best organizers, the best PR people to get their point of view across.

If we allow that to happen without limitation, then is it really freedom of speech or is it freedom of the almighty dollar? It is certainly freedom of the almighty dollar if somebody can go out and spend several millions of dollars or tens of thousands of dollars compared to the ordinary citizen or poor people's organizations that do not have access to the funds.

I recall last week when the government House leader said that there are legal opinions saying it would be a violation of the charter. Today, if I heard him correctly, he said it may not be a violation of the charter, but what would happen when this is challenged in the courts in the midst of a referendum campaign? Already there seems to be some uncertainty as to whether or not this is a violation of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

I suggest to the government that if we want to clarify this, let us have a quick reference to the Supreme Court of Canada to make sure that this bill is charter proof with spending limitations in it. If we have spending limitations in the bill, we would have a much better chance of a fair referendum that would be perceived to be fair by the people of this country.

The other concern I have is if we do not have limitations in this bill, what kind of legislation do we expect in the next few months or weeks from the government across the way when it comes to amending the Canada Elections Act? This is going to happen because we have had the Lortie commission on electoral reform.

Are the limitations to spending that we have now as political parties or candidates going to be removed? Is the government going to succumb to that kind of pressure in this country? Are the courts going to look back at the referendum bill and say: "Look, there are no spending limitations in the referendum bill. Therefore there should not be spending limitations on people running for Parliament or on political parties or indeed on third party advertising".

That happened ad nauseam back in the 1988 election campaign on the issue of free trade. In terms of free trade, 1988 saw the expenditure of hundreds of thousand of dollars by the big business community as it bought television, radio and newspaper ads, printed brochures and printed leaflets across this country to persuade the people of this country that the free trade deal was a good deal. Those did not come within the limitations of the Conservative Party of Canada. Yet the opposition parties, the two opposing the free trade deal had spending limitations where even if we could have raised the money to fight the big business agenda, we had spending limitations and ceilings where we could not have spent the money anyway.

Was that freedom of speech? Was that freedom of association? We could make a pretty strong case in the Supreme Court that just having access to big dollars and big bucks in this country does not give one the unfettered right to spend those dollars in pushing an idea on the population of this country.

Let us put in spending limitations. Let us have a free referendum in this country, if there is to be a referendum in this country, a referendum that would be free of being bought by people who have access to large funds.

Second, we should have a very substantive amendment in this bill concerning the wording of the question and the issuance of writs of referenda. If we look at the bill before us today we find that the government, through an Order in Council, will word the referendum question. The government will decide on the timing of the referendum writ. On a constitutional issue, if this is suppose to be non-partisan and involving members from all sides of this House, why should we not have a non-partisan committee that drafts that question?

Maybe we should look at the possibility of subjecting the question to a special majority in the House because, after all, this is a constitutional matter. We now have an amending formula that requires five things to have unanimous consent of the provinces and the federal government and, for other issues, the support of the federal Parliament plus seven provinces representing at least half of the population of the country. Those are special majorities; more than a straight 50 per cent of governments or 50 per cent of the members of the House.

Why not look at the idea in this bill of an amendment that would require the approval of 60 per cent or two-thirds of the House of Commons for the approval of the question? That would ensure for the population of this country that the government, acting alone, unless it had an extraordinary majority like it had in 1984, could not impose a question on the people of this country because it imposed the will of the majority on the House of Commons. Why not have two-thirds majority of this House in approving the question? Why not a two-thirds majority of this House before we drop the writ of referendum on this question to have a national consultation of the Canadian people?

It seems to me that if we want to democratize the process, if we want to make this a more non-partisan effort, if we want to involve the judgment of people who are elected here and representing Canadians from all corners of this country, then a two-thirds majority or a special majority would be appropriate in a referendum bill on a constitutional matter.

It is very rare in our parliamentary system that a government, elected in a country such as ours with a majority, will receive a majority of the votes. In the last election our government had around 43 per cent of the votes and it got a majority because of our electoral system.

On a constitutional matter, when the Constitution belongs to the people of the country, not to the government and not to politicians, is it asking too much that we have a regulation saying that if we are to have a referendum, then two-thirds of the members of the House should approve the question and approve the issuance of a writ for that referendum? I do not think that is asking too much.

The government says it consulted the opposition and involved the opposition. We have heard this from the minister in charge. We have heard this from the Prime Minister time and time again. Sometimes the opposition is consulted very well. Sometimes the opposition is involved very well in this process. Sometimes the opposition is ignored in the process. This is one time when the opposition was not consulted and not involved until the referendum bill was actually drafted by the government across the way.

Again, if we want to have a meaningful, non-partisan look at changing the Constitution and the process of doing so, it seems to me that we should involve the opposition parties in the only meaningful way; namely, to have a non-partisan process for the writing of the question and the dropping of the referenda writs.

Finally, we need a third amendment or change to the referendum bill that is before us today.

[Translation]

Take the report of the Beaudoin–Edwards committee last year—Mr. Edwards is in the House today. On that committee, we were unanimous about the need for a double majority in this country to change the Canadian Constitution. The three political parties all supported giving each of the four regions of Canada a veto.

• (1120)

According to the Beaudoin–Edwards committee report, it is first of all necessary to have a majority of members of the House of Commons and senators of Canada, but also a majority in each of the four major regions of Canada: the Atlantic provinces, Ontario, Quebec and western Canada. This double majority is necessary because without it, it would be easy to isolate not only Quebecers but also western Canada, the Atlantic provinces or Ontario.

I think that it should not be possible to change the Constitution of Canada without the massive support of Canadians. If there were a national referendum on the federal government's major proposals, like those in the report that the parliamentary committee published two months ago, and western Canada were opposed, I think it should be out of the question to change our Constitution without western Canada's support.

The same goes for Quebec. If Quebecers are against, it is hard to believe that we could make a major change to our Canadian Constitution. We are for an amendment requiring a double majority in the bill presented by the Government of Canada.

[English]

In the two minutes remaining I want to say that we have a number of other concerns as well. My colleague from Churchill, who has spent a lot of time on electoral matters in this House, has a number of concerns about the electoral details in this bill and a number of amendments that should be moved to make sure this bill is fair in terms of how the referendum will be conducted if we have a referendum in Canada.

The other point I want to mention is that any referendum at this time would involve the division of powers. It would involve the competence of provincial governments. If we are to have a referendum at this time, it seems to me that it is very, very important that the provinces, the territories and the aboriginal people be consulted and involved in a meaningful way in terms of the wording of the question and the rules and regulations, including spending limitations.

We are a federal state and we do not have the right to make decisions unilaterally that affect the powers of the provinces. It is important that we look at an amendment in that area, and if not an amendment in that area, then certainly meaningful involvement and consultation with the provinces, territories and aboriginal people.

I conclude by saying that we do not oppose the principle of a referendum but we have major concerns about spending limitations, about what constitutes a majority, about the wording of the question and the approval of the wording of the question, and the dropping of the referendum writs.

We are looking forward to moving those amendments and discussing with our colleagues in government the acceptance of those referenda amendments which will make this a much more acceptable piece of legislation. If it is used, it will be used as a tool that is fair and just for all the people of this country.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville mentioned three possible areas for amendment and I want to ask him the following question: If the government does not accept the principle of spending limits, will the member for Yorkton—Melville and his New Democratic colleagues still support the bill on second reading?

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, on second reading, we discuss the principle of this bill. As I said, we are not at all against the principle of a national referendum on an important question like a significant amendment to the Canadian Constitution.

But it is very important to have a bill that is fair for Canadians. Our caucus will make that decision after the government opposite responds. I suppose that the Liberal Party will give the same answer after two or three days of speeches by government members.

[English]

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I also have a number of comments and questions with regard to the bill. This is the question or comment period, therefore I will keep my comments fairly brief at this point and speak later on the bill in total.

I would like the member for Yorkton—Melville to address my concern. Not only are there no effective spending limits in this legislation, but the definition of a referendum expense is exactly what the government wants to achieve as it changes the electoral law of this country. In other words, the definition of expenses will be very limited, the ones that you register, the ones that you have to account to the public for. What will happen is that the various business interests in this country, as they did in the free trade debate, will be able to spend millions of dollars that they will not have to account for.

The definition in this legislation says that only direct expenses, a very exclusive list of direct expenses, would have to be included. Those same firms could spend millions of dollars doing polling and millions of dollars in preparation which would not count as referendum expenses.

In addition, those same corporations could volunteer their expert staff, their advertising staff, their PR staff. Under the Elections Act of this country, those people who are acting in their full-time capacity such as organizers, ad agencies and PR people must count as an expense and be included under some spending limit. In this legislation they are not included as an expense and they do not come under any limit.

This legislation, in so many aspects, has nothing to do with a referendum. It has to do with a government agenda to distort the whole electoral process of this country.

I would like the member to speak on that issue.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I mentioned in my remarks that this is one of the fears I have. If we do not have a number of amendments in terms of how the referendum is conducted, spending limitations, a direct expense or an indirect expense and the section 38 mentioned by my friend from the Liberal Party which concerns enumeration, these could all be used as precedents by the government across the way in terms of changing the electoral law.

We have just come through a very lengthy process in this country. We had a royal commission on electoral expenses headed by Mr. Lortie. I believe we spent some $16 million holding public hearings across this country. We had a tremendous amount of public input. We issued a very comprehensive and detailed report about having an electoral system in this country that is fair and just for every single Canadian.

If we are to spend that money, it is very important that we accept most of the recommendations made by that particular committee. One recommendation it talked about that was so important was having a limitation on spending in federal election campaigns. If we can do it in a federal campaign, surely to goodness we can do it in a national or a federal referendum campaign. The only democratic thing to do is have a limitation on what a candidate, a political party or somebody outside of the political parties can spend. It makes a farce of our electoral system if somebody can spend $30,000, $40,000, or $50,000 as a candidate and yet you are fighting an organization on a single issue that is unlimited, that can spend a couple of hundred thousand dollars in fighting you. It is very important that we take our guidance in terms of amendments to this bill from the Lortie Royal Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Financing Expenses. It has done the research, consulted with legal advice, spent hundreds of days drafting a very good report. The people on the commission came from all political parties, different walks of life, distant parts of this country. It seems to me their advice should be taken into account.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pick up on the theme of limits on election expenditures.

It is important for the House to bear in mind that the case that has been referred to so often on the issue of election spending dealt with the question of an absolute prohibition against certain kinds of advertising, not on the question of limitation or regulation of spending either by political parties or by third parties.

For the government to take refuge behind that case and the legal opinions based on that case is doing a disservice to the House and to the country. It seems to me, and I would ask the hon. member to comment, that this particular flaw in the bill arises out of the government's peculiar failure in such a sensitive issue as this to consult with all sides of the House.

If the government would be prepared to open up and listen to the wisdom on all sides of the House this bill could be substantially improved, particularly in the area of spending limits. It is entirely possible within our Constitution, within the charter, for regulation to be imposed on spending so that the referendum be seen to be fair.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I think that is a very important point. The whole question in terms of the Constitution is consulting people, involving people, making the process very inclusive.

I refer to a couple of members on the other side who have done a very good job in terms of their concerns about this bill.

[Translation]

The hon. member for Jonquière, who was on the special joint committee, has spoken publicly about this problem several times. For him, the lack of spending limits is a big problem in this bill. Other government members share this opinion.

[English]

If the government would listen to members of this House, it could have drafted a referendum bill that would reflect what the Canadian people want. The important thing is to involve people, to make this a non-partisan issue in terms of involving all members of the House of Commons.

We must always remember one thing when it comes to the Constitution in this country. The Constitution does not belong to the government of the day, it does not belong to members of this House, but the Constitution belongs to the people of this country.

We have involved the people of this country better this time than we did during the Meech Lake round, than we did during patriation back in 1981-82. We have had parliamentary committees, we have had them at the federal level, the provincial level. We have had five national conferences. We have had the aboriginal round. We now have a package that is more reflective of the Canadian people than we have had before. Let us not screw up this time by the government going back to its old ways of doing things through Orders in Council, consulting no one but a few key people and mandarins from the government side.

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak on second reading of Bill C-81, an act that will enable the Government of Canada to consult Canadians by means of a referendum.

Basically, the purpose of this bill is to provide Canadians with a fair and democratic instrument to settle the constitutional debate, once and for all.

I think it is important to point out that there has been no decision by the government to hold a referendum on the constitutional question. It is by no means certain that this type of consultation will take place. In fact, we on this side of the House would prefer not to have to hold a referendum.

The government has said repeatedly that its primary objective is to reach a firm constitutional agreement through the discussions currently taking place with our provincial, territorial and aboriginal partners. Considering what has been accomplished in the past few months, we can be reasonably optimistic about the outcome of the current process.

In any event, we intend to focus all our efforts on reaching a political and negotiated solution to our constitutional problems. However, we must be ready for any eventuality. The bill before the House today should be seen as a precautionary measure and as an insurance policy for all Canadians.

Basically, this bill is a democratic extension of the current consultation process. From the outset, Canadians have made it clear that they did not want to be left out of the constitutional process. That is why our initiatives in this area have included a high degree of consultation, and we can be justly proud of the results.

First of all, the Citizens' Forum on the Future of Canada went to communities throughout the country and listened to thousands of Canadians. Cabinet ministers met many Canadians to find out what they had to say about the future of their country. Subsequently, the Beaudoin–Edwards Committee examined various aspects of the amending formula. Finally, between last fall and the end of February, the Special Joint Committee on a Renewed Canada went to all the provinces and territories, received more than 3,000 briefs and held 78 sittings for a total of 227 hours, during which it heard 700 witnesses.

The government's purpose in tabling this bill is also to ensure that the rules of the game for any consultation that takes place will be fair, open and transparent, in accordance with our democratic traditions and the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

What are those rules, Mr. Speaker? Basically, they would be the same as for a general election. The referendum would be supervised by the Chief Electoral Officer and be subject to the provisions of the Canada Elections Act, already a guarantee of a fair process. Furthermore, the "yes" and "no" sides would have equal access to free air time, as determined by the arbitrator. The CRTC would also supervise the purchase of air time on radio and television networks for advertising purposes.

However, there are some differences because of the very nature of this kind of consultation and the implications of the charter. First of all, the bill does not make so–called umbrella committees mandatory. Any obligation to take part in the referendum campaign under the aegis of such committees would be contrary to the Charter of Rights, according to the legal opinions we have received so far. In fact, such an obligation would not only be likely to violate freedom of expression, it would also force groups that may be for or against the question for entirely different reasons to operate under the same umbrella.

What should be understood is that the situation is entirely different from the referendum held in Quebec in 1980. At the time, both options were represented by a political party which headed an umbrella committee. That would not be the case in a Canadian referendum on constitutional reform. In this connection I would like to quote the senior editor of La Presse, Mr. Alain Dubuc, who wrote the following on May 14:

> If we apply the Quebec model to the Canadian referendum, the result is frankly grotesque. This is especially true when we consider the umbrella–committee concept. Any attempt to put those who say yes to constitutional reform in one group and those who say no in another group makes a mockery of democracy.

However we believe Canadians have the right to know all the details of the process. That is why the bill contains some very clear provisions to ensure the referendum campaign's funding process is absolutely transparent.

Mr. Lapierre: Except where the government is concerned!

Mr. Danis: Any group or person spending more than $5,000 will have to register, disclose contribution amounts and publish the names of anyone contributing in excess of $250 to either side.

We realize that fairness is of the essence. The obligation to register is a response to this concern for fairness.

• (1140)

Some members complained the bill did not provide for a double majority when calculating the results of an eventual referendum. Generally speaking, an amendment to the Canadian Constitution requires the consent of the legislatures of seven provinces representing 70 per cent of the Canadian population. This rule would not change in the case of a referendum.

However, these critics forget that although the referendum certainly would have moral and political weight, it would have no legal implications. It would have no force of law, so that the double majority concept is irrelevant. Furthermore, a federal referendum would not in any way prevent Quebec from holding its own referendum and determining its own future, as provided under Bill 150.

The purpose of the Canadian referendum would certainly not be to prevent the provinces from exercising their prerogatives under the Canadian Constitution.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, it should be understood that most of the people opposed to this bill today already decided our constitutional proposals were unacceptable before knowing what they were. Being consistent they decided that a referendum held by the federal government would be unacceptable as well.

We hope the constitutional question will be settled through normal channels. In fact, we are confident this is what will happen. The bill before us today can certainly be improved, and we will try to do so in the days to come, with the help of all members of this House. However, I am convinced it is a welcome response to the expectations of Canadians and that is why it deserves to be supported by all members of this House, except perhaps by a few diehards in the back.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I see there are several members who have questions and comments. I maintain, failing evidence to the contrary, that my good friend the minister, with whom a number of us worked on the Parliament of Canada Act, did not convince me, first of all, on the double majority issue. I am sure we will need far more conclusive arguments than those we have used so far to explain this double majority right to Canadians who are listening.

Just imagine two planets, side by side: the majority on the first planet, which would represent all of Canada, and the majority in another planet, divided into four or five regions. I think this has to be made very clear, so that we can explain the concept to the public and avoid undue divisions between Canadians and Quebecers. That is my first comment. Of course, I will be taking part in debate later on.

My second comment, more importantly what I call the plumbing, the mechanics of holding a referendum, and some people do not like what they see. The minister and a number of other colleagues and I have been actively involved in revising the Standing Orders of the House. I wonder whether he could answer the following question: Why can we not immediately adopt a concept we developed after hours and hours of work? The critic for the Liberal Party and I are working on another bill, to amend the Canada Elections Act. We worked on this—this is not debate—and the amendments are ready. We would like to table more in the House, but we already have some that are ready, for instance, on the appointment of scrutineers and clerks, which would get rid of all the controversy about appointing enumerators, something that was very annoying in the past. This is all very specific stuff. It is about the mechanics of process. It is not as interesting as talking about lofty principles, but when you hold a referendum, it is important to demonstrate the government means what it says about this not being a matter of setting up a big election machine across Canada. As for the rights of the opposition, at least the Official Opposition or the party that came second in the last election, that party could at least have the right to select one of the two officers for the referendum as well as for the enumeration process.

As for the two witnesses, I am looking forward to going to committee so we can elucidate the implications of this new idea of appointing two witnesses representing the two sides, whether we have umbrellas here or not.

I do not think we were given a very clear explanation. Of course, this is only a preliminary debate.

Mr. Danis: Mr. Speaker, my distinguished colleague raised three points.

First, on the double majority issue, I can inform the hon. member that personally, I would be in favour of a double majority in a referendum if the results were legally binding. In this particular case, under this legislation, the referendum will certainly have moral weight but is not binding and does not amend the Constitution.

Some people say the present formula is a good one, while others are less enthusiastic, but as far as I know, it will be 7/50 or unanimity, for the time being.

Since this referendum is not binding, I personally see no need for a double majority, but I do understand what the hon. member is trying to say.

As far as the Canada Elections Act is concerned, I know a committee of this House is considering the legislation, and I am sure that with the hon. member for Saint-Denis as a member of the team, the committee will do an excellent job.

The hon. member realizes of course, that this type of amendment which mainly concerns the Canada Elections Act should be the result of a consensus among commitee members. I am certainly looking forward to his suggestions. In that, I hope the hon. member, and members of the other parties as well, will make a number of suggestions that we will be able to adopt by the end of June, so these improvements will be in place for the next election campaign.

As for the issue of the witnesses, or representatives at the polling stations on election day, the purpose of the bill is to have the yes and no sides each have one representative at the ballot box. I assume this is what will happen: The returning officer for the electoral district of Verchères —I am taking my own riding as an example —will probably ask the "federalist" forces to appoint or suggest representatives who will be appointed by the returning officer. I assume the returning officer will also ask my friends in the Bloc québécois or other opposing factions for a list of witnesses or representatives at the 241 polling stations in my riding, to ensure there are no doubts about the ballot counts.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Any more questions or comments?

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, there is a major contradiction in what the minister said, which I found very surprising. He tells us the referendum results will have no legal value, will not be legally binding on anyone, but he said at the beginning of his speech that he wants a referendum and I quote: "to settle the constitutional debate once and for all".

Either the referendum settles something or it does not. I wish the minister would tell us why, as a Quebecer, he thinks a referendum that ignores the entire amending formula could possibly settle the constitutional debate once and for all.

Mr. Danis: Mr. Speaker, the whole point of this referendum legislation, and especially the current process headed by Mr. Clark, is that the federal government will try and settle the constitutional question once and for all.

The hon. member knows perfectly well that all the energy being spent on the constitutional question would be better spent on economic issues and on finding jobs for Quebecers and Canadians.

I think the time has come to terminate the process. If we think a referendum should be held, we will do it, but it is not a binding referendum. However, we see it as a device that could bring the whole constitutional process to a conclusion.

• (1150)

This is only one phase. We have gone through several phases, as I mentioned in my speech. However, it is one phase we would prefer to avoid. If this week in Montreal or next week in Toronto, Mr. Clark's group were to reach an agreement, it would be a relief. Quebec would be able to hold its referendum, and everything would be fine. However, if there is no agreement, I think it only makes sense for the government to consider all the options. I think it stands to reason that a democratic country like Canada should go to the people.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Very briefly, Mr. Speaker, the bill contains no provisions for spending limits. Many of us feel spending limits should be set. The Liberal Party and others suggested a reference to the Supreme Court to find out whether the bill violates the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Is the government, through its minister, prepared to tell the House today that it is willing to refer this bill immediately to the Supreme Court for an opinion on the implications of the bill for the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

Mr. Danis: Mr. Speaker, personally, I would prefer to see spending limits in this kind of bill. However, officials of the federal Department of Justice were unanimous in their opinion that if people were forced to associate under the aegis of two umbrella-committees—which would be the only way to limit spending, because one could then limit the spending of these committeess—and if this were challenged before the courts, the group or person initiating the challenge would have an excellent chance of winning their case. If this were to happen during a referendum period, we have no way of knowing what the courts would do. The court might decide that the clause in question was ultra vires or it might decide that the bill itself was ultra vires, which could have disastrous consequences.

To answer the questions raised by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier and the hon. member for Saint-Denis, at the committee stage we intend to call as witnesses the people who gave us these legal opinions. At that stage, either my colleagues will be convinced, or if members of the two opposition parties have a better idea that would make it possible to get around this legal point, then, as the government House leader said, we are prepared to improve the bill in order to obtain the broadest possible consensus among members of this House.

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, we in the Liberal Party support the principle of this bill, that is, we support the principle that the new constitutional proposals should be submitted to a national referendum or a plebiscite for the approval or disapproval of the Canadian people.

But we have serious reservations about several parts or clauses in the bill. In particular, we are opposed to the bill in so far as it does not place serious financial controls on the different groups that will participate in the referendum campaign. Because it does not do that, we do not think that the process can or will be fair. Second, we oppose the bill in so far as it does not provide for a majority in all the regions of the country. The bill simply sets that aside and provides for a simple majority right across the country.

We believe if you are going to have a national referendum or a plebiscite on constitutional proposals, it must be perceived as being absolutely fair. Otherwise, once you have the results in, it will not have the validity or will not solve the problems that you wish to solve. You submit these proposals to a referendum because you want to gain the consensus or the approval of the Canadian people on a new constitutional proposal. But if, for one minute, regions of the country perceive the referendum process as not being fair, or if they perceive it as having been bought off by big financial interests, then you will not have the results you want, and no matter who wins or who loses the other side is going to claim that the result is tainted because it has been manoeuvred or manipulated by financial interests or because one region of the country with a greater population will simply overwhelm another region of the country and impose its views on that region.

We in the Liberal Party approve of a referendum in principle because as far back as April of 1991, the Leader of the Opposition, proposed, with eight other points, that there be a referendum to approve of the new constitutional proposals. His reason, supported by our party, is that the Constitution, different from other laws, is the basic law of the land, and the basic law of the land is the law by which we give authority to the Parliament of Canada, by which we give authority to the provincial governments and the federal government.

The people are saying that they agree with this process, this law, by which certain powers are given to members of Parliament, by which certain powers are given to the Government of Canada, by which certain powers are given to provincial governments and legislative assemblies.

If we are going to change that basic law, it is appropriate that the people of Canada be involved in approving or disapproving that basic law that we call our Constitution.

I mentioned our two serious reservations with respect to the bill before us; first, that it does not provide adequately for the financial control of the parties taking part in the referendum and second, it does not provide for a double majority.

Let me explain the double majority. In any referendum on constitutional proposals there should not only be a majority for those proposals from all the voters, right across the country, but there must also be a majority in the four or five regions of the country. There should be a majority in Atlantic Canada, a majority in Quebec, a majority in Ontario and a majority in the west and the north. In this way, we get around the difficulty of what happened in the only other two referendums or plebiscites that we have had in Canadian history; where in Quebec they voted one way and in the rest of the country they voted another way. It only led to more disunity or division.

Let me refer to a bit of history. As I pointed out, we have had only two so-called referendums in Canada. I think I should clarify that as well. Usually the word "referendum" is understood to mean a binding consultation with people, such as proposition 13 in California. The people are consulted, they vote on a law or on a proposition. Once they have voted, the assembly or the Parliament has no say whatsoever, the results are binding. That is the strict definition of a referendum.

What we have had in Canada on many occasions, both federally and provincially, are plebiscites, which have a serious political impact but are not binding. We have had two at the national level. The first one in 1878 was a referendum on whether or not we should allow liquor to be sold. It was a referendum on whether we should have prohibition as they had in the United States or whether it should be left to local option. The proposal carried in all other provinces of Canada but was defeated in Quebec. Even then Quebec was distinct and believed in a more flexible approach to the sale of liquor than they did in the other provinces.

The other instance at the national level was in April of 1942 on the subject of conscription, of forcibly requiring Canadians of a certain age to serve in the armed forces in the Second World War. It came about because in the national election of 1940, which Mackenzie King and the Liberals won, Mr. King had promised there would be no conscription for overseas service. However, when we got more into the war and things were not going good for us—good for us or good for the allies—Mr. King sought a way to be released from his election promise of 1940 and passed the Dominion Plebiscite Act of 1942. The plebiscite took place and the yes side won a vote in favour of conscription. But once again in Quebec, 72 per cent of the population voted against conscription. If we want unity after any referendum then we should learn the lessons of that referendum.

The no forces in Quebec and across the country were not even allowed access to the public broadcasting system to explain their point of view. In other words, in 1942 those in Quebec on that referendum were not even allowed to appear on Radio Canada or CBC Radio to explain their point of view and why they were opposed to conscription. The whole process was viewed as being unfair.

At this point I am not taking sides on the question. What I am trying to do is to demonstrate to the House, to the government and to the Canadian population that if we have another referendum it has to be perceived by the Canadian people as being absolutely fair.

It will not be absolutely fair if both sides to the question have not had ample opportunity to present their points of view and their arguments, or if it is also perceived that by massive advertising, which costs millions and millions of dollars, one side is able to outspend the other side and therefore win the question.

We know that in the election of 1988, the last election, many of us in the opposition parties, the Liberal Party, the New Democratic Party and other elements in Canada, believed that election was won by third party groups who supported the free trade question and were not subject to spending limits.

The Lortie commission studied election spending and how to control spending by large corporations on elections. It said that there must be more control so that third party interests will not be able to influence elections simply by the size of their financial expenditures on advertising, whether on television or in newspapers and magazines, and so on.

If we are going to have a referendum and it is going to be perceived by all parties to be fair, then there must be controls on the amounts of money spent on either side. There must be adequate opportunity for both sides of the question to properly express their views and to give their arguments.

Also, in order to come out of the referendum with people accepting the result and having national unity no matter what the result, and if not unity at least an understanding between peoples, then there must be majorities in the different regions of Canada and not simply a national majority as we had in 1942 and in 1878. If we do not do that then we are going to end up with a split country.

I have listened to the ministers argue that we do not really have to do that this time because in fact this is a plebiscite and it is not binding. If it is not binding, then we do not have to provide for regional majorities. The minister and the government are speaking from a very legalistic point of view.

I took part in the plebiscite in Quebec in 1980 and it was not legally binding either. It was an advisory sort of opinion, but once you are into it, it is a very serious matter. People do spend money. They spend a lot of time and dedicate their lives to winning one side or the other of the referendum.

To not clearly set out in advance how the results are going to be treated will lead to a lot of confusion and a lot of ill feelings. We do not want that. It is much better to say in advance, right in the law, that in order for the proposals to win, what is needed will be not only a national majority but also majorities in the different regions of the country. People will then know what the rules of the game are. Of course, they know that the results are not binding, but they know that the political influence of the results are overwhelming.

It would be very difficult for a premier of a province or for the Prime Minister of Canada to deny the results of the referendum or to try to do something differently when the people of his province or the people of the country have spoken clearly in the referendum.

The political impact will be very significant even though the results are not binding. Consequently, if the political impact is going to be significant, then the rules of the game have to be spelled out.

The rules of the game, if we are going to come out better after the referendum than when we went into it, should make it clear that it will have to be a double majority with a majority nationally and a majority in the regions of the country.

The government House leader has said that one reason for not putting financial spending limits in the bill is that these would be subject to challenge based on the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

He refers to freedom of opinion. Our charter guarantees freedom of opinion and he feels that if we try and put restrictions on the expression of opinion through spending limits, on what can be spent on advertising, that that would be against the charter of rights.

But it also says in the charter that these rights are subject to reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrated and justified in a free and democratic society.

I think that putting such financial limits in the bill can be justified in a free and democratic society because they guarantee the democratic society. To have no spending limits, no financial controls, then those with the most money control the results. That is not democracy.

When the minister says that, we would be interested in seeing the legal opinions, more than one legal opinion. We would like to see the legal opinions he has from the Department of Justice as well as some independent legal opinions on this point.

As a lawyer, I am convinced that there could be and we could formulate much better financial controls and spending limits in this bill that would be acceptable under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

I referred to our experience at the national level with plebiscites in Canada. I pointed out that we only had two other examples in our history: the prohibition of liquor situation in 1878, and conscription in 1942.

Canadians should know that referenda and plebiscites have been used much more often at the provincial level. It is interesting that they have been used more often in the west than in the east. As a matter of fact, the more you go toward the east the less they are used.

For example, in British Columbia we have had nine referenda, with the last one in 1972. Alberta has had seven, with the last one in 1971. In Saskatchewan and Manitoba they have had six referenda, with the last one in Saskatchewan in 1956 and the last one in Manitoba in 1952. Ontario has had only three, with the last one in 1921. Quebec has had two with the last one in 1980, but it has passed Bill 150 which provides for another one this year. New Brunswick has never had a referendum or plebiscite. Nova Scotia has had two, with the last one in 1929. There has been one in Prince Edward Island, in 1948. Newfoundland had three, all having to do with whether or not it should join Confederation.

Most of these provincial referenda or plebiscites had to do with subjects such as the prohibition of liquor, the introduction of daylight saving time, the application of the Lord's Day Act, or whether women should have the vote or not.

I bring up that history to point out that referenda and plebiscites while being rare in Canada are not unknown. We have had them on important issues, but never an issue as important as the unity of the country at this time.

I should also point out that in some countries they are used quite often. In Switzerland they have had over 300 referenda. Australia has had 40; France, 20; Denmark, 14. They are used quite often in the states of the United States. In the United Kingdom there has only been one referendum. That was an important one in 1975 on whether or not the United Kingdom should join the European Economic Community.

I refer to that history because a lot of people when they hear the word referendum get very up tight and feel it will be wrought with difficulties and risks. There are difficulties. It is very difficult to put some complex constitutional proposals to the Canadian people in a referendum.

It is not a simple matter. There are risks and it is difficult but it has been done before. It was done on a very complicated matter in the United Kingdom with respect to the European Economic Community in 1975.

I believe that the positive elements outweigh the risks and the difficulties in these matters. By the way, so did the two parliamentary committees which recommended the possibility of a referendum, the Beaudoin–Edwards committee and the Beaudoin–Dobbie committee, in recommending that the Canadian people be consulted on constitutional proposals.

There are reasons that I believe the positive elements outweigh the risks. First of all, the Canadian population felt cynical after the collapse of the Meech Lake proposals. The process by which the governments of Canada examined the Meech Lake proposals, behind closed doors, sometimes as the Prime Minister said, rolling the dice on the future of the country and all that sort of rhetoric, extremely upset the Canadian people. They felt that this is our Constitution, this is how we give authority to governments and we should have something to say about it.

Even though it is complex and even though it is difficult, the final say on these matters should be with the Canadian people. Beyond that, why it is important is that it can settle the matter once and for all. If a government approves or disapproves of certain constitutional proposals, that government is always open to question as to whether or not it really represented the people of its province.

If the country goes down the drain as a result of the way one provincial government votes or does not vote especially behind closed doors at a federal–provincial conference, there will always be doubt in our minds as to whether the country broke up over some whim of a government or partisanship that should not have been present.

On the other hand, with a referendum, the people will decide, not the governments. I should say, they will at least give their advice. It will be up to the governments to legislate on that advice, but at least they will have the formal very clear-cut advice of the population. That having been said, it will settle the matter in a much more definitive way, not perfectly, but in a more definitive way than has been done in the past.

To conclude, as I said, we in the Liberal Party support the principle of this bill, that there be a referendum on constitutional proposals, that the Canadian people be involved in approving of such constitutional proposals.

However, we want to see changes in the bill. We believe that there should be stricter limits on the spending of money by parties involved in the referendum, so that it is a fair process.

We also want to see provisions in the bill that provide for not only a national result but also regional results and that no question be carried without the support of the regions.

We will be looking at the process very closely, what happens in committee, whether the government is flexible, whether it is willing to accept amendments.

We will also want to see the legal opinions I referred to as to why financial controls would be against the charter. We doubt that and we want to see the legal opinions.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great care to my hon. friend who has served this country with distinction in many capacities, most recently in this context on the Beaudoin–Dobbie committee. I have a couple of comments and two or three questions for him.

First, he referred to the question of financial controls. He suggested it was lamentable that there are no financial controls on plebiscite spending within this bill. He was a member of the government which drew up Bill C-9 in 1978. Would he not agree that that bill also provided for no particular spending limits. In fact, I think under clause 8 of old Bill C-9 if a group was registered under that bill, in a referendum or plebiscite campaign then the sky was the limit.

There may have been some good reason for that in 1978 and some good reason today. I know he follows very closely the distinguished columnist William Johnson in the Montreal Gazette.

Mr. Johnson writing last Friday said: "Elections lead to corruption if ambitious people have unlimited money to buy their way to office. Personal ambition requires spending constraints but plebiscites are not fuelled by personal ambition. They do not put people in power for years able to wield that power for personal advantage, wealth and prestige. A plebiscite merely leads to an expression of opinion. It puts no one in power. Corruption is less likely because the plebiscite does not serve personal ambition as do elections".

The electorate is not stupid. As long as all views are sufficiently expressed, there is no reason to think the people will vote for one side because they hear that side's message more often. Trust the people, let everyone participate, that is the best course in a plebiscite.

My hon. friend also advocated there should be a majority in all regions of the country. I listened with care to him in that. He was perhaps looking at the recommendations of the committee which I had the honour to co-chair where a referendum would require a national majority and a majority in each of the four regions: Atlantic, Quebec, Ontario, and the west.

Discounting the wrath of British Columbia of not being regarded as a region unto itself, and I think his former leader might take issue with him on that particular omission, there is the other difficulty that immediately this report was tabled in June 1991, there was of course a response from at least two provinces saying that kind of approach to constitutional amendment is not acceptable. As my hon. friend knows, being a constitutional scholar, given our current amending formula under 41(e) no change can be made without the unanimous consent of the provinces. With great respect, I think the position of his party is an absolute non-starter.

The Beaudoin-Dobbie committee I think reflected that when it said simply: "We recommend that a federal law be enacted if deemed appropriate by the Government of Canada to enable the federal government at its discretion to hold a consultative referendum on a constitutional proposal either to confirm the existence of the national consensus or to facilitate the adoption of the required amending resolutions". There is no reference there to a regional majority.

Of course the people of Canada will inform themselves on the issues. They will interpret the results according to however they choose to interpret them. In the final analysis, given our present Constitution, the implementation of whatever decision is made, whatever advice is given by the people of Canada, must take place under the Constitution Act of 1982 which would require the House of Commons, the Senate, and the legislatures of seven of the provinces constituting 50 per cent of the population to approve.

What I suggest to my hon. friend is that he is advocating overriding the present amending formula with his party's position or he is advocating entrenchment of this plebiscite in the Constitution; one or the other and I am not clear just what he is referring to.

Very quickly, my final comment refers to his House leader's comment about this bill being required to apply to all provinces. I would remind him in the old Bill C-9, clause 3(1) of the 1978 bill had identical wording. There was wisdom in 1978 as well as in 1992.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague raises some good points that should be dealt with. First of all, Bill C-9 which was a Liberal bill in 1978 as he said, did not provide for limits but that bill was not passed. It was objected to from many sources. It was before the referendum of 1980 in Quebec. I think because of the various objections to it the government did not proceed with it, did not push it through Parliament, and did not pass it.

Personally, I believe having gone through the experience of the referendum of 1980 and seeing what has happened in other elections, the spending limits are necessary. They are necessary not only to ensure a fair referendum and plebiscite but to make sure the plebiscite is perceived by all Canadians as being fair.

While the provision may not have been in Bill C-9 in 1978, that bill was not passed. I think looking at the situation now, we do require spending limits. I would be very adamant on that. I think they are as important with a referendum bill as they are with the Elections Act for the House of Commons where we do have spending limits and we are going to improve the spending limits.

My hon. friend referred to comments by William Johnson in which he, in his column, differentiated between financial controls for elections to Parliament as opposed to financial controls for a referendum. He said that personal power was at stake in the one, but not in the other. That is true.

Again, the reason I propose and our party proposes spending limits is not because there is an element of personal power involved. It is because it must be perceived by all participating, especially by the side that will lose eventually—one side will lose—that the process has been fair.

I point out to my hon. friend that in 1942, the losing side, and I am not discussing the merits of the question, was overwhelmingly in Quebec. The "no" side was not even allowed access to Radio-Canada and the CBC, the public broadcasting network that they paid for with their taxes.

When the result came in, they perceived the result as being unfair. They may have lost anyway, but the fact is if you do not have the spending limits and the spending controls and you lose, there is always the accusation such as we in this party firmly believe that in the 1988 election the pro-free trade elements in Canada bought that election.

We firmly believe that, and nothing you say over there will change our mind. If there had been better financial controls—let me put this argument to you—on third party advertising and we had lost, we could not have used that as an excuse in accepting the result. I am telling you that it is very important when our country is at risk, that once the referendum is over those who have lost as well as those who have won will be able to say: "Nobody bought the result". It is not a question of personal power buying the result.

On the regional majorities, again by looking at our history and the two national plebiscites that we had in 1878 and in 1942, there were vastly different results in Quebec from the rest of the country. After it was all over, it was perceived as unfair, even though they were not binding in those cases. The referendum on conscription was not binding. It was the plebiscite.

Parliament was still supreme. It still had to legislate, but there was heat generated. The political heat and the passions of individuals in all parts of the country were very significant and they will be again. To say simply that the results are not binding legally does not really get to the core of the matter. The core of the matter is that politically, those results will have a lot of significance. Consequently I think it is much better to say in advance that there must be a majority not only in the country but in the regions.

I agree with my friend that there is a question as to where the regions should be—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order please. The time for questions and comments has now expired. Resuming debate.

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have this opportunity to speak on Bill C-81, an act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada.

I am particularly pleased because I served as did many other members of this House and of the other place on the Beaudoin-Dobbie committee on the renewal of Canada. That was a rare opportunity and a rare experience which we all learned a great deal from. I refer to that because I think it is important that we think about what the real goal is here.

The goal here is to renew this country, to renew Canada in a way that is meaningful, in a way that stands the test of time. As a result, I think that issues such as the referendum legislation which we have before the House today are an extremely important element of a whole series of initiatives, the end result of which is the renewal of our country.

I am also pleased to speak today because I have returned from the riding over the weekend. I can tell you that in my riding of Macleod and in the town of High River on Saturday, there was a tremendous show of support, interest and love for Canada. The right hon. Joe Clark was the guest of honour for the Little Britches Parade. There were 6,000 or more Canadians out there, all waving their little Canadian flags, showing their great support and love for this country. I can say that in the riding of Macleod, there is a great deal of interest in renewing this country, showing support for Canada. It was truly heartening to see that last Saturday.

This historic legislation has many facets and potentially far-reaching implications. While the government has yet to determine whether the actual holding of a referendum would be beneficial in assisting us in achieving national consensus, we must be prepared for such an eventuality.

What are the objectives of this legislation? Clearly, it is important to have in place a law that will allow this consultation to occur with the greatest possible efficiency and effectiveness. The law must allow the vote of the people to occur in a process that ensures the integrity of the process and the integrity of the result, while minimizing the hurdles to the exercise of that franchise by the people of Canada.

This bill meets that objective through its reliance on our tried and true experience with the Canada Elections Act and by giving the role of superintending the referendum process to the independent Chief Electoral Officer of Canada.

The other main objective of the legislation, an objective to which I will direct my remarks today, is that of fairness in the referendum campaign. I believe it is trite to say that a referendum campaign which is conducted without a sense of fairness of the process that leads to the answer of the referendum question deprives the result of legitimacy and negates the whole exercise. Fairness is critical to the campaign and must be reflected in the enabling legislation which governs any such campaign.

Fairness is a concept that is sometimes difficult to define in words but always easily recognizable in practice. When we think of fairness we think of something that is unbiased. We think of equitable opportunity. Of course, key to the fairness concept is the notion of playing by the rules. Bill C–81 exemplifies these elements.

The registration requirements of the bill are a case in point. As hon. members know, no person or group other than a registered referendum committee can incur referendum expenses during the referendum period in excess of $5,000. Therefore, while participation is welcomed from all Canadians, there is a requirement that one must register with the Chief Electoral Officer where one intends to spend over $5,000.

The registration procedure is set out in clause 13 of the bill and is quite straightforward. There are provisions that ensure fairness in the registration process itself. For example, the Chief Electoral Officer is required to examine applications for registration in the order he has received them and, second, provisions to guard against confusion in the name of a referendum committee are there in order to avoid confusion between committees or as between a committee and a federal or provincial party.

What the registration regime brings with it are two essential ingredients. Those essential ingredients are accountability and transparency. Accountability for larger sums of money expended by these committees is ensured through the requirements for the use of auditors, a chief agent and for the keeping of books and records. Returns must be made detailing expenses incurred, contributions received, et cetera, much as is the case during an election campaign.

In addition, the law will require that those contributions received in excess of expenses must either be returned to contributors or, if that is not possible, to the Receiver General of Canada. This will protect against the misuse of funds by unscrupulous individuals.

Transparency is also present in that the bill requires that any contribution received from individuals, corporations, trade unions, political parties and other groups that exceed $250 must be reported. In this way contributions to registered referendum committees and the committees themselves will know that contributions and expenses over certain amounts will be matters of public record. This is as it should be. This does not limit participation of Canadians or the expression of their views.

It does, however, allow Canadians to see who the financial participants were. This is of tremendous importance for the public's confidence in the outcome of a referendum.

I would like to turn to another thrust of the bill that I believe is laudable and that has fairness as its hallmark. This bill makes available to both sides of any referendum question free time for broadcasts on networks in order to get the message of both sides out without the barrier of cost and in prime time. This is a very significant initiative, a very significant part of this legislation.

Three hours of broadcasting time in prime time will be split equally between those registered referendum committees that support the referendum question and those committee that oppose the referendum question. This provides the essential fairness. The broadcasting arbitrator and an impartial official appointed pursuant to the Canada Elections Act will allocate the time available to registered referendum committees that have applied for registration before the 27th day before polling day; all committees that have indicated their wish to be considered for an allocation of free time.

To guide the broadcasting arbitrator, certain criteria are set out in the bill which will rely upon, among other things, the consideration of whether the allocation would be equitable with regard to the different views expressed on the referendum question, ensuring that there is a fair distribution of time and second, the consideration of the public interest in fairness to the referendum committees.

Again, fairness is explicitly recognized when the bill lists the factors the broadcasting arbitrator must take into account in deciding the broadcasting time that is to be made available to the various committees. Clause 24(4)(b) of the bill requires the broadcast arbitrator to take into account that any broadcasting time should be made available fairly throughout prime time.

This means that one committee cannot end up with broadcasting time in the middle of the night and somebody else in prime time. Everybody has to have fair time. That is a very important part of this process.

On the the same subject, it is also important to note that the bill requires the sponsor of referendum advertising to be identified when that advertising is aired. Similarly, printed advertisements will have to show the name of the sponsor. Again, this is a fair provision to help Canadians avoid confusion as to who is transmitting the message involved and to ensure transparency of the financial side of things. Those are important aspects of this initiative.

I would like to turn to other evidence of fairness in the process established by this bill. All hon. members of this House know the importance of the men and women who work on compiling and revising the electoral lists in an election campaign and the importance of the other men and women who make the campaign work as scrutineers and volunteers. The bill provides that the returning officer shall appoint the enumerators, revising officers and revising agents.

Given the fact that during a referendum campaign there are no candidates, the apparatus in the Canada Elections Act that allows candidates to have their agents present at the polling stations cannot be directly imported into a referendum campaign. Instead, in the interest of fairness, the law will provide for the appointment of two persons to act as witnesses for each polling stations. These witnesses will be appointed by the returning officer who must, as far as possible, select a person who supports the questions and a person who opposes the questions. These individuals will take an oath of office and will have all the rights and obligations of a candidate's agent under the Canada Elections Act.

The presence of these witnesses at the polling stations in electoral districts will reassure us that the fairness and the integrity of the referendum process will not only be integral to the taking of the consultative vote, but will also be seen and very visible to all Canadians.

A similar practice will be utilized for revising agents who are appointed by the returning officer.

Here again, the bill stipulates that revising agent pairs should, as far as possible, be comprised of a person who supports the question and a person who opposes it.

The bill provides as well that electoral lists will be made available on request to the designated agents of a leader of a federal or provincial party, or a registered referendum committee in the electoral districts. This provision, too, helps evoke confidence in the process, as both sides of any referendum question will have this crucial information available to them for the conduct of the referendum.

Another example of the element of fairness incorporated into the proposed law is the recount part of the bill, which allows electors to attend a recount, representing those who support and those who oppose the question.

Finally, I would like to refer to the statute which is the basis of the scheme that will be used to conduct the referendum campaign. The bill takes relevant provisions of the Canada Elections Act into the referendum process. Clearly, the Canada Elections Act is the foundation upon which this bill would operate. When one speaks of fairness in the conduct of an election campaign, one immediately thinks of the Chief Electoral Officer of Canada and his very able and excellent officials who work tirelessly to ensure that campaigns unfold in a way that is the epitome of fairness in an unbiased approach.

Canada is the envy of the world, and the counsel of the Chief Electoral Officer is often sought internationally by other countries whose electoral systems are not up to the same standards and which are seeking the highest standards possible. We are fortunate to have a Chief Electoral Officer, with all the accumulated expertise in his office, to oversee any potential referendum.

Let us not forget all the provisions in the Canada Elections Act that will be drawn upon and that work when we assess the fairness mechanisms in this enabling legislation. For example, let us remember such sections of the Canada Elections Act that deal with the qualification of electors and residency requirements, ballot papers and ballot boxes and safekeeping, polling stations and fairness procedures of polling day, the initialling of ballot papers, and no impeding of electors. There are a lot of things that we take for granted in the course of running a fair and open election. Other aspects are secrecy of voting, maintenance of peace and good order, the counting of the ballots in a fair and open process and the prohibition of broadcasting from outside Canada.

The fairness mechanisms of this bill are also backed up by offence provisions so that they can be enforced effectively.

Today is an important day as we debate the provisions of Bill C-81. We are setting the stage for a possible public consultation of historic proportions. We have a law that respects the Charter of Rights and Freedoms by allowing maximum participation and freedom of expression, while being fair and encouraging an open, transparent and accountable process.

With this newly-created opportunity to vote in a possible future referendum comes the responsibility to ensure that the vote is done according to rules that are clear and fair. I believe this is such a law. I believe this bill strikes the right balance. I hope that if a referendum occurs Canadians will participate in this great opportunity to be even more involved in national renewal. Canadians have to date received unparalleled opportunities to participate and have joined in this renewal process with vigour.

I am also mindful of the words of the Special Joint Committee on a Renewed Canada, a committee on which I served and spoke of earlier. It recommended that a law be enacted if deemed appropriate by the Government of Canada to enable the government at its discretion to hold a consultative referendum on a constitutional proposal, to either confirm a national consensus or facilitate the adoption of the required amending resolutions.

This bill will ensure that should it be decided that a referendum is required, we will have the tools available to hold such a vote in a fair and appropriate way.

As I mentioned earlier, this is but one step along the road to renewing this country, to giving Canadians the opportunity to feel better about their country, to feel fully a part of this country. When we get into some of the substance of the issues it is an opportunity for western Canadians like myself to feel that our part of the country is fully responded to and is fully reflected in the national character of this country. The same is true for the people of Quebec, the same is true for aboriginal Canadians and the same is true for all other Canadians.

I hope that if this is necessary, Canadians will participate in this referendum in a full and meaningful manner because this could be a historic opportunity if it is deemed appropriate.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately the more I hear about this bill, the less impressed I am with it and the more distressed I am that the government has not taken the trouble, in advance of this bill, to consult with all sides in this House effectively.

Let me ask the member about two particular provisions. He made much of the fairness of the bill and yet in the area of spending limitations, let me draw the member's attention to the provisions of the bill that you could drive a truck through.

The alleged limit on expenditure in clause 14 says that no person or group, other than a registered referendum committee, shall incur and set expenses exceeding $5,000. A registered referendum committee is defined by the most circular of all definitions: a person or group that intends to incur referendum expenses over $5,000. In effect, you can have any number of referenda committees, each of which is then authorized to spend as much as they like. How is that fair?

The government suggests there are legal limits. I defy the government to put forward a single, judicial decision which prevents the government or Parliament from regulating or limiting expenditures of third parties or referenda committees in an effective way. Parliament is clearly entitled to do that. You will not be able to find a single legal opinion to the contrary.

Second, and I would ask the member to comment on this as well, section 3 of the act gives to the Governor in Council, i.e. the cabinet, the authority to consider proceeding with the referendum if, in its opinion, it is in the public interest to do so. The question comes back to Parliament for approval but not the decision to proceed with the referendum. On a constitutional issue of this kind, surely it should be up to the Parliament of Canada to decide on whether to proceed with the referendum because governments, being who they are, will proceed in part on their definition of public interest and their political interests as well.

As the member said, it is critical that this process be seen to be fair and that there be genuine consultation on whether to proceed with the referendum and, second, that the procedures on finance limitations be fair.

Mr. Hughes: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the questions from the hon. gentleman from Victoria.

On the question of spending, it is the judgment of the government that the value of the freedom of speech, which is recognized in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms of this nation, is an important value which overrides other considerations. There is legal advice, I understand, which would suggest that we would have to be very careful about limiting the ability of Canadians to form their own committees to work on one side or the other of a referendum question. That value of freedom of speech is something which clearly this government and the House of Commons respect. It is a value which we would all want to hold high in this country.

On the question of whether to proceed, clearly my colleagues suggest that perhaps there would be partisan considerations which would come into effect.

I fully believe that the only factor that would be taken into consideration at the time of a judgment about this by the cabinet, by the Privy Council, would be the future of this country. I reject this outright because I have been through this process, through the Beaudoin–Dobbie committee in which I saw some interests and some members of the House trying at times to slip a little bit away from the non-partisan attitude which was so central to the work of that committee.

I hope that no members of this House slip into partisanship at this critical time in our history because what we need to do is ensure that this country is united. We need to ensure that this country comes through this process in which Canadians respect one another, Canadians all are united in their support of a united country. Canadians must respect the process through which we arrived at this point.

I encourage all members not to be partisan. I encourage all members to take into account the importance of the country and I fully expect that the cabinet will be doing that at the point at which it has to make a decision on whether to make use of this enabling legislation.

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, on page 7 of the bill it says:

> Where the polling day at a referendum is within one year after the polling day at an election or a previous referendum, no enumeration of electors shall be made for the purpose of the subsequent referendum unless—

More or less it says that if we have an election a year after this referendum is being held, no enumeration will be done.

That might be fine in rural ridings but not in suburban ridings, in metropolitan ridings such as mine and the riding of my colleague from York West. Something like one-third of our constituents are apartment dwellers. Apartment dwellers tend to change within a year, a 25 per cent vacancy and turnover rate.

I am wondering if the hon. member sees the need for an enumeration during the election because we have heard great debates in the House about the unfairness of enumeration. My colleague from York North went back and forth a couple of times between ourselves and the Conservative members.

I am wondering if he shares with me the the idea that although there could be enumeration done during this referendum, there should be an enumeration in an election because all the parties involved, the other parties during the election, will not have a chance to make sure that the enumerations are done correctly, fairly. It could be to the advantage of a member and/or the government.

My question is does he not agree with me that because of great metropolitan cities like Toronto, Montreal, and Vancouver we need to do an enumeration at the next election and this should be struck completely out?

Mr. Hughes: Mr. Speaker, this is an interesting detail which my colleague raises and I suspect that the purpose here is to help ensure that the enumeration costs are kept to a minimum.

I believe in the legislation. There is an aspect which gives the Chief Electoral Officer some flexibility in the way in which he deals with the enumeration. If there is a problem in ridings such as that of my colleague in which there is a lot more mobility than there is in ridings such as mine, then I am sure the flexibility is there to afford the Chief Electoral Officer the opportunity to make those adjustments in between the time of the proposed possible referendum and any election in the subsequent year.

It is potentially a useful cost-saving exercise. There obviously will have to be flexibility in the implementation and I am sure the Chief Electoral Officer can do that.

Third, enumeration is clearly an important aspect of both the referendum and the election and I do not think the Chief Electoral Officer would be in a position that would limit his ability to ensure that those lists are appropriate, up to date, and ready for any potential federal election at which point I look forward to returning to the government side of the House.

• (1250)

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I think there have been discussions with members on all sides to permit the completion of at least the 20 minute portion past one o'clock. I believe if you ask the question you will find unanimous consent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. members have heard the terms of the motion proposed by the member for York West. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for York West for a maximum of 20 minutes.

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the government members as well as the New Democratic Party and members of the Bloc Quebecois for their kind and generous co-operation.

Bill C-81 is no ordinary piece of legislation, particularly as we consider the time of the national unity dossier that is involving governments at all levels and Canadians from one coast to the other.

We on this side of the House accept the principle of a national referendum as a tool and a mechanism by which Canada and Canadians can legitimize constitutional reform. As has been expressed already by our House leader, on April 21 of last year, the Leader of the Opposition made public a nine-point constitutional agenda for national debate in this House and across the nation.

One of those points, and a very important point, was that any constitutional arrangement that was arrived at by the first ministers ought to be placed before all Canadians, regardless of whether that deal was a good one, a bad one or an indifferent one. At the end of the process, when governments crossed their *t*s and dotted their *i*s, it was the belief of the Leader of the Opposition that because the Constitution of Canada, as the premier piece of legislation of this place, belongs to all Canadians, all Canadians are deserving of a voice and a stake.

It is no longer acceptable that only the chairman of the board or the chief executive officer or the board of directors be given the ability to dictate the future, but essentially that there are 27 million shareholders of this public company Canada who deserve a vote, a voice and a franchise.

We are pleased on that basis that the government has put before the House this piece of legislation, particularly as we concern ourselves with what went wrong on the Meech Lake round. It was not only a question of substance that caused consternation among Canadians, but the process of back room, secret, roll the dice dealings that undermined any integrity and confidence in the system.

My only point along this line was the hope that the government would have accepted at least one of the Leader of the Opposition's points on the referendum early enough so that a committee could have been stuck months ago with respect to preparing the legislation rather than the seemingly mad rush to try to complete this in the next number of weeks and months before the House rises. It would have served the public interest much better had we taken that initiative some months ago.

In principle, this piece of legislation is acceptable in the sense of giving Canadians the ability to also dictate the future of their country. The bill at the same time is in need of serious amendments, serious modifications, to make this bill as fair and as up front as possible.

I would suggest seven changes. The first one is this national referendum should not be optional. The government House leader has said maybe, perhaps, it would be his intention or his preference not to have one at all. I am saying it should not be an option that Canadians perhaps or maybe will be a given franchise.

I believe a national referendum should be mandatory. Let us for certain give the opportunity to all Canadians to express themselves on the constitutional arrangement that first ministers will arrive at in a number of weeks and months. In order for constitutional reform to be truly legitimate, I believe this tool of a national referendum should be mandatory and guaranteed as the final part of this constitutional process.

In terms of the possibility or options, this piece of legislation should be enacted. A national referendum should take place regardless of the size or shape of the constitutional arrangement.

Point two is that currently in the bill there is a sunset clause of three years which means that at the end of the three-year process this bill will die. That should be changed. The national referendum in terms of major constitutional arrangements should be a permanent mechanism. What is wrong with offering Canadians a say on the future of their country after all?

I believe Canadians are tolerant, educated, interested, mature enough and deserving of an ability to be actively involved and engaged in deciding and shaping the future of Canada's constitutional make-up. Therefore, it should not be grandfathered after three years. It should be a permanent mechanism so that the process that soured the Meech Lake round could never happen again.

It has been tried in other countries with a fair amount of success. Some people suggest constitutional arrangements are something too complex for the average Canadian. Based on the experience of other countries such as Australia, in which the citizens disposed of many options that they saw as unfit or unpopular and really came down with a bottom line, I believe Canadians are able to to do that. In many cases, they can probably do it much better than the elected representatives in terms of being viewers at a distance in trying to ascertain what is truly important as opposed to what is not important, or what is good or what is bad for the country. Put our faith in the hands of those 27 million Canadians and I do not think we will go wrong.

Point three is that the national referendum must be truly national. Currently the bill is written that if the referendum is held, it need only be held in one or more provinces. From my viewpoint, that is a very dangerous exercise.

If we have a national referendum, it must be held in each of the 10 provinces and 2 territories. If there is anything less than that, we cannot call it a national referendum because if we have a referendum by the federal government in one or two provinces and then provincial referendums in three or four and then no referendums in the remaining territories or provinces, what kind of a verdict will that yield?

You will have a situation potentially that the provincial referendum in the province of British Columbia, for instance, will be a very different question than the provincial referendum held in Alberta or even than the federal referendum held in three other provinces. What we will see is a chequerboard of referendums that will yield different conclusions based on different questions. I would submit that it would not offer clarity, it would not offer solid direction but would only cloud the issue and lead to a multiplicity of interpretations which would undermine any sense of national purpose that a national referendum can mobilize.

I would suggest that the government House leader and his parliamentary secretary and the members of the government think of the consequences of having a referendum in only some parts of the country. We cannot have a part-time referendum in various spots along the way. We need one question asked of all shareholders of this country and only then can we ascertain what direction the electorate has imposed on its elected leadership. Anything short of that will drain the integrity or clarity from a referendum.

Point number four concerns what has already been well mentioned, the lack of any spending limits or regulations. Currently the bill only has the stipulation that if any individual or organization gives more than $5,000 with respect to the referendum, he or she or the group must register. There are no ceilings attached to expenditures in the national referendum. That is a very dangerous situation because many Canadians will see the referendum as being fair only in direct relationship to what one group or individual can spend.

We saw in the general election of 1988 the concern, the consternation and the damage that was done by third party advertising. On the one hand, the election act controlled what individual candidates and parties could spend, yet third parties had no limits on what they could spend on television advertising, newspaper advertising, radio advertising, general flyers going around to homes or at general meetings that were organized. They had carte blanche.

If it was wrong, and many dispassionate observers would say it was very wrong, a national referendum that would have serious consequences for the future of this country should not be put at the whim of any group or clique of individuals who would have an ability to spend whatever they wished in order to influence and dictate the outcome of the national referendum.

The message coming from Canadians is that this issue should not be dictated by the depths of one's financial pockets, it should be up front. It should be clear and the same for all Canadians. There should be a ceiling by which all Canadians' actions vis–à–vis the referendum is governed.

This issue is crucial enough, given the history of this constitutional dossier, to be up for grabs depending on the power that individuals have with respect to expenditures. That goes to the very heart of how Canadians view this referendum. All matters should be fair, up front and equal for all.

Point number five is along the same lines as the whole question of expenditure limits. I would suggest there be a component of public financing through the tax credit. I believe there are a number of Canadians across the country who might not have the ability or the time to get involved with any of the referendum campaigns, writing letters, presenting papers, presenting a brief or participating in a rally but they would be prepared to spend $25, $30, $50 for Canada. I believe that those individual Canadians in my riding, in the ridings of hon. members from all sides, should be encouraged to participate and put their $25 down for a united country and be supported through the tax credit as they are when they contribute to any of the political parties across the country. I do not think we should exclude average Canadians, despite the tough economic malaise that is gripping the country, from saying: "I believe in Canada and my way of showing it is to give $25 to the committee supporting a strong united Canada".

I urge the government to take a look at, not spending by governments in the campaign, but allowing Canadians to use the tax credit so that they can participate and also get a tax break based on their involvement come tax time next year. I think that is fair and it would show an openness to involve all Canadians.

Point number six is that we should have the prerequisite not only of a national majority with respect to the question but a double majority in this bill. It should be a majority across the board, across Canada, plus a majority in each of the four defined regions, namely the west, Ontario, Quebec and Atlantic Canada.

If the answer coming back from the majority of Canadians is for a strong united Canada with a strong national government, it would be beneficial and very reassuring if we had a double majority. In that way, no region of the country would feel that it had been coerced or pressured or ignored by other Canadians in other regions of the country wanting something that that particular region was uncomfortable with.

Therefore, it would be a win–win situation; it would be a national majority complemented by majorities in each of the four regions of the country. It would give rise to the feeling that the referendum had played the politics of inclusion rather than the politics of exclusion. The feelings of alienation that come from that type of arrangement would be gone.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, a double majority would be an investment in good will and in feeling that everyone is a part of this Constitution which, after all, belongs to all Canadians.

My last point, point number seven, is that we should have a change in how the opposition parties are consulted. It was mentioned today by our House leader that there was no consultation, despite the promises of the Prime Minister and the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs, in the legislation before us today. I believe that there ought to be consultations from here on in, particularly if we have a national referendum—and I hope we do—and particularly in the writing of the question.

We saw in the Quebec referendum in 1980 what a nebulous question can do to a population and, indeed, to a country. I believe the question is important enough to merit the close scrutiny of this Parliament and to involve the three federal political parties in a joint venture, if you will. We must ensure that the question which inevitably will be asked is a clear one, an honest one and a relevant one so that the result will will be of a positive, clear, concise nature. We should not play with the wording of the question to get a particular result. It should be clear and up front and its result should be equally clear.

I am pleased that I was given the opportunity of sharing with the House a few of the important issues that this member for York West sees in this legislation. I welcome the bill in principle. It is long overdue. I do have some reservations, essentially defined by those seven issues. I hope in the committee studies following second reading we can iron them out so that at third reading we can debate a bill that is significantly stronger and fairer for all Canadians.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): According to the motion passed earlier, the question or comments period is transferred to after the Question Period.

350TH ANNIVERSARY OF MONTREAL

Mr. Jean–Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, last weekend, Montreal celebrated its 350th anniversary. The valiant men and women who faced the adversity of impossible situations had the faith and courage needed to make that adventure an outstanding success.

The 350th anniversary of Montreal is also a celebration for Quebec and all of Canada. Montreal, the world's second–largest French–speaking city, takes pride today in its uniqueness in Canada. It is a place where many ethnic communities live together in mutual respect.

As our Prime Minister, among other dignitaries, said, much of Canada's history can be traced back to Montreal. Congratulations to all who contributed to these celebrations and to the development of this beautiful metropolis.

INTERNATIONAL MUSEUMS DAY

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, yesterday was International Museums Day and I take this opportunity to salute Canada's museums, which are dedicated to the preservation and presentation of our culture, our heritage and our valued treasures.

According to StatsCanada there are over 2,200 museums and related institutions which welcome over 57 million visitors each year. Our museums are non–profit institutions. They are a vital link, reflecting the world's varied cultures through many different mediums. They add and give pride and a sense of identity to our citizens while contributing to our economy and tourist industry.

However, the Minister of Communications has not given any assurances that grants and services to non–federal museums will be retained by the federal government in the constitutional negotiations.

The Standing Committee on Communications and Culture unanimously recommended that the Museums Assistance Program, the Cultural Initiatives Program and other heritage programs be retained by the federal government while acting in close consultation with the provinces.

What better time for the Minister of Communications to give the museum and heritage community the message that the federal government will stay in business and support them through grants and services to these non-federal museums.

CANADA FIT WEEK

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out the national launching of Canada Fit Week, which will take place tomorrow at noon in Confederation Park in Ottawa. It is the greatest celebration of active living in the world.

On the theme of celebrating the active life, the hon. Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport, will officially launch this event that runs from May 22 to 31. This unique activity was made possible with the co-operation of the federal, provincial and territorial governments and the participation of 18 national organizations and private-sector sponsors, and for a good reason: the success of active living has been clearly demonstrated.

Last year, more than eight million Canadians took part in over 16,000 activities. I call on all hon. members to participate in the launching of Canada Fit Week and related activities in their communities so that it will again be an outright success.

REFERENDUM ACT

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Mr. Speaker, last Friday, the government tabled its bill on referendums in Canada. Just as in 1978, the federal government's fear of letting Quebec decide its own future is behind this bill.

Just like the Liberals then, today's Conservatives, including those from Quebec, refuse to let Quebec make its own decisions. Although the Conservatives voted at their convention last year in favour of a motion by a Quebec member, the hon. member for Louis-Hébert, recognizing Quebec's right to self-determination and have boasted about it so much, the government has decided to ignore it.

Obviously, Mr. Speaker, the purpose behind all this is to avoid holding a general election, since the Prime Minister thinks it is too soon. Too soon for whom? For the Conservatives, not for us in the Bloc Quebecois. We are ready and we have been demanding an election again and again. Call an election now and you will see how Quebec will answer.

MORGENTALER CLINIC

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, according to friends and foes, the explosion that destroyed the Morgentaler clinic yesterday on Harbord Street in Trinity—Spadina was caused by a bomb. If so, that act of violence will not stop abortions.

Abortions arise in the pattern of violence toward women: not only rape and gender directed murders but systemic pressures on women as child bearers. Our North American society not only peddles sex as a commodity but too often it abandons the woman who bears a child.

Low wages and unemployment, husband desertion and non-support, shortages of good child care for children of working mothers and shortages of decent affordable housing condemn many single mothers and their children to poverty and humiliation.

The bombing of abortion clinics in the United States has not stopped abortions, nor has the threat of jail for women or doctors stopped them in Ireland.

We need good sex education, good and available contraception, and respectful economic and social support for every woman bearing or raising a child.

CANADIAN UNITY

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister went to Montreal this past weekend to remind people what it means to be a Canadian.

To a cheering crowd, The Prime Minister quoted Sir John A. Macdonald: "Let us be English or let us be French, but above all let us be Canadians".

The Prime Minister also reminded people about the realities of politics in Canada. There are three national political parties in Canada which will field candidates in every province. There are two regional parties which will not even try to represent all of Canada.

In the next election you will not be able to vote against a Bloc Quebecois candidate in Toronto and you will not be able to vote against a Reform Party candidate in Trois-Rivières and that is simply wrong.

The parties of the western separatists and the Quebec separatists will surely attract those people who are blind to Canada's history and intolerant of its realities. But as the Prime Minister said in Montreal, Conservatives and Liberals and New Democrats will work for Canada together.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, the problems created by the changes in the UI act by Bill C-21 continue to grow in number and severity, and as is usually the case in situations of this kind, the innocent and well-intentioned get hurt the worst.

Of particular concern right now is the Revenue Canada appeal system. A large number of people in my riding filed in good faith for UI benefits. UI referred these people to Revenue Canada for an eligibility ruling. They were refused because of interpretations of the terms "arm's length" and "contract of service". They then had to appeal through the Revenue Canada system.

For many this began last November. Six months later they have had no decision. The final stage of the appeal process is the Tax Court and it will not hear most of the appeals until the fall. That will be a full year of waiting for an answer from Revenue Canada.

Bureaucratic delays have forced innocent people into debt, in some cases debt which puts their homes in jeopardy.

People who had been told by the UI Commission, by Revenue Canada, and by various lawyers and accountants that their employment arrangements and business structures were legal now find themselves in limbo with no answers coming from Revenue Canada.

People are into another earning period still not knowing what their legal UI status is.

Justice is not being served when a bureaucratic structure can play havoc with peoples' lives.

I ask the minister to intervene immediately, to speed up all stages of the appeal system, and to hold special hearings of the Tax Court in order to clean up the backlog.

CYSTIC FIBROSIS MONTH

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to remind members of the House and all Canadians that May is Cystic Fibrosis Month. Cystic fibrosis, or CF, is a genetic disease which affects the lungs and digestive system.

For the past 30 years, the Canadian Cystic Fibrosis Foundation and its many dedicated volunteers like Tim Hunter of the Calgary Flames, the honorary chairman, Mila Mulroney, and thousands of financial donors have been helping to support research and to provide much needed programs and services to CF sufferers and their families.

The theme for cystic fibrosis month is "We've never been so close to a cure. They've never needed your help more".

Tremendous advancements have been made since the 1989 discovery of the gene that causes cystic fibrosis. With our help, the next decade promises improved treatment for this terrible disease and even possibly a cure.

On behalf of the federal government, I invite all Canadians to support the work of this organization so that they may achieve success in finding a cure.

HOUSING

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, co-operative housing provides shelter while offering a supportive environment and the opportunity to develop skills learned through co-operative management.

These are the words of the housing minister this past December and yet in the federal budget two months later the co-op housing program was axed.

I am sure all Canadians want to know why the government had such a sudden change of heart in those two months. Did it think that all the 165,000 people on waiting lists for co-op housing won the Lotto 6/49?

In justifying this decision, the government told us that it would be spending more on social housing but the budget reduced this commitment as well, from $97 million down to $70 million.

The objective of co-op housing is not to create public housing ghettos for the poor, it is to give them hope and a way out of this route. In this regard the program is a Canadian success story. It provides housing to moderate and low-income people, seniors and the disabled. It fosters a sense of pride and community and does this in a very cost-effective way.

• (1410)

By cutting the co-operative housing program, the government has destroyed the pathway from poverty to self-sufficiency. I call upon the government to reinstate this vital and important program and to recognize the damage that its policies are doing.

RECREATIONAL FISHERY

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans visited New Brunswick to announce a major initiative designed to promote the conservation and enhancement of recreational fish resources in Atlantic Canada.

The goal of the $5.7 million Educational and Public Awareness Program is to raise the level of appreciation, particularly among our young people, to the important role the fishery plays in the Canadian economy.

Co-ordinated through a number of organizations, including the Huntsman Marine Science Centre in St. Andrews and Memorial University in Newfoundland, EPAP is aimed at restoring the freshwater and coastal habitats for salmon, trout, mackerel, and smallmouth bass.

The initiative is based on the grassroots participation of local people and native groups who will play an active role in identifying and taking action on habitat problems.

NORTH ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, during the past weekend more than 500 parliamentarians from North America and Europe, including the republics of the former Soviet Union, met in Banff for the influential North Atlantic Assembly.

The beauty of Banff, the warm hospitality of Alberta, and the efficiency of the organization lead by the indefatigable member for Scarborough East, put the delegates in a receptive mood to hear a creative message from Canada on the issues before the conference. But no senior minister of the government took the opportunity to speak to the plenary session.

Where was the Minister of National Defence? It was his duty to represent Canada at that conference. A great opportunity was missed to set out Canada's views on the future security arrangements for Europe and North America, on the vital need for even sharper cuts in arms, for conflict prevention measures.

Canada has a stake and an interest in these issues. It was a disgrace that the minister was not there.

REFERENDUM ACT

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, Canadians must reject calls for spending limits and umbrella committees to be put into the referendum legislation. We must be mindful of the words of U.S. Supreme Court Justice William O. Douglas, who said on June 24, 1957:

> Free speech is not to be regulated like diseased cattle and impure butter.

On June 18, 1986 U.S. Supreme Court Justice William Rehnquist said:

> In a modern democracy, to resist political spending is much like allowing a speaker in a public hall to express his view while denying him the use of an amplifying system.

Let us not muzzle the free voices of our nation. Canadians are mature enough to make their own judgments on this or any other issue.

CANADIANS AGAINST RACISM

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, this evening the National Capital Alliance on Race Relations is organizing an assembly of Canadians against racism here on Parliament Hill. Local religious and community leaders, business, labour, politicians and citizens will gather to express support in working to eliminate racism in our national capital community and in Canada.

In light of the recent demonstrations and violence in Toronto and other Canadian cities following the riots in Los Angeles, it is critical to ensure that racism is not tolerated in our society and for all to speak out.

While it was one particular incident that sparked the deplorable violence and destruction, there are other causes of unrest; high unemployment, high drug use, large numbers of high school dropouts, illiteracy, hopelessness. Racial tension is but a part of a greater social malaise and we must all work at fixing the root causes.

The government must also commit to invest available resources for the elimination of racism, including an immediate lifting of the funding freeze imposed in this year's budget on the Canadian Race Relations Foundation.

I applaud the National Capital Alliance on Race Relations for its work and encourage Canadians to organize similar events.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, who could not feel proud about the great events that took place over the weekend in Montreal? More than a million people celebrated the 350th anniversary of the founding of Montreal. French-speaking and English-speaking people joined those of other language backgrounds to celebrate a really distinct society together.

To mark the event, I would have three suggestions to make. First, settle the constitutional issue, with the leadership of the first ministers and the native people; second, make Bill 178 more flexible so as to allow bilingual signs in Montreal; third, have the federal government work with the unions, Montreal City Hall and the Government of Quebec to revive Montreal's economy. If we work together, Mr. Speaker, we will all celebrate Montreal in grand style 365 days a year.

JOB TRAINING

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and other local ridings have been hit over the head with yet another government two-by-four.

In the depth of this economic recession, the government has cut training grants under section 26 of the Unemployment Insurance Act. Originally, our area was to get $1 million from this program. The amount has recently been reduced to $78,000.

Some people in school with literally days left before graduation were struck off the list of qualifying for training. Luckily a demonstration by local unemployed people in Cornwall restored part of the funding to end the present school year, but countless other individuals in Hawkesbury, Alexandria, Cornwall and elsewhere are still going to be denied the usual benefits.

I take this opportunity to call upon the Minister of Employment and Immigration to restore section 26 funding for the people of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. What the people want is training so that they can get jobs if and when this recession ever ends.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, there have been some discussions and I believe there is an understanding at this point in time that we will have testimonials with respect to the situation in Nova Scotia and the coal mine.

WESTRAY MINE DISASTER

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I rise on behalf of the Government of Canada, I am sure all members of this House and of the people of Canada to express our most heartfelt sympathy to the families and friends of the 26 miners who died in the Westray mine in Plymouth, Nova Scotia as a result of the explosion of May 9.

Our thoughts and prayers have been with the community ever since, and are so especially today. A memorial service organized by the Pictou Council of Churches and attended by His Excellency the Governor–General and the right hon. the Prime Minister is under way in Pictou county at this moment. The service pays tribute to those who died and to the indomitable courage and spirit of all miners. Their loved ones have learned to face tragedy and somehow rise above it.

The families and friends of those who died as well as the whole community of Plymouth now face the painful task of carrying on without those whom they have lost so tragically. They do so in the knowledge that their community and in fact the country wishes to offer every assistance possible. We also pay tribute to the heroic efforts of the rescue teams who risked their lives in the hope of finding the miners trapped in the explosion.

Mining has played a significant role in the history of Nova Scotia and of Canada. These men will not be forgotten. As the late Helen Keller once said: "Although the world is very full of suffering, it is also full of the overcoming of it".

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I join with other members of this House to remember the 26 men who met sudden death at the Westray coal mine in Plymouth, Nova Scotia.

Death and disaster are all too familiar to the coal mining communities throughout this country. These men bring the total number of deaths in Pictou county, Nova Scotia to 272, yet for many in eastern and central Nova Scotia, the mines provide the only opportunity for meaningful work.

It is not pleasant work. It is hard and unsteady work. It can be dangerous and unhealthy but for many, it is their only way to enhance their economic opportunity. Miners are an indomitable breed. They do not shrink from the arduous nature of their labours nor from the dangers posed to health and safety. Their object is to earn an honest living for themselves and their families and they take these awful risks to do so.

Disasters like those at Westray mine are brutal blows, not just to families of the victims, not just to the communities in which they live but indeed to an entire nation. All Canadians feel the pain and join in the grief. We marvel at the spirit of the people, not only from the communities directly affected which united in support of the stricken families, but also those from all over Atlantic Canada who came voluntarily to Plymouth to risk their own lives in the valiant but futile attempt to rescue.

We know that as long as there is a demand for coal and as long as there is coal to be mined, there will be brave and honest men in Nova Scotia to do the work. There is a special spirit in the mining communities of Nova Scotia that marks that of mining communities everywhere, a spirit that was well summed up by a poet of Wales when he said:

> Though they go mad, they shall be sane;
> Though they sink through the sea they shall rise again;
> Though lovers be lost love shall not;
> And death shall have no dominion.

In the last few days, we have seen that spirit at work. The extended communities, of not just Plymouth or even just Pictou County but of all Nova Scotia and all Atlantic Canada have gathered around the stricken families. Especially impressive have been the courageous draggermen who so valiantly attempted the rescue. Many of these men came from my own constituency but they also came from various parts of Pictou County and parts of New Brunswick. To each and everyone I express the appreciation of the House for their heroic efforts.

This is the way of Nova Scotia's mining communities, resolution and strength in the face of adversity. The pain of the past is eased by the determination to build a better future.

Words alone cannot express the depths of our sympathy for the families, friends and communities who have suffered such tragic losses. So let us today offer our own personal prayers and sincere condolences to the families of these special men. And let us reassure these miners that their struggle was not in vain. We as a people shall never forget.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the New Democratic Party caucus and our leader, the member for Yukon, who is also at the memorial service today, I wish to offer our condolences to the families and the friends and the people of the community who are affected by the mining disaster.

It is no news to you, Mr. Speaker, that this House was very quiet over the last week as we waited for the rescue efforts to finish. We are concerned in this House about what happened in that community. We are concerned with the trials, the tribulations and the sorrow that those families went through.

As we say in war, people should not die in vain. I would hope that after this memorial service is finished hard questions will be asked as to why the mine was allowed opened when in 14 years 246 people died. There are many serious questions. They must be answered.

We again offer our condolences but we do not want these men to die in vain.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, like many thousand Canadians, every day we have been watching the news and hoping for good news.

[Translation]

But after several days, we lost hope, as all those families did. We all know that fathers, friends and husbands died in that terrible tragedy. We want to join their families and friends in saying that suffering knows no boundaries, no partisan allegiance and in the hope that such tragedies will not recur. We hope that we will all learn lessons from their terrible death. Naturally, Mr. Speaker, like all of you, we want to join those who are at the memorial service to share our sympathy.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I would ask hon. members to stand for a moment's silence. One minute, please.

[Editor's Note: The House stood in silence.]

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

TRADE

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

In next week's issue of U.S. News and World Report there is an appalling interview with the Prime Minister of Canada. Along with telling Americans it would be unfortunate for the United States if he were not re-elected, the Prime Minister had this to say about U.S. trade harassment of Canada, and I quote:

> President Bush has spoken to his cabinet about this and I have had a number of calls from him recently. He is clearly indicating his intention to restore this relationship.

As this interview went to print, the United States slapped another unfair $200 million American duty on softwood lumber from Canada. How does the Prime Minister explain ongoing American trade harassment when he claims that he has directly spoken to the President of the United States and that it will not continue?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, there is absolutely no question that the Government of Canada takes a very dim view of the recent indication by the United States that it intends to continue on the softwood lumber issue.

We will win this case. We will take it, as we have, to the GATT, we will take it to the FTA panel, and we will prove the United States to be wrong. That is exactly what the Prime Minister will be telling the President.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Well, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister was right about one thing in the interview; he is the best Prime Minister the United States could hope for.

Unfortunately, Canadians want someone who is going to speak up for us, not only here but also in Washington. While our Prime Minister sounds more like President Bush's press secretary, we are being hit from all sides—Honda, unfair softwood lumber claims, durum wheat, magnesium. When is the Prime Minister going to get off his knees in Washington and start speaking up for Canada?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, that is exactly what the Prime Minister has done and what he intends to do again this week when he meets with Mr. Bush.

It is easy to criticize the trade arrangements between Canada and the United States. It is the largest trading agreement that there is anywhere in the world between two countries, and there is bound to be friction. We do not like it, we intend to try and put a stop to it.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister claims he has a very good relationship with the President of the United States. However, as you know, this weekend the President of the United States again decided to ignore the clean air agreement between Canada and the United States.

Why does the Prime Minister go along with a situation in which the clean air agreement between the Americans and the Canadians will no longer be observed as a result of the actions of the U.S. President on the weekend?

[English]

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, there is no question that the clean air agreement between Canada and the United States is a significant step forward. There may well be difficulties in it, but my colleague the Minister of the Environment will be able to look at those and clear them up.

Every time you have a significant dispute, it seems that the opposition then wants to stop all trade with the United States or stop the free trade agreement, cancel it, change it. We would be far worse off if we did not have these agreements with the United States.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, last Friday the U.S. Department of Commerce ruled against our softwood lumber industry once more. This biased ruling is both politically motivated and hypocritical. Furthermore, the industry will lose $200 million this year.

• (1430)

Can the Deputy Prime Minister inform this House whether the Prime Minister will obtain a guarantee from President Bush that this politically motivated duty which has caused extensive damage and injury to our softwood lumber industry will be terminated once and for all?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I assume my friend knows that there is not a new imposition of a new tax. The experience last Friday was another step in a process that will culminate some time in June.

We now have a final determination of a countervail assessment that was made sometime ago. The determination in fact is somewhat less than what the original findings were. It is half that.

What my colleague, the Minister for International Trade, and I did on Friday was to immediately call for the establishment of the binational panel that will adjudicate this issue and, of course, will find in our favour.

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the same minister.

The decision handed down last Friday is just as harmful and irrational as all the other decisions that were made since 1986. The industry is dying while the government watches the parade. Even with this reduction, the industry will lose $200 million this year.

Does the minister intend to accelerate the dispute settlement process so that Canada's softwood lumber industry will get a fair deal and stop submitting to this despicable show of U.S. dictatorship?

[English]

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, we have no intention of submitting to this action or any action like it which has no basis in law and which we have protested from the very beginning.

To this point, I should tell my hon. friend that the industry has not been required to pay the duty, but rather to issue bonds in the event that the American action can be sustained. The same situation prevails for another 45 days until the final decision on injury can be made.

As I have told my friend, we have already asked for the establishment of the binational, quasi-judicial panel that will deal with this issue as soon as possible. There can be no doubt in anyone's mind that any objective observer of this situation would have to agree Canada has a very strong, if not unassailable case.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, the earth summit begins a mere two weeks from tomorrow. It is time for this government to act, not just talk. Canada must take concrete actions nationally and a leadership role internationally on the environment and development.

My first question is for the Minister for External Relations. The Conservative government has failed to meet Canada's development aid targets for the last five years. World governments will be asked at the summit to substantially increase their aid targets and fundamentally re-think their criteria for aid projects.

Will the minister assure this House that the Canadian government's commitment to aid will be met, unlike the past performance of this government, and that human priority needs such as family planning, poverty and women's education will become the bottom line for aid funding?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, I am proud of our government's achievements in Third World development assistance, whether we are talking about programs operated by CIDA or our own very firm position in various international forums where the Canadian government is often seen as a leader in promoting major development issues.

As for our environmental concerns, since the hon. member alluded to these, CIDA, together with various other departments, intends to play an important role, as it did during the preliminary meetings, at the UN Conference on Environment and Development.

HEALTH

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, my second question is to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

This year, tens of thousands of Canadians will develop skin cancer and cataracts because of exposure to cancer-causing ultraviolet radiation. Millions more will be exposed to dangerous levels that will result in deaths and illness in the future. Will the minister provide an example of leadership and act now to educate and regulate the safety of Canadians on sun awareness? Will he introduce legislation to rate and test the ultraviolet protection of both sun-screens and sun-glasses? Will he make a commitment today to introduce legislation before Parliament recesses for the summer?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the member will recall a couple of months ago I said to an audience here in Ottawa that I would like to consider action in terms of the problem of sun exposure and cancer. We are dealing with it now and later this week with the Minister of the Environment we should make some announcement in terms of the way the problem of sun exposure should be treated and the way Canadians should consider the problem.

In terms of cancer, she knows very well that the department and the Medical Research Council make money available to researchers.

Legislation has not been considered so far, but I do not say that it could not be considered in light of the discussions we had, particularly with my colleague, the Minister of the Environment, and organizations such as the cancer society and the lung association. I take note of the proposal and I consider that it is quite possible.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of the Environment. The proposed text of the climate change convention is a definition of false security. It does not even meet the minimum standards set by Canada's national round table on the environment to protect world climate. It has no targets or timetables for specific greenhouse gas reductions and according to the Americans, it will not be legally binding.

Will the minister assure this House that Canada will not sign the agreement proposed for signature in Rio until there are serious binding targets and timetables?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member took the time to look at the proposed convention very carefully, he would find in article 4, section 2, paragraphs (a) and (b) reference to the reduction of CO2 or greenhouse gases outside of those covered from the Montreal protocol that cause climate change and reference to certain dates that are useful and meet the general objectives of certain countries, although they do not go as far we wanted to.

The member does make a statement that is very important. He says that Canada should walk away from this and not sign the climate change convention. I take note of his position. I can assure you we will have discussions. However, if that is the NDP way of approaching this issue, I do not think it is going to be useful.

Furthermore, I invite him to look at what happened on ozone depletion substances. A Vienna convention also preceded the Montreal protocol that lead to real action.

We feel that we may have exactly the same type of situation here with the climate change convention.

EMPLOYMENT

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Despite above average unemployment statistics in Northumberland and area, government approved training criteria are more restrictive, inappropriate and counter-productive than ever before.

The fee payer program is an example. In Trenton, where over 20 per cent of manufacturing jobs have been lost in the last several months, only four people will be able to benefit from this program this year.

Will the minister commit to a specific review of all government and UI funded training programs in Northumberland and area?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, on the issue of funding for fee payers under section 26, this, by the way, is the amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act which she and the Liberal Party vehemently opposed. These are the same people complaining in this House today about a measure they fought for a year and a half. Let us get that straight.

On the issue of funding, last year there was $43 million under section 26 just for Ontario. We are increasing that amount to $125 million in 1992. That is almost three times as much as was spent in 1991. Because of the needs and demands on this program, yes we have to be more selective. We will be in order to ensure that in the end we get a better trained workforce which the Liberals opposed.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, the people of Northumberland are fed up with this government. That program we opposed eliminated government funding to important programs, yet the government stipulates inappropriate use of employee-employer programs.

My next question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. With the permanent loss of tens of thousands of jobs in Ontario alone, and one in every six Canadians being illiterate, upgrading of our jobless is essential. However, without a job at the end, much of the skills training can be wasted.

Will the government commit to working immediately with the Government of Ontario and municipal representatives to determine appropriate niche markets in Ontario so that any skills training can be efficient and cost effective?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the call by the Liberals for partnerships is exactly what the Labour Force Development Strategy is all about.

If she cares to talk with Minister Allen in Ontario, she will find out that there is great co-operation among the federal government, provincial government and the business and labour sectors in Ontario to try to train people in order for them to fill these jobs and also get the fundamentals of our economy right.

These people were calling in this House for lower interest rates, for a lower dollar and we have all of that. Everything will not happen overnight, but we are on the right track.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

In metro Toronto last month, there were some 220,000 unemployed. We are told that of these, some 5,300 are enrolled in training programs. That is only 2 per cent of them. There are still another 200,000 with UIC benefits expiring over the next few months.

Will the minister now admit that both his job training money and his government's economic policies are failing Toronto and the whole country. Will he tell us why this government is refusing to take the necessary corrective economic measures which are needed to salvage our very sick economy?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, to his first question, the answer is no. To his second question, the answer is yes, we are taking those steps.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question is obviously in order. I think we need more meat for the table.

This severe recession is exacerbated by the Bank of Canada's misguided battle to reach zero per cent inflation, fought on the backs of the unemployed and by adjustment to the free trade agreement with none of the Prime Minister's promised adjustment assistance. Zero inflation plus zero free trade adjustment equals zero opportunities.

Will the minister of employment admit that Canadians are now desperate for a new economic initiative and new jobs that will help keep their families and their futures together?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member plays with the phrase that there are no adjustment programs, I invite him to read a report commissioned by this government which was chaired by one Mr. de Grandpré.

There are over 400 adjustment programs all across Canada. Billions of dollars of taxpayers' money are being channelled to help Canadian workers adjust and to allow the business sector to restructure in order to meet the global challenge. This is happening.

As for his claim that the government is doing nothing, I remind him again that he will find in the last budget of my department we have some $300 million more to train unemployed Canadians. Surely this is a step in the right direction.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Employment and Immigration just pointed to the extra $300 million that his government allocated for training. The reality is that it is not enough to deal with the problems out there today.

In the Thunder Bay area office, there are at least 687 laid-off workers who have been identified by CEC as eligible for section 26 funding. There are at least another 200 who are being laid off as we speak.

Is the minister prepared to open up the purse so that these men and women who have decided that they do need training can in fact get access to it, not just for one year but for all three years?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I often hear NDPers in this House calling on us to come clean. Maybe they should come clean with Canadians.

If they remember correctly, last December we increased the premium on UI to do exactly what the member is calling for us to do today and they blasted us; it was terrible to increase UI premiums.

Today he is asking me for more at a time when the UI premium rate is the highest we have known in this country and when workers and business people are trying to remain competitive.

The answer is that we cannot tax people more or increase the deficit or increase the UI premium rate because I think people are taxed enough.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, the minister talks about being selective and the fact that it will be possible to be selective with these new constraints on training.

Does the minister think it is being selective when in Windsor it is not going to be possible for a single extra person to take training under section 26?

Is it being selective when the people at the Canada Employment Centre say they need $2 million more to cover the desperate needs of people in Windsor?

I ask this minister to get serious and to start doing something for the people of this country.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I know, especially on TV, that the member likes to be selective. Does he want to talk about the $293 million that we will spend on training in Ontario other than under section 26? No, we cannot talk about these other training funds because "this is just taxpayers' money"; of course not.

The reality of the matter is the demand by unemployed workers for further training is there. We have started this UI reform in order to provide that training, and at this point we have to live within our fiscal means. This is what we are able to do. Unless we further increase taxes or increase the deficit, I am afraid we cannot do more.

TRADE

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. Last week President Bush declared that he was trying to negotiate a free trade agreement with Chile. Does Canada intend to participate?

[English]

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, Canada has no intention of negotiating a free trade agreement with Chile.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Deputy Prime Minister.

The reason given for sitting at the table with Mexico was to protect Canada's interests. Why then is it not important to protect Canada's interests in this particular instance?

Why is the danger of the United States signing a series of bilateral trade agreements from which Canada would be excluded and which was the reason we sat down with the Mexicans not a factor now that that series of free trade agreements is in fact becoming a reality?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, the negotiations with Mexico were something that were on the burner. The negotiations if ever with Chile are something that are a long, long way down the road and we do not need to consider them at the present time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): My question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. We were horrified by the repression and violence in Thailand. Why did Canada, which claims to defend human rights, approve an increase in direct aid and arms and munitions exports to the military regime in Thailand during the past 14 months?

[English]

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I know we all deplore and were saddened by the violence that took place over the weekend in Bangkok.

• (1450)

I would like to advise my hon. colleague that the Secretary of State for External Affairs issued a statement yesterday deploring that violence and asking for all involved to exercise restraint. Upon her instructions today, she called in the Ambassador of Thailand in Canada again expressing to him the need to exercise restraint and called upon all parties to find a way of dealing with this very tragic problem.

Our concerns at this point obviously are to see a cessation of the violence and ensure the safety of all Canadians in Thailand. I am pleased to say from our information at this point that all Canadians are safe.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the statement issued yesterday by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, she said: "Canada supports the movement toward increased democratization in Thailand".

Apparently this support for democratization included an increase in aid to a repressive regime and an approval for Canadian arms, tank parts and ammunition which could have been used to oppress those civilians last Sunday night.

Will the minister and the government stop this hypocrisy, stop the export of arms and cut off aid to Thailand until there is a restoration of democracy in that poor country?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, at this point in time it is important to assess the over-all situation in Thailand. To take any precipitous or unilateral action I do not think would be helpful. We will be continuing to consult with our allies.

I might just remind my hon. colleague that we have a modest development program with Thailand. The major focus of that program is on development of democratic institutions, support for universities in Thailand, and support in the fight of the drug war.

One has to look at this issue in its over-all context and find ways to encourage the democratization of Thailand and a peaceful situation.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if I could just advise the House that because of the condolences with respect to the Nova Scotia miners Question Period will extend to 3.10.

MULTICULTURALISM

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship.

Yesterday many elder citizens of Chinese origin rallied on Parliament Hill to raise the question of redress now, and several of them are in the gallery.

Mr. Jackman, age 91, paid the racist Chinese head tax to come to Canada in 1918. Mrs. Lee, a widow, endured terrible hardships in China and with her sons was separated from her husband for 31 years because of the Chinese Exclusion Act. They and many supporters want redress now for this injustice, before they die.

When will the government on behalf of all Canadians acknowledge the injustices of the Chinese head tax and the exclusion act and negotiate appropriate redress?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I was not here to meet the group yesterday, but hopefully I can meet some of them after Question Period today.

I have indeed met on numerous occasions with the Chinese Canadian National Council Redress Committee, as well as the National Congress of Chinese Canadians and other individuals, and many others representing Canadians of Italian origin, Ukrainian Canadians, Jewish Canadians, NACOI and indeed the Canadian German Congress.

I attempted to put forward some ideas that I thought would be helpful for us to best symbolize the act of discrimination which is a very dark day upon all of us. I have had those meetings. I have now prepared a report which the government is considering.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, we appreciate the minister's effort and hope that there will be action on this as soon as possible.

Japanese Canadians who also support redress for the Chinese head tax are very saddened by the government's betrayal of its redress promise to them to establish the Canadian Race Relations Foundation.

In order to show good faith, will the minister persuade the government to proclaim Bill C-63, which has not even been proclaimed? Will he also facilitate the allocation of $2 million annually to begin establishing a Canadian race relations foundation even if the capital amount that was promised is not possible at this time? Let us show faith and get started with this race relations foundation.

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, four years ago when I became the minister responsible for multiculturalism I indeed made this the highest priority, fighting racism, racial discrimination, and bringing forward a program on integration and equality.

I am as fully committed to the establishment of a race relations foundation as I was there in Ottawa when we announced the opening of the new information centre at the Canada Police College. It was decided not to proclaim it in this current fiscal year in the budget announced by the finance minister. Of course we all completely agreed that the budgetary constraints must be respected.

Whether more can be done within my established budget, I am always looking for ideas that could be helpful to make sure that we do all we can at this particular time in our history.

FREEDOM OF SPEECH

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, freedom of speech must not be restricted or channelled in a free and democratic society.

The recent calls for spending limits and two umbrella committees in our referendum legislation are calls for controls and limits on our most fundamental freedom. These suggestions are élitist and patronizing.

Given that the referendum bill is being fast-tracked through the House—

Some hon. members: Order, order.

Mr. Speaker: I listened to the question and of course hesitated to interrupt the hon. member. The bill is before the House and I think that is anticipating an order of the day.

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs, who is passing through Ottawa on his constitutional tour. Will the minister be able to make good on his commitment to table formal offers for Quebec by May 31?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could answer this question when the hon. member's leader is back in the House.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, the minister may be pleased to hear that my leader is in Montreal, at the request of the Crown, to help one of his colleagues. My question is quite straightforward. Will the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs be able to table formal offers for Quebec by May 31, as promised?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, May 31 remains the target date for the group I have the honour to chair.

MULTICULTURALISM

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship. From 1885 to 1923, a head tax was imposed, followed by an exclusion act specifically targeted to the Chinese until 1947. Will the government act now to compensate the victims of this form of institutionalized racism?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, we have already been able to meet a number of people representing the Chinese-Canadian community and probably other communities. As I said in the other official language, I have already submitted a report which the government is now examining.

We are all aware of these events which took place in the past. Such activities are abhorrent to all of us, and they are nothing to be proud of. Today, we are working all out to gain a better understanding of what happened in the past, and I intend to watch very closely whatever can be done in this respect.

[English]

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, I did not expect a specific answer. I am going to try again.

There are elderly head taxpayers in Ottawa today, very close to us right now as I speak. They are here to urge the government to redress a wrong committed against them because of their race.

Specifically, once again, will the minister formally apologize to Chinese Canadians for this blight on our history and announce a redress package today? Or, is his government interested in redress as a tool for partisan, political gain?

• (1500)

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, I deeply appreciate the manner in which the elders in particular have brought forward their feelings and the strength of the feelings they brought forward.

I myself have met such a head taxpayer from Montreal, Mr. James Wing. I am not sure if Mr. Wing is in the gallery, but it is a touching experience to have him show you the yellowed piece of head tax paper.

One could imagine with all the efforts we are putting in to fight discrimination that we will certainly try to do all we can to erase this dark day from our history.

GRAIN AND OILSEEDS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Last week the prairie wheat pools made a proposal to the Prime Minister and to the government asking the government to negotiate an interim grain trade agreement pending the completion of a successful Uruguay round at the GATT. This proposal would provide a cease-fire with no escalation of the grain wars between the United States and the European Community which have been so destructive to Canadian farmers.

Does the government support this proposal by the wheat pools? Will the government be proposing it to the European Community and to the United States to make sure there is not an escalation in the grain trade wars?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as I am sure the hon. member is aware, at the start of the Uruguay round at Punta del Este there was a proposal put forward and supported by Canada for a standstill and a cease-fire in the trade war while the MTN was negotiated.

We have consistently asked and supported other trading countries such as the Cairns Group in requesting a standstill while the negotiations take place. At this point we have not been successful, but that does not mean we will not continue our efforts.

This is not new to the government. We have been involved in it for the last six years.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, the United States export enhancement program has cost Canadian grain producers $1.8 billion over the last five years. If there is no agreement reached in the Uruguay round of negotiations by June of this year, the United States plans to expand its export enhancement program by $1 billion to $2 billion in the next crop year.

I want to ask the Minister of Agriculture what action the government is going to take, whether the Prime Minister is going to be raising this matter and taking action with the President of the United States in his meetings tomorrow and with the European Community so that we do not have a violent escalation of the export enhancement program and the destruction of thousands of Canadian grain and oilseeds producers and farmers.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is right in referring to the U.S. farm bill as putting another billion dollars forward in export enhancement. That is for the 1994 year.

We hope, as other countries involved in the MTN, to have successfully concluded an international agreement under the MTN that will bring about a cessation to the trade distorting subsidies by both the European Community and the United States, which are not only harming Canadian agriculture but agriculture around the world, particularly agriculture in developing nations.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Forestry.

Last Friday's decision by the Bush administration to impose a tariff on Canadian softwood exports is in reality a grab for Canada's raw logs.

Can the minister assure Canadians that the Prime Minister will tell President Bush that Canadian raw logs are not going to be negotiated away as we all try to resolve this dispute?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I think I can give my hon. friend this assurance simply because of the fact that there are no materials either in British Columbia, which has been targeted for a special tax to make up for log exports, or in the rest of the country. We just simply do not have any surplus materials to export.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, our staff has just spoken with commerce department officials who say that the decision as to whether the dispute settlement mechanism applies to this dispute is still under review. They have indicated that the department may have a different position when the Prime Minister meets with President Bush.

I wonder if the minister could tell this House whether they actually have a decision from the United States yet as to whether it recognizes the dispute settlement mechanism to try and resolve this dispute. Yes or no.

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, the New Democratic Party wants to do away with the free trade deal. If we did this there would not be a question, we would be stuck with the imposition of a countervail duty on our lumber.

I can tell my hon. friend that the MOU is a part of the free trade agreement and we have launched an appeal to the bi-national panel which will eventually resolve this problem for us under the free trade deal.

JOB TRAINING

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

In Windsor, Ontario, and in many other communities across Canada the funds set aside this year under section 26 of the Unemployment Insurance Act for training of people who pay fees for their courses has already been used up, although there are still some eight months to go this current year.

In spite of the answers the minister has given already to questions on this subject, I want to give him another chance and ask him if he is going to take a fresh look at this matter. Will he put aside his partisan responses and take a fresh look at this matter and see what he can do to provide the funds required for this type of training. If he is serious about training, why can he not give that constructive answer now?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is talking about Windsor. In the Windsor area in 1990–91 the department spent on training under the regular program, under SARS, SEED, and fee–payer, section 25, section 26, a little over $8 million to train these people in Windsor. The next year this went up to over $11 million and I contemplate that we will spend even more in this fiscal year.

If the hon. member wants to test our resolve to train more unemployed Canadians by the amount of money we spend for training, the answer is yes, definitely. We have increased the training of UI recipients throughout the country by $300 million this year, and that means there will be more training, not less.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister.

In Windsor, Ontario, unemployment has gone up from 10.3 per cent in February to 12.8 per cent in April. This is an indication that whatever the government is doing, so far it has simply not been enough.

The fact of the matter is that for people paying fees for their courses, the amount of money he has provided this year under section 26, while it has increased, has already been used up. Second, under the section 26 portion for project–based training, his department has actually reduced the amount of money by 34 per cent.

You cannot say you are going to increase funds and reduce that aspect by 34 per cent. I ask the minister if he will take another look at the matter and, in spite of his rhetoric, put it aside and do something constructive for the unemployed people in Windsor and across Canada.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the member should talk to his caucus. I have already had a discussion with another member from his caucus, the member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon. Instead of standing up and grandstanding in the House, he came to see me. He had problems with workers in Thunder Bay who had received a commitment from CEC and we have dealt with them.

I cannot on the floor of the House commit to the hon. member that I will increase the funding in the Windsor area by x dollars. What I can tell him is that with the funds that we have targeted to Ontario, in order to do more and not less we will try to be as helpful as we can.

CITY OF TORONTO

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): My question is again for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

This government has consistently ignored the economic plight and woes of metropolitan Toronto, which used to be a vibrant economic engine for the Canadian economy.

• (1510)

Given that a new metropolitan government study indicates that as of last month 640 Torontonians lost their jobs through reduced operations of businesses, 48 through partial closures and 3,200 through complete closures of Toronto firms, what plans does this government have to put Torontonians back to work and restart the Toronto economic engine?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member pays attention to the budget which my friend, the Minister of Finance, laid before this House, he will find measures in that budget to help small business and the manufacturing sector do better in this economy.

As for other measures, we have increased spending in a very substantial way in Ontario on training with the provincial government in order to yield the kind of work force that is required in order for this economy to do better and keep on progressing.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Andre that Bill C–81, an act to provide for referenda on the Constitution of Canada, be now read a second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): At the midday break, the hon. member for York West had finished his speech. We now proceed to the period for questions and comments.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I know that the hon. member gave us a brilliant speech, but like us, he does not believe the government's arguments about the Charter of Rights not allowing spending controls and umbrella committees.

Would the hon. member be prepared to accept the use of the notwithstanding clause under the circumstances?

[English]

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I believe it is prudent to keep all options possible. But I do not think that we should start from that premise necessarily because what I pointed out in my intervention in the House this morning was that Canadians are very concerned with the fact that there is no ceiling currently in the proposed referendum legislation and that people will measure the fairness variable of any national referendum by how well we try to control the financial expenditures of individuals, corporations and other organizations in a national referendum.

That is why the Leader of the Official Opposition and our House leader this morning put on the table a very, very important principle, that while we favour the principle of a national referendum, while we support the concept of the legislation that was put before the Chamber last week, we also believe that it is absolutely vital in a number of areas to amend the legislation so that we have a national referendum which can be a powerful tool with which to bless any constitutional reform. That piece of legislation is in need of some radical restructuring.

One of those areas clearly is in the whole question of placing a ceiling on what Canadians can spend. It is our hope that the government House leader and the parliamentary secretary and indeed the Prime Minister, who have promised a spirit of non–partisanship and consultation, will see fit to come at the committee stage and put some water in their referendum wine as tabled on Friday so that we may have a referendum that truly will be acceptable to the vast majority of Canadians which currently, unfortunately, it is not.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the speech of my hon. friend opposite. He touched on this subject but he did not elaborate on it in his speech although others speakers from his party have elaborated on it. It relates to the question of a referendum having majorities in four regions of the country, which I understand is perhaps the official position of his party.

I reminded the hon. member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce that the Beaudoin–Edwards committee had recommended such a venture but that it had been rejected outright by at least two provinces and perhaps others. With the unanimity formula of changing the Constitution, any aspect of the amending formula itself was thus rendered inoperative.

I wonder if the hon. member could elaborate a bit on the Liberal Party position with regard to regional majorities and give us his own personal observations as to whether that is still a realistic policy, given that the provinces hold to the view that provincial considerations, rather than regional, should prevail in the Canada of today.

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, when I advocated earlier today that another area needs modification, that was essentially in advocating a double majority.

We on this side of the House, despite the good work by my hon. friend who was the co–chair of one of the two committees that he alluded to, and despite the complications of the amending formula, believe that a national majority, complemented by a majority in four regions of this country—the west, Ontario, Quebec and Atlantic Canada—would be a win–win situation and would preclude as far as possible any Canadians or provinces within one of those predescribed regions from feeling that a constitutional arrangement has been forced upon them by the rest of the country, despite that one region perhaps having reservations with the over–all package or with one particular element of that package.

Thus, in order to try to avoid any regional aspirations as being shut down by other Canadians or for some people to suggest in the patriation of the Constitution in 1982 that somehow Quebec was left out despite the fact that it was a sovereignist government that was negotiating with the national government, and despite the fact that the existing Prime Minister was a big cheerleader of the 1982 constitutional deal, this double majority would avoid those feelings of alienation or being left out of the constitutional arrangement.

What we are suggesting is that this mechanism would certainly improve from the procedural viewpoint the feeling that we have incorporated all Canadians and that we have not played the politics of exclusion and have pressured one region against the other, but that we are seeking a complementary double majority so that this country may be strengthened by this national referendum and that once and for all, in a successful and united way, we can put the Constitution behind us and address the economic challenges.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, we are very interested obviously in ensuring that all of the regions, western Canada, as well as other regions, have a voice when it comes to a referendum if that is the way we go.

Is my hon. friend saying that it would be in his best interest, in terms of the country, to ensure that in the event of a referendum, western Canada, British Columbia, the Yukon, Quebec, Ontario and Atlantic Canada would all have to pass a majority in order to be interpreted as a success?

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, what I put forward today with all sincerity was a formula that I believe would work better than simply having a national majority. Some members in the House advocate that British Columbia ought to be a region in itself. Some advocate that the two territories should be another region. I suppose we can have those debates without any final resolution.

I am trying also to inject a dose of practicality into it. We may be in a national referendum this summer or early fall.

What we are attempting to do is try to avoid the Meech Lake process that not only failed many Canadians in the substance but failed miserably in the process. Canadians felt that they were disenfranchised by a constitution they thought they owned, given that is the premier law of this land. We are saying that there happens to be 27 million shareholders of this public company called Canada and we should no long rely simply on the chairman of the board or the chief executive officer or the board of directors to have a strong voice. We are suggesting it is time for all Canadians to have that voice. Putting in a prerequisite for a double majority as defined by those four regions would further solidify the feeling of unity and belonging to this country. It is certainly far superior than having 50 plus one pass the post.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to have the opportunity to intervene in this debate concerning the legislation which would put in place the regime for a referendum, should one be called for.

This flows from the recommendations of the joint committee, which I had the privilege of co–chairing last year, and the one co–chaired by my hon. colleague for Winnipeg South and Senator Beaudoin which reported at the end of February. It is a useful piece of machinery to have on the shelf, should the need arise, to establish a national consensus.

I am happy to observe that there appears to be a growing confidence among Canadians that the current process of constitutional renewal will reach a successful conclusion. After many months of debate, open discussion and private reflection there is good reason to believe that Canada's future is brighter than that of yesterday. Tomorrow we will continue our steady advance toward achieving true and lasting constitutional reconciliation within the Canadian family.

We have many reasons to be optimistic. On several issues, positions have become more flexible. Important agreements have been negotiated. Increasingly, the meetings and discussions across the country in recent weeks have taken place in a true spirit of compromise. Our ultimate goal is a renewed federation in which all Canadians can feel at home. Every step that we take in that direction is another reason to stay together. Of course, we would all prefer the debate about the Canadian Constitution to be settled quickly and to stop taking so much energy.

Other priorities, like our economic growth and social development, also demand our attention. But we cannot really devote ourselves to these urgent matters until the issue of our national unity is resolved.

The constitutional process that we are now going through is starting to bear fruit; not dramatically, but gradually, some would say too slowly, but steadily, as Canadians make the effort to understand one another better and discover how much they have in common.

Nevertheless, we should not fall back into naive optimism. We must keep on working. We must maintain this feeling of urgency and the sense of commitment that made it possible for us to achieve these results.

The multilateral constitutional process in which we are engaged began only a few weeks ago. On March 12, in Ottawa, my hon. colleague, the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs, announced that the federal, provincial and territorial governments as well as the other national native associations had agreed to begin a new series of discussions. The purpose of this process was to prepare a package of constitutional amendments that could be presented to Canada as the result of consensus among all parties.

The representatives of the parties involved in these negotiations agreed on an optimum timetable that provides for possible agreement by the end of May. Since then, in order to succeed, the participants in the multilateral process have met almost every week, both at the ministerial and at the senior official levels.

No effort has been spared to ensure the success of this process and the results of each meeting have helped forge the consensus that Canadians want and deserve.

[English]

During the month of April ministers and the four national aboriginal leaders met in Halifax, Ottawa and Edmonton. This month they have already met twice, in Saint John and Vancouver, and they will be meeting this week in Montreal.

Next week participants will be meeting virtually the entire week in Toronto to build on the considerable progress which they have already made. Throughout this multilateral process, all parties have understood quite clearly that nothing will be etched in stone until the whole package has been completed.

The constitutional affairs minister has repeatedly stated that some decisions can only be made by first ministers, and that in accordance with Canada's constitutional amending formula, nothing is final until it has been approved by Parliament and the requisite number of provincial legislatures. Nevertheless, the tone of these meetings has been positive.

Issues have been tackled slowly but surely and there has been remarkable consensus in some of the most contentious areas. Participants in the multilateral constitutional process have demonstrated a genuine willingness to compromise and to accommodate each other's differences and this spirit bodes well for the successful conclusion of the Canada round.

I will review some of the progress which has been made. While most decisions are comparable to agreements in principle, they still provide a measure of difficult issues which have been tackled and the areas of consensus which have been forged. For example, ministers agreed in Halifax to recommend to their respective governments the entrenchment of the inherent right of aboriginal peoples to self-government within the context of the Canadian state.

At that same meeting there was also agreement that the Senate should be elected, that it should not be a confidence chamber and that Senate elections should be for fixed terms. In Edmonton there was further discussion on the Senate and on aboriginal issues.

In addition, ministers and aboriginal leaders reached broad agreement on the principles of a social and economic union. There was a clear preference for returning to the earlier rules for giving provincial status to the existing territories. Those rules had allowed the decision to be made by a territory and the Parliament of Canada. The range of options on the Constitution's amending formula is being narrowed in order to meet the needs of all parties, including the concerns of Quebec.

Another important area of agreement in Edmonton concerned the Supreme Court. Ministers and aboriginal leaders agreed to recommend the entrenchment of the Supreme Court's composition, including three judges from the civil law tradition of Quebec, and on the principle of provincial participation in the appointment process.

Where provincial powers might be transferred to the federal government, there would be compensation. On spending power, there was agreement to adopt the language of Meech Lake with respect to reasonable compensation if they choose not to participate in national shared cost programs provided they undertake a program or initiative compatible with the national objective.

In May at the Saint John meeting there was further discussion on the Senate. Ministers and aboriginal leaders dealt with the Senate's power to ratify appointments. Ratification of senior appoints such as the heads of the CBC and CRTC would be spelled out through amendments to the laws under which they were established.

There was unanimous agreement that the Senate should reflect groups now under-represented in our political system. In Saint John there was agreement on 90 per cent of the legal language on the social and economic union.

There was discussion of legislative interdelegation with an agreement in principle to allow the federal government to delegate some of its power to make laws in a particular field to a province and vice versa.

Most recently in Vancouver ministers agreed to recommend the creation of a new order of government to the first ministers. They agreed that the inherent right would be stated in a new proposed subsection of 35(1) and that this inherent right would exist within Canada.

The various agreements in principle and areas of consensus which I have just cited are significant steps forward. While I must re-emphasize that all participants in the multilateral constitutional process want to review these issues in the context of the complete package, nevertheless they show that real progress is being made.

As we move on to the final meetings in the multilateral process, Canadians have good reason to be confident about their future. For many issues a working consensus has developed on how to resolve questions that not too long ago seemed to defy solution.

Of course, we all want Quebec to return to the negotiating table. Recently, we have all had encouraging signals from the Government of Quebec. Premier Bourassa visited several provinces where he had bilateral discussions with his counterparts. This evening, the Government of Quebec will host a reception for participants at the multilateral meeting to be held in Montreal on May 20, 21 and 22.

I believe that these are very positive signs. The Government of Canada will spare no effort so that all participants can consider the results of this Canada round with satisfaction and pride in the work done. If, despite all this progress, the process could not result in full agreement, the federal government will go on to the next step, which would be made possible with this bill that we are considering today.

We would consult all Canadians in a national referendum. This referendum would be fair and give everyone an opportunity to express their opinion. It would be the culmination of the most extensive consultation exercise ever undertaken by a Canadian government.

This bill is a prudent precaution. I urge all hon. members to give it their full support.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member who just stated his support for Bill C-81, a bill that will enable the federal government to prepare for and hold a Canadian or almost Canadian referendum, since we are not sure whether this referendum will be held in all provinces, or in all provinces except Quebec. It remains to be determined by our government.

I have the following question for the hon. member: Is he aware of the following statement by Mr. Roch LaSalle, made on January 31, 1979, in referring to the referendum legislation tabled in the House in 1979: "This national referendum bill is in my opinion nothing more than a political gadget. The Prime Minister, in the wake of this fiasco and monumental failure on the political and economic fronts, has designed this tool to enhance his image as the great saviour of Confederation".

I wonder whether the Conservative government endorsed this criticism. That year's Hansard is full of similar statements by Ms. Flora McDonald and the right hon. Joe Clark. They all said it was a monumental mistake.

In what way, therefore, is this referendum bill different? How is it different this time? The Conservatives are in power. They presented the same bill, I think, after having consulted Bill C-9, the old Liberal bill. How do these two bills differ?

[English]

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. He was asking what the difference is between the situation in January 1979 and the present situation and why statements by a former minister and the then Leader of the Opposition should reflect a situation different from that in which we find ourselves today.

He was the Leader of the Opposition in January 1979.

The situation is that we have had 13 years of rather chequered history pass between us since that time. This bill before us today is largely a technicality. The genuine software of any referendum initiative that is to be taken will be contained in the question itself. The member's own party acknowledges that through its not entirely unreasonable demands in that quarter.

The situation between 1979 and today has changed rather drastically. The mechanics of the bill can remain the same but the situation is very different.

We have had a Quebec referendum in the interim and we have had the remarkable situation of all the Quebec members of Parliament, including the Hon. Roch LaSalle, voting for Quebec's involvement in the Canadian constitution and for the patriation of the constitution and, if I am not mistaken, all the members of the Quebec National Assembly voting against it.

It cannot truly be said that Quebec had subscribed to the 1982 constitution.

Criticisms made of an initiative in 1979 or with an initiative in 1992 often do not relate to the mechanics of the bill, which is what I believe we are examining, the principle and the mechanics of the bill today, but rather the use to which that would be put.

If I could go right back in conclusion to the preamble to the hon. member's question, I can only conclude that he does not believe that the people of Canada ought to be consulted on this question or that the government should avail itself, that this House should avail itself, of the opportunity to put the question should that later be desired.

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member for Edmonton Southwest what he thinks of a statement made by Senator Gérald Beaudoin, with whom he co-chaired a certain committee; the statement, in a document on the constitutional aspects of the referendum is to the effect that electing a majority of péquiste members of Parliament in Ottawa for Quebec would have the same value as a referendum.

In view of this statement, I would like to know if the hon. member agrees with his co-chairman's statement which means that all we need is an election to find out what Canadians, and especially Quebecers, think?

[English]

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the quotation that my hon. friend has cited. I have immense respect for Senator Beaudoin's capacity on questions of constitutional law, as I think do most if not all Canadians.

I would only respond by saying that the way to resolve our constitutional dilemma is not by having an election. It would be probably the last issue that might be addressed if an election were called today and we would be no closer to solving our constitutional problems.

• (1540)

There will be an election by November 21, 1993. It is then that those issues can be addressed. In the meantime, if there is a need to identify a national consensus on constitutional issues, then the bill before us, Bill C-81, will provide the means of establishing that consensus.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak against this bill. To begin with, I would like to say that in principle, I am not against consulting the Canadian people, I am not opposed to using a referendum to consult the residents of a city or town or province in Canada. As was already said, it is something like the GST. We are not against taxes as such, but the GST is not the right tax at the right time and the way it is collected is not fair. We can say the same thing about this referendum. We are not even sure that it will be held all across Canada, because the government House leader said that it might not be held in all provinces. This bill is not quite clear and we do not know exactly what we will vote on.

I think this bill is a fraud. It is expensive and it is also very provocative for the first ministers and even for native people. It is deceptive because it does not allow having yes and no camps as we had in the Quebec referendum in 1980. Furthermore, there is no spending ceiling. If I remember correctly, the federal government spent more than $17 million in 1980 to win majority support. This bill sets no spending limit. There is a symbolic limit, if you will, but no real limit in that millions of dollars can be spent.

As for what constitutes a majority, will it be a double majority or a single majority? No one knows. Lysiane Gagnon, who I think is an excellent columnist, wrote a report in La Presse of April 4, 1992 in which she said: "Besides the issue of interpreting the results, which is an insoluble problem" —she is talking about a Canada-wide referendum —"with a single majority, Quebec's vote would be drowned out; with a double majority, the experience of the 1942 plebiscite is likely to be repeated; with a quadruple majority (meaning a regional majority in the West, Ontario, Quebec and the Atlantic), the risk of fragmentation increases. If the native people are included, there could even be five majorities". Finally, Ms. Gagnon asks how the federal government could override the will of a whole region. If the native people voted against, would that mean the referendum would fail? I think that is an excellent question raised by Lysiane Gagnon in La Presse.

There is not only the issue of a double majority. There is also the question of free air time proposed by the federal government. They want to give the yes and no sides air time on television and radio and space in the newspapers as well, I suppose, I don't know, but they will give enough air time, probably on the CBC, for both sides to express themselves. But how will they choose the yes and no supporters, especially the no supporters? Will they choose them from the Reform Party? From the Bloc Québécois? Will they choose other spokespersons? Who will choose whom?

If there is no real spending limit, one may ask how one can really have a fair, even-handed, open referendum. In fact, those who can give more money can buy more advertising. Even federal MPs can heavily influence a referendum because I think they have considerable resources just by virtue of being members of Parliament.

But something interests me more than that: Quebec has already said that is does not want to negotiate as one among eleven. But with a referendum, are we not starting to negotiate as one among 27 million? That is important, because I find that with a referendum—yes, the general public should be consulted. Most of the time, there is some polarization between those who are for and against the question. But, Mr. Speaker, I can tell you that is not the case here. The answer to our constitutional problems cannot be summarized in a yes or a no vote.

Excuse me, but that is so, unless you want to trivialize the question so much that it becomes meaningless. Are you for Canada? Are you for Quebec? It makes me think of Yvon Deschamps who said that what Quebecers want is a strong Quebec in a united Canada. That is true, but it is trite. It does not solve the constitutional problem. And how much will it cost? One million? No. Ten million? No. We will spend $108 million for this kind of super opinion poll that will decide what? It will settle nothing. I think that it is a mistake to propose a referendum at this time, because besides being costly and not fair to all, it is provocative. How can a referendum be provocative?

I will tell you that the way I see this bill and the way it was presented by the minister, it was provocative. How can I say such a thing? It is very easy. He says that there cannot be real spending limits or umbrella committees for the yes and no sides because there would surely be court cases —yes, lawsuits —under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. But when a journalist —I think it was Mr. Fraser of The Globe and Mail —said, "Did you think of maybe using the notwithstanding clause?", the government House leader said, "Yeah, but you know that Canadians take a dim view of it." They may not like it, but the notwithstanding clause could have been used.

Look at the question. If the referendum is not held all across Canada, if it is held in the other provinces but not in Quebec, it will set a double standard. It means that Quebecers will be treated as second-class citizens. It would mean that Quebecers have no say in the matter. You cannot deal with Canada-wide issues, because the expression Canada-wide does not include Quebec.

If there was a suit based on the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, this would be a good opportunity for people from Quebec or elsewhere to say: Wait a minute. We would like Quebec to give its opinion on this.

If the government decides to hold a Canada-wide referendum without a double majority, will this help the constitutional cause? Will it help solve the issue? I do not think so. I think it will be more provocative for the Prime Minister and the aboriginal groups, but especially for the Prime Minister, because instead of doing his job and trying to make offers to Quebec, he will simply say: Listen, you do not trust us; therefore, we will wait until the referendum is over.

In my opinion, that is the mistake. I want to compel the Prime Minister of Canada and the provincial premiers to make offers to Quebec and to the rest of the country to really do their job, not at a cost of $108 million, but just do the job for which they were elected. It seems to me that once elected, this government decided that it could throw money at the problem; spend, spend and spend even more.

I can tell you about the Spicer commission. I can tell you about Beaudoin-Edwards. I can tell you about the Beaudoin-Dobbie committee. As a member of that committee, I was proud to work on a project in which we proposed what we saw as solutions. A referendum was not one of our first solutions. Mr. Speaker, if you read our recommendations, you will see that a referendum was one of the last recommendations made. There is a reason for this. It is because the present constitutional problem is not the fact that Quebec negotiates with 27 million Canadians, nor the fact that it negotiates with 11 people, but the fact that Quebec receives offers concerning which Bill 150 can be amended to enable us to vote on these offers, at which time the referendum on sovereignty would become null and void if we accept the federal offers.

But do not tell me that we will get federal offers in the context of a Canada-wide referendum. This is no place to make federal offers, and you know that. If we hold a Canada-wide referendum, we will ask questions on the division of powers. The division of powers is what Quebec is interested in. I am not talking of something like asymmetry; we have to define the division of powers.

Mr. Speaker, I can tell you that when we get to the division of powers, you will see that the rest of the country is not as generous as you may think and that this referendum is more than provocative. People will find a reason to vote against Quebec, not necessarily because they are against the idea of giving more powers; in fact, I found it rather amusing to watch the New Democrat leaders of Ontario, B.C., Saskatchewan, and even Yukon say that there will more powers to the provinces. This is a tendency that will pick up momentum, because it costs less, it is less centralizing and people are much more responsible with the monies and the programs that are theirs.

It is not on a technicality that I oppose this bill. My opposition is based on common sense.

We will have to take our responsibilities. As a Quebecer and a Montrealer, I know that the constitutional issue has been zigzagging a lot: the aboriginal groups have been clear, then not so clear, and then not clear at all. We cannot ask a question and call upon the ordinary Canadians to do our job. I support the idea of a referendum in principle. In the case of a municipality, before it undertakes a megaproject, yes. Why? Because people can tell whether they are in favour or not of such expenses by simply answering yes or no.

Mr. Speaker, do you remember the last referendum held in Canada, more specifically in Quebec? I am talking about the latest referendum, not the one held in 1980? My friend from the Bloc Quebecois might remember the last referendum held in Quebec. I am referring to the referendum in the town of Rosemère. People had to answer yes or no to the question: Are you for or against bilingualism for our town? That was a clear question. People voted in favour of bilingualism. It is to their credit. But this will not happen with a Canada-wide referendum that is rigged, that offers no protection to people disagree, and that is provocative. Even so, are we stupid enough in this House to believe that a Clyde Wells or a Gary Filmon can be persuaded to vote in favour of this referendum because 49, 51 or 60 per cent of their population agrees? No, those premiers will do their job; they will vote for or against, depending on what they themselves believe. I think that the provincial ministers will find this very provocative. In fact, the premier of Saskatchewan did not appreciate the fact that the federal government wants to usurp his responsibilities through a referendum.

In 1979, the Liberals had a good cause. They wanted the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms to be passed. The Canadian population was rather in favour of Mr. Trudeau's idea, the Prime Minister at the time, of a Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. There was some consensus in the country. I believe it is a mistake for the Liberals and Conservatives to support this referendum today as a consultation tool, as it may destroy our country rather than make it stronger.

In the course of this debate, I have tried to be non-partisan, to truly see the problem as a Quebecer. I have tried to see the issue of a referendum by looking at what happened when other national referenda were held.

In conclusion, I would like to mention what happened on those two other occasions when a Canada-wide referendum was held. There was one in 1898. It dealth with prohibition and the sale of alcoholic beverages. What was the outcome? Forty-four per cent of the Canadian population participated in the exercise. Fifty-one per cent, a sober majority, gave their support. However, in Quebec, 83 per cent of those who voted were against the idea.

Let us now turn to the plebiscite of 1942 on the issue of conscription. Mackenzie King used to say that this was not a binding process. He said that the government would not send Canadians to war. It was just a survey. Well, we hear the same thing today. This is not a binding process. Talk to those who were sent to the front and you will see that it was truly a binding process.

Mr. Speaker, 70 per cent of Canadians were in favour of conscription, while 72 per cent of Quebecers opposed such a measure. The mayor of Montreal—we talk a lot about the mayors of Montreal these days—even went to jail because he opposed the idea. He went to jail because he felt betrayed by Mackenzie King. It is unfortunate that we don't have mayors like him anymore.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I really appreciated the comments my colleague the hon. member for Chambly made about the Canadian referendum process. If I understood him correctly, he said he was against a Canada-wide referendum.

I would like to ask him if the same would apply to the Quebec referendum? If not, what is the difference between these two referenda?

Mr. Edmonston: Mr. Speaker, I do not think it will be the same in Quebec as in Canada because I think that the choice is clear in Quebec, very clear indeed. I would like the Quebec referendum to be twofold and ask, first, do you approve the federal proposals, if any, yes or no? Then, if the answer to the first question is no: Are you for the independence of Quebec, yes or no?

If the public response to the first question were: "Yes, we approve them. We are not at all happy. This is a partial victory, a temporary benefit, but we agree." Then, I think that a referendum on sovereignty would become useless. We would not need one. However, the Prime Minister, the natives, the native groups and we, in this House, must take a non-partisan look at the work we are doing and try to get, if at all possible, the premiers to approve the Beaudoin-Dobbie recommendations instead of putting the decision-making process on the back of the public at large.

I am for consultation and, as former president of a consumer protection agency, I could not be against it. However, I disagree with this form of referendum, because I think that it is an extremely expensive sham.

[English]

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I was very interested to hear what my friend and colleague across the way had to say about the referendum. I was a little bit surprised at some of the things he mentioned. He said, for example, that people will find a pretext for voting against Quebec. It may be the translation that was inaccurate, because I know my friend has been very, very fair and non-partisan in this whole question of national unity.

If that is what he did mean, it is certainly not the impression that I got as we travelled across the country. I felt very much that Canadians wanted to reach out and accommodate Quebec in every possible way they can, and that the idea of tabling legislation for the possibility of a referendum is really a way of the federal government's responding to the "what ifs?", the possibility that there is no other way of bringing the whole country's opinion to bear in a positive manner on this very important issue.

I was also a little surprised to hear the member say that in the referendum there is no provision for people who have a dissident point of view. Again, it may be just a matter of the translation, but I was beginning to wonder if perhaps he was speaking on behalf of another party when he made that point. It tied in to something he had said earlier when he mentioned that he was very concerned about there not being any expenditure limit.

I cannot understand for the life of me why anybody would object to private citizens or the federal government doing everything within their power to try and convince the people of this country to stay together, to keep the country intact.

Why does the member object to private citizens or the Government of Canada's doing everything in their power to keep this country together?

Mr. Edmonston: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question. Perhaps I got a bad translation because I really feel the government should do all it can to bring this country together.

I believe the way this referendum is presented, the way the bill reads, it will not do that. If we are to do our jobs as members of Parliament, as first ministers, as leaders of the aboriginal groups and First Nations properly, we can get over this difficult period without spending $108 million.

I do not believe this is a question of being against the people of Canada or for the people of Canada. In fact, I would hate to see a question on the ballot of this referendum asking if we are in favour of Canada or against Canada or if we are in favour of Quebec.

I do not know what the question will be but I disagree even more with this legislation in that fundamentally I do not think it is needed at this time. I think it is unduly provocative, $108 million is extremely expensive, and the message I am getting from across the country is that Canadians want us, NDP, Liberal, Conservative, Bloc Quebecois, and Reform to do our jobs.

Our job is not that whenever we get into some difficulty because we perhaps cannot convince quickly enough the first ministers or others to lay it out across the board, across Canada, to give the problem to the Canadian people.

In those provinces where we will have two referenda, what is the percentage that really applies? If we have a referendum with 40 per cent of the population supporting the same question in one province and the federal question has the support of 60 per cent, does that mean the federal question won? What does it mean exactly?

There are a lot of problems here and I am glad I am on side with my party when we say there are fundamental problems that we have to see changed before we can vote for this bill.

[Translation]

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Mr. Speaker, I have just heard the hon. member for Chambly say that he and his party would oppose such legislation. I am a little confused here and I would like him to tell me this: When he talks against a Canada-wide referendum and says he would not vote for such a law, is he speaking for himself or on behalf of his party? I am quite puzzled.

Mr. Edmonston: Mr. Speaker, I will gladly answer my hon. colleague's question. Let me just quote an article from the April 29, 1992, edition of La Presse which says: "The NDP refuses to approve the plans for a referendum without first knowing what the wording of the question will be." In the same article, Ms. McLaughlin is also reported as saying, and I share her views on this: "Why put a bill forward if you do not know where you are going?" That is what I was saying. To those who would like to drive a wedge between Ms. McLaughlin and myself or to set us against each other, I will repeat what I said before: Cut the partisanship. This makes a lot of sense. Let us not forget it.

My point is that we would like to see this constitutional issue resolved. That is the basic issue. The way to resolve it is, especially at this time, for the native groups and the Prime Minister to come to an agreement. We in Quebec can hold our own referendum because they say the problem is with us. If that is the case, we will decide for ourselves.

Another thing, it is highly scornful for the people of Quebec and even the people of British Columbia and Alberta who are pretty well in the same boat.

[English]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, this has to be pursued. The member says that to justify his position he and his party are in favour of a referendum for Quebec but against a referendum for the rest of the country because if we have a referendum across the rest of the country we will somehow be scorning Quebec.

He quotes his leader and maybe I misunderstood. He spoke about mépris pour le Québec, les Québécois. "Mépris" is "scorn". I would like to know whether he is speaking on behalf of his leader when he says that he supports the principle of a referendum for the province of Quebec, yet he does not support the principle of a pan-Canadian referendum. If he does take this position, how can he square that circle? Surely the notion of a referendum in giving the chance to the people to have their say is a notion that is not exclusive to one part of the country but indeed is critical for all parts of the country. I would like him to square that circle because he and his leader are saying two different things.

Mr. Edmonston: I think I can say that pretty well, Mr. Speaker, in one minute. What we are saying essentially is that the provinces have decided that they would like to go the referendum route, certain provinces: British Columbia, I mentioned, which my colleague conveniently or perhaps inconveniently forgot. I mentioned Alberta and I also mentioned that perhaps even Manitoba would like to have hearings before a referendum comes out.

What I am saying is this. There is a timetable for Quebec to decide on federal offers and to decide on sovereignty. Let us get those federal offers up front and maybe a renewed Senate and maybe I hope self-government for aboriginal people. There may be a number of other things, including some administrative agreements between Quebec and Ottawa on power sharing.

Once that is done, let us vote on it. Do you know what, Mr. Speaker, we may as Quebecers not only save Canada but also save Canada $108 million. Maybe that is something that Liberals would not understand.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I rise to participate this debate on Bill C-81 with some trepidation. When I was elected back in 1988, and prior to that, I formulated the opinion that as a member of Parliament I was elected first to represent my constituency; second, to make decisions that were in general good for Canada; and third, to make sure I understood those decisions and made on behalf of my constituents. Yet here I am in this House debating the idea of a referendum, something that in principle I have been not comfortable with in my view of Canada.

I look back in history at some of the referendums that have taken place. What I will do is go to a questionnaire that I did in my riding on the issue of the Constitution.

I mailed out some 55,000 questionnaires to my constituents. I asked them their views on the 28 different proposals that were put forth by the government on amending the Constitution. I received quite a number of responses. In those responses people were asked to indicate whether they were either strongly in favour, in favour, opposed, strongly opposed or had no opinion on the question.

On all 28 proposals I would say except for one, there was very strong support for 27 proposals and on the 28th it was 50/50. I put a 29th question in. That question was: Would you be prepared to compromise your position? If you got all those things you agreed with, would you accept all those things you did not agree with? I had a 75 per cent no vote, even though if I looked back at all the questions, I had an overwhelming yes vote.

I am talking about a referendum where I presume the question will be yes or no; do you agree with this, whatever that magic formula or equation is. I look at my constituents who all thought there were a bunch of good deals in there but they would vote no on the whole package. My concern is that I sense that as being very divisive.

We have heard reference in this House to other referendums that have taken place in this country. We can go back to the conscription referendum. There is the argument about was there concurrence in this country. It appears that the majority of those who voted clearly voted yes. However, there is a group saying in this House that there was a significant group who voted no and therefore that particular referendum should have been interpreted on a regional basis. There is an argument that there was a region upset because the balance of Canada overruled them.

What would be different if we had had it done in the reverse in the early forties? We would have had another chunk of Canada upset with the outcome even though they were in the majority because a minority supported it.

I stand here and say that I am not sure I am comfortable with referenda, but I also understand very clearly in my riding, as happened in the rest of Canada, that Canadians want to have an opportunity to input.

Although there have been quite a number of opportunities, I would like to quote a particular line from the Speech from the Throne: "You will be asked to approve enabling legislation to provide for greater participation of Canadian men and women in constitutional change".

I note that this particular bill is entitled "An act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada". This referendum bill is a very specific bill that deals with a very specific subject. We are not talking about general legislation as it might apply to a whole series of questions that could be put to a national referendum.

Since it relates to this particular subject and a debate that many Canadians have wanted to participate in, in spite of my thoughts about the general thrust of a referendum, I plan on supporting this legislation.

Why would I go along with this process? First off, it is clear to me that the Constitution of Canada and the problems that are being caused by this never ending debate must come to an end. One way or another, this debate must end. Hopefully, it ends because we have the federal government, the 10 provincial governments, the two territorial governments, other interested parties, the aboriginal community and whoever else may be covered in this constitutional amendment. Hopefully we have a deal. If we have a deal there may not be a need for a referendum. Would that not be absolutely great? That is what this legislation provides for.

If we have a deal that is accepted across this country, then the government really has a choice of whether to hold a referendum. Personally speaking, if we have this deal across the country I would then argue that there is really no need for a referendum. Members of Parliament are elected to make decisions, therefore let us make them because we have this concurrence across the country.

If we did not have that concurrence, and we have had some debate in this House today about the need for a referendum, could you image what will happen in this country? There is going to be a referendum question in Quebec. There is going to be one in British Columbia and I believe there may be one in Saskatchewan. We will have three provinces for sure and there may be others that will hold a referendum.

If the other seven provincial governments decide in their wisdom that they do not need to hold a referendum but that ratification of the Constitution is dependent upon at least seven provincial governments in this country approving it, it seems to me that the federal government should have the ability to go to those seven provinces and say the other three are holding referendums to approve this package or not to approve this package, as the case may be. It seems to me the federal government should have the right to consult with the other seven governments.

It is also possible that because of provincial legislation, the three governments that require a referendum will have one, but it could be the same question we put in the other seven provinces so that all Canadians in all 10 provinces and the territories are being asked to answer the same question. That would be an ideal situation. I guess that is part of the option available to us in this particular piece of legislation.

This referendum is not binding on the government. Should the bill pass and ultimately should the question be put to Canadians, it is not binding. Why not? I go back to the question I asked my constituents in which the majority very clearly said they agreed with the individual 28 proposals but objected to the 29th question which asked if they accept the whole package. It seems to me that in parts of this country, whether it is my particular riding east of Toronto or some riding in western or eastern Canada, if they should really get into a debate point and they vote no, even though they like the individual proposals save one, the federal government should certainly have the ability to interpret throughout the land the substance of the debate and then determine whether it agrees with the substance and then take its decision, which is what we were elected to do.

Over and above that, what happens in this referendum? Clearly, the legislation says that the vote must be taken 45 days after the question is approved by both the House of Commons and the Senate. There is a very clear time line on that. The point is that all members in this House will have an opportunity to fully participate in the preparation of the question and deciding whether the question is the right question to put to Canadians.

Between these two houses, the House of Commons and the Senate, I am sure we will come up with a question that Canadians can easily understand, not like some of the questions that we have heard asked in the past. We need to look at some of those questions in the past which have left a lot of doubt as to their actual meaning.

I can even go back to the last major provincial referendum that has certainly had an impact in Canada. The one held in Quebec basically argued the concept of sovereignty association. With all due respect, what did all that mean? I would say that was not a very clear question, at least not in my mind as an observer to that particular debate.

Is there fairness in the system that is being proposed by this bill? I think so. I would probably support some amendments. I may not put them myself, but there is some fairness in this legislation. It requires that three hours of time be given by national broadcasting networks to the question. Those on the yes side and those on the no side would have the time equally split. I am not sure why we would even put that in here.

Why would we force private networks to accept equally, free of charge, participation on this subject? We should not require the CTV, the Global network, the Ontario network or the CBC to give anybody any free time. They can sell it. If they cannot afford to buy the advertising time on television, then they should not have access to television.

There are some spending limits which are very appropriate such as the spending limits of $5,000 or else you have to form a referendum committee. If you form a referendum committee, you have to declare your sources of revenue over $250. It seems to me that that is very appropriate. Some would argue that may not be fair.

I go back again to that last election that I participated in in 1988. There was a group called the Council of Canadians. It started a campaign against free trade. Never did you see or hear how much money it spent or where it got its money from.

Because it did that kind of stuff, there was another group formed called the BCNI, the Business Council on National Issues, which spent money on promoting the yes side of the free trade agreement. I guess my point is whether you are on the yes side or the no side, those groups were able somehow to fund themselves and participate in the debate.

Should the same kind of debate occur this time, it will be compulsory, unlike it was then, for these groups to publicly identify themselves and to identify their sources of money if they spend more than $5,000. That is a degree of fairness that did not exist in 1988 and whether you were on the yes side of the free trade debate in 1988 or the no side, very clearly, it was very difficult to distinguish because not in every ad, not in every article was there a very clear indication of who these groups and people were and who was paying all these gobs of money for whatever the viewpoint was.

This legislation is going to be very clear. It sets out that if you spend money, you are going to have to identify yourself. The committee that is organized on their behalf will have to do so. That is a very positive step.

The other rules that apply are those that relate to elections. You do not very often, at least in areas I travel, hear complaints about the fact that the elections were not fair, that there was cheating at the ballot box or there was unfair registration of candidates and all of those kind of accusations that may go on in other countries around the world.

At least in Canada the election system by and large is deemed to be a very fair and open process. The majority of the rules that apply to federal elections will apply to this particular debate. That is another degree of fairness that I do not have any problem with.

I have already mentioned the idea of donations and expenses, that these will have to be registered if they are more than $250. They must be reported to the returning officer. The committee that spends this money must have its accounts audited, not unlike a federal election. It must verify all expenses.

All of the surplus revenue either must be returned to the people who have donated it so there is no chance for a personal profit on somebody's part or must be given over to Her Majesty in right, I believe is the term used, so that nobody can personally pocket funds from this particular process.

I see that whole process lending more fairness to it all.

Further, there are differences in all parts of Canada and I do not think anybody would debate that. We come to the whole issue of who asked the question, who answers the question and on what basis.

Imagine the federal government putting out the question and one province deciding that it is not going to support this, rather, it is going to put the resources of its provincial government on to the no side of the campaign. I do not know why that would happen but for argument's sake it could happen.

Whether the legislation was there or not we cannot control provincial governments and their participation in the democratic process, nor do I want us to control that. We have to recognize that Canada is a federation in which there are provinces with specific jurisdictions in certain areas that we cannot interfere with.

When we talk about federal government spending versus provincial government spending, it is wise that this bill does not really say a lot about those two subjects because we have the controls, we have the ability to react if necessary. We also have the ability to go into a particular province if that province or that region of a province decides it does not like the way the process is going and interferes. I support that whole–heartedly.

There are other provinces that require some public hearings to to deal with any amending legislation and it seems to me that this process will not interfere with their hearings. I guess in theory it will not interfere if the province decides to hold hearings at the same time that the federal government is holding its referendum. In the media at least one might be overshadowed by the other.

One has to understand that in order to amend the constitution referendum, this House, the Senate, and at least seven provinces if not 10, depending on the exact amendments, must vote in their respective jurisdictions yes to the particular amendment that is being proposed.

When we have that specific amendment, whether there are hearings or whether there is a referendum or a plebiscite, we cannot lose sight of the fact that governments ultimately must vote on the issue.

The final point I would like to make is the issue of different kinds of governments that we have in this country and the problems that we have faced. We experienced them the last time we had a deal on the Constitution. There were elections held in some of the provinces between the time the accord was ratified by the various premiers and the Prime Minister and the three–year time frame.

Governments changed and in the wisdom of those governments the deal was cancelled. I find it unfortunate that kind of situation occurred but we have to understand that with the multiplicity of government types, the multiplicity of viewpoints that come from those governments, whether they be the socialist views of the Liberal and NDP opposite us or the Conservative view, there has to be some open option for the government to deal with this very important question.

It is because of the openness required and the many options that we face that I plan on supporting this particular referendum legislation even though in principle I do not think I was elected to deal with referenda. I was elected to make decisions.

Finally, I have heard the point about should we have regional requirements. Should there be a requirement that if a certain portion of Canada votes no and the rest votes yes that it cancels out? If we were in a unitary state one might argue that is a legitimate point of view. This bill is in a sense silent on that because it does not get to the specific question being asked.

When I look at the 185,000 people I represent, I want to know full well that the voice of my constituents is equal in stature to the voice of anyone else in this country.

That is why I am pleased to see this bill is silent on the particular issue of regional voting. When that question is ultimately put forward and when the future of this country is voted on, if it is voted on in a referendum, my constituents want to know that their voice is worth exactly the same as every other voice in Canada.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I followed what the hon. member said with great interest because I understand of course he does see the need for changes. Although he may not propose amendments to this particular bill, he would perhaps support a certain number of changes to it. In all frankness, I appreciate the fact that he made us aware of that today.

I would like to ask him this question. It comes from a study of referenda that was made by Michel David from Le Soleil in Quebec City. He said that there is a basic problem with a government which is unpopular hoping to get a mandate from a population which may not be able to differentiate between the question and the government that poses the question. Let me be precise in what I am trying to get at.

With a government that is as unpopular as this Conservative government is right now—it is at about 20 per cent popularity right now, but has been at 11 per cent—there is a great risk that people will vote against the messenger or will vote against specific questions in this referendum mainly because they do not like Brian Mulroney. They do not trust Brian Mulroney; they do not want to see him in office for another term. They would vote against this because Brian Mulroney is unpopular.

Does the hon. member on the government side recognize this problem of shooting the messenger and perhaps killing Quebec and Canada as well? I ask for the same measure of frankness as I have just heard. If he does recognize that, what would he suggest could be done to avoid this possibility?

In a referendum question so that we could have a consensus, what would be a question in a referendum across Canada that could rally everybody in a yes or no response?

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comment about the possibility of people shooting the messenger.

All I would indicate in the first case is that in my constituency when people go to the ballot box they are prepared to make an educated vote. They did so in the last election and I believe they will do so in the future.

Having said that, using the logic of the hon. member, I do not know why Bob Rae's government continues to do all the things it does because it is certainly very unpopular. The New Democrats in Ontario believe the myth that what they are doing is in fact good for the people of Ontario. They are entitled to that view.

I come back to the situation we are in. We were elected to govern. Sometimes governing means making tough decisions. In this case, what we are proceeding to do is to ask a question and Canadians have indicated they want to participate.

If we fall back on the hon. member's logic that because we are unpopular we should not ask the question, in the last public opinion poll the New Democrats were not anymore popular so they should not participate in putting the question together. If you put our two parties together and compare us to the Liberals, we were as unpopular combined as they were so they should not participate either. The only people who should participate in this question are those who are undecided in this country. The only undecided people around here are sitting on the other side of the floor.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, one of the amendments that has been proposed by a number of people on this side has been to modify the wording in the current proposed referendum legislation. We should truly make any referendum conducted by a national government national. As the member knows, the wording only provides for one or other provinces. It sets up a potential uncomfortable situation because I do not think it is going to provide clarity. It is not going to provide just one interpretation but a multiplicity of interpretations that can confuse rather than assist the situation. There is the possibility that there will be a number of provincial referenda in a number of provinces, a federal referendum in a few others, and perhaps none in other provinces or territories.

If in fact a referendum by the national government is conducted, and I hope it will be, does the hon. member not believe that it ought to be conducted in each of the 10 provinces and two territories? Then the 27 million Canadians who are shareholders of this public company called Canada will in fact be able to express themselves on the same question from one coast to the other and to the other. Does he not believe that would be an improvement over the chequer–board situation which may potentially make the situation worse?

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question and I understand the direction from which it comes.

I would respond that hypothetically, if there is a deal sometime this month on the Constitution, two or three provinces in this country must hold a referendum. The possibility is that in this deal those three provinces will say: "This is the common question we are going to ask in our three provinces". The federal government could concur that that is the common question and say: "In fairness, we will hold the question in the other seven so that all 10 provinces and the territories have an option". But whether we hold a national campaign or not, in three provinces there must be a referendum. It seems to me this option allows us to work with the provinces in only that example.

I suppose there are many other examples that could come forward as to why the Government of Canada wants an option in the bill, but the one I have given is a clear example of why an option would be beneficial to all Canadians.

Mr. Edmonston: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. When I raised a question to my hon. colleague dealing with what he had just been speaking on with the referendum, I asked two specific questions and he had answered one of them. Perhaps he did not understand or hear me. I understand we do have under the Standing Orders that when something like that—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I must recognize as many members as possible. It is up to the previous speaker to answer or not, the choice is his.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I am sure I misunderstood the hon. member earlier when he said he agrees with a single majority, because all votes, from all voters, are equal, and a single majority must be binding.

Have I understood the Conservative member correctly? Is he asking for a repeat of the conscription crisis? Does he know so little about the reality in this country to want to use the tyrannical powers the majority gives him to force his will on the minority? I am shocked by his words, and I am sure he made a mistake.

[English]

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had been listening to my comments earlier, he would have heard me say that because of clear examples in the past of referendums that were very divisive, I generally did not support it. In fact, I could easily oppose the whole concept of referendums.

Having said that, since we have had a very clear indication in this country that people want input, through this bill, they will be given the opportunity to do that.

He may not like the tyranny of the majority. All I would say to him is that in this country, either you have tyranny of the minority or tyranny of the majority, or hopefully we have a deal that all Canadians will cherish and we do not need to ask them the question in the first place.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before resuming debate, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier—Court Challenges Program; the hon. member for York North—Youth employment; the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway—Immigration; the hon. member for Vancouver East—Canada 125 Corporation.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to speak to this bill because Parliament has been expecting for a long time the introduction of a bill like Bill C-81.

It is appropriate to recall the story about someone who is asked whether he wants to hear the good news first or the bad news first. I think we had better start with the good news and that is the government has agreed, at long last, through this bill C-81, to give itself the means of consulting the people on amendments to the Constitution of Canada.

I do not have to remind you, Mr. Speaker, that the Leader of the Opposition mentioned, as early as April 1991, the importance in the present round of constitutional negotiations of the possibility, as a last recourse, of consulting the people on proposed amendments to the Constitution.

In the Beaudoin-Edwards committee, our party stressed the importance of having within the Canadian constitutional arsenal the capacity of going to the people. That is why we, Liberal members, joined with other members of the House and the Senate in this joint parliamentary committee to pass unanimously a recommendation to the conservative government, urging it to pass a bill permitting it to go to the people.

It is clear, that if we allow that the people of a province, Quebec in particular, be given the opportunity to express their opinion on their constitutional future, it ensues that we are perfectly justified to give Canadians in other provinces an opportunity to express their views on their constitutional future.

Holding a referendum is a very democratic process. In our democratic system, this might be the most logical, natural and desirable course of action. We in the Official Opposition can only be pleased to see, at last, the government assume its responsibilities and introduce a bill to hold, if necessary, a referendum on constitutional proposals that could be accepted by all provinces and the Canadian government, or by some provinces and the Canadian government.

Now for the bad news, as the story goes. There are frightful shortcomings in this legislation that could totally void even the most democratic aspects of this consultation of the people.

How can the Conservative government do this amazing trick, provide on the one hand for a very democratic means of going to the people and, on the other hand, present such an anti-democratic bill? It is clear that we are going to try and convince the government of amending its bill, that we are going to do everything in our power to pressure the government into amending this bill.

First, we believe that there should be a spending limit. The bill does not limit spendings by either side of the referendum question. Finally, it does not even provide for an umbrella, as was the case with the referendum held in Quebec in 1980. Canadians support the idea of a referendum. I believe that the polls show clearly that a majority of Canadians would like to be consulted at this particular time on the constitutional issue. But, as much as they want to be consulted, they also want this to be done on an equitable basis. The bill, which does not provide for umbrella committees and which does not include any reasonable spending limits, is severely lacking in this regard. This could result in a process which might not be as democratic as it should be.

Canadians do not want the outcome of the exercise to be fixed. They want a well-deserved result.It seems essential to us, if we want to convince Quebecers that they should remain part of Canada, that this exercise be credible, acceptable and not flawed from a procedural point of view. There is no point for the minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs, to try to convince the provinces to accept a valid proposal to solve the constitutional deadlock and tell Quebecers "here is what we are willing to offer, which is much better than an independent Quebec", if this exercise is to be thwarted by a steamroller of a referendum which literally buys Quebecers and which deprives them of a logical, rational and fair debate. We, the Liberals, are not afraid of holding an equitable referendum in Quebec, based on concrete and specific proposals that are favourable to Quebecers. Quebecers do not need to be bought by Mulroney's big dollars to give their support to Canada. What concerns us is the approach undertaken now with this bill, which is totally unacceptable in the circumstances.

We also think that in the present context, given our past experiences with referenda, it would be important to include a small clause clearly stipulating that the government will be guided by the results of the referendum, not only by a majority that it hopes to get for all of Canada, but also by a majority that it will want to obtain in each of the main regions of the country, so that Quebecers, when they participate in this referendum, will know that they are not buried by the majority vote of the Canadian population, but that they will also have what we call the "double majority", that they will also have in Quebec, we hope, a majority that will accept the constitutional proposal.

It seems to us that it is absolutely essential at this time to be very up front with the population of Quebec and say that the overwhelming majority of Canadians will not force a constitutional change upon them. With this referendum, we will recognize at the outset that it will not only be necessary to get a majority throughout the country, but also a majority in Quebec as well as in each of the other large regions of Canada, so that this consultation process take into account the legitimate ambitions of each of the large regions of our country.

• (1650)

A third change we are advocating deals with the wording of the question. A spokesperson said earlier, and justly so, that the Canadian Prime Minister no longer has the credibility to hold a Canada–wide referendum alone and win the support of all Canadians. It seems obvious that those who believe in Canada among the three major national parties—meaning the government, namely the Conservative Party, the Official Opposition, namely the Liberal Party, and the New Democratic Party, three of the best known members of which are provincial premiers—should all get together to draft the question to be put to the people of Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear. Hear.

Mr. Ouellet: We can obviously not rely solely on the discretion of the Prime Minister. He has neither the credibility nor the support at this point in time to carry the constitutional issue through on his own.

Canada's interest transcends political parties. It is in that context that the Leader of the Opposition has been talking for over a year now about the need for co–operation between the three major national parties in order to resolve the constitutional crisis.

To my great regret, I must say that, unfortunately, opposition parties were not consulted at all on this bill. We have been called to the office of the government House leader only to be told: "Here is what it will be." There was no consultation, only a briefing.

Under the circumstances, we deeply deplore this move on the part of government. If this is any indication of what it has in store for the weeks to come, it tells you this is scary, very scary, because we feel that the interest of Canada should obviously take precedence over that of political parties. It seems to me that the Prime Minister of Canada is more concerned by his self–interest and his political survival than by the best interest of this country when he brings forward a bill such as this one.

I think that the points made about the Canadian Charter of Rights are totally preposterous and superfluous. I will refer to an article by Michel Auger published on May 16 in Le Journal de Montréal which state, regarding this argument: "Prime Minister Mulroney said on Thursday that the government would have gladly used the Quebec model, with two umbrella committees, for its own referendum on the Constitution, but the Charter prevents it."

The Lortie commission looked into the matter. I must remind my hon. colleagues that this commission worked for two years and made very specific recommendations based on legal opinions paid for by the Conservative government which state clearly that it is possible to limit expenses incurred by a third party for an election or by umbrella committees for a referendum without contravening the charter.

I would suggest that the Prime Minister and the government House leader refer to the Lortie report to make sure that the legal opinions provided by the lawyer they have paid to assist the Lortie commission are not ignored. It seems obvious to me that the charter clearly says that the citizens have rights, but it also says in its first section that freedoms are not absolute and can be subject to such reasonable limits as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

During the weekend, Professor Mendes of the University of Western Ontario law school, faxed me his legal opinion in which he explained in great detail how the charter can limit certain expenses in the case of a referendum legislation. He referred particularly to the recent decision of Justice Sopinka in the Queen v. Butler. I will read this paragraph of his legal opinion:

[English]

> I would suggest that the appropriate standard is that laid down by Justice Sopinka in the R v. Butler decision that Parliament is entitled to have "a reasonable apprehension of harm" resulting from the dangers which the legislation is attempting to avoid.

"It would be quite easy for the government to have proved in an appeal from Justice Medhurst's decision"—and this is the decision that was rendered in Alberta at the time of the 1984 election—that the Conservative government did not want to appeal. It should have appealed. The chief electoral officer asked the government to appeal and it never wanted to appeal.

This decision is quite clear, that "there is a reasonable apprehension of harm resulting from unlimited spending during elections or referendums".

Professor Mendes concludes by saying:

> Perhaps the reasons why the government did not appeal Justice Medhurst's decision and why they do not wish to put spending limits in any referendum legislation have nothing to do with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms or with law at all.

In a nutshell, Mr. Speaker, those are the comments that I wanted to make at this point. It seems obvious to me that this bill, while it is desirable in itself, will have to be seriously amended if it wants to get the attention and the credibility that it needs.

I note that the member for Edmonton-Southwest spoke earlier in this House. He reminded quite appropriately that the parliamentary committee he co-chaired with Senator Beaudoin specifically recommended to the government of Canada, should it want to get a consensus on constitutional amendments or should it fail to agree with the 10 provincial governments, to submit to the people a constitutional agreement which could be supported by at least a majority of the provinces representing more than 50 per cent of the Canadian population.

It seems to me that this last resort approach of consulting the population to tell us whether or not our constitutional proposal is valid and acceptable and in the best interests of Canada is something that must be done, but it must be done properly, with very strict rules of election spending limits and also with umbrella committees for the yes side and the no side.

Observers will recognize that referendum legislations is historically common.

• (1700)

One was submitted to the Parliament of London to determine whether or not England should join the Common Market. On the yes side was a major group composed of all sorts of people and of all political allegiances. The same can be said for the no side. Now, the fact that the representatives from the Bloc Québécois and the Reform Party —

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The hon. member's time is now expired.

It being five o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 30(6), the House will now proceed to consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

CHILDREN

TERMINAL ILLNESSES

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona) moved:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation to enable mothers with terminally ill children to take leave from their employment in order to care for such children.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak in favour of this motion finally .It is a private member's motion that I have had in the hopper, so to speak, for a long time, I believe going back as far as 1989. The way in which Private Members' Business works here, in order for something to be debated, and perhaps even voted on, one has first of all to win the lottery by which we select those bills and motions that will come before the House.

In the last draw I was selected and this is the motion which I have chosen to bring forward. I say that because I want the House to know that I have been working on this issue for some time. I raised it in the House before in the context of Standing Order 21 and was somewhat disappointed when I learned that this motion had not been selected as a votable item.

The committee makes its own judgments about this and I am not here to dispute that, but I am told that one of the reasons the committee employed for not selecting it as a votable item was that it might have been in contravention of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The reason for that is that in the motion I singled out mothers with terminally ill children as people who should be provided with some legislative protection vis–a–vis taking leave from their employment in order to care for such children.

There are some things which are obviously contrary to the charter and there are other things which are arguable. I do not think the committee or the House, for that matter, should prejudge in this case whether singling out mothers is something that goes against the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. If that were the case then I suppose the family allowance ought to be brought into disrepute because of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in that it singles out mothers.

I do not think it should be beyond the legislative purview of the House of Commons to designate a benefit for mothers. On those grounds it is unfortunate that this is the reasoning that was employed.

Having said that, it probably would have been better if I had said in my motion legislation enabling parents or one parent or something like that. I acknowledge that. However, to have denied the House the opportunity to vote on this for that reason is at least debatable. The House can vote on this. Those members who are in the House this afternoon can either vote on it or simply allow it go to committee and pass it.

What we have in this motion is an attempt to deal with the needs of a very small but significant group of people: those families stricken with what I think is the ultimate nightmare for any family or for any parent or parents, that is having to deal with a terminal illness, for instance cancer having inflicted itself upon one of their children.

The success rate in curing cancer is going up and up. We see that and everyone rejoices in it, so the group that I am talking about in the sense of children actually dying is getting smaller.

In the sense of families who are dealing with a process that has a successful outcome, we are still talking about a group the numbers of which are holding and perhaps expanding. Even with those families whose children are successfully cured of cancer or in beating cancer, there is an entire treatment and healing process they have to go through that can be very, very hard on families, particularly when we consider the number of double income families of necessity in the country today. It seems to me that we should not add misery upon tragedy by putting at least one parent in the situation of having to forgo the income which is necessary to their economic integrity at the same time as he or she is being attacked by fate or whatever you want to call it when one of their children is so seriously ill.

That is the object of this motion. I have written to ministers about this over the last few years. At first I would simply get answers which, to sum up, were basically that this would set a precedent that the government was not willing to live with because there might be others who wanted to take leave from work in order to care for an elderly parent or for a spouse or whatever.

Of course, my contention with the government was yes, I understand all those needs but what I am trying to make the case for then and now is that this is a special group of people who need a special form of attention by the government. I still think that is the case. If the government wants to look at other ways through our health care system or whatever mechanism we want to devise for enabling and/or helping out or even helping to recognize those many Canadians who do all of us a service by staying at home to look after sick or disabled relatives, that is something the government should do. I am not arguing against that.

I have come across constituents when I have been canvassing either at election time or otherwise when people have complained to me that they are staying at home to look after a relative and get absolutely no recognition, economic or otherwise, for doing it. However, if they farmed out that person to the neighbour next door, they would be able to claim something for doing that.

This is a loophole, if you like, in our entire system; a loophole by which the kind of care motivated by family connection is not taken into account. That is a larger question and I do not think the fate of this particular motion should hinge on what people think of how we address that larger question because here we are talking about a very specific need.

Proposals have been made, and I refer in particular to a proposal for what is called a "caretaker allowance" for the families of children with cancer. The idea of a caretaker allowance has been put forward by the Candlelighters Childhood Cancer Foundation Canada, the acronym of which is CCCFC. It is a national parent support group for families with children suffering from cancer and represents about 30 family support groups across Canada.

Although obviously that is a small number of people, nevertheless it is probably larger than any of us here care to think about. Unless we come up to them face to face in our own lives, we tend to be blithely unconscious of just what other people are experiencing or suffering.

This proposal has been made on a number of occasions. What I am trying to do through this motion is give Parliament an opportunity to cause the government to focus on this issue. I can chip away at the mountain, and other members might want to do so as well from time to time on issues like this, but if the House of Commons were today, because today is the only opportunity it is going to have for a long, long time to come to pass this motion—it's only a motion, it would not go into law or anything—the government would have to presumably take into account the fact that it has been instructed by the House of Commons to deal with this issue. It is something that all of us could then hold the government to account for.

We could say there was a motion passed in the House of Commons instructing the government to deal with this problem. It would create a situation in which much more progress would be made on this issue and in a much swifter way.

That is my goal here today. I hope that other members might take the opportunity to speak to this, to support the motion and have it go through. Then the government would have to focus on this particular issue.

I would like to quote, if I might, from the proposal by the Candlelighters Foundation because I think they say it better than I could. They say:

> The treatment of childhood cancer has improved dramatically over the last 20 years due to co-ordinated efforts internationally. Whereas in the 1960s the overall long term survival of any type and stage of childhood cancer was less than 20 per cent, today it is in the 65 -70 per cent range and hopefully will be in the 80 -85 per cent range in the next ten years.
> The survival of children with cancer has improved because of the increasing use of intensive chemotherapy. This trend is likely to continue with the advent of new treatment modalities known as growth factors and oncogenes as well as the proliferation of new chemotherapeutic agents.
> However this approach has several ramifications. More intensive therapy causes more serious side effects resulting in lengthier hospital admissions and home convalescence. Hospital admissions for childhood cancer can range from a few weeks to several months. Length of treatment of childhood cancer, depending on the type, range from six months to three years and longer if there are relapses.
> Because of the increasing health costs and the focus in paediatrics to maintain the parents as primary care givers the families have assumed more and more responsibility to care for children at home, requiring complex treatment such as tube feedings, total parenteral nutrition, central line care, pain pumps, ostomy care and a myriad of other procedures.
> With most families —

This is a point I made earlier, Mr. Speaker:

> — being double income earners, of necessity, and with the intensive nature of treatment and outpatient management, parents must take lengthy absences from work, with usually one parent, the mother, taking an indefinite leave of absence or actually quitting her job. Very seldom do they qualify for unemployment sick benefits, as they must indicate they are under extreme emotional stress.

In other words, on top of having this, they have to jump through a whole bunch of bureaucratic and medical hoops themselves, which I think is totally uncalled for in the situation. Going back to the proposal:

> Disability insurance also requires consultation to a psychiatrist to prove that the applicant is indeed suffering severe emotional stress due to his/her child's illness. This type of absence is incorporated into their employment record and may unduly influence employers' attitudes. Many times social workers have had to lobby Members of Parliament who have interceded on a family's behalf. It is only then, with publicity, that the unemployment benefits have been approved.

I am aware of a few situations like that and I am sure other members here are as well. We should not have to do that. People should not have to go through that kind of hassle at that particularly difficult time in their lives. There should be a mechanism, which is exactly what this motion calls for, to provide for people in that kind of situation.

Going back again to the Candlelighters Foundation proposal:

> This issue is universal to all families who have children with cancer. We cannot expect families to assume the massive burden of care with little in the way of financial assistance, if a family is to survive the devastation of cancer.

The objective of the CCCFC is a caretaker allowance for the parent who must care for the child which has cancer whether in hospital or at home. It is not just a matter of being at home but sometimes it is the case of being at the hospital day after day and night after night.

They would like the allowance to be equivalent to the unemployment insurance illness benefit maximum payment. They feel this type of benefit should be by application and should begin within four weeks of diagnosis, continue until the child is off treatment, and resume if a relapse occurs.

Obviously they feel this would have to be supported by documentation from the child's physician. It is not the sort of thing that would be open to fraud in any way at all I am sure. Any worries people might have in that regard are unfounded.

We do have such a thing as special illness benefits under the current unemployment insurance benefits for those who are unable to work because of an illness, quarantine, pregnancy, or the adoption of a child. It is not as if we do not have these kinds of mechanisms within existing legislation.

Surely it is not beyond the wit, wisdom and wiles of the Canadian Parliament and the government with its resources to come up with a mechanism that would enable us to address the needs of this particular group.

As I say, in the instances of pregnancy and adoption a parent can claim special benefits to stay home to care for a child. Surely to goodness they should be able to do that in these circumstances.

If we had such a mechanism, the family would be able to continue to provide for regular living expenses as well as the additional costs that inevitably arise because of the illness of the child. These additional requirements, for instance, could include expensive medication, babysitting, perhaps for other children in the family, transportation to and from the hospital, hospital parking fees, meals, extra clothing because of weight loss or gain due to medication, special equipment for the care of the sick child, homemakers, home nursing. There are all kinds of expenses which are not necessarily covered by medicare.

All we are suggesting is that in this circumstance the people at least not be deprived of the income to which they are normally accustomed, although even the maximum payment under UIC might in many cases be less than what people would make if they stayed at their job. What is being suggested in this proposal is that people not be deprived entirely of one of the two incomes they are dependent on in this particularly difficult economic and emotional situation.

This is the proposal I am placing before the House. I would certainly be prepared to make copies of this proposal and some of the attached information and rationale available for members who may be interested in this. I hope that this afternoon we could actually do something here. Often we spend a lot of time here not feeling we are accomplishing a great deal. Surely we could agree among ourselves today, particularly given that it is a motion and not legislation.

It does not even go to a committee. All it has to do is pass this House in the next 40 minutes and it will be there on the record for the duration of this Parliament and for Parliaments to come, until such time as the government deals with this issue. It is an instruction by the House of Commons to the government, take heed, pay attention, look at the needs of this special group and do something about it.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, it is always a great pleasure to take part in such a debate.

[English]

One of the most significant labour trends in our country has been the increase in the number of working mothers. It is estimated that by the year 2000 women will account for nearly one-half of all Canadian workers.

Recognition of the family responsibilities of workers has prompted family-leave policies in the private sector, in collective bargaining agreements and provincial and federal legislation.

A comment that I would like to make about the hon. member's motion in connection with the necessity for women to take leave to care for a terminally ill child would be to add the word "father" along with mother as men are now taking on additional family responsibilities.

I was particularly impressed with the member's arguments about the need for us to be more open to suggestions like this, and he is quite correct. This motion has come up in Parliament on a number of occasions and I did take part in other debates. However, I would like to put the motion, if I might, in the context of the entire labour force and see how this suggestion fits in with it.

Under the labour force development strategy of Bill C-21 which became law, the member was here, in November 1990, maternity benefits were improved at an annual cost of $450 million. These benefits, as he pointed out in a cursory way, included 15 weeks of maternity benefits available to natural and adoptive parents, either mother or father, or shared between them. Parents are eligible for an additional five weeks in parental benefits if the child is ill. An additional five weeks was included primarily at the insistence of adoptive parents who wished more bonding time with their new child.

To be eligible for the additional five weeks, the child must be six months or older at the time of placement or when the child comes home. The illness of the child would have to be certified by a doctor, but I would point out that it can be of a physical, psychological or emotional nature. This leaves quite a broad spectrum for a doctor to make a pronouncement on. This would naturally require an extra period of parental care.

Departmental officials claim that 90 per cent of adoptive parents will qualify for the additional five weeks, 15 weeks sickness benefits. Any contributor to the UIC plan is eligible to claim sickness benefits. More than one type of benefit can be claimed; that is, maternity, parental and sickness. Within the claim period, one can claim up to 30 weeks.

If we look at these points in order, we can understand why the Employment Standards Act as a provincial statute is inconsistent with the UIC act. Labour standards vary from province to province. While the federal government can set examples, as in the case of reasonably progressive measures like maternity and parental benefits, it cannot force the provinces to pass similar legislation.

The fact that Ontario parents are eligible for a minimum, I repeat a minimum, of leave of six weeks is not the fault of the federal law. It is a failing, in my opinion, of Queen's Park; that is to say, it is a failing in the provincial legislation.

My party submitted amendments to Bill C-21 which would increase parental benefits for natural and adoptive parents from 10 to 15 weeks, regardless of child illness, and eliminate the maximum benefits of 30 weeks when maternity, parental and sickness benefits are combined.

It has always been our commitment to improve the maternity and parental leave provisions of the unemployment fund so that eligibility guidelines and benefits can better reflect the changing needs of Canadian society.

Some time ago a report on social trends reported that a poll taken from among a cross-section of women indicated, and I am quoting him directly, "a guilt so intense it has put many working mothers in a winding sheet of anxiety", the guilt being of course the fact that women are working outside the home.

One might well imagine how intensified that guilt is when a child is sick, or worse when a child is terminally ill. This is what the hon. member is talking about.

Working outside the home has became a financial necessity for many. Others often enjoy the satisfaction of a family and a career at the same time. This is their choice and I would surely not have any quarrel with it as I have two daughters who are doing that just at this moment.

Statistic Canada says that the picture of the household with dad at work and mom at home with the children is no longer a statistic. Fully 70 per cent of families with children under 16 in 1990 had mothers in the work force. Sixty-eight per cent of families with children under school age had a working mom. The Vanier Institute of the Family in Ottawa showed that the so-called family wage, a salary that could support a man, a wife and children, has largely disappeared in spite of the fact that many more women have entered the work force. In fact, if women stopped working, the number of low income families would rise by an estimated 62 per cent, according to the institute.

Canadians still crave the stability of a family rather than material goods. Goldfarb Consultants has also done some research tracking social trends nation-wide since 1980. About 30 per cent of parents polled declared categorically that they feel they do not spend enough time with their children. Social workers and counsellors often remark that during the counselling sessions with mothers of young children, the mothers comment about the torture they feel to do their best at a job and parenting at the same time. It is never easy for a young mother to go out and do a full day's work and come home and still be faced with all the chores she has to do at home, including of course spending time with her very precious children.

At the annual conference of First Ministers held in Ottawa in November 1989, the Government of Canada submissioned to the talks the necessity to support the family. Here is a text of the opening paragraph:

> In its capacity as legislator, the Government of Canada has an important role in regulating work practices and providing labour market programs to support the efforts of individuals to balance work and family responsibilities.

Through his motion, the hon. member has raised a most valid concern which must be addressed at the federal level if we are to follow through with a plan to really support the efforts of individuals to "balance work and family responsibilities".

I do have a few nagging questions. I wonder, if this motion was passed, would this leave of a parent, mother or father, be paid leave? Would it be paid through the UIC? Would there be benefits from there? Would there be a cap on the amount of time that the parent could spend with the child that is terminally ill?

I am very open to this type of suggestion, as is my party. If we could have some suggestions or information on it, I believe this is the type of thing toward which we should be advancing as we deal with the social problems and the social opportunities of this day.

I would encourage the hon. member to continue in his quest to have this motion passed. With a little more information, it could be supported by members on our side.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the member's concerns are met with the motion.

The motion simply instructs the government to come up with a proposal to do this. It would be up to the people in his own party to come forward with a proposal. It is not a question of having to deal with the details today. It is simply a question of having the House instruct the government to come back to the House at some future date with a proposal that would deal with the concerns that the member has raised.

Ms. Marie Gibeau (Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, I was deeply touched by the motion from my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona, to enable mothers with terminally-ill children to take leave from their employment in order to care for such children.

We know that there are more and more women in the labour force. Being a mother myself, as my colleagues know —not a young mother, but a recent mother —I realize to what extent the responsibilities of caring for the children fall on the mothers, for the most part. I do not mean to belittle in any way the responsibilities fathers might assume, but it is a fact that the role of mothers is extremely important.

When children are sick, the role of the parents—I will use the plural, because I know that both mother and father have a very important role to play—becomes parts of the treatment and the cure. On top of chemical, physiological or medical treatments, you also have the moral, psychological, emotional and physical support that parents can provide to a child who has to undergo treatment, who must experience extremely stressful and painful circumstances that have normally no part in childhood.

I was touched by the motion. Obviously our government could explore the possibility of amending labour laws or regulations to deal with situations like the one described, situations with are extreme and exceptional.

Clearly, as another member was saying a while ago, there are details to iron out. For example, would the leave be covered by unemployment insurance? Should there be a time limit for the payments, if payments are made? For the time being, we are only debating the principle of the thing, and I think it has merit, especially since we keep repeating that families make the social fabric, and that a healthy society starts with healthy families.

I wish to support this motion but add that the role of the father could be substituted for the role of the mother when the circumstances require it, but it is true that statistically it is more often the mother than the father who is involved.

[English]

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to make a few remarks with respect to Motion M–72 which proposes that the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation to enable mothers with terminally ill children to take leave from their employment in order to care for such children.

One can certainly sympathize with the intent of the motion. However, my hon. friend has not taken into account the fact that by limiting the leave to mothers of terminally ill children, this motion is discriminatory. I have heard his remarks that explain that this could be amended down the road. There are also those who say that it contravenes the Charter of Rights and they ask about the fathers, step–parents and guardians of terminally ill children.

The motion is also vague in its lack of definition of a child. For instance, at what stage does a person cease to be a child? Is the standard one of chronology or one of dependency?

As well, there is no indication of criteria for determining the point at which an illness becomes terminal and what length of time is envisaged with regard to leave granted.

Surely these critical elements might introduce an emotion that has far–reaching repercussions.

We have also not been advised as to what obligations will be imposed on employers and to what extent they will be required to continue an assortment of benefits including seniority, health care, pension coverage and while the employee is on leave.

While I appreciate the spirit in which the motion is being tabled, I believe the hon. member did not quite take into account all the complexities and ramifications that any legislation in this domain will have incorporated.

This government has an ongoing commitment to harmonize the work and the family life of Canadians. Over the past few decades we have seen a profound change in attitudes in this increasingly important area. These changes have taken place as the nature and the composition of the work force have evolved.

Only a few statistics have been cited to show how dramatic the changes have been. In 1965, 65 per cent of all Canadian families were what has customarily been thought of as traditional families; that is, there is only one wage earner.

Ten years later this proportion was cut in half and by 1981 only 16 per cent of all families in Canada had the husband as the sole bread–winner. The result of the 1991 census will probably underscore that trend.

There have been other equally significant changes. The percentage of persons in the population over 65 is going up sharply. More and more working men and women are carrying for elderly parents or persons with disabilities. Men are increasingly sharing the care of the children.

Given these labour markets and attitudinal shifts, we have also needed to alter the manner in which we conceive of the relationship between work and family and even with one another.

These are important developments and actions must be taken.

What we actually do to integrate these two spheres of life needs to be considered. As well, we must consider all circumstances.

I hope my hon. friend appreciates that no single method is suitable for all work places. Initiatives will vary by both individuals and by work sites. Canadian businesses are showing increasing willingness to experiment to try whatever they believe is reasonable and practical to accommodate the needs of their employees.

This kind of progress calls for flexibility.

I would also like to point out that a wide variety of measures has already been introduced by employers and unions across the country. In many instances they have exceeded legislative minimum standards because of their growing recognition that the evolving nature of the work place plus the changing demographics necessitate resourceful measures which will come out in harmony rather than in disruption.

I can attest to this happening right in this very House where several years ago when I was the Whip of our party we were in the opposition. We had a member in the government party who had a child who was terminally ill. Because the balance in the House was rather close, he was unable to get permission to leave the House to go and spend any amount of time with his terminally ill child.

I arranged for a pair for him on a permanent basis so that he was able to be with the child in the last few months of its life. These sorts of things go on with employers across the country.

Computerized information is now available in many areas on community based facilities for children and the elderly as well as on support services available in the work place. There are subsidies available to sustain these ventures and many employers have introduced supplementary benefit plans and family supportive relocation policies.

• (1740)

Work on family initiatives requires planning and financial commitments. Some initiatives cost less than others and more are acceptable to a greater number of organizations. These include, for example, modification to benefit plans to cover elderly dependents.

I do not believe that the member, in proposing his motion, has considered how many variables are involved in the reconciliation of work and family life. This government is facilitating the process by working closely with labour and management as well as with the provincial and territorial jurisdictions.

Many highly beneficial adjustments have already taken place and the response from employers and employees has been positive. For instance, working hours have been rearranged to accommodate the new realities of the two-income family. Flexible working hours and options to work out of the home have already made great strides to meet family related needs of workers.

Balancing work and family responsibilities is also increasingly regarded as critical to the Canadian economy and the achievement of economic equality for women. Employers and labour organizations in steadily increasing numbers are recognizing the need to adapt the workplace to meet the changing needs of the work force.

I trust my hon. friend will appreciate from these remarks that considerable work has already been done to assist families to look after pressing personal needs. There is also a need to reconcile all these enterprising measures with the resources that are available. While the proposal that mothers with terminally ill children should be able to take leave from their employment in order to care for those children is both commendable and compassionate, I believe it is clear that any step in that singular direction is a piecemeal approach and is only one small part of balancing working and family responsibilities.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. Perhaps the House should be reminded that what we are debating here is a motion, not a bill. It is a motion calling for legislation that would embody all the flexibilities and variables and everything else the member just talked about.

We are simply talking about a motion here and I think the House should keep that in mind. A bill could be criticized for not doing all the things the member criticized this motion for. A motion is simply a motion that would instruct the government to come up with the legislation that would meet all the concerns the member has so ably itemized.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before going on with the debate, I understand that the hon. member seems to be indirectly asking the Chair to be more strict as to the relevance of remarks. Since this is a private member's motion, I would rather take the risk of being tolerant in this debate even if it means being too generous. That is why I try to intervene the least possible and let members express themselves with much latitude on the motion under study.

[English]

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I rise to respond to Motion M-72, which proposes that the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation to enable mothers with terminally ill children to take leave from their employment in order to care for such children.

There is no question in my mind that this motion was born out of compassionate motives, but unfortunately it does not take into account a number of very important considerations.

The hon. member should know that restricting this kind of leave to women is discriminatory or could be discriminatory toward male parents and therefore it could be a violation of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Provincial and territorial ministers of labour met recently with the federal Minister of Labour to discuss, among other things, the whole issue of balancing work and family responsibilities. Each jurisdiction is developing policies and practices that will apply to all workers who have responsibility for children, spouses and elderly parents.

Labour Canada has already taken a number of significant steps to address the challenges intrinsic to a changing work force and shifting family priorities.

For instance, over the last 18 months Labour Canada has hosted three regional seminars on balancing work and family responsibilities.

As well, through the Workplace Equality Fund, WEF, Labour Canada supports projects aimed at ensuring equality for women in the work place. This fund gives priority to projects involving labour management partnerships and to those focusing on the integration of work and family responsibilities.

Increasing numbers of employers are getting together with unions and employers to consult and co-operate in reaching an accord on family and work related issues. There is a growing recognition of the need for family-responsive work places that will act decisively as the labour force participation rate for women continues to grow and as elder care needs become increasingly important. This is particularly pertinent in the context of the apparent trend among Canadian workers to favour flexibility and choice in their lives.

One initiative involves increased work and family integration through work place support for workers with dependants. For example, some companies offer subsidies for respite care. This arrangement enables employees to return to work while care-giving responsibilities are assigned to health care professionals.

Other organizations have established on-sight or near-sight child care centres and still other companies have extended their employees dependant care coverage to include health and dental expenses for the employee's parents. Recently, the Bank of Montreal, recognizing that already two out of every five Canadians over age 30 provide some form of care for elderly relatives, began an elder care program. It offers employees counselling and assistance in dealing with older dependants. It seems likely that with the Canadian population aging, more and more workers will want to have benefits of this kind.

I believe that this kind of enlightened action, which benefits employees and employers alike, demonstrates clearly that legislation is not the only approach to family related issues that are felt in the workplace. We frequently underestimate the degree to which management and labour can sit down and co-operate on matters that affect both productivity and workplace harmony. This kind of collaboration can have a favourable impact on a company's over-all ability to compete and prosper for the benefit of all concerned.

While the bargaining table may be one area where problems or misunderstandings can be resolved, more often than not common sense and good will can form the basis of co-operation and partnership that will remove the obstacles toward accord and mutual trust.

Even with the difficult economic circumstances we face today, I believe it is possible for the work place partners to give a high priority to matters concerned with the reconciliation of work and family responsibilities. The progressive initiatives that have been implemented and perpetuated by far-sighted companies in the collaboration with responsible unions mirrors a more flexible and considerate perspective.

Recent research confirms these observations. It has been demonstrated that employers who offer family-responsive benefits to their employees find these benefits to be effective ways of recruiting and keeping competent workers. These factors also have been found to weigh heavily against stress and absenteeism in the work place. Improved morale has resulted and the over-all efficiency of the worker has also been enhanced in the process.

I believe hon. members are aware that the federal government continues to act as a catalyst, moving employers and employees closer together in the pursuit of solutions to work place and family questions. We know that an unhappy work force is less productive, less motivated and less lucky to make adjustments to the rapid technological changes taking place in the new world economic order.

All governments must continue to play a significant part in promoting partnership between employer and employee. We must encourage the expression of good will and common sense as we establish a more altruistic and amicable atmosphere, one within which we can make substantial progress in improving the lot of the worker while also addressing the viability of our economy.

Under the circumstances, in addition to the fact that the motion excludes fathers, step-parents and guardians, I am not prepared to support it at this time because there are already substantial innovations being undertaken to deal with work and family responsibilities. These initiatives are proceeding in an ongoing and effective manner.

The thought is good but I believe, as I have said earlier, we are addressing those issues on an ongoing basis and for that reason, I do not feel that I can support the motion.

• (1750)

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I also want to respond to Motion M-72 proposed by my colleague across the way. I know he introduced this motion and put it in the hopper, as he said, a good long time ago because of his great interest in this very important area.

It proposes that the government, as he said earlier, should introduce legislation to enable mothers with terminally ill children to take leave from their employment to care for the children.

Previous speakers have indicated how responsive they are, and I think my hon. friend from Winnipeg knows that this government's response has been changing to the needs of the work force. As well, ample documentation was provided as to the manner in which companies and employees are collaborating to arrive at harmonious decisions affecting the reconciliation of work and family responsibilities. Certainly all are to be lauded for the amount of work that is going on in collective agreements and in co-operation between employer and employees.

I am sure all members realize that balancing work and family is increasingly recognized as being critical to the Canadian economy and to the achievement of equality for women especially. Employers and labour organizations acknowledge the need to adapt the work place to meet the changing needs of our work force. We also know that in the current economic circumstances, employers are looking for cost-effective ways in which to enhance the balance between work and family responsibilities and I know this is of great concern to my hon. friend.

A wide variety of practical strategies have been already implemented at little cost to reduce the stress associated with competing work and family priorities for workers, while at the same time meeting the employer's operational objectives.

The government is working toward ratification by Canada of the International Labour Organization Convention No. 156 on equal opportunities and equal treatment of workers with family responsibilities, hopefully to coincide with the celebration of the United Nations International Year of the Family in 1994.

The provinces are presently looking at the provisions of the convention. Taking this step would be an opportunity for Canada to communicate world-wide its commitment to meeting the needs of workers and family responsibilities. I know my hon. friend who proposed this motion has been following this UN convention with interest.

The convention recognizes that change in the traditional role of men as well as women in society and in the family has to be recognized if there is to be full equality between men and women. It further states that the problems of workers with family responsibilities are aspects of wider issues regarding the family and society and are matters which should be taken into account in national policies.

Article 6 of the convention states that competent authorities in every country should take appropriate measures to promote information and education which engender broader public understanding of the principle of equality of opportunity and the treatment for men and women workers, including workers with family responsibilities.

I do not intend to go through the entire convention with hon. members, but there are provisions in this document which are important to the matter at hand. For instance, Article 9 recognizes that there are many important ways to achieve equal opportunities and treatment for workers with family responsibilities, be they men or women. These include, among others, collective agreements, work rules and appropriate practices.

We all should realize that the principal parties in any venture are best equipped to recognize their own requirements and then take the necessary steps to attain their goals. We know there is a growing sense of partnership between labour and management when it comes to the manner of work and family responsibilities.

We have heard about companies that have exercised initiative without recourse to legislation. This kind of action augers well for increasing collaboration between the stakeholders in this regard.

It is clear that Canada already has a progressive framework of legislation and practices in place with respect to the treatment and benefits accorded its workers. However, we in the government are determined to maintain our vigilance over matters related to labour standards and will amend and upgrade them as necessary in order to make them mirror the realities of the time.

As our employers and employees make adjustments to a restructured global economy and the increasingly competitive international marketplace, it is incumbent upon governments at all levels to respond if and when our existing regulations are inadequate.

The federal government will continue to monitor the whole world of work, but we will only step in with legal measures when it becomes absolutely necessary. In the meantime, it is prudent to allow market forces, coupled with a spirit of co-operation, to dictate the course of future arrangements in this very important area.

Under the circumstances I am sure hon. members will agree that the motion before us is certainly well-intended. As the hon. member from Winnipeg has indicated, he put this motion forward, I believe he said, back in 1989 for the first time. He indicated in committee that he might have approached it slightly differently and, as he mentioned in his speech, he would have included men as well as women in his redrafting. Certainly this bill is well-intended.

One of the members of the Conservative Party mentioned earlier that a new mother would have a lot of interest in the government taking heed, if not of passing the motion. Certainly it would be an indication to the government to take heed of this very important debate and this very important initiative that has been brought forward. Even though there are a number of non-legislative initiatives being implemented, they have to be implemented successfully and we have to see some results.

It is incumbent upon all of us to make these work and it is incumbent upon us to take special note of the motion put forward by our hon. friend from across the way and reflect upon it. As he has said, it is not legislation, it is proposed as a motion to have the government work toward legislation. If it does not reach that stage it certainly brings it to the attention of the House and all our constituents across the country who are listening that this is an important area of parental concern that we as a government and all members of the House should be concerned about, take heed of and watch as non-legislative approaches come forward. We hope that this will be successful and conclude in what the hon. member had in mind when he put forward this motion for the government to introduce legislation.

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, on March 17, 1992, I again raised in this House the issue of the Court Challenges Program, which as we know was abolished by the government in February. Many Canadians think this program is essential and I believe that it should be restored or reinstated. I asked the minister why, at a time when we are rethinking our constitutional future, the government abolished this program which is considered essential and as we know gave legal recourse to women, native people, racial minorities, linguistic and ethnic groups, who are very well aware that it is illusory to give them rights if these rights are not correctly interpreted by the courts. Why could the minister not give the cabinet convincing arguments so that all Canadians, whatever their means, rights and privileges, can defend themselves in court?

My party and I take this issue very seriously. April 1 was an opposition day and it was completely devoted to the Court Challenges Program. As you will recall, Mr. Speaker, I think that we proved beyond any doubt that the Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship and his colleagues who spoke in that debate did not have very strong or convincing arguments.

The body of precedents is far from complete, even though the minister said that there were 300 cases and that they now had a body of jurisprudence. He also told me that it was time for others—I will quote page 8362 of Hansard of March 17:

> Whether a program must go on forever should be determined now either by other jurisdictions which have a responsibility, or by the private sector, if there is such an interest.

These causes were essential for Canadians to obtain a clear and precise interpretation of their rights regarding education and equality. I cannot imagine a more important issue, at a time of constitutional reform, than to give all Canadians, regardless of their revenue, the right to appear before a court.

The Conservative government has raised the issue of the cost of that program, which totals $2.7 million per year. This amount represents less than 10 cents per Canadian per year for a program that gave each and every one the possibility to go before the courts and defend their rights. This program was but a drop in the federal budget of some $160 billion.

I find it hard to see how the Conservative government was able to find $15 million to increase the budget of the legal services in the Department of Justice, that is $15 million for litigations, but could not find $2 million for the Court Challenges Program, which helped Canadians to protect their rights.

Numerous people wrote letters—I have received a great many and so has the government—including experts such as former judges from the Supreme Court, to say that this program was very useful. We also received many petitions. To this day, more than 5,500 petitioners have asked Parliament to restore this program.

This was not an expensive program but it was valuable. I will end with a quote from Mrs. Rolande Soucie, the vice-president of the Fédération des communautés francophones et acadienne du Canada, and a former researcher here at the Library of Parliament. She said, regarding official languages: "The government sends a very ambiguous message. On the one hand, it is proud of the linguistic duality and it makes a big thing of it, especially at the international level, but it is not ready to support the individuals and groups that want to have their rights enshrined in the charter."

Once again I ask the government, on behalf of all the citizens that care about Canadian rights and liberties, to recognize its mistake and to restore as soon as possible the Court Challenges Program.

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and to Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, I have the dreadful task of answering to my hon. colleague who always puts his heart in what he does. As spokesperson for the government, I want to remind him that it is true that our nation is in the midst of constitutional debate—discussions that will indeed affect the future of Canada, but never the commitment to the basic rights and fundamental freedoms that our citizens share as Canadians.

I am referring, of course, to a topic raised yet again; this government's decision to abolish federal funding of the Court Challenges Program. Our critics claim that, through this action, we are abandoning the 1982 Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. This is clearly not so. Rather, the charter remains a living document that will continue to be strengthened in our daily lives. However, in this period of fiscal restraint the government has to limit its expenditures.

The issues surrounding the equality and rights of disadvantaged and minority groups are shared by all of us. Canadians must do their part to join us in supporting our charter. This government is asking the leaders of the provinces, and of the private sector, to share the responsibility of enforcing our rights and freedoms within their own sphere of influence. Surely this is not too much to request of the very people who speak so strongly for those rights.

I reiterate for hon. members that we shall continue to pursue the fundamental values of Canadian citizenship that bear a direct impact on our daily lives: equality and participation.

In conclusion, the court challenges decision was a difficult one. We now ask our provincial colleagues and the private sector to work together with us in furthering our national human rights goals.

YOUTH EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, when I rose in this House on April 28, I asked the Prime Minister why his government has cut 40,000 jobs from the Summer Employment Experience Development program since 1985.

The minister of youth gave the expected response. He told the House the budget for the SEED program was increased last year and has been increased again this year. That is a very clever answer but it is misleading. Since 1985, this government has cut $72 million from SEED's budgets. When one removes the $6 million that has been added over the past two years, there is a cumulative cut of $66 million. The government's increases are cosmetic and do not even begin to make up for the devastation caused by those earlier cuts.

The facts prove this. In 1990 when the total SEED budget was $77 million, the number of jobs created through SEED was 54,000. In 1991 with a budget increase of $3 million, the number of jobs created actually fell to 53,800. The reason for this drop is simple. While there are private companies and organizations in our communities that are willing to hire young people for the summer, they are unable to do so without the support of government. This government is robbing young people of the opportunity to work and is denying access to firms and organizations that are willing to tap into a dynamic and ambitious work force.

The statistics illustrate the cold hard truth. Without government help there will be no jobs for young people in this economy. While the general population struggles with an unemployment rate of 11 per cent, the rate for Canadians between the ages of 15 and 24 is 16.8 per cent. This is because young people are usually the first to be laid off in a recession and they are the last to be hired when the economy begins to recover.

For example, of the 32,000 full-time jobs that the Canadian economy lost in February 1992, 22,000 were held by young people. However, the worst effect of a youth unemployment rate of 16.8 per cent is that many young Canadians are being robbed of their future. I am speaking of those post-secondary education students who must work in order to pay their tuition fees, their living expenses and other costs. Because tuition fees have skyrocketed since 1985, it is critical for an increasing number of students to find work during the summer.

Between 1985 and 1991, tuition fees increased 45.5 per cent in Ontario and 145 per cent in the province of Quebec. If these students do not find work this summer, tens of thousands of them will be squeezed out of the system, unable to pay for their tuition or to support themselves. This happens at a time when the government is speaking about a prosperity agenda and global competitiveness, but the fact is I do not think that this government understands what it means to be competitive in a global market. Given the urgency of the situation, I call on the government to take action immediately. I call on it to increase its commitment to the SEED program and create badly needed employment for Canada's youth.

Today is an extreme situation and it requires immediate measures. As a nation we cannot afford to have a generation of citizens who have given up on their future. We must not discard young Canadians who are badly in need of employment simply because they do not fit into rigid economic policies.

Anyone who doubts the urgency of this problem need look no further than this Sunday's Toronto Star edition which paints a very depressing portrait of the dire straits in which so many young Canadians now find themselves. I hope the government will understand that the future of these young people is a worth–while investment.

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, in response to a question asked by the hon. member for York North, I am pleased to discuss, on behalf of the Minister of State for Youth, the government's summer programming as it concerns Canada's youth.

This government is committed to assisting Canadian youth find employment. In this regard, a number of summer programs have been developed over the years to prepare Canadian youth for the challenges of the future. These programs are mostly funded under the Challenge '92 program whose allocation this year was set at $110 million.

The member is obviously interested in the SEED component of the challenge program which subsidizes summer jobs for canadian students. The SEED (summer employment experience development) component of challenge '92 was increased by $3 million this summer to ensure that our commitment to youth was maintained. This means that this summer some 55,000 jobs will be created fo youth.

For the past two years, Ontario has distributed the SEED funds based on two factors: student population and communities experiencing unemployment rates greater than the provincial average. This concentrated funds in Northern Ontario, Windsor and the Niagara peninsula. This was and still is an acceptable way of doing business because it recognizes that other areas are more able to create sufficient job opportunities without assistance.

This year, however, every area in the province is experiencing higher than average unemployment rates. It was therefore decided that a more even distribution of funds would be needed. This means that some areas in Ontario will actually receive less SEED funds this year than last. However funds under START and the Canadian Jobs Strategy allocated in these areas will offset the reductions in seed funding.

Finally, the member should remember that there are other summer programs like the Business Loans Program which will receive some $900,000 this summer. There is also the Business Drive for Jobs which will receive $800,000, the Native Internship Program and the Canada Employment Centres for Students which will receive $12 million in funding.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, in late February of this year I raised a question in this House with the Minister of Employment and Immigration concerning the situation of two women living in the Yukon Territory, Andrea Underwood and Anna Carrott.

Andrea Underwood, a Canadian citizen, has been living with her partner Anna Carrott in a committed and loving relationship for some eight years together with Anna's children. This couple run a lodge in the Yukon, the Morley Lodge.

I asked the minister at that time to recognize the fundamental inhumanity of the policies of the immigration department which denied any status whatsoever to this and similar relationships. I urged the minister to extend Anna's visa while this case is being considered by the Federal Court.

I am very pleased that the minister did, in fact, agree to extend the visa in these circumstances. I want to take this opportunity to again draw to the attention of the House the fundamental cruelty and immorality of a policy which states that Canadians, men and women who are involved in committed loving relationships with non–Canadian citizens of the same sex, are denied any recognition whatsoever of those relationships in Canadian immigration law. In the eyes of the law that relationship does not exist. It is invisible.

In a number of other countries including Australia, New Zealand, The Netherlands and Scandinavian countries, there are policies in place recognizing that same sex relationships should be recognized for purposes of immigration law.

Indeed, a task force of a number of individuals, a number of prominent citizens of British Columbia, chaired by Professor Douglas Sanders of the University of British Columbia, is looking into the whole question of the implications of the current discriminatory policies affecting the lesbian and gay community in Canada.

The government itself is studying these policies. It has been studying them for some three years. I received a letter from the Secretary of State for External Affairs back in 1989 in which she stated that she had asked her officials to look into the policies and consider the possibility on compassionate humanitarian grounds.

I have another letter from the current Minister of Employment and Immigration stating that this is being studied. But surely the time for study has ended. If the Charter of Rights and Freedoms is to mean anything, then there must be full equality.

On March 4, 1986 the federal government, this Conservative government announced that there would be an end to discrimination based on sexual orientation in all areas of federal jurisdiction. That must include immigration as well.

I want to pay tribute to the two women in the Yukon who have the courage to publicly challenge these policies, as well as to Christine Morrissey and her life companion of 14 years, Bridget Coll, who have challenged these policies similarly in the Federal Court.

As Ms. Morrissey said: "I feel as a Canadian I ought to have the same rights as any other Canadian to sponsor the person with whom I have chosen to share my life. We are not claiming any special rights for same sex couples but asking for the same consideration from the immigration department to be able to live in Canada with the life companion of our choice as any Canadian sponsoring a member of their family is given".

Christine Morrissey's 76–year old mother added: "I cannot understand why Christine is not allowed to sponsor Bridget for immigration".

I hope that the government will reconsider these policies. Unfortunately, the Court Challenges Program which was funding the challenge to this discriminatory area of the law has been eliminated. I hope that the funds will be there for Christine and Bridget and for the others who challenge these policies.

Again, I call upon the government to recognize there must be an end to discrimination in this area. It is time that this government recognized that lesbians and gay men are equal citizens in this country and entitled to be treated with equality, dignity and respect.

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, I welcome the opportunity to further discuss the matters raised by my hon. colleague, the member for Burnaby—Kingsway.

It is not possible to sponsor a same sex spouse under the Immigration Act. Such a relationship does not meet the current definition of spouse under the family class regulations. Given that this issue is now before the Federal Court, it would be inappropriate to use this House as a means to influence or interfere with this legal process.

I will take this opportunity, even if the member for Burnaby—Kingsway did not mention it earlier, to address another aspect of the question he submitted to the hon. Minister of Employment and Immigration on February 25 concerning the case of Mr. Abo Shandi. The Solicitor General and the minister signed a security certificate because of the seriousness of this case. I would also like to point out to the hon. member that the Federal Court found that this certificate was reasonable. This action to exclude terrorists and subversives from Canada clearly states this government's view that Canada will not be a safe haven for persons with active terrorist or subversive backgrounds who constitute a menace for Canada.

CANADA 125 CORPORATION

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, on March 17 I asked the Secretary of State why in this year's budget the Canada 125 Corporation was allocated another $30 million, an outrageous 150 per cent funding increase, while many essential programs are being cut and cancelled.

Over the last two years, the Canada 125 Corporation has been allocated a total of $50 million of taxpayers' money. By contrast the Secretary of State has only $2 million for local community celebrations of Canada's 125th birthday.

Canadians will be astounded to know that this private non-profit corporation, whose three legal directors are Tories, is not subject to the same disclosure rules as government departments. Where is this government's accountability to the citizens of this country? Why would Canadians believe that the $50 million of public money is well managed when we hear of the waste and mismanagement by Canada 125 Corporation? A $1 million direct mail campaign brought only .001 per cent response. Also, $4.2 million was wasted on ambiguous TV ads which stirred up interest but gave no toll-free number for viewers to call. English pamphlets were distributed through direct mail when the French version could only be obtained by purchasing a newspaper. Over $71,000 went to two countries for the development of two different logos for the Canada 125 Corporation.

Is this efficient private sector management? Surely Secretary of State Department would have done it better and for a much lower cost.

The Canada 125 Corporation's mandate is to act as a catalyst for private sector initiatives, institutional projects and individual participation of Canadians from all walks of life. Yet none of the $50 million allocated to Canada 125 Corporation goes to direct funding for local community celebrations.

Local communities apply to the Department of Secretary of State which only has $2 million to fund about 1,700 projects for Canada. Remember this is half of the money wasted on TV ads. To celebrate this year, the demand has greatly increased while funds are the same through Secretary of State.

In its last budget, this government abandoned Canadians who are most in need. The indefinite postponement of both the Canadian Race Relations Foundation and the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute, the abolishment of the Court Challenges Program, the elimination of co-op housing, a $100 million cut from job training programs, all these hurt the people who are most disadvantaged. Surely these programs are more important than pre-election pizzazz by corporate Canada.

We have a glorious country. Canada 125 celebrations are needed to lift our collective spirits and bring our country together. Canadians want our celebration to be fun and meaningful, involving people from all walks of life who come together to celebrate the joy of being Canadian and to celebrate our achievements and our common values.

Canadians want a government that is accountable and honest. Allocating $50 million of taxpayers' money for the Canada 125 Corporation with no public accountability, coupled with poor management, is a disgrace.

Instead of funding Canada 125 Corporation, this government should have increased funding through Secretary of State for community groups to hold genuine celebrations. Canadians deserve better.

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and to Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to set the record straight about the partnership between the Government of Canada and the Canada 125 Corporation.

Last year, eminent and nationally recognized Canadians like Frank King, Iona Campagnolo —not Conservatives —Claude Dupras, Alex Colville, Mel Cooper, Paul Desmarais and Angus Reid came together in a spirit of public-mindedness to organize and coordinate a meaningful celebration of our great country's 125th anniversary.

The corporation has forged a strong and dynamic partnership across the breadth of Canada. Imperial Oil, Manu Life, Canadian Tire, Greyhound, Canada Dry and many others have joined with thousands of community volunteers to mount the celebration of our generation.

For example, Participaction, with the kind sponsorship of Imperial Oil, has animated over 10,000 local events, making this anniversary a most special one.

The hon. member charges that this sum is a waste, but she should ask Montrealers how wonderful it was this weekend. I must say I was there. I would remind her that, in 1967, the Centennial Commission spent far more than this amount.

The philosophy of this government has been to build partnerships, not to impose solutions. Her party traditionally favours impositions and state intervention.

We on this side uphold what Canadians in 1989 resoundingly said—our celebration of Canada 125 must be a partnership and not a made-in-Ottawa event.

For far too long, Canadians have been somewhat reluctant to express their pride in Canada. Our approach to Canada 125 fosters the pride which is in each one of us.

For every four dollars spent by the Canadian goverment, the private and voluntary sectors are spending five.

On this side, we see this as a success. On their side, the hon. member's colleagues see any positive returns as a failure. What can we do.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

PERLEY RIDEAU VETERANS HEALTH CENTRE

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the announcement by the Minister of Veterans Affairs that veterans now living at the Rideau Veterans Home in Ottawa will be moving into new premises late next year.

The Rideau Veterans Home has been of great service to veterans in the national capital area but as can be expected of a facility built at the end of the Second World War, it is past its best.

Our government has been going all out to reach agreement with the provinces and increase the number of beds available to veterans across the country.

Last Thursday's announcement is another step in the right direction. The agreement with the province of Ontario means veterans will have access to 250 beds in the Perley Rideau Veterans Health Centre.

THAILAND

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, during the past several days the world and Canadians have watched in horror as unarmed demonstrators in Thailand have been shot down in cold blood by the Thai military.

In February last year the democratically elected government in Thailand was overthrown. A new undemocratic constitution came into force. In March of this year the elections which took place resulted in the appointment of the chief of the armed forces as prime minister of Thailand.

Shortly before those elections the very respected opposition party leader Chamlong Srimuang stated that going against the will of the people could cause them to resist and this will turn into an uprising. The soldiers must understand if they do this they will have confrontation.

As a Canadian I have to ask: Where was our government? Why has our government increased the level of bilateral aid, direct government to government aid from Canada to Thailand? Why have we not announced an arms embargo on Thailand? Why is it that the Canadian foreign minister has said that Canada supports the movement toward increased democratization of Thailand?

THE DISABLED

Mr. Allan Koury (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to express my support for Bill C-78, the omnibus bill tabled by the minister responsible for the status of the disabled. I would be very pleased to see the provisions of this bill implemented, since this legislation is one more step toward eliminating the barriers that prevent the disabled from becoming full-fledged members of our society.

The bill, and related policies and regulations were prepared in consultation with the disabled. With the Secretary of State and many of those who worked on this bill, I am convinced that the proposed amendments will enhance the well-being of 3.3 million disabled Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, this omnibus bill is tangible proof that the Government of Canada intends to pursue its policies for the the disabled, with their co-operation.

SAFE GRAD PROGRAMS

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, graduation time is upon us and I would like to take this opportunity to commend the laudable actions of many students across Canada for their participation in the Safe Grad program.

This year, students throughout the country, including Manitoba, will once again take part in the Safe Grad programs. Safe Grad combines students' graduation celebrations with realistic measures to prevent accidents and other problems which could be associated with drinking and driving.

The aim of the program is to enable graduates to have their graduation parties but to ensure others look after their transportation afterward. Safe Grad is a student run program with much assistance from parents, teachers and police too. Safe Grad is geared toward the needs and wishes of individual schools and their students.

I am most impressed with the students of our country and their support of Safe Grad. I would like to take this opportunity to commend them for their actions.

On behalf of this House and my colleagues I wish all students a happy and safe graduation.

BRITISH COLUMBIA PHYSICIANS

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): The medical profession in my home province of British Columbia is being blind-sided by two pieces of provincial legislation brought down by the NDP government. Bills C-13 and C-14 attempt to cap the earnings of and eliminate the pension contributions for physicians in B.C.

This unilateral action by the government threatens to limit the access of British Columbians to quality health care, alienates the medical profession, creates longer waiting lists and forces doctors out of B.C.

It is obviously unjust to require specialists such as a radiologist who purchases high tech, high-priced equipment for one's practice to come under the same earning limits as the low overhead physician.

The province has not consulted with the BCMA and refuses to negotiate a more equitable settlement even now. This unilateral action jeopardizes the historically co-operative relationship between the medical profession and the government.

I call on the federal government to take whatever action is necessary under the Canada Health Act to force the B.C. government to resume meaningful negotiations with the doctors of British Columbia.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, on April 23, I wrote to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans urging the federal government to maintain the Department of Fisheries and Oceans' laboratory in Charlottetown in its current state.

I am disappointed that the minister continues to hold fast to the plan to phase out the bacteriological portion of the Charlottetown facility.

Producers have relied upon regular monitoring of shellfish to ensure that the environmental conditions have not adversely affected their product. According to some industry members, the proposed change could make some operators less inclined to monitor their products as strictly.

The reduced testing could jeopardize the industry if a bad lot makes it through the system. In addition, this type of testing demands stringent and complex handling procedures. One mishandled sample could cost a producer thousands of dollars in lost product.

Therefore, I renew my call to maintain the DFO lab in Charlottetown in its present state.

"ACTIVE LIVING" PROJECT

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, on May 1 this year, it was my privilege to attend the launching of a national Active Living pilot project in Dieppe, New Brunswick. Active Living is a new philosophy of life which stresses the integration of all kinds of physical activity into our daily lives.

The pilot project in Dieppe is one of five projects across Canada being used to test this new concept. The federal government is pleased to have been able to contribute to this initiative, especially since the municipality is celebrating its 40th anniversary this year. Since Canada is celebrating its 125th birthday, we have another reason to applaud this stimulating and laudable initiative.

On behalf of the Minister of State for Youth and on my own behalf as well, I encourage members of this House to emulate the positive approach to Active Living shown in Dieppe today in their own communities.

AJIT SINGH BAINS

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, on April 3, prominent human rights activist, Ajit Singh Bains, a retired judge and current chairperson of the Punjab Human Rights Organization, was arrested in India.

To the surprise of his relatives living in metro Toronto, the 71-year old justice has been thrown in prison and denied the right to a full and legitimate trial under the rule of law.

In addition, more than 300 police personnel took over his residence and, without any warrants, entered and confiscated documents relating to the human rights organization he heads.

The manner in which Justice Bains was arrested, the forced entry into his home, and the lack of any due legal process has evoked condemnation around the world.

I urge our government to voice Canada's strongest disapproval of the violation of Mr. Bains' fundamental human rights. I urge our Secretary of State for External Affairs to communicate this dissatisfaction immediately in the most forceful and concise terms to her counterpart in the Indian government.

CANADA–U.S. FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, a few minutes ago, the Prime Minister and the President of the United States held a news conference in Washington. The Prime Minister has travelled to the U.S. to deal first-hand wi th some of the trade irritants which have arisen out of the latest round of American protectionism.

Right now, a lot of Canadians are wondering about the future of free trade, given the disputes over softwood lumber, Honda cars, and so on. So it was reassuring to hear President Bush a few moments ago say that since the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement was signed in 1988, the trade between the two countries has grown by over $30 billion. That is thirty thousand million dollars of additional trade since free trade and that translates into more jobs on both sides of the border. Those are the facts.

The economic recession which has bedevilled both countries would likely have been a lot deeper if it had not been for those $30 billion.

• (1410)

Of course problems remain. The trade deal can be improved. Americans' attitudes can be improved. If there is one person who can do it, he is in Washington today.

MACMILLAN BLOEDEL

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak of a grave situation that has arisen in my riding, one that could affect elected representatives across this country.

MacMillan Bloedel, the forestry megacompany with a virtual stranglehold on my home province of B.C., has launched a lawsuit against the elected local representatives of Galiano Island, among others.

These island trustees, in fulfilling their responsibilities toward their electorate, passed a ruling on land use that MacMillan Bloedel did not like. It was simply that: MacMillan Bloedel did not like it. Hence, it is suing the island's trustees personally.

I trust even my colleagues in this House who condone the appalling rapid destruction of the remaining old growth forests in Canada would agree that this is an unacceptable price to pay while fulfilling one's role as an elected representative.

I plan to do everything in my power to ensure that Canadians hear and understand the ramifications of this suit, an American invention called the Strategic Lawsuit Against Public Participation, or SLAPP. With this kind of threat, megacompanies could ensure that no elected representatives feel free to do the job they were elected to do, namely, representing the voters who elected them who have the unassailable right to do local planning and decision-making.

This is a threat to the very basis of our democratic system. It is a threat I hope the members of this House and all elected representatives in Canada will resist to the utmost of their ability.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs has warned that the silence of concerned Canadians could threaten our future.

That future affects us all, but it belongs to the youth and I find it encouraging to know that there are young people in Canada who are not going to sit back silently and allow the forces of negativism to destroy their nation.

The city of Red Deer has more French immersion students per capita than any other English-speaking city in Canada. Last week, 33 of these students from Central School in Red Deer were here in Ottawa. They were en route home following a visit to Cap de la Madeleine where they delivered a message of national unity to the mayor and people of Red Deer's twin city in Quebec.

We met briefly with the Prime Minister where they were able to share the same message they had taken to the mayor of Cap de la Madeleine. Their message was straightforward. They want their country united and their Canada includes Quebec.

I commend these students and their teachers. We have some serious constitutional challenges, but we will succeed because of people like them and the fact that they are willing to take a stand.

DEMOCRACY IN HAITI

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, on the night of September 29, 1991, the army in Haiti staged a bloody coup d'état, ending the democratic process begun with the election of Father Jean-Bertrand Aristide.

Since then, the Haitian nation has lived in terror. On February 23, 1992, a memorandum of agreement was signed by President Aristide and the Speakers of the two Houses of the Haitian Parliament. Unfortunately, because the army controls the government now in place, the agreement was never discussed in that Parliament.

I believe that it is important for the Canadian government to demand the restoration of the constitutional system and to encourage democratic countries to respect the OAS embargo.

TAXATION

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, Canadian business is suffering from excessive government regulations that are costly and burdensome for management and undermine our global competitiveness.

This was a message of a recent survey completed by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce. In a letter to the Prime Minister, the chamber stated that its members believed they were being tramped on by our regulatory processes which are driving up the costs of conducting business in Canada.

Three out of ten responses indicated they had experienced negative effects from the lack of harmonization or duplication of regulations. Thirty per cent of respondents said they had run into duplication in payments to governments. The most frequently sighted overlap was in the tax system. Clearly the lunacy of maintaining two separate sales tax systems creates a heavy compliance burden as does the frequent conflict between federal and provincial regulations.

The message is clear. Governments at both the federal and provincial levels have to put aside entrenched considerations and work toward creating an environment that will foster, not hinder, economic growth in this country.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, negotiations on the international treaty to slow down the loss of plant and animal species have been gutted by the United States this week.

Biologists have warned that unless international action is taken to curb the destruction of species and their habitat, a mass extinction will occur over the next few decades.

Despite the awesome warnings of the best informed scientists on earth, the Bush administration believes that protecting wild plants and animals would interfere with the profits of private companies involved in the manipulation and patenting of life forms.

There should no longer be any illusions about the role of politically powerful vested interests in relation to the key conventions for the earth summit. They are hell-bent on destroying international consensus and co-operation. They stand for profits ahead of survival, for business as usual ahead of sustainable development, for their imperial control over the planet's living resources.

This is a call to all thinking people to get involved and pay attention to the earth summit. Twenty thousand species will become extinct this year. If we fail on biodiversity we will soon be one of the listed statistics of extinction.

Canada has been silent on the attempted U.S. murder of the biodiversity convention and for this we stand shamed before the world.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

WESTRAY COAL MINE

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

The Westray coal mine was made possible and was only possible because of the $85 million in federal loan guarantees and over $8 million in interest buy-downs. It also received close to $700,000 in research and development moneys from supply and services.

I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will provide the House of Commons and thereby the general public copies of the agreements which have been consummated between the Government of Canada and Mr. Frame as well as the memorandum of understanding signed by the Government of Canada and the Minister of Supply and Services.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, if I may I would like to express my condolences regarding this terrible accident. I would, with the hon. member having just posed the question, extend my deep thanks to the draggermen from Devco. There were six teams from the hon. member's riding who were there to help, together with very brave draggermen from Westray as well who did all they could to help mitigate the severity of this terrible tragedy.

As to his question, the hon. member is right. The federal government provided assistance, principally in the form of a loan guarantee of 85 per cent of the $100 million term loan connected with this project.

That was the federal government's involvement. What we will do, of course, is bring forward all the appropriate information as soon as possible, and this we are preparing. There are thousands of pages of documents relevant to this question. The government is preparing those and will bring them forward shortly.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. minister for his kind comments with regard to those draggermen who worked to try to expedite, if you will, a rescue.

But I want to say to the minister, through you, Mr. Speaker, that more than a week ago I had written a letter to the government House leader requesting co-operation with regard to securing and obtaining the necessary documents which would shed light on this particular incident.

I ask the minister again if he is prepared today to table in this House copies of an agreement which provided a contractor the amount of $85 million in loan guarantees, interest buy-downs in excess of $8 million, research and development moneys in excess of $700,000. Will he provide those documents, those agreements, and that memorandum of understanding?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the hon. member knows this, but there are, I think, three or four requests now under access to information for information of that sort. We are readying those documents to comply with that request.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, this is the House of Commons. This is where the government is accountable for the expenditures that it makes on behalf of the people of Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dingwall: I want to remind the House that a senior member of this House, a senior minister, said the following: "A member of Parliament I submit has a right and a duty to pursue investigations and ask questions on behalf of his constituents and the general public and any interference or obstructions in this respect must be undertaken very carefully and supported by citations and precedents of the greatest weight and substance".

• (1420)

This statement was made by the hon. member for Central Nova, the Minister of Public Works.

I ask the minister again, will he now table in the House of Commons the agreement which was consummated with Mr. Frame as well as the copy of the memorandum of understanding?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, among the documents which are being brought forward there are thousands of pages and many hours of cataloguing to be done. We hope to get this out as soon as possible.

In there is included, of course, the agreement between the Bank of Nova Scotia, Mr. Frame of the Westray mine. Under this loan, the Bank of Nova Scotia was guaranteed 85 per cent by the federal government. As a result of that we had to comply, as would be expected, with the regime put in place by the Government of Nova Scotia for safety and for health in the mine. The loan by the Bank of Nova Scotia could not flow unless there was that compliance. We could not put our guarantee in place unless there was compliance with the health and safety requirements of the two departments which were going to administer it for the Government of Nova Scotia.

That particular reality was there. We are very pleased that these documents are coming together very quickly. I hope that we will be able to get them before the public shortly.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister.

When Suncor, the previous owner of the leases, decided in 1987 that it wanted to sell these leases and sell them in a hurry, it was not only Curragh Resources that was interested. Esso Resources was also interested. In fact, it did not want millions of dollars as Curragh did. It just wanted six months to be able to study the whole project, the geography and the topography involved.

Other than the fact that there was an election coming up, why would the government not wait to allow Esso Resources to complete its study? Why was the government in such a hurry before it gave millions of dollars to Curragh Resources?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, in fact this is quite a myth. The over-all project took over three years to put together and to hammer out. There are thousands of pages of contractual agreements that had to be put in place between the principals, the banks and the various governments and also to make sure that all health and safety requirements were complied with.

Three years is not rushing a project into completion. It was quite a lengthy process.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, it seems the government had plenty of time to read the reports of the Bank of Montreal, the lawyers and the consultants involved but it did not take any time to read the reports of Suncor and Esso Resources.

Why did the government not read these reports? If it did read these reports, surely it must have seen the dangers involved. Will the government admit that it did not adhere to these reports and will it make these reports public?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend knows a judicial inquiry has been established. Nova Scotia will inquire into those matters.

Let me respond from the federal government's point of view. The particular studies done by various groups which have looked at this are well known to our government. The concerns we had originally with Westray were basically business and economic. Originally the safety concerns had to be answered through the province putting in place a very strict regime. It is that regime which is going to be inquired into by the judicial inquiry. That regime was the responsibility of the province. In fact, that regime was being complied with regularly in all its particulars by the mine and confirmed by the Bank of Nova Scotia which regularly monitored it month by month through independent mining consultants.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister and is on the same subject.

It is clear that there were a number of studies done on the Westray mine site to which the federal government was privy. One of those studies, for example, states and I quote: "As a result of such difficulties it seems"—referring to the Westray mine site—"have given off large volumes of gas and proven extremely liable to spontaneous combustion".

I understand that the government's role was, as the minister has just said, in one sense economic and business, but surely the federal government also has a role when it sees these reports to make some response to this and perhaps to receive some assurances from the company that these safety concerns will be addressed before loan guarantees are given.

Can the minister, given the concerns raised in these reports, tell the House what actions were asked of the company regarding these safety concerns before loan guarantees were agreed to?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is rightly pointing out where the regulatory authority lay in this particular case, which was the province. She is asking whether we received assurances that the mine was complying with the regulatory regime put in place by the province.

We did better than that. In fact, the Bank of Nova Scotia would not give the loan unless it assured itself in every particular, with certifications at each step, that the safety regime was being complied with in its entirety. Otherwise its $100 million would be at risk. We, guaranteeing 85 per cent of that loan, also undertook the same due diligence to make sure that in every particular we had certification that the health and safety requirements as laid down by the province of Nova Scotia were being followed.

All of this was done, was followed, and we still had the tragedy. I have to remind my hon. friend, the leader of the NDP, of what Gerry Finfinger, head of Research and Ground and Methane Controls at the U.S. Bureau of Mines said: "In general we should be able to produce coal from an underground coal seam, no matter how gassy the coal seam is, without an explosion. It is very doable and it is done around the world every day. Part of the hazards of so many mines around the world is methane".

That is why there is a strict regime put in place. Unfortunately, in this case something happened, but it was not a failure on the part of the federal government or the Bank of Nova Scotia to comply with the regulations.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary. I would like to say to the minister that no one is accusing anyone of anything. I am simply asking the minister if he can assure this House and, therefore, table with this House how exactly the federal government, not the Bank of Nova Scotia, ensured that the safety concerns would be addressed. The minister has said he was assured of it. I am simply asking that he table with this House how his government arrived at those conclusions and on the basis of what information and will he table that information and how those conclusions were arrived at?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, it is very important that all the relevant information be put before this House and be made public. That is what the government is assembling, cataloguing, cross referencing so members can understand it and get the answers to the questions they are asking.

In this particular instance, the nature of the contract will be in the public domain. She will be able to see what the contract says. The monthly compliance with the regulations was not only adhered to but certified by the independent mining engineers on behalf of the Bank of Nova Scotia. That too, I am sure, will be made available.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): A final supplementary. As the minister mentioned, the Government of Nova Scotia is going to hold a full inquiry into this disaster. I would like to ask the minister if, on behalf of his government, he is prepared to give assurances in this House that his government will fully co-operate with that inquiry if asked, allow witnesses to be there, if asked, and to table all of the documents with that inquiry if asked. Is the federal government, in other words, prepared to be open with this House and also act as a full participant when requested in the inquiry in Nova Scotia so that everyone can know the full facts and have the full benefit of the information that the federal government has as well as any provincial authorities.

• (1430)

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Of course the government will, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister and it is on the same subject matter.

On May 12 the minister of energy said: "We the cabinet were all aware of the mine having high methane deposits and with the new technology that there would have to be a learning curve."

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister if the cabinet's discussions on the so-called learning curve included the real possibility of spontaneous combustion and explosion in the Foord seam and, if so, how they possibly could have funded this project?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the government was aware, and every government everywhere I would hope is aware, that coal mining is a dangerous undertaking. In this area, all of Nova Scotia's coal mines, including Cape Breton and the mainland and so on, have had their share of problems in the past. They have all had problems with methane and they have virtually all had problems with methane explosions.

It was our job to make sure that when we gave the government loan insurance, we gave the government a guarantee that Curragh was in full compliance with provincial regulatory standards on health and safety and indeed they were.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is again for the Deputy Prime Minister.

The minister of energy indicated that officials of the department of industry expressed serious concerns about methane at the Westray project. Given the fact that the Foord seam has a history of fatal explosions that has cost the lives of 264 miners, what was the reason and what was the compelling information that the government had that led it to ignore its own department, to ignore history and fund this project?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, if we take ourselves back to the period when this was all being assessed, the primary questions being asked publicly within the legislature and here in Ottawa by those analysing it, were primarily business and economic questions. There were a few safety questions but they occurred very infrequently. As a matter of fact, Teresa MacNeil of the Devco board said that her memory was that the questions being discussed were questions of economics, not safety. To quote her: "We would all like to think today that we were all preaching safety. Safety was a factor but it was mentioned very infrequently."

In fact, even though that was the case, we put in place steps to make sure that the regime set down by the province for health and safety were complied with in every particular by the company and that it was monitored by independent mining consultants on a regular basis.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

In a project overview by Westray in January 1990 the section on mining calls the risk of spontaneous combustion not clearly defined.

My question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Did the government, in assessing the decision to fund the West-ray project, accept Westray's evaluation of the risks of spontaneous combustion as not clearly defined, or did it seek an independent evaluation of these risks before deciding to fund this project? If so, will the minister make this assessment public?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, can you imagine a bank putting forward $100 million and not taking any interest at all in whether the whole future of the mine could be put into doubt by a spontaneous explosion?

Therefore, due diligence and very careful research would have to be done to make sure that the methane problems that exist in almost all mines were being properly regulated and that in fact is ensured by provincial authorities.

The provincial authorities have their health and safety regulations. Those had to be complied with. The Bank of Nova Scotia made sure they were complied with. Of course we, giving a guarantee for a portion of that loan, also made sure on a regular basis, through independent mining consultants, that those regulations were being complied with.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, in point of fact the risks of spontaneous combustion were clearly defined and well known to the government before its decision to fund the Westray project. On December 7, 1987 the government's own Crown corporation, Devco, warned in a memorandum that the Foord seam gives off large volumes of gas and has proven to be extremely liable to spontaneous combustion.

In the face of this clear warning, why did the government choose to provide $85 million in loan guarantees to the Westray project?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the truth is this. The Devco mine in Glace Bay, for example, not far from the hon. member's riding, has methane gas problems too. It had a tragedy in 1979. These things happen. It does not mean that you do not go ahead and see, under a proper regulatory environment that is constantly being monitored by independent mining consultants, that you do not make the investment.

This is what in fact happened. The investment went ahead. It was carefully monitored and accidents still happened. The judicial inquiry in Nova Scotia will help us to uncover that.

In so far as the hon. member is saying that methane gas problems do not exist in all mines, he knows that is not true. They exist in most mines. We have to make sure that the regulatory system put in place is complied with. We assured ourselves of that. How the accident occurred now will be the subject of that provincial inquiry.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources or the other minister that is answering for the government regarding the Westray disaster.

I want to state as a preface that I recognize the appropriate jurisdiction in matters of safety and health and so does my party.

However, considering the government's major investment, both financial and in terms of the government's credibility, which the government made in Curragh Resources, especially considering the Prime Minister's and other ministers' unusually active intervention in support of the Westray proposal, did the minister or his or other officials of the federal government directly or indirectly conduct any ongoing surveillance of safety conditions and operations at the Westray mine or was this treated in the same way as any other industrial operation?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I may have misunderstood the question. Did he say did members of Parliament or members of cabinet do the surveillance? This has to be done by experts, by independent mining experts.

In this particular contract, the Bank of Nova Scotia, wanting to protect its investment, made sure this was done on a monthly basis. It was done and we also ensured that it would be done because our guarantee was there.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I must say with all respect that the answer was a little picky. There is more than one way of conducting surveillance. One is to be in some close touch with provincial authorities whose job it is to investigate ongoing safety operations in the operation.

Did the federal Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources or other officials of the government undertake any ongoing contact or surveillance—never mind the exact term—with the appropriate provincial officials or with the provincial government to ensure that appropriate safety measures were being taken at this operation, in light of this government's unusually active involvement in promoting this specific promoter?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, we of course relied on the surveillance primarily carried out by the independent mining consultants. I will try to find out if more surveillance was put in place besides that.

The hon. member is asking if there were members of Parliament, parliamentarians—

Some hon. members: No, no.

Mr. Hockin: —parliamentarians from that region who supported this project. The answer of course is yes. There was a regional economic development need in that part of Nova Scotia.

• (1440)

There were mayors, there were city councillors, there were all sorts of public leaders who very much supported this investment. This is not unnatural. This government supports regional economic development and just dozens and dozens of public people in that region supported this investment.

TRADE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Since the Prime Minister is in Washington today—I hope that it is not just to report to head office—in his absence, I would like the Deputy Prime Minister to tell me whether the Prime Minister told the President of the United States during lunch that the great majority of Canadians want to renegotiate the free trade agreement, or was he satisfied just with crumbs from the table?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, no.

The Prime Minister met with the President of the United States to talk about a number of outstanding issues, particularly trade irritants. The Prime Minister was very forceful and forthcoming over what we consider to be harassment by the United States concerning softwood lumber, Honda and other issues.

The hon. Leader of the Opposition should be pleased with the fact that the President has undertaken to personally become involved in these particular issues, and as well to use whatever influence he has with respect to Congress.

I should also remind the hon. Leader of the Opposition that the Prime Minister will be meeting with the heads of the Senate and the House of Representatives as well to talk about the respective trade issues that affect Canada and the United States, particularly our bilateral trading relationship.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately we noted at the press conference that Murphy Brown got more attention than the Prime Minister for his representation to the President.

In the Saturday last Toronto Star a prominent member of the government said: "The Prime Minister recognizes that changes have to be made and we are in the process of making them before the next election".

I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister if the government is changing the policy at long last and agreeing with the Canadian public that the free trade deal needs renegotiation, or was the Prime Minister just reporting to the President of the United States as a subsidiary reports to the head office?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows very well that there are always things that can be improved in a trading agreement.

One of the reasons, of course, that we are in the North American free trade agreement discussions is that we believe through that vehicle we can make some changes that will be beneficial to Canada in the free trade agreement with the United States.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Today the Conference Board of Canada released its latest outlook for the Canadian economy. It concluded: "The current situation in Canada is grim—We are on the verge of recession". This means that this government's economic policies, especially the last budget, have been a failure.

The Minister of Finance has already said that his budget has been wrong on growth, wrong on jobs and yesterday his department said that the numbers for the deficit for last year have also been wrong.

Why will the minister not admit that his budget has been a failure and bring in new policies that this time focus on economic growth and jobs before it is too late and before this country falls back into recession?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the forecast provided by the Conference Board of Canada is overly pessimistic.

There are a number of indicators that would prove otherwise. For example, real exports were up 3.7 per cent in the first quarter. The results flow from a strong increase in imports of 7.8 per cent in March, which indicates that there is a great deal of purchasing in the area of machinery and equipment, and this is a very positive indicator. Housing starts went up by 7 per cent; 14 per cent for single detached dwellings.

It is also important to point out, as Mr. Frank indicated in his report through the Conference Board of Canada, that "the central problem lies with declining real disposable income in Canada due to falling employment and rising taxes in many provincial budgets".

Obviously what has happened is that the stimulus we have provided in our February budget has been usurped and eroded by the actions of many provincial government budgets which have increased taxes, and that is something we did not do.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Today Patti Croft, an economist at Burns Fry Limited, said speaking about these export-import numbers: "I don't think it is indicative of an economic turnaround".

I do not see why the Minister of Finance tries to put the blame on the provinces for offloading on them the effects of his own cutbacks.

The Conference Board said: "We can put aside the hope that lower interest rates and inflation will rouse the consumer. Jobs are all that matter—With unemployment falling 110,000 in March and April, we cannot see much prospect for improvement over the short term".

Why will the Minister of Finance not recognize that this is a valid and damning indictment of his policies and bring in new policies that focus on growth and jobs and give Canadians hope and give Canadians confidence?

What is he waiting for? Surely he does not want another recession.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I was not trying to blame anybody else. I was simply quoting for the record the comments of Mr. James Frank when he said: "the central problem lies with the declining real disposable income in Canada due to falling employment and rising taxes by many provincial budgets".

Did the hon. member not read The Globe and Mail of Monday where the headline says: "Maz giveth and the provinces taketh away"? That is the problem.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, my question is for the acting Prime Minister.

The government is obviously determined to spread confusion on the constitutional issue. On one hand, the minister responsible boasts about the progress made at the negotiating table, and on the other, his colleague, the minister of health, says that there is nothing on the table for Quebec, "absolutely nothing for Quebec" are his exact words and that no transfer of powers has yet been discussed. An obvious question arises: Who is telling the truth, the minister of health or his colleague?

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the meeting is now going on in Montreal and another meeting will take place next week, with a known agenda. Of course, some questions take more time than others, but the whole agenda will be followed and the timetable will be respected.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): But, Mr. Speaker, the agenda is not known. It is the big unknown in Canada at this time.

The response indicates that the government does not know where it is going. First it suggests there is an agreement, then it threatens to hold a referendum as a stick. When will this government make up its mind? Are we to understand that May 31, the date mentioned yesterday, is the deadline for the effort now under way?

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, he says the agenda is not known, but I have in my notes here that they will discuss Senate reform and aboriginal issues on Wednesday and spend Thursday on the division of powers. Friday will be spent on all the points discussed and Senate reform as well.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, since the Minister of Finance quoted from the Conference Board's discussion of why there were problems in our economy, why the situation was grim, why did he not concentrate on the key point that Mr. Frank makes, the falling employment which exists in this country? In fact declining interest rates, as this report makes clear, have not spurred consumer spending. Business investment is going to be lower and unemployment is going to stay at 11 per cent until the end of 1992.

• (1450)

Does the Minister of Finance not recognize that it is time to bring in a new budget which shifts spending and puts spending behind an expansion of jobs in this country to get people back to work?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the report points out it is somewhat counterproductive if, on the one hand, the federal government moves to provide some tax relief, to provide some slack so that individual Canadians have more disposable income and to see on the other hand, that is taken up and in fact exceeded, particularly by the three NDP governments. They are the ones that have been the most guilty in this particular area. They not only sapped the tax breaks that we provided Canadians. They imposed further taxes, and that is the point he is making.

I am very concerned about the level of unemployment and the lack of employment. The budget did take some very major steps in trying to provide a more competitive environment in the manufacturing and processing sector, that particular sector which has been most hard hit. We have provided additional resources for training so that we can upgrade skills and improve the capability of our work force to meet the new demands that are out there. All these things are part and parcel of the budgetary provisions.

I recognize and I acknowledge, even in the budget, that the fourth quarter was slower than we expected and that could carry over into the first quarter. That is certainly not reason to abandon ship and start to do what the NDP wants to do: print money and hope the problem will go away.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, we have seen a government which on January first of this year increased taxes on Canadians $1.8 billion and then talked in the House of Commons about trying to reduce taxes. The unemployment insurance increases this government put through in terms of increased fees have done as much damage as anything across this country in terms of reducing consumer demand.

What is the Minister of Finance going to do in the face of this forecast that economic growth will only be one per cent when his budget was based on a forecast of 2.7 per cent, almost three times as much? That is what is causing the unemployment in this country; that is what the minister has to respond to.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, again not to belabour the point, the report clearly cites on at least three different occasions on two pages the impact of the provincial budgets, the impact of the increased taxes provided by provincial budgets. I am not making that up.

If the hon. member wants to accept this report, why does he not accept that element of it?

I indicated to him that I believe his forecasts of one per cent GDP for 1992 were overly pessimistic. I also indicated that because of the slowness in the fourth quarter and the extension into the first quarter of 1992 our target of 2.7 per cent may not be met. As a matter of fact, with Statistics Canada adjusting the figures for 1991 downward by .4 per cent, that immediately throws the 2.7 per cent figure out of kilter because it then becomes 2.3 per cent. We are looking at growth that will be less than that.

I have acknowledged that publicly and I acknowledge it here, but that is no reason to start out on a new policy course. The course that we are following is sound. There has been continuing monetary ease. There have been provisions for the manufacturing sector. There have been inducements—

Mr. Speaker: I think we are going to have to move on.

TOURISM

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue.

As we know, tourism is one of our major economic generators. This last weekend there were long lineups at the American border with many of our tourists being held up there.

Could the minister tell us what is being done to expedite the access of American tourists to Canada? This has been widely reported in the American press. What can we do to tell them that Canada is a good place to visit?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, it may come as a surprise to this House, because it is good news and that is very seldom reported, that cross-border shopping has decreased two consecutive months in a row. Between January and March there were 300,000 fewer one-day trips. I am not jumping up and down with joy yet, but if the trend continues I think we will see positive results.

As far as the specific question from the hon. member is concerned, we have not only brought greater efficiency to the border with new technology and systems to speed up the process. We in fact have opened up some nine special tourist lanes in nine locations nationally, three of them in British Columbia, which have increased tourism over the last few months.

Tourism is increasing. Cross-border shopping is decreasing. This is good news, and I hope the parliamentary press gallery will write about it one day.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Yesterday I urged the Canadian government to support the people of Thailand in their struggle for democracy. I am pleased to see that today the government has acted in response to our recommendations to cancel arms exports. However, that is not enough.

I want to ask the minister this: Will she clearly demonstrate her support for the democratic forces and immediately cancel direct aid and lines of credit for Thailand? Will she ask for an international inquiry into the events of the past few days?

[English]

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, like all members of this House and all Canadians I am horrified by what has occurred in Thailand over the past few days.

I would like to report to the House that just in the last hour or so there have been some positive developments, including an amnesty by royal decree for all the people who have been arrested and a movement back toward democratic practices through the intervention of the king with the prime minister and with the leader of the opposition who had been on a hunger strike.

We are therefore a little more hopeful than I was even this morning, and I know that the House will be pleased to hear that.

Let me say in terms of the action we have taken that we have called in the Thai ambassador to Canada. We have asked our ambassador there to intervene with the prime minister. We are in regular touch with our ambassador and have asked for a report from him. We have called on the Thai government to institute a process of independent inquiry. We are monitoring virtually minute by minute the situation and will take further action as we think it is required.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, we certainly welcome the news from the minister about events changing, but I think there are some important questions for the minister.

This government has said constantly that it ties direct assistance to the question of human rights. Why is it that in the past year we have increased our arms exports to Thailand and we have increased our direct aid to that country when we knew it had a repressive military regime?

I also want to ask the minister: as a major signal should we not put a freeze on that direct aid until we see that there is clear movement toward the re-establishment of a democratic government in that country, not just the amelioration of some conditions but the return of democracy?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the aid we give to Thailand is in support of democratic development. Much of it even though it is defined as government development actually is institutional. It goes to places like the Thailand Development Research Institute, an independent think tank for economic policy in support of democracy and good governance. There are projects for community development and for human resource development.

Those are very important projects in the current context. While we are prepared to take strong action on aid as it is required, we think that under these circumstances, certainly to date, these projects support the democratic process and are useful for the people of Thailand as they search for full democracy.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the chairman of the standing committee on justice which is now studying the proposed firearms regulations.

I want to be sure that I will have the opportunity to discuss with the committee some problematic regulations. One such regulation is the requirement to load guns only where they may be lawfully discharged. The problem is that the police are not exempt.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the member could put his question.

Mr. Attewell: Will the committee be seriously looking at some of these harsh rules on gun collectors and others?

Mr. Speaker: I am afraid the question is out of order.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

In the context of the Rio conference it is very clear that the government has completely caved in on global warming. One hopes it will not on biodiversity.

I would like to ask a question about another crucial issue and that is the necessity of funding the less developed countries so that they can live up to the undertakings arrived at at Rio.

First question, did the Prime Minister press President Bush today to match the amount that the Japanese are prepared to commit to the global environmental facility?

Second, is the Canadian government prepared to commit new money to a facility in the amount called for annually by its own national round table on the environment?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the government has made both financial commitments and commitments in respect of the substance of the issues having to do with Rio. I certainly would not want the preamble to stand without denying that we have caved in on anything, be it biodiversity or climate change.

The Prime Minister has been in touch with the President on the issues that are coming up and on the need that the conference be a success. Indeed he has been instrumental in encouraging President Bush to attend along with other G-7 leaders.

As to the outcome of the conference, we will have to wait and see. There will be further discussions among all the G-7 leaders, not just the President and the Prime Minister, between now and then.

POINT OF ORDER

PROCEEDINGS UNDER STANDING ORDER 38

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my point of order is with regard to yesterday. At 6 p.m., the Acting Speaker indicated to the House that there was a motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 which was deemed to have been moved and he acknowledged the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Earlier that day there were some discussions among House leaders concerning different travel motions for which consent was necessary and we had agreed to the substance of those motions.

My point of order is simply that these matters were raised at an inappropriate time, namely during the adjournment proceedings. I believe the rules are fairly clear on that. It ought not to have taken place yesterday during the adjournment proceedings. I hope in the future that this will not serve as a precedent for further motions seeking unanimous consent of the House, regardless of what the subject matter may be.

I want to indicate to the House that as far as the subject matter is concerned, we have agreed with those travel motions but it was an inappropriate time to raise those in adjournment proceedings.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I simply want to support my colleague's intervention. We in the New Democratic Party support the motions, but I would not like to see using that particular time of the day as a precedent for moving unanimous consent motions. Indeed, we support the points raised concerning yesterday.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order.

I am sure at least some members will recall, with reason, how I ranted and raged against the House during the debate on the war between Iraq and Kuwait, because of those surprise motions that could be presented any time of the day or night. Dissatisfied with what it could obtain directly, the government would wait until the member in question was absent from the House or until there was no quorum, to ask the unanimous consent of the House, and do so at any time of the day or night.

I think that members who are dedicated to the principles of the House of Commons and the spirit of harmony that should exist within these precincts, would like to see our standing orders make it sufficiently clear when, how and where unanimous consent can be requested, so that people are not taken unawares, and I am thinking more particularly of what happened last night.

I simply want to be on the record as reminding the House of what has happened before, and I would like to have the assurance that these surprise motions do not become the rule in this House.

[English]

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to respond to the point of order.

I think it is clear that an exception was made yesterday evening. I just wanted to restate that it is the practice and the intent of the government to move such motions at the appropriate time during Routine Proceedings.

In perusing the record, it will be found that what was done was procedurally correct. I want to assure my hon. friends that it is not the intention of the government to establish a new practice or to depart from established practice.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Chair has heard the point of order.

PETITIONS

REFUGEES

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to present to the House petitions signed by many of my constituents as well as constituents in the surrounding area.

These petitioners call upon the government to step up action on refugee cases while exercising compassion. Many of these refugees are suffering from personal and economic hardship as their future is undecided while they await the slow refugee processing.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present 25 signatures on a petition to the House of Commons.

• (1510)

The petitioners say that social and political conditions are unstable in many Third World countries, that thousands of refugees to Canada are trapped in a processing backlog and that many of these refugees are suffering from personal and economic hardships, their futures undecided as they await the slow refugee processing.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to urge the government to step up action on refugee cases and exercise some compassion.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition on behalf of constituents of Scarborough—Rouge River.

Following up on the Citizen's Forum, the petitioners ask that the government ensure that a referendum on constitutional reform proposals is held and that it provide a mechanism for approving the constitutional proposals and some mechanism for a double majority.

PROUD TO BE CANADIAN PROJECT

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present two petitions to the House. The first petition is from a number of constituents from the Moose Jaw—Lake Centre riding and states that it is important to encourage all Canadians to take pride in a united, strong and independent Canada.

Although Canadians are normally reserved people and control their patriotic feelings, the petitioners are very pleased to take part in the Proud to be Canadian Project which is sponsored by the Kinsmen and Kinette Clubs of Canada.

The petitioners therefore pledge their support to protect Canada, as an opportunity to nurture a positive feeling and relationship with our heritage and our flag and to encourage stronger ties with all Canadians for the further advancement of Canada as a leader in world circles and to promote our tremendous pride in being Canadians.

ADVERTISING OF ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): My second petition, Mr. Speaker, is from a number of constituents from Elbow, Saskatchewan. They state that whereas the abuse of alcohol is seen as the cause of many of the social problems confronting our society, and whereas the advertising of alcoholic beverages on radio and television is seen to encourage the abuse of alcohol by young people and others, the undersigned, the petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to instruct the government to ban the advertising of alcoholic beverages on radio and television. They call on the government to act on this matter.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions to present today. The first petition, deemed to be certified by the clerk of petitions under Standing Order 36, is signed by constituents of The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, all of whom reside in Paradise Hill or St. Walburg, Saskatchewan.

The petitioners state that it is appropriate to encourage all Canadians to take pride in a united, strong and independent Canada. The petitioners were part of the Kinsmen and Kinette Clubs of Canada's Proud to be Canadian Project which is taking place across Canada at this moment.

The petitioners thereby support the Proud to be Canadian Project as an opportunity to nurture a positive, life-long relationship with our heritage and our flag, to encourage stronger ties among all Canadians for the further advancement of Canada as a leader in world circles and to promote our tremendous pride in being Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, I was proud to be in Paradise Hill for this tour and the signing of that petition.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, my second petition is again certified by the clerk of petitions under Standing Order 36 and is signed by members of The Battlefords—Meadow Lake constituency, almost all of whom reside in the city of North Battleford.

The petitioners are all concerned about the constitutional process presently taking place in Canada. They have reviewed the process by which Canada has undertaken to allow Canadians to participate in the process.

They call on the government to enact legislation providing for a referendum of the people which is binding upon Parliament to accept or reject constitutional amendments proposed by the government. They also call upon a regional majority for Canadians in the counting process.

TAX REFORM

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, the petitioners in this first petition call upon the government to bring forward real tax reform.

They want a simplification of the system. They note that if you have child care receipts you can get an income tax deduction, but if you choose to stay home and take care of your children you cannot. They deplore the fact that common law couples had their deductions changed and not to their advantage.

These petitioners call upon the government to bring about tax reform.

RADIO AND TELEVISION BROADCASTING

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, in another instance, petitioners from my constituency ask that the Canadian Radio–Television and Telecommunications Commission monitor the use of foul and inappropriate language on radio and television in both the English and French languages. They feel it is counteractive and contradicts the efforts of parents in their home to rear their children. They want this monitored.

GOVERNMENT POLICIES

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, finally I have petitioners from my constituency who call upon the government to ensure that there is quality education, training, retraining, research and development in our country. How else can you meet the challenges of globalization, enhance competitiveness and increase productivity.

They deplore the fact that there have been cuts to transfer payments, a 3 per cent tax on student loans, six months more interest on loans; tuition fees are increasing; student debt is increasing. They want the government to review all of this.

DRUG SEIZURES

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of presenting a petition collected by Ted Wray who is with the Oakdale Acres Ratepayers Association of my riding of York West.

He collected a number of petitions asking this government to amend the Narcotics Control Act so that the huge financial proceeds coming from drug seizures in metropolitan Toronto, where unfortunately drug abuse is rampant, be shared with local police officers and local organizations rather than having 100 per cent of those proceeds going back to the general revenue funds of the Government of Canada.

The aspect and the objective is that the organizations, local police forces and others who are on the leading edge of trying to combat drugs would be aided by some very much needed tools.

GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present a petition signed by numerous residents of Mountain, Ontario; Ottawa, Ontario; Nepean and other areas in the vicinity of Ottawa.

These petitioners join with countless others for whom I have filed petitions in a seemingly endless parade of objections to the high cost of gasoline in this area. My fear is that the petitions are falling on deaf ears because the replies I have seen to some of the previous ones from the government have been totally useless.

These particular petitioners object to the disparity and the high price of gas in the Ottawa area as opposed to other parts of Ontario. They call upon Parliament to urge the government to correct this injustice to Ottawa area motorists instead of filing a host of platitudes every time these petitioners file objections in this House, with the outrageous conduct of this government allowing them to be taken to the cleaners the way they have been for so long.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from my constituents who have expressed concern about two Canadian citizens, Christine Lamont and David Spencer, who in their opinion are suffering miscarriages of justice.

They are urging the Secretary of State for External Affairs to request the Government of Brazil to expel Christine Lamont and David Spencer and return them to Canada.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today, forthrightly and fully: Nos. 235 and 268.

[Text]

Question No. 235—Mrs. Gaffney:

Since January 1989, how much federal funding from all sources has been given to (a) the National Action Committee on the Status of Women and (b) Action Canada?

Hon. Robert R. de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): In so far as the Department of the Secretary of State is concerned, the answer is as follows:

(a) Since January 1989, the National Action Committee on the Status of Women (NAC) has received a total of $1,315,000 in federal funding from the Secretary of State.

(b) No funding has been provided by the Department of the Secretary of State to Action Canada.

Question No. 268—Mr. Proud:

For the years 1990 and 1991, have any departments, agencies or crown corporations contributed funding to the National Action Committee on the Status of Women and if so (a) which ones (b) in what amounts?

Hon. Robert R. de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): In so far as the Department of the Secretary of State is concerned, the answer is as follows:

(a) The National Action Committee on the Status of Women has received funding from the Department of the Secretary of State for the fiscal years 1990–91 and 1991–92.

(b) In 1990–91, the National Action Committee on the Status of Women received $396,000 from the Department of the Secretary of State and in 1991–92, $300,000.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

Mr. Edwards: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that all Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers be allowed to stand.

[Translation]

Mrs. Venne (Saint-Hubert): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the government when I could expect a reply to the Notice of Motion for Production of Papers I tabled on February 26, 1992, as item P–13?

• (1520)

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to respond to the hon. member's question.

What I can say is that the papers in question are not in the control of the Government of Canada and that it would be appropriate for my hon. friend to address her question to the commission itself, that is the Commission on Reproductive Technology which I believe was the object of her question.

I would ask therefore that the question be transferred for debate if it is unacceptable to my hon. friend.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Transferred for debate.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

WESTRAY COAL MINE DISASTER

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have an application pursuant to Standing Order 52. The Chair has received a letter from the hon. member for Kootenay West—Revelstoke. It is very, very important. I would like to hear the hon. member's very short comment.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I and my colleagues in the New Democratic Party decided that an application for an emergency debate regarding the issues arising from the Westray coal disaster was important and was an issue requiring urgent consideration by the House.

First of all, yesterday Canada mourned the loss of 26 Nova Scotia miners killed in an industrial accident at the Westray coal mine. Today Canadians are seeking assurance from their governments, both federal and provincial, that this disaster could not have been prevented. They want to understand the circumstances underlying the operations of the mine and surrounding the accident.

The high level of public concern must be answered at this the earliest appropriate opportunity for this Parliament to discharge its responsibilities to both the dead and the living. The legitimate demand of Canadians for answers to their compelling questions, which have been covered widely in the media during the past week, were appropriately held at bay over this last week by agreement of all parties of this House. We did not feel that it was an appropriate time, and those demands for answers must now be met. A failure to meet that demand we feel can only further disappoint Canadians in a Parliament already suffering from considerable public disdain and disrespect.

The usual opportunities the House provides will not enable this assurance to be made in a timely manner. The business of the House in the last weeks before the summer recess is simply too crowded to provide for debate during regular hours, and that has been compounded by the addition of the referendum legislation just put before the House.

For that reason I respectfully submit that an emergency debate is the most appropriate means for this Parliament to discharge its responsibilities.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have listened to the hon. member and also we have looked over the letter and his proposition.

I regret at this time it does not meet the terms of the Standing Orders.

The House resumed from Tuesday, May 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. Andre that Bill C–81, an act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada, be now read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When debate ended, the hon. member had 10 minutes of questions and comments.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint–Denis): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I listened very carefully, as I intend to do throughout a debate that is so important for the future of our country, to the comments made by my hon. friend, colleague and neighbour, who incidentally will celebrate his 25th anniversary as a parliamentarian next Friday, on May 29. He was elected to this House on May 29, 1967, and I thought we should mark this occasion. I listened carefully to what the hon. member had to say, and it brought back a host of memories of all the events around this constitutional question.

I keep thinking that if we had only ratified the Victoria charter—someday, we will have to write history as it is—we would not be here, rehashing the same subject more than 20 years later. Political observers should take another look at the Victoria charter, in light of the revelations by special advisers who had said, at the time, that Victoria was unacceptable.

I also keep thinking that if we had only ratified Meech Lake, we would not be here discussing the constitutional question once again. In other countries people are killing each other and burning cities and getting into fights about constitutional questions. In Canada, things are different. We talk and talk, and eventually, when we think people are really getting fed up, we finally find a solution, and that is what we will try to do.

I must say that my hon. colleague and friend very aptly expressed—and I speak as chairman of the caucus of Liberal senators and members from Quebec—the wishes of the Quebec caucus in Ottawa, when he said there should be spending limits. We discussed this at length, and I appreciate his emphasis on this point. He also said that this kind of referendum seemed to require a double majority, a majority across Canada and a majority in each of the regions, but, irrespective of the final debate and the ultimate decision made in this House, we will never tolerate imposing a decision on a majority of Quebecers who would be opposed to it. I would not tolerate that, and I know I have colleagues and friends in all parties who would agree this would be entirely unacceptable.

I also urge political observers, colleagues and friends—and I would appreciate the hon. member's comments—to remember that in 1978, just to show there is nothing new under the sun, on April 4, and I am proud to say my memory has not failed me, Marc Lalonde, then minister of state responsible for federal-provincial relations, tabled a referendum bill. Everybody knows Marc Lalonde and I have had a number of vigorous discussions. We often disagreed, but I must say that his presentation on the referendum bill, and I have a summary here of the main provisions of that bill, contains many elements that we also find in the bill before the House today.

In any case, I hope that whatever the tenor of discussions by the party leadership, the government will agree to accept amendments. I would appreciate it if the hon. member would tell us if we stand any chance of getting through to the responsible minister, who seems determined to argue:

[English]

"It's going to be my way or no way." I would like to tell him that it is going to be no way if he thinks it is going to be his way.

On a question of such dramatic importance for the future of our country, I would hope that the government would have the sagacity, the intelligence of accepting major amendments, when the time comes. I would suggest that we should go to committee, not a committee of the whole but I would prefer a committee of this House, to study exactly what this referendum is all about. I would not understand if the political parties did not participate. I could not accept personally if the political parties do not participate together in the drafting of the question. It is unacceptable. I know my colleague is an expert. I am sure he will vigorously defend that point of view expressed by us. He is our representative. We want to participate in the drafting, it should not only done by the government. There should definitely be a limit to the expenses, and there should be fairness for both points of view that will be expressed to Canadians.

I thank him for his views which he expressed yesterday. I trust he will be vigorous in his representation and I would like him to comment further on the few proposals that I just made.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague from Saint-Denis for his statement. In particular, I must say that it is quite appropriate to set spending limits for the yes and no sides. Without spending limits, the wealthier will obviously have more opportunity to put across their point of view and may be able to impose their opinion in such a way that the others will feel wronged in what must be as democratic an exercise as possible.

I find it rather strange that the government refuses to impose spending limits by arguing that under the charter, people cannot be forced to get together under a yes or no umbrella. I would tell those who say that Canada is too diverse to have such umbrella committees that Great Britain used such a procedure in the referendum on its joining the European Community.

When the House adjourned yesterday evening, I was talking about this referendum held in Great Britain. Before I was interrupted, I was going to say that the no camp in Great Britain contained ultra-Conservative unionists from Ulster and Trotskyist coal miners' unions, while the yes camp included the Labour Prime Minister and the English managerial class. Moreover, the yes side included some ministers in the Wilson cabinet and some ministers in the Wilson cabinet were on the no side.

That makes me think of the division of opinion now in the Conservative government. Some days, on seeing the minister of intergovermental affairs say one thing and the minister of health another, one wonders whether these two gentlemen are not preparing to be in different camps in the referendum that might soon be held in Canada. But just because the leader of the Reform Party and the leader of the Bloc Quebecois might be on the same side in the Canadian referendum does not mean that there should be no umbrella committees. On the contrary, I think that it is quite natural, in a referendum on a major issue, to find people of different allegiances on the same side. That was the case in the Quebec referendum.

We will recall that the present leader of the Liberal opposition stood with Camil Samson, leader of the Creditiste Party, and the then leader of the Conservative Party, who today is the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs. These three people, of very different political stripes, were on the same platform, in the same camp, and that did not prevent the referendum from being held and running smoothly.

I bring up these things because it seems to me that the government is hiding behind the charter of rights in its desire not to set spending limits for the principal camps in a referendum. We think that spending limits are absolutely essential and that the government must understand and accept this. There will be no credible, fair, equitable and democratic referendum unless the spending of the groups that take part in it is limited.

[English]

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I listened yesterday to the debate with a good deal of interest. I was perhaps looking for some passion about our country and expecting to see in the House of Commons a sense of co-operation and accommodation in terms of dealing with this very important issue of legislation for a consultative referendum for Canadians.

Unfortunately I did not hear what I was looking for. Just a moment ago when my hon. colleague across the way asked a question of the member who spoke last yesterday I noted that he made some reference as to whether we should have spending controls on the legislation. The answer suggested that we should and that the government is somehow doing something wrong by not imposing these controls.

I have some things I would like to say about this, and I have some references I would like to make. However I would like to begin by quoting an article in The Ottawa Sun today by Michel Gratton.

In response to my colleague he said that the Liberals "obviously want a national plebiscite on the constitution". He also said:

> I can understand the opposition's frustration. They are not in control. It must be particularly hard for those Trudeau-era Grits who used to manipulate their adversaries in similar fashion. I don't remember Jean Chrétien consulting too many opposition members on constitutional matters.
> And I don't remember any of them complaining about "no spending limits" on referendum expenses when the Trudeau ministers surreptitiously poured millions into TV advertising to defeat René Levesque's plebiscite in 1980.

I think it ill behoves any of us to say that we have some answers that are rooted in the past or rooted in absolutes when history has proven otherwise.

What is important in this debate is that we examine all the issues carefully and thoughtfully, thinking not only of our own political concerns, our own regional concerns, or our own particular interests. We must examine the issues carefully and thoughtfully in terms of the interests of the country as a whole and at large.

On the question of the referendum and why we are doing what we are doing in terms of this legislation there are some very straightforward answers that require non-partisan and thoughtful debate in order to arrive at the right conclusion to serve the country as best as we can.

First, there seems to be confusion in the minds of many of our constituents, our audience out there, about why we should hold a referendum, why it is not binding and whether the Constitution can be amended by holding a referendum.

For those who may be a little concerned or a little confused about this matter we cannot amend the Constitution through a referendum. It takes 11 governments, the Parliament of Canada and the legislatures of all 10 provinces, to amend the Constitution. That is the only way it can be done. It can be seven out of ten of those provinces with 50 per cent of the population or some other combination including unanimous consent.

That is what is in the Constitution. The referendum allows us merely to consult with the Canadian public, to get a sense of the direction in which Canadians would like to see us go. It is a reference to the public to ensure that the decisions we are taking in this very important matter, which is of such profound importance to the country, are decisions that are supported by the population in general. We have heard many questions about whether or not the Constitution should have a decision pending on the double minority, majority in all four regions, or a majority in any particular region or any particular province. My answer to that is that if the referendum cannot ultimately amend the Constitution, if it is not binding on the government—and it cannot be because of the way in which the Constitution was amended in 1982—then all the referendum is designed to do is provide a reference point for the decision-makers in the country. Once we have consulted with the country then we will have the kind of direction we need in order to take the next step.

It might be said by some opposition members that this does not demonstrate the kind of leadership that government should be taking on an issue like this. On a question such as this one we need to have as much support for the ultimate decision as we possibly can.

This is not just a question of an election bill, it is not just a question of a budget bill or a matter or policy that affects us in a small way. This is the question of the future of our country. I think that all Canadians are interested in that outcome, regardless of whether the Constitution can be amended by other than the provincial ministers and the Parliament of Canada.

This allows us to consult with Canadians to get their sense of our direction and where we are going. It provides us with the kind of information we need to plot the course of action and take us to the next step so that we can do what everybody wants, which is keep the country together. There is no shame in that. There is no shame in doing absolutely everything that is within our power to keep the country intact.

The other question that continues to arise concerns why there is no limit on the amount of money that can be spent in talking about this question, and saying that people should vote yes or people should vote no. I personally do not know, and I do not understand emotionally or intellectually why anyone would want to do anything to limit the right of individual Canadians to express their opinions on this particular and very important issue.

It seems to me that even if we did not have a Charter of Rights and Freedoms that is very specific on freedom of speech, as Canadians we would want to have that ability to speak loudly and clearly and to be heard as well as we possibly could. In fact, it does say in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which was passed in 1982, under fundamental freedoms in section 2(b): "Everyone has the fundamental freedom: (b) freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression, including freedom of the press and other media of communication".

That guarantees that Canadians can say what they like to say or what they feel that they must say to help us keep this wonderful country together. It helps to ensure that a referendum will allow for the greatest expression of opinion and provide the best possible sense of direction for the first ministers. It is they who ultimately must come to grips with the problem and help us amend the Constitution in a way that will give Quebec a sense of having a home within Canada and allow it to feel free enough to be able to express itself in the manner that an individual province and the individuals within that province have the right to do in this particular country of ours, which is a great democracy.

We hear comments about fairness. It is not fair if we do not limit the spending. It is not fair if we do not reduce the amount that can be said on either side of the question. I do not understand that myself.

It seems to me that in this country we have some fundamental obligations, some responsibility as citizens. Whether we are members of the political system, members of the public at large, or members of the media or the business community our first duty is to our country and to ensuring that this great Confederation of ours remains intact.

To do that we must provide an atmosphere in which all the partners in Confederation can feel that they have a home which they belong in, and which they stay in because it provides some warmth, some comfort and some hope for the future for them. It is not something that we can force upon the members of the federation.

If we had a unitary country, I suppose none of this would be happening. It would all be so simple because we would not have to deal with 10 unitary states which have come together in a federation.

But in fact, that is not what we have. We have a great federation made up of 11 partners and two, almost three, territories at this time, that have a sense of individuality. That is appropriate in a country of 27 million people spread thinly across 25 million square miles.

It is difficult to keep a country like this together. The only way we can do it is by allowing each of the members of the federation, each of the partners in this country to have a sense of its own individuality, to express itself according to what is appropriate for its own needs and for its own place in our history and in our country. That is true of British Columbia, it is true of Manitoba, and it is also true of Quebec.

We have come to the pass where some members of the federation feel alienated, feel left out. They feel that somehow the country is not giving them what they thought they were going to get when they first came to Confederation. Therefore, we must rethink our approach to doing things, take a step back, take another look and ask whether there is some better way.

First of all, we have to know that the country wants to stay together. When the committee I co-chaired with Senator Beaudoin, which travelled across the country over the last few months, had completed its deliberations and tabled its report, a poll was conducted by Environics for the Council on Canadian Unity.

It was very clear to us from the results of that poll that, in fact, the one thing a large majority of Canadians can agree on is that they want this country to stay together because 71 per cent of them supported what was in the report. I would be quite surprised if 71 per cent of them actually had all the details of what was in the report at their fingertips.

Even more encouraging about that Environics poll was the fact that 65 per cent of Quebecers supported what was in the report. That tells me also that there is a large sense of wanting to remain in Canada, of wanting to belong to something greater that will lend strength to all parts of Quebec as well as the rest of Canada.

A referendum will allow us to get a sense of direction from every corner of the country, from each of the individual parts. However, we have to be extremely careful that we manage this referendum in a way that will not create alienation in any of the parts.

It would be unfortunate if we were to isolate any part of the federation by drawing very hard lines in the sand saying that there must be a majority here and there must be a majority there so that there is a binding decision. That is not the exercise.

The exercise is to consult, to think and then to determine the next step in a thoughtful way that does what it can to use the information we obtain by holding the referendum to bind the country together rather than use it in a way that might ultimately have just the opposite effect.

I want to say again that the Constitution cannot be amended by holding a referendum. The only way the Constitution can be amended is through the consent of the legislatures of the country, of the 10 provinces and the Parliament of Canada.

In the case of most of the issues that are on the table right now and later between the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs and the first ministers, most of those issues can be settled by seven provinces with 50 per cent of the population and the Parliament of Canada consenting. One or two issues, such as amending the amending formula itself, require unanimous consent.

It is important that all members of this House and all people in Canada understand that if a referendum is held, it is a matter of reference. It is a matter of governments and all members of Parliament seeking direction to do one thing and that is to keep the country together. In spite of our own particular political stripe or particular partisan bent, we are all bound together by that same, individual, single goal. If we do not keep this country together, there will not be a Parliament, a referendum, or podiums for people to take partisan positions.

• (1550)

As the debate continues, I hope all members of Parliament will put their country first, put their partisan and personal interests aside just for a moment. Members should work toward a solution that will keep the country together, give all parts of the federation a sense of participation that will avoid any kind of divisive action that would alienate any more parts of the country. I appreciate the opportunity to say these few words today.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): I have a question for my colleague, the former chair of our parliamentary committee. It seems only a few days ago we were doing this in the committee, over that five or six month period.

I would like to ask her about the idea people have that in this bill there should be the concept of regional majorities. I know she was not on the amending formula committee which was co-chaired by her friend the senator and the member for Edmonton Southwest.

In that particular committee we had a unanimous report in terms of a consultative referendum. In that referendum wording we said we should have a double majority. We said that if there is a referendum: "The referendum should require a national majority and a majority in each of the four regions: Ontario, Quebec, the Atlantic, and the west".

How would we interpret the results of a referendum if indeed we do not have that in the bill? Would she agree for example that before we proceed with amending the Constitution we would have to have the support of the population of Quebec? If she agrees to that, would she not also agree that we would have to have the support of western Canadians, Ontarians, or Atlantic Canadians?

I have always been of the view that before we can change the Constitution we have to have the support of an overwhelming majority of Canadians. It is not just an ordinary law; it is a very special document, it is the basic law of the country.

If we do not have the four regional vetoes in there in terms of a double majority, what advice would she have as to how we should interpret the results of that referendum?

There are all kinds of results. I would not want to speculate what they might be. I know the Prime Minister may be making a statement later as to how he would interpret the results of the referendum, but I want to know what advice she may have for the House as to how we should interpret those results?

Mrs. Dobbie: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for the question. It is a valid one.

I do not think it is really a question of deciding at this point in time how we would interpret the results of the referendum or try to predetermine what we might actually see when a referendum is held.

It is very important, as I said before, to be flexible enough in terms of the consultation process with the public to allow for that determination to take place when we see the results.

Right now, if we draw hard lines in the sand and take positions and say that we must have a majority in Quebec, we must have a majority in Ontario, we must have a majority from the regions, then we are already asking for resistance and that will reduce the impact and the overall importance of this consultation process we are going through.

If we must go through it, it is extremely important that we be very careful that we do not do it in a way that will create some sense of alienation or some sense of isolation in any of the individual parts of the federation.

The hon. member mentioned he was on the Beaudoin-Edwards committee. I know he played a very important role there. There was unanimous consent about the regional vetoes and the double majority. But he will also recall that met with a very sharp rejection by those regions. Therefore, it is one of the questions we have to answer and one of the reasons we have to go so carefully.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, it should be noted that the hon. member's riding and mine are separated only by the Assiniboine River. I always take note of what the hon. member says. I certainly share her love of country and support her patriotic remarks on behalf of this great country.

I am wondering whether the remarks she made this afternoon are perhaps better suited for the referendum debate itself, if we ever get to that, if the government does call a referendum, and we have to debate exactly what the question is. I say that only because I think that the previous speaker, at least today, should be concerned more with the mechanics of the referendum.

That brings me to the issue of a double majority. Our party believes strongly in a double majority provision in any referendum.

Let me attack it from this perspective. We are all minorities. One way or another, we are all minorities. There are only 295 members of Parliament in Canada and as a body of people, we are a minority in Canada. I come from the province of Manitoba, as does the hon. member for Winnipeg South. In the context of Canada, we are a minority. The people of Quebec are a minority in the context of Canada. Canadians, even though there are 27 million, are a minority in the context of the whole continent. When it comes to North Americans, we are a minority.

I raise that because one of the strong arguments against referenda for a long, long time has been the fear that referenda can be used by majorities to trample on the rights of minorities. That has always been the concern of having referenda. I can relate to that argument. I always fear when people talk about referenda that the instrument can be used by the majority to trample on minorities.

With that concern and with that fear, it leads me and my colleagues on this side of the House to support a double majority. That is the very provision in a referendum that will protect minorities in this country.

We in the west are a minority. We do not want a majority of Canadians to gang up on us when it comes to reshaping the Constitution. I am quite sure that Quebecers feel the same way. They do not want Ontarians or people from Atlantic Canada or the west ganging up on them.

So how do we protect Quebecers? How do we protect people from western Canada? How do we protect people from Ontario? Even though there are nine million, in the context of the country they are a minority. I cannot think of a better way to protect minorities in this country in a referendum than to incorporate a double majority provision.

I would like my hon. friend from Winnipeg South to comment on that.

Mrs. Dobbie: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague and my neighbour for his very good question. There is nothing to say that ultimately, when we see the results of the referendum, it may not be one of the considerations.

Obviously it is in the government's interest to protect everybody in Canada and that is very difficult. That is one of the reasons we have been so reluctant to enter into this whole issue of having a referendum. Clearly there are some downsides to it and it is still a big if.

What we are presenting here today is the ability to hold a referendum. It does not carry with it a guarantee that that is what will happen. By happy chance, if we can come to a consensus, which is really the only fair way that protects all minorities, about how to keep this country together, then a referendum need not be held. If one were held it would only be a matter of rubber-stamping what had already been achieved through consensus.

I respect and appreciate the hon. member's question. It is a difficult one. That is why it is so important not to draw too many hard lines or tight rules around how we will or might interpret the results of a referendum, if indeed we absolutely have to have one at some point in time.

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I think it is clear the government has failed to consider the impact of its decision to ask the House to adopt this bill and its decision to hold a Canadian referendum in circumstances the government may be said to have created.

Today, May 20, is the 12th anniversary of the 1980 referendum in Quebec.

My point is that we know what a referendum is like, and we know how traumatic it can be. We have seen the consequences and we are keenly aware of the political and democratic requisites for the referendum process. It so happens that the referendum that may be held as soon as the bill before the House is passed does not meet these criteria, Mr. Speaker. It does not meet the criteria for political legitimacy, because to us in Quebec, it is not legitimate. And as for being democratic, as far as Canada is concerned, it is not.

When I say it is not legitimate, I mean that the motives behind the government's action are patently suspect and extremely negative. It is painfully obvious that its real purpose is to do an end run around the referendum Quebec is about to call itself. After two years of dilatory measures, of successive failures of initiatives like the Spicer commission that turned into a regular circus, the proposals tabled on September 24, 1991, which were practically stillborn, the Beaudoin–Dobbie report which has now been shelved after only a few weeks, it seems as though this government all of a sudden wanted to prevent Quebec from holding its own referendum.

Why? It so happens that for the past two years a major movement has been growing and taking shape in Quebec, leading to the rebirth of the sovereignist movement. Whether we like it or not, Mr. Speaker, at the heart of the Canadian malaise and our political landscape, the major issue is Quebec's sovereignty. We can talk until the cows come home, we can waste our time on contitutional commas and semi-colons, we can use increasingly convoluted formulas to dilute the distinct identity of Quebec, but basically, we are just trying to evade the real issue. The real issue is: Will Quebec become sovereign, yes or no? In any case, that is what Quebecers have on their minds. I am not saying everyone will say yes, but in Quebec there are a lot of people who think Quebec should become sovereign and who want to be able to answer a question dealing with this particular subject. And this led to a commission of inquiry known as the Bélanger–Campeau commission, which sat for nearly one year. Three members of this House sat on the commission, and I was one of those members. This commission, whose members represented all activity sectors in Quebec, including labour, business, communities and all political parties, reached certain conclusions. Of course it could not reach a consensus on sovereignty or federalism, but there was one conclusion on which we all agreed and that was the enormous cost to all of us, in Quebec and Canada, as a result of the uncertainty in this country, an economic cost that is impossible to assess, a financial cost as well as a social cost and political cost.

Our society is not preparing for the major challenges of the future. While the world is busy building and rebuilding, Quebec and Canada are playing these introspective games. We have an education system that has to be renewed. We have to develop new technologies. We must redesign our national fabric, in Canada and Quebec, and meanwhile we are wasting our time on an endless discussion which contributes nothing to this debate. Why? Because some people, and these are mostly politicians or governments, do not want Quebecers to say what they want. But until Quebecers have voted in a Quebec referendum held under the auspices of the State of Quebec, by answering a question that deals with sovereignty, and until a decision is made, nothing will be settled.

Anything done by this government under siege, which is trying to use a referendum as an election platform and wrapping itself in the Canadian flag to save its own skin, will be useless. It is not getting us anywhere, and since this referendum is not legitimate because it does not answer the real question, because it will not resolve the real problems, the Bloc Quebecois will never feel bound by the results. Never. We will just be back to square one.

We are well aware that this referendum which the present government is preparing to hold is also an act of impotence, an admission that its own efforts have failed. This government had promised to make an offer to Quebec. Quebecers know that the political situation may produce an offer of renewal or lead to sovereignty. The Bélanger–Campeau commission concluded that Quebecers, like Canadians, by the way, had two options: sovereignty for Quebec or thoroughly renewed federalism. Supposing federalism can be renewed and that an offer might still come from the federal and provincial governments, the Government of Quebec created a parliamentary committee to study any offers that might come and would be binding on the federal and provincial governments.

This government had the obligation to make an offer, but it failed every time it tried to come up with one. So when the government tells us now that it will hold a referendum, what is it saying? It is telling us to forget about offers. Forget about the discussions going on in Montreal today and that have been going on throughout the country for some time. This government has two strategies. There is the strategy of the minister responsible for the issue, which is to try to come up with an agreement, and the strategy of the Prime Minister, who has concluded that the negotiations would fail.

By preparing to hold a referendum, Mr. Speaker, he is telling us: "The current negotiations are a farce. I know that my minister responsible is a naive man who is wasting his time and wasting the country's time. In fact, this country needs something to stir up the electorate, so that I can then hold an election on the basis of a yes vote that I will get on a phoney question." That is what is going on, Mr. Speaker. Let us be logical and open our eyes.

While we are wasting our time on what is supposedly a referendum debate, we are just discussing a life buoy that this government, which is dangerously adrift, wants thrown to it.

We in the Bloc Quebecois will not go along and take as hypocritical a stand as some others. I was there the other day when the Leader of the Official Opposition tore his shirt on learning that the bill would be tabled. He denounced its undemocratic character and added shortly afterward that he would vote for the bill, even without amendment, regardless. What inconsistency. That shows the government's tricks and the opposition's inconsistency. Inconsistency is a kind word; why not use another word that is in the dictionary, but I do not know if it is parliamentary: "hypocrisy". This same Leader of the Opposition tells us—and the hon. member just reminded him—that we should use the democratic rules provided in Quebec's legislation, rules that he speaks of with admiration today, rules that allow fairness in public funding for both sides. What a wonderful law. What a wonderful democratic requirement Quebec has. We should apply it to the federal government. But that same Leader of the Opposition, who was a minister in the Liberal government during the 1980 referendum that we are celebrating today, was determined to systematically violate Quebec's democratic legislation by tipping the scales with money and unlimited federal spending.

This makes me draw a parallel with the present bill. When I just said—and this is my second point—that this bill is not democratic, I believe that the argument may apply to all of Canada. I am a sovereigntist, but not because I believe that the federal government or the federal state is undemocratic. I am one of those who believe that, whatever the future of Quebec, whatever path it takes, it must maintain the democratic institutions that we have lived with for over a hundred years. I am one of those who are generally proud of the democratic tradition under which Canada operates, despite its shortcomings and weaknesses that we denounce from time to time but that in general do not break the continuity of this country's democracy.

I say that this referendum is an infringement on Canadian democracy and if ever a referendum were held in such conditions, it will be a scar on Canada's history and sully a very fine tradition that will always be an inspiration to Quebec. Why do I say that? It is, for example, because of the issue of unlimited spendings.

In every country of the world, at least in democratic countries and especially in ours, there is a requirement when an election is held, because it is an important decision, to put a ceiling on expenses and to ensure that one party will not be able to spend more than another. It is an old rule that has always prevailed. Elections have been held in Canada since the charter of rights came into effect. Nobody ever disputed that rule and I am convinced—this is a legal opinion which is worth what the others are worth and probably less—that the Supreme Court will never allow the law of the jungle to prevail, it will never substitute the power of money for the power of citizens when what is at stake is an issue as important as the future of a country.

Yet the government tells us that there will be no ceiling on expenses. Today I heard in the hallway—I do not know if it is worth anything, I have not seen the text—that the government leader intends to impose a very strict limit on the expenses of each committee, but that he would not limit the number of committees. This is a joke. This is the kind of amendment to be expected from this government. I can just see them show up tomorrow and tell us that they are generous and that they have listened to the voice of democracy. Mr. Speaker, they will come and tell us that they have decided to impose a limit on the expenses of the committees. However, they will not limit the number of committees. There can be as many committees as there are Canadians. This is another joke by this government.

What is more serious, even though it often goes unnoticed, is the fact that the government itself, in its management of public resources, will not be subjected to any spending limit regarding the referendum. In other words, ministers will travel in Challenger aircrafts, civil servants will criss-cross the country during the referendum campaign, and they will be able to do just about anything with the government's money, the taxpayers' money, to influence the outcome of this exercise. Officially, it might be true that no party in this House will have access to public funds, but in fact one party will have such access.

This legislation enables the government and the government party, namely the Conservative Party, to use without any restriction, as that government likes to do given the deficit that we have, the public funds, the taxpayers' money, to come out a winner.

Mr. Speaker, if this is the kind of country in which Canadians want to live, the kind of referendum that they want to hold, and the kind of public administration that they want, fine, but us Quebecers say no and this referendum is null and void even before it is held. I can tell you that we will fight it everywhere in Quebec; we will challenge not only the question, but also the admissibility of the referendum, its anti-democratic character, and we will ask the people to vote against such an anti-democratic measure. I can assure you that there will be federalists from Quebec who will vote against the question because they feel that this intervention is shameful, unacceptable, and it goes against their idea of a fair and equitable society.

I have one last point regarding the content of this legislation. It is the issue of majority. Mr. Speaker, we all know that the motto of Quebec is "Je me souviens" and there is a date in the recent history of Quebec as well as in the recent history of Canada that nobody talks about; I am referring to 1942. Let us not forget that the conscription in 1942 was one event that tore the country. The general feeling of Quebecers then, which has been transmitted from generation to generation since, is that Quebec was the victim of steamroller tactics in 1942. The federal government then used the Canadian majority to bury the Quebec minority, even if our province was opposed to the conscription.

Consequently, we all believed that this government, when it would resort to a referendum and pass the required legislation, would allow for a double majority. I believe several members of the government said so before, to free themselves from the syndrome of 42, the conscription syndrome. But no, Mr. Speaker, there is no end to their excesses because they are in a state of utter confusion and helplessness.

Now, there will be only one majority. Some will claim, on the evening of the referendum, that Canada has decided that yes we had to go ahead by approving the empty question that Canadians will be asked, even if Quebec is a minority as regards the result of that referendum. Indeed, the legislation does not officially provide for any other interpretation than the global result for the whole country.

There is already in there a negation of the principle of the existence of the Quebec people. There is a fundamental negation of the right of Quebec to self-determination, which is a principle that last year, in August, this government mocked when, for publicity reasons, the few thousand militants that had gathered in Toronto to boast about having recognized the right of Quebec to self-determination, walked singing "O Canada" and hugging each other. This is the same party today that tables a bill which negates, in its essence and foundation, the principle that it recognized in Toronto last year.

We can only conclude, regarding this government, that a verdict will be necessary. There is of course an artificial majority here, which does not reflect in any way, as we know, what people in Quebec and in Canada think. The verdict will be a general election. Those people across the floor are all about to be evaluated by the population. That is why they wait as long as they can, that is why they will go to the very end of the five-year period provided by the Constitution. That is why they do not dare come before the population; that is why they hide behind an artificial situation which prevents them from getting the sentence that they deserve. Mr. Speaker, we are ready. A decision will have to be made.

My second and last conclusion concerns the Government of Quebec. We have in Quebec a government whose premier has, because of historical continuity, the obligation of preserving the fundamental prerogatives of the state of Quebec. The first responsibility of the Premier of Quebec is not to be a party leader or to try to regain power or to remain in power: It is to ensure that the fundamental rights of Quebecers and of the Quebec nation are preserved. The first of those fundamental rights is of course the right to decide in Quebec, Quebec's future.

This same premier ratified the report of the Bélanger–Campeau commission which says that there must be a legislation requiring the government to hold a referendum on sovereignty in October 1992 at the latest. The same premier had the National Assembly pass a bill that contains precisely that conclusion and that requirement. We must demand from that premier, and this is what we expect from him, that he does not watch the federal parade at a time when the presence of the state of Quebec is required in a fundamental and essential way.

Therefore, we believe that if English–speaking Canadians want a referendum, which is legitimate, to define the kind of country that they want, the kind of offers that they would like to make to Quebec, so be it. It is totally legitimate, provided it is done in a democratic way. But at the same time, the central issue must be resolved and it must be resolved only by the logical decision–makers, the legitimate decision–makers, namely the people of Quebec. Otherwise, Mr. Speaker, the steamroller is put into action once again.

I promise you that a great number of members of the Bloc Quebecois will be here, maybe a little farther from the curtain than we are now, with more seats, to again defend the cause of Quebec and to resume a debate that costs a lot to everybody, solves nothing and only makes the situation worse. I call upon realism, I call upon political courage, I call upon the need to make the real decision, which is to decide whether Quebec will or will not be a sovereign state. Leave it to the people of Quebec to decide.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the member for Lac–Saint–Jean a question.

Once upon a time, there was another Quebec separatist who was a democrat. His name was René Lévesque. I heard the speech of the hon. member for Lac–Saint–Jean who claims to favour a referendum within Quebec, but not a referendum across the country. Does the hon. member favour democracy in Quebec but not across Canada? That is my question.

Mr. Bouchard (Lac–Saint–Jean): Mr. Speaker, the decision Quebecers will be asked to make in the referendum is complex, but one of its elements is quite straightforward. Is Quebec a sovereign nation whose aspirations will be embodied in a sovereign state? That is a fundamental question that cannot be left up to others to decide. Outsiders cannot decide whether or not Quebec will be sovereign. According to the basic principles of democracy, this referendum, which will determine the future of the people of Quebec, must be held under the auspices of the state of Quebec. It only stands to reason. We must not forget that the word democracy contains the word "demos", the Greek word for "people". Democracy is power exercised by the people, which is as it should be. The power at issue here is the power to determine the future of a people, in this case, the people of Quebec.

Basically, the hon. member and I disagree, not on the concept of democracy but on the identity of the people in question. My hon. friend believes there is one people, the Canadian people, while I believe there are two peoples, who will not go their separate ways because they hate each other but because they are fundamentally different, because they have entirely different concepts of what their future should be and of their collective values, political structures and the kind of government they want.

My hon. friend believes that the federal system is a good system for governing this entity called Canada. I say they cannot be administered together, because the people of Quebec want a weak central government and a strong state of Quebec. My hon. friend believes that under a federal system, the central government must be able to govern, and he is right. But it so happens that since we are two peoples, there is one too many in Canada. Or there is one missing, depending on one's perception. To us, what is missing is the Quebec nation, which we must create.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question for the member for Lac-Saint-Jean has to do with our responsibility as members of Parliament who, when we come to this Chamber, are given a mandate to speak for Canada.

I do not speak just for Toronto. I do not speak here for Ontario. We try to the best of our ability when we are here not just to speak for our own ridings, but we try to work on behalf of the whole country.

When the member was giving his speech, he talked about the fact that the government would be using taxpayers' resources to try and keep this country together.

Does the member think it is wrong for those of us who want to keep the country together, even though we may have a different view of the direction of the country? Does he not think it is our responsibility and duty to the best of our ability to try and keep this country together? If we did not do that, our constituents would wonder what we are doing in this room.

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I think with my hon. friend that in a normal federal system when the members are elected in their ridings they must abide by a fundamental duty of protecting the integrity of the country. He is right on that.

We were elected in Quebec. We were elected—that was my case—in a situation where we thought that the Meech Lake Accord would be ratified and that, basing our hopes on this, it would be possible after that, because there would be a climate of generosity and tolerance, to strike a new deal defining the different responsibilities and attributions of Quebec and Canada within the federation.

Meech failed. Meech was rejected and it changed everything. It showed that there were fundamental differences in this country. It showed that a member coming from a Quebec riding would be always obliged to defend Quebec first. It showed that we could not be here as sovereignists forever, that we must be here only the time it takes to achieve sovereignty, that there would be members acting as members in the House of Commons who would have to defend the country, their country which would be English Canada, and that we would be or other people would be in the parliament of Quebec.

It is a very particular juncture, a transitional juncture where we have to resolve the crisis. We happen to be here. We will seek an additional mandate to come back here with a large number of people, believe me, to complete the job we have undertaken, which is to apply a political solution to a political problem.

Whatever you say, you might wish this to be a unique country, one country, Canada, but it happens that it is two countries, two political entities. We Quebecers feel that we are a people. We have different views of the kind of government we need to be governed, and we think that it can only be achieved through sovereignty and two political structures: neighbours acting in the fulfilment of their aspirations remembering that they have geographical, economic and historical bounds.

Personally I think that we will always be friendly countries, that we are doomed to be friendly to achieve some kind of agreement on the common things we have to do together, but first it goes through sovereignty of Quebec and then maybe something would be possible.

[Translation]

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague mentioned the Toronto convention, where it seems that the Conservative Party first recognized Quebec's right to self-determination. I would simply remind him that in Toronto, our party just reiterated Quebec's right to self-determination, since that right had been recognized in 1980. I think that he should remember it, because at that time he was working for the other side on the Quebec referendum. I also took part in the Quebec referendum.

Mrs. Venne: On what side?

Mr. Ferland: I was on the no side, and I have never been ashamed of it.

Mr. Lapierre: It's been quite a change.

Mr. Ferland: Mr. Speaker, he said in his speech that the referendum was undemocratic. I have a lot of trouble understanding someone saying that a referendum is undemocratic when it is Canada-wide, but that the Quebec referendum was democratic.

I think that holding a referendum in Canada in no way takes away the right of French-speaking Canadians who live in Quebec to express themselves on the federal government's offers. I think that there is nothing wrong, reprehensible or undemocratic about that and it in no way takes away the Quebec government's right to use Bill 150, which we respect.

So I do not see how my friend opposite can say to us today— He should remember, Mr. Speaker, that not so long ago, he represented Canada in Paris and was proud of it. He said that Canada was the greatest defender of rights and freedoms in the world and an example to follow. Today he tells us in front of everyone here in this House that holding a national referendum is undemocratic. I would like him to explain that to me.

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I do not have time to answer the very vicious personal attacks to which I am accustomed. I already did so and will do so at the appropriate time and place, but I want to return to the essential point—

Mr. Lapierre: Well, it's very hard to get through to the hon. member.

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): —which challenged the use of the term "undemocratic" that I used to describe the bill and a referendum that would be held in the context of the circumstances he mentioned.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, it is elementary. As sure as can be, this bill is undemocratic. It is not undemocratic because it asks Quebecers to vote; it is illegitimate, which is even worse.

It is undemocratic because it contains no spending limit and will let our friends opposite go and see business people, engineers, architects, banks, big companies, government suppliers to contribute in order to influence the debate and load the dice. Let us not forget, Mr. Speaker, that in the Quebec referendum, which my colleague just mentioned, the Government of Quebec gave the federalist side a million dollars and the sovereigntist side a million dollars. Will this government dare to do the same? We know very well that it will not. It has the impudence and the indecency—A member from Quebec in this House has the nerve to accuse Quebec of not being democratic when it set an example for Canada and the federal government, which it should follow today, of respecting both sides.

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the Bloc Quebecois and member for Lac-Saint-Jean was just saying that, on this day, 12 years ago, on May 20 1980, the people of Quebec were voting in the Quebec referendum. I was listening earlier, Mr. Speaker, to the hon. member for Portneuf who stated he was on the no side. So was I, along with the Chrétiens, Mulroneys and Ryans. I was indeed, and I was looking forward to this renewed federalism which rejected Quebec in 1981. Today, I wonder and I would like to put the question to the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean. Nearly two years have gone by since the failure of Meech, on June 23, 1990. In a month or so, two years will have been spent in this House debating the issue and striking committees to try and resolve the constitutional deadlock we are in. I would like to ask the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean about the statement the Minister of Labour made the other day to the effect that a Canada-wide referendum would have no legal value. Would that not tend to prove that the government is afraid of the results of such a referendum? Would it not tend to prove also that it is only a diversionary tactic aimed at confusing people, especially the people of Quebec?

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I think the question is relevant and stresses the blatant vagueness of the referendum because they are trying to have it both ways. That is the kind of language we have grown accustomed to with this government. I am not as good at it as I was two years ago. At any rate, it is obvious that this government is talking from both sides of its mouth. On the one hand, it is telling us that the referendum will change absolutely nothing, that it will be meaningless. On the other hand, when the results will be out, it will want to base its future course of action on these results. I think that it fools no one, and I thank the hon. member for this great question.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would like to bring to the attention of the House that we are now, under Standing Order 74, in the 10-minute period with no questions or comments.

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, today's debate represents one of the most important principles of a democracy. We are here to debate the framework within which the people of Canada will be able to decide their future. Canadians must be able to chart their own course. They must be able to be completely certain that their wishes, as expressed in a national referendum, will be respected.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, we must recognize the fact that the Constitution belongs to the Canadian people. It does not belong to politicians or bureaucrats. We must give Canadians a chance to have the last word on any proposal for constitutional reform.

A Canadian referendum would give Canadian citizens outside Quebec a chance to say yes to Quebec and give Quebecers a chance to say yes to Canada. All Canadians must be able to say yes, not just those who live in Quebec or in provinces that plan to hold their own referendums.

[English]

We must trust the people of Canada. We must give them final say on any new constitutional agreement. That is why I welcome any legislation that will enable the people of Canada to do so.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the bill gives the government the right to decide whether it is appropriate to hold a referendum, while the Liberal Party believes it is essential for Canadians to approve the proposals for constitutional reform in a referendum.

[English]

When Canadians go to the polls to express how they feel about the Constitution, they must have a sense that they will be listened to. They have to believe that the ballot they cast represents a real and fundamental contribution to the future of this nation. To do anything less I believe is a betrayal of the democratic process.

I understand that there are entrenched legal and constitutional mechanisms for the amendment of the Constitution. I know that in order to change some clauses of the Constitution we need to have the co-operation of the federal government and seven out of ten provinces representing at least 50 per cent of the population and absolute unanimity for others. Despite these facts, we have to recognize that a Constitution has to represent the people that it is intended to govern.

If we want to address the problems that our society does face, we have to put the debate over distinct societies, Senate seats and various clauses and permutations to an end. I know that the people of Canada will take advantage of a national referendum to put this issue to rest.

The process that the government has put into place is flawed. I believe that the largest and most fundamental flaw is that the government is not committed to respect the results of the referendum. Not only must its commitment respect the wishes of the entire nation; it must take into account the regional divisions of Canada.

[Translation]

Proposals for constitutional reform should not only require the approval of the people of Canada as a whole, but should also be supported by a majority of the population in each of Canada's major regions, including Quebec. The Prime Minister, however, has refused to promise to give up any constitutional agreement that did not receive the support of all Canada's regions.

[English]

We are a federation. We have prided ourselves on balancing the interests of different regions of this country. This must be reflected in this legislation. I hope the government will consider certain amendments that will make the process morally binding at least on the leaders of this country.

Mr. Speaker, we must avoid even the remotest chance that any part of our country might be excluded from the constitutional renewal process.

The referendum legislation must recognize that each region in our country should be comfortable with the new constitutional proposals.

[English]

We are not here to accommodate the interests of a few. We are here to make sure that all Canadians, no matter where they live, feel that they are part of the process and are part of the solution. If we are to reach a true national reconciliation, all parts of Canada must be satisfied that their interests are protected in the new Constitution.

Another one of the glaring flaws in this legislation is the fact that there are no spending limits. What in effect this bill enables governments to do is spend unlimited amounts of public tax dollars on the positions they take. The potential exists that taxpayers could be financing both sides of the referendum question with an unlimited amount of money.

During the last federal election Canadians were bombarded with propaganda from third parties on the merits of the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement. Millions of dollars were spent by big business while few could afford to meet this advertising onslaught. We need to set maximum spending limits and targets so that this exercise is truly democratic.

I know that some members opposite will say that they cannot limit the amount of money that third parties spend during things like referenda. They feel they will be challenged before the Supreme Court on the constitutionality of the legislation. They are afraid that the judges of the Supreme Court would see such a limitation as a violation of the free speech provisions of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. No one is saying that we must prevent organizations or individuals from expressing how they feel about a potential referendum question.

The first section of Canada's Charter of Rights and Freedoms says quite explicitly that government can set limits to these rights as long as they are reasonable in a free and democratic society.

I believe that by setting these types of limits on spending, we will be contributing to the democratic process rather than detracting from it. Bill C–81 should facilitate a fair and open debate over the future of Canada and enable the people of this country to have their say through a referendum that will, at the very least, be morally binding on the government.

This bill must stipulate that all regions of the country must have a say in how the constitutional issue will be resolved. That means we need a truly national referendum. I know, for example, in my province of Quebec we will be having a referendum in the coming months. I am also aware that several other provinces have expressed an interest in holding referendums on the Constitution. What will this patchwork result in? No one really knows. But the Canadian people also have the right to respond to a national question. They have the right to express themselves on a question that is the same in Charlottetown, Halifax, Saint–Laurent, Sudbury or Calgary.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, there is no clause providing that the government shall consult the opposition parties on the wording of the referendum question. The government has offered only three days of debate in the House on the wording of the question. This would enable the opposition parties to suggest amendments but would exclude them from the drafting process.

This bill should include a provision that the question must be approved by a majority of at least two–thirds of the House before it is put before the Canadian people. We in the Liberal Party believe that Canada needs a referendum in which Canadians will be able to determine the future of our country by answering a question that is clear and specific.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There are no questions or comments. Debate.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on Bill C–81, the referendum legislation which the government has proposed. I rise with some sorrow because the government has deliberately introduced legislation that is flawed.

The government knows that there is a lot of will in this country to have a national referendum on the Constitution. I for one have a lot of concerns with regard to a national referendum because I believe that there is always the danger that minorities may be ignored when it comes to a national referendum, that they may not be fully protected.

But even with those reservations I was willing to give the government a chance. I believe there are some mechanisms that can be put in place to ensure that minorities are protected and at the same time allow for both national and regional participation by the citizens of this nation.

When I came back yesterday morning to the House and read the legislation, I was appalled with what the government has done. The government has not simply introduced legislation that enables Canadian citizens to have a referendum on the Constitution, it has deliberately taken a number of clauses that allow it to manipulate that whole electoral process.

At the present time, Mr. Speaker, I serve on a committee that is meeting in another room in this building where we are discussing changes to the elections act. We are having those discussions after the royal commission, set up by the Prime Minister, spent $18 million listening to Canadians, studying and researching how we conduct elections in this country, how we finance elections in this country, and what limitations can be put on spending during election processes in this country.

When I look at this legislation I see that the government has taken its agenda on electoral reform. It has ignored what the Lortie royal commission has done. It has deliberately gone against the basic tenets of the royal commission.

The royal commission talked about very severe spending limits for third party advertising. This government has made that wide open. The royal commission talked about an almost all-inclusive definition of election expenses to make sure the public knows what is being spent by those who are for a candidate, those who are against a candidate, those who are for a party, those who are against a party or, in this case, those who are for a referendum question or those who are against a referendum question.

What we see here is not what the Lortie royal commission promoted. What we see here is even weaker than the present electoral law of this country. The government has not only gone in the opposite direction of Lortie. It has managed to weaken the present clauses that we have in this country.

This legislation is cynical. It speaks of a government being driven by its own agenda, its own electoral campaign, and not by any real concerns for the future of this nation.

When I rose today I said: "I rise to speak in sorrow". I mean that. This legislation could have been much better written. It could have been written so that all members of this House, with the possible exception of a few, could have been proud of that legislation. We could have all felt like participants in the wording of the question. We could have all gone out across the country and said that the referendum was fair and why Canada was worth saving. It would not matter to us who our allies were. They could be Liberals. They could be Conservatives. We would be out there working for the future of our nation.

The previous Liberal member who spoke said that she would support any referendum legislation. I cannot give this Prime Minister a blank cheque. I cannot support this legislation as it is written. The government has spent $18 million listening to Canadians on electoral reform, on why it is necessary to have electoral fairness. This legislation goes against that very concept. The government says that it cannot limit spending or restrict the number of groups that would participate because it might received a charter challenge. That was one of the issues the Lortie royal commission looked at. It believed—and its advice was sought as well—that our Constitution allowed reasonable limits.

At this time I have proposed a number of things I do not have time to go into. We have prepared proposals for the government House leader on how they could clean up this legislation, on how we could have reasonable limits on spending and on how we could ensure federal and provincial governments do not overspend and still respect the charter. However we say there should be expenditure limits based on the voters.

We believe provincial and federal governments should be limited in the amount they can spend. We believe we can make the limits real by taking the Lortie commission recommendation and ensuring there is no co-ordination, no pooling of efforts on the referendum question, and by saying that no group can belong to more that one referendum committee.

There are ways to ensure the charter, to ensure spending by public, to allow it to spend money, but at the same time to ensure we have a fair system. We have made recommendations in a number of other areas.

I realize that my time to speak is very limited and I do have an amendment to offer this House. Before I make that amendment, I would ask the government to seriously consider what it has presented to this House and consider the fact that the Canadian public is very cynical about politicians in general, but especially about this government.

• (1650)

When they see this legislation, if it is not amended, and when they see large corporations spending multi-millions of dollars and doing a lot of things behind the scenes that are not going to be reported, and that is what happens under this legislation, which I said is weaker than the present election laws of this country, Canadians will become more cynical about this nation. It will cost us the votes of the people who believe in a strong and united country because they cannot support the Prime Minister, they cannot support the government and they cannot support a cynical process.

I move:

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "that" and substituting the following therefor:

This House declines to give second reading to Bill C-81, an act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada, the principles of which are objectionable in that the bill fails to:

(a) specifically provide for limits on campaign spending by individuals, organizations and governments;

(b) require that the results of the referendum are interpreted to ensure support and participation from all regions of Canada; and

(c) apply rules of campaigning to the governments of Canada, the provinces and territories.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will take the hon. member's amendment under advisement and rule on it a little later today.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, why referendum legislation today? Why is the government tabling such a legislation before the House? First of all, we must go back a little in our history. In 1980, there was a referendum in Quebec, in which people said they agreed to a renewed Canadian federalism by ultimately saying yes to the possibility of a renewal of our country. Then, in 1982, there were discussions where, once again, Quebec found itself isolated and could not respond positively to the proposal it received at the time.

Later, in 1987, the Prime Minister succeeded in getting the agreement of the ten premiers on what is called the Meech Lake Accord, that is the five conditions put forward by Quebec so that it could say yes to the Constitution of Canada.

During the three years that followed, some premiers opposed the accord and our government, through our Prime Minister, succeeded once again in getting the premiers to sign it. A few months later, the same premiers did not honour their commitment, so that the Meech Lake Accord failed and Quebec found itself isolated once again. Then, despite some difficulties at that time, our government set up some committees: the Spicer commission, and then, the Beaudoin-Edwards Committee, which was supposed to analyse the constitutional amending formula and which did an in-depth analysis of the referendum issue.

Then there was the Beaudoin-Dobbie committee, which also dealt with the referendum issue and which was somewhat saying that the government should hold at its discretion a referendum in case of a deadlock or in order to get a national consensus. But meanwhile, since the tabling of the Beaudoin-Dobbie report, there have been ongoing constitutional discussions between the first ministers or their representatives, and we might indeed end up with a deadlock during the next few weeks.

If in fact we cannot reach an agreement at the table and if we cannot obtain resolutions from each of the legislatures in order to renew our federalism, what shall we do? Shall we let the country go to pieces or shall we ultimately risk consulting the people? I think that in such a context, if there is an impasse, before Canada is divided we should go to the people. Even if the only legal way to amend the Constitution of Canada is to obtain resolutions from the different legislatures, a national referendum through which the Canadian people could express its opinion would have a tremendous impact. Given that situation, a piece of legislation on referendums seems absolutely necessary to me, even mandatory, since we must recognize that the possibility of an impasse really exists.

Mr. Speaker, what is our role as members of Parliament in such a context and how are we to analyse this bill? What are the really important values? Justice and the values of our democracy of course.

In 1898, a referendum was held in Canada on the issue of prohibition. At that time, the Quebec vote was diametrically apposed to that of the rest of Canada. In 1942, there was another referendum, a plebiscite on conscription, and again Quebecers expressed an opinion quite different from that of the other Canadians. Nonetheless, two years later, the Prime Minister decided to introduce a bill to force everybody into accepting the conscription.

That is why today, for this bill, I spoke of the importance of the double majority. Why am I talking about the double majority? The Beaudoin–Edwards committee examined this question extensively and declared: "We recommend that a federal law be enacted to enable the federal government at its discretion to hold a consultative referendum on a constitutional proposal whether to confirm the existence of a national consensus or to facilitate the adoption of the required amending resolutions. The referendum should require a national majority and a majority in each of the four regions—Atlantic, Quebec, Ontario and the west".

Even if the referendum is a consultative one—and I understand my colleagues for suggesting that perhaps it might not be necessary to entrench the double majority in a bill—I maintain it would be better to mention it in a bill to make it clear that there should be a double majority, whether in the four regional divisions or in Quebec, precisely to prevent a repetition of what happened in 1942.

My second point is the question of how fair it is to limit expenses. Experts say that, under section 2 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms: "Everyone has the following fundamental freedoms: (aside from freedom of association) freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression, including freedom of the press and other media of communication" and that these rights make it difficult to put a ceiling on expenses in the event of a referendum.

I am not a lawyer, but I had the opportunity to sit on the Beaudoin–Edwards and Beaudoin–Dobbie committees where the issue of the charter was reviewed at length. Another section of the charter states that: "The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society." In that context, I think that this particular section is as important as section 2 and that we should really seek to put a ceiling on expenses to prevent potential abuse.

As members of Parliament, there are things we can do when a bill is tabled by our government. We can try to make it better. That is why I still do not rule out the possibility of tabling amendments to our bill over the next couple of hours to ensure it is as fair as possible and in keeping with our rules of democracy. That is the context in which I intend to table, in a matter of hours, these amendments to the referendum legislation.

I have another important point to make and it is that we need a referendum act. If indeed a deadlock were reached, not having such an act could definitely be more detrimental to this country and all the values we want to uphold. We need that piece of legislation. And, in that context, I will work at improving it, using my position as a member of Parliament to make the bill better. After that, we will see.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. The Chair has examined the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Churchill and finds it in order. Debate, the hon. member for Saint–Léonard.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint–Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take part in this debate at second reading on Bill C–81, an act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada.

It is unfortunate that every time this government proposes something, it is on a rush–rush basis. It has been almost two years now, so the government could be much further ahead, it had ample time to introduce a bill on referendums that we, on this side, have long demanded. The government always claimed it was not necessary, it was difficult.

Now that we finally have a bill, the government is telling us that we have to pass it as quickly as possible, because otherwise it will be impossible to hold a referendum this fall. I would like, first of all, to point out to the House the fact that the Leader of the Opposition said on April 21, 1991, and I quote: "We need a process, a constitutional framework based on principles which will allow us to resolve the actual impasse quickly and equitably for Quebec and Canada as a whole." In that same speech he was proposing an approach while, as I said, the government was still dragging its feet. In order for this approach to succeed the federal government had to hold a referendum. At that time we would have liked this referendum to be held at the beginning of 1992, in the spring, but the government now proposes fall 1992.

We support in principle the concept of a referendum but not in the way proposed by the government. Today the government wants us to pass a bill allowing for referendums, but it tells us that it might not use it. I do not understand. If we come to a constitutional agreement with the provinces, why not let the people of Canada have their say? In my opinion, the referendum should not be used only when there is no agreement, it has to be used as well when there is one, so that the question is settled once and for all.

When the Canadian Constitution was patriated in 1981–82, if we had had a referendum act, where we would have asked Canadians and Quebecers for direction on the matter, I am sure that in Quebec and in every other province the people would have voted yes and the issue would have been settled once and for all. The then premier in Quebec would have had no other choice but to accept the people's verdict, and that would have been the end of it. Whereas, we now have to go through that all over again.

What I am concerned about at this time is that even if the federal government and seven provinces representing 50 per cent of the population came to an agreement, if we do not hold a referendum, some groups in Quebec would not accept the proposals, and we would have to start all over again. Also, if we were to amend the Constitution with a referendum based on the bill before the House, some groups in Quebec would still challenge the results since this not very democratic legislation is so lacking.

So we have not solved the problem, even with a referendum to be held pursuant to this bill. It is very important for me and for my colleagues in the opposition, that the government amends this bill. I was glad to hear the previous speaker, the hon. member for Jonquière, say that as a member of the government, he would be proposing some amendments. I hope he will be able to convince his colleagues on his side to amend this bill right away, so we can vote for it in a democratic fashion.

Mr. Speaker, why do we always have to start from scratch? Yesterday, when he introduced his bill, the leader of the government in the House of Commons quoted a 1978 report which has never been approved. However, in 1981, Quebec went through such an experience, they held a referendum and passed some bills. Why not use that model? In 1980, I was involved in the referendum campaign, as the majority of politically active people in Quebec. I joined the no campaign, because I was opposed to sovereignty association. We won, but that did not stop the people on the other side of the issue from feeling betrayed, since they did not have the same opportunities. The same spending limits, the same rules applied. So, why should we fear such a form of democracy?

Since democracy is very important to the Canadian and the Quebec people, why not have a bill allowing everyone, from every political stripe and every region of the country, to feel free to speak their minds during the referendum campaign. That way, when we got the results, we would know where we stand. It is incumbent on the premiers and the Prime Minister of Canada, on the Parliament of Canada and the provincial legislatures to amend the Constitution. I do not think any politician in this country would dare ignore the will the people choose to freely express, according to democratic principles.

Unfortunately time is running out. There are just a few months left, because one way or the other, you have to bear this in mind, Mr. Speaker, if the federal government continues to lose whatever precious time we have, Quebec will decide on its own. If we do not establish some democratic rules, I fear we will not only lose the referendum, but also our country, a beautiful country everyone envies and we can stand to lose because we are stuck with this piece of legislation.

I do hope the government will agree to study the issue of double majority because it is very important. Quebecers must feel that their vote will count. If they are refused, most Quebecers will vote no, and we will start all over. But if they are accepted, it is settled. We can solve the constitutional issue and turn to economic problems.

So it is important for the double majority to be part of this referendum bill. The whole issue of election rules is important, Mr. Speaker. It is unacceptable not to have spending limits in a democratic society. I also find it unacceptable that there are no groups. The government is not required to report and it can spend as much as it wants. I especially think that when a government represents a political party, it is dangerous for the democratic process.

As for the whole subject of election rules, Mr. Speaker, we spent $19 million on the Lortie commission. We have a referendum bill so that people can express their opinions. Although it is not an election, why does this bill not include the Lortie Commission's recommendations, after $19 million of the taxpayers' money was spent on it?

So I ask the government and government members to put pressure on the House leader, who is piloting this bill, and on the whole cabinet to present us with amendments as soon as possible or a new bill that will respect the basic principles of democracy. That means a double majority, spending limits, more equitable election rules that are in tune with our time and not an election law from 20 or 30 years ago.

You are telling me that my time is up. I hope that my colleagues on the government side, like one who got up—I hope that others will talk to their minister so that this bill is completely changed.

[English]

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted that the Parliament of Canada finally has a plebiscite bill before it for debate. We have waited a year and now we have it.

My father, who was in the Canadian army during World War II, taught me an expression which they often used in the army. It was: "Hurry up and then wait". The parliamentary version of this is the other way around. Here we have to wait and then hurry up. We are now being asked to hurry up and get this legislation approved in a very short time.

It is important that we deal with this legislation in Parliament and hear argument about amendments and how it can be improved. The government House leader indicated last Friday that he would be open to debate and amendments. As recently as today he indicated that he is planning some amendments himself and is discussing these with other parties in the House.

This bill is important because it is enabling legislation that will permit the men and women of Canada to be participants in the process of constitutional change. We have the bill and now we can work on improving it.

We should take into account that the last time Parliament debated legislation for a plebiscite was a decade or more ago, when the government of Prime Minister Trudeau felt that the same approach was necessary. Another time before that a plebiscite actually was held, that was half a century ago in 1942.

If we very briefly look at some of the things that are different this time around we can see that we are making changes in our democratic society. I will give three examples. First, compared with 1942 the franchise is broader now. It includes people as young as age 18 and it includes, because of the 1960 changes in the election law thanks to the Diefenbaker government, Canadian Indians, Inuit and Dukhobors, it includes people who had been excluded. We are going into this plebiscite with a broader franchise.

Second, unlike the plebiscite 50 years ago we are seeing disclosure of the sources of funds that are being contributed to the process. These were unheard of ideas half a century ago in Canadian electoral law.

My third example concerns the equitable distribution of broadcasting time. These again are new ideas that reflect our revolution as a democratic society. However, what more needs to be said about the 1992 plebiscite bill?

First, the title itself, referring to referendums, is a misnomer because the spokesman for the government refers to it as a plebiscite. It is a non-binding vote. Yet we have a bill that will have to be amended to change the title from referendum to plebiscite.

Last Friday I was told that this was not possible, that the government had received legal advice that you could not use such a name. Today I understand that there will be an amendment to change it. That is good. It makes me doubt a little bit more the authenticity and depth of the legal advice which the government might be relying on in this bill. If it has that problem with the title of the bill then I am more concerned about the kind and quality of the legal advice it is getting with respect to the charter arguments, which get to the more profound dimensions of this legislation.

The fact that we have enabling legislation before the House is very important because in a mature democracy there surely must be on the statute books the enabling rules that will permit a direct vote by the people when Parliament decides it is important to allow the Canadian people to share with us the risk of decision making, and to live with the consequences of making that decision.

Seven of our provinces have such legislation. Both of the territories do. It is more than high time that we in the Parliament of Canada put permanently on our statute book this kind of enabling legislation. Which makes me think that we should amend the provision of the statute that puts a three-year sunset clause on this bill. What is the magic about 36 months? Why should this enabling legislation disappear after 36 months?

As a very minimum we should instead put in the legislation the kind of provision we find in the Lobbyist Registration Act saying that after a certain period of time a committee of Parliament will consider Parliament's experience with it and come back before Parliament with recommendations on what kind of changes might be warranted in the act.

We are a long way yet from getting the kind of legislation that I would like to see, so that we would have in the Constitution an entrenched requirement that any amendments to our Constitution would require ratification by a popular vote. That is no radical idea, certainly not for a parliamentary democracy. Our Australian cousins have been doing that since the year 1900. They have found that on 32 trips to the polls to amend their Constitution, eight times the electors have approved the amendment and the rest they have turned down.

In a parliamentary democracy if you cannot persuade a majority of the people that the amendments you want to make to the Constitution should be made then I do not think that you have a political right or a legal right, or a moral right, to change the Constitution. Ultimately in a democracy our system rests upon the consent of the governed, not their coercion but their consent. The whole elaborate superstructure—our Parliament, our courts, our police, our financial institutions, all of our organizations—has its place in our society because the Canadian people consent to this system and agree that is how it should operate.

We must be sure that the Canadian people are partners with us in any changes that will be made to the Constitution. It is my hope that our minister and others who are negotiating in Montreal today, and next week in Toronto and so on, can come before us all with a package of amendments that will modernize the Constitution and renew Confederation. Then we will have a chance under this legislation to go before the Canadian people and let them express their verdict on the question at the polls following a good campaign on the issue.

As for the value of having enabling legislation, I might just mention as a footnote that in 1914 Prime Minister Borden had great difficulties with the Canadian Senate. He decided in 1914 that it was time for Senate reform. He wanted to go to the people to get a mandate in a plebiscite for that kind of Senate reform. However, as he prepared for that he discovered that there was no enabling legislation in the country. By the time the Privy Council drafted it and it was ready to be brought before Parliament we were into World War I and that whole issue was off the agenda.

There have been many times in this country when our leaders—especially the veteran mature prime ministers who have been in office for some years, be they Laurier, Borden, Mackenzie King, Trudeau or Mulroney—have come to the conclusion that there is something important in the way our system functions requiring that the people be directly involved in expressing their verdict at the ballot box in a direct vote, as a plebiscite.

Therefore, we come again to write yet another line or two in this long chapter of the Canadian quest to get direct legislation that will permit a vote.

I do not agree that this is the best bill we could have. That is why I will be working with others to support the amendments that are being proposed; amendments that would see the sensible structure, as we have in the referendum bill in Quebec, of two umbrella organizations. These organizing structures do not force people to participate in a certain way but enable a fair division of broadcasting time, a fair presentation of both sides of the issue, a fair allocation of funds and a responsible limiting of expenditures in accordance with the norms that have developed over the past two or three decades in Canada to ensure that our political processes, be they elections or plebiscites, are not a rich person's game. Canadians have an intelligence that should be addressed on these issues rather than simply being bombarded by the group that can spend the most money.

There are many ways in which the legislation can be improved. I am here in Parliament with my colleagues to work for those amendments and to see that this legislation is improved. I am certainly glad to be supporting it because this is a day that many of us have waited a long time to see.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to stand in the House today to address the federal referendum legislation.

At the outset I would like to say that there are a couple of principles that are particularly important whenever one considers legislation of this type, particularly one that is so important to the future of Canada and all Canadians.

We must check the principles against this particular legislation in order to ensure that it addresses the legitimate needs of this country and its people.

I think most colleagues would agree that the Constitution belongs to the people, not to the politicians and not to the bureaucrats. Canadians should have the final say on any constitutional reform package. On that measure the proposed legislation falls short.

As well, I believe that our national referendum should allow Canadians to say yes to each other. All Canadians should have the same opportunity, the same chance to express their views on the same question or questions, not only some Canadians and not only some Canadians in a series of provincial referendum questions.

I want to remind my colleagues, as well as listeners, that it was the Liberal Party of Canada under the leadership of the hon. member for Beauséjour who first proposed a national referendum to get us out of this constitutional impasse a little more than a year ago. It was part of his nine point plan to bring about some sort of constitutional resolution in our country.

Canadians are disappointed that it has taken the government some time to get its act together. They recall that this kind of legislation had been promised in the throne speech of May 1991 and the government backed away from that promise shortly thereafter. It was promised again in November and the government backed away again. Finally it has come forward. That is a good sign and I hope that it is something that works out well for all of us.

I was surprised right from the beginning as a member of two constitutional committees, the Beaudoin–Edwards constitutional committee and the Beaudoin–Dobbie constitutional committee, that the NDP has not been supportive of a national referendum. At most it has given lukewarm support, if any at all. I am surprised at that particular position because it seems to me that the legislation has a lot of merit which the NDP has not considered as deeply as it might have.

I want to commend the government for finally having come forward with referendum legislation to permit Canadians to say yes to each other.

However, I still have many concerns and here are some of them. The referendum is still only optional. That breeds uncertainty and causes some considerable anxiety: will it happen, will it not, when, where, et cetera?

It has no spending limits. I recognize there are certain difficulties with spending limits, but at the same time and with all due respect some limits could have been established among fair players.

I am surprised that it would appear we are looking at a majority of Canadians and not a second majority, a majority of the four or five large regions of Canada would have to say yes.

I would have liked to have seen as well a commitment from the Prime Minister and his government to withdraw any constitutional agreement if it did not receive support from the majority of all regions of Canada, quite apart from the over–all majority.

Perhaps my greatest concern is with respect to the question, deciding upon the question. Clearly there has to be consultation. Clearly the government has to approach this with an openness of spirit and a commitment to consult and to come forward with the best question or questions that will get the support of all parties.

If it were not to do that I fear it would get into serious difficulties, and we know what the potential price is if that were to occur.

[Translation]

What also bothers me, is that there are quite a few questions for which there are still no answers. I mentioned this earlier, but it bears repeating because I think this is very important. Will there be a referendum, yes or no? If so, where? Across the country, in certain provinces or regions? We do not know the answer. And of course, when? We do not have the answer to that either. I think all this tends to create a feeling of uncertainty that is not well received by most Canadians.

[English]

Will all Canadians throughout this great land be able to vote on the referendum?

We do not know that either.

[English]

Will it be a vote on the same questions? Or, will the provincial and territorial questions, if there are some, somehow be able to replace those that would be posed in a national referendum? What is the question? What are the questions?

Yes, what is the question and what will the questions be? To me, that is the crux of this debate.

[English]

Another element which is closely related and equally important is: How will it be drawn up? Will the government simply come forward and say: "Here it is"? Or, will the government consult with the various parties in the House and with other Canadians in order to ensure that it is as sensitive, as comprehensive and as meaningful as it might be?

I will take this opportunity to make certain suggestions. If somehow after this exercise, assuming there is a referendum for the whole of the country, we have not addressed the aboriginal question of self-government, we are in serious difficulty.

If we have not addressed the distinct society Quebec wants, we are in serious trouble.

[English]

We cannot avoid the question of the veto. That question must be addressed and there are a number of proposed solutions. One is clearly found in the Beaudoin-Edwards constitutional committee report where there is a proposed approach to having a majority in regions and it is defined therein.

We must also sort out either on the referendum question or elsewhere the whole question of division of powers. We cannot continue to have the dysfunctionality that we now have and the difficulties that it causes. Very often it is unclear what level of government delivers what services for its people.

So the division of powers is one of the essential issues.

[English]

I would also suggest we need to address in a very sensitive way one group that often feels left out of any constitutional discussions and debate on perhaps the Canada clause. It is those Canadians who have come from other lands, those Canadians who are of ancestry other than aboriginal, English or French. There is a wonderful opportunity, if it is done correctly and with sensitivity, to ensure they feel they are a full, significant and meaningful partner in this country.

• (1730)

In concluding, I have a few short comments to make. We have a unique opportunity to try and settle the constitutional question once and for all, to find a solution that will not please all Canadians but the majority of Canadians, so that we can get on with the major challenges facing our country today: the economic situation, unemployment, poverty, the fact that so many people have to go to food banks. It seems to me this is a golden opportunity to try and settle the matter and start doing something about the recession in this country.

[English]

It is a great opportunity for Canada and for Canadians. If this proposed referendum is used sensitively, I think it can finally bring constitutional peace to our great nation. If used improperly, however, it could be the end of our great country. It could create a lot of divisions. I am not just talking about the division between the rest of Canada and Quebec, I am talking divisions within the whole of the country.

Therefore, I urge the government to listen and listen very carefully to the people of Canada, to listen to the various political parties to see what it is that they have to offer, to make sure that this particular initiative is one that bears very positive fruit. I urge the government as well to co-operate with all parties. This is a time to rise above partisanship. This is a time to do what is right for Canada and for all Canadians.

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, as I begin I would like to repeat what my colleagues have already stated. This legislation is a precautionary measure. No decision to hold a referendum has been made. At the present time there is no federal legislation to permit a referendum. This legislation would make a referendum possible.

In February 1992 the Beaudoin-Dobbie committee report stated: "We recommend that a federal law be enacted to enable the federal government at its discretion to hold a consultative referendum on a constitutional proposal".

Canadians from across our country spoke to the committee and recommended that a referendum be considered. Many Canadians are pleased that the government is listening to Canadians and following the advice of the committee, the advice that was endorsed by all major parties.

Legislation must be in place to allow a referendum before the Chief Electoral Officer can begin to make preparations to hold a referendum. It is estimated that three months are needed for such preparations. That is to say, if this legislation were to be passed by mid-June, then the Chief Electoral Officer would be able to have everything ready for a referendum no sooner than mid-September.

The government is simply looking ahead, seeing that there may be a decision to hold a federal referendum and saying if this decision is the one taken, then let us be ready.

I would also like at this time to reassure all Canadians that this legislation would only apply to a referendum called by the federal government and would not in any way affect the right of provinces to hold their own referenda if they choose to do so.

Canadians know that the referendum our government is considering is a referendum on constitutional reform. As the Beaudoin-Dobbie report noted, one of the most positive results of the patriation process is the degree of interest expressed by the people of Canada in their Constitution.

Since 1982 the people of Canada have insisted on being involved in all aspects of constitutional change. I believe this characteristic of Canadians is one of our strengths as a nation.

There are many forms that public involvement can take and a federal referendum should not, at this stage, be ruled out.

As a member of Parliament from western Canada, it is appropriate that I remind my colleagues from central Canada that Canadians living in the west have felt excluded from decision-making in the past. The huge population concentrated in the centre of our country seems not to always hear the suggestions or concerns from the west. Whenever anyone feels that his thoughts and ideas are not being heard it is frustrating. The more significant the issue, the more irritation is felt at being ignored or overlooked.

Historically there have been 44 advisory referenda or plebiscites held in Canadian provinces. Of these 44, 31 have been held in the four western provinces. So it is not surprising that many westerners believe that a referendum might be helpful. It is important to western Canadians and I believe to all Canadians that suggestions from all regions of our country be considered.

This government is doing that. This legislation says clearly we are seriously considering a referendum. If we decide that a referendum is the appropriate tool to use we will be ready and able to use it.

There are five possible ways to amend the Constitution of Canada. These five possibilities have been in place since the patriation of the Constitution in 1982. The general procedure in section 38 of the Constitution Act requires the consent of Parliament and seven of the provinces with 50 per cent of the population. This section of the amending formula is the one that the government is planning to use during this cycle of constitutional reform.

Some Canadians are wondering why the government can use this less stringent section of the amending formula when it was necessary to have all 10 provinces verify the Meech Lake Accord. The answer is that the Meech Lake Accord contained an amendment to the amending formula itself so it needed unanimity to be accepted.

The current proposal is not expected to include any amendments to the amending formula. Therefore, the current proposal is expected to need the approval of Parliament and the approval of seven provinces with 50 per cent of the population.

Some people wonder if there are safeguards to assure that the referendum is fair. This bill does not change any safeguards for fairness that are already established under Canadian law. The Canada Elections Act would provide the basic framework for the referendum and this includes practical aspects such as the qualifications of voters, et cetera.

The wording of the question posed in a referendum must be voted on and approved by both the House and the Senate. So there is no possibility, nor is there any wish on the government side, that this be a secretive process. If the government does decide to hold a referendum, a referendum proclamation must be issued within 45 days following the approval of the question that is to be put to the Canadian people.

Any federal referendum call today must be consistent with the Canadian charter of rights and fundamental freedoms. The advice we have suggests that limits on spending on umbrella committees, for the yes or the no sides, are not expected to meet the requirements of the charter and therefore are not included in the legislation.

In order for everyone to be aware of the major participants in a referendum campaign, groups which intend to participate in the referendum in a major way—that is anyone who intends to spend more than $5,000—must register and disclose all expenses and contributions, including the names of the contributors of over $250.

Some people have asked why the government is not required to register in the same way other campaign participants are if it spends on this campaign. The registration requirements in the bill are intended to make sure the public knows who is spending significant amounts of money to present their views. Government spending is already visible and governments are accountable to the public for all their spending.

There are other safeguards to ensure fairness. It is necessary that the referendum campaign be at least 36 days long and that gives everyone an opportunity to present his views. Free broadcasting time will be allocated equally to both sides of the question. There is no provision in the legislation for public funds to be given to those campaigning. There will be equal opportunity for all sides of the issue to purchase additional time in the media. It is also worth noting that there is a sunset clause included. That simply means in three years this legislation will cease to exist.

In closing, I would like to emphasize that the purpose of the legislation is to be ready to hold a referendum if the government wishes to do so. The government is listening to the Canadian people and wants them to continue their involvement in the constitutional process. There is strong regional support for a referendum on proposed constitutional change. The government is responding to this recommendation and is seriously considering the possibility. Finally, a federal referendum would be a fair referendum.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity this afternoon to make a few comments on Bill C–81, an act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada.

The first comment I would like to make concerns the title of the bill itself. It is my understanding from repeated comments by the Prime Minister and other members of the government that we are not going to have a referendum, if there is a vote at all. They keep talking about a plebiscite and it certainly piques my curiosity when we have a bill come before the House that refers to a referendum. I am not aware it even refers to the word "plebiscite" any place in the bill.

I am pleased the government has finally brought forward and introduced legislation. I can only say it is a start. I am certain the constituents in my riding of Prince Edward—Hastings are pleased because we in Prince Edward—Hastings, and we in the Liberal Party, have been calling on the government now for well over a year to come forward with some sort of enabling legislation.

At the present time Canadians are seeking direction. However, when we look at the legislation, it is noticeable that the government continues to act as though it thinks there is only one voice that Canadians need to hear and that is the government's voice. It thinks it is the voice of an infallible ruler.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. There is a debate going on in this part of this House. I would appreciate it if the gentlemen who wish to talk or discuss something would go behind the curtain.

Mr. Vanclief: Mr. Speaker, I began to wonder on which side of the House the debate was going on but I did check and my microphone was on and theirs was not.

I repeat that the government seems to think that it has the complete and only right to speak on behalf of Canadians on this issue. We know the folly of this notion because this is the same government that is jamming legislation down the throats of Canadians and has been for a number of years now. It is the same government that continues to lose its credibility with the Canadian public.

I do praise the government for bringing forward the legislation, but I fault the government for the quality of it. The government has unashamedly pronounced on the form of this legislation, reserving for itself the authority to determine the question, and that at a later date without any consultation. This, in spite of assurances over the past number of months from the highest ranks of the government benches, the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs and the Prime Minister, that opposition parties and the Canadian public would have input in the legislation.

I remind Canadians again, that did not happen. The bill was presented to the opposition parties. There was not any discussion whatsoever and it was presented as we see it here today.

The government has not only failed to consult on enabling legislation to conduct a plebiscite or referendum which I repeat should have happened, was promised to happen but it does not seem to realize that this is an issue of our nation's destiny. We must make it very clear to the Canadian public and to Parliament there may not be a vote at all, so let us not be naive enough to think that just because the legislation is there it is going to be used.

The reasons for that simply evade me. Why? I recognize as well as anyone the potential for divisiveness that a national referendum would hold but such a risk must be taken when the contrast to not doing it is the risk of not holding a vote at all.

My colleague from Cape Breton—East Richmond put it appropriately in the House yesterday. He said that Canadians:

> —are an intelligent and educated people and they usually demonstrate a remarkable sophistication in their political behaviour. The Canadian population of 1992 is as well prepared as a whole as any group of officials, elected or not, to make the decision on the basic structure of its government. It is unreasonable and unconscionable to suggest otherwise.

So I state again that the government has an obligation to conduct a vote.

This description definitely applies to the constituents in Prince Edward—Hastings riding who have regularly challenged me on every facet of the constitutional debate with insights that quite honestly continue to educate me well beyond the understanding of these issues that comes from many of the presentations and speeches I have heard in the House.

There are reasons why a referendum or a plebiscite must be held on this government's final constitutional package. A national vote would go a very long way toward addressing the public's cynicism, a cynicism which arose after the collapse of the Meech Lake proposals in the wake of the political engineering and the closed door negotiations that took place at that time.

Second, the final say in the matter rightfully belongs to the Canadian public. Third, a referendum will finally allow us as a country to put this matter to bed once and for all.

I do not believe that a referendum should be an option. It should be an obligation and it should be mandatory for the government to conduct one. In fact, a referendum should be mandatory before any future government proceeds to revise the Constitution of this country. The people must not be excluded from the process of changing the way they are governed.

The Constitution was created for people, not for politicians and bureaucrats, and being their property it is also their sole right to permit such changes. If a referendum is going to be held, it should go well beyond what Bill C–81 is proposing at the present time. As has been stated even by government members in the House here today, it needs to be fixed, it needs to be improved. The vote must be held nation–wide, giving every citizen in all regions of the country an opportunity to express their opinion on the same question or questions. I repeat, every citizen in all regions.

The results in order to carry any weight in the government's consideration of whether or not to proceed must reflect the clear majority of the will of the nation and the will of the nation as a whole, as well as the feeling and the will of each region. This will provide a clear demonstration of our collective will to remain united as a country, while at the same time preventing any misinterpretation, claiming the imposition of a constitutional arrangement by any portion of the nation on another portion of the nation.

Further on the issue of conducting a fair vote, this legislation must be amended to make the process transparent and equitable for all sides of the issue. I am glad to learn that there is some indication by the House leader today in an announcement that there will be some changes introduced and amendments introduced that will provide some spending limits on the registered committees.

We must ensure that the losing side will not be allowed to claim the vote was bought by the rich and the powerful. This means that both sides must somehow be limited in their over-all expenditures.

The government House leader said last week in the House and again this week in the House that he is open to amendments and changes to improve the bill. I hope we can take him and the government at their word. It needs some improvement. It needs to be changed. We must take the present Bill C-81 and fix it and make it better.

This is the challenge before us as a Parliament, it is the challenge before us as a country. I know that if the will and the desire is there, we can rise and meet that challenge.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I am rising to speak at second reading of Bill C-81, an act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada. It is very easy to support in principle the idea of a constitutional referendum. As my colleagues who have spoken before me have indicated, the principle of a referendum on constitutional matters is one that we support.

Now our challenge as parliamentarians is to look at the specifics. The specifics are very important in terms of defining what it is that we are setting out to do.

We all support the principle of hockey, if I might use it as an example. The rules in hockey have always been carefully outlined and understood by all the participants because the rules have been defined and upheld by a group with responsibilities, a group which for the most part has the respect of all the participants in that hockey game. Of course, I speak of the referees and the league itself which have set the rules.

Not your favourite team, Mr. Speaker, the Edmonton Oilers, not the Toronto Maple Leafs and certainly not the Vancouver Canucks or the Montreal Canadiens would step on the ice in a Stanley Cup final game without a referee. They certainly would not step on the ice without a set of rules. Not all of their skill, their determination, their energy or their emotion would help any of those teams succeed in their chosen goal and victory without division or discord if those rules were not understood, agreed upon and enforced with the co-operation of all of the players.

We are not playing hockey and the future of Canada is not a game. But as a country in crisis we are skating on very thin ice. We want to play the game. We want to enjoy the game. We want to enjoy our country with all its diversity, its history, its people and, more important, we want to enjoy its future, but discord and division is threatening our enjoyment of that future.

A national referendum in these exceptional circumstances is one way to ensure public participation in the decision-making process that will once again help us to enjoy our country, to enjoy the game and put the referee back on the ice in the most important game of the year.

When I speak to my constituents, the support for a referendum is almost universal. In fact, for most of my constituents the outline of how it is put together and run is somewhat secondary. For the most part they take it for granted that when a referendum is called, the rules will be in place and all you need is a question and they will help to provide the answer.

Mr. Speaker, you know from your own election experience that it is not that easy. Our task as parliamentarians is to provide the rules and make those rules acceptable not only here in the House of Commons, but to people right across Canada. Unless those rules are accepted by all the participants before the game begins, the results of that game may be held in suspect.

My colleagues from Yorkton—Melville and Churchill who spoke earlier outlined some of the matters of concern that they have and I share about this referendum bill. Those concerns are so great that they throw doubt on our ability to accept the principles laid down by this legislation. Therefore, we suspect that Canadians would not be well served if these are the only rules they have to play by. Those concerns, as outlined, include the fact that there are no spending limits, that cabinet alone can trigger the timing of the referendum; that the question to be asked will eventually be decided by government despite the discussion about parliamentary vote; there is no awaiting the results to ensure that the regions feel included in this whole process. That latter concern is my main concern at this moment.

The current constitutional debate in western Canada focuses primarily on the reform of the Senate. Why? Canadians feel left out of the process and, in fact, feel left out of the country because the decisions made in the populated centres of Canada, the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, are often made at the expense of the rest of the country because of that large population base in the centre of Canada.

Western Canadians feel let down by the House of Commons which is accountable to the population centres of the country. Therefore, they want a Senate that is more accountable to the regions and that serves as the hub of most of the argument we hear, not only in the coffee shops but in the forums and reviews brought before the Spicer commission and others.

Now we have a referendum bill which does exactly what western Canadians fear most. That is, leave in the hands of the voters of central Canada the powers of decision-making within constitutional reform. We have to get out of this way of thinking. We have to write the rules that will ensure that western Canadians are not again ignored in this process. There must be a way to ensure that the interpretation of the results of this non-binding referendum ensures that the government weighs the views of western Canadians well.

My colleague, the member for Yorkton—Melville, said yesterday in this House and I quote: "I think that it should not be possible to change the Constitution of Canada without the massive support of Canadians. If there were a national referendum on the federal government's major proposals like those in the report that the parliamentary committee published two months ago, and western Canadians were opposed, I think it should be out of the question to change our Constitution without western Canada's support".

I could not have said it better. The member for Yorkton—Melville outlined what I hear on the streets of my constituency daily in that very brief comment.

In an article in The Ottawa Citizen published May 17, the member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore, a referendum expert and a member of the government party said, and I quote: "If we call ourselves a democracy, we must not be afraid to use democratic procedures". Well, we are in the process of defining one of those democratic procedures and we are in the process of establishing the rules that will guide that democratic procedure.

In the spirit of co-operation which comes from my personal desire to rebuild a fragile Canadian Constitution, I urge the government to put its partisan desires aside and create a more acceptable, fair and equitable procedure to ensure that we have a strong referendum should it become necessary to do so. The Constitution, as has been said, does belong to the people of Canada, not the politicians. Therefore, is it asking too much that we create a referendum process that will over time help to rebuild this country and this nation? Is it too much to ask that Canadians are able to truly participate in the democratic decision-making process in this unique and unusual and most exceptional period of time, at a time when Canadians are more cynical about government than at any other time in our history? Is it too much to ask that government take the time to build an all-inclusive process that will help to rebuild respect for participatory democracy inside a united Canada? Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that is too much to ask. In fact, I consider it a very minimum.

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Mr. Speaker, the bill now before us could be an important factor in resolving some vital decisions at this stage in the political history of our nation. That is one reason why I am particularly gratified to have an opportunity to participate in this debate.

Like many other members here, I am sure, I have heard from a number of my constituents who expressed interest in the idea that they and all other Canadians could have some direct influence upon the decisions that are to be made about our Constitution. In fact, I have received some petitions signed by several hundred residents of Durham constituency. The wording of these petitions should be noted. They request a referendum in which the Canadian people could vote to accept or to reject constitutional amendments proposed by the government, with the result to be binding on Parliament.

While one can understand the reasoning behind that wording and even sympathize with it, the circumstances we are dealing with here do not permit such a final and binding public decision. I believe it would be useful and helpful to spend a few moments explaining why.

To begin with, I would suggest that it would be immensely helpful if all of us involved in this debate would use precise language when describing the type of vote that is proposed. In saying that, I must add an important qualifier; that I am only referring to those of us who speak in English. My capability in the other official language is such that I would not attempt to comment on the fine nuances. However, in the English language there are two words that do describe the type of popular vote proposed here. One is referendum, the other is plebiscite.

There is a difference in the meaning of these two words, a distinction that may seem subtle but that is also very important. Throughout much of the discussion the two words "referendum" and "plebiscite" have been used as though they were interchangeable and synonymous, which they are not. I fear that this could well be confusing and even misleading.

The Shorter Oxford English Dictionary defines plebiscite as, and I quote: "In modern politics a direct vote of the whole of the electors of a state to decide a question of public importance; also, by extension, a public expression with or without binding force of the wishes or opinion of a community". The same Oxford Dictionary gives this definition for referendum: "The act, practice or principle—of submitting the direct decision of a question at issue to the whole body of voters". In fact, a plebiscite is an expression of opinion by the people, with or without binding force; while in a referendum the voters are asked to make a direct and final decision.

It is extremely important for all Canadians to know and understand, if such a vote should prove necessary, that what they are being asked for is an expression of their opinion in a plebiscite. I understand that the government will bring forward an amendment to clarify the title and the language around this bill. Whether it is binding or not, that expression of opinion obviously would be a very significant consultative procedure. Elected politicians in our form of parliamentary democracy could only ignore the outcome at their own peril.

However, the vote in that plebiscite cannot decide the matter finally. For constitutional reasons it cannot be binding upon this Parliament or upon the legislatures of various provinces. There is a very simple reason for that, something that we do not have the power to change unilaterally. The formula for making constitutional amendments is enshrined in the Constitution itself. That formula, adopted by the federal government and the provinces in 1982, requires that any amendments to the Constitution must have the approval of at least seven provinces representing no less than 50 per cent of Canada's total population.

There is nothing this government or this Parliament can do to alter that without the agreement of the provinces. That obviously would be virtually impossible amidst the current ongoing constitutional negotiations. This Parliament has no power to tell the provinces what they must do on constitutional amendments.

These are very important considerations. While I have dwelt on them at some length, I believe it is essential that all Canadians have a clear understanding of exactly what we are doing with this legislation and why. There is some consensus that public dissatisfaction over the outcome of the Meech Lake negotiations was due as much to the process followed as to the actual content of the agreement. People felt that crucial decisions were being made about their future and that they were closed out of the discussions.

To be fair to all politicians involved in the Meech Lake discussions, the process was not their fault. They had to use the only procedure that was then available to them. However, today and in the future Canada's people must also have a part in that process.

I recognize that there could well be a requirement for a constitutional plebiscite within the coming months. However I also believe that this form of public consultation, be it through a plebiscite or a referendum, should only be used on rare occasions when needed to settle the most contentious issues.

One reason that I suggest such restriction is the tremendous expense involved. It is estimated that the cost of holding any plebiscite would exceed $100 million, and this is at a time when all of us are deeply concerned about government expenditures and reducing the deficit and national debt.

Any such vote on any contentious and emotional issue carries the risk of being very divisive and it could accentuate the existing divisions within our country. I am told by those who voted in the 1942 conscription plebiscite that is exactly what happened then; communities, provinces, religious and language groups became pitted against each other. To this day in my area there are families who still bear the emotional scars of that conscription plebiscite.

All of us have heard about the family members in Quebec who took opposing sides in the 1980 sovereignty referendum and who still, 12 years later, have not been able to reconcile or heal those fractures.

We must do all we can to ensure that Canadians understand that this legislation is a necessary precautionary measure, that it will permit the federal government to consult all Canadians if that will bring the current round of constitutional negotiations to a successful conclusion.

Mr. Richardson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Pursuant to Standing Order 26(1) I would move that this House continue to sit beyond the daily hour of adjournment for the continuation of second reading of Bill C-81, an act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada.

• (1810)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Unless we have unanimous consent it cannot be done under a point of order. Do we have unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that it cannot be done under a point of order, it has to be done during debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, the House of Commons is currently examining Bill C-81, legislation that will enable the federal government to hold a national referendum on the Canadian Constitution.

The Canadian experience in that field has not been successful. The current Constitution does not provide for a binding referendum. Consequently, our referendum will only be consultative.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order please. Could I have just a little order? I would like to hear the hon. member's speech.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, since Confederation, Canada used the consultative referendum approach twice: the first time in 1898 on the prohibition issue, and the second time in 1942 on the conscription issue. That last experience left a bitter feeling among a lot of Canadians. On the other hand, in the current political context, where people want to take a more active part in the debate, instead of leaving the decision to the elected representatives, the referendum approach deserves serious consideration.

Mr. Speaker, it is a change of policy for me who used to oppose referendums, but since this government has destroyed or has almost finished destroying the people's trust in politicians, I think that, today, we must let the people decide on such important issues as the future of our country.

In so doing, we will have to pursue the objective of a new Constitution that will preserve the linguistic duality, the regional interests and the national unity. That is why on April 21, 1991, the Liberal leader was the first to suggest the idea of a national referendum by proposing a nine-point action plan, including a national referendum with a double majority.

For the Liberal caucus, it is clear that all Canadians must be consulted and, consequently, be able to express themselves on the same issues in all parts of the country. It is clear that in addition to a national majority, the constitutional amendment proposal must be approved by every region of the country. The Atlantic provinces, Quebec, Ontario, the western provinces and the territories would thus have a veto. In that way, the double majority protects regional interests against an imposed national will.

If one of the regions decided to reject the proposal, the federal government should not follow through with its constitutional amendment project as presented.

Liberals regret that the Conservative government did not include this double majority provision in the bill before the House. Also, in order to keep this referendum from being divisive, the government must ensure that it has an appropriate set of rules since, as was noted by the Royal Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Financing, and I quote: "Such a mechanism can easily fall into the hands of wealthy interest groups."

That is why the Liberal caucus believes it is important to limit spending by both the yes and the no sides. We believe that a referendum must take place in all fairness. We favour umbrella committees and a reasonable spending limit by each side of the issue.

Canadians do not want the result to be bought; they want it to be well deserved. Unfortunately, the Conservative government's Bill C-81 contains no spending ceiling.

Announced a year ago in the Speech from the Throne on May 13, 1991, the legislation on a national referendum was presented to the House a year later. The referendum process is off to a bad start. Let us be honest: the Conservative government had promised to consult the opposition parties. It did not consult us. It informed the House leaders of its plan—that is all.

I suspect that the government's intention with this bill is to set up a mechanism for calling a snap federal election. At least that is what clause 38 of the bill leads us to believe. It says that no enumeration shall be required if an election is called within a year of the referendum date. Furthermore, no clause in the bill says that the government must consult the opposition parties on the wording of the referendum question.

The government has proposed only three days of parliamentary debate on the wording of the question, thus restricting, in my view, the right of members of this House to speak on the question. Nevertheless, it is important for members to ensure that their constituents are perfectly aware of what they will be asked to vote on. The government's failure to consult here is a bad omen for what this referendum campaign has in store for us.

We Liberals, Mr. Speaker, think that any constitutional change at this time should be approved by all Canadians and all regions of this country, not only one province, but all regions. Canada's future depends on the choice that we will have to make. We think that the final decision must belong to the people directly.

[English]

While I may support holding a referendum in principle there are a number of aspects of this bill which concern me. One of these aspects is the absence of spending limits on referendum expenditures. There are no spending limits in Bill C-81. The only provisions are that groups spending more than $5,000 on a referendum campaign must be registered and contributions over $250 must be declared.

Without a ceiling on spending by various groups during a referendum campaign the process will be flawed because the amount of money a group has to spend will become more important than the free democratic expression of Canadians.

Canadians do not want a result that has been bought. They want a result that is fair and deserved. The question of spending limits is a question of fairness, not of freedom.

We have only to look at the example of the last election to show us the dangers inherent in the absence of spending limits. The report of the Royal Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Financing notes: "Third parties, including individuals, corporations, labour unions and other groups spent more than $4.7 million on advertising for the 1988 campaign—most of the money was spent on the issue of free trade—four times as much money was spent to promote free trade as to oppose it".

We do not want to repeat the experience of the 1988 election, particularly when the unity of our country, Canada, is at sake. The referendum campaign must not become a free-for-all with those with the biggest wallets dominating the debate. The government may argue that spending limits contravene the right of freedom of expression as guaranteed by section 2 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

We can look at the Alberta court decision in 1984, brought on by the challenge from the National Citizens' Coalition. This decision found that the relevant section of the Canada Elections Act on spending limits on a third party was an unjustified restriction on freedom of expression.

The federal government decided not to act on this decision by the Alberta court. Furthermore, Elections Canada decided not to enforce the law, even though the court decision was not binding outside of Alberta. The result of these decisions, as the report of the electoral reform notes, was to destroy:

• (1820)

> —the overall effectiveness of the legislative framework for promoting fairness in the exercise of freedom of expression and of democratic rights during Canadian elections—Without fairness, we may continue to have a "free" society, but we would certainly diminish the "democratic character of our society".

However, the charter does provide for reasonable limits on the freedoms guaranteed by the charter.

In the exceptional case of a referendum, it seems to me we should carefully examine the danger of uncontrolled spending by various groups versus a reasonable limit on freedom of expression.

If the government hesitates to go to court on this matter, why not refer—and the government can do it—this matter to the Supreme Court of Canada for a decision on whether spending limits contravene the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. If the government was concerned about democracy it could have done so. It had the time to do so in the last year, it could have done so earlier.

In conclusion, I want to quote from an opinion by Professor E. P. Mendes, Faculty of Law, University of Western Ontario.

> I would suggest the appropriate standard is that laid down by Justice Sopinka in the R. v. Butler decision that Parliament is entitled to have a "reasonable apprehension of harm" resulting from the dangers which the legislation is attempting to avoid. It would be quite easy for the government to have proved in an appeal from Justice Medhurst's decision that there is a reasonable apprehension of harm resulting from unlimited spending during elections or referendums.
> Perhaps the reasons why the government did not appeal Justice Medhurst's decision and why they do not wish to put spending limits in any referendum legislation have nothing to do with Charter of Rights and Freedoms or with law at all.

I claim that Professor Mendes' decision is something of which we should take note.

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to enter into this debate. I welcome the opportunity to say a few remarks on this potential plebiscite or referendum facing our nation.

Before I say anything on the bill, I would like to praise the member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore, a truly democratic Conservative, for a long time a voice in the wilderness, someone who has been promoting referendums, plebiscites, and more direct democracy. I think a lot of praise is due my colleague.

I would also like to thank the federal government and the Prime Minister, for considering the referendum, the plebiscite legislation. It is a big step for the government to be considering this kind of a method of solving some of our nation's problems.

I would like particularly to take this opportunity to say thank you as well on behalf of my constituents to the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs. He is trying to do his best for Canada. He is in his 20th year in federal politics. Twenty years is a long time to serve your country. There have not been all that many wins. There have been a lot of difficulties and failures along the way for anyone in public life that long. I would just like to pass along my thanks to him.

He is doing something for Canada, and most of the people in this Chamber are doing something for Canada too. The people who are here right now to debate this bill are doing something for Canada. The people here care enough to make sure the right legislation is going to be in place to ensure the future of our country.

A few moments ago those watching this debate could not hear but there are a few people in this Chamber who are taking exception to some of the remarks I am making. They are members of a political party that has been an obstruction to this country.

It is tough to sit in this Chamber sometimes and look across and see a few members who do not share a vision of Canada but who view this nation as being broken, battered, bloodied and knocked down in the world stage, from being a modern country that most people in the world die to live in to some Third World country which would have an economy just a fraction of the size that it is today.

Maybe that is a good thing. Maybe it is a good thing there are separatists in this Chamber now. Maybe that will help wake up a few people. Maybe the whole referendum and plebiscite situation will in the end be good. It may take people and shake them by the shoulders and say to them that your country is at risk. Your country is at risk because there are people who sit in the federal House of Commons, in Parliament, who want the destruction of this country. I think if some of my constituents are wakened by that it will have been a worth-while, useful exercise.

In terms of referendum or plebiscite or whatever we are going to call it I would just like to say, based on the feedback from my constituents of Halton—Peel, that this is something they very much want. It is very much the kind of thing they have been asking for, that is a direct mechanism to become involved in what has turned into an all too long constitutional debate.

As with everything else there are good things and bad things about direct democracy. There are risks and rewards, plebiscites and referenda. I think back to the Meech Lake accord experience. The polls showed us after Meech Lake failed that roughly 70 per cent of Canadians did not agree with Meech. However, the same poll showed us that about 73 per cent of Canadians did not know what was in the Meech Lake package. Had there been a referendum, direct democracy, a plebiscite on the failure of the Meech Lake accord or the success of it, it would have failed. Circumstances led to that failing anyway.

There were other influences at play during the time the Meech Lake accord was being discussed. A lot of my constituents were probably turned off the whole package by Quebec's language laws and changes to those laws which were brought in around the same time and which a lot of people confused with what was in the Meech Lake accord.

It is ironic now that my constituents may see the day coming before long when they are asked to vote in a plebiscite on something that essentially may ratify what was in the Meech Lake accord that most people did not understand and rejected.

The question could be asked whether this is the right time for a plebiscite or a referendum. Maybe it is the right time after the Spicer commission, after the Beaudoin–Edwards report on constitutional change, after the Dobbie–Beaudoin report on the specifics of how our country may be renewed, after all those constitutional conferences that hopscotched across the country ever week, after the "ordinary Canadians" were involved in this whole process and after all the weekly meetings of bureaucrats and the meeting now in Montreal. After all these steps maybe it is time to test the waters of democracy, to take the risk, to take the gamble, to take the leap of faith.

We will likely have one more step and that may be a first ministers' conference in perhaps a week or two or three. We do not know that. The first ministers will obviously be trying to come up with a negotiated settlement. At that point the referendum or plebiscite future will be cast in stone. We will know whether we will have one in order to break a logjam or whether we will have one in order to ratify an agreement that has been negotiated by our first ministers.

In any case, there are important rules for all of us in this campaign. Individual members of Parliament have an obligation, a responsibility to use their offices and their resources to make sure their constituents know what they will be voting on. There is nothing more important than public education in this whole thing. Whether you agree that Canada should be saved and remodelled or whether you agree that Canada should be split, divided and broken, whatever you think, you should know what you are voting on. Members of Parliament from all sides have to use their offices to make sure we are telling people the truth.

Government has a role. Federal and provincial governments all have a role in making sure that the issues are understood if and when this plebiscite arrives. We all have a responsibility to make sure that the propaganda, the empty rhetoric, the lies, the untruths and the misrepresentation of those who want to destroy Canada are fully explained, are dissected and are shown to people.

I noticed in a newspaper article yesterday that the bill we are debating now, and I will read the sentence, "was greeted in the Commons with howls of dismay from the opposition and the threat of court action from the Bloc Quebecois". If the Bloc Quebecois is so worried, so scared, so frightened of this particular legislation that it is willing to take the government to court, we might be on the right track here. We might be doing the right thing if the separatists who sit in this Chamber are so mortified at the idea of going to their own people for a choice. We are probably on the right track.

The referendum, the plebiscite campaign marks the beginning of the battle for Canada. Let us make no mistake about it. The stakes are that big.

The weapon in the battle for Canada this time—it is not like the Battle of Britain, it is not like the other battles we have seen, it is not weapons and artillery, planes or bullets. We have one weapon in the battle for Canada, and it is the truth. We want to tell the truth to Canadians about what is going on.

In Quebec right now the leader of the Block Quebecois and the leader of the Parti Quebecois are going around that province telling people: "You can be independent, you can go from Canada, you can leave Canada and all you do is say that you are no longer part of Canada and you are no longer subject to their laws".

They are also telling them in Quebec: "You can take a hike from Canada and you can still use a Canadian passport. You will still be protected by the Canadian military, you can use the Canadian dollar, you can have access to the Canadian economy and you can even have the Queen". They are telling them all this stuff.

They do not want to hear it. They are so afraid that right now somebody in Montreal is listening to this debate.

What will happen if they take a hike from Canada? It is gone. Canada is finished. There are people in my riding who are not going to let the separatists think they can take a walk from Canada and still have the Bank of Canada setting low interest rates and taking care of monetary policies. There are people in my riding who say there is no way their tax dollars, $12 billion a year, is going to go for the Canadian military to protect—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. I would like the hon. member for Shefford to take his seat or else go behind the door. Please. The hon. member for Halton—Peel has the floor.

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): There are other people who are separatist from the rest of Canada as well. I will give these guys a break right now.

There are people who are separatists from other regions of Canada. There is Preston Manning and the Reform Party. Do you know what Preston Manning is saying? It is interesting that the House leader for the Bloc Quebecois is giving me a hard time. He is one of the biggest fans that Preston Manning's got. Do you know why? Preston Manning says: "Let Quebec go and determine itself".

Mr. Lapierre: Self-determination.

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): That is right. Preston Manning says: "Give Quebec the right of self-determination. Let Quebec define itself and if it leaves that's fine. Let the rest of Canada define itself. Perhaps there is an economic union between the two of them". It sounds an awful lot like what we are hearing from the Bloc Quebecois.

When you think about it, Preston Manning and the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean have the same goals, to sever Canada and to become princes of their own little fiefdoms. For the rest of us in the Chamber, no way.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, this evening I want to speak in favour of the concept of Bill C-81, the referendum legislation.

We in the Official Opposition agree with the idea of a referendum. In fact we have been calling for a referendum for over a year. When our leader presented his nine point plan back in April of 1991, a referendum was one of the main points.

We believe that the Constitution belongs to the people, not to the politicians, not to the government, not to the bureaucrats, but to the people.

The Constitution differs from other laws because it is the basic law of the land. It is the Constitution which gives the Parliament of Canada authority, as well as the federal government and provincial governments. We believe that all Canadians should be consulted and that they should have a final say in this constitutional reform package.

This government has been flip-flopping for more than a year on the question of a constitutional referendum. In the throne speech of May 1991 it promised referendum legislation. In the early fall of that year it backed away from the promise and then by November the referendum was back on again. Then it was off again.

Now we have legislation before us, Bill C-81. However, this legislation does not say that a referendum will be held, it says that a referendum may be held. In other words, it does not require the government to hold one. I believe that is the fundamental flaw in this legislation.

A referendum is the only way to give real legitimacy to the constitutional reform package. The people of Canada will no longer accept backroom deals. We had the Meech Lake round, and as we heard the Prime Minister admit and say, he rolled the dice. Canadians want a chance to say yes to each other and yes to Canada.

A second flaw in this bill, and I believe it is a major flaw, is that it ignores the principle of regional majorities. I believe there must be a double majority. In other words, there must be a majority of Canadians who vote for the constitutional reform package, but on top of that there must be a majority in the different regions of Canada.

This bill does not require that. It does not require that there be a majority in each region. It does not require that each region must agree with or support the constitutional proposal. I think that regional majorities are important. If we had a referendum and a region of Canada, such as the western part of Canada, voted against the constitutional package then I do not think we should proceed.

I believe that there should be a double majority, that across Canada the majority of Canadians agree but there also should be a majority in each region. Otherwise, for the government to push ahead would cause disunity and division within the country.

A third weakness in this legislation that we have before us is in the process of writing the question that Canadians would be asked. It is very important what the question is, how it is worded and how it is put.

In the past in Canada the three political parties have worked together on many matters of great national importance, This certainly happened during the 1981-82 constitutional process as well as during the 1987-88 constitutional process. There is no reason why all three parties should not be actively involved in writing the referendum question.

Yet this is a government that has failed to consult the opposition on the legislation we have before us today. It promised that it would consult the opposition. It promised that its members would consult us. Yet all the government did was inform us as to what would be in this legislation.

Furthermore, this legislation does not provide for any consultation on the question that would be in the referendum with opposition parties.

• (1840)

I think that is wrong. The other parties should be consulted. The question should not be worked out exclusively by the government. The government proposes only three days of debate on this very crucial referendum question. Three days. Unless the debate is extended it would mean that only 25 per cent of the members in this House of Commons would be able to speak on this question.

On top of that, the opposition members would not be allowed to propose any substantial changes. They could make only minor amendments to the legislation.

That is another thing that is wrong with this. In such an important matter only 25 per cent of the members of this House will have the opportunity to take part, and the 25 per cent who can speak would not be allowed to make any meaningful amendments to the question.

There is no reason, no reason at all, for the government not to consult the opposition on this important issue.

Finally, the referendum fails to address significant proposed changes to the Canadian Elections Act that were recommended by the royal commission. One concerns spending limits. I certainly am one who feels that there must be spending limits, otherwise people with the money will be able to hire the best PR people and the best organizers, and then maybe it will be money that will change the results. It is important that we have limits because it is only with limits that Canadians will perceive this referendum as being fair.

If it is perceived as being unfair by Canadians then the losing side will say: "Well, it was manipulated, it was bought". I feel very strongly that there must be spending limits.

I know that my time is running out. However, I want to repeat that I support the concept of a referendum. I feel that the referendum must be mandatory, not optional as is provided for in this legislation; it must include the principle of regional majorities or it is not fair, and there must be spending limits.

I have other concerns as well. However, in the limited time that I have those were the three points I wanted to mention.

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, 12 years ago to the day, following the referendum in Quebec, I was standing there with the Leader of the Opposition, the Prime Minister, Claude Ryan and all the others that had supported the no campaign. We were promised a renewed federalism. In 1982 with the patriation of the Constitution, English Canada got a renewed federalism, but Quebec was left on the sideline.

Following the election of the Liberal Party of Quebec in 1985, one of the first issues discussed at the National Assembly had to do with finding a common ground to allow Quebec to reintegrate the Canadian Federation with dignity.

That resulted in the Meech Lake accord, which had been ratified by ten premiers as well as the Prime Minister of the country. We know the outcome of this sad story: on June 23 1990, the Meech Lake accord died. Since then, we have spent practically two years talking about the Constitution in this House, while industries close down, thousands of people lose their jobs, our young people experience problems, and our old people are looking for security. We in this House try to destroy rather than build. Mr. Speaker, contrary to those who might claim that this destruction is caused by the Bloc Quebecois members, it is English Canada that has simply refused to allow Quebec to reintegrate the Canadian Constitution.

Now we are debating Bill C-81. This is a fraud; it is a diversion to create confusion, given the fact that it will be an empty consultive process that will cost Canadians and Quebecers some $110 million. This is ridiculous. It is ridiculous because it has no legal value. This referendum will not change anything; it will not solve any problems because people representing the government have told us that they do not want to hold a referendum; it is just in case.

We found that out today at the federal-provincial constitutional conference that is being held in Montreal. They waited to be in Montreal to create a common front of five anglophone provinces asking for an elected, equal and effective Senate. We know that Quebec is against that, as is Ontario, but what is worse is the fact that the same English provinces are telling Quebec that there will be no right of veto for Quebec or a distinct society as described in the Beaudoin-Dobbie report.

This is a far cry from the Meech Lake Accord, from the five small conditions that would have enabled Quebec to reintegrate the Canadian Constitution. However, Quebec is no longer interested in that stuff. We no longer talk about language, culture and the civil code. This is no longer what Quebec seeks. Indeed, the Liberal Party of Quebec approved the Allaire report during its congress in 1991. That report recommended 24 powers for Quebec: a major decentralization. On the other hand, Canada precisely wants to keep a strong central government. That is where the problem lies. We understand that in Quebec. We do not want to keep English Canada from continuing to have a strong central government. We agree on that. But we are also agree that Quebec wants to decentralize to the point of forming a country. The country that is missing within this Canada is the state of Quebec, next to it. We want friendly relations and exchanges. But from a political point of view, Quebec wants to choose its own laws. And that is the fundamental principle that the members of the Bloc Quebecois stand up for on this side of the House. We want to protect the higher interests of Quebec.

A while ago I was listening to some members who were calling us separatists. Maybe they should look at themselves in a mirror, Mr. Speaker. They are the ones who refused us access to the Canadian Constitution. As a matter of fact, we should remind the hon. members who accuse us, members of the Bloc Quebecois, of being illegitimate, that all the Quebec members in this House are illegitimate since we do not belong to the Canadian federation, being left out in 1990.

Before passing such judgment, maybe members on the government side should look at themselves. When polls for the last two years or so give them 13 per cent, one wonders whether even their own family members are going to vote for them. We worry about that, because this could split families, recreate all over again the situation we experienced in the eighties with the referendum.

In the interest of English Canada as well as Quebec, we should pay more attention to the referendum which should be held in Quebec before October 26, 1992. Let Quebecers decide their own political future. We should wait until that referendum. We respected the result in 1980, so why all the tricks now, especially within a bill which allows unlimited spending. There is no Yes umbrella organisation and no No umbrella organisation.

We learned today on the 6 o'clock news that the government might propose amendments to, precisely, limit spending—

An hon. member: A fraud.

Mr. Rocheleau: An umbrella committee will not be able to spend more that $10 million. That is one committee, but you can have any number of them. It is farcical, Mr. Speaker, it is the rape of democracy.

We consider it unfortunate that hon. members from Quebec should be willing to go along with that. One wonders whether it is not simply a way for this government, which is in trouble and does not find support in the population, to use public funds in a referendum, since it will be able to spend at will. By the way, you might have noticed that on TV, every evening, every day, during intermissions, during hockey games, "O Canada" is being sung about every five minutes.

In the interest of Canada and Quebec, I hope that opposition members, and indeed the Conservative members from Quebec, will refuse to venture into something which could have dire consequences for the future of Canada as well as of Quebec.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak briefly on this bill. This is a piece of legislation that has attracted a lot of attention.

I think, though, the important thing to do is not so much to focus on the piece of legislation but to recognize what this legislation does, once passed through this House. It will give the government the power to hold a plebiscite or a referendum to consult the people of Canada on the future constitutional agreements that we reach and the arrangement that we collectively come to, if it should be decided that referendum is important or that referendum is necessary.

We should consider this on a number of levels. Perhaps the most important is the role that the Canadian public can play in expressing its views on the Constitution. The second clearly would be the role that a referendum could play in ensuring that this country stays together, to break a deadlock and to confirm a consensus that may be there.

We would be fooling ourselves entirely if we did not recognize that a referendum, whether or not we like it, rightly or wrongly has some inherent difficulties and some inherent dangers as my friends and colleagues from Quebec well know. As anybody familiar with the recent history of Newfoundland and Labrador will know, a referendum hangs on. It stays. The wounds that it creates are long term and very serious.

We should recognize that perhaps the most important debate in this House should a referendum become necessary will be the debate surrounding what form the question will take and what it will be. The debate over the last two days has been very fruitful and it is important that it continue.

Therefore, pursuant to Standing Order 26(1), I move:

That this House continue to sit beyond the ordinary hour of daily adjournment for the continuation of second reading of Bill C-81, an act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada.

And more than 15 members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 26(2), the motion is deemed to have been withdrawn.

Mr. Winegard: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. An agreement could not be reached under the provisions of Standing Order 78(1) or Standing Order 78(2) with respect to an allocation of time to the second reading of Bill C-81, an act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada.

Under the provisions of Standing Order 78(3), I give notice of my intention to move a time allocation motion at the next sitting of the House for the purpose of allocating a specified number of days or hours for the consideration and disposal of proceedings at that stage of the bill.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate on behalf of the constituents of Cardigan, Prince Edward Island, for a very short period of time on Bill C-81, the referendum legislation.

My constituents, like all Canadians, welcome the decision of the government to pass referendum legislation. However, Canadians regret that it took the government so long to understand exactly what the people of Canada truly want.

On April 21, 1991, the leader of the Liberal Party of Canada gave a speech in Montreal on the Constitution. In that speech he called for a national referendum on the Constitution. Indeed, the government picked up on the idea and mentioned in the throne speech last May that it would seek a way to consult Canadians on this important issue.

Unfortunately it has taken the government a full year to act on its promise. Unfortunately I guess my time is up.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired. I know it would have been a great speech.

It being seven o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(6) the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

SECURITY INTELLIGENCE SERVICE ACT

COMMUNICATIONS SECURITY ESTABLISHMENT

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should amend the Canadian Security Intelligence Service Act (CSIS Act) to authorize the Security Intelligence Review Committee (SIRC) to review the operations of the Communications Security Establishment (CSE).

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to address this item of Private Members' Business which I consider a most important issue. I understand that other members of this House feel the same way.

The motion asks for the government to amend the Security Intelligence Service Act to authorize the Security Intelligence Review Committee to review the business affairs of CSE, the Communications Security Establishment.

This issue has been floating around this House for a couple of years now with virtually no adequate material response on the part of the government.

The first thing I want to do is describe the agency which, for all intents and purposes, is unchecked or unmonitored by Parliament or other external agencies within government.

This particular agency has a budget of about $250 million. I say "about" because no one in this House knows what the budget is other than, perhaps, two or three ministers who sit on the Privy Council Committee on Security and Intelligence.

The second thing we know is that it has about 850 employees, about, but we are not sure. We are also advised that approximately 1,100 Department of National Defence employees work in the endeavour.

What is the endeavour? It is twofold. The Communications Security Establishment provides information, advice and consultation to government departments on the security of their communications. That is internal-external security so that when communications are made in any mode, they are secure and, hopefully, unmonitored by parties who might want to monitor them.

The second role, and this is the one I speak mostly to this evening, is that of signals intelligence gathering. This $250 million a year agency gathers communications signals, basically out of the air, not just in Canada but elsewhere in the world from its bases wherever it has access. We do not know where all those bases are for the same reason we were not told the budget or the number of employees or a lot of other things the agency does. We do know where the agency's office is located and we do know who the head of the agency is.

Before I go further I would like to give some credit, although I am a little sheepish about doing it. I have to give some credit to The Globe and Mail, not to the government, for investing a lot of time and hours in researching this Communications Security Establishment. Its series of articles on this by Mr. Peter Moon was quite a good series and provided yours truly with basically the only blueprint, the only collected set of information about this particular agency. That, I suggest to Canadians, should be an insult to them; not the good work of The Globe and Mail but the fact that Canada's Parliament does not have this information and cannot get it.

Why is Parliament interested? Let us review quickly the role of Parliament. In essence, there are books written about the role of Parliament but it boils down to a couple of basics. One of them is that the Crown, the government, does not tax the people without the consent of Parliament and, second, it does not spend the people's money without the consent of Parliament.

Parliament does other things in that role. That includes legislating, that is passing the laws that authorize the spending. Parliament also monitors government. Parliament is separate from government. It monitors in its committees and other processes what government does on behalf of Canada's citizens.

I want to point out that CSE, notwithstanding all the things that it does, bears no relation to any of those functions because there is no statute governing CSE. There is no statutory law that describes what CSE is or what it does. We will get into a bit more detail later as to what CSE does. As well, there is no law or instrument that sets out the mandate for CSE. No one really knows precisely what CSE is mandated to do.

I am saying this from the floor of Parliament, whose job it is to know what government is doing. There is no specific accountability for its spending. I cannot determine what kind of money it spends. The $250 million figure that I just bounced before the House I think came from The Globe and Mail study because I cannot get it in any of the committees. It is simply not there.

For all the other reasons we have just discussed, there is no monitoring because CSE sits out there beyond the reach of most of the parliamentary scrutiny devices and monitoring devices. The bottom line is that there is no accountability by this agency for what it does and for what it spends. That is an unfortunate circumstance. I am hopeful that the process here in Parliament, which includes the debate on this motion, will provide a solution that is acceptable to the security and intelligence framework that we have in this country and which is acceptable to Parliament.

I have no doubt that the taxpayers, the people who pay the bills, are of the view that Parliament has to satisfy itself. We here in this House, all of the members, have to assure ourselves on behalf of our electors that this agency is operating within a law—there is not a law now—and that it is spending properly our tax dollars.

This signals intelligence gathering began during the last war. As far as I can ascertain, it was not until the year 1975 that there was any legal reference to it in government records. It is a pretty pitiful list of references. There is a series of three statutory orders which are expressed or articulated as subsidiary legislation of other statutes. I think one is the Treasury Board, another is the Financial Administration Act and the other is the Public Service Employment Act, all basically exempting this particular agency, which had come into being, from any scrutiny under those agencies.

Just so that you know this is non-partisan, the government that did that was a Liberal government in 1975. There has basically been no change. It could have been any government. The environment in the 1950s, the 1960s and the 1970s was I think very much different in terms of civil liberties than the environment is today. I hope it is different in relation to government accountability.

One of the problems at CSE, one of the reasons why we find it difficult in Parliament to monitor it, is that the government, probably not by design but just by historical evolution, has permitted the agency's existence to divide into two separate pieces. They are as follows:

The agency in 1975 was moved from the National Research Council where it must have been a "project" for many years. It moved to the Department of National Defence and it exists there today as a section of the Department of National Defence. Presumably, there is a colonel or a general who, I believe, is unnamed who has administrative responsibility for this. That is, financial and administrative responsibility lies with the Department of National Defence.

However, who controls the policy and operations—and the real word here is operations—the day-to-day functioning, the things it does? The answer to that is the Privy Council Office. The Privy Council Office is basically the Prime Minister's Office. It is the office of public servants who run the Prime Minister's function in this country.

As far as I know, the Privy Council Office does not account to any parliamentary committee, especially in terms of operations which they call top secret, top secret umbra—we will not go into too much jargon here—or simply secret.

Little guys like us in this House of Commons probably would never get within a hundred feet of that secret or top secret information, most of which we do not have to get close to anyway. But when we are monitoring we have to have the ability to find out what is going on.

What is my concern about CSE? What is our concern in Parliament? Is it just a spending and monitoring issue? No, it is not. In particular, this agency has the comprehensive ability to eavesdrop anywhere it wants. I am talking about total comprehensive eavesdropping, principally based on eavesdropping of electromagnetic signals or transmissions.

Anything that moves and creates a pattern is ascertainable by this agency, by its net. It has an intelligence-gathering net. There is an additional wrinkle in this which I will get to later. But all electronic signals, everything that moves in Canada, is trappable, receivable, nettable. All phone conversations, all fax machine transmissions, all radio frequencies, even those that are encoded and encrypted, are trapped or trappable within the net used world-wide by CSE and its brother or sister components in other countries.

This is going on right now. They could be listening to me right now, quite possibly. They certainly could. This is certainly carried on with our internal monitoring system. Now they probably do not want to listen to me, but they might be. They have a net that is capable of doing that. They have a net world-wide capable of picking up this information and screening it through one of only three CRAY supercomputers in this country. That is a very expensive piece of machinery, but it basically is able to analyze all of these signals and, I suppose, to read them using key words, and to draw out those which it wishes to retain. It puts them into its own coded retaining language. These are then submitted to further analysis in Canada, the U.K., the U.S.A., Australia, or in other countries.

That is what they are capable of doing. That is why we are concerned that this agency is not monitored.

I want to mention the problem of reciprocal exchange agreements between CSE and other countries. The United States National Security Agency is perfectly capable of listening to what I am saying now. If it wants to listen, it does it. It has satellite transmission capability as well as satellite networks and earth transmission networks, and CSE is a part of it. It is not illegal. It is listening from up in space or some place else. It is doing it from Buffalo. It does not matter.

If it is listening, and it is capable of doing it, it takes the data to Maryland or West Virginia to the National Security Agency where it is coded. If Canada wants that information, CSE can get it. It runs it through the super computer checking for key words. It sees somebody is talking about CSE. All of that can happen. The Australians can do it, the British can do it. It is that trading, that subcontracting capability that we are not able to monitor.

We do not know whether data that we are using in Canada is obtained legally, illegally in other countries, whether it is eavesdropping, whether it is a breach of Canadian statutes, U.K. statues, Australian statutes, French statutes. They are getting the data and they are using it, we think for a good purpose. We know it is for a good purpose. It is for our national security. That covers a lot of territory.

Now that we know it is out there and the capability is there, all of our privacy is therefore at risk. We are not monitoring in this country.

What has Parliament said about this? A couple of years ago Parliament did a five-year review of the CSIS statute, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service Act. I served on that committee, as did two or three other members in this House here now. They are here because they are concerned about it. They had a number of things to say about this.

First, they wanted to note the capability and they ended up by making a recommendation. Even though CSE was not part of CSIS, it gives data information to CSIS. That was confirmed. The committee recommended that Parliament formally establish the CSE by statute, which does not exist now, and second, establish the Security Intelligence Review Committee, which already exists to oversee CSIS, as the body responsible for monitoring, reviewing and reporting to Parliament on the activities of CSE concerning its compliance with the laws of Canada. That was the recommended solution.

The recommendation was not adopted. I want to refer to the government's response to that report. It admitted the problem. I do not accept the statement that "a broad accountability system for CSIS is in place". I am not going to go through the details. It is not there. I am telling this House as a member that the accountability is not there.

Even if there is some Public Service accountability, which I am not familiar with, there certainly is not in this House. "Nevertheless, such an accountability system can always be improved and the government has been considering providing the Minister of National Defence with some additional capacity for review of CSE. Once the decision is taken—", et cetera. There is no mention of Parliament, no mention of parliamentary accountability.

The Security Intelligence Review Committee made reference to it in its 1991 report. The former chairman of the Security Intelligence Review Committee, Mr. Ron Atkey, stated recently in an interview: "We need a system that will provide some accountability and some assurance to you as a private citizen that you are not being abused". To date, we do not have that.

The government's response to that committee was inadequate. It did nothing. Members were so dissatisfied with the response of that report that from all sides they created a parliamentary subcommittee to deal with national security.

Someone has said that CSE is accountable to the general law. That is true, but they are in the same area that the RCMP was in 15 years ago. Mounties who were sworn to uphold the law broke the law with the barn burning incident some 15 years ago.

If the Mounties were able to break the law, if they fell into that trap, how much more likely is it that civilians not sworn in the same way would also break the law? I am not accusing anybody. It is a problem. I want to encourage this House to adopt this motion. I want to make Canadians aware this is a matter of very serious and important unfinished business, and that a statute and legislation are necessary.

• (1920)

Canadians must have this degree of accountability. They should insist upon it. I am hoping the House will adopt this motion.

[Translation]

Mrs. Monique Tardif (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak to this motion concerning the role of the Security Intelligence Review Committee, also known as the SIRC within the national security system.

In 1984, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIC) Act and the Security Offences Act established a new legislative framework to govern Canada's national security system.

The new legislation was designed to create a balanced and accountable system for the protection of Canada's national security interests and the preservation of the democratic way of life of its people. It provided the main legislative framework for the national security system, assigning security intelligence to CSIS, and confirmed the security enforcement and the protective security mandate of the RCMP.

Embodied in the legislation was a set of interlocking principles to shape and guide the operation of the system and each principle can be associated with one of its major participants.

The legislation incorporated a clear mandate and strict controls of the activities of the new service. The inclusion of ministerial oversight and sophisticated review mechanisms ensured that the service would be effective and that the rights of individuals would be respected. Balance was a distinguishing feature of the legislation.

The need to protect national security was balanced by respect for individual rights and freedoms. The need to provide the service with sufficient powers to produce effective security intelligence was balanced by statutory controls and policy direction.

The need for CSIS to employ certain intrusive techniques was balanced by the requirement for prior authorization by a minister of the Crown and the Federal Court. The need for secrecy was balanced by ministerial accountability and informed independent review.

The national security system assigned specific and distinct mandates to CSIS and the RCMP. The service's primary mandate is to be found in two provisions of the CSIS act: the definition of "threats to the security of Canada", and the description of the service's duty to collect, analyse and retain information and intelligence on "threats to the security of Canada".

In order to fulfill its mandate the service undertakes counter-terrorism and counter-intelligence investigations of various types and duration.

The CSIS mandate is conditioned by the limits and controls specified in the act, by ministerial directions, and by the service's own operational policies and procedures. Certain powers employed by the service are subject to the requirement to obtain a judicial warrant.

In view of the complexity of CSIS activities and the importance of securing public confidence in the integrity of the system, the CSIS act provides for an independent external review body, the SIRC, reporting to Parliament through the Solicitor General on the activities of the service. The act also establishes the function of the inspector general to conduct independent internal reviews of the service for the Solicitor General

Like other government departments and agencies, CSIS is required to pursue its objectives with full respect for the law including the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Legislation governing the creation of a security intelligence agency has a special need for a policy framework, if there is to be public confidence in how the agency operates. Ministerial direction helps to ensure that the Solicitor General, who is accountable to Parliament, is the linchpin in the legal and policy framework.

The principles of ministerial control and accountability are central to Canadian parliamentary democracy. The CSIS Act ensured that the minister would have full knowledge and power of direction over the policies, operations and management of CSIS and also supplies the minister with the means to control and guide the service.

The function of the inspector general forms an integral part of the over-all accountability process. The CSIS Act established the inspector general's reporting role to the minister.

The terms of the act assign the inspector general a review and a monitoring function with respect to CSIS, and no information other than cabinet confidences may be withheld on any grounds.

By serving the minister directly, the inspector general maintains a measure of distance from the minister's policy and operational advisors in the ministry secretariat.

Canadian are protected by limitations in the CSIS mandate and the scope of prescribed activities of the service, by the conditions of the warrant process and the complaint and review processes provided in the act.

In the performance of its duties and functions, CSIS has no authority to counter or deter threats to the security of Canada. Furthermore, information is to be collected only to the extent that it is "strictly necessary". Investigations are to be initiated only when suspicions are based on "reasonable grounds", and the investigations themselves are to be conducted in a reasonable manner.

The definition of threats to the security of Canada excludes lawful advocacy, protest or dissent, unless carried on in conjuction with any of the activities referred to in the CSIS act.

Judicial authorization is required for the exercise of the most intrusive powers of CSIS and is granted only after a rigorous internal process of approval is completed, including consultation with the Deputy Solicitor General and the approval of the Solicitor General.

The Solicitor General conveys his views to the service through written ministerial directions and his intentions through the approval processes, for example in approving warrant applications, and in regular meetings with the director.

Assistance to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Defence in the collection of foreign intelligence excludes investigation of Canadian citizens and permanent residents and corporations, and must occur within Canada.

The director of CSIS is required by law to report on illegal activity of any member of the service in the performance of his duties.

This represents a brief discussion of the system governing Canada's national security. A recent review by the special committee found that it is basically sound, has served the nation well and should be preserved.

Mr. Speaker, let me now turn to the role of SIRC, which is an innovative and important component of the national security system established by the CSIS act.

Responsibility for this independent external review function was given to the Security Intelligence Review Committee (SIRC), a non-partisan committee of privy councillors which reports to Parliament through the Solicitor General.

SIRS'S review role is a cornerstone of the accountability framework established by the CSIS act. SIRC has a mandate to review the propriety of CSIS activities, with emphasis on the delicate balance between national security and individual freedoms.

Given SIRC's importance as presently constituted, the government does not agree with the proposed statutory amendment which would expand SIRC's role. In the government's view, it would have the effect of either diffusing SIRC's functions with respect to CSIS or diminishing ministerial accountability.

The SIRC, created in large part to act as Parliament's surrogate in the sensitive area of security intelligence, consists of five part-time members who are privy councillors but must not be sitting members of either the House of Commons or the Senate, and is assisted by a small staff of researchers.

• (1930)

The members of SIRC see their part-time status as a great advantage which assists them in maintaining their independence and objectivity. By retaining their chosen career as their main professional activity, they avoid becoming captives of the system.

Finally, through daily accountability in the House of Commons, supplementary and main estimates process, standing committee hearings, special committees (terrorism), the subcommittee on national security, the tabling of SIRC and other special reports, and parliamentary review of the legislation, Parliament is the ultimate review body.

Mr. Speaker, this illustrates that the CSIS act, which created SIRC's review role, was well thought out. The special committee, when it reviewed its provisions and operation, found the CSIS act basically sound. As presently constituted, SIRC well serves its intended purpose.

[English]

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, we indeed live in strange times. Just last week in the United Kingdom the British Prime Minister admitted that MI-6 actually existed when it was in fact founded over a century ago.

The motion we have before us relates to a Canadian institution, the Communications Security Establishment, which has been in existence for about half a century, perhaps not under that name. Parliament still has absolutely no control over that body, and for all practical purposes it does not exist either. In fact, we do not have anything in the estimates, they are hidden in the Department of National Defence estimates.

I just had the ordeal of listening for 15 minutes to a speech that had absolutely no relevance to this motion. A speech on CSIS and SIRC was relevant to the debates of spring of 1984, but of absolutely no relevance to the debate this evening. I do not think the parliamentary secretary even made a passing reference to CSE. She certainly said nothing about its operations.

I want to congratulate my colleague, the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River, for bringing forward this motion this evening because I think it is very timely. It is timely not only because it concerns a highly secretive information-gathering agency which has no parliamentary responsibility. It is about the accountability of a secret organization. That is what we are discussing and debating tonight.

In 1992, when Canada is not at war with anyone and no one is plotting war on Canada, we have a secret agency that can listen in on virtually any kind of electronic transmission anywhere in Canada, indeed anywhere in continental North America. We do not even know how far it goes beyond continental North America.

The Communications Security Establishment, which originated some 50 years ago in the National Research Council, I think it was part of its communications directorate, has remained under the cloak of secrecy ever since. The reason it has is because it is a secret organization and therefore it is involved in secret activity. That secret activity is listening in on all the electronic communications of foreign embassies in Ottawa or consulates in Montreal, Toronto or Vancouver or wherever they happen to be. It listens in on all kinds of government traffic. It is also responsible for the security of government information and government documents. It is really the security agency for Parliament Hill, and perhaps I should say for cabinet, the Privy Council Office and the office of the Prime Minister.

I would not object to that if it was simply a security agency of government to protect information within the Government of Canada from foreign eavesdropping. If that were its only activity, I would not be standing up this evening and demanding greater accountability because I can understand that part of its operations.

Every prudent government in the world has that kind of security or at least attempts to have that kind of security. I am not denigrating the capability or the expertise of CSE. I have no way of doing that because I do not know anything about it. As a parliamentarian I am not allowed to know anything about CSE. I am precluded not by law or statute but by some arrangement within the PCO. On that part of it I simply have to stand back and ask like any other citizen: "I have no right to know, therefore what can I do?"

I can stand here on my feet tonight and verbally blast away at the government and say: "Look, that part of CSE's operation may be acceptable in its secrecy, but the other activities of CSE, that is the electronic eavesdropping on foreign embassies, the electronic eavesdropping on citizens, not necessarily of this country but in the United States, for example"—and I will get to that in a moment—"and CSE's ability to tap into sources south of the border with respect to electronic eavesdropping in Canada should be scrutinized".

Now the member who moved this motion said earlier that it has the capability, and I agree with this, of listening in on virtually every fax machine transmission, every telephone call, every cellular telephone communication. Anything of an electronic nature can be tapped into.

We are told by the minister and by his senior personnel in the Solicitor General's office that CSE does not operate in any illegal manner, that is it does not collect information in this country on Canadian citizens in an illegal manner, in a manner contrary to the Criminal Code of Canada. I will accept that argument because the National Security Agency in the United States assures American congressmen and senators that it does not eavesdrop on American citizens contrary to their Bill of Rights.

But there is no law in North America prohibiting NSA from getting in touch with the CSE in Canada and saying: "I want you to keep track electronically of so-and-so resident in South Dakota or Alabama". CSE can do that and pass on information to the NSA, therefore circumventing any American law. The National Security Agency, buddy-buddy that is with the CSE, can do exactly the same thing and eavesdrop on Canadian citizens, contrary to Canadian law but circumventing that law.

That is the part of CSE that disturbs me. That is the part of CSE that I would like to know a little more about. I would like to know whether or not in fact the sourcing of its information, whether or not it comes from the Americans, the British or the Australians, is done in a manner that is in accordance with our rights here in this country, with our Criminal Code and with our charter. That is what I want to know.

As far as I can determine there are no legislative safeguards. There are no oversight safeguards. There is no committee or subcommittee of this House that has any jurisdiction over CSE. We cannot put a question on CSE in this House in Question Period either to the Solicitor General or to the Minister of National Defence. He will get up and answer that because of the national security involved with that agency he is unable to answer the member's question. We cannot put questions in committee. We can ask the Minister of National Defence to appear but we know ahead of time that he or she will not answer questions on the CSE.

This motion, if passed or adopted, would mandate SIRC to have the same oversight power or responsibility with respect to CSE as it has with CSIS, but SIRC does not have that mandate. The government will not give SIRC that mandate.

We need a couple of things here. I agree with the motion completely. The Security Intelligence Review Committee should include the Communications Security Establishment as part of its mandate. It should be the citizens' oversight committee for CSE just as it is for the Canadian Security Intelligence Service.

But I would go further than that. I would mandate CSE's existence by statute. I would bring in a bill. It would be thoroughly debated in this House at all stages. It would go to a committee. The special committee has already looked at this at least in part, but now we could devote our entire resources to CSE. We would come up with a bill just as we did with CSIS. Therefore it would be statutorily established instead of tucked away somewhere by tradition, by some kind of secret arrangement within the Privy Council Office for only the eyes and ears of only two, three or four top public servants to have any control over or any counsel over the operations of CSE.

We live in a democracy. We are not at war. We are under no stress. Surely CSE should come under parliamentary mandate. It should be statutorily established by an act of Parliament. SIRC, as stated in this motion, should have the right to oversee its operations as a citizens' committee watch-dog on the Communications Security Establishment.

I see my time is up.

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to join in this debate. As a member of the special committee that studied CSIS with my other friends who are in the House, I did agree and sign the report that said that CSE should have its own legislated mandate and that SIRC should be mandated to oversee CSE.

My friends from Scarborough—Rouge River and Brant have gone into detail on the Communications Security Establishment and what we know. Certainly the minister has primary responsibility. That is our system as it exists today. In that regard the CSE is apparently under the Department of National Defence. The Minister of National Defence would have authority over that particular agency and a reporting function to Parliament in that regard.

I would like to say there is no indication that anybody's civil liberties have been offended by CSE. Therefore, why are we bringing this particular matter forward? Why was this motion brought forward? We saw, as was indicated in the early 1980s, that the RCMP security establishment, sworn to uphold the law, did run afoul of the law in regard to national security matters.

As a result it was decided that the security service would be made a civilian agency. It would be given its own legislative mandate. Certain checks would be put in place in order to defend the civil liberties of Canadians. Those were outlined very well by the parliamentary secretary and included SIRC, the Security Intelligence Review Committee, as well as the inspector general.

We found in our review of CSIS that these organizations have functioned well and have protected the civil liberties of Canadians. We looked at other areas of the security establishment in this country. We understand there is security apparatus within the Department of External Affairs, within the transport department and with CSE, to name a few.

To make sure that the civil liberties of Canadians were protected and that we did not have any incidents where those civil liberties were offended and as a result there would a great uproar in Parliament, it was decided by the committee that we would recommend that CSE be given its own legislative mandate and, since SIRC had worked so well in overseeing CSIS, that SIRC be mandated to oversee CSE as well.

CSIS in the act, as was pointed out by the parliamentary secretary, has its own legislative mandate in regard to threats to the security of Canada. Surely the CSE could be given a similar legislative mandate as a standard by which it can be judged in its picking up of the various electromagnetic signals and which it would take into consideration.

It is my belief that there are memorandums of understanding between CSIS and CSE, so there is some exchange of information. Obviously the memorandum itself is secret and should remain so, but the mere fact of a memorandum of understanding indicates that there is an agreement as to what information will be turned over to CSIS in certain circumstances.

It is not out of the question for people who have the responsibility, as we do here in Parliament, to want to know what that information is. We should be able to get at that particular information. We should know in general terms what the budget of the organization is so that we can fulfil our oversight function, and also so that we can ensure that the civil liberties of Canadians are protected.

Our first choice would have been a model similar to the United States. When we were doing our study on CSIS we found that in the United States all the security intelligence agencies are overseen by two congressional committees, one of the Senate and one of the House of Representatives. They have access to all the information in regard to all the security establishments in the United States, including their NSA.

We in Canada did not go that route in overseeing our security intelligence service. We decided we would do it through the Security Intelligence Review Committee, made up of Privy Council members who were mandated to actually take the place of Parliament because it is a secret organization. Obviously it is important to the security of our country. They were to take the place of Parliament, and that is why the Privy Councillors were put in this particular position.

We on the committee accept that concept. We found that it was working well. As was mentioned, the Security Intelligence Review Committee does look at what CSIS does. It delves into various matters to ensure that the civil liberties of Canadians are protected, and we can see that in its annual report. Obviously that has an effect on CSIS and it makes sure that the civil liberties of Canadians are taken care of and are not abused.

Our thinking on the committee was that we should put all the security intelligence apparatus under some form of oversight, that includes the other ones I mentioned and would be found in the report.

We feel there was a reaction in the early 1980s to what had gone on in the RCMP security service. CSIS was established and the model is working. Now in a time when we do not have a great crisis we should look at our entire security establishment and establish oversight in the other areas as well.

CSE is an organization shrouded in a great deal of secrecy, rightfully so. However, what is occurring there? There are no indications that there have ever been any civil liberties that have been abused by this particular organization, but we do not know. As members of Parliament we would like to be reassured that no aspect of our security intelligence apparatus in this country is offending any of the civil liberties of Canadians.

SIRC has worked well in terms of the oversight of CSIS. We suggested that it be given additional responsibility and its oversight be extended to CSE. I can understand the argument that SIRC has worked well on a part-time basis. One of the things we were concerned about in our study was that SIRC had not been co-opted by CSIS. We found no indication of that.

One of the reasons we felt that had occurred was because of the part-time nature of its oversight function. If it is felt that this would be too much of a burden for SIRC and would take away from the part-time nature of its job then why not create another body similar to SIRC to oversee CSE. Privy Councillors can do the job in this case also.

My personal preference would be to put that entire oversight function within a parliamentary committee. We have done that to a certain extent with the subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General which we have formed.

If we are going to proceed on the basis of the SIRC model, which has worked well, I would urge that we go ahead with a legislative mandate for CSE, set out what it is that it is collecting and in what terms, such as threats to the security of Canada, a similar definition as is put in the CSIS Act that we could compare it against and make sure that is what this particular organization is collecting.

There may be an argument that it cannot get the co-operation of the National Security Agency in the United States. We heard that one from CSIS when SIRC was established. SIRC went to the United States and found that once the initial barriers were broken down, it could co-operate and the Americans were satisfied with the security intelligence agency.

In conclusion, I would support a legislative mandate for CSE. I would like to see SIRC or a SIRC-like body set up in order to protect the civil liberties of Canadians in regard to CSE but not only in CSE, in every aspect of the security apparatus here in Canada.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise and speak on this particular motion. I had the pleasure of serving on the review committee that studied CSIS.

The motion of my colleague for Scarborough—Rouge River is an excellent one and really gets to the heart of the matter. He is being very skilful in what he is doing because all of these spy agencies, if you can use that terminology, should be included under a review or oversight function. He is starting with CSE which is the more serious one and which does not even have a parliamentary mandate. I am sure as time goes along and after the government sees the wisdom of this motion and enacts it, we will see other agencies fall within the ambit of a review agency such as SIRC.

On that review committee of which I had the pleasure to serve, we had a recommendation. I believe it is recommendation 87. I quote: "The committee recommends that Parliament formally establish CSE by statute and establish SIRC as the body responsible for monitoring, reviewing and reporting to Parliament on the activities of CSE concerning its compliance with the laws of Canada".

That was an excellent recommendation but the government chose not to deal with that particular recommendation. There were a number of recommendations in our report that the government refused to deal with. It only adopted one or one and a half recommendations which is unfortunate. Ron Atkey, who was the chairman of SIRC, gave a very interesting radio interview in March 1991 in which he talked about the recommendations which we came up with as parliamentarians and submitted to Parliament. I again quote because it is illustrative of what is going on here:

> None of these recommendations were earth shattering. Why were they rejected? The explanation may relate as much to the malaise in our parliamentary system. It seems there is simply not the time and inclination to debate important legislation in a non-partisan way these days. It is also clear that the government wanted to avoid at any cost the commitment to introduce legislative changes. How convenient for CSIS which really never wanted to limit itself to investigating terrorism and espionage.

This little part is really illustrative.

> And wasn't this just super for the Communications Security Establishment, that huge vacuum cleaner in the sky which has frightening capacity to invade the privacy of Canadians in a variety of ways but which has no legal mandate and which is not accountable to anyone except to the Department of National Defence and the Privy Council Office, the principal users of the data gathered.

That is very illustrative. There is the head of SIRC as he then was saying this is a very serious situation. This was a simple recommendation which came forward in our study. It is the same recommendation which the member for Scarborough—Rouge River is putting forward to Parliament again. That is to put some oversight, some control, some protection on the privacy of individuals. CSE is aptly described as the huge vacuum cleaner in the sky which is scooping up information all over the place. And we have no control over it, no say as to what is going to happen.

Both Mr. Atkey and Mr. Jean-Jacques Blais are no longer on SIRC, but when they were, they made some comments. There was an article in The Globe and Mail in June, 1991. I quote again from Jean-Jacques Blais who said: "My knowledge of the Communications Security Establishment was very superficial indeed when I was minister of defence." Then later on he says: "—and I am sure that the minister of defence today has no better knowledge relating to CSE than the Solicitor General had prior to the establishment of the review process."

So, here we are again, looking at two people who had an intimate knowledge of what is going on with CSE and an intimate knowledge of over-all data collection, and as a lot of people call it, the spy agencies that are here in Canada. They all say that they know nothing about what is going on with CSE. There is no parliamentary mandate; it was established by an Order in Council. It is not overseen by Parliament or by SIRC.

Now everyone knows the review committee said that in addition to SIRC there should also be a parliamentary review involved. We went so far as to see a subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General established for that purpose.

I am sure everyone realizes there is a lot of work in these committees. We do not set these committees up frivolously. We do not set them up just to have another name or a title. This particular committee that did the review and the subcommittee that is working now are hard-working committees designed, quite frankly, to protect Canadian privacy. That has to be something that is fundamental to this country.

Right now in private conversations in homes or businesses or in any organization, that huge vacuum cleaner in the sky could be scooping all of that information up and utilizing it some day, putting it in a file or a data bank and storing it away so that some day that could be used against someone. That is fundamentally wrong. The idea of having a spy agency doing all of the things that have to be done, the idea of data collection in order to protect Canada is absolutely essential.

We are into all kinds of arrangements with a number of countries in sharing information and protecting one another. There is nothing wrong with that. But as Canadians we have to be satisfied. I feel I have to be satisfied as a parliamentarian that these agencies are not carrying out any abuses, and that the work they are doing is the proper work.

That is where SIRC comes in. It can do in private that type of research and report to Parliament and say: "Yes, CSE is functioning properly. No, it has not taken any intrusive steps without proper reasons and without going before the proper organizations or courts to get the necessary permission to carry out these intrusions." All those sorts of things would then be laid before Parliament and we would have an opportunity to look at them and decide that we need not worry, everything is working fine.

Instead we have a situation in which we have an organization without a parliamentary mandate, without being overseen by Parliament or SIRC, now functioning in our Canadian society and continuing to monitor everything that we are saying. As a former great leader of the Liberal Party said, it is "interfering in what is going on in the bedrooms of the nation".

Quite frankly, I can tell by the look on your face, Mr. Speaker, that is a concern to you and it is a concern to us on this side. That is why my colleague from Scarborough—Rouge River is bringing forward this motion which will see the necessary protection to Canadian privacy if it is adopted.

I hope that the government will see the benefit of an all-party committee's recommendation that this be done. I heard my colleague opposite talk about the same types of things that we are talking about on this side. It is unanimous among parliamentarians. We need the executive branch to deal with this and make sure that Canadians are protected.

GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by many residents of Nepean, Gloucester, in my riding of Ottawa Centre, as well as many constituents from other ridings in the national capital region. These constituents are very upset about the disparity between gas prices in the national capital region and those in other parts of Ontario.

These petitioners are calling on Parliament to urge the government to correct this injustice.

THE CONSTITUTION

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I would like to deliver a petition as well. It is signed by several constituents in western Canada who claim that Parliament should enact legislation, which we are doing right now, except there is a difference because these people are asking that a referendum of the people be binding upon Parliament.

These people have every right and responsibility as Canadians to make sure that any referendum which may be held would be binding upon Parliament. I submit this respectfully.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I too have a petition that has been certified correct according to form and content under Standing Order 36.

This petition adds to the total number of signatures I have in my office; 1,132 people have signed this. The petition calls upon Parliament to reconsider a decision made by the provincial court of Alberta which ruled that the rights of aboriginal people include the right to hunt for profit on private land.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to support an appeal of this court decision and conclude an agreement with Canada's treaty Indians regarding sound wildlife management practices and restrict native rights to hunt, fish and gather for personal consumption needs and prohibit the sale for profit, wildlife meat or parts obtained by treaty rights.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition which I wish to enter into the House today to make Parliament aware of the fact that a large number of constituents in the federal riding of Peterborough have asked that the government consider legislation providing for a referendum of the people to accept or reject constitutional amendments proposed by the Government of Canada.

I am pleased to present this petition with pages of signatures, all in support of a referendum on constitutional changes.

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Wednesday, May 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Andre that Bill C–81, an act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope; and the amendment of Mr. Murphy (p. 10955).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Cardigan has eight minutes remaining in his speech.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, once again I rise to speak on Bill C–81, the referendum legislation. Yesterday evening I indicated how pleased the people of Cardigan, Prince Edward Island, and I were that this legislation was finally brought forward.

It is unfortunate the legislation was not brought forward sooner so that the government would not have had to bring in allocation time or closure. With this we do not permit all members to indicate how they feel about the legislation. This is not acceptable to the people of Canada, but being they have the majority they can do what the like for now.

Now that we have the bill in front of us we must take a look at it and see what the government's proposition is. From what I can see there are several problems with the legislation and with the question as to whether the government really intends to have a national vote.

The bill allows the government to call a vote in one or more provinces. The government has said this to avoid the confusion of having two constitutional votes in the same province. However, having some Canadians vote on different questions at different times could be a disaster.

The point of a vote is for Canadians to reach a conclusion on a single issue. It would be like Alberta voting yes or no whether to buy a Ford car, P.E.I. voting yes or no if it should buy a Chrysler, and Quebec voting yes or no if it should buy a car from General Motors. Instead all Canadians should get together and vote whether or not we want a car at all, whether or not we want the Constitution or we want this country to remain together or not.

Separate votes on separate questions would only serve to confuse Canadians about the results. To avoid the confusion, all Canadians should vote on the same day, on the same question. To do anything else would leave this important question unresolved.

The bill would also allow the government to worm its way out of a national vote altogether. The referendum legislation itself is not binding, let alone the results. Clause 3 of the bill indicates that the Governor in Council may call for a referendum. I feel the government should be required to hold a vote on the Constitution, not only this time but any time the Constitution is to be amended in the future. As it stands now the government has put a sunset clause in the bill, killing it three years after it has passed. That would allow this or any future government to make amendments to the Constitution without first consulting Canadians.

The government has said no to spending limits in the legislation. Anybody, any corporation or any lobby group, can spend however much they want. This is unfair because during the last federal election Canadians saw the result of unrestricted third party advertising and spending. Is it fair for Canadians if certain well funded, special interest groups are allowed to hijack the national agenda? Spending limits must be included to ensure the fairness of the whole process.

For spending limits to be truly effective people must be organized into logical groups. The Liberal Party has called on the government to organize participants under two umbrella groups. Such umbrella groups would not only ease the imposition of spending limits, they would require Canadians to work together in a spirit of compromise and co–operation.

While nobody expects the constitutional deal to be perfect, there should be something in it for everybody to support. Umbrella groups would force Canadians to come forward to reveal their true colours. By having umbrella groups Canadians will have to decide if they are in favour of national unity or if they are against it.

Canadians want to vote on the Constitution and they want their Constitution to reflect all parts of the country. A Constitution that does not have the support of the majority of people in each region is useless. What is the point of a Constitution that the people of Atlantic Canada disagree with? What is the point of a Constitution if the people of Quebec feel that it is being shoved down their throats?

If the federal government does not agree to the principle of regional vetoes people will view the process as being irrelevant, and that is the last thing we want.

A referendum is the ultimate form of consultation. Members in this party hope that the government will be more forthcoming in consulting Canadians than it has been in consulting the opposition parties.

From this side it seems that the Prime Minister's idea of consulting is deciding what he is going to do and then telling us about it later.

It has been a year since the government first mentioned the possibility of a national referendum. Instead of starting the legislative process back then it has waited until the last minute before throwing this bill together. The result is a bill of holes that could jeopardize the success of the entire round of constitutional negotiations.

Liberal members want to be constructive. We criticize the government's bill in the hope of making it better for Canadians. We realize the government has the majority and it will probably have the last say. But in the interest of fairness and in the interest of all Canadians who want to keep this country together please listen to what we have to say.

There are ways to improve the bill. All 27 million people in this country want to reach a settlement of our Constitution and a national referendum is the way.

I certainly believe, as I have indicated, that the opposition parties must be consulted more to come up with the proper question. I believe we must have a double majority, that is regional majorities and a total majority over all. It could be financed if people were given tax credits for donations made to either yes or no in the referendum. I believe that the sunset clause should be removed because this means the legislation dies within three years. Now is the time to bring the Constitution to the people and every time we wish to make a change it should be brought to the people.

You are aware, Mr. Speaker, of the disastrous result of the last federal election campaign. We ended with a government which was elected to a large extent by third party spending. We are now experiencing the results of the agenda of that government.

Let us not go through the same mess with this constitutional referendum. Let us control third party spending and be sure that we have a fair result. Of course, as I indicated before, it must be national. The referendum also should be mandatory. The only way it can be of any success is to have a referendum and let the people have a say and then if each region and the majority vote yes, possibly we can put this constitutional issue to rest for a good period of time. Hopefully that will be the result.

If the government will accept a few of the recommendations from the opposition and the people in general then, hopefully, we will come up with success.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on Bill C–81, an act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada. It might be a surprise to all Canadians that someone is going to stand up and speak positively about the referendum. I have heard an awful lot of rhetoric from members in the House about people being positive about a referendum but then making a lot of negative comment. It is something the government has talked about for a period of time.

I recall an excerpt from the throne speech of May 1991 which said:

> In September, my government will refer its proposals to a joint parliamentary committee that will be established to consult with Canadians.
> After receipt and consideration of the committee's report, my government will propose a plan for a renewed Canada. You will be asked to approve enabling legislation to provide for greater participation of Canadian men and women in constitutional change.

Also I would like to read an excerpt from the Beaudoin–Dobbie committee report of February 1992:

> We recommend that a federal law be enacted to enable the federal government, if deemed appropriate by the Government of Canada, to enable the federal government at its discretion, to hold a consultative referendum on a constitutional proposal, either to confirm the existence of a national consensus or to facilitate the adoption of the required amending resolutions.

The legislation as put forward is a precautionary measure in the mind of the government because of the negotiations that are taking place. As was noted on April 14 of this year by the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs when he spoke about the consultative process, he said:

> If at the end of May, there is not a substantial consensus on the Canada round we would intend to go to Parliament with a federal proposal which we hope would secure the support of the two opposition parties. If that support were not there, we would proceed alone. Parliamentary approval of that package might be followed by a national plebiscite, whose purpose would be to secure the agreement of the people of Canada, in effect, to reach around those premiers who did not agree.

Carrying on with that particular objective, the Prime Minister was quoted in The Toronto Star on April 9, 1992 as saying:

> My position is: If the provincial premiers cannot agree on constitutional proposals that would be put to the people, then the federal government, with the other federalist parties in the House of Commons, brings forward proposals and causes these proposals to be put to the people.

I think that all Canadians would want the federal government to be in a position of moving forward with a referendum in what I guess would really be considered a plebiscite to let them have their say.

• (1110)

The over-all objective is to ensure that there is every means of success in this Canada round. I know that is also the intent and in the minds of most other members of Parliament in this House, I am sure all except those who want to break up Canada. Certainly we would want to have a referendum that will not interfere with any right of any province to hold its own referendum. That is certainly the intent of this legislation. It must be characterized by fairness so that all points of view are expressed and considered, and the element of fairness must be there when we go to the people with a referendum.

Certainly it is a serious step and it must not be taken lightly. It is a very serious step and I think all members of this House would agree with that. The current process of the Canada round has been long. It has been somewhat painful at times. Nonetheless, it has been an important journey for Canada as we have carried on with these consultations.

As the House will recall, first there was the citizens' forum, next there was the Beaudoin—Edwards committee on the amending formula, then there was the Beaudoin—Dobbie review of the federal government's constitutional proposals, and a series of national conferences that followed. Now under way and nearing completion is the multilateral process involving the federal government, nine provincial governments, two territories, and leaders of the major aboriginal groups. Whatever other successes we have had, whatever this consultative exercise may yield, it will eliminate the possibility of anyone ever daring to impose a contrived sense of what Canada is.

Resolving the constitutional issue in a positive, modern way is what we all would like to see happen. National referendums, of course, have been held only a few times in Canada, and certainly a number of times in the provinces. There have been two national referendums, as we know, the first of course being in 1898 and one in 1942 on conscription. Certainly national referendums are something that in very important cases like this clearly are needed.

It should be noted that through the years individual members of Parliament have brought forward private members' legislation in connection with holding referendums and they have not been very successful in doing that. Most recently, in the fall of 1989, the member from Etobicoke brought forward a private member's bill, Bill C-257. Certainly he has carried on in his mind that holding a referendum or plebiscite is something for which there should be legislation in place. We should commend the member from Etobicoke for his foresight and his action in that area.

In a recent article written by the member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore he wrote: "I emphasize that not every issue has to be put to the people. The main work of enacting laws, resolving issues and debating public concerns must continue in our elected and deliberative legislative bodies. Direct voting in a referendum or plebiscite is such a special democratic device that it ought not to be trivialized or overused. Perhaps every decade or maybe once in the life of each Parliament, one or two topics of overriding national importance should be subjected to the fullest expression of popular opinion".

It goes on in another line: "Plebiscites can help in our self-definition as Canadians". Certainly a lot of us would agree with the member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore.

I appreciate the opportunity to speak on this very important piece of legislation and support it with some changes that may take place in the committee and ensuing days.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to address this legislation which has been introduced to provide, and not to assure, the holding of not a referendum, but a plebiscite on the constitutional questions.

The proposal that there should be a plebiscite has been defended on democratic grounds. I think that all Canadians should be cautioned about that argument as presented by a government which has again added to its record of having limited debate more than any other government in history. Let us not look to the government's commitment to democracy as the premise on which we have before us a proposal for a plebiscite.

My party has agreed to support at second reading this legislation in the hope that there will be abundant amendments to it to make it acceptable and to make the process work more effectively and more democratically.

I think that in our enthusiasm for a plebiscite on an issue as complicated as the Constitution some caution should be sounded as to whether this plebiscite and this legislation really will perform in the interests of the two key issues on which it is based, one being Canadian unity and the other that a referendum is the soundest reflection of a functioning democracy.

We have to reflect on the two national referendums that this country has held, one in 1898 on prohibition and the other in 1942 on conscription. I think that all Canadians and this House should be conscious of the fact that the questions that were put then were relatively simple. If one looks at one of the key plebiscites held in this country, namely the referendum of 1980 in Quebec which was on a constitutional issue, that again was a relatively simple question.

We are not dealing with a simple question here. We are dealing with a very complex question. We are dealing with a whole host of constitutional changes. I think it is edifying to reflect on the process as it has occurred so far which points to the extraordinary complexity of the issues with which we have to deal.

This process really began with that 1980 referendum in Quebec which demonstrates clearly that referendums do not resolve constitutional problems. The reason why we are here today is that the 1980 referendum in Quebec did not resolve the constitutional issue with respect to Quebec. It is 12 years later and we propose another referendum.

More important is that we look at how the immediate process began. That began with a whole host of proposals by the government for constitutional reform, a set of proposals that was never really adequately understood by Canadians but which then became the subject of a special joint committee of this Parliament and as well five conferences on the Constitution.

I participated in all of that. The process involved was one in which people had to commit themselves quite thoroughly to understanding every element in the process. We know that the proposals of the government were changed dramatically by the hearing process of that committee as well as the conferences. Out of those conferences came the proposal for a social covenant and the proposal for a reformed Senate quite different from what was proposed originally by the government.

I do know during that process there was a great deal of difficulty in understanding such questions as distinct society, concurrency and interdelegation.

Yet we may propose to put a question of yes or no to the people on proposals having to do with the Constitution that are part of this long evolutionary process. But it is key in all of this to know that we do not know what will be the outcome of the present first ministers' consultations, what will be put to the people and how well the people understand on what they are voting.

Who will determine the message that is received by the people to which they will answer yes or no? It will come I am sure from the same people who communicated the message about the free trade agreement which was essentially a yes or no question in the last election.

Could anybody seriously argue that the people of this country were given an opportunity by the press and the powerbrokers in this country who declared themselves on one side of the issue in their dominance of communication and explanation? Do we really believe that Canadian people ever were given an opportunity to understand what was at issue then and what is going to happen here?

They are going to talk about the status of Quebec, the aboriginal peoples, the division of powers, the charter, a whole host of things. People will be dependent on the public press unless there are some dramatic changes in how this thing is carried out.

Very few confederated nations have successfully held referenda. We have had the example of Australia that has had 32; only 8 were approved. We say that the referendum is in the interests of Canadian unity. Would anybody suggest the 1898 referendum lead to a conclusion that was in the interests of Canadian unity? Would anybody suggest that the 1942 referendum lead to an outcome that was in the interests of Canadian unity?

We have two premises on which we are going to base this referendum. We have no clear message that this process can contribute to democracy, if we understand democracy to be based on informed consent of the electorate. On the other hand, we have problems on the record wherever such referenda have occurred on complicated issues of this sort about whether in fact it will contribute to Canadian unity.

Let me say this: With respect to the issue of Canadian unity there is the question of where minorities fit into the equation. In previous plebiscites it has been the Quebec minority that has been scotched.

I represent a section of this country which the politicians have thoroughly ignored. Our status in this country in terms of citizenship is an unequal citizenship. I am supposed to depend and those whom I represent are supposed to depend on what government says, on what the party says, what the media says, and what the powerbrokers say about the appropriateness of this Constitution.

But will people know that 30 per cent of the population are not to be included in these constitutional proposals? Is that democracy? Is it democracy that questions that are going to be put to the Canadian people ignore 30 per cent of the people, and will they know that?

There has been almost a conspiracy by our political leaders and the media to help shut out some. If there was going to be any prospect of fairness in this plebiscite, if we are going to assure ourselves it is going to contribute to Canadian unity or the democratic process, then there had better be significant changes in the character of the process that is going to be enforced when this plebiscite takes place.

There had better be serious examination of the question of spending limits, not only of the total expenditures but also who spends and what provisions will ensure that regional minorities or demographic minorities will have a fair shake in all of this. If we are not careful about that this will not contribute to Canadian unity.

What regulations and rules will apply to ensure that Canadians are adequately informed? Every line, every dotted i and crossed t in that Constitution, must be understood by them and explained to them so that their decision will be on the basis of informed consent in a democratic process that is all too often organized to deny to the people informed consent.

I hope people will understand that the record of referenda and plebiscites in the United States has certainly not been in the interests of democracy. It has been in the interests of those who have the money and who can shape opinions by denying information, denying analysis and denying to the people an understanding of where they are in the process.

If we are going to have a plebiscite and that plebiscite is to be in the interests of either Canadian unity or democracy then there had better be substantive changes in this legislation. Otherwise it will fail democracy; it will fail Canadian unity. A most dangerous outcome could result to the future of Canada if care is not taken.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to enter into the debate on Bill C-81 and say that it certainly is time the government has adopted at least my party's position on holding a referendum on any future constitutional amendments.

I also would like to say that I appreciate and commend the member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore for his efforts over the years on referendum legislation. I know that he has worked tirelessly on this and I know that he is pleased that this is at least happening.

It is also high time that the Prime Minister responded to over 40,000 letters which I personally delivered to his office last month. They were sent to me by concerned Canadians demanding that the government conduct a binding national referendum on any future constitutional package.

The Prime Minister's office claimed it received only approximately 10,000 such letters. I will leave it to the Canadian people to decide who is telling the truth and perhaps who is not.

At any rate, I am pleased to see the government so interested in direct democracy and consultation of the Canadian public and they say that a leopard can never change its spots. However, enthusiastic as I am about the prospects of a national vote on the Constitution, I nevertheless hold some serious reservations about the government's sincerity in doing so and the contents of the bill itself.

Before I go on let me make my position completely clear. While I support the general direction the government has taken in tabling referendum legislation, this does not necessarily mean that either I or my party will support the final question proposed by the federal government.

Only if the question is truly national in scope and adheres to the principle of equality of all provinces, and only if the question allows for a yes or no response to the final package as a whole, might I or my party support a referendum question on any future constitutional amendments.

One would assume that if the government were truly serious about soliciting the will of the Canadian public it would give this legislation all the force that a real referendum requires. That is, this bill should be more than just an advisory mechanism for the government's own use. Rather the results of any vote should be binding on this House.

I realize that a binding mechanism would necessitate an amendment under section 41 of the Constitution Act, 1982, which would require the unanimous consent of all provincial legislatures. This does not prevent the government from adopting a simple motion that states that the House would adhere to the results of such a vote.

It is a simple matter. If the government considers itself a democratic entity it should have no problem in complying with such a simple request. By strict definition this bill provides only for a plebiscite, not a referendum.

Canadians are not simply asking that the government listen to them and then pat them on the head and tell them to go away. They want a real opportunity to express their feelings on the most important document in this country. Instead, the government has chosen to deny Canadians their fundamental rights in a free and democratic society by once again shutting them out of the process.

Yes, the government will let them vote on some sort of manipulated question. But what good is all this if the government can then turn around and reject the results or, worse yet, twist the results to its own satisfaction simply for the purpose of partisan gain?

I submit that this is the only intention of the government in the first place. This toothless bill is simply an attempt by the government to make itself appear more democratic when in reality perhaps democracy is the farthest thing from its mind.

This fact is expressed in the comments of the government House leader himself who has said recently that he would prefer not to have a referendum at all. The same House leader has termed this legislation: "A weapon to be used only if the various premiers and other leaders involved in this process do not comply with the government's own constitutional vision".

In the final analysis a constitutional referendum, if the government chooses even to conduct one at all, will be meaningless and subject to the whims and political gamesmanship of this Tory government.

I fear that perhaps the government is more concerned about achieving a deal than it is about achieving true unity. I hate to think that the government would be obsessed with a short-term patchwork truce rather than working without artificial deadlines and crises toward a long-term cohesive solution which will celebrate the true equality of all provinces and all citizens.

I therefore restate my belief that if Bill C-81 is to advance the cause of democracy in this country it must be amended in order that a national referendum must be conducted on any final constitutional package. In addition, a motion must be proposed that the results of such a referendum be binding on this or any other future government.

A further question I would have for the government would be why this bill does not provide for a truly national vote. Why has the government allowed for the possibility of asking different questions in different regions or provinces, or for the possibility of conducting the vote in only specific provinces or regions while omitting others? Bill C-81 could enable the government to propose a question or questions nationally or in one or more provinces. What is the government's rationale for this move?

Perhaps the government believes on the one hand that the views of the residents of particular provinces or regions are more important than those who live in other provinces or regions. On the other hand the government may want to use this provision as a strong arm tactic or weapon to pressure reluctant but principled premiers into succumbing to the will of the federal government.

Still yet another possibility is that the government would like to hold a separate referendum in the provinces outside Quebec so that English and French Canada may be denied the opportunity for an intelligent and meaningful dialogue with each other on the country's constitutional aspirations. Whatever its reasons the government has erred on this count.

If members on the other side of the House believe in the equality of all citizens regardless of where they live in this great country they will do the right thing and conduct this proposed referendum on a national scale.

As an extension, if the government wants to show Canadians that it believes in the equality of all provinces it will hold any constitutional referendum in each and every province.

I am not sure whether the government believes in the equality of all provinces but this is certainly a prime opportunity to show Canadians where they stand on this question.

It is essential on important matters such as constitutional amendments that a national referendum be paramount over advisory provincial referenda. One question should be asked everywhere at the same time, not a set of different questions extending over a period of time.

As a protection of regional interests, approval of the amendment should require a majority vote in at least two-thirds of the provinces and a majority of all votes cast nation-wide.

The current amending formula provides for the most fair and equitable protection of regional interests. It did not just pop up out of nowhere. It was arrived at after years of deliberation and academic argument. Thus far it has allowed for a fair expression of regional interests.

I cannot see much value in tinkering now in order to apply some special regional vote to this upcoming particular set of amendments.

The four-region concept being talked about has been thrown around before in constitutional deliberations. It was inevitably rejected because it did not recognize the equality of the provinces. The government must now acknowledge the equality and ensure that any future amendments require the seven and fifty formula for approval.

Finally I come to the issue of the referendum question itself. The government has given no indication in Bill C-81 what the question might look like or how it might even be arrived at.

The government House leader has said it is possible to have more than one question. Perhaps it is this government's intention to submit a myriad of questions to the electorate in order to obtain a nebulous body of results from which the government can then pick and choose its desired conclusion.

In this case the government may not only take the referendum as an advisory one, but it may also manipulate and interpret the results for purely partisan reasons. What guarantee do we have that in Bill C-81 the government will not just do this, ignoring the whole purpose of a referendum which is to elicit the will of the people, not of the government?

I am also concerned about the provisions that would allow us only three days of debate when it comes time to draft the wording of this question. I cannot imagine why the government would want to invoke closure before the debate has even begun, unless of course it is not interested in what anyone else has to say or what the results might be. I am sure there are at least some democrats over there who would be interested in what others have to say about a proposed question. If the government wants to act unilaterally on this one it should think again because it looks like it could use all the help it can get.

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to speak on this bill today. I would also like to compliment the member from Etobicoke who introduced his own bill on referenda. I had the pleasure of seconding his bill when he introduced it.

In 1867 Canada was created by its people. Now 125 years later I am proud to see that the government will give people a final and concrete say in how their country should be rebuilt. This is truly a Canada round of constitutional negotiations.

The government is committed to ensuring public participation in the renewal of our Constitution. By tabling this legislation to enable a referendum on constitutional reform our government has reinforced this commitment.

Constitutional reform must be open, must be public, and must be transparent. We must provide every opportunity for the ideas of Canadians to be heard. It is not enough to have Canadians involved in the debate; they must also have a stake in it and they must also vote on it. Our government also must listen.

In the summer of 1991 I sent out a survey on the Constitution to every household in my riding. My constituents told me that they wanted to participate in constitutional renewal. Sixty-six per cent said they want to be involved in creating and reviewing constitutional amendments through constituent assemblies and public hearings.

Our government has responded to these demands by providing Canadians with opportunities to be heard at every turn. First there was the Citizen's Forum on Canada's Future in November of 1990. The forum was created to get Canadians from all across the country talking to each other about the values and characteristics which define this great country and which define us as Canadians.

Then there was the Beaudoin-Edwards special joint Committee on the process for amending the Constitution of Canada. It asked Canadians how our Constitution should be amended and who should be involved in the amending process. The Beaudoin-Dobbie committee toured the country to ask Canadians to discuss and improve upon the set of 28 proposals which had been tabled by the right hon. Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

The federal government, nine provincial governments, two territorial governments, and leaders of the four major aboriginal groups have now entered into discussions. There have been consultations and multilateral negotiations.

I hope that these groups and leaders will come to some sort of consensus on a constitutional package which will be truly national in scope, a truly national round.

My constituents told me that not only did they want to be involved in creating the constitutional proposals but that they wanted to be involved in a national referendum. Sixty-three per cent said it was important that our government hold a national referendum to improve any constitutional amendments.

I am happy to see the government move in that direction. I am an advocate of referenda when necessary on national issues. Referenda in the past have been used in different countries and different states to involve people in debate, to make the trade-offs in their own minds on issues, to get more fully involved in discussing what is at issue, what ramifications issues have, how it would affect them personally and how it would affect their country. In this way they become emotionally involved. It is less easy for citizens to say they do not like a proposal or to criticize it in a facile way when they have a personal stake in it.

It is very important that the Government of Canada consult with people. That is not to say that governments should use referenda at every turn on every matter or allow referenda to be used on issues that are not of national importance.

We do have elected representatives; we do have a court system. It is almost tragic that the more people seek to go to the courts, the more they want referenda, the less effective our political system may be in the future. This is something we must consider because we must have an effective political system to resolve matters in a democratic way to protect the interests of individual Canadians of every background.

I want to stress two points. First, I am personally not in favour of spending limits. I believe these are restrictions on freedom of speech. However the government has indicated it would have spending limits similar to that of a national election. That might be a compromise in the interests of equality and fairness so I am prepared to go along with it.

In my view this freedom on spending should be extended to broadcasting. If people want to buy broadcast time to air their views on an issue they should be able to do it.

I would like to read a quote of U.S. Supreme Court Justice William Rehnquist who examined this issue and wrote in a judgment dated June 18, 1986:

> To restrict political spending is much like allowing a speaker into a public hall to express his views while denying him an amplifying system.

In a modern democracy we must be able to spend money to do things like direct mailings and reach out to a lot of people. People lead very busy lives. It is not as it once was where people would have a lot of say without spending the money.

We must not muzzle the free voices of our nation. Canadians are mature enough to make their own judgments. Canadians can see through who is spending money and what they are saying. Canadians are mature people. They can make their own judgments. What we do need and where we should concentrate, if we are speaking about spending limits, is on disclosure. I am pleased to see the government has tough disclosure rules on this issue.

On the subject of freedom and involvement I would also like to quote John Stuart Mill:

> The only freedom which deserves the name is that of pursuing our own good in our own way so long as we do not attempt to deprive others of theirs, or impede their efforts to obtain it.

Once again that reinforces the notion of freedom of speech and public discussion.

I applaud our government for moving in this democratic direction, yet Canadian legislatures must make sure this bill is fair. We are doing that by having our disclosure rules and other rules.

This legislation puts in place a Canada round and we want to achieve success in a Canada round. This legislation does not mean that a referendum will be held but is enabling legislation so if at a certain time the government decides to hold a referendum it can decide with consultation on a national question.

I will close by saying I endorse this legislation. I am prepared to make a compromise on the spending limits although I believe we should have increased disclosure rather than spending limits. People want to know where a message is coming from. We acknowledge that in order to get a message out or a point of view across, people or committees need to spend money and that is perfectly legitimate.

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on Bill C-81, as it is the means by which Canadians will be consulted on the amendments to the Constitution of Canada.

On numerous occasions the Liberal Party has stressed the importance of having within the Canadian Constitution the ability and the right to go to the people. Logic dictates that if one province has the opportunity to express its views on its constitutional future, so should all other provinces.

I believe the pinnacle of our democratic system is the holding of a referendum. It is a process which gives Canadians the opportunity to express their views on their future. My colleagues and I are very pleased to see this process being utilized as it was proposed by the Leader of the Opposition in April 1991. The simple fact of the matter is that all Canadian citizens participating in a national referendum will be brought closer together.

I totally agree with the concept of a national referendum but Bill C-81 is flawed. This bill contains absolutely no provision for capping spending limits. These should apply to either side of the referendum question. The proposed bill should provide for a yes and no umbrella committee that would follow realistic spending limits. In other words, no corporation, no financially powerful individual, no group or political party can buy the Constitution of Canada because it is not for sale.

Furthermore the polls indicate that Canadians want a referendum. At this point in time, I believe that the Canadian people deserve a fair and honest question. This would enable each and every Canadian to express their views on this matter once and for all. The wording of the question is the key, the key to a new life for this magnificent country of ours.

That is why I strongly believe that total co-operation is required in this House. If we are unable to reach an agreement on the question we will be setting a terrible example for our fellow citizens. As members of Parliament, we must show Canadians that we are able to deal with this matter expeditiously and professionally. I say expeditiously because Canadians are fed up with this bickering over the Constitution and want the matter resolved as soon as possible so that we can all get on with our lives.

Unfortunately we are off to a bad start. The opposition parties have not been consulted at all on this bill. Our House leader was only briefed. If this government was genuinely concerned about our Constitution and the future of this country, it would have put Canadians and Canada's interests first and politics last. Our country should be first and foremost in our hearts and in our minds because the issue at hand transcends partisanship; it goes far beyond political expediency. The unity of our country is at stake.

The bill does not provide for a double majority. A fair referendum should not only have a majority of votes at the end of tabulation, but it should also have a majority in the five regions of the country. I believe there should be a majority in Ontario, Quebec, Atlantic Canada, western Canada, and northern Canada. This would better serve the concept of a fair and realistic referendum as no one or two regions of Canada would impose its will on another region.

We have to come out of this constitutional exercise better off than when we entered into it. Therefore, we must have a national majority and a regional majority. Furthermore, once the referendum results are in all premiers should acknowledge the results and comply with the will of their people.

Once again this referendum must be understood by all and to be fair at all stages of the process. It must be unquestionably fair. The days of major decision making behind closed doors without a mandate are over. The people will no longer accept this. I believe Canadians are tired of hearing about the Constitution and would rather talk about the economy as it is extremely important. We must all realize that this matter has to be resolved once and for all.

We are going through very difficult economic times. The risks are high but we cannot allow this wonderful country of ours to perish because of the negative vote. In my view it would be disastrous.

The final decision will be rendered by the people and not by governments or politicians. We will get our marching orders directly from the people and the decision should be very clear and should give government clear direction also.

• (1150)

To conclude I would like to say once again that the Liberal Party fully supports and endorses the concept of a referendum on constitutional proposals. The Canadian people must be given the opportunity to express their views. After all, this country belongs to them.

However, as I have previously indicated, we require some changes to this bill. The government must allow amendments to be adopted. Without these amendments I am very concerned about the outcome of the referendum and I hope that the governing party will see the light and take down these political barriers.

There have to be firm limits on spending to allow this to be a fair choice for the country. The limits would create an atmosphere which would be more likely to result in a fair decision. This bill should allow for a national and regional majority.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to participate, even for this short period of time, in the debate on Bill C-81. I must say, as other speakers have said, that in a referendum bill that is supposed to pull the country together and be a unifying force we certainly got off to a very bad start to have the government invoke time allocation this morning after just two and half days of debate on what for me is a most important bill and the question that will come from this bill, this Parliament is going to have to decide.

Those were two and a half short days and it does not auger well for the mood of the country and/or any debate on what finally is going to be in a constitutional package, let alone a referendum question when we get to that. I could speak for the whole 10 minutes on the ramrod, jack-boot method of the government House leader in forcing this bill through when we do not even know what the constitutional package is and there are no deadlines out there that have to be met. This should have had a full airing.

Every member who wanted to participate should have been able to speak. Instead we are cut off at the pass with this allocation of time with all questions to be put tonight by five o'clock. That is totally wrong and does not breed the goodwill and non-partisan, bipartisan atmosphere that is going to be so necessary if some of the wounds of this country are to be healed.

Last night I was in my riding at a very inspirational meeting, an adventure spring citizenship festival. Mainstreet Canada was there: fire chiefs, police chiefs, municipal leaders and 300 to 400 Boy Scouts and Girl Guides, all reaffirming their faith in Canada, getting certificates of citizenship. I would like every member of Parliament to get to some of those citizenship festivals to get in touch with the pulse of the real people rather than just hearing ourselves talk in this chamber where sometimes we lose touch with the real people. I could do a whole speech on that citizenship festival last night and on the faith of those basic people, the taxpayers of Canada and the youth of Canada who are going to be the leaders of tomorrow, and how they feel about Canada.

In this Chamber with this Bill C-81 and the mechanical debate we have had up until today, and now with the allocation of time order that is going to cut us off tonight, it certainly does not give you much inspiration to talk about the nation in the way the founders talked about this nation and helped to bring us together.

In my very short time left, I want to be very clear that on Bill C-81, in terms of the principle of a referendum, I certainly have said for some time that this government especially, in view of the Constitution and especially this government's credibility with the people, it is fundamental that there is some reference to the people to approve whatever constitutional package comes forward from the constitutional discussions and/or the question that is going to be framed in this House.

This bill does not even go part way. The constitutional referendum should be a binding referendum. It should be national in scope and it should be a single question, yes or no. I do support those in this House who have very real fears about the reason for this bill at the present time which does not even meet any of those tests.

It can be very manipulative, have different questions in different parts of the country and have some referendum questions that are not going to be put to other provinces. If that happens it is going to be most divisive indeed. For members over there, including the member from Etobicoke who has certainly led the way in the academic research on referendums and plebiscites, I find it passing strange that some members on the government side do not appreciate from their history that in effect if we are going to have a referendum it has to be a single question, it has to be national in scope and has to be binding.

The specious argument of government is that a referendum cannot amend the Constitution. We know that but it certainly can have a motion to bind the result of whatever the people decide in this Parliament. This Parliament is one of the eight parliaments together, the national Parliament and seven parliaments representing 50 per cent of the people, that can amend the Constitution.

There is no reason at all for this hokery-pokery and specious reasoning. There is no reason to say we are not going to put a binding clause on a referendum bill because this Parliament does not amend the Constitution by itself. It certainly could be restricted in what it did if there were a proper referendum question.

It is passing strange to me, and I am afraid we are heading down to another Meech Lake fiasco of imposing artificial deadlines, when I hear the intergovernmental minister talking at these different constitutional conferences that we are certainly making progress here. I actually do not even have to turn up the sound on television any more to realize that in effect some of this so-called progress is maybe some progress, but the real questions have not be decided.

What I have one of the greatest fears about is that frankly the constitutional fatigue has set in and in effect there is going to be a charade or a mirage at the end of the day that we resurrect a form of Meech and then put off the real serious questions and decisions on Senate reform and the inherent right of the aboriginals for self-government, whatever that means, let alone the division of powers. I am very concerned that in the heat of the summer with constitutional fatigue with the looseness of this referendum bill, a very bad question or questions could be put to the Canadian people that will not pull this country together but will make further stress and strain on the country.

In terms of time we are talking about a nation that has been here for 125 years. It was only 10 years ago in 1982 that we got the Constitution back to this country so that we could amend it. Many people can complain about the then Prime Minister. I sat in the opposition then and the then Prime Minister, Mr. Trudeau, may have had many things that people could complain about. However, one reason I voted for the Constitution bill was that it at least brought it back to this country so that Canadians finally could try to amend it and change it.

That was just 10 years ago after 115 years that the Constitution was stuck in England. Goodness gracious, we only got our own citizenship in this country 80 years after the country was formed in 1947 and we only got our flag in 1965, 98 years after the country was formed. With those three little demarcation dates in history, the Constitution only came back here in 1982. The act of citizenship came in 1947. Finally we had the flag, which took over 40 years through all parliamentary committees, going from the Union Jack, to having official colours red and white, and then finally having the ensign. Finally after 40 some years of different parliamentary debate and different parliamentary committees, we finally raised the flag on February 15, 1965 just outside these Parliament Buildings.

With that perspective in terms of history, let us not box ourselves in to artificial deadlines that are going to do more to rip this country apart than to bring it together.

As far as I am concerned, in the closing moments that I have I could give you Pat's panacea for political problems in this country. It would be to abolish the Senate, in effect to make sure that the character of the distinctive culture, language and civil code of Quebec is recognized and implemented through proper law, and in effect fix the term of Parliament so that while the Prime Minister might be able to call elections within the fixed term, that a certain time, a certain fixed date, an election is held if he did not call for the fixed term. You would not be able to play around with all of the dates and the manoeuvring and the political manipulation that you have and the bad legislation and all the weird things that happen as you get closer with the Prime Minister deciding where he sits in the polls.

That is a forlorn hope at this time of our constitutional discussion but anyone who thinks we are coming up with a constitutional package from the constitutional conferences that are going along today, no matter how sincere is whistling Dixie when they have not even got to Senate reform. They have not defined what self-government and the aboriginal inherent right is, let alone the division of powers.

We are going to be faced with a question that we do not even know. The worst thing about this bill, in conclusion, is the three-day limit imposed in this bill on the bill that is going to define the question. That question is going to be the question that makes or breaks Canada. It is the question that is going to decide if we have a Canada. I have never yet seen in my history of 20-odd years as a member that as you debate one bill you already impose closure on the bill that is going to follow, that is, the question bill.

That is not the way to build a consensus and that is not the way to build the non-partisan attitude that we need if we are going to have a greater Canada which we can have if we have the right leadership.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to join in this very important debate. I was saddened, as were most of the members on this side of the House, including the previous speaker, by the fact that we had to have closure this morning.

We have a most important debate and we are trying to give a message to Canadians that we want to open up the constitutional debate but in the process of talking about opening up the debate, we close it down.

These contradictions are not lost on the voters and the people who are trying to right many wrongs in this country.

This is a little bit of a transformation for me to be standing up and supporting a referendum. I must say that as a university professor teaching political science for 15 years before I became a member of Parliament, I spent a long time thinking about questions such as referenda and plebiscites and the democratization of our process.

For many years I thought that the use of the referendum would be too simplistic but I began to believe more and more that Canada has got itself into a trap of thinking that the only deals that really could be made, that really counted, or that would last are deals made among the elite groups of the country. There is a whole academic body of literature about making deals this way, elite accommodation for those of you who follow these academic issues.

It became quite apparent in the 1970s and 1980s that the deals being made by these elite have not been respected in the Canadian political body. Through the emergence of fringe parties, through the emergence of protest votes and tax revolts, Canadians have sought many ways to express their frustration with the system.

I concluded it was about time that Parliament began to take leadership on the fundamental question of how to democratize society.

The Meech Lake accord, which failed two years ago, failed in part because a small group thought that the solution it had thought about and worked hard at should be accepted automatically by the rest of the country. The ensuing public debate was one of the more divisive debates we have had on the Constitution or any other issue in this country.

Part of what we are doing on the constitutional debate is a healing process. We are trying to find ways in which the different regions can be accommodated, the different provincial interests can be accommodated, and the bottom line that the Canadian taxpayer, the people living in this country, feel that in the end there is a package we can put behind us and move on to more important issues.

The deal has to be accepted widely.

The referendum offers the possibility of opening up the doors and saying to people that here is the question that Parliament has thought about and put in front of you and what we want you to do is indicate that you support or disapprove what has been done.

There is a risk because we want to make sure that Canadians see the country continue. Whenever you have a plebiscite or a referendum on an issue of such importance there is a risk. However, the risk of not putting a question out is greater.

There is the risk of having people sitting at home saying: "There they go again. They never ask me my opinion. I do not know what they are doing. I do not know what the Constitution is". This is one of those rare opportunities when we can say: "You are part of the process. Here is what all the negotiations have led to. Here is the package. We want your approval. If you do not approve it, we start over again and we form a package that is acceptable to you".

That is a very fundamental shift away from traditional parliamentary democracy. The fact that this legislation is flawed is very important to consider because its acceptance will mark in the development of our parliamentary history the time in which we moved away from this Chamber as the place of final resolution of issues into a more broadly defined consensus and voting process.

It will not be something that evolves on every issue, but I think that the acceptance of the referendum here for the first time in many years across the country is an acknowledgement that the process must change to accommodate people. I look forward to participating in that change and to putting my support behind those who wish to have a referendum.

The Liberal Party worked at this issue since the failure of the Meech Lake accord and realized that only through broad based support could a new constitutional deal be accepted. That is why in the nine points that we introduced into the debate in April 1991 we had the referendum front and centre. It has taken a while for the deal makers to see the need to include others.

The introduction of this legislation was greatly welcomed by our party because we have been waiting for a chance to have Canadians express their views. I would particularly like to use this opportunity to thank the member from Etobicoke who spent long years—we were colleagues in Carleton University many years ago—seeing his ideas develop and emerge, and seeing him take a perspective. Very gently and gradually through research and persuasion, he has had the House of Commons turn to his idea in the end and say: "Yes, you were on the right track long before the rest of us. Thank you very much for presenting us with an option".

I think it is a valuable experience for every one of us to know that it is through the pushing of good ideas that we can, in fact, persuade Parliament to change its processes.

There are some fundamental flaws in this legislation that are going to cause a great deal of difficulty. I would like to bring them to the attention of the House. We have four concerns from this side of the House with this piece of legislation.

First, there is the fact that the referendum is still only an option. The proposed legislation would still leave it up to the government to decide whether to hold a referendum at all. We believe that legitimacy in the constitutional package will come from a referendum, therefore a referendum must be held.

Second, there should be spending limits. We do not want to see an endless amount of money spent by the federal government or by other parties unknown to Canadian taxpayers. We do not want to see the participation of groups as we did during the last election when there were people campaigning for the pro–free trade vote. They were able to pile millions of dollars into the coffers of the governing party, causing them to win the election. We do not want that sort of feeling hanging over a referendum.

Third, we would like to see regional majorities. If people in one region of this country do not agree with the deal we do not want them to feel that they have been imposed upon by others. We want to make sure that each region is in agreement with the essential points in the package as they will affect each region differently. Those of us from the west are particularly sensitive to being cut off, to having a deal signed over us and leaving us in the same constitutionally weak position that we have been in since Confederation.

Last, who decides the question? We want a straightforward and open parliamentary process through which representatives from all parties have an opportunity to work on the question. The ownership of the question is with Parliament and not with the government. People must feel that everyone has contributed to it, that it has not been decided at a cabinet meeting which then comes in and uses its majority to push a question through. It has been an all–party meeting. Everybody would have had a chance to look at it to make sure it is fair in both languages. It should be fair to all the different regions.

These are the central points that we want to put forward. We are hoping that the government understands the fundamental flaws in this legislation and that it is able to change them. This has been a very, very important debate. I only wish the government had not decided to close it down so quickly because Canadians do want to know about the new referendum.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the bill that is before the House. The bill will establish a procedure to hold a national referendum on a constitutional issue or amendment that may be worked out in the weeks or months ahead. I do so with full confidence that it is entirely appropriate for this Parliament to provide for legislation to consult the people of Canada on important constitutional changes because the Constitution of Canada is the property of the people of Canada and must ultimately be decided by and have its legitimacy based upon the consent of the people of Canada.

Our party has been at the forefront of calling for a new constitutional consultative process. We all saw the disaster of the process used in Meech Lake and before it in the 1981–82 round of constitutional changes. Back in 1981–82 the province of Quebec was ultimately left out of the national consensus, fostering further grievances which have led us to the situation we are in today where we have a whole range of truly important national issues besetting this country and we are required, because of the failure of governments back in 1981–82 to include Quebec, to deal with yet again the grievances of Quebec in respect of constitutional matters and because of other failures, including the failure of the Meech Lake process, the grievances of others across Canada and particularly the aboriginal peoples of Canada.

Once again we are in a constitutional debate and discussion, a matter of great frustration to this Parliament and of course a great frustration to the Canadian people. The issue is now before us. We have to deal with it and it is appropriate that we should provide, as this bill does, a mechanism for consulting the Canadian people in the process.

The Meech Lake process really left out the people of Canada. It was on that fundamental ground that it failed. In its failure, it has come close to driving this country apart. One of the results of the failure is a divide in fundamental perception about the understanding of what this country is. Many people in Quebec who until then felt themselves to be welcome and part of Canada saw the failure of Meech Lake as a rejection of francophone Quebec. In the rest of Canada, Meech Lake was seen as a failure of constitutional process, a failure of consultation and in no way was seen as a rejection of Quebec. In that divided perception are the seeds of the division that we are now in this country working to repair.

All members of this House, perhaps with a few minor exceptions, want the current process to work. I believe that the overwhelming majority of people in Canada want the current process to work. If it is to work we have to establish the possibility of genuine consultation with the people of Canada, and this bill seeks to provide it.

As I said, our party has called for an opening up of the constitutional process. We thoroughly supported the idea that the two parliamentary committees, the first known as the Edwards–Beaudoin committee looking at an amending formula, have a wide process of consultation with the Canadian people, and that took place. We supported the establishment of the Beaudoin–Dobbie commission. We were gravely disappointed at the difficulties it had at the beginning in establishing an effective consultative process with Canada and we have pressed from the beginning for a constituent assembly.

We were pleased to see the government ultimately accept the wisdom of that approach and agree to these five conferences across Canada which have contributed enormously to the improvement of the atmosphere, improvement of the process, and are offering us now some genuine hope we can settle the constitutional issue at least for the time being and get on with the other issues of the day.

The referendum bill we have before us authorizes the government, if it deems it appropriate in the public interest, to call for a referendum. It then provides a process for approaching Parliament for approval of a question to be put to the people of Canada and establishes the procedures under which the referendum is to be held.

We have some concerns with the details of the bill. We have been assured in part by the statements made by the government in the last 24 hours that it is ready to consider sympathetically amendments which we hope will allay the concerns we have. On that basis I have no difficulty in voting to support this bill because I believe it is important the people of Canada be given the possibility of being consulted on constitutional amendments.

In the remaining moments I have I want to address a couple of specific concerns which I think the Canadian people should be aware of as we proceed down the path of national referenda.

I think we should ensure that referenda only be used in constitutional issues. We do not want to move to a system of governance that they have, for example, in the state of California where referenda can be forced by special interest groups on virtually any question and it ultimately ends up where, in the nature of our society, the rich can control the results. In a referenda on an issue which affects the powerful in any country the powerful will have an undue influence in the result.

That happens within our parliamentary system as well and we should not be naive about that, but there are risks in allowing in our mass media age every issue to be handled by the process of referenda. On the other hand we should be clear that it is appropriate in the case of a constitutional amendment for us to consult the Canadian people.

This bill does not of course provide that any constitutional amendment must automatically go to a national referendum, but rather it is: "In the public interest to obtain by means of a referendum the opinion of the electors on any question relating to the Constitution of Canada". The cabinet or the government can set the process in motion.

The two committees of this House that looked at the proposition of a referendum suggested it should be narrowed to situations where it was helpful to determine whether there was a national consensus. I suspect, certainly in the current round of negotiations, when this bill is passed that the government cannot escape the conclusion that the offer that is to be put together to use that language, the constitutional package that comes out of these rounds of discussion, will have to be in some fashion or other put to the people of Canada for their views.

It should be noted the bill does not provide the details of a question, it does not settle the timing of a question, and it is going to be important that that be worked out in committee.

I hope the committee that is considering this bill will look at amendments to the bill which will not just leave it to the government alone.

• (1220)

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate on Bill C–81.

I support the principle of this bill and I emphasize the principle of the bill because I see flaws in it. I would like to discuss those flaws and my concerns in a moment.

It is clear Canadians want to be consulted on the matter of constitutional change. They want a say in the reshaping of our fundamental laws and we in the Liberal Party believe Canadians deserve nothing less. That is why we support a national referendum. After all the Constitution is not owned by politicians; it belongs to the people of Canada.

People are saying they do not want another Meech Lake. No more secret, late night meetings; Canadians must be full partners in the process.

I want to get to some of the reservations I have about this bill because I believe, as do my colleagues on this side of House, that the bill can be improved considerably. We sincerely hope that the government will consider amendments very seriously at the committee stage examination of this bill.

It is unfortunate that we are discussing this bill now. There has been an unfortunate delay concerning referendum legislation. After all our leader proposed a referendum one year ago. There have been all kinds of signals from across Canada, including signals from a couple of parliamentary committees, for the need of having a referendum tied to any constitutional change.

Unfortunately the government sat on its hands and did nothing. Now at this very late hour, when there is what you might call a bit of panic in the country, we have Bill C–81 before us. It is really unfortunate that the government did not bring forward this legislation, if not months ago certainly weeks ago.

Let us take a look at some of the other concerns that we have on this side of the House. This legislation, Bill C–81, provides for a referendum but only on an optional basis. In other words it does not make a referendum mandatory before proceeding to any constitutional change. I believe that is unfortunate.

We know that the Constitution does not require referenda before changes are made. I am aware of that. We can certainly have legislation in this House that ties our hands, that binds parliamentarians to having a referendum and observing its results before we proceed toward constitutional change. It is very unfortunate that this legislation provides for a referendum but only as an option. There is also the question of the question. There is nothing in this bill that sets out the question. There is nothing in this bill that provides us as parliamentarians with a full role in the determination of what the question is. From my reading of this bill, the question will be left to the determination of the government. Again that is very unfortunate.

If we are going to have fairness in the process, if we are going to have Canadians supporting the process, then Canadians will want to see full participation of all parliamentarians, not just the government. It is unfortunate that the mechanism for determining the framing of the question, determining the timing of the question is not written into the legislation.

One of the gravest concerns I have is the lack of provision in the bill for a double majority. I want to touch on that in some detail because we all know that referenda raise fears. Referenda can be very divisive.

We have had a couple of national referenda, or we might call them plebiscites, in this country in the past. They have been referred to. There was one in the 19th century having to do with prohibition. There was the famous one in 1942 relating to conscription. In both cases the plebiscites or the referenda succeeded but they were divisive because, in effect, they produced a result of having one part of the country saying no and another part of the country saying yes. That by definition is divisive. We do not want to face that possibility in another referendum relating to constitutional change.

A double majority which in effect demands that the referendum succeed in all four regions of the country will eliminate that fear of great division. We all know that Quebecers see themselves as a minority in Canada. Certainly they see themselves as a minority in North America and they do not want to see their rights and their aspirations and their hopes trampled upon and dashed by the majority.

The same thing is felt in western Canada, the region I come from. Western Canadians see this as a Canada round and they feel that they have a stake in any constitutional change, but they want to be consulted directly. They want a say in this and the full say they are asking for can only be obtained if there is a double majority. After all, there is a possibility that the question may be written in such a way that westerners will take one viewpoint, they will take one opinion on the question, whereas other Canadians, from Ontario, Atlantic Canada or Quebec will take another view.

Therefore it seems to me for a referendum to truly succeed, to truly have validity, to truly have credibility, there must be what we call a provision for a double majority. It must succeed in the west. It must succeed in Ontario. It must succeed in Quebec. It must succeed in Atlantic Canada.

According to news reports I have heard in the last 24 hours, the government is not prepared to amend the legislation before us in such a way as to provide for a double majority. I think that would be a mistake and I hope the government will reconsider its position with respect to double majority and look at this again very seriously. Canadians are demanding that kind of protection and that kind of insurance.

The other concern I have has to do with spending limits. Again, based on news reports, apparently the House leader of the government is entertaining some different thoughts and is, perhaps, prepared to amend the legislation to put some control on spending limits. I think it is absolutely essential that there be spending limits.

To have the legislation seen as being fair there has to be spending limits. If the sky is the limit there is naturally favouritism toward the rich, toward people with money. People with money in a process where the sky is the limit will have no constraints, none whatsoever. They will be able to spend anything, all the money that they would want, while ordinary people of ordinary means will be constrained by their limited finances.

I believe it will make people feel that they have been treated unfairly, that the legislation has been essentially unfair and so spending limits are absolutely essential. Again I would urge the government to look at that.

We support the principle of the bill but it needs a lot of work.

[Translation]

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, at this very moment, while we are discussing Bill C–81, an act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada, the Canadian constitutional circus caravan is parked in Montreal, we see the actors going around in circles without getting anywhere on the substance of the issues.

We get the impression that only one thing is moving and that is the caravan itself which travels from city to city across Canada, spending millions of dollars just to realize, time and time again, it has reached an impasse.

Five Canadian provinces chose Montreal to take a joint stand on making a Triple–E Senate an absolute–condition for any constitutional agreement. That is where we are now, with all our efforts to bring Quebec back into the Constitution with honour and enthusiasm.

Quebec's minimum demands have been rejected: no veto, no assurances on Supreme Court appointments. As for the fundamental issue of Quebec's development instruments to be discussed during the second round, there has been no time yet to consider the matter, although the deadline is only two weeks away.

What are the consequences for Quebec? As far as constitutional guarantees are concerned, Quebec has no assurances that in the long run it will be able to maintain its influence within our federal institutions. As far as the division of powers is concerned we are denied the tools we need to maintain our identity and provide for our development. These results were entirely predictable and inevitable when we consider the events in this country that led to the demise of Meech Lake.

That is why we founded the Bloc Quebecois. We were elected to defend the higher interests of Quebec and to enable Quebecers to pursue the affirmation of their identity and development, both individually and collectively. The current talks are headed for an impasse because the basic realities of Quebec are not recognized by the other provinces and the federal government.

Yesterday I listened to members opposite talk about the Canadian nation without any reference to the principle of two founding nations which formed the very basis of Confederation in 1867 but was never observed. They are making pretty speeches today but they want us to be a large ethnic group within an anglophone Canadian nation. The answer is clear: never.

They accuse us of wanting to divide a country that does not recognize us and never did, a country that for decades prohibited French schools in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta; a country that hanged Louis Riel, imposed the War Measures Act, imposed conscription and now wants to impose a referendum thereby conscripting democracy. The sole purpose of this referendum is to short-circuit the mechanism by which the people of Quebec will exercise their right to self-determination. Its funding and spending regulations are worthy of a banana republic.

Today, on the third day of this debate, they are imposing closure, to end debate as we have discussed it enough here. The constitutional circus can go on for weeks or months but here three days of debate is enough and closure is imposed.

The Quebec people are proud and polite. We will all be there to answer no, thanks: No to the federal strait-jacket, no to continuing the constitutional circus on which we are wasting our energies. We will exercise our right to self-determination with honour and enthusiasm. We will repatriate all our taxes. We will assert our right to make all our laws. We will negotiate our international agreements ourselves. We will soon become a sovereign country, a normal people that will take its place in the family of nations.

The federal government is a giant with feet of clay, an overindebted giant, in debt here and abroad, a divided giant, unable to have policies that correspond to the real country. It still has the power to waste our time. It still has the power to waste hundreds of millions on phony consultations, a referendum that will cost the government $100 million but solve nothing at all. But it does not have the power to force us to keep silent. It does not have the power to force us to belittle ourselves and deny who we are. The referendum tactic will not divert us from our essential objective: affirming and developing our people, the Quebecois, and soon our country, Quebec.

In closing, I would like to call on all my colleagues elected in Quebec. It is clear; we all know that the present negotiations are on the wrong track as long as the Quebec people are not recognized as such. Faced with this impasse, the federal government is now preparing to push something through and these people are being sucked in. After refusing it they partly accept it and now they tell us in the corridors: "We are ready to hold a referendum, but we think that it will not happen. We won't need it. We shouldn't need it. We would prefer not to use it, but we are preparing legislation anyway. We will pass the bill anyway. We are cutting off debate today".

I would call on the hon. members for Champlain, Gaspé, Matapédia and Abitibi to reflect on the consequences of what they are doing. It is clear now that we are about to make fundamental decisions for the future of Quebecers. I hope that when the time comes we will all be together to make a positive decision which will ensure that we can pursue our own development, look after the real problems, create jobs, take our own place on the international scene in a world of global markets, give our children a future in French in Quebec, make our institutions from now on depend on our own decisions and not be subject to another majority which can impose constitutional changes on us, which can impose fundamental changes without our consent. No self-respecting people would agree any longer to be denied within a federal structure. This is an essential condition for new negotiations and any possible agreement on a whole series of normal relationships with the rest of Canada. First and foremost, they must recognize us for what we are: a people with a brilliant future.

• (1240)

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, we are embarking on a discussion of probably the most important piece of legislation that we have brought before this House, legislation that will enable us to express our point of view on the constitutional changes that we want to bring to our country, on helping us implement a new vision for Canada, whether we are living in Quebec, Alberta, British Columbia or anywhere else within our wonderful country.

In a sense I regret very much that we have cut short the debate on this vitally important piece of legislation. I would sincerely hope that it was undertaken by the government with the expectation that by sending this to legislative committee the very important changes needed to make this a fair, open and workable piece of legislation will be undertaken there.

What is important to know is that the Constitution belongs to all of the people, not just to the bureaucrats and the politicians. All Canadians should have a final say on any constitutional reform package. This is not a foreign idea. This is something that has been undertaken in other countries around the world. This is an undertaking that we have done here in Canada. We know from the experience that we have had in the referenda in the past that the key, the vital and the important undertaking must be that this referendum be fair and acceptable to not only my people who live in Quebec but to Canadians everywhere else.

I do not see that it is a very difficult circumstance to realize that as a wife, mother and daughter I have a love for all this part of my immediate family. It is not difficult to extend it to the larger family, but we share this love in different ways. Where I have a sense of participation and belonging as a Montrealer and as a Quebecer, I do as well concern myself with what is going on in my larger country.

All Canadians want to have the opportunity to say this is right for me, this is how I feel as a Canadian and I have a sense of pride and belonging. Lord only knows that the rest of the world sees this as the most marvellous country. They see us as a bunch of little quarrelling children who have to find out how we want to play the rules of the game.

That national referendum which the Leader of the Opposition suggested as far back as April of 1991—and this government has finally agreed, as has the opposition, that this is a good way to go—really has to be right. I lived through the referendum in Quebec and I will tell you that it can be very divisive. Because it can be divisive and because there is heated passion about this, whether you are living in Quebec or in British Columbia or in Newfoundland for that matter, we all have a point of view. In the end we can all see how wonderful this country is.

In order to have that national referendum we first have to have the question right. There are a number of things wrong with the way this bill has been presented. I would sincerely hope that we will in the end fix those problems because they are fixable. The fixables that need to be attended to are the spending limits. The spending limits must be addressed because you cannot have the perception that any part of this country bought the election. It cannot be seen as belonging to the rich and powerful. It cannot be seen as belonging to either business or labour or interest groups. It has to be perceived as belonging to everyone with equal access to the opportunity to present their point of view so that when the point of view is expressed no one can be seen or act as a poor loser.

Second, there should be something done about some form of umbrella committees. Having worked in Quebec I can tell you that was a very effective way to use our energies and express our point of view.

The question of regional majorities comes very much to the heart of the matter as to whether we will be preceived to have been fair. We have put together a workable referendum procedure and it is transparent. There are no regulations in this piece of legislation.

We have no idea how a majority is going to be defined. We know there is not a provision for a double majority in there. Not only does it have to be perceived as being fair and right and acceptable for all Canadians as individuals, but we also have to see it as fair in our collective sense, in the regions in which we live.

Where in the past there have been differences, no one wants anyone to be able to go back and say, "you did not listen to me. You were not fair".

We wanted to be fair. We want Quebec to know that we are welcome as Quebecers within Canada, and Canada has to know that Quebecers welcome the opportunity to participate in their own way within this wonderful country.

I could go along and say that if we do not consult all three parties we, in our own actions right here, become too partisan. We need a mechanism whereby the actual question has to be defined and it should be defined by all parties, first in a small committee in which it can be examined and made sure that it is properly weighted and easily understood. Everybody will know what the question means so that when we go into the debate on the issues we know clearly what we are talking about.

It is perhaps not germane to the issue but this House is well aware that in the last few weeks and over the last few years the Canadian Parliament and Canadian parliamentarians have been helping the European parliaments establish themselves.

I looked after the Hungarian group this time. Last time it was those who came from the Ukraine. The Hungarians asked all kinds of questions on how you run a democracy. How did they get a democracy? They had referenda. They expressed a point of view. They chose a way to live.

Now they have to learn how to apply that way to live.

What could be better than to come here? We are a democracy. We do have differences of opinion. We do exchange in a logical and, I hope, intelligent approach in the bigger picture, not to mention distinct society. We are distinct and some of us are more distinct than others, never mind language. What is so terrible if you speak one language, two languages, three languages, four is even better.

We may or may not reform the Senate, but for goodness' sake the bottom line is that this country is too precious and too well perceived by everyone around the world, by those who are knocking to get a visa to come in here, who want to immigrate to Canada. We are having an argument. Let us settle it once and for all. Let us learn how to respect our differences, never mind tolerate them. Let us respect them. Let us rejoice in them.

The diversity of this country is the strength. Our unity is what is important and also in the long run that Canadian people recognize how lucky they are and they will express their will to live together. We have to have a proper mechanism.

As this bill goes to committee to be adjusted, to be fixed in a sense so that it will be on a proper open and fair procedure, I hope that good judgment on the part of this government will recognize the very serious responsibility it has and meet the concerns of all sides and many of the backbenchers, even on the government side, particularly around spending limits, advertising procedures and regional double majorities. The whole process needs to be tightened up.

As a Quebecer, as an Yvette, I do not want to have to see the breaking up of family ties and the bitterness that stays for much too long. This question is one we can discuss in an agreeable way. We do not have to be disagreeable. We can exchange on these differences but give us the mechanism and the tools to do it fairly, openly, tolerantly. It should always be perceived as such.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have a chance to speak, even if only for 10 minutes, on Bill C–81, an act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada.

This is a complicated bill. There are many details in it and there are also many flaws in it. The biggest flaw probably has been the lack of consultation between the government and the parties, that is, the consultation which broke down just in the last stage of the process when this bill was being drafted and when certain matters were overlooked. They were presumably not left out deliberately.

My NDP colleagues have touched on several of those already and I wish to concentrate on only three. The first flaw that I wish to mention is the lack of the double majority principle. This was the principle that was agreed to by all parties unanimously in the report that was tabled last June from Beaudoin–Edwards.

I quote from Hansard, page 10848:

> We recommend that a federal law be enacted to enable the federal government at its discretion to hold a consultative referendum on a constitutional proposal whether to confirm the existence of a national consensus or to facilitate the adoption of the required amending resolution.

This is the next part that I wish particularly to point out to the people of Canada. It was agreed further that:

> The referendum should require a national majority and a majority each in the four regions—Atlantic, Quebec, Ontario and the west.

The government party in the discussions agreed to that principle but has not written it into this referendum. There has been some suggestion that there might be a declaration by the Prime Minister but that would not have the force of law.

I am very concerned that in our country, as wide as it is with so many different peoples in it, we should not allow for some of them having reason to feel that they have been trampled or steamrolled over.

This is true for the west, it is true for the Atlantic, it is true for Ontario but I am especially concerned for Quebec. I have only lived there for five years. I have lived most of my life in Ontario but two of my children have lived at least half their lives in Quebec and expect to live there for the rest of their lives.

It should not be forgotten that perhaps the most critical time for Canada's independence prior to the struggle we have over the trade agreements with the United States was back in 1776 when the rebels in the thirteen colonies thought they would easily liberate Quebec from Britain which had conquered it. The people of Quebec said no and they had good reason to say no.

There was an agreement that under Sir Guy Carleton, the governor, Quebec would have its own language, its own religion, its own civil law and generally speaking its own culture. In other words, though I do not think the term was used, Quebec should be a distinct society.

That was the deal. Quebec delivered on its side of the deal and therefore Canada was brought into being and we still have a country independent of the United States, more or less. There should not be any suggestion that the other parts of Canada wish to renege on that deal without which Canada would not have come into existence.

If, in this referendum, we seem to be rejecting the right of Quebec to a majority in control of the outcome of the referendum along with a majority for the Atlantic, a majority for Ontario—I am not particularly worried for Ontario—and a majority for the west which is very important to many of my friends in the west and especially for many of the aboriginal peoples who live in the western provinces and the Northwest Territories, there should be a majority for each of those regions.

Therefore, the referendum may not be seen as a victory of some regions over one or two other regions. They have to be recognized not just in the vote, the possible outcome, but in the way the structure of the referendum is to be interpreted.

The second matter which I wish to note is that 30 per cent of Canadians have had the experience of being designated as different, as being often ignored, because they are racially or ethnically distinct from the majority, particularly those who are racially distinct.

We thought we would never have a race riot in Canada. We had one in Toronto a couple of weeks ago. We saw the bitterness in Canada's major metropolitan cities between certain racial or ethnic minorities and the governments of those cities, including their police forces. The bitterness is something that has caused us all great concern and we should not appear to be overlooking those. Until this date the government has refused the request of those minorities to include in its proposals, or to agree in its proposals, an amendment to section 27, the multiculturalism section.

Those groups representing the 30 per cent have asked that we should add that the section requires also the promotion of racial and ethnic equality. Without that, that being denied as it has been until this day, the people of this 30 per cent are not at all sure they are being included as equals if we will not guarantee it in our charter.

Therefore I would hope before the question is worded there will be some consideration given to that 30 per cent of the people of Canada.

The final matter I am concerned with, and it has been spoken to by some of my colleagues, is there must be effective equality in principle in the funding arrangements. There are only going to be two sides, yes and no. There may be many opinions on the yes side, many opinions on the no side, variations of yes or no, but it comes down to putting your "x" in one box or in the other.

If the rich are allowed to use all the force of their dollars on one side of this equation it will be a sick joke and it will be seen as a sick joke by the large majority of the people of Canada. It would be divisive to allow the rich to buy this referendum according to whichever side suits it.

It would be seen as a surrender of constitutional power to the power of the dollar, that is to the power of millions and billions of dollars. Most Canadians who are excluded from the prime ownership of the means of production in Canada have only their individual vote and a relatively trifling amount of money with which to make a campaign of this sort. It is important that this referendum should be so constructed that it is clear the primacy is given to one person, one vote, rather than to one dollar, one vote, because we know where the huge billions of dollars are concentrated in this country.

These are three amendments I sincerely hope will be adopted in the committee meetings over the next week. It is our caucus' intention to vote in favour of this in second reading but only because we hope the government will listen to reason and adopt amendments such as these in order to make the referendum a fair one for all Canadians.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 1 p.m. I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(2).

MEDIC-ALERT FOUNDATION

Mr. Yvon Côté (Richmond—Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that the Canadian Medic-Alert Foundation has proclaimed May to be Medic-Alert Month.

The Canadian Medic-Alert Foundation is a non-profit organization that has been dedicated to protecting Canadians for the past 30 years. It now has nearly 700,000 members and some 42,000 Canadians join every year.

People join for three main reasons: diabetes, allergy to penicillin and allergy to sulfadrugs. Health professionals have access day and night to a telephone service where they can obtain information to ensure that patients receive proper care. Medic-Alert never fails in this task.

I am therefore very pleased to point out this special day and month, to pay tribute to this excellent organization, and to express my support for Medic-Alert publicly.

CFB DOWNSVIEW

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Simple fairness demands that Marcel Masse, the Minister of National Defence, either justify or reverse his decision to close the supply depot at CFB Toronto Downsview in my riding and move its function to Montreal, a move which will cost an admitted 330 direct jobs and maybe more.

The minister claims that efficiency and effectiveness justify the change, but a secret government study made public shows that this solution is, in fact, more costly. The minister calls the study outdated and I ask the minister to prove it.

The minister clearly wants to give priority to building up his own region. He has said as much. But to use his cabinet muscle and national responsibility to impose more expensive solutions on the military is surely an abuse of power. If he cannot justify his decision, he must reverse it.

He must reply to the demands of chairman Alan Tonks of metro Toronto council who has written to him on this subject.

CANADA FITWEEK

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, Canada's Fitweek is May 22 to May 31. The first day of activities of Canada's Fitweek is Sneaker Day, May 22. That is the day when all Canadians are encouraged to wear their sneakers at home, to work, to school, or anywhere in their communities.

Over 540,000 people are going to participate. There is going to be a walk around the grounds of Parliament Hill for staffers on that day.

I would like to invite all members of this House to participate by wearing their sneakers and by getting involved in local activities.

Sneaker Day is a partnership of Fitness and Amateur Sport and the provincial and territorial governments.

Canada's Fitweek is the ideal time to enjoy the fun and ease of physical activity and to celebrate active living.

SOUVERAINETÉ QUÉBEC INC.

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, last night in Montreal, I had an opportunity to meet at least 125 company presidents who have decided to create a corporation called Souveraineté Québec Inc.

I was very pleased to learn that finally a group of business people has decided to screw up its courage, despite threats concerning federal government contracts, of course, and to get together to create a force to show Quebecers that business people can succeed in a sovereign Quebec and create a more prosperous, equitable and just society and more jobs.

That is what they said last night and they will tour Quebec to promote Souveraineté Québec Inc. I wish them much success.

PROUD TO BE CANADIAN PROJECT

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, across our great nation service clubs and the people in them are truly unsung heroes. No finer example of this fact can be found than the efforts of the Kinsmen and Kinette clubs across Canada, and especially in Dorchester, Ontario.

The Proud to be Canadian tour which is circulating peace tower flags for signature in communities from coast to coast is testimony to the Kinsmen and Kinette pride and dedication to Canada.

Yesterday, the Dorchester and area Kinsmen and Kinettes organized a highly successful Proud to be Canadian event with over 600 people demonstrating their love and commitment for our country by signing a Canadian peace tower flag.

Congratulations to Dorchester, the Kinsmen and Kinettes, and especially all of those citizens for rekindling our pride in being Canadian.

AIDS

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): I will address this statement to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Four years ago, the federal Centre for AIDS began work on a special document "Ending the Isolation: HIV Infection in the Second Decade". This is a study on mental health needs of people infected with AIDS, as well as the victims and their families. There are no adequate words to describe their agony and pain nor the mental anguish of their families and friends.

More than six months ago, the minister promised this document would soon be released. He said: "It is in final production and should soon be on my desk".

I ask the minister to explain why this document is still in his hands and not in the hands of the people who desperately need it. If he really is committed to the social aspects of this disease, I urge him to immediately release this report.

CANADA FITWEEK

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec–Est): Mr. Speaker, I would like to join the hon. member for Calgary Southwest in drawing the attention of the House of Commons Fitweek, which will run from May 22 to May 31.

The first day, May 22, is Sneaker Day, when all Canadians are asked to wear sneakers at home, at work, at school, or anywhere else in their community. Some 540,000 people are expected to be wearing sneakers on that day. All Hill employees will be invited for a walk around Parliament.

Mr. Speaker, I urge all members to do their share by wearing their sneakers and taking part in local activities. Sneaker Day is a joint effort of Fitness and Amateur Sport and the provincial and territorial governments.

Canada FitWeek is an ideal opportunity to experience the pleasure of taking part in physical activity and at the same time promote the benefits of active living.

LAW OF THE SEA CONVENTION

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, the time has come for Canada to take the initiative and ratify the Law of the Sea Convention. I believe that by signing Canada will send a clear signal to the world that international law is the way to protect our common economies and environment.

We will be the 53rd nation to ratify and we need 60 to bring the treaty into force. Canada needs to assume the leadership and open the floodgates. Others will follow.

We all know the sorry state of our cod stocks, the overfishing, the pillage of our oceans. Here is the legal mechanism that will enhance our sovereignty and lead to a stable, peaceful legal order to resolve fishery problems and issues of ocean ecology and economy.

I do not need to remind this House of the seriousness of Arctic contamination or the savage interception of our west coast salmon on the high seas. Provisions in the Law of the Sea Convention will protect our Arctic from pollution. It will also protect our west coast salmon. Let us delay no longer. Future generations will thank us.

Thanks go to the World Federalists of Canada who, with others, have pushed long and hard for Canada to fulfil our basic international obligation.

KAON PROJECT

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, I am very disappointed with the recent political manoeuvring by the B.C. provincial Minister of Finance, Mr. Glen Clark, who has attempted to discredit the federal government's commitment to the KAON project in British Columbia.

The facts are very clear. In September of last year the federal government through the Minister of Science, committed $236 million for the construction of this project as well as to provide for one-third of the operating costs, an offer that the province has not yet responded to.

By refusing to indicate what share of the operating costs the province is prepared to assume, and by refusing to supply information for the OECD science ministers meeting this weekend, Mr. Clark is jeopardizing the whole KAON project.

It is a shame that Mr. Clark has not spent as much time stating the province's commitment to KAON as he has attempting to discredit the federal government which remains committed to this project.

WESTRAY COAL MINE DISASTER

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, when the whistle blows in coal towns, everyone feels the fear. When the whistle blew for Westray, we held our breath. We watched. We waited. We prayed. We hoped against hope for a miracle that did not come.

But now we are angry and we are asking why. Why once again did the whistle blow in a Nova Scotia mining town and herald death? Why were jobs more important than safety? Why did the mine open against the advice of federal experts? Why in the knowledge that the Foord seam was the most dangerous on earth did both governments rush to finance and guarantee Westray? Why did coal miners have to take such risks?

Will this be the last disaster? Will it be the last time? Or will the people of Nova Scotia's coal towns still live in trepidation waiting yet again for the whistle to blow?

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, last Friday, Statistics Canada was the bearer of good news for communities along the Canada-U.S. border, including my riding of Sarnia—Lambton.

Statistics Canada reported that same-day trips to the U.S. in March fell by 0.3 per cent. This represents the first monthly year-over-year decline in March since 1986.

What has contributed to this result? Factors like the decline in the value of our dollar, more aggressive retailing practices by our retailers, some rationalization of prices and greater enforcement by Canada Customs have no doubt had a part to play.

Are we looking at a trend? Is cross-border or same-day shopping running out of steam? To me, it is too early to tell. Yes, this is welcome news, but one month does not constitute a trend.

Like my local retailers, I will reserve judgement and will anxiously await reports from Statistics Canada in the ensuing months. I know we will all be working toward maintaining this important trend.

JOB TRAINING

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Employment and Immigration talks about living up to commitments already made on section 26 fee payers option funding.

The minister is not keeping his commitments to provide training. Thousands of workers who have spent hours in meetings with CEIC counsellors on planning and training programs, who have received verbal assurances that they will be able to go for training, are now being told in light of new restrictions to this training support program, they will not be able to receive funding.

Even though the minister constantly emphasizes the importance of training, his actions speak to the contrary.

I call upon the minister to reallocate funds from within the UI portfolio to provide for all the training needs of all unemployed workers.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, contrary to what the Government of Canada would like the public to believe, Canada has not taken a leadership role on items at the earth summit such as climate change, biodiversity, post-summit funding, or the dumping of radioactive waste in the oceans.

Instead of caving in to pressures by the United States administration, the Canadian government should take the lead. With Japan and certain European nations it should pledge to negotiate after Rio the reduction of carbon dioxide emissions by 20 per cent; ensure an agreement on biodiversity; protect the oceans from radioactive dumping; ratify the Law of the Sea; and take steps at home and abroad to establish sustainable fishery, forestry, agriculture, trade, energy and waste management practices for generations to come.

MULTIPLE SCLEROSIS MONTH

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, May has been designated as Multiple Sclerosis Month by the Multiple Sclerosis Society of Canada to highlight the concerns of those who live with this disease, their families and their caregivers.

Multiple sclerosis is the most common disease of the central nervous system affecting young people in Canada.

The Multiple Sclerosis Society of Canada supports excellence in research into the cause, prevention, treatment and cure of MS through more than 100 local chapters in communities across the country. Volunteers provide valuable services to Canadians affected by this terribly debilitating disease.

I take the opportunity now of recognizing and saluting the volunteers and the members of the MS Society of Canada. I encourage my colleagues and all citizens to support the carnation fundraising campaign which supports the work of this most worth-while society.

OLDMAN RIVER DAM

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, reports are out that the Federal Environment Review Panel has recommended the Oldman River Dam in southern Alberta be shut down.

We are told that the panel's report said the Alberta government did not do enough to protect fish habitat and preserve the lands of the Peigan Band.

The provincial government is not the only government that stands condemned. The federal government failed to do a proper environmental assessment in the first place. It has damaged the credibility of the environmental process and has compromised many Albertans on both sides of the issue.

Now the minister has sat on the report for over a week. He owes it to all Canadians to tell them what his intentions are. What is he going to do about the report's findings and recommendations?

SOFTWOOD LUMBER

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I was disappointed with last Friday's determination by the United States Department of Commerce that Canadian stumpage charges constitute countervailable subsidies.

Further and even more astonishing is the inclusion of Canadian log export controls as a countervailable subsidy.

This determination of log export controls as a countervailable subsidy comes despite the fact that the United States has the same kind of export controls on its logs.

Canada is taking this determination to a binding binational review panel under the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

Our Prime Minister was forceful in bringing this issue to the attention of President Bush. The Prime Minister did not mince his words and appropriately called this move harassment.

I am encouraged by the strong position taken by the Prime Minister and look forward to a positive and a fair conclusion to this protectionist determination. As a fair trader, we will turn our anger and frustration into action and we will be successful.

SALMON FISHERY

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, a month and a half ago, the hon. member for Skeena warned the minister of fisheries that the United States had served notice at our embassy in Washington that it will now violate the Canada–U.S. salmon treaty, that it had overfished Fraser River bound sockeye by 510,000 last year, and it intends to do it again this year.

American fisheries and processors have formed a coalition and have mounted a huge "Salmon for Washington" campaign. This group's demands on the Pacific salmon treaty renegotiation is over 9 million additional sockeye enter U.S. ports annually.

This means at least 5,000 new American jobs at the expense of Canadian fishers. The impact on the Fraser River salmon fishery and Canadian workers will be devastating. The minister must give us his assurance that he will be tough minded in renegotiating a treaty, and he must assure us that he will not allow U.S. fisheries to violate the existing treaty.

TRADE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, yesterday we saw the Prime Minister in Washington. He tried to be firm and decisive. However, at no time did we hear the president of the United States say that his Department of Commerce would drop trade actions in connection with Honda, magnesium and softwood lumber.

If no real progress was made yesterday in Washington, would the Acting Prime Minister not agree that the Prime Minister's conference in Washington was merely an exercise in public relations?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the best way of answering and responding to the question of the hon. Leader of the Opposition is to quote from the press conference that was held by the Prime Minister and President Bush when President Bush stated: "I told the Prime Minister who forcefully presented Canada's case that I would work with our administration to see that these disputes receive the proper high level consideration before they go to some form of action".

I think that is a pretty clear indication of the intention of the President to take action as a result of the very vigorous representations that the Prime Minister made.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, words and words.

We are used to the Prime Minister stretching the truth when he is in Canada. There is a little bit of blarney all around, but we thought that when he is in the United States representing Canada he would act as a Prime Minister representing Canada abroad.

Yesterday on a TV program in the United States the Prime Minister, talking about his political opponents, said that they "do not like the United States, do not like trading with the United States and want to build a great wall of China around Canada".

I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister: Is it because we are standing for Canadians and the interests of Canada that we in Canada are opposed to the Americans?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think what Canadians are really asking, particularly the Leader of the Opposition and his party, is to stand for something.

We do not know what they stand for. One day they are for free trade and the next day they are against free trade. One day they are for the GST and the next day they are against the GST. That kind of confusion will get the Leader of the Opposition nowhere.

When you go representing the country internationally, as he is aware I am sure, you have to stand for something and you have to represent the principles that we, as a government, stand for.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the government talks about standing for Canada. They should realize that in the last poll only 4 per cent of Canadians agreed with their position on the free trade agreement.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

• (1420)

Mr. Chrétien: When will this government understand that friendship is friendship but business is business? Will the Deputy Prime Minister tell Canadians that he will ask the Prime Minister to apologize because he treated them as anti-American just because 96 per cent of Canadians do not agree with the Holy Ghost, the Prime Minister of Canada, when he is abroad?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition can talk about all the puffery but the facts are still very clear. Merchandise exports to the United States have gone up by 12.3 per cent since the implementation of the free trade agreement. In March we achieved a record level of $117.4 billion in exports to the U.S. on an annualized basis.

In terms of merchandise imports, again demonstrating the strength of the Canadian economy, imports rose by 6.2 per cent. Quite frankly, the over-all aggregate trade with the United States is in fact increasing. That is the only trading area where trade is increasing with Canada. It is decreasing in other areas, increasing with the United States, which again demonstrates the importance of the free trade agreement.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. The Prime Minister was wrong yesterday. Canadians like Americans. What they do not like is this government.

The U.S. entered the recession six months after we did. It has already come out of the recession while we remain mired deep in the soup. The Americans have created 947,000 jobs since November. We have lost 141,000 in the same period.

How, given the difference in prospects between our two countries which is unprecedented in recent history, can this government continue with an economic program that has failed so miserably to create jobs and to give Canadians hope?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased the hon. member has recognized that Canada is a trading nation, thus we trade to survive. Our growth and our prosperity will come through trade. That is why I am encouraged, as I am sure he should be encouraged, that our trade with the United States has risen by 12.3 per cent since the free trade agreement came into effect.

As a matter of fact, in March we recorded $117.4 billion worth of export sales to the United States on an annualized basis. In the budget we took steps to improve the competitiveness of our manufacturing and processing sector. We took steps to improve the competitive environment, the investment environment, so we can be more competitive, so we can take advantage of these new trading opportunities. We are all encouraged by the fact the United States economy is in fact strengthening and that is positive news for Canada.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question to the same minister. The minister's mantra is as inaccurate as it is boring.

[Translation]

According to the Conference Board of Canada, this country is going through its longest period of economic stagnation in 30 years. Last week, I met former employees of Sidbec; two weeks ago, it was former textile workers; a month ago, former workers in the pulp and paper industry. All these people are in their fifties and have been laid off for good. I will ask the minister the question they asked me: Where will we find jobs in the future?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have acknowledged on many occasions in the House the difficult period that Canada is going through, and Canada is not alone.

The hon. member will know the anticipated growth for all the OECD nations is something in the order of 1.6 per cent or 1.7 per cent for 1992, which is hardly robust. They also indicated the high levels of unemployment will persist in all the industrialized countries, I think something like 30 million unemployed people, and that is a challenge for all governments, including this one. It also is compounded by the fact we are going through a structural change in terms of our economy.

As I indicated in the House yesterday, I find the Conference Board of Canada's projections overly pessimistic. I think that view is shared by the business community, at least in Ottawa. I quote from The Ottawa Sun today: "Area businessmen said they were surprised and angry at the board's latest economic forecast". They said that messages like the one the Conference Board is sending out contribute to consumer pessimism rather than confidence.

I think there are a number of positive indicators which indicate that the economy is strengthening. It is not robust. It is not as robust as the hon. member would like to see it, nor is it as robust as I would like to see it. I think he would agree with me that the fundamentals are right. Interest rates have fallen again today. Inflation is at an all-time low. So we have the framework and the basis for sustainable growth and price stability.

That is what we are trying to achieve.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The Conference Board of Canada predicted today that the growth rate of the Canadian economy would be the worst of the G-7 countries and our unemployment rate the highest and one of the worst in the western world. Nevertheless, in the midst of all this bad news, many jobless Canadians are now receiving letters from the federal government, letters like this one, telling them that they will no longer have funds during the waiting period necessary to obtain training under section 26 of the act.

Will the federal government provide the necessary funds for this program so that the unemployed can have the training they need to get a job?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should recognize and admit that the additional funds provided under section 26 of the Unemployment Insurance Act throughout the country, and especially in Ontario, have tripled this year.

It is true that unemployed Canadians ask for this additional training so that they can hold new jobs with greater skills. Do not believe that we are insensitive to this demand.

But I would ask the hon. member to consider that the federal government alone provides 76 per cent of all the funds to train Canadian workers. The provinces want jurisdiction over worker training, but they spend only 24 per cent of all the funds allocated for this purpose in Canada.

We are now looking at our own budget in Employment and Immigration to see how we can accommodate the increased demand from workers—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to have to interrupt you. The hon. member for Yukon.

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, this is the government that has created the level of unemployment that we have and refuses now to help those people who want to have training so they can get a job. This government refuses to put additional funds into a program that works, one that helps sustain Canadians. That is a responsibility that this government should be undertaking.

I would like to ask the minister of revenue this. The minister of employment has said that it is a question of budgetary funds. I would like to make a suggestion to the minister of revenue as to where he might find some of those funds.

Twenty-one years ago the former Liberal government introduced measures to provide a tax-free holiday on private trusts for some of Canada's wealthier citizens. Some estimates have put the total value of $70 billion on those private trusts.

As the minister knows, that tax-free holiday is about to end. In view of the need that we have for further training and in view of the needs we have in Canada now, will the minister tell this House that he will not allow this tax-free holiday to continue for Canada's wealthier citizens and put that money to use to train some of the unemployed and those who need the funds for their future.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, you know I am getting a little sick and tired from the New Democrats going on and on and on—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Jelinek: —about tax-free holidays which do not exist, about the fact that large corporations are not taxed, about the fact that the tax system is unfair.

This government has been bringing in tax reform, broadening the corporate tax base, bringing in more corporations to pay further taxes, closing loopholes left, right and centre that the Liberals opened up under the Leader of the Opposition when he was finance minister, and bringing in accelerated tax collections. One thing we will not do is take away the incentive for Canadian businesses to continue to expand and create jobs and opportunities for Canadians.

• (1430)

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Revenue.

Hospitals are closing across the country and food banks are opening across the country. I have simply suggested to the minister that he has the opportunity to close a tax loophole on the private trusts of Canada's wealthiest Canadians, where the wealthiest Canadians can put in funds that are not taxed. They have had a 21-year tax holiday.

Will the minister stand here and say that he is prepared to close this tax loophole on Canada's wealthiest citizens to provide the services needed for those many Canadians who are in need at this time?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, those loopholes were closed two years ago. Those corporations were put on a taxable basis and the hon. member knows that.

WESTRAY COAL MINE

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister of Canada was intimately involved in seeing that the Westray coal mine received $85 million in loan guarantees and $8 million into interest buy-downs.

Yesterday in Washington the Prime Minister, when asked whether or not he was aware of the serious safety problems plaguing the Westray project previous to federal funding approval, stated: "Of course not, of course not."

My question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Who should Canadians believe, the Prime Minister or the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who informed this House that all of the cabinet was aware of the safety problems at the Westray coal mine?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I welcome my colleague, the member of Parliament for Central Nova, back to the House. I think he would like to know that yesterday the questions on this subject were responsible and not very partisan, out of respect for what his constituents are going through.

In answer to my hon. friend's question, the Prime Minister made it clear that this particular mine is regulated as to its safety and health regimes by the province. Because of that, the province is going to be conducting a thorough judicial inquiry and we are going to co-operate with that inquiry.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, in 1987-88 at a time when Devco had excess capacity, the national government supplied $85 million in loan guarantees to a private company to compete against its own national Crown corporation. Furthermore, the company had a sweetheart deal, known and supported by Ottawa, to guarantee that company $14 million a year for 15 years whether the coal was mined or not.

My question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Why did the Prime Minister choose to reward his political friends instead of abiding by safety and sound public policy reasons?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, this government believes in regional economic development. We have stood by projects which will lead to regional economic development especially in regions that have high unemployment.

We are very proud of that record. We have been able to encourage regional economic development in various parts of Nova Scotia. What we cannot do is simply say that the coal business is just for Cape Breton. We cannot say that. I do not think the hon. member means to suggest that.

What we did with this particular arrangement was to help guarantee a loan that the Bank of Nova Scotia put in place for the Westray mine. The loan was guaranteed by the federal government for 85 per cent of the losses. Our involvement was purely financial, but we went beyond that.

We made sure the contract with Westray that the Bank of Nova Scotia was putting in place included periodic reports on the compliance of all the regulations of the province in order to satisfy ourselves that the contract would ensure that the provincial regime for safety and health was in place. We received regular reports that this was the case. Therefore it is quite appropriate that questions on this will be handled by a provincial judicial inquiry.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, the minister for small business has just said and he said seven times yesterday that the government depended on mining consultants to do studies to determine if the safety regulations were being complied with.

Evidently the government has placed a great deal of confidence in these consultants' reports. Will the minister make these reports public today?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, yes, we will be open with Parliament. Those reports will be forthcoming. We are assembling the documentation and the information to bring to the House and, of course, we will comply with the requests from the judicial inquiry.

I would like my hon. friend to know, however, that the regulation of health and safety is a provincial matter. It has a regime in place to do that. It is not the federal government's responsibility, even though we informed ourselves on a regular basis that this contract was in compliance.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the minister said that the government gave an $85 million guarantee to Curragh Resources on the basis of these consultant reports that the safety requirements would be complied with and that they would be available.

It is not the responsibility of the Bank of Nova Scotia to look after the safety of the miners. The minister said these reports were complied with. Evidently they are with the government. There is no reason why we cannot have those reports today. Either they exist with the federal government or they do not. If they do, make them public today.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): My hon. friend has just asked a supplementary without listening to my answer.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hockin: My answer was very clear. Those particular reports will be tabled and made public. We will co-operate fully with the House. But he must remember that the province of Nova Scotia has the day-to-day responsibility for health and safety. This is why there is a judicial inquiry and that is also why we as a government will be co-operating with that judicial inquiry.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister and concerns the Westray affair.

The Deputy Prime Minister will be aware of yesterday's report that the shredders have been busy at the office of Westray Coal. Further to these reports, I have a copy here of a Westray Coal interoffice memo on security procedures which instructs all employees on shredding procedures and use of cellular phones.

My question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Considering the seriousness of this tragic matter and the need for all information to be both secure and available for scrutiny by both the Nova Scotia inquiry and this Parliament, can the Deputy Prime Minister assure us that the RCMP has been instructed to seize and secure all Westray files and are these files now so secured?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that he is quoting, at best, hearsay comments from the leader of the NDP in Nova Scotia when he talks about shredders. He does not know if that is true or not. But he should know that question should quite properly be asked by the leader of the NDP in the Nova Scotia legislature.

As a participant in a financial transaction, we guaranteed a loan. On a monthly basis we fulfilled our concern that the health and safety requirements were being followed. That is the federal government's role. The role now is for the judicial inquiry to inquire into the kinds of questions he is asking.

Mr. Speaker: Before the hon. member asks the next question, I listened very carefully to that one and the answer when the minister responded. I want hon. members to keep in mind—and the hon. member is pursuing a serious matter—that the administration of justice is a provincial matter. I think that if there are further questions to the federal government as to why it has not or has done something with respect to the RCMP it may very well be out of order.

I caution the hon. member, but of course I will hear his question.

• (1440)

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I fully accept the comments you have just made, but I would also point out to the government that when it makes a major investment and guarantees 85 per cent of a $100 million loan in a project which ends up sacrificing the lives of 26 Nova Scotia miners, there is no limit to public responsibility.

I would be quite happy to table the document to which I have referred. Further to that I have a question for the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism.

Yesterday the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism told the House that the federal government was relying on mine inspections done for the Bank of Nova Scotia for its information on safety. Our latest information is that Associated Mining Consultants did not do comprehensive mine inspections but rather relied on safety inspections done by Westray itself.

Can the minister confirm this and will he table in this House all of the inspection reports he claimed the federal government received from the Bank of Nova Scotia, which to remind the minister, was covered to the tune of 85 per cent of any loans extended to Westray under the provisions of this cosy deal with the federal government?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend characterizes the loan to Westray as a cosy deal. The federal government has also made a very substantial loan to Cominco in his riding. It is also a mine. Does he call that a cosy deal as well?

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism.

Yesterday the minister stated in this House: "We would not have put our Westray guarantee in place unless there was compliance with the health and safety requirements of the two departments which were going to administer it for the province, for the Government of Nova Scotia". We know that the government's own agency, Devco, told it Westray was not safe.

What specific assurances did the province of Nova Scotia provide to convince his government to disregard the concerns of its own Crown corporation as to the safety of this project?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is perpetrating an exaggerated fiction from what Devco said in 1987. What Devco did, and let us be blunt about this, was analyse the impact of Westray on its market share in the coal business. Of course it was concerned that some of its market share of Nova Scotia Power business could be taken by Westray.

Therefore, Cape Breton members of Parliament were very concerned about this and so were Devco employees. This was outlined in great detail in the Devco report. There were a few very brief references, just a few sentences, concerning possible safety concerns. But as Teresa MacNeil, who was the chairman of Devco, said at the time, the over-all thrust of the report was about business, about market share, about economics and there was only the briefest reference to safety. Of course the safety concerns expressed were to be dealt with when the mine was put in place.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): My supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, is for the same minister.

Yesterday the minister told this House that the concerns we had originally with Westray were basically business and economics. But on both counts, safety and economics, Devco told the government: "Don't do it".

I ask the minister again, given the safety concerns, given the economics, why did the government fund this project?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): The federal government gave a loan guarantee to a bank loan which helped fund the project. In fact, it is a loan guarantee on the Bank of Nova Scotia bank loan, plus an interest buy-down that we put forward. That is what the federal government did.

Why did we do it? The answer is very clear. It was for regional economic development. There was high unemployment in the member for Central Nova's riding, there is high unemployment in the Stellarton area. There is a long history of a productive seam of coal. They wanted to participate in the production of coal for NSPC as well as for other customers. This was an opportunity to create 240 direct jobs and of course a multiplier of two or three or four times that.

It was done for regional economic development reasons and it was a very stimulating addition to the region's economy.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism.

For most of yesterday the minister, in reviewing the Hansard, spent the day telling the House that safety was the responsibility of the Bank of Nova Scotia. He spent most of today suggesting that safety was only the responsibility of the provincial government.

I want to remind the minister that the Bank of Nova Scotia had at risk exactly $15 million. The Government of Canada in financial terms had at risk $85 million. But the coal miners had at risk either their future prosperity or their very health and safety—tragically, in the case of 26 miners, their lives. Those miners counted upon governments, federal and provincial, because they did not have a union, to ensure that this project was safe, to ensure that given the history of the Foord seam it could be mined safely.

What did this minister and this government do to ensure that when it put $85 million into reopening the mine, a mine that could not have reopened otherwise, that the operation would be safe? What was done?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, to ask the same question as all previous members have with a higher decibel of sound does not make it a different question. The question is the same and the answer is the same.

We guaranteed the loan and, when we did, we satisfied ourselves that the provincial regime for the regulation of health and safety would be in place and indeed the provincial regime across all regulations that affect a mine would be in place.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, that answer is not acceptable.

I want the minister to understand that everybody in Canada knows, and in particular those in Atlantic Canada, that this mine could not have opened without the direct involvement of the federal government. Everybody knows there were large question marks about this mine and many people strongly recommended against it, but it was opened anyway with $85 million of federal loan guarantees.

It is quite reasonable, rational and fair to ask this minister: What did the government do to assure itself that the mine was not only economic but that it was safe for miners to go down into? Those miners had only governments to depend upon before they went down into that pit. What did this government do?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I can only repeat what I said yesterday. When you are a bank—

Mr. Tobin: You are not a bank; you are a politician.

Mr. Hockin: —and you put forward $100 million you have depositors' money on the line. You are going to make sure that the mine is not going to be closed because of some explosion or that the mine is not going to be functioning because of some tragedy. So the bank made sure that the safety and health regulations—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister is answering a question and I am sure that members would wish him to continue.

An hon. member: No, he is not.

Mr. Speaker: He may not be giving the answer somebody wants but he is on his feet answering the question, and I know that hon. members would give him the courtesy to complete his answer.

Mr. Hockin: The first thing is that the bank wants to protect its investment and it cannot protect its investment unless it is complying with all regulations put in place by the province. Part of those regulations are health and safety. We as the federal government wanted to make sure that this was also the case so we received on a regular basis the reports from independent mining consultants—they are virtually monthly reports—to make sure this was the case. This is what the federal government should do.

We cannot supersede the provincial regime for health and safety. The provincial regime is there, but we can do what we can under our contractual arrangement with the bank to which we were giving the loan guarantee.

TRADE

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister has labelled President Bush as a father of free trade. Canadians reject the deal and the parents.

There are 70 American steel trade actions pending against numerous countries, including Canada.

• (1450)

The Canadian steel industry is depressed. Canada is a fair trader. The American share of our market has increased from 7.3 per cent to 16.3 per cent since 1988 and the free trade agreement.

Was steel on the agenda yesterday as indicated and, if so, did the Prime Minister come away with any assurances for Canadian steel producers?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, we have been in constant touch with the Canadian steel industry about a supposed charge against the Canadian steel industry. We have not got that.

What the Prime Minister told Mr. Bush yesterday, one of the very important things he told Mr. Bush, was that Canada's exports to the United States today are at an all-time high thanks to the free trade agreement despite its problems.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe the minister has been speaking to the steel industry; he would not get the information that he has received.

The issue will test yet again the credibility of the Prime Minister. He spoke yesterday of American trade harassment and unfairness that is hurting Canada. President Bush said: "We have agreed today to be sure that some of these disputes can be avoided".

Given the fact that these trade actions are imminent, this is a test case. Could the minister ensure us that this is a top trade priority and the Prime Minister will report to the House as soon as possible that any American trade action against Canada is off?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, one of the things that the Canadian steel industry will be doing with the support of the Government of Canada if there is a dispute lodged against steel is to ensure that the Canadian steel industry responds in kind, and we will launch an unfair trade practice against the United States.

HOG INDUSTRY

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

As the minister well knows, one of the longest running trade disputes between Canada and the United States is the dispute over American duties on Canadian hogs.

Yesterday the FTA binational dispute settlement panel ruled that the American commerce department's justification for duties on Canadian hogs was inadequate. I have had calls from producers asking me just how optimistic they should be, given this ruling.

What will this ruling mean to the Canadian hog industry and future trade between Canada and the United States?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague is right in drawing to the attention of the House the ruling by the binational panel which was established under the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

That panel has said that the department of commerce in the United States was not, in its mind at this time, able to justify the amount of countervail that it has applied to Canadian hogs. It has given it 60 days to justify that.

The other important part is that it shows that Canada alone, of all the countries in the world, because of the free trade agreement has a binational panel impartial to rule against the political machinations of the department of commerce in the United States.

I take it as being optimistic that it was not able to justify its countervail, and we believe that we will again prevail in this case.

WESTRAY COAL MINE

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism whose best defence of the Westray deal so far is: "The bankers made me do it".

I want to ask him to tell the House not what the bank did or what the bank's interests were in this matter but what did the government do to protect the real risk here, some human lives.

Why does he not, just for his own good and the government's, quit this Pontius Pilate act and tell us—

Mr. Speaker: I want to make it very clear that in a 45–minute Question Period every question can be on this matter, but questions are going to have to be put in such a way that is appropriate with the decorum of the House.

The hon. member will complete his question and do it properly. I am sure he will.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, the government's own agency told the minister, told the government, that this was not a safe undertaking.

Why was that advice ignored, I ask the minister? Was the urge here to be in sync with the political agenda of the provincial Tory regime three days before an election? Was it because the Prime Minister intervened in this matter, as the premier said, that this went ahead despite advice to the contrary?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, in fact the report from Devco to which he refers argued that this would be a bad idea for economic and business reasons for Devco and for Cape Breton coal mining. That was not a surprise to anybody because in fact it is true that the Westray activity would take some market share from Devco.

There was a very fleeting reference to safety but it was not a major part of the report.

This was three years before the Westray mine even began. Of course the very general and brief references to safety were more than accommodated by the construction of this mine and the procedures put in place.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, the minister talks about fleeting references to safety. Is he telling us that those references, however fleeting, were dismissed as not being central to the government's concern?

What was the government's concern here? Was it to satisfy some political debts in Nova Scotia, or was it to ensure that not only was work put in place but that safe work was put in place and that lives were protected?

Does the minister see that as one of his priorities in his present position?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, of course safety considerations are paramount. It just was not mentioned very much in the Devco report of 1987. That is the point.

The province has a regime in place that must be followed by this particular mine.

What the hon. member is trying to do is to drag in all sorts of other extraneous political concerns, and I would remind him what the Reverend Angus MacLeod said two days ago. He said: "Let us put aside unnecessary controversy. It is not a time to try to score points for any side. Let us allow the judicial process to proceed".

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is for whoever is responding for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Today our Prime Minister in speaking at Johns Hopkins University says: "Rarely in history has there been such a victory for an idea, the idea of democracy".

Despite the fact that he acknowledges that history will judge us by our response to the challenge, we see in the former state of Yugoslavia where new states are struggling to achieve democracy that the process is falling apart.

Only a token cell of 100 UN peacekeepers are able to remain in Sarajevo, the capital of Bosnia, because of unjustified violence. Yet Canada maintains diplomatic relations with Belgrade and refuses by action to convey its condemnation of the current violence in Bosnia.

For the sake of over one million refugees and our peacekeepers, will the government address this issue today to take the necessary action to signal that we cannot allow any further deterioration in Yugoslavia?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, this question has been answered by the Secretary of State for External Affairs just a few days ago.

It is entirely inaccurate to say that Canada has not taken any action. We have taken measures against Serbia. We have supported the temporary suspension of Yugoslavia from the CSCE. We have not accepted the Serbian claim to the continuing state of the old Yugoslavia. We have restricted trade measures on Serbia.

We have not recalled our ambassador for the reasons the Secretary of State for External Affairs said several days ago, and they have not changed. We need someone on the scene who can report to us and who can carry out our instructions and our concerns.

We are greatly concerned at the events in Yugoslavia. We are doing everything that could be expected of a liberal democracy to assist in that situation, including sending peace troops over to a situation where there is not even peace to enforce.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, a year ago our Prime Minister signed a convention on the rights of the child promising "to take all feasible measures to ensure protection and care of children affected by armed conflict".

A hundred thousand of the innocent victims in Bosnia today are children under three years of age.

What is Canada doing to ensure that the required humanitarian assistance is reaching these innocent victims?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, we together with every other civilized country of the world are doing all we can to exert pressure on Serbia in connection with the women and children held hostage by Serb gunmen the last two days in Sarajevo.

• (1500)

On May 20 the Canadian chief of staff of our UN peacekeeping force said: "To impose peace in Bosnia would require a military force equal to that used in the war against Iraq".

What is the hon. member opposite suggesting, that these kinds of measures be taken? What is her solution? What more does she want us to do than to exercise our support, with every other civilized country, to try to persuade the Serbians to act in a civilized manner in connection with Bosnia.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, during Question Period the Minister for Science was heard by a number of my caucus colleagues, including myself, to say: "Don't be such a hypocrite". As you know, Mr. Speaker, the use of the word hypocrite has been banned since 1958.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has the floor on a question of privilege.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, by far a more offensive word that I did not repeat and I will not repeat was used in this House. The minister himself knows what he said and what we all heard is an obscenity and we ask that the minister withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has raised on a question of privilege an alleged comment by the hon. minister. Perhaps if the minister wishes to reply I will hear it.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, out of respect for you and this House, I withdraw.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I would like to know what kind of double standard we have here. The Prime Minister of Canada has been known to use the same language and was not obliged to withdraw. I would like—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The matter has been raised. There was more than just the word hypocrite alleged. The hon. minister has withdrawn and that is the end of it.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put my regular weekly question to the government House leader. In asking this question I beg the opportunity to ask him how we might facilitate the business of the House in subsequent proceedings when we return, but I am wondering if he could indicate what the business will be for tomorrow.

Second, the government House leader did in fact share information with us concerning amendments to Bill C–81. Will we now have an opportunity to see the written legal opinions in order to consider them at length?

Finally, as the House leader knows, I wrote to him on May 13, 1992 with regard to documents surrounding the Westray incident and I am wondering if he could indicate to the House when these documents will be tabled.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, today, to our disappointment, we had to move time allocation on second reading of Bill C–81, the referendum enabling legislation. That will be the business for today.

The hon. member is barking from his seat, apparently not interested in this report. If he can talk his colleagues into being quiet I will try to continue.

On Friday the government will call Bill C–59, the National Parks Act. It is my understanding there is an agreement among the parties to proceed with all three stages. We will also deal with Bill C–41, the Energy Efficiency Act, for debate at report stage and Bill C–45, Transportation of Dangerous Goods Act, for debate at report stage and third reading.

The House is adjourned next week. For the week of June 1, the priority will be to complete Bill C–81. As the hon. member knows, if this is not done expeditiously, this important tool to keep the country together will not be available for use.

Mr. Nowlan: I am surprised. Tear, tear.

Mr. Lapierre: Never, never. You are a bullshit.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. Will the hon. member please withdraw that statement.

Mr. Lapierre: You are full of it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will not recognize the hon. member for the rest of the day.

Mr. Andre: The hon. member for Shefford's respect for democracy is plainly obvious and his concern for the country, of course, we know.

I expect that in future votes on this issue we will make a distinction between the votes of the Bloc Quebecois and the votes of the opposition parties.

Mr. Speaker, in addition to that a very high priority of the government, because of the timing, is Bill C–80 dealing with the Children's Special Allowance Act. It needs to be passed in order for it to come into effect.

In terms of the question of the Westray documents, as my colleague the Minister of State for Small Businesses has indicated, all the materials are being collected. I can assure the hon. member that all those materials will be presented just as soon as they have been collated.

He will understand that whenever documents involve other parties, we need to get their agreement to table them. There is no difficulty getting the agreement but it is a process that takes some time. It is being worked on expeditiously and I expect we will be able to present those documents to the House and have them available for other parties very soon.

The legal opinions are by way of letter to the deputy minister of justice who asked for these for support. The deputy minister of justice will be available for participation before the committee and will have these with him. In the meantime, I am certainly prepared to have members who are interested come to my office and read the document there, that is no problem. I hope they understand that the nature of the correspondence is such that I cannot distribute it broadly.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I would like two clarifications, one from my hon. friend the government House leader. As a result of the motion passed earlier today, Bill C–81 will pass second reading later today and will then be referred to a committee.

I wonder if my hon. friend would indicate whether the government would be open to the consideration of televising that committee since the House of Commons will not be sitting next week.

I would also like to confirm a point that the government House leader made a week or two ago that during the committee period of this bill because it is so important to the future of Canada, there would be a willingness on the part of the government to consider amendments that normally may be considered beyond the scope of the legislation.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I am hoping there is recognition of the necessity for dispatch and the necessity to have a clear indication for the Chief Electoral Officer of the intent, if not the final completion, of the bill and that necessitates acting very quickly. I anticipate that the committee will be meeting this afternoon, perhaps tomorrow morning, and speaking as one potential witness, perhaps Saturday and Sunday. Frankly I believe there is no benefit to the ultimate goal of Canadian unity to try and schedule ourselves around the interests of a viewing audience.

That being said, I will wait to hear what the committee recommends in respect of how they might proceed.

• (1510)

In terms of amendments, as I have indicated privately in meetings we have had, yes, we are prepared to look at amendments that are appropriate and improve the bill but I am hesitant to say amendments that go beyond the scope of the bill. The hon. member can understand my concern.

This is, very simply, enabling legislation, it is not–binding, it is not compulsory. It is nothing but enabling legislation for a plebiscite. Hence I cannot immediately respond positively to the suggestion we use it to amend some other acts that really do not have anything to do with what we are trying to accomplish in this bill. With that qualifier I will certainly listen to any suggestions.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, is the government House leader indicating it would be up to the committee to decide whether or not it would be appropriate to televise the proceedings? After all, I think we all agree the people of Canada would like to view the deliberations around this important issue.

Mr. Andre: I will say this. I wish a camera were trained on some of the deliberations around this issue and the people of Canada might not have the same favourable impression that sometimes we think they have. As I indicated, that is up to the committee to decide.

Let us not suggest this is going to be a theatrical event for the television cameras. Remember what is at issue, remember what is at stake, and let us deal with it in a businesslike fashion rather than for the benefit of our audience.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootney West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, during Question Period I referred to a document, an interoffice memorandum for Westray Coal entitled Security Procedures and I would be pleased to table that document for the House and I now so do.

Further to the question of tabling—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): A private member cannot table a document unless he has unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I would like to raise two points on House business. I have refrained from speaking on the referendum issue.

There is a suggestion from the member for Kamloops which I understand, although I do not necessarily agree with the urgency and the dispatch that the government House leader mentions. We have all the government members around here under the Whip and I understand that because I have had nine requests to pair just today.

Why does the government House leader not have Committee of the Whole tomorrow on the bill and if there is a problem with voting in terms of second, third, or fourth reading, at least get rid of the bill and then have the final bill when we come back.

I do not see the problem with votes tomorrow. If we are really going to send it to a committee, forget about television. If you are really going to bludgeon it through the committee, which I sort of think is the intent in view of the allocation order today, let us have the fight tomorrow on the clauses. Quite frankly I am a member that will vote for the bill but I have a real problem with several of the clauses and the government is eventually going to have its say.

I throw that out in terms of House business as far as the referendum bill is concerned. Everything used to be done in Committee of the Whole with fair dispatch when I came here many years ago.

My second question is the perennial one concerning the merchant marine. I know the government House leader has been trying. I am suggesting that if he cannot get a little more finite in the answer today with this week coming up, I will be on the government House leader with all the other little problems he has as a bird dog in heat.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, that is a terrifying proposal.

In view of that threat, the bill will get beyond the Notice Paper the first week of June when we are back. The Department of Justice indicates it should have completed its drafting and I will be putting it on the Notice Paper June 1 and treating it will depend on agreements in the House. As I have indicated, we are anxious to proceed with it and I hope we can do that very quickly.

In terms of the Committee of the Whole, indeed that suggestion has been made and discussed. Unfortunately it requires a special order of this House. We were not able to secure agreement in that regard so we cannot proceed that way. I agree with the hon. member it would have been a better way to proceed.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I want to have the attention of the House leader who may be busy looking somewhere else in his impatience.

That is exactly the problem that we are going through at the moment. He is impatient. I, along with many colleagues, the member for Kingston and the Islands, the member for Churchill and many Conservative members, his own colleagues, work very dutifully on the committee of electoral reform. We have done so because we thought that we should work that way with patience with each other. He is so impatient that we are not sure—I am still on the same point—if it is worth at all sitting on any committee.

Many amendments are already ready. I want to be on record because I will not to be a member of the referendum but I certainly will attend. Many amendments are ready. Why do it behind the curtains? They are ready and they have been accepted at the committee on electoral reform. They would be ready immediately to be acceptable. Could we have the assurance of the House leader that at least a lot of freedom would be left to the members to accept very good amendments which already have been accepted at the committee on electoral reform which you are expecting sometime in June.

At least if we have a public understanding, a public acceptance by you that everybody is impatient and defending Canada is absolutely important, nobody on this side will take any lesson from anybody as to the importance of preserving Canada. I assure you of that.

We would like to have some assurance that at least the committee will not function as a rouleau compresseur as we say in French. The minister, with patience, should just get up once in his lifetime and give the assurance to the House that nobody is going to be bullied. We do not accept to be bullied.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, you do not know how much I look forward to these lectures by the hon. member for Saint-Denis on decorum and behaviour. I especially like the part in which he talks about my being arrogant.

I wonder if the hon. members of the Liberal party would give me a chance to answer their colleague who asked for an answer.

On the question of electoral reform and the changes, as the hon. member has suggested, all members of the committee from all parties are working together to get changes to the Elections Act. As I have indicated to our members, and I presume similar indications from the other parties, a package of amendments which would be agreeable to the political parties in terms of amending the Elections Act is something that I as House leader would schedule and treat with dispatch to change the Elections Act. If these were possible to do, it would not preclude the Chief Electoral Officer's implementing them before the next election.

The hon. member keeps heckling me.

Mr. Prud'homme: I am not heckling.

Mr. Andre: I wish he would allow me to answer his question before he stands up and interrupts me.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, he may be heckled by some, but he knows that I have too much respect for the institution and for him as a responsible man.

I am not heckling. I am trying to get some answers. He knows that already these have been accepted by the committee. He knows that we know that most of these amendments will be acceptable to the Chief Electoral Officer.

• (1520)

I do not like these secrets going around all the time. These are facts that he knows and he knows we know, so why should he beat around the bush all the time?

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order as the hon. member from the Liberal caucus.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. It is my mistake. I thought the hon. government House leader had finished his answer. The hon. government House leader has the floor and then I will recognize the hon. member for Churchill.

Mr. Andre: The hon. member is sincere and he does want to hear the answer. The answer is that I am certainly agreeable to any amendments to the Elections Act which are agreeable to all sides of the House that we can put in place that the Chief Electoral Officer could implement in a way that would not cause the delay of a referendum or a plebiscite or an election.

However, what we are talking about in terms of the plebiscite legislation allowing the plebiscite to be held if a decision is taken on the basis of the Elections Act. If it is prudent to amend the Elections Act so that it could be implemented immediately, then let us by all means do that. Let us not confuse the two and attempt to use the enabling legislation for a plebiscite as a circuitous route to amend the Elections Act because they are quite different.

That is the only point I would make. It would be out of order and as far as I am concerned a total confusion to what the intent of Bill C-81 is, namely to use Bill C-81 to try to amend the Elections act. Amendments to the Elections Act to improve it in accordance with the recommendations of Lortie that have been agreed to by all sides of the House are certainly something I would be in favour of and welcome and would proceed with expeditiously.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, again, without trying to create a long debate at this point, the government House leader should know that the Chief Electoral Officer was before the House committee yesterday. He indicated that he did not believe he could deal with further amendments to the Elections Act at the same time as he had to deal with the referendum legislation, in other words a number of clauses which are not controversial, including who gets to vote on election day. Right now we have a lot of urban voters left off voters' lists. It is a problem in each and every election. There are a lot of recommendations that could be put in place to make sure that people are able to vote on the referendum.

The only way those clauses will be in place for a referendum is if the government allows amendments which will be on the scope of the referendum bill in committee. If the government does not allow those amendments, those people will be denied the right to vote on the referendum and on Canada's future.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, the plebiscite will be implemented, if we have one, using the rules of the Canada Elections Act. We can through the plebiscite legislation change some of those rules as they would apply in respect of a plebiscite. That is agreed and I am not adverse to entertaining amendments in that regard.

One has to recognize that does not change the Elections Act. We would have presumably the Chief Electoral Officer who, if he is being prudent, has to prepare for two different events, a plebiscite and a general election. He would have to prepare on the basis of two different rules, one that would apply in an election and one that would apply in a plebiscite. If that is no problem, I am not adverse to it.

Rather than go into all these details, which we could have done if we had agreed to Committee of the Whole, but the hon. member was one of those who was opposed to it, we should let these kinds of discussions go on at committee. We can discuss them. I have said publicly on several occasions now I am not adverse to amendments that will improve the act and let us leave it at that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would just like to remind hon. members that we have been on this weekly question for 20 minutes. May I remind the House that the bill this afternoon is under time allocation and time is of the essence. I will recognize the hon. member for Kamloops on that point of order.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, to the government House leader, he referred to the business tomorrow being Bill C–59, the parks legislation, and indicated that there was, after discussions with the parties, a willingness to proceed through all stages.

I simply want to indicate that is the case with our party, assuming that the minister is here to respond to questions and so on during Committee of the Whole.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the hon. member for Shefford rising to retract the remark that he made during Question Period?

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I want to know which one you are talking about.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not think I should repeat it. The hon. member knows. If the hon. member would like to retract his remarks and also the member for Richelieu, whom I listened to distinctly. If you will both please as honourable gentlemen retract the statements you made.

Mr. Lapierre: I would like to know which rules are guiding this place. When the Prime Minister calls me a hypocrite it is okay. When somebody else does it it is not okay.

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Andre that Bill C–81, an act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope; and the amendment of Mr. Murphy (p.10955).

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the hon. member retracting his statement? The hon. member said "bullshit" in the House and so did the hon. member for Richelieu. Would they both please retract that statement?

Mr. Lapierre: I was not talking about you at all.

[Translation]

Mr. Plamondon: May I have the floor, Mr. Speaker? I believe you referred to my using unparliamentary language. It was not directed to the Chair, nor to the member speaking on the other side of the House but was part of a private discussion here on our benches. However, if the Chair was disturbed by what it heard, I shall of course withdraw immediately, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, if it is the same word, I can withdraw the term I applied to the leader.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity today to take a few minutes to speak to Bill C–81, an act to provide for referendums or consultation on the Constitution of Canada.

This bill is an historic event, because its purpose is to help us reach a national consensus on the constitutional question. Let us consider the objectives of this bill. Clearly it is important to have legislation that allows this consultation to be conducted as effectively as possible.

The referendum process must guarantee the validity of the results while minimizing obstacles to the electoral process. The bill meets that objective by drawing on legislation that has already stood the test of time, the Canada Elections Act, and by making an independent party, in this case the Chief Electoral Officer of Canada, responsible for the referendum process.

The bill's other main objective, which will be the subject of my speech today, is the fairness of the referendum campaign. Clearly, if the campaign on the referendum question is not fair, it will deprive the response to this question of any legitimacy it might have and make this an exercise in futility. Fairness is essential to the campaign and must be reflected in the enabling legislation.

Fairness is a concept that is sometimes difficult to define but is always easy to recognize.

To our mind, a fair process is one that is not biased and involves equal opportunity. Of course the key to fairness is playing by the rules.

• (1530)

Bill C–81 covers all these aspects, for instance in its provisions on registration. No person or group other than a registered referendum committee shall incur referendum expenses during a referendum period that in the aggregate exceed $5,000.

This means that although all Canadians are urged to take part in the referendum and no one is obliged to do so through a co–ordinating committee any person who intends to spend more than $5,000 must register with the Chief Electoral Officer. This process, described in section 13 of the bill, is very straightforward.

The bill also contains provisions to ensure the fairness of the actual registration process. The Chief Electoral Officer shall examine applications for registration in the order in which they are received. There are provisions to prevent any confusion arising from the name of a referendum committee, as a result of similarities between the names of various committees or between the name of a committee and a federal or provincial party.

The rules for registration reflect two essential aspects of the referendum process: the obligation to report and transparency. The obligation to report sums of money over and above a certain amount spent by these committees is reflected in the provisions concerning auditors, chief agents and the keeping of books and records. Reporting includes providing detailed records of expenses incurred, contributions received and any other type of expenses.

Transparency is guaranteed by provisions in the bill that require disclosure of any contribution over $250 received from individuals, companies, unions, political parties or other groups.

Registered referendum committees and those who contibute to these committees will know in advance that contributions and expenses beyond a certain level will be made public.

These provisions are fair and do not restrict the participation of Canadians nor the expression of their point of view. However, they also make it possible for Canadians to know who is providing financial backing and guarantee that no one will be able to influence secretly the results of the referendum through massive contributions and spending. They are important because they ensure the public has confidence in the results.

I would now like to comment on an aspect of the bill I think is admirable and extremely fair. Free broadcast time will be available to both sides, so they can send their message to the public, at no additional expense, during prime time. Three hours during prime time will be allocated equally among registered referendum committees on both sides.

A broadcast arbitrator, an impartial officer appointed under the Canada Elections Act, will allocate the time available to registered referendum committees on both sides which applied for registration before the 27th day before a polling day and indicated that they wished to be considered for the allocation of free broadcast time.

As a guide to the broadcast arbitrator, the bill provides certain criteria. The arbitrator shall consider whether the allocation of broadcast time would be equitable, having regard to the different views expressed on the referendum question. The arbitrator shall consider the public interest and fairness,in the manner broadcasting time is allocated to the referendum committees.

Furthermore, fairness is included among the factors the broadcasting arbitrator must consider when determining the broadcasting time to be allocated to the referendum committees.

Section 24(4)(b) of the bill provides that the arbitrator shall take into account the fact that any broadcasting time shall "—be made available fairly throughout prime time".

On the same topic, I think it is also important to note that the bill requires names of any person or group making referendum advertisements to be indicated when the messages are broadcast.

All the measures I mentioned as part of this bill are intended to reflect and, in fact, achieve fairness and thus allow Canadians who wish to take part in this referendum, if it is ever held, to make a free and informed choice.

[English]

Bill C-81 is a law that will entitle the government to hold a referendum or plebiscite or a general consultation throughout Canada on the question of the renewal of the Constitution.

This bill is a straightforward bill. It is a bill that should enable the government to have consultation. It is a bill that is important in the process of constitutional renewal and I feel that it is important for the House, important for all members of Parliament to support it at this time.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate on the government's referendum bill this afternoon.

I think it was on May 13 last year that parliamentarians and all Canadians found out in the Speech from the Throne that we would have a referendum bill. I must tell you that it is unfortunate that a year went by, more precisely, a year and two days, before the House was even presented with that bill. Nevertheless, I must say that I intend to support it on second reading. Why? First of all, the hon. member for Beauséjour in a speech that he made in April 1991 was the first leader of a national party to call for a referendum to ratify a future constitutional agreement. I take the opportunity to congratulate the hon. member for Beauséjour, the Leader of the Official Opposition, on the initiative he took at that time.

[English]

I must say that more than one Canadian at the time was asking: "Why are you as a parliamentarian, why is your leader, and why is your party asking for this referendum?"

Our position remains the same. We are in 1992 and Canadians expect in this modern age to be consulted as to the ratification of a constitutional deal. It is the right thing to do. Our parliamentary system has evolved to such a stage that this is what is expected of all of us.

Of course some are going to ask: "Isn't that scary?" Well, probably the Magna Carta was scary at one time but we have evolved beyond that.

Democracy was scary at one time. Giving the right to vote to those who did not have a right to vote previously might have been scary to some at one time, giving the right to vote to people who did not own property for instance, and so on.

Maybe all those things were scary to whomever at some point but our system has evolved, our system has changed, and we have now the institutions that we all know so well. One of the things that we now need in this constitutional debate is a referendum.

It was the Statute of Westminster of 1931 that gave this country its independence. It was on that day that we started to debate in Canada how to repatriate and amend the Canadian Constitution. It took 51 years in the great Canadian compromise before we could repatriate the Constitution. Unfortunately, even though all federal political parties at the time in 1982 were in favour of it, even though 74 Quebec federal MPs were in favour of the repatriation of the Constitution, because there was a separatist government in that province at the time the Constitution was not ratified by one province and therefore a certain political legitimacy to the whole process has been questioned since.

[Translation]

Today we have an opportunity to equip ourselves with a tool so that Canadians can express their opinion on the constitutional issue. The tool, of course, is a referendum.

• (1540)

As most hon. members already know, I was born in Quebec and spent much of my life in another province. I am a francophone in a heavily English speaking province. That is why it is important to remember that a referendum must not only express the will of the majority but also the will of the regions of our country, so as to avoid what some might call the tyranny of the majority.

The Hon. Leader of the Opposition, in his wisdom, as well as the hon. member for Papineau and all my colleagues, have asked the government to make the voice of each region count in the referendum. In other words, my colleagues in the Liberal Party and I are in favour of the double majority principle; this means that for the Constitution to pass, it must receive a majority of at least 51 per cent throughout Canada. In addition, a proposed Constitution must have a majority in each of the major regions of Canada, the four regions designated in the British North America Act of 1867 and after. Some may say that there should be five regions instead of four, and so on. We could debate that at some point. At the present time, four regions are recognized. Let us hope that the constitutional agreement which I hope we will have soon between the federal government and all the provincial governments will not only be a unanimous agreement among them but will later receive majority approval in all provinces. There would be no need to ask whether there were a majority in all regions if we already had a majority in all provinces. But still we should have a guarantee of at least a regional majority. In any case, I would hope for more. Once we have that majority in all parts of the country, the various federal and provincial legislatures could pass the Constitution Act. I am sure that we could then put the whole constitutional issue behind us and concentrate as Canadians on making our country prosperous and improving the welfare of Canadians who gave us the honour and the privilege of asking us to represent them in this illustrious assembly.

[English]

Therefore, what I and my colleagues would like are a number of amendments to this bill in order to ensure such things as a majority for regions, to ensure that the question that will be posed later would be an exact referendum question, such that it is the appropriate one, to ensure that there is a limit on expenditures and, of course, to make the referendum compulsory upon an agreement occurring.

Of course, it is not necessary to have a referendum if there is no agreement among the first ministers. There will not be a question to put, but what I personally want and I am sure all of my colleagues want is an agreement between the first ministers. We want assurance that that agreement would go to a referendum, not a referendum if necessary but not necessarily a referendum. That is not acceptable in 1992.

We need more than that. We need assurances. Canadians really expect us to give them those kinds of assurances.

[Translation]

I took a survey of my riding last year. I even tabled a copy of the survey I had taken of the people of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell in this House when we had the big constitutional debate. Some 500 people in Glengarry—Prescott—Russell took part. I shared the survey results with all hon. members. I even wrote a letter to all members of the Beaudoin–Dobbie committee, which dealt with the whole issue. I did that so hon. members and this House would have not only the opinions of committee members and of interest groups that appeared before the parliamentary committee but of the people of my riding or in any case a sampling of my constituents. I must tell you that our people in Glengarry—Prescott—Russell really participated and I want to congratulate them on that.

In conclusion, I would express the wish in this House today that all hon. members will vote for this bill on second reading and I would also hope that the government will be flexible and take account of the constructive amendments from the Official Opposition in this House. I hope that we will then be able to support this bill on final reading. But what I want more is to have a referendum passed by all Canadians so that we can finally unite our country.

[English]

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate as, indeed, other hon. members have. I want to raise several matters that perhaps have not been raised sufficiently in the context of what I think is a very important augmentation to our democratic system.

The very fact that Canada has not relied over its 125-year history on the use of plebiscites and referenda must tell us something. In fact, even though we know that back in the 1970s Mr. Trudeau's government introduced legislation that would have allowed for a referendum, it did not in fact get approved.

Private members, including our own member for Toronto—Lakeshore, have proposed similar legislation and, of course, it was promised as one of the items in the Speech from the Throne a year ago. All of this indicates that we are on the edge of something that is in effect a significant departure from our normal traditions in this country, certainly nationally and even provincially.

While there have been instances over the last 125 years of plebiscites and referenda, they have not been used with any consistency. Anybody who has lived in other countries like Switzerland will know that referenda and plebiscites become almost a way of life when individual cantons on weekends will be invited to vote on just about every question from whether there is going be a park installed, the garbage will be picked up or anything else that might affect some kind of local condition.

However, that has not been a part of our political tradition. In fact I would have to say speaking in this House this afternoon that if I had been asked at any time prior to the last several years whether I thought referenda and plebiscites made any kind of sense for our democratic system, I would have said categorically "no". I do not know whether this is evidence of either old age or the willingness to change one's mind, but I have now become convinced that answer is no longer sufficient or acceptable. I am convinced for several reasons.

First, I want to say that as a member of two of the committees that have dealt with the Constitution in the last few years, the Charest committee several years ago and more recently Beaudoin—Edwards, there has been one message that has been there from start to finish and that is that on matters with respect to the Constitution of this country, it is no longer sufficient that heads of government or elected representatives by themselves make fundamental decisions about the nature of our Constitution.

I think we should acknowledge the fact that this is a significant departure from a previous era. In fact, I can remember no time during my time here as a member since the mid-1960s when there was any great public outcry or concern to be consulted.

First Ministers Conferences, conferences on the Constitution actually from the 1930s were held with frequency and abandon but never was there a clear-cut call for a ratification by some kind of public means.

However, since the Meech decision in 1987, the underlying message of the body politic in this country is: "We want to be consulted. We want to have some final say". Why is that? I think the reasons really flow from the events of the early 1980s. I believe that something fundamental happened to Canada when we patriated our Constitution and accepted a charter of rights.

For the first time in our history for more than 100 years, we said that this Constitution of ours, this charter of ours now belonged to Canadians, not to parliamentarians, not to heads of government, not to provincial premiers, parties and municipalities, but to Canadians.

Therefore, the underlying weakness if I can put it this way, of pretty well all the constitutional agreements that have gone on since then was the belief that governments by themselves could then make significant decisions. Too much criticism has focused in some ways on the substance of what went wrong with Meech and too little on the process.

The lesson we have learned is that Canadians must and will be consulted. I say frankly that I am not really too concerned as to whether or not we find such unanimity in the country in the next month, that there will be no need for a referendum. That is because I believe in the final analysis, and this will be the happiest of stories, that if there is an agreement by first ministers, heads of territorial governments and aboriginal leaders on a constitutional package, it may still be important and significant that Canadians from coast to coast to coast say Amen to that package.

What I am concerned about is that we provide the process for Canadians to participate in an understandable, fair and reasonable fashion. That is not going to be an easy exercise.

I want to caution members on all sides that we tried to establish or design so restrictive a piece of referendum machinery that it fundamentally will fail even before it gets used. I do not even, at this stage, feel very happy with the word referendum. It smacks too much of some kind of absolute, binding decision coming from the body politic.

I think the first time out we should back off a little bit and think of it more as a plebiscite, more as a means to do something with Canadians that will allow them to take greater ownership both for the present constitutional package and indeed for the whole ongoing process.

I am not one of those who believe that we are going to resolve all of these constitutional issues this week, this month or this year. Nobody should inflate the expectations to that point.

There are several critical aspects that must be resolved having to do with finally letting Quebecers feel a full part of this Constitution, resolving some of the regional tensions particularly with respect to institutions in the Senate for our friends in western and eastern Canada, and ultimately providing real justice for the aboriginal people.

How all of that gets defined in a package will be important. But let us not put a strait-jacket on the process because we are doing something, in my view, that has not been done before. In that instance, we have to maintain some kind of flexibility and freedom in the final legislation that is being devised.

I welcome its introduction here. I welcome the support from members on all sides. I hope we can keep that sense of flexibility and freedom to achieve what is our ultimate purpose. That purpose is to allow Canadians to come to some point of real consensus this year, in 1992, about our Constitution and about our country.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pick up where my friend who holds the neighbouring riding of Rosedale left off.

I too agree that this is a whole new journey for each and everyone of us. We would have to say that there is one exception here. That is the member of Parliament for Etobicoke—Lakeshore. He should feel very proud today of the fact that he has worked from the very beginning to develop a package which would ultimately end up as a piece of national legislation. It is so rare that a sole member of Parliament has the capacity and the skill to do that. He deserves a lot of credit.

I also have to remind the House that my leader a year ago brought up with force this idea of getting into a plebiscite discussion or referendum debate. I share the view of my colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell who said: "I wish we had a little bit more time than three or four days to iron this thing out".

I am going to approach this from a totally different point of view in my community.

Even though this is called an act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada, I am going to title the exercise in my community the "Campaign for Canada".

Really what this legislation is all about is making sure that ultimately, at the end of this exercise this nation stays whole, that we are able to somehow crush the separatist, divisive forces that exist, not just in the province of Quebec, there are some of those forces that exist in other regions.

It is our responsibility as national members of Parliament to make sure that the next 90 days of our lives are ones where all of us, no matter what political stripe, are campaigning for Canada.

In my riding I will make sure that this legislation is handed around for everyone to read it. We will understand what it is all about.

I would like to make a couple of recommendations to the Chief Electoral Officer. One is in the process of setting up for this plebiscite that he make sure he has the resources to get everyone enumerated. I am sure the member for Rosedale would share this point of view. In my riding in downtown Toronto close to one-third—maybe that is a little high—but well over 25 per cent of Canadian citizens were not enumerated in the last election. That kind of thing cannot happen.

There is an opportunity for us here. There is not a partisan contest going on. We must make sure that every Canadian who is eligible to participate in this plebiscite is properly enumerated. I would counsel the Chief Electoral Officer to please make sure that he has the necessary resources to do that.

Of course, I support the amendments that my party is promoting having to do with making sure that we have a guideline on spending limits. We do not want another situation like the last election where an organization such as the Business Council on National Issues went out as a third-party advertiser and literally bought full-page ads promoting its point of view on the free trade agreement.

If it had not been for my leader's debating skills at that time, the right hon. John Turner, I am sure that I probably would not even be standing here. Those third-party advertisements in print and in radio especially were very forceful and put a lot of confusion into the marketplace.

Of course, the other thing has to do with the double majority. We must make sure that we are sensitive to every region in this country.

We in the Liberal Party have a very strong view that we have a double majority. There is no possibility of one particular region of the country imposing its will, or three or four regions ganging up and imposing their will on another region.

I want to go back to the exercise. In my particular riding even though we have limited resources—we are not the government—I have rented a tour bus for the next 60 days. It is the kind of tour bus seen outside here when students come to visit Parliament Hill. It is not a new one; it is old. It cost us about $3,000 for two months. We painted on the side of it "Campaign for Canada".

We also put on it "Mobile Riding Office". In the baggage or luggage compartment we have put our Government of Canada material. It is information and facts about Canada, about our regions, about various services and programs that the Government of Canada provides for citizens.

What we aim to do during this referendum period is to go around to every part of our community. We will go right to the seniors' homes and park there for a day. Then each and every one of the senior citizens in that home can have any questions answered or obtain any updated material on the Government of Canada or facts about this plebiscite.

• (1600)

We will do the same thing with the local collegiates. Sometimes the hours of school do not coincide with our static constituency office, the permanent constituency office, but our mobile office will pull right into the collegiates.

That is the kind of thing constituents want to see right now. They want to see some excitement in this country. Rather than sitting back letting the constituents come to us, we are going to be on the road going to them.

We can put a spirit of campaigning for Canada into this referendum rather than just focusing on the substance, on the i dotting and the t crossing.

Going back to the comments of my friend from Rosedale, consider the process of getting everyone involved. Everyone then feels a part of it. They feel that they have been brought up to date on all the aspects of the proposals and thoughts that various groups have in terms of amending our Constitution or things that we should be doing to galvanize the will of this country.

That will be the process the committee in our riding will use. We will have the "Campaign for Canada" bus and we will have it operating seven days a week. As time goes on, if it has enough appeal, we may even attract or influence other colleagues to do the same thing if it works well for us. We have to get Canadians excited again. We have to get Canadians feeling good.

If there is one thing that I feel positive about in terms of this legislation, it is that this is not going to be a situation where the Conservative operation is running with a particular point of view and the Liberal operation with another.

There is one campaign once this enabling legislation is put through. It is a campaign for Canada. It is a campaign to blow out of this place anyone who wants to divide, split, or harm the economic fabric, the social fabric of this country.

Mr. Speaker, I thank you for giving me the opportunity to speak on this referendum legislation. I hope this can be an experience where we galvanize as one force and have a profound effect on the spirit of all Canadians.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to rise and speak this afternoon on this referendum legislation.

Like the rest of my colleagues in the New Democratic Party, I agree with the concept of consulting with the people. Therefore, we agree with the concept of a referendum in principle, if the concept of a referendum is to consult with the people, to hear their ideas, but also to consult with them so they may have the opportunity to influence the decision-making of their government. It is a method of ensuring that they are heard and heard clearly where they stand on constitutional issues.

The constitutional debates in this country in the last three years particularly have been such that they have driven people apart instead of pulling them together. They have created distrust in their governments and in their politicians instead of giving them more confidence that there is leadership. I am hoping that the concept of a referendum can be used in a manner that not only enhances the feeling for Canada but the feeling that Canadians have a stake and a say in their country.

Prior to being elected I was involved in senior management in a number of organizations. Often we had to make decisions that affected employees. We could go through a consultation process with the employees, but we found out very quickly that we had to be clear with them as to what was the process: were we there to hear their ideas but still make the decision, were we there to receive their direction and incorporate it into our decision, or were we there simply to try to convince them of our position? If we were not open and honest with our employees, the consultation process could backfire. It could do more harm than good, and we could end up with employees who were angry, disgruntled and felt that they had been manipulated.

There is great danger in this referendum bill that that is what will happen with the Canadian public. If the referendum goes forward and Canadians feel that it has not been fair, that it has not been open, that it has not been an honest process on which they were consulted or on which they were allowed to make a decision, they are going to be disillusioned and angry.

I am concerned that this referendum process has had a very rocky start when one judges it against the concept of fairness, honesty and openness. We have had a last minute introduction in the House and now an insistence by the government that it be pushed through without proper opportunity to debate or to take a look at it. It is only reluctantly that it has even agreed to allow it to go to committee next week.

We have had the government withholding legal opinions that it says is the basis for its spending decisions. There is no openness or a sharing of trying to involve all members of the House.

The House leader stood this afternoon to try to make sure he was not backed into a corner where the committee would be televised. Those are the various things that make Canadians wonder whether this referendum is in fact a method of true consultation or if it is just another attempt by this government and a cynical Prime Minister to manipulate the public.

There are three or four specific points about which my colleagues in the NDP have made motions and that must be changed in this legislation if it is to be viewed by the Canadian public as being an open, fair and honest process.

There must be spending limits on the campaign. Average Canadians will not accept the fact that their voice will not be equal to the voice of the wealthy and the powerful. They will not accept the fact that because they do not have hundreds and thousands of dollars to spend they are not equal to the wealthy, to the multinational corporations, to big business and big organizations. Therefore there must be spending limits.

The average Canadian wants to know this referendum is not going to be bought but it is going to be honestly debated on an equal footing.

There must be an interpretation of the results of the referendum that every Canadian knows is fair and honest. They must know that before they start participating. They must understand if we in western Canada vote yes it has some significance. We not going to be simply ignored by the Prime Minister. Those in Atlantic Canada have the same commitment as do those in central Canada and Quebec. All Canadians in every region must support this interpretation.

There must a feeling of fairness and openness in the drafting of the question. That is why we are insisting on an all–party committee that jointly drafts the question. If Canadians feel this is another one of the manipulations of the Prime Minister and if he puts a question they do not believe is a fair, open and honest question, the backlash against this government and against Canada could do irreparable harm. In fact, it could destroy Canada at the very opportunity when we have a chance to unite the country.

Dealing with the whole question of the campaign, it must be viewed by Canadians as fair. We should take the opportunity to incorporate some of the proposals made by the electoral reform commission and properly define electoral expenses so that people cannot do polling that is not considered an expense, so that people cannot use volunteers, slick advertisers and marketing people and say they are not an election expense, so that there is a proper enumeration, particularly in my riding of Surrey North which is the fastest growing riding in Canada with 10,000 additional households. People must be assured that it is fair.

In closing let me say that we support the idea of a referendum. Unless it is a fair, honest and open referendum it is going to destroy Canada rather than unite Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that I could not give the hon. member more time. That is what happens in this place when you are having fun.

[Translation]

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I am telling you nothing new when I say that Canadians and Quebecers no longer have any confidence in this government. Because they no longer believe in this government, they will not play this phony game that is being proposed to them to solve the constitutional problem.

I recall that two years ago that I no longer believed in this government. I no longer had any confidence in the ability of this government to act honestly, openly and credibly and I gladly and proudly quit the Conservative caucus.

I left it because, as I told you then, this government had lied to the people since 1984 by saying, for example, that it would reduce the deficit to zero, when in fact it doubled it and that it would solve the constitutional problem in a way that Quebec could come back with honour and enthusiasm. Obviously that was false. It broke that commitment in May or June 1990, although it had said that it would make a very big effort, not just any effort, a very great effort to make all our institutions more democratic. I honestly took it at its word. I believed that the government was telling the truth.

In August 1988, just before the election campaign, the Prime Minister said: that he supported the principle of popular financing for political parties. He added: "The example of Quebec, where citizens finance political parties, is good for democracy and it is the way it should be." Four days before the election, on November 17, 1988, the big headline of the day on the front page of La Presse was: Mulroney promises popular financing of political parties. He said: "It is unthinkable to finance an election," and the same goes for a referendum, "with big corporations and unions to the detriment of ordinary citizens, because it unbalances the whole process". The promises he made from 1984 to 1988 got him 63 seats from Quebec in the 1988 election, including my seat in Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead.

I call that electoral manipulation, actual election fraud and dishonest. Today they are trying to go even further than that by holding a phoney referendum based on a phoney bill. The process that has been going on here for three days is a monumental farce. They want to silence all hon. members by having less than 10 hours of debate on something as important as a referendum on the future of Canada and Quebec.

That is unacceptable. This lack of will, fair play and honesty towards all the citizens of Canada and Quebec is of course the reason why Canadians no longer trust this government today. Quebecers no longer believe in it. Less than 15 per cent of the people today believe this government because it lies to them every day. It is a government that says absolutely anything.

Nevertheless, I remind you that just in terms of the democratic process, the Prime Minister, as I told you, promised popular financing on November 15, 1988. A general convention of more than 1,000 Conservative Party members voted unanimously in favour of it on March 25, 1988. The by-election won by the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean in June 1988 was another obvious demonstration of the popular financing that Prime Minister Mulroney still approved of throughout the 1988 election campaign.

At the first proposed public consultation since the 1988 general election, a referendum, how can the government suggest that companies will be able to form as many committees as they want and give as much money as they want and, even worse, that some funds will never be accounted for, that there will be no disclosure and that none of the fundamental rules of the electoral process recognized in all civilized, democratic countries will apply? How could we have reached such a point in Canada today?

Are we so afraid of talking about the real issues? The real issue today is the constitutional problem. The real issue is the future of Quebec, because Quebec wants to be sovereign. Is Canada prepared to use any completely undemocratic means to try to come up with something else and think that Canadians and Quebecers will go along with it? It is utterly impossible! It is unthinkable.

Personally I am not against a referendum bill. It would be normal for a government to have that kind of tool, to follow very well established democratic rules that correspond pretty closely to those that apply in an election. But holding a referendum only on the Constitution is a different story. Passing special legislation to hold a referendum on the Constitution is a lie and a joke. That basically is what offends me.

If the government had tabled a referendum-bill, based on democratic principles, that could be applied to the Constitution or other qestions, eventually, like the legislation we have in Quebec, with some nice, clear-cut rules, an umbrella committee for the yes side, and another one for the no side, a ceiling on contributions, no union or corporate contributions, complete disclosure of all donors and a number of other democratic measures, of course I would have supported it. I think, however, that Quebecers should realize what this government is trying to do.

By the way, I see only one Quebec member of the Progressive Conservative Party in the House right now, one out of 54 or 55. I can tell that particular member that there are no —

• (1620)

Mr. Weiner: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think it is entirely uncalled for to mention the presence or absence of members of this House. There is nothing wrong, either way. However the hon. member just said there was only one Quebec member in the House, but I also happen to be a member from Quebec.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member has been around here for a long time and he realizes that he should not be saying who is in the House and who is not in the House. There are television cameras outside. There are committees meeting. I will recognize the hon. member for Mégantic-Compton—Stanstead.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérin: After the next election we will not have to count to see how many Conservative members are left in the House. There will not be any left, and that will take care of that. I suppose it would be the same, whether they come from Quebec or Alberta. I am just joking. I do not know that much about Alberta. In any case, we will take care of Quebec.

The important thing today is to talk about why Quebec refused to join the rest of Canada to deal with the constitutional question. We have to remember what happened in 1981 when tactics were used that led to some very serious problems, and then from 1987 to 1990, we had Meech Lake, which fell through. We should remember that the biggest problem was the general attitude in English Canada.

Everything started in the fall of 1989 with New Brunswick. Mr. MacKenna started it. Remember Sault St. Marie and how people trampled the Quebec flag. Remember Clyde Wells, Filmon and Carstairs. And above all, remember Mulroney's attitude in this debate. Basically, that is what we have to deal with. We don't need a referendum on the Constitution.

Quebec asked for an agreement that would allow it to live like the society it is. Let us see some proposals, not just another strategy. The Mulroney government promised to table offers that would be satisfactory to Quebec. It should stop beating around the bush and table those offers. It should stop this endless series of committees. Do you not think we are fed up, Mr. Speaker? We had Charest, and after that Beaudoin–Edwards, Dobbie–Castonguay and then Beaudoin–Dobbie. We had government committees, we had the Spicer commission, we had the PC caucus from Quebec which made two or three futile attempts. We had constitutional conferences. We had ministers conferences. We had first ministers conferences. And thousands of officials wasting their time discussing the Constitution, at our expense. And the result was zilch. Today they want us to believe that a Canadian referendum with patently antidemocratic rules will make the difference.

We must realize that we cannot deal with the real problems today because we are still stuck with the constitutional question. If we had resolved the constitutional question two years ago, we would have had all this time to talk about the recession, the decline in our standard of living, the rising deficit, taxes, unemployment, school dropouts, and the monumental failure of this government to run the country. Instead of that two years after —

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am sorry, but the hon. member's time has now expired.

[English]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, this debate is a serious one. I am sorry that the time is so limited and I am sorry that the government has reverted to its usual technique of using closure in debate on a matter as important as this.

The government was urged by the Official Opposition to bring this bill in months and months and months ago. This has been a policy of this party for some time. The government made a promise, through the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs, to introduce this bill months and months and months ago. Instead, it dilly-dallied and shilly-shallied and gave a lot of mumbo-jumbo, broke its promise to the opposition and held it up. Now it brings it in. Last Friday it was introduced and it is screaming and ranting that if we do not pass it right away we are going to somehow damage the fabric of this country. It is saying that we have to pass this bill, flawed as it is, and get on with it.

I take strong exception to this disgraceful approach of the government to the House. The debate can go on in a Tory caucus and once it is settled there the rest of us are supposed to bow down and worship and just accept whatever the government passes out. I will not do so.

I object to the government's dealings in this matter. It is wrong.

I want to look at what the government House leader said the other day in his speech and it was clearly wrong. He said: "The Canada Elections Act legislation, which enjoys the great respect and confidence of Canadians throughout the country, would provide the basic framework under which any referendum would be held. The Chief Electoral Officer would have the same responsibility for the conduct of a referendum as he has for the conduct of a general election". In other words, the government House leader was suggesting that somehow this bill and the Canada Elections Act are one and the same. Nothing could be further from the truth.

Let us look at the changes the government made in the Canada Elections Act to determine the bona fides of what the government House leader was saying because somehow he was suggesting that he was being above-board and honest with Canadians in his dealings on this bill. I suggest exactly the opposite is so. What he did was say that this is just like the Canada Elections Act when it is not.

Let us look at the insidious changes that are proposed. First of all, the method of appointment of enumerators for the enumeration of the people under the Canada Elections Act is that each of the parties that came first and second in the previous campaign appoints one enumerator in all urban polls so that there are representatives of both parties going door to door to select the names of the persons to go on the electors' list.

This bill changes it for the referendum. What does it change it to? It changes it to the appointment of the enumerators by the returning office. Who appointed all the returning officers? Almost every position in Canada has been filled by a Conservative appointee. Everyone knows that Tory hacks have been given the job. I am not saying that is wrong. I am just saying that is the fact. Those people are all being asked now to appoint all the enumerators, not the usual pattern of one from each party. That is what is going on.

Then, get this. If that is not pernicious enough, the list that is drawn up for this referendum campaign will then be used in the general election by section 38 of the bill. In other words, there will not be an enumeration during the general election. The enumeration done by a pile of Tories during the referendum campaign would be used in the general election.

I admit that the government House leader has recanted from this nonsense and has agreed that he will make some changes in the bill to reflect this fact. I am pleased to hear it because it is an absolute scandal. Never before, in years and years of electoral history in this country, have we had an enumeration conducted by one party. It has always been done by two and that is the way it should be done in this case.

The government House leader had the gall to stand in the House and say that somehow this bill was fair and equitable and it is not. It is manifestly unfair.

That is not the only thing. The current Canada Elections Act provides that—

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am a little confused. The hon. member seems to be speaking against the bill, but his leader said he would support it. I would like to know whether he intends to—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am sorry, but that is not a point of order.

Mr. Milliken: I hope that is not taken off my speaking time.

[English]

As I was saying, under the current Canada Elections Act, deputy returning officers are appointed by the returning officer. The DRO then appoints poll clerks. For some time we have been trying to get a change in this and we are on the verge of getting one through the committee that is working on electoral reform so that there are representatives of both parties appointed to work the polls to make sure that it is done fairly.

• (1630)

The government members appear to co-operate on this. Was it in this bill to make that change? No, it was not. The returning officer will make the appointments as has been done under the current Canada Elections Act. If this bill was fair and above board, why was that change not included in the bill?

Mr. Mills: It was a mistake.

Mr. Milliken: Under the terms of this bill, the Chief Electoral Officer is given power to make regulations to give effect to the bill and to make necessary adjustments with the Canada Elections Act. Listen to what the government House leader had to say when he introduced this. He said the Chief Electoral Officer:

> would be responsible for making the regulations under the Referendum Act to adapt the Canada Elections Act process to a referendum just as he has the responsibility for making the regulations to adapt the Canada Elections Act to a general election.

He has no such power to make regulations. That statement was patently false. There is absolutely no power in the Chief Electoral Officer to make any regulations under the Canada Elections Act for any purpose. Here the government House leader, who supposedly knows about these matters, made this outrageously wrong statement in his introductory remarks.

Here we have unprecedented powers being given to an officer of Parliament who will be left to run a referendum campaign receiving advice from the minister to whom he has to account. He has to account to someone for some purposes to a minister. Who will tell him how to run the election? No doubt this minister will. He is well-known to be arrogant and a bully. He will bully the Chief Electoral Officer. This should not happen. This power should not be granted without some checks and balances and the proper check is to have the regulations brought to this House.

What happens? The bill says you do not have to bring them for scrutiny under the regulations act. Take a look at the bill. I urge hon. members to read this bill. That needs to be adjusted.

The government commissioned a report on elections in this country that cost some $18 million. The report dealt with issues such as who has the right to vote in elections. There are several outstanding charter claims on this very issue that have been litigated in the courts and that are currently outstanding.

One of them is the right of inmates and prisoners to vote. That issue is still unresolved. It is waiting to go to the Supreme Court of Canada. Two high courts of appeal decisions have given inmates the right to vote. You would have thought that in dealing with legislation in a referendum, the government would have brought these forward and said we have to deal with these now because all these people currently have a right to vote. The act is completely silent on this issue.

Where is the leadership? Where is the thought? After spending $18 million you would think it could come up with some ideas, put them in the bill and try to deal with it. We have a committee working on it but the evidence we now have is that committee cannot get anywhere because the Chief Electoral Officer could not implement changes in the Canada Elections Act while he is having to deal with the referendum.

It has to be dealt with in this bill. The government must have known that when it introduced the bill last Friday and it failed to deal with the issues.

These are serious omissions. This bill has been introduced by a government that does not know what it is doing. We always have said that and it is made manifest by the very flawed nature of this piece of legislation. While we may end up supporting the thing because it has to be done, we all recognize that, the fact is we are going to be pressing for some very significant changes in committee.

I hope that hon. members on the other side will support the very sensible changes. I see a member who will support it. I am sure the minister of homelessness will do his best to do so as well.

I urge him in cabinet to get after his colleagues and say: "Fix this bill. Do not introduce such trash in the House. Get it right the first time so that it is something close to what we as Canadian legislators can expect from a government which is expected to show leadership and which has had years and years to draft this bill".

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I recognize the hon. member for Ottawa Centre—it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Edmonton Southeast—Canada Assistance Plan; the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex—Beef industry; the hon. member for Victoria—National Defence; and the hon. member for Algoma—Denison Mines.

[English]

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to rise in the House to discuss the bill that deals with the question of the referendum.

It was our leader, who in last years called on the government to introduce legislation that would deal with the question of referenda. At that time, he promised the government to go full out, he as well as every member of his caucus, in order to defend the interests of Canada and the unity of Canada.

At that time, the Leader of the Opposition called on the government to move on this issue on a non-partisan basis. He called on the government at the time to take the approach of consultation with the opposition.

Unfortunately, while the government dragged its feet before it introduced the bill that would deal with the question of referenda, it did not really go through the proper consultations, as my colleague from Kingston and the Islands has raised so eloquently, about the different flaws that existed in the legislation. If the government had taken the time to do the consultation with the opposition, I am sure many of those issues would have been resolved prior to the introduction of the bill.

Having said that, I will be supporting the bill, as my colleague from Kingston and the Islands indicated, with reluctance. Simply put, it is because no one wants to be put in a corner and blackmailed that if you do not support the legislation you are working against the unity of Canada.

In our caucus and in our party we support the idea as well as the principle of consultation with Canadians. Our leader has in the past promoted, still is and will always be promoting the question and the issue of consultation with Canadians.

In my riding I have many distinguished constituents who have been working tirelessly on this question of the Constitution and the question of consultation with Canadians. In particular, I would like to mention one of the outstanding leaders in the community, Gail Stewart, and her group of constituents who lately produced a newsletter called "O Canada: Dare to Dream, Shaping Our Future Together".

This organization is a non-partisan, apolitical organization with one purpose in mind and that is to save and preserve Canada as we know it today. Here is what it has written in its latest edition, March 25, 1992, volume 1, No. 3:

> It's not too late to change the debate. It's difficult to think clearly about the constitutional debate. There are so many proposed amendments, so little time to consider them, so much going on behind closed doors, so much at stake.
> Also, the debate is taking place in a global setting where ecological and environmental problems threaten our future. These realities must surely bear on the shaping of a constitution, yet they have been overlooked.
> The process is changing—let's take the next step: instead of negotiating, why not work together?

I want to congratulate my colleague from Kingston and the Islands who specifically was stressing the question of working together and the point of working together with all sides of this House, with those who believe in a United Canada, those who believe in a fair Canada.

I want to spend a few minutes putting my own feelings on this issue. It is a feeling which is echoed so eloquently by my constituents in their latest bulletin. We have to start looking out to see our position on the international scene, rather than focusing on issues that are local. We have to focus on issues that unite us, rather than focusing on the issues that divide us.

There is nothing wrong with having a constitutional debate, a constitutional discussion. It is extremely important for any nation to have those kinds of debates providing at the end we come out of those debates united, as one force and as one unit.

While this year we will be celebrating Canada's 125th birthday, my constituents and I echo the sentiment that we have to put more emphasis on this issue and as well we have to recognize the fact that Canada did not start only 125 years ago. Canada started over 10,000 years ago with our native Canadians.

• (1640)

Those elements which were echoed so eloquently by many Canadians across the land must be recognized not only in our Constitution but as well in our daily lives.

We have to focus on a common history in order to talk about a common future. Your Honour probably knows that if you study history in British Columbia nowadays, you might not be reading the same material as a student who is studying in Nova Scotia, in Newfoundland, in Quebec or elsewhere in Canada. We do not have as yet a common basis so that every Canadian will learn the same things when it comes to the history of this country.

Citizenship—and I see the Minister of Citizenship and Multiculturalism here—is not taught as widely as it should taught be in Canada. We are not putting enough emphasis on teaching Canadians about what it is to be Canadian. The whole debate on division of powers has to be changed so that we can talk more about the division of responsibilities. When we get to the point where we start talking about responsibilities rather than talking about powers, the debate and the tone of the debate will change tremendously.

While it is extremely important to build on the good things we have, we have to look ahead and see our place in the world. If we look at Canada as it is right now and at the latest survey of the United Nations, we find that Canada has been identified as the number one country in the world in which to live and raise a family.

There is nothing wrong with that. It is something that every single Canadian in every part of our country has to be proud of. It is my wish that one day every Canadian will have the chance not only to visit every part of Canada and to see how magnificent this land is, but also to go abroad for one week or for one day, as a matter of fact, and I would challenge them to tell me that there is any place, anywhere in any part of the world, they could identify as home other than Canada.

I know this because I have travelled from one country to the next and I know that we live in the best country in the world in which to raise a family. I say it and I knew it even before the United Nations came up with their survey because I like many other Canadians immigrated to this land, to this country, because we knew then, we know now and we will always know that the opportunities available to us in Canada would never be available to anyone anywhere else in the world.

For example, when I came to this land I was illiterate—I did not speak French or English—and I was able to build a future. I was able to bring my family and was able to build a future. I look around me and I ask: Where else in the world would I as an immigrant be given the same opportunities I have been given in Canada? Nowhere. I am sure my colleagues from Kingston and the Islands, Calgary and Edmonton would agree with me that this is a land of opportunity.

Why we want to turn around and screw it up, why we want to turn around and sell out the best nation on earth, is beyond me.

I can only speak for my constituents on this issue, but I am not interested in seeing money being distributed to anybody who has anything but the interests of a united, fair and equitable Canada at heart.

I will be supporting the bill with reluctance because there are many technical components in it that have to be addressed. It is my hope that with the expertise of many members of our caucus, in particular the member for Kingston and the Islands, the House leader will sit down with the member as well as members from the other political parties to iron out those difficulties so we can come up with something that everybody will be proud of.

On a final note, the government has to keep in mind one thing. This is an issue on which every member of this House who believes in Canada has to work collectively on. It must remain a non-partisan issue in our minds. We cannot play partisan politics on this issue. Otherwise we will lose a lot.

The Leader of the Opposition, the Leader of the New Democratic Party and the Prime Minister have to share the same platform so that they can promote Canada, the unity of Canada. As well, every member of this House has to be given the opportunity to do the same. We must because it is out duty and responsibility to do so.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 4.45 o'clock p.m., pursuant to order made earlier this day, in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 78(3) it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the second reading stage of the bill now before the House.

The question is on the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment, which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 5.25 o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(6), the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

COMPENSATION FOR ATLANTIC CANADIANS

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should implement immediate compensation to address the plight of those Atlantic Canadians affected by the reduction in northern cod who will have lost their jobs but who are unable to qualify for unemployment insurance.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the motion today to discuss—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. Hon. members, please, we are in private members' hour. The hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception has the floor.

Mr. Mifflin: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As much as I appreciate being recognized and being able to speak, I hate it when I have to get up following a vote because it takes about five minutes for things to settle down.

I hope the impact of what I have to say is important enough that members will pay attention. It is a problem with a human face on it. It is a problem that I consider my top priority as the member of Parliament for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception and God knows, I have others both as a member representing a constituency and as a federal member with all the other problems we have in this country.

I am very pleased that I am allowed to bring this to the attention of the House. It will point out a number of Canadian families, in this case in Newfoundland, who are, to use an expression, one that is well used and perhaps sometimes not well understood, in dire straits, in desperate conditions, close to having no hope, despair, despondency, lack of respect for themselves, demoralization.

These are harsh words. For the people who I represent here today these are harsh times. It requires some harsh measures.

I do not know what it is I have to do as their link between what they need and what they cannot get. God knows, I have tried enough in this House to get the attention of the ministers responsible. I have written letters, I have presented motions, I have made statements under Standing Order 31, I have asked questions, I have had meetings. I have not been able to achieve what it is I want.

I am at the point where this is a personal wish, a personal thing. It is personal because I consider I am very close to the people who are in need. They live close to where my home town is. Because of that perhaps I know them better on an individual basis than I would if my riding was in another part of Canada.

• (1730)

It is an area that has been affected by an action taken by the government. My motion is, again, to remind the House:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should implement immediate compensation—

That is immediate compensation.

> —to address the plight of those Atlantic Canadians affected by the reduction in northern cod who will have lost their jobs but who are unable to qualify for unemployment insurance.

I am referring to the fishing industry. The federal government is responsible for managing the fishing industry, and those people involved are affected by the actions in this management area by the government. It is my thesis, and I am joined by many in making the conclusion, that therefore the government is responsible for the plight of the people involved and for taking measures to rectify the situation.

I am referring to the plant workers. This morning there were a total of 70 families who were affected. They are on the Bonavista Peninsula. The plant is the FPI plant in Port Union, Newfoundland. The immediate areas affected are Catalina, Bonavista, Melrose, Elliston, Newman's Cove, Amherst Cove, Birchy Cove, Port Rexton, Trinity and about 70 communities.

As you get further from the tip of the peninsula, the communities are affected less. It goes as far as Clarenville, which is 100-odd kilometres away from the plant itself, which is the distribution centre for the area. It is suffering businesswise because of the decision.

The processing plant, because of the northern cod reduction, was shut down on February 21. It is three months since this has happened. I want to go through very briefly the chronology of what has been involved. I will stick to the action that I have been involved in but I know other members, particularly members from Newfoundland and other members from Atlantic Canada, have been equally persistent for their constituents in areas where this has happened to them.

We will hear some of these examples this afternoon. The plant closed on February 21. I understand that it takes time to develop a compensation program. I understand that, but how long does one have to wait for compensation? We are three months into this now. While I asked the first question two days before the plant closed, I did not really expect to have somebody waiting with a compensation package.

The response of the minister of the day, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, ended up by saying: "We are ready to help and do what is possible to alleviate the problem and we will keep on doing this". That gave me some hope.

The day the plant closed, I directed a similar question to the minister of fisheries and asked him about a compensation package. The minister responded: "When we have established exactly what the consequences of this decision are, if there is need for any additional assistance programs it will be forthcoming".

Later in that response, the minister said: "When we know later in the year exactly what the effects are, other programs if necessary will be put into place".

My hopes were still up on February 21. On March 17, having heard nothing from either of the ministers involved, I then went on the offensive again and spoke in this House for four minutes on the necessity, the pressing need for compensation for those involved.

I discussed the life of a plant worker, a fisherman, and an operator. I talked about the kind of salaries that we were looking at and the difficulty they were experiencing then, one month into the lack of compensation. These are people who last year were employed or were covered by unemployment insurance, or were covered by an emergency response program.

This year because the plant closed earlier with very little notice, they had only two or three weeks of work. Through no fault of their own, they could not qualify. As of February 21 they were using their savings, capitalizing on what food they had stored—a roast of moose, some saltfish—and that was one month into the desolate situation that I am describing.

Now, a processing plant operator does not make a lot of money. The average income in my riding is $23,000. That was the latest figure I had. The average in Newfoundland is $32,000 and the average in Canada is $46,000. These workers make anywhere from, depending on their seniority and the kind of bonuses they get, $17,000 to $23,000 a year. If my research serves me correctly, that is pretty close to the poverty level in Canada. So you do not start out with very much. If you have to go on unemployment insurance, if you are covered by unemployment insurance, your income can range from $14,000 a year to $19,000 a year. That still is not a lot of money, Mr. Speaker, as you know.

In this case, at one month—where I left you in my presentation in the House—these people had no compensation, no visible source of income.

The next date I want to bring to your attention is April 27. In the meantime I have met with officials. On March 16 I met with the director general of unemployment insurance, or the regional director in St. John's for employment and immigration, and I discussed this problem with him to see what solutions may be forthcoming, along with other problems of course. On April 27 I found it necessary, because I had no response from the government, to make another statement in the House of Commons in this regard. In the meantime I wrote to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. I have yet to receive a reply.

Mr. Speaker, at this point in time, if you can follow the chronology, on April 27 at about that time, I was in my riding and I visited some of the families and spoke with some of the people involved, and actually went and ate, had meals, with some of the families. I do not think they would be ashamed because of the circumstances which caused me to rise to my feet and talk in public about this for me to tell you that they get up in the morning and they have no jobs to go to. Their breakfast is a cup of coffee, a cup of tea, in some cases maybe a glass of cold water, home made bread made from purchased flour, ingredients that are still within some range or left over from the days when they had work, sometimes without butter, some partridge berry jam that was picked the year before. Their kids go to school, they come home for lunch and it may be bread, maybe butter, maybe a can of beans put on the stove and boiled, shared with the family. The kids go back to school, they come back from school and for supper, maybe there is some meat left over. There may be some more canned food left. This is one day into the second month of this situation that I am trying to put a human face on.

In the second month their pickups are being repossessed, their cars are being repossessed. They are not brand-new cars. They are not big cars. In some cases they are 10, 12 years old, but they still have payments to make because they cannot afford to pay cash for these vehicles.

I am asking the government to put a human face on these families which need compensation because of a management decision, albeit necessary, by the government of the day, which happens to be on that side of the House. On May 8, which was not too long ago, I found it necessary two and a half months into this difficult situation to ask the Minister of Employment and Immigration about this. Although he was not here at the time, I was pleased that he was represented by the Minister of State for Employment and Immigration. I was beginning to take some hope from the sympathetic look and response she started to give, but I lost hope when she said:

• (1740)

> We could, of course, look for a way out in conjunction with the private sector. A variety of programs exist within the department, as we have said time and again, to help workers find new placement and to help companies forced to proceed to massive layoffs carry out studies and assess what the future holds for them.

What good does that do? I spoke to some of the families involved after that intervention and they could not believe their eyes or their ears.

The minister went on to say in response to my supplementary question:

> It is important to sit down with the employer and the worker and figure out precisely what their needs are for the future.

I can tell you what their needs are for the future. I have been telling this House and the government since February 19 what their needs are. Their needs are some money, some income, some subsistence to put bread and butter and something a little more than bread and butter which the average Canadian has become accustomed to, on their table. I do not think that is an unreasonable request. I do not think I am asking for very much. I do not think it is very difficult for the government to find this money. I do not care where it gets it. I know it is strapped for money.

We are talking about $2 million or maybe less. The only recourse for these people other than to have me get up and plead their case, and others who will plead when I sit down, is to apply for social services. I am saying that all Canadians, not just Newfoundlanders, have respect. They do not like to apply for social assistance. When they are strapped, they have no alternative.

Social services pays them $7,200 a year maximum for a family and that is about one-third the average income in my riding, one-quarter the average income in Newfoundland and one seventh the average income in Canada. Most of them have not done that yet, because they have self respect. Some of them have had to do it.

I am hoping that within a couple of days, tomorrow, Friday, the end of this week, there will be some compassion and benevolence. I do not like to use those words. I do not like to beg. I am not used to begging. The people I represent are not used to begging. They have not begged me but they have asked me, implored me. They are desperate and I am close to desperate also. I am not saying this to take credit for the effort but I do not know where else to go.

On May 8, when I finished speaking in this House and got the response to my question, I then wrote to the minister. I said: "This is a serious situation. It needs immediate response". It is now May 21 and I have not even had a phone call. No response. I do not know where to go. If I thought doing a handstand in this House, other than provoking the leader to ask me to behave in a more responsible parliamentary manner, if I thought that would get some action from the government, I would do it. I know you would not agree with that, but when a person is desperate they resort to desperate means. I would bring my guitar and sing a song if I thought that would help.

An hon. member: You can do it.

Mr. Mifflin: The Speaker says I can do it. His background I guess in athletics would probably want him to see me do it.

Having been challenged, I am not sure it is the kind of thing I would want to do anyway.

The point I am making is what can I do to get attention? I am not looking for media attention. I am not looking for attention from anybody. I want action. I want some results. I want somebody from that side of the House to say: "We believe you have a problem. We believe those 70 families on the Bonavista Peninsula have a problem because the government reduced the northern cod quota, because there was not much there to begin with because the foreigners all caught it, because the government has not the political will to do something about it. It needs to take some action".

I do not mean action of the Rio conference at which there are 30,000 people and 75 heads of state and the thing goes on for a week or so. The last time that was tried was down in Dartmouth a week ago with no results. They say you have to go to the countries. The countries say you have to go to the European Community.

We are not going to make too many points with that crowd that way.

Until we see some political will to do something that will cause the northern cod to increase, to have a quota that is reasonable that will allow the plant to open, which is what these people want and is what I want, let us have a bit of compassion.

I know there are members enough for that. I do not name them because I do not operate that way. I have spoken to members on that side of the House. They understand where I am coming from. They would like to do something and I will ask those members to go to their ministers and tell them the situation, how desperate it is, and that a member of Parliament is pleading their case and is looking for compassion, benevolence, help. I will put any name to it and accept it as long as the compensation is there.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to stand here this afternoon and be able to participate in this debate that has been initiated by my friend from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception, the neighbouring constituency to mine in that part of Conception Bay where the ridings come together.

It would be trite for me to say unfortunate, but the particular situation that my friend talks about is exactly that. It is a situation that unfortunately to some extent we are all confronted with one way or the other. Those we are most familiar with have been affected the most by the decisions as he says, albeit necessary, that have had to be taken to properly manage our fisheries so that in the future we have a resource that is of value to all of the families and the communities that he talks of; not only the community of Catalina and those communities in that area, but the communities that exist all through Atlantic Canada, through Quebec and different parts of the country.

He talks about compassion and benevolence. While he seeks compassion and benevolence he would be the first to agree that he is not saying they are lacking. I do not have that many fishermen in my constituency; about 300. I see exactly the same situation that he sees.

The minister of fisheries has about 1,200 fishermen in his constituency. He has seen the fish plant in the town of Trepassey with upward of 800 people close down. He has seen a number of other smaller plants in his constituency close down.

There is not a man I have met in politics, and granted I have been associated with him for well over 17 years in politics, who has more compassion and inclination for benevolence as a personal commitment. It is the way he conducts his life.

• (1750)

As minister of fisheries it has been damn difficult for him. He is someone who we all agree has displayed a commitment to try to make it better within the constraints of the capacities of science and within the constraints of the fiscal capacity of the government.

Just last week the minister met with the fishermen and the union from the south coast in St. John's. Not completely satisfied with the results, he has dispatched his senior fisheries advisor to go to the south coast to personally do an assessment of what is happening. That reflects the type of commitment that the minister of fisheries has in dealing with these things.

He was in Grand Banks two weeks ago and met with the community. I talked to the mayor of Grand Banks 10 days ago. He was delighted with the visit. The minister has been able to save a number of fish plants except the one in his own riding, the one in Trepassey. He and I share responsibility for the city of St. John's. He has worked very hard to try and save that fish plant in St. John's.

How do you approach these things? As members in this House know, the government has taken a multi-faceted approach. We talked about dealing with the overfishing problem. We have had many debates in this House and a number of the members I see here participated with me and with other members in an effort to bring some focus to this issue and that process is ongoing.

We must clearly deal better with our capacity in science and that is something that a considerable amount of resources have been expended on. We are finally involving those people to participate in the resource so that there is a resource there that is predictable, that is definable and that we can better manage. The whole concept of underutilized species product development diversification is another that we have expanded into in which there is much more work going on in small communities in Newfoundland and Labrador to big market development and promotions through Asia and Europe, something that we all benefit from.

What does it matter if we do not have fish? It does not at lot. We must act to make sure that we have fish down the road. There have been a number of communities through Atlantic Canada and into Quebec that have been affected by a lack of fish and the inability to catch fish because limits have been put in place. What happens to them, as my friend from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception asks? What are they supposed to do?

We all know there has been an investment of almost $600 million to deal with fisheries adjustment in Atlantic Canada. It has taken on a number of combinations and permutations. One of the initiatives that is underway now that I think is particularly important and would be endorsed by all of the members of this House is the task force on incomes and adjustment that is being headed by Richard Cashin, the President of the Newfoundland Fishermen's Food and Allied Workers Union in St. John's. Forty-five million dollars have been set aside for pilot projects in this area.

The approach here is to take this on in two phases. The first phase would be an interim assessment of the resource, the industry and those employed in it. The second phase would be to prepare for the minister and the government a set of recommendations on an adjustment strategy and recommend communities in the region that can and will be helped.

There have been a whole series of short-term measures and emergency responses to particular problems like the one that my friend has spoken about. There have been programs for catch failure. There have been programs designed to respond to ice conditions. There have been very specific programs put in place to provide for training for those people who have been laid off from fish plants.

In my own constituency of St. John's East in the community of Belle Island we have been able to develop a heavy equipment program. That has come from the commitment of the faculty of the community college there and of the community.

The great advantage is that we have been able to solve two or three problems at once. Most of the people who have gone through that program have been plant workers who had been laid off in closed fish plants.

We get the benefit of the heavy equipment program on Belle Isle, the community with a 70 per cent unemployment rate, a community that was abandoned in 1965. Now we are beginning to see some real initiatives there. At the same time, we are training plant workers who have been laid off.

It is the community-based approach that has evolved from the old IAS strategy supported through Community Futures, that has developed as we have committees in place to bring together, not only the training needs and employment opportunities, but the economic diversification opportunities.

For the last three years we have seen and I am directly familiar with emergency response programs. For instance, in the community of Cupids we were finally able to open up a channel and put some cribbing into a small boat basin, a pond as we call it. We have that facility but more important, last year we had a number of people who were able to get employment through that program.

We have seen it in other communities. I use it only as an example of good work and creative responses.

There are people who do not always get taken up. There are safety nets which we hope will deal with these. So many have been taken care of. In times of hardship and difficulty the likes of which many of us have never seen before and have only heard about, the concern that my friend expresses on behalf of his constituents is one that all of us feel.

Frankly, be they fishermen or be they farmers or people laid off in manufacturing industries, in communities that depend on the manufacturing sector, the compassion that he talks about and that he displays is one that many of us have and share. That is why we have evolved the programs that we have. That is why so many of these things have been put into place. That is why the government continues to respond in many different ways to make sure that we have a fishery in the future that can support our communities and our individuals.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, do I have 10 minutes or are we only going until six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We just go until six o'clock on Standing Orders. I regret it is only after supply motion that we could take the whole hour.

Mr. Cadieux: Mr. Speaker, an agreement could not be reached under the provisions of Standing Order 78(1) or 78(2) with respect to an allocation of time for the committee stage of Bill C-8l, an act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada.

Under the provisions of Standing Order 78(3), I give notice of my intention to move a time allocation motion at the next sitting of the House for the purpose of allotting a specified number of days or hours for the consideration and disposal of proceedings at that stage of the bill.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak on this matter on behalf of the Official Opposition.

Mr. Mifflin: Mr. Speaker, you said it ended at six o'clock. We have a couple of minutes left. On a subject of this importance I would have thought that we would have gone right to the wire, even if it ended at six o'clock. I see that with three minutes to go we are into other subjects.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Your colleague has just raised another point of order.

Mr. Samson: Mr. Speaker, I will have to be brief.

In view of the importance of this motion, it is imperative that we look at the reality.

• (1800)

The reality is there are a number of people, a number of families, in dire straits, in dire need. It is not time to talk about training programs, it is not time to talk about anything else. It is time to talk about the need. These people do not qualify for training programs. They do not qualify for unemployment insurance. What they are looking for is some emergency assistance.

The government has seen fit to find emergency funds in other areas of the country for other reasons. It found funds for the gulf war, a very important issue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, very briefly, the minister made the point that the parties could not agree on a Standing Order with respect to debate and therefore he is moving this motion under Standing Orders 78(1) and 78(2).

I am told that nobody on behalf of the government consulted with anybody in the Official Opposition, so it seems to stretch credulity to get up and say agreement could not be reached when the minister with a straight face never even bothered to speak to anybody on this.

Mr. Speaker: This is not a debatable motion.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 is deemed to have been moved.

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, after that performance it certainly makes all of us over here wonder what kind of people we are dealing with on the government side.

On April 8 I asked the Minister of Finance if he could possibly see his way through to ending the benign indifference with which he has treated the provinces, his fiscal partners in this country. There does not seem to be any such thing as a have province at the moment.

The current recession has affected every single province adversely. Ontario, which was long known as a prosperous economic engine of Canada, has been dealt extremely punishing blows by a combination of high real interest rates and an uncompetitive exchange rate in the Canada–U.S Free Trade Agreement.

In my own province of Alberta about 80,000 people in the oil and gas industry have lost their jobs since 1986, largely because of unprofitable conditions in the industry. About half of the industry work force is now out of the industry.

Those conditions have been exacerbated by Ottawa's obsession with monetary policy, a deflationary direction that has been continued by the current Minister of Finance with the result that 110,000 of our fellow citizens have lost their jobs in March and April alone this year.

The oil and gas industry is the engine of growth in our province, the province which is also the home of the finance minister. Currently there are 432 drilling rigs available in Alberta but only 132 of them are in use, leaving 300 idle. A firm's rigs utilization to break even should be at about 55 per cent and 65 per cent to secure a reasonable rate of return.

Statistics Canada estimates that the oil and gas companies will cut capital spending by 14 per cent this year and $5.7 billion in 1981 to $4.98 billion. The biggest cut will occur in the exploration and development drilling which will fall 17 per cent from 1991 levels to about $1.9 billion.

These are statistics which the government says translate somehow into afterward picture. I can guarantee those people opposite that these facts indicate no such thing. They mean that 46,000 people are unemployed in my city of Edmonton. There are 28 per cent more people living below the poverty line this year than last year.

It means 98,000 food hampers were distributed to men, women and children in Edmonton last year. The Canada Assistance Program is a shared cost fiscal agreement between the federal government and the provinces. In the 1990 federal budget the government decided the so-called have provinces should be limited to a 5 per cent increase annually in their entitlements under CAP until 1992.

The 1991 federal budget extended this unilateral action until 1995. This type of fiscal terrorism is just one way the current government is sowing the seeds of division in our country.

I said that the minister is playing shell games with provincial transfer payments and I repeat the allegation today. Can the minister or his agents give this House an indication as to what concrete steps they have taken to co-operate with Ontario, B.C., and Alberta in order to come to a reasonable agreement on increases in CAP transfers? If no such assurances are given, can we assume this government is presiding over the destruction of federal-provincial fiscal relationship? Have they no sense of responsibility, no sense of Canadians as a national family, no ability to see Canada as a single great nation?

[Translation]

Mr. Barry Moore (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the government is very much aware of the fact that the slowing down has deeply affected some Canadians. However, the social safety net in Canada, which includes the federal unemployment insurance program as well as the various welfare programs cost-shared by the two levels of government, is especially aimed at helping Canadians through such hard times.

The federal government has clearly increased the amount of assistance provided through these programs, and that has helped make the situation easier to bear.

[English]

The total amount of federal UI program benefits going to unemployed Canadians has grown at an average rate of 8.8 per cent per year. Furthermore, the federal share of social assistance payments to the needy has gone up from $4 billion in 1984–85 to $6.6 billion in 1991–92.

Federal expenditures in these two programs will grow by 10 per cent, which means that in 1993 the funds available will grow by $2.3 billion over 1991–92 to help the needy and unemployed through these programs.

In putting a ceiling on payments under the Canada Assistance Plan, we are simply asking the three fiscally stronger provinces, Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia, to help contain the federal share of welfare costs to increases of 5 per cent per year.

The federal deficit control plan is already making its impact on the Canadian economy in the form of lower inflation rates and lower interest rates.

In conclusion, this government believes that the best income security for Canadians is a job. Our record speaks for itself. Since 1984 over 1.3 million jobs have been created. The number of persons living in low income as defined by Statistics Canada dropped from 4.4 million in 1984 to 3.8 million in 1990.

An effective healthy economy that provides jobs for Canadians will mean that fewer and fewer Canadians will depend upon welfare and UI.

BEEF INDUSTRY

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, May 6, I asked the Minister of Agriculture why Canadian consumers are not being informed that the imported beef they are buying in Canada may well be cheap, tough U.S. cow beef. This is no roll beef or ungraded beef coming in mainly from the United States.

On April 12, 1989, I first raised this issue in the House during Question Period. At that time one million pounds of this product per week were coming into Canada. The minister at the time responded that there must be a need for this product or it would not be coming in. Two years later it was not one million pounds per week but it was 3 million pounds a week coming into Canada.

During this time five beef packing plants closed in Ontario and others across Canada, and the Ontario and Quebec feed lot industry is put under further pressure.

Finally in March 1991, after two years of pressure the minister responded: "I have instructed my officials", to take the necessary steps to require the United States, whether with graded or ungraded beef, to identify it for consumers. We believe Canadian consumers have the right to know the exact grade and origin of their beef, and we are going to ensure that happens". That was in March 1991.

The regulations have been changed but they only require the container to be marked as ungraded and not the meat. This is a fraud because Canadian consumers still will not know the grade of product they are buying.

Further to this in his answer on May 6 the minister stated that Canada is working with the United States to harmonize our inspection systems. This is clearly unacceptable.

As was shown on ABC Prime Time Live on April 30, the United States streamlined inspection system is a disaster. The plants have their own inspectors and carcasses that have fallen on the floor or are contaminated with faeces are allowed to pass after they wash off the faeces. These conditions are deplorable and are even worse in the poultry industry according to media reports from within the United States.

I ask this government again: Will it ensure Canadian consumers and producers that our health and inspection standards will never be compromised, and that we place the health of our people first and foremost; that it will bring in regulations that will require that all imported meat must be clearly marked with the Canadian grade equivalent and the country of origin in a manner that is clearly visible to Canadian consumers.

Finally, I am appalled that in the midst of all these pressures some of the few remaining feed lot operators are still waiting for their third and fourth quarter payments for 1991 under the tripartite stabilization program. How can our Canadian producers compete under such conditions?

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would like to respond to my hon. colleague's concerns.

On April 5, 1992 a regulatory amendment became effective requiring imported beef to be clearly identified with the grade of the exporting country if the product was graded or to be marked ungraded if that were the case. In essence, all beef entering Canada must now have this labelling requirement clearly indicated. This regulatory amendment is enforced at all federally registered establishments in Canada.

• (1810)

The requirement for beef grade identification at the consumer level is one that is within the jurisdiction of our colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs of Canada. It is my understanding that retail guidelines have been issued by my hon. colleague to ensure that labelling and advertising requirements relating to beef are clearly understood by all sectors of the Canadian meat retail industry.

In addition, Agriculture Canada will be participating in a meeting with officials from industry and C&CAC, as well as the Ontario Minister of Agriculture and Food, to determine what action can be taken at the provincial level to further inform the consumer of the considerable progress that has been made in regard to better informing the Canadian consumer.

Continued efforts by both the department and all those affected will assist the consumer in making an informed choice when selecting beef at the supermarket. Under no circumstances will the Canadian government allow our inspection system or the quality of our products to be compromised in any way. We know that prime time television on April 30 did a program which was somewhat sensationalistic, and inaccurate statements were made on that segment about the U.S. beef industry. It is damaging to the meat industry whether it be in Canada or in the United States, and it did not serve the Canadian producers of beef in any way.

Mr. Milliken: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There are no points of order heard during the late show.

Adjournment Debate

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I will proceed on this point and try not to intervene in your difference of opinion with the member from Kingston.

On March 9, 1992 I asked a question of the Prime Minister, which was eventually answered by the Associate Minister of National Defence, on the issue of a new version of Star Wars, this one going under the unlikely and implausible name of GPALS which stands for Global Protection Against Limited Strikes, once again an acronym designed to lull the public into thinking that what we are talking about here is something benign.

What we really have here is the American space military complex coming up with another version of the Strategic Defence Initiative, an idea touted by President Reagan, an idea which was at the time bizarre and expensive, and which is now being recognized as a bizarre, expensive and gross waste of human and financial resources.

The SDI proposal, the Star Wars proposal, depended on having an enemy, and the enemy was the Soviet Union. The Soviet Union has now collapsed so the same industry has to come up with another idea in order to keep itself going, in order to suck public funds primarily out of the American taxpayer, but as well out of the world economy, and they are coming to Canada to try to sell this project to the Canadian government.

The project finds a new enemy; this time, fortunately, they have Saddam Hussein and they have the example of the Scud missiles. So they come forward touting this idea that maybe we should invest billions of dollars in trying to set up a space based defence against ballistic missiles, not coming from the Soviet Union across the pole or elsewhere to North America, but they conjure up the idea of ballistic missiles coming from places like Libya or Iraq to cities in North America. They build on the fear that was generated during the gulf war of scud missiles, a fear generated by Saddam Hussein and now being exploited by the purveyors of this bizarre idea.

I call on the government to ensure that while it seeks information about this, it is made clear right at the outset that Canada is not going to spend one dollar of Canadian taxpayers' money on this bizarre scheme; second, that we recognize it will not provide an ounce of protection against scud missiles or ballistic missiles; third, that it is a breach of the anti-ballistic missile treaty in which Canada and the international community has a critical stake; fourth, that because it involves putting weapons in space it goes directly counter to Canadian policy promoted at the United Nations.

Whatever information we seek about this bizarre proposal, we make it clear at the outset that we will have nothing to do with it and we urge the American government to have nothing to do with it, and we make that plea on behalf of the Canadian people.

In 1985 the external affairs and defence committee came out against Star Wars. It should not be necessary for us to do that again, and I call on the government to make clear its opposition to this ludicrous proposal.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we all know that while attention to the cold war is quickly fading, the recent gulf war demonstrated the real threat of proliferation of nuclear weapons and missile delivery systems.

In response to this concern, the Prime Minister outlined Canadian initiatives in a speech in Washington this morning. This speech in turn followed upon an exhaustive program outlined by the Prime Minister and the SSEA in other speeches in February 1991.

It is in this broad context that the ballistic missile defence must be considered. While recognizing the need to respond to threats Canada also wishes to ensure that any proposal in the area of ballistic missile defence is stabilizing in nature.

We therefore welcome the fact that the U.S.A. 1991 missile defence act prudently stipulates that the initial U.S.A. BMD system should not contravene the United States anti-ballistic missile treaty with the former U.S.S.R. or authorize the deployment of weapons in space.

Moreover we have welcomed the broad co-operative approach the United States government has taken, particularly the ongoing U.S.A.-Russia dialogue and the program of consultation taking place with other interested countries.

This is all taking place against the historic co-operation between the United States and Russia in reducing their nuclear arsenals. We hope all these activities will permit new co-operative approaches to common security.

Beyond these general points, Canada has not taken a decision regarding possible participation in the proposed U.S.A. BMD programs. We have indicated our willingness to engage in consultations with the United States concerning the details of the American proposal and its implications for Canada.

The views of other countries will also be of interest and this process is likely to take some time. Canada has long enjoyed a close bilateral defence relationship with the United States, particularly in NORAD, and ballistic missile defence is not a NORAD function.

Any changes to NORAD's mandate would have to be the subject of negotiations between the United States and Canadian governments and neither side has indicated any intention to reopen the agreement which, under its present terms, was renewed for five years in May 1991.

DENISON MINES

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, on March 10 I put a question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration because at that time we had received an announcement that Denison Mines in Elliot Lake would be laying off 1,000 workers during the ensuing few weeks.

This represents a tremendous blow to this community of some 13,000 people. Over 80 per cent of the mining labour force has been laid off in the last two and a half years. Earlier in 1990 there were some 2,400 people laid off at the two operating mines, Denison and Rio Algom in that community.

I asked the Minister of Employment and Immigration what action would be taken because the government has been providing very substantial funding for the 2,400 who had been laid off previously. I am told that in the 1991-92 fiscal year some $2.3 million had been provided for adjustment and training of workers who had been laid off.

I have been advised by the Community Futures officer, Mr. Craege McQuarrie, last evening that their estimates now will be only some $600,000. What the government should be doing is increasing the last year's funding by some 50 per cent rather than cutting it by 75 per cent as seems to be the case.

The minister was quite forthcoming in his response in the House. He said: "I know this is a serious blow to that community and I am ready to work with the hon. member and officials of my department are ready to sit down with those people to see how we can help them adjust to the situation in question". I hope this evening the parliamentary secretary will be able to come forward and say yes, the minister was not talking through his hat. The minister meant what he said in the House on March 10. He is committed to providing the additional funding that will be required for training, for not only pre-vocational training at the high school level, for the literacy training at the elementary level, but also for the community college courses and the skill courses.

This is a community with many thousands of men and women who require this kind of training and upgrading. The government talks about providing increased training and adjustment funds but, there have been serious cutbacks. We only have to listen to Question Period to know that there have been serious cutbacks.

We want the government to live up to the commitment that the minister made in the House a few weeks ago and say that it will provide these additional training allowances and support programs to help adjust the lives of these miners who were laid off at Denison Mines and Rio Algom Mines during this past couple of years.

It is not only important that the funds be provided but that they be provided in a flexible way so that people can receive the assistance they need and get it in an orderly way so it does not turn their personal lives into turmoil, as has occurred in many cases in the past.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, Employment and Immigration Canada offers a wide range of programs and services to assist unemployed individuals in the Elliot Lake area.

These programs and services have proven very successful throughout the country in helping unemployed individuals and communities facing economic difficulties.

Through the Canadian Jobs Strategy, Employment and Immigration Canada provided the Elliot Lake region with more than $8 million in assistance in 1989-90 and another $8 million was budgeted in 1991-92.

Last year the Canada Employment Centre staff was increased in Elliot Lake to provide additional counselling services in the areas of training and mobility to meet the needs of the laid-off workers at Denison Mines.

There are several programs and committees in place now to deal with the recent lay-offs at Denison Mines. The joint consultative committee is up and running, the Community Futures Program is already in place and a Canada Employment and Immigration Centre joint planning group made up of regional Canada Employment Centres and adjustment services staff has been established.

In addition, a community training co-ordination committee was established to priorize needs and to make decisions as to training purchases. Obviously the tripling of the fee payer program funding in Ontario by $125 million will benefit unemployed workers in Elliot Lake who need retraining. EIC is providing assistance to the Elliot Lake area and, as in the past, we will help the laid-off workers adjust to this difficult situation.

NATIONAL PARKS ACT

Hon. Tom Hockin (for the Minister of the Environment) moved that Bill C-59, an act to amend the National Parks Act be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Natural Resources envelope.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, the bill which is before us today is an important one. Hon. members will discover it is a bill which will be well received as it reflects important partnerships we are developing with aboriginal peoples.

This bill is divided into two major purposes. First of all, the bill will deal with Environment Canada's responsibility for the fulfilment of Treaty No. 8 obligations, flowing from the Cree Band of Fort Chipewyan land claim settlement of 1986.

In that settlement Canada, Alberta and the band agreed that additional entitlements under the treaty would include provision of some 12,000 acres of land for Indian reserve purposes and $26.6 million compensation.

Environment Canada's specific role in the settlement concerns Wood Buffalo National Park which straddles the boundary of Alberta and the Northwest Territories. This park, the second largest in the world, overlays the approximately three million acre traditional hunting grounds of the Cree. Following a settlement it was necessary to prepare a complex boundary survey of this area of the park for insertion in the National Parks Act.

While I must point out that the area will remain subject to the National Parks Act, this bill confirms the right of the Cree Band of Fort Chipewyan to hunting, fishing, trapping and cultural pursuits in their traditional lands within the park.

• (1010)

The bill confirms not only rights to wilderness, it also excises the small community of Peace Point from within the park boundary to enable its establishment as an Indian reserve. This is being done as part of the claims settlement in recognition of the understandable wish of the Cree of Peace Point to greater control over their own affairs.

The final element of the bill affecting Wood Buffalo is the formal establishment of a wildlife advisory board. This board, which has been operating informally but effectively for several years, enables the Cree to participate meaningfully in decision making which directly affects their way of life.

It is indicative of the kinds of partnerships which must be established with native people to ensure that Canada's wilderness values are enriched and the ethics of wilderness protection are shared among all Canadians.

Therefore in this bill we are formally recognizing the long-standing relationship and affinity of the Cree to lands which, by agreement, remain under the protection of the National Parks Act. Moreover we are helping to perpetuate a tradition for caring for the land from which all Canadians can learn.

In 1983 UNESCO declared Wood Buffalo National Park a world heritage site. It was largely because of the contributions of native peoples for the continued protection of this marvellous part of Canada that this international honour was accorded.

The second purpose of this bill concerns a matter with which all members will be familiar. In fact it was the subject of an all-party resolution made in this House in 1987. I am speaking of course of the establishment of the National Park Reserve in the Queen Charlotte Islands of British Columbia, along with the authorization of a unique management agreement with the Council of the Haïda Nation.

On July 1, 1987 the Prime Minister and the premier of British Columbia signed a memorandum of understanding which committed the two governments to negotiate an agreement to establish a national marine park in the South Moresby area of the Queen Charlotte Islands.

On July 12, 1988 the two governments signed a formal memorandum of agreement setting out specific commitments regarding the parks and related initiatives.

Signing of that agreement was the culmination of a 13-year struggle by the Haïda and environmentalists, supported by church organizations and others, both nationally and internationally, to protect the area from logging and mining.

In 1985 the Haïda and their supporters blockaded logging on Lyell Island leading to the arrest of 72 Haïda, including elders, and focusing national and international attention on South Moresby. Agreement to protect South Moresby was greeted by Canadians as one of the most important environmental accomplishments of the government in its first term.

Setting aside the park reserve will protect internationally significant heritage resources. Parts of the area were not glaciated during the last ice age, resulting in the evolution of unique plants and animals—hence the area's common description as the Canadian Galapagos. Moreover, South Moresby represents a rich cultural heritage.

The abandoned Haïda village of Ninstints, for example, was designated by UNESCO in 1981 as a world heritage site for its array of totems and other cultural remains; two other village sites in the vicinity have been declared of national historical significance. In recognition of these factors, the name Gwaii Haanas Archipelago National Park Reserve has been selected, meaning "islands of wonder and beauty".

The federal-provincial agreement sets the boundaries of the 147,000 hectare national park reserve. The boundaries of the national marine park reserve, however, will not be finalized before an assessment of the mineral and energy resource potential of the area, and a decision by the federal and provincial ministers this December. Therefore, Bill C-59 deals only with the land reserve.

Since the beginning of the initiative to set aside the national park reserve it has been evident that an understanding with the Haïda would be needed to ensure the effective management of the area. An all-party resolution of the House of Commons on May 14, 1987 stated "that the House confirms its intention to ensure the continued participation of the Haïda people in matters affecting South Moresby".

Moreover, in his remarks at the signing of the MOU in 1987 with the province the Prime Minister stated: "South Moresby is more than an ecological treasure. It is also the spiritual heart of "Haïda Gwaii", the homeland of the Haïda. The Haïda community will be involved in a meaningful way in park planning, development and operation".

Therefore Environment Canada began discussions with the Haïda in 1987 regarding a mechanism for co-operation in the management of the archipelago and the continuation of traditional Haïda activities.

As a result of these commitments the Haïda did not oppose the idea of a national park reserve which would stop the logging and at the same time not prejudice their position on ownership.

For this reason and in keeping with past practice elsewhere, a reserve for a national park will be set aside pending resolutions of outstanding disputes over rights, titles, interests in and to the area.

Formal negotiations with the Haïda on co-operation with the management of the archipelago began early in 1988.

Unfortunately, talks have broken off from time to time giving the differing views of the parties on sovereignty over the lands. However, eventually the parties agreed to set out their different views in the areas of dispute and to concentrate on those issues where there was agreement, principally the protection and conservation of the unique ecology of the area and the continuation of the Haïda culture and activities within it.

With that deadlock broken, the negotiations led to a draft agreement in April 1990. The agreement was subsequently ratified by the Haïda in a referendum held by the Council of the Haïda Nation on May 19, 1990. The principal components of the agreement are as follows:

(a) The agreement will be between the Government of Canada represented by the Minister of the Environment and the Council of the Haïda Nation represented by its vice-president.

(b) The document contains parallel statements which set out the Haïda and Government of Canada's divergent positions regarding sovereignty, title and ownership to the land included within the national park reserve, as well as the definition, i.e., citizenship of those Haïda to whom the agreement will apply.

By way of explanation, under their definition, the Haïda Nation includes persons of Haïda ancestry living in the United States, whereas Canada maintains that its responsibility under the agreement can only be for those Haïda to whom subsection 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 applies.

(c) The parties agree that long-term protective measures are essential to safeguard the area and that the highest standards of protection should be applied. The parties also agree to contribute to the continuity of Haïda culture.

(d) An archipelago management board will be set up to examine all initiatives and undertakings relating to park reserve planning, operation and management. The board will have equal representation by Canada and the Haïda, and will be co-chaired. The board will operate on a consensus basis.

(e) The Haïda will continue specified cultural and traditional renewable resource harvesting activities with few exceptions, e.g., trees for ceremonial or artistic purposes intended for public display; resource harvesting will be on a non-commercial basis.

The National Parks Act will be amended by this bill to permit these activities by authorizing the Governor in Council to enact appropriate regulations following review by the archipelago management board in accordance with the consensus decision-making process.

(f) There is an explicit statement that the agreement shall not constitute a land claims agreement or treaty within the meaning of section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982, nor shall it be construed as creating, affirming, recognizing or denying any aboriginal or treaty right.

Also it is stated that: "Nothing in the agreement shall fetter or limit, or be deemed to fetter or limit, in any manner the rights, jurisdiction, authority, obligations or responsibilities of either party or their representatives, except to the extent of the requirement that all reasonable efforts must have been made to reach consensus".

(g) Commitments are made to encourage Haïda employment with the Canadian Parks Service and other economic opportunities associated with the national park reserve.

(h) There is a commitment to negotiate a further agreement with the Haïda for the national marine park reserve before it is established.

When this agreement was accepted in principle by the Haïda Nation through their referendum two years ago, co-operation between the Canadian Parks Service and the Haïda began on the ground. A contract is in place with the Council of the Haïda Nation for the operation of an interim archipelago management board to deal with priority issues until the agreement actually comes into force.

However, real authorities are extremely limited in the absence of legislation and the Haïda remain cautious about the nature of formal relations in the absence of a signed agreement.

In conclusion, the proposed amendments to the National Parks Act would provide for setting aside lands in the Gwaii Haanas archipelago as a reserve for a national park; enable the Governor in Council to authorize the Minister of the Environment to sign an agreement with the Council of the Haïda Nation respecting the management and operation of the park reserve; provide authorities required to implement the agreement as it relates to traditional renewable resource harvesting and Haïda cultural practices; and in addition, implement provisions of the 1986 Cree Band of Fort Chipewyan Specific Land Claim which affects Wood Buffalo National Park, by establishing a wildlife advisory board with authority to propose regulations within the band's traditional hunting grounds and excising an existing community from the park for an Indian reserve.

As I mentioned earlier, both the Gwaii Haanas and Wood Buffalo proposals reflect partnerships with aboriginal peoples.

• (1020)

As such they are indicative of co-operative land management regimes which will greatly benefit Canada's internationally renowned national park systems.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Madam Speaker, basically, the purpose of Bill C-59 is to amend the National Parks Act to bring it into line with the two agreements concluded with two native peoples, or should I say, three.

[English]

First, the act we are debating here today allows for the creation of a wildlife advisory board for Wood Buffalo National Park. It does so with the Cree Band of Fort Chipewyan. It allows for traditional aboriginal hunting activities within the park as negotiated in the 1986 Cree Chipewyan Specific Land Claim.

We support this and we would like to congratulate all those on the aboriginal side who were involved for their patience and their perseverance.

Second, the act permits the establishment of the Gwaii Haanas South Moresby National Park Reserve under the National Parks Act as established by the British Columbia Canada Agreement.

Some time ago we, the Liberal Party, supported the all-party motion on South Moresby in the House. Even more specifically, I am proud to say it was a Liberal government that drew the line in the map which first indicated federal interest in South Moresby.

Indeed, it is unfortunate that because of a previous commitment my colleague, the hon. member for Davenport, cannot be here. As Minister of the Environment, he was the person who took the lead on this. Indeed, it is a tribute to his vision that we are here today.

The act we are in the process of debating authorizes the Minister of the Environment to enter into an agreement with the Council of the Haïda Nation respecting the shared management and operation of the park. This agreement was ratified by the Haïda Nation in a May 19, 1990 referendum. It is clear that occasionally referendums can work.

Let me highlight some parts of this agreement. The Haïda will be authorized to carry on specific cultural and traditional renewable resource harvesting activities. Commitments are made to encourage Haïda employment with the Canadian Parks Service and other economic opportunities associated with a national park reserve.

Following the aforementioned agreement, legislation was also required to authorize cultural activities and traditional renewable resource harvesting activities since harvesting of plants and animals is contrary to the National Parks Act unless specific amendments permit it. That is what Bill C-59 is all about.

Earlier on, the Haïda Nation was concerned with the wording of the bill when it was introduced for first reading in February. I have been informed they are now satisfied and that is crucial, as far as my party is concerned, with the amendments that have been proposed by the government. The final act will now reflect the agreement that was reached some years ago.

We can only deplore that it has taken so long to bring forth this bill and to fulfil the agreement that was reached with the Haïda Nation and with the Cree Band of Fort Chipewyan.

In these circumstances my party will support the bill as amended. My colleague later on will be expressing his views and other views from a slightly different perspective on this bill but within the context of our support.

I point out to the House how ironic it is that we stand up here giving all-party support to this bill on the day after the government announced its decision in the case of the Oldman dam.

The Oldman dam demonstrates the desperate need in this country for us to come up with a way and a policy of dealing with the environment and all aboriginal Canadians that is fair, by sitting down and discussing and negotiating, not by imposing, not by ducking and weaving and not by turning our backs on our very clear and strong fiduciary relationship.

Yesterday, this government, the Minister of the Environment and the Minister of Transport after having hidden, camouflaged and kept away from the Canadian people for over a week the review panel's report on the Oldman dam, finally brought it forth in a way that does not do the government credit. At the same time that they brought it forth, they clearly rejected the number one recommendation of the panel report. At the same time as they brought it forth, they refused to give us the full report until it was far too late and we had to make do with a summary.

The way in which this government has dealt with the Oldman dam, its refusal to put into place the means of mitigation, its refusal to deal with the illegal activity of the Alberta government, its refusal to deal honestly and fairly and squarely with the Peigan Band does not stand the government, or indeed the democratic process in this country, in good stead.

So, while my party rises today to support Bill C–59, while we are delighted that this is what we have in front of us, I must say that I do wish this country could come to the point where it deals with all aboriginal peoples on the same basis.

Let the agreement with the Cree of Fort Chipewyan and the Haïda stand as the model that we would look to. Let us hope that never again will we have a black mark on our history such as that which occurred yesterday in the case of the Oldman dam.

Madam Speaker, we support this bill as amended.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to speak on Bill C–59. It is a piece of legislation that has taken a long time to get here.

As someone who is often highly partisan in debate in this House, it is an occasion on which I do not feel there is any need to be partisan at all. We have heard from the Liberal member from LaSalle—Émard. We have heard from the minister's parliamentary secretary.

In relation to Gwaii Haanas, it is worth reflecting for a moment on a number of extremely non–partisan and highly Canadian events that have taken place.

This Chamber just more than five years ago passed the unanimous resolution to work with the Haïda Nation in setting aside South Moresby. The former Minister of the Environment, Tom McMillan, worked extraordinarily hard to make it become a reality. Canada's present Prime Minister did an extraordinarily good job in negotiating with the then premier of British Columbia, Bill Vander Zalm, and with the president of the Council of Haïda Nations, Miles Richardson, in bringing together the three levels of government: Canada, British Columbia and the Haïda Nation, and setting aside an area that more than three million Canadians had expressed interest in having set aside.

The Prime Minister's office received several hundred thousand letters from Quebec, Ontario, the western provinces, the territories and the maritimes. Support from all over the world was focused on this unique area, which, as other members have made clear, was recognized by the United Nations more than a decade ago in terms of Ninstints, a very small area down off the southern tip of the archipelago.

It really is a remarkable area, often called the Canadian Galapagos, that missed the last glaciation. It was one of the most heavily inhabited areas of the whole west coast of North America until very recent times. There were communities of several thousand throughout the Gwaii Haanas archipelago which regrettably were wiped out. The Haïda nation was almost entirely wiped out by measles and smallpox just 100 years ago.

It is significant that such an agreement was ultimately reached. I think it is probably the crowning environmental achievement of the present Prime Minister. I hope the present Minister of Environment will very soon find the opportunity to potlatch in relation to Gwaii Haanas, in relation to what is often called South Moresby National Park Reserve. It is very important that this matter be ultimately brought not only into being but also into a co–operative understanding between the two principal nations now involved: Canada and the Council of the Haïda Nation.

It is a tribute today to the minister and to those officials who have worked hard behind the scenes to get wording that has been found to be co–operatively acceptable between the Council of the Haïda Nation and Canada. It is also a tribute to the elders, to the chiefs, to Miles Richardson, to Guujaw and others who worked so long right until I understand one of the officials received a call from Miles this morning. I spoke to him at five this morning.

It is a piece of legislation that should be passed today. I am sure there are many members who want to speak on it, but the importance of passing it so that the agreement can in fact come into being should not be overlooked by any members of this House.

As many will remember, the agreement involved a substantial amount of money, $106 million, from Western Diversification. It is interesting that the forest companies have now been compensated. The loggers that were affected have been compensated. Over $12 million in just one part of the agreement has been spent for reforestation in a replacement fund for those areas removed from forest tenure. Regrettably, almost all of that has been spent off the Queen Charlotte Islands, not in Gwaii Haanas, not in areas that had been harvested, but rather in other areas of the tree farm licence.

It is urgently important that this be passed now. I understand there is goodwill in the House to get through as much of this bill as we can today so that it can go on to the other place for passage.

I have reviewed the wording that has been worked out between the Council of the Haïda Nation and officials of Justice Department and Environment Canada. I understand it is acceptable on all sides so that an appropriate amendment could take place today so that this can be put in place.

There should be no misunderstanding. The Council of the Haïda Nation went to great lengths more than two years ago in a binding referendum. An agreement was passed in relation to what we are doing today. That referendum agreement is running out of time. May 5 was the deadline that only by the grace of the Haïda has been extended to allow this debate to take place and for this bill to be passed.

The area is cherished by so many Canadians as a symbol. It may be an area that they will never get to, but it is an area that they recognize the importance of. It may well be withdrawn from this process if this legislation does not proceed.

There are other parts of the agreement that the government must now work very hard to get moving because the Government of Canada is in fact in violation of a number of areas of the 1987 agreement. In fact, it has been for some time, not only in terms of the actual expenditure schedules, but also in terms of other parts of the agreement.

There is an anticipation that $44 million will be transferred to the Gwaii trust. It was a promise made by the Prime Minister of Canada that funds would be made available and efforts would be made to redevelop the economy of the Queen Charlotte Islands from basically, a logging and forest based economy to one of world-class tourism. That has been a hollow promise so far. There is $6 million in the aid base for the visitor reception centres and for Gwaii Haanas for the summer, but the $44 million is still awaited. Sandspit has waited a long time for the Minister of Fisheries to live up to the small craft harbour agreement that was promised by Minister Siddon from British Columbia more than five years ago.

I agree that the price tag of $9 million sounds high and it may well be that the minister or ministers could involve themselves in finding some better economic engine for Moresby for the Sandspit area. There has been little political will exercised to get that going. I am certainly hopeful that after such a long, long road on this most important issue and one that has been most honourably pursued by the government, I must say, on almost all occasions that it will now be done this year.

Having said that, I just want to say again that the wording as proposed in the clause 1, page 2 amendments under the title: "Reserve for a National Park on the Gwaii Haanas Archipelago" has been reviewed. I spoke to the president of the Haïda nation this morning and confirmed that this wording is acceptable to the Haïda nation in order to implement. This is enabling legislation to allow for the agreement reached within the Haïda nation to be put into play.

The second part of this piece of legislation is in relation to Wood Buffalo National Park. As I am sure you are aware, Madam Speaker, the Minister of the Environment earlier this week had justice officials move forward with a consent judgment in the courts to halt logging in perpetuity in Wood Buffalo National Park, Canada's largest national park, a park similar to the Queen Charlotte Islands, similar to Gwaii Haanas and Ninstints as a world heritage site 10 years ago.

Part of this legislation, in terms of being an amendment to the National Parks Act, implements the 1986 Fort Chip as it is often called, Fort Chipewyan the full name, the Cree Band from there, their specific land claim which involves a two-square mile reserve inside the park boundaries. That will be excised from the park. I understand later today, if we complete the legislation, it will be transferred for a split second to the province of Alberta and a split second later it will be transferred to Canada where it will come under the protection of the Indian Act and revert to the ownership and obvious existing occupancy of the Fort Chip people.

The payment in terms of the specific claim includes $26.6 million and the transfer of 4,969 hectares of land outside the park. It also establishes what I consider to be a very important intergovernment instrument, which is a wildlife advisory board, which will provide for the permanent establishment of a board with four members appointed by the Cree Band, three by the Minister of the Environment with the superintendent of the parks sitting as an ex officio non-voting member. That board will establish a permit system for hunting, trapping, fishing of all various species to monitor any harvesting that goes on within about one-fifth of the park, an area of 8,869 square kilometres of the 44,800 square kilometres of the park.

Therefore, there will be an area within the park that has been recognized as the traditional hunting ground of these aboriginal people. This wildlife management board will have a process for identifying sustainable harvest levels of species that have been traditionally harvested. There will be an identified, designated membership of Cree hunters, trappers and fishers who will be operating within that area. This board will manage this traditional harvesting in a sustainable fashion within the largest of Canada's national parks systems. It is something that I think has encouraged debate among many conservation and wildlife groups in this country. I think it is now well enough understood that this nation was founded on three nations: the aboriginal people, who were the original occupants of Canada; the French; and the English. It is that ultimate recognition which is now recognized constitutionally that is being recognized in part through the legislation we are dealing with today.

I understand there have been both consultations and discussions with Fort Chipewyan and with the Cree. They not only support what has happened in terms of the specific land claim which occurred almost six years ago but also the legislation that we have today, which is to implement the wildlife management board, the territory that it will include, the permitting structure and the excise of this particular reserve land.

Within the schedules of this legislation one finds the description of the Gwaii Haanas Archipelago. In my consultations with officials and the parliamentary secretary this morning, I understand that this is the precise restatement of the designation and definition of lands in what is now often referred to as South Moresby, but now legislatively will be referred to as the Gwaii Haanas Archipelago. It is what is found in the 1987 agreement struck between the three nations almost five years ago and is therefore for legal purposes not to change any boundaries, so there should not be any concern that this legislation in schedule VI is in any way to add to or to subtract from what was agreed to after a very long and protracted and thankfully happy debate of many years ago.

My colleague from LaSalle—Émard touch on one other point that I think is worthy of the attention of the House today because of the way it occurred yesterday. That is in relation to the panel decision on the Oldman dam. This has been an extraordinarily long and hard fought environmental issue that has probably attracted the greatest focus other than the Grande Baleine project in the province of Quebec.

The issues are ones that are deeply felt in Alberta and in fact all across the country. A very small group of Albertans principally took this matter all the way to the Supreme Court of Canada. On January 23 of this year there was a unanimous ruling on most points from the highest court in Canada that there is an affirmative regulatory duty of federal ministers of the Crown in relation to projects such as the Oldman River dam and in particular, is binding on the Minister of Transport in his role with the Navigable Waters Protection Act.

In four months the Minister of Transport never lived up to the orders of the Supreme Court of Canada. Yesterday, regrettably, after the long awaited court ordered panel review of the Oldman River Dam, in the secrecy and darkness of the offices of the Minister of the Environment and the Minister of Transport they made a secretive decision to reject the conclusion reached by the expert panel, which is to decommission the dam.

Regrettably, I think the decision made by the ministers in secrecy yesterday, without ever letting the public see the panel report, will be the undoing of environmental assessment and Bill C-13 as it was passed and as it is presently before the other place.

The reason I say that is that there will no longer in my view be good reason for Canadians of good faith, aboriginal, environmental, conservation, engineering oriented or whatever to participate in a process where they know an anti-democratic and undemocratic end awaits them. In that process before the expert advice was ever made public so that the public could reflect upon it, two ministers, neither of whom claimed any engineering expertise, any hydrological expertise, any wildlife conservation expertise, any fisheries expertise, any aboriginal rights expertise, any archaeological expertise, no expertise at all, other than straight political chicanery, decided against the expert advice, five to one, of professional engineers, professional experts who heard hundreds of hours of evidence.

They reviewed over 126 written submissions, made probably one of the most difficult decisions of conscience they could possibly make in their own home province, which was to decommission a dam that had cost almost $500 million, had been to the highest court in Canada, had existed illegally contrary to the basic fundamental moral and legal tenets of that province and this country since its inception and went against it.

I predict, regrettably, that the Cree and others in Quebec will probably withdraw from the environmental assessment process of the Grande Baleine. I predict that many groups will withdraw should an EARP now proceed in relation to Kemano II in British Columbia. I suspect that the Tetzlaff brothers in the province of Saskatchewan are as appalled as anyone in this country that it could happen again in another province by the same ministers in relation to the same issues.

It is absolutely appalling on the brink of the earth summit in Rio that a minister from this country, who is going to be Canada's lead minister in Rio, would have taken such an anti-democratic, anti-environmental view of a project. The panelists made it absolutely clear that the economic benefits of the Oldman River dam were massively outweighed by the negative implications on aboriginal people, the Peigan people.

Milton Born with a Tooth was here speaking yesterday about his feelings on this issue. I can understand the emotional tenor that he brings to this debate after being so callously treated by the justice system and by the ministers responsible.

The issue is one of credibility of this institution if this institution is going to pass into law, new law to go beyond the 1984 cabinet guidelines order and expect Canadians in good faith to enter a process of compromise, to enter a process of assessment, to appear before an expert panel that would weigh as it did in this case the economic benefits for irrigation, for farmers in southern Alberta and for communities such as the Lethbridge water district and others in southern Alberta.

They weighed that, the cost of the dam, the cost of decommissioning against the phenomenal dangers of mercury poisoning for the fish in three river systems as a result of the empoundment of the water. All of the negative impacts on forest ecology, sacred sites, archeological sites were weighed. They came to one principled conclusion because 22 of their 23 recommendations dealt with mitigation issues that have never been dealt with by Alberta, and I predict never will be.

They have never been dealt with by Canada, and I predict never will be. Regrettably, the decision made by the Minister of Transport and the Minister of the Environment yesterday will stand as the darkest, blackest, sleaziest decision that was ever made on an environmental issue by a panel.

Therefore on Bill C-59, I am honoured that we finally have an opportunity to do this honourable thing today, prior to the referendum time running out with the Haïda in terms of Gwaii Haanas and also for Canada's largest national park, Wood Buffalo National Park, now that logging has halted and the rights of the First Nations, the aboriginal people, the Cree are recognized and passed in this legislation.

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Madam Speaker, I would like to start by congratulating the hon. member on having convinced the government to take this new initiative in his riding, which is not easy. In fact, we as members from Quebec approve of this government initiative, which was a joint effort.

I would also like to take this opportunity, at a time when we are right in the middle of a referendum debate, to make certain points and ask the hon. member to comment and perhaps explain his party's position on the points I intend to raise, including the fact that Quebec has far fewer national parks than the rest of Canada.

I would like to ask him whether he happens to know what percentage of national parks are located in Quebec, what the value is of the various national parks outside Quebec and those inside Quebec, and the consequences this may have.

While I was listening to the hon. member's speech, which was brilliant, and while I was listening to the parliamentary secretary to the minister, because the minister is off somewhere else while we are having this debate—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has been in the House for a number of years and I fail to see why he insists on commenting on the presence or absence of a member or minister in this House. I think there is really no excuse for that, since the Minister of State for the Environment and the parliamentary secretary are both in the House. I think this is an inappropriate attempt to make a fuss.

I will let the hon. member finish his question and give the hon. member for Skeena a chance to respond.

The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead.

Mr. Gérin: You are perfectly right, Madam Speaker. It is Friday and after a rather long week during which the government has been playing its procedural tricks, we overlooked certain rules. You are right and I am looking forward to seeing the minister in the House, in order to ask him some very specific questions.

Meanwhile, you are perfectly right, and I will put my question to the hon. member. If, as expected, Quebec's sovereignty becomes a fact, and I think it will, because those federal offers will never be made, I would like to ask him whether he agrees that the national park to be created in his riding or the territories that will be created and which have a certain value, should remain the property of British Columbia, and that this should be absolutely clear? Does he agree that the various assets located in the territory of the province of Quebec should remain, after Quebec has become sovereign, the property, in no uncertain terms, of the province of Quebec, without any obligation to pay compensation of any kind?

I would appreciate an answer to these two questions. And I again wish to congratulate him on this auspicious occasion. I have known the hon. member for a number of years. I know he has always had a passionate interest in the environment. He has been a member of practically every committee on the environment and has worked very hard. As a member of this House he is very dedicated to his province, to environmental issues and to his riding. He is an example to all members of this House.

[English]

Mr. Fulton: Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague and friend for the question. The issue that he raised first, in terms of the amount of land designated as what are called national parks in the province of Quebec, is a shame to this country. Less than one-third of 1 per cent of the land in the province of Quebec is designated as a national park.

I have looked into it a bit, and it has long puzzled me why so little effort has been made at the national level to achieve the kind of co-operation that there should have been over a long period of time for the designation of lands. Frankly, a considerable amount of the existing friction between the First Nations in Quebec, the Government of Canada, and the Government of Quebec is related to the lack of serious attention paid by Canada and the Government of Quebec to issues of title, in terms of First Nations, but also in terms of lands to be designated as parks.

Not only is this true of areas set aside and designated as national parks in Quebec, but as well Quebec has the second lowest level of all the provinces in terms of areas of provincial significance protected within the provincial parks system.

If we were to achieve what this House unanimously voted for just one year ago in June—a motion that I made and which was ultimately remade by the Minister of the Environment and the member for LaSalle—Émard—to set aside 12 per cent of Canada by the year 2000 our greatest single challenge would be in Quebec, despite having a Prime Minister from Quebec for 24 of the past 25 years. There has been no serious action to designate the areas of incredible beauty and incredible national, regional, and world-wide significance in that enormous and beautiful province.

I am glad my friend raised the issue of referenda because it is something that all members of this House should understand today. In May 1990 a national referendum was held on the issue of Gwaii Haanas among the Haïda nation. This was a difficult and divisive vote, one that pitted elders and ancient family traditions one against the other in relation to the designation of this area. It was an emotional and deeply rooted spiritual battle as deeply wounding and as deeply painful as the one presently going on in this country.

Referenda, for all of the good that can come from them, also carry inherent dangers because of the nature of the wording of a question on a very difficult issue. It is a challenge not easily met in the present legislation because it could pit one region against another, one province against another, one part of the country against another, and there is unlimited funding. There are major questions about the referendum process that I do not think have been seriously addressed by this House in the vault and pressure of time allocation and strangulation which the government has chosen on the referenda legislation.

On the issue of property that is designated as parks, national or provincial, I often remind myself when I look in my children's faces, and I encourage you to do the same, that property and lands belong to no one. Time will always pass it on to another generation.

Our greatest challenge in this country at this time is to remember that Quebec will never move anywhere. The geography, the land, the trees, the people, all of that will always remain there. That is why I was proud to be a member of the New Democratic Party when we voted as a party for the right of self-determination for Quebec.

I am proud of that. If the people of Quebec choose that road I will always be proud to be in Quebec, to be in this country, to be on this land and to be on this planet.

In terms of land for parks, as to whether it ever reverts to Ottawa or British Columbia, we will be hearing about our greatest single challenge if we listen to what is going on during this lead up to the earth summit, which is a few weeks from now.

People like Dr. Caldicott are telling us that we are into the last of a decade. Dr. Caldicott predicts that if we do not change what we are doing within the next eight years the major biological systems of this planet will collapse. The atmosphere will collapse, and the oceans of the world will collapse in terms of their productivity.

Our greatest challenge in this Chamber should be to find ways to protect 12 per cent of Canada, to find ways to get out of the fossil energy trap. The fossil energy consumption of this planet is the great trap. If you burn a gallon of gasoline it weighs eight pounds, then after it is burned you have 20 pounds of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere.

When you drive in a car you must think that it takes a large tree a whole year to take back out of the atmosphere the gallon of gasoline you burned as you drove 30 miles. We move blindly onward with all the crazy debates we have in this House about referenda, about what is happening with the Westray mine, and all these other things.

They are certainly important, but this Chamber so rarely pays attention to the great things we can do. One great, tiny thing we can do is viewed by every Canadian. Remember that several hundred thousand Quebecers wrote to this Chamber about South Moresby, about Gwaii Haanas to plead with this Chamber to set it aside. Three million letters came in. Some of the strongest support in Canada came from Quebec. I urge that this bill be passed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being eleven o'clock, we will now proceed to Statements by Members, pursuant to Standing Order 31. The hon. member for Bruce—Grey.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

SKOPJE

Mr. Gus Mitges (Bruce—Grey): Madam Speaker, the Skopje republic, formerly part of Yugoslavia, cannot count on recognition unless it abandons the name of Macedonia to which it has no ethnic, cultural or historical birthright.

There is only one Macedonia and that Macedonia is Greek. Skopje's insistence to include the word Macedonia in its name can only lead to instability and uncertainty and a point of friction for the whole Balkan area. At some point it could become very dangerous.

Skopjans should take an official stand on the issue and propose a new name for their state which does not include the name Macedonia.

In point of fact, the inclusion of the name Macedonia in the country of Skopje only traces back to the Second World War. Before then it was known as Santzakio Skopje and after the First World War as the province of Vardari.

Therefore, I call upon the government to hold back any recognition of Skopje until that country decrees that it will not use the name Macedonia.

NUCLEAR TESTING

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, I find it rather sad and interesting that the Secretary of State for External Affairs remains strangely silent after the Chinese government detonated a 1,000 kiloton nuclear bomb underground yesterday.

The sheer magnitude of the blast, the largest underground nuclear test ever conducted by the Chinese, is totally inappropriate in 1992.

This morning, I contacted the Chinese Ambassador and asked why China feels it is still necessary to prepare for war at a time when the risk of external threat has been reduced to its lowest point in 50 years. The Ambassador explained to me and I quote: "China is in favour of a complete prohibition of nuclear testing and the thorough destruction of all nuclear weapons".

The problem, the Ambassador explains, is that the other established nuclear powers also continue to test their weapons underground.

That is why it does not matter which country is toying with nuclear might. Canada must condemn all nuclear testing once and for all.

TRIBUTE TO PATRICK POULIN

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec–Est): Madam Speaker, today I want to pay tribute to a young hockey player from my riding, Patrick Poulin, of the Quebec Major Junior Hockey League. He has been a stand–out performer on the St. Hyacinthe Lasers and earned attention from the Hartford Whalers professional team.

That is why Patrick Poulin was duly recognized for his outstanding potential at the 10th anniversary Vanier Quebec sports and cultural gala, chaired by the likable Guy Lafleur, a well–known figure from professional hockey. During this ceremony, I was proud to note once again the tremendous potential of tomorrow's generation.

As members of this House, we must continue to recognize the determination and talent shown by our young people.

Therefore I am pleased to belong to a government that believes in today's youth and gives them all they need to develop fully. In that way, our society will be privileged to have among it other young people of the same calibre as Patrick Poulin.

GOVERNMENT POLICIES

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Madam Speaker, the government members have been going into a feeding frenzy over some tongue–in–cheek remarks of mine that were reported in the Hamilton Spectator a few weeks ago.

If they had read the article with more care, they would have noted that I said these comments were not New Democratic policy. They never have been and they never will be.

I spent much more of my time in Hamilton speaking on the serious topic of unemployment and the thousands of people who must apply for welfare for the first time in their lives as their UI benefits are either delayed or exhausted.

The government's economic policy is much more ludicrous than anything I could ever suggest. It is creating unemployment through high interest rates, a high dollar, free trade and the GST.

Why will members on the other side of the House not stop harping on one throw-away comment of mine and instead, pay some attention to the serious matters that confront Canadians.

CANCER TREATMENT

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of the House an issue that the Minister of National Health and Welfare is aware of and is doing nothing about.

Cancer patients require many forms of treatment and most should have this treatment within a two-week period. Some hospitals in Ontario have had to wait-list cancer patients beyond the two-week period. This situation is not acceptable.

The federal government has cut back in transfer payments for the provinces in the area of health care resulting in insufficient funding to our hospitals and cancer centres. It affects our hospitals that do not have enough radiology equipment nor enough technologists to run the equipment.

There are risks to the patients, to the caregivers, to the cancer centres, and to our health care system. I find it absolutely deplorable that consideration is being given by some centres to send patients into the U.S. for treatment, at what cost to our health care system and to the patient.

I ask the minister of health to immediately review these serious ramifications to his government's budget decisions. I have mentioned only one health care area. How many others are there?

NATIONAL ACCESS AWARENESS WEEK

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon—Souris): Madam Speaker, those of us who are fortunate often tend to forget that 13 per cent of Canadians in total, including 39 per cent of those who are 65 years of age or older, are disabled.

For this reason the establishment of June 1 to June 7, 1992 as National Access Awareness Week is exceedingly important, particularly in light of the fact that its purpose is to challenge all Canadians to create and support equal access which will enable persons with disabilities to participate fully in all aspects of life.

Whether it be a question of access to the workplace, to government offices, or to movie theatres, which can be a particular source of some difficulty, those with disabilities have rights which all too often have been ignored.

We have an obligation, both moral and otherwise, to ensure that this very basic need is met.

I congratulate those who are responsible for the implementation of National Access Awareness Week as they are doing their part to enhance national awareness on this important issue.

Madam Speaker, it is now up to the rest of us to ensure that concerns do indeed lead to action.

TAMMY DE SILVA

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, I want to draw to the attention of the House the case of Mrs. Tammy De Silva, a disabled woman from Winnipeg, who was abducted in February, 1992 by five Americans, including her estranged husband and two Chicago police officers.

Charges are to be laid momentarily by the Winnipeg police department and a Canada-wide warrant is to be issued. But this action is not enough.

I urge the Minister of Justice and the Secretary of State for External Affairs to ensure that extradition charges will be laid immediately against these five individuals in order to protect the rights of Canadians at home.

Without a true effort to bring these individuals to answer charges in the Canadian courts, a signal will be sent to foreigners who violate our sovereignty. It will be open season on Canadians.

This government must not allow our sovereignty to be eroded. I ask it to defend the rights of Tammy De Silva and all Canadians.

INTERNATIONAL HEART HEALTH CONFERENCE

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, the International Heart Health Conference will be held in Victoria from May 24 to May 28. The theme of the conference is "Bridging the Gap: Science and Policy in Action".

Organized jointly by the Heart and Stroke Foundation of Canada, Health and Welfare Canada and the British Columbia Ministry of Health, and co-sponsored by the World Health Organization, it is expected to attract 600 national and international delegates and feature Victoria declaration on heart health.

This conference will showcase the accomplishments of the Canadian heart health initiative in which all provincial departments of health are working together with Health and Welfare Canada to implement a national approach to the prevention and control of cardiovascular disease.

This conference is a landmark for cardiovascular disease prevention in Canada. It will set the future direction for policy and research agendas in heart health beyond the year 2000.

REFUGEES

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, the Government of Canada is misleading Canadians about its refugee determination program. The rate of acceptance of refugee candidates in Canada has been cut to 54 per cent for the past half year.

This was done by narrowing the legalistic interpretation of the word "refugee" and by harshly rejecting most humanitarian and compassionate claims that would have been accepted a year ago.

The government defends the program by saying that Canada accepts a higher proportion of claimants than any other country. That is not true.

Britain protects a far higher proportion than Canada. In 1989, Britain gave protection to 37 per cent of claimants under refugee status and 47 per cent under exceptional leave which leads to permanent residence. That is 80 per cent of claimants protected.

Canada needs to amend our system by giving full right of appeal against the many mistaken IRB decisions and by establishing clear rules and procedures for protection on humanitarian and compassionate grounds.

SILKEN LAUMANN

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Madam Speaker, millions of Canadians were dismayed to learn this week that Silken Laumann, a leader in Canada's quest for Olympic gold in Barcelona, suffered severe injuries in a rowing accident in Germany. Silken captured the hearts of Canadians at the 1991 world championships where she placed first in the single scull event. It was the first time a Canadian has ever brought that title home.

• (1110)

This achievement is just one of a long list of impressive accomplishments by Silken Laumann. She has served as a continuing source of fierce Canadian pride in international competition. Her dedication to the sport of rowing has provided inspiration for many young Canadian athletes.

Despite her serious injuries, her courageous spirit remains unbroken. Canadians are sure to see her return to the sport of rowing with a renewed vigour and a brilliant future.

I ask all members of this House to join me in expressing our best hopes and wishes for Silken's speedy recovery.

MACEDONIA

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Madam Speaker, the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs is preparing to visit Greece, Turkey and Cyprus. I strongly hope that she will be able to impress her Turkish colleagues and convince them that the time has come for Turkey to withdraw its occupation troops from Cyprus, where our Canadian troops have served so long with such style, intelligence, courage and patience under the aegis of the United Nations peacekeeping forces.

I also hope that she will have an opportunity during her visit to Greece to note the historical attachment of Greece to Macedonia's history. Macedonia has always been and will always be Greek. As they say, "Makidonia i Hellas."

Finally, no new geographical entity that is about to become a country can usurp the name "Macedonia" to obtain diplomatic recognition. The minister must reassure her Greek colleagues that Canada will not recognize this former Yugoslav entity if they use the word "Yugoslav".

To conclude, I ask her to offer our friends in Cyprus, the Greek and Turkish Cypriots, our best wishes for them together to make Cyprus an earthly paradise.

COMMONWEALTH WAR GRAVES COMMISSION

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, this month, the Commonwealth War Graves Commission is marking its 75th anniversary.

The duties of the War Graves Commission are to mark and maintain the graves of members of the Commonwealth forces killed in the two world wars.

Members of the House who have been on overseas pilgrimages can testify how well the commission fulfils these duties. So too can the many Canadians who each year visit the graves of loved ones. They can return home with the consolation of knowing that the graves of those who were killed far from Canada are being tended by caring hands.

Along with Australia, the United Kingdom, New Zealand, India and South Africa, Canada shares the cost of the Commonwealth War Graves Commission. It is money being well used.

I congratulate the Commonwealth War Graves Commission on 75 years of faithful service.

SILKEN LAUMANN

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I join with the hon. member for London—Middlesex in calling on the House to pay tribute to Silken Laumann.

Last Saturday, Silken was very seriously injured and possibly deprived of an opportunity to achieve that highest goal of athletes, an Olympic gold medal, in her event.

Silken trains and lives in Victoria. We are all very proud of her and wish her a quick and speedy recovery.

However, I have a concern about the highly unusual circumstances of this injury. She was injured when a German shell crashed into her. Her leg broke causing her great pain and difficulty.

The government should conduct a Canadian investigation to ensure that this was not an act of deliberate sabotage of this very fine Canadian athlete or was otherwise not a product of gross negligence by the organizers of that event.

ALLERGY AWARENESS MONTH

Mr. Gaby Larrivée (Joliette): Madam Speaker, let me bring to the attention of the House that the Allergy and Asthma Information Association has proclaimed May as Allergy Awareness Month.

The incidence of allergies is on the rise. Furthermore, the association estimates that about a third of Canadians suffer from some form of allergy. Allergies can strike at any age. They cost the health system hundreds of millions of dollars a year, which explains their great importance, and cause over 500 deaths a year, due mainly to asthma.

This year, emphasis will be put on hay fever. To survive the allergy season, the association recommends being well informed and avoiding allergens.

Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to pay tribute to this organization and I publicly support Allergy Awareness Month.

I would also like to point out the efforts of the Lanaudière community health department and especially Dr. Suzanne Fortin.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, but time is up. The hon. member for Longueuil now has the floor.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Madam Speaker, in 1989, I made a study of research and development contracts awarded by the federal government in the provinces. I found that at the time, the federal government spent $1.2 billion more in Ontario than in Quebec.

The government appointed a departmental committee to analyse the problem. Today, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources sent me some information. I noticed that 20 businesses were subsidized across Canada but none from Quebec.

My conclusion is, of course, that there have been no changes in policy to benefit Quebec. The government talks about technology and prosperity, but as far as developing prosperity and technology is concerned, Quebec apparently does not exist.

There have been no changes in the past three years, and the situation is still the same.

RETAIL SALES

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, retail sales figures came out this week and they indicate a decrease of .04 per cent for March. This follows two months of no growth.

Bargain Harolds, Jack Frasers, George Richards, Marks and Spencer are all retailers which are either out of business or experiencing difficulty. Today's statistics give retailers little reason for optimism. This government's dogmatic policy of relying on low inflation and low interest rates is not enough.

When is this government going to do something to stop the haemorrhaging of the retail sector? When will the government take some solid action to get our stagnant economy moving again?

The government must realize that an infrastructure program would not only be a much-needed boost to the economy, but it would also be a much-needed investment in our long-term competitiveness.

How many more retail businesses and retail jobs will be lost before this government takes some action?

Oral Questions

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

WESTRAY COAL MINE

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. On Wednesday, May 20, 1992 in Hansard the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism, when asked questions in regard to the role of the Government of Canada on safety issues at the Westray coal mine said:

> In fact, that regime was being complied with regularly in all its particulars by the mine and confirmed by the Bank of Nova Scotia which regularly monitored it month by month through independent mining consultants.

Could the Deputy Prime Minister inform the House whether or not he stands by that statement by the hon. minister?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, we have a statement from the independent mining consultant who is quoted in The Daily News of Halifax and I will quote:

> "I will concur that as late as March, I believe we had confirmed independently with the Nova Scotia Department of Labour and (Natural Resources) that they (Curragh) were in complete compliance with the current statutes, and that answer was provided and passed on to the bank," he said.
> McCandlish said his firm's primary role was to monitor the levels and cost of coal production.

He also assured that the mine was in compliance with provincial regulations. This is his statement yesterday.

As you know, Madam Speaker, as the federal government we have no responsibility over provincial regulations. Provincial regulations are to be monitored and regulated by the province, but we did receive these regular reports from the independent mining consultants, as you can see from this quote, as late as March.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, that is rather strange because the consulting firm, which was hired by the Bank of Nova Scotia to monitor the loan agreement, says it was not asked to conduct independent safety inspections at the Westray mine and in fact, the Associated Mining Consultants was reported to have said in the newspapers today: "We didn't independently check any safety conditions".

My question for the minister is this. Will the minister now come clean with the House of Commons and tell us exactly what has transpired in this particular incident? Were there safety reports? If there were, where are they?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows, and he has been told this the last three days, and he knows it without being told, that the whole regime for regulating provincial compliance with safety regulations is put in place by the province. The judicial inquiry will inquire into all those questions.

• (1120)

The federal government's role was a very limited one. We simply guaranteed a loan. We assured ourselves that we received certificates of compliance from the bank, which received them from the independent mining consultants on a monthly basis, that the mine was complying with provincial statutes. That is something we asked for and we got them on a regular basis, to show that they were in compliance with provincial statutes. These were certificates which we received on a regular basis.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, on Wednesday and Thursday of this week this minister said in this House repeatedly, almost 11 or 12 times, that he had independent reports in regard to safety which the government was getting through the auspices of the Bank of Nova Scotia. We now have a senior official who has said; "We did not independently check any safety conditions".

Why does this minister not come clean and produce those documents so that all members of Parliament, and the general public, will have all of the knowledge in regard to the safety conditions at the Westray coal mine?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): We have made it clear that we are assembling all the documentation and will be bringing it before the House and before the public. The documentation is voluminous. It is into the thousands of pages but we are making good progress with that and we will be bringing forward all this documentation very shortly.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, the minister stood in his place and no fewer than seven times yesterday and seven times the day before said that the government received "independent mining consultant reports about safety at Westray". We are now being told that they did not receive these independent mining reports.

He also said and I quote: "We informed ourselves on a regular basis that this contract was in compliance". He is now saying that this was not done.

He said that the $85 million loan guarantee was given on the basis that safety would be maintained. We now see that the government did not care one bit about the safety of the Westray mine.

Why did the government say it received the independent consultants' reports when it did not? Even more reprehensible, why did the government try to give the impression that it did receive them when it did not?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Well, Madam Speaker, even more reprehensible is the hon. member's allegation that the federal government did not receive certificates of compliance from independent mining consultants month by month. We did receive such documents and those are going to be laid before the House together with all the documentation on this issue.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, what the minister said was "independent consultants' reports", over and over again. This is what the minister said yesterday, and I quote him once again: "The Prime Minister made it clear that this particular mine is regulated as to its safety and health regimes." But when the Prime Minister was asked in Washington whether anyone raised safety issues with him, he said: "Of course not, of course not."

I want to ask the minister which is the correct version, or did the minister make a mistake about that, too?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): I am surprised at the hon. member, Madam Speaker, because he is purposely confusing two things.

The Prime Minister was asked in Washington about a Devco report of 1987 and whether the question of safety was raised. He said it was briefly raised in the Devco report. Devco, of course, was concerned about Westray because it might have taken some of Devco's market share. There was a brief reference to safety, but this was three years before the mine was even started. When the mine was put in place it accommodated those safety concerns.

What the Prime Minister was talking about is that this is over-all an economic or business decision for the Government of Canada and not a safety decision. In fact, the Devco report of 1987 emphasized almost entirely nothing but business questions. That is what he was talking about.

OLDMAN DAM

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

Experts appointed by this government just spent over a year examining the impact of the Oldman River dam project. After hearing witnesses and other experts, their conclusion is that the dam should not be used, but the government has rejected their conclusion.

I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister. How can the public be expected to trust a government that talks about protecting the environment but simply refuses to listen to its own experts?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I think the leader of the New Democratic Party should give the public the correct information. In the report submitted yesterday, the commission recommended that if its first option was not acceptable, the dam could be maintained, provided certain recommendations were implemented. The government responded favourably to 22 of the 23 recommendations contained in the report. I think this shows the government is anxious to protect the interests of all concerned.

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister.

The report says, and I quote: "The dam should be decommissioned". That was the panel's first recommendation: decommission the dam. This recommendation was made very clearly in this report as their first preference.

My question for the minister is this. This group of experts, chosen by this government, have stated that the consequences of the project impose substantial environmental, social and economic costs and particularly is critical of the unfair treatment of the Peigan Band, of the serious environmental consequences and the minimal economic returns. Why has the minister and his government chosen to ignore the primary recommendation of the panel of experts chosen by this government itself?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the truth is in the report itself. I do not know if the leader of the NDP has had a chance to read the report. For her information I will refer her to page 6 where the panel, first of all, mentioned that it has examined the possibility of recommending the dismantling of the dam.

It states: "An extreme option for resolving the problem would be to dismantle the dam. The panel thinks that this would be an inappropriate use of government funds."

It goes on to say: "The panel's preferred recommendation is to decommission the dam by opening the low-level diversion tunnels and permitting unimpeded flow of the river. However, the panel recognizes that this option may cause insurmountable inter-jurisdictional difficulties. Consequently the panel also presents a secondary set of recommendations directed toward minimizing the environmental and social economic impacts of the dam if it were to be operated".

We have accepted that recommendation with the 22 other recommendations contained in this report.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): A supplementary question, Madam Speaker.

The report clearly says that the panel concludes, and I quote: "that environmental, social and economic costs of the project are not balanced by corresponding benefits and finds that as presently configured the project is unacceptable". No matter how the minister wants to portray this, this government has chosen to ignore a panel of experts.

I ask the minister again, why would the public have any faith in any environmental process that this government undertakes when it refuses to listen to its own hand–picked experts? What confidence can he expect the public to have, whether it is aboriginal people or other groups, in the process of this government?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, again I believe this is a perfect case of selective interpretation of a report. Again on page 6 of the same report, the panel's "less preferred second recommendation is offered because the proponent has shown some efforts at mitigation and because acceptance of the first recommendation may lead to insurmountable inter–jurisdictional conflicts".

• (1130)

The chairman of the panel said on national TV last night that this is a recommendation that is pragmatic because it is enforceable as the other would probably not be enforceable.

WESTRAY MINE

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

The premier of Nova Scotia has publicly stated that he asked the Prime Minister of Canada to intervene to keep the Westray proposal alive. The premier said: "There is no question I expressed my concerns to the Prime Minister. There is no question that I made representations to him".

There is no question that the Prime Minister of Canada himself was intimately involved in the approval of this project. I ask the Deputy Prime Minister: what was the Prime Minister's role? What did the Prime Minister of Canada do to see this project through?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is overlooking the fact that public spokesmen, leaders at the municipal level, provincial level, members of Parliament, many people were interested in economic development in that part of Nova Scotia.

Stellarton area had high unemployment. The whole region of Central Nova had high unemployment. We believe in regional economic development and so does the province. This particular project, which was going to contribute directly 240 jobs and a multiplier that could be two, three or four times that is a very, very important regional economic development instrument.

Therefore, many municipal leaders, many wardens and mayors came forward and supported this project. It is not unusual that they do because of the economic strength that this particular project could bring to the region.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is again to the Deputy Prime Minister.

We are not talking about a municipal politician. We are not talking about company representatives. We are talking about the involvement of the Prime Minister of Canada in the approval of this project.

Wednesday, May 20 in the Nova Scotia legislature, Premier Donald Cameron stated: "What the Prime Minister did after I spoke to him, you would have to ask him. I cannot answer for the Prime Minister".

In the absence of the Prime Minister, I once again ask the Deputy Prime Minister: what was the response? What role did the Prime Minister of Canada play in the Westray mine decision?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, the hon. gentleman does not like the fact that there was a mine begun in Pictou country. He is not alone. There are a number of people from Cape Breton who felt the same way.

Let me tell you who agreed with the development of this particular regional economic development project: Hank Dunnewold, the warden of the municipality of Pictou County.

There was Barry Trenholm, mayor of the town of Trenton; Ronald Marks, mayor of the town of Stellarton, and in a letter to the Prime Minister: D. Hugh MacGregor, chairman of the Pictou County Research and Development Commission; Dan Currie, mayor of the township of Pictou; Clarence Porter, ex–mayor of the town of Stellarton; Mary Daley, mayor of the town of Westphal; J. H. MacLean, mayor of the town of New Glasgow.

This was a very supported project by municipal leaders in that area.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Madam Speaker, the minister can skate all he wants. The Prime Minister had an intimate involvement in this project.

I want to put a question to the Deputy Prime Minister. Given that intimate involvement by the Prime Minister, he must have known that this was the most dangerous coal seam in North America. Will the Deputy Prime Minister tell us about the people whom the Prime Minister so quickly embraced, what was the extent of their experience in driving an underground coal mine, in operating an underground coal mine?

Did the Prime Minister even have that information before he decided to fast track the project?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I notice the hon. member is wearing running shoes today. If he calls three years fast tracking, then he is a pretty slow runner.

This project in fact took over three years to put in place. Thousands and thousands of pages of documentation and contractual agreements had to be worked through. It frankly took a considerable amount of time to put in place to the acceptability of the province and of course to Westray, the banks and ourselves a proper contractual arrangement for the beginning of this mine.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Madam Speaker, the minister makes my point beautifully for me. Sure it took three years but I put it to him that he should check. It took a lot less than three years after the premier called the Prime Minister.

The Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism is having an awful time getting his lines straight on this one. Everything he has said so far has been contradicted by respected, knowledgeable people, people in the know, responsible people.

The Deputy Prime Minister this morning, given now a total I think of eight opportunities, just sits there. I want to ask him: why the stonewalling on this one?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I cannot think of one instance in the last three days where anything I have said has been contradicted by anybody in the know.

We have allegations from hon. members opposite but allegations are not clear refutations, they are just allegations. Yesterday, in fact, we had a statement from the independent mining consultants confirming still further what I have already said.

What the hon. member should know, if he has got concerns about this tragedy and we all do, is he must direct his attention to the commission of inquiry in Nova Scotia where all of these matters will be looked at properly. I have made it clear we are going to be not only open with that commission of inquiry but co-operative as well.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Before I recognize the next member it would be helpful if members would make an effort and not impute motives at this time.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism.

In April 1991, Alan Craven, an engineering consultant for Associated Mining Consultants and the Bank of Nova Scotia, said:

> That the construction of the Westray coal mine was one of the most rapid he had ever seen. It is extremely fast to achieve an underground mine in 10 months. Normally you are talking years instead of months.

Considering the excessive speed of this mine construction raised by this consultant in April 1991, a year ago, and in view of the federal government's and the minister of energy's awareness as early as 1988 that this coal seam was a high-risk venture in terms of safety, why did the federal government not exercise greater direct scrutiny over safety developments rather than relying on the loans office of the Bank of Nova Scotia to do its job for it?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, we have no jurisdiction over matters of that sort. This is a provincial jurisdiction.

Yesterday we had a major constitutional discussion between the provinces and the federal government. Different levels of government have different levels of responsibility.

The monitoring, inspecting, all of that was the responsibility of two departments, the Department of Labour and the Department of Mines and Energy in the province of Nova Scotia. Therefore something went wrong. The hon. member is quite right. Something went wrong. What went wrong? The commission of inquiry in Nova Scotia is going to help us find out what that is.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, the minister has obviously been in office too long. He has forgotten how to ask questions. That is all he had to do.

The minister has made repeated references to receiving regular safety reports from his independent mining consultants or the consultants of the Bank of Nova Scotia. In today's Halifax The Daily News, Keith McCandlish, who is a geologist with Associated Mining Consultants in Calgary, said his firm wrote 18 reports for the bank between August 1990 and May 1992. As a courtesy he said: "Five of them were passed along to the federal Department of Industry, Science and Technology as a courtesy. Our function was not to monitor safety on a direct basis".

Who is telling the truth here? The minister or the consultants who performed and reported the inspections? Come clean.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I can help the hon. member with his question if he will listen carefully.

The job of the independent mining consultants was to make sure we received on a regular basis certificates of compliance, that we knew that this mine and that Curragh were complying with provincial statutes and regulations.

• (1140)

That was part of the monthly certifications we received from the independent mining consultants. In fact it was confirmed today in the very quotation that the hon. member makes. The day to day inspections of this mine was the job of the province of Nova Scotia through its inspectors, through its two government departments. That is what the committee of inquiry is looking into.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

We all heard the President of the United States say yesterday that he was just a phone call away from the Prime Minister on trade disputes.

I would like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister: did the phone go dead on Honda? Did the phone go dead on softwood lumber? Did the phone go dead on magnesium? Why is it that the only thing the Prime Minister came away with from Washington was a ringing endorsement from Dan Quayle?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I think if my hon. friend read the press reports in Washington as well as here, she would understand that the Prime Minister had a very effective meeting with the President of the United States. The matter of the trade disputes that are there between us is going to be handled very effectively in the future.

We have had some difficulties. That is one of the reasons why the Prime Minister has raised these matters with the President. The conclusion we have seen from this meeting is that those matters will be handled more effectively in the future by the United States.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, I did hear the press reports and I heard the President and the Prime Minister being compared to the fathers of free trade.

For my part, I would like to say that if they are the fathers of free trade, I would rather be the child of Murphy Brown.

[Translation]

I have not heard the Prime Minister state that the American government will abandon its action on Honda automobiles, that it will abandon its action on softwood lumber, that it will abandon its action on magnesium.

What did the Prime Minister really accomplish in Washington during his visit? Was it nothing else but a photo opportunity?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, this was not, as my hon. friend has alleged, a publicity stunt.

At the luncheon meeting the Prime Minister had with the President in attendance were the Secretary of State, Jim Baker, and the U.S. trade representative, Carla Hills, two key people in the management of the relationship between the United States and Canada.

These matters, the ones she has referred to, have been discussed. But there is a certain element of process that must be followed in these matters, whether we are managing them or whether the United States is managing them.

What has become very clear as a result of the meeting between the President and the Prime Minister is that the attention of the President and the senior members of his cabinet will be engaged at all times in the management of these issues.

CANADA–U.S. FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, yesterday, the Minister of Finance in the Conservative Government of Manitoba said that the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement is a failure, the cause of massive unemployment and that the federal government deliberately misled Canadians in 1988 in selling the free trade agreement as a panacea.

I want to ask the Minister for International Trade instead of spending time cavorting with Dan Quayle, should not this government be listening to the serious condemnation being made by senior ministers of its own party about the failure of the free trade deal? Will it not understand that it is now time to renegotiate that deal?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I think that if my hon. friend looked at the facts he would see that last Wednesday, or was it Thursday of this week, there was an announcement of trade statistics which demonstrated that exports to the United States were at record levels.

We have seen an increase in exports to the United States of some 5 per cent at a time when the United States is in a recession. We have been increasing our market share during that same period because exports into the United States from other countries have been declining. This demonstrates that companies in Canada are competitive and that the increased exports are being translated into increased jobs in Canada at a time when we are going through a difficult time in our economy.

An hon. member: When?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): My hon friend asks: "When". If he could add he would see that there is an increase of $5 billion to $6 billion in exports from Canada into the United States. That translates into some 75,000 or 80,000 jobs.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, the minister talks about facts. Well, these are the facts. Since the signing of the free trade agreement Canada's industrial production has declined substantially relative to every other G–7 country. That is from his own agency, Statistics Canada.

Another fact is that Canada has lost 23 per cent of its manufacturing jobs compared to 6 per cent in the United States. The toughest fact of all is that there are a million and a half Canadians unemployed.

If the Minister of Finance in the province of Manitoba, a good Tory, can understand the drastic decline of Canadian production as a result of the free trade agreement, why can't this minister and why can't he start doing the honest thing by listening to Canadians and renegotiating the deal?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, let me just draw my friend's attention to the Peter Cook column in today's edition of The Globe and Mail where he comments on this very point. Let me quote one thing: "Under Mr. Chrétien we would have a prostrate Canada pleading its case".

My hon. friend says: "Yes, we are going to go down there beating ourselves on the chest and we are going to renegotiate that deal". What is the hon. member going to give up? Renegotiation is not a one–way street. If he is going to ask the United States to give up something, what is he going to offer in return?

Let me just quote two figures. Since January 1989 merchandise exports are up 12.3 per cent. Since the implementation of the FTA merchandise imports from the United States are up 6.2 per cent.

Who has been the winner? Canada has been the winner.

TOBACCO

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue.

A study released today in the British medical journal, The Lancet, shows that 250 million of the world's population will die from tobacco smoke. In Canada this will be 48,000 persons a year, our largest single cause of death by far.

Yet since April, when the government caved in to the tobacco manufacturers and removed the export tax on cigarettes, cigarette exports are up 37 per cent and cigarette tobacco exports are up 450 per cent according to Statistics Canada.

Since fully 80 per cent of these exports are smuggled back into Canada, how can the government still claim that its new cigarette smuggling policy is more effective than the export tax it replaced?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, the government continues to be committed to the national strategy for reduced tobacco use. We in this government do not need to take a lesson from anybody, least of all from the hon. member, to reduce tobacco product smoking in this country, particularly for young people.

Mr. Karpoff: You caved in.

Mr. Jelinek: Our policy continues to be anti-smoking. We will continue to do everything and lead the world in that regard.

As far as the specific question is concerned, the hon. member says we caved in to the tobacco manufacturers. He knows full well that it was the other way around, that we have been trying for years to get the tobacco manufacturers to the table to give us the things that would allow our law enforcement officers to track exported tobacco products so that we could ascertain who the smugglers are, get to the root of the problem, and make sure that we will reduce smuggling and therefore reduce smoking of tobacco products in this country.

He is right that 80 per cent of cigarettes exported are smuggled back into Canada. That is why we have taken these positive steps with tobacco manufacturers. The co-operation is going to lead toward the reduction of tobacco-smuggled products into Canada.

• (1150)

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

The minister knows that these dramatic increases in cigarette smuggling undermine Canadian small business, cost the federal and provincial government substantial revenues, and threaten the Canadian anti-smoking effort.

In light of the extensive investigation by The Toronto Globe and Mail which appeared today, why does the minister still claim, as he did in April, that this government did not cave in to the tobacco lobbyists? Why do friends of the Prime Minister, such as Bill Neville, have such a negative influence on Canadian health policy?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, the hon. member just cannot get it through his thick head that the agreement—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sure everyone would appreciate it if the hon. minister would find another way of expressing himself.

Mr. Jelinek: The hon. member just cannot seem to understand that the agreement we have reached with the tobacco manufacturers, in conjunction with the RCMP and other law enforcement organizations, is going to go a long way toward the elimination or reduction of smuggling tobacco products into Canada.

This is not a smoking issue. It is not even a health issue at this time. We are committed to reduced tobacco smoking in this country. What we have to do is put a major dent in the amount of tobacco that is smuggled back into Canada.

What we agreed with the tobacco manufacturers will allow law enforcement officers, agencies and Revenue Canada to do exactly that for the benefit of all Canadians.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Madam Speaker, Pearson International Airport in Toronto handles one-third of Canada's airline passenger traffic and 40 per cent of its international and national air freight.

Modern, efficient facilities are required, not just for Torontonians but for those in my city and indeed dozens of other communities. The government has recognized this. It has announced plans to build three new runways and to have the private sector modernize and manage terminals 1 and 2.

I would like to ask the Minister of Transport to reaffirm the government's commitments. Specifically will the minister assure the House, subject to the report of the environmental panel, that the three new runways will continue to be a high priority and that the competition to redevelop terminals 1 and 2 with a promise of thousands of badly needed construction jobs at no cost to the Canadian taxpayer will move forward?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased that the member has asked this question. It gives me the opportunity to reaffirm my commitment to making sure that the future success of Pearson International Airport continues to grow. It is the same concern we have with all airports in Canada.

We are awaiting the report of the EARP panel on the runways and decisions will have to be made at that time. In the meantime I would like to reassure the member that the future of Pearson airport is in good hands.

CANADA POST

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for Canada Post. Yesterday Canada Post announced the elimination of over 200 jobs in 85 communities across Canada.

Why does it make sense to the minister to eliminate jobs in small town Canada and send mail hundreds of miles away to be sorted, only to be returned to a few blocks from where it started?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the hon. member's party along with every other party in the House said to Canada Post in 1981 when we made it a Crown corporation: "Go out and act like a business. Look at new technologies, improve your efficiency and improve service". That is what Canada Post is doing.

If the hon. member thinks that Canada Post should go back to sorting by hand and using the distribution techniques that were quite proper 40 or 50 years ago, he is alone in that view. In my view we should be applauding Canada Post for being a leader in Canada in seeking efficiency, improved delivery and at a cost that is second to only one in the rest of the world.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): No, Madam Speaker, I do not intend to applaud Canada Post for firing hundreds of workers. If the minister wants to do that, so be it.

[Translation]

I wish to ask a question to the minister. According to section 60 of the Financial Administration Act, he and this government have the authority to give instructions to Canada Post. Is he willing, today, to give such an instruction to Canada Post in order to stop all cuts pending an independent evaluation of the new system, which I predict will be ludicrous?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is misinforming the House when he says that employees are being fired. The employees are not being fired. He knows that. Positions are being affected. That is different.

Mr. Boudria: Oh.

Mr. Andre: If the hon. member would stop barracking from his seat, I could answer him.

The reality is that Canada Post has the most generous job security program of any company in the country. The hon. member knows that. No one will be fired. No individual is going to be displaced or financially disadvantaged.

What will happen is Canada Post will continue to make progress on its efficiency, on its delivery service, on its on-time delivery, and will continue to be a major contributor to the economic growth of this country.

The hon. member knows that. At some point in time I hope he will show the political fairness to acknowledge that.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

The government's ducking and weaving on the issue of the Oldman dam has caused farmers in southern Alberta great pain, the taxpayers of the country unnecessary costs, and it has shredded whatever credibility this government might have had left in terms of protection of the environment.

Recommendation No. 5 of the review panel's report deals with the failure to mitigate environmental consequences and the need to reach agreement with the Peigan band.

Does the government accept recommendation No. 5? If not, why not? If it does, how can it allow any build-up of water behind the dam until both conditions have been resolved satisfactorily?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I was hoping that the member for LaSalle-Émard would have understood the answer to a preceding question put by the leader of the NPD and which was on the same subject.

The commission presented its report yesterday, and I do not know if the member has had the opportunity to take a look at it. The report recommends, among other things, the introduction of dress and agreement measures between the parties in order to maintain the dam open. The report contains 23 recommendations. We have rejected one, the very first one in fact, which would have the effect of eliminating all together the use of the dam. All other recommendations were retained, and we will ensure that they are implemented. That shows our interest in the environment.

[English]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Madam Speaker, yesterday, the federal environment minister placed all the blame for the mess at Oldman on the lack of co-operation from the Government of Alberta. At the same time the minister who has just answered, the Minister of Transport, said that the federal government rejected the review panel's prime recommendation because, he alluded, the federal government was afraid to do battle with Alberta.

If the federal government is not prepared to stand up for its own jurisdiction in cases where it publicly condemns the illegal actions of a provincial proponent, when in Heaven's name is it prepared to act?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I hope this attempt on the part of the member for LaSalle—Émard to mislead people is unintentional because, in fact what the commission says, what it recommends is to close down the dam by opening internal diversion tunnels, and to let the river flow freely.

However, the commission, and not the government, recognizes that this option can create enormous jurisdictional conflicts. Consequently, the commission presents a second set of recommendations in order to minimize the social, economic, and environmental impact if the dam is operated. We have accepted this recommendation along with the 20 others which are part of this excellent report.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, in view of the unavailability of the Minister of Agriculture, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Saskatchewan farm families have debt problems unlike those in any other province, yet the agricultural minister said Wednesday that he would instruct the Farm Credit Corporation not to obey any legislation by the province of Saskatchewan that would require lending institutions to lease foreclosed land back to the original owner for six years.

This is a recommendation that was made by a committee of lenders, academics and farmers, including the Saskatchewan credit unions, the Canadian Bankers Association and FCC itself. There has been no complaint by either the banks or the credit unions. Why is the government playing politics?

Is this the position of the federal government and if it is, why is it refusing to protect farm families from foreclosure?

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I want to indicate to the hon. member that the present Farm Debt Review Board has worked well for the last five years. It is a plan that is set up for all producers and farmers across Canada facing difficulty. To offer one province a different program would not be fair to the producers in the rest of Canada.

THE DISABLED

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for the status of disabled persons. It concerns his omnibus bill, Bill C-78.

Disability groups were expecting this omnibus bill to contain amendments to the Immigration Act, Broadcast Act and the Evidence Act. It does not.

More than anything Canadians with disabilities are looking for timetables, deadlines and enforcement mechanisms in this bill. Instead they get promises of more review, more consultation and more delay.

Would the minister at least agree to develop some timetables for accessibility in such key areas as transportation?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): Madam Speaker, my colleague opposite well knows that first, the contents of the bill were derived largely from the consultations that we had with the community.

Second, the community is very favourable to the bill. Third, the community required a number of minor amendments that we are looking at right now and to which I will most likely agree. We expect to be able to go forward.

On the specific issue of immigration that the member raised, it was felt that from a technical point of view it was more expeditious to deal with that in the upcoming review of the Immigration Act which should be tabled in this House very shortly. We have a commitment to that effect.

PRIVILEGE

QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): With due respect, Madam Speaker, today the government side of the House had, I believe, at least two questioners. We had one question allowed on this side of the House today. I am concerned because we are here to represent our constituents. I had a very important question for the Minister of Environment. Do we have to sit on the opposition side of the House to ask a question of the government?

During Question Period today each and every one of the opposition members had supplementals, at our expense, and in some cases they were not deserved.

Madam Speaker, I am attempting to represent my constituents and when I am not allowed to get on my feet and ask the question I feel it is a violation of my privileges as a member of this House. This has occurred more than once.

Madam Speaker, if you consistently go through that list, as you do every day, you will find that we are not getting our fair share of questions on this side of the House. In many cases what we have to say, the questions that we ask, are just as important as the questions asked by opposition members in this House.

An hon. member: More important.

Mr. Thompson: I believe that this whole process has to be reviewed, giving members on this side of the House equal opportunity to ask questions.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): On the same point of order, Madam Speaker. When I sat on that side, almost in the same seat, and I had a question for a minister, I just went up to the minister and asked him. I suggest the hon. member do the same.

[Translation]

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Madam Speaker, we asked to be allowed to put a question today. We had come to an agreement with the Chair giving us the opportunity to ask three questions per week, but we managed only one this week, and we were not allowed one today on a subject as important as research and development where Quebec is totally neglected by the federal government as far as technology and prosperity is concerned.

Madam Speaker, I think you are not being fair or you are unaware of our agreement and you should talk to the Speaker who will confirm that we have been given the opportunity to ask three questions each week. I think this is unfair to the Bloc Quebecois.

[English]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Madam Speaker, I rise on the same point to support certainly one part of the member's contention, not all of it but one part of it. I too for the last couple of weeks have been trying to find the Minister of the Environment in order to ask him a question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I see that we have now had something from each side of the House, on what was not a question of privilege. The hon. member who raised the question did not see fit to wait and see what I would say about it, and of course it was not a question of privilege. I realize that it is sometimes frustrating, but there are only 45 minutes during Question Period and today we had 19 questions. I think it is a fair number of questions.

[Translation]

As to the remark made by the hon. member for Longueuil, I would ask him to rephrase it in a way which does not question the fairness of the Chair. I do not think that anyone, at this time—not me anyway—can be accused of being unfair toward the hon. member. He was recognized for a Standing Order 31 statement this morning and, as he can see, other members also wished to ask questions, but it was impossible to recognize everybody in the 45 minutes we had.

I would appreciate it if the hon. member would admit that he did not really mean what he said, then we could go on with the rest of Routine Proceedings.

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): Madam Speaker, I did not say you had been unfair to me or to the Bloc Quebecois. I said you should ask the Speaker, the supreme authority in this House, about our agreement giving us the opportunity to ask three questions per week. We were allowed only one this week. I asked whether you had been properly informed by your boss, the Speaker of the House.

I repeat, this week the Bloc Quebecois was not treated fairly, but I am not accusing you.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am grateful to the hon. member for this clarification. However, I think he should also realize that the Chair cannot do everything and can only recognize one member at a time in the 45 minutes reserved for Question Period.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, pursuant to section 36(8) of the Standing Orders, I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to 16 petitions.

[Editor's Note: See Today's Votes and Proceedings.]

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Next are ministerial statements.

Mr. Gérin: There is not a single minister. They all left.

• (1210)

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead is saying things which are out of place in the House. He knows it perfectly well; he admitted it himself barely an hour ago. I hope he will regain his memory and remember that alluding to who is or is not in the House is contrary to our rules. The hon. member for Shefford has the floor.

Mr. Jean Lapierre: Madam Speaker, I know that one is not supposed to mention that a given minister is not in the House. But I thought it was customary to be able to say that there was no minister present in the House since there should always be at least one or two of them. That is what this is all about and I would like you to give me some clarification on this point, Madam Speaker. I have always been under the impression that there should be one or two government members present in the House in order to prove that the House is not sitting just for the fun of it.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do not think that under normal circumstances the House sits just for the fun of it. I think that it is when we get bogged down in slightly touchy and tedious issues that we give the impression that that is the case.

Mr. Gérin: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, on a point of order.

Mr. Gérin: Madam Speaker, I have been listening to your comments regarding my case. I also listened to the remarks made by my friend, the member for Shefford, as well as your answer to him. Nonetheless, I would like to have some more definite clarification from the Chair. Do the Standing Orders of the House allow sitting when there is no minister of the Crown present in this Chamber? That is exactly what I would like to know.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Yes. We will now go on to presentation of committee reports. The hon. member for Terrebonne.

BILL C-46

REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 35, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the report of the legislative committee on Bill C-46, an act respecting contraventions of federal enactments, with amendments.

BILL C-26

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the report of the legislative committee on Bill C-26, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and other acts in relation to the Public Service of Canada, with amendments.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS AND GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS

FIFTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the fifth report of the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations on Bill C-22, an act to amend the Bankruptcy Act and to amend the Income Tax Act in consequence thereof, with amendments.

POINT OF ORDER

STANDING COMMITTEE FOR CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS AND GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Madam Speaker, I have a very important point of order to raise regarding Bill C-22. As you no doubt realize, Bill C-22 is an act to enact the Wage Claim Payment Act, to amend the Bankruptcy Act and to amend other acts in consequence thereof. It was introduced in the House of Commons on June 13, 1991.

On November 5, 1991 Bill C-22 received second reading and was referred to the Standing Committee for Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations for clause by clause consideration. After having covered 28 clauses of the bill, the committee broke on December 3, 1991 on the basis that an amendment introduced by the parliamentary secretary was out of order.

Five months later, on May 5, 1992 the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs appeared before the standing committee and said that he was severing the Wage Claim Payment Act part of the bill. The committee then went back and negated the 28 clauses we had already previously agreed to and then proceeded to vote down the remaining clauses that dealt with the Wage Claim Payment Act which was a major principle of Bill C-22.

The main principles of Bill C-22, as approved at second reading, are to establish a wage protection plan and to include insolvency.

I submit that the committee did not narrow the principle; it changed the principle. It is no longer Bill C-22 that we are dealing with but Bill C-11, so to speak. The House as a whole, all of us, agreed on the major principles of this bill, sent it to committee and the committee wiped out one of those major principles.

I would like to cite Beauchesne's, and make other citations, which I think will help you, Madam Speaker, in your deliberations on this question. I quote Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Sixth Edition, citation 684, page 204:

> 684.(1) The time for moving an Instruction is immediately after the committal of the bill, or, subsequently, as an independent motion.

It goes on:

> If the bill has been partly considered in committee—

I wish to emphasize:

> If the bill has been partly considered in committee, it is not competent to propose an Instruction.

As I said, it had been partly considered. We were up to 28 clauses at the time that it was severed.

No instruction had been given at the end of second reading nor prior to committee stage. In other words, the committee received no instruction from the House to empower it to change the principle of the bill.

Another citation from Beauchesne's reinforces this citation. It is citation 689 on page 205:

> 689.(1) A committee is bound by the decision of the House, given on second reading, in favour of the principle of the bill, and should not, therefore, amend the bill in a manner destructive of this principle.

I want to emphasize that the committee had approved the first 28 clauses of the bill, and that following the appearance of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs on May 5, a full five months later, when he announced that he was eliminating one of the two main principles of the bill, namely the Wage Claim Payment Act, the government members proceeded to go back to the 28 clauses that were approved and then voted against them.

I would also like to quote Joseph Redlicks' Procedure of the House of Commons: A Study of its History and Present Form, A.M.S. Press, 1909, New York, Volume III, page 95: "It is not proper to ignore the transformation of a bill by committee into what is really a new bill".

I submit that we are dealing with a new bill. To continue the quotation: "The correct course to adopt in such an event is to withdraw the bill and to introduce the measure as altered by the committee as a new bill beginning again with the first reading".

I look to Beauchesne's as the primary determinant of questions of procedure. I fully understand that Erskine May is often cited, but it reflects predominantly the British House of Commons while Beauchesne's is written by Canadians for the Canadian Parliament.

I believe sincerely that this bill is illegitimate. It is a bastard bill. That is what it says in Beauchesne's, which is based on Canadian practice and precedents, and it should have a final say in matters when there is a difference of opinion with Erskine May.

I submit that Bill C-22 reported out of committee is out of order and should be withdrawn and reintroduced for first reading.

Madam Speaker, I submit to you this information most humbly and I ask you to consider it seriously.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, it is not a matter of whether one agrees or disagrees with wage earner protection.

I do personally, but I submit that the point of order made is not valid. First, the committee can legitimately remove clauses from the bill if it so wishes, which it did.

What was out of order was an attempt by the government to introduce amendments which were against the original purpose of the bill, and the chairman of the committee ruled on that some time ago as he had to according to our rules. That part was done.

Finally, even if the committee had amended a clause I submit to you that that should have been raised as a point at the committee rather than here.

• (1220)

However, as much as I would like to see a wage earner protection plan I do not think that the point that is being raised today is valid. Clauses were removed from the bill, narrowing the scope of the bill. In other words the bill covered several items and it now covers one item less. However desirable or undesirable that particular move is it is certainly not out of order.

Further, hundreds of thousands of jobs are at stake if we do not get a new bankruptcy law. I do not want to see any more workers lose their jobs in the depths of this recession. We need to help workers immediately. I do not want to see this delayed any further, notwithstanding my great desire, and that of my colleague from Dartmouth, to have the wage earner protection plan which I certainly hope the government will introduce at the earliest opportunity.

Coming back to the point of order, I submit that particular one is not one. The purpose of the bill was not changed, unless one considers narrowing the scope of the bill as being a change. Narrowing the scope of the bill is perfectly within our rules.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Madam Speaker, I listened with great interest to the arguments of my two colleagues and, just like you, witnessed the vote on second reading of Bill C–22. You know that after the report tabled a few minutes ago, you would not recognize Bill C–22. It has been changed to such an extent that you will think it is a different one. Bill C–22 was stripped of all its content. We are all aware. We all heard the speeches during second reading and particularly that of the consumer and corporate affairs minister talking about the wage claim fund.

That wage claim fund is fundamental to the bill. Therefore, Madam Speaker, I think that when you examine the report presented to you by the chairman of the committee today, you will realize, as we did, that the committee has completely modified the content of the bill by removing its major element. I therefore think, as does my colleague from Chambly, that this bill should have been tabled again in the House because the government backed down on the fundamental intent and the very principles of the bill.

An hon. member: Twenty–eight sections.

Mr. Lapierre: Twenty–eight sections were removed between the second reading, where we all agreed, and the tabling of the report. So, Madam Speaker, I think that the essence and the principles have been modified, exactly what my friend the member for Terrebonne does not understand, essence and principles. Obviously, once you have read the chairman's report you will send him back to the drawing board because this House cannot be victimized by such a travesty of a bill.

[English]

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to intervene on this point of order, having had a little to do with its early history in a previous capacity.

I thought the hon. member for Chambly stated his argument in very colourful fashion by calling this a bastard bill. Actually it is intravenous feeding of the bill rather than a bastard bill. I do not find his citation of Beauchesne's, page 204, citation 684, to be pertinent to the issue before us at this particular moment.

I would rather go to citation 689(2), which my hon. friend also referred to, which states:

> A committee may negative every clause and substitute new clauses, if relevant to the bill as read a second time.

I submit that the negativing and substitution are relevant to the bill as read a second time.

My hon. friend depreciates the value of Erskine May because of its jurisdiction, but I think it is appropriate to add that Erskine May states on page 486, paragraph 2 that: "Notwithstanding the rule which forbids the moving of an amendment which is destructive to the principle of the bill, there is nothing to prevent the committee from negativing a clause or clauses, the omission of which may nullify or destroy the bill and reporting the bill as amended to the House".

The committee did not consider amendments in regard to the point raised by the hon. member. The committee simply rejected certain clauses of the bill. Committees can approve or reject clauses of the bill. I would ask the hon. member whether he is proposing in objecting to the report of the committee that committees should not have the power to approve or disapprove of clauses.

With reference to the intervention of my hon. friend for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, I appreciate his sagacity, his knowledge of this issue, and the wisdom of the points he makes. I appreciate the generosity of his comments.

The hon. member for Shefford suggested that the bill as reported is empty of all substance. The wage earners of this country, the unsecured creditors of this country, and the farmers and fishermen of this country, who will be protected by this bill as amended do not regard it as being empty of all substance.

[Translation]

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Madam Speaker, on the same point of order, I want to say that the ultimate objective of Bill C-22, an act to amend the Bankruptcy Act dating back to 1949, as we all know, was to create a fund for wage claims. That was the whole philosophy behind this bill.

At present, according to the report the chairman of the legislative committee on Bill C-22 just tabled, the philosophy of the bill has been totally changed. As far as I know, legislative committees have never been allowed to change the philosophy on which bills are based.

I remember very clearly when we were studying the firearms bill in committee, I was proposing amendments for every section and was told the changes were out of order because they altered the philosophy of the legislation.

Madam Speaker, I just wanted to say that I totally support the hon. member for Chambly and I also ask that the bill in its present form be withdrawn.

[English]

Mr. Edmonston: Madam Speaker, I would like to respond very briefly.

The hon. member from the government side mentioned that it seemed as if I were questioning the ability of a committee to make changes to the different clauses or the different sections in a proposed bill. Of course I am not saying that, Madam Speaker, and I am sure you did not understand me to say that.

What I am saying here, and I feel that it is important it be emphasized, is that when we are talking about a major principle of a major piece of legislation and we are talking about a Canadian citation which is often used in this House, Beauchesne's, I believe we are talking about jurisprudence. I have always been told in court that it is better to use Canadian jurisprudence rather than American or English.

What I tried to do by citing Beauchesne's at two different intervals was to show clearly that Beauchesne's was on the side of bringing in a new bill.

I believe there is a question of balance of convenience. I am sure you understand that whenever someone goes before a court and tries to have an extraordinary action accepted by a judge has to be shown as in the case of injunction, a balance of convenience.

Let us look at the balance of convenience with the government here. We are simply saying bring in the bill and respect Parliament. We do not want any more bastard bills that affect the legitimacy of what we are doing.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: I want to thank the hon. members for Chambly, Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Shefford and Saint-Hubert as well as the parliamentary secretary to the leader of the Government who brought my attention to these issues.

I will take the matter under advisement for a little while and get back to the House as soon as possible.

BILL C-58

REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present the report of the legislative committee on Bill C-58, an act to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act and other acts in consequence thereof, without amendment, in both official languages.

Mr. Edmonston: Madam Speaker, now I am seeking the floor because it is with great pride that I wish to present a private member's bill dealing with amending the Financial Administration Act. It is a private member's bill which essentially allows Canadian citizens to sue on behalf of the government any contractors which have been hired by the government and who do not serve or deliver the product—

Madam Deputy Speaker: We were not advised that the hon. member would move his bill today. I would like to put it to the House and then allow the hon. member to tell us what it is about so that we are within the rules.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–347, an act to amend the Financial Administration Act.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Edmonston: Madam Speaker, I will try to be very brief.

It is essentially an act to amend the Financial Administration Act in order to allow Canadian citizens to sue directly contractors and suppliers of the federal government that have given the federal government less than was agreed to, have abused the government or have defrauded the government.

This flows from legislation which originally came from the United States during its civil war where many of the suppliers of that time were ripping off the government. They found out that the government was incapable of suing them in every instance. It actually gave citizens the right to sue and have a part of whatever they received in judgment in favour of them as plaintiffs.

This is very important because it gives citizens the right to sue suppliers to receive part of the money of which they feel that the government was cheated.

I hope that we get to this bill later this year.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr. Edmonston moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

PETITIONS

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, today I wish to present two petitions signed by a number of people in Windsor, Ontario.

These petitioners call upon Parliament to enact legislation providing for a referendum of the people, binding upon Parliament, to accept or reject constitutional amendments proposed by the government.

VIOLENT CRIME

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, I wish to present three petitions also signed by a number of people in the Windsor, Ontario area.

These petitioners call upon Parliament to pass legislation establishing mandatory minimum sentences for all violent crimes. These minimum sentences would apply uniformly to all regions of Canada.

These petitions have been examined by the clerk and have been duly certified pursuant to our rules.

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, today it is my duty to table five petitions, part of a series of petitions I have tabled in this House concerning the Court Challenges Program, a program which, as you know, made it possible for individuals and minority groups to have their constitutional rights, as they relate to language and equality rights, clarified before the courts.

Madam Speaker, your petitioners maintain that the Court Challenges Program was, and should still be an essential instrument in the evolution of our constitutional rights and that all Canadians must be given equal access, whatever their income, to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Your petitioners want Parliament to consider re-instating the Court Challenges Program which gives all Canadians equal access to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

LAW OF THE SEA

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I am honoured to have the opportunity today to present to the House petitions from over 4,000 Canadians relating to the Canadian ratification of the Law of the Sea Convention.

The petitioners draw to the attention of the House that the oceans cover 70 per cent of the earth's surface; that the Law of the Sea Convention was open for signature in 1982; and that the report of the World Commission on the Environment and Development, known as the Brundtland commission, states that the most significant initial action that nations can take in the interests of the oceans' threatened life support systems is to ratify the Law of the Sea Convention.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to urge the Government of Canada to ratify the Law of the Sea Convention without delay, no later than June of this year, and to mobilize Canadian diplomatic resources to encourage other nations, particularly developed nations, to ratify this important international treaty.

In presenting these to the House, I would like to pay particular thanks to the World Federalists of Canada who have co-ordinated this national signature and letter gathering campaign. I will present all of those to the House that are in the proper form and those that are letter or correspondence or other petitions I will present directly to the minister.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Madam Speaker, I have a petition from various communities in my riding; Lansdowne, Mallorytown, Rockport, Gananoque, Frankville, Toledo. They are petitioning the government to make sure that any amended Canadian Constitution has been approved by the Canadian people before it is altered in any way.

BILL C-289

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, I have a petition signed by dozens of people in the Hamilton-Stoney Creek area. The first signature is that of the secretary of the Legion in my riding, Cora Ring.

The petitioners are calling upon the members of Parliament to support Bill C-289, the Remembrance Day Act, to ensure that Remembrance Day continues to be observed. Remembrance Day is a solemn day for remembering the dead and those who fought in the two world wars and in Korea.

Certainly I know that there are hundreds of other Hamiltonians who join with me in supporting this petition.

CANADA POST

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Madam Speaker, I would like to present a petition that is mainly directed to the Department of Labour and was sent by the Postal Workers Union in Sorel. Your petitioners have some questions about the validity of collective agreements and about the constant changes taking place at the Canada Post Corporation, which may threaten their jobs or force them to move to another region.

This petition was signed by all members of Local 408 in Sorel. Once again, your petitioners are opposed to any special legislation and any changes being made in their collective agreement before it expires.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I assume the petition was certified in accordance with the Standing Orders of the House?

Mr. Plamondon: Yes, as far as I know.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Madam Speaker, I have a petition I would like to present. It was sent by women in my own and other Bloc Quebecois ridings, who request that the goods and services tax be removed from items for female hygiene such as tampons and sanitary pads. I realize this is not something we often talk about in this House, but just the same, it is my duty to table this petition for these women who want to see the goods and services tax removed from sanitary pads in this country, and I think that is quite reasonable, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I assume the hon. member, who is herself a member of the legal profession, can give the House the assurance that she had her petition certified in accordance with the Standing Orders.

Mrs. Venne: As far as I know, Madam Speaker, my petition is entirely in order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I want to thank the hon. member.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 241, 258, 276, 305 and 309.

[Text]

Question No. 241—Mrs. Feltham:

With respect to the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement (a) how many jobs have been created as a direct result of the agreement (b) how many jobs have been lost as a direct result of the agreement?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): The Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement will have positive effects on the Canadian economy over the long term. At this stage, it is too early to come to any conclusions about the effects both positive and negative that the Free Trade Agreement has had on the labour market in Canada.

Job losses over the past year should not be attributed to the free trade agreement. It is only one of several factors including wage rates, business cycles and the value of the Canadian dollar which influence employment patterns in Canada.

There have been encouraging economic developments. In 1991, Canada sold $15 billion more in goods than it imported from the United States. In the three years since the free trade agreement was signed, merchandise exports to the United States have increased by an average of 5 per cent over 1988.

While there have been positive developments, some workers may be adversely affected by structural adjustments taking place. These individuals can be and have been assisted by the wide range of general labour market programs we have in place.

Question No. 258—Mr. Karpoff:

As of March 16, 1992, has the PMO received any cards, letters or petitions or other forms of written or electronic communications concerning pending changes to the Patent Act and generic drugs and if so (a) how many (b) how many signatures did they contain (c) how many signatures favoured increased patent protection for pharmaceuticals (d) how many signatures opposed increases in pharmaceutical prices?

Mr. Leonard Gustafson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): The following is in response to Mr. Karpoff's question of March 17, 1992:

a) As of March 16, 1992 the PMO had received 4,177 cards, 28 letters, 147 signatures on petitions and 34 other forms of written or electronic communications concerning pending changes to the Patent Act;

b) The total number of signatures contained within the above documents was 4,386;

c) Of the total number of signatures received, 10 favoured increased patent protection for pharmaceuticals; and

d) Of the total number of signatures received, 4,376 opposed increases in pharmaceutical prices.

Question No. 276—Mr. Robinson:

With respect to the court cases of (a) Veysey vs the commissioner of Corrections (b) Egan and Nesbit vs the Minister of Justice (c) Mossop vs the Minister of Justice (d) Haig and Birch vs the Minister of Justice (e) Canadian Committee against Customs Censorship vs the Minister of Justice, in each case, what was the (i) number of hours spent by Department of Justice lawyers preparing the case (ii) number of hours spent by Department of Justice lawyers arguing the case (iii) estimated cost incurred by the government at each level of litigation (iv) cost of any private sector lawyers or consultants in preparing the case?

Mr. Robert D. Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada):

(i) It is not possible to provide the number of person-hours expended by various justice lawyers in the several departments involved in these cases. All cases except Veysey are still before the courts, either at trial or on appeal.

(ii) The estimated number of hours spent by justice counsel arguing these cases:

Veysey	–	6
Egan	–	18
Mossop	–	12
Haig	–	12
Cdn. Cttee. (Glad Day Bookshop)	–	24

(iii) Disbursements paid by the government:

Veysey	–	$ 50.00
Egan	–	9,555.31
Mossop	–	1,264.64
Haig	–	780.86
Cdn. Cttee. (Glad Day Bookshop)	–	1,234.80

(iv)

No agents were appointed	–	nil
Costs of consultants	–	$16,585.95

Question No. 305—Mr. Karygiannis:

With respect to The State of Canada's Environment, 1991 edition (a) what was the total cost incurred in the designing, printing and binding of this publication (b) what is the breakdown of these costs (c) what would have been the costs incurred in the designing, printing and binding of a similar paperback edition?

Hon. Pauline Browes (Minister of State (Environment)): (a) The total cost incurred by Environment Canada in the designing, including word processing, typesetting and graphics, printing and binding of The State of Canada's Environment, 1991 edition, was $334,969.67.

(b) The breakdown of these costs was:
Design: $155,364.37
Printing and binding: $179,605.30

(c) Because of the size of the report which was nearly 750 pages in English and over 800 pages in French, a hard cover format was chosen to substantially increase its durability and shelflife. This was strongly recommended by Canada Communication Group, our co-publisher; Banfield-Seguin Ltd., the designer; and the printers, D.W. Friesen and Sons Ltd.

Nevertheless, in response to your question, the cost incurred in the designing, printing and binding of a similar paperback edition would have been $290,969.67, a reduction of $44,000.

Question No. 309—Mr. Jordan:

Of Canada's total exports to the U.S. in the first quarter of 1992, what percentage is from companies that are either partially or totally controlled by Americans?

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): By the minister responsible for Statistics Canada. Statistics Canada reports:

Statistics Canada does not have the necessary data to relate U.S. ownership of exporting companies to exports on a current basis. Obtaining this information would represent a considerable increase in paperwork for businesses and a very costly set of surveys.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

Mr. Edwards: I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

NATIONAL PARKS ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Charest that Bill C-59, an act to amend the National Parks Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Natural Resources envelope.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to take part in the debate on Bill C-59, an act to amend the National Parks act. Obviously, we are all aware of the significance and importance of this bill that has come up this Friday and which the government wants to rush through. Nevertheless, we want to exercise our rights as members. Although the government regularly denies our existence, we want to show that we do exist and that we intend to participate fully in the debate.

We want to participate in the debate so much, that we bitterly regret not being members, for example, of the legislative committee on Bill C-81 concerning referendums. Of course, today we want to show the government its insensitivity, given the presence of some members who do not belong to the usual club. Therefore, I want to talk today about the National Parks Act, not only about what this bill contains but especially about what it does not contain.

Madam Speaker, you no doubt know that the lack of Canadian national parks in Quebec is now legendary. My colleague from Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead just obtained figures showing that it is a third of one per cent.

Mr. Gérin: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead on a point of order.

Mr. Gérin: I invoke Standing Order 29(3), Madam Speaker.

And the count having been taken:

Madam Deputy Speaker: We have a quorum. Resuming debate, the hon. member for Shefford.

Mr. Lapierre: Madam Speaker, I am very glad that my colleagues came to hear my excellent speech. I wanted to talk to you about the National Parks Act and the obvious lack of co-operation now between the Government of Canada and the Government of Quebec. I know that the Minister of State for the Environment will tell us in her speech later on about the mandate of her department, particularly as regards the administration of the National Parks Act.

Everybody is well aware of the issue of the Saguenay marine park and I know that if my colleague and leader, the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean, was here today, he would have stressed the importance of this issue, given all the efforts and the work he did. I know that the parliamentary secretary will provide us, maybe in a speech later on at the report stage or at third reading, with the details regarding the Saguenay marine park.

The agreement in principle on the establishment of the Saguenay marine park was reached two years ago. Although some work has been done since, the most important decisions still have not been made. Indeed, unlike Bill C-59 which we are now debating, we still know nothing about the area of the park, although the minister said he was open to proposals to the effect that it be larger than originally planned. Nothing is happening with this project. The minister is in the last months of his mandate and one would have thought that he would have wanted to finalize this project before retiring. Last February, Quebec Minister Blackburn raised the possibility of a 1200 square kilometres park.

It is obvious that if the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean would still be the Minister of the Environment, Bill C-59 would not only include prescriptions for Wood Buffalo National Park, but would also provide the details of the boundaries of the Saguenay marine park.

The Minister of the Environment is in a hurry today. He wants us to pass this bill, but he has not done his homework regarding the Saguenay marine park. This situation compels us to intervene. In a release, the minister said regarding the master plan, that he still hoped to implement it with the co-operation of all the stakeholders. In fact, some kind of harmonization committee was set up and the last information that we have is to the effect that following the tabling of the progress report, the committee members were confident that the development of the management plan could start. That was in March, but the plan has yet to be completed and we are very concerned.

Obviously we would have liked the Minister of the Environment to tell us about his timetable regarding the Saguenay marine park. Obviously we would have liked to have in this bill the legal prescriptions, the provisions for the legal creation of the marine park. Right now, this marine park exists only on paper. Nothing in this House recognizes a legal reality and, in fact, the real creation of the Saguenay marine park. I know that the minister or his parliamentary secretary will later try to explain this major omission. If you bother to come before this House to table a bill on national parks, obviously it should include all the details regarding the Saguenay marine park. We can only regret this omission.

I would also like to know what is happening with the work of the harmonization committee. Harmonization is fine as long as it leads to something. There is talk of an amount of $493,000 in capital projects regarding the land part of the Saguenay park, but we would like to get more details on the project.

One of the most substantial elements of the creation of the Saguenay marine park, as well as Moresby, is the boundaries. The bill that we are debating today is very specific about this aspect. For instance, looking at schedule V and schedule VI, there is a detailed description. Therefore, the necessary work has been done and one of our colleagues from the New Democratic Party, who worked hard on that project, told us earlier how he, the minister and others worked to reach a successful conclusion to that project.

In any case, I know why the bill does not give us any details on the Saguenay marine park. It does not because no agreement could be reached on who was going to administer the park. Some people think administration of the park should be handed over to a management company.

Madam Speaker, I know you share our concern about the Saguenay marine park. Of course I do not want to spend all my time talking about this marine park, although it is a major omission, and if it were not for the intrinsic value of this particular bill, we would have to vote against it. However, our leader, the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean, initiated the plans for Bill C-59 and worked very hard to prepare what we now have today, a bill that settles some centuries old problems. That is why we intend to support Bill C-59. We are sorry more information was not available beforehand.

Personally, I was astonished when I heard the leader of the government in the House announce rather pompously yesterday that an agreement had been reached by all parties, that everybody agreed and that the bill would be expedited through the House. They always forget, unfortunately, because they would prefer to pretend we do not exist. Yesterday, the leader of the government again forgot we existed when he pompously announced everything would be over in a matter of minutes. He thought our conscientious members would rubber-stamp this bill.

Madam Speaker, you and the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell are aware we are usually prepared to co-operate, but there are limits. At this very moment, while we are here in our seats waiting for the referendum legislation we intend to fight, we know that Parliament has once again formed a committee while ignoring the representations in this House.

I have no crystal ball like the former Prime Minister Mackenzie King, but I predict that after the general election there will be so many of us in this House that our presence will indeed be felt. Maybe at that point the government in power will have the courtesy to invite our contribution to the debate.

I will get back to the referendum bill, because that is probably the worst sticking point. The government has decided to form a committee on Bill C-81. The only members opposed to the principle of the bill in the House yesterday, 197 to 7, the real opposition, the opposition's opposition, were us and we have no seat on this committee.

Mr. Gérin: It's a farce.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I remind the hon. member for Shefford that we are discussing Bill C-59.

Mr. Lapierre: Madam Speaker, I was getting there. I was just going to say that I hope the committee that will consider Bill C-59 will have a few members of the Bloc Quebecois at the table who will be able to discuss the case of the Saguenay marine park. I am sure that even the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean, our own leader, would like to raise some questions with the committee, because as its spiritual father, he is very much aware of the importance of the Saguenay marine park.

There are a number of questions we would like to ask, both on this important committee and the other committee on the referendum bill. We want to express our views wherever we can. I know that my colleagues are all anxious to talk about Bill C–59, its contents, what it does not include, and especially the questions that they have.

If tomorrow morning British Columbia voted for self–determination, how would the assets be split? What would happen to the park that we are creating today? Would it be federal property? Would B.C. have to pay a fee to the federal State? What would happen? This is more or less the kinds of questions that were examined by the Commission on the political and constitutional future of Quebec, more commonly called the Bélanger–Campeau commission.

I know that you followed the work of the commission with great interest, but there is one aspect that is directly linked to Bill C–59, and that is the division of assets. I believe that it is a legitimate question, at a time when we are establishing new federal territories, to wonder what would happen if a province opted for sovereignty, whether it is British Columbia or Quebec.

Let us take the example of Quebec. This applies very well to Quebec because there are already four national parks that we will have to deal with, including the Mingan Islands, Forillon Park and a few other ones. We will have to look at those in due time. Some experts from the Bélanger–Campeau Commission said that in the case of Quebec—which is what concerns us with Bill C–59—the share of the province in the federal non–financial assets would be equivalent to the ratio between the value of those assets in the territory of Quebec and the value of the over–all non–financial federal assets in Canada and around the world.

The incomplete and imprecise information regarding the over–all value of the non–financial assets of the federal government does not enable us to quantify accurately those federal non–financial assets on the Quebec territory. But there is no doubt that the National Parks Act covers several of those assets.

To solve this important issue, they used the data provided by the Canadian Tax Foundation on the grants in lieu of property taxes that are distributed to municipalities by the federal government. I am convinced that my colleague from the NDP is concerned about the grants in lieu of taxes which will be distributed for instance to B.C. following the passing of Bill C–59 that we support.

Indeed, even if Government of Canada properties are not subject to municipal property taxes, in some cases, the federal government has agreed to give grants in lieu of taxes, as though the federal properties were taxable. There is of course no specific detail in this bill regarding the estimated value of the new park that we are establishing. We have exactly the same problem: What is the value of the Forillon Park? What is the true value of other parks such as this one?

Madam Speaker, I had a list of some assets that you would certainly have liked to consider, but unfortunately I do not have all those data. I can share with you the data of the Treasury Board of Canada, which concern us, and which were used by the Canadian Tax Foundation. The Quebec share of the grants in lieu of taxes paid by the Government of Canada and received by the municipalities in Quebec represent some 18 per cent of the total distributed to municipalities across Canada. In the basic scenario, this data is used to get an idea of the proportion of federal non–financial assets in Quebec.

Consequently—and this is of interest to us—the undeveloped, for instance the national parks that are certainly not established yet, are not the object of grants in lieu taxes. Such is the case and the Bélanger–Campeau report precisely dealt with national parks. This surprises me. It is especially the case for the 35 national parks, of which only three are in Quebec. Three out of thirty–five. That is why there is a major omission in Bill C–59.

Therefore, the 18 per cent figure seems high. The alternative models will use other percentages.

Just imagine the importance of such a bill in the case of state successions. Just think that because Quebec was penalised compared to the rest of the country under the National Parks Act, the 18 per cent usually withheld cannot apply in the assessment of grants in lieu of taxes for national parks because such grants are not available when national parks are not built.

An hon. member: And no tax is levied on them.

Mr. Lapierre: You are right; no tax is paid. My colleague who was a minister in Quebec was concerned about the fact that the federal government does not pay taxes on national parks. Therefore, I know he will want to explain further, later on, all the mathematical formulae that allow the federal government to get away with not paying.

Now, I will not keep on talking about the accumulated deficit. I know it is of particular interest to my colleague, the member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead. We have a good sense of humour here, Madam Speaker. My colleague for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell will certainly wish to add his knowledge to this debate because, as you know, the frontier towns between Quebec and Ontario will—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time is up. Are there any other questions or comments? We will hear the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): I listened extremely carefully to the member for Shefford. I took note of some of his remarks and I would like to ask him a couple of questions. For instance, he said that the member for Lac-Saint-Jean was the father, albeit a spiritual one, of a marine park idea in the Saguenay River. If I understood him correctly, he also said that if the member for Lac-Saint-Jean had remained the environment minister, everything would have been complete. The work would be finished. You will understand, Madam Speaker, that I am asking myself a few questions. First of all, does it mean that the member for Shefford is blaming the member for Lac-Saint-Jean for quitting his job as minister? I am curious to know the answer to this.

Second, if the Saguenay Park, the marine park, is, and I quote, a federal enclave, does it mean that the Bloc Quebecois member, who wants Quebec to go its own separate way, supports federal enclaves? It seems that he does since he said that if his leader had remained the environment minister, a job he claims he should not have quit, he would have completed the task which consisted of creating a federal enclave.

Mr. Plamondon: That has nothing to do with the issue in question, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Boudria: But, Madam Speaker, I am asking questions regarding the member's statement and I have quotes right here.

I also noticed that the member said that there were penalties and that Quebec was, and I quote, penalized with regard to grants in lieu of taxes for national parks. Well, if that is the case, how can he explain that he congratulated the member for Lac-Saint-Jean for being the spiritual father of a project which, according to him, penalizes Quebec?

Well then, I would like him to reconcile all of these ideas which he described earlier because there will be a lot of Canadian men and women quite concerned by the member's remarks and who will be surprised to hear, for example, a Bloc Quebecois member blaming another member for, first of all, saying that he was not present in the House today. I myself would not have said such a thing and, in view of the fact that I hold the member for Lac-Saint-Jean in high esteem, I would have never mentioned it, but the member for Shefford did. Anyway, those are the comments he made regarding the member for Lac-Saint-Jean.

I would therefore like to know if he supports or not the fact that the member for Lac-Saint-Jean quit his job as environment minister and consequently abandoned the Saguenay marine park project? I would like answers to all these questions and I am quite sure that all the members opposite are also curious to know the answers to all these very relevant questions which flow directly from the remarks made by the member for Shefford.

Mr. Lapierre: Madam Speaker, I think that the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell paid tribute to the member for Lac-Saint-Jean for the work that he started when he was Minister of the Environment. Indeed, the member for Lac-Saint-Jean has always been loyal first and foremost to his constituents and to the province of Quebec, so much so that, when his government denied his loyalty toward Quebec, when this government decided to abandon Quebec, he even sacrificed his position as Minister of the Environment to defend Quebec before everything else.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lapierre: It is obvious that the member for Lac-Saint-Jean would have carried out the marine park when, like many others, he believed the risk worth taking. But he was smart enough, with other colleagues from his caucus, to realize that his government was betraying the advocates of risk taking. At that time, he had the courage of his convictions, which is not the case with many other members of this House.

I am happy that the member for Lac-Saint-Jean took part in trying to re-establish some balance in the National Parks Act. I am very glad to see that the member for Sherbrooke, for example, is giving a national park to British Columbia, but he forgot where his government, where his power came from. He forgot those who elected him. He should have tackled head on the problems of the marine park of Saguenay, for example, and today we should be examining the two parks in this legislation.

When we talk about penalizing, I think that the greatest penalty that Quebec can get at this time is to have to bear with this government which claims to have power because it got 58 members elected. Unfortunately, it is turning its back to Quebec, which is not the case with the member for Lac-Saint-Jean who is in Sept-Îles preparing for the coming of the next group of Quebec members of Parliament to Ottawa.

[English]

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member whether he is aware and is prepared to speak to those British Columbians who are presently watching this debate, in particular the Haïda people.

This is not a piece of legislation to give British Columbia a national park. I would hope that the member knows that. This is enabling legislation to allow an agreement to be implemented between the Haïda people and Canada.

This debate has been going on in this House for six years. The member has already expressed to me personally that the reason for holding up this piece of legislation, for holding up the debate, is to try to extort from the government a seat on the referendum committee that is presently meeting, which has eight members on it.

To hold the Haïda people hostage like this while claiming to be seeking some kind of just remedy for the Bloc Quebecois is unethical, immoral and unworthy of anyone who is elected to this Chamber. This is a First Nation that stood on the line to protect the land. The elder people were arrested and taken to jail.

They ultimately negotiated with two levels of government. They held a referendum in their nation on their land to protect their land. This small bill that is before the House is solely to enable an agreement to be put into place, an agreement that has been promised since 1987.

The members of the Bloc Quebecois know full well that they are attempting to extort something that is not provided for individual members, or in any formula to any collection of members known as a party.

I just would like to hear from the member as to why he thinks his rights in representing a view from his province override those of the Haïda people.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérin: Question of privilege, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead on a question of privilege.

Mr. Gérin: Madam Speaker, you told some Bloc Québécois members several times today that some words are not to be used. I just heard the word "extort" in reference to Bloc Quebecois members, and I ask you to act in the same way the New Democratic member who just spoke—as you have acted all day with Bloc Quebecois members.

• (1310)

You know very well that that word and several others he used before are unparliamentary. Accusing a Bloc Quebecois member or all Bloc Quebecois members of trying to extort, that, is of trying to use a bill to get something else, is an extremely serious attack, Madam Speaker, much more serious than using a word like "unfair" about the Speaker of the House. It is much more serious.

Yes, and you know it. We were elected to be here and we are debating a bill under consideration. We have had it before us for barely an hour and a quarter. The member himself said that the government has been preparing it for four years. We have had it in front of us for an hour and a quarter and he accuses us of trying to engage in extortion in order to obtain something else.

Well, I hope that you will ask him to apologize publicly, here in this House, and not just in any old way. Otherwise, expel that member, we do not need him. Basically, I know why he wants to rush it through. It is because the government is preparing a nice little trip to Rio and he will need the unanimous consent of the House. I tell him in advance that he will not get unanimous consent. They will stay here to do the work.

I am ready to sit all next week—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think that we are getting off the subject. What the hon. member for Skeena said, twice, is that he was quoting the hon. member.

Mr. Rocheleau: I never said that in my life.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do not know who he was talking about, but he said that a member had admitted such a thing to him.

I cannot personally cast doubt on the word of the hon. member for Skeena. Perhaps the term used was—

Mr. Gérin: Impartiality.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Maybe the term used was not the best one and I am sure that the hon. member might want to rephrase it—while he still has the floor, because I will let him finish—or find a different word to express his opinion. But he told me that he was quoting someone.

As for the other terms mentioned, I think that when the hon. member sees the transcript of the debates, he will find that no one was attacked personally. A state of mind or attitude was mentioned, but there was no personal attack. Otherwise I would have made it a duty to call the hon. member's attention to it.

[English]

Would the hon. member for Skeena be kind enough to change his words to make sure that we do not have any unparliamentary language?

Mr. Fulton: Madam Speaker, certainly when you review the "blues", if you find that the context and the way in which I used the word "extort" would lead you to believe that it is unparliamentary I would be glad to withdraw it.

What I was expressing was a direct conversation I had with the member who just spoke, who indicated that he was intending to hold up this legislation and keep it from passing, to try to use political blackmail to obtain a seat on the referendum committee, which is the same thing.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérin: That is false. I never said that. What the member is saying is false. Madam Speaker, you see how unfairly you are acting in such situations.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I see no reason for the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead to accuse the Chair for the way I act—I take no responsibility for what a member might or might not say. I can assure the hon. member that I am doing my work as calmly and fairly as possible and I do not believe that insulting the Chair will make debate in this House easier or in any way contribute to decorum in this House. I do not believe that this kind of attack will raise the esteem in which Canadians throughout our country hold the House of Commons or raise its image.

I think that we are all adults and that we can debate situations without insulting each other. The period for questions and comments is now over. We will—

Mr. Gérin: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead. I imagine he is going to apologize.

Mr. Gérin: Madam Speaker, I am willing to apologize as much as you want and rephrase as you advise, if you feel offended. I was saying that debate in this House should be conducted in an impartial manner. If the Chair was offended by what I said—I see no reason why, but if she was—she should be able to imagine how I felt about what was said by the hon. member. I would ask her to be just as demanding of the hon. member for Skeena as she is of me. Put yourself in my shoes. The only way to maintain decorum in this House, the only way, is to treat all members the same way. What the hon. member said is unacceptable, and you know it.

I am asking you to ask him to withdraw. You asked him politely to rephrase, you did not order. He did, but seeing an opportunity he was at it again, using even stronger insults. When such a behaviour is tolerated, we come to a point where it is impossible to have the discussion we should be having.

This is my opinion. Do not take it personally. I know that someone should preside over our proceedings. We know that, and today it is you. I am glad to have you in the Chair, but in circumstances like these, I am asking you to be stricter, to show more authority so that debate can proceed in a noble and dignified manner to the satisfaction of all Quebecers, and indeed all Canadians.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. member for his good advice. I will check the record of our exchange this afternoon and, if necessary, I will come back to the House.

Mr. Plamondon: Madam Speaker, on the same point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The point of order has been dealt with. We are going to proceed with debate. The hon. member for Richelieu.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): In that case, Madam Speaker, I am delighted to take part in this debate. Like many other members, I looked forward to address this issue. I prepared a speech into which I put a lot of determination and a lot of research. My first words would have been for my NDP colleague in the opposition who spent five years fighting for a park in his riding.

But now, given what he just said about the Bloc Quebecois and other members, I want to congratulate him for the park, but not for the intentions he thinks we have but which never crossed our minds. Again, the Bloc Quebecois is here to stimulate serious and honest discussions, to reflect with the official opposition, our NDP colleagues and members of the government on what the government intends to do with the bills, including the one before the House today, Bill C-59.

Of course, on a Friday afternoon, at the end of the week, when we know we are not sitting next week and that we always have to deal with a lot of legislation in June, it is surprising to see that the government, after ignoring the issue for five years, wants to railroad such an important bill for the people of British Columbia, such an important bill for the Haïda nation who have been hoping for this legislation for five years now. It is surprising that the government wants to ram through this bill without proper consideration, as our House leader mentioned. Yes, we all applaud this park in British Columbia. It was a rightful demand. But why not reflect at the same time on a fairer division of parks in Canada?

Why are there only three parks in Quebec, but 35 throughout Canada?

• (1320)

Why is less than one-third of 1 per cent of Quebec's territory set aside for parks? For the sake of fairness, this should be 12 per cent. I think this bill should give us pause to reflect on the principle of fairness that should guide our thinking and the proceedings of this House, and which should inspire government in the proper distribution of public funds.

The park mentioned in this bill is the result of a five-year campaign by the Haïda, the people of British Columbia and the hon. member, who has been fighting for this for many years. At one time this government had the most effective Minister of the Environment that Canada ever had. I am referring to the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean, who was sympathetic to these claims and insisted that this project be made operational and that the requisite administrative steps be taken so as to produce legislation as soon as possible. However, as soon as he left, his successors failed to sustain his enthusiasm, like this government which since 1984, and especially since its second term, has been fumbling around in a kind of bureaucratic fog.

This government has no idea what to do about the economic situation or social problems. It has not a clue how to spend taxpayers' money. This also applies to our national parks, because otherwise it would produce legislation that would reflect a political will to have more national parks. This government makes decisions after the fact. It is incapable of finding real solutions to the real problems, which are plain as the nose on your face. In talking about the economy the only policy it has in this respect is to hope, as the Minister of Finance said, that interest rates will go down and that the dollar does not go up too fast. It is a policy of economic wishful thinking. That is what this government has to offer us in the economic sector.

As far as research is concerned, today the government published a small folder. Does it worry about fairness? Of course not. We read that 24 companies will have subsidies for technology and prosperity, but not a single one is from Quebec in this particular document. It is the same old story. This government does not understand what the situation is, does not understand there are two founding peoples, and it governs Quebec while blithely ignoring its concerns. The members who represent this province are sleeping on the job. They are satisfied with whispered promises. Their only hope is that in the next election, the political winds will be as favourable as they were before. They do not see the storm rising in front of them, a storm that will topple them, leaving not a single member from Quebec in this House.

They are fourth in the polls today. Why? Because during debate on this kind of legislation, not a single member ever rose to consider the issue of national fairness and what should be his province's share. Of course not. They are not here to defend those issues. They do not intervene. Do they have any particular reason to be or not to be in the House? I do not know. But they do not rise in this kind of debate. They did not rise in the debate on the environment legislation that took powers away from Quebec. They did not intervene in the debate on occupational training, although historically, Quebec has always had jurisdiction over occupational training. Normally, they should have protested, but they chose to remain silent, to abstain, which is typical of members who are part of a machine they do not control, who are part of a government that is not their government. They do not recognize themselves in this government. And instead of leaving and hoping, as we do, for a government that does represent the interests of Quebec, they prefer to abstain. Are they worried about their pensions? I do not know. Their personal interests? No idea. Are they naive? I wonder.

Maybe all these adjectives best describe this lack of debate from them, this failure to take a firm stand on and for Quebec. But no. They are silent as always. What fate do the voters have in store for them? The same fate as the Liberals in 1984. What did they get in 1984 after their mistake in 1982? They let the Constitution be repatriated in 1982 without saying a word, without Quebec's consent. They went dancing in front of Parliament with the Queen of England and the nine other premiers. They forgot about Quebec's interests. They forgot to take a stand. They forgot that they had been elected by Quebecers.

For that reason, they were sent home in 1984 in a landslide. The Liberal members, or rather former members, will recall that. That is the fate that awaits the Conservative members from Quebec. The same fate awaits them and they remain silent and let such important bills as today's be debated without saying a word, without thinking about what Quebec should demand as its share for national parks. Such an attitude is incomprehensible.

Look at the bill that preceded yesterday's debate. We are talking about a country's future. This government, in one day, decides that the debate will not even last the whole day. It imposes closure. Last night, the minister responsible threatened to limit debate again today on the committee studying the bill after second reading. It is already in a big rush to bring it up again in early June. It wants to get rid of a constitutional problem, thinking that a referendum would solve everything.

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I know the hon. member gets carried away. But I would like you to call him to order so that he would address the bill before us. As far as the election is concerned, I think that his time will come and that it will be soon enough for him.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Champagne): That is not a point of order. The hon. member for Richelieu can proceed and it would be appreciated if he would limit his comments to the current debate.

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, I will take heed of your sound advice.

I was about to tell my hon. colleague for Laval–Est that I am making a link between the defeat he can expect at the next election and the fact that no government member from Quebec is rising in this House to speak on such an issue. That, I say to the member for Laval–Est, is the link. Did I hear him speak about parks in Quebec? Did I hear him speak when we were dealing with job training and the sacred rights in education? Did I hear the hon. member for Laval–Est when the last throne speech mentioned two government proposals on environment and education, but he voted against the best interests of Quebec? That is the link to be made.

An hon. member: They did not speak either on the referendum legislation.

Mr. Plamondon: Not a word! They did not speak on the referendum legislation. There is a link between any legislation and the higher interests of Quebec. That is what I want to bring into the debate.

Of course, the NDP member who spoke on this bill is right. He is right to ask for something for his province. He stands up for the interests of British Columbia; he stands up for the interests of his constituents. He wants to get a park. Of course, he does his duty. I congratulate him for that, but less for the remarks he made about us. But where are the Quebec members to get their fair share? Will we be content with mere patronage, with a few thousand dollars spent in some riding as the Liberals did with a paint job for church basements just before the election? Not at all. That era is over for Quebec.

Quebec expects its members to stand up, to say white or black, not grey. Quebecers are fed up seeing their members in Ottawa sleeping, keeping quiet, abstaining from participating in debates, in major debates, be it on Bill C–59 or any other legislation. They are fed up not to hear from their members in their ridings.

It is the same thing for the member for Terrebonne. I was going around his riding the other day. How can he get that disconnected from the reality of his riding, not intervening as he does—

Mr. Lapierre: He is always away on a trip.

Mr. Plamondon: Travelling around the world, forgetting—

• (1330)

Mr. Robitaille: Mr. Speaker, during his passionate speech, the member for Richelieu mentioned the name of the hon. member for Terrebonne, and he was asking how—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Champagne): This is not a point of order, but I understand what the member for Richelieu is saying, because he generally uses quite colourful expressions, giving many examples here and there. I ask the hon. member to conclude his remarks, because his time is running out. I would ask the hon. member to speed up and resume debate. I think his remarks attract much attention and I would ask him to go on and conclude.

Mr. Rocheleau: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, in accordance with Standing Order 29(1) I call for a quorum count. What my colleague has to say is in fact very important.

And the count having been taken:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Champagne): We have a quorum. If the hon. member for Richelieu wants to go on, I hope his colleagues who have great respect for him will let him conclude his remarks.

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, I hope I will be able to get back the time I lost because of points of order that were out of order. I would like to be able to sum up by showing the link between the whole referendum debate, this specific bill and the attitude of the members. I thank all members who came to the House to hear my speech. I knew they were courteous, but I am surprised to see such a crowd, even here in the House of Commons.

I was just about to raise more specifically the problem of national parks in terms of equity. Equity means equal distribution of them on the land or equal share among the public. Yet, a third of one per cent of the Quebec territory is national parks. Three national parks out of 35 are in Quebec, but the member for Terrebonne remains silent about such a blatant injustice, as well as the member for Laval. I discussed that matter with several members and they seemed absolutely oblivious to the circumstances. I do not know which method of torture is used to silence them like that, to frighten them, in order that they nod without thinking and always say yes. It is worse than a congregation.

The member for Laval wants to know how much time left I have. I have five minutes left. I will be glad to speak about you a little longer, if you wish. Do I still have the floor, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Champagne): Yes.

Mr. Plamondon: Thank you.

Mr. Della Noce: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The member keeps talking about his colleagues. He talks about anything but the parks.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Champagne): That is not a point of order. The member for Richelieu.

Mr. Plamondon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I see that the truth hurts. The behaviour of the hon. member for Laval is a good illustration of that. Of course, some truths are difficult to hear. But it is my duty to repeat them, because I have been travelling for three months throughout Quebec, preparing for the next election where there will be candidates from the Bloc Quebecois. Often, people I—

Mr. Robitaille: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the member for Richelieu just mentioned that he has been travelling throughout Quebec for three months. That is why he is never in the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Champagne): That is not a point of order. I would ask the member for Richelieu to conclude. I think he is capable of ending his speech in a way acceptable to the members of the House and I think he will do just that.

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, I will certainly follow your good advice. But just to make a little digression before closing, I must say that I was travelling at my own expense and not at the government's, as the member did when he went to Japan or Europe.

So, Mr. Speaker, concerning Bill C-59, the distribution—

Mr. Robitaille: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the member for Terrebonne has no lesson to learn from the member for Richelieu.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Champagne): That is not a point of order. Would the hon. member for Richelieu please continue.

Mr. Plamondon: Thank you again. I find it too bad that members interrupt that way when we have to debate a serious important bill that concerns the future of fairness with respect to national parks. We have work to do. We members from Quebec, members of the Bloc Quebecois, are here to—

An hon. member: You are in Canada.

Mr. Plamondon: The member over there tells me that I am in Canada. As long as we pay taxes, we will try to get our share of the loot and the goodies, my friend. Then we will go when an agreement is signed. Who will defend that agreement, who will bring it about and settle it? The Bloc Quebecois members, not the silent ones who are on the government side today.

Mr. Rocheleau: Dummies.

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, I conclude on this bill by paying tribute once again to the member from British Columbia who worked very hard for five years to make that sleeping government understand the importance of this park. He really defends the interests of his province, British Columbia. He gets his province its due, as the members from Quebec who sit on the government side should do, but are not doing, so the Bloc members remind them. I would like to tell the Haïda nation that we fully support this bill, as we agree with their just land claims, although we have some questions about clause 8.4(3), for example, which refers to the Governor in Council. I think it gives too much power to the Governor in Council. After consulting the Cree council, I think that the Cree council should have full authority, now that it will become their territory, part of their nation. That is what I mean.

I conclude with the wish that this bill will be passed as soon as possible, since British Columbia is waiting for it. However, Bloc Quebecois members and Conservative members from Quebec are waiting too for a marine park and other parks in Quebec. They want their fair share, not just trips to Europe or Japan from time to time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Champagne): We are in the 10-minute period for questions and comments. The hon. member for Laval-Est.

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and to Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I cannot say that I listened to the hon. member's speech with interest, because he was off topic. He was making political propaganda. He talked about the Bloc Quebecois. He talked about recommendations. If they are so popular, why could they not get 10 volunteers to take care of Voyageurs 92? I am also interested in this bill. I made some inquiries about the fairness aspect and I will quote my colleague: it is a matter of fairness, based either on territory or on population. He is right. However, there is something he does not know and which he ought to know. He should find out about this, because the Canadian government would like to have more parks in Quebec. I have a few questions for my hon. colleague, but I will not yield to him right away, because he probably thinks he knows the answer. Why are there not there more national parks in Quebec? Why does the Government of Quebec want to set aside more land for national parks? Why does Quebec penalize its population by not having more national parks? So why are the members of the Bloc Quebecois making such a fuss? Unfortunately, the people listening might even believe those stories.

The hon. member for Saint-Hubert is laughing. I do not think it is funny, because I do not treat my constituents like school children. I do not think it's funny, not at all, because I think Quebec deserves better. If we have only three or four parks, there must be a reason. And since this is the period for questions and comments, I have a question. Why do we not have more parks? And why does Quebec not want to set aside more land so we can have more national parks?

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, it will be easy for me to answer the hon. member. It is strange that government members should ask opposition members questions on how to do things.

• (1340)

But I want to remind the hon. member of one thing, they have been delaying the marine park for two years. It is not because of Quebec, but because of the federal government. And why is there not a park? He told us it is because Quebec is against it. That is not true. Canada, when it wanted to take a part of our territory was imposing unacceptable conditions. Quebec's territory, is sacred and has been defined since the land agreements. When a park is created on its territory it is quite normal to have administrative agreements.

Canada, under the arrogant Liberals in the past and under the arrogant Tories now, insists on doing paperwork instead of solving problems. This is the real reason.

The hon. member for Laval-Est put his finger on the problem when he asked that question. He asked the question, but of course he did not know the answer. He was given questions to ask. But to get the answers, why did he not go to the committee responsible for parks and ask why the matter of the Saguenay marine park was not settled? It was because civil servants were questionning commas, were engaged in useless constipating negotiations which led nowhere. Why was that? It was because the hon. members only asked questions without demanding anything, as the hon. member from British Columbia did.

What has the hon. member for British Columbia been doing for five years? He has been fighting like mad at the committee on environment. This is why he will get his park. I do not mean his personally, but a park for his province, his constituents. Meanwhile, in Quebec, we get documents in quadruplicate saying that if we had agreed on the length of the fish-tails or on water temperatures in Celsius, if the second town clerk or the deputy minister had been willing, then—and allow me, Mr. Speaker to answer fully to the question—we would have had a park. But no, we get only excuses. In Quebec we get documents in quadruplicate when what we want are real parks of the type they get in British Columbia. Here is something concrete to deal with, why do not you do it? The example of the other hon. member is the best we can give? It has taken him five years, but he has done it.

For that, I congratulate him. I know people in British Columbia will applaud him. They will say he, as a member of Parliament, fulfilled his duty to his riding, his constituents, his province. We should do the same for Quebec, but this is the rub. Instead of that, they have studies, discussions; they try to have federal-provincial agreements with conditions unacceptable to Quebec. Let me remind you of the park in Gaspé, where discussions went on for five years because the conditions of the Liberal government at the time were unacceptable.

Today, the Conservative government uses the same tactics, the same language and the same officials—

Mr. Della Noce: Talk to the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Champagne): The member for Laval-Est. Order please. This is the questions and comments period, but the member for Richelieu seems to be repeating a good part of the speech he gave a while ago.

Considering that we wish, on both sides of this House, to respect the periods of time allotted, if he has a question I will give the floor to the member for Terrebonne. The member for Richelieu will certainly be able to give, in his answer, sensible advice or judicious precisions on the content of his speech.

The hon. member for Terrebonne may ask a question.

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have this opportunity to be able to make a few comments regarding the remarks made by the flamboyant member for Richelieu.

As we were able to judge, it seems that the Plamondon family is artistically inclined, especially when it comes to show business. However, I would just like to make a few comments.

A moment ago, the member for Richelieu mentioned that the Bloc Quebecois members would go and get the marine park. It should not be forgotten that the man who was in charge of the Saguenay marine park project is the Bloc Quebecois leader who was environment minister at that time. So, if the matter is not settled today, let us not forget that it would have been possible for the then environment minister, the present Bloc Quebecois leader, to settle the matter.

Second of all, the Bloc Quebecois members are wondering if, as Quebec Tory members, we would go and get projects such as the marine park.

Through our presence in this Chamber, and it is easy to know when the member for Richelieu shows up here, just about once a month, we hardly ever see him here—Mr. Speaker, I am nearly finished.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Champagne): I think the hon. member for Terrebonne is well aware that we cannot mention which hon. members are present in the House and which are not.

Mr. Lapierre: Come on.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Champagne): Would the hon. member for Shefford please let me finish. I think you have a lot of decorum in that respect.

Mr. Rocheleau: But he is insulting us quite a lot.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Champagne): I think the hon. member for Hull—Aylmer is in no position to give anyone a lesson. Therefore, I will say to the hon. member for Terrebonne that we must keep the decorum and proceed. This debate is extremely interesting and, for the benefit of all Canadians, we should put our personal squabbles aside and deal with the legislation that is before this House.

Mr. Robitaille: Mr. Speaker, I will respect the decorum, but contrary to my colleague from Richelieu, I will also comply with your requirements. I just wanted to stress the fact that the member for Richelieu is rising to talk about this issue for the first time since he became a member of this House.

My question is very simple. In his speech, the member seemed to imply or would have us believe that, when it comes to the creation of national parks, the federal government negotiates with Quebec according to different rules or using different approaches than those he applies when negotiating with British Columbia or any other province.

Is the member for Richelieu in a position to illustrate quite clearly how the federal government does in fact use a different method with Quebec as compared to all the other provinces?

Mr. Plamondon: First, I would like to say to my hon. friend that the bill he mentioned, when he said I did not intervene in this matter, was presented this morning. In fact, it was adopted at full speed all stages at once. This then is the first day of debate. So do not tell me I did not intervene.

Second, he spoke to our leader, during the first part of his speech, and said that it was the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean who started this debate, who first dealt with this matter when he was Minister of the Environment. After he left, you fell asleep, and the matter was put on the back burner.

Now, as for federal-provincial agreements, we are not interested in agreements, paragraphs and what have you. We want to talk about results obtained by preceding governments. Since the creation of the National Parks Committee, three parks were established in Quebec of a total of 35, the equivalent of 1 per cent of the province's territory. These are facts showing that members of Parliament and the Minister of Environment are not doing their job. The only time we spoke of creating a park in Quebec was when the member for Lac-Saint-Jean was Minister of the Environment. That is the only time we spoke of creating a park in Quebec. Maybe we will get it one of these days, thanks to the remarkable work done by the member for Lac-Saint-Jean when he was minister, because since then nothing has happened.

Mr. Speaker, how long do I have left? Two minutes, I believe.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Champagne): The hon. member for Skeena wishes to put a question to the hon. member for Richelieu. He can do it as long as it is very short because there is really no time left. The member for Richelieu can also give a very brief answer after.

[English]

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I would like to know whether or not the member for Richelieu is aware that by holding up this legislation this afternoon, in light of the fact that a referendum took place on the Queen Charlotte Islands in the Haïda nation two years ago and that the Haïda nation is a sovereign nation that he is dealing with, if it is directly bearing on Bill C-59 and if this legislation is held up, not only will the Haïda withdraw from this enabling legislation for the agreement to effect Gwaii Haanas, but what these members have been talking about, particularly the member for Richelieu, this national park reserve, will no longer be a national park reserve. It is a national park reserve that was broadly supported by Canadians living in Quebec. It was broadly supported by Canadians in every province and both territories and this is a sovereign nation. If he reflected for a moment, he would see that the cause he claims to justly represent here in the House today is the one that is doing the most damage to another sovereign nation.

• (1350)

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Champagne): The hon. member for Richelieu must give a very brief answer since the ten minute period has now elapsed.

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, I am surprised to hear the hon. member say that I am delaying the debate. I am participating in the debate as requested by my constituents and according to my mandate as a member of Parliament. I participate by bringing in my arguments, just like any other member. I have often been refused the right to speak. Pursuant to the rules, I have the right today to talk on this bill, which I support. In fact, I hope that it will be passed and I would even propose that the House obtain unanimous consent to sit on Monday, in order to carry on that debate and have this bill passed as quickly as possible according to the usual rules.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Champagne): The 10-minute period has now elapsed. Debate. The hon. member for Megantic—Compton—Stanstead.

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is with some concern that I have been following the debate since this morning. The remarks made by the members from across are often disrespectful toward the members of the Bloc Quebecois, and I wish to remind you of a government motion moved on November 21, 1991 asking that this House recognize that it is the national forum for the consideration of issues and challenges facing all Canadians; that this House recognize that its members were elected by the people of Canada to represent them in a manner which demands that individual members respect one another and their democratic right to express differing opinions; that Canadians have expressed alarm at the excessive partisanship and lack of decorum and civility too often in evidence in the House.

That is not all. I ask the hon. member for Laval to listen to me. That this House recognize that disruptive behaviour and verbal interruptions, including abusive language, leads to a depreciated view of and respect for the institution of Parliament and its members.

This motion was moved for a reason. It is because Canadians no longer believe in their institutions. Right now, the Mulroney government stands at about 12 or 13 per cent in the polls. Why? Why is this government's popularity so low? It is because this government and its members act irresponsibly and Canadians as well as Quebecers stopped believing in them more than two years ago.

I left this government about two years ago, almost to the day, and I suggest to the members across to read again—

[English]

Mr. Fulton: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I believe we are debating Bill C–59. There are certain rules of relevance which are noted in Beauchesne and which are noted in the traditions of this House. I would hope that the member would at least make some attempt to at some point say something relevant in relation to the agreements we are talking about with the Cree of Wood Buffalo National Park and the Haïda people of Gwaii Haanas.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Standstead also got a very clear message. I would ask him, if he could, to make his remarks relevant to the second reading of the bill.

Mr. Gérin: Madam Speaker, I did listen to the hon. member for Skeena, but what I do not understand is why my comments are not relevant to the issue under study. That is what I do not understand, but anyway, I want to continue with my speech.

These interruptions are made with one purpose in mind. They are used to destabilize the speaker. They are used, at a specific time, to interrupt the thread of the speech so that, in the end, Canadians who are watching may believe the speaker was not very coherent. It is an old trick, a very old trick.

That is why the minister moved his motion in the House on November 21, 1991, asking members to put an end to such verbal interruptions which prevent a member to make a speech when all his or her attention is focused on it.

There is one thing I can tell you, Madam Speaker. I want people to recognize that I can have my own different view on this bill for various reasons. Let me give you one. Today, we heard a lot of talk mainly during speeches but also through points of order about the absolute necessity to pass this bill on second reading, in committee of the whole and on third reading today. I do not agree.

I may be ready to extend the sitting today in order to facilitate second reading. I would even be ready to come back on Monday to finish this item. I would be agreeable to that.

I have questions I want to ask about this bill and questions about links between this and other issues I am concerned about, but I do not think I can get answers today. I realize that the hon. member for Skeena is interested in having this bill passed unamended, but members of the Bloc Quebecois were not consulted about this procedure today.

Members of the Bloc Quebecois want to participate actively in discussions on the business of this House in order to be more efficient and more useful—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Skeena on a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Fulton: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I was not consulted on the procedures affecting this piece of legislation either, but I believe there are certain rules of relevance. I know now that there are several thousand people in British Columbia watching this debate. It has been put on the CEN national network to make sure that people tune in just to see how totally irrelevant and incompetent members of the Bloc Quebecois really are.

Mr. Lapierre: Madam Speaker, now I understand why the hon. member for Skeena is making those frivolities.

[Translation]

The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead has the right to speak in this House. It is amazing, but each time someone else intervenes, the same rules no longer apply. Therefore, what I would like is that we let the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead make his speech, like we did for the hon. member for Skeena, who was allowed to conclude even though he attributed motives to several of us. We would ask that he shows toward the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead the same respect as we did in his case.

On top of that, I would like to present a motion. I move that the House sits next Monday. I ask for the unanimous consent of the House, Madam Speaker. If the hon. member for Skeena is serious, instead of being on holidays, he will be here with us next Monday to follow up on the debate. I therefore ask for the unanimous consent of the House and propose that the House sits on next Monday, despite its regular agenda. We are ready to give up our parliamentary recess to follow up on the debate. I therefore ask for the unanimous consent.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I believe the hon. member for Shefford, who has made it his duty these last few years to learn the procedure in its most subtle details, knows full well this is not the type of motion he can propose on a point of order, unless of course there is unanimous consent of the House. However, I have already heard some nays.

• (1400)

[English]

Mr. Fulton: Madam Speaker, on a point of order. The member for Shefford told me in the lobby with others present that he and the Bloc intended to hold up the passage of this piece of legislation to try to use political blackmail to get a seat on the referendum committee.

That is not how this House is supposed to operate. He is attempting to use my constituents as some kind of political fodder for some other kind of juvenile game he and the others are involved in.

At some point, I just call upon the members of the Bloc, such as the member for Shefford, to show some sense of decency, justice and honesty toward other Canadians. This Chamber is to serve the Haïda people. It is to serve the people of Quebec. It is not just to serve the petty self-interests of people like—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately, I think we are now getting into a debate. It is not really a point of order and it is not productive either.

I can quite understand the deception which the hon. member for Skeena feels at this time. However, as long as we are proceeding with debate and we are not into totally dilatory motions, the Chair cannot and will not stop the debate. I would like us to keep on and try to debate the bill which is in front of the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, I believe the hon. member for Skeena is making very serious allegations.

In fact, we do want to take part fully in this debate. It is obvious that the government House leader pretended to have unanimous consent in order to proceed at all three stages without consulting us.

What I said to the hon. member for Skeena is that if we do not exist for the referendum legislation, if we do not exist for consultations, we will show that we indeed exist for debate purposes. Consequently, we are happy to take part in this debate.

So I would like to ask the member for Skeena why he wants to apply closure, since he says that this bill is so important to him? No one has had the decency to consult us, not him, not the government, not the Minister of the Environment, nobody. They did not do their job.

Mrs. Venne: Madam Speaker, I would like to add something to what my colleague from Shefford just said. The member for Skeena made allegations to the effect that we were trying to blackmail the government in an attempt to have a seat on the legislative committee on the referendum bill and that we would be trying again. He even mentioned the name of a member from the Bloc and the Bloc as a party. I am concerned and I want the member for Skeena to take back what he said.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Two opinions have been voiced in the House, one by the hon. member for Skeena and another one by the hon. members for Shefford and Saint-Hubert.

The Chair is not in a position not to believe either one, so it is a matter of debate. It is not a point of order. I think we should go on with the debate. The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead had the floor.

Mr. Gérin: Madam Speaker, I assume the time used for those points of order will not be counted in my 20 minutes. Would it be possible for you to tell me how much time I have left?

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is right, that time will not be counted in his 20 minutes. So the hon. member has 12 minutes left.

Mr. Gérin: We cannot take a problem out of its context. I will ask the hon. member for Skeena to listen very carefully to what I have to say. I think that he is an intelligent man so he will understand that we cannot simply isolate a problem and do as if the rest of the world did not exist. I will give him two examples. He is upset today because we are using up the time. Would he be upset if they had done to him and his party what they have done to us on the referendum legislation, by imposing closure and making sure that the only opposition to this legislation had no member in the legislative committee, by denying most of the Bloc Quebecois members the opportunity to speak on this legislation and gagging them? Imagine his anger. It would be obvious.

My second point is this, Madam Speaker. There are a couple of small lakes too in your riding. There are many in mine. There is the Memphremagog Lake, the Massawippi Lake, the Megantic Lake, of course, just to name the major ones, but there are about fifteen lakes in my riding. There are many federal wharves on these lakes, under the management of the small craft harbour branch. Almost every community has some, maybe not in Laval or downtown Montreal, but there are wharfs in a rural riding like mine.

Well, this was at the time when the federal government was overly generous and was building wharfs here and there, and everybody was happy with that—

An hon. member: The time of the nerds.

Mr. Gérin: Yes, the time of the nerds. It was incredible. The wharfs were under federal management, and they had lots of public servants to manage them. It was not making any sense whatsoever. Those wharfs require much maintenance and much repair. Often after 20 or 30 years, they have to be totally rebuilt. Now, with increasing public deficits, there is no money left for that.

Mr. Della Noce: You have to tell people why.

Mr. Gérin: Just wait and see what I am getting at. The member for Laval-Est should pay attention. At some point, there was a policy to hand those wharfs over to municipalities. Then, the government was committing itself to do that. Here is what I am getting at: this whole policy has been put aside lately, last fall, at the hon. member for Yellowhead's request. It has been put aside until the constitutional issue is settled.

An hon. member: Come on. This is almost blackmail.

Mr. Plamondon: This has been confirmed to me by letter. You see what I am getting at?

[English]

Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris): Madam Speaker, on a point of order, I draw your attention to the fact that the remarks of the hon. member are not germane to the legislation. I think you understand that he indeed has a responsibility to speak to the bill.

If the hon. member and his colleagues are as concerned about the legislation as they claim to be, then surely they would wish to discuss the legislation as proposed. By the way, it was not introduced into this House today. In fact, I believe it was introduced and given first reading on February 20.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérin: But, Madam Speaker, if, in the case of federal wharfs, we ask that all municipalities postpone any purchase or takeover, to their great displeasure, why could we not do the same for the establishment of a national park? Why do we treat Quebec differently from any other province?

I just mean to say that the member for Skeena is asking us today to consider one park separately and to ask ourselves if we are in favour of it. From that perspective, of course we are.

The member for Richelieu and the member for Shefford stated that this issue was too broad. Yes, we are in favour of that park, but we are also in favour of the marine park. So, why restrict the issue? Yes, we agree that municipal governments should take over federal wharfs and get a compensation from the federal government. But we are against the federal government delaying all of that until a constitutional agreement is reached. It is unacceptable.

• (1410)

If it is unacceptable for Quebec, it is also unacceptable for British Columbia. But the fact that it is done only in one province and not in others is particularly unacceptable. That is what this bill does and that is why I ask not to restrict the issue. It must absolutely be looked at in its entirety.

Earlier, the member for Shefford talked at length, among other things, about what would happen if one province or another became sovereign. Who would take charge of the costs? Who would pay for the debts and all those things? That is certainly an important issue.

Yesterday the government passed legislation on the referendum issue. That legislation affects such an important and fundamental issue which is the Constitution of our country. In all the speeches, I heard members talk about the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. That legislation that was passed has no relation whatsoever with, for example, this bill under study or any other bill that it will table. Listen, the Constitution of the country and the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms are fundamental issues. They underlie everything else. You cannot just take something like that and throw it at us. Today, because of this piece-work administration of many years by this government, we have a huge deficit, we have unemployment, we have a recession and all of that. The government's administration must absolutely be looked at as a whole.

[English]

Mr. MacDougall: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, we have a bill before this House and I think that the member should be speaking to the bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérin: Madam Speaker, I have sometimes the feeling I am speaking into deaf ears in this House, but Canadians and the Quebecers who are listening to us understand what I mean.

When it is explained to a Quebecer that we have three national parks in Quebec out of 35 there are not many who do not understand that. When they are told that there is one-third of one per cent of the area of Canadian national parks which is on Quebec's territory, there are not many Quebecers who do not understand that.

There is none so deaf as he who will not hear. That is for sure. As far as I am concerned, it is not with repeated interruptions that you are going to upset me or have me change my tune. It is not for that reason either that we are going to proceed at top speed or otherwise. I think there is a message to deliver, and the main point I wanted to make concerns the constitutional problem. In Quebec, they are delaying the settlement of many issues. In my riding alone, there are at least 10 issues which are important for the municipalities, dealing with the Department of Fisheries and Oceans about the matter of small boats. They are postponed with the excuse or the official reason that this situation will last as long as the constitutional matter is not settled.

Government acts like that for the wharfs. A wharf is a tiny bit of territory, sometimes 30 feet by 30 feet. We are not talking about a national park which extends over thousands and thousands of square. So, for a tiny area of 30 feet by 30 feet which is important for a municipality such as Lac Megantic, ir says the matter is completely settled, but it will be finalized when the constitutional problem is solved.

When we get to the park which is at issue in this bill, then it is okay to set aside hundreds of thousands of square. Because it is not in Quebec. But when we deal with, for example, the marine park, then we hit a brick wall because it is in Quebec. You think that I am against the creation of a reserve or a park in British Columbia? On the contrary, it pleases me. I am very happy for them.

I am very happy for the member who worked toward it. I am happy for the people of British Columbia. I would think that the provincial government was advised. But as a member for Quebec, I demand to be treated the same way, I resent being cajoled into giving my agreement, very rapidly, suddenly and at once, on a Friday afternoon when everybody knows that generally there is hardly anyone in this Chamber. On top of that, the day before, I was gagged on a most important question, which is perhaps at the root of the reason I am here in Ottawa with the Bloc Quebecois, I mean the Quebec sovereignty issue. I am gagged on an extremely important issue and then they try to cajole me from the other end of the country. Well, good for them. All I am asking for is fairness, as my colleague for Richelieu said, fairness. That is what it is all about, fairness. No need to make phone calls to Sept-Îles for that. No need at all. That is it, Madam Speaker.

I will now conclude since I know that I have very little time left. I will conclude somewhat like the member for Shefford a moment ago. Let us take the time to review this bill. Let us not rush it through. Let us look closely at the powers that will be conferred upon the Governor in Council, the powers that we will be giving the Governor in Council. Let us try to look at what will happen to this reserve in, say, 10 or 15 years. Let us try not to create another white elephant. Let us try to plan so as to avoid any horrendous problems in the future. We must never engage in piecemeal management. Let us try to look at the question as a whole.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Comments or questions? The hon. parliamentary secretary. The hon. member for Richelieu wants to raise a point of order.

Mr. Plamondon: I am positive, Madam Speaker, that three members from this side rose from their seats before the parliamentary secretary.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has been in this House since 1984. He knows that the normal procedure, after a speech, is to allow a question from someone from another political party. The member for Skeena and the parliamentary secretary rose at the same moment. As it is my prerogative to decide, I choose to recognize someone from another party at this time. I think it is fair and just according to the rules and customs of our House. The hon. parliamentary secretary, please.

[English]

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, the hon. member and some of his colleagues have referred to the very appropriate role played by their now leader when he was Minister of the Environment, the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean.

Does the hon. member really believe that the position taken by himself and his colleagues today is consistent with that of their leader?

On May 4, 1990 the then Minister of the Environment wrote to Miles Richardson and said: "Together we have crafted a truly innovative and creative approach. I have made this one of my highest priorities and I have ensured that every effort was made to find accommodations, despite the complexities and the risks so that we could proceed quickly with the management of this spectacular natural area".

Later on he said: "During our meetings I felt that we shared the same strong desire to have the agreement ratified by the special Haïda assembly now scheduled for May 5 so we could move ahead in the spirit of co-operation that characterizes the agreement".

I would ask the hon. member whether the obstructive tactics they are displaying this afternoon in trying to prevent the passage of a very important bill is in any way consistent with the very appropriate flexibility and innovative spirit which their hon. leader was displaying in this particular communication of May 4, 1990.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérin: Madam Speaker, I totally agree with the member for Lac-Saint-Jean.

I do not know if you explained to him why the government tabled this bill for first reading on February 20, 1992? As far as I know, this is the end of May. What did the government do during these three months to prevent the passing of this bill? Why does it now want to rush it through in one day? What is the point of all this?

This colleague and I once sat on the same side of this House, and I respect him very much, but I just want to draw his attention to one thing. He is furious today because of what he thinks is a filibuster. Imagine how furious we are now that the government gagged us and denied us the right to sit on the legislative committee on the referendum bill. Could he help us? Yesterday, he voted to exclude us; he voted for the gag. We were alone; 177 against 9.

Why did he have that attitude yesterday and a different one today? Because the roles have changed? This is something I do not understand in the member's attitude.

[English]

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I would like to address a question to the member. He does not seem to have been listening with care to what I think has been a fairly carefully articulated history of the situation in relation to Gwaii Haanas. I would like to sum it up for him again and hear his views on it. I think Canadians who watch this debate or read this debate need to know what is really going on here.

As the parliamentary secretary has quite properly mentioned, the hon. member for Lac–Saint–Jean was the former Minister of the Environment. I had many meetings with him. Miles Richardson had many meetings with him. There was an intense period of negotiations. An agreement was ultimately put by referendum to the Haïda people of Haïda Gwaii in relation to the Gwaii Haanas archipelago question.

The referendum took place two years and seventeen days ago. The period for implementation of the referendum ran out on May 5 of this year. The legislation presently before us was brought before this House on February 20 of this year. It was only yesterday that the government House leader found an opportunity as I understand it, and that is up to him, to explain why that was possible. But I cancelled my travel arrangements to go to my constituency to make sure that this important piece of legislation was put in place.

It is enabling legislation. What it does is it enables Crown Canada to enter into an agreement with the sovereign Haïda nation for the joint administration of what is presently known as the South Moresby National Park Reserve.

The point I want to ask the member about is what one of his members said. I have raised this before and it has not been denied. There were others present when the member for Shefford said that he was planning along with the Bloc to hold this legislation up, not to allow it to pass today, knowing that there would not likely be an opportunity this month because the House is not sitting next week. This will violate the terms of agreement of the Haïda referendum.

There is a question the member must address as a member of Parliament, not as a member from Quebec. As a member of this House he serves all Canadians. He serves the members of the Haïda nation. Does he think this is appropriate in the last 40 minutes available for this bill probably before next September? It will mean the end of the national park reserve and the end of the agreement because the referendum has taken place and it is binding. Is this fair to the Haïda people who are watching this debate, for reasons that simply are not now deliverable? The government House leader is not in the House. He is not going to approve in the next 40 minutes a seat on the referendum committee; he is not going to do it. The only people being punished are the Haïda people. Does he understand that? Yes or no?

[Translation]

Mr. Gérin: It is really a shame that some get into petty politics like the member for Skeena just did.

It seems to me that the level of debate in this House could be raised a little. He is the one who gagged us yesterday. I mean the member for Skeena. I know he was here and voted to gag us, to gag the province of Quebec, to gag the Quebec interests. Today, he is insulted because it concerns British Columbia. Well, so be it. We are insulted as well when something concerns us Quebecers.

Tell me why they could use the constitutional problem as an excuse for not dealing with 10 harbours for small boats in my constituency but not when it comes to British Columbia? Tell me why. Give me a good reason for that.

Mr. Rocheleau: Is this on debate, Madam Speaker?

Madam Deputy Speaker: No, there are still three minutes left. I am very careful with the timing. The hon. member for Longueuil. Questions and comments.

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): I listened to my colleague when he talked about small harbours. He was telling us how tough it was to have small harbours transferred from the federal to the municipal level, because the federal government thought the constitutional debate was not over yet.

Personally, what also concerns me is that we agree to create such an important park in British Columbia without knowing the outcome of the constitutional talks.

This is because Mr. Ovide Mercredi, chief of the Canadian nations, is negotiating full time for native self-determination in Canada and agreements concerning this park will have to be reached between the federal government, the park authorities and the natives. I am wondering why we are in such a hurry to pass this bill this afternoon and to establish this park.

There is something else we have to worry about. We will have to examine the assets and liabilities if Quebec ever becomes sovereign. In this period of frenzied constitutional talks, we will have to assess the assets and liabilities of Quebec, as well as everything that province invested in Canada over the last 125 years. Quebecers will have to get their hands on those assets in order to pay for whatever liabilities they will owe.

I do not think we should be in a hurry to pass this bill today. We should Wait, and that is the question I want to put to my colleague. We should wait until after October, that is not so far away, before settling the issue. Then, we will not have to think about dividing the assets and liabilities and understanding at the same time the real position of the natives, and especially of Ovide Mercredi, chief of the First Nations.

There is something wrong here. I felt it as soon as I learned that this bill was being debated today. There is something that does not quite fit, something I cannot quite figure out. Why are we in such a hurry?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, but I have to interrupt the hon. member, since the question and comment period is over.

Resuming debate, the hon. member for Hull–Aylmer.

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Madam Speaker, before I start, could we please follow Standing Order 29(3)? I would like hon. members to hear some of the remarks I have to make about this bill.

And the count having been taken:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order, please. We have a quorum. Would the honorable member for Hull—Aylmer withdraw what he just said about one of his colleagues. I heard it very clearly and it is unacceptable in this Chamber. No one can be accused of lying.

• (1430)

Mr. Rocheleau: Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Laval said I did not show up in the House for the whole week. That is a lie because I was here Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and I am here today.

Mr. Lapierre: Withdraw.

Mr. Rocheleau: Let him withdraw his words, and I will withdraw mine.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I believe there is another way to correct an hon. member when such a mistake is made. The hon. member knows full well that the word he used is unparliamentary. Even if someone makes a mistake, one can always point out to that person that a mistake has been made, without making accusations and using unparliamentary words in the House.

I would ask the hon. member I had recognized for debate, and whom I will recognize for debate after, to start by doing the honourable thing, that is to withdraw the unparliamentary words he pronounced, after which he will be able to continue.

Mr. Rocheleau: Madam Speaker, I wish to withdraw the words I said with respect to the hon. member for Laval, but I would like to say that he was not very kind to me, because I was here Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday. I had an engagement yesterday, and I am back today to speak precisely on this bill.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. member for doing the honourable thing and rectifying what could have left a false impression on the House.

I will now recognize him for debate.

Mr. Plamondon: We have gentlemen in our party.

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Madam Speaker, thank you for recognizing me on Bill C-59. I am not against this bill, but I have some concerns about it. We have been talking about it for a while and, indeed, it was given first reading some two months ago—

An hon. member: More like three months.

Mr. Rocheleau: —maybe more, three months. It was in February, but I do not remember the exact date. Then the government chose today, Friday, May 22, to shove this bill down our throats and have it read a second time, without amendments, passed at third reading and done with.

We could ask ourselves a few questions about our national parks, and indeed some were asked during this debate. It has been said that there are 35 national parks in Canada, including three in Quebec. The hon. member for Laval said that the reason we did not have any more in Quebec was because the province was unwilling to give some land to the federal government in order to set up national parks.

I would like to remind members that in the Ottawa area the Gatineau Park belongs to the federal government and is managed by the National Capital Commission. This is our backyard. We have special concerns and this brings me to ask a few questions on some parts of Bill C-59.

Section 8.5(4) says that the Governor in Council may make regulations respecting the carrying on of traditional renewable resource harvesting and aboriginal cultural activities on the reserve. The budget for the Gatineau Park, a park which has been in existence for years, has been cut over the years because of government spending restrictions. This brings me to ask a few questions.

When the government tables a concrete bill on national parks, I want to ask some questions and get some answers. Will the government recognize its responsibilities afterward? Will it accept those responsibilities? Will it provide the necessary funds that are requested?

I make a comparison between Bill C-59 and the Gatineau Park where, just a few years ago, an agreement was reached between the municipality of Lapêche, formerly Masham, and the National Capital Commission for the Gatineau Park regarding the access to Lac Philippe.

Agreements were reached through regulations to allow users to use the access road to Lac Philippe, that is the residents of the municipality of Masham. This year they want to charge a $5 fee everytime people use the road that goes to Lac Philippe.

Yet the regulations did not provide for a fee to property residents in the Lac Philippe area, who have always employed free access to the interior of Gatineau Park.

Bill C-59 provides no guarantee, and I have not heard anything today in the House confirming that the government will fulfil its commitments, accept its responsibilities and recognize the regulations that it proposes to make.

I use that as an example because we have a park in our area. Last year, the National Capital Commission wanted to close for the winter an important access road between Gamelin Boulevard and Taché Boulevard, on its property in the park. The NCC simply wanted to close access to citizens who use that road every day. I had to personally ask the Minister of Public Works, who is the minister responsible for the National Capital Commission, to allow citizens to have access to that very important road.

I am not opposed to this bill. On the contrary, it could suit the First Nations and it is obvious that the First Nations have been experiencing particular equity problems in Canada for many years. If they have been experiencing those problems it is because of the governments that were in power. It is not my fault.

I might add that they will experience more problems, because the government wants to force the passing of a bill like this on a Friday afternoon, go through second and third reading, and not allow any amendment. We cannot protect the parks that we are concerned about in Quebec. One wonders if this is not simply part of a constitutional package to please the aboriginal people so that they will be understanding and accept gracefully the constitutional offers and therefore allow for some solution.

If it was simply that, there would be no problem. We would have solved that minor issue a long time ago.

We referred to the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean when he was Minister of the Environment and dealt, among other things, with the Saguenay marine park.

• (1440)

In fact, it has been over two years now that the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean quit his job as a minister, and we are still waiting for the confirmation of those agreements concerning the marine park in Quebec. We, from the Bloc Quebecois, are not the ones who opposed that project, who put a spoke in the wheels. Not at all. Is it because this park would be in Quebec? Is it because it would be in a riding represented by a Pequiste member in the National Assembly that this government refuses to give its consent to these agreements, to initial them, Madam Speaker? These are all questions that we can ask ourselves, without being accused of wanting to block this bill. This week, we had Bill C-81 before us. Yet, although it was an important bill, because its purpose was to provide a Canada-wide referendum, our government applied closure. Today, we have Bill C-59 before the House—

Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Terrebonne just insulted me in this House. If you did not hear him, I will repeat what he said for you. He said that I spoke badly. This is not acceptable in this House. Therefore, I would like him to come back from behind the curtains, where he usely hides, to apologize.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I cannot interrupt or shout at a member that I do not hear. I think the hon. member can understand I did not hear a word. And I cannot act now since—

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): Point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member for Longueuil could wait for me to sit down before raising a point of order.

Mr. Robitaille: Point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Terrebonne.

Mr. Robitaille: Madam Speaker, as you can see, the member for Hull—Aylmer is hearing voices.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I will need 10 seconds to figure out what the hon. member for Hull—Aylmer just said.

Unfortunately, as I just told the hon. member, I did not personally hear any remark which would have been unparliamentary. Anyway, even if the words used in a comment or remark are not in Beauchesne, when an expression causes any trouble in the House, the member concerned is asked to apologize.

As for now, I did not hear any unparliamentary remarks. However, I can promise the member I will check the transcript of the debates. If in fact there are reasons to ask some members to take back their words, I commit myself to do so as soon as possible. I hope this will suit the hon. member for Hull-Aylmer, whom I recognize again.

Mr. Rocheleau: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I forgive the hon. member for Terrebonne for what he said about me. It is unfortunate. He simply wanted to stop me while I was raising points in this House, some points that I consider very important. I do not think that I hurt anybody's feelings when I tried to explain the problem that that bill raises in regard to other national parks. Furthermore, the Bloc Quebecois supports the bill. But we cannot accept to have a fast one pulled on us and be silenced.

We have so few opportunities to speak in this House that when we do have a chance, we ask questions. I would like to take, for instance, section 8.5(2) and 8.5(1).

We read:

> The description of Wood Buffalo National Park set out in Part I of Schedule I to the said Act is amended by adding thereto the following:
> > Saving and accepting thereout and therefrom all those lands lying within Peace Point Indian Reserve No. 222 as shown on plan 71 277 recorded in the Canada Lands Surveys Records at Ottawa, a copy of which is filed in the Land Titles Office at Edmonton.

It says together with all mines and minerals, the remainder containing about so many square kilometres. The question arises, whether prospecting rights are included in the rest of the territory. Such questions come to mind because in Gatineau Park, which is the responsibility of the National Capital Commission, mineral exploration is prohibited.

Everything is prohibited. In the seventies we had snowmobile trails in the park which were a boon to the industry in Quebec, including companies like Bombardier. This particular use was prohibited. Two years ago people who wanted to use the park at no extra cost could no longer do so. I am referring to cross-country skiers, for instance, who now have to pay if they want to use the park in the winter. That is on the Quebec side.

On the Ontario side, people can skate on the Rideau Canal and it does not cost a cent, but it does on the Quebec side, where it is a federal park. Does this mean that after the regulations to Bill C-59 have been drawn up with the municipalities, they will simply block all these measures? Will they say that the government is no longer participating so you have to pay the whole shot?

Will the Haïda have to absorb the costs in the long run? Who is going to pay for maintenance, improvements and operating costs? It says here in the recommendation that His Excellency the Governor General recommends to the House of Commons the appropriation of public revenue under the circumstances, in the manner and for the purposes set out in a measure entitled "an Act to amend the National Parks Act".

There is an undertaking here to appropriate public moneys. If the government cuts, as has been the case in so many programs, in previous budgets and in this year's budget, for instance, $1 million in subsidies to the Outaouais Transport Commission were cut for transfers across the river between CTCRO and OC Transpo. Last week, the Minister of the Environment said that the transition period was over and the annual $1 million subsidy would no longer be paid. I am sorry but this was not a transitional measure. It was compensation, because in 1970, the city of Hull allowed the federal government to build federal buildings with fewer parking spaces in return for $1 million in compensation annually, to be applied to public transit.

Mr. Gérin: I did not know that.

Mr. Rocheleau: This year, the Minister of the Environment said: the transition period is over. It was not a transition .In Bill C-59, we see the kind of regulations the government might impose. Will he do what he did in Gatineau Park to the people in Lapêche? Will he do what he did to the cross-country skiers who use Gatineau Park in the winter, charging them $5 a day to use the ski trails?

An hon. member: That is a good point.

• (1450)

Will it simply remove these subsidies when the government no longer feels like paying because it is wasting too much money on other things? These are all questions that arise when we consider Bill C-59, and I am raising them now—

[English]

Mr. Fulton: Madam Speaker, I have listened with care to the member and those members of the Bloc who spoke before him. In particular, this member has never said the word "Haïda", has never said "Haïda Gwaii", and has never mentioned "Gwaii Haanas". He has never mentioned anything to do with the legislation we are dealing with, and he is simply holding up a very important piece of legislation for some kind of personal political gain.

I think the rules of relevance should be used at this point.

[Translation]

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, without denying the importance of the points some members want to raise this afternoon, I think that it would still be possible, if the House agreed, to pass this bill through all stages if we proceeded immediately. That means there are still about 10 minutes to do it, if the House agrees.

In his point of order, the hon. member for Skeena just raised the whole issue of relevance and the time would be right to raise it. Of course all hon. members have the right to express themselves, but, Madam Speaker, we must recognize that a native community is affected by this and I know something about it—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell was really turning it into a debate and not a question of procedure.

[English]

I also listened very carefully to the hon. member for Skeena, and I must tell him that I do have a very difficult problem at this time with the rule of relevancy.

As I usually do with all members in the House, whatever bill is in front of the House, I always try to give the member the benefit of the doubt and hope that somehow there will be, as shortly as possible, a link to the bill in front of the House.

The hon. member will know that occasionally members do stray from the subject of the bill to the point of irrelevancy. I do agree that today it is particularly difficult to follow at times.

Mr. Lapierre: Point of order, Madam Speaker. I know that the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and the member for Skeena are trying to portray the members of the Bloc Quebecois as trying to do something negative toward the Haïda people.

The House must realize that every one of these speeches has been in favour of the legislation, so there is nothing in the debate that is against anybody.

We share with the Haïda people the feeling of the tyranny of the majority. I know we could share together a lot frustrations, but we are not going to be—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is also getting into debate and this is not a point of order.

There are a little over two minutes remaining for the hon. member—

[Translation]

—for Hull—Aylmer.

Mr. Rocheleau: Madam Speaker, regrettably I must say that the member for Skeena is barely back in the House and he accuses me of not talking about Bill C-59. Throughout my speech, I compared the difficulties of the people out west with the situation in Gatineau Park, which the government had promised to subsidize and today is charging user fees. What I find regrettable in this House today, and I think you will agree with me, is the pushing through of a bill like this one. It is not because the Conservatives, the Liberals and the New Democrats are in agreement that they do not want to debate this legislation, but that the bill will ipso facto be rushed through like this in the House. Madam Speaker, you will have to accept the fact that, in this House, the Bloc Quebecois represents the higher interests of Quebec and I personally represent the interests of my constituency and constituents.

Quebec has not been a member of the Canadian federation since 1982. You are just as illegitimate as me.

In conclusion, I repeat again that we support this bill but that we fear this government. We fear that this government will not assume the responsibilities that are established in the bill and that once the legislation is passed, the regulations could be changed, which could result in major costs for the aboriginals and in particular the Haïdas.

It is in that context that I made my speech. If they pulled a fast one on us—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately, the time of the hon. member is now up.

[English]

Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris): Madam Speaker, because this is a very important issue, I would like to take just a moment to speak through you to the Haïda and to the Cree of Fort Chipewyan who are watching this debate. I would like to say to them that although I regret we have not been able to complete our task here this afternoon, which was indeed to pass the legislation in all stages, that all members of the House are supportive of the bill. I know when I say that I speak on behalf of the government and on behalf of—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately I must interrupt the hon. member. We will proceed with questions or comments.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Madam Speaker, my comment arises out of the remarks just made by the parliamentary secretary and indeed by the remarks made earlier by the member for Shefford.

The procedures in this House must appear somewhat opaque if not strange to those who are watching. They certainly are to me. Not only are we dealing here with rules that are steeped in history, but there are many agendas that are being played out in this House at this time.

There is one thing that ought to be very clear, and I say this to the Fort Chipewyan Cree and to the people of the Haïda nation, and that is that all members in this House, without exception, support this bill. The parliamentary secretary has said it, the members of the Liberal opposition have done it, the member for Skeena has been very articulate and indeed the member for Shefford has expressed it on behalf of the Bloc.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin: We all support this bill and let the Chipewyan Cree and the people of the Haïda nation understand that very clearly. We are with them. We are one.

[Translation]

Mr. Rocheleau: Madam Speaker, we confirm on this side, that is the same side as the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard—

An hon. member: The Bloc Quebecois.

Mr. Rocheleau: The Bloc Quebecois confirms that it supports Bill C-59. But the government must not do to that nation what it does to the Quebec nation, that is to ridicule it in this House and wait at the last minute, on a Friday afternoon, to force the passing of a bill about which we have questions to ask. It is not we who call the shots here; it is the government which tabled its bill on a Friday afternoon.

An hon. member: Three months later!

Mr. Rocheleau: Yes, three months later.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being three o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

REMEMBRANCE DAY ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Wednesday, April 29, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth) that Bill C-289, an act to provide that Remembrance Day be included as a holiday in Public Service collective agreements, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to be able to speak today on Bill C-289, an act to provide that Remembrance Day be included as a holiday in the Public Service collective agreements.

Before commenting on this bill I would like to take this opportunity to commend my hon. colleague, the member for Dartmouth, for bringing forth this legislation.

Given the long-standing relationship between the Canadian Armed Forces and Canadians in his riding I am sure that many of his constituents are very interested in the objective of Bill C-289.

Remembrance Day in Canada is observed every November 11. This date marks the anniversary of the end of the First World War. On each November 11 Canadians pause to remember those who fought and gave their lives for their country in time of war.

We specifically remember those who fought for Canada in both world wars and in the Korean war. For veterans Remembrance Day is a very special and important day that is full of symbolism and emotion. Veterans and families across Canada remember comrades and relatives who did not return from battles fought in the defence of what we in Canada are so blessed to enjoy today.

Given the significance of Remembrance Day, a number of Canadians across the country find it disturbing that as time passes there is a tendency for some in our society to place less emphasis upon remembering Canada's war dead.

There is no doubt that the pressures and concerns in our daily lives can at times be overwhelming. However, we must never get caught up in our day to day lives to the extent of taking for granted the many things we have here in Canada and the way in which they were preserved for us by others in times of great peril.

The things we continue to enjoy today as citizens of Canada did not come about without a price. The price previous generations paid for our freedom and our way of life today was not cheap. Many of us in this House remember the Second World War and the difficult period that Canada and her allies went through until they achieved victory. We should never forget those who fought for Canada and never returned to enjoy the fruits of their victory.

Recently, many Canadians had the tragic opportunity to witness the destruction and horror of war as a result of the Persian Gulf conflict. While this war was short in duration compared to World War II live media coverage gave Canadians, and especially our youth, a vivid picture of war and the death it brings.

The concept of having a Remembrance Day holiday for every Canadian to remember the contributions and sacrifices their fellow Canadians made for our country should not be diminished in any way. However, as we have discovered, Remembrance Day is currently not considered a compulsory holiday for all employees of the federal government under the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

Bill C-289 seeks to correct this present situation. It will, if passed, ensure that Remembrance Day will become permanently entrenched as a statutory holiday for all non-essential federal public servants who have contracts negotiated under the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

However, there is some concern that Bill C-289 will not receive appropriate support from the government side. It is indeed hard to believe that there would be any question as to whether this bill would obtain the necessary support needed for it to be passed. Yet, unfortunately there is some doubt.

Recently I received a letter from Mr. John Lariviere, president of Royal Canadian Legion branch no. 357 in Finch, Ontario, which is located in my riding of Stormont—Dundas. In his letter, Mr. Lariviere writes that he has regretfully received word from Dominion Command that Bill C-289 is experiencing some difficulty in the House of Commons. He goes on to state that:

> Surely Canadian pride should warrant that one day to remember those who made the supreme sacrifice, is the least our country can do to honour their memory.

Mr. Lariviere also noted something which I am sure many Canadians will take very seriously.

In his opinion it appears strange that while our neighbours to the south accept the principle of remembrance as a basic fact of life Canada seems to be drifting in the opposite direction.

He concluded by stating that, and I quote:

> Our Prime Minister should recall his recent statements at Vimy Ridge and Dieppe and realize that now is the time to put those words into action.

I hope that members of the government will do just that and give their full support to Bill C-289.

I would like at this time to refer to another letter which was written by Mr. Jolleys, dominion president of the Royal Canadian Legion, to the Prime Minister on April 2, 1992. In this letter, Mr. Jolleys writes that the Government of Canada is attempting to block the process of Bill C-289, based on recommendations made to it by Treasury Board.

Apparently the Treasury Board has reservations regarding the impact this bill would have on future collective bargaining with Public Service unions. According to Mr. Jolleys, the Treasury Board seems to view the entrenchment of Remembrance Day in Public Service collective agreements as being tantamount to discarding a bargaining chip or a potentially negotiable benefit.

If the Treasury Board does indeed have such a view it would be one that is totally unacceptable to Canadians. As far as my colleagues in the Liberal Party and I are concerned the question of the observance or the non-observance of Remembrance Day should never be viewed as a question to be negotiated between labour and management in the federal Public Service. To do so would be an insult to Canada's war dead, their families and their memories. I am sure Canadians would not wish to see such a belittling of the day we set aside each year to honour those who served their country proudly and have fallen in battle.

Remembrance Day is currently a holiday for most federal public servants. However, it is not one for all public servants because it is not considered in some cases to be an automatic holiday. There are cases in which a holiday for Remembrance Day is currently a matter for negotiation. Bill C-289 seeks to correct this by ensuring that Remembrance Day will indeed be observed as a holiday by all employees of the federal government unless their work is deemed to be, as the bill states in clause 2:

essential for the public safety or public interest.

There is no doubt in my mind that the Canadian people would support the preservation of the honour and remembrance we bestow upon our country's war dead each November 11. However, I believe the federal government should, above all, be no less respectful.

By helping to pass Bill C–289 the government will prove beyond any doubt its commitment to the memory of Canadians who fought and gave their lives for their country.

In conclusion, I urge all members of this House to support Bill C–289. By passing this bill we will not only remove a very solemn day from the Public Service contract negotiating process, but more important we will be giving a clear signal that the federal government and this House of Commons will never forget the debt Canada owes to those who gave their lives for what we hold so dear.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and to Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Madam Speaker, I would also like to speak to Bill C–289 and take this opportunity to congratulate my colleague, the member for Dartmouth, for having tabled it. I believe nobody in this House is opposed to the principle of the bill.

All members will agree that Remembrance Day is a very important holiday, quite deserving of our attention and consideration. However, we must admit that we can do nothing more to increase the people's understanding and consciousness of the the event we commemorate on that day. Unfortunately, the content of Bill C–289 offers nothing new. It only proposes to guarantee civil servants a holiday on that day, but they already have that through—

Mr. Lapierre: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, I would like you to give me some information. I am told that the rules of the House provide that members will speak abundantly from the heart instead of inanely repeating a speech written by others. Does this rule still exist in our books?

Madam Deputy Speaker: You will recognize with me that that is indeed a somewhat archaic rule that existed. But I think that members are still allowed some notes to make it easier for them to express their views on a bill. The hon. member for Laval–Est.

Mr. Della Noce: Thank you, Madam Speaker. The hon. member just said "abundantly from the heart". I do not know if he still has one, considering all the foolish things he said this afternoon. I think it is getting to be—

• (1510)

Madam Deputy Speaker: I would appreciate if the hon. member for Laval–Est would make amends, withdraw comments which are not parliamentary and proceed with his speech.

Mr. Della Noce: Madam Speaker, I follow your suggestions and I withdraw. But I would like, if the hon. member will allow me, to continue reading from my notes. And if that bothers him, he will do as usual and just leave this House.

As I was saying earlier, this holiday is already in one collective agreement and is nothing new. So, if there is nothing new, we would legislate for the sake of legislating.

Parliament has already stated its position by accepting this Public Service Staff Relations Act. That act also says that statutory holidays must be negotiated between the employer and the bargaining agents, through a union for instance. I sincerely believe that legislation giving a holiday to people who already have it will have no impact whatsoever on the remembrance of those who took up arms or who gave their lives for our country.

Canadians will continue to respect Remembrance Day in their own way, through commemorative ceremonies, social events or family gatherings, or through personal gestures. For example, students learn about the importance of that day by participating in the ceremonies held at their schools and not simply by being out of school on that day. It should not be a holiday, but the memory of the good deeds that should mark that day as being a special one for each and every one of us.

Even if I respect the intent of my colleage, the member for Dartmouth, I do not agree with that bill.

[English]

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak to this bill in support of my colleague, the hon. member for Dartmouth. We all know that Dartmouth is a historic and military place. It seems appropriate that the private member's bill would have originated with the member for Dartmouth at this time.

I congratulate him on his tenacity and determination because it seems that is often what it requires to get a private member's bill through the House of Commons. It received first reading way back in September and now we are looking for second reading on this bill, Bill C–289, the Remembrance Day Act.

I just want to refer to why I think we need this bill. Some would suggest that it is a bit repetitious and that we already have made provision for this. A lot of people probably do not know that choosing the eleventh hour on the eleventh day of the eleventh month was not just a coincidence. That was the when the armistice, as we used to refer to it, the cessation of hostilities of the First World War, occurred.

I remember very well in just about every town and village at the cenotaph there would be great crowds of people recognizing Armistice Day. After the Second World War it was decided to have remembrance of it coincide with that same day, as was the case after the Korean war.

A strange thing happened, in my opinion. I can only attribute it to the remoteness of war in the country. As people get older and memories fade, there has been less and less interest shown in the remembrance aspect of Armistice Day. I think that is the reason that my colleague is presenting the bill at this time. It seems appropriate that we do it now. If this generation does not do it, the likelihood of it ever being done would become more and more remote because memories fade and people fade. The thoughts of war, unpleasant as they are, must not be allowed to fade.

It is very difficult to impose respect or impose remembrance. It is impossible. You need something of this nature that will bring forward that kind of memory every once in a while, something that will jog our memories every once in a while. The difficulty that we have got ourselves into in this country is that this has become a negotiable item at salary negotiation time, and that means you can trade it off.

It can be in the contract or it can be traded off for something else. We think it is too important to be left to the whims of management as good as management's intentions might be. It should not be imposed on the Canadian people. There should be some provision and this legislation would provide for it. This must not be allowed to slip our memories.

It is in the collective agreements pursuant to the Public Service Staff Relations Act that we think it would be appropriate. Perhaps the federal government should take the initiative. That is what my colleague is trying to do with his private member's bill.

The veterans and members of the Legions across the country are dismayed to think that this is a negotiable item. There is nothing left to negotiate. To leave it to the whims of the negotiators would seem to put it in a very weak position.

The likelihood of its continuance in the next generation and the one after that would be very slim indeed at the rate that we are going now. So there is a degree of urgency to it. As people, battles and memories become more and more remote, that gives it even more urgency. The federal government, of all agencies, has a special responsibility to protect this memory of the fallen ones in the two world wars and the Korean war.

To remove Remembrance Day as a bargaining chip, that is exactly what my colleague is endeavouring to do. He does not want it left to where a decision could be made to trade it off for something else. The only way to prevent that from happening is to get it written into the contract in such a way that it remains there, that it cannot be removed, it must stay.

I am not criticizing. The negotiation process has to go on. But let it be remembered that this is not something that is negotiable. This is something that has already happened. It is a fact. All he is asking for in his private member's bill is to make sure that there is continuity.

A bargaining arrangement can run out or expire. That means we no longer remember. We no longer have an Armistice Day. We no longer have a Remembrance Day. Perhaps at a future time that would be negotiated back in. That lack of continuity it seems to me asks for trouble because the Remembrance Day aspect of it will very soon be forgotten, if not by the present age group, certainly by the next generation.

That is all my colleague and I are asking. Give it some continuity. Give it some real meaning. Give it some real purpose. Take away the risk of it being an item to be bargained in or out.

This bill is an attempt at entrenchment. We want to entrench this so that it will be there for all time. No one can tamper with it as in the case of salary negotiations between any two bodies, the authority to recognize and impose this on all working groups. We are suggesting that those who are involved with the federal Public Service groups have some right to impose it or entrench it in order to make sure that it stays there for all time.

Let us make sure that November 11 will be observed by Canadians for time immemorial at least by some sectors of our society and will not be bartered away for some other benefit or someone else's benefit at some future time.

I want to congratulate my colleague for Dartmouth on his initiative in bringing forth the bill. I hope it will pass. I know that legionnaires around the country are watching very carefully and they too are hoping that it will get third reading and become law.

I want to congratulate my colleague on his initiative.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker I also want to take a few minutes this afternoon to mark my support for that legislation and furthermore, to congratulate the hon. member for Dartmouth for his initiative.

This act is to provide that Remembrance Day be included as a holiday in Public Service collective agreements. Canadian men and women who will read the House of Commons report or those who are watching us on television should not be under the impression that we want to establish a new holiday for anybody because that is not the case.

• (1520)

First of all, the bill provides that Remembrance Day be included as a holiday only in Public Service collective agreements. At this time, to my knowledge, Remembrance Day is already a holiday in all Public Service collective agreements.

However, the member for Darmouth, in his wisdom mentioned the fact that Remembrance Day could be used as a bargaining chip by the various parties negotiating a new collective agreement.

[English]

I do not think the day to remember our war dead should be utilized as a bargaining chip in a collective agreement by either party. It is not a matter of trying to give more holidays or less holidays to whomever. This is an occasion that we have to recognize officially that which we are already in essence doing but that which is also being threatened with undoing, namely the remembering of our Armistice Day.

Many people have spoken today about the fact that every year when all of us hon. members appear before the various cenotaphs in our constituencies the crowds are dwindling, there are fewer and fewer people. To a degree perhaps that is normal. Our veterans are getting older. Some of them are no longer with us and every year fewer of them are with us. Nevertheless, those of us who have our freedom because those others gave their lives should be more conscious of the tremendous contribution that they made for all of us.

Perhaps this is a good time to indicate to all our fellow Canadians, particularly at this time of difficulty in our national unity, that we should remember the tremendous contribution of those who have given their lives in the first, second or even the Korean war, as well those military people who have given their lives during peacetime. It is a day to recognize all those who made that valuable and priceless contribution of their own lives.

The hon. member for Dartmouth has indeed seized an important issue. It would be my hope that we could pass this bill unanimously. Merely to pass it on second reading, although in itself is a good thing, is not the be–all and end–all because the government ultimately has the decision power in terms of bringing back the bill for third reading. Even then proclamation is a decision of the government in any case afterward.

The point I am making is that we should be passing this bill today and that committee should be reporting the bill expeditiously. Actually it is the kind of bill that could easily be dealt with in committee of the whole. The bill should then be given third reading, and hopefully very soon we could incorporate in the statutes Bill C–289 as proposed by the member for Dartmouth.

[Translation]

I would like to take this opportunity to thank Canadian legion members in the riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell who, these last months, kindly sent me letters indicating their support for the bill tabled by the hon. member for Dartmouth. Legion members in my riding, like other members everywhere in Canada, are certainly following closely today's debate. They hope and are confident that we will not let them down nor forget them.

[English]

The challenge is up to us. Let us vote on this bill. Let us vote for it. Let us approve it unanimously this afternoon. Let us make sure it becomes law very quickly so that our veterans know that at least we do remember them and that we care. If we make this very important gesture, we make a small contribution toward raising the level of consciousness of Canadians generally in terms of the tremendous effort and the tremendous benefit that have been given to all of us by our war dead.

It was said long ago that if we do not remember our history we risk repeating it. If we do not want to repeat war, perhaps even for that reason alone the wisest thing we could do is remember the last ones we have had.

Many countries of this world are still in a state of war. I am thinking of the Republic of Bosnia-Hercegovina and other parts of this world such as parts of the former Soviet Union where we are watching today tremendous violence and unrest. We are lucky in this country that we live in the peace that we do, notwithstanding our differences and, regrettably I must say, notwithstanding our difficulties right now on the national unity issue.

We cannot take that peace we have for granted. We must remember those who have given so much for our freedom. Today we have an opportunity to make but one small gesture to indicate that yes, it was a long time ago but we are still remembering and grateful for the contribution of our war veterans.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Madam Speaker, I too want to congratulate my hon. friend from Dartmouth on bringing forward this bill. I am not surprised, because during his time in the House of Commons he has shown that not only is he a knowledgeable member of Parliament but also a very assiduous one who takes his job seriously.

For him it must be a great deal of satisfaction because it is really only with a private member's bill that one experiences the kind of satisfaction only a member of Parliament can get. That is making some real, significant change in the country.

I think this is an important change. This bill may seem very simple, but I think it was Will Rogers who said: "There is nothing so powerful as an idea whose time has come". This idea certainly has come of age. As a matter of fact, it should have come of age much earlier and I want to say why I think that is so. There is a need to remember.

My colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell has just said those who forget the lessons of history are doomed to repeat them. It is well for us to remember that now more than at any other time, perhaps because the cold war is over. People are thankful that it is over and there is a sense of relief. There is an inability at the same time to identify a threat and to put in place a security system to deal with that threat.

What really bothers me at the moment—and this is why I think it is so important to remember—is that we are struggling with a new security system and we have not found it. We hear talk about the interlocking security architecture of Europe. We hear about NATO, the CSCE, the western European union, the UN, but none of those organizations was able to solve the problem in Yugoslavia.

We see peacekeeping troops withdrawing from Yugoslavia. We see the Red Cross withdrawing from Yugoslavia. The irony here, if I am not mistaken and there may be somebody in the Chamber who can correct me if I am, is that I believe it was in what is now Yugoslavia the first shot was fired that started the First World War. If I am wrong there will be somebody either here or outside the Chamber who will correct me. The interesting irony is that Yugoslavia was the spot that started the First World War. Today again we see peacekeeping troops being withdrawn from Yugoslavia. That bothers me. This generation has gone through an experience that I have not. Young people have gone through the nuclear age with the threat of nuclear war. I did not have that experience. I remember going through the Second World War. I remember in St. John's, Newfoundland, as with Halifax which was a sea port, where we experienced the war. We had to darken our windows. We had black-outs. We heard the air raid sirens. We were threatened by aircraft and by naval ships. We experienced war, but nothing like the nuclear threat that hung over the heads of the present generation.

• (1530)

The real problem is now that that threat is taken away, my worry is that we have not put a security system in place to deal with whatever threat is out there for the future. That is why it is so important to remember. I do not think that remembering can be an option. It is an absolute necessity and that is why this bill is important.

Remembrance cannot be a bargaining chip. We have got to remember. Only by making every effort to remember do we keep in mind the lessons of history and guard ourselves against repeating the mistakes that we have made in the past.

I have public servants in my riding. I think I can say on their behalf that they do not want to see this as a bargaining chip. They serve the same Queen as the veterans served in the Second World War, the First World War and the Korean war. The people who fought and died in those conflicts served the Queen. It is the same Queen that we serve here today and it is the same Queen that the public servants are working on behalf of.

I think it is important for them, maybe more than other people, and for us too, to think of that seriously and to therefore put in place legislation that protects their ability to make that effort at remembrance.

There really is no option for us today. We had to have this legislation. I am sure that the veterans across this country want it. It is very timely, too, in terms of my own province. July 1 which is Canada Day is in my province the anniversary of the battle of Baumont Hamel, which was an important one for us in the First World War. There was a Newfoundland regiment that served and many died in that particular battle. We are coming up very close to that event in history. Where I live, we certainly have not forgotten that.

I think it is extremely important now more than ever, now that the threat of nuclear war has receded and we think has been erased. I do not think it has been erased, but it has receded. There is a feeling that you want to put this out of your mind now. There is a sense of relief. The danger in that sense of relief is that it clouds your mind to remembrance of what precautions need to be taken.

I would like to quote, if I may, because I think it is important to us today, some lines that the Canadian legion uses often in its ceremonies. The lines are taken from a poem by Kipling called Recessional. It is instructive for us today to read those words in full because it expresses some of the reasons why we must not forget. The lines are well known and they go like this:

God of our fathers, known of old,
Lord of our far-flung battle-line,
Beneath whose awful Hand we hold
Dominion over palm and pine.
Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet,
Lest we forget—lest we forget!

The last verse is:

For heathen heart that puts her trust
In reeking tube and iron shard,
All valiant dust that builds on dust,
And, guarding, calls not Thee to guard,
For frantic boast and foolish word—
Thy mercy on Thy People, Lord!

We should bear in mind those words "lest we forget" today and the thoughts that come from that particular poem.

Now it is more important than ever that we remember what happened, because if we do not we can never guard against it happening again. That is why this bill is important, that is why this bill says that remembering is not an option. Remembering is something we have to do.

I congratulate my colleague for bringing it forward, and I hope that the House will approve it speedily.

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming): Madam Speaker, I would like to take a few brief moments to speak in regard to this piece of legislation, Bill C-289.

I would like to speak as someone who is just having a regional office for veterans affairs located in my riding at Kirkland Lake, with 180 employees, but more for the veterans who served in the First and Second World Wars and the Korean war, in remembering those individuals who fought for the democracy that we are able to have here today.

As a result of the fact that those of us in this House have freedom of speech and the opportunity to serve our constituents and Canada, and in a time when our country is going through some difficult times, in a growing country and a different country, I think it is important for us to remember those who have served so well, those who lost their lives and contributed to the success and the future and the fortunes that we have in Canada.

I just want to say on behalf of the legions in Timiskaming and northern Ontario, and those in other parts of the country—we have received many letters in support of this piece of legislation—that I want to make clear that I believe we should be doing anything we can do to remember those who have served so well over the years for us.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 45(6), the division stands deferred until 6 p.m. Monday, June 1, 1992.

Mr. Plamondon: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, did you say that the yeas had it?

Madam Deputy Speaker: As far as I am concerned, the yeas had it, but as more than five members had risen, a division has been called. If the hon. member reads Hansard, he will realize it.

It being 15.38 p.m., the House stands adjourned until Monday, June 1, 1992, at 11 o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

NUCLEAR POWERED VESSELS

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should require the cessation of visits to harbours in the Victoria area of nuclear powered vessels or vessels that may be carrying nuclear weapons until a full public inquiry has been completed, including an environmental assessment.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to rise to ask the House to adopt this motion, a motion which calls for the government to require the cessation of visits to harbours in the Victoria area of nuclear powered vessels or vessels that may be carrying nuclear weapons until a full public inquiry has been completed including an environmental assessment.

This motion is of importance to the people in our area but it is also important, I believe, to the people of Canada because it represents a very important environmental issue and it represents a very important issue in terms of our national and international policies.

The effect of this motion could equally apply to other harbours in Canada and to other waters. However it is addressed in this way as I represent the Victoria area. I am familiar with the issues there. I wish to speak very specifically to the impact of these visits on the Victoria area and my recommendations to this House for dealing with the consequences of these visits.

I believe I speak for the overwhelming majority of people of the Victoria area. All MPs in the area are in support of this motion and of its intent. Eight of the ten local councils have called upon the federal government to have a moratorium on these visits until there has been a full environmental assessment.

Recently the British Columbia legislature voted 51 to 1 in favour of declaring British Columbia a nuclear weapons free zone. If I may read the motion, it endorses in effect the motion I have before the House. The motion was adopted on April 24, 1992 by a vote of 51 to 1 and therefore included not only members of the government party, the New Democratic Party, but Liberals and Social Credit as well. In fact only one Social Credit member voted against the resolution. It read as follows:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly of British Columbia declare British Columbia a nuclear weapons free zone; and be it further resolved that this Assembly calls on the Government of Canada to conduct a full public environmental review of the dangers involved by the presence of nuclear weaponed and nuclear powered vessels in British Columbia's harbours and waterways.

This all-party support for the resolution coincided with the passage of similar resolutions by the provinces of Ontario and Manitoba, the territories of Yukon and the Northwest Territories, as well as hundreds of municipalities across Canada.

I would acknowledge there are some in our area who have concerns about this resolution. They are particularly supportive of the visits to the Victoria area by U.S., French and British vessels. They are concerned that this kind of resolution or approach will inhibit the visits of foreign vessels to our harbours. They wish to have the visits continue because they believe it is an act of friendliness to our neighbours. As well the commerce that our area enjoys as a result of these visits is something they wish to continue.

Let it be said that for my part—I believe my colleagues and the municipalities in the area agree—we too would like to see the visits continued but only after there has been a proper environmental assessment of the impact of the visits and there is an agreement worked out that there will be no nuclear weapons on board the vessels coming into our area as a matter of national and provincial policy.

Last week I met with the chamber of commerce which represents these views. It has done an outstanding job in welcoming sailors, officers and crews of the vessels that have come into Victoria harbour. I frankly believe that an accommodation can be worked out with the chamber on these issues. It certainly joins in its concern for the environmental issue and for the public concerns arising around that issue.

As well, as I will point out later in the debate, there have been significant foreign policy changes in the United States which should lead this government toward taking some new and fresh steps to resolve this issue and these very vital concerns of the people in our area.

I have met with the Naval Officers Association of Vancouver Island. In fact I am a member of the association. It has sent correspondence and conducted a number of discussions with me. Many distinguished naval officers, including retired naval officers, are concerned with this issue and have raised a number of important considerations.

What it boils down to is that there are two issues confronting the Government of Canada on these visits. The first is an environmental issue. The second is an issue of national policy.

Let me deal with the environmental issue first. There can be no dispute whatever from the government that the consequences of an accident in an urban area such as Victoria, or any other urban harbour in Canada, would be absolutely catastrophic. There can be no doubt about that proposition. A serious nuclear accident in a built-up area such as Victoria would be absolutely catastrophic. There is no amount of emergency preparedness that could properly respond to such a crisis. As well more minor accidents can still have a very serious deleterious effect on the environment in our area.

Our area is asking the House to provide for an environmental assessment of visits of particularly nuclear powered vessels coming into our area, primarily those of the U.S. navy but also of the British and French navies, and to look at the consequences even of carrying nuclear weapons into the area.

Let us focus on the nuclear power for a minute. There have been those who have studied this issue carefully and have concluded that not only are the consequences of an accident serious but the potential risks are real. Over the lifetime of nuclear power there have been sufficient numbers of accidents around the world that the risk of an accident either minor or major is significant. There are others who have studied the issue who say that that is not correct.

It is the view in our area—I believe it ought to be supported by members of Parliament in this House—that given the consequences of an accident there should be no gambling on the risks and that those risks should be carefully and thoroughly examined by a public environmental assessment.

This is not a particularly radical view. It is in fact the view of the government agency charged with responsibility for deciding whether or not an environmental assessment is necessary. I draw the attention of the House to a memorandum prepared by the Federal Environmental Assessment Review Office in August 1991. It was approved by the director general of operations, went to the government and was overruled by the government when it adopted an Order in Council waiving the necessity of environmental review.

Let me take this House through this memorandum. It states the issue:

> Whether to support National Defence's proposal to seek an Order in Council approval for this activity,—

That is, port visits by nuclear powered vessels. It continues:

> —rather than assess it in accordance with the EARP Guidelines Order.

The memorandum points out:

> The Deputy Minister of National Defence wrote, in February 1991, describing the sensitivity of this subject and suggesting the adoption of the above strategy to avoid the possibility of a public review.

The minister was asked to decide whether the initial assessment should be done by EARP, whether there should be a public review. DND persisted on the issue and FEARO, the Federal Environmental Assessment Review Office, was considering whether or not Environment Canada had a different view.

It was clear that Environment Canada did in fact have a different view. It said:

> EARP clearly applies to the decision to authorize port visits by these vessels. The visits constitute a physical activity that is confined to a few ports located on the east and west coasts, an activity that lends itself readily to initial assessment.

DND has the authority to approve the visits and would be initiating authority under EARP. However, the government was concerned there would be legal challenges to the order. A request was going forward to the government in respect of Dixon Entrance, so that DND coupled that request with an over-riding request in respect of all visits of nuclear powered vessels to harbours.

• (1120)

FEARO has strongly recommended to external affairs that the results of the analysis done by others to respond to the public request be made available to the standing committee of the House of Commons on the environment. It should be recommended that external affairs conduct an assessment in accordance with cabinet procedures that officials provide advice on the assessment procedure and that DND is fully aware of it.

The recommendation goes on to say:

> National Defence's reluctance to conduct an initial assessment under the EARP needs to be questioned. It has come to our attention that the United States conducted an environmental review with extensive public involvement of an acoustic testing facility for nuclear submarines to be located at Behm Canal in Alaska, notwithstanding the obvious defence-related sensitivity of that facility. If such public consultation was possible for the United States in that situation, should it not be possible for Canada to do the same in this case, before National Defence takes its decision?

The memorandum goes on to say:

> While FEARO recognizes there is some risk that opponents could seek a court judgment, we believe that the Point Aconi judgment offers some precedent to allow the National Defence Department to mount a successful argument.
> The Order in Council approach is not risk-free—

It then concludes:

> We reiterate our opinion that EARP applies to the decision to authorize the port visits, and that National Defence is the initiating department.

The memorandum re-states firmly the view and recommends that the minister re-state firmly the view that it would be preferable to follow the process rather than to avoid it.

No pressing security argument has been advanced for avoiding a public environmental assessment review of this issue. If any government authority proposed to put on land a nuclear power plant, there would be the most comprehensive review of that decision. It would be done nationally, provincially and locally.

What excuse can be given to the citizens of any community when a nuclear power plant is brought in by sea, for avoiding an assessment of the environmental impact of that decision? There can be none.

If the government proposes to raise security as an argument, let the government propose procedures for the security aspects of the case to be determined in camera. Let there be appointed an independent assessor who will have the confidence of the community, the Department of National Defence, External Affairs, and so forth, who can make an environmental review of the impact of this decision.

Our community calls on the House to request the government to ensure that such a review takes place.

I would like to draw the attention of the House to another document that has come to my attention. As the House will know, the New Zealand government is reviewing its policy. As well the Senate of Australia is reviewing the issues in that part of the world. In the course of the inquiries there, a secret U.S. Navy document has come to light which instructs commanders that they do not necessarily need to contact all the relevant authorities like foreign governments when a nuclear powered vessel has an accident in a foreign port. This would violate the terms of the basic agreement between the United States and foreign governments, and I assume the terms of the agreement between Canada and the United States in respect of these visits.

I want to ask the parliamentary secretary who will be speaking on behalf of the government to move quickly on this and to look into this particular document.

Let me conclude my remarks by addressing the second issue, which is the issue of national policy.

It is my view and I hope the view of this House—it is certainly the view of the B.C. legislature and 68 per cent of the people of British Columbia according to a recent public opinion survey—that Canada should be a nuclear weapons-free zone.

The government makes the argument that we are somehow protected by the U.S. nuclear umbrella as part of our collective security arrangements with the United States and through NATO. So I may say do the Liberal opposition. The Liberals as well as the government make the case that these visits should continue and that nuclear weapons should be brought into Canada.

Let me say first that nuclear weapons provide no protection whatever against a nuclear attack. Even if there had been an argument once upon a time before the end of the cold war that the nuclear deterrent was in fact an effective deterrent against a Soviet nuclear attack on North America, that argument can no longer be made.

Clearly Russia, the successor state in this respect and to some extent the Ukraine and perhaps other states in that part of the world, present no strategic nuclear threat to Canada and the United States at this time.

A year ago the right hon. Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs when he was Secretary of State for External Affairs described the then Soviet Union as an ally and a friend of Canada. The case cannot be made that we are threatened today, and it certainly cannot be made that nuclear weapons in Victoria harbour present any deterrent to any potential assault.

In September there was a decisive change in U.S. government policy when President Bush announced the withdrawal of tactical nuclear weapons from their naval forces. Today most of the vessels, if not all of the vessels, coming into Victoria harbour probably do not carry nuclear weapons.

Until now the Government of Canada has accepted the argument that the United States government will neither confirm nor deny whether it has nuclear weapons on board. If it is true that the sense of crisis has seriously diminished, as it has, then I call on the government, in light of the changing conditions since the end of the cold war, to renew its discussions with the United States and conclude a new agreement under which the United States will indicate clearly that there are no nuclear weapons on board any vessels coming into Victoria.

It is time to change our policy, to look afresh at these issues and to give the people of Victoria and the people of Canada the assurance that we have entered into a new day, that the environmental considerations will be paramount and that we will have new policies which reflect the reality of today, that we should be nuclear free not only in Canada, but throughout the world.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to see you presiding here this morning in the House.

If you have a sense of déjà vu with respect to this debate, it is because the hon. member for Victoria has raised this same issue previously. We had a debate following somewhat the same lines at least as far as his comments are concerned on February 18.

He raises two issues in his speech, one relating to safety of nuclear vessels coming into Canadian waters and the other the dimension of the environmental impact. I would like to deal with both of those. I know my colleague from Calgary Southwest is going to be dealing later with the broader collective security approach that we have with our allies. Perhaps the spokesman from the Liberal Party would also be dealing with that.

In fact, the first point that he made had to do with broad Canadian policy in this whole area. Of course Canadian policy, established by a previous government in 1967, has been one of allowing our allies to visit Canadian ports under certain terms and conditions. That policy has continued whichever party was in power. It is the policy of the Government of Canada. In fact it was renewed last October by Order in Council.

I want to speak about that because in the process of renewing this policy the government did undertake environmental impact studies. My interpretation of them, which may not surprise the House, is somewhat at variance with the interpretation of the member for the New Democratic Party.

Before getting to any of that, I would like to make very clear that when the member mentioned a document that he purports to be a secret U.S. naval document with respect to the non-reporting of accidents of nuclear powered vessels, I do take that seriously. I would ask the member for Victoria to table the document to which he referred. I would also indicate to him that upon it being tabled and seeing it I will investigate the matter and see what is being done in that area because this is a serious issue.

Certainly the government does not take that lightly, nor indeed does the government take lightly the question of the safety of nuclear propelled vessels or the environmental impact that they might have. That is why a study was conducted initially by the Department of National Defence prior to an extension of the government policy allowing allied nuclear powered vessels to visit Canadian ports.

After that was completed last year and it was determined by the government that the environmental consequences of these visits are insignificant, and second, that these visits pose no significant risk and hence can be safely accommodated, a review of this was done by Environment Canada at the invitation of DND and the Department of External Affairs.

That process has been referred to on several occasions by the member for Victoria. The results, I want to make it clear, are public. The memorandum he refers to in the House is a public document. There is no effort to hide information; indeed, it is the government's approach to be very open about this because the issues are significant.

The ability of the Canadian government to assess the environmental and safety impact of these vessels is based on a number of factors. First of all, our country has within it experts who are extremely knowledgeable in the philosophy, the principles and the practice of nuclear reactor safety. Canada has been in this field since its inception in the 1940s. Second, Canadian expertise with water reactor design, as well as safety analysis and accident characteristics gives us the ability to make assessments in this area and that expertise was brought to bear on the situation.

In the review there was a comparison of the risks posed by commercial power reactors and marine nuclear propulsion reactors. We looked at the historic record of what has happened over the past 40 years in operating these types of vessels. We made an assessment of the alleged accidents. A lot is said in the popular press and even by some members of Parliament, as we heard about 10 minutes ago, on the nature of these accidents. Sometimes as much heat as light is shed on the issue in the way that those are described.

The government also looked at the results of environmental monitoring that have been published in this field. There is a fairly extensive body of knowledge on that. There has been specific environmental monitoring of foreign vessel visits to Canadian ports. We also relied on the assurances given to us by our allies. That was part of the over-all process and it is again in that connection that I refer to the member and hope that he will table that document and I will be sure that everything is as we expect it to be. If it is not, then appropriate action would certainly be taken. Also, we have within the Department of National Defence a lot of people who are very knowledgeable about the nuclear propelled submarines because of the now defunct nuclear submarine acquisition program. A lot of skill and knowledge was built up there.

For all those reasons, the government concluded and subsequently validated by a review by Environment Canada that the policy of the Government of Canada begun in 1967 should be continued.

For practical reasons it is only the United States and the United Kingdom nuclear propelled vessels that visit Canadian designated ports. On the west coast these visits are accommodated at both Esquimalt and Nanoose.

I want to emphasize that nuclear propelled vessels of our allies are only permitted to visit these ports if they satisfy the strictest of nuclear safety criteria. Specifically, only nuclear propelled vessels which satisfy conditions established by the Government of Canada and by the Department of National Defence of Canada are permitted to visit our ports.

The record is public. The monitoring that is done by Canadian teams to detect any release of radioactivity is ongoing. This is the time, in the moments that remain for me, to try and place on record some of the facts that would help to shed light and indeed reassurance on this issue.

Since this policy of allowing foreign vessels of this type to visit our ports the safety record has indeed been excellent. In almost 40 years of visits by allied nuclear propelled vessels to over 150 different ports around the world, there has not been a single reactor accident nor have there been any other types of accidents with these vessels which have had a detrimental effect on the environment.

Our Department of National Defence maintains well-trained nuclear emergency response teams at both CFB Comox and CFB Esquimalt to respond in the unlikely event that there ever would be an accident.

I should put on record as well that those teams are not just established for that narrow purpose. They also respond to any nuclear contamination that could occur from the multitude of nuclear material that is used daily in construction, educational, medical, or research activities.

Those teams have been used to assist the civilian or non-military activities at the request of regional authorities. There is a very well-trained nuclear emergency response team detachment at Nanoose. The department works with the local officials to co-ordinate those responses. We are continually evaluating the capacities and effectiveness of those teams.

The final point I would make, and the member has said this, is it is like having a nuclear reactor established in the community waiting for it to explode or something. There is a bit of intentional fear mongering going on there that creates public alarm.

Nuclear propelled vessels and their propulsion plants are designed to prevent a serious accident even in severe conditions at sea. They are built to withstand the rigours of combat and therefore to sustain being damaged.

The risk of loss of life associated by living in proximity to a commercial nuclear power plant for 50 years is comparable to smoking about one and a half cigarettes and the cancer or heart disease that can cause, or living for about two days in a large city and the lung cancer that can be caused by air pollution. There are comparative figures and data. There are a lot of statistics out on this but anyone can see that the relative risks have been assessed and the systems designed to prevent accidents from happening.

• (1140)

The final point I would make in concluding is that since last November 27 when the American President ordered the standing down of all of the U.S. tactical nuclear weapons and removing them from surface ships and submarines, I am advised that the U.S. navy advanced on that as well. While it continues to be, as the member said, the policy of that government neither to confirm nor deny whether its vessels are carrying nuclear weapons, clearly the announced policy since last September is to step down and remove those nuclear weapons.

There is not the cause for concern because the government has itself a strong concern with the safety of Canadians and the environment.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank both hon. members for a very good debate on this issue. The debate has given both sides of the issue, essentially the security side and the environmental side which I think has been done so well by my colleague, the hon. parliamentary secretary.

This question really is of a national proportion. May I say at the outset that I have not known the hon. member for Victoria for long but I do know the city of Victoria quite well. With the possible exception of St. John's, Newfoundland, it is probably one of the finer cities in Canada. I can appreciate where he is coming from in that perspective.

An hon. member: And Calgary.

Mr. Mifflin: There is Calgary and a few other cities of course.

I would like to put the issue in the proportion of the aspect of security and the totality of that aspect. I want to draw on your experience, Mr. Speaker, of the past, of the history of our country and where we have come from in the last few years.

One of the premises of my presentation this morning is the timing of the hon. member's motion. Now that peace and security are looking a little better than they did a few years ago, then perhaps this might be a good time to have a look at the proposal he puts in front of the House.

I would have to go back and say that the first goal of any country, of any municipality, or of any province is to look after its people. This would drum up a security policy that would take into consideration the hon. member's motion.

We have to put it in the perspective of where we have come from in the last 40 to 45 years. It is no revelation and it is no surprise to anybody here to say that in the last 40 to 45 years we have lived in a period of instability, challenge and a great threat to our security. How that is manifested I suppose is by the billions of dollars that Canada has spent, and other countries have spent against the challenge, the threat and the instability that faced us. It is a fair investment, I would say. It could have been plus 10 per cent, it could have been minus 10 per cent, we will never know.

The fact is that we took out an insurance policy on the country, an insurance policy on the continent, an insurance policy to make sure that I and my colleagues could be here speaking in this excellent model of democracy.

Is it time to change our feelings about instability, peace and security? Well, the conventional wisdom is that the end of the cold war has brought us to a point in time where we should consider these things.

Not long ago, I watched a television biography of a great hero of mine and I am sure of many in the House, the Hon. Winston Churchill. A lot of us recall his speech where he talked about the neck of the British Empire being wrung. It was delivered here, I am sure with much more eloquence and élan than I am delivering today. But it is appropriate to remember what he said. One of his expressions was "some chicken, some neck". Well, for those who would look at the end of the cold war as the end of our concerns with instability, challenge and security, I say to them: "Some peace, some security".

It is very difficult to pick up a newspaper today without reading about the difficulties taking place in the world. It is more difficult to read articles on the number of nuclear weapons that still exist.

As the hon. member said, this is not a question of fear mongering, but my hon. colleague the parliamentary secretary used some facts and figures. I will not quote, but there are roughly 25,000 nuclear weapons in the arsenals of both sides.

Again, I am not going to take the hon. member for Victoria out of context, but his thought was nuclear weapons are not needed to protect against nuclear weapons.

Well, if I am fighting an enemy that is 10 feet tall and packing two six-guns on his side and is driving one of these big-wheeled vehicles, I do not think I am going to take him on without the aid of a few friends. In those days it was called deterrence; today it is called hedging.

I will tell you why it is important to hedge. It takes a generation and a half to build up the kind of technology and security that we have in Canada. We cannot take on the world. In fact, we are the second largest country in the world and it has been shown that we cannot defend ourselves alone because of the number of people we have for the size of our country.

Therefore, we rely on a thing called collective alliance. While sometimes it may be difficult to understand this from some of the speeches that have been made in this House, our best neighbour is the United States. There are times when business is business and friendship is friendship. However when we really come down to the final points here, the point is if you belong to a collective alliance, if you belong to a collective defence club and you believe that there is still reason to have concern about peace, instability and danger and if you look at a weekend itinerary of what is happening in the world, then you would have to ask yourself the question, as laudable as the motion may seem superficially and, indeed, in some depth.

In the totality of what we as parliamentarians are expected to do and make decisions on, would it be wise at this time to make a decision that on the surface would seem to be reasonable on environmental assessment? Quite frankly, I do not think it is that unreasonable. It is a judgment call. I have no intention of degrading the motion of the hon. member or saying that it is absolutely out of the question.

What I am saying from where I stand, from the way I have been brought up and from the policies I revere is that perhaps the timing is wrong. The principle is fine but at this particular time in the history of our country I am not so sure it would be a wise move to support this judgment.

If I am allowed another minute or so, I want to go back and look at those past 45 years and what we stood for in Canada. Looking at our contribution to NATO, our contribution to peacekeeping, and our contribution to having the world the way it is today, we can be very proud of our achievements in our country.

• (1150)

While the hon. member's motion may be a move in a direction that the world may be heading somewhat downstream—I am looking at the Rio conference and that kind of thing—I think perhaps the timing is a little early. At this particular point in time I suppose the view would be that the organization is there, we support it, you cannot have both sides, and I suppose I would have to say we would entertain the idea at some other time.

An hon. member: You sound like Mackenzie King.

Mr. Mifflin: No. I wish I could be perhaps more definite than the gentleman to whom you refer. I would say a good motion but the timing is somewhat perhaps to be achieved downstream.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise today and speak on the motion by the hon. member for Victoria concerning nuclear powered and nuclear capable vessels off the west coast in particular.

While there has been a lot of public discussion on this subject, unfortunately not all of it has been truly well informed. In fact, many well-meaning Canadians are quite confused about the whole issue of these port visits. I do welcome the opportunity to clarify some of the facts.

Specifically, the motion calls for the cessation of visits to harbours in Victoria of nuclear powered vessels, or vessels that may be carrying nuclear weapons until a full public inquiry is done, also including an environmental assessment.

To understand why the government allows these specific port visits—I have to say under the very strictest of criteria, very strictest of guidelines—it is important to appreciate Canada's defence policy.

A lot of the public debate on the visits of what we call NPVs, nuclear propelled vessels, and the NCVs, nuclear capable vessels, ignores the fact that Canada welcomes these visits as a meaningful contribution to collective security. Indeed, much of Canada's history demonstrates the benefits of Canada's commitment to collective security.

I really believe the hon. member for Victoria would agree in the international arena the Canadian forces and its forerunners, the Canadian Army, the Royal Canadian Navy, and the Royal Canadian Air Force, acting in concert with our allies have played a notable, indeed a very honourable role, both in the establishment and the maintenance of peace in many widely separated areas of the world. This tradition continues today.

In addition to our continuing commitment to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, we currently have personnel in the Red Sea enforcing United Nations sanctions against Iraq. We have 1,100 personnel in the Balkans with the European Communities monitoring mission and the United Nations protection force. We have personnel throughout the rest of the world in such places as Angola, Cambodia, El Salvador, the Golan Heights, Kuwait, the Sinai and the western Sahara.

What I am talking about is best described in the April 1992 document Defence Policy 1992. On page 4 of this newly released document is a statement I would like to read:

> As a responsible member of the world community, Canada seeks the maintenance of a peaceful international order in which to pursue its own interests. Canadians do not and cannot look with equanimity on violent conflict anywhere in the world. It would not only be reprehensible in itself, but also corrosive to international order and to international stability.

More important, the document does make it clear that Canada maintains its commitment to defence and collective security, arms control and disarmament and the peaceful resolution of all disputes. Canada is a great country with a very small, a very modest armed force.

Again I refer to the Defence Policy 1992. In fulfilling our commitments, in conjunction with like-minded nations, we contribute to a safer and a more secure international environment. We are living in changing times. In only a short period of time we have all witnessed remarkable changes right around the world.

The cold war is over. Germany has been reunified. The former states of the Soviet Union have taken their place in the international community. Arms control regimes are in place to help contribute to a more secure world. Along with the changes there are challenges, and in particular the prospect of international instability is the subject of concern for all members of the international community.

Who of us would have thought that with the end of superpower confrontation Canadian forces personnel would be serving in and around the Persian Gulf? Canada's contribution in that region is an example of the benefits that we realized from collective security efforts.

Furthermore, Canada's success in the gulf was not derived only from the fact that we fielded extremely well trained and very good professional personnel but because we have much experience in operating in concert with our friends and with our allies.

The hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception has just made statements with regard to friends and collective alliance. This is the only way that we in Canada can have collective security efforts. Successive Canadian governments have recognized for years and years and decades there is absolutely no alternative to collective security.

We are blessed with one of the longest coastlines in the world. We are the second largest territory in the world. From a military perspective this is a major challenge. Added to the physical realities of our country is the fact that with our very modest small population and military resources Canada cannot defend unaided our national territory.

At the same time it should be remembered that there is no free ride. If Canada is going to derive benefits of alliance membership for our own security then Canada must and should be prepared to contribute in return. It is not surprising then that Canada works toward international peace and security in conjunction with those nations with which we share a very similar political principle, similar economic structures and similar social values.

Exchanges with our American friends are quite common, exchanges with their navy, their air force and their army personnel. They make regular visits to Canada. Other allies also visit Canada often using our spacious training facilities.

In this regard we have the British, the Dutch and the Germans. These flyers train out of Goose Bay, Labrador. German soldiers train at the Canadian Forces Base in Shilo, Manitoba. British personnel train at the Canadian Forces Base in Suffield and Wainright, Alberta.

This discussion would not be complete without highlighting Cold Lake, Alberta which indeed has its superb training facilities. The pilots of the CF-18s that played a major place in the Persian conflict some months ago trained in Cold Lake, Alberta.

It is an important part of our alliance in working together with our colleagues. It is not surprising that we do have visits of the NPVs and the NCVs, because we are all working together for peace and security in the country.

While I am pleased to participate today—and I know that security and environment are major factors—we all have to realize that Canada's major role in security policy and our commitment to defence and collective security are the only ways to go.

We are proud of what we have done. The world is not benign. We are moving toward better peace and security. Hopefully we can see that in the not too distant future.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I call Orders of the Day, the hon. member for Victoria has a one-page document which he wants tabled. In order to do that we would require unanimous consent. Do we have unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We do not have unanimous consent.

The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1) the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The member just refused unanimous consent to my request. I should advise the House that I did provide the parliamentary secretary with a copy of the document which I had intended to table, so he has the document.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

NATIONAL PARKS ACT

The House resumed from Friday, May 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Charest that Bill C-59, an act to amend the National Parks Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Natural Resources envelope.

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity today to speak to Bill C-59, an act to amend the National Parks Act, as part of the debate on this bill. First of all, however, I want to say that according to the Projected Order of Business, we only have a ten-minute maximum, while according to me, we still have a 20-minute maximum plus 10 minutes for questions and comments. So I would appreciate it, if you would—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Yes, under the standing order. I regret that it does have that in today's procedure, but there are still two hours and nine minutes left as far as debate is concerned before we go into the 10-minute period.

Therefore the hon. member will have 20 minutes plus 10 and any other following members may have 20 minutes plus 10 until we complete the two hours and nine minutes.

[Translation]

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. Last Friday, after my colleague from Hull—Aylmer finished his speech and we had started on questions and comments, there were still eight minutes left. I was about to intervene at that point. Could I use the eight minutes to make my comments now, or does the member in question have to be in the House?

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member must be in the House. I know it would have been a great question, but we will have to do it another time.

[Translation]

Mrs. Venne: Mr. Speaker, we will now continue the debate on Bill C-59, an act to amend the National Parks Act, and in fact, I want to take advantage of this opportunity because I am not sure I will be given a chance when debate on the referendum legislation is resumed.

As you know, the Bloc Quebecois has seldom had a chance to express its views in many of the debates we have had, and that is why we insist on being able to speak in this particular debate. We want to take every available opportunity to express our views, and today is one of those opportunities.

During the debate on second reading of the referendum bill, the government imposed closure, and I would not be at all surprised if it did the same on third reading and even at the report stage. That is why I take this opportunity to rise in the House today.

As for the current debate, I would like to recall that when we were discussing this bill on Friday, during the last week the House was sitting, the hon. member for Skeena made some remarks that were far from obliging. I think that some day, at the Chair's request, the hon. member should withdraw those comments, because he said, and I quote:

> This debate has been going on in this House for six years. The member has already expressed to me personally—

And he was referring to one of our Bloc Quebecois members.

> —that the reason for holding up this piece of legislation, for holding up the debate, is to try to extort from the government a seat on the referendum committee—

Saying that we are extorting a place is incredible. It is our due. I think it goes without saying that we from Quebec are entitled to a seat on the legislative committee on the referendum bill. Calling that extortion is quite unthinkable.

I would also like to mention that the same member for Skeena told us members of the Bloc Quebecois that what we said was not relevant and that we were incompetent. Well. I never questioned that member's competence; I do not see why he would cast doubt on ours. Finally, I wanted the people to know that we are not fooled by such things.

Getting to the bill under consideration, I would like to talk about the famous Wood Buffalo Park, since it is one of those affected. I am looking here at the 1988-89 annual report from Environment Canada—

Mr. Lapierre: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Shefford on a point of order.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I find the speech by my colleague from Saint-Hubert so interesting that I think at least a quorum should be required so that many members can also benefit from hearing it.

Therefore I call for a quorum count, Mr. Speaker.

And the members having been counted:

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret there are enough members for a quorum.

[Translation]

We continue the debate with the hon. member.

Mrs. Venne: You are sorry that there is a quorum, Mr. Speaker. Well, I suppose that is a slip.

As I was saying, I would like to continue on one of the parks mentioned in this bill, namely Wood Buffalo Park. I think that hon. members and Canadians will be interested to know that there are falcons in this park. I think it is interesting to find out from the 1988-89 annual report what happened in this park. I will read you an excerpt. It says here, "A peregrine falcon recovery program continued on the Peace-Athabasca delta within the park." They are talking about Wood Buffalo Park.

> In 1988-89, 25 peregrine falcon chicks from seven nests hatched.

Mr. Lapierre: Oh?

Mrs. Venne: Yes, they did. I would really like the people to know what is going on in that park.

> Ten [of them] were foster chicks. The park, the Canadian Wildlife Service and Alberta Fish and Wildlife have been co-operating, over the past eight years, in research and management activities for the subspecies of peregrine falcon in northeastern Alberta, the only remaining boreal forest population of these birds.

I think that it is worth knowing what is going on in a park when we are considering making it a reserve. We should know what is going on in the park.

Of course, I would also like to tell you right away that I am for this bill. I think that Canadians should know that all members of the Bloc Quebecois who have spoken on this bill so far have said that they are in favour of it. Those who come after me will also say that of course we approve of this bill, but we are taking every opportunity we get to express ourselves in this House, including this one this morning.

So I continue on Wood Buffalo Park. I continue to quote the report:

> An interagency recovery plan was completed in October 1988. It includes basic chemical monitoring, fostering and release programs involving Wood Buffalo National Park's nesting pairs.
> The issue of bison disease within Wood Buffalo National Park—

There are also bison in that park and I think that we should mention it. So I continue:

> —and surrounding areas of Alberta and the Northwest Territories remained contentious.

• (1210)

In February 1989, the Minister of the Environment appointed a five-member environmental assessment panel to study the subject, as requested by the Minister of Agriculture. Technical and scientific data are being prepared for submission to the panel. Public hearings are expected in January 1990, with panel recommendations later in that year.

That is what the 1988-89 annual report of Environment Canada told us. Of course, that report also mentions other national parks in western Canada. We have another one in British Columbia, since the bill mentions the national park reserve on the Queen Charlotte Islands in British Columbia. So British Columbia has other national parks, including the S.S. Moyie. I can tell you that the 1988-89 report had this to say about it. A cost-sharing agreement was signed with the Kootenay Lake Historical Society and the village of Kaslo. The federal government's $175,000 helped to stabilize and protect the vessel, which upon retirement was the oldest Canadian-built paddle-wheeler in service. So a boat is part of the national parks. Note that I am new to this field, of course, but I would like to tell you that I find it rather surprising. Certainly it is understandable because this boat, which is now out of service, has been made into a historical monument and we ended up with a park. It is part of the national parks.

We also have the Brooks Aqueduct, which is a national park in Alberta. The Department of the Environment again in this case allocated $150,000 under a heritage protection agreement with the province of Alberta and the Eastern Irrigation District to construct visitor and interpretation facilities. So people will interpret the aqueduct. The Brooks Aqueduct was built of reinforced concrete between 1912 and 1914. You can now understand and realize that national parks are not just parks but also aqueducts and boats, and of course parks in some cases.

The Quebec region also has some, for example, the Lachine canal. It is classified as a park, but it is a canal. It is probably still there because of its historical character. A $10,000 five-year plan to decontaminate the Lachine canal began in 1988. Among other things, special containers will be built alongside the canal to hold the excavated material. This is all being done to clean up our environment so that it will be more pleasant.

I would also like to talk to you about another national park, South Moresby, in British Columbia. On July 12, 1988, Canada and British Columbia, which is part of Canada, I think—by Canada, I mean the federal government, since British Columbia is still part of Canada. It says here that Canada and British Columbia signed the first memorandum of agreement to establish a national park reserve called South Moresby and this agreement also involved regional economic development.

In all, the federal contribution totals $106 million over a period of eight years. Given these figures, allow me to make a short digression. Obviously, I am in favour of protecting the environment; we are all in favour of virtue, but those figures are quite striking when you think that women's groups, ask rather frequently the federal government for funding and their requests are rejected, not to mention that when we ask for a daycare program we are told to wait until next year, only to then find out that there is no longer going to be a daycare program.

I am now getting back to the national parks, but I wanted to make this digression because the situation is so striking. It is obvious that when women ask for pay equity, when we make requests of any kind to the government, those requests always come in second or third place.

The development work done for the park in 1988-89 is defined as follows: the CPS set up an office in North Vancouver which is primarily responsible for the implementation of the agreement. A new office was set up in the Queen Charlotte Islands; its mandate is to manage the Reserve for South Moresby National Park.

At various times during the year, officials from the CPS have negotiated with the Haïdas—as we know, the Haïdas are of course mentioned in the bill—in an attempt to reach a mutually satisfactory agreement on the planning, the management and the operation of the reserve for the national park.

The regional economic development program got under way with studies on the conditions necessary for the eventual development of a small craft harbour in Sandspit, the establishment of information and visitor centres in the city of Queen Charlotte and in Sandspit, as well as the setting up of a federal-provincial planning and coordinating committee.

This is what took place in South Moresby. I would also like to talk about the prairies, since we also have national parks in the prairies—

Mr. Lapierre: Indeed, Banff and the Rockies.

Mrs. Venne: Of course, everybody knows about Banff, but there are also other parks and I think it would be interesting to talk about those.

On September 23 1988, after five years of negotiations, the federal and Saskatchewan governments signed an agreement respecting the establishment of Grasslands National Park, that is in the south-west area of the province. This agreement replaced two federal-provincial agreements signed in 1981 concerning the creation of that park, as well as the development of oil and gas resources.

The proposed park will have an east and a west part totalling 906 square kilometres. Under the new agreement, an area of 336 square kilometres was designated as a mineral reserve for the Crown, so that oil and gas exploration are now prohibited activities on that land. I believe it is important to know what is going on in other provinces, and not only in Alberta and in British Columbia, as is now the case with Bill C-59.

Once the federal government—I am referring to Grasslands National Park—will have acquired all this land, the provincial authorities will transfer to it the management and the control of that land. This is yet another park that will be under federal jurisdiction. Of course, the provinces are always asked to give up the land, something of which the Bloc Quebecois does not necessarily approve.

I could also tell you about the Winter Garden theatre in Toronto.

• (1220)

In my four minutes left, I will try to say a few words about the Toronto area, which is rather interesting.

Mr. Lapierre: We could go there in the summer.

Mrs. Venne: Maybe, but remember, this is the Winter Garden.

Mr. Lapierre: However we can go there in the summer just the same.

Mrs. Venne: Maybe we should ask people from Toronto. I think so. I will tell you exactly what it is.

As part of a shared-cost agreement with the Ontario Heritage Foundation, the Department of the Environment has contributed $240,300 to be used in phase two of a project to restore the ornaments in this theatre. The agreement ensures that the world's best example of a theatre with a roof garden that is still intact will be protected. A historian will prepare a special paper on the history of the theatre. I think it would certainly be a very nice place to visit.

In concluding, since I only have a few minutes left, I will say a few words about Ellesmere Island in the Northwest Territories.

Mr. Lapierre: That is really a lovely spot.

Mrs. Venne: Ellesmere Island National Park Reserve was formally established on September 6, 1988, when 37,775 square kilometres of northern Ellesmere Island were set aside. The park reserve protects a representative part of the Eastern High Arctic Glacier Natural Region and peacefully asserts Canada's sovereignty over the northernmost tip of the continent.

I think that is a rather poetic description.

Park administration facilities were constructed at Tanquary Fjord. I wish to conclude on that note—

Mr. Lapierre: So soon?

Mrs. Venne: I suppose it is a bit soon, because I could have given you all the details on the traditional hunting grounds in Wood Buffalo National Park, but unfortunately, I will have to refrain.

I also could have talked about the national park reserve in the Queen Charlotte Islands, and here again, I cannot describe all the attractions of this park which, I am sure, is absolutely enchanting. In concluding, I want to say that we are certainly in favour of this bill, but we insist on our right as members of the Bloc Quebecois to express our views. After all, that is what members are supposed to do when they are in the House.

Thank you for listening to me, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to thank the hon. member for Saint-Hubert for her speech, and I think the Chair appreciated the information she was able to provide.

However, I am rather concerned about the fact that there are so many national parks across Canada but so very few in Quebec. The hon. member for Saint-Hubert mentioned the money spent on the various parks. I think this is one way for the Government of Canada to inject considerable amounts of money into the regions. However, I know there has always been a certain reluctance in Quebec because of territorial considerations.

I get the impression they often simply want excuses for dumping federal money in certain regions. I am sure there are many towns in Quebec that would have liked to get the kind of money that was spent on Gatineau Park and the Saguenay park reserve. I must say that over the years, the National Parks Act has not been beneficial to Quebec.

Considering that one-third of 1 per cent of the territory subject to the National Parks Act is located in Quebec, this legislation has been used to inject a lot of money everywhere else. Today we are being asked to spend about $300 million, the figure someone mentioned to me.

I am aware the hon. member for Saint-Hubert has read a number of reports, and perhaps she has something to say about the value represented by these parks, because in Quebec, when we are discussing Quebec's future and secession, we are all concerned about the way the assets will be divided. We know there are a few locations in Quebec like Forillon Park and the Mingan Archipelago. The hon. member told us that the Lachine canal—I did not know this—also comes under the National Parks Act.

There are a number of places that would have to be counted as part of our assets.

Payments in lieu of taxes are the usual procedure for office buildings, for instance. The federal government makes in lieu payments instead of paying property taxes. However, the problem is that there are no buildings in our national parks. There is no mathematical formula for calculating the value of these assets. I wonder whether we could decide to share the national parks and we could then get at least one-quarter of the value of all national parks. For instance, this is of course very symbolic. I realize this must sound rather funny, but the Rocky Mountains are so often used in advertising as a kind of flag waving. We have to ask some serious questions about the National Parks Act, which we support. Someone said Mount Royal, but I hardly think that comes under the legislation. No. It better not. It is clear that the hon. member for Saint-Hubert is concerned about the assets, and I would like to hear what she has to say.

Mrs. Venne: Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer my colleague from Shefford. There was certainly not much money spent in Quebec, since we have only three parks out of a total of 38 or 39, I believe. We have Grosse-Île, the Lachine Canal and Saint-André-de-Kamouraska. I talked previously about the Lachine Canal. I now talk about Saint-André-de-Kamouraska. As part of a national cost-sharing program regarding national historic sites, Environment Canada contributed $200,000 toward restoring the Saint-André church. It is a good example of Récollet style and parishioners as well as Industrial and Regional Development also contributed. It is quite outrageous that, to answer my friend, Quebec received only $200,000 for Saint-André-de-Kamouraska. For Grosse-Île, no amount is given here. It simply says that some buildings will be strengthened. We do not really know what happened at Grosse-Île. We know there was an agreement, signed in August 1988 by the federal Minister of Agriculture, to transfer this historic site to the National Park network, to commemorate immigration in Canada. I hope this answers the question of the hon. member for Shefford.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): I am very pleased to congratulate my colleague for her great speech on national parks as a whole. I would like to ask her if she is surprised by the fact, as she mentioned, that out of 35 parks only three are in Quebec, and those represent only one third of one per cent of the area of that province. Why is it, in her opinion, that the Quebec Conservative members across the floor remain silent on this issue? Is she not also surprised to see the conservative members, and I can see that the member for Trois-Rivières is completely oblivious to this debate, that not one member rose to call for a comprehensive study on all of our national parks, and not only on a specific one? So much the better. Of course we support this bill. It is marvelous, especially for the people of the Haida reserve, and we totally agree that it is their right to have this park. However, while we are debating this issue, why not also include all of the Canadian territory and consider a more equitable sharing of these resources, so that the money can be better allocated and so that each region can benefit from that money.

In that regard, we know that Quebec was treated unjustly. Therefore, why is it that the Conservative members from Quebec do not rise to ask that our province also get its share? They should ask that we take this opportunity to settle the case of the Saguenay park. We are prepared to give our agreement so that there is the unanimous consent required to pursue the debate a bit longer today and wrap up the three readings at the same time, if the government is prepared to include the Saguenay park. Why not take this opportunity to solve the issues that remain or that are still the object of negotiations with some provinces?

This of course should in no way delay the present bill, but it could be a remarkable way for the Quebec Conservative members to show that they have stayed with this government to protect Quebec's interests from within. Indeed, this is what they said when they decided to stay with the government. I can see that the member for Trois-Rivières is totally oblivious to this debate; he prefers to write a few letters and greeting cards rather than get involved in such historical and compelling issues for Quebec, so that this province can get its share of parks.

I therefore ask this question to the hon. member for Saint-Hubert: is she not surprised, after reading those documents and after the very elegant and comprehensive explanation that she gave in her speech, that there are not more parks in Quebec? Also, how is it that the Quebec Conservative members prefer to remain silent rather than protect the interests of Quebec as they have always claimed to do, so that Quebec also gets its share of national parks and that the federal government stop pouring money on one side or the other of that province, while precisely forgetting this population of seven million people that also pay taxes and that are entitled to their fair share?

Could the hon. member for Saint-Hubert make a small comment? I presume that my colleague is just as surprised as I am to notice this absence, this silence on the part of the Conservative members regarding such an important debate.

Mrs. Venne: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer the hon. member for Richelieu. As for the silence of the Conservative members from Quebec, I would just like to quote an article from Le Quotidien, the Chicoutimi newspaper, which shows how highly regarded the member for Jonquière is in his region, but he is still silent too. I quote: "He criticizes for reasons of form and image alone," says editorialist Claude Girard. Later on, he says, "Blackburn goes so far as to say that if he had heeded his constituents two years ago, he would have joined the Bloc Quebecois, but he finally preferred to listen to his leader's pleas instead of the will of those who had elected him."

In that same article, which I do not have with me, so I cannot continue to quote it, it is obvious, as is undeniably clear from the tone of it, that the only thing the member for Jonquière wants is to be seen. He often appears on TV. We in the Bloc like to see him too, but we often get a kick out of it: I must say that he does not contribute much to all the debates in which he does not participate or on which he has no opinion. Unfortunately, all he does is repeat what his leader told him.

As for the others, I must admit that after last year's Conservative Party convention, which I stormed out of, as you recall, because they just did not want to recognize the rights of an ordinary backbencher. That convention recognized Quebec's right to self-determination, as we recall. The member for Louis-Hébert was very pleased about that, but since then we have not heard from her. She was also against having a referendum bill. Now we see that she is all for it.

Every time we see Conservative members from Quebec changing their colours, we are no longer surprised to see them keep silent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Debate. The hon. member for Longueuil.

M. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to speak today on Bill C-59. I am also delighted to notice that, for the very first time since I have joined the Bloc Quebecois some two years ago, I have been recognized immediately after another member from the Bloc Quebecois in this House.

As you are aware, I tried over and over again to raise the rather important matter of the Canmet program, but I was not allowed to ask a question. I do not know why. After all, we were talking about technology and prosperity. I have leafed through the brochure received from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and noticed that, on the twenty or so projects listed in this leaflet, not a single one had been awarded in Quebec. By the way, the same is true, more or less, for national parks.

You are no doubt aware that only three of the 25 national parks in Canada are located in the province of Quebec. Such inequity is very nearly outrageous, when you see what little interest the federal government has shown for the province of Quebec, whether for parks or for science and technology projects. The same thing is happening almost in every case.

About parks, I must say that I am in favour of establishing parks, in so far as we can afford it of course. I am especially in favour of establishing parks equitably. I know why parks are necessary. First, our wildlife needs to be protected. We all know that this is important, at least in certain geographical areas of this great land. There are migratory birds and we have to earmark permanently a place for them, so they can go on travelling, surviving and living. That is why we need wildlife reserves such as parks to allow these birds to settle, feed and breed.

There are also animals that need protection. The problem often with wild animals accustomed to living in parks is that they are hardly protected at all when they wander in commercial or industrial areas, in big cities, in rural areas and so on. We absolutely need specific places where animals, our wildlife in particular, can live and survive.

The flora needs protection as well. Having been raised on a farm, I appreciate how important it is to have animals and to protect them as well as to have some contacts with animals, birds and nature. That is part of our culture, of our way of living and of our way of appreciating life. Nothing beats the beauty of animals living freely. When you look at animals living freely, you can recognize their specific character. In that sense, parks are a special place where wildlife and birds can live in total freedom and express themselves in all liberty, as I can do today in the House.

Of course, the quality of life is also in question here. If men and women have the possibility to live, to travel and visit national parks to see—

Mr. Lapierre: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Shefford, on a point of order.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, my colleague is making an excellent speech, and deserves much more attention. That is why I call quorum, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, the member for Shefford gave his word last week that he would not be stonewalling this legislation. Today we see tactics that are counter productive to advancing this legislation and getting on with other business. I think that is as much a point of order as is his.

• (1240)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the hon. member asking for a quorum call?

Mr. Lapierre: Yes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I did not hear him. I am sorry.

And the count having been taken:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There being 21 members present, not including the occupant of the Chair, the debate shall accordingly continue.

[Translation]

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, personally I was a little—

[English]

Mr. Mills: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. This is the kind of hypocrisy I think the people of Canada are fed up with in this House. All morning the hon. member comes into this Chamber and after looking around if he does not see quite enough people to form a quorum, he requests a quorum call. Then 30 seconds later, he himself runs out of the room.

Is there not some way we can finish this debate so we can get on to other business?

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I cannot accept that you do not ask my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood to withdraw his remarks. I have been following this debate all morning long, I even took part in it, and I do not need him to discipline us.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I think that is debate. If you want to discuss it, you can do so behind the curtains.

[Translation]

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): We are lucky, Mr. Speaker, to have parks because sometimes in this House it is somewhat embarrassing—

Mr. Lapierre: Its a real zoo.

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): People may think that we are not very free to express ourselves in such a place. Today, I am proud to be able to express myself. It is a rare occasion when we have time to do so since we are usually given very little time to speak our minds. We were given very little time to express our opinion on the referendum bill. Today, of course, we have the opportunity to talk about parks, which I greatly appreciate.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, in Quebec we would like to create a kind of a park, a very large park we would call Grand parc Grande-Baleine. For me and for many Quebecers, Grande-Baleine would become a great park, an extraordinary reservoir, the likes of which may never exist elsewhere in the world. We want to create this great park, Grande-Baleine, and at the same time generate energy and electricity. For the past 30 years we have developed energy and electricity in Quebec, the cleanest, the least polluting form of energy possible. For me that is extremely important. One is always wondering what is going on in Quebec. We want to generate clean and non polluting energy and at the same time create a park we would call Grande-Baleine Park, which would generate a lot of electricity and would be an extraordinary body of water which could be stocked, thus creating a perfectly viable park, especially in terms of tourism, which would attract all kinds of people.

[English]

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. As you know, I am a new member in the House and I am not quite sure of the rules. It seems to me that if somebody is constantly demanding a quorum that the responsibility of that party is to keep the debate going. Is there a rule on that note that when a party leaves in the middle of a debate and causes a quorum to be lost that they are not chastised by the Speaker for their interruptions at other times?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I think at this time we will just carry on with debate. I can discuss that with the hon. member if he would like to come to the Chair.

Mr. Fulton: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I know there is a fair degree of latitude in terms of relevancy given by you and other Speakers during debate, but I am just wondering about the terms of relevancy here.

Bill C-59 deals with Gwaii Haanas, with the South Moresby National Park Reserve and the agreement thereto in relation to Wood Buffalo National Park which is in Alberta and the Northwest Territories.

We were given to believe through the media that there was a solemn commitment by members of the Bloc that they would not be blocking this legislation today and yet they are. I just wonder, if they are being totally irrelevant to the legislation perhaps they could at least take the time to explain why their word is of no value.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe the hon. member was getting back to the relevance of the bill.

[Translation]

Mrs. Venne: Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that we, the members of the Bloc Quebecois, consider we have a right to speak just as much as the other members of this House. If we want to debate a bill, we have the right and the duty to do so. I cannot understand why our other colleagues are opposed to that.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I think we should get back to debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the member for Skeena has anything to teach us concerning the way we speak and the words we use in our speeches. I do not feel I have the right to judge his speeches and I hope he will not judge mine.

The Canadian people, and particularly the people from Quebec since I always speak more specifically for Quebecers, should be the ones to decide if my declarations are intelligent and adequate and not the member for Skeena.

We always address the people of Canada when we speak in this House; that is why cameras are filming and broadcasting the speeches of the members of this House.

I was talking about the great park we were thinking of creating in Quebec, the park of Grande-Baleine which would play an important role in the production of energy, electrical energy, and which would at the same time promote tourism in Quebec while producing electrical energy, the cleanest form there is.

When you talk about parks, you necessarily talk about environment. I wonder why the creation of a park such as Grande-Baleine, an environmental site and a source of enormous quantities of clean energy, should give rise to so many comments and to such a commotion on the part of native lobbyists and others who state it will be very bad for the environment.

Having asked myself a number of questions on that subject, I came to more essential and more vital ones such as could it be that our competitors, important American and Canadian lobbyists, would try to prevent the development of hydro-electricity in Quebec in order to promote other forms of energy like the atomic energy the Canadian government is promoting so strongly, since it has large amounts of uranium it wants to sell, particularly in Ontario, and also—

[English]

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I would ask that you rule on relevancy. I have now listened for another five minutes to the member. He shows no desire whatsoever to speak in relation to Gwaii Haanas. There has been a binding referendum that took place. The time clock ran out on that yesterday.

I think it would be helpful, since the leader of the Bloc Quebecois has personally committed to seeing this legislation pass, and as one of his other spokespersons last week said that this legislation would not be unduly held up, and since the members are obviously determined not to be relevant, surely the least we can do in this House is hold them to the rule of relevancy.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have been listening very carefully to the hon. member. Since he has only about four or five minutes left, I would hope that he would get back to the bill. I will listen to the hon. member for Shefford but I am just going to say to the hon. member for Longueuil that I have been listening to his speech also and I think he should come back to the relevancy of the bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, the member for Skeena keeps coming back on that subject each chance he gets to accuse us of trying to stop the bill. We are nine members here in this House and freedom of speech is fundamental to this Parliament. The reason why this Parliament sits is to give its members the opportunity to express themselves and I will not allow any one of those members to gag us. Mr. Speaker, and your function is precisely to make sure that we—

• (1250)

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not know what happened as far as any arrangements outside this House are concerned. I do not feel that we should get into discussion in that respect. I would like to recognize the hon. member for Longueuil because he is losing his time as far as debate is concerned. I would like the hon. member for Longueuil to finish his speech.

[Translation]

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, to answer the hon. member for Skeena, no agreement was made that I know of.

Mr. Lapierre: Exactly.

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): There was no agreement and we can speak freely in this House. We simply felt that we should take the time to explain, for the benefit of the people of Quebec in particular, what is happening in British Columbia. The government wanted to ram this bill through, to go through first, second and third reading within a couple of hours on Friday, the week before last, and we had not even been informed of this bill.

We simply decided to rise in this House to try and understand better what is going on with parks. I do not think there was any deal.

We also wondered what the rush was with this bill, why it had to pass all three readings on the same day. We were seriously wondering. Personally, I wondered for example about the ongoing constitutional debates. We know that, in this particular case, the responsibility for managing the park would be shared by the natives, the provincial and the federal governments. So, we wondered what the big rush was to entrust the federal government with the management of this park without first making sure, for one thing, that Mr. Ovide Mercredi, the leader of the native people in Canada, was aware of what was brewing in this House.

Mr. Mercredi is trying to gain more power for the native people in Canada. Did he really know what was going on? I asked myself the question and I wondered what all the rush was. Was the idea to play a trick on Mr. Mercredi by passing a bill swiftly to throw a wrench in his bargaining efforts, as he is talking about the Constitution and wants to bring back certain powers? Do we indeed want to play a trick on him?

Tricks like those are being played on us here in the House of Commons. We asked ourselves if the government was doing the same thing with Mr. Ovide Mercredi and was trying to fool him. We told ourselves that there was no rush and asked ourselves if, during last week's break, we could perhaps do a little research to see if the federal government was trying to fool Mr. Ovide Mercredi. It is for these reasons, among others, that we decided to speak in this House.

Who will really manage that park? Who will really manage it? Will it be the federal government alone or the three levels, that is the federal government, the province and the Indians? I do not know. It seems that it will be the federal government alone. We know that, until now, the federal government was not able to manage its own affairs. It has now accumulated a debt of $450 billion—$450 thousand million—and is on its way to have another deficit of $32 billion. It now wants to rapidly establish a park and create commitments for the next 50 or 100 years, without knowing if we will be able to pay for that park. That too is a serious question that we should ask ourselves.

We ask a lot of questions like those. Is the federal government able to manage a park adequately? Should the Indians not manage it themselves? Would it be better if British Columbia or even a private company did it? Those are all serious questions that we must ask ourselves in order that when that park is actually established and we start pouring money into it, we will be able to afford it and manage it efficiently and adequately, at lower costs than we have had until now.

We know that presently the federal government is unable to manage its own affairs. It is demonstrating its inability to manage the nation's finances since the accumulated debt is now reaching $450 billion and the annual deficit is going to reach $32 billion again. This is why we decided to talk. We want 25 per cent of the moneys which come from Quebec to be spent wisely. Quebecers are contributing $25 billion to Ottawa in direct and indirect taxes, and some would like us to believe that Quebec is receiving presents from the federal government. It never did, the government is simply returning to Quebec the money it took from our pockets in taxes. The same is true for parks.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively to the member for Longueuil. It seemed to me that toward the end of his speech he was asking a lot of interesting and constructive questions. He asked questions that we should all be concerned about concerning the Government of Canada and how we manage the parks of Canada, concerning the relationship of the Government of Canada to the parks of Canada versus the provincial relationship to the parks.

I was getting a strong sense from the member that he was speaking as he once did, as a strong federalist, rather than as he has been speaking in the last few months, which is—as most Canadians would know—as a separatist.

I am getting the sense that the separatist position of the Bloc Quebecois is taking a sudden shift. All of a sudden it is showing a great interest in Canada, her national parks, and the relationship between Canada and her national parks. Is there something new here? Is the Bloc shifting its position from that of a separatist party to that of a federalist party once again?

[Translation]

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): Absolutely not. Mr. Speaker, we are not in the process of changing our opinion. We are more and more attentive. Since we have decided to protect the interests of Quebec in Ottawa, we represent the citizens of Quebec here, we are more and more attentive to what the federal government does. As we know, Quebecers pay approximately $25 billion per year, that is 25,000 million dollars per year in taxes to Ottawa. Ottawa does not make gifts to Quebec. We are watchful because Quebecers pay about 26 per cent of all the taxes that the federal government spends recklessly. We are here precisely to keep an eye on how the taxes paid by Quebecers are spent in Ottawa.

The park that we are talking about will cost money and it will have to be managed by somebody. What I meant to say is that if it is managed by the federal government, and it has been demonstrated that the federal government is incapable of managing properly the taxes paid by Quebecers to Ottawa, within the Canadian Confederation, I say that one must wonder whether the private sector could better manage that park and ensure that Quebecers do not have to pay as much taxes to Ottawa to support it. I am not against parks. On the contrary, I am in favour of them and I wish that there would be many more in Quebec, since it seems that only three out of thirty-five national parks are in that province. If I rise today it is because we ask ourselves a lot of questions as to why Quebec is so disadvantaged in that regard. We have been establishing parks in Canada for 100 years. Why is it that Quebec was put at such a disadvantage when its territory is so suited to the creation of parks?

We have mountains and beautiful lakes. We have everything that is needed. Why has Quebec been so neglected in the last 100 years as regards parks, when Quebecers have always paid much more than they have received? If Quebec had collected those $25 billion and spent that money according to its priorities, I am convinced that it would have established more parks than the federal has done in the last 100 years. That is why we are interested in parks. It is not because we are less separatists, but we believe that the sovereignty of Quebec will precisely enable us to create parks adequately and in accordance with the priorities of Quebec. No, it is still the federal government that decides for Quebec, according to federal priorities. Unfortunately, the federal priorities are not the same as the priorities of Quebec. In Quebec, we would like to have more parks. That is why we rise today and say so to the population of that province. We rise today because we only represent Quebec. And we are the only ones. Of course, there is not a single Conservative member, nor a Liberal, because they only look after their own small personal interest. They want to become parliamentary secretaries or even ministers. We are not interested in becoming parliamentary secretaries or ministers; in fact, we are not even interested in gaining total power. We are only interested in having the power to protect the interests of Quebec and watch how the taxes paid by Quebecers are spent for as long as it will take before we can fully manage our own affairs, collect all of our taxes, and spend them according to our own priorities.

We will conclude economic and defence arrangements with the rest of Canada. Of course we are open. Ideally, and I am answering to the hon. member, a strong and united Canada with a sovereign Quebec would be ideal. It would not be necessary for us to rise in this House to protect the interests of Quebec. Our province would collect all of our taxes and would negotiate with the rest of Canada to decide on the parks that should or should not be created. It is for those reasons that I am more and more sovereignist; it is because I think that we were not well served by the Canadian federation. This is a blatant example, because in the last 100 years, the federal government only established three parks in Quebec while it created 32 in the rest of the country. This is proof that Quebec did not get a fair treatment in this country.

It is for all those reasons that Quebecers want to collect their own taxes and manage their money according to their priorities. It is for those reasons that the majority of Quebecers, and francophones in particular, have decided to opt for a sovereign Quebec associated with a united Canada. That English Canada form a united and strong nation is great, but Quebec will spend its money according to its priorities, and both sides will benefit. In fact, I am convinced that both sides will do better. That is why the Bloc Quebecois has chosen this option.

[English]

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, last week the member for Hull—Aylmer was interviewed by the press outside of this House about the tactics that had taken place that Friday during the debate on Bill C-59. He admitted that the Bloc Quebecois had been stonewalling Bill C-59. However, when asked whether that stonewalling was going to continue he indicated, on behalf of the Bloc Quebecois, that there would be no continued blocking of the bill.

I would like to ask the member why—

An hon. member: That is not a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): He is asking a question.

I recognized the hon. member on a question or a comment. He is now putting a question to the hon. member.

Mr. Plamondon: He is reading a text.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): He can read a text, there is nothing wrong with reading a text. He wants to make sure that the quote is right.

The hon. member for Skeena has the floor.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member could take a moment to address this because there are a considerable number of Haida people and British Columbians who are watching this debate, as well as a considerable number of Albertans and residents of the Northwest Territories. They would like to know whether the word of members of the Bloc Quebecois given to the media in Canada can be trusted or not.

The headline says: "Bloc Quebecois won't block South Moresby Park bill any more, member promises".

I am just asking whether a promise made outside the House by a member of the Bloc is worth anything. Apparently, the Bloc's promises here in the House, and outside, are of questionable value.

[Translation]

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the hon. member means by stonewalling or blocking. A few hours of debate in this House is nothing, compared to the many years this park will be in existence. I do not see why the hon. member for Skeena is in such a hurry. I do not see why he is so anxious to save a few hours' time, when we are discussing a bill to create a park that will cost several million dollars and will probably be in existence for the next 100 years.

Mr. Lapierre: Or even thousands of years.

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): Or even thousands of years, as the hon. member said. I do not see why he is so upset. We kept our promise. We are just saying we want to talk about this and make sure Quebecers get their fair share of what they contribute every day to the Canadian federation in the form of taxes, which adds up to about $25 million annually. If the Bloc Quebecois were not here to debate these points, I do not see who else would defend Quebecers as they should be defended in this Canadian Confederation.

And I do not see what he means by stonewalling.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that the hon. member's time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to take part in this debate on Bill C-59 which concerns our national parks.

Very often we cannot speak in debates that concern Quebec, such as the debate on the constitutional proposals or on the referendum. That is why we believe we must take advantage of every opportunity we have to speak on other matters, especially when the government is trying to expedite bills through the House, which is the case for this bill and even more so for Bill C-81, the referendum legislation.

This debate on national parks is a typical example of the speed with which the federal government is able to deal with matters outside Quebec and its reluctance to deal with matters that concern Quebec, and I am thinking more particularly of the Saguenay marine park.

Mr. McDermid: That is not true.

Mr. Duceppe: I do not know whether we will sit on the committee on Bill C-59. The minister said that all parties agreed to support the bill, but he never bothered to consult the Bloc Quebecois. As far as the government is concerned, we do not exist. However, the government and hon. members opposite from Quebec are in for a rude awakening after the next election.

Our members did not sit on the committee on Bill C-81 concerning the referendum and Canada's and Quebec's constitutional future. Committees, as in the case of the committee on Bill C-59, are more or less private clubs from which we are excluded.

To get back to Bill C-59, a number of questions come to mind. For instance, if British Columbia were to become a sovereign state, following a democratic referendum called, need I say, by the authorities of British Columbia and not by the federal government with its anti-democratic manoeuvres, how would the assets be divided? Would this park be federal property? Would British Columbia have to pay certain rights to the federal State? These things must be considered, and that is what the Bélanger-Campeau commission did when it consulted experts who came not just from Quebec but also from the rest of Canada, France and England. These experts told us that Quebec's share of non-financial federal assets would be equivalent to the ratio of the value of the assets located in Quebec territory to the value of all federal non-financial assets located in Canada and abroad, including embassies, consulates and the like.

• (1310)

We must also determine the real value of the national parks, because they have a value, even if it is hard to define in accounting terms, according to the federal government's own data, because they have not been built on. For example, what is Moresby Park worth or Forillon Park in Gaspé? That will have to be discussed when the time comes for Quebec and Canada to negotiate. We also know that federal government property is not subject to municipal property tax, so there must be some form of compensation. It exists in some cases. We know that Quebec receives only 18 per cent of this kind of compensation paid to municipalities.

I also repeat that Quebec has only three of the 35 national parks in Canada and that there is no compensation for national parks because, as we know, they are not built up but in their natural state.

How would one prepare that report I spoke of earlier on non-financial assets? The value of the national parks must be determined. We know in advance with absolute certainty—it is quite obvious—that Quebec contributes much more than it receives in this regard.

The relationship between the Haïda nation and the government authorities of British Columbia and Canada must also be specified. The governments should use the James Bay agreement between the Government of Quebec and the federal government and the Cree and Inuit nations as an example. Matthew CoonCome, the Cree Grand Chief, said in the State House in Maine: "As a people, we have the assurance of being able to preserve our way of life with respect to hunting, fishing, trapping and our language and culture. Under the agreement, we obtained what we never had before: full authority over education through the Cree school commission, over social and health services, over managing our lands, and a strong voice in approving new developments on our territory; rights that respect the resources of the land; rights that guarantee police protection and a judicial system adapted to our needs; guarantees that we can participate fully in developing sub-Arctic Quebec."

That is the kind of agreement that Quebec made with the Cree and that Matthew CoonCome, the Cree Grand Chief, talked about. I think it is important to mention it, because we know that British Columbia has the most land claims and that so far there have been almost no negotiations with the native people because these negotiations only began a year and a half ago, although I stand to be corrected on that.

We should also know whether creating that park will solve the land claims, if the inherent right of native self-government that we hear so much about in the present constitutional circus would accommodate such an agreement or whether the Supreme Court would have to decide in three years. In short, would this park still be part of British Columbia? Would it be a federal enclave or an independently governed native territory? Have provisions been made in this bill to tie it to the constitutional debate so that we can see beyond the few hours we have to discuss it?

We must deal with these issues and these questions are all unanswered right now. They might have a major impact in this time of constitutional discussion.

Despite what the member for Skeena said, we are in favour of creating this park.

There seems to be a problem when we are talking and when we want to talk, nobody wants us to do so. Make up your mind. As far as we are concerned we are quite ready to speak at some length and in great detail on the referendum issue, but nobody wants us to do so. Obviously, we will grab every opportunity possible but, as I said before, we will support the creation of this park. However, it is important to know how much it will cost Quebecers. We do not question the judiciousness of creating this park. We only want to try to figure out, in this area as in many others, how much is federalism costing Quebecers.

This park has its raison d'être and does not represent a totally frivolous expense, unlike the statue to honour the Queen of England which will cost taxpayers hundreds of thousands of dollars. It seems totally unjustified, especially during a recession, to build a statue of Elizabeth II on a horse.

The national park example, in terms of investments, is an excellent one for any province. In Quebec, the question is different because of the issue of who has control over the territory. In this area we are clearly distinct. When you look at investments, you can see that Quebec only gets 18 per cent of research and development funds. We also know that with three parks out of 35, we get very little in that area also. As a matter of fact, there is an area where Quebec receives more from Ottawa than it gives, and that is unemployment insurance.

You do not build a country, you do not develop a society by relying on unemployment insurance payments. You build a society by investing in research and development, by investing in industries, by investing in tourism via, for example—it is a good one—national parks.

We will therefore support this project and I hope that the questions I asked will be answered, especially as far as asset splitting is concerned, so that Quebec and Canada can start negotiating in earnest the splitting of assets and liabilities once Quebecers have answered yes to a sovereignty referendum held in Quebec according to Bill 150 passed by the National Assembly which is the only legitimate authority to decide what the future of Quebec will be.

Mr. Plamondon: On point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Richelieu wants to raise a point of order.

Mr. Plamondon: I would like to know, Mr. Speaker, if this is the question or comments period.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Yes, this is in fact the question or comments period. The hon. member for Richelieu has the floor.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): I am very pleased to participate in this debate and I very much appreciated the speech of my colleague, the member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie, who placed this debate in its proper perspective, that of a reflection we have to make on a greater equity in the distribution of resources and taxes levied by the federal government.

I find it surprising that we should want to speed up the debate on this issue as much as possible when we often take several months before passing ordinary bills. Last Friday, they tried to have it go through all three stages. I wonder why the member for Skeena is not rather going after the Tory government who neglected to table that bill. If we had been consulted a few months ago, or better still, if the government, in its respect for democracy, had—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. I wish the hon. member would direct his questions and comments to the former speaker. I do not think there should be a debate here between the hon. member for Skeena and the hon. member for Richelieu. When members get up for a question or comment they should direct it to the former speaker not to another member in the Chamber.

The hon. member for Skeena, on a point of order.

• (1320)

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, just so the record is accurate, the bill itself was tabled on February 20, 1992. The Bloc had more than three months to read it so it could have a reasonable opportunity to participate fully and directly in this debate.

There were no discussions on this floor on Friday of somehow ramming this suddenly through the House. Discussions were held to see whether the debate could be speeded up so that the binding referenda that had already taken place with the Haida could be met by this House.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, the member for Skeena is now trying to tell the House that there was no deal between the three parties to speed it up.

The reality is that for the last few hours of debate on Friday last and today those members have been trying to stop us from speaking. The reality of the matter is that we have wanted to participate in that debate, and at the end of the day we are going to support the bill. I hope the member will be here to support it as well.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The reality is that most of the members of the Bloc have been able to speak, so I would like to go back to questions and comments and recognize the hon. member for Richelieu.

[Translation]

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, I would also like to take part in the debate by asking my colleague if he is surprised to hear the hon. member for Skeena, who is getting ready for his trip to Rio with nine of his colleagues, tell us today that we have not prepared for this debate? The member forgets that when he or his party was sitting on the committee presided by the Speaker of the House, they refused to give us research budgets to enable us to have researchers, to prepare ourselves and to welcome this bill, but with a much better understanding of its content. However, they were not there, they were not there to defend democracy.

When the New Democratic Party only had 11 members, and the hon. member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie will agree, that party was entitled to research budgets even if the required number is 12 members. When there were only six Creditistes, they were entitled to research budgets. However, because this is the Bloc Quebecois, which has nine members, we refuse to give it research budgets. We would need those budgets to prepare ourselves, and we do not have enough time. Consequently, we have to discuss things a little bit longer, but debates in a Parliament can sometimes take an extra day, and I think that the member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie will agree on that. In fact, I notice that my colleague spent the whole weekend preparing his speech because he did not have researchers to help him and also because our party was not consulted regarding the ideal timetable to pass this very important bill. We were not consulted and now we are being blamed for not having been consulted. How can we understand those great Democrats?

I am surprised to see that because we take part in a debate that they tried to hide from us to speed up the passing of the bill on a Friday morning, with the three readings as well as the consent and the complicity of the three parties, all of a sudden they are surprised to see that we have things to say. We do this exercise in the name of Quebec and its higher interests, while the Conservative members are sleeping and hiding so as not to have to protect those interests. They act like good sheep after having been elected as the lions that would protect Quebec's interests.

The hon. member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie will agree that this is what is tragic. In fact, I think that this is precisely what the member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie was saying in his speech. That is what his comments were about when he was referring to the historical aspect of this great debate that has been going on for several years between Quebec and Canada and that deals primarily with the sharing of monies collected by the federal government. The hon. member explained how Quebec does not get its fair share of those monies in spite of the fact that it is a contributor.

This debate will lead to the passing of an exceptional bill for the Haida nation that we admire a lot for the struggle that it has put up for many years in order to get this park. Indeed, this park represents a lot for the Haida nation. That is why I urge the members of the House to support this bill.

I hope that all the members of this House will vote in favour of this bill so that the Haida nation can be satisfied after so many claims, and so that this park can be managed and established in British Columbia. However, as my colleague from Laurier—Sainte-Marie mentioned earlier, in the future we will have to ensure a more equitable allocation of public monies regarding national parks and Quebec will understand—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member has made his comment. I wish he would ask his question.

[Translation]

Mr. Plamondon: I was just about to ask my question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if my colleague from Laurier—Sainte-Marie could tell me: Basically, after a debate like this one on parks, would Quebec not be better off relying only on its own elected representatives, its own government, instead of relying on conservative members of Parliament who are sitting there in silence while Quebec is not receiving its share of federal funds?

Mr. Duceppe: Mr. Speaker, I think that, indeed, the role of members of Parliament from any region in Canada is to stand up for their constituents. I admire the hon. member for Skeena for that, as he truly fulfils his duties in this House. He is here to protect the interests of the people in his riding.

It is the same thing for us from Quebec, at least for us in the Bloc Quebecois, because the others do not speak up too often. Essentially, we are in favour of this bill. Yet it would be worth while to let the people know how much it costs, how much shall be levied from that area, and I raise again the matter of assets and liabilities. So how can this be settled, because this is the kind of question this House will have to deal with when Quebec and Ottawa get down to bargaining, after all this circus is over.

I would also like to go back to the question of knowing about this bill being introduced and our being insufficiently prepared. I for one have the feeling of having asked questions that are yet to be answered. We would have been better able to prepare for this debate if we had been afforded actual research services. I can tell you that, under the minority government of the member for Yellowhead in 1979, the Socreds lead by Fabien Roy had one. They ensured a majority. The NDP also had one between 1962 and 1964, as the Equality Party does presently in Quebec, because they view democracy differently there. There is more fair play and the people from the Equality Party, though they are only three, get research services while we do not get any here.

It seems to me that we could follow this lead. As I said earlier, we could follow the lead in the case of deals with the Haidas. In considering the James Bay agreement, we should draw inspiration as to how this House functions from the way things are handled in the Quebec National Assembly which celebrated its 200th anniversary last week.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time for questions and comments has now expired. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On a point of order, the hon. government whip.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I am just wondering, with this kind of precedent on Monday morning, we could apply this vote to the government legislation for the balance of the week.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 2 p.m. the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

ROBERT CAMPBELL

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, on the last day of May, the riding of Egmont in Prince Edward Island, Canada, is the worse off because of the loss of a great parliamentarian, citizen and family man, Robert Erskine Campbell.

• (1400)

Known affectionately as "the great west wind", Bob was in the 30th year of his reign as MLA for 1st Prince. His death marks the end of an era.

Bob was a rare and extraordinary individual, a politician the likes of which we probably will not see again. He had a great feel for politics and an uncanny ability to reach people in situations. He established a reputation of electoral invincibility and it grew with the passage of time. His last majority was his largest.

A major reason for his success was his genuine concern for his fellow man. His political partisanship melted away very quickly when he saw someone in need.

Hundreds of people in western Prince Edward Island will attest to the fact that when times were tough and the chips were down Bob Campbell was there for them.

I had the privilege of working closely with Bob for the past 15 years. He was a great friend. His advice and support were instrumental in my personal electoral success in 1988. I will miss him dearly as will the members of the P.E.I. legislature, the people of his riding, and most of all his family.

Bob died the way he wanted, still a member of the legislature, still fighting for his constituents. His love of people and politics still burns strongly.

We offer our sympathy and support to his wife Georgie and family. They can be proud of Bob's legacy and proud that the country is much the richer for Bob's having been there and much the poorer for his passing on.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, the fixed link to Prince Edward Island moved a major step forward when tenders came in well within the previously established financial guidelines at the May 27 tender opening.

The construction of the fixed link project will give the economy of the Atlantic region a major boost. A completed project will create new opportunities and help make Prince Edward Island much more competitive.

Compared to other maritime provinces P.E.I. has the lowest average income and the highest unemployment rate, in fact 37 per cent higher than Nova Scotia.

Both provinces are in the same region. Both have similar resources and work ethics. The difference is simply transportation.

As New Brunswick and Nova Scotia make every effort to improve their transportation systems. The fixed link will allow P.E.I. to move along with them.

The fixed link will provide new job opportunities and will allow the youth of Prince Edward Island to stay on the island and to support island traditions and the island way of life.

NATIONAL ACCESS AWARENESS WEEK

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, today is the first day of National Access Awareness Week. It is the time for us to reflect on how much still needs to be done to ensure equality for persons with disabilities in Canada.

This involves much more than just access to buildings. All Canadians are entitled to equal access to transportation, television, telephones and a wide range of other services that most of us take for granted.

Public attitudes and misconceptions can be the most difficult barriers that persons with disabilities must face in our society.

It is very sad that the government's omnibus legislation, Bill C-78, fails to address the problems of access adequately. The bill has been described as pathetic in The Ottawa Citizen and as a joke in The Toronto Star.

Canadians with disabilities have been waiting a long, long time for the federal government to take concrete action on important access issues. They are tired of waiting. They want action, not words, and they want it now.

I urge all Canadians to participate in National Access Awareness Week activities in their communities.

VIOLENCE ON TELEVISION

Mr. Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, her little sister died a horrible death, a death no one can forget, a traumatizing experience. Today, instead of hiding away, of crying all by herself, Virginie Larivière, from Saint-Polycarpe, has decided to send the Canadian government a petition with more than one million signatures, urging Ottawa to legislate in order to progressively reduce violence on television. She wants the people in Quebec's and Canada's cities to ask her for more petitions. The Optimist Club from Saint-Polycarpe, is managing the donations for the petition.

To receive copies of the petition, you only have to write to Virginie Larivière, Box 263, Saint-Polycarpe (P.Q.) J0P 1X0.

Mr. Speaker, I urge all members to support Virginie's project.

TRIUMF-KAON

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, the federal government is intentionally trying to scuttle British Columbia's TRIUMF-KAON project by setting new pre-conditions which are not acceptable.

The federal government's promise of $236 million for KAON was announced on the eve of last fall's provincial election. It is now clear the federal government never intended to honour this commitment.

Its actions on the international scene demanding that foreign governments now pay a minimum of one-third of the operating costs are designed to invite failure. Such actions threaten to embarrass both British Columbia and Canada and prove once again that this government cannot be trusted.

The B.C. government on the other hand has recently announced a new offer to pay a substantial portion of the operating costs in addition to the one-third share of capital costs for KAON.

If the federal government is not serious about funding world-class science at KAON then it should be honest and say so. At the very least it should commit the $236 million toward other worth-while scientific endeavours in British Columbia.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, Canadians of Greek origin hope the visit of our Secretary of State for External Affairs to Greece and Cyprus will contribute greatly to the solution of the Cyprus issue in accordance with resolutions of the United Nations.

The illegal Turkish occupation forces should be removed as soon as possible. This will enable the subsequent departure of UN peacekeeping forces.

While in Greece, we hope the minister takes the opportunity to hear the views of the Greek government on the Yugoslav crisis. Our government must do everything in its power to prevent further destabilization of the region.

Failure of the former Yugoslav Republic of Skopje to assure its ethnic groups their rights and adopt a name which is not linked to Hellenism threatens to increase the chaos in this turbulent region.

Canada should insist that prior to any recognition Skopje should drop the Greek name Macedonia and respect the culture and traditions of its various ethnic groups, as well as those of its neighbours.

TRADE

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Mr. Speaker, the world is moving to free trade. As tariffs to international trade come down it is necessary to address barriers to efficiency and development at home.

For years negotiations at GATT have been eliminating trade barriers and reducing tariffs between countries. Free trade between Canada and the U.S. came into effect on January 1, 1989.

In Europe, the European common countries have joined together to foster free trade. Australia and New Zealand have a free trade agreement.

Today, as trade barriers disappear around the world, there remains between provinces hundreds of impediments preventing the free movement of goods and services.

I urge the premiers of the provinces to convene a meeting to address this problem. The restrictions to free movement of goods and services between provinces is hindering economic growth in Canada. We need action now.

HAMILTON, ONTARIO

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, in a bid to add perception to reality no less than four Conservative cabinet ministers, including their sidekick from Hamilton—Wentworth, met behind closed doors with Hamilton Mayor Bob Morrow and Hamilton—Wentworth Regional Chairman Reg Whynott last week to discuss local issues.

Incidentally no such meeting has ever taken place since the Tories were elected in the early 1980s.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism, the Minister for Science and the junior transport minister met with the two Hamilton area officials and pleaded their ignorance on such things as the Hamilton airport, the Hamilton Harbour Commission, and the beleaguered Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety.

Could the ministers have been apologizing? Or did this Tory tea party have anything to do with the timing of an election possibly?

Despite appearances, the foursome could not make up for almost a decade of truancy. A miffed Hamilton Mayor Bob Morrow summed up the feelings Hamiltonians have for the Conservative government's relationship with the city when he said: "It is unfortunate that after eight years in power this is the first meeting we had".

PROPERTY RIGHTS

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, last September the federal government made 28 proposals for constitutional change. Since then there has been much public polling of what Canadians want to see in a renewed Canada.

Of all of this data I have seen none is more supportive than in the case of restoring the right to own property to Canadians. Almost 90 per cent of those polled want property rights entrenched in the Constitution. They want this right, first enshrined in 1215 in the Magna Carta and adopted by the United Nations in 1948, given back to Canadians as a fundamental reform.

As it now stands the west will likely get an elected Senate. Quebec will likely get distinct society status. The aboriginal people will likely get self-government.

Middle-class Canada wants something as well: the right to own property and to be fairly compensated when it is taken away, and the right to challenge politicians and bureaucrats when they pass laws affecting what people own.

I urge the federal government to hang tough in this issue and not to give into the bleatings from the left-wingers who do not think Canadians should be trusted to own property.

GRAIN INDUSTRY

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, Canada's grain industry is in a crisis once again. From prairie elevator to Thunder Bay to Port Cartier, Sept Iles and Baie Comeau our elevators are full.

At the same time when as many as 25 ships could be loading Canadian grain in Thunder Bay, this week only three will depart that seaway port. The problem is money.

While Canada has appropriately extended financial credit to Russia and other eastern European countries so they can buy our grain there is no money to pay to ship that very same grain.

• (1410)

In the past this government has quickly acted when labour-management disputes slowed or stopped grain movements. In the government's words they acted in the national interest.

On behalf of farmers, railroaders, grain handlers, weighers and inspectors, seafarers and the hungry people of eastern Europe, I call on the Government of Canada to act now to find some way to get our grain moving again. It is in the national interest.

SENIORS MONTH

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, June is Seniors Month in Canada, a month to commemorate the great things seniors have done for Canada as well as recognize the contributions seniors continue to make.

Government has an important role to play. The one thing seniors want more than anything else is independence. It is only through co-operation and support that true independence will be achieved. Seniors have the right to choose their own futures and they want government to support that right.

The Liberal Party is committed to seniors and their independence. We appreciate the talent and the experience of seniors and thank them for giving so much to this country.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, last Friday, at a press conference help in Rouyn-Noranda, Noranda Minerals Inc. announced, through the CEO for the Horne Smelter, that the company has reached, three years before the deadline, its objective of reducing by 70 per cent its SO_2 emissions and mineral dust compared to 1980.

At the same time, the CEO announced a financial commitment of $5 million for updating the equipment, in order to reduce SO_2 emissions by 90 per cent by the year 2000.

Since that means citizens from Rouyn-Noranda will be breathing 90 per cent fresher air in comparison with 1980, needless to say how such good news were welcome by the people. This is the result of the efforts of all those who campaigned for better air quality in our region.

As I have often said, we have to expose industries which are polluting, but we also have to encourage and congratulate those which take positive action.

So congratulations to the Horne Smelter for its environmental achievements.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, as our constitutional negotiators take a much needed break, we should offer our support and congratulations for their achievements to date.

I would also encourage them to keep working to find acceptable compromises that will keep Canada united.

Despite the fact that we are encouraged by the progress that is being made, it is important to remind all of the negotiators that the first level of government, the family, is not directly represented at these talks.

I urge all participants, federal, provincial and aboriginal, to recognize the importance of families in all our societies and communities. Families formed by men and women freely making commitments to each other, to their role in bringing children into the world and to successfully raising and nurturing children to adulthood, need to be fully recognized in our Constitution.

I urge the Prime Minister, the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs, the premiers and aboriginal leaders to ensure that the importance and the role of families are fully recognized.

CANADA'S 125TH BIRTHDAY

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, throughout the last number of months the government has been encouraging Canadians to buy Canadian, to support Canadian entrepreneurs, manufacturers and retailers. The government is also spending money on ads encouraging people not to shop in the United States but to avoid cross-border shopping, to buy Canadian.

Yet all Canadians were shocked over the weekend to find out that in an effort to celebrate Canada's 125th birthday all sorts of paraphernalia—caps, tote bags and pencils—were purchased not in Canada but in the United States and in China.

On one hand the government says one thing and on the other hand purchases caps from China to help celebrate Canada's 125th birthday. We figure this is unacceptable. The government should do what it encourages other Canadians to do from time to time.

WORLD NO TOBACCO DAY

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, Sunday, May 31, was designated World No Tobacco Day by the World Health Organization.

The slogan for the day was: "Tobacco-Free Work Places: Safer and Healthier". Canada has already made giant strides toward achieving smoke-free work places for all employers and employees.

Leadership was provided in 1987 by federal government's provision for smoke-free work places under federal jurisdiction through the public service smoking policy. Many provincial and local governments and corporations have also taken similar action. By late 1991 the Canada Health Monitor Survey was able to report that only 37.6 per cent of Canadians over the age 15 had been exposed to tobacco.

Smoke in the workplace area is unacceptable and our goal is to see that all working Canadians are protected from this workplace hazard in striving for a tobacco free generation.

CORRECTIONS CANADA

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, in 1990 the Task Force on Federally Sentenced Women recommended the creation of a healing lodge which would serve as an incarceration option for federally sentenced women.

Last week the Solicitor General announced that, pursuant to the recommendations of the healing lodge planning committee, the healing lodge would be built near Maple Creek, Saskatchewan, in close proximity to the Nekaneet Band and the historic Cypress Hills. Central to the choice was the long history of peaceful interaction between the native and non-native community in the Maple Creek district, a relationship characterized by mutual respect and cordiality.

The building of the $7 million facility will create some 60 construction jobs and there will be 26 full-time employees and staff. Most important of all, the selection of the Maple Creek-Nekaneet site for the healing lodge is part of this government's ongoing commitment to respect the task force recommendations and thereby better meet the objectives of the Canadian Corrections Service.

JOB TRAINING

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister and his colleagues have been travelling the country in the last month talking about the need for Canada to be competitive and for Canadians to be trained and retrained. His colleague, the Minister of State for Small Businesses, came into the Hamilton area last week and said there were 300,000 jobs going begging for lack of proper training. However, if Canadians follow the government's advice and go down to their local Canada Employment Centre to apply for training, they are told there is no more money for training this year.

How can the minister square his claims that he is moving to make Canada more competitive with the reality that 1.5 million Canadians do not have access to training funds?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, last year some 630,000 Canadians benefited from training programs funded under federal programs. This year, with the changes we have made to the Unemployment Insurance Act, more will benefit. I hate to refer again to the strong opposition of her party to that modification. Today she stands in the House, and the Liberal Party, to complain about there is not being enough money for this developmental use of the UI program which they strongly opposed.

To me, it is inconsistent. Had they not delayed the implementation of Bill C–21 for 18 months, a lot more Canadians would have benefited from that money sooner. Right now, this year, the need of Canadians for training is recognized. Some $3.4 billion will be spent to train Canadians and that is more than last year.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, Canadians fully remember that one of the first acts of this government was to cut $700 million from training funds that were there under Liberal governments, so we do not need lessons from anybody about putting Canadians back to work.

[Translation]

It is the same old refrain we have heard from this government over and over again. What we want is an answer. The Prime Minister has promised us time and time again that Canada would have the best training and retraining programs in the world. How can they be the best when there is no more money to pay for them?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if I were to qualify the hon. member's statement I would be unparliamentary. I must inform the hon. member it is absolutely false to claim there are no more funds under the Unemployment Insurance Act or under programs financed from the Consolidated Revenue Fund to train Canadians. There are funds, but they must be managed throughout the year. This year, more Canadians will benefit in absolute numbers from federal training programs than last year.

• (1420)

[English]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the number of jobs in the retail trade have gone down for 21 straight months. Jobs in the food and beverage industry have fallen for 25 straight months. Jobs in construction have gone down for 27 straight months. Manufacturing jobs have fallen 28 months straight. The fact is that 1.5 million Canadians are out of work, and as we speak those Canadians do not have access to UI training funds.

My question is for the Prime Minister. What are these 1.5 million Canadians who desperately want to work supposed to do with no training funds?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, again I do not know what the hon. member is trying to do by saying in this House to Canadians that there are no training funds out there.

Throughout Canada this year $3.4 million will be spent. That is $300 million more than last year. How can she stand in this House and tell Canadians there is no training money?

If the Liberal Party is so concerned about training, why does it not start its campaign at the provincial level? Seventy-six per cent of all training funds in this country are spent by this level of government. Training and education are provincial matters which provinces should take seriously.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

I would like to ask the minister to confront the harsh reality. The minister has said there are 300,000 jobs that cannot be filled because Canadians do not have the proper skills. At the same time, thousands of Canadians are being denied access to the training that would enable them to fill those jobs. Obviously the system is not working.

How does the minister intend to fix it?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, how the government intends to fix it is to convince Canadians from coast to coast to coast that the matter of building a training culture in this country is not only a federal matter.

It is something that implicates all levels of government, business, labour, workers and individual Canadians. It is true that the demand for training at this time of high unemployment is resulting in pressures on the funds available. That is why the government increased the number of dollars to be spent to train unemployed Canadians.

If the argument is that we should borrow more or increase the deficit more, or raise taxes to do more than what we are already doing, we think and we suggest that instead, all levels of government that have a stake in the skills of our work force should get together and try to get a system that will work more efficiently.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, the point is that we cannot afford to have 1.5 million Canadians unemployed. It is simply not the way to use our human resources.

If the minister would like co-operation, it is going to be extremely difficult to get parties involved. The minister has cut $200 million from the Canadian Jobs Strategy and people will continue to be shut out of the process and training. He is denying them an opportunity for the future. How long must they wait before this government will act?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Again, Mr. Speaker, I have to confine myself to parliamentary language.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Valcourt: This party stands in the House today complaining about not enough funds going to training. For 18 months they, with their friends in the other place, prevented Canadians from benefiting from these hundreds of millions of dollars that we are spending to train unemployed Canadians.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Statistics Canada has shown there are over 1.5 million Canadians out of work. There are 95,000 Canadians who have access to the training programs this minister is bragging about. That represents 6 per cent of unemployed people having access to training. Is the minister saying it acceptable for only 6 per cent of the unemployed have access to training? Is this acceptable to the minister?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker. One Canadian unemployed is one too many. That is why instead of trying to buy the illusion of prosperity which the Liberals and the socialists think we should keep on doing, we have decided to concentrate the funds of the UI program for training Canadians, which by the way that party opposed.

I said earlier last year 630,000 Canadians benefited from the training and support programs under UI and this year this will go up to 650,000 people. Maybe it is not the extent to which the hon. member would do it, but with the limited funds we have, this is what we have decided we will do as our priority.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, unemployed people do not care where the money comes from or how people voted. The reality is they are out of work, they need training, and this minister goes on and on about the amount of money being spent when only 6 per cent have access to training. What is he going to do for those 94 per cent that do not have access to training?

Mr. McDermid: This guy wants to print money.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, maybe we could print some more money. Maybe we should print some more money.

Mr. Riis: Are you joking about this?

Mr. Valcourt: He is joking with the future of Canada by pretending we can print money.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, obviously members on the other side do not listen any more than they do any other time. I clarified that situation a long time ago.

[Translation]

It is clear the minister has no idea of Canada's training needs. Ninety-four per cent of the unemployed have no access to training programs. What is the minister going to do to train those 94 per cent?

[English]

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): I can quote the hon. member. When we borrow money to do a project that money has to be repaid. We are going in circles like a dog chasing its tail and not getting anywhere. Instead of borrowing money we create it. We do not have to pay it back. That is the philosophy of the socialists in Canada, it is not ours.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Two weeks ago, at an international conference on the environment in Nairobi, the international community was supposed to approve the convention on biodiversity. By the end of the conference, the United States had managed to rid the text of all substance. However, a few days ago the Americans announced they would not sign the text they had already diluted.

Considering this total refusal by the United States to do anything at all, will Canada immediately initiate a campaign to revert to the original text of the convention, so as to provide better protection for the world's animal and vegetable species?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, earlier today I indicated that we intend to sign the international convention on biodiversity and that we will also work very hard with our allies to bring about gradual improvements in the text.

• (1430)

[English]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, the question I asked was whether Canada would push first to go back to the original text, which the Americans had diluted, now that the Americans have refused to sign the text on biodiversity.

The real question is that of the major conventions to be signed in Rio, the one on forestry has been shelved, climate change has been emptied of all content and as we have seen, biodiversity has been critically wounded. The reason is very clear. We are dealing with the selfishness of nations.

Not for a long time has there been an opportunity for Canada to play such a role on the world stage in such a crucial area.

In this, the decisive week, what new initiatives does the government propose to make among the many that have been suggested to infuse needed momentum back into the Rio process?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have just come from a meeting of some 400 to 500 young Canadians, some of whom will be going to Rio.

I dealt with some specifics as to the objectives of Canada for the Rio conference and the things that we can do, will do, and are in the process of doing to achieve the objectives articulated so eloquently by my hon. friend.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

The earth summit is about to begin yet the government lacks the support of some key international players for its fisheries resolution. Last week the minister was in Washington and he hardly managed to get the time of day from the U.S. commerce secretary.

Now that we know and he knows that the Americans are going to scuttle the resolution at Rio, what contingency plan does the minister have in mind or has he thrown in the towel on this one?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I visited Washington last week on this subject. I met with the secretary of commerce and other officials from her department who are involved with fisheries and also with Congressman Studds who is the chairman of the House of Representatives sub-committee on fisheries and the environment. I had very good meetings down there.

The U.S. has given us considerable support with reference to our resolution which is going forward to the Rio de Janeiro meeting next week. In addition, the Prime Minister met with President Bush and reviewed the fisheries situation with him and with Secretary of State Baker.

The Americans are now fully familiar with the problems we are suffering from overfishing on the nose and tail of the Grand Banks. They are also supportive. The secretary of commerce advised me that they will support our request that there be an international conference under the auspices of the UN on high seas fishing as soon as possible and will support our call for that to occur at Rio de Janeiro next week.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, the minister of course is skating a bit on this. The real question is: are the Americans going to support the resolution? I think he himself gave the answer publicly last week and the answer is no.

What action plan does the minister have in mind after Rio, assuming the resolution fails as he allowed it might? What does he plan after Rio to get action on the real issue, the stopping of this pillaging of fish resources off Newfoundland? How will fishermen and plant workers in his riding and in mine be any better off as a result of the summit in Rio next week?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, everyone interested in the fishery will be better off as a result of the summit in Rio next week because this issue will be front and centre at the largest conference ever held on the environment. Until several months ago, it was not even considered to be an important environmental issue. We now have this issue in its right context.

It is the European Community that claims to be very concerned about the environment and environmental issues, but is preventing our resolution, supported by 40 countries, from having a consensus so far. They are feeling the results of our campaign around the world in this connection. This is shown by the fact that many times in the last several days the Spaniards have announced that they are removing their fleet, even if temporarily, from the nose and tail of the Grand Banks.

We are getting results. I hope that hon. members opposite who have been helpful for the most part would rejoice in the fact that there is some progress being made.

As far as what we are doing in the future, the Prime Minister is going to carry on this cause at the Munich summit of the G-7 powers in July. We will be carrying on our campaign at NAFO in September, and in many other fora during the coming months.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Forestry.

Last week, legal counsel on behalf of the federal government wrote to the U.S. department of commerce asking for the exemption of Manitoba, Quebec and Saskatchewan from the softwood countervail dispute with the United States.

Can the minister tell the House the reasons for this move? Can he assure us that this move will not mean that the provinces of B.C., Alberta and Ontario will have to pay a higher price for yet another bad trade deal by this government?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, as my friend already knows, the Atlantic provinces have always been excluded from the countervail action. The new findings by the commerce department, which are disputed, also indicate that Quebec and two of the prairie provinces should no longer be included. In the case of Quebec, the duty that is imposed is less than .01 per cent.

This is nothing new. My hon. friend knows that we disagree with all aspects of the finding and that it is being fought and appealed to the binational panel, the establishment of which we have called for.

TRADE

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, from one bad deal to another. My question is for the Prime Minister.

This government has indicated that the North American free trade agreement would improve the status of Mexican workers and open a market of 85 million to Canadian manufacturers. I was in Mexico last week and these statements are simply not true.

Last week, the Mexican government, labour and business signed a work accord that may or may not increase productivity but did nothing to address the wages of grossly underpaid Mexican workers.

I want to ask the Prime Minister what specific Canadian products will the hundreds of thousands of exploited Maquiladora workers purchase when their present and potential earnings are $4.50 a day?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that there are discussions besides the NAFTA on labour, on environment, and on other issues.

The hon. member asks what Mexican products come up here and what we are going to do for Mexico.

Mr. Butland: No. What Canadian products?

Mr. Winegard: At the moment what we have, certainly in the automotive industry, is one-way trade with Mexico. For every car we can bring up here from Mexico, we have to send two and a half to offset this.

There is no doubt at all that we are in the NAFTA agreement because we want to have two-way trade with Mexico, not one-way trade with Mexico.

WESTRAY MINE

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister and it concerns the Westray mine.

One thing is crystal clear. If the government had listened to its own bureaucrats there would have been no federal financing, no mine would have been built, and 26 miners would not have lost their lives.

The premier of Nova Scotia has stated that when federal bureaucrats stalled the project he asked his political friend, the Prime Minister, to give the project a green light.

How could the Prime Minister possibly justify proceeding with the project on purely political grounds, overlooking the obvious safety concerns that were raised time and time again by his own bureaucrats?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will not comment on the specious argument and the misleading statements of my hon. friend. I will say in regard to the fundamental nature of the question, that my role in this was no more nor less than in other cabinet decisions regarding financial assistance for regional development projects.

In this case, federal financial development assistance was provided because the development of the mine with its potential for some 240 direct jobs and 300 or 400 indirect jobs was viewed as a top priority by the Government of Nova Scotia and the people in Central Nova. The mayors, the wardens, trade union leaders, all of the people involved in Central Nova and throughout Pictou County made direct representations asking for financial assistance for what they viewed as an important instrument of regional economic development. After careful consideration, the government agreed to provide assistance as we do in many regional development programs across Canada.

If my hon. friend is in disagreement with that, perhaps he could say so. Those were the grounds on which the government made the decision.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my supplemental is for the Prime Minister. It concerns the same subject matter.

This was not a regular project. Canadians, Nova Scotians, but most particularly, the families of those 26 miners want to know what role politics played in the approval of this project.

The premier of Nova Scotia has stated that when this project was stalled he contacted the Prime Minister. He said that what the Prime Minister did in response will have to be asked of him.

I ask the Prime Minister: what was his response? What role did he play in overriding the numerous safety concerns of the federal bureaucrats which ultimately resulted in the financing of this ill-fated project?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): I do not know why my hon. friends from the Liberal opposition would be applauding a question of this nature.

An hon. member: It is a good question.

Mr. Mulroney: No, it is not a good question. The suggestion is that the government would knowingly proceed with something that would jeopardize the well-being of people in the interests of regional economic expansion.

My hon. friend asked me what role I played in the decision-making process. I played exactly the same role as I played for example in the decision to proceed with de Havilland in downtown Toronto and when we decided to proceed with development programs in Hibernia in Newfoundland. I was involved in the decision-making process in exactly the same way and pursuant to the same criteria.

The government concluded on the basis of the evidence made available to it that this was in the interests of economic development in Nova Scotia and in Central Nova. Those were the grounds on which we proceeded.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question likewise is for the Prime Minister.

The government has said over and over again that it was satisfied with the safety conditions in the Westray mine because it was receiving monthly reports from an independent consultant. We now know that that simply was not true, that the person who was supposedly the independent consultant says he did not supply those reports, nor did his company. He merely passed along reports that the Government of Nova Scotia provided.

When will the Prime Minister stop the confusion and say what reports the government did or did not receive, if it received any? Evidently there were some reports in which the government says it put a great deal of faith. What we want is for those reports to be made public today.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had read the newspaper carefully two weeks ago, he would have a quotation from the very mining engineer he has been quoting. Mr. McCandlish said: "I will concur that as late as March I believe we had confirmed independently with the Nova Scotia Department of Labour and the Department of Natural Resources that they, Curragh, were in compliance with the current statutes. That answer was provided and passed on to the bank". He also said that his firm's primary role was to monitor the levels and cost of coal production.

These certificates of compliance were received on a regular basis, but the actual day-to-day monitoring and inspection of the mine was the responsibility of the province of Nova Scotia and those two departments. That is why a judicial inquiry has been established. My hon. friend knows that.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, there is a drastic erosion here of the government's position. Now it is telling us it was not concerned with safety in the Westray mine.

Without questioning what information the government had that said the safety conditions were poor in the Westray mine, surely the Prime Minister and the government must have received some information which said that there were no problems with safety in the mine. Surely information of that importance came from somewhere to the federal government before it gave the loan guarantee.

Did it come from Westray? Did it come from Curragh? Did it come from Donald Cameron? Did it come from some other source? Just tell us today where the government based its belief that there were safe conditions in that mine and make those reports public today.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member can try as hard as he wishes to make this provincial jurisdiction federal jurisdiction.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Come on.

An hon. member: Give us the detail.

Mr. Hockin: What the federal government did when it gave the loan guarantee was to make sure that on a regular basis all provincial statutes and regulations that affected the mine would be complied with.

We did that through receiving monthly certificates of compliance. That is what we received. That is what we relied on, but we cannot do independent inspections on our own. That was the job of the jurisdiction that was in charge, the Government of Nova Scotia.

ABORIGINAL HEALING LODGE

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General.

Aboriginal women and their supporters were pleased when the decision was made to close the Kingston prison for women and build an aboriginal healing lodge following the suicide death of three aboriginal women from northern Saskatchewan.

These tragic deaths were found to be the direct result of isolation from families and communities. Therefore people are shocked that Maple Creek was chosen as the site for this lodge since only one-half of 1 per cent of the native people in Saskatchewan live within 200 kilometres of the site.

Can the minister please explain how Maple Creek meets the basic criteria of being close to family and the support networks of incarcerated women?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I think it is quite evident that aboriginal women would be satisfied with the selection of Maple Creek Nekaneet as the site for the healing lodge. It fulfils all the criteria that they were looking for in terms of being a culturally sensitive environment with running water, plenty of rural land, and a sensitive relationship between the native and non-native communities.

My friend specifically refers to it being equidistant. I remind my hon. friend that this is an aboriginal healing lodge for native women from all of Canada. We do find that there are more aboriginal women from the west and in particular from Saskatchewan and Alberta.

I think if my hon. friend checks the geographical distances from both Alberta and Saskatchewan, he will find that the appropriation is appropriate on that basis also.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I do not really care if the politics involved in making this decision came from the aboriginal community or came from partisan politics, or both.

The fact still remains that aboriginal women at Kingston died because of isolation from families and communities. The fundamental problem of isolation will not be solved by putting this healing lodge in a location where there are virtually no aboriginal people, where there is no transportation, where there are no support networks.

Therefore, will the Solicitor General please commit himself to a complete review of the selection process of the aboriginal healing lodge to make sure that another tragic mistake is not being made here?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, we are closing the prison for women and we are doing it by establishing prisons for women right across Canada.

I can assure my hon. friend that there were no politics involved in this. I am looking for one winner and one winner only and that is the aboriginal women.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Over the last few months Canadians have seen dramatic reductions in the level of interest rates charged by the banks. The prime is now 7.5 per cent and mortgages are in the 8 per cent range.

Consumers are paying from 16 per cent to an incredible 28 per cent interest on unpaid credit card balances, a spread now of up to 20 per cent compared with the primes.

My question is this: can the minister help Canadian consumers by telling the banks that if this rip-off does not end soon he will move to stop the credit card gouging?

• (1450)

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, yes, interest rates have dropped dramatically in recent months and I have already said, as my colleague is probably aware, that I met with the Canadian Bankers Association. I also met with the association of store owners who operate credit cards. Of course, the problem is that interest rates on the credit cards commonly used for everyday purchases have dropped appreciably. They are now around 16 or 17 per cent. I invite consumers to shop around for the best rates.

Department store credit card rates are still 28 per cent, which is very high. Often, people do not realize that when they buy with their department store credit cards, they keep outstanding balances on their accounts for months, although they could simply go to a branch of a bank or credit union and get a loan at 10 per cent, thus saving a lot of money in interest. I publish a quarterly report on interest rates to inform consumers. Through the forum that we have here, I ask them to do what I say: shop around and use the right payment method when they buy.

TRANSITION HOUSES

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs. It refers to a transition house for Millbrook near Truro, Nova Scotia.

The transition house need is acknowledged. The funding is approved for the future, but the problem is the natives need the transition house right now.

Considering recent negative effects on the economy in the area, will the minister review this decision and find some way to fund this transition house this year instead of next year?

An hon. member: All transition houses.

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Cumberland—Colchester raises a question which is of concern to native women across Canada.

This government has taken special steps through the Project Haven Program and more recently the Next Step Program to provide transition houses such as the one I announced jointly with the New Brunswick government last Thursday in Fredericton.

I will look into the hon. member's request. I did announce some time ago that we would be building two new transition houses in the province of Nova Scotia. It is my understanding that the chiefs of Nova Scotia have opted to build the centre first at Whycocomagh Band on Cape Breton Island and the second project to proceed next year. However, I will review the matter further.

WESTRAY MINE

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In responding to questions regarding Westray, the Prime Minister said and I quote: "My role is no more nor less than other regional development projects".

The Prime Minister will know that the federal government's own Crown corporation, Devco, had written a devastating report pointing out the dramatic safety hazards of the foord seam at the Westray mine.

The Prime Minister will know that senior federal officials had expressed such reluctance, both with respect to the economics of this project and with respect to the safety of this project, that the premier of Nova Scotia felt compelled to call the Prime Minister personally to ask the Prime Minister to intervene to get this project back on the rails.

The question I ask and that Canadians are asking is what did the Prime Minister do that moved forward a project that seemed stuck in neutral prior to Don Cameron's phone call to the Prime Minister's office?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I frequently receive calls from provincial premiers with respect to major regional development projects in their provinces.

My hon. friend represents the province of Newfoundland and Labrador. I can tell him I had many calls from the premier of Newfoundland seeking my support in regard to the Hibernia development project. This is not unusual. It is quite proper and appropriate that it proceed that way.

It was conducted in essentially the same way in regard to the regional economic development in Nova Scotia. The decision-making process follows cabinet committee and at the end of the day the government has to decide whether the expenditure of public funds is in the national interest in respect of development and employment-creating programs in Nova Scotia.

In Central Nova, unemployment was high throughout Pictou County. This was seen by everyone as an opportunity to provide long term and good paying jobs. We examined it objectively and we arrived at the conclusion we did.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, the issue is not whether or not the Prime Minister of Canada ought to be concerned with regional development. The issue is whether or not the Prime Minister was concerned about safety after he talked to his friend Don Cameron.

What I am asking and what the people of Canada want to know, and I suspect in particular the people of Pictou County want to know, is about the miners who had no union and no other spokesperson and who were counting upon their governments to defend their interest. What action did the Prime Minister take to ensure himself that the concerns raised by Devco in 1988, the concerns raised by senior federal officials about safety in that mine in fact could be answered in a responsible fashion that would justify providing $85 million and opening that mine?

What action did the Prime Minister take to assure himself this was a proper investment and that that mine was safe? Did he take any action to ensure himself in that regard?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of State has referred to documents that will be tabled in the House. There is a commission of inquiry established by the Government of Nova Scotia that will examine all questions relating to this tragedy. I am sure that the chairman of the royal commission will arrive at conclusions and will convey them to the public.

My hon. friend mentioned Devco in his first question. I draw to his attention that, for example, on February 24, 1979, an explosion occurred in the 12th south section of the No. 26 colliery operated by Devco.

The explosion resulted in the death of 12 employees and serious injury to another four employees. A commission of inquiry was struck. The commission concluded that the methane produced from the coal being cut was ignited by sparking from the sheer of steel picks, and that the primary cause of the explosion was the inadequacy of the wall face ventilation that did not prevent a minor ignition from developing into an explosion.

This was a mine owned and operated completely by the Government of Canada. The safety regulations were within federal jurisdiction, as I understand it. In spite of this—and in excess of $1.3 billion of federal money that had gone into Devco to provide for this—this tragedy occurred.

The coroners of the commission of inquiry concluded that it was methane induced, but I do not think that there was anybody in the House of Commons who rose to suggest that because of the approval of these public funds to develop the mine in Cape Breton, that there was any member of Parliament who was responsible for the safety provisions.

I ask my hon. friend to wait for the response from the commission of inquiry. I think he will be satisfied.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister cannot deny that his own appointee as president of the Cape Breton Development Corporation, one Derek Rance whom he worked with on a previous occasion, wrote a very extensive memo with regard to public policy reasons as to why they ought not to proceed with funding the Pictou mine and as well referred to safety.

The Prime Minister must also be aware that that same president had a telephone conversation with the minister responsible, the Minister of Public Works, indicating to him the safety concerns with regard to the foord seam in the Pictou county mine.

Furthermore, the minister of energy said on May 12:

> We the cabinet were all aware of the mine having high methane deposits and with the new technology that there would have to be a learning curve.

I ask the Prime Minister: what convincing evidence did he have in his possession that there were no safety problems at the Westray coal mine?

Speaker's Ruling

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, presumably the same convincing evidence that caused my hon. friend who just spoke to write an article in The Halifax Chronicle Herald on February 25, 1989, in respect of Westray where he said: "The mine poses a threat to the Cape Breton economy".

It is a very lengthy article in which he opposes the mine without the slightest reference to safety. He opposed it on economic grounds, and I have already indicated it was an economic decision.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Prime Minister.

I want to ask the Prime Minister if he could explain to the House what underground mining experience his dear friend, Mr. Clifford Frame, had. Would he indicate to the House the extent of this gentleman's and this company's underground coal mining experience, drilling tunnels and mining coal.

Would the Prime Minister indicate to the House as to that experience.

• (1500)

Mr. Speaker: The Prime Minister may wish to answer but I think that question is going way beyond the authority or responsibility of the government.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend says that it is very relevant, then I will be happy to oblige.

He asked me about information in regard to my dear friend, Clifford Frame. I met Clifford Frame the first time in my life in Central Nova last week.

MINERAL EXPLORATION

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Can the minister tell us or confirm today that in the discussions with the Government of Quebec to sign a Canada-Quebec mineral development agreement, Quebec will use part of it to support mineral exploration, especially assistance for prospecting and exploration and use of new exploration technologies in Abitibi-Témiscamingue and Chapais-Chibougamau?

[English]

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm points which my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare has said many times. We are negotiating with the province of Quebec for the purposes—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Epp: I can confirm that with my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, we are negotiating with the province of Quebec for the purpose of arriving at a new Mineral Development Agreement. In that MDA, we are exploring various issues as well as programs for specific regions so that we might encourage the mining industry in the province of Quebec.

POINT OF ORDER

STANDING COMMITTEE ON CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS AND GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: Before commencing Routine Proceedings, I would like to take this opportunity to make a ruling with respect to Bill C-22.

The Chair wishes to announce that it is now prepared to rule on a point of order which was raised on Friday May 22, 1992 by the hon. member for Chambly in regard to the admissibility of a report by the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations on Bill C-22, an act to enact the Wage Claim Payment Act, to amend the Bankruptcy Act and to amend other acts in consequence thereof.

The hon. member for Chambly indicated that at a meeting of the committee on May 5, 1992, a series of clauses were deleted from the bill which made its provisions relating to the proposed Wage Claim Payment Act inoperable. He argued that this action went against the principle of the bill as adopted by the House at second reading, and that, consequently, the Standing Committee report is out of order.

[Translation]

There were a number of other submissions made on this point of order, and the Chair is appreciative of the comments offered by the hon. members for Glengarry-Prescott-Russell, Shefford, Saint-Hubert, and the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader.

After reviewing the submissions made, the Chair is now prepared to decide on the basic question relating to the amendments adopted by the Standing Committee.

[English]

In his presentation, the hon. member for Chambly contended that the House is now dealing with a new and substantially different bill since all provisions relating to the proposed Wage Claim Payment Act have been deleted. Quoting from citation 689(1) of Beauchesne's sixth edition, the hon. member supported his argument with the following passage:

> A committee is bound by the decision of the House, given on second reading, in favour of the principle of the bill, and should not, therefore, amend the bill in a manner destructive of this principle.

[Translation]

The logic behind this citation is to prevent the adoption of amendments which would result in a committee straying from the objectives of a bill and all that this may entail. Of course, a committee may not expand on the scope or nature of the bill, nor introduce important elements which were not present during the debate at second reading. There are several other restrictions placed on a committee. As I recently explained on April 28, 1992 in relation to a committee report on the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Bill C-54:

> A committee is restricted in its examination in a number of ways. It cannot infringe on the financial initiative of the Crown, it cannot go beyond the scope of the bill as passed at second reading, and it cannot reach back to the parent act to make further amendments not contemplated in the bill no matter how tempting this may be.

[English]

Further types of inadmissible amendments are listed in citations 698 to 706 of Beauchesne's sixth edition. Barring these, a committee is completely free to amend a bill in whatever manner it may choose, and to vote for or against any or all of the clauses in the bill as they are submitted for approval to the committee. As the 21st edition of Erskine May explains on page 486:

> —notwithstanding the rule which forbids the moving of an amendment which is destructive of the principle of a bill, there is nothing to prevent a committee from negating a clause or clauses, the omission of which may nullify or destroy the bill, and reporting the bill, as amended, to the House; a Committee may also negative every clause of which the bill is composed, and substitute for those clauses new clauses, if relevant to the bill as read a second time, and otherwise in order.

In the present case, the standing committee elected to delete several clauses of the bill, and in particular several clauses of the proposed Wage Claim Payment Act. In keeping with the explanation found in Erskine May and our own Canadian practices there is nothing which can be found objectionable with this procedure. Consequently, I find that the standing committee report is in order.

CANADIAN ENVIRONMENT WEEK

Hon. Pauline Browes (Minister of State (Environment)): Madam Speaker, I wish to bring to the attention of hon. members the fact that we are currently marking Canadian Environment Week, which in 1992 runs from today, June 1 to June 7.

This week gives Canadians an opportunity to ask themselves the question: "What can I do to help the environment?" In the spirit of Environment Week all Canadians, all levels of government and all sectors of society must stop and think about the ways in which they can contribute in preserving and protecting our magnificent country, Canada.

Environment Week is a Government of Canada initiative which funds projects across the country which demonstrate action and participation in Canadian communities. One of the largest initiatives this year is a partnership that has been formed with the Canadian Urban Transit Association. It is offering an enviropass in over 40 cities in Canada to encourage Canadians to use public transportation as an environmentally friendly way to travel.

All of us are urged to make a contribution to Environment Week. For example, we can be vigilant when we are shopping and purchasing consumer products by selecting those products with the least packaging. We can minimize waste, recycle, compost or initiate household practices that will conserve water. The options are really endless.

This year Environment Week and its theme, "It's Up to All of Us", takes on global significance. As we work to improve the environmental state of this great country of Canada, the world's leaders are gathering in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil at the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, more commonly called the earth summit.

Canada has played a primary role in organizing this historic conference, and the Canadian delegation, which will be led by the Prime Minister, is providing leadership and solutions to tough economic and environmental concerns.

I invite all hon. members to participate in Environment Week, and their communities. As well, they can participate indirectly in the earth summit by signing the earth flag located at the entrance of the House of Commons today. Upon the signing of the flag it will be delivered to the earth summit in Brazil by Mr. Maury Mason of Earth Day Canada. This flag has already been signed by hundreds of thousands of families and individual Canadians demonstrating Canada's support for the earth summit. This morning the Prime Minister signed this flag.

It is time for all Canadians to make an extra effort to adapt and adopt environmentally responsible behaviour and to make it part of everyday life in the spirit of Environment Week and all year long.

I encourage all Canadians to join in our national environmental efforts this week and every week. I would like to leave the hon. members with a message, which is the earth pledge which states: "Recognizing that people's actions toward nature and each other are the source of growing damage to the environment and resources needed to meet human needs and to ensure survival and development I pledge to act to the best of my ability to help make the earth a secure and hospitable home for present and future generations".

That is an excellent pledge which I would ask all Canadians to make.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, today does mark the beginning of Environment Week, which takes place from June 1 to June 7. It is especially important this year as the whole world is looking to the world leaders gathering in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, for the earth summit.

The Rio summit may well be the most important international conference in the history of the world. It has the potential to be the turning point for our environment, resulting in a number of landmark conventions and declarations, and a new global era in the struggle to achieve sustainable development.

Environment Week should be used by the government and Canadians to look very closely at our commitment to saving our rapidly deteriorating environment and to take the necessary measures to halt and reverse the catastrophic impact our actions have had on our world.

The Prime Minister, on behalf of all Canadians, must show in Brazil that Canada is prepared to exercise the leadership it so readily claims. If other nations refuse to accept a convention on climate change with tough targets and timetables Canada must step forward and be the first to sign and invite others to follow.

If others fail to make financial commitments to accomplish agenda 21 then Canada must not fail. On issues of biodiversity, forests, water and poverty, Canada must clearly establish what we believe to be the right path to save the world for future generations and it must be prepared to have the courage to take the first step along that path.

[Translation]

Canada owes it to Canadians and to neighbouring countries to practice what it preaches on all environmental issues.

In matters of environmental protection, we cannot always wait for international agreements to be signed. To harmonize development and environment, Canada must implement effective preventive measures that can be accounted for in front of the whole world.

Environment Week is not a time to show off, but to act.

[English]

We all have a responsibility, but rather than putting the responsibility solely on individual Canadians we in this House must look to ourselves first and foremost. We must all make the protection of the world our first commitment to Canadians and to those generations to follow. If we as Canadians fail the world in Rio we have a great deal to answer for, and we cannot ask individual Canadians to do what we as their parliamentarians are not prepared to do.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to speak today on the beginning of Environment Week in Canada. It is particularly appropriate given the summit in Rio starting later this week.

The minister spoke very well about the need for individuals to do something during Environment Week here in Canada. I take the individual approach to the environment very seriously. I have promoted in my own constituency, as I know members of my caucus have, recycling programs for paper, cans and glass, as well as community clean-ups and other actions that individuals can take on their own.

Despite the fact that individual effort is so important and environment week helps to instil in the individual Canadian a desire to contribute what he or she can to the environment over-all, governments have a much more responsible role to play than encouraging people to recycle bottles and cans and glass and newspapers. Governments have a responsibility to ensure that the inter-governmental agreements that will, in fact, protect the environment from the harm that others can do while we are cleaning up our own backyard are promulgated so that we can stop the destruction of the earth.

As members know, we can burn ethanol in our cars in Canada, but as long as the hundreds of thousands of vehicles in the United States, in Los Angeles for example, are pumping out CO_2 emissions into the atmosphere, the efforts we make, as much as it makes us feel comfortable and good, are not going to eventually save the earth.

What we have is a challenge before us, and the conference in Rio is the test of that challenge. We have to reach agreements or the world is in dire jeopardy.

I quote from an excellent book that the round table on the environment and the economy put out earlier this year, called Preserving Our World: A Consumer's Guide to the Brundtland Report by Warner Troyer, in which Mr. Troyer quotes U.S. Supreme Court Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes: "Every man has a right to swing his arms, but that right is circumscribed by the proximity of his neighbour's nose."

Well, the nose is awfully close as the large corporations are swinging their arms at the moment around the world.

The population growth in the world is reaching the point where we can soon no longer feed it. The world's population is projected to top six billion people this year and the carrying capacity for food in this world is estimated to reach about 7.5 billion people. The Brundtland commission report, which talked about the environment and the economy, the need for sustainable development, is very much tied to population growth in the world.

If stabilization of the population in the world is not reached until the year 2035, the total world population will settle at over 10 billion people, very close to the maximum food-carrying capacity that we have and by the year 2065—75 years from now—we could have a population of close to 15 billion people, which, unless something happens quickly, is going to see mass starvation on this planet.

As we know, the root cause of much of the environmental degradation in the world is poverty. Poverty is the greatest single enemy of the environment. The poor and the hungry destroy their environment to ensure their own individual survival. Theirs is an individual effort that is predicated upon the failures of governments to reach agreements that will improve the world's population's poor to a sustainable environment of their own.

I use the opportunity today to impress upon the Minister of the Environment and this government that Canada must take its leadership role seriously in the international community on environmental issues and use the conference in Rio de Janeiro to ensure that the agreements are in place to ensure the protection of the earth.

HOUSE MANAGEMENT

39TH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present the 39th report of the Standing Committee on House Management regarding the selection of votable items among private members' business.

Pursuant to Standing Order 92(2), this report is deemed adopted when laid upon the table.

40TH AND 41ST REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Madam Speaker, while I am on my feet, I have the honour to present the 40th and the 41st reports of the Standing Committee on House Management.

Pursuant to Standing Order 113(1), these reports are deemed adopted when laid upon the table.

PETITIONS

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, I have the duty to table today five petitions from Newfoundland, Ontario, British Columbia and New Brunswick.

The petitioners would like the Parliament of Canada to reinstate the Court Challenges Program. The Court Challenges Program was a very important program in that it made it possible for individuals and groups to have their constitutional rights clarified as those rights relate to language equality rights by the courts.

The petitioners maintain that the Court Challenges Program was and still should be an essential instrument in the evolution of our constitutional rights and that all Canadians must be given equal access, whatever their income, to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The petitioners want Parliament to reinstate the Court Challenges Program which gives all Canadians access to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms regardless of their means.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is an honour to present a number of petitions with hundred and hundreds of signatures from people from Kamloops, British Columbia and Chase, British Columbia.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to enact legislation providing for a referendum of the people binding upon Parliament to accept or reject constitutional amendments proposed by the government and also to enact legislation providing for the acceptance or rejection of the proposed amendments to be determined by the majority vote of the total votes cast in the whole of Canada together with a majority vote in the majority of provinces with the territories being given the status of a single province.

RIVER DIVERSION

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, on an unrelated but a very important matter, petitioners from throughout British Columbia, again now totalling hundreds and hundreds of names, point out their opposition to any intention by anyone, private or public, to export fresh water from Canada, particularly fresh water from British Columbia through river diversion to the United States.

The petitioners are calling upon Parliament to urge the government to state categorically that it will not tolerate this type of resource sellout.

ILLEGAL DRUGS

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, I have the honour of presenting another petition, collected by Mr. George Chiavarolotti through his chiropractic office, to request the government to amend the Narcotics Control Act so that the financial proceeds from drug seizures, rather than being sent completely to the Government of Canada to be deposited in their general revenue fund, be shared instead with local police forces and local organizations which are trying to wage the battle on the streets on behalf of all of us.

I am hopeful that the Solicitor General will see the light of day and amend the Narcotics Control Act as hundreds upon hundreds of individuals from my riding of York West have recommended.

Question No. 279—Ms. Callbeck:

Has the government developed any policies or conducted studies regarding (a) the manner in which the operator of a fixed link between Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick will be able to raise tolls, particularly regarding increases above the inflation rate (for example to recoup losses associated with operating the link one year through toll increases greater than inflation the following year) (b) cost overruns associated with a fixed link, particularly regarding whether the public would bear the extra costs (c) a situation in which the successful fixed link developer experiences financial difficulties part way through construction of the project, particularly regarding who would step in as financier (d) how the government would cope with interruptions in the operation of the link?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): (a) With regard to the bridge tolls, the proposal call states that, in the future, should the government require a level of insurance coverage from the developer which is over and above the levels prescribed in the development agreement with the winning consortium, the developer may apply for an adjustment to the toll rates to cover the difference in his cost of insurance. The final decision will rest with the government and the recovery may be spread over several years to minimize any impact.

Additionally, should the project proceed, the development agreement with the winning developer would recognize the concept of a minimum toll revenue which is derived from the toll revenue for the ferry service. If in any year the developer has a shortfall below the minimum, they will be entitled to a modification in subsequent years. Again, the government may determine the length of time to affect any recovery and minimize the impact. It must be stressed that there is a very strong expectation that the link would generate traffic levels higher than the ferry. It is therefore unlikely that the developer would ever see the toll revenues drop below the escalated amounts generated during the last year of ferry operation, thereby requesting an increase in the bridge tolls above the rate of inflation.

(b) & (c) Developers must demonstrate that they have the financial capability to carry out the project. They must finance the project themselves and be prepared to put the entire amount required for the construction of the bridge into a trust account, complemented by an additional level of security satisfactory to the government. Therefore, our purpose is to make sure that the developer has the resources to complete and undertake the project. Nevertheless, should anything happen to the developer that would prevent them from completing the project, the Crown would have access to the remainder of the trust funds and the security package, in order to complete the facility without using additional government funds.

(d) The government does not expect major interruptions in the service which the proposed bridge will provide. However, in the unlikely situation of such an event, the government would be required to maintain its obligation for a transportation link between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. Should the project proceed, Transport Canada will develop contingency plans which will be in place when the bridge becomes operational.

Question No. 280—Ms. Callbeck:

Is there a discrepancy between the government's estimated annual subsidy for Marine Atlantic and the figure provided by Marine Atlantic and, if so (a) what are the figures and the discrepancies (b) which of these amounts does the government intend to provide the operator of a fixed link between Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): (a) & (b) The $40.5 million amount available for the subsidy is $35 million (1988 constant $) escalated to 1991 dollars, which represents the overall cost to the federal government maintaining the Borden–Tormentine ferry service, projected over the next 35 years. This amount includes capital expenditures, such as the purchase of new vessels, which are not assumed by Marine Atlantic and are not included in their subsidy. Certain adjustments have been factored into this amount which deal with such items as costs of administration by Public Works, compensation to the ferry workers and highway improvements. The Marine Atlantic subsidy amount cannot and should not be compared to the $40.5 million (1991 constant $) which is available for the fixed link subsidy.

Question No. 281—Ms. Callbeck:

With respect to the establishment of a fixed link between Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick, have any policies been developed concerning the developer's environmental management plan and, if so (a) what is the structure under which this plan would be communicated to the public (b) which non–developer parties, if any, would participate in such a structure?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Upon the selection of a bridge design, the successful consortium will be required to develop a comprehensive environmental management plan. This plan will demonstrate how the developer will effectively address the environmental impacts of the project and must be in place to ensure protection of the environment during all phases of development.

The successful developer's plan will be communicated to the public through public information sessions, at which time the plan would be explained in detail. The developer will then submit the plan to the environmental committee for final review and approval.

The environmental committee includes representatives of Environment Canada, Fisheries and Oceans, Canadian Coast Guard, Public Works Canada and of the three provincial departments of environment. Each member will have the full resources of their respective departments to ensure every aspect of environmental protection and mitigation has been addressed by the developer.

Question No. 290—Mr. Fisher:

What is the number, by province, of Co–operative Work Education Grants applied for in 1992, how many were awarded to each province and for what dollar amount?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): The number of Co–operative Education applications by province is:

Newfoundland	19	Ontario	59
Nova Scotia	4	Manitoba	15
Prince Edward Island	1	Saskatchewan	0
New Brunswick	17	Alberta	10
Quebec	36	British Columbia	16

Applications for funding are still under review. It is expected that this review process will be completed by the end of May 1992.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, if Question No. 228 could be made an order for return, this return would be tabled immediately.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that Question No. 228 be deemed to have been made an order for return?

An hon. members: Yes.

An hon. member: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. parliamentary secretary to the government House leader will have to help the Chair at this point. Either we postpone the fact that No. 228 be answered, as there is no unanimous consent for the question to be made an Order for Return, or I can put the question to the House.

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, I believe that unanimous consent has been denied. Therefore I would be happy to arrange a postponement of the Order for Return.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. parliamentary secretary.

The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

Mr. Edwards: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. John C. Crosbie (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C–80, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, to enact the Children's Special Allowances Act, to amend certain other acts in consequence thereof and to repeal the Family Allowances Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: I wish to inform the House that because of the ministerial statement Government Orders will be extended by 11 minutes, pursuant to Standing Order 33(2)b).

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I thank you for giving me this opportunity to speak on bill C–80, a most important bill indeed—and I hope that my colleagues from the Bloc Quebecois will be happy with it—as much for children in Quebec as for those throughout Canada. You will understand that Bill C–80 is intended to make all federal transfer payments for children across the country simpler and much, much fairer.

I think that any legislation that undertakes to simplify the handing out of money and simplify the taxation system should be passed as quickly as possible. Full child benefits will hopefully be adopted so that all children can benefit from them as soon as possible.

For some years now, the Government of Canada has been paying special attention to supporting children, making it in fact an ongoing priority. Remember when, in December, the right hon. Prime Minister looked into the United Nations convention which, as a matter of fact, dealt with the rights of the child and which he signed on behalf of Canada.

There is also the Brighter Futures program which, again, is aimed specifically at ensuring a brighter future for the children of Canada and for Canada.

• (1530)

Simplifying the tax system has been a priority for the Conservative government since 1984. When we consider the present system of child benefits and we look at Bill C–80, we realize that today, there are three different ways in which Canadian families receive payments for their dependent children. We all know family allowances, which have been around for 40 or 50 years. We are also familiar with the refundable tax credit and the child credit. These three programs allocate sums of money to families, for their children, at different periods throughout the year.

For many Canadian families this is a complex system. Do I get a cheque in January, March or June? How much will it be? Why am I or am I not eligible? Do I get half the maximum amount, three quarters or nothing at all? So this makes it a complex system, in addition to the other benefits families are entitled to: the goods and services tax credit, the child care expense deduction, parental or maternity benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act, as well as benefits funded by the federal government and delivered by the provinces.

There are seven or eight different programs to which all Canadian families are entitled. The purpose of Bill C–80 is to get rid of three of these programs and give more money through a single program. We are going to give more money. Over a five–year period, we are talking about an additional $2 billion or more. Consider the three programs that will be eliminated. Family allowances provide $35 per month; the annual credit, $71; the refundable credit, $601 annually; and, depending on the family's economic situation, an additional $213.

In future, there will no longer be three periods. There will no longer be three kinds of payments, and family income will replace individual income as the basis for calculating the benefit, to make the system fairer and more equitable. In one family, one spouse may have a fairly high income, while the other spouse may earn less; in another family, both spouses may be earning the same amount. This means that two families with the same total income do not necessarily receive the same amount in family allowances, child credit and refundable child tax credit.

Based on the family's income, the new system will be much fairer and far more equitable. Finally, since payments will be received regularly, low-income families will not be tempted to seek out discounters who often charged outrageous rates to advance the tax credits these families were to receive. By simplifying the system, we are giving families more money, as recommended by various groups in this country.

What does Bill C-80 provide? It provides $1,020 per child and per year, plus $213, if parents or spouses did not claim child care expenses, plus another $75, starting with the third child. This means that low-income families will receive $1,733 for the first child and $1,233 for each subsequent child. Clearly, this makes a big difference for low-income families. However, families with an income of more than $67,000 will receive no child benefits at all. I think it is only fair that high income families should not receive money from the federal government, since they are financially capable of raising their children.

We start at around $26,000. For a net income above $26,000—and I stress, a net income—the tax credit is gradually reduced to zero when the family income reaches $67,000. For a family income below $50,000 per year, the average increase—I say average—will be $250 per child, per year.

Bill C-80 is quite simple and represents an improvement over the current three programs. It provides for fiscal equity and fairness as well as adjustments for inflation. Eighty per cent of the increase resulting from this program will go to families with an income below $40,000.

It is worth stressing the reasons for passing this legislation without undue delays. I repeat, this legislation makes the Canadian fiscal system fairer, since it really targets low income families who need help raising their children. What is taken into consideration is the family income, not individual income.

It is also a system with more flexibility, and easier to administer, since Canadian families will not have to fill any forms. Calculations will be made automatically by the federal government, based on family income for the year 1991. We want the system in place by January 1, 1993. This means that on January 1, 1993, eligible families, the low income families, will receive a cheque based on their income tax returns for 1991, without having to fill out any kind of form and without having to apply for anything. The amount will be revised after six months, that is to say starting July 1, 1993.

To conclude, I think it is a big step forward for the Government of Canada, already judged number one by the UN, for what it did and continues to do for children and youth. I think we should congratulate the Prime Minister for his leadership in this regard, and for the record of his government over the last eight years. We did our best to simplify the fiscal system and make sure that it benefited low income families while leaving the higher income families to provide for their own children.

Therefore, I urge all members to let this bill pass without undue delays.

REFERENDUM ACT

WAIVING OF 48 HOUR NOTICE

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, there have been discussions with the representatives of the two opposition parties in respect of the following motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 53(1) I move:

> That, in relation to Bill C-81, an act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada, this House be permitted to waive the 48-hour notice required for the beginning of report stage.

Just by way of explanation, I would like to indicate that the matter of some urgency has to do with the fact that in order to be possible to hold a referendum or plebiscite it requires about three months of preparation time by the chief electoral officer. There is some urgency in getting this through.

There was great co-operation from hon. members last week. The committee met Monday and Tuesday for long hours and indeed Friday, Monday and Tuesday to get the legislation through committee. Hence, but for the fact that the House was adjourned the report would have been tabled and there would have been lots of notice. I do not think there can be any surprises in this instance. It really is a matter of some urgency that we have it on the table, and as I have indicated the two opposition parties have approved.

• (1540)

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. There is a one-hour debate with a maximum of 10 minutes for any member who wishes to intervene.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Madam Speaker, once again this government just used an extraordinary procedure, with the blatant complicity of the other two parties in this House, in order to impose closure to parliamentarians.

We just saw a minister of the Crown come before the House and tell its members that the government does not even want to follow the normal rules, the standards rules of debate in this House, but wants to bypass those rules and eliminate the time allowed to members to familiarize themselves with amendments and prepare for debate. This government wants again to put the kibosh on the democratic right of this Parliament to examine properly and with total freedom the referendum bill.

Madam Speaker, you know as well as I that this referendum bill is the most illegitimate and anti-democratic legislation ever seen in the Parliament of a British regime. You know that this bill violates all the democratic rules, that the democratic values that have been so precious to Quebecers, for instance in the 1980s, are going to be violated by this legislation. This Parliament that claims to be a democratic institution now enables the government to steamroll a piece of legislation on the back of Quebec. Indeed, this referendum bill only has one enemy: Quebec. Consequently, we are now witnessing before a House that is certainly not full an outright violation of the prerogative and the freedom of Parliament to decide but also to debate. I know that the minister talks about the urgency of the matter. How come the minister says that it is urgent to pass the referendum act while his colleague, the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs is quite willing to postpone the process for several days? How come the government now wants to ignore the issue of Quebec at the constitutional table and impose an illegitimate and anti-democratic bill that is unworthy of this institution? I am convinced, and you only have to look at the precedents in Great Britain and at the National Assembly in Quebec, that never before has a government had the nerve to table such an antidemocratic piece of legislation. That is why, and I want the members of the government to know that, every time you act in that way you undermine the credibility of the process that you want to undertake. No Quebecer will feel bound by your illegitimate legislation. You can show whatever results you want. You can spend all the millions that you want, but none of us will feel bound by the results of a defective, unworthy and implausible piece of legislation.

When I see the leader of the government show up casually with the complicity of the Liberals and the New Democrats—the word Democrat should be withdrawn—there is no shame—

Mrs. Venne: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, I notice that there are not 20 members in this House. A quorum is not present.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have a quorum call.

Call in the members.

And the bells having rung:

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Since we have a quorum, we shall resume debate. The hon. member for Shefford.

Mr. Lapierre: Madam Speaker, I thank you for filling up this place. I just wanted to say that Quebec is being bullied into accepting this most shameful bill. One day, each and every hon. member in this House will bitterly regret this debate and this bill on referendums.

This bill has been exposed throughout the country. It would not live up to the principles of the most ancient democracies. It looks like a bill passed by a banana republic. I hope hon. members will be ashamed, I hope Quebec members will be embarrassed to see that their government now wants to put the gag on debate, to ignore the usual democratic procedures in order to prevent Parliament from adequately studying and vigorously debating such an important bill.

I do not have to remind you that this bill will never pass the test with regards to justice and fairness. I do not have to remind you that this government is simply misusing Parliament, and there is a price which will have to be paid not only by the Conservatives, but also by their accomplices, the Liberals and the New Democrats, all of whom are joining forces to play a dirty trick on Quebec.

Thank God the Bloc Quebecois is here to expose such a disgraceful tactic. I hope some other members from Quebec will rise, all those who oppose a federal referendum which would be shameful and unfair.

This motion should never have found its way before Parliament. It violates the most fundamental rules of democracy. Consequently, I do hope we will not be the only ones to oppose the motion. We may have different views on the content, on the options available, on a society model, but we have one thing in common: the development of equal and fair democratic rules. Nothing in this bill deals with justice and fairness; the casualness shown by the government is a good example.

We have seen the leader of the government in the House of Commons come up suddenly with this motion, interrupting one of his colleagues to put a gag on debate.

• (1550)

The Parliament and the small club of old parties which can play all their little games here, but it is in the field that we will find the truth and settle their score. The price to pay for this violation of democracy and justice is enormous.

The marks of conscription haunted this Parliament for many years. The memories of that debate are nothing compared to what awaits members who are accomplices to such an arrogant and undemocratic action. Therefore, during the next few minutes, I dare hope that other Quebecers, at least the democratic ones, will find out that a crime against history is being committed here.

It is obvious that this motion should not be passed, that we cannot accept the way the government wants to steamroller it through. If federalists in this House are so self-confident, why are they scared of the debate? Why are they scared of the usual rules? What do they want to hide? What do they want to avoid?

It is obvious that what we are seeing here is a shady deal, a political operation with a single goal: to save the skin of the Prime Minister of Canada at all costs—

An hon. member: Even if it means to trample on Quebec.

Mr. Lapierre: —at all costs and to trample on Quebec with the federal steamroller.

That is what the government tried to do to us on a Monday afternoon. It will be a black Monday in the history of this Parliament and I hope that this government realizes the extent of its action. I hope that my Liberal friends who I thought were democratic—I see the hon. member for Saint-Denis and I am sure he will oppose Parliament preventing debate on the referendum bill, because he too knows that this referendum will not be valid if it is—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The ten-minute period is now over.

Mr. Mifflin: Madam Speaker, I listened to the hon. member with great interest. In my caucus, we had a lot of discussions about this issue.

[English]

With the background that I have it did not take a long discussion to understand how we would vote on this motion. We have heard a lot of speeches, and we are going to hear more on this motion.

I am going to make a short speech. We are going to go for the motion. We think it is right. We think it is proper.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, the rhetoric of our colleagues from the Bloc notwithstanding, I really do not have much difficulty with this motion. It is asking the House to waive the normal 48 hours that are required for the beginning of report stage. It is not cutting back or reneging in any way on the ability to debate the issue of this motion.

Standing Order 53(1) states very simply that:

> In relation to any matter that the government considers to be of an urgent nature, a Minister of the Crown may, at any time when the Speaker is in the Chair, propose a motion to suspend any Standing or other Order of this House relating to the need for notice and to the hours and days of sitting.

My colleagues and I in the New Democratic Party have supported in principle the provisions of the enabling legislation for a non-binding referendum. This is an issue which is of an urgent nature. This is an issue which is of grave national concern.

Speaking on behalf of my colleagues, I want to say that we feel that, although we have some concerns about the details of the legislation, fundamentally the people of this country should be allowed to be heard in helping to determine the future of this land.

Although we have some specific problems with the bill, we have no concern about bringing that bill at this time back from report stage to debate some of the amendments, some of the recommendations and some of the proposed changes, hopefully to strengthen the legislation and to provide an opportunity for the people of Canada to have a voice in determining the future of this land.

We will be supporting this notice of motion by the government.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I listened to the member for Shefford earlier today. I cannot figure out where he is coming from.

In my first year in this city back in 1980, I worked with the member for Shefford. At that time, he worked almost night and day seven days a week campaigning for Canada. He at that time was a very effective member in making sure that those of us who wanted to keep this country together had all of his energy and all of his support.

I also remember in 1984 when he was the minister responsible for fitness and amateur sport in this country. He travelled the country speaking on behalf of not just Quebec, but every region of this country. This was, of course, an Olympic year when he was very proud to speak about the athletes and the people who represented us in this country.

Today I listened to his speech and where he talked about a bill that is being put before this House, if I understood him correctly, he said that this bill was going to "skin" Quebec, this was going to be the rape of Quebec.

This is something that many of us have a tough time figuring out when we hear the Bloc Quebecois coming out with words like this. There are a lot of people in the province of Quebec who still believe in Canada.

Mr. Lapierre: Where are they today?

Mr. Mills: I am talking about the people of Quebec. There are a lot of federalists in the province of Quebec. It seems to me that when you talk about frustrating a referendum process, you almost insult the intelligence not only of the federalists but of all Quebecers.

It seems to me that your opposing this referendum process is sort of contradictory to what you have basically been proposing in this House since you have decided to become a separatist. Quite frankly, a lot of my constituents in Toronto have a difficult time with this Bloc Quebecois operation.

Mr. Lapierre: They have not seen anything yet.

Mr. Mills: We were elected to come to this Chamber. I do not just try to speak here for Toronto or for Ontario. I try to speak and try to make sure that we work on legislation that is for all regions of the country.

Why you want to work at dismantling this country is really beyond most Canadians' imagination. Why do you want to sort of systematically, like this morning, try to devise ways of frustrating this Parliament when there is so much economic pain out there and the pain in the economy is as important to the people of Quebec as it is to the people of Newfoundland, Toronto or wherever in this country?

The government has the right to put forward this 48-hour motion today. We in the Liberal Party have supported this. This is not a surprise attack.

• (1600)

I would ask the member to think back as to how and who elected him to the Parliament of Canada. They elected him when he first came here to speak for Canada, to speak for Quebec in Canada and he fought for Quebec in Canada for many years. All of a sudden he has become a turncoat. Why he has done this is beyond my imagination, but as far as I am concerned this is counterproductive and it is going nowhere.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Madam Speaker, I want to just add a few words under this rule 53(1). The rule was put in the Standing Orders for certain special reasons. Certainly if you are talking about the fate of the country and/or Constitution and referendum, and I cannot think of a much more important issue—and I think it is the first time it has been used under the Standing Orders—if there ever was a reason to use it, it is certainly when the state of the country and/or the Constitution is at play.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood. Without getting into a dog fight with other members individually here, I thought he made very good points. As he spoke I looked in the index. Of course as the hon. member for Shefford knows, he is still in the index as the Honourable Jean Lapierre. Perhaps he would like to correct the index at some time to eliminate the honourable which means that he was a member of Her Majesty's Privy Council.

On this issue, no one has been caught by surprise. There has been constitutional discussion ad nauseam. The country is absolutely fed up with the fact that we cannot seem to resolve something that is fundamental to every Canadian. Even though it does not excite every Canadian from day to day, it is fundamental. So it is time to come to grips with it.

I firmly believe that we should have this referendum legislation as a tool for the government to use in its way. I agree with the NDP. There are parts of the bill that personally I have some problems with. I may try to move an amendment or so if they are in order. I know this rule certainly speeds up the necessity to get your amendments before the table before time runs out. If there was ever a reason to use this, this is a reason where the national issue of the country is at stake.

When I stop to think of what the hon. minister of intergovernmental affairs has tried to do over months of constitutional discussions and then to read in the papers that the deadlock is on a dead Senate which should not even exist as far as I am concerned, an appointed body is an anachronism of history, to think that in effect that should be the stumbling block is something that I just cannot rationalize. I believe, when the time is proper, after consultations are over and after the first ministers and/or the phones are busy this week, and/or/if the negotiations continue on June 9, that the government should get the referendum bill in place. I would like to know if Canadians even want the Senate regardless of what state of reform. If you are going to reform it then okay, we get into all the arguments that everyone has written books about since I went to high school and certainly since I wrote my first political science paper on the Senate way back in 1950. There has not been a new thing said about Senate reform since then and even years before.

I think the fundamental question is, even in Alberta, to see if the public wants the Senate by putting it directly to the people. The leaders have had their chance to try to resolve the issues. In effect the political elite have been locked in rooms for days and weeks as the conferences have gone across the country from sea to sea and, as they have gone from sea to sea, they still have not come up with the consensus.

I say let us trust the people and put it to the people. This referendum bill allows separate amendments. I did not like that in the bill initially and frankly had some suspicions, but maybe the wisdom of some of the government advisers is obviously a lot better than mine. It may be that if we get this bill in place we could use it individually in different areas. Certainly there is one for the Senate.

I am going to conclude, having had a chance to speak on this motion. I may have more difficulty speaking in a tightly confined debate on the bill when we launch into it, I gather, tomorrow.

This will not be received with great favour and it may be misinterpreted in many parts I suppose, but I believe this whole question of inherent right of self-government of the aboriginals with the implication of a third level of government, federal, provincial, and aboriginal, is something the people should have a chance to decide, including the aboriginals of course, before we lock ourselves into a system that will be paralysed from A to Z.

Let us get on with the referendum bill. Let us try to resolve things by consultation, but I am afraid the consultations have produced so little. I quite understand some of the empathy of the Bloc Quebecois although obviously, I do not share its objectives. I do not think there is going to be the fundamental offer that is necessary from consultations.

Even in Quebec, it would be interesting to see what they think about the Senate. Certainly Quebec has a very real interest in the question of the aboriginals. We have already seen what the Cree in a united way have been able to do to affect certain parts of Quebec. Both of those questions should be put to the people where the political leaders have not been able to resolve them.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker—

[Translation]

Mr. Plamondon: It is to remind you, Madam Speaker, that I have been sitting here since 10 o'clock this morning and that I have asked the right to speak before the four previous speakers, two of whom were not—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Richelieu should appreciate the fact that whereas members from all sides of this House want to speak on this motion, as of now one member of his group has already had the opportunity to speak, as well as one other independent member. I think it is perfectly normal that members from other parties have the opportunity to express themselves, and he should leave it to the incumbent of the Chair to recognize the members for debate, that being its job. The hon. member for Churchill has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Murphy: I voted against the government's bill in second reading because I feel it is a flawed piece of legislation.

I looked at it in terms of some of the major concerns that I have. I believe that the government made no attempt to resolve the issues that I have. I look at this legislation and believe that it does not provide for a fair referendum and I will go into that in a few minutes.

Having said that, I have no problem with the debate starting tomorrow. I think that the earlier we get into this debate, the more we discuss it, the more the public is aware of what is actually in the legislation, the better it is for all Canadians.

I believe that as Canadians see the legislation and hear the debate on the legislation they too will be concerned about that legislation.

I have had the opportunity, as have other members of this House, to read the report from the committee, to see the bill as it is reported. I have had the opportunity to prepare my amendments as are required under the rules of the House. Other members who may have concerns with that bill have had the same opportunity. Having said that, I have no problem with the motion to waive the 48-hour notice period for that.

As I did indicate earlier, the bill itself is not just a piece of legislation that enables a referendum. Unfortunately, it basically establishes a Conservative agenda for how elections should be run in this country.

It gets rid of any real spending limits. It allows outside interests with the biggest dollar to have the biggest bang.

In other words, if you take a look at this legislation and compare it with the normal election laws of this country, you see it is not the same. However if you take a look at this legislation and see how things are run south of the border in the United States, you see that what we are doing is Americanizing the electoral laws of this country.

We know there are no effective limits on spending in the United States. We see what has happened to their democracy as a result of that, where less than 50 per cent of the people vote for the election of the most powerful person on our globe, the President of the United States, where large amounts of money must be raised by each and every member of the House of Representatives. What has happened over the years is that people running for Congress actually have full-time staff paid for by Congress who go out and fund raise. That is what has happened to the American system.

A lot of us, as I said earlier, could support a fair referendum bill. I have to ask if aboriginal Canadians have concerns about this legislation, where are they going to find the dollars to go out and spend the $10 million that would be allowed under this legislation? If the women of Canada have concerns, where are they going to raise that money? They do not control the boardrooms of our nation yet.

What we have here is a piece of legislation which is not looking at fairness. It is not looking at how we should best bring this country together. What we have here is a way that people will feel they have been bought during the election campaign.

There are absolutely no limits on paid advertising, but who has the money to buy that? Not most individual Canadians. Not the homeless. Not the poor. Not the people who will be concerned on an individual basis. It will be the corporate elite of this land. Someone once said: "Well, that won't happen in this country. That would never happen in Canada." Take a look at the 1988 federal election. We know that those who supported free trade through their corporate organizations spent millions of dollars on that one issue.

We have no guarantees that we will not find a situation where all the money is spent on one side, and where a lot of that money will have nothing to do with the referendum, where a lot of that money will be spent not on the referendum or the Constitution but a lot of that money will be spent basically trying to pump up the fortunes of the Conservative Party of this country.

In other words, what we will have is a number of those corporations and organizations spending money not to defend the future of Canada but to do all they can to ensure the re-election of the Conservative Party as the government of this country. That is my concern.

An hon. member: Why would you vote for that? Why do you agree then?

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, the Bloc members know I voted against the legislation.

I have said I will fight it in this House and I have already written my referendum amendments as to why I want this changed. We want that debate in this House. At the end of that debate all members in this House will decide how they will vote. But as I have said, Canadians have to look at this legislation. Many of us want Canadians to have a say. That is why our leader has argued for constituent assemblies. We want our people to have a say in the future of this country.

But the legislation that is in front of this House is flawed. It sets up an unfair system and many Canadians will become much more cynical as a result of this legislation.

[Translation]

M. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Madam Speaker, I understand there have been consultations. I simply want to rise and say a few words. To make things perfectly clear for my friends from the Bloc Quebecois and from the party, I will reaffirm in this House what I have been saying all along and will always maintain: I speak as a French Canadian and I am proud to be a Quebecer and, as far as I am concerned, there is no contradiction in that. Aside from the consultations issue, I regret to see the House leader avail himself of this suspension rule to save a miserable 24 hours at the risk of poisoning the debate, while the wiser choice would be to apply one of the inscriptions carved in wood, above the Speaker's Chair in the Senate. I will read it in Latin and table the text to make sure it is understood in all three languages I will be using, namely Latin, because it was originally said in Latin, then in French, and you can go and look up how it translates into English. "Nihil ordinatum est quod praecipitatur et properat" said Seneca.

Mr. Plamondon: There you go.

Mr. Prud'homme: No horsing around, please! You did not understand a thing, but you will in a moment. I do not want to take sides for or against the Bloc Quebecois because this is a serious matter. If someone tries to make light of it, I will refrain from getting involved. This phrase means "nothing is well ordered that is hasty and precipitate". If a vote is taken, I will vote against this Standing Order 53 that was just resorted to. I want to make myself clear; my vote is not dictated by the Bloc Quebecois. I can make up my own mind, thank you. I believe this is a debate that promises to be very difficult and could be potentially divisive——to this country. When I say I am a Canadian, I say I am a Canadien français and very proud to be a Quebecer. I hope this is well understood in this land of ours. I cannot give my consent to such a precipitous motion just to save a miserable 24 hours and risk poisoning the debate.

[English]

I assure you, I shall participate. We just completed the very complicated bill. I just received another bill which says "Confidential, Special Joint Committee on Conflict of Interest". We just received it and we are supposed to look into these documents tomorrow.

I am a serious member. I like to consult. I like to learn what I am doing here and exchange ideas. Therefore I am not ashamed. It is going to be difficult to get up now and say I disagree. I do not know what took place, therefore, I am allowed to say that I disagree.

[Translation]

I want you to know, Madam Speaker, that I am sorry. If the Bloc Quebecois called on the hon. member for Saint-Denis, my answer is: I am a French Canadian and a Quebecer and I will do everything I can in the interest of my own people. Everybody is talking about their people. Well, I will do my best to preserve the honour of my people.

In that sense, I cannot expect the Bloc Quebecois to say, when they rise again in this debate, as I hope they will. "Do like Prud'homme." Let every member take their responsibilities and let very speech be stamped with dignity and serious-mindedness, because this is a serious matter. I cannot understand.

[English]

I cannot understand people who do not understand the kind of country we live in. I am probably showing it to you now in the other official language that we could be different and remain Canadians.

[Translation]

I can assure you, Madam Speaker, that when you call in the members for the vote, I will vote against proceeding to a vote on this motion now.

[English]

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I have listened with care to the interventions in this one-hour debate on the motion of the hon. government House leader concerning the use of Standing Order 53(1) in bringing forward the debate on Bill C-81. I should stress for the benefit of those who may have just caught up with the debate that this motion does nothing more than bring forward the debate on Bill C-81, which is a bill to establish the option of using a Canada-wide referendum in our nation.

It has been suggested by my friend from Shefford that this is a guillotine. It is absolutely nothing of the sort. He should welcome it because it is an opportunity to have the debate 24 hours earlier than would have normally been the case.

The legislative committee on Bill C-81, met on Friday, Monday and Tuesday of last week. This committee heard witnesses, heard the minister and spent a 14-hour day doing a detailed clause by clause study. I should point out that the government accepted a number of amendments that had been proposed by the opposition and embraced some of them to make a better bill out of what was originally introduced.

Our friend from Shefford says that this is a bastard, illegitimate law and is undemocratic legislation. His friend Rene Levesque would be spinning in his grave if he heard those words because Rene Levesque, that distinguished Quebec separatist, was above all a profound democrat. This is an opportunity—

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Point of order, Madam Speaker. I will not have the members tarnish Rene Levesque's memory with such a shameful bill. They should—

[English]

An hon. member: You are the one who is tarnishing his name.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member knows this is not a point of order, but ideas being debated.

[English]

Mr. Edwards: Obviously the Bloc has no willingness to listen to points made in debate. It resorts to emotion and rhetoric rather than listening to debate. The point I was simply making was that Rene Levesque, a man with whose views I profoundly disagreed on many subjects, was a democrat and this is democratic legislation. It provides to the people of Canada the opportunity to pronounce themselves on changes to their Constitution.

Our friend from Shefford suggested that we were afraid of debate and as a result introduced this motion. The contrary is the case. This debate has been brought forward in order to provide an opportunity for members of Parliament such as himself to participate in it.

Mr. Lapierre: You brought closure on second reading.

Mr. Edwards: This is not a closure motion. Check your rule books. The member has been here much longer than I have and he says this is a closure motion. It is absolutely nothing of the sort.

An hon. member: What is coming? What is your next move?

Mr. Edwards: My friends from Broadview—Greenwood and Annapolis Valley—Hants contributed very skilfully and constructively to this debate, as did my friend from Okanagan—Shuswap. However I found myself somewhat saddened by the intervention of my friend from Churchill who suggested that this was not a fair bill.

However, I do appreciate his point that he has no difficulty in proceeding tomorrow with the debate. It is appropriate to proceed with the debate but I must take issue with two other points he endeavoured to make.

My hon. friend said, and I believe it is an accurate quote, that: "People will feel they were bought". The Canadian people are too intelligent to be bought by anything. The Canadian people are well-informed, well-educated and are well able to make up their own minds about the issues before us.

The other point he makes, which I find somewhat absurd, is that this bill is designed to pump up the fortunes of the Conservative Party. I believe that is also a direct quotation. That statement comes from a member of a party that only three weeks ago was calling for a general election. I wonder why the change.

My hon. friend from Saint-Denis, whom I respect immensely and have great affection for, has made a point that is perhaps based on miscommunication. It concerns his suggestion that there was no discussion beforehand on this issue.

Mr. Prud'homme: I did not say that.

Mr. Edwards: Then I misunderstood, and I withdraw that.

There was discussion among the parties as to when it would be appropriate to bring this debate forward. There was agreement it would be appropriate to have the bill reported tomorrow. That is what we are debating at this time.

There is absolutely no thought of hastening the debate itself once the debate begins other than with the co-operation of members of this House. If the House favours that kind of co-operation then of course there would be haste. On the other hand, the point is—

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Madam Speaker, on a point of order. I know the member just made an important comment by saying the debate will not be rushed and that it will not be restricted. Could he make the same statement in the form of a motion, or could we at least take note of it, so that the member remembers the formal commitment he just made in front of this House?

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is well aware of our rules and he knows this is not a point of order. We will now hear the hon. parliamentary secretary.

[English]

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, I appreciate your ruling but I will respond to the hon. member's point nonetheless.

He is seeking an undertaking from the government that there will not be undue haste in the debate of the bill. I will stand by what I have just said. If it is the will of the House that there be thorough debate there will be thorough debate. If it is not the will of the House then there will be a more compressed debate.

This is a vital issue to the future of our country. I can understand the panic by the Bloc Quebecois because it sees something happening out there, particularly in Quebec itself, which is sober second thought, the slogan of our own Senate.

There is sober second thought taking place in Quebec and throughout Canada as Canadians come alive to the questions that are before us. They look at the rosy prospect, the positive challenge that is put to us by a renewed and revitalized Canada.

In conclusion, I would say that the purpose of the motion put by my colleague, the government House leader, is to give us the opportunity to get to the report stage debate and ultimately third reading of Bill C–81, an act which would provide for the opportunity to consult the people of Canada on their future Constitution.

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Madam Speaker, first I would like to express my agreement with the comments of the Liberal member for Saint–Denis. There is at least one member of that party who had the guts, who dared to say how much this is undemocratic. We are not debating a motion, we are debating the very survival of democracy in this House. Historically, the British parliamentary system never allowed such abuse, such a bill on referendums as that announced in the Speech from the Throne. There was time enough to table it, we would have had ample time to debate it. No. We had to hide because we were afraid. Now we table the bill in a terrible rush, we allow almost no time for debate and not only that, we send it to the committee with restrictions. The period for tabling is limited to one day. The committee also had to work within certain limits. At the very moment when we must prepare ourselves and respect a deadline, and it is particularly difficult for the Bloc Quebecois to prepare for a quality debate because we have no researchers helping us, they once again try to gag us. This is a hold–up on democracy, in which Conservative are accomplices; they are Cains selling pottage of lentils to their brother. That is how bad it is. The Conservatives have become collaborators, just like the Nazis were, or like we saw in France during the Second World War. They have become collaborators.

• (1630)

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

The hon. member for Richelieu is making very serious accusations. I would ask him to immediately withdraw—

Mr. Plamondon: Which words, Madam Speaker?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think it is totally unacceptable to call members of this House Nazis, and I would ask the hon. member to immediately withdraw his words.

Mr. Plamondon: Madam Speaker, my comments were not directed towards—and if that is how they were construed, I am sorry, I did not mean that to happen. All I said was that, under the Nazi regime—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member will withdraw his comments immediately.

Mr. Plamondon: Let me finish, Madam Speaker. I withdraw them, all right. All I said was that the behaviour of Conservative members—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Please, I want the hon. member to unequivocally withdraw his comments now.

Mr. Plamondon: In that case, Madam Speaker, consider the word withdrawn. The whole thing is over. Let us not talk about it anymore.

I say that the members—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Will you withdraw your comments, please.

Mr. Plamondon: Madam Speaker, for the third time I withdraw the word you wanted me to withdraw, the word "Nazi". Is that clear? It is withdrawn, let's forget about it. What I am saying is that the collaboration given by Quebec Conservative members in support for such a gag is unacceptable and is strangely reminiscent of the attitude of some collaborators during the last war. That is what I meant.

It is intolerable that democracy be ridiculed in such a manner. We behave like a banana republic. We have never seen, in any western democracy, such abuse of power, especially when we are talking about a bill without any spending limits, about an attempt to buy people's votes. There will not be any debate, just a squandering of public money. Not from the nation's treasury, since there is nothing left in the till, but borrowed by the government. We are going to spend $200 million, $300 million, you name it, on the back of Quebecers, to buy their votes, and Conservative Quebec members stay silent.

The referendum in Quebec was mentioned earlier. It was used as an example the world over. In England, when they had a referendum to decide whether or not they should join the Common Market, they upheld the long British parliamentary tradition of democracy, when we are turning this debate into a sad joke.

It is intolerable that democracy be ridiculed like this. No "yes" side, no "no" side, unlimited spending, unlimited number of committees. On top of that, 39 departments will be wasting public money, with the Prime Minister in front, followed by an Official Opposition leader without support, and a party which calls itself democratic but goes along with such a thing. It is unacceptable, Madam Speaker, unacceptable.

I wonder how they manage to stay seated in this House, these silenced Quebec members, gagged by their own party. Judas, traitors to their nation. Unacceptable! It is unacceptable that such things should happen in this House, that we should, on top of limiting debate on the motion, already prepare a motion for closure at second reading, without allowing proper time to probe the core of the question, like we usually do during any regular debate on a given subject.

This morning, as well as the Friday before the adjournment, members were shocked by our interventions on Bill C-59, another bill the government wanted to pass in a hurry. All three parties are just drivelling away. There is no more opposition, only three parties conniving to hold up democracy and to spend millions of tax money to buy votes rather than have a real democratic debate with a "yes" side and a "no" side, with spending limits and start up funds, like any decent referendum.

An hon. member: It is because they have nothing on the table, it is because they have nothing.

Mr. Plamondon: You have nothing to offer, so you buy. A $450 billion deficit, it is not enough, let us waste another half a billion in unnecessary TV advertising to promote this great and beautifully divided country. Let us not stop there.

[English]

Mr. Mills: Madam Speaker, on a point of order. I am having a little difficulty with this member's accusations. He has made some accusations in the last few minutes that those of us in this House of Commons who are trying to speak for Canada, who are trying to keep this country together, are traitors.

I think this is a valid point of order. It seems to me that when this room is dedicated to Canada and someone in it is trying to tear it apart that the real traitor is that group, not those of us who are trying to keep it together.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The danger in this type of debate, be it from the hon. member for Richelieu or the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood, is very scary and very apparent. If members of this House, depending on their different ideologies, start calling one another traitors to whatever ideology, we are getting into a very—

Mr. Mills: That is the term he used.

Madam Deputy Speaker The hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood is saying that this is the term that the hon. member for Richelieu used. While listening to the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood I am sure that when he reads the blues he will see that he was, in a way, certainly returning the term. This is very ugly and this House should refrain from using this type of language, and that includes each and every single member of this House.

There are two and a half minutes left.

[Translation]

I would ask the hon. member for Richelieu to please stick to parliamentary language. The hon. member has the floor.

Mr. Plamondon: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I would like to tell the colleague who spoke before me that I was addressing my remarks to the Conservative members from Quebec, not to the—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member should know that his words are no more acceptable whether he addresses members from Ontario or Conservative members from Quebec. I would ask him to restrict himself to parliamentary language.

Mr. Plamondon: To have parliamentary language first we should have a parliamentary democracy, you are quite right about that, Madam Speaker. In a parliamentary democracy, you have debates, you do not have gagging, you do not have debates which are always interrupted.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is himself jeopardizing democracy at this very moment in this very Chamber. The hon. member would like us to believe that the motion—

Order, please. The hon. member would like us to believe that the motion now before the House is going to limit the possibility to have a debate for everybody; that is not the case and the hon. member knows it perfectly well. I would prefer that we continue to debate this motion during the minute and a half that we have left and that we do it properly. It is not democracy which is at stake in this House for now.

On a point of order, the hon. member for Shefford.

Mr. Lapierre: Since when is the Chair defending the government's decison as if she were the government House leader's assistant?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do not think I defended anybody's opinion. If the hon. member would just listen for a minute, I only wanted the House to know exactly what Standing Order 53.(1) does. It was only a matter of information, just that since, as I was listening to the remarks by the member for Richelieu, I realized that he obviously did not understand where Standing Order 53 was taking us.

Unfortunately, time has now run out.

Mr. Plamondon: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Richelieu on a point of order.

Mr. Plamondon: You told me that there were two and half minutes left but you used them up.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hour provided for in the Standing Orders has now expired. If the hon. member reads Standing Order 53(1), he will see that this is precisely what this section says.

It being 4.40 p.m., the hour provided for the motion now before the House has expired, pursuant to Standing Order 53(3). Accordingly, under this Standing Order, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put the question on that motion.

[English]

Will those members who object to the motion please rise in their places.

[Translation]

And less than ten members having risen:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Since fewer than 10 members rose to oppose the motion, the motion is adopted pursuant to Standing Order 53(4).

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Plamondon: Madam Speaker, on a point of order. I noticed that a quorum was not present when you made the decision. Therefore, the decision is not valid.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I believe that there were indeed 20 members present in the House. In any case, since the point of order was not raised before, the question was put to the House and 10 members did not rise to oppose the motion. Therefore, the motion is carried. Orders of the day.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C–80, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, to enact the Children's Special Allowances Act, to amend certain acts in consequence thereof and to repeal the Family Allowances Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise to respond to the government's Bill C–80, which is a bill to amend the Income Tax and in fact do away with family allowances and set out a new pattern of child benefits.

Before dealing specifically with the legislation I would like to take this opportunity to review the way our party is approaching social policy as given to us by this government since 1984.

One academic writer has described it as social policy by stealth. I would just like to support that analysis. The way this government has sought to change the major pieces of legislation in this country governing social policy has been to do it through the back door, to do it in debates in which the Canadians following Parliament do not understand just how fundamental the changes being made are, as they are not being properly announced.

For example, who would have thought that Bill C–80, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, in fact contained major changes in the way we treat children in this country? It was not brought in as a new policy dealing with child benefits. It was not brought in by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who is responsible for children in this country.

It was brought in by the Minister of Finance as a ways and means motion. It was brought in through the budget as a budgetary motion. It was not presented clearly to Canadians as an act to change the way we deal with children.

We can go back through several pieces of legislation, particularly in the last two years, in which the government has sought to change the fundamental way in which we built up the social security system in this country by moving through the back door.

Let me give three examples. The most famous example, used and perhaps decried by all the social policy committees across this country, was Bill C–69 which was the first act to cut back transfer payments to the provinces. That was a battle in which the groups opposed to these changes, the groups involved with the delivery of medicare services in the provinces, post–secondary education and social services, realized too late in the process, in fact this bill had gone to the Senate, how fundamental the changes were that were occurring to them.

In the second last budget, in 1991, the government presented changes along the same lines and called them very simply Bill C–20 and Bill C–32. These again were considered to be amendments to the fiscal arrangements act and were done in a very quiet way.

This time the government took this not to the social policy committee or the health committee but to the finance committee, which is the last place social policy groups are used to going to find out what changes are being made in dealing with things like medicare, post–secondary education and social assistance measures under the Canada Assistance Plan. All these measures were done quietly.

However, this time the groups were notified, not by the government or by the House of Commons but by the opposition, this party, to come out and share their views on the impact that Bill C–69 was already having on the system. Day after day, we heard these groups say: "Do you not realize what you are doing to the social fabric of this country? Do you not realize how much you are undermining people's confidence in government to help them?"

That is a very important message when groups—not fringe groups but groups representing doctors, nurses, practitioners of all kinds in the health care system, representing regional governments in this country, major actors responsible for hundreds of millions of dollars—come forward, not to whine as the the government would say but to say to people: "Listen, you have just done enough cutbacks and we need to be protected".

In this budget we see another change. It is dealing with child benefits. I did some research on this, this is not hyperbole. This white paper, entitled The Child Benefit, is the shortest white paper presented in the history of any government in Canada. The total amount of money it was dealing with was $4.5 billion. In 14 short pages the Government of Canada announced its most major changes to the way that we deal with children, $4.5 billion was summarized in graphs and a few cliches in 14 pages.

Since that was introduced in March of this year the government has laid low. It has not produced any subsequent documents. It has not prepared the public for any discussion. It has not announced anywhere that this is going to legislative committee for discussion. It is going to put us on hurry up because it needs these amendments made to the Income Tax Act soon, if they are going to take effect next year.

We see here not only a push on other fronts, which we find very difficult to deal with these days, but on the most basic of things. If done properly, and if people take the time to think of the consequences dealing with children, we could have a worth–while discussion in committee in this House and across the country. No, this government simply wants to get on with it and make these changes before Canadians wake up and realize what is happening to them.

One of the fundamentals of social policy in this country, particularly since the Second World War, is that the Canadian government should seek as many ways as possible to support family life. The number of vehicles available to the government to do that in a federal system are limited.

However, through gradual changes in family law and through changes right after the Second World War in some of the UI provisions, and also through the children's special allowances act and family allowances, we began to develop a system in which the Government of Canada said to each and every family: "We understand that what you are doing is very important for society. We cannot always give you a lot of money but we understand that no matter what your background, who you are, what your husband does, all these other things, we will give you a small amount of money each month to help out".

• (1650)

For some families that is a very real amount, $35 per child still buys a week's worth of groceries and basics, it still buys a few books, it still buys the occasional treat, it still alleviates some of the tensions between men, women and families, and it does not make a statement about income levels. It is very important that in the way in which we create social policies that we do not make statements on class and do not make the assumption that because one income-earner in a family is well-off that everyone else in the family is well-off. There are subtle ways to state that we understand that in your own private lives this small amount of money may be of some help to you.

The government has decided, through the continuation of a social policy by stealth, that the principle of reaching out to each family no longer applies. It will seek to target those families which it thinks need the most.

In some respects the targeting philosophy is very popular in this country. People are wondering in times of tight budgets and high deficits if targeting is not the proper strategy. Any political party worth its salt does not just look at the past policies but looks into the future and seeks to make sure that it is being as responsive as possible.

The underlying fault with so-called targeting is that it lets too many people off the hook. We do not often like to make these comparisons between Canada and the United States, the rhetoric of targeting, the rhetoric of cutbacks, the rhetoric of telling people they must do with less is strictly a part of the ideological thrust of the right in America. The price Americans are paying in their cities and among their youth is far greater than we ever want to pay. That is because the American strategy has always been to claim targeting, rather than the reality of reaching out to too few to be of help.

One test which we would like to apply in examining the child benefits package is to apply the litmus test of the government itself. The government's litmus test is two-fold. First, it is there to help the very poorest of families to withstand changes taking place in their lives, and second, those people who are not being helped do not really need the help.

Let us examine the first principle. The very poorest of Canadians either fall under the Indian Act and represent about 400,000 status Indians living on reserves across the country, the largest proportion of those are under 25 years old and a good many of those are under 18, or are covered by the Canadian Assistance Plan and are living on either provincial or municipal social assistance programs. That varies of course from province to province and city to city. It is hard to generalize from here all the characteristics of those systems.

This particular child benefits package deliberately does not speak to the question of those very poor families who are living on social assistance. It is deemed that there are measures in place to look after those people but the reality is that because of the cutbacks, legislated through Bills C-69, C-20 and C-32, the fundamentals of our system for dealing with poor families have been undermined.

If we examine the literature from the social sciences, certainly throughout the 20th century in North America and back to 19th century industrial England, the whole thesis is that to help the poor we need a basket of programs or a combination of programs to support them, not only through cash but in a number of other ways.

In Canada we have taken many different initiatives. However, we will just isolate three or four of them. First, we will deal with housing. This government has continued its cutbacks in social housing and co-operative housing to the extent that this year CMHC has all but left the field.

Second, we will look at education. The cutbacks to these different programs, to education and training, is dramatic and the access of young people to training is almost nil.

Third is the question of nutrition and health care at a young age. Fundamental to healthy family life is a healthy community and healthy children.

When you undermine those basic principles, when you take away the support structures, and then come in at the end with a little bit of cash it is very deceptive.

One academic made a presentation to us that struck me, and I think will strike me for many years to come. She said that in her professional estimate the amount of money withdrawn from the health care system by measures of this government from 1984 to 1993, the end of the next fiscal year, is going to be as high as $43 billion.

If we examine those measures that I talked about before, at what is happening in medicare as it deals with children, in pre-natal care, what is happening in housing, and what is happening in education, we see that there is an emerging crisis here. When the government makes another announcement dealing with family benefits we must expect that the cash put on the table is somehow going to begin to compensate for what is taken away.

There is a theory among some social scientists, particularly among conservative economists, that the problem with the poor is that they do not have money. Therefore the simple solution is to give them money and the poverty will begin to end.

It is not so simple.

In a community in which roads are run down or property that people rent is not kept up, along with other little things which do not work, the cash presented by the federal government will have minimal impact in creating a healthy community.

As a result of the emergence of CAP and the strategy of this government that the welfare poor should be more subject to provincial assistance than to federal assistance the federal government made the decision that it would not change the benefits to the non-working poor, that is to say those people who do not have income as defined under the Income Tax Act.

That is a brutal blow. In fact it is not clear at this time whether the new benefits package which is paid monthly for the child will be given freely to these individuals without the province taking recourse because it represents such a substantial change in the way that the cash comes in.

If the federal government and the minister of health are seeking to change the way that people receive money the least he can do in negotiating with the provincial ministers of social services is to guarantee that the money he is providing for these people will not be used against them in the determination of provincial levels of social assistance.

Possibly that is difficult for the House to accept, but that question has not yet been publicly answered by any of the ministers across this country.

In terms of the test of helping out the very poorest there is no change in the position of these families. They will not receive any extra moneys.

The second question is whether the cut-off level is realistic. Are people going to begin to receive less money from the federal government at a level at which we sitting here think they can get by with?

As part of its strategy the government, and probably quite appropriately in this case, has been most generous with families earning between $20,000 and $30,000.

I want to stop here and point out one subtle change. Again this is where as an opposition critic I become furious with this government. If it is talking openly with people, how many Canadians realize that now the question no longer concerns individual income but family income?

How many people now realize that in order to obtain benefits under the child benefit process they must be able to show the income of both people?

The government has decided that if the family income is in excess of $30,000 a family should receive minimum assistance under this plan. The calculations, if you follow the child benefit package as presented in this in-depth 14-page report, are very difficult to follow. By most measures the average family with both spouses in the home working will receive an additional $4 a month if its family income is about $30,000. This continues right straight through to $50,000. Then once they get between $50,000 and $100,000 by a sliding scale, people begin to receive less.

• (1700)

Let us deal with the middle income families. The average family income in Canada according to Statistics Canada is about $51,000. That means that the government's cut-off point is below the average, which by definition means that the average family is going to receive little or no benefit.

I cannot think of any circumstances under which an extra $4 a month will fundamentally change the relationship between a family and a child. In what ways can a parent substantially change the way a child saves, a child buys clothes or a child is fed with $4 extra a month?

That is as insulting as the 37-cent increase given to seniors on their last senior citizens' cheque. That is the type of sleight of hand or social policy by stealth that this party wishes to challenge on the floor of the House of Commons as being unfair to most Canadians.

The government projects itself as being of great help to children. It has national press conferences. The minister was quick to tell me that he had been out to Winnipeg North Centre and understood and saw the poverty in my constituency.

Families are trying very hard, particularly families of new Canadians with incomes of $30,000 to $35,000 and families with two people working at the minimum wage and working overtime, which are not uncommon. How can we say to them that basically we think they make enough and do not need the help of the government? This is an important part of our society. The government is no longer willing to provide them with any increases that take into account the increased pressure that they are feeling.

As members of Parliament we would have to be deaf and dumb to say that we do not hear constantly from constituencies about how tough it is to make ends meet. Nobody has a nickel to spare.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I apologize. I must interrupt the hon. member.

[Translation]

Mrs. Venne: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to listen to the speech of our colleague, but I would like others to benefit from it. I realize that we certainly do not have a quorum in this House. It is easy to see.

And the count having been taken:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Since we now have a quorum, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has the floor.

Mr. Walker: Madam Speaker, I am very happy that my colleague did call quorum on my behalf. I need an audience for such an important speech.

[English]

I would just like to continue with the analysis of low income families, particularly new Canadians. As I started to note, the message goes out from the government that if they are making $30,000 or $35,000 a year as a couple they can look after their children and do not need its help.

We can take that as a stark contrast with the recognition in Quebec, for example, of how fundamentally important support for children is at the outset and in the continuation. If we want to have a healthy society, we must give out the signal constantly that there is a government that cares. We would not use public relations to overcome the fact that we are not really spending any money.

In fact we on this side of the House could accept a policy framework which stated that due to the bankruptcy of the government all we can do at this time is give an extra $4 a month to people earning $40,000 a year but that as money comes in families are our first priority. That could be accepted.

They should not pretend something different. For example, officials proudly informed members of Parliament in a briefing that most Canadians would be receiving a higher monthly payment under this system than ever before. They failed to add in the concluding statement that most Canadian families would be receiving less annually. That is a diversionary tactic which just goes to the heart of the lack of credibility of the social policy of this government. As such, instead of stepping forward to help children, this government has in fact stepped back in a very dramatic fashion.

Let us not only consider what I have to say and what this party has to say. Let us stop and listen to what other people have said.

It is not as if all of a sudden the government, starting in January in preparation for its February budget, heard about child poverty. What happened to the national day care study which set out a very elaborate process for working toward day care? It has disappeared; it is forgotten. What about the Senate committee that worked for months on poverty and came out with several options for the government to consider? It is forgotten. What happened to the subcommittee on child poverty and its report just before Christmas with very specific recommendations dealing, for example, with prenatal care? It is forgotten.

The government has forgotten every major initiative it initiated and for which it sought public support for. It took a very minor step forward yet claimed it was looking after the basic income problems of children. I believe that is the type of disrespect for Canada and Canadians that people have begun to resent.

A number of groups has come forward but I would just like to deal with what one group said in its critique of the new child tax benefit in the 1992 budget. It was prepared by Ken Battle, president of the Caledon Institute of Social Policy.

We should not only be concerned with what we tried to do in the past through universal programs or with the present and what this government is doing, but we should look into the future. What is social policy for children going to look like in 1997? Let me quote: "Like the current child benefit system the new system will only be partially indexed, which means the benefits will fall steadily in value as the years go by. The federal government has already siphoned off an estimated $3.5 billion out of child care benefits for 1986 through 1991 by the physically powerful and politically invisible mechanisms of partial deindexation".

Ken Battle continues: "For example, a welfare couple with two children, one under seven and one between seven and seventeen, will get $2,253 from the new child tax benefit in 1993. By the year 2000 their benefit will have declined to $1,862, which is $391 or 17 per cent less than in 1993. Their cumulative loss of child benefits will amount to a hefty $1,532".

In other words, they start out with a system which is really tight now. They put in the deindexing provision, and gradually, gradually families find it more difficult. However, they wash their hands of it and say: "That was done many years ago", and they hope people forget about it.

We have reached a point where we should re-establish our commitment to certain fundamental beliefs. The Liberal Party of Canada built up the social policy network we have starting in the 1930s, continuing after World War II and through the 1950s and 1960s, and culminating in income security for seniors and medicare for the nation. This was a longstanding commitment. As a caucus and as a party we have recently reconfirmed these views.

I would like to quote from a recent motion of the Liberal Party: "The Liberals believe that Canada must remain a society committed to both greater economic opportunity and to social justice for all its people, and that to be productive members of the work force individual Canadians must be equipped with the necessary tools for life and work". It continues: "They must be healthy, well nourished, well educated and well trained to achieve their own economic success. We are committed to meeting these goals for Canadians".

If we want this generation, the hundreds of thousands of children and each of the age cohorts, to move in to a more productive life, we have to start with income support to the family which adds up to more than $4 a month. We have to provide pre-natal care. We have to make sure there is day care, particularly in our large cities. There is no reason we have to get ourselves into a corner by plastering the whole country with day care spaces and day care facilities when the need varies from one region to the other, but we have to start. This party has never, ever vacillated on support for national day care.

There are thousands upon thousands of families, particularly in the big cities, right across this country who cannot survive without two people working. They cannot have two people working unless they are sure their children are being looked after. Recent statistics indicate that the number of days women miss work every year is going up because in the end they are the ones responsible for their children. This is what happens when we do not have a proper system.

We have to make sure there are summer programs for them. In our city we could not get that because Challenge 92 was too small, an issue that is not discussed here. We have to make sure when we talk about training that it is not just UI based. Aboriginal youth and women returning to the work force for the first time in years must have access to these programs. We have to make sure of these things. We cannot take them for granted.

This program has dropped support from age 18 to age 17. What do students who are going to university do? They want people to be trained. They do not want them to be bankrupt. Yet the bill is totally silent on it. They take a small piece of the pie and try to parade it as being as big as possible.

In the meantime people start getting their cheques and are happy. This government hopes to keep them happy for six months before the election comes. However, the husband and wife will begin to compare what they are really getting out of it. When the major spouse's income, usually the man's, drops dramatically because of changes in the Income Tax Act and another cheque arrives for $200, $300 or $400 a month, people are going to be confused. At first they will think they are ahead. Then they will realize they have been subjected, at their own expense, to one of the biggest con jobs in social policy seen in Europe and in North America for many years to come.

This is the reason we call upon the government to take the initiative in the legislative committee which we are hopefully headed for very shortly. When we reach the legislative committee hopefully it is not only opposition members asking for different witnesses. Government members themselves should take the initiative. There are many questions left unanswered, but they should be put on the table now and the government should be asked to respond to the problem.

For example, let me refer to some of the questions which are unanswered in the legislation. First, is this new money or tinkering with forecasted growth?

The Conservative government's white paper on child benefits states: "Over the next five years the child tax benefit will provide almost $2.1 billion in increased child assistance". However, there is some doubt that this projected increase is new money but merely the five-year accumulative increase that would have occurred to the existing child benefits system. Preliminary estimates show that between 1986 and 1991 family allowances payments grew by approximately $275 million. For the same five-year period the refundable child tax credit grew by approximately $750 million.

The government should show the committee that the total growth forecast for the three existing child benefits exceeds or is not similar to the one being proposed in the new program.

Second, there is a number of constitutional implications. Both the current deal being discussed through the media and the report of the special joint committee on a renewed Canada contained many ideas on social policy. Is this legislation consistent with what is happening in Alberta and Quebec, or are they issues that need to be resolved before the legislation is passed?

Third, there is the erosion of child benefits. The proposed child benefit is indexed to increases in inflation less 3 per cent. This partial deindexation will cause the benefits to decrease steadily in value as the years go by. It was the process of partial indexation that allowed the Conservative government to take approximately $3.5 billion out of the child benefits system between 1986 and 1991.

How does this government intend to monitor and adjust the levels of benefit and the income threshold so that the value is not eroded over time by inflation?

Finally, we come to the major point of the discussion. At this time in every major city in this country we are facing a crisis, where youth are unemployed at the rate of at least 20 per cent, and where there are pockets of youth unemployment and student unemployment far higher than that. We have people between the ages of 16 and 25 making critical decisions which are destructive because of their lack of opportunity to do things positively. We have students and young people turned away from training programs because of a lack of funding. We have the group which most needs help finding that the national government has run out of cash to help them. You have to stop and think of that, what it means to say that you have run out of cash to help the young people.

My argument is that if this government took proper time to consult with Canadians and if it asked them for a priority, income support for children, for families, for youth would be the number one priority.

We take for granted the phenomenal progress we have made in dealing with the elderly in Canada from the mid-1960s to the late 1980s. Between housing programs, an effective medicare system, an effective community health-based system dealing with questions of nutrition, special programs like New Horizons, and basic income support programs, we could quite literally begin to think that we had dealt with the issue of the elderly.

Now we are faced with another social crisis, the strategic underpinnings of which are quite clear. Every child in this country deserves support. Every child in this country deserves an opportunity of a home, the opportunity to be fed, the opportunity to have an education, the opportunity to walk down the street without being faced with a gang, and the opportunity to make a choice of going to university or a community college without being bankrupted. When children sense that the people on top, the generation that has gone before them that has reaped so beautifully from a generous system, and I include myself here, when people like myself say: "No more, there's no money for you because we won't pay the taxes, we won't structure a government, we won't set priorities"—all these reasons—"we can't help you", then I say to you that that will be a sad day in this country. It will mark the beginning of the end of confidence in the government system among the very young.

It will start as soon as we begin to pick and choose among the families we want to help. I urge this government to use a legislative committee, not to ram through an amendment to the Income Tax Act of Canada, but to stop and to say: "All right, let's hear from some important groups, let's have the government members bring in some of these groups, let's have the opposition parties bring in some groups. Let's talk about what it costs to bring up a child nowadays; let's talk about what it costs to keep a child off the streets. Let's talk about the cost, and the Solicitor General can tell us about that, to have an aboriginal youth in a western Canadian prison, what it is costing the Government of Canada to set up aboriginal women's centres across this country because of past policies".

We say to ourselves: "Is this what we are going to be spending our money on for the next generation or are we going to systematically seek out a different way of doing things?"

As with any policy, does any one party have all the wisdom? The answer is no. The parliamentary system has tried to wrestle with the questions of child poverty for the last five years. We have had reports, we have had expert witnesses, and again and again we have walked away from the recommendations of these people.

This is our last chance. If the final product of this Parliament is going to be known as Bills C-69, C-20, C-32 and C-80 as the so-called building blocks for a new social policy in the country, I think we are going to have exactly the opposite effect.

• (1720)

In fact, we are going to end up with a system which is so demoralized, actualized, bankrupt of ideas and money, it is going to take us another generation to regain the confidence of the young people. I thank you for the opportunity to participate in this debate and I look forward to a lengthy discussion in legislative committee.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Madam Speaker, it is with some resignation that I stand to debate the government's child benefits legislation. We see this at the end of a long line of attacks on Canada's social programs, in particular, attacks on Canada's poor children.

If we look back to November 29, 1989, we will remember this House voted unanimously for the resolution moved by the then leader of the New Democratic Party, that it express its concern for the more than one million Canadian children currently living in poverty and seek to achieve the goal of eliminating poverty among Canadian children by the year 2000. On that day the Prime Minister, every member of cabinet, and all of the members representing the government voted in favour of that motion to end child poverty by the year 2000.

On many occasions in the past the Prime Minister talked about social programs as a sacred trust, as programs which would be enhanced and maintained for all Canadians into the future.

Last December the Prime Minister signed the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child which tied and bound Canada by international agreement to support children in Canada, to maintain them and provide for their needs. In that context, in signing that convention, the Prime Minister committed himself and his government to placing children as the first goal on Canada's resources, the first goal in good times and in bad times.

It may be we are in bad times. I think those millions of Canadians who are on welfare, the over one million Canadians who are unemployed, would agree that we are in bad times. The Prime Minister committed himself to provide for children in good times and in bad times. Now we see the implications of that. Actions quite clearly speak louder than words.

We are discussing today the government's plan to address or respond to the concerns of Canada's poor children. Critics have made it clear that the government is not fulfilling its obligations to Canada's children, to Canada's future. No social groups working in the field support the changes to the legislation, to child benefit programs which this government is proposing. All those organizations working on behalf of poor children, on behalf of the poor, who understand the poor, who live with them and work with them every day know there is a need for a major shift in government economic and social policy. This has been clear to the government over many years and the government continues in this same course, this course which has served the interests and concerns of Canada's poor so badly.

Lest we think things are not so bad, let us be clear about the numbers of people that we are dealing with here. Let us ask the question: Is Canada's economy working? It is not working for the over 863,000 children who are welfare recipients; 37.8 per cent of all welfare recipients are children.

It is not working for the 2.3 million welfare recipients in Canada, the 1.3 million unemployed in Canada, and it is not working for the over one million children in poverty in Canada. This economy, this country, is not working for millions and millions of Canadians.

Lest we think much is to be achieved by this child benefit proposal by the government, let us look at some of the things that have been said about it by analysts who are not tied to the government, nor tied to any other political party.

Ken Battle, who used to the director of the National Council on Welfare, the advisory agency to the government's own health and welfare department, said in response to these proposals that the working poor families are falling deeper and deeper below the poverty line. He said that the federal proposals are designed to pretend to fight child poverty while at the same time making sure that middle and some upper income families get larger benefits. He talked about partial indexation. As we know this program, as with so many government programs, will only be indexed to inflation over 3 per cent. He said that deindexation is a fiscally powerful and politically invisible mechanism that allows the government to siphon money from social programs.

Prior to the introduction of this legislation, Canada's average families have seen their social programs from this government reduced by about half of what they were seven years ago. Through various approaches this government has cut family benefits dramatically, as I say, to about half. It has killed the old income tax deduction for dependent children and brought in a tax credit which is worth far less, now just standing at $71 a child. It did not index benefits fully for inflation, as I said.

Year after year these benefits will continue to shrink as they have done for the last seven, eight, nine years. This means that the poor will remain poor. We are not solving that problem. Indeed, the minister responsible, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, has said that in spite of his government's and his own vote in favour of the resolution to eliminate child poverty by the year 2000 only two to three years ago, now that commitment to end child poverty is an unrealizable dream.

For the over one million children living in poverty, it is a necessity to get out of poverty, to break that poverty cycle. For the government minister responsible for the support for poor children to say that it is an unrealizable dream is to give up the fight before it has begun. Indeed, in order to deal with the problems that poor children face, the minister needs to fight tooth and nail against his own cabinet ministers to ensure that economic and social policies are changed in this country to support those children.

During various briefings that have taken place, Department of National Health and Welfare officials have indicated that children whose family income is derived from social assistance and from unemployment insurance will be no better off under the new system than under the old. In other words, the poorest of Canada's children will not be addressed by these changes to child benefits.

For someone earning less than $10,000, the family income coming from child benefits will stay exactly the same as it was before. Not one extra penny is being added to the poorest of Canada's poor children. The only changes which take place add about $500 to families earning up to about $30,000. In other words, it is about $1.30 a day for poor families and lower income families in Canada.

That is not going to deal with the one million children who go to bed hungry at night. One dollar and twenty-five cents a day per family is not going to address that concern. Indeed, as the government's own officials have indicated, it is not even intended to deal with that problem. As I have said, the government itself is not even committed any longer to eliminating child poverty by the end of the decade.

In the process of introducing these changes, and an issue not mentioned once by the government spokesperson presenting this bill who, as has been noted, has a finance portfolio, not a health and welfare portfolio, we have had this bill introduced and presented not as a measure of welfare but as a measure of finance. Not once did the government spokesperson mention that this bill finally puts an end to universality.

The purpose behind universal family allowance, which is being dispensed with, ended in this legislation, is to recognize the important task of raising children by all families, regardless of their income levels. Yet this bill is saying to Canadian families that a large number of them are not to receive anything in recognition of their participation in raising children, in raising Canada's future. It is opposed by all groups working on behalf of children and families. It is the end of universality as is being produced here in this legislation.

Even if some families are going to be a little better off, and as I said some will be $1.25 a day better off, this government over the last few years has taken billions of dollars out of social programs and billions of dollars out of transfers to the provinces.

In my own province of Saskatchewan $518 million will not come to the province this year that otherwise would have. That $518 million is about the same size as the provincial deficit, in a small province with limited ability to raise tax dollars, with a small population, indeed a shrinking population. Here the government is taking $518 million out of the province of Saskatchewan and it is putting a few dollars back at the rate of $1.25 to lower income families.

It cannot be said to be progress when you take millions out and you put a few cents back. Many families in Saskatchewan and Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing do not have adequate resources to feed their families because they cannot get jobs. The unemployment rate is around 12 per cent. The government is telling those families they are not going to be better off; they are going to be worse off. They are not going to receive any assistance. They are going to be worse off in the end.

Let us look at one single instance. The government says that it is putting $400 million more into these child benefits, as I said, prorated to $1.25 a day per family, but it is taking $620 million out of social housing across the country. On that one item $220 million is lost to those Canadians at the low end of the economic earning capacity, who need some help to afford housing, to provide adequate housing for their families, housing which is too expensive for them in the private sector. Even on that one issue lower income Canadians are losing about $200 million; the difference between the cut to social housing and the extra money in the child benefits.

The federal unloading on to the provinces is costing Canadian families enormously and the federal government is just throwing a few cents their way in response to that. The federal support has been reduced considerably. Canadian families know that.

In spite of the attack on the resources of the provinces, there are some opportunities which have been taken. The three provinces with NDP governments, British Columbia, Ontario and Saskatchewan, have all been able, in spite of the desperate financial situations they have been in, to increase social assistance rates. They recognized the plight of Canadians living so far below the poverty line.

Let us look a little at what is wrong with what the government has done. It says that its new child benefits package is simpler, fairer and more generous, whereas in fact, as I have tried to show, it is none of these things.

First of all, it is not markedly simpler. There is a reduction of categories of sets of benefits from five to four, but this new system remains so complicated that the government, not individual families, will have to calculate the benefits.

As I have said, it is not fair. It does not provide to Canadian families with low incomes the ability to feed their children. It does not enable them to get out of the welfare trap, as the government tries to pretend it does.

What the government has done in this case is distinguish between the deserving poor and the undeserving poor. Whether or not children are poor is not a question of whether or not they are deserving. They do not become undeserving because they are members of a particular family or deserving because they are members of another family. Yet this government has decided that it would add $500 a year to working poor families, but not to families without the opportunity to work. With the costs of child care being anything upwards from $6,000 a year, the extra $500 clearly will not be of much assistance to those families.

It is said that the program is more generous. As I and the government's own officials have said, the poorest of Canada's poor children will be no better off at all under this program. Of course with deindexation, everyone who receives the benefits will become worse and worse off over time.

What did the government do to let Canadians know about its new child benefits package, even though it did not have much to work with? As I have said, the poorest will remain poor. It spent $500,000 on an advertising campaign to promote the new child benefits program. It spent $500,000, money which surely would have been better spent on feeding those hungry children.

What should we do instead? It is not enough just to criticize the woefully inadequate programs that the government puts forward. It is necessary to suggest some alternatives for the government, not that it will listen, it has not listened to any of the critics. So far it has not listened to those people who know how lower income Canadians have difficulty in getting by from day to day.

We must set the reduction of poverty as a realizable goal. We must fight for it. We must make sure that we work toward reducing poverty in Canada. Yet over the last 10 years, in the time that this government has been in office, there has been no decrease in the number of children living in poverty. That number is about the same as it was 10 years ago.

We have to get Canada working again. We have to place employment at the top of our list of priorities. We cannot continue to fight inflation by creating unemployment, as this government has done. We cannot continue to fight rising interest rates by creating unemployment. It is an immoral, unacceptable way of organizing our resources.

We have to put full employment strategies first. We have to make sure that we treat the creation of jobs as our number one priority. We have to also support that policy with adequate training programs, not for just 6 per cent of those people who are on unemployment insurance but for all Canadians so that they can become better trained and better able to cope with the needs of a modern economy.

We need a fair taxation system so that those who are richer and the corporations that make profits will pay their fair share of taxes. Canadians do not mind paying their fair share of taxes, but they do not like being treated unfairly. They do not like to see the Royal Bank or the big banks paying no taxation essentially, while their taxes are increased on a yearly basis. Every time the finance minister produces a budget, his hand goes into the pockets of ordinary Canadians. Yet tax loopholes for the rich and corporations continue to flourish. That is an unacceptable approach.

We have to try to stop poverty. This government has tended to allow poverty to take place and, indeed, through its economic policies to encourage poverty and then attempt to respond with band-aid solutions. We would be best off to invest in our children, to invest in our future and ensure that Canadian children do not grow up in poverty and that they grow up with the basic necessities of life.

To summarize, we need full employment policies. To suggest as some on the other side would that this is impossible is only to close their eyes to countries across this world that have put employment first, to successful economies with low unemployment rates and low child poverty rates, too. For example, we could look to Norway as a country which could show us how to ensure our children do not live in poverty but are provided with the basic necessities of life. In Norway, the child poverty rate is 5 per cent. In Canada, we are dealing with one in six Canadian children living in poverty. There are examples to follow. There are other countries we can look to.

• (1740)

As I said, we need fair taxes so that we can find the revenue to provide for those who, for whatever reason, are unable to work. We need affordable, accessible, high quality, non-profit child care so that parents can go out to work. That is something the government has reneged upon only recently.

Canada's record among the industrialized countries in the world with regard to child poverty is better only than that of the United States. Only the United States is worse than we are. All other countries are better and it is time we looked to them for examples.

I will end on one rhetorical question. Do we not have the resources in this country to ensure that no children go to bed hungry? Surely we can organize our resources appropriately so that those children who will be our future have the resources they need, the food they need, the education they need. Can we not organize our resources so that can be done? Surely we can, if we have the political will.

[Translation]

Mr. Plamondon: Madam Speaker, a point of order. We do not have a quorum.

And the count having been taken:

Madam Deputy Speaker: The quorum has been restored. Questions and comments.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Madam Speaker, I listened very carefully to what was said by the previous speaker, and I would like to say that he made a very good speech in which he analysed the essential components of the family allowance policy. However, before that I also listened to the speech by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, and I was very disappointed that it was so simple, I would almost say simplistic, for a major debate on the universality of programs like family allowances.

I was surprised at his petty dollars and cents approach and his explanation that it was actually better for all concerned, when we know this entails an enormous loss in terms of vested rights many Canadian families have had for years.

Madam Speaker, I am sure that like me, you remember the universal family allowances program, a program that has benefited all Canadian families. Irrespective of income or marital status, this program was universal. Today, we are witnessing the end of the universality of family allowances, and you know as well as I do, Madam Speaker, that a program for the poor always ends up being a poor program. Every time we decide to change the rules of the game to give one group an advantage over another group, the losers are the people on the borderline.

The problem with this government proposal is that our tax system could be fairer. Members know as well as I do that those who earn more would normally pay more income tax and those who earn less would pay less. Consequently, things could be evened out at that level. However, they now want to decide arbitrarily, and this is supposed to be a measure by the Department of Finance, but basically, this marks the end of a truly universal program in this country. The government has done it again. It did exactly the same when it set a ceiling on old age security pensions, and today, in a matter of hours, another national institution, a program which the Prime Minister himself said was a sacred trust, will disappear.

I saw the Prime Minister with my own eyes at Patro Roc-Amadour in Quebec City, when he was on television, promising his mother I remember, it was the 1988 election campaign that he would never touch the universality of old age pensions. I know because some of my colleagues were in that room and remember it very well. Again, he lied to us, and now family allowances are disappearing for all practical purposes.

I know that hon. members opposite would like to say that family policy is strictly an accounting operation. I know that we should have had a much more substantial debate before coming to that conclusion. Basically the whole Canadian social safety net which they are advertising, instead of spending money to have young girls sing "O Canada", that money could be much better spent to help children have school lunches or things like that. Obviously the government's priorities are misplaced and more and more we are forced to realize that this government's family policy is going nowhere.

After he solemnly promised a national child care program—I heard it too—the Minister of National Health and Welfare says it is out of the question. They went back on their word once more. Imagine, the major social programs about which Canada boasts around the world are being eroded one after another.

That is why when we see people traipsing around the world, trying to pretend to be virtuous, we should look at reality. We do not have to go very far. I am sure that in any primary school, you could find children who have not been fed because they are poor. The $1.04 a day under this program will certainly not be enough to feed them. It is not even enough for a bus ticket. We know very well that this program which the government would have us believe is an incentive and generous perpetuates child poverty. Even worse, it is just the beginning.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member knows very well that this period is for short comments and questions or comments on the previous speech and questions for the member who just spoke.

The hon. member has already been talking for over five minutes. Perhaps he could conclude with a question for his colleague.

The hon. member for Shefford.

Mr. Lapierre: Madam Speaker, you guessed that I was coming to the questions, because that is just what I was about to do.

I wanted to ask my colleague if he does not find it indecent for a government to come with a bill like this without dealing with the fundamental issue in Canada and Quebec for taxpayers. I think removing the universality of social programs through the back door, using a Department of Finance that has a petty accountant's mentality—does the hon. member not find that dishonest? Is it not rather crooked of the government to have done it to old people and now do it to families? Is it not going back on its promises one by one? I think that the hon. member would have something to say about that.

[English]

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the member for his question. Clearly we share the same view regarding universality that the majority of Canadians share, and it is that we see the raising of children as a responsibility of all Canadian families. That should be recognized by the government on behalf of all Canadians.

After all, it will be those children who will pay the pensions for you, me, and everybody else and provide for our health care as they move into the work force and pay their taxes. If we do not respect them, if we do not honour them, if we do not recognize them then they are likely to be less prepared to provide us with pensions, health care and so on. Even in terms of self–interest it is a big mistake to attack universality.

Those programs of universal application of family benefits, the family allowance, some of that money goes into families which are a little wealthier. If we had a taxation system which responded well and in a progressive way, if we were taxed back much of that money, we would be able to recognize those families' contributions to the raising of children as something which is beneficial to Canada and we would be able to recover some of those moneys in terms of taxation.

• (1750)

By undermining universality and by increasingly turning our taxation system into a regressive system, we are undermining those roles on two accounts.

It is worth pointing out that all critics of social programs will tell you that once you remove universality you begin the process of removing the program altogether. That is what we are seeing here, the continual erosion over time, first of universality and now of social programs directed toward the poor.

It is also worth pointing out that by not encouraging those children of lower income families, by not ensuring that they attend school and can stay awake because they are well fed, we encourage a huge cost on our society. One study has suggested that the school drop-outs in one year, from 1989, will cost Canada $4 billion. There are suggestions that school drop-outs over a decade will cost $30 billion. Those are huge costs to society because we are not paying enough attention to our children.

Were it not for the government's refusal to look from the heart at these problems, to be compassionate and caring about the pain and suffering that its economic and social policies are causing Canada's low income children, perhaps it could look at it from an economic point of view, from a financial point of view, and see the huge costs that are being loaded on this country.

Madam Speaker, whether it be from economic or social reasons, it surely is necessary for this government to change its policies.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I consider it a great pleasure to support this legislation, Bill C-80, with regard to strengthening Canada's income assistance measures for children.

I have listened very carefully to some of my colleagues in the House and I just want to say at the very beginning that what we are talking about today is certainly a major change, I grant that; but it also is $2.1 billion in new money. This is new money that is going to the assistance of children. We are streamlining this system so it can be passed through to the families far more effectively. It is a lot fairer, it is a lot simpler and it is a lot more generous.

These really sweeping changes did not come about suddenly, they have been under review for years and years, both in the standing committees of this House and the other place down the hall. It was most interesting, if you chronologically go back, to note that the Prime Minister attended the United Nations meeting on the rights of the child and we ratified the Canadian position on children's rights on December 11, 1991.

Also, the standing committee on health and welfare had a report. I also would like to thank my colleague from Calgary North who through a great many meetings with various members of Parliament has gone through each and every area with regard to the benefits in assisting families, and we feel we have come up with a very good system.

When the Minister of Finance on February 25 brought in his annual budget for the present fiscal year, he tabled a white paper on the child benefit.

I noticed that some of my colleagues opposite were mentioning that there was no communication and no discussion with regard to the child benefit package with the agencies, various provinces and the Canada Assistance Plan people.

The department has sent out thousands of copies of the white paper to interested people and the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of Finance have been talking to the provincial agencies right across Canada to review exactly what is in the benefit and looking for input.

I mentioned the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child and I mentioned the budget that was brought down in February. I would also like to say that the Minister of National Health and Welfare brought down Brighter Futures a few weeks ago, which is a plan that deals specifically with children at risk.

We are all very worried about youngsters in poverty. We must be very careful to be fiscally responsible as well as socially responsible. In taking a strong look and in talking to people right across Canada we know that we must assist those who are high risk. That is indeed what the Minister of National Health and Welfare brought down.

He took the money, $500 million, and is utilizing it to target youngsters who are really at risk through prevention, through education, and through promotion. He is promoting through the various agencies, hospitals, clinics, and our aboriginal colleagues how to take care of oneself when one is pregnant, to cure the low birth weight of some new youngsters, and introduce more education for health protection gear for children's safety. We have also joined partnerships right across Canada. That is another element.

I am really glad to speak today because this tremendous change in our legislation represents the final one.

There were many areas of the old act that were causing us a great deal of concern. I would like to say that I believe that there is absolutely no doubt that the new child tax benefit put forward in the bill today is a significant advancement over the current system. In light of today's complex society, and we heard from the gentleman across the way that it is a complex society, the bill proposes enriched benefits which will be streamlined and be very responsive. It will better target the ones who need our help.

I did mention the two parliamentary committees and the member for Calgary North. The proposed benefit is going to be a single monthly payment for children under 18. It will generally be made to the mother. This new benefit is going to be based on family income reported in the most recent tax year. These single monthly payments will neither be taxed nor recovered at tax time. Those are two important changes so that families are going to keep in full what they receive.

There are two major components of the proposed tax benefit. The first is the basic monthly benefit that replaces family allowances, the dependent child credit and the refundable child tax credit. It includes extra benefits for children under the age of seven and also for children in large families.

The second major change is a new federally earned income supplement. This is very important. It is a federally earned income supplement that will increase the basic benefit by up to $500 per year for low-income working families with children. While we will maintain and increase our benefits for those people living on welfare we are going to give some added incentive to low-income working families. Today there needs to be an incentive for people to get out and work. It is most important.

The annual benefit is going to depend on family earnings, the number of children, and the age of the youngsters. It is going to prove to be a lot simpler and fairer.

• (1800)

The child tax credit will be made up of a base amount of $1,020 per year for each child with a $75 supplement for the third and subsequent children. The base amount is increased by a further $213 per year for each child under the age of seven if child care expenses are not claimed at the time.

The basic child tax benefit amount is going to be paid in full to all families with incomes up to $25,921. The benefit will gradually be reduced for those with incomes above that particular amount.

In addition, the $500 per year income supplement for the low-income working families is to be phased-in for families earning above $3,750. This supplement is going to reach its full and maximum benefit if family earnings are $10,000 or more. It will only be reduced when the family income exceeds $20,921.

It is very important and we can debate these things when it goes to the legislative committee. Let us look at what it means to the average Canadian family.

Under the new system a single mother with an income of $30,000 and two children over the age of seven would receive $153 a month in 1991. She will be better off by about $300 per year under our new system.

A mother with three children over the age of seven and a total family income of $22,000 in 1991 will be eligible for the basic amount of $261.25 plus an earned income supplement of $32.68 per month. Basically, this means she is going to receive $293.93 a month beginning January 1, 1993 and she is going to be better off by about $400 per year.

This new system is intrinsically a lot fairer. It is not based on individual income; it is based on family income. This is what Canadians have been telling us for years. It is targeted at those who need it the most. We have taken a look at the total system and we will target those people with lower and middle incomes. The assistance will be focused on the low and the middle income.

The child tax benefit will gradually be reduced with incomes above designated thresholds. Obviously the more money earned above a threshold, the benefit will slowly be reduced.

The entire benefit is going to be paid monthly, making it easier for families to budget. It will not be taxed and it will not be recouped at the year end. The benefit will be paid to the parent who needs it the most and it is a fundamental design of redoing the tax system.

I am not suggesting for one minute we are backing away from universality. What we have done here is become very fiscally responsible while being socially responsible. It is a new system which is more generous. It is $2.1 billion more generous than the current system over a five-year period.

The government has committed these new funds to assist families and it is going to assist over 2.4 million families. They are all going to have their benefits increased.

Some 2.4 million families are going to receive more benefits. Over two-thirds of those particular families have incomes under $50,000. No family below $50,000 is going to lose benefits.

Mr. Milliken: There is a whole bunch that won't get anything.

Mrs. Sparrow: The bill before us today underscores our commitment. The member for Kingston and the Islands does not seem to realize that some people at $50,000 a year with youngsters do need benefits, absolutely.

This is why out of the 2.4 million people whom we are helping with increased benefits nobody under $50,000 a year is going to lose. That is very important. The economic and fiscal statement starting in 1984 accompanying the agenda for economic renewal have been our key policies throughout the past five, six, seven, eight years.

The child and the elderly benefit consultations paper profiled a number of options for child benefits and it encouraged public participation. That is what we have taken into account, the public consideration.

In 1985, as I said, we had the parliamentary standing committee on health and welfare. We had another one that reported in December just past with regard to the social conditions and the poverty under which some youngsters in Canada and indeed some lower income families are living. We have taken into consideration all the recommendations that have been put forth.

We have to invest in our future, as my colleague from Saskatchewan mentioned. Children are our future. Day after day we see areas throughout Canada that need attention. I support many of my colleagues with regard to the need to attack poverty. It is very important.

The end result of an extensive review over the past five or six years and consolidation of the particular programs that we are putting into Bill C-80 today are of utmost importance to all Canadians. Once people see the system they will greatly appreciate it.

I thank the staff of both departments in charge of the implementation of the new program. We are working with finance as well as with health and welfare. It has been a monumental task that will be implemented only if this House along with the other House approves. It is going to mean the switching of some 3.7 million files in health and welfare for the new program.

The member mentioned that copies of the white paper had not been sent out. It was my colleague from Winnipeg who spoke earlier. I really want to assure him that information has gone out all across Canada dealing with this specific policy. In no way would we be implementing something that we did not have agreement on.

Poverty is a major issue. I know everyone in the House has heard the hon. minister address that specific issue. None of us should rest while there is one youngster living in poverty. We have also addressed the fiscal constraints we are living under. We have hard choices to make: to spend more money we could raise taxes, increase the deficit or cut other programs.

The Minister of Finance, as he so carefully worded it in his budget in February, made it extremely clear that it was through cuts in certain areas, in program expenditures, that he was able to recoup the $2.1 billion to put into this new child benefit package.

We have not increased the deficit for this. We have not increased taxes. Indeed what we have increased are the benefits to youngsters and we can all commend the Minister of Finance.

• (1810)

Some of us are well aware of the problems under the old system. There were delays in receiving the refundable child tax credit. Often families could not gain from any child tax benefit for a year. It was very inconvenient. Each benefit was delivered in an entirely different way, which meant that there were eligibility criteria for every particular program. This made it very difficult.

For the eight years I have been here—I am sure, Madam Speaker, you are well aware of this too—we have been told that there are certain higher income people who do not perhaps need the family allowance as much as the lower income people. We had inadequate targeting under the old system.

I look forward to working with my colleagues on all sides of the House at the legislative committee. I am sure there are some areas of the bill we can improve, but I am in support of Bill C-80.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being 6.11 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 45(6), the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division at second reading stage of Bill C-289, an act to provide that Remembrance Day be included as a holiday in Public Service collective agreements.

PETITIONS

PORT OF CHURCHILL

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I have a petition signed by a number of Canadians from Churchill, Colonsay, Meacham, Viscount, Saskatoon, Ridgedale, Tisdale, Central Butte, Riverhurst, Lake Lenore, Tisdale and Richmond, B.C.

The petitioners support the use of the port of Churchill and basically urge the federal government to maximize the uses of the port with at least 3 per cent of Canada's annual grain shipments being shipped through the port of Churchill and to act immediately to maintain further development and promote the port to handle export in addition to grain.

While I have the floor, I should point out there is no grain committed to the port of Churchill at this time. It is time the federal government acted on this very important issue.

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–81, an act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I would like to advise the House that it is my duty to report with respect to certain amendments that have been introduced relating to Bill C–81.

I also want to point out that a great number of these amendments came in yesterday. The table officers worked till early this morning. There has not been sufficient time for consultation which I regret but which I know hon. members will understand. I understand that there may be some comments after my ruling from the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands and I will hear those.

While that breaks from the usual practice, I think under the circumstances it is appropriate.

I am going to read the entire ruling. Then I will hear the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

There are 64 notices of motions standing on the Notice Paper for the report stage on Bill C-81, an act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada.

(a) An affirmative vote on Motion No. 13 will obviate the need to vote on Motion No. 14.

(c) An affirmative vote on Motion No. 16 obviates the necessity for a vote on Motions Nos. 15 and 17.

Motion No. 26 standing in the name of the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader does not appear to affect any changes to the bill. As a consequence, it will not be selected.

Motion No. 27 standing in the name of the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader will be debated and voted upon separately.

Motions Nos. 28, 29, 31, 32, 33 and 34, standing in the names of the hon. members for Annapolis Valley—Hants, Yorkton—Melville, Churchill, Jonquière and Papineau—Saint-Michel, cause the Chair some procedural difficulty. These motions appear to be going beyond the scope of the bill in dealing with the effect rather than the process of referendums. In my view these proposals exceed the principle established when the House gave second reading to the bill. In addition, Motions Nos. 32 and 34 were ruled out of order in the legislative committee which studied the bill. Regrettably, I must rule these motions out of order in accordance with Beauchesne's citation 698(1).

[English]

Motion No. 39 standing in the name of the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader will be debated and voted upon separately.

Motion No. 40 standing in the name of the hon. member for Churchill appears to infringe the royal recommendation in that it calls upon the government to expend public funds in order to assist the various committees. In this regard, I must rule the motion inadmissible, as it contravenes Beauchesne's citation 698(7).

Motion No. 52 standing in the name of the hon. member for Churchill will be debated and voted upon separately.

Motion No. 64, standing in the name of the hon. member for Churchill will be debated and voted upon separately.

What I would usually do, and I am addressing my remarks to the House and of course the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, is propose Motion No. 1 to the House. I do so subject to hearing the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. If necessary I may reserve after argument and at that stage I would propose again that debate proceed on Motion No. 1 which should give the Chair a fair chance to give consideration to the remarks of the hon. member.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, of course I am interested in Your Honour's ruling. I can see that Your Honour spent some time on this, or at least Your Honour's assistants spent a great deal of time on it.

I noticed the usual summary was not read at the end. I can understand why. I do not think it could have been much shorter than the ruling itself.

Notwithstanding that, I wanted to comment, Sir, on the ruling, and specifically Motion No. 34, standing in the name of the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel and the other similar motions concerning the effect of the referendum.

I realize that this motion was ruled out of order in committee and that that in itself might constitute grounds for Your Honour to rule it out of order here in the House, but I submit that the question of the effect of the referendum is fundamental to the consideration of this bill and it is one that needs to be addressed by this House and decided in this House.

The principal reason why the government has introduced this bill, and this reason has been the subject of debate both publicly and in this House over the last two or three years, was because of the failure of the Meech Lake Accord to allow for participation by Canadians in the writing of their own Constitution. The government engaged in a very extensive public relations program to involve Canadians in this process, starting with a royal commission, followed by extensive parliamentary hearings across the country on two occasions and has sought to involve Canadians in this process.

The purpose of this bill is to involve Canadians in the reform process and I note that the bill is entitled "an act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada". I refer Your Honour to The Concise Oxford English Dictionary and its definition of the word "referendum". It is defined as:

> —referring of political question to electorate for direct decision by general vote; vote thus taken.

In other words the purpose of a referendum, what a referendum is by definition, is a decision by the electorate on a question referred to the electorate. That is what a referendum is. This bill establishes a referendum procedure according to the title of the bill. Yet in substance there is no binding effect to the vote that is taken by a referendum held under this bill.

The amendments seek to give some binding effect, however limited—and I submit it is quite limited, but it is there—to the vote of the people in the referendum. It is a fundamental principle of a referendum that if you have one you are then bound by the result. It is a decision by the people, not a decision by somebody else. It is not for someone to interpret that decision and then make another decision. The decision is made by the people in the referendum.

What Motion No. 34, standing in the name of the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel, says is that during the life of this Parliament, the Senate or the House of Commons shall not adopt any resolution authorizing a change in the Constitution where the amendment would be directly or indirectly contrary to the opinion expressed in this referendum by a majority of voters in Canada and in certain regions too. It deals with the majority vote of all Canadians.

It was suggested by the chairman of the committee, when he made a ruling on this issue in committee, that this imported some new notion on referendums into the bill. The argument was somehow made by the chairman in a way that frankly I could not understand that this made a change in the Canada Elections Act.

The referendum bill itself makes changes in the Canada Elections Act. It overrides it in certain particulars and it incorporates it by reference where it is silent on issues. The referendum is to be conducted in accordance with the practices set out in the Canada Elections Act. Clause 2(2) of the bill is the one that does it. It states:

> Unless a contrary intention appears, words and expressions used in this Act have the same meaning as in the Canada Elections Act.

There are other references in the bill that incorporate provisions of the Canada Elections Act.

With great respect, this amendment does not change in any way the effect of the Canada Elections Act. What will happen in this case is that results will be reported from the referendum vote on a constituency by constituency basis. The only reason that is being done is because the Canada Elections Act calls for reports on that basis and that is fine. In addition, there will be some additions made of those results on a constituency by constituency basis to provide for regional results to be released based on provincial results. I submit that it is done now anyway.

We frequently see in the press the tabulated results of the election added up to show the percentage of the vote obtained by each party on a national basis and on a provincial basis. Sometimes we see it even on a regional basis. Certainly we see it frequently on a provincial and national basis.

This is not a case of changing the reporting mechanism. This is a case of changing the application of the results by adding them up and putting them out in a different tabulation. However they will still be reported on a constituency by constituency basis for what that is worth.

The motion is not intended to alter the way in which the referendum will be conducted. It simply means that when a referendum has been held, when the people of Canada have expressed their will and pleasure with respect to the question put to them, the answer to that question will bind this government.

It will prevent it from proceeding with the resolution during this Parliament to change the Constitution in a way that is contrary to the expressed wishes of the people. It does not force the government to do anything, it forces it to refrain from doing certain things. It does not make the referendum totally binding but it does place some stricture on the government's freedom to act, depending on the answer given to the question that is put to the people.

That is the expressed title of the bill. That is what the government says in the title of the bill it has set out to do. It shows the word referendum. It was not the case of the government not using the other word. If it is a consultative process, the word is plebiscite. It could have used that word in the title but it chose to use referendum.

Apparently there is some problem in moving an amendment to this bill which makes this into something close to a referendum. I do not understand the problem. To me it is a fundamental issue. It has been a major public issue in Canada for a long time. It needs to be debated on the floor of this House.

The chairman of the committee in making his decision after some objections from some of the members of the committee said: "Mr. Ouellet, I can appreciate the political importance of this. It is a question that probably should be decided in the House".

I quite agree with the chairman of the committee. I submit that this amendment is very important. It allows for a debate on an issue that needs to be decided here. If it is ruled out of order and cannot be even discussed, then I think we have missed the most important aspect of what this bill was intended to do and that is to provide the people of Canada with a direct voice in the establishment of their new Constitution.

The whole question is optional. The bill only permits a referendum to be held. I submit that the question of the effect of the referendum, once held, is vital to the bill. It is fundamental to the bill. The title brings it in. The first clause brings in that vital importance. If we cannot move amendments that give teeth to that importance, that gives strength to the expressed intention of the government in using the word referendum, then I submit that the debate on the bill lacks substance, lacks importance and fails to deal with the cardinal issue that the people expect to be able to deal with if the question is put to them. That is, their votes will count for something instead of being another public opinion poll.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I listened with care to the comments of my hon. friend. I know it is going to be a very interesting day if this is the beginning of it.

Before responding, I take the liberty, Mr. Speaker, to express my thanks to you and the table officers who laboured through the night to group these amendments and to rule on them. It is one of the more complex chores you have had to face and I appreciate what has been done.

My friend from Kingston and the Islands makes several points, the first of which, of course, relates to the dictionary definition of referendum. I am sure we will hear from others of a more scholarly bent on that subject as the debate progresses.

Very briefly, Sir, the word referendum has become common usage in Canada for a non-binding vote. That may not be precisely correct as to dictionary definition but it has become an acceptable part of our practice.

The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands referred as well to the regional implications of this particular Motion No. 34 that is before us for discussion. The issue before us is twofold: First, whether or not it is appropriate to bind the interpretation of the results of the referendum; and second, if that is the case, whether it is appropriate to group them according to regions.

With reference to the first point, it is true that conventional election results in this country are first tabulated poll by poll and then constituency by constituency. Thereafter, of course, they are tallied as to numbers over all throughout the country for purposes of determining who would form the government. That is the practice with a conventional election.

When we come to a referendum, there is really quite a variety of interpretations that could be put on the results, but none of them ought to, in my submission, be binding.

First of all, it is moral suasion we are looking for in terms of the result of any referendum. It is to guide those who must amend the Constitution of the country. Under the Constitution, of course, it is up to this House and the other place and the legislatures of the 10 provinces to pronounce themselves on any constitutional amendments. That is the way the Constitution is written and that is the way it will be until it is appropriately amended, if it ever is, in section 41 and the other amending sections.

The basic thrust of this motion would be to have the results interpreted as to the various regions of the country, being the Atlantic region or the provinces of Ontario and Quebec as individual regions and western and northern Canada as a further region. This sort of interpretation, I gather, flows out of the original concept of the make-up of the Senate but bears no relevancy to the interpretation of a referendum result. It is true that it was recommended by the committee which I had the privilege of co-chairing, but within hours that recommendation was torn to shreds by at least two provinces of our country and, therefore, is a non-starter.

In conclusion, I would just simply say that what this bill is designed to do is to provide some guidance to this House, to the government and to the Senate as to what changes are acceptable to the Canadian people. It can be interpreted in a variety of ways. I submit, Sir, no legislation should hamper the interpretation of the result.

• (1040)

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I too wish to rise on the interpretation. I recognize the hard work that you, the clerks and others have done on this. I have two concerns.

The first one is with regard to Motion No. 31, standing in my name, which has been ruled out of order in that it goes beyond the scope of the bill. One of the concerns I have with regard to Motion No. 31 is that it does not bind the government. We are not, in this motion, binding the government. What we are giving is a clause explaining how the government would interpret the results of the referendum vote. In interpreting the results, it would have to look at the results nation-wide. It would have to look at them in each of the regions of Canada. It would also have to consider the vote by aboriginal Canadians. There is a reason for that.

Again, I want to stress the fact that we are not, in Motion No. 31, saying that it would be binding upon the government. What we are saying is that this is how it interprets it. What we were told in the press release and in the statements by the government that accompanied the original introduction of this bill was that some time during the process the Prime Minister would tell us how he was going to interpret the results. I do not think that is good enough for Canadians. They have a right to know what the rules of the game are. What better place to set the rules than the House of Commons itself as part of the legislation from day one.

It is very important that no region feel left out. I, along with a number of members of this House, come from western Canada. I think a referendum which passed in other parts of Canada but was defeated in the west would create a very strong regional antagonism within this country. The same thing would be true if Atlantic Canada were the only region of the country that voted against a referendum, or the province of Quebec, or Ontario.

As I mentioned earlier, we have also included aboriginal Canadians because a lot of the clauses will deal with aboriginal Canadians. In fact, because the nature of this bill now is such that it is open-ended, it could be used for any number of referendums in the future. We could have a referendum which was solely on the topic of aboriginal rights, aboriginal self-government and there would be no tally of how the aboriginal Canadians in this country voted.

I would argue that this clause should be allowed to remain in effect. I would also like to remind this House of what the government House leader said and that is that he would allow amendments that went beyond the normal scope of the bill.

Mr. Edwards: If agreed upon.

Mr. Murphy: If agreed upon, that is true and that is exactly what we need now.

Mr. Milliken: If Harvie says yes.

Mr. Murphy: Is the government going to honour the word of the government House leader? Is he going to allow us to even present a motion to see if it is agreed upon?

There were members of this House who allowed this bill to go to committee on the basis of what the government House leader said, on the belief that there would be a number of clauses that could be addressed later on.

Mr. Lapierre: You were naive.

Mr. Murphy: Somebody said they were naive. That is a value judgment. There were members in this House who believed the government House leader when he said that when this bill went to committee and when it was dealt with at other stages that amendments would be allowed that went beyond the scope of the bill. This is one of those amendments that, strictly speaking, goes beyond the scope of the bill, but I think it is integral to the whole purpose of the bill.

Mr. Speaker, if you were to still rule that this was beyond the scope, I would then ask unanimous consent to have this motion called.

With regard to Motion No. 40, standing in my name as well, which calls for the government to establish funds to help those groups in Canada that do not have their own funding in order that they can participate in a referendum, I would make very similar arguments.

Unfortunately, one of the things this bill does is it lets money rule. If you have the money, you can spend up to $10 million and if that is not enough, you can form another group and it can spend another $10 million. If that is not enough—

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member for Churchill. I am listening very carefully to what he has to say and I will hear a few more members of course. I also ask the hon. member for Churchill to complete his remarks in an appropriate way.

I do want to caution members about getting beyond the procedural position that I have to determine, getting into substantive debate on the principle of the bill or other principles that may of course be of great importance to members or to the House.

I am bound to make a procedural decision, and I know the hon. member for Churchill would want to assist me in that.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I do not challenge your ruling and that is one of the difficulties.

I again refer to the government House leader's remarks. I will ask for unanimous consent later on for Motion No. 40 to be allowed to stand.

What I was trying to point out is that if we are going to set up a referendum system, especially with the very exorbitant limits that exist under this bill, certainly those groups, natives, women and others not having independent sources of funds should be able to receive some government funding. It will not necessarily be a large amount, but there should be some government funding so that they can have their input in a public debate.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief because, quite frankly, I want to associate myself almost entirely with the remarks of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, and in part with the initial remarks of the hon. member for Churchill. Therefore, I do not have to repeat everything.

I appreciate the Speaker's problem. I certainly also want to add my thanks to that of the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader and to compliment the staff in the Speaker's office and yourself, Your Honour, in getting these 64 amendments before us in some sort of order, along with all the problems presented in trying to rationalize some of these difficult points.

I am not going to get into the merits of the issue involved but rather look right at your ruling, Mr. Speaker. In mentioning the difficulty you had with Motions Nos. 28, 29, 31, 32, 33 and 34, quoting from your ruling, you felt that it was dealing with the effect rather than the process. As the member for Kingston and the Islands mentioned, there is absolutely nothing in those amendments that affect the process of taking the referendum.

I go back to the bill and clause 3 which sets out very clearly that "where the Governor in Council considers that it is in the public interest to obtain by means of a referendum". I am not going to get into the semantics of referendum or plebiscite, but the bill is a referendum. Other people will be speaking about it and there is an amendment on the floor by the hon. member for Etobicoke about changing the whole name of the bill from referendum to plebiscite which will be debated.

That is fine, but just clause 3 itself. As a parliamentarian with years of experience, some of us who have seen the fundamental clauses—clause 3 is the fundamental clause—what does that say? That says that "where there is a matter of public interest, the referendum is going to obtain the opinion of electors". It goes on: "and direct that the opinion of electors be obtained by putting the question to the electors of Canada or one or more provinces".

All the amendments questioned in that paragraph of your ruling do is in effect the reflection of the opinion of electors. In effect, clause 3 does not restrict how that opinion is to be tallied; it is open-ended. I submit, as others have submitted, the fact that the amendments we are discussing here on this point segregate the tally. It has not affected a thing with taking the vote, but it segregates the result. It is not of such injury to the fundamental principle of the bill that it should be a rule.

In the straight parliamentary sense, as the member for Kingston and the Islands says, this is a fundamental question of the whole process. Surely if the government does not like the segregation of the votes on clause 3, the opinion of the electors, if it does not like to segregate them by province or in the nature of the aboriginal Canadians, then the government very well will turn the amendment down and vote for the bill as is presently tabled in the House. That is the whole nature of the debate.

To preclude that fundamental issue for debate by a procedural ruling, which your Honour has the grace and humility to admit causes you some procedural difficulty, flies in the face of the whole reason why we are here, with respect, Mr. Speaker.

Let us have the debate on all the issues here. Certainly one of the fundamental issues, whether you call it a plebiscite or referendum or opinion poll, is you have a bill trying to get the opinion of the electors of Canada. Certainly if you get the opinion of the electors of Canada, it is a very legitimate question for this Parliament to decide should it be an opinion that binds or restricts some action of the government, or should it just be like a polling result. That is legitimate. Obviously members of Parliament should be entitled to decide.

I must say, since my amendment also shares the same extension as some others that you have called into question, of including the aboriginal Canadians as an aggregate, you could have—and there is nothing in this bill to prevent it, as the hon. member for Churchill pointed out—a specific and, quite frankly, I think a very legitimate question. Not getting into the other questions that are going to be decided here tonight, I think a very legitimate question is whether we should even have a Senate. Let us leave that for the moment. Let us talk about the aboriginal Canadians. There is a very legitimate question that Canadians have not decided.

Perhaps some of the political leaders in the closed isolation of conference halls from coast to coast have recommended in principle, with no legal language, in effect what the inherent right of self-government means. That is a very legitimate question by itself. How would we dare have that if, in effect, the tally of the aboriginal Canadians who were so directly involved were not tallied?

Mr. Speaker, I appreciate you giving me the time for this. I would submit in conclusion and summary that using, as I tried to do when I used to practise law, the very words of your opponent, and you are not the opponent, Mr. Speaker, but it is your judgment that we are having the opportunity and discretion through your courtesy to comment on today because of the complexity of the issue, in effect using your own words, you say that it is dealing with the effect rather than the process.

I submit to you in the strongest terms that there is not one item of process affected in the amendments that you have challenged. Certainly if there was ever a reason to have the question before the House, this is a very proper question. Otherwise, there is an awful lot of wasted air that is going to be expressed on this whole issue.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, you mentioned this morning in your ruling that the amendments to the referendum bill relating to the double majority had caused you some procedural difficulty. You also said that, in fact, our motions were dealing with the effect rather than the process of referendums. You pointed out that they had been ruled out of order in the legislative committee.

If I remember correctly the operating rules for legislative committees, only members of the committee can table such amendments. I for one had drafted a number of amendments to the referendum bill and advised the legislative committee that I would be tabling the said amendments. I wanted the committee to be able to review them during its proceedings. However, because I was not a member of the committee, I was denied the right to formally table these amendments. That is when a member, the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel, suggested tabling them on my behalf, which was ruled out of order.

That being said, why have a referendum act? The answer is because a constitutional impasse is likely. Why did the government go to the trouble of setting up the Beaudoin-Edwards committee on the constitutional amendment formula and the Beaudoin-Dobbie committee on the constitutional process as a whole? We are in an impasse and Quebec has not yet signed the constitutional changes brought forward by Mr. Trudeau and his government in 1982. The truth of the matter is we have been in an impasse ever since and the failure of Meech just made matters worse.

Today, our government realizes that, should we fail to agree in the next few weeks, a referendum will be held in Quebec. There is a law in Quebec which says that a referendum could be held to ask people whether or not they want to pull out of Canada.

What are our responsibilities as parliamentarians and representatives of the Government of Canada? We must make some provisions to allow us, should the first ministers fail to agree, to ask the people of Canada to decide on the future of their country. It seems to me that Canadians should have their say before some premiers, because of their attitude, let the country split apart.

It is in this context that we are debating today a referendum bill which would, ultimately, give the Prime Minister the authority to go to the people if the provincial premiers fail to agree and refuse to present a resolution to their respective legislatures. All members in this House know it is only a consultation and cannot be binding on any government. The Canadian Constitution, since 1982, is very clear on the ways to change it, and referendums are not one of them.

If we have a Referendum Act with some rules, how is it going to work, to be perfectly fair from one end of the country to the other under our democratic system? It seems to me that it is fair and appropriate to ask the Speaker and this House that we indicate how the results will be interpreted.

In our history we had some instances, like the referendums of 1898 and 1942, where things were decided against the will of a province, Quebec, which voted no in both cases, since Parliament went along with the majority. Is it wise to fail again to provide for the effect of the referendum or how it must be interpreted?

I am going to give you an example. If we do not specify it, how are we going to tabulate the results? By province? Nationally? Who is going to decide? Let us assume a provincial premier had said: "I pledge that I will abide by the democratic decision of the people of my province." What would happen if, for example, the premier of Newfoundland had said that and people in that province would vote no? I will end on that.

Mr. Speaker: I understand the strength of the hon. member's arguments, but again, I think that his intervention, which is very smart and relevant to the issue, probably does not help the Speaker to solve a procedural matter.

I certainly appreciate the hon. member's fervour, and sympathize with him to a certain extent, particularly considering the importance of this issue for all Canadians. Again, I would ask each hon. member to be a little careful, particularly during the intervention, because my ruling is about a procedural matter.

Maybe the hon. member could conclude.

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, yes, indeed, Beauchesne's citation 698(1) reads as follows:

> 698. An amendment which is out of order on any of the following grounds cannot be put from the chair:
> (1) An amendment is out of order if it is irrelevant to the bill, beyond its scope or governed by or dependent upon amendments already negatived.

In your arguments, Mr. Speaker, you mention it is beyond its scope. Indeed, a referendum bill that has only a consultative value has a lot of moral weight. It is exactly in such a context that the referendum per se is significant. It produces an impact because it sends a message from coast to coast on one particular aspect of the Constitution and of the future of our country.

• (1100)

Let me go back to that example; we could face the same impasse as we did with Meech. A national referendum without a regional majority means that, for example, if you take one province only, if a premier says he is bound by the opinion expressed by the people of that one province, Quebec's veto is out. It would be impossible to obtain simply because one province would have voted against it. I think we would be wise to learn from our past experience in order to avoid another Meech.

That was also the opinion of an all-party parliamentary committee, the Beaudoin-Edwards committee, when it said: "In our opinion, the federal authorities would be well advised to table draft referendum legislation before Parliament. Referenda would be optional. Authorities could resort to this mechanism when they deem it necessary. In our opinion, given the heterogeneous nature of the country, the draft legislation should stipulate a double majority: a national majority and a majority in each of the four regions. Referenda would not amend the Constitution of Canada and the results would carry some political but no legal weight. The results would not be binding on the two levels of government, but would constitute an eloquent message".

It is in such a context, according to me, that we must establish the rules of interpretation of the referendum since they are part of the scope of the action we are about to take, if ever there is a constitutional impasse.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a small contribution to this morning's procedural debate. Like all my colleagues, I heard your ruling. I must say it bothers me when you say: "These motions appear to be going beyond the scope of the bill in dealing with the effect rather than the process of referendums".

Mr. Speaker, I wish I could convince you these amendments go to the very core of the referendum exercise and make it possible to interprete and analyse the results. If the Canada Elections Act were to say: Elections are held but results are not discussed; it does not matter who is elected; and the results are binding on no one, you would have a problem. At this point, I believe what will not be discussed in this House is the very essence of the bill. Instead of getting down to the nitty gritty, we are going to have a debate on externals.

Obviously, talking about how enumerators are appointed has no connection with the actual scope of this bill. If there can be no debate on the significance of the results, I insist this will be a futile exercise, as futile as the attempts of the hon. member for Jonquière to argue the benefits of a double majority. I have no desire to argue the merits of the amendments. The hon. member for Jonquière should have made those points in his own caucus or mentioned them to his leader. As far as the substance of the various amendments is concerned, I believe that preventing debate on these issues means preventing the House from doing its job. Whether we are for or against amendments proposed by our colleague, the hon. member for Churchill, or other members, I think by trying to avoid this debate we will get the kind of situation we had during the conscription crisis, and God knows these walls must be haunted by the ghosts of that debate.

If we do not discuss the fundamental issue of what this exercise means or how it could interpreted, the legislation becomes meaningless. Mr. Speaker, without wishing to cast doubts upon your wisdom, which is proverbial, I know that provided there is unanimous consent, you would agree to let us discuss substantive issues.

I will argue not the merits but the general substance of these amendments and I move for unanimous consent to agree to a real debate on these fundamental issues.

[English]

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would like to join with other members who have thanked you and the officers of the House for having worked through the night to group these some 64 different amendments, bearing in mind that those are amendments that are in addition to the ones that we made last week in the legislative committee. It shows how much work is having to be done in such a short time as the result of important amendments being made to very important legislation for which we have waited quite a long time to have before the House.

So to you and others who have tried to bring order to this process, it is very helpful.

I would like to particularly direct comments to your interpretation with respect to Motions Nos. 28, 29, 31, 32, 33, and 34, all of which have to do with the effect of the referendum.

As you have explained to us, these amendments, all having essentially the same purpose, to make the results of the direct vote by the Canadian people have some consequences, give you procedural difficulty. As you state, these motions appear to be going beyond the scope of the bill in dealing with the effect rather than the process of referendums.

That of course is a problem created as the member for Kingston and the Islands, the member for Annapolis Valley—Hants, the members for Jonquière and Churchill, and others have referred to with respect to the title of this bill and the word that appears throughout, mainly referendum.

The parliamentary secretary to the government House leader in addressing you on this point, Mr. Speaker, did draw attention to the fact as he stated it that the word referendum has come into common parlance or common usage in the country to mean any kind of direct vote.

Certainly at a couple of levels, at least in a couple of provinces, that is the case. The 1948 Referendum Act of Newfoundland contained nothing in its provisions that said what the results had to be, nothing to indicate that they would be binding or they would lead to anything, in fact is a plebiscite.

Indeed the excellent statute in the province of Quebec, la Loi sur les référendums, is a model of contemporary statute on this point but it, as well, uses the word "referendum" for what in the main are non-binding votes.

It is true that term has been used in a couple of provinces, but I submit to you for your consideration on this point the fact that it has never been confused in this place. The Parliament of Canada when passing the Prohibition Plebiscite Act, 1898, clearly envisaged the process and the consequences and used the word plebiscite.

Again, when Parliament passed the Dominion Plebiscite Act, 1942, it was the practice of Parliament to call the plebiscite by its name, plebiscite.

I submit that the procedural difficulties that you find flows from the ambiguity that has resulted with the government using the word referendum in an act which in substance only talks about a plebiscite.

I am not going to anticipate now the debate that will come later on my amendment No. 3, where I propose that we in fact change the title and the terms from referendum to plebiscite throughout which would certainly bring clarity if that is all that the substance of the bill is to be—

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if I may be able to assist the hon. member and other hon. members.

I am going to hear the remainder of this intervention which is not only very interesting but is of historic significance from a member who, I think it is common knowledge in this House, has spent a great deal of time on it. One of my difficulties here is that an argument as to whether or not this should be called a referendum or a plebiscite does not help me very much. If a statute calls it a referendum, spells out what its effect is, that is the statute and that is the way it is passed that is, of course, what we would have to accept no matter whether the word is referendum or some other word.

• (1110)

That takes nothing away from the general debate as to how the word should be used, but the fact is that in the proposed law which we are debating, while the word referendum has been used it also, at least in the form as presented to the House at the moment, does tie that word with certain implications. All I am saying is that a debate on the definition of the two words does not get me very far ahead procedurally.

Mr. Boyer: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your point and I understand your dilemma. Perhaps, your attention has been somewhat taken by another member. As I was saying on this very point, in addressing it, I did not look to anticipate now in addressing your ruling, Sir, the debate that will come later when we are dealing with Motion No. 3 standing in my name.

The point I was making and I will continue to conclude with is that the dilemma of a procedural nature that you face flows from where you say: "In my view, these proposals"—I am speaking of these six amendments—"exceed the principle established when the House gave second reading to the bill". It is from that interpretation that you invoke Beauchesne's citation 698(1). I think there is ambiguity as to what principle the House established in giving second reading. The bill that is before you and before this House at the present time uses the word referendum throughout.

On two previous occasions when Parliament enacted similar legislation in this area it chose, as a matter of principle, to call it plebiscite. There is ample Canadian evidence and historic fact in legislative history to show that when Parliament is dealing with a matter like this, words do have meaning and those are the meanings of the words.

Therefore, the interpretation you have given, which effectively rules out the possibility for debate here in the House of Commons as to the consequences of a process to involve the people in constitution making and constitution amending, I would invite you to reconsider, in light of the comments made by a number of members. If we cannot have this issue clearly addressed here on the floor of the House of Commons and resolved here, then where and when will it be resolved?

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I would like to raise another amendment you have ruled on and which I did not have a chance to deal with earlier. It is my Motion No. 19. In your ruling you indicated it had been dealt with by the committee.

I will read my motion and I will also read the issue that was dealt with by the committee that I believe was substantially different and, therefore, my Motion No. 19 should be allowed to stand.

Motion No. 19 says it must be passed by an affirmative vote of 60 per cent of the members of the House, with or without amendments.

The motion that was defeated by the government in committee said: "Sixty per cent of the members of the House present and voting". My motion deliberately setting out a criteria which called for 60 per cent of the total membership of the House to vote for a referendum question, believing as I do that a referendum question should have the support of more than one political party in this House and there should be substantial support for that resolution before it is sent to the people of Canada. Therefore, I made the deliberate decision to make it 60 per cent of the total members of the House, not the motion that was defeated in committee which was 60 per cent of those who happened to be there when the vote takes place.

Mr. Speaker: I want to thank all hon. members for their courtesy this morning in the interventions that they have made. Also, I ask the House's co-operation on future matters. Keep in mind that, as much as possible because of our consultative approaches, and trying to avoid having to argue these matters—I use the word argue in the best sense of that word—subsequent to the Speaker, the Chair is having to put the ruling to the House.

However, these matters in this particular case are, as I said at the beginning, brought to bear on us because of a great number of amendments that came in at the last minute. We did the best we could with them. I have indicated to the House that I shall take into account what has been presented to the Chair over the last hour and report back to the House as soon as possible.

I might say to the hon. member for Churchill that I will look particularly at the last point that he raised. I will think with great care on the first point that he raised as well.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I know there has been some extensive debate with regard to the procedural arguments of some of the amendments which did come in late last night and there was not an opportunity for consultations. I do not wish to be long in my intervention, but concerning Motion No. 34 by my colleague, Mr. Ouellet, in terms of the effect of a referendum, I realize there had been some discussion at the committee stage with regard to this kind of amendment. I believe that there has been, and I stand to be corrected, a tradition and an understanding within this House that even if the amendment were defeated in committee or ruled out of order based on procedural grounds, the Chair could allow this amendment to go forward and to be adjudicated by the members after having a reasonable debate within the House if it were found to be of an exceptional significance.

The regional majorities, as contained in that particular motion, are of exceptional significance and ought to have the opportunity to be debated and to be heard by all members from whatever political stripe, regardless of their political allegiance to party or to non-party.

It is my understanding that Motion No. 34 is very germane to this debate on allowing the Government of Canada the power to have a referendum in order to consult with the people of Canada. It would be a grave mistake on the part of the Chair if members of this House were not given a full opportunity in the debate to discuss the contents of that particular motion which we believe, both at this time as well as in subsequent years, could play a major role in constitutional renewal and, more important, in uniting Canadians under a federal system.

I thank the Chair for giving me this opportunity late in the morning to intervene on Motion No. 34. I would hope that the Chair would give this serious consideration in view of the exceptional significance that members in this House would associate with the regional majorities as contained in Motion No. 34.

Mr. Speaker: We have been at this for a long time and given the circumstances members would probably agree that the Chair has been generous. I am going to reserve on these matters raised and I will try to come back to the House as soon as possible.

In the meantime I will propose Motion No. 1 to the House and I will make every effort to get back to be of assistance to members, taking into account the usual exigencies of debate.

• (1120)

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, on a very short point of order. Several times it has been mentioned that these amendments came in in the last few minutes. All I am going to do is point out, as a point of order for the record, that they came in in the last few minutes and we all had to work overtime because of the invocation of that interesting rule 53(1) which cut off the normal time for preparing it.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member raises an interesting point. However, the rule was applied and the House did decide.

I do ask the indulgence of the House to allow me to retire and reserve and come back to the House as soon as I can.

[Translation]

Mr. Plamondon: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, nothing prevents me from turning to you since you are now replacing the Speaker. In view of the fact that the Speaker is reflecting on the amendments or suggestions made by hon. members about the different amendments that we could consider, could we obtain the consent of the House to await his answer so that we could debate this legislation knowing that we are speaking on the substance of the bill, not just on some procedural items? That is the point my hon. colleague from Shefford was raising a moment ago. That would have a major impact on the arguments we would like to bring forward in this rather important debate.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Speaker has listened carefully, as you would surely agree, to all the arguments expressed by hon. members concerning certain clauses of the bill. He has decided that nothing prevents the House from debating other clauses at this point and suggested that we propose Motion No. 1 to the House, which I will call immediately.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill) moved:

Motion No. 1.

That Bill C-81 be amended by deleting the title and substituting the following therefor:

"An act to provide for a referendum on the Constitution of Canada".

He said: Madam Speaker, I raise this motion right off the top because it speaks to the concern many Canadians have with the bill.

Originally the government came up with the idea of having a bill that would allow for referendums over a three-year period. Later on, when this matter went to committee, it was further amended to say that at the end of three years a committee of the House and perhaps of the Senate would look at this matter and decide if we are going to have referendums from then on.

A lot of people have been convinced that we need a referendum on this particular constitutional situation that we find ourselves in at the present time. A lot of people believe that across this country. One of the reasons that we have this legislation going through the House and through committee stage with a fair amount of haste is that people believe this legislation must be in place in case we have a referendum or a plebiscite, whatever we decide to call it at the end of the day, in order to deal with the constitutional situation we face at this time.

I can agree with those sentiments, that we do need legislation in case a referendum is to take place. I do not see why in this legislation, which is being rushed through and pre-empts the work of the Special Committee on Electoral Reform, should have a long life. Why should we say this legislation should be in place three years, six years, eight years, nine years ten years down the road?

If we need legislation to enable the Government of Canada and the Parliament of Canada to authorize the legislation this fall, let us pass legislation that does just that. Do not bind us for the next three, eight, nine ten years. The member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore has a private member's bill calling for enabling legislation for the purposes of referendums and plebiscites.

That is the way we should go. We should have actual legislation establishing referendums and plebiscites if that is what the House decides. To use a piece of legislation which was introduced to deal with one specific situation and make it wide open for the future is unfair.

Spending limits, which are being addressed in this bill, are being done quickly on the assumption that we have to have something that is charter proof in case we have a referendum this fall. Why should we pass legislation now that says these same rules and regulations will be in effect for the next three, four, five or who knows how many years in the future?

That is my concern. If we want legislation authorizing a referendum, that is what this legislation should do. Do not make it wide open. Do not use this as a back-door approach to allow all sorts of other constitutional referendums in the future. I would think that we are going against the whole idea of setting up a special committee to look at electoral reform if we do that.

We are saying that this House has to rush the legislation in because of something that we have to do for this fall, and at the same time we are saying that legislation will stay in place potentially forever and a day.

If the government really wants legislation and really wants rules that are there for this fall's legislation, this fall's potential referendum, that is what the legislation should do. That is not what is happening at the present time.

I fear that what the House passes in haste now will come back to haunt us two or three years down the road. We do not know what type of constitutional issues will be facing us two or three years down the road. We do not know what the government of the day may decide to take to the people in order to have a constitutional amendment.

We do know that the government in its wisdom or lack thereof set up these rules for this referendum. If it wants to set up rules for future referendums, that should be a different piece of legislation and it should act accordingly.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I am in sympathy with the gist of what the member for Churchill has said regarding the importance of having on the statute books of the country in general enabling legislation for direct voting, just as seven of the provinces have.

His amendment here is focusing on the fact that he wants to see this simply for a one-time vote and not be kind of an uncertain, open possibility for succession of direct votes on constitutional amendments.

With respect to the last part of the member's comments to the House, I would invite his reconsideration of section 40 of the bill as it now reads. Following the amendments we made last week in legislative committee, which say this act comes into force and shall be reviewed and reported on, any recommended changes in the act by a committee of the House are designated for that purpose within three years from the act's coming into force.

It would be helpful for the members considering the remarks he has made to keep in mind that we now have created by the wording of section 40 the distinct reality that there will be, following a national plebiscite on the constitution, a parliamentary committee that will be struck to review the exercise and to make recommendations back here as to how and to what extent and what nature of changes ought to be made in the bill and in the act to make it perhaps the permanent legislation that he and I both have spoken in favour of.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I am very surprised that the hon. member for Churchill has moved this amendment.

I am surprised in one sense and, having witnessed the proceedings in the committee, I should not be. I thought the New Democratic Party would support referendums in principle and agree that referendums are very useful as means of consulting the people and giving the people an effective voice.

• (1130)

The public discussion that has taken place in Canada in the last period of time has focused on the need for the public to be directly involved in constitutional decision making.

We have had lots of consultation. Members of the New Democratic Party have served with our members and with members on the other side on parliamentary committees that have consulted extensively with Canadians. My over-all impression of the result of that consultation has been that Canadians say they want more voice in this.

We have announced that a referendum is a way to consult and allow Canadians a direct voice in decision making. We are prepared to push that as a means of ensuring that Canadians have a voice. We feel it is important that this be allowed for.

I do not know why the hon. member for Churchill would seek to restrict this procedure to a one time event. Perhaps the situation is that some members of Parliament are very distrustful of the general public and its ability to make rational decisions. I do not share that view. Members of this party generally do not share that view. We think there are issues the public is fully competent to make decisions on, major constitutional changes being one of them.

This bill does not require a referendum to be held. It is merely a machinery for one to be held if the government decides to proceed with a referendum. That is one of the criticisms we have made of this bill. One of the amendments we sought to introduce in committee was to force a referendum on this issue and that was defeated. That is one of the problems we face. We think it should be addressed in this bill, not something that is set up as a one time thing and then thrown out the window.

I hope the hon. member would reconsider his position. I hope members who are distrustful of the public and its ability to make intelligent and capable decisions would get over this mistrust and allow for this procedure to operate. It could be very effective. It allows for the participation the public is demanding in the Constitution amending process.

With regret I feel that I cannot support this amendment.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Madam Speaker, I too have concerns with the amendment, although when I first saw the bill I shared some of the views of the hon. member for Churchill.

Upon reflection and as the constitutional conferences have moved down to the stalemate they are presently in, I do see merit in the government having the machinery, as the member for Kingston and the Islands has said, to have a referendum process and maybe several referenda and/or single questions.

Without repeating everything that has already been said on setting up this whole machine, we know how difficult it is to get any bill through this House, especially a bill that touches so closely the very core of the country as a Constitution and a referendum or a plebiscite that is going to give an expression on the Constitution.

There is wisdom as a potential, as a piece of machinery that the government will have if the present stalemate is not resolved and a consensus comes up in a full-blown package from sea to sea. At the present time the odds on that are quite long. There will have to be decisions made.

I for one, as I have already expressed here yesterday on a procedural point, feel that the Canadian people can accept these questions. They all have been saturated with the issues for months now. The constitutional cavalcade has now come to a grinding halt. We are coming out of the conference rooms. It is time to let the people into the decision making.

I can see this bill giving potential power to the government to clarify some of the stumbling blocks that are perhaps presently preventing a consensus. Certainly a referendum on the very fact if we want a Senate and the very questionable referendum on if we want an undefined inherent right to aboriginal self-government are two things which we could not do with the amendment of my hon. friend for Churchill. It would be too restrictive. It would certainly be a waste of taxpayers' money to go through this procedure to set it up on one occasion and perhaps not have it there for other issues that might have to be resolved.

I too could not support this amendment.

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Madam Speaker, I understand the purpose of the hon. member who moved this motion when he explains that he would like to restrict the title of the bill to a single application or use. This bill is so unacceptable and the rules for public consultation that go with it are so undemocratic that it should be used at most only once and then erased from the statute books of the Parliament of Canada.

In fact, I do not think that the hon. member's purpose can be achieved through his motion, since in any case, this bill cannot be legitimized just by changing the title. Changing the name will not change the unfairness and total unacceptability of this bill, which is illegitimate both in its principle and in its rules of operation. The principle of it is illegitimate for Quebec, of course. Many people do not know that for the past two years, a very broad movement has swept Quebec so that Quebecers can decide on the real issue which is at the heart of the political situation. The real issue which explains the political crisis that Canada is going through and is at its root is whether Quebec will be sovereign or not. That is the real question. People are trying to avoid it in all sorts of ways. Changing the title of a bill or restricting it to a single exercise will not hide reality.

The reality is that Quebec has determined, socially, politically and even judicially, to make a decision next October on its future sovereignty. The Quebec National Assembly even passed a law to this effect, which obliges the government to hold a referendum. Things are not going in a way that suggests that the Government of Quebec and Quebecers wanted to dodge the issue and avoid the deadline, as if they did not want to face reality and make a decision. On the contrary, everyone in Quebec is preparing for this referendum, which will be held under a Quebec law that has already existed for a dozen years. Bill 150, which the Quebec National Assembly passed in June 1991, requires holding the referendum soon.

It is obvious that this bill is meant to short-circuit the political decision that Quebec wants to make and substitute for the democratic rules of the Quebec Referendum Act totally unacceptable rules which are odious in many respects and which many members here, including government members, have denounced. Of course changing the title does nothing about that, especially since it would be strange to say using it only once is less serious than keeping it in the statutes of the Canadian Parliament, since it is to be used only once. What is it to be used for that one and only time? It is to be used to decide the future of Canada and the future of Quebec, as though that were not important, as though using this iniquitous, unacceptable law were futile and insignificant because it is for something as minor, trifling and unimportant as the future of a western country deciding Quebec's future.

I submit this motion has no real significance and does not alter the very basis of the discussion that we are to have today. As far as we are concerned, of course we will vote against it.

[English]

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Speaker, I am looking at the title and the motion that has been brought forward, Motion No. 1, to change the title.

As far as I am concerned whether we have one referendum or many referendums it is a question of whether they are binding or not binding in the first place. Bill C-81 does not bind the Government of Canada. Therefore it is a motion that I cannot support.

On the other hand, I have been listening to the member for Lac-Saint-Jean and I agree with him that it is a fundamental problem. We have provinces that have referendum legislation. It has to be dealt with in that respect. The provinces have to decide what is good for them. Therefore from my point of view this bill is not good enough for Canada and it is not good enough for the provinces.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Madam Speaker, after having listened to the arguments of the member for Churchill, I have strong reservations about his amendment. Essentially, his argument is that this legislation is unfair, sometimes antidemocratic and we should not keep it. Let us do a job once, since we are dealing with the issue of Quebec and the Constitution, but after that, let us make sure that it disappears from the Canadian political scene.

• (1140)

In other words, the House is told to do a dirty job quickly and then forget about it as soon as possible. Consequently, I find the member's argument to be very very dangerous, especially when we are discussing a bill that would have consequences, at least political ones, on the fundamental law of the land, that is the Constitution.

If there is one element with which we have to be very cautious, vigilant and democratic, it is precisely the fundamental law of the land. Just think, any country could make small violations of the democratic principle regarding its Constitution and then claim to act fairly regarding everything else. In fact, we are fundamentally undermining the credibility of the process.

As regards the other aspect, I believe that the member for Churchill should instead have proposed an amendment to change the name of this act and call it the Prime Minister's lifeline, or something similar. This would have been a much more appropriate title, because his proposal to call this legislation an act to provide for a referendum on the Constitution of Canada could, in my opinion, mislead Canadians. In fact, we all know that this referendum act has nothing to do with the Canadian Constitution.

We are all bound by the Constitution which provides that the only way that the Canadian Constitution can be amended is through resolutions before the legislated bodies. There is no other way. To make Canadians believe they are the ones who will amend the Constitution through a referendum is just a smoke screen.

Therefore, the foundation of this whole process is undermined because we know that it is strictly a futile political exercise from a constitutional point of view. More importantly it is a political rescue attempt for those who will want to use it and wrap themselves in the Canadian flag.

We should call a spade a spade. I sincerely regret we did not have more time to propose amendments, given the offhand manner used by the government to put an end to procedures. It is obvious that we could have proposed an amendment to rename the legislation an act to rescue the Prime Minister I believe this title would have been more appropriate and more eloquent.

Needless to say that when the member for Churchill asks us to support his amendment, he is not the least worried about the fact that this legislation has but one objective, namely to bypass the provincial premiers. It is fundamental in a federation such as ours; it is fundamental when you think about the initial agreement of this federation. This Parliament is the result of an agreement signed by two nations. Now the government wants to replace the agreement reached by those two nations with a kind of tyrannical power of the majority.

I am convinced our fathers never thought that one day this agreement between two nations, which was signed in good faith, would be replaced by a process such as this one. It is obvious the notion of equality for the various groups was very much in the mind of those who shaped our Constitution. It is obviously not acceptable to now try to replace the clauses of this fundamental agreement by a phony referendum act.

I could also have suggested another title, which might be even more appropriate. That is an act on the big opinion poll. If you listen to the government spokespersons, they will tell you that this is only a consultative process. The one thing that those in this House who know something about polls can tell you is the fact that $100 million is a bit expensive for a big opinion poll.

Personally, I think that we could have passed a law providing for the hiring, for example, of Allan Gregg to conduct a national poll and find out what the population wants. This would have been a lot cheaper and I am convinced that the Prime Minister would have obtained all the results that he needs.

In this exercise aimed at trying to give a new definition to the act, the amendment proposed by the member for Churchill has little to do with reality. I would like to quote a colleague of the member for Churchill, who is supposedly a great champion of the principle according to which this legislation is unacceptable. I am talking about the member for Chambly. I will talk on his behalf since he is not taking part in this debate right now. He said that this exercise was an undemocratic fraud. I believe this could have made an interesting title, something like an act on the undemocratic fraud. Indeed, I think this could also have been a very appropriate title.

I think that would accurately describe the content of this bill, because any casual observer would notice something is not quite kosher here. Any democrat looking at this bill would say: "This legislation lets the government do just about anything". Any democrat who remembers what happened during the referendum in Quebec would say: "Good heavens, where is the yes committee and the no committee?" Questions, questions. The Chief Electoral Officer tells us there could be as many as 3,000 or 4,000 committees. There would be the yes, the no, the yes-no, the maybes, the maybe-yes, the maybe-nos. It is mind-boggling.

I am very concerned that no appropriate definition was found for this exercise. I am thinking of another title that could have been used, like "an act to sabotage the Quebec process". I think that would have accurately described the purpose of this bill. After all, a title is supposed to indicate to the person who reads it what the bill is all about.

In other words, I would have voted for an amendment like "an act to sabotage the Quebec process" or "an act to kneecap Quebec". I think my colleagues and I would have voted for that kind of title.

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): We would have supported the title.

Mr. Lapierre: We would have voted for the title, obviously. I think the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean was right to intervene, because you cannot be too careful around here. With a title like that, it would have been obvious what this legislation is trying to do.

Madam Speaker, I am sorry I will have to vote against the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Churchill. He should have consulted his colleague from Chambly, who is supposed to come back in a few days to take part in this debate. Thank God for the newspapers in this country, because now I know the hon. member for Chambly is against this legislation, and I would not have known if I had not read La Presse this morning. Incidentally, it was reported in La Presse that the hon. member for Chambly was asking all Quebec members to act as one block. My goodness, the hon. member for Chambly is starting to—

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): He is starting to get ideas.

Mr. Lapierre: —get ideas. I hope this is not an attempt at a merger however, he was asking for a block. I am sure the hon. member for Chambly included the hon. member for Rimouski—Témiscouata, for instance, who I am sure feels a particular concern here. In any case, he was asking for a block against Bill C-81 on Canadian referendums because of—this is very important—apprehended antidemocratic jargon, and I am delighted to speak on his behalf.

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Is that parliamentary?

Mr. Lapierre: Is apprehended jargon parliamentary? I think so. The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, a veteran of these precincts—

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): He is nodding.

Mr. Lapierre: —and our own Jean-Marie Laurence, says it is quite all right.

According to La Presse, at a press conference to be held this morning—so that is why he isn't here, that's where he is.—Quebec's only NDP member will call on his Liberal and Conservative colleagues to put pressure on Prime Minister Mulroney. It does not say so in the article, but I think he had the hon. member for Jonquière in mind. I think he was counting on the hon. member for Jonquière to be a major influence on the Prime Minister of Canada.

This morning, the hon. member for Jonquière made an excellent speech for his caucus, but unfortunately his caucus was not here. It did not want to listen.

Now the hon. member for Chambly is in Montreal for this press conference while all this is going on in Ottawa. I realize he is missing out on something. I must say—

[English]

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, it is fascinating to hear this stream of consciousness, but I would ask the Chair's indulgence in applying the rules of relevance.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sure the hon. member will be very careful to confine has remarks to the various subjects before the House today. The hon. member has exactly seven seconds left.

• (1150)

3 Mr. Lapierre: Madam Speaker, I will use those seven seconds to say that I will vote against this amendment, be it regretfully.

[English]

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, as much as I believe in Murphy's law, I must oppose his amendment. The effect of this amendment would be to change the word referendums to a referendum in the title. While that may seem minor in its implications, it is major in its effect.

Bill C-81 before us is enabling legislation which would permit one or more federal referendums. I am not sure whether it is what his party has in mind, but what the hon. member has in mind is a one-time bill permitting only one referendum.

The proposed change is not in keeping with the intent of the bill. In practical terms, it is conceivable that a referendum would take place and that the results of that referendum and other consultations might indicate certain changes in the constitutional proposals were called for. Then it would be appropriate, obviously, to hold a further referendum and the effect of my friend's amendment would be to forestall that.

The alternative, of course, would be the necessity of passing another bill to enable another referendum to take place. It would not be appropriate, once having had one referendum not to have another if there were substantial changes to the proposals. For that reason, I recommend voting against the amendment, as I will do.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Madam Speaker, I just have a short response to the parliamentary secretary.

It seems to me from all the press clippings I have read and all the speeches I have heard from the Prime Minister and others, the intent was to have just one national referendum. All this motion does is make clear what the Prime Minister has been telling the people. There will be a national referendum and not two, three, four, five or six referendums, if a decision is made in this country to have a referendum in the first place.

If there is a positive decision to have a referendum, all the chats we have had and all the comments we have heard from the government across the way is to have that one referendum on the package which would take place right across the country. All this motion does is to make it very clear in the title of the bill that there shall be a referendum, singular, not referendums, plural.

The other point is that in the last 100 years in this country we have only had two national referendums. I would say, God help us if we need two in the next few months. I think the government should just put in the bill what it has always signalled to the country, that it is not planning on two or three referendums, it is planning on one referendum if, indeed, there is even going to be one. That might not even happen.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Madam Speaker, we are getting into an endless discussion. The first motion presented by the hon. member for Churchill, which would change the title of the bill and call it "an act to provide for a referendum on the Constitution of Canada" instead of "referendums", suggests the member for Churchill considers this bill to be undemocratic, unacceptable and just a strong-arm job that this government wants to do on Quebec by passing this bill. It is meant to be used only once.

You know, when I was in business, I had a men's clothing store, among other things. We dressed people. It makes me think today that they are trying to dress the referendum bill up to make it look better, but without changing its content or substance.

I find it quite simply odious for this House of Commons to want to disguise a bill with subtle changes in an attempt to convince a majority that all is well here in Canada.

My greatest regret in all this is that except for those who are the true representatives of Quebec and its higher interests, namely the members of the Bloc Quebecois, ably led by the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean, except for them, this House would be prepared to pass an undemocratic, even outrageous referendum law with a minimum of consideration. Nevertheless, we know that the Government of Quebec used the Bélanger-Campeau Commission to consult throughout Quebec and find out what Quebecers in all parts of that future country wanted. The Government of Quebec passed Bill 150, setting October 26, 1992 as the deadline for Quebecers to be consulted on their political future, namely sovereignty.

Whether we are for renewed federalism or for Quebec sovereignty, I find it unfortunate today. I think the country's leaders should at least have the intellectual honesty to let this consultation proceed without being overshadowed. They should let it be fair and a benefit to all of society. That cannot happen on the basis of the way this discussion on Bill C-81 has begun.

Yesterday, we in the Bloc Quebecois opposed changing the filing deadlines. We knew that a 48-hour period was absolutely necessary for tabling amendments and in fact, the Speaker of the House told us at the beginning of this morning's sitting that 64 amendment motions had just been received. That is not a serious way to proceed, given the time and the context. I have not yet used up my ten minutes, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: No, no. I was just trying to get the attention of the hon. member for Hull—Aylmer to gently remind him to keep to the amendment now under consideration, instead of digressing on the substance of the bill.

I know that the hon. member likes to stick to the rules of the House. He would therefore like to keep in mind the rule of relevance and confine himself to the amendment now under consideration that was tabled in the House. I think that everyone would be very grateful.

The hon. member for Hull—Aylmer can continue.

Mr. Rocheleau: Madam Speaker, I will confine my comments to the motion moved by the hon. member for Churchill. I cannot help but remind you that 64 motions were put before us this morning and that we have not even had time to read all of them. The object of the first motion is to amend the title of the bill, as if we should be ashamed of saying there might be referendum bills or referendums from time to time, on different issues.

• (1200)

By changing the title, we can have it say anything we want, but it would only be a cover-up. Already yesterday, there was an agreement to shorten the delay during which these amendments could be tabled. One of our colleagues in the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for Chambly, urged all hon. members to vote against this bill, but I would have liked to have seen him here yesterday. If there had been ten of us, we could have blocked this legislation, which is the role of the official opposition. The only official opposition in this House comes from the Bloc Quebecois. Last night we had to sustain the scorn of the majority in this House, but had there been ten of us, we could have asked for the delays to be respected.

Today, the hon. member for Churchill is introducing a motion to change the title. Madam Speaker, I do not think members of the Bloc Quebecois can play these little games. We cannot accept amendments containing such subtleties and requiring explanation. What we are interested in doing in this House is to advise Quebecers they are getting a raw deal here. We want to get to the heart of the debate as soon as possible so that the Bloc Quebecois can shed some light on the situation. This is how we are going to do it. We will follow the principles of democracy, the rules of this House, while trying to advise Quebecers of the injustice being done with regards to a democracy which we, in Quebec, are respecting with our legislation, even with Bill 150. However, we do not want the federal government to interfere with the decision Quebecers will be asked to make.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Madam Speaker, I came to the conclusion, while reading this bill before becoming aware of the amendment tabled by the hon. member from Churchill, that it was undemocratic and illegitimate. After taking note of the proposed amendment, this bill still appears undemocratic and illegitimate.

An impression of constant improvisation pervades the government's entire constitutional process. To fully understand both the bill and the amendment thereto, one must stand back and get a comprehensive view of the government's actions since the failure of the Meech Lake Accord. We saw the Spicer commission, or the Spicer circus as some editorial writers called it, seeking guidance, without exaggeration, even in day care centres. The Beaudoin-Edwards committee was followed by the Castonguay-Dobbie committee, and then by the Beaudoin-Dobbie committee, by a multitude of conferences attended by carefully selected participants, and later by special or standing committees, you name it. Finally this bill is illegitimate, because it has no legal basis. As an editorial writer suggested in Le Soleil, the referendum question could be: "do you like soft ice-cream?" This will bring us back, in the end, to the constitutional process which provides for ratification within three years, in each and every legislature; and some provinces—not only Quebec, but British Columbia also—are committed to hold referendums. This bill is illegitimate because Quebec at least acted with rigour, with the Bélanger-Campeau commission and Bill 150. Nobody has questioned the rigour, the seriousness, with which the Bélanger-Campeau commission carried out its work. One thing that emerged clearly from the Meech process was that Quebecers alone will decide their future. This will no longer be decided in Newfoundland or in Manitoba.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Would the hon. member be kind enough to talk strictly about the object of the debate right now, namely the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Churchill? There will be other amendments to look at and we will have plenty of time to discuss the bill as a whole. I would appreciate it.

Mr. Duceppe: You were in a position to appreciate it, Madam Speaker, since I—

Mr. Rocheleau: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, we are quite willing to follow the rules, but the House has to do the same. Therefore, I invoke Standing Order 29(3).

And the count having been taken:

Madam Deputy Speaker: I now recognize the hon. member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie.

Mr. Duceppe: Madam Speaker, if you check the transcripts you will certainly notice that I have been talking about the amendment since the beginning. I look at this amendment and I wonder about a referendum or referendums. Also, this legislation provides no spending limit other than $8.5 million per committee, but there can be an indefinite number of committees. Moreover, there is no framework legislation. Then this amendment goes precisely in that direction. This amendment says no act in practice, but a specific referendum.

In Quebec, there is what we call a framework legislation on referendums and the Bill 150 is based on that legislation. We have found a rigorous way of doing things. I would not support this amendment because the member should precisely require a framework legislation and see what the possibilities are. I imagine this amendment should be made with that objective in mind, but it is far from being the case. We should look at the possibilities of holding referendums afterwards and passing laws that would precisely refer to a framework legislation.

Rather, the member says that there is no framework legislation, there is no need for one, but we can do a little special for Quebec. I believe that this is part of the hypocritical undemocratic tools that are often used in this whole constitutional process, whether it pleases some people or not. This is continually the case here.

I believe not only the amendment but the bill as a whole is unacceptable. It is somewhat futile and naive to act like little birds and at the same time be willing to swallow it all.

I thought that we would be the only ones to vote against this legislation and this amendment, but when I read the comments made by the member for Chambly, I realized that half of the NDP caucus was opposed to that bill. If the member for Chambly happens to vote in this House, he will hold the majority within his party. It will be 50 per cent plus 1.

The member also tells us that he would like a free vote so that members can vote according to their conscience. This implies that if it is not a free vote, it means some members vote unconsciously, unless the member no longer has a conscience, but this is what the member for Chambly said.

I believe this simple amendment changes absolutely nothing; it misses the issue, and it does not follow the democratic traditions regarding referendums. I might add those traditions are not followed in this House, based on the examples of 1898 and 1942. This is a far cry from democracy, as everyone has said, but I imagine that you do what you can when you do not have higher principles than that. However, there are other places in Canada, of which Quebec is still part, hopefully for as short a period as possible, where democratic procedures are followed. Besides, one of the government members used Quebec's referendum legislation to prepare a bill. I think we should take that into consideration. Our colleagues from Quebec, those who do not belong to the Bloc Quebecois but still seem to have roots in Quebec, should turn to the Quebec referendum legislation for inspiration. It is a parent legislation and not an occasional act, as the amendment seems to indicate.

I do not see why they want to change the title. There is more than meets the eye here, since they are really saying we do not need a parent legislation, only a special one, a quickie for Quebec. That is exactly what they are saying and that is precisely what they are suggesting. We will play a dirty trick on them, we will block the whole process in Quebec, and then we will crow, unanimously, over our victory in a huge poll prearranged for a federal election. The object, of course, is not to use one or many referendums to save Canada and to solve the Quebec issue. It is to save the Conservatives' skin, to save the Prime Minister. That is how things stand since Meech.

Ever since Meech, we have been going round in circles, creating commissions like the last one, the Beaudoin–Dobbie committee. No later than yesterday, Senator Beaudoin was saying that the Senate is unacceptable. He was the one chairing that funny committee, right? But as we often say in Quebec, even though we are laughing, it is not funny.

Unfortunately, this is where things stand right now. They are trying to amend this shameful legislation, to give it a new flavour, by saying there will not be bills on referendums but one bill on a referendum. We do not care a hoot about the rest of the principles. I will be voting against this amendment.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Madam Speaker, I wish to support my Bloc Quebecois colleagues and some NDP members who are fully opposed to the proposed amendment.

As my colleague from Laurier—Sainte-Marie pointed out, the sole purpose of this amendment is to change the bill's title, but a very meaningful title nevertheless. The debate on Motion No. 1 must address the following question: do we want referendum framework legislation or only a referendum which can be carried out quickly to avoid getting our hands too dirty, while still allowing us, afterwards, to claim that we are great democrats and that we always abide by the great principles of democracy.

This amendment is dangerous, because it will make this is a specific action against a highly democratic and well thought-out process on the part of Quebec. This will, to begin with, hamper that process. Why not proceed as in any other democracy and, more specifically, as in England where a referendum was held to decide whether or not to join the Common Market. How did it proceed? It adopted a referendum framework bill and then adapted it to the referendum on Britain's entry into the Common Market.

The initial preoccupation was to create a democratic process, one which would eliminate any doubt, inspired as it is by the same principles as the Quebec Referendum Act which restricts expenditures, provides for yes and no umbrella groups, and provides both sides with start-up funds. The country gave itself a referendum framework or legislation. Legislation inspires respect; it must be above suspicion and reflect, not the petty intentions of a government which is losing momentum, but principles emerging, in a parliamentary context, from our democratic past. In this sense, the British parliamentary system provided a model for the whole world, and justly so, as to the validity of and the principles which guide each debate and lead to a democratic vote, a vote on principles, often on framework legislation. Based on these principles, a specific action plan will be defined.

This amendment is contrary to time-honoured principles of the British parliamentary system in that its purpose is not to provide parent legislation to give everyone a chance to express views and serve democracy well. Heaven forbid. A little referendum would be much too embarrassing, a little referendum we are ashamed of and do not want to discuss.

As a matter of fact, this referendum has even been announced in the last throne speech. Instead of tabling the relevant piece of legislation within a few months after the throne speech, they concealed it, because some Conservative members from Quebec were ashamed and said: "We will never be able to sell that." The fact is they were ashamed. Today they are no longer ashamed.

Mr. Lapierre: Even the minister of state.

Mr. Plamondon: There are even ministers from Quebec who do not dare say a word, they put up with it. They too want the debate to come to an end as quickly as possible. They sit in silence and hide. Let me remind them of the fable of La Fontaine in which the ant asks the grasshopper: "What did you do in the spring?" "I was dancing." Come the next election, voters will ask them: "What did you do—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Not only would La Fontaine have a hard time recognizing his own tale, but I think that the hon. member has wandered considerably from the amendment before this House.

Mr. Plamondon: Madam Speaker, knowing your talent for telling lovely stories, I will refrain from telling all of it and merely use the moral of the story. Let us not forget that, in the end, she who has danced all summer long found herself very needy.

The same thing will happen when election time comes. "What did you do, Conservatives members from Quebec when the debate was held, will we ask?" They will answer: "We were hiding." Then, people will answer back: "You can go and hide forever now." Their voters will hide them forever in a corner of their ridings because they did not stand up for the fundamental principle of democracy that there should be an omnibus bill on referenda instead of this mere scrap of legislation to deal with a temporary situation. In so doing, we feel ashamed because we know that we are interfering with the very principles that have lead to the careful consideration of the question by the Bélanger-Campeau commission during a year and a half in Quebec as well as with Bill 150 which will continue to guide our reflection in a very democratic context, under the "yes" or the "no" banner, with a ceiling on expenditures and restrictions on the number of speeches.

Instead of that, with this amendment here, we will put restrictions on this referendum just for the sake of pulling a fast one on Quebec and on democracy at the same time. Then they will go and hide, puffing out their chests and making meaningless speeches on democracy. They will even have commissions go and check if democracy exists in other countries, while it is being trampled on in this country, with time limits and a mock referendum that even banana republics would be ashamed of having. We are spoiling and bringing shame upon this honourable institution and the entire British parliamentary system at the same time.

I will strongly oppose this amendment which shows just how unfair, illegitimate and undemocratic this legislation is and how much of a blemish it will put on the reputation of the members of this House, especially those from Quebec, the Conservatives in particular who did not speak up against such interference, a real hold-up on democracy.

That is how they will be remembered. You can laugh as this amendment goes through, but you will not laugh for long. You will be judged by the people and very severely. You are presently fourth in the polls and should another party be founded, you will then be fifth. That is what will happen to you. Keep on thinking about your pension and hoping for a limousine—

• (1220)

Madam Deputy Speaker: Could the hon. member respect the rules of this House and address the Chair please?

Mr. Plamondon: Madam Speaker, if you have a limousine, you certainly deserve it with all the patience we require from you in this House and also because of your good judgment and the excellent advice you constantly give us when we stray from the subject. However, you should not consider the Bloc Quebecois as the wolf among the sheep, quite the contrary. We are here to represent the vital energy of Quebec, to defend the higher interests of the beautiful Quebec nation. It is fortunate we are here because from the amendments proposed today, one can realise there was a collusion among the three parties to abstain from reflecting over Quebec's demands and interests. Nobody would have said a word, except maybe for the NDP member for Chambly, but he made his declarations in Montreal and not in this House. If he talks in Montreal, we have to wait and see him here, see how he will vote. Maybe there will be one more member thinking of the higher interests of Quebec instead of participating in that collusion.

The member for Jonquière whom I see on the other side is smiling because he brought some amendments; but he saw how his amendments were received. His work and reflection of many years were rejected flat out. Again in committee today, his documents were not even taken into account and he will probably yield like a sheep after having acted like a lion in front of the cameras. He will probably bow and vote with this government which is about to, Madam Speaker, with this referendum and even more so with this amendment—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I will say it very gently to the hon. member; his time is over.

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Madam Speaker, today we are discussing a very important amendment to the referendum bill. We have to decide if we are going to call the bill an act to provide for a referendum on the Constitution of Canada or an act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada. In any case, we cannot accept a bill which simply tries to ignore the will of Quebecers. We also realize that we are going through the same experience as in 1978, when the Trudeau government tabled Bill C-9 under almost the same circumstances as today. That was when Quebec decided to pass its own referendum bill. At that time, the federal government, which was Liberal, decided to table its bill which, ultimately, did not pass third reading stage, since an election was called before that. We can see full well the context is the same today. People in Ottawa are annoyed because there will be a referendum in Quebec. The pressure is mounting and the federal government finally decides to short-circuit what could happen in Quebec.

The Conservative government, which decided to table this bill, has no longer any legitimacy, as we know. We only have to look at the recent polls to fully realize why we have this bill. Yesterday, a Gallup poll mentioned leaders' popularity, and again, we saw that the Prime Minister's popularity had dropped to 16 per cent.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member puts me in an unbearable position. I think she must realize that at this point her remarks have absolutely no relevance to the amendment before the House. I would ask her to please stick to the content of that amendment. I think that throughout this morning, I have shown a lot of patience and clemency. There must be a limit and hon. members should stick to the content of the amendment which is before the House at this point.

Mr. Lapierre: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, I have been following the debate for some time now. At times it seems that the debate is not taking place between adversaries but rather that the Chair has decided to prevent our members from speaking.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have no doubt that the hon. member for Shefford will be kind enough to withdraw his comments.

The hon. member for Shefford is a veteran of the House of Commons and he is well aware of the rule of relevancy. He knows that I have already received several comments from other members asking me to make sure that it was followed today just as any other day. I have been extremely patient and forgiving and I really do not appreciate been told by the hon. member that I am the one who is preventing people from speaking. I would be grateful if he could withdraw his remarks.

I think the debate will be made easier for everyone if, during this long debate at report stage, one sticks to the particular issue being dealt with in any given amendment on which the House will have to vote.

I would request the hon. member to withdraw the remarks he made on my account.

Mr. Lapierre: Madam Speaker, you acknowledged that I am a veteran. I thank you for that. However, the fact is—I do not mean this to be personal—since I have been sitting in this Chamber, as you know, when a member has the floor, he does not have to—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Would the hon. member be kind enough to immediately withdraw the totally unacceptable remarks he made on my account.

Mr. Lapierre: Madam Speaker, I can withdraw the remarks that you deem offending, but one thing is certain: you said that, at some other hon. members' request, you have decided to apply strictly the rule of relevancy. In fact, I think that the application of rules should not depend on government members or Bloc members. What matters is that your rulings be fair, and I am counting on you.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I can assure the hon. member I will show, to the best of my knowledge, at all times, the utmost fairness. I think we also have to abide by the rules of this House, and the hon. member will no doubt wish to reread the clauses of our Standing Orders dealing with relevancy. Then he might help his colleagues to target their statements, which will allow us to work together, on all sides of this House, a lot more seriously.

Mrs. Venne: Madam Speaker, I feel my remarks are quite in order. They relate directly to this amendment, and when we deal with an amendment, references to the legislation are inevitable.

I am sorry, but if you ask me to speak to an amendment without referring to the legislation, I can do so only with great difficulty. When I speak to an amendment I also speak to the legislation, and I point out what made the Tory government propose this legislation. That, to my mind, is part of the debate.

If we cannot say what motivated the Tory government to table a referendum legislation, I think we are missing the point altogether.

An hon. member: Absolutely.

Mrs. Venne: For my part, I think I have to deal with the substance of this legislation. The reason we have a referendum bill at this time is that the Tory government is at 16 per cent in the polls, and that is exactly why this legislation is now on the table.

We are now debating an amendment to change the title of the legislation, so that it provides for a referendum instead of referendums, but that is quite inappropriate. Anyway, what difference does it make if the legislation provides for a referendum instead of referendums? On that account, I am entitled to discuss this motion and I am entitled also to discuss the substance of this legislation. I cannot discuss one without the other. I am very sorry, but that is the way I see things. That is what I wished to explain.

I will go on by saying that we are now at a time where, rather than having to discuss a referendum bill, we should have an election. Normally, after four years, a government calls an election instead of proposing referendum legislation.

That is, in my view, the heart of the matter and I cannot ignore it. The government tries to bypass the issue, but it can fool no one, and it is my duty to denounce it.

I also wanted to stress that when those members brought in this referendum legislation, the government was not concerned with the interests of Quebecers, but only concerned with staying in power. It should be understood that those are the motives behind this legislation, and as a member of the Bloc, it is my duty today to condemn those motives.

• (1230)

Since we are discussing the title of the bill, I have a suggestion. I hope I will not be told I am off topic, because I would like to suggest the following title: "the cowards at Quebec's expense act". I think it would be an appropriate title. They are cowards because they are afraid to call an election and "at Quebec's expense" means they do not want Quebec to have its own referendum. They want to short circuit the process. I think that would be an appropriate title.

I could suggest another one: "An Act concerning an endangered party and artificial support systems to keep it alive".

An hon. member: Not bad.

Mrs. Venne: I think that would also be a good title to discuss. Of course, because of pressure to speed up the debate, there was not enough time to submit these amendments to the Chair, but I think they would have been very appropriate. If I had to choose, which would not be easy—I would take the cowards—more appropriate, considering the kind of government we have today.

In concluding, I want to say I will certainly vote against this amendment and against the bill. I say this because I think Tory members from Quebec should do the same. They should rise in the House and tell us what they think about this amendment—

An hon. member: They are hiding.

An hon. member: They do not think they are hiding.

Mrs. Venne: —what they think about the title and what they think about the bill. You say they do not think. Well, I certainly would not have dared to go that far. I would like to hear from them and I see the hon. member for Beauharnois—Salaberry. Perhaps he could rise in the House and tell us what he thinks of the referendum bill and this amendment.

To confirm what I have been saying, I would like to quote an article from the Journal de Chicoutimi which says, in referring to the hon. member for Jonquière: "—it is clear that when Jean-Pierre Blackburn bravely criticizes his government's policies, speaking up for Quebec's interests, Quebec is really the last of his concerns." Incidentally, we read this in a daily newspaper published in the riding of the hon. member for Jonquière. I admit I would not have felt very flattered if the same kind of article had appeared in my own riding, but I imagine the hon. member will respond in kind to this journalist who did not seem to appreciate him.

In other words, I expected that. If the hon. member for Jonquière wishes to speak, I would ask him to rise from his seat, since he seems to want the floor. My comments seem to have inspired him. If he really wants to speak, I suggest that he rise in the House, and we will be delighted to listen.

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): I hope he will speak to the amendment.

Mrs. Venne: Yes, of course. We would like to hear him talk about the amendment, because this is so important. We know he could manage to be more relevant than the Bloc, because he has been a long-time member of various committees. I think he sat on all of them in turn. But finally, it would be—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but her time has now expired.

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): Madam Speaker, on a point of order, perhaps you will allow me to tell the people who are making these comments that they had as much time as I did to table amendments to Bill C-81. They had just as much time, and furthermore, some of them were present at the legislative committee.

As far as defending the interests of Quebec is concerned, I think they should have—

Madam Deputy Speaker: This is debate. I am sorry but I must interrupt the hon. member.

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Madam Speaker, I understand why the hon. member for Churchill tabled an amendment to remind the government that the referendum bill should apply only to one referendum. I understand because during the past two years, we have seen any number of committees travelling across Canada.

There was the Spicer commission which sort of failed. The member for Jonquière, who followed the exercise rather closely, mentioned this commission tabled a rather meaningless report. In any case, it would have been very hard for the government to hold a referendum based on such a report. I imagine that it would have been the first of a series of referendums. The government tables a bill on referendums probably because it intends to hold several of those.

I understand the member for Churchill is worried the government will not make a decision based on its past record. We know in the last ten years or so, and especially in the last two years, the government and the three main political parties in Canada cannot agree on how to renew this beautiful country, as they say.

There was the Beaudoin–Edwards committee, the Castonguay–Dobbie committee, which also failed and became the Beaudoin–Dobbie, and then there was the weekend committee. Each of those committees tabled reports that most of the time contradicted each other. Let us now look at what has been taking place in the last two or three months, with those 400 people going from one city to the next all across Canada. This is of course very good business for those hotels and cities, but it seems strange that a government with a $430 billion accumulated debt and a deficit of $32 billion this year can travel across the country and pay for the expenses, hotels and meals of 400 people, in order to discuss things that we already know.

We already know what Quebec wants, because Quebec has performed one of the most rigorous exercises in the history of Canada, namely the Bélanger–Campeau commission whose co–chairman, Mr. Campeau, is now going to travel through the province to gather business people and promote the sovereignty of Quebec. There was the Bélanger–Campeau commission, which was an unprecedented exercise. Six hundred briefs were received by the commission and at the same time, fifty–five experts did parallel studies. They demonstrated that it was necessary for Quebec to patriate almost every power in order to develop properly. English Canada is aware of this rigorous exercise that took place in Quebec. Why continue to travel across Canada in order to find out the opinion of Quebecers and of the rest of the country when we already know the answers?

Now we are undertaking yet another exercise called a referendum. Apparently, the Canadian government will spend more than $100 million to hold this non–binding referendum. All they want is to once again ask the Canadian population for its opinion. We have known that opinion for ten years already. Each year, month after month, the government says that it wants to know what Canadians think and what kind of Canada we should have. Once again, this government wants to ask Canadians that same question, this time through a referendum. We know very well this referendum is not legitimate. It will not change the Constitution because it has no legal value. We know that to make constitutional amendments, you need the approval of at least seven provinces representing at least 50 per cent of the population. Such changes must be ratified by the provincial governments.

This referendum is strictly a consultative referendum. The government will bother the Canadian population. It will spend at least another $100 million of taxpayers money while it is already in debt, to ask Canadians what they think of Canada. We need only ask the companies that specialize in polling. It would cost us barely $100,000 and we would have exactly the same results, without disturbing the people.

• (1240)

Mr. Rocheleau: Within 2 per cent.

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): With proper polling, within 1 per cent.

I very well understand the hon. member for Churchill saying there could be only one referendum, because the government could also start another exercise over again; committee after committee, another Spicer commission, another Beaudoin–Dobbie, Castonguay–Dobbie, Beaudoin–Dobbie again, weekend committees and referendums and spend ten years talking and talking to come up in the end with what we already know now.

Madam Speaker, why would we continue with these exercises—

An hon. member: Futile exercises.

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): —that are futile and hurt the economy of Canada and especially Quebec? We are here to defend Quebec's interests. This uncertainty makes our Quebec premier uncertain himself. He goes back and forth because he does not know what the federal government will do. He is acting the same way, in order to have it both ways.

We in the Bloc Quebecois and I especially are against a referendum. The hon. member for Jonquière just said we too should have proposed amendments. I want to tell him we do not want amendments; we do not want a referendum, because we are fed up with spending Quebecers' money. We give the federal government $24.5 billion a year and it wastes our money. We will not let Canadians waste another $25 million on a referendum, or let Quebecers give the federal government another $25 million to hold a phony referendum, a sort of opinion poll, when we know that we could spend $25,000 in Quebec to do exactly the same thing and come up with the same results.

We are against this referendum. We find it outrageous and we are here to represent Quebec's interests. We say to Quebecers: Participate, but refuse to answers the false questions presented by this irresponsible government that does not want to defend the national interest. It says it is the country's future, but it does not want to defend the national interest. It wants to defend its own partisan interests.

That is what it wants to do. it wants to score points. The federal Liberal Party does the same thing. It is trying to score points, and so is the NDP. We do not want to score points. We want Quebecers to—

Mr. Rocheleau: We want to get out of here.

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): —get out of all these endless discussions. We absolutely want Quebecers to be able one day to develop as they should and create the richest country in North America. That is what we want for Quebecers. We are tired of all this foolishness and nonsense.

I am against this referendum and I will work day and night if necessary to tell Quebecers not to get involved in it and waste our time and money. All we want is to build a prosperous Quebec to have a better quality of life. That is what we want.

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Madam Speaker, you will note that the Bloc Quebecois members regularly have the floor this morning. Since it is often difficult to do so when one wants to speak on bills, one can wonder. This morning, as if by magic, we all get to speak. We can all speak to an amendment because our colleagues across the way are silent. Except for the member for Beauharnois—Salaberry, who regularly attempts to intervene, they do not consider this bill sufficiently important.

Some hon. members: He only speaks while sitting.

An hon. member: Ah, he has risen.

Mr. Hudon: Some say that I never speak, Madam Speaker. I would simply like to state that we are debating clause 1 and that I support the title.

Mr. Tremblay (Rosemont): Is the hon. member for Beauharnois—Salaberry asking for several referendums? Is that why he supports the title?

An hon. member: He supports the title of parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Tremblay (Rosemont): I think, Madam Speaker, we have reached the bottom, given the situation in Quebec, the context in which we have to make our decision, and the constitutional discussions where, for two years now, we have known that the government had promised to submit acceptable offers to Quebec. Now, they come up with a bill to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada, and the hon. member for Beauharnois—Salaberry tells us he supports the title.

Even one referendum in unacceptable, but now our colleague, a former nationalist, decides that, as far as he is concerned, the title should say referendums. Does the government want to hold one referendum after another, like it created one commission and one committee after another? I want to tell my hon. colleague that, unfortunately, many of those commissions and committees had all the time they needed in the last several months. Now time is running out. Soon there will be a deadline: the federal elections.

I do not quite understand the need to hold several referendums, costing $100 million in public money in organization expenses only, after we have had the Spicer commission. I see the hon. member for Edmonton Southwest and I want to mention the Beaudoin–Edwards commission, which all cost millions and millions of dollars. Now, we have the Constitutional caravan made up of 400 people travelling throughout Canada, from city to city. They stop somewhere, go round in circles until they get tired, or one of them looks about ready to explode; that is when they decide it is time to move on. There, everything stopped. The minister in charge announced that great progress had been accomplished. The caravan left for another town, with 400 persons moving again. There it started all over, round and round and round. We were told there was progress. It seems we made progress on the native people issue.

It is really incredible that the federal government would accept to recognize the inherent right of native people and would declare that the courts would define that right in three years if no agreement is reached before that. On the other hand, that same government, that same constitutional committee would refuse, in the case to allow the distinct society clause to be used in the interpretation of the rights and powers which already exist in the Constitution. It is quite extraordinary. Now some members from Quebec want to support a bill on referendums in Canada which aims evidently at delaying the schedule because we know quite well this referendum will be unacceptable for the population of Quebec. The reply to this attempt to bypass the process already going on in Quebec will be a definite no.

The government had all the time it needed and the provinces had all the time required and they spent fortunes. It is easy to understand the cost of federalism. In Quebec, we had the Bélanger–Campeau commission which was very interesting, very relevant and entirely televised and the whole process cost approximately $5 million.

• (1250)

The cost of the constitutional commissions, committees and caravan greatly exceeds $100 million already. Of this, 23 per cent comes from our taxes. In reality it comes from borrowed money, of which 23 per cent is borrowed on our behalf because the deficit continues to increase.

That is very frustrating. The Government continues to spend our money, to borrow on our behalf, in order to finance a constitutional caravan which leads nowhere and does not meet its deadlines.

What is still more frustrating is to have to listen, every night on the National, as they repeat that no progress has been accomplished, that they are happy or unhappy, that they have made great progress but not enough.

Worse still is the use of borrowed funds to pay for commercials, even during the hockey play–offs. These broadcast slots, used for subliminal publicity boasting of Canada's greatness, cost a bundle. It is shameful.

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): It is beautiful.

Mr. Tremblay (Rosemont): It is shameful. The member for Jonquière finds it beautiful. That is extraordinary.

Mr. Lapierre: Supposedly a great nationalist.

Mr. Tremblay (Rosemont): Yes, a great nationalist, even in his own riding.

I have here an editorial which appeared in his riding, and I quote: "Should one take these negative comments seriously—"

Madam Deputy Speaker: Would the hon. member kindly restrain himself to the amendment before the House?

An hon. member: Say something about the editorial's title.

Mr. Tremblay (Rosemont): Madam Speaker, this article deals precisely with the referendum. It says how seriously we must address the issue. There is nothing unusual about an editorial writer questioning the seriousness of some of the comments members can make, particularly when they show up regularly on the news because they slightly disagree, or so it seems, with their government. For months now, those people have been making promises.

Not so long ago, just a few months ago, the idea of holding a referendum was considered unacceptable by them. Never was the federal government to hold a referendum in Quebec. That is what the Prime Minister himself was telling us not so long ago.

An hon. member: And the minister of state.

Mrs. Vézina: It is still unacceptable.

Mr. Tremblay (Rosemont): The Minister of State just said it is still unacceptable. Well, at one point, all those assertions will have to—

Mr. Lapierre: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, I do not know if this will show up in Hansard, but I did hear the minister say that it is still unacceptable. Did she really say that?

Madam Deputy Speaker: This is not a point of order, as the hon. member knows.

The hon. member for Rosemont still has about 40 seconds.

An hon. member: Forty-two!

Mr. Tremblay (Rosemont): Madam Speaker, I think our House leader asked a pertinent question, and I can confirm that the Minister of State for Employment and Immigration indeed repeated that a referendum would be totally unacceptable, and we fully agree with that.

The government will soon have to take action to match its words. All Quebecers are wondering about it. They are wondering about the hon. member for Jonquière in his region, as is to be expected. It is right in the heart of the debate.

When we criticize or say that a referendum is unacceptable and we are presented with a referendum bill that refers to referendums—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member. His time is up.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to intervene in the debate now to bring up something quite basic.

The bill before us today allows the government to consult the people, if it sees fit to do so, as the title clearly says. It is an act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada.

I am very surprised that our colleagues in the Bloc Quebecois did not even take the trouble to read clause 3 of the bill, which says very clearly the government can hold referendums or a referendum throughout the country or in one or more provinces.

Obviously, the proposed amendment that would limit the government's ability to consult all Canadians is certainly not one that we will support. We will not support it because it is obvious that the Government of Canada has the right to consult Canadians, just as the Government of Quebec has a referendum law and no one objects to the Government of Quebec consulting its people. The same thing happens in British Columbia. The Legislative Assembly of British Columbia passed a bill allowing the government of that province to hold a referendum and consult the people.

I wonder what kind of hypocrisy this is, this show that the Bloc Quebecois members are putting on to have us believe they are defending democracy.

Mr. Lapierre: Madam Speaker, the hon. member will be surprised to learn that we share his position and that we are also against the amendment. I am sure that using a word like hypocrisy is not very appropriate. You know the Speaker already asked other hon. members to withdraw such an unparliamentary word. My ears are shocked to hear words like those. I suppose yours are too.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Chair is really concerned about the hon. member's ears. Maybe the hon. member would want to think about mine, because I have been here since 10 o'clock this morning.

The hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel may rise again.

Mr. Ouellet: Madam Speaker, clearly the Canadian government by providing for a means to consult the people on constitutional amendments, if it is deemed necessary, is doing something most democratic and most legitimate.

The Liberal Party of Canada and its leader have been demanding such a law for months and months. In this way, the government of Canada will be able to consult the people across Canada, or in some provinces only, if they would rather have it done by the federal government instead of the provincial government.

I believe that the principle of a law to permit the people to vote on major constitutional amendments is totally democratic and should be accepted by all members in this House.

If some hon. members have concerns about some aspects of the bill, I agree that we should discuss them, but systematic opposition, of the kind we have seen this morning from members of the Bloc Quebecois, to a Canadian referendum on constitutional proposals is out of place and out of order in the context of the constitutional negotiations presently in progress.

This is a wrong debate to question the advisability of letting the government of Canada consult the people.

Obviously, the Bloc Quebecois is very concerned there might be a referendum on constitutional proposals which might be accepted by the people of Quebec. This would be the end of their role in Parliament. From that point of view I am not surprised they should object so strenuously to this bill.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member will be able to pursue his speech a little later.

It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

ST. ANTHONY'S CHURCH

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to bring to your attention and through you, to all Canadians, a memorable event that took place in Thunder Bay last Sunday.

Approximately two years ago, St. Anthony's Church was completely destroyed by fire. Last Sunday, the new St. Anthony's Church was dedicated by Bishop John O'Mara.

For over 75 years, St. Anthony's served as a centre of religious and cultural heritage for Italians who chose Canada and made it their home. More recently, it has embraced the Portuguese community who have also chosen Canada as their new home.

The community of St. Anthony's is an example that should guide us all in the faith for the future of Canadians, the hope for a united Canada and a love that we all share for Canada.

I would like to thank Father Ermete Nazzani, who gave us his leadership, Father Umberto Rizzi, who continues to give us his guidance, and Father Riccardo Bezzegato, who is now the pastor. They all deserve our gratitude for continuing to provide for the cultural and spiritual needs of our community.

CHALLENGE 92

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec–Est): Mr. Speaker, 188 summer jobs for students will be created in my riding as part of Challenge 92. One hundred twenty–four companies or organizations of Québec–Est have been chosen as promoters for the project, in exchange for a federal government contribution of approximately $238,187.

I would like to stress that since this program was introduced, more than 790 businesses of my riding have helped 1,290 students benefit from a unique and quality work experience, as well as allowing them to make some money, thanks to a federal investment of close to $2 millions.

We really want to help our young people and that is why our government never hesitates to invest its time, efforts and money.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, in Quebec City yesterday the Secretary–General of GATT, Arthur Dunkel, left the clear impression that there is hope for the supply management system in Canada. His words gave Canada's supply management agencies cause for believing there is a window of opportunity to continue seeking a clarification and strengthening of article XI so as to maintain our marketing system.

While Mr. Dunkel gave no firm commitment, he did suggest there was hope when he said that marketing boards were still a question mark and that those involved must carefully examine how supply management functions and how this system can co-exist within a new GATT agreement.

The federal government must stay the course to ensure that the greatest possible pressure is applied to world leaders and key players in these negotiations. Canada cannot afford to lose its supply management system. Thousands of farm families, rural communities and agrifood industry workers depend on the system which provides the steady supply of good, wholesome dairy and poultry products for Canadian consumers.

I call on the Prime Minister and his government to see these negotiations through to the end so as to preserve this most stable part of our Canadian agricultural system.

THE SALMON

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, yesterday marked the official opening of yet another Atlantic salmon season in many Canadian rivers.

The salmon has become a challenging symbol for our society in two important ways.

First, its very survival is a reflection of our commitment to conservation. Once a resource that was available in abundance, the salmon is now a fragile species that tests our environmental will and discipline to the extreme.

Second, the salmon is a dynamic issue in developing new relations which aboriginal self-government will bring among Canadians. It is one resource where native rights have been established as a priority but where sharing with all citizens remains an essential goal.

In both respects, let us resolve to meet the challenge which the salmon symbolizes with care, with sensitivity and with effective management.

HAITI

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada ought to condemn publicly the barbarous action of the United States in returning to its 1981 practice of forcing Haitian boat people refugees to return to persecution in Haiti. After all, we condemned nations of southeast Asia for the same violations of United Nations law a dozen years ago.

Canada did well to halt deportation to Haiti at the time of the coup last fall, but now we must do more.

There are Haitians in danger of persecution who now have no way to flee persecution in their country, but are not eligible to apply at our Port-au-Prince visa office as refugees because they are in their own country. Therefore, I call on the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the cabinet to use section 62 of the Immigration Act to designate classes of Haitians as being in need of our protection and, therefore, eligible to apply at our visa office for entry to Canada as refugees.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, here is some news about the Canadian economy that should be mentioned.

Exports in March reached a record level of $12.8 billion, with $9.8 billion in sales to the United States alone. This is the third month in a row in which we have had an encouraging increase in the gross domestic product.

In fact, exports to the U.S. rose 12 per cent between December and March. During this same period, labour productivity has soared at an annualized rate of 5.7 per cent, surpassing the historic trend in the 1 to 2 per cent range.

Canada is regaining its competitive position. Could it be that our economic policies are beginning to pay dividends?

DRUNK DRIVING

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, despite massive public awareness campaigns, drunk driving continues to be a serious problem in Canada.

Recent statistics indicate that the number of impaired driving charges has fallen. Conservative estimates state that the ratio of impaired drivers to the number of those who get caught is 200 to 1.

Education has lead to a slight decrease in the problem by reducing alcohol abuse among young people and by diminishing the number of casual drinkers who drive after a few drinks.

We need tougher sentences in court, but the real responsibility lies with each of us. As members of Parliament, we have a special responsibility to lead by example.

During Nepean Days in my riding, a group will be donating proceeds from the sale of Canada Day memorabilia to a local chapter of Students Against Drunk Driving. I applaud their efforts in support of public awareness and encourage other communities to do the same.

YOUTH VIOLENCE

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, following hard on the looting and violence of May 4, yesterday's teenage brawl on Toronto Island is extremely disturbing. This is by no means the first time that incidents of this kind have occurred in Toronto.

At the conclusion of the 1991 Canadian Music Awards, large groups of youths rampaged through the Eaton Centre. Following the 1988 New Year's celebrations in Nathan Phillips Square, gangs of youths smashed windows and looted. In 1987 and again in 1991, youths went on a rampage at the CNE and after the 1981 Grey Cup, football fans celebrated by overturning cars and looting stores.

In fact, there have been riots in Toronto as far back as July 12, 1858 when Orangemen and Catholics fought each other and two men were shot.

That it has happened before, however, is no excuse. This kind of lawless behaviour just cannot be tolerated.

ABORIGINAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Health and Welfare had responded to constitutional agreements on aboriginal issues by saying, and I quote: "I don't understand that we needed 125 years in Quebec and in two months they, the natives, could get all that they get."

The minister should know the aboriginal peoples have not arrived at this point over a period of two months. It has taken hundreds of years of looking in from the outside. It has taken many years of demanding a place at the table.

What is more, Canadians in every region of this country know this fact and have said they want the constitutional reform package to address these issues.

Stop back-tracking. If Quebec were to separate, it would still have to deal with the same aboriginal issues. Premier Bourassa should come to the negotiating table, because in the long run aboriginal peoples and Quebecers have some common causes. Native self-government will only be a tough sell if you make it so.

ALLERGY AWARE PROGRAM

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, members of Parliament, federal departments and the private sector have worked together to make information on potential food allergens available to consumers who are sensitive to certain food substances.

After several private members' initiatives, consumer and corporate affairs developed a requirement for the mandatory listing of ingredients on food labels, an important step in ensuring that consumers are aware of the ingredients in a food product.

I commend the Canadian Food and Food Services Association, the Allergy-Asthma Information Association and the Department of National Health and Welfare for implementing the Allergy Aware Program.

Thanks to this program, quick service restaurants are publishing charts listing the foods served in their establishments and identifying the ten most prevalent allergens consumers may wish to avoid. Such initiatives and partnerships benefit all consumers and must be commended.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, 60 per cent of the 969 women murdered between 1974 and 1990 in Ontario were killed by male partners, according to the recently released study, "Women Killing: Intimate Femicide in Ontario".

The report shows ironically that shelters created to protect and save the lives of women are also saving the lives of men. The growth in shelters since 1981 correlates to the decrease in the number of men dying at the hands of their female partners. Because women now have somewhere to turn in an abusive situation, they are not resorting to violent means.

Women are still being killed by their male partners in as large numbers as ever. Native women in Ontario are six times as likely as non-native women to be killed by a spouse.

The report notes that the justice system still neglects to protect women. Peace bonds, restraining orders, and other measures have failed and will continue to fail without proper police protocols and appropriate judicial response.

We must continue to support shelters, but the issue of abuse and murder must be brought to light. We must educate all Canadians, particularly the professionals.

BILLY BISHOP

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Mr. Speaker, 75 years ago today, Billy Bishop took off for further glory. He made a one-man raid on a German aerodrome 12 miles behind enemy lines in France. It was a famous raid that was to earn him the Victoria Cross.

Our greatest First World War ace was challenged by four enemy aircraft during the raid. He downed three of them and emptied his gun into the fourth before making his escape.

Billy Bishop was only 24 when he received the Victoria Cross, the Commonwealth's highest award for gallantry, from George V at Buckingham Palace. On the same occasion, he received the Military Cross and the Distinguished Service Order.

This man from Owen Sound was only one of the many Canadians who brought credit to the Royal Flying Corps and proved to hidebound generals that the new-fangled flying machine had a role in warfare.

Indeed, at the end of the war, over half of the top 20 aces of the Royal Flying Corps were from Canada.

Canadians like Billy Bishop were born to high skies and open spaces and were ideally suited to the challenges of aerial combat. Let us never forget the skill and the bravery of young men who conquered new frontiers.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, an appalling study was released by the Women We Honour Action Committee yesterday. It shows that between 1974 and 1990 at least 61 per cent, and perhaps as many as 78 per cent of the women murdered in Ontario were murdered by the men they had lived with.

It is horrifyingly macabre that in Ontario, and presumably in the rest of Canada, the statistically surest way for a woman to secure her own violent murder is to enter into a spousal relationship.

It says something deeply alarming about the culture of maleness and male violence in our society. It raises frightening questions, the proper answers to which are fundamental to the continued living of up to 100 or more women in Canada this year, next year, the year after that, ad infinitum.

Whatever it takes, and increased funding for women's shelters and post-shelter aid, education of police and the judiciary, and anti-violence education in the schools are utterly essential starting points, this undeclared war against the women Canadian men allegedly love must be ended.

HEALTH AND THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Mr. Speaker, you are well aware of the acute concern that the people of Canada have for their environment. One of the main concerns of Canadians relating to the environment is their own health and the health of their families.

It was fitting that the Minister of National Health and Welfare announced on March 20 of this year the action plan on health and the environment.

As a further measure to ensure that the public is informed about the important link between their environment and health, I welcome the news that the Department of National Health and Welfare is about to launch a new report during this Environment Week on the topic entitled, "A Vital Link, Health and the Environment in Canada".

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint–Léonard): Yesterday, I received a letter from a young Canadian in my constituency who is looking for a job after graduation.

At the beginning of the year, he wrote to the Prime Minister and the Prime Minister referred his letter to the minister of employment. The minister of employment has not yet answered.

However, he went to an employment centre to register for a program but was told that this program took place only once a year and it was too late for this year. The only chance he has is to wait for next year.

We have been asking for several weeks why this government cut the funding of training programs and why it does not put more funds into them.

When the member for Hamilton East said there was no more money for training programs yesterday, the Minister of Employment and Immigration said that was false. Why can my constituent not get into a program? It is important for him to find a very good job after having worked so hard to graduate from university.

TELEVISION PROGRAMMING

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon—Souris): Mr. Speaker, Canadians of all ages watch television more than many of my generation would wish. While the use of one's leisure time is a matter of personal choice, the nature of those programs can have a substantial influence on viewers, particularly on the young, and that is of consequence to all of society.

If television portrays life as one in which violence including rape and murder are day–to–day occurrences, young people may learn to accept such violence as being a natural part of their own lives. As an example, 13–year old Virginie Larivière of St. Polycarpe, Quebec is convinced that her 11–year old sister was brutally and tragically murdered as a direct result of the portrayal of such violence on television.

In a different but equally important vein, Canadians look for television and particularly to the CBC to be an accurate portrayal of the role of our country in world history, but veterans have been outraged and insulted by revisionist portrayals of that history as in the recent series The Valour and the Horror.

Those who produce and those who select television programs have an immense and even frightening influence on their viewing audience, an influence to which they have not given adequate attention.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. We all hope that the earth summit in Rio will be a success. Already the international community is seriously concerned about the United States' refusal to sign several international agreements which are critical to the success of this summit.

Will the Prime Minister give us the assurance that he is going to pick up the phone and call the President of the United States to urge him to sign these treaties of paramount importance at this time? Otherwise the community of nations will be very disappointed.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend would take offense if the President of the United States phoned me to tell me to sign a treaty after the Canadian government had decided otherwise. This is something for each nation, for each country to decide for itself.

Of course, on an issue as important as this one, I have already conveyed to the President of the United States our views regarding not only the importance of this summit, but also that of the treaties that flow from it. I stated in a speech yesterday the Canadian position and our objectives for this summit as well as what the Canadian government will do immediately afterwards to contribute to its success, because we believe that this summit is a most important event as regards all issues relating to the development of the environment.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister.

There were supposed to be three conventions at Rio. One was climate change, another was endangered species and the third one was forest management. The convention on forest management has been completely dropped and now the Americans have convinced other industrial nations not to have specific targets or deadlines for the one on climate change.

President Bush's advisers are bragging that when they are back from Rio they will have very little to do to meet any new commitments.

I want to ask the Prime Minister what I asked him in French. Will he use his good office and call the President to tell him that according to what we know, of the three conventions that were proposed, two will not be signed by the United States—one has been in fact dropped—and the third one, the President does not want any deadlines or targets.

Will he tell the President of United States that if that is the case, Rio will be a complete failure?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is always imprudent to try to judge the results of an important international event before it takes place.

It is always very, very imprudent to suggest that if a given country does not propose or agree to do a certain act, the entire thing will collapse. There are 178 countries in the world. There will be members of the United Nations, there will be more than 110 heads of government at Rio, and while the United States plays an important role in this, as it does in all other international affairs, it is not the only player there.

• (1420)

We do not propose to subcontract our rights or obligations in the environment to the United States or anybody else. We will be there to fulfil our obligations on behalf of Parliament and the people of Canada and we expect other nations to do the same thing in their national interest.

FISHERIES

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question concerning the fisheries.

This morning we read in the press that the Europeans have decided to stop fishing off the coast of Newfoundland. Of course they stopped fishing for a very good reason, there are no fish any more.

We would like to know from the Prime Minister if he can guarantee to this House that the Europeans will not come back next fall and that if they decide to come back it will only be when we have enough stock on the banks. Can he assure that Canadian fishermen have a livelihood for themselves and not for others?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. gentlemen has noticed we are having some success with respect to the campaign we have been waging with respect to foreigners.

Mr. Chrétien: There's no fish, John.

Mr. Crosbie: You cannot have it both ways. Yesterday you were going berserk, we had to stop foreign overfishing. Today it looks like we are on the way to stopping foreign overfishing and you are complaining there are no fish. Now which is it? What do you want? Do you want to stop overfishing or not?

M. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday, while preparing his visit to Rio, the Prime Minister said the environment should be the focus of the next round of the GATT negotiations. If he is really convinced of that, why does he continue to consider the environment as a secondary issue in the negotiations for the proposed free trade deal with Mexico? Why does he not insist on the enforcement of common standards for the three countries? Why does he not insist on an accession clause which would protect the environment and on a dispute settlement mechanism which would take the environment into account?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): My friend should be careful when talking about the accession clause because that opens very interesting doors into other areas.

As for the environment, I can assure you that it is part of the Canadian government's negotiating position in all our global initiatives. As I said yesterday in a speech about what would happen after Rio, we intend to make the environment a priority in all our commercial negotiations and particularly in the case of the GATT. Evidently all countries will have to co-operate and participate, but I think Canada is taking leadership action in this area and we will invite others to follow.

[English]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister.

The Rio conference is about the environment, trade, and the relationships between the rich and the poor. The North American free trade agreement is about exactly the same thing. The Prime Minister cannot say one thing in Brazil, another in Mexico, and hope to maintain any degree of credibility.

Will the Prime Minister integrate the enforcement of common environmental standards directly into the Mexican agreement and into its dispute settlement mechanism?

The Prime Minister has said that the environment should be the focal point of the next round of GATT negotiations. Will he demonstrate his sincerity now in the current round of Mexican negotiations?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I certainly agree with some of the observations made by my hon. friend. The conference in Rio is going to deal not just with the environment but with the problems of foreign debt, aid and trade in respect of developing nations, how their own economic situations can be accommodated to the horrendous economic costs of preserving their own environment.

There is not a bifurcation but there is an equally important degree of responsibility to be accorded in Rio to the problems of Third World development. I think my hon. friend quite properly points that out.

Canada's policy of eliminating debt in sub-Saharan Africa, our problems of write-offs of debt in the Caribbean countries, the developing countries, are all part and parcel of that general approach.

With regard to trade, we are surprised by some of the opposition we see in this House, because precisely one of the ways that you are going to increase the well-being of people in developing countries, a developing economy such as Mexico, is to enter into a free trade agreement with developing countries, so as to give them access to developed markets. In this way they can enrich their own citizens, thereby raising the well-being of all of their people.

Because of that fundamental principle, and because it has just been articulated so well, I would then conclude that my hon. friend is also speaking, because he is environment and I think associate finance critic, that he is speaking for the Liberal Party and committing them to full support for a North American free trade agreement with Mexico.

WESTRAY MINE

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister and it concerns the tragic accident at Westray mine.

On May 20, the minister responsible for small businesses assured this House that the government would bring forward and I quote: "all the appropriate information as soon as possible". Two weeks later we still have not received any of that information.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister if he will assure this House that he will bring forward this week all of the documents pertaining to the Westray mine and how those decisions were taken.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to inform my hon. friend that the documents are being assembled and they will be tabled in the House this week.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, it is very important that they are tabled this week and I thank the minister for his response to that question.

I also would like to ask a supplementary question of the Prime Minister. As we know, there were many concerns prior to the approval of the loan guarantee for the Westray mine by independent consultants, as well as, we understand, by federal departments, about not only the financial viability of the mine, but more importantly, about the safety of the mine.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister, given that he did intervene, as he is asked to do on many projects of regional economic development, could he share with this House the reports on which he based his decision and felt that indeed this was a safe project for the federal government to proceed with.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I indicated to the House yesterday that my involvement in the decision-making process on behalf of projects of regional economic expansion is by and large the same. There is an intervention sometimes by a provincial premier about a given project. It is examined carefully and it follows the cabinet committee route and a decision is made.

We made that decision in Central Nova pursuant to a set of objective criteria and we made a similar decision involving exactly the same company in the constituency of my hon. friend, in the Yukon. That company has provided good employment opportunities there and I think it has been actively supported, quite properly so, by my hon. friend who has made representations on its behalf and to which we responded.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister, of course, is quite right. As I said in my second supplementary, it is to be expected that the Prime Minister of Canada would take an interest in regional economic development opportunities.

Given the very tragic results, however, at the Westray mine it is equally important that the Canadian people are aware that these decisions were taken with full information and knowledge of any risks. There was an environmental assessment done of this project, as we know, from the 1991 Curragh Resources prospectus. It said, and I quote: "The Westray Mine has been reviewed under the environmental assessment and review process".

I would ask the Prime Minister if he was privy to this environmental assessment and if so, what was his opinion of that particular environmental assessment and will he table that with this House?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to inform the leader of the NDP that the environmental assessment will be tabled along with the documents to be tabled this week.

There were a number of other reports upon which the federal government relied. The federal government in fact relied on all the technical reports that existed in making this decision. The decision was clear, based on all of these reports, that it was technically feasible to have the mine and that the economic factors and the safety factors were certainly manageable. It was technically possible to go ahead with the mine.

JOB TRAINING

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Yesterday the minister let it be known that his department was about to run out of money for training UI recipients.

In the case of Winnipeg his department is currently paying between $6,000 and $7,000 a year in tuition fees alone for people taking secretarial and business administration courses.

How can the minister, at a time when he says his department is running out of money, defend such patently high fees for training people?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will try not to get into a discussion of the criteria that provincial institutions established to fix the tuition fees of training Canadians in their institutions.

It is important to recognize that this government has acknowledged the need to train Canadians. We have increased the resources so that we can train unemployed Canadians. Throughout Canada this year it is $3.4 billion, which, I might add, under the Unemployment Insurance Act is three times the amount we were spending to train Canadians in 1990. This is a fact from which the hon. member cannot derogate.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

Although the minister may claim the amount is higher, the fact is that the department is totally wasting the money in its allocation. People who need training simply do not have the opportunity because of the outrageous fees being paid to these firms. The minister refuses to deal with this issue.

Among those who are trained in Manitoba this department and other departments have refused to announce one program for economic expansion, one program for economic development in that province.

Could the minister please tell me and the House what he expects these graduates to be doing once they have finished their courses?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, these graduates will benefit from the economic policies of this government. That is what they will do.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Valcourt: All unemployed Canadians out there are listening to the Liberals laughing. I hope they are listening to them.

Back in 1978 the leader of that party, the hon. Leader of the Opposition, talked about unemployment and said: "But I don't believe I can be"—

Some hon. members: Order, order.

Mr. Valcourt: They are not interested in the good words of their leader.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Today the minister boasts about the amounts he is spending to train unemployed Canadians. Perhaps he will admit today that this training was funded by raising taxes on wage earners through higher UI premiums while other employment programs were in fact cut back.

Why is his government disguising the size of its deficit by shifting the cost of employment programs to the UI account? Why is it tarnishing the future of Canadian workers to polish its own record of failure?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, what we hear in this place. It is as if Canadians were not always the same taxpayer.

I have news for the Liberals. Whether you are in northern New Brunswick or in Saskatchewan, when you pay your premium rate you pay it as one Canadian taxpayer.

The member is asking me today to tell Canadians that we will follow the NDP policy, that we will print money to buy the illusion of prosperity.

We have targeted training as a priority area of activity for this government for the benefit of Canadians.

Right now the demand for training is very high. We have to acknowledge that we cannot put every UI claimant on a training course. What we are doing is targeting these funds at those most in need.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, the minister should know and understand that he is frying Canadians to cook his books.

The minister keeps apologizing for the rejection of training applicants by saying that it is impossible for his government to accommodate every UI recipient.

That is no surprise to unemployed workers whose training was denied for lack of funds but who see endless tax dollars being spent on government ads telling them how competitive they are.

Mr. Speaker: I must ask the hon. member to put her question.

Ms. Guarnieri: Why has the minister's government chosen to spend taxpayers' dollars to train public opinion before an election rather than to train workers for skilled jobs?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I know Liberal doom and gloom is hard to overcome, especially when you sit there and you do not like it.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): I know you don't like it.

Mr. Valcourt: The fact of the matter is that earlier I referred to the economic policies of this government and they all laughed.

The chairman of Canadian steelworkers is quoted in an article. We know the importance of steelworkers in Ontario. He said: "During the first quarter of this year steel shipments were up 3 per cent, making a 5 per cent year over year increase quite feasible".

Mr. Telmer said: "Canadian steelworkers and their customers are also benefiting from interest rates that are at their lowest level in 19 years".

ROYAL OAK RESOURCES

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour.

For the past 10 days we have witnessed a labour relations fiasco in Yellowknife. Workers at the giant mine are on strike against their employer Royal Oak Resources. The issues in dispute are the very real health and safety concerns of the workers.

Rather than bargain in good faith and address the concerns of the workers, the company's response to these legitimate concerns for a safe working environment was to hire security guards in riot gear complete with attack dogs.

Will the minister now intervene over and above appointing a mediator to ensure that the company returns to the bargaining table, bargains in good faith and settles not only the strike but also the legitimate health and safety concerns?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I remind my hon. friend that matters of occupational health and safety are under the jurisdiction of the territorial government and not of the federal government. Having said that, the industrial relations part is under the jurisdiction of the federal government.

Last week I was in contact with the owners of the mine and with the union. Having received a request from one of the parties, I appointed a mediator yesterday. The mediator is having the parties meet as we speak this afternoon.

The president of the national union, I understand, has flown to Yellowknife and is meeting with the president of the mine. I deplore the violence that has taken place on the picket lines. I would urge both sides to put their efforts toward settling the disputes.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, we are back to the same old thing of pawning off from one jurisdiction to another the life and safety of workers in these working conditions. That is not acceptable.

Given the violence we have witnessed at the mine, including three workers requiring hospitalization and the constant threat of violence that is ever present due to these wonderful Pinkerton agents—is it not amazing that they keep coming up through history all the time—will the minister now take the next necessary action, amend the Canada Labour Code and introduce anti-scab legislation?

• (1440)

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the government has no plans to amend part I of the labour code on industrial relations.

Let me remind my hon. friend that at the federal level in Canada we do settle over 97 per cent of the negotiations of collective agreements without work stoppages. The system works well.

Occasionally we do have cases and that is why we are putting all our efforts into those cases to make sure there is no violence. We want the parties themselves to agree on a settlement.

WESTRAY MINE

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister presided over a cabinet meeting where the $85 million loan guarantee for Westray was discussed and finalized. Certainly in questions such as that there are discussions about the conditions that must go along with such a loan guarantee and there must be some conditions imposed.

Could the Prime Minister tell us today how many of these conditions related to safety and what were these conditions?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the answer is patently obvious. The province puts conditions in place for health and safety, for occupational safety for nine different departments that regulate mines. The conditions of the loan guarantee we worked out with the bank were that all of those conditions must be complied with.

Not only that, the contract that was entered into made it clear that there would be compliance and there had to be compliance or the guarantee would not be there. We informed ourselves on a regular basis month by month that this was the case.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, the minister of state for small businesses still has not said what conditions there were or if there were in fact any conditions attached to the loan regarding safety.

The government's own department of energy through CANMET stated that there were methane problems in the mine, and the minister of energy is quoted as having said: "We were all aware of the mine having high methane deposits". Then the minister for small businesses sloughs off the question and does not tell us what conditions there were.

Will the Prime Minister include among those documents to be released the CANMET study on the Westray mine and the subsidiary agreement on the financing of Westray?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the hon. member's question is absolutely clear. Every single provincial regulation as it deals with mines—and there are nine different departments that affect a mine that is to be put into production and its daily monitoring—must be complied with. That was secured in the contractual arrangement for the loan guarantee and, as I have said, on a monthly basis we assured ourselves that the mine was in compliance.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, the minister's answer is less than clear.

The question was whether or not the CANMET study would be made available. Perhaps, in attempting the second time to answer a very specific question, the minister would also tell the House whether or not a summary of the direct communications between the Prime Minister and the premier of Nova Scotia will also be included in the documents to be released, we understand, as early as tomorrow.

In addition, will there be a summary of whatever directives were issued by the Prime Minister following those personal conversations with the premier of Nova Scotia? Yes or no.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I have a very long list of all the municipal and regional political leaders who have supported this regional economic development project.

The Prime Minister made it very clear yesterday that he supported it. We certainly support regional economic development, especially when it is a provincial priority. So did the warden of the municipality of Pictou county, Hank Dunnewold, so did the mayor of the town of Trenton, Barry Trenholm, so did the mayor of the town of Stellarton, Ronald Marks and so did the chairman of PICORD, which is the Pictou County Research—

Mr. Speaker: There has to be another way to give this information to the House. The hon. member, supplemental.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, the minister can hide behind all the lists he wants and all the local officials he would want to name. What members of this House are asking for, quite properly, is whether or not key documents will be made available. The minister for the second time has refused to answer.

I ask him again, will the CANMET study be available? Will a summary of communication between the Prime Minister and the premier be made available? While he is at it, will he tell us whether the reservations expressed by senior federal officials, such strong reservations that the premier felt compelled to call the Prime Minister, reservations primarily out of the department of energy, will be made available as well?

We don't want a shopping list, we don't want a propaganda poll—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has put his question.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): I would tell my hon. friend that all appropriate information will be released. He will be very pleased when he sees how extensive it is. It deals with all of the questions he has raised in the House.

NATIVE SELF-GOVERNMENT

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

For many years provisions have existed for development of native self-government agreements on a band-by-band basis in Canada. For example, I understand that the Kingsclear Band, which is one of three in my riding, has achieved considerable progress in many aspects of such a concept, and that the Kingsclear Band is an excellent candidate to become one of the first in Atlantic Canada to sign a self-government agreement.

My question is this: what would such an immediate self-government agreement entail and how would it be implemented?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): The community self-government policy of the Department of Indian Affairs has been in place, I think at least since 1985. It envisages the negotiation between a particular Indian band or First Nation and the federal government, a set of optional means to be given parliamentary protection by way of legislation, to administer their own communities in the areas of, for example, education and health and lands management and membership, presently covered under the Indian Act.

It is our intention to continue to negotiate such agreements pending an adoption of the inherent right to self-government, should that be constitutionalized in the near future.

SUPPLY MANAGEMENT

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Reports from Quebec City show that Arthur Dunkel, the GATT Director General, is stating that our marketing boards must abandon supply management and adopt tariffication. This indicates that the government's message to our associate governments around the world has failed to convince them of the value of supply management.

Will the Prime Minister explain why he thinks his message has not been accepted by presidents Delors and Bush, and did he fail because they still remember that Canada's original position was tarification at the GATT until Canada's farmers found out about it?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend's last statement is incorrect. What he has failed to recognize is that the position Canada has presented at GATT has been developed with the provinces and with the producers. We have been continually putting forward that position.

Mr. Dunkel, who is a hired gun, a bureaucrat, has put forward a text. But individual nations, sovereign nations, will make their decisions in the best interests of their own country and their own economies, how they enter GATT.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): I think the hon. minister should remember that for the first two years our position was tariffication. It was changed then.

This past February this House reiterated Canada's support for a strengthened and clarified article XI, 2(c)(1), and urged the Prime Minister to use his influence to build international support beyond that being received from Japan and North Korea. What new support has his activities brought to the supply management cause, and how many countries are now on side with Canada as a result of these activities?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): My hon. friend obviously missed the attendance of President Jacques Delors of the European Commission here in Ottawa.

Mr. Althouse: No, I didn't. I was wondering what the results are.

Mr. Mulroney: Oh, you were wondering what the results were.

• (1450)

Here are the results he announced about a month ago in Ottawa. He said that he quite understood and was sympathetically disposed toward the position the Canadian government had put forward to the point where he was advocating the proposal that a 90 per cent deal that allowed for this kind of exemption was better than no deal at all.

We all know that each country is seeking exemptions for various matters. The marine industry in the United States, the import of bananas to the European Community from former colonies, and so on, represent important exemptions they are all seeking.

There is nothing wrong with Canada pointing out the important dimension that marketing boards constitute for our agricultural industry.

This we have done with some considerable degree of success, witness the statement made in this building a month ago by President Jacques Delors of Europe.

SMALL BUSINESS

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of small business.

The minister is well aware that most jobs in this country are created by small business and that most small businesses just cannot get a bank loan. Three months ago the budget promised some help but nothing has been done to implement that and the time is fast approaching for the summer recess.

Will the minister immediately take steps to help small business get financing, even through the Federal Business Development Bank or through putting in place legislation to allow small business to survive and create jobs, or does the minister subscribe to the sign on the wall of the finance department which reads "the light at the end of the tunnel will remain off until further notice"?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I agree with my hon. friend that there has been a constriction of credit in the banking system for small business and because of that the last budget did some very important things which are in fact being put into place.

With the Small Businesses Loans Act, the ceiling will be lifted to $200,000 from $100,000. It will be done as soon as possible while making the Small Businesses Loans Act easier to deal with.

The small business financing program is there. We have the lowest interest rates in 22 years. We have the lowest inflation in 22 years. Yesterday new financial institutions were formed by trust companies and insurance companies as well as banks to get into commercial lending.

REFUGEES

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of immigration.

Last week several Canadian organizations working with refugees announced that they had given up on the minister of immigration because he had virtually stopped using his discretionary powers to admit refugees on humanitarian and compassionate grounds and consequently their appeals to him were a waste of time.

The law gives the minister the discretion to admit deserving cases when there are humanitarian and compassionate grounds. My question is this: why is the minister refusing to use these legitimate powers and will he make it clear to the Canadian public the criteria he has for using these powers?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the statement made by certain people at that meeting that I never intervene on humanitarian and compassionate grounds.

The difference between my department and others is that I do not publish every day the individual actions I take in this department on behalf of refugee claimants.

Mr. Tobin: What others? Name the other ministers.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister has been asked a question and is on his feet to answer. I ask hon. members to extend the usual courtesy.

Mr. Valcourt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In 1991 alone over 8,000 people were admitted to Canada on humanitarian and compassionate grounds so this charge that we are not exercising these criteria in favour of claimants or immigrants is groundless.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, the minister is not using these discretionary powers with respect to refugees as they were used in the past and more refugees are now being deported than ever before, often to dangerous situations. For example, last year in Quebec only four cases were accepted on humanitarian grounds out of 884 applications. That is applications to him after they were refused by the board.

Will the minister be frank with the Canadian public and say why he has restricted the use of these powers, because he has restricted the use of those powers?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, some people can level the charges they want. I know I am entrusted with administering a refugee determination process which the United Nations Commission on Refugees has labelled the best and the fairest system in the world.

Canada welcomes every year and affords protection to tens of thousands of people in need of protection. No other country in the world beats that record. I am applying the law. Every time I receive an intervention on behalf of someone in need of Canada's protection, he gets it.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Last week in a speech the Prime Minister said:

> The road has been dilatory and dangerously indifferent to the breakup of Yugoslavia.

Today while we meet, Sarajevo is being shelled, thousands of people are being killed and wounded and are losing their homes.

I want to ask the Prime Minister this: Even with the recent round of sanctions being put in place are we now once again in danger of being too little and too late?

Will the Prime Minister be instructing the Secretary of State for External Affairs at the meeting of foreign ministers this week in Oslo to raise whether or not the mandate of the UN forces in that region should be expanded or whether NATO itself should take a look at whether it can undertake peacemaking initiatives and stop the tragic fighting in Bosnia?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend will have to tell me precisely what he means by two things.

He is asking whether the United Nations mandate would be expanded. Expanded to do what? He is asking whether we would instruct the Secretary of State for External Affairs to ask for NATO intervention. NATO intervention to do what?

The United Nations peacekeepers, including 1,300 Canadians, are already in the region. They are there prosecuting the instructions of the Security Council of the United Nations. Obviously this has not brought about the results we wanted. We are working very closely with the United Nations to make sure we advance in that.

If my hon. friend has some ideas that might help in that, I would be happy to listen to him and to follow through carefully, provided I understand exactly what information is he seeking or what instructions he would like the Government of Canada to convey.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): I have a supplementary for the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister may begin by paying attention to the words of his own secretary of state who was quoted yesterday as saying: "We may have to consider further actions, including military actions".

Those are the words of the Prime Minister's own secretary of state. Is that going to be the question or the position taken by the government?

I will ask the question specifically. Will the Government of Canada take the lead in asking for a direct airlift of humanitarian assistance to the city of Sarajevo? Will we be asking particularly for the convening of an international conference to deal with the massive problem of over one million refugees who are now existing in that region? Will Canada take the lead in ensuring that these innocent people will not be harmed, injured, or killed any longer?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): As my hon. friend knows, we were the first industrialized country to ask the United Nations last September to involve itself in the Yugoslav crisis, long before it deteriorated to the extent it has because we were fearful of precisely that result, I think in fairness, so was my hon. friend at that particular point.

We have been pressing for the opening of the Sarajevo airport precisely to achieve the objective of an airlift for humanitarian purposes. Without the opening of the airport which is now being subjected to gun-fire from the neighbouring hills, we have difficulty in getting humanitarian assistance in there. We are moving on that as well. My hon. friend indicates the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated what her intentions were. I know what her intentions were. My question to my hon. friend was what he meant by the suggestions that he was making. He made two very important suggestions. I think it is equally important that he specify exactly what he had in mind. If he is saying that we should ask for NATO to involve itself militarily there, if he is saying that we ask the United Nations to direct its peacekeepers to be transformed into people on a more aggressive footing, that is something we can contemplate. We must understand: Is that the position that my hon. friend is advancing? If so, is that the position of the Official Opposition? He seems to be signalling yes. Is that right?

• (1500)

Now my hon. friend says "the answer". I cannot answer. It was your suggestion.

Mr. Speaker: I will take a single question from the hon. member for Longueuil and a single question from the hon. member for Halton—Peel. The hon. member for Longueuil.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In 1989 I had the opportunity to study the sharing of expenditures for research and development. It was found that Quebec received $1.2 billion less than Ontario in research and development contracts from the federal government.

Approximately two weeks ago, I received from the minister a CANMET report in which one can see that the federal government is spending a lot on research and development and that the trend remains the same, that is approximately 11 per cent for Quebec and 55 per cent for Ontario. Could the minister tell us if he intends to continue to treat Quebecers this way for a long period of time?

[English]

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that the member has asked me that question because it gives me the opportunity to indicate to him that some of the leading edge technology on energy efficiency is taking place in the province of Quebec, in particular, in laboratories in the riding of our colleague, the Minister of Labour.

I think for all of us this is very important. It is important for us as Canadians. It is also important for the province of Quebec. I am pleased that the hon. member gave me the opportunity to make this announcement and further demonstrate how Quebec colleagues are in fact promoting their province on research in that province.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for veterans affairs.

Many Canadian veterans were shocked when they watched the CBC television series The Valour and the Horror earlier this year. They felt that history was being rewritten to denigrate the efforts of heroic Canadian soldiers and airmen during the Second World War.

Is the minister aware of the outrage being expressed by Canada's veterans and is he in agreement with them that this series defames Canada's proud war record?

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all I can say that we are indebted to CBC and the National Film Board for the fact that they put those three programs on in prime time because I think everybody in this House knows the importance of Canadians understanding the immense contribution and the sacrifice of Canadians in time of war.
