As a Newfoundlander I am particularly pleased that the limitation of 180 days has now been removed because in the last three years I have been involved in many cases in which there was a dispute over whether it was 180 days or 170 days. Memories fade, and there are depositions and the legalities of things. I am very pleased that there are at least three or four cases that I know of that can now be sorted out with relative ease.

I have great admiration for those merchant seaman and merchant navy veterans organizations. I am not going to list them all. They know who they are. I know who they are.

I am a relative newcomer to the business of fighting for them politically so I am not going to take any credit at all. There are people in this House and others who have fought the battle for them for over 47 years.

However, the credit goes to them because in my mind the tenacity, the determination and the skill they showed in fighting this political battle was equal to the seamanship and courage they showed during the period under discussion.

I thank the minister, the hon. member for Crowfoot and the committee for the excellent work they have done, and the others who have also made contributions. I thank the House and I thank you, Mr. Chairman, for indulging and allowing me these few moments to put on record these remarks that will be very important to the merchant navy veterans and to those who fought that fight and who I am sure are celebrating today a great victory.

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Chairman, it gives me great pleasure to join my colleagues in support of this bill, an act to amend the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act, the War Veterans Allowance Act and the Pension Act and to amend other acts in consequence thereof.

We all know that this bill took a long time in coming down the pike. Merchant mariners have been calling long and hard for this type of action. Merchant navy veterans faced the great obstacles of weather and war to protect the supply line to the United Kingdom during World War I and World War II.

The new definition of merchant navy veteran outlined in the bill is far-reaching. The veteran is a person who had service on a Canadian ship while on a high seas voyage during World War I or World War II, or a Canadian national who had service on an allied ship while on a high seas voyage during either world war. It also includes any person who from 1950 to 1953 had service on a Canadian ship while on a voyage in dangerous waters.

As my colleague from Hillsborough and the Minister of Veterans Affairs have mentioned Bill C-84 has two main purposes, both of which are eminently supportable.

First, this bill will extend certain benefits to our wartime merchant mariners. Second, it will take away War Veterans Allowance benefits from persons who served as members of allied resistance forces.

The second point is important in the interest of fairness. It may be difficult to assess how many illegitimate claims were made to the government by people who would never be eligible. It is important to note that without legislation the resistance component of the program is forecast to take up over 50 per cent, or $60 million, of the total program expenditures within five years.

We all know that this is unacceptable when there are needy veterans out there who have served our country well and while at the same time our nation is faced with a huge debt.

• (1730)

About 5,800 War Veterans Allowance recipients are getting government money because they were members of a resistance force. About 1,700 of the total are receiving the benefit outside Canada. Personally, I do not agree with that.

By contrast, under 1,000 Canadians and allied veterans with formal military service receive War Veterans Allowance outside Canada. With Bill C-84 resistance members now need to demonstrate 10 years residency in Canada. A Canadian citizenship is not a requirement of the WVA Act.

It is good to see that this bill will make permanent the requirement that a resistance fighter receiving money from the Canadian people through their federal government must live in Canada. That only makes common sense, something that does not happen all that often in this House of Commons.

As we know, through the provisions of this bill, recipients now living outside Canada will have one year to return to Canada or lose their entitlement altogether.

When the WVA Act was first passed, it was never Parliament's intent that resistance service would qualify as military service. Through interpretation of the act by quasi-judicial bodies, this qualification arose. I wonder if those people who made these decisions were ever in battle for their lives as our courageous veterans were.

I say again that I heartily endorse the government's efforts to correct this loophole. The purpose of the resistance group changes in Bill C-84 is to restore the excellent War Veterans Allowance program to its original purpose, to provide income support to wartime Canadian and allied veterans of regular military forces.

I know that all the Royal Canadian Legions in my riding fully support this measure. I meet with the local legion presidents regularly. One thing that comes through crystal clear is that everything should be fair and be seen to be fair. God knows our veterans have confronted death and destruction and governments of every party have supported them. They want to be treated with the respect they deserve. We owe everything to our veterans.

The bill states that no new applications from resistance fighters will be accepted and the current recipients will lose their benefits if they move abroad. As well, those now living in another country are given one year to take up residency again in Canada or lose the War Veterans Allowance. All Canadians with common sense would back that as I and the members of the Official Opposition do.

I want to point out to the House that the Royal Canadian Legion will hold its 34th Dominion Convention in Quebec City later this month. Resolution No. 16, that deals with War Veterans Allowance for allies has been prepared. The resolution says that in 1930 the War Veterans Act was enacted and included payment to allied veterans, the intention being to ensure protection to those Canadians who served in His Majesty's Forces such as the Royal Air Force, since Canada had no air force of its own during World War I.

Further, it says that Canada is the only nation in the world paying such compensation to allied veterans, and Canadians living in foreign lands do not receive anything comparable to the War Veterans Allowance from their host country.

The legion says: "There are known cases of fraud, which are now being investigated by the RCMP, of people who could be getting the benefits without the service".

The resolution says furthermore that Veterans Affairs Canada pays a large portion of the War Veterans Allowance budget to allies, and whereas there are outstanding funding requirements to meet the ever-increasing health care needs of Canadian veterans and their widows, therefore be it resolved that the Royal Canadian Legion requests the Minister of Veterans Affairs to amend the War Veterans Allowance legislation by tightening up the allied veterans provision and to ensure that the benefits are extreme towards Canadian and Commonwealth veterans and their dependents.

It also says that be it further resolved that any War Veterans Allowance payments made outside Canada should only be made to veterans of Canadian and Commonwealth wartime armed forces.

Bill C-84 answers that legion resolution. I am sure all those in attendance at the convention will be delighted.

This particular piece of legislation makes my job as a member of the opposition but more important as a member of Parliament, all that much easier when I can get up and support a government proposal. Too often we hear Canadians complaining that all we do is fight and argue while the country waits for action on the important matters. Here is an example of government legislation that is good, fair, fiscally responsible, and supported by members of the opposition.

I do add very quickly that this bill has been a long time in coming. Its full recognition of merchant mariners is long overdue, but the benefits provided will be of great help to the aging veterans.

I am pleased to have had an opportunity, how ever brief it was, to speak on the merits of this bill. As my friend from Hillsborough stated in his speech, we will be supporting this bill.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Chairman, I realize the House has agreed to expedite this legislation, something that I thoroughly welcome. Therefore, I will not speak at length on this bill which is something I would normally like to do because it is an issue very close to me.

I welcome and commend the final and full recognition of merchant marine veterans. It is something that has been long overdue. I am especially pleased to see their full eligibility for the Veterans Independence Program.

I cannot let the debate pass however without rising on behalf of the many merchant marine veterans in the South Shore area and indeed the many in Nova Scotia. I know this legislation will be welcomed by all people in my province.

This is an issue that has been close to my heart. It was one of the few campaign pledges I made when I ran for public office, to fight on behalf of this issue. This was the first issue I raised as a member of Parliament when I came here in 1988. I have raised it several times since. As the Minister of Veterans Affairs knows, I have been at his door about this for a long time. This is a very, very happy day for me and I just want to mark that occasion by mentioning it.

I wish to commend members on all sides of this House for their support of this legislation. I wish to commend all members of the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs and, in particular, the chairman who is unable to be here today.

I wish to commend Senator Jack Marshall who has fought for this cause for many, many years. I wish to commend the merchant marine veterans associations who have fought for this. In particular, I wish to commend this Minister of Veterans Affairs who, after 47 years, was the minister who took up this issue, took it to cabinet, got it approved and has it before us here today.

In closing my remarks, I am pleased to quote a couple of sentences from a letter from the president of the Royal Canadian Legion who writes to the minister: "I write to congratulate you for the obviously considerable amount of time and thought that went into the production of these amendments. You can count on the support of the Royal Canadian Legion in these proposals." He goes on to say: "There is no doubt that this legislation is a major step forward towards satisfying the remaining needs of those deserving merchant navy veterans who supplied the tools and the fuel for war and the defence of democracy".

It is a happy day for all merchant marine veterans and a day that should make all Canadians proud.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Chairman, I want to echo the comments of my hon. friend from South Shore. It is not very often that we get the chance in this House, particularly these two Nova Scotians, to agree on very much in this place, but the comments that he just made are ones that I want to echo. I also want to congratulate the minister and all the members of this House who have worked so hard to bring this bill to the floor and to committee today.

Being a member from Dartmouth, the old riding being Dartmouth—Halifax East, makes this bill even more important. My hon. colleague from P.E.I. indicated in the history lesson he was giving in his speech that it was way back at the beginning of the war that the first group of merchant vessels steamed out of Halifax harbour. There are a lot of people a little older than I am who remember all of those vessels steaming out of Halifax Harbour.

There are a lot of veterans still down there and a lot of new veterans created by this bill, those merchant mariners who served for Canada and served for the Commonwealth during World War II. It is indeed fitting that finally they have received the recognition due them.

• (1740)

We must remember that the individuals who served in the merchant marine were not just regular or normal veterans. Most of the veterans who we sent over were trained in the military. They knew how to operate offensive and defensive weaponry.

When dealing with merchant mariners, these are individuals who ran supply vessels. When these vessels left and went across the ocean even with an armed convoy to protect them, many times they were the slowest boats because they were supply vessels.

When the German U-boats went after them, those vessels would be the first to be sunk. You also have to remember that they really did not have any heavy armaments on them. As a result of this, the men who served in the merchant marine and the merchant marine generally suffered the highest casualties of any branch of service in the armed forces during the Second World War.

We know that as each year passes the number of veterans diminishes. They are getting older and each year there are more and more who die. I think it is extremely fitting at this point in time that this bill looks at the whole aspect of recognition of the service that they have given to this country, not only by the provision of additional benefits but also by conferring on them a new status and a new title, "merchant marine veterans".

The word veterans means a lot to those who are still left and who served in the merchant marine. It means an awful lot to the sons and daughters of those who are gone, those fathers who served in the merchant marine.

I want to join with everybody in this House in saying that every member of this place, no matter what political affiliation, is extremely pleased to see this bill: I want to commend the minister for his stick-to-itiveness to get to this point and to bring it forward.

I also want to give some recognition to my hon. colleague from Regina—Lumsden. I think one of the first times that I can remember hearing about this issue was well before I was a member of Parliament. I was watching a debate on the parliamentary channel. That member was up very clearly and articulately stating the case for full recognition of the contribution of the merchant mariners as veterans. I am sure that it is an extremely proud day for him that this House is seized with this issue today and hopefully at the end of the day that for which he has fought so long will see its way into legislation.

[Translation]

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): Mr. Chairman, I would also like to congratulate the minister and thank him for tabling this bill in the House. I also want to thank members of the opposition for doing everything they can to adopt this bill as quickly as possible.

When I became a member of the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs, I was astonished when I found out about this blatant injustice which had been dragging on for more than 45 years, in fact quite a bit more if we include World War I. For decades, the government had refused to recognize the war records of merchant seamen who had agreed of their own free will to serve on board ships engaged in supplying the troops on the European front. They had been ignored. It was felt they were not real veterans.

Today, I am pleased to join hon. members in adopting a bill that will make amends for the tremendous injustice suffered by these men who sacrificed their lives. It must be said, that of all those who served in the two great wars, merchant seamen paid the highest price in human lives. No other unit, the air force, the marines or the army, suffered as many losses as the merchant seamen.

I am pleased to see that this legislation will be adopted today, and once again I wish to congratulate the minister.

[English]

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Chairman, I have a couple of questions which perhaps the minister could clarify.

First of all, in the standing committee report there was reference to the issue of merchant navy prisoners of war. The minister will know, of course, that under the basic disability pension for prisoners of war, there are steps which express the percentage of basic disability pension. For example, if someone was interned for 90 to 545 days they would receive 10 per cent of the basic disability as compensation, 15 per cent for 546 to 910 days and then those interned for more than 910 days receive 25 per cent of the basic disability pension.

In World War II, of the 2,198 military prisoners of war, fewer than 40 were incarcerated for more than three years or 1,100 days. Yet of 198 merchant navy prisoners of war, 122 were interned for periods of four to five years. The committee suggested that it would be reasonable to have the time measured compensation extrapolated beyond 30 months so that those who were interned for longer periods would be entitled to additional benefits.

I was wondering if the minister could indicate whether this comment in the committee report was considered by the government. It certainly is not part of this bill. Why not? Will the government consider that particular idea as another element of justice to the merchant navy veterans, those who were unfortunate enough to be interned for these excessive periods of time during World War II?

Mr. Merrithew: Mr. Chairman, I should just mention that I do know where that particular suggestion comes from. There is an association, not a very large one, the Merchant Navy POWs. They have been trying to put their views forward to the minister and the government over a period of time.

During the discussion of the report of the standing committee, and indeed this whole issue, we met with the president of that particular group. He agreed at the time that the priority was to get this legislation through and get benefits for all merchant mariners, including the status veteran, and that he would put off the other issue until we get this thing through. Obviously we will have to do that.

I should point out that merchant navy prisoners of war are treated exactly the same way as are the uniformed prisoners of war. The same legislation covers them. It will have to be one that will be dealt with later. That was with the concurrence of the president of the POW Association.

Mr. Proud: I ask a question of the people at the table. Under 8(c), page 5, I just wondered if it could be explained to me again what happens in this 8(c) where it says:

> (c) after taking into consideration such corroboration as may be available, the Minister or the Commission, as the case may be, is satisfied, on the balance of probabilities, that the information in the declaration or statement is true.

I want to know what that does to the benefit of the doubt.

Mr. Merrithew: Mr. Chairman, in considering applications to the Canadian Pension Commission, in the absence of other hard evidence, the commission would have to take into consideration a statutory declaration as to the service or maybe an event that happened during the service of a veteran.

The hon. member asked what the benefit of the doubt would be. It would not affect that at all. In the case of a statutory declaration the commission would still give the benefit of the doubt to the veteran.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 3—Status of males and females

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, I was out getting a little assistance here. I gather there is some concern that this bill is going to take us a long time. I just want to assure the House that I see no reason why it should take us very much longer. There are very few further points we wish to raise and we are going to try to accommodate all sides of the House in getting this disposed of. Everybody can just relax and let us get this bill considered fairly.

I would like to move an amendment to clause 3 of the bill. The amendment I would like to move is in respect of clause 3 which purports to amend sections 5 and 6 of the act. My amendment would deal with one of the provisions considered for section 6 and in particular the definition of high seas voyage.

The definition of high seas voyage has three parts to it: (a), (b) and (c). My amendment would be to (c) and would come on page 3 of the act, line 2. I would seek to add the words to subsection (c) "or was in danger of attack by the enemy" after the word "enemy". I have those words in French as well.

Let me explain my amendment this way. First of all, the benefits that are being extended to merchant mariners by this bill are affected by clause 9 which provides that:

> The Pension Act applies to and in respect of merchant navy veterans
> (a) as though their service while on a high seas voyage had been military service rendered during World War I or World War II within the meaning of section 21(1) of that Act;

The term "high seas voyage" determines whether a person becomes entitled to the benefits under the act, and high seas voyage is defined in the new clause 6. It includes a voyage during the course of which the ship was attacked by the enemy.

I propose that it should add the words that I gave "or was in danger of attack by the enemy".

The way the bill is developed, a merchant mariner will become entitled to the benefits on any voyage outside territorial waters of Canada and on some territorial voyages, including those in which the ship was actually attacked. But it does not cover those who were in dangerous waters while they were in territorial waters.

Therefore it is important in my view that the coverage of the bill be extended, not only to those who were actually attacked while in territorial waters of Canada or its allies, for example within the three-mile limit of Britain. These are the merchant marines who would be on a voyage totally within the three-mile limit of Britain, or the three-mile limit of Canada, and where those waters would be defined as "dangerous waters".

As the bill has provided, you only get the benefits if your vessel was attacked. Therefore there is a distinction made between those who served in the navy and those who served in the merchant marine. Those who served in the merchant marine have to get outside the territorial limits to be assured of benefits and only receive the benefits within territorial waters if their ship is attacked.

Therefore I would ask the committee to agree to this amendment as an element of fairness to our merchant mariners.

The Deputy Chairman: I would like to thank the hon. member for Victoria for allowing the Table and myself to have a look at the amendment.

I have looked at it and I am willing to rule now. Unfortunately I have to rule this amendment out of order because it goes beyond the limitations as set by the royal recommendation attached to this bill.

Indeed this amendment will allow more sailors to be eligible under the bill but this is contrary to citation 246(3) of Beauchesne's fourth edition which states in part:

> The guiding principle in determining the effect of an amendment upon the financial initiative of the Crown is that the communication, to which the royal demand of recommendation is attached, must be treated as laying down once for all (unless withdrawn and replaced) not only the amount of a change, but also its objects, purposes, conditions and qualifications. In relation to the standard thereby fixed, an amendment infringes the financial initiative of the Crown, not only if it increases the amount, but also if it extends the objects and the purposes, or relaxes the conditions and qualifications expressed in the communication by which the Crown has demanded or recommended a charge.

Therefore I must rule against the amendment.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, we of course accept your ruling. I just say that this is something we will put on the agenda for future consideration and seek in future to see if we cannot persuade government to extend the bill in this fashion.

On Clause 4—Evidence

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Chairman, I have more the nature of a question than an amendment. If I am a little slow sometimes getting up it is in part because the numbers are a little confusing. The clause in the bill seeks to amend sections in the act. Section 9 of the act as it will be amended provides that the Pension Act applies to and in respect of merchant navy veterans as though their service were on a high seas voyage and being military service rendered during the war, et cetera.

Later in the bill, on page 7, part 1.1, the bill makes certain provisions for civilian merchant seamen and salt water fishermen. It expressly provides that for those persons, the civilians, if they suffer or contract an injury or disease or aggravation thereof while proceeding to their ship or returning from their ship or on leave from their ship, they will receive benefits under the act.

I would like it made absolutely clear that for merchant mariners the effect of the amendment in clause 4 of this bill will be to ensure that the exact same protection—and I understand this to be the insurance liability principle that is referred to by those who are very familiar with all this—is fully extended to merchant mariners.

I would ask the minister to make it clear that the benefits referred to in the latter clause for civilians are all in every respect available to merchant mariners, in particular that they are covered while they are proceeding to or from their ship, or while they are on leave in the case of injuries or disease.

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Chairman, the insurance principle is a very important principle with regard to applications for pensions under the Pension Act because it covers the veteran, in this case the merchant navy veteran, for 24 hours while he is on duty. In this case the merchant navy is going to get the same treatment as a uniformed veteran would get. If they were proceeding on the way to performance of their duty on board a ship, they would be covered under the insurance principle in the Pension Act.

It is attributable. As long as it is attributable to the service, they would be covered.

Mr. Brewin: Just to be very clear. He said proceeding to. How about proceeding from and while on leave, the precise provisions in clause 15(2)?

Mr. Merrithew: Mr. Chairman, I just want to make sure. It means if they are on the way to their service on board the merchant ship or from it they are covered, the same as they would be under the military. In the case of leave, if it were authorized leave on a high seas voyage under the definitions under clause 3 of the bill, they are covered.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the hon. member for Victoria have another amendment on clause 4?

Mr. Brewin: No, Mr. Chairman.

Clauses 5 to 8 inclusive agreed to.

On Clause 9—Pension and Allowances

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, I want to bring to the attention of the minister my concern over this section of the act.

I am not questioning the point he is making here where no new applications will be accepted. I accept readily that portion of the bill whereby more of the recipients of the allowance have to reside here in the country.

The particular problem I am facing, and I face it on a daily basis, is that I am hearing from many people in my community who were part of the resistance movement who have said that their application has been in the system upwards of two, three, and four years. As there was a re-examination in the last two years of all of the applications because of some fraudulent applicants, many of the legitimate applications were affected.

What we have is a situation now where the Government of Greece has verified the legitimacy of many of these applications that have been in the system. Now that they are back here in Canada because of the March 2 date, these people who would otherwise have been approved now find themselves caught in a situation where their applications are not being accepted.

It marks the first time that we as a country have really withdrawn a benefit from someone who has not only been in the queue, but has been in the system and is going through the process not only of verification, but in many instances this verification process has been going on for a second time.

Now that that has happened I think this part of the act is not fair. I would appeal through you, Mr. Chairman, to the minister to address this because it is causing a lot of hardship for a lot of people in my community, especially those members of the Greek resistance fighters.

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Chairman, what we tried to do in clauses 9 to 11 of this particular bill was to return the War Veterans Allowance program to exactly what previous Parliaments in history—this is since 1930—intended to do. It was for our own uniformed people. No country on earth gives pensions to a foreign nation for resistance service.

I want to state that we did not make that decision as a government. It was made by a quasi judicial board and eventually by a court as an interpretation of the laws which exist. We are correcting that. We are returning the program to what it was intended for, that is for veterans who were in uniform in time of war.

With regard to the point about the people in the queue, there is no question there were a lot of people in the queue. In fact, there were 1,600 people in the queue, most of them from one particular country. Obviously, as the government dealt with that particular issue, it had to deal with additional applications from those who were also in uniform during the war who were applying for War Veterans Allowance.

The government made the decision at that time that it was not going to process any more War Veterans Allowance applications after March 2, 1992. The decision was made by the government. It did affect the people who were in the queue but it did not affect those who were in receipt of War Veterans Allowance, because they had been grandfathered. That particular group received their benefits as a result of an interpretation of our legislation. We are going to honour that and grandfather those. The government has made a decision that it is going to return this legislation effective March 2, 1992 to what it was intended for, War Veterans Allowance for the uniformed people.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I think that the misunderstanding comes when the minister uses this expression "in the queue". These are not people who were lining up to put in an application. I am talking about people who had their application accepted by the department. They were in the system and were in the process of being verified. Had there not been this period where because of some fraudulent applications all of them ended up being reviewed, many of them would have been approved and, therefore, they would have been part of this benefit.

The point that I am trying to make is that I am not talking about new applications. The minister has made a deadline of March 2. He has said "no new applications". On those applications which the department accepted, especially those that have been in the department for two and three years and which have been verified, not only by the Government of Greece but also by other forms of verification here, I appeal to the minister to differentiate between those that were in the queue and those that were inside the process.

Mr. Merrithew: I can assure the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood that I was not mistaken and that I know which ones he is talking about. He kept saying "accepted by the department". He means where they had made the application to the department, the department had received them but not necessarily accepted and processed them.

Obviously there is an issue here, the whole process of verifying the applications. That is verifying the service in time of war in another country. It is called a validation process. This takes a long time. Obviously we have to work through a foreign government to verify that. For those people who were verified we processed them, and the ones that were not verified we set the date as of March 2, 1992 and we were going to cut off those people who were not at that time in receipt of War Veterans Allowance.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 10 to 20 inclusive agreed to.

On Clause 21—Regulations respecting merchant navy veterans

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): My friend was very helpful and did not say adopté. Clause 21 provides:

> Regulations made under the Department of Veterans Affairs Act for the first time after this section comes into force for the purpose of providing merchant navy veterans and their dependents and survivors with benefits similar to those provided to veterans and their dependents and survivors shall, if they so provide, be retroactive and be deemed to have come into force on a day prior to the day on which they were made, which prior day may not be before the day on which this Act is assented to.

I do not know if anybody can make any sense out of that. The minister says that he can make some sense out of it, but what I would like is the minister's assurances, because he has given these privately, to make sure it is on the record of the House.

The benefits payable under the Department of Veterans Affairs Act to military veterans will be made available in exactly the same way to merchant navy veterans and that will be by way of regulation. The minister has those regulations in the works. They will be promulgated along with the act, God and the Senate willing, on or before July 1 of this year.

Mr. Merrithew: Clause 21 of the bill talks about retroactivity. We were working on the assumption that the bill would be through all stages, through the Senate in all stages, would be given Royal Assent and proclaimed, we hoped, by July 1, 1992. Assuming that could not have happened, we had to put a provision in under clause 21 that would be retroactive to that date should it be after July 1.

In the case of the regulations, I can assure the member that I ordered the deputy minister some months ago to start working on the assumption that the bill would be as we submitted it. Hopefully it will pass this House today.

The regulations are in written form and are prepared to be submitted. If I am not mistaken, they will go before Treasury Board and then a special committee of cabinet within a two-week period. That means we will be able to put this particular program into effect on July 1, 1992 as I stated when I made the announcement on the bill.

Clause agreed to.

On Clause 22—Coming into force

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Chairman, I have a fear that my amendment to clause 22 is out of order. In any event I am going to try it on. It is retroactive so perhaps that is the best way to deal with it.

I would propose a new clause 22 that will provide that the disability pensions payable under this act be made retroactive to the date at which the applicant became disabled. As well there are other similar retroactive benefits which I would like to see the bill provide.

It seems to me that merchant navy veterans and their survivors and spouses have waited long for this. This is not going to be a big bill to the government. It is one which I think we owe them. Therefore I would like to see if it would be in order to move such an amendment.

I have a copy of it here, but perhaps on my description of it you might be able to indicate your view.

The Deputy Chairman: I thank the hon. member for Victoria for bringing this to my attention earlier.

This amendment would infringe on the financial initiative of the Crown as it enlarges the limitations as set by the royal recommendation attached to the bill.

I refer hon. members to citation 246(3) of Beauchesne's fourth edition which I quoted earlier. I regret that I cannot accept that amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Merrithew moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I say to the member for Mississauga South that I just cannot let this bill go through without putting forward the point of view of the people in my community.

There are a lot of winners in this bill. I salute that part of the bill where the winners are looked after. I salute the minister and the department. I have absolutely no debate about that particular aspect of the bill.

I have close to 7,000 people from the Greek community in my riding. I have more people of the Greek community living in my riding than in any other place in the world outside Athens. In the last two months not a day has gone by that I have not been asked to appeal to the minister by people who have served not only their country but our country as well. They have families here. They have made fabulous contributions to this country. They have asked me to appeal to the Minister of Veterans Affairs to see if there is not some way that fairness could be addressed in this particular bill.

I took this bill up in committee. The minister cannot seem to understand that the people who have been in the system and have been part of the process for three years feel that they are quite different from someone who just comes in and fills out an application post March 2. They feel that there is a big difference.

I know it is not just happening in my riding. I have heard from my colleagues from Saint-Denis, Saint-Laurent and Scarborough West. What bothers me about this bill is that an amendment is being made that asks resistance fighters who live outside the country to return to the country within a year.

No one complains about that. We accept that amendment. Naturally we are not going to cancel the benefits that have already been approved. The expectation has been created that applications will be approved as long as they are not fraudulent. That expectation is contained in documentation that has been sent out to individual people saying subject to further investigation by the Greek government and subject to further verification.

If I were a legitimate Greek resistance fighter and my application had been in the department for three years, and I knew it was legitimate, I would know it was just a matter of time. What is essentially being said to me with this amendment is that I am going to be left hanging. Does the minister know what is bad about this? It is that I have now been lumped in with those applications that are fraudulent, not to mention the fact that I have neighbours around me many of whom were part of the same movement. This is not just in my riding. It is the same in the riding of my colleague from Saint-Denis who is an honorary Greek citizen.

The minister cannot understand the unfairness of knowing that your neighbours are sitting there recognized and receiving the allowance and now all of a sudden because of this March 2 arbitrary date you are not.

In my riding some people believed on trust that it would ultimately be processed. Some of them went out and borrowed a little money from their banker to put extensions on their houses. Maybe they have bought new cars hoping this would eventually come through. Now they are saying: "My goodness, I am stuck. I am not getting the allowance and I have actually borrowed against it".

We are all terribly sensitive to the deficit and the debt, but this is not a question of deficit and debt. This is a question of fairness. If persons are legitimate and have been in the system for the last three years they should be accepted. The government chose to review them. I do not question the action of reviewing applications. More than once some fraudulent activity has been detected, but once those reviews have been completed people who were part of the system should be accepted. They should not be compared to someone who after March 2 knocks on the door and says: "Give me an application and put me into the system". They are two entirely different groups of people.

I ask the minister to understand that people come into my office every day and say: "Where is the fairness in this?" He has to understand that it is pretty difficult for me to give them an acceptable answer.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, in winding up this debate I just want to thank all those who have been involved: the three parties, all members of the committee who worked very hard, and the chairman, the hon. member for Crowfoot who is now in his riding. I wish him all the best and all of the people who took part, especially those groups and veterans associations that appeared before us.

This is a great day for merchant mariners and for veterans in general.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to join in those remarks. This is a very big day for Canada. It is a very big day for the merchant navy of this country which has served us so gallantly.

It has been a long struggle for those who have kept the fight going over these many years when it must have seemed very tough to do it. I am sure they will be very pleased. It is an important day for all of us and for Parliament.

Again we congratulate all those involved. In particular I would like to join with others in congratulating the minister for, as he said, having this go through on his watch.

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to drag the debate out, but I do want to comment on the remarks of the member for Broadview—Greenwood. I want to state very clearly that I understand that issue. I understand it all too clearly. I have been at it for a long time.

Since 1930 when this act was introduced no Parliament has considered amendments and since 1930 no Parliament ever intended resistance fighters to get war veterans allowance.

That was done by a quasi-judicial board, and there was later an interpretation of the act by the Federal Court of Appeal.

In the meantime those that were processed were honoured. We were even generous enough to grandfather them, and that is fair.

However, I want to say that there are an awful lot of people who do not think it is particularly fair. I can understand that as well. This government made a deliberate decision to do this. It was done after a lot of consultation with veterans groups. It was mentioned here today that there are resolutions on the floor of the convention two weeks from now in Quebec City suggesting that we return War Veterans Allowance to what Parliament always intended it to be. This government certainly intends to do so.

I would like to read a quote from the Royal Canadian Legion, which is by far the largest veterans organization in Canada, representing 600,000 veterans. It said in a letter to me: "The executive officers of the Legion also want you to know you have our unqualified support for the amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act relating to allied resistance groups. We are of the firm belief that benefits for veterans must first and foremost be available to Canadians and to allied veterans living in Canada".

Having said that I do wish to extend my thanks to the opposition members and to my own colleagues who were so supportive on this issue over the months that we dealt with it.

I particularly want to thank my critics today. I thank the hon. member for Hillsborough, who has Veterans Affairs Canada, the largest employer in P.E.I., in his own riding. He has been very interested in veterans issues.

I thank the hon. member for Victoria, who filled in very adequately for our ailing critic from Regina—Lumsden. They all have been very supportive of veterans issues.

My thanks to one and all.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

CANADA DEPOSIT INSURANCE CORPORATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-48, an act to amend the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There are four motions in amendment at report stage to Bill C-48, an act to amend the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act and to amend other acts in consequence thereof.

Motion No. 1 standing in the name of the hon. member for Mississauga South will be debated and voted upon separately.

Motion No. 2 standing in the name of the hon. member for Mississauga South will be debated and voted upon separately.

Motion No. 3 standing in the name of the hon. member for Mississauga South will be debated and voted upon separately.

Motion No. 4 standing in the name of the hon. member for Malpeque will be debated and voted upon separately.

I shall now propose Motion No. 1.

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, I think you will find there is unanimous consent following report stage to proceed immediately to third reading.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South) moved:

That Bill C–48 be amended in Clause 11 by striking out lines 18 to 21 at page 5 and substituting the following therefor:

(a) an agreement for a transaction referred to in subsection 39.19(1) is reasonably likely to be expeditiously entered into after the making of the order, and

(b) any such transaction would be consistent with the objects of the Corporation, the Corporation may request the Minis—"

He said: Mr. Speaker, I move that clause 11 be amended on page 5 in accordance with the motion that I set down as Motion No. 1.

• (1830)

Having gone over the bill in the Standing Committee on Finance in the House of Commons, we took the bill to the Senate's committee and the Senate analyzed the committee hearings before the House committee. The Senate made a number of suggestions and those suggestions make a lot of sense.

What we came up with was Motion No. 1, which just for greater clarity provides for a better restructuring of a troubled institution. The amendment makes it explicit that CDIC's objects are there to serve as an important criteria in any decision made in a FIRP under the provisions of this particular bill.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I just want to say that we on this side of the House have no problem with this motion. It simply adds a little more clarity to the splendid job we had done in the committee on Bill C–48.

I am prepared to give a nod to the Senate. In this case it has simply done a little fine tuning to what we have done in terms of the FIRPing of a financial institution.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, we in this party have no problems with Motion No. 1 and will be agreeing to it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 1 agreed to.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South) moved:

(a) by striking out line 21 at page 6 and substituting the following:

"assignee or successor in interest of the person who was the";

"member institution, or the assignees or successors in interest of those persons, and";

(c) by striking out line 42 at page 14 and substituting the following:

"institution, or the assignee or successor in interest of that person";

"(b) that each person who held, or is the assignee or successor in interest of a person who held, shares or";

"persons, or the assignees or successors in interest of the persons, who together held at least 10 per";

(f) by striking out line 2 at page 16 and substituting the following:

"that debt in the Corporation or, where, after the making of the order, the rights of those persons in respect of those shares or that subordinated debt have been assigned to or have devolved on other persons, those other persons.";

(g) by striking out line 9 on page 16 and substituting the following:

"that debt in the Corporation or, where, after the making of the order, the rights of those persons in respect of those shares or that subordinated debt have been assigned to or have devolved on other persons, those other persons."

He said: Mr. Speaker, this motion is pursuant to the Senate discussions on this bill. It makes it easier for holders of shares and subordinated debt of a vested company to sell the rights to compensation attached to those shares to others.

What happens is we FIRP the company and then there is some time before the shares are either bought out by the CDIC or whether they are given back to the company that is FIRPed.

In the meantime these particular assets might be sold and this amendment provides for a sale of these assets in that intervening period. The amendments do this by permitting the CDIC to hand over shares and debt to either of their original holders or to the persons who subsequently acquired the rights to them because under the bill if the CDIC FIRPs a company, then sells some of the assets, pays itself out, solves its problems, it can give back the remainder of the company to the shareholders and the subordinated debt holders. This means the buyers of those subordinated debts or the buyers of those shares can get them in the same fashion as the original holders had them when the company was FIRPed in the first place. It is a very simple amendment.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I agree with that amendment, it is important and certainly it is needed. We will be voting for it.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, this amendment simply gives greater certainty to what happens to the assets or the shares when a company is FIRPed. We have no problem with it and we will support the amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 2 agreed to.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South) moved:

That Bill C–48 be amended in Clause 11 by adding immediately after line 33 at page 12 the following:

"(1.1) For greater certainty, the liabilities of a federal member institution do not, for the purposes of paragraph (1)(c), include its subordinated debt."

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is again a technical amendment arising from the Senate hearings.

It certainly is a technical amendment. It clarifies the meaning of the term "liabilities". It defines liabilities so that liabilities do not include subordinated debt because you can take all of the assets of a company with exception of the subordinated debt and the shares. You may have to pay off the liabilities of a company but you do not have to pay off the subordinated debt so it segregates liabilities and subordinated debt. It is really a technical amendment but it is an important amendment in terms of the FIRPing process.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member. It is a technical amendment. It clarifies liabilities for the purpose of restructuring. I agree with it.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, we on this side of House have no problem in supporting this amendment. It is strictly a technical one. As my hon. friend has said, it is an important one. We certainly have no difficulty with it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 3 agreed to.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque) moved:

That Bill C–48 be amended in Clause 11 by adding immediately after line 30 at page 20 the following:

"39.36 An order under section 39.13 shall not be made after the fifth anniversary of the coming into force of the section."

She said: Mr. Speaker, this amendment is really a five–year sunset clause. It prevents any FIRPing orders five years after the legislation we are discussing today becomes law.

The intent is to force a review of the financial institution restructuring process after five years. This legislation gives major powers to the Canadian Deposit Insurance Corporation which effectively allows it to take over a troubled financial institution.

We feel that a five-year test period for this kind of a major new power is quite reasonable. A five-year sunset clause is actually in the Bank Act, the insurance, the co-operative and the trust legislation that we passed previously.

Also there was a very low degree of consensus among the industry players; the banks, the trust companies, and the corporate lawyers. They raised many issues. With the five-year review, these issues and concerns could be brought up again and addressed.

I would urge the House to support this five-year sunset clause.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, quite frankly I do not see the need for this amendment.

It suggests that there could be some difficulties arising and there is a need to review the legislation. We had Justice Estey come before our committee. He had the experience with the Northlands Bank. He had recommended to Parliament that when we have to step in and take over a financial institution, restructure it or sell it off or wind it down by always going to Parliament and passing a bill, which is what we had to do back in 1985, what we needed was a more permanent and long-term solution to the problem. That is how we got this bill.

Surely, if there are problems arising with the bill we ought not to wait five years before we review it. If after one year or two there is a problem, I would hope that the government, whatever it is, does not sit on its hands and allow a situation to arise where one does not come back and review the thing to correct it. Therefore I do not really see the need for a sunset clause.

A sunset clause indicates that somehow or other, five years from now, you may not even need this legislation. I cannot see that as I look in the crystal ball and see what is happening in the financial institutions of this country at the moment. I see the melting down that is taking place, the problems that have arisen as a result of the recession, the real estate loans that are going down the tubes and the financial institutions that are being taken down with them. I see the need to have this legislation, but I do not see the need for an amendment. If we have a problem, surely we are not going to wait five years before we review it.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Malpeque raised an amendment similar to this at committee suggesting a three-year sunset clause. We opposed it then and we are opposing this one now because this is only a portion of the CDIC bill.

The CDIC bill itself may need to be reviewed. Indeed, Monday night the finance committee's subcommittee on financial institutions reviewed the CDIC and there are some problems that may be there and there may be some problems with OSFI and so on. There may be some problems with the CDIC in total.

I do not think that this particular part, this very small section dealing with FIRPing, ought to be reviewed by itself. We may have to have some reviews, but surely this particular section will probably never be used. It is a hammer that is there but I am not so sure it is the kind of hammer that a government will ever use. I am not so sure that it is a hammer that OSFI will ever recommend. I am not so sure that it is a hammer that a minister will ever authorize.

I believe that this hammer that is in the CDIC in this particular bill we are passing now—a minor amendment to the CDIC bill in total—ought to remain without any special—this amendment is special—sunset for this particular special provision. I think the amendment is specious in that sense and that it ought to be debated.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

An hon. member: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Deblois): I declare the motion lost.

Motion No. 4 negatived.

[Translation]

Hon. Kim Campbell (for the Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)) moved that Bill C-48, as amended, be concurred in at report stage with further amendments.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre) (for the Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)) moved that Bill C-48 be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): We will begin debate with the hon. member for South Shore.

[English]

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to lead off today's third reading debate on Bill C-48. This bill which amends the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act has benefited from a thorough discussion by the House finance committee. A number of very helpful amendments have been made to the bill and I will have more to say about these in a moment.

It will be recalled that this bill expands the range of options available to the government for dealing with troubled financial institutions. Specifically, it gives the CDIC the authority to arrange and carry out the sale of a troubled federally regulated financial institution to a healthy institution.

These new measures which we call the Financial Institutions Restructuring Process or FIRP, were first proposed by the government in the blue paper on financial sector reform. Other major elements of the reforms set out in the blue paper have already been considered and endorsed by this House. It is time now to complete this process of reform and give passage to this remaining piece of legislation.

I will review very briefly why the restructuring powers set out in this bill are needed. As the federal deposit insurers, CDIC can be exposed to substantial potential losses when a member institution gets into financial difficulty and the institution's capital declines.

This legislation helps control CDIC's exposure to loss by giving CDIC the means to act with the approval of the minister in a timely manner to put a troubled institution back on a solid footing. In this way, the new powers will make it possible to run a more cost-effective deposit insurance system.

A fundamental goal of providing these new powers is to enable federal authorities to arrange a restructuring transaction which preserves the value of a troubled institution as much as possible. This is in the best interests of the institution's depositors and creditors and the deposit insurer.

Generally speaking shareholders want to see the value of their institution maintained. But once a deposit-taking institution's capital falls below a certain level, shareholders may find themselves in a position where they have little left to lose by the institution's further decline.

At this stage, declines in the value of the assets of the institution will be borne more and more by the creditors of the institution, its uninsured depositors and the deposit insurer.

Bill C-48 contains measures to deal with this situation and give federal authorities more control over the cost of resolving a financial institution's difficulties.

The restructuring process vests all ownership of the troubled institution in CDIC and gives CDIC the power to approve a restructuring proposal, including the sale of the shares of the institution or the sale of its assets and liabilities.

It is important to understand how CDIC will carry out this role. CDIC will be guided by the objectives set out in its act. In particular, the CDIC Act directs the corporation to promote the stability and competitiveness of the financial system in Canada and to pursue its objectives in a way which minimizes CDIC's exposure to loss.

What this will mean in practice is that when CDIC is faced with a situation of a member institution in serious difficulty, it will consider its range of options, including the new restructuring process, and make a decision based on how best to achieve its corporate objectives.

The House finance committee studied the bill very carefully and served an important role by suggesting ways in which the bill could be improved. Witnesses who appeared before the committee also made valuable contributions with their expert knowledge of the financial system.

I would like to take a few moments to describe some of the more important amendments that the committee made.

One category of change was in respect of the bill's stay of proceedings. A number of technical changes were made to this section in consultation with representatives of the chartered banks, trust and loan companies, representatives of the Canadian Depository for Securities Limited and the Canadian Payments Association.

The changes reflect the complexity of financial market systems and products, and with the benefit of the considerable technical knowledge and practical experience of these groups, the bill has been improved.

Changes to the stay of proceedings also reflected a balancing of the interests of ordinary creditors of financial institutions and the interests of financial institutions that act on behalf of other institutions in the clearance and settlement system.

Another group of changes which originated with members of the House finance committee is intended to give federal authorities greater flexibility to arrange a restructuring transaction. These changes centre on the sale of a troubled institution's assets and the transfer of its liabilities, rather than the sale of its shares. Having greater flexibility to structure a deal will mean that CDIC will be able to obtain the highest possible value for the troubled institution and minimize CDIC's exposure to loss.

Finally, the bill was amended to authorize the federal government to enter into agreements with provincial governments regarding provincial institutions whose deposits are insured by CDIC. We will be working with individual provinces that have an interest in the FIRP process to make the appropriate arrangements.

The latter amendment to the bill reflected a concern of the House finance committee that CDIC as the deposit insurer of most provincial institutions should have additional flexibility to work out problems with these institutions as well. I think the outcome in this case is positive for the financial system.

The amendments have improved the bill, but they do not either individually or collectively change the fundamental policy embodied in the bill.

The broad concept of FIRP was supported by witnesses who appeared before the committee. There was also broad support for giving federal authorities the power to control their exposure to loss when an insured financial institution risks failing.

During the second reading debate on this bill the need for balance in legislation such as this was noted. I would like to take this opportunity to acknowledge the committee's contribution to the balance which has been achieved in Bill C–48.

Before I finish my remarks I would like to note briefly the other provisions contained in Bill C–48 which are not directly related to the financial institutions restructuring process.

The first of these is aimed at improving the flow of information about deposit insurance to customers of financial institutions. The new rules are an important step toward improving the public's understanding of deposit insurance coverage and the changes are welcomed by the industry.

Another section provides for an increase in CDIC's borrowing limit from the Consolidated Revenue Fund to $6 billion reflecting the growth in deposits in recent years.

Other provisions of the act give CDIC greater flexibility to make by–laws to promote a common standard of business practice and conditions of insurance coverage among member institutions.

All of these modifications to the CDIC Act were endorsed by the House finance committee.

I would like to express my appreciation for the contribution of all who participated in the debate in this House on Bill C–48 and those who took part in the study of the bill in committee. I hope hon. members will join me now in supporting this bill by giving it third reading.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak on Bill C–48, an amendment to the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act.

Most Canadians do not think much about fire insurance until the neighbour's house burns down. Then they make sure they have adequate coverage. Probably the same could be said for life insurance. Most Canadians do not worry too much about it until a friend or a family member dies. Then they wonder if their dependants are provided for.

It is no surprise then with the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation that Canadians really do not think very much about it. This corporation insures deposits in banks and trust companies for Canadians so that in case of a financial fire that results in the financial death of a bank or trust company, Canadians are protected.

Canadians certainly want CDIC to have all the tools that it needs to properly do its job. That job of course is stabilizing the Canadian financial system and protecting Canadians. The legislation we are debating today certainly helps in that regard.

This legislation gives the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation the power to go into a financial institution that is just inches away from bankruptcy and to merge it with a healthy institution or to otherwise restructure it and get it on a firm footing.

We on this side of the House certainly agree that the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation needs this tool. In fact Justice Willard Estey recommended this in his report in 1986 when he reported on the failure of two western banks. The Canadian regulator of banks, trusts, loan and insurance companies, known as the Superintendent of Financial Institutions, also said that Canada very much needs this tool.

He also indicates that he has been very frustrated with the authority he has now. The situation now is that the superintendent either has to shut down a financial institution facing bankruptcy or stand by and watch it fail.

In other words, there is no in between where the regulators could help save a financial institution from going under. I guess it is something like a doctor saying that he had only two choices: to sit back and watch the patient suffer a slow death or put the patient out of his misery once and for all, even though an operation might have saved that person.

This is the situation that the superintendent finds himself in now. Certainly, as I said, he agrees that his office should have this tool or this power which we are giving through Bill C–48. Now regulators will have the option of going in and trying to get this institution on to a firm basis.

The Canadian financial service industry is one of the healthiest in the world. Very seldom do we read in newspapers stories of financial institutions in great difficulties, but recently we have had First City Trust, an Ontario trust company, in the news as well as Central Guaranty.

I suppose we could say that part of this is due to the recession because a recession brings high unemployment and high bankruptcy rates. In my province of Prince Edward Island the unemployment rate is over 19 per cent, the highest ever recorded in that province since Statistics Canada started keeping records.

As well as recessions taking their toll on the unemployment rate, they certainly take their toll on financial institutions. Customers of financial institutions are the people who buy cars and homes or borrow to run businesses. When people lose their jobs in a recession it means that many of them cannot make their payments on their cars, their houses or whatever they have borrowed for. They may lose these assets and lose their hope along with them.

Last month the unemployment rate in Canada was 11.2 per cent, the highest since November 1984. The lost jobs and the lost wages I have been talking about will lead to loan payments not being made. If that happens and if enough large borrowers cannot make their payments then financial institutions could be in trouble.

Certainly we saw Standard Trust go that way last summer. This summer Central Guaranty and First City are struggling to avoid Standard's fate. This legislation will help to avoid that by giving the regulator the power to go in and to operate or to help keep the financial institution from going under.

In so doing, we are protecting the 400,000 Canadians who are employed in the banks and in the trust, loan and insurance companies. We must preserve these jobs because we have approximately 1.5 million Canadians out of work. Every job in this country is important and must be protected. As I said, I appreciate the need for this legislation and I agree with what the legislation is going to do, but I certainly have serious concerns about the whole process this government followed to reach the stage where we are today.

• (1900)

First, this legislation is not just needed today. It was also needed five years ago when Mr. Justice Estey recommended it in his report.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but it being 7 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(6) the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur) moved that Bill C-342, an act to amend the Income Tax Act (teachers), be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to speak on Private Member's Bill C-342.

As my colleagues in the House know very well, the Conservative government has said many times that for it, education is the cornerstone of Canadian society. The Prime Minister even said that it is important to improve the quality of education in Canada if we want to be competitive internationally.

I believe that the bill I introduced gives the government an excellent opportunity to ease the tax burden on those who have the admittedly huge responsibility of educating our children. The purpose of Bill C-342 is to amend the Income Tax Act so that teachers across Canada can deduct some employment expenses in calculating their income.

For example, they could deduct expenses incurred to take part in professional development days and travel expenses to attend conferences. Let me now give the reasons why teachers should be allowed to deduct some employment expenses.

First, teaching at the primary, secondary and post-secondary levels is an occupation that requires higher than average expenses to obtain material, services and facilities related to their teaching duties and to upgrading their academic qualifications and professional skills. While curriculum related material is normally supplied by the employer, teachers must often buy books, periodicals and other written material particular to the teaching profession.

Second, many teachers must pay considerable costs for professional development through on the job training courses, to buy computers and software to be used at home for educational purposes and also to buy classroom material.

Mr. Speaker, you will agree that these expenses help teachers to improve their methods and provide superior instruction. I think it is quite unfair for the Income Tax Act and regulations to allow self-employed professionals and business people deductions for operating expenses and improving their office or business and to refuse these same tax breaks to members of the teaching profession.

Since teachers have considerable employment expenses and play an important role in society, the government must give them the treatment they deserve.

[English]

I am presenting this bill this evening as a result of conversations I have had with members of the New Brunswick Teachers' Association, the Canadian Teachers' Federation and teachers themselves who are concerned with expenses. I have a background in education so I can speak from my experience as well.

Elementary, secondary and post-secondary teaching is an occupation which requires larger than average expenditures by teachers on materials, services and facilities related to their jobs and to their professional improvement.

While curricular materials are normally provided by the employer, other equipment and materials related to the professional practice of teaching must be supplied by teachers. Many teachers incur considerable expense for in service professional improvement. They purchase computers and software for educational use in the home and for use in the classroom. As a result of these outlays for these kinds of goods and services, teachers are able to improve their teaching methods and extend to their students a better quality of service.

It is unfair that self-employed professionals and business people are permitted under the Income Tax Act and regulations to deduct expenses of operating and improving their businesses while teachers are denied similar tax benefits.

The cancellation in 1988 of the standard deduction for employment-related expenses—20 per cent of employment income to a maximum of $500—has served to reinforce this sense of injustice.

There are membership fees for professional organizations in addition to annual professional and union membership dues required to maintain professional and/or employment status which are deductible at present. These are all expenses that should be allowed under this bill and should be allowed in the Income Tax Act. There are expenses for attending teaching conventions when attendance is mandatory and when a convention is held outside the city or town of residence. Other expenses that could be incurred and should be covered are registration fees for professional conferences, expenses for attending up to two conferences or conventions per year for professional growth and expenses for attending professional in service programs. As I mentioned before, the cost of purchasing teaching materials is certainly a major expense.

To be fair and honest, sometimes the perception of teachers is not always positive. Many people in the public sometimes think negatively towards our teachers. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and others who are listening, that quite often these perceptions are unfair, unfounded and are based on a lack of knowledge.

Mind you, there are some bad teachers out there but I say to Canadians in general that the majority of teachers and educators are honest, sincere and dedicated to education. I say also that if there is a bad apple out there, then you get rid of it. If there are bad teachers in the system, then you have them removed. I am sure teachers' associations and federations stand by that as well. I do not think we should punish the majority just because of a few bad apples.

I would like to speak about a few specific examples of the involvement of teachers and the expenses they have. I know of a teacher here in Ottawa who teaches kindergarten to children with special needs. At the present time she goes around and collects a lot of materials that can be used in the classroom and pays for it with her own money. She has now been teaching for a number of years. She has even gone so far as to collect so much material that there is no room at her house any more and she has rented a garage to store some of those materials. That is a cost that the public does not realize.

Take a drive around on Saturdays and Sundays to garage sales and see who is at those garage sales. You will be amazed to see a number of teachers. It is not because they are looking for a bargain for themselves. Often, they are looking for a bargain for their students. They are looking for second-hand materials that can be used in a classroom.

One might ask what is wrong with the school system or what is wrong with the school boards? Do they not have money for materials? Yes, they do, but it is not enough. Quite often the material that is supplied is generic material. It is not stimulating to the student. The textbooks and support material are quite often out of date. This is a way of allowing teachers to get new material into the classroom, but it is costing money to these individual teachers.

I would also like to mention that we hear the common statement that teachers have two months off in the summer. Yes, they do. They are in a very stressful job.

Many of the teachers also use those two months—not the full two months because they do take holidays as well—to attend summer courses. Again, that is an expense that translates into a very positive expense because it is going to be beneficial to our citizens of tomorrow who are our youth. As we know, education has been a major topic of late and a major concern of many especially when we talk about competition and the ability of our labour force to be well trained.

I have taught from grade 1 to grade 12. In my 12 years of teaching I had to attend various workshops. I lived in northern New Brunswick and most of these courses were away from our community. Quite often we had to travel by car for most of these courses. Quite often we car pooled, obviously. We had to travel and it was an expense. We had to pay for our meals. We had to pay our hotel rooms, but again it was an expense that we met very gladly in the sense that we knew it was going to be beneficial not only to us, but to our students in the classroom.

I should also mention that when I speak about northern New Brunswick, the same can be said about any province in Canada. Quite often these courses are held away from the smaller communities and that is where the cost really lies.

Some of the school boards do pay for these expenses, I admit. If they are paid for, so much the better. Then, obviously, the teacher would not have to claim them under this bill.

I would also say, as I mentioned before, that school boards do have a lot of supplies, but they are under a lot of pressure these days to cut here and there. We see that in many provinces. The thing that I found with teaching, especially in the years I taught, is that we did not have enough resource material for the students or the teachers.

I married a woman from this area—originally from my home town, but her family was here—and quite often we would come here during the summer. At that time it gave me the opportunity to buy books in this area. It also gave me the opportunity to use the university resource centre here to make photocopies.

That is an expense that I did not mind and I am sure a lot of teachers do not mind. It comes to a point, however, where one can compare it to other professions and say that if they are allowed to deduct certain expenses then teachers should be allowed those deductions as well.

I am sure we will hear some opposition to this. I am sure if you look at the bill that it is a nice bill. You may say it goes too far, but what I have done is to put forth a bill as close as possible to what would be desirable. As anyone knows, whenever one negotiates something, one always puts forth one's best. One asks for the most hoping to receive just a little less.

I agree there may be some criticism of expenses for an office in the household, but we are also dealing with university professors here as well. That might be a little far-fetched but I am open to amendments.

I think it important that we look at the bill as a just bill because other professionals have similar types of deductions for income tax.

Another comment might be how about the poor tradesmen who have to buy tools to work. I say to those who make that argument that there is no reason why teachers cannot have their deductions just because someone else does not. Two wrongs do not make a right. We have to start somewhere. If we feel that there is also an justice in that area, there is nothing wrong with making the appropriate changes.

The problem is that the whole Income Tax Act is very unfair and must be amended somewhat. We must work within the system that is in place. We must work with the Income Tax Act, so that is exactly what we are doing. That is why this type of bill has been put forth.

I should also mention that teachers are quite often considered to be in the middle income range quite often. Therefore, they have a heavy tax burden. I should mention that the two deductions of the greatest value to teachers have been eliminated recently, the $500 employment expense deduction and the $1,000 interest and dividend income deduction.

That $1000 interest deduction also has affected many other Canadians, and I speak on their behalf as well tonight. The government should possibly re-examine that decision in the light of senior citizens who sometimes had a little bit of savings money and used that little extra interest they gained to do a little extra shopping or for a few extras that they had looked forward to. I would say that the government should also reintroduce that deduction.

I have received indications of support from a number of MPs from all parties. I have received indications of support from citizens out there. I have received indications of support from teachers' associations. I thank them. In fact I have received a number of letters. The bill was only tabled about a month or so ago and I have already been receiving documentation in support of the bill. I have received copies of letters that have gone to ministers supporting the bill.

[Translation]

I have a letter of support from the president of the Association of French speaking Teachers of New Brunswick, local 32. The letter is addressed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration and it supports the bill. I have another letter from a school in Neguac, signed by many teachers. I also have a letter from the president of the Association of French speaking Teachers of New Brunswick, Anita Hébert, local 7.

[English]

I have a number of letters from kindergarten teachers. I have a letter from the New Brunswick Teachers' Association. Mr. David McCready, the secretary of a district, has written in support. I have a letter from the Grand Manan Elementary School supporting the bill.

I have another letter from Pâquerette Michaud, president of local 1 at Alexandre G. Savoie Comprehensive School.

[English]

I have another letter from Tyne Valley in Prince Edward Island and some others from Prince Edward Island. I must single out the Regina Public School Teachers' Association. Its members have written to me in support and I have tabled their signatures.

I would like to thank those people who have acknowledged the introduction of this bill. I look forward to my colleagues this evening, if not totally supporting the bill, at least looking at the possibility of sending it to committee and making adjustments in committee.

I am very open to seeing amendments made to the bill, if hon. members feel that amendments are needed. Thank you.

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak to Bill C-332. I must admit I agree with some of the comments made by the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur. However, there are other areas where I think he has taken the wrong approach.

If we consider the education system in this country, we must admit it is one of the best in the world. It is also a fact that our education system is our assurance of progress. In the long run, it makes for the best possible economic growth.

I think all members of this House will agree that for any country education is a priority. As I said before, we are privileged in that respect here in Canada.

However, the bill introduced by the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur raises a number of problems from the point of view of fiscal justice and fairness. If we go back to the time before our 1988 tax reform, every employee across the country was entitled to a lump sum deduction of $500. As long as we had employment income on our return, we could deduct $500. It was a deduction. As a result, Mr. Speaker, depending on the individual's employment income, the $500 meant an after-tax saving of $100, $150 or $250. If my income was taxable at 50 per cent, I would pay taxes on that amount less $500, which would mean a saving of $250. However, if my income was taxable at 25 per cent, the $500 deduction would mean a saving of only $125.

The 1988 tax reform made the tax system fairer and more equitable. We eliminated anything that could be qualified as a deduction and replaced it with a tax credit. In determining the amount allowed for the basic personal tax credit, we took into consideration the old $500 deduction. As a result, anyone with an employment income in Canada has a basic tax credit which does not depend on the individual's tax rate but on the fact that he has an employment income.

For instance, if the basic tax credit is $1,000, whatever my employment income happens to be I will pay $1,000 less in taxes. Whether I earn $50,000 or $100,000 or $20,000, I get the same tax credit. My point is, Mr. Speaker, that a tax credit is subtracted from the tax payable.

This means that all Canadians are equal for tax purposes. Whatever the rate at which they are taxed, they have the same tax credit, and that is important.

The hon. member opposite says it is not true. I would advise her to take a course in taxation, and maybe she will understand what is happening in Canada's tax system. It would do her a world of good to take a course on the subject.

In any case if she wants the floor, she can have it as soon as I finish. Meanwhile, she could at least let me proceed.

As I was saying, the system has made the Income Tax Act more equitable. The hon. member's proposal suggests adding eight specific deductions to the Income Tax Act, targeted exclusively to the teaching profession. However, this would put unfair practices right back into the Income Tax Act.

This evening, I speak both from my experience as a tax expert and as a professor at the University of Quebec in Trois-Rivières and in Sherbrooke. When I was teaching, I could only deduct expenses as provided under the Act. That was normal for anyone who had an employment income. Given the privileges my colleague demands in the Income Tax Act, Canadian teachers could specifically deduct eight items he identified as teaching related expenses. I would be quite glad for the teachers, but what will we do about the workers who regularly buy tools for their work and are on salary, or have employment income? What will we do about mechanics who work in a garage, have an employment income and must buy all kinds of tools every year to do their job?

Mr. Speaker, you will understand that I could name any occupation where people are paid a salary and have to buy goods for their work in order to earn employment income. Mr. Speaker, you will see that that is where the unfairness lies. In Canada, we cannot think of giving more to one kind of occupation than to another.

My colleague from Restigouche—Chaleur gives me the example of lawyers. I am glad he does, because I will tell him that lawyers have employment income or a salary and are entitled to no deduction except the one now provided for in the Income Tax Act, which is the same as for teachers. Notaries who are on salary are entitled to no other deduction than what teachers have. We could go through all the professions when we compare employment income with business income.

A lawyer who opens an office or starts a business is entitled to claim business related expenses. What the hon. member forgets to point out is that a lawyer who has his own office may not have any income at the end of the year either. He may run a loss. He has no assured income. He has no salary. He has fees if he works and earns them, but if he has no clients. He has no income. Even if he could take all the expenses in the world—

Mr. Plourde: If the clients don't pay.

Mr. Vincent: My colleague from Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, ever the good manager, points out that if the clients do not pay, it comes to the same thing.

We should not confuse what—

Ms. Clancy: In what country do you live? That is not true.

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, could you tell my colleague that she will have her turn to speak. Would you please tell her?

Ms. Clancy: That is not true for lawyers. We are three lawyers here. In what country do you live?

Mr. Vincent: My colleague will find out that we are four lawyers, because I am one too. If she would be so kind as to let me finish my speech it would be appreciated.

We must not confuse what the Income Tax Act considers employment income, a fixed, assured, guaranteed salary, and business income, whether it is a lawyer's office, an architect's office or any profession where the rules for deductions are different. The Income Tax Act is clear. Any expense to earn business income is deductible. The law is there to help people earn a living, but the teacher or lawyer on salary does not have work related expenses. They are assured of a salary that comes every week.

Employment income and business income are treated quite differently in the tax system.

In conclusion I would like my colleagues in the House to think of the injustice that would be done if this bill were passed. Again I agree with what the hon. member said about the work done by teachers in Canada. I have no problem with that, but we have a big problem with tax fairness, if we allow one category of people with employment income to deduct some items they buy for their work, when no one else can do the same.

• (1930)

We would do a grave injustice to all Canadians.

I see that my time is up. I will close by asking hon. members to think carefully about this subject.

[English]

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to support this bill put forward by my colleague and friend, the hon. member for Restigouche--Chaleur.

It is time a bill of this nature was brought forward, and since we could not get it from the government side, then it is only right it should be brought forward by a caring and thinking member of the teaching profession such as my colleague.

I was astounded at the remarks of the parliamentary secretary because I do not know what country he is living in. He made comments about deductions made for some professionals and not for others that are just not true in many cases.

What we have to understand most clearly about this particular situation is who we are talking about here. We are talking about the profession that spends its time, professional life, working time, in dealing with young Canadians, teaching them, moulding their minds and setting an example for them.

Although sometimes it may be hard to believe, every one in this Chamber went to school for some period or another, and we all had teachers. We all know the tremendous influence, the tremendous amount of effort over and above what is required in the job description that teachers put into their jobs.

I have to admit to a bit of special pleading here. I taught for one year and I was also a substitute teacher in the springs of my university years. Most particularly, my mother was a teacher and a principal for 41 years in the school system in Nova Scotia.

I know at very close hand the kind of commitment and sacrifice members of the teaching profession put into their daily lives. There are very few teachers who work solely from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. or whatever the school hours may be. There are endless hours of preparation, endless hours of correcting, endless hours of dealing with students, counselling them, assisting them, being in loco parentis, being surrogate parents to their students, frequently dealing with social problems and difficulties that the home is not prepared to deal with. Our school system, much suffering from cutbacks, is unable to deal in an extra-professional sense and the teachers deal with this as well.

Teachers get a bad rap in the country because, yes, there is no question it is a secure job, and it is a well paid job; but not necessarily the be all and end all of pay. Not when you put it up against the hours that are spent after school is closed in volunteer projects with the students, the hours that are spent during summer vacations in volunteer projects with the students, on weekends, Christmas time, March break, and on and on.

My colleague's bill, which gives teachers, a bit of break, particularly in this overtaxed atmosphere we have in this country today, is not a great deal to ask.

I look in particular at the section of the bill that relates to professional expenses. I find it utterly unbelievable that professional expenses are not deductible for teachers. My colleague on the other side talked about the fact lawyers only get to deduct those expenses which relate to their business. That is not true. Lawyers get to deduct their professional fees no matter what they are doing. They get to deduct their memberships in their bar societies; that is a deductible fee. There are other deductible fees as well.

An hon. member: Or union dues.

Ms. Clancy: Or union dues. You are absolutely right. Union dues for teachers should be deductible as well. Absolutely. A wonderful thing, why can you not move it a little further and do professional fees as well? Why can you not do it for mandatory travel expenses on in service days that no one else is paying for but the teacher? No one else is taking care of their hotel bills and no one else is taking care of their travel expenses. Everyone else in a profession gets that kind of relief.

The teachers in this country deserve a better break and this bill is the kind of a break that can give it to them.

My colleague, having been a teacher himself, understands this. There are colleagues on the other side of the House who you would think would understand this as well. This is not something that is going to add immeasurably to the deficit of this country if you pass this bill. This is not something—

Mr. Dorin: $500 million a year.

Ms. Clancy: Five hundred million a year. Show me where you find your figures. I would like to know where you find your figures. I would suggest that he is using an etch-a-sketch rather than a calculator.

This is a fairness issue. If one group of professionals are permitted to behave in this way and to deduct certain things, another group of professionals should be allowed the same thing.

Therefore, it is with the greatest amount of fervour that I say to all members that the private member's bill brought forward by the member for Restigouche—Chaleur deserves the support of this House, deserves the non-partisan support of both sides of this House. Let us see a little fairness for teachers who do so much and do not get, contrary to a lot of people's opinion, a great deal in return.

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to enter into this debate.

I want to say at the outset that earlier this afternoon, as chairman of the finance committee, I tabled a report where we had examined a proposal put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg—St. James. In his particular case he was suggesting that mechanics be allowed to deduct their tools. During the course of that study we also heard from real estate agents who were suggesting that they should be able to deduct the cost of home computers and car telephones and certain other particular things that they are not able to deduct.

This bill by this particular member is along those same lines. It gives me concern for a number of reasons. First of all, almost everyone suggests that the tax system is too complex, its complexity creates unfairness and in many cases—

Ms. Clancy: CAs get to deduct everything.

Mr. Dorin: Not when they are employees they do not.

If we begin down the track of defining a particular tax regime for every type of occupation whether it is mechanics, teachers, real estate agents, what we are doing is not creating fairness, but creating unfairness. Moreover we are creating enormous complexity because virtually everyone will be treated differently within the tax system. One of the primary objectives of the tax system is that people in similar circumstances will be treated the same.

Members of this House will know, and you will know for certain, Mr. Speaker, that for a male member to speak in the House he must wear a tie. It could be argued that because you must wear a tie to do your job as a member of Parliament, ties for members of Parliament should be deductible. We might have to ask what limit we should put on the price and the amount of deduction; over what period of time should we depreciate them.

I know that that is a bit of a facetious example, but it illustrates the difficulty in trying to determine for particular occupations the types of deductions that might be applicable to them and how one would ever draw a line.

I suspect we would even have to spend a great deal of time trying to define what is a teacher. At first blush one could suggest that teachers are persons employed by school boards or post-secondary education institutions.

There are many other types of institutions that employ teachers in various ways. There are many types of educational institutions, so we would again be in a situation of having to determine who would be eligible for these deductions.

I can tell the member after eight years of experience on the finance committee of this House and several years experience in business before coming to the House involved in the tax system, once you start trying to create those definitions and those delineations you have a great many problems.

I should say it is true that employees, teachers, mechanics and others, have expenses involved in their employment. It is also true that up until 1987 there was a general deduction available for people up to a limit of $500 available to all employees to compensate them basically for those types of expenses without having to try and enumerate which particular occupations, teachers, real estate agents or others would be eligible for them.

That deduction was eliminated in the 1988 tax reform along with a number of other deductions. The employment expense deduction and the $1,000 dividend deduction were eliminated also. They were eliminated to do two things; first, simplify the tax system and second, lower the rate. That is the reason they were done.

They were accepted at that time and received good support among the Canadian people. I should mention in passing that the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood has put forward a tax proposal that he calls the single tax. His proposal would go even further in eliminating even more deductions and would attempt to achieve a single tax rate.

Many people speak quite favourably of that, but I am not certain that it could be achieved. In a survey I did in my own constituency from which I have just been counting the replies, that was one of the questions that I asked and a majority of the respondents suggested that we should have what would be called a flat tax.

In other words, we should be eliminating deductions rather than trying to create new ones. In so far as I am concerned, that is the direction we should be trying to go.

There are other difficulties involved in trying to determine deductions for individual groups of employees or occupations.

In our report tabled today, which I think hon. members would find of interest if they are interested in this particular subject because it is applicable to teachers as it is to mechanics and to people in the real estate business, we have listed the various problems and tried to come to some resolution concerning them.

We came to the conclusion that at the end of the day, the only real resolution would be a deduction that could be offered to all qualifying employees. In other words, they would not be segregated by occupation. The deduction would have to be available to employees in general to meet certain expenses that are involved in their employment.

If we are simply going back to giving everybody a deduction of $500, we could simply lower the tax rate and everybody would be just as well off. I am not so sure that that gains what is being suggested here.

However, it was our recommendation, after analysis and consideration and hearing from witnesses in this area, that the Department of Finance make an attempt again to try to come to some definition of what exceptional expenses could be allowed to be deducted by employees in the course of their employment.

It was suggested a little while ago that lawyers, chartered accountants and other professionals are allowed to deduct the kinds of things that are being sought here. To some degree, that is true but that is only when people are self-employed. There is a distinction.

Employees, receive fixed salaries monthly, weekly, annually; they have income. They also have many other types of benefits that go along with that. They are eligible for unemployment insurance, for example. They make the contributions and if they become unemployed, as former employees they can receive unemployment insurance benefits.

People who are self-employed have no such benefits. They are not available to them and they have no guaranteed salaries. In fact, what they have to do is determine whether or not they can find sufficient income to cover the expenses they have.

In some cases, the expenses that they incur may be more than the revenue they take in and they may actually have a loss on the year or even lose money on the year.

That is not the case for employees. They do not lose money during the course of the year. They may lose their job and thereby their income but they are not obligated to lay out money in advance for expenses that are required in order to earn that income. A lawyer or a doctor may have to do that to rent an office and buy equipment. They might have to spend many thousands of dollars in the hope of earning income, but with no guarantee that they would have the income that is provided when one has a fixed job.

I could speak further on this. It is a subject that we spent a great deal of time on in 1987 in the finance committee when we did the 1987 tax reform. It was generally concluded at that time that we wanted to eliminate as many deductions as possible and reduce the over-all tax rate. That was done in 1987. I believe it was the correct move. I believe it would be a step backward to create again individual deductions aimed at particular groups or particular individuals, which this bill and the earlier bill of the hon. member for Winnipeg—St. James suggested.

We want to be very careful. I would suggest that he consult with his colleague in the Liberal Party, the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood, who is going in the opposite direction. In my opinion he is going in a more preferable direction because it would be a system that would be applied to all taxpayers on a basis that would be equally available to them all without determining the particular occupation they are involved in.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak very long today as I understand the limited time that members have to debate this bill.

There were two things that I wanted to mention. First, I would like to respond to my friend from Edmonton Northwest who spoke about the self-employed versus the employed workers in terms of tools. It reminded me of the position of people who work as carpenters in rural and northern parts of this country. Carpenters for all intents and purposes are self-employed but the only work they can get on a steady basis is working as subcontractors on projects contracted out to general contractors. The general contractors will hire individual carpenters as employees but require them to own their own tools.

For all intents and purposes these carpenters are self-employed but for income tax purposes they are very much an employee. As a result the requirement for the job and the expense is treated much differently than if they were self-employed and paying the taxes, as the hon. member for Edmonton Northwest suggested.

I intend to have a very careful look at the report that the member discussed in his remarks. We will certainly provide him with some input from northern Saskatchewan and the perspective of the individual workers in northwest Saskatchewan. I appreciate the opportunity to be able to do that.

Second, regarding the matter at hand, Bill C-342, I want to commend the member who raised this issue today for his communication skills. Obviously teachers throughout Canada are very much aware of the bill today.

Prior to the bill being introduced this evening I received a couple of letters by fax from teachers within my constituency who indicated their awareness of the matter before us and wanted to communicate their support.

• (1950)

I would like to take this opportunity to put on record the communications I received today. One is from Elaine Yaychuk, who represents teachers in Meadow Lake, Saskatchewan. She indicates the support of the teachers of Meadow Lake for this bill. The second is from an individual teacher named Robert Krismer from North Battleford, Saskatchewan. He is a teacher in the separate school system in North Battleford who communicates his support.

I will read a couple of paragraphs from Mr. Krismer's letter to indicate to the member who put forward this bill and the government the support for this bill that exists among some members of my constituency.

My constituent writes:

> Dear Mr. Taylor, I am writing to you with regard to the bill being introduced to the House on June 10 of this year by the Member for Restigouche—Chaleur, New Brunswick, Mr. Guy Arseneault.
> As a teacher, I feel quite strongly that our profession has long been disregarded in this area. Certainly, consideration for deduction of expenses incurred in our area of work would not be a precedent setting move as many other professional, white collar and blue collar workers have been granted this type of concession, in some cases, for quite some time already.
> Further, it is not unrealistic to think that many teachers do incur expenses that enable them to be more effective in the classroom, either with the purchase of materials that are used directly in their classrooms or as equipment that help them to plan and prepare for their classes.

He outlines some of his personal expenses like the computer systems he has purchased. He teaches computer literacy classes for grade nine and uses his equipment for storing some of his students' notes. He goes on to say:

> In addition to the purchase of this hardware, I have purchased software so I am able to do this work.
> As I said earlier, I think it quite reasonable to conclude that, just as many other professions and occupations purchase materials which assist them in their line of work and are able to claim these as expense deductions, teachers should also be considered for such deductions.
> I was happy to learn that Mr. Arseneault had advanced such a piece of legislation and I am asking that you support this bill for me and the several teachers I represent as their councillor here in the Battlefords. I thank you.

Realizing that time is short and members wish to speak I simply want to communicate this information to the House.

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, I will try to split what time we have left with my hon. colleague from Moncton.

I would begin by saying that I too have received many pieces of correspondence dealing with this particular issue. As a matter of fact the pile is quite thick. It is not an issue that is strange to me.

What is the issue? The issue is somewhat confused. In some of the letters there is a request that professional fees be covered under the Income Tax Act. Of course that has already been done.

I believe the nub of this issue to be, and I have full and total sympathy for this position, a situation in which teachers are required to go beyond that which is normally defined by the boards of education as a requirement of their jobs.

Teachers are extremely professional in every sense of the term. I know because my wife happens to be a teacher. Not only that, but through her I have met many other teachers.

The mere mention of good teachers versus bad teachers caused me some concern because I think that all teachers are essentially good teachers. They not only convey that which they have learned to tomorrow's leaders but in so doing convey a bit of their hearts, souls and consciences.

What got me involved in this particular subject was a presentation made to me on behalf of a particular teacher who while teaching in a mixed culture school saw that it was an advantage for cross-cultural purposes to teach the children how to make bannock. The school board budget did not permit her to buy flour, sugar and whatever else was needed to make bannock so she brought these materials from her kitchen at home. I wondered whether or not this was going a little bit above and beyond the call of duty. Recognizing that a teacher was doing this, I had to admit teachers would do this normally. Their expectation is that the Government of Canada through the Income Tax Act would some day soon, hopefully sooner than later, recognize this contribution that they make to our upcoming communities. I have no difficulties with that expectation. I do not think it is greedy at all. It is something that I am hopeful we will see happen very soon.

We talk about moneys being made available for these kinds of programs. Someone said that it was a matter of priorities. Someone asked is it fair that where we are today is where we should be? Should we not have progressed further? Today, as a matter of fact, you will recall that merchant marines performing in World War II have now been classed as full veterans with all veterans' benefits, the sort of thing that I am sure all of us felt should have happened a long time ago, not possessing though the necessary financial mechanics to make it happen. It happened today. I would venture to say that what the teachers are asking for, which will as well affect all those who require tools of the trade or expenditures over and above that which a normal salaried person is required to provide to their job, will some day be recognized. Again, I hope that it happens sooner than later.

I would just take one or two minutes more and say for those not knowing the background of government funding that does occur, through two systems of funding known as EPF and CAP the federal government grants this money to the provinces, which in turn take traditionally used EPF money for education and for hospitalization. The strings are no longer attached to EPF that way. EPF is used by the provinces as they see fit. In negotiating with teachers, with school boards, I would have to ask: Is it fair to expect now that this money has come from the federal government to the provincial governments that they should look at the broader picture of education? Education goes beyond books and pencils, reading, writing and arithmetic. It goes into society, as I have explained earlier.

Is it fair that maybe the school board should pay greater heed to some of these extra costs? Certainly I think we all agree in this Chamber that it is not fair for the teachers themselves to be expected to take their professionalism into the classroom, dig down deep into their pockets and supplement an educational system that will help all of us.

The matter before us is not whether or not the status quo is fair. I think we all agree that it is not fair. Who said that taxation was ever fair? We can only hope to strive to continue to make it fairer. I would hope that the thrust of what we have before us today becomes law in the not too distant future.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague opposite for sharing part of the time with me so that I can have an opportunity to speak on this particular bill.

I should say that when you listen to what the government says, in most cases in the response you get you wonder about its commitment to education and its search for excellence in education. If you look at some of the things that teachers are talking about that they would like to have, some relief as far as the tax system is concerned, there are things like educational improvement expenses, such as registration fees and cost of books and travel and living expenses. Or, they want the cost of purchasing teaching materials for audio-visual and those types of things that are not supplied by school boards, and the cost of purchasing equipment such as computers and computer software and the cost of books that are necessary for them to do their jobs.

When you look at those expenses and then you hear some of the members opposite with their excuses, you wonder where their commitment is. If their commitment is to education, obviously their commitment has to be to the teachers, because they are the vehicles utilized in part for this search for excellence in education. We need to show a strong commitment to education and show that commitment to the teachers who are the integral part of delivering that service.

On top of that, a tax system has to be fair and must be seen to be fair. As I listen to the objections, I come to the conclusion that the teachers are talking about fairness as the excuse of continuing to be unfair, rather than trying to correct the unfairness in the system. That could be achieved, quite frankly, by taking a look at this type of exemption. If some day somebody should see the wisdom of doing a flat tax, then all would be treated equal and there would be fairness in the system. We would not have to be requesting these types of items.

I know that my time is short, but I think that it is time to become proactive.

Let us do something positive. Let us send a clear message to teachers in this country that we are with them and we are supportive of them.

I have heard some objections and some concerns as to what may happen. There are some nuances and there are some changes, and those types of things. Maybe the best place for this would be at a committee to really go through and take a look at those.

If I could get unanimous consent of all my colleagues, I would move a motion that this be referred to a committee, perhaps even the finance committee, to review this bill. I would ask for unanimous consent for a motion that this be moved to the finance committee for study.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. McDermid that Bill C-48, an act to amend the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be read the third time and passed.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I will continue my remarks on Bill C-48.

As I said earlier, I support the legislation but I certainly have some very serious concerns about the process the government followed to reach the stage where this legislation is today.

First of all, this legislation was needed as much five years ago as it is today. It is five years since Justice Estey recommended this type of legislation in the report. It has taken five years for this government to bring in the legislation. The result of the government dragging its feet may have been the failure for at least one trust company, Standard Trust. Standard was closed with a regulator last summer even though it might have been saved by forcing a merger with a healthy financial institution.

That option was not open for Standard Trust because this legislation had not been passed. Of course, Standard was forced to close its doors. Now we are seeing the same threat of failure facing Central Guaranty and perhaps First City.

After five years, the government decided to table the legislation. After tabling the legislation, the government decided to consult with the banks, the trust companies and all those affected by the legislation. It decided after it had tabled it that it should get their views on it.

Needless to say, the best time for consultation is before legislation is tabled, not after it is tabled. After the legislation was tabled, the Canadian Bankers' Association indicated to me that it had very serious and substantial concerns about this legislation.

A lot of these concerns could have been avoided if the government had consulted with the industry before tabling the legislation. After the government tabled it, it is very interesting to note that the finance officials told us in a briefing that there were only minor technical concerns about this bill. The concerns were only minor and technical and therefore we should pass it right away.

Certainly there was no lack of opposition to this bill. When we started to study this bill in the finance committee, we heard witness after witness criticizing the bill, saying it was poorly drafted, it was poorly thought out and it was in need of a lot of revision.

Many of these concerns and problems certainly could have been eliminated if the government had consulted the industry, as it should have, before it tabled the legislation.

I am sure many Canadians read some of the headlines in the newspapers concerning Bill C–48. For example, on February 3 The Globe and Mail headlined "Ottawa Moving Quickly to Give CDIC Sweeping Powers". On February 15 The Toronto Star headlined "Bankers see Gaping Holes in Proposed Law".

As I said, the government was really trying to ram this bill through. Commenting on that was The Globe and Mail on April 27 in an article entitled "How Not to Rush a Reform Bill Through Parliament".

Those headlines certainly highlight a very flawed process. It was flawed because the government did not adequately consult the groups involved: the banks, the insurance companies, the other financial institutions. The lack of consultation led to misunderstanding and even mistrust.

What happened was that we in the finance committee spent a great deal of time in our meetings discussing details that should have been resolved long before the legislation was ever tabled. All the while we were never told why the government was so insistent on passing this legislation right away. The government wanted it passed the minute it was tabled, even though it had delayed the legislation for five years.

Some people said that it was to save Central Guaranty Trust. If that had been the case, a private member's bill could have been introduced to take care of that situation. There was no excuse for the government trying to rush this legislation through, especially when it gave no explanation even when we asked. There was no excuse either for the government not consulting with the finance industry, the banks, the trust and loan companies. Certainly there was no excuse for waiting over five years to table this legislation in the House.

Even though I said we had many concerns about the process the government followed, nevertheless the finance committee, the finance department and the industry worked together to co–operate on this bill.

It is important legislation. We feel it is very important that the Superintendent of Financial Institutions has the power that Bill C–48 will give him.

We made a lot of amendments in the bill, amendments which we feel will strengthen and give CDIC a better chance to help a troubled financial institution.

I want to take a minute to talk about the CDIC. The Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation was established in 1967 to provide deposit insurance to people who had deposits in financial institutions that belonged to this corporation. It was to promote stability in the Canadian financial system which is so important. Certainly we realize that when we read the newspaper articles and magazine articles about what is happening south of the border. CDIC is financed by premiums paid by banks and trust companies who are CDIC members. As I mentioned, they will guarantee up to $60,000 for the depositors, for financial institutions that belong to the corporation.

As well as that, CDIC will also guarantee or co-sign loans to unhealthy financial institutions that need backstop money to keep operating. They set standards for sound business and financial practices for financial institutions.

Bill C-48, as I mentioned earlier, really gives the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation the power to take over a troubled institution and to work out some kind of a restructuring deal. That could involve selling the financial institution whole or simply selling off parts of the institution to get it on a more secure footing. That is giving a lot of power to the regulators. Therefore, we felt it was very important that the situation and the conditions under which the regulators can go in and take over that financial institution be spelled out in legislation. This is so that they cannot just walk in and do it. There are very specific situations spelled out in the legislation.

The committee made important amendments to the bill. First, we gave CDIC more flexibility for the kind of restructuring deals it can do. At the same time, we also restricted it somewhat by giving it the power to seize an institution only when it believes it has a buyer. Therefore, if CDIC cannot find a buyer but seizes the institution, then the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation would end up running that financial institution. However, that is not its job. That is why we wanted to amend the bill so that CDIC cannot seize it unless it feels there is a good chance to sell it or get it on a better financial footing.

It is certainly not an easy job to find a buyer for a troubled financial institution. It was indicated in the press that First City Trust had contacted 45 prospective buyers and only 20 were interested enough to look at its books. Only 1 out of the 45 prospective buyers came forth with an offer. That was North American Life.

The amendment that we made in committee was to force the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation to look for potential purchases of a failing financial institution before moving in on that institution.

We then opened up the bill in committee to the provinces so that if a provincial finance minister has a financial institution that is in financial trouble then he or she can ask the CDIC to take it over and merge it with a healthy institution or simply take it over and sell off part of the assets and liabilities to put it on a firmer basis.

We want the federal government to work closely with the provinces. We also want Ottawa and the provincial governments to eliminate a lot of this red tape in regulations that really adds to the cost of doing business. Of course, that cost is passed on to the consumer of financial institutions in the way of higher service charges and higher interest rates and so on.

The situation in Canada today is that there could be a federal trust company doing business across the country which would have to report to 11 different jurisdictions. That means Ottawa and each province. Just imagine the amount of red tape and the cost involved in that.

I want to conclude my remarks on Bill C-48 by again indicating that I certainly support third reading of this legislation. However, I want to repeat my displeasure with the whole process that was followed by the government.

There's the fact that the government took five years to bring in this legislation. It was five years after Mr. Justice Estey made his report. I want to register my displeasure with the lack of consultation and discussion that took place with the financial institutions involved before this bill was tabled. There's also the lack of progress made by this government in cutting the provincial-federal red tape for financial institutions.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I want to start my remarks where the previous speaker left off. That is with Mr. Justice Estey.

In 1985 we had some western banks that went down the tubes. We had no provision. There was no provision in legislation that allowed for any kind of restructuring of financial institutions in Canada.

I suppose it was not really brought home to us about the fragility of the financial institution structure in this country because after all it did not often happen that a bank went down. Banks did not very often go bankrupt in Canada. The last time, before the one in 1985, was probably 60 years ago.

Mr. Justice Estey brought down his report and he recommended that you have to have some permanent mechanism whereby you can restructure a financial institution that gets into trouble.

We solved the problems of those three banks: the Northland Bank, the Bank of British Columbia and the CCB. We solved that by passing a bill in this House, Bill C–27, in which we pumped in a whole pile of money and we paid off the depositors. Then we paid the Bank of Hong Kong to take over the Bank of British Columbia.

We did that and then Parliament went to sleep. The Department of Finance snoozed. As I used to say: "If you snooze you lose". They snoozed like the fellow in the story. What was his name? He went bowling in the forest and fell asleep. It was Rip Van Winkle.

They went to sleep. They did nothing about acting on the recommendations of Mr. Justice Estey until the recent experience of the collapse of the trust sector of financial institutions in this country. That, of course, has been exacerbated by the recession and by the fact that trust companies put a lot more of their money into commercial real estate than banks do. We all know what has happened to commercial real estate in this country.

Accompanying that were the changes we made with deregulating the financial institutional structures of this country. I want to remind the House that at that time, when we passed those bills, Bill C–4, Bill C–19, Bill C–28 and Bill C–34, we on this side of the House predicted that we were letting the animals out of the cages.

We said the first animals to be eaten would be the trust companies. We said that the trust companies were equivalent to cobras, the insurance companies were equivalent to mongooses and the banks were equivalent to lions.

We predicted at that time that the mongoose would kill the cobras and in the end the lions would get them all. It is not accidental that the Royal Bank's logo is a lion grasping the world to its chest. That is not just accidental, it is a sign of the times.

The whole thesis of this Tory government approach, this neo–Conservative approach, is that we have to build global competitors in Canada. Therefore if we are going global we need some sumo wrestlers not those old regular Hulk Hogans, to wrestle for us. We have to go big, and the bigger the better.

I want to put on the record what we are witnessing today. Take a look at what is happening. Take a good hard look. In the last 20 years 24 financial institutions have gone down the tubes, and most of them are trust companies. Last year four of them went down the tubes. It is not accidental. Lo and behold, Bill C–48 was tabled in this House and we had second reading. Then the phones starting ringing as the Minister of State for Finance wanted to know how soon we could get to C–48. How soon can we get it passed?

The government said we needed this bill. Of course I know why it needed the bill. It needed the bill because it had some cobras who were pretty big cobras. My colleague mentioned Central Guaranty. Of course there is Central Guaranty Trust and there is one still out there sitting in the wings, Royal Trust.

I predict that by the time the next three years have gone by there will only be two trust companies left in this country large enough to exist, Canada Trust and National Trust.

The government introduced this bill and then started putting the pressure on the members of the committee. I got phone calls almost every day from the minister's office asking: "How soon can we expedite this bill?" When we got the bill to committee I asked very straightforward questions of the officials in light of the fact that financial institutions bills do not go to the committee unless there has been consultation among the major players. Has that taken place with this particular bill? When the dust cleared no consultations had taken place at all. This bill was rushed through Parliament and it was brought into committee.

Justice Estey said this bill should not go forward until we have made some major changes to the bill. All the major witnesses who appeared before the committee gave evidence that there had to be changes to the bill.

If one were to compare this to a bankruptcy bill it is a bankruptcy restructuring for financial institutions, as compared to the bill we are going to deal with later this evening that deals with those corporations and individuals other than financial institutions. This is the bankruptcy bill for financial institutions.

I suppose that the new role of the CDIC—and we must understand the structure. I want people who are watching to understand the structure and how it works, and maybe the minister can listen for his enlightenment.

First, there is a regulator, the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions, better known as OSFI. He is the policeman on the block. Then there is CDIC, the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation. Its chairman is Mr. Ron McKinlay. He is the undertaker, he performs the undertaking functions in the financial institutional structure. When the patient is dead they bring in Mr. McKinlay. He makes sure that the body is properly prepared and he also hands out the estate.

This is the kind of structure that we have. Then there are the functions of the Minister of Finance.

We examined the bill. What does the bill do? The main function of the bill is that it now provides for what is called a Financial Institutions Restructuring Process, better known as FIRP. I could sing that song:

Ol' McKinlay had a bill, ee-i-ee-i-oh;

With a FIRP, FIRP here and a FIRP, FIRP there,

Ol' McKinlay had a bill.

He can FIRP off any time he wants. If he sees an institution that is in trouble he can FIRP it. He can say: "FIRP you", and it is FIRPed. He can see another one that is weak and say: "You're FIRPed", and it is FIRPed.

What does it mean when you FIRP an institution? What are the details of FIRPing? What is the foreplay involved in a FIRP?

There are 12 easy steps. It is like the Kama Sutra for financial institutions. There are 12 steps that must be gone through. I will not bore the House with the 12 steps, but it is a process by which the institution is taken over by CDIC.

As a socialist I do not object to this idea. This is one way that we could have social ownership of the financial institutional structure, without having to nationalize any of them. I have no basic philosophical opposition to FIRPing it.

The CDIC recommends a FIRP to the minister and the minister carries on with the FIRP. Then a deal is cut. They make it sound like it would be over a weekend, they would do the FIRP on a Friday and on Monday they would be able to carry on business as usual with a new owner.

We have no problem with the FIRP. In fact, the FIRP gives the assurance to Canadian taxpayers that it is the least costly to them, because if that financial institution had gone down the tubes it could cost the taxpayers of Canada a lot more than the FIRPing process and the pay-out under the CDIC. Mr. McKinlay said that if Shoppers Trust had gone down the tubes it would have cost the taxpayers in excess of $3 billion.

This leads us to one of the other provisions in the bill. This is why in the bill Mr. McKinlay and CDIC want to increase the amount of money that it can borrow from the Government of Canada from $3 billion to $6 billion. Obviously, it is going to be getting ready for a whole lot of FIRPing going on.

They want to make sure they have a lot of bucks, because if they have to get into all these others that are sitting on the sideline wavering, you are talking about bigger bucks yet to come.

The bill also includes an increase from $3 billion to $6 billion of potential borrowings by CDIC from the Consolidated Revenue Fund. That raised a question with us in the committee.

Think of the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation as a club. You want to join the club or you want your financial institution to join the club. You pay the premiums or dues into the club. Then you are a member of the club.

Now the club has some rules. One of the rules is that if you are having problems, if you are seeming to have to borrow more and more money to pay your commitments, if the thing is going down and Mr. McKinlay has to FIRP you, he can FIRP anybody in the club but he cannot FIRP a member of the club who is under provincial jurisdiction.

I want to say that if you are going to FIRP one, you have to be able to FIRP them all. One FIRP is as good as another FIRP. Let us get it straight. I have never seen a FIRP that is different. The minister said: "You cannot FIRP it". Why can you not FIRP it? You cannot FIRP it because it is under provincial jurisdiction.

Then we had the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs getting into the FIRPing act. He writes to us and says: "Dear Don and Company". He was referring to the chairman of the committee, the member for Mississauga South. He says: "Dear Don and Company, you cannot FIRP them". I did not think this thing had constitutional ramifications. I thought a FIRP was a FIRP. Now it has all of these very serious constitutional ramifications.

That was one of the shortcomings of the bill. If you want to join the club and you pay your dues to join the club, then you follow the rules of the club.

The other club members have to be able to protect themselves by being able to FIRP you. What happens is that provincial institutions can suck and blow at the same time. They can go with whatever federal rules they like, and if they do not like them they can claim protection under the provincial rules. We said: "You cannot do that".

We ended up doing a little mishmash thing here. We went half way and said: "With the permission of the provincial minister, we can FIRP them". That is the situation with the FIRPs.

Concerning the other question that arose, you have to understand what I said before. The bulk of these financial institutions that have gone down or have had problems have been trust companies. The banks came along. The lions came along and said: "Roar, roar. Just a minute now. The ones going down in this club are all those trust companies and yet they pay the same premiums as we do". They say: "This is not fair". Imagine the banks saying: "This is not fair". They did. Honest to goodness. They said that this was not fair, that those having the greater risk should pay the higher premiums. Justice Estey did comment on that and said: "There should be some sort of co-insurance".

Are you giving me the fingers, Mr. Speaker? I see it and I will try not to abuse this. I see you are giving me two fingers. Well, that is good. If you have to go, Mr. Speaker, do not feel that I am holding you up.

Justice Estey did comment on the fact that the banks had a point here. I have to say the banks had a point.

Another question the committee had to deal with was the whole question of what happens, for example, when an institution is FIRPed on a Thursday. If that institution is a trust company it will usually have a clearer, that is a bank.

Will the bank continue to clear the cheques for the FIRP institution? If the banks stop clearing the cheques will the FIRP institution go down the tubes? The banks need some assurance from CDIC or from the Bank of Canada that in fact the commitments will be honoured. We finally got that commitment from the minister.

In conclusion, there is one other thing that remains to be dealt with. Hopefully we will do that at a later date when we look again at this whole structure. We have to bring OSFI and CDIC together. This is a recommendation from Justice Estey and we have to deal with it.

I support the bill at third reading. My party supports this FIRPing and all the other restructurings that are included. We are not a party opposed to FIRPing. I will end on the words of Justice Estey: "We need this legislation because there may be something out there lurking in the woods".

An hon. member: Tigers.

Mr. Rodriguez: Tigers or lions.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, it is always difficult to follow the member for Nickel Belt as he goes through a very torturous explanation of things through analogy.

Mr. Rodriguez Torturous? It was entertaining.

Mr. Rideout: Yes, torturous. I was worried that he was going to be FIRPed. One of the suggestions I might make is that the member for Nickel Belt be FIRPed every once in a while.

This bill has really taken a very interesting course. It was brought forward. It was an important piece of legislation that had to be dealt with immediately. We all jumped to the ready to deal with it. The government said we must get it through quickly with no delay: quick, quick, quick. It had to be done.

Then we heard things like: "We have consulted with everyone. Everyone thinks this bill is wonderful. It is really going to be a great piece of legislation. All get on board and don't worry. Everything will be fine". As soon as we got it into committee, lo and behold, the brakes went on and went on hard. They remained on hard until we could get some amendments to the legislation to make it work.

The Canadian Bankers' Association and retired Supreme Court Justice Willard Estey both came to the committee and urged us to make changes. Both groups said the bill was properly aimed and it was doing the right thing.

As my colleague from Nickel Belt has said, this idea of a FIRP, Financial Institution Restructuring Process, is an important function and a power that they should have. But the bill was basically flawed and changes needed to be done. That is the purpose of committees and we performed that.

Lo and behold, we had the bill pretty well all done and then it languished on the shelf. Whatever the urgent reason for this bill, it suddenly disappeared and it languished for the longest period of time.

It is now back before the House. We on this side, as my colleague from Malpeque has indicated, are very supportive of the bill. It is a good piece of legislation, but we have to look at the reasons why. I think it was captured. I was in the finance committee on Monday. We dealt with CDIC and some of its problems. It was carried in The Globe and Mail on June 10 and summarized the situation. The headline read: "Sickies double CDIC's costs. Ill financial firms up significantly". The article reads:

> The "sick list" of troubled Canadian financial institutions has grown so large that the cost of running Canada Deposit Insurance Corp. more than doubled last year and its staff is more than twice as large as it was five years ago.

That is the problem we are facing. Our financial institutions are under attack. We have seen what has happened, the number of failures that have occurred. Part of the problem rests with their inability to FIRP. That sounds like such a terrible thing. In fact when the member for Nickel Belt was talking I wanted to remind him that there might be children listening to the analogies that he was utilizing. However, there is a need to FIRP and all of us should FIRP once in a while.

In this particular case the legislation is going to handle that major problem. The testimony of Mr. Justice Estey and Mr. MacKenzie who heads up OSFI would be most illustrative of the problem. I would like to quote first from Mr. Justice Estey: "The idea of a FIRP is an essential element now missing in our banking system. Where I would like to see more action can be expressed this way: We should not govern this country by knee–jerk special acts. We should try to pass bankruptcy acts and not special acts for each bankruptcy. We should not have a crisis every time a bank or trust company folds".

Again I quote Mr. MacKenzie at the financial committee: "The present situation is extremely frustrating for someone in my position, because a regulator at this stage cannot force a going concern solution if the owners or if other parties, for example bankers who have loaned money to a parent company, do not want to accept it. Therefore we are trying to fill in this gap with this legislation to allow the regulators to say to people: Look, if you do not face up to the reality of the situation and how bad it is and deal with x–y company or z bank or whatever to get an appropriate takeover of the whole thing, then you are going to have to do this process and we will force you".

I think that is the issue. Regulators now have a weapon called a FIRP to jump in and try to rescue the situation.

We are going to see some benefits from that. I agree with the comments made before that it is probably the threat of a FIRP rather than the FIRP itself which is going to cause the greatest good. I do not think we are going to see all kinds of FIRPing going on across the land.

There will only be the threat of a FIRP that will really force the change, make positive things happen and force companies to face up to it because no financial institution would want to have the regulators involved in their day–to–day operations if they can dispose of those assets and make the changes without that happening. We on this side see there is a benefit with respect to the threat of a FIRP.

My colleague from Nickel Belt also alluded to an interesting factor. It was fascinating to get a letter from the minister responsible for intergovernmental affairs asking us not to allow the FIRPing of provincial financial institutions.

I can see the constitutional issue, but it still does not make very much sense to me that a financial institution that is provincial in charter can stand and tell all Canadians that it has Canadian deposit insurance protection and they can put all their money into that institution and be protected. At the same time the Canadian Deposit Insurance Corporation does not have the power necessary to come in and take over that organization and protect the taxpayers of Canada and all the other people who are paying premiums to the Canadian Deposit Insurance Corporation. That to me is crazy.

I still think the compromise is not a good compromise, that we must go on bended knee to the premier of each province and say: "Can we FIRP your financial institution?"

That is going to take time and time is the essential element in this whole process. If we are to salvage an insolvent company or a company that is bordering on insolvency then we have to move quickly to arrange buyers and to make those kinds of deals in order to make it work. If part of the process is to go on bended knee to a provincial premier to ask if we can do it, and that premier is dealing with all the political ramifications associated with it happening, I think the process is going to fail and more people are going to lose money with these failed provincial institutions. I do not see the merit or concern and I do not accept that.

The guy who plays is the guy who should pay. What we know for sure is that the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation is the one that is going to have to pay. If provincial organizations want the benefit of that insurance then they should sign on for the consequences of a FIRP should they get into financial difficulties.

I am very worried about the present status when you read the headlines I referred to earlier:

'Sickies' double CDIC's costs.

If you read on in that particular article in The Globe and Mail, the organization is asking for a doubling of the amount of money they can ask the federal government to give them out of general revenue in order to keep financial institutions afloat.

We are facing a major problem. I am very concerned about a problem we are facing right now and I hope this legislation can facilitate that problem when it deals with the company called Central Trust. We know it is for sale. There has been a problem with that particular organization. As a maritimer or Atlantic Canadian. I feel sad about that institution being in difficulty and knowing some of the people involved in that corporation.

It was the one financial institution that had a base in Atlantic Canada. The best branches were in Atlantic Canada and it was the only institution that provided that mechanism for Atlantic Canadians to get financial support, to judge the loans partly on the individuals because they knew them from their neighbourhood. This was rather than having, as we say in Atlantic Canada, the large institutions in upper Canada tell us who is going to get a loan and who is not.

In that sense it saddens me to see what is going on, but I am even sadder by the idea that all the best branches are going to be picked. They will go to some of the other financial institutions such as North American Life and perhaps the National Bank.

At the same time the poorer branches and the problems are going to be left with Central Trust. Then the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation could perhaps be called upon to have to bail out that segment that is left. That is going to increase the costs.

I believe that Mr. MacKenzie and OSFI are going to be in a position to deal with that particular situation and use the FIRPing provisions that are here in order to bring forward the best deal. It may still be with the National Bank or North American Life or it may be with another institution, but those are the types of powers this bill will give to our financial institution regulators.

In that sense, we are pleased to support the bill. We want to see it in place as quickly as possible so that the financial institution organizations will have the necessary protections.

In conclusion I want to comment on one other minor thing. It was a recommendation from Mr. Justice Estey about OSFI. When I say OSFI, I mean the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions. We deal with all these fancy little initials and nobody can figure out what they mean. That is why FIRPing has such an exciting connotation. It is really not all that great.

Look at both the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions and the Canada Deposit Insurance Company and the functions they perform. Mr. Justice Estey said that maybe Canadians and the Canadian government would get a bigger bang for their buck if these were put together because they perform roughly the same functions and there is some duplication.

We do see CDIC growing by leaps and bounds when you hear their staff has doubled in the last five years and their budget has gone up dramatically in the last couple of years. You can see perhaps that there may be some benefit in taking a look at bringing those two organizations together and perhaps effecting some savings. That is something that will be left for another day. Hopefully that day will come soon so we can go back and take a look at that concept.

We are supportive of this legislation. I thank all the colleagues on the finance committee who studied this legislation because they did pick off some of the errors and some of the mistakes that were brought forward by a hastily prepared bill. I think we have a better piece of legislation. Thanks to the committee and thanks to the witnesses who came forward.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, as someone who at one time, and this was quite some time ago, worked for three banks, including the Bank of Montreal, perhaps I may offer my comments on this bill. I believe I am now considered a fairly good critic, at least I hope so, of the banking industry.

[English]

Any legislation that will serve to strengthen the confidence that all Canadians have in our financial institutions is obviously something that we in the Official Opposition would like to support.

The fact of the matter is that this government has done more to sabotage that confidence than to build it. Bill C–48 is an exception, as just indicated by the member for Moncton. It adequately addresses many of the problems that the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation has been faced with when confronting financial institutions on the verge of failure. As my colleagues from Malpeque and Moncton have just indicated, our party will support this bill.

I would like to use my brief time this evening to speak of the absurd fiasco that has haunted the path to CDIC reform. In 1985, two banks in my own province of Alberta met a tragic and inglorious fate. The Northland Bank and the Canadian Commercial Bank suddenly collapsed under the weight of too many high risk liabilities and several bad investments. I might say the collapse of real estate in my province was a major factor in both those banks' problems.

CDIC was on the hook for $417 million in insured deposits for those two banks alone. These were the only two financial institutions to fail, other than trust companies, since the Great Depression. That was in 1985, seven years ago. The Berlin wall has come down, the Soviet Union has dissolved, yet the government has just now woken up to the fact that the CDIC needed to have broader powers over financial institutions in trouble in order to avoid the problems, the misery and the suffering of people associated with the collapse of the CCB and the Northland Bank.

The minister responsible at the time, who is now the Secretary of State for External Affairs, was very concerned, as she ought to have been then. Unfortunately, she was not able to transform her concern into meaningful action. Perhaps her colleagues would not let her.

The renowned Justice Willard Estey, now a business person, was asked to investigate the failures. He stands today as one of the main authors of the bill before the House tonight. The problem is that it is now 1992 and the matter should have been taken care of years ago.

In December 1985, the Senate banking committee reported that the CDIC should be granted broader powers to assist financial institutions in difficulty.

In an article in The Globe and Mail published December 26, 1985, reporter Bruce Little wrote that the Senate committee: "said that the CDIC should not take over the role of primary regulator of banks and federally incorporated trust and loan companies, but should move in when institutions run into trouble". That is exactly, thankfully, what this bill attempts to do.

To use a somewhat macabre analogy, the CDIC will now be able to act as doctor in nursing a financial institution back to health, rather than as an undertaker.

Since this bill was introduced in the House last December it has been the subject of some tumultuous hearings of the House finance committee. A bill that could have been passed expeditiously, I believe with the co–operation of our party—I cannot speak for the other opposition members—was subjected to barbs from various industry groups who had not been given the opportunity to give their input on the bill in the drafting process. That was, I believe, a major error and one that demeans our legislative process. It was delayed, I might add, on the advice of such great consumer advocates as the Canadian Bankers' Association. This is the same Canadian Bankers' Association that wants now to reduce the maximum level of insurable deposits from $60,000 to $20,000. We know whose interests they are looking after. The people of Canada, especially small depositors who are most at risk, deserve better than that from a strong Canadian industry and the organization which speaks for it, the CBA.

I have been critical in the past of how the CDIC has dealt with certain failures only because those failures could have been prevented had this reform taken place at the right time long ago.

I would ask my colleagues to hearken back to the summer of October 22, 1985. That is when the former auditor of the Northland Bank appeared before the Senate banking committee investigating the failure of two banks.

In his testimony, Crawford Smith noted the following: "I personally think that had the public not lost confidence and begun withdrawing deposits, the bank would have survived".

This arises from the belief that the CDIC could only intervene in the operation of a financial institution if it had already failed. By virtue of its traditional role as an undertaker of financial institutions, once the CDIC appointed a curator to run the Northland Bank, it was by all accounts clinically dead.

At what cost did this occur? The CDIC was forced to compensate insured depositors to the tune of $161 million and it threw about 200 Albertans, many of them residents of Edmonton, out of work.

What other results has the outdated mandate of the CDIC wrought on our financial institutions across Canada? In 1983 the collapse of the Alberta based Fidelity Trust Company cost taxpayers $359 million to repay depositors. The 1987 rehabilitation of the North-West Trust cost the CDIC $275 million. More recently, the Standard Trust Company, the Standard Loan Company, the Bank of Credit and Commerce Canada and the Saskatchewan Trust Company will all need assistance from public sources to satisfy depositors and investors.

Central Guaranty and First City Trust are currently in dire straits. Hopefully the passage of this legislation will allow those two firms to pull out of the fire that they now find themselves in.

This bill will transform the CDIC into a body that will build confidence in financial institutions rather than take away the respirator. As most Canadians know, if there is anything that is desperately needed in Canada's economic environment, it is confidence, the more confidence the better.

Why are we on this side concerned about the sluggishness of this initiative? It is kind of like molasses flowing up a very steep hill in Alberta, in January.

If anybody has had the chance to look at the financial condition of the CDIC lately, the answer is clear. In calendar year 1990 the corporation borrowed $1.28 billion from the federal government in order to compensate depositors. Last year, in 1991, $1.9 billion was needed. CDIC debts stood at around $600 million at the end of 1991. Obviously any new action that would help the corporation aid institutions without decapitating them, without killing them, would have a positive effect on the deficit, a deficit which members know has been virtually more than doubled since this group opposite took office in 1984.

I would conclude by reminding the House that we certainly welcome this legislation on this side. But dilly-dallying around with important measures like this for years and years and years has to stop. The failures I mentioned earlier could have been prevented had the lessons of the failure of Northland and the CCB been acted upon right away with due diligence, with responsibility and with concern for the people of Canada.

Just a couple of days ago I spoke on Bill C-78 dealing with amendments to several pieces of legislation to enhance the rights of Canada's 3.3 million disabled fellow citizens. It is another bill that has been delayed, studied, toyed with and eventually watered down by a terribly discredited government. Indeed, the polls will show it is the most unpopular government in Canadian history, at least since they started taking polls, and they call the Liberal opposition obstructionist.

Finally, I hope the government has learned a lesson from this bill. Consumer confidence in our financial institutions of all sorts is not something that any government worthy of the name should trifle with. I do not know why the government would want to treat this matter lightly either. I think we will all stand a little taller when this bill becomes the law of the land.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Carried on division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

BANKRUPTY ACT AND INSOLVENCY ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)) moved that Bill C-22, an act to amend the Bankruptcy Act and to amend the Income Tax Act in consequence thereof, be read the third time and passed.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity today to speak to Bill C-22, which proposes to reform the Bankruptcy Act. I know members opposite will agree that this bill has been a long time in coming and that our economy desperately needs this legislation.

Canada must have bankruptcy legislation that reflects the realities of 1990, not 1949. Our country needs legislation that is easy to implement, effective and less costly for taxpayers and that requires less expense and effort on the part of those who must use it as a last resort.

Canada wants bankruptcy legislation that is fair to creditors. Above all, we must have legislation that gives companies in financial difficulty more breathing space in which to reorganize their affairs.

Bill C-22 contains a number of key objectives.

First, the bill aims to strike a better balance between the rights of various classes of creditors and the rights of creditors and debtors. It will also update the legislation to make it more effective, less costly and easier to implement on a day to day basis.

The new legislation will also make it possible for individuals and businesses to restructure and, if possible, avoid bankruptcy.

The thrust of this reform is to provide a mechanism that will safeguard businesses that have the misfortune to be in financial difficulty but are still viable. It is not, as I have said from time to time, to give artificial respiration to businesses that are clinically dead but to ensure that businesses that are viable get the help they need to keep going. Thanks to this mechanism, we will save thousands of jobs.

The bill stresses restructuring, not liquidation. These changes are something we have needed for a long time. As I said earlier, the Bankruptcy Act was passed in 1949. Members on both sides of the House are aware that today's market requires legislation that provides a greater degree of equity, effectiveness and certainty.

The new series of bankruptcy provisions we have developed considers the needs of debtors, creditors, consumers and suppliers. We succeeded in getting this bill where it is today because we consulted a great many people, because we also listened to the people we consulted, and also because we provided the flexibility and initiative that were required in this process.

I realize that members on both sides of the House are disappointed that the government rejected the proposals for wage claim protection.

[English]

I would remind those members that in the absence of consensus on how to provide wage protection, we must move forward where there is consensus. Canadian workers will indeed significantly benefit from this legislation which helps companies avoid bankruptcy altogether.

This piece of legislation is very much designed to protect Canadian jobs. It gives companies time to restructure in order to survive. Had previous Parliaments been able to pass this legislation, there is no telling how many companies might have survived this recession. There is no telling how many jobs might have been saved.

We cannot fail where Parliaments before have failed. This seventh attempt to reform Canada's bankruptcy laws must succeed. The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell put the matter very well last May 22 when the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations tabled its report.

I would like to thank him for his intervention on that occasion when he said: "Hundreds of thousands of jobs are at stake if we do not get the new bankruptcy law. I do not want to see any more workers lose their jobs in the depths of this recession. We need to help workers immediately. I do not want to see this delayed any further, notwithstanding my great desire to have the wage earner protection plan which I certainly hope the government will introduce at the earliest opportunity".

The government shares my hon. friend's concern for a wage earner protection program. This issue will be given the highest priority when the act comes up for parliamentary review in three years.

The government also strongly agrees with my hon. colleague that now is the time to act. We do not want to see this reform delayed any further, not when thousands of jobs may be at stake.

[Translation]

Bill C–22 vastly improves the effectiveness and fairness of the federal Bankruptcy Act. By making provisions relating to restructuring more flexible and accessible, Bill C–22 helps safeguard jobs while providing businesses and individuals with greater leeway to turn the situation around without having to resort prematurely to bankruptcy. By providing businesses and individuals in financial difficulty with more breathing space to negotiate with their creditors, Bill C–22 helps avoid unnecessary bankruptcies and, as a result, helps to safeguard jobs. By expanding the rights of unpaid suppliers, Bill C–22 helps to counter the familiar domino effect.

By eliminating Crown priority in some cases, Bill C–22, I am sure you will agree, makes bankruptcy rules more equitable. As hon. members are aware, the new provisions are the result of intensive consultations conducted by the government and the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations.

Both the government and the standing committee consulted with industry, the unions, consumers, financial institutions, legal experts and the provinces. Mr. Speaker, this reform was not planned in a vacuum by people who never had to manage a payroll or a budget. Those with concerns about the new proposals had ample opportunity to express their views and make a very positive contribution to this final version of the bill before us this evening.

[English]

This legislation is the product of an experiment in sending a bill for pre–study by the standing committee. The government has accepted the vast majority of the committee's recommendations, from large policy issues such as the rights of farmers and fishermen as unpaid suppliers to questions of courtesy and logic such as making draft regulations available to the standing committee.

These amendments are a tribute to the manner in which all parties can work together to improve a piece of legislation that is vital to our country's economic health.

In line with recommendations made at the pre–study stage, we adopted the committee's suggestion to stop the clock, if I may use that analogy, for unpaid suppliers, pending implementation of reorganization measures. We adopted the eminently reasonable recommendation requiring the bankrupt consumer to engage in financial consultations as a condition for his release.

In the past, many consumers have been involved in multiple bankruptcies. Because the same consumer would occasionally be faced with another personal bankruptcy a couple of years later, it was necessary to be able to offer these people, and the system as well, the assurance that we could also help consumers find ways to reorganize so as to avoid another bankruptcy.

In other words, we made good use of the excellent report drafted by the standing committee. We carefully considered the views expressed by various intervenors who appeared during the pre-study.

Bill C-22 reflects many years of intensive consultations with business, unions, consumers and legal experts—with all the people who deal with insolvency. Where a consensus seemed possible, a consensus was achieved; where compromise was necessary, a compromise was reached; where leadership was required, leadership was given.

The result was a set of proposals that provides a reasonable and balanced response to a host of complex problems that must be dealt with as soon as possible, in order to safeguard businesses and jobs. Let us try to succeed where other governments have failed six times over.

After waiting more than forty years, Canadians can no longer afford outdated bankruptcy legislation. Bill C-22 is a basic component of the framework put in place by this government to promote a competitive and productive economy that will provide prosperity for all Canadians.

In a few days or a few hours, it will be a year since this bill was tabled for first reading, a bill that we amended with the help of my colleagues who participated in the process, like the hon. member for Dartmouth, who is in the House this evening, and the hon. member for Nickel Belt, both of whom worked very hard in committee with government members. Unfortunately we could not satisfy all the requests or suggestions made to us. The art of governing is being able to go ahead with what we have a consensus on and to implement mechanisms to help businesses first thing tomorrow morning and save jobs for thousands of workers.

I almost feel like saying when we finally pass this bill, that I look forward to next time because in a few years, we will review it in a more permanent way. With the legislation we have passed since 1984, we try as much as possible to have a mechanism in the law to review it regularly so as to avoid the absolutely unacceptable situation of legislation remaining on the books for 40 or 50 years without significant amendment.

I think that the Canadian parliamentary system now allows us to do it and this ongoing review will no doubt give Canadians legislation, including the Bankruptcy Act, that is more dynamic and can be amended from time to time over the years.

I thank all hon. members who will pass this bill tonight. I think it is a great day.

[English]

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, it is high time that I finally have the chance to address this bill at third reading.

It has been one year since the minister made his announcement and tabled the bill in the House. I made a mistake the other night, or I think I did, in discussing this at report stage. It has been one year almost to the day. It was on June 13 of last year after much deliberation, after years of discussion and debate, that this minister finally made the announcement that the government would be proceeding with yet another attempt to reform Canada's Bankruptcy Act.

The minister said it well, that the act we currently have and that is still the law of this country was passed by Parliament in 1949 and it has not been substantially amended since then.

It took us one year to get to this point. June 13 will be the one-year anniversary of the tabling in this House of Bill C-22. What started off with a great deal of promise a number of times hit the shoals. It landed on the rocks. We started off and figured it would be a noble adventure.

The minister was very kind in the beginning. We sat down and talked. Because of the economic situation that the country found itself in, primarily due unfortunately to this minister's government's policies, we were looking at record bankruptcies around the country. We were seeing economic decline in this nation unlike anything we had seen since the dirty thirties.

The opposition, myself included, felt that we had a fundamental responsibility. If the government was not going to listen and change its ways and abandon the economic policies that has forced so many Canadian citizens into bankruptcy, then we felt it was incumbent upon us in the opposition to co-operate wherever we could with the government. We felt we should at least try to improve the legislative infrastructure in the marketplace to catch those being forced out of the economic mainstream and on to the economic trash heap of bankruptcy.

The minister will recall back on June 13 when he made the announcement. I was not here. My youngest son, Stephen, was being born that very day. So I have two reasons to remember that date. I have to thank the minister and I will do it publicly now. He sent the nicest bouquet of blue flowers. I did not think you could get blue flowers but his florist found them somewhere. He sent a bouquet of blue flowers to my wife, congratulating her on the birth of our son, Stephen.

What we did at that point in time in recognition of the difficulty Canadians were finding themselves in is the opposition parties agreed to a novel approach. We agreed to pre-study the bill.

The difficulty we have here is that when a bill comes through the House, once it gets approved in principle at second reading, everybody digs in their heels. The job of government members on committee is not necessarily to improve the legislation, it is to get the legislation through with the integrity of the government intact. If there are any major flaws, they have to find ways that the government can change them a little later.

I believe the creativity that is absolutely necessary in this House and through the legislative process to bring back to this place any integrity lost is to allow private members to participate in the formulation and betterment of legislation.

We agreed to that on this side of the House, and sure enough we did it all through the month of September. We came back early and pre-studied the bill. It was fabulous. None of the members of the committee felt bound by any party ideology or philosophy. What we said we would do is we had a fundamental responsibility to the Canadian public as parliamentarians to go through the legislation and to squeeze out of that process of pre-study the best possible amendments to the Bankruptcy Act that we could possibly arrive at.

I have spoken two or three times on this and hundreds of times in committee. I asked dozens of questions of the minister, so I am not going to go through all the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act. My comments on them are well recorded in the Hansard both of committee and of this place.

There were a number of major parts of this bill. The bill sought to rebalance the bankruptcy legislation, the infrastructure legislation in the marketplace. It sought to go and change the regulatory environment of 1949 and to take into account the interests of the very stakeholders in a bankruptcy situation.

One of the first things obviously that the minister and the government saw that was out of whack was the fact that individuals who put their labour into a company or a business and do not get paid should be near the top. That is because those individuals had invested their labour and it is usually one of the last inputs into a company before it becomes insolvent and is forced into receivership or bankruptcy.

The minister and the government decided that rather than rebalance the bill and recognize right in the body of the Bankruptcy Act that wage earners had a right to be protected and they had a right to be up front in the process, it said: "We cannot do that because of the big financial institutions".

Sometimes I accuse the minister of being too good a friend of the big institutions, and perhaps that is unfair. But the big financial institutions in this country carry a heck of a lot of clout, not just over parliamentarians but over businesses as well. These institutions can make a decision based on one slight modification in the formula of the credit worthiness of an organization that may mean that it cannot access the lines of credit needed in order to carry on its business.

In the five or six previous attempts, I believe, to reform this bill we could never get it right because the big interest there, the financial institutions, which were usually secured creditors, if too much of their security was taken away in the legislation it would scare the life out of the business community. The financial institutions would then tell the businesses that they were not going to be able to lend them money any more and that they were not going to be able to have their revolving lines of credit. The business community would fall back and say: "My goodness, if the banks turn their backs on us we will not be able to do business". It is no different for political parties.

The banks have clout in this country because they are large financial institutions. They wield a lot of power. Rather than face up to the bullies on the block, the big financial institutions, the government said: "No, we recognize that there should be a rebalancing of this bill. We recognize fundamentally that the workers have to be up front here, but we are not going to do it in the body of the act because the big banks are going to squeal too loudly. Therefore what we are going to do is set up a fund called the wage earner protection fund".

In and of itself it is not a bad idea. In recognition of the fact that workers had an interest in the assets of a bankrupt company and that the wages should be paid, a fund would be set up. This fund was going to pay them up to 90 per cent of the wages and vacation pay they were owed, up to a maximum of $2,000. The government wanted to ensure that there was a system in place that provided for certainty and immediacy of payment for those workers. In many cases they were only getting $4.50 an hour and every dollar they got went to feed, clothe and shelter their children. They were the two criteria that were used.

We said we would rather see it in the bill. We would rather see some super priority given to the wage earners in the body of the bill. Recognize for goodness' sakes that that is where it should be done. The rest of the interests will just have to move on down a little bit because it is not a lot of money.

The government said it could not do that, so it set up a fund. The original name of this bill before it was amended at committee was an Act to Enact the Wage Payment Claim Act and to amend the Bankruptcy Act and related statutes. I guess I could have swallowed that. I recognized where the pressures were. I was pleased that the government recognized there was a fundamental responsibility to those workers in cases of bankruptcy to get the few dollars back that they were owed.

But the government had a problem. The government's problem was that it was going to fund this by a tax. It was going to implement a new tax. This is the government that has implemented 34 new taxes since it came to power. This is the very government that has come in and shifted the tax burden away from corporations and on to the middle class. This is the very government that at 11 per cent in the polls for goodness' sakes came in with the most unpopular tax in the western world, the GST. But this time Canadians were taxed out.

What this government was going to do was tax everybody. It was even going to tax public corporations. It was going to go to the school boards and tax school boards. Public corporations do not go bankrupt. It was going to tax hospitals. Hospitals do not go bankrupt. It was going to tax municipalities. Municipalities do not go bankrupt. It was going to tax small and medium sized businesses, businesses that do go bankrupt all too frequently because of this government's policies.

The business community came in and it said it agreed with most of this bill. When it came time to deal with the wage earner protection fund, it thought it was a great idea.

But do you know what? We do not trust this gang opposite. We do not trust governments any more when they say it is only a small little tax because we think you guys lacks integrity and we do not think you are always up front with us.

We think if you get a small little tax, to start off it is going to be 10 cents a week, and before you know it, it is going to be one of those big taxes.

They had heard throughout the GST debate about all the wonderful attributes of the GST. Do you remember it all? It was going to be revenue neutral. It was going to be transparent. You were going to be able to see it when you paid it. It was going to be single tiered. It was going to be fair. Most important, it was going to be revenue neutral.

There is nobody in the country that has an ounce of sense left in his head who would believe this government when it says it is only a small tax and it is not going to grow.

At that point the government said to every one of these businesses that came in, every organization: "We promise you that this tax will not change without coming back to Parliament". Some officials are watching this debate from various parts of the building, I hope. I can see a few here. It told them over and over again: "You do not have to worry. Trust us because this tax cannot be changed unless it goes back to Parliament".

The committee, Tories included—I know it is hard to believe it—listened to all the debate and listened to the witnesses. After all the debate and all the witnesses, after everything was said and done, we came in with the report back in September. You know what we reported? We reported that more properly the interest of the wage earner should be in the act itself. We did not believe one word that came out of the mouths of the big financial institutions, crying in their cups at the committee that they would lose money. This was at the same time that we were in the worst recession since perhaps the 1930s. It was at the same time that the big banks were making record profits. The minister knows that. They made $3.4 billion in profits in 1991. In the middle of one of the worst recessions we have ever seen, they had the highest profits they had ever seen.

The Liberals, New Democrats, and Conservative members of Parliament sitting on that pre-study committee made a recommendation. The recommendation said: "In the event that the bankruptcy, liquidation, or receivership of an employer, claims by employees for unpaid wages, for salespersons' expenses up to a maximum of $3,000, should be given priority over the claims of all other creditors, including the Crown". This priority, however, should be subject to the right of unpaid suppliers of the employer.

Do you know what that means, Mr. Speaker? It means an idea called super priority, which means that they take the first crack at the assets. It was recommended by Conservatives and not just left wing Conservatives. We have some members over there who even my hon. colleagues would consider right wing Conservatives.

They say: "Yes, it may cause some trouble in the financial communities, but by God this is the way it has to be done". We made all kinds of other recommendations about how this bill should be changed. The government came back at second reading, accepted a lot of the other recommendations of the committee and ignored the recommendation about the wage earner protection fund.

There was a particular problem caused at this point in time: There were at least eight members of the government benches who said: "I will not support this legislation because it implements a new tax. I no longer will support my government if it introduces new taxes".

"By God, you have made me swallow the GST and I have the scars to prove it", they told the government, "but I am not going to swallow another tax. I have finally listened to my business community and I am going to do what my constituents think is right, not what my government says is right. I am not going to support a tax".

We get to committee. We had a fine time. We were still friendly then. We were still working in a vein of co-operation, and all of a sudden what happened? There was complete discord. We had the parliamentary secretary come in, and because there was a problem with the Conservative caucus the government announced to its caucus, not to me: "You don't have to worry about it. We know this tax thing is going to give you a problem because the municipalities, the universities and the schools and the hospitals, the MUSH sector, are all on your case and they are sending you petitions. What we are going to do is we are going to fund the program out of the CRF, the consolidated revenue fund".

The government was going to pay it. We did not have to worry about the tax. We thought it was rather kind of the government to do that. Its members came into the committee and had a double-headed amendment. The first part of the amendment said that it would be funded by CRF. All the Tories were saying: "Great, no tax". I was saying: "Great, no tax. The government has listened". We recognized that the government which caused this recession should pay a small premium to try to rectify some of the damage of the recession. We thought they recognized that but obviously they did not.

Upon prying into the amendment, my hon. colleague over here realizes, we found out that there was another part of the amendment. After telling all these businesses, hospitals and universities across Canada that the tax could never be raised unless it came back to Parliament, we found out that this amendment which was ostensibly going to give a year and a half without a tax also gave the Governor in Council, which is cabinet, the ability to raise the tax unilaterally without ever coming back to Parliament.

In short, they had misled every single witness who had come into our committee, every single witness. They had misled members on the committee.

Second, upon further questioning we found out that there was no holiday for anybody. There was no freebie here. They were going to lend the money to the fund. That is all they were going to do: lend the money to the fund. At some point in the future they were going to get future employers to pay back the money for the first two years of the fund.

It was the height of hypocrisy, a sleight of hand, and dare I say, a deceit to come forward at that point in time. They destroyed the discord of the committee. We argued the point that what the government was doing was wrong. It flew in the face of the rules and regulations and precedents of this place.

Lo and behold, another miracle happened at that committee. The New Democratic Party and the Liberal Party argued that the government's amendment was out of order. I will never forget that day either. We were right, and the chairman of the committee came back and said: "I checked with the clerk and the opposition is right. You can't do this". Then the Tories did not know what to do. Do members remember that? The Tories did not know what to do. They were going to kick the chairman off the committee because he had not done what they wanted him to do.

So much for harmony, so much for co-operation, and so much for doing it the right way.

What happened then is that the government did not know what to do with the bill. That was in early December. It did not call the committee back and the bill basically got stuck in neutral. The government then ran around the Parliament Buildings trying to figure out what in the name of goodness to do next. At the same time, every day the bill was not put back into the House and every day that the government did not know what to do with the bill hundreds of Canadians were going bankrupt.

We went to the minister on a number of occasions and said: "We realize that the Minister of Finance will not give you the money to fund this fund". We put at least four different proposals as to how they could fund this particular program privately to the minister and his officials, and each and every time it was met with no response.

Finally, a bill was brought back to the House of Commons, stripped of the entire wage earner protection program.

My hon. colleague from Nickel Belt had spent a considerable amount of time with me and the minister and members of the Conservative caucus trying to be innovative. We said the bill indicated in its title that the government recognized there was a right that wage-earners had in this and therefore how could it possibly split that part of the bill? It is done and history will judge these people opposite for doing that.

We fully support most of the aspects of the bill dealing with reorganization. We support the ability of suppliers under this act to be able to revindicate or take back their goods. I must give the minister some credit because that must have been a tough one to get by some of the lobbyists from the banks because it affects their secured position. The minister stood tough and we all win on that one.

There are some other provisions of the bill, just introduced recently in amendments, for farmers and fishermen which recognize that they are a little different. The minister and the government agreed with members of the committee from all sides and included special protection for farmers and fishermen. The Cattlemen's Association did not get everything it wanted but I guess half a loaf is better than none on this particular count.

Things have changed. This bill goes a long way in taking an outdated Bankruptcy Act, because that is all it is now it is not a wage earner protection act anymore, and rebalancing it to a great extent. It takes away the right of the big financial institutions to walk in and almost unilaterally pull the rug out from under businesses that might be experiencing some cash flow problems. Businesses are not always solvent, sometimes they are insolvent but that does not mean they are not good businesses. It may be because of fluctuation in the market, it may be because of problems with cash flow, it could be for a whole number of reasons. However, all too often the banks could quickly appoint a receiver, pull the rug out out from under the business, and the business would go belly up.

They cannot do that any more, they are going to have to give notice, I think it is 10 days, before they appoint a receiver. The individual or the corporation now, rather than saying that they cannot do anything unless they find the money to pay everybody off, are going to be able to file for protection and are going to be able, just as in the United States, to put a proposal together to reorganize without a gun at their heads. This means they can have an orderly repayment of their debts so that they can save jobs. When a business goes bankrupt we lose jobs and we lose productive people from the economy and the community.

This bill goes a long way toward fixing that. We support those provisions and they were equally contributed to by all parties in this House. Even after that rocky period in November, December and January we have shown that this place can still work and we have pulled it together, and the minister has been able to bring this back to the House.

However, we cannot sit here and talk about bankruptcy without really understanding what has happened in the last 12 months. I started off my speech by saying that in the last 12 months a lot has happened in my life. I have a new child who is going to be a year old on June 13. This bill has been in and out, up and down, and all over the place. All kinds of things have happened here. However one of the things that—

Mr. Blais: Do you still want blue flowers?

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): You can send more flowers, though make them red this time.

One of the other unfortunate things that has happened is that the recession, which this government denied was a reality for so long, continued at a breakneck pace. Between June 13 of last year and June 13 of this year about 70,000 individual Canadians and Canadian businesses have been forced into bankruptcy. There have been billions of dollars in liabilities left over by those companies.

In 1991 in Nova Scotia alone there was one bankruptcy for every 305 Nova Scotians. Think about that. It means in every neighbourhood in Nova Scotia, people have either lost their jobs because of a bankruptcy, perhaps have had to file for personal bankruptcy, or somehow are affected by this outbreak, this plague of bankruptcies that is spreading through the economy.

It has to be understood when we talk about the statistics on bankruptcy they are not just sterile numbers. These are real people. They are just like me or the minister. They have families, children, parents, they contribute to their community. They have some pride, integrity, and they work hard.

People find themselves up against that big grindstone of debt because they have lost their jobs, cannot pay their mortgages, their kids cannot get into sports, and maybe they cannot even feed their families without going to a food bank. They lose their integrity, that sense of community, of being able to contribute to their family and their community.

Each and every one of these cases where somebody is forced into a bankruptcy is a personal tragedy. It is not something that just goes away the day they get their discharge. Unfortunately there is a stigma attached which is with them for the rest of their lives. They have problems with their spouses, their children, their parents, their neighbours, because the emotional anxiety they go through may never be erased.

Many times they never again contribute to the same extent they had contributed when they were productive members before the stigma of bankruptcy.

There was a new record established every month for the last 16 or 17 months. We broke records in this country; not of productivity, not of employment growth, but of a growth in bankruptcies. There was a tragedy unfolding.

Since this government's made-in-Canada recession began there has been over 130,000 Canadians, individuals, businesses, which have gone belly up. It is fine for the government to spend all their time talking about their prosperity budget, $50 million here, $25 million there. These people have been the real casualties of this government's economic policies.

There is a lot of stuff we do not like in this bill. I do not like the fact the wage earner protection fund has been done away with. There are a few provisions I would like to see changed but I have some sense of what I am supposed to be doing as a member of Parliament. I think most members of this House have.

When we look at the economic calamity taking place in every corner of this nation, when we look at an unemployment rate in the province of Newfoundland in excess of 20 per cent, when we look at over 1.5 million Canadians unemployed, when we look at over one million Canadian children living in poverty and 2.5 million Canadians on welfare, anything we can do on this side of the House to offer even a modicum of relief we will support.

The members opposite are saying, why not? We are going to support this bill but my time will be spent today not just saying what is good about the bill but also telling Canadians what could have been done and how it could have been better.

There are an awful lot of definitions of bankruptcy. Webster's ninth edition says: "Bankruptcy: One who is destitute, exhausted of valuable qualities, impoverished". The Penguin Canadian Dictionary says: "One totally lacking in specific qualities". The Gage Canadian Dictionary says: "Bankruptcy: A person who is completely lacking in something".

If we get into the etymology of the word "bankrupt" we cannot help but contrast it with the activities of this government over the last number of years. This government has proven over and over that no matter what definition of bankrupt is given, this government meets the criteria. Economically they are bankrupt. They got into power on the promise of jobs, jobs, jobs in 1984 and what we have seen is rising unemployment.

In 1988 they said to the Canadian public: "We are going to come in with a free trade deal and that deal is going to open up markets in the United States. We have to get away from countervail. We have to get access to their markets and the world is going to be rosy again because we are going to create all these jobs".

We see how many jobs have been created. By some estimates, there were over 1 million jobs lost in the Canadian economy because of free trade. The manufacturing sector in southwestern Ontario has been decimated because of this government's economic policies.

It talked about spreading prosperity around. In actual fact, if you measure regional disparities by unemployment rates and by family income, you will find out quite quickly that there is no prosperity in places like Newfoundland and there is no prosperity in places like Saskatchewan, where this government is presiding over the very death of the family farm. In Saskatchewan there are more acres of farmland that are now owned by banks that have foreclosed than are owned by individual farmers. Every day, every week, every month of every year this government is in power the family farm goes further on to the endangered species list in places like Saskatchewan.

This government is bankrupt of policies. This government has gone into the management of the fisheries on the east coast of Canada. Because it does not really care about the east coast of Canada, because it does not have the electoral seats there, it has decided that in a great effort to try to cleanse itself of its bad image at home, it is going to do it by being friendly to the foreigners. It has effectively mismanaged and handed over that once great resource called the northern cod stock to foreign fleets.

In Newfoundland, which has always suffered more disparity than any other region of the country because of this government's bankrupt economic policies, we have a situation quickly developing where within the next weeks we may have the Minister of Fisheries announcing that there is no more fish because he has given it all away or he has mismanaged the stock into near extinction. There will be 35,000 jobs in the province of Newfoundland that will go with it, 35,000 jobs. It is a province of 570,000 people. In terms of Montreal or Toronto, it would be like Montreal losing perhaps 120,000 to 150,000 jobs.

Newfoundland is destitute because of this government's bankrupt policies on the fisheries. This government lacks the integrity to understand that when it is at 11 or 12 per cent in the polls, it does not have the support of the Canadian public to pursue policies with the Americans, with foreigners, or with the North American free trade deal where we are now in phase one.

It is like Freddie Kruger and Nightmare on Elm Street. There was a number in the series. Well the Nightmare on Elm Street No. 1 for the Canadian public was 1984 when it elected these guys the first time.

Chapter 2 in the trilogy was when it told us it was going to have a free trade deal with the United States. Chapter 3 was the GST and NAFTA, two issues it has on its economic agenda that will ensure that the demise of the Canadian economy will continue and that the destruction of this nation will continue unabated as long as this bunch opposite is at the helm.

This government is bankrupt of any idea of what to do with this once great nation. It has taken a nation of incredible promise, a nation that is extremely diverse but was extremely tolerant and turned it into a nation where nobody feels secure that they have any future here any more.

It has turned it into a country where anglophones are battling francophones, whites discriminating against blacks. It has turned it into a country where it has pitted region against region against region. We have race riots in Toronto and in my hometown, Dartmouth and Halifax. We have economic conditions leading young black youth to stop trusting that the system will get any better and who are taking things into their own hands.

We have had outbreaks of racism in western Canada against the Sikh community. We have had Canadians from coast to coast to coast who have lost that sense of Canadianism and have started to question whether or not there is even any hope for this country. That is only after a few years of this government's bankrupt direction.

In conclusion, I wish that we could apply this bill to the Conservative government. I talked about reorganization and meetings of creditors. I wish we could apply this bill to this government, because I think if we could the Canadian public would serve notice. They would give it its 10 day notice just like banks do when they appoint a receiver. They would appoint a receiver against this government and that receiver would be the Chief Electoral Officer of this country.

There would be a vote in this country by the shareholders, the stakeholders, Canadians from coast to coast to coast. They would come up with a reorganization plan. In that reorganization plan, the first plank would be that they would get rid of the board of directors which is the cabinet, and they would send the CEO south, and that is the Prime Minister of Canada.

Maybe if we had the opportunity to do with this government what businesses can now do when they find themselves in times of turmoil, we would have some future.

Canadians will never forgive this government for what it has done to this great nation over the last number of years. Perhaps the final and the most telling testament to the greatness of this nation is that yes, this nation will survive even eight years of Tory mismanagement.

Finally, I want to give a quote because I think this quote suits this government perfectly. It is a statement about how I and every Canadian feels after this government has driven this economy straight into the cellar. It is a quote from, of all people, Trotsky: "You are pitiful, isolated individuals. You are the bankrupts. Your role is played out. Go where you belong from now on, into the dustbin of history".

I can assure you that the next time Canadians have an opportunity to judge this government, they will remember that quote and this government will be destined to the ash pile of history.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I looked on with great interest as we have gone through a perilous journey with Bill C–22, the Bankruptcy Act and the insolvency act as presented by this government.

One gentleman asks if I would support this bill. Unlike my Liberal colleague, I would not support this bill. Fundamentally it is flawed, and I would not support it for the same reason I would not support the referendum. I thought that it was fundamentally flawed. Something is flawed when it does not do what it is supposed to do. If it does not give wage protection to workers then it is not worth being supported.

Just to respond specifically to the question on the other side, a bad bill is a bad bill is a bad bill.

Let me give a bit of history on this Bankruptcy Act and the insolvency act. It is very important. This goes back to 1949. The last time we dealt with bankruptcy in a substantial manner was 1949. As far back as 1970 there was a study committee. The report coming from the study committee said that the 1949 act essentially reflected the 1949 situation. It meant that the moneys that workers could get were expressed in 1949 dollars. We are looking at very little money.

What we are looking at here with this proposed law is a bill which is unbalanced. To give the minister his credit, as originally presented to us I believe that was a balanced bill. It did what it said it was going to do. There were the workers' protection funds and there were a number of articles dealing with reorganization to make bankruptcy more responsible and easier to go into and easier to avoid in many instances.

Something has happened, however. It changed along the way. We do not know why. We have our thoughts on it, but we know that no longer do we have the workers' protection fund. That is extremely important. The main reason we felt this bill was important for Canada and for workers was that for the first time it brought the amount of money they could get into real 1990 dollars. No longer were we dealing with 1949 dollars. We were dealing with more money than they were getting in the past.

As we look at the travelling this bill has done over the past year or so we see that the bill has been changed substantially to the effect that all it does is reorganize and leave the workers out in the cold. We are talking about workers who are affected by bankruptcy. We are talking about workers who all of a sudden find that the vacation pay they have coming and the back pay they are due will no longer be given.

I think it is important for us to come to terms with a certain number of definitions. There are three definitions we want to be sure we are aware of. First, we are looking at super priority. Now what does that mean? Super priority is what was originally intended in this bill. It is no longer there. What super priority means is that if you are a worker you go to the front of the line. You do not wait at the back of the line until the money dissipates and then when you come up you find that the banks, the government, the secured creditors and those other people got their money before you. Yes, you do have a right: You can claim as much money as you want, but it is not there.

That is what super priority means. You, as the worker, the person who is least able to assume the burden of the debt of this company, you get paid first with what is left when that company declares bankruptcy.

That super priority disappeared. It is no longer there. That was an essential or quintessential part of this bill. That is why we in the NDP said that we had better support this bill with the government because it is doing the right thing. Well, they did the right thing but not for very long.

That super priority for workers was tossed aside and the first priority was still given to banks and to secured creditors.

How do we define secured creditors and unsecured creditors? These are two definitions. Secured creditors are those who are at the front of the line. They are there and they get paid. They are the first ones who get paid. Generally, after they have been paid, we find out that close to 70 per cent of the time there is no money left for the others.

Unsecured creditors are those who are left after secured creditors have been paid out. Among those unsecured creditors are the employees.

What we have here is a bill called Bill C-22 which originally was going to give super priority to workers. It does not do that. It continues along the line of making sure that the banks get their money.

There is something else here in this bill which is one of the most surprising things. It is that even the government has decided to allow a certain amount of its own rights to taxes and so forth to go by the wayside so there would be more money in the fund for banks and others. It has decided to forego some of its own rights so that the taxpayer, who is counting on the government to recapture its own taxes and other moneys owing, will not be paid.

Not only do you have the workers being shafted, but you have the public in general being shafted as well.

When the government dropped the idea of super priority it proposed a tax which was going to be levied on the employers. This tax, as proposed by the Conservative federal government, was to be about 10 cents per worker. This would make it approximately $61 million in order to create a fund which would be used to pay workers.

We on the NDP side said: "No, we think people are taxed enough", and the government was quite surprised. It did not expect the opposition that came from the NDP and from its own members. We felt that taxing people for this fund was not the way to go and that it should come from general revenues.

When we made this representation the government was freaked out because the NDP said, as did the backbenchers of the Conservative government, that people have been taxed enough, between the GST and all these other taxes. We said that we were not prepared to see another tax even though the government said it would only be 10 cents a week, less than a cup of coffee.

We did not believe the government. It had misled us with the GST. It said that it would be a transparent tax, but it has not been a transparent tax. It said that it would be revenue neutral and that it would not hurt, but it has hurt an awful lot. It has not been transparent, it has not been revenue neutral and we felt that this cup of coffee might sooner or later become much more than a cup of coffee. It might be a full steak dinner.

We as a party rebelled against the tax. The hon. member for Nickel Belt and myself said that this was unacceptable, and we still maintain that. When it came to the question of levying a tax we said no.

However, we did suggest that the government take this money from the general revenue fund. The government has already taxed us and the money is available. We are talking about $61 million to do an honest deal with workers. The $61 million is there. Right now the government is talking about paying $4.3 billion for helicopters that are not needed. When we talk about money being available in government we find that when the government really wants to fund some sort of a pet project, whether it be a prosperity agenda for $18 million or advertising campaigns to convince us to vote one way or another, it can find the money when the time comes.

The government did not accept the idea of taking this money out of general revenues. It said: "If we do not get this tax, which represents $61 million from business, we are going to completely drop this protection for wages of workers". The government had already dropped the super priority idea.

When it came to the fund the government said: "If we cannot tax people anymore"—and there have been 34 tax increases since this government came to power—"if we cannot have another tax you are not going to get anything".

My colleague said that Freddie Kruger came on the scene and we found that this became a nightmare on Wellington Street. It was worse than that. If we are going to look at movies I remember Love Story, in which it was said that being in love means not having to say you are sorry. Being Tory with this bankruptcy bill means not having to say that you are sorry or that you are wrong.

The Tories simply shifted from second to third gear and said: "No, we won't have a tax. We won't have super priority. We won't have a wage protection fund. What we'll simply do is rewrite history, change those 28 original parts of the bill that we had already agreed upon and come back with something else entirely different".

That is when we really started getting worried. At that point this bill, which seemed to be balanced and initially seemed to be fair, took on a life of its own. It became a grotesque caricature of itself and ended up not giving super priority to the worker, not to most workers. It ended up not doing what it said it would originally do, which was to provide a fund for most workers who would be needing it.

It finally ended up essentially caving in to the corporations. At the same time, the government relinquished its rights to the close to $25 million that the government could expect in receipts or in money owing to it from the bankruptcies on an annual basis.

This is difficult to take for the average consumer or the average worker who wants to believe in a government and finds out that it does not want to do the right thing. Whether you are a Conservative, a Liberal, an NDPer or what have you, you know that at the grassroots level people are hurting.

We have had thousands and thousands of people involved in bankruptcy situations who have been looking to this government to help them out. We are not talking about a benign problem where people just say: "I will take my lumps and that is it".

We are talking about a malignancy which is eating away at the fabric of trust we have in this government. What particularly irks me is that while we are talking about protecting the banks, protecting the secured creditors and making sure the bankruptcy process becomes much more logical, rational and easier in certain cases, we have left a primary person outside the protection of this law.

That is what is wrong and that is what is so indicative of this government's heartlessness. This government does not have a heart. This government cares about the bottom line, as long as the bottom line benefits or works in favour of corporations.

Our party, the NDP, originally came to support the bill because we thought it was balanced. We thought that the bill would do something for workers. Essentially the government has let us down. The government has let workers down.

It is not just myself and the NDP who are saying this. Even members on the government side have expressed their discontent with what has happened here. They have wanted to see workers better protected, and they are not. That is very obvious when we take a look at the bill.

The major weakness with this bill is when it comes time for a worker to get some protection, to get some money owing. I am not talking about charity. I am not talking about UIC. I am not talking about welfare. I am talking about money that is owed to a worker for his or her time and effort put in on the job. That worker is not in this bill.

As much as we try to get the minister to say that he has forgotten the key element he was supposed to protect, all we get back from the government side is ideology. All we get back is that this is good for the country. It is not good for the country. If the people of our country, our citizens, lose confidence in our government being able to provide for them, it is not good for the country.

At this time we are having a constitutional crisis. People are looking to the federal government to show them where it is standing up for them and protecting them with a social contract. We give up certain liberties, our taxes, and a certain amount of freedom in order get a certain amount of protection. When the other side of the contract does not come down to our level we are actually creating a disrespect, a kind of annihilation, anarchy, where people do not believe that the federal government really cares about them.

At this time when we are dealing with the Constitution and trying to keep our country together, this kind of law is working against that end.

We are going to vote against this law. We think it is bad and wrong. We will not hold our noses, close our eyes, and say the government could have done better. It did not do better. There are some small things which are wrong with this law.

The protection of workers' wages is not a small addendum. It is the principal part of any protection and it is not in there. If we do not have a law that is fair, equitable and applies to people who are most in need then we do not have a law that is acceptable to a political party or to members of Parliament.

As a member of Parliament who followed this bill through the committee stage, I believed in this government as far as this bill was concerned. I believed in you. I felt you were going to do a good thing. I felt you were going to do the right thing. I thought you really cared about the average Canadian worker. I was duped along with the other workers in this country. Unfortunately the only people who are going to benefit from this bill are those who need it the least, corporations and banks; not us, not the workers.

By betraying the people who believed in you, you are going to pay and that payment will come on election day.

POINT OF ORDER

RECORDED DIVISIONS—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: Before proceeding to the daily routine of business, I want to give my ruling on a matter raised by the hon. member for Calgary Northeast a few days ago.

As all hon. members know, there were some technical difficulties with the Votes and Proceedings of Wednesday, June 3, 1992 in recording the divisions on motions of amendment at report stage of Bill C-81, an act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada. A reprint was immediately ordered to accurately reflect the results recorded by the Clerk.

In his point of order, the hon. member for Calgary Northeast was concerned by the fact that some of the names appearing under the listing for paired members also appeared under the "yeas" or "nays".

I would appear therefore that some members whose names were paired with others indicating that they would not be voting had in fact cast votes either for or against certain motions.

[English]

Should or could action be taken by either the Speaker or the House in regard to this situation.

• (1010)

Standing Order 44.1 specifically deals with paired members. It explains that a register of paired members is kept at the table "in which any member of the government party and any member of an opposition party may have their names entered together by their respective Whips to indicate that they will not take part in any record division"; independent members sign in their own right.

The names of these paired members are inscribed immediately following the list of "yeas" and "nays" for each recorded division.

[English]

However, the Standing Orders are completely silent on the question of a broken pair; there is no penalty provided for, nor any corrective action suggested. As the 21st edition of Erskine May explains on page 350:

> The Speaker has ruled that agreements to pair are private arrangements between Members and in no sense matters in which either he or the House can intervene.

Although Westminster's rules relating to pairing are different from those employed in Canada, the basic principle enunciated in May holds true for our practice, that is to say: a pairing agreement is a private arrangement in which neither the House nor the Speaker can intervene, according to the Standing Orders as now written.

[English]

Any change to our current practice would require amendments to our Standing Orders. The Standing Committee on House Management which has as part of its permanent mandate the power to review and report on the Standing Orders, procedure and practice in the House, may wish to look into this question. I thank the hon. member for Calgary Northeast for bringing this matter to the attention of the House.

PSYCHOACTIVE SUBSTANCES CONTROL ACT

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (for the Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-85, an act respecting the control of psychoactive substances and their precursors and to amend the Criminal Code, the Food and Drugs Act and the Proceeds of Crime (money laundering) Act and repeal the Narcotic Control Act in consequence thereof.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Cadieux (for the Minister of National Health and Welfare) moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REQUEST FOR ELECTRONIC VOTING

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): What I would like to do, Mr. Speaker, is introduce a motion on behalf of myself and the hon. member for Comox—Alberni on electronic voting for the House of Commons.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret there is not unanimous consent.

PETITIONS

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of petitions that I would like to table pursuant to Standing Order 36. These petitions have been signed by Canadians across this country who are objecting to the government's decision to cancel the Court Challenges Program.

This particular program has allowed many individuals and minority groups to clarify through the courts their constitutional linguistic and equality rights.

They call upon the Government of Canada to rescind this decision and reinstate the Court Challenges Program. Some of these individuals come from Kingston, Ontario, and others come from New Brunswick, Newfoundland, the other Atlantic provinces, the Western provinces, Ontario and Quebec.

FISHERIES

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 wherein the petitioners ask the federal government to do everything in its power to stop drift-net fishing in the north Pacific ocean.

They point out that an ecological disaster is being perpetrated by Japanese, Korean and Taiwanese drift-net fishing fleets in the north Pacific. Sea birds and marine mammals are being slaughtered by the thousands in the monofilament drift-nets used by the above mentioned fleets.

The west coast salmon fishery is being damaged by this fishing practice. There is also a great possibility of this practice having a horrendous effect on the global ecosystem and our own environment. The petitioners call upon Parliament to do everything it can to stop this.

CANADIAN UNITY

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I have a another petition signed by people primarily in the Ladysmith area of my riding.

The petition is to promote pride in being Canadian. Whereas it is appropriate to encourage all Canadians to take pride in a united, strong and independent Canada, whereas Canadians are normally a reserved people often concealing their patriotic feelings, and whereas Kinsmen and Kinnette Clubs of Canada have created an opportunity for all Canadians to participate in the proud to be Canadian project during the celebration of the 125th anniversary of Confederation in 1992.

Therefore the petitioners support the proud to be Canadian project as an opportunity to nurture a positive lifelong relationship with our heritage and our flag, to encourage stronger ties among all Canadians and the advancement of Canada as a leader in world circles, and to promote tremendous pride in being Canadians.

REFERENDUM

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 it is my pleasure to introduce a petition calling for a referendum of the people before there is constitutional change.

HEALTH

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise today to present a petition signed by many of my constituents in Malpeque, in places such as Cornwall, Winsloe, Kensington, Marshfield and Albany, Prince Edward Island.

Whereas scientific evidence has raised doubts about the safety of silicone breast implants and whereas the Health Protection Branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare has known of the dangers of these implants for several years the undersigned petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to establish an independent judicial inquiry into the testing and approval process of all medical devices, in particular silicone breast implants.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I rise to present a petition from a number of residents in British Columbia regarding two Canadians, Christine Lamont and David Spencer, who have been sentenced to 28 years in a Brazilian prison.

They have suffered discrimination in sentencing and parole. The cumulative effect of these irregularities provides ample grounds for the Government of Canada to seek a remedy on their behalf and there should be a request for expulsion in accordance with Brazilian law.

Therefore the petitioners call upon the government to urge the Secretary of State for External Affairs to request the Government of Brazil to expel Christine Lamont and David Spencer and return them home to Canada.

LIGHTHOUSES

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition representing the wishes of thousands of British Columbians.

They ask that the Future Use of Lightstations report be immediately implemented by the federal government, along with the return of the 10 person-years cut from the program and the return of the budget dollars that were removed. This will ensure the safety, continuation and upgrading of the west coast lighthouse system in order to ensure the safety net for the transportation of British Columbians.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present to the House a petition signed by a number of my constituents who are Canadians of Sri Lankan origin and reside in the Flemingdon Park area of my riding.

This petition relates to the recent Canadian human rights mission to the island of Sri Lanka and it requests that Canada take a lead to facilitate the international mediation of the conflict there.

It calls upon Parliament to express willingness to call upon the parties to the conflict in Sri Lanka, the Government of Sri Lanka and the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, to express their willingness to accept mediation of the conflict and also to commence negotiations with a view to entering an internationally guaranteed accord to establish an associated structure within which the Sinhalese people and the Tamil people may live in peace and freedom.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, Question No. 266 will be answered today.

[Text]

Question No. 266—Ms. Langan:

With respect to the survey being conducted by the Department of Health and Welfare on the experience of women with breast implants (a) will the Minister consult with opposition critics and the status of women sub-committee on breast cancer prior to appoint a company to conduct this survey (b) who is to be surveyed (c) when will this survey begin (d) when will the survey be completed (e) will the report of the survey be tabled in the House of Commons?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): (a) The selection of a contractor to conduct a survey of Canadian women with breast implants has been done through the Department of Supply and Services according to government contract policy. The process does not include consultation on the choice of contractor with opposition critics or the status of women sub-committee.

(b) The survey is open to all women in Canada with breast implants. Women who respond to well-publicized invitations by calling 1-800-661-4437 will participate in the survey and/or be included on a mailing list for future information from the Department of National Health and Welfare.

(e) The survey will be made available to the public immediately following the review of the results.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary has been answered.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, if Question No. 308 could be made an Order for Return, the return would be tabled immediately.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House that Question No. 308 be deemed to have been made an Order for Return?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Text]

Question No. 308—Mr. Angus:

With respect to the Financial Administration Act, Section 88 and 89, for each fiscal year since April 1, 1985, has Transport Canada collected data on (a) the number of train kilometres travelled on each VIA service provided, per route, per year (b) the number of passengers carried on each VIA service, and total number of passenger kilometres travelled on each VIA service, and total number of seat kilometres on each VIA service, per route, per year (c) the amount of total revenues from each VIA service, per route, per year (d) the total of avoidable costs of each VIA service, per route, per year and, if so, for each case, what is it?

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-70, an act to amend the Criminal Code (jury), as reported (without amendment) from a legislative committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is one motion in amendment on the Notice Paper at the report stage for Bill C-70, an act to amend the Criminal Code (jury).

Motion No. 1 standing in the name of the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam will be debated and voted upon.

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam) moved:

Motion No. 1.

That Bill C-70 be amended in Clause 8 by striking out lines 7 and 8 at page 5 and substituting the following therefor:

"deemed to have come into force only after the multicultural justice review and report commissioned under the authority of a reference from the Minister of Justice forwarded to the Law Reform Commission of Canada on June 8, 1990, has been completed by the Law Reform Commission of Canada and tabled in the House of Commons."

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On a point of order, the hon. member for Niagara Falls.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I wish to seek unanimous consent in the House to deal with both the report stage and the third reading stage of Bill C-70 today.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, I am not prepared to give unanimous consent at this point. I wonder if we could deal with my motion. I would like to hear the parliamentary secretary reply to it. My response depends on what he says. If he says the appropriate words I will be prepared to give consent to finishing this bill today. However, I do not want to do that beforehand.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, there were no formal undertakings with regard to completing Bill C-70. However, I think there is a clear disposition on this side of the House that we would like to proceed with both the report stage and third reading.

I find it rather objectionable that preconditions would be established by members of this House before continuing on with debate on a particular piece of legislation. I would hope that my colleague who has raised an amendment with regard to Bill C-70 will have an opportunity to debate it. Of course the government and the Official Opposition would have an opportunity to intervene. Then perhaps an adjudication could take place and we could then proceed with the completion, if necessary, of the bill.

I want to make it perfectly clear to the parliamentary secretary that we are not trying to obstruct in any way. We wish to facilitate the debate. I find it somewhat objectionable that preconditions—in other words, a form of blackmail—would be placed on the floor of the House of Commons before we proceed. That is totally unacceptable.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would hope that these agreements would take place behind the curtain. I do not consider this the place to debate this.

Motion No. 1 is now in front of the House and the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam has the floor on debate.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, the Official Opposition House leader can call it whatever he likes but I hope he will listen to my remarks. He will see that it is no such thing. I think, and hope, that he will agree with me when I finish.

I introduced the amendment to alleviate some of the concerns that many of us have about Bill C-70 and the jury selection process. Allow me to explain to the House what the bill is and what we are trying to do.

The bill before us today is a result of the decision in the case of Regina v. Bain. It is a major decision of the Supreme Court of Canada. The judgment was rendered January 23, 1992. In that decision the Supreme Court ruled that sections 634(1) and (2) are inconsistent with section 11(d) of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in so far as they provide the Crown with a combination of peremptory challenges and stand-bys four times the number permitted the accused.

As the court noted:

> The observer of the process is bound to conclude that, absent some control, the Crown possesses a substantial advantage and can effectively influence the make-up of that jury under partisan considerations.

Let me translate that into plain English. We have a system in which the Crown prosecutor has a different level of challenges. The Crown can follow a different process. It has a better crack at excluding people from a jury than does the defence. The Supreme Court basically said: "Make it a level playing field".

The court gave Parliament six months to bring forward a remedy. That was on January 23, 1992. I know that the parliamentary secretary has acted and the government has acted. It has introduced a bill and we have expedited it in committee.

However, the government's legislation deals specifically with the narrow and very limited recommendations that come from the Supreme Court decision, which was limited to the very specific questions that were asked in the case. I believe that it was a case concerning sexual assault and the lower court's ruling that the Crown could not use stand-asides to influence the make-up of the jury.

My concern, and I know I am not alone in this, is that we have gone through the process of drafting and debating amendments to the Criminal Code without making full use of this opportunity to really effect meaningful and innovative change that will bring the code into the modern age and into the future.

Instead, we have done the least that could be expected of us and left the real work for another day. What kind of real work am I talking about? There have been numerous studies and inquiries that have shown that the justice system is not always fair. Justice is not always equally available to Canadians as a result of procedural flaws, including the jury selection process. This is not only because of the use of stand-asides by the Crown—even back in 1980 the Law Reform Commission drew this to our attention—but because of the nature of what we call peremptory challenges.

I will give an example. The report of the aboriginal justice inquiry of Manitoba found that aboriginal people were excluded from the jury in the Osbourne case because of their race. The defence used a peremptory challenge to exclude six aboriginal people. This was a case concerning the murder of an aboriginal woman in a community with a large aboriginal component.

As the report states:

> The jury was not representative of the community from which it was drawn and in which the crime was committed.

In modern Canada there are instances in which people have been excluded from juries because of their race.

• (1030)

It is my understanding that one of the ideals we strive for in the justice system is to provide for the selection of a jury that does represent the community. The peremptory challenge may in fact stand in the way of achieving this goal. Perhaps it should be incumbent upon counsel to provide cause for every challenge. After all, the Supreme Court of Canada in the Bain decision noted that:

> The peremptory challenge is purely subjective.

Perhaps we need greater objectivity; if you do not like the person's face or you do not like the colour of his or her skin, you can challenge and you do not have to justify why you are challenging.

This is one of the concerns we could have looked at when we opened up this part of the Criminal Code. We are going to have to do it in the near future. I know the Attorney General of Ontario—I have a letter from the Attorney General of Ontario to the Minister of Justice of Canada—is determined to see these concerns addressed and these flaws remedied. The Attorney General said so publicly just a month ago in Toronto.

We have yet to have any substantive assurance from the federal government in this regard. In fact, by introducing legislation that killed the Law Reform Commission the government has given every indication it is not prepared at all to do the kind of work that needs to be done in this area. There had been some hope when the minister asked the commission to begin work on multiculturalism and the law that we could begin the process of updating our laws.

Were it not for the articles of Mr. David Vienneau in The Toronto Star after he obtained a copy of a consultation paper from the Law Reform Commission which was looking specifically at a trial by jury and had drafted well thought out and researched recommendations in its final report, we would not have known that the government was even looking at this area. This is a copy of the draft consultation paper by the Law Reform Commission. It is incomplete.

I suggest to the government and to you, Mr. Speaker: just take The Toronto Star for today and look at the headline "Anti-Black Racism Deep, Lewis Warns Ontario". This is a very relevant issue. Mr. Vienneau of The Toronto Star really did us a service to get this report public and get it out. We did not even see this in our committee.

This is not the way government should work. It should not hide things from Parliament, especially when racism is such a huge issue in our major cities in Canada today.

This report has recommendations that address the issue of proportional representation of the accused's racial, religious or other minority characteristics on juries, recommendations that would improve our ability to ensure that juries represent a fair cross-section of the community, and recommendations on page 38 regarding peremptory challenges and challenges for cause. I suggest some members of the House, including the House leader of the Official Opposition who I know is a lawyer, might want to have a look at this because it deals with stand-asides and peremptory challenges.

Basically, if I can summarize, it says maybe we should look at this because it is a purely subjective standard. As I said before a defence counsel or even Crown counsel could have people stand aside because they are black, Jewish, aboriginal or whatever. They can do that.

I am not saying they are doing it, although there was one instance in the case I have cited. At least we need to have some study of that and we need to look at that. I am not trying to hold up the government's bill. I understand the parliamentary secretary has to get this done in six months, although he could go back to the court as the government has done in the past and say we need more time. If the court does not like it, he could blame it on the socialists down here and say they caused all the problem and ask for more time.

The Law Reform Commission's report called Minister's Reference, Jury Selection on Multicultural Issues would provide members of Parliament with a learned impartial non-partisan opinion. That is why I do not want an in-house study by the government or by the Department of Justice. I know that the government likes that but we want a non-partisan report. We want something that can be tabled in the House of Commons. In short, we want this study completed.

If the government were prepared to say firmly that today, now in the House, I am prepared to consent to going to third reading and putting this bill through today. If not, I am not prepared to consent.

The member from Nova Scotia, the official government House leader, can call that blackmail or call it what he likes. I call it good parliamentary tactics and doing my job as justice critic for the NDP and trying to get the government committed. I know the government really is committed and I know the member from Niagara Falls, the parliamentary secretary, is committed to having these issues looked at in the best possible way.

It is my hope that we can bring this in and we can get this report completed before the law is challenged because visible minorities, women or others are excluded from juries through abuse of the peremptory challenge. We do not want this to start going back to the court.

These kinds of time constraints can only result in hastily written and often barely adequate legislation, that is the six months, the stop-gap legislation.

I suggest that Canadians deserve better. By bringing forward this amendment it is my hope that the government will agree to look at least a short distance into the future and that it will agree to at least giving us the tools, if not the time, to come back to the jury selection process and make some real and meaningful amendments that will make the justice system fair for everyone.

That is what I am trying to do today. I will be pleased to hear the reply of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, we on this side are supportive of the intent and direction suggested in this particular motion. We all recognize the problem that exists and the need for change in the area of jury selection and in particular to do everything possible we can to make the system function properly so that there is not racial discrimination within that system.

We are also faced with the problem of doing the possible. My understanding is that under the Supreme Court decision about the middle of July, July 22 or July 23, we have to correct the problem which the Supreme Court found, and that is what Bill C-70 does.

I would hope the government and the NDP could work out an arrangement to accommodate that. I would hope they would see to it that there is a commitment as to time for that report to be brought forward, a commitment by the government to act on that report and to conduct the full study necessary in order to make amendments to jury selection to accommodate what the report brings forward.

We are supportive of where they want to be as far as the motion is intended. We just do not know if it is a doable situation given the time constraints we are involved in. I look forward to the parliamentary secretary coming forward with a solution to that time constraint.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, time constraint is the problem we have at the present time. As was pointed out in the Regina v. Bain decision, the Supreme Court of Canada struck down certain provisions of the Criminal Code as they relate to jury selection.

We had a specific problem on our hands at that point. The Supreme Court of Canada indicated that it would suspend the operation of its decision for a period of six months. That period of time expires July 23, 1992.

We have a situation where we are at report stage on June 11. I hope the House deems it appropriate to continue with the third reading stage of this debate so that it can pass this House and move on to the Senate.

The bill is specific. The member for Port Moody—Coquitlam talked about that and we have nothing to hide in that regard.

• (1040)

It was specifically directed toward the issue raised in the Regina v. Bain decision. It was not meant to be a comprehensive look or solution to all the issues or questions raised in the jury selection process. It was for this specific purpose. We did not dawdle with this. Within I believe six weeks of the decision of the Supreme Court we tabled Bill C-70. Prior to that we consulted with groups such as the Canadian Bar Association and others that were generally interested in commenting on new initiatives from the Department of Justice and took their advice on this.

As well the minister has consulted with provincial attorneys general. I can tell hon. members of the House that this particular bill has their blessing and approval. I do not think it is unreasonable they would give it.

We took this through the committee stage. At that time there were no amendments, no briefs, and no witnesses who appeared before us. I think that was a result of the consultations that took place prior to the introduction of the bill.

I hope I have addressed the question of whether the government is hiding something on this. We are not.

With respect to the motion that the hon. member makes, he asks that the application of this bill be suspended until there is a review and a report commissioned on the authority of a reference from the Minister of Justice to the Law Reform Commission.

I do not think he will be too surprised when I say that the government will not be supporting it because it puts an indefinite time period for the application of this bill. I do not think that is something the courts, the judiciary, the bar or Canadians interested in seeing Parliament act would want at this particular time.

However, I can tell the hon. member that he is quite correct. He raised issues in his comments that are of concern to the government. I believe that he and I, the member from Moncton and others at the committee stage discussed this very question in terms of a review being undertaken by the attorney general of the province of Ontario. I can tell him, as I think I indicated then, that the government will be very interested in hearing what the attorney general of Ontario, or indeed any others in this country, has to say on this particular issue.

With respect to the specific reference in the motion vis-à-vis the Law Reform Commission, I want to tell the member that the issue that was referred to the commission is being studied and will continue to be studied by the Department of Justice itself. The minister, I and everyone would like to see that concluded as quickly as possible.

I cannot say to the hon. member or to anyone else that we will therefore bring in amendments when we do not know what the report is. It is reasonable to see what the report is, to see what the attorney general of Ontario recommends to us in this regard and then to decide the appropriate action. But I cannot in advance of a report being completed say that we will accept whatever the conclusions of the report and therefore bring in amendments to the Criminal Code.

Mr. Waddell: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member.

I just want to point out to him so that we can expedite this matter. What I asked in my speech was that he give a commitment to this House that there be a report, an independent study, and that this study be made available to members of the House. I did not ask for an internal Department of Justice study but an independent study that is available to the members of the House. If he were prepared to give that commitment I would withdraw my amendment.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I can tell the hon. member that the issue being studied by the attorney general for Ontario is not one that is controlled or directed by the Government of Canada. He can be assured that there is independence in what the Attorney general of Ontario will be doing vis-à-vis the federal Criminal Code. I can only tell him what we are doing at the present time. Yes, we are having a look at it.

He is a member of the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General as are several other members of the House. I would indicate to him that if he would like to study this as well as the study that is going on within the Department of Justice, then by all means he should propose that to members. That is certainly within his purview and that of his colleagues on the Standing Committee of Justice and Solicitor General. If they want to undertake a study that would act in parallel or in concert with what we are doing at the Department of Justice, then by all means do so. That would be the appropriate route.

If the member is asking me to make a commitment that we will have a royal commission, all I can say is that I want to see first the Department of Justice review. Let us see what the recommendations are from the attorney general.

With respect to the attorney general for Ontario, provincial attorneys general want this bill passed and they want it passed by July 23. As far as an independent inquiry is concerned, I say to the hon. member, please go before the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General. That is his right as a member of Parliament to make that recommendation.

We heard that the hon. member for Moncton. I know my colleagues on the government side are interested in all aspects of the justice system and all attempts to create a fair justice system for everyone in Canada. I would suggest that is the route.

At this point, I do not see why it would be a good idea for us to stop the internal review being undertaken by the Department of Justice. I would suggest that we let that proceed and find out what the attorney general of Ontario or anyone else in this country has to say about it. Let us hear what the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General has to say on it and then we can formulate an action plan at that particular time.

This is very important. Time is running out in Parliament and I hope that hon. members will not proceed with this. It would suspend the application of this bill to an indefinite period of time. I hope that we will get on with it and pass this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it. I declare the motion lost.

Motion negatived.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, in view of the importance to all members of this House, the judiciary, the bar, and all those involved in jury trials in this country, I would seek the unanimous consent of this House to proceed with third reading debate.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I asked the parliamentary secretary if he would undertake to continue this study that is going on, not just internally at justice department. I asked for an independent report so we would actually see it in the House and it would be tabled. He refused to do that so reluctantly I will not give my consent.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (for the Minister of Justice) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When shall the bill be read a third time?

Some hon. members: At the next sitting of the House.

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-74, an act to amend the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff and the Excise Tax Act, as reported (with amendment) by the Standing Committee on Finance.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have a ruling on Bill C-74, an act to amend the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff and the Excise Tax Act.

There are three motions in amendment on the Notice Paper at the report stage for Bill C-74, an act to amend the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff and the Excise Tax Act.

Motions Nos. 1 and 2 standing in the name of the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell will be grouped for debate with a vote on Motion No. 1 applied to Motion No. 2.

Motion No. 3 standing in the name of the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott Russell was moved, debated and negatived in the Standing Committee on Finance which studied the bill. Consequently, Motion No. 3 will not be selected.

I shall now propose Motions Nos. 1 and 2.

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell) moved:

That Bill C-74 be amended by deleting Clause 39.

He said: Mr. Speaker, first of all I obviously accept the Chair's ruling in terms of Motion No. 3. I will make my remarks to all three of the motions. I invite the parliamentary secretary to avail himself of the answers to some of the questions that I will be raising.

First of all, I indicated at second reading that it is my intention to vote for this bill and to recommend that my colleagues do the same. I want to indicate to the government that we have no interest in blocking, stalling or otherwise delaying the passage of Bill C-74.

It should be made clear to all Canadians and to all members of this House that the reason Bill C-74 is needed is because of an action by the government across the way some years ago. It decided in its so-called wisdom to make all parcels coming into Canada under $40 exempt from customs duties. In so doing, it has created an industry in the United States.

I have here a magazine entitled The Guide to Cross-Border Shopping, Tourism and Entertainment. This little publication comes from the U.S.A., right across the border in Ogdensburg, New York. It tells of all the great ways Canadians can cross-border shop.

I understand that Canada Post is busy right now in the United States soliciting this kind of business to encourage Canadians to shop in the U.S. We will deal with that some other time. Right now, we are going to talk about the amendments that are before us.

The bill does two things. One, it reduces the tax free amount from $40 to $20. I had proposed in the amendment that has been ruled out of order to reduce that amount to $5. The government said at committee: "Don't worry because all articles even under $20 will be subject to a $5 fee at the border by Canada Post".

That is not true, because in the bill there is what is known as a foreign certification program by which a large mail order house in the United States will be able to apply, collect the taxes themselves, and exempt themselves from the $5 surtax.

The long and the short of it is the following: A company in the United States will be able to by-pass the new $5 fee that the government is proposing by registering under the foreign certification program. Okay? Now, say a Canadian small retailer imports by mail some small article made in the United States to resell in Canada. It has no possibility of being so exempted.

What have we created? We are going to make it harder for a small business in Canada to compete with a large business in the United States because the certification program is only made available to foreign companies and not Canadian ones. We are actually creating a new device in order for foreign companies to exempt themselves from paying the $5 surcharge we are initiating in the bill.

That is why the government has to answer for this. I invite the parliamentary secretary or one of the ministers across the way to explain to this House and to Canadians why yet another loophole has been created in a law that is supposed to get rid of loopholes this government created in the first place.

We really need to clarify that. As far as I am concerned, that foreign certification program should not exist. There is no reason for it. Why are we so desperate on wanting to export jobs out of this country? I cannot understand it.

If a Canadian mail order house wants to sell something to the U.S., it has to pay $8.40 U.S. at the border in order to get the privilege of sending a parcel across the border. That is roughly $10.50 Canadian at the time we are speaking today.

We are proposing to charge them $5 for what they charge us $10 and then we are proposing to exempt most of them from paying it anyway. Do they exempt us? Likely not. We are proposing to exempt all the large mail order houses that are able to avail themselves of this foreign certification program. I really think the government has to answer for this.

There is another element in the bill I want to address. The purpose of the two amendments on the Order Paper in my name is to reduce the gift exemption the government is creating. Under the present rule, there is an exemption for someone receiving a gift from offshore. If a gift is received from offshore, this particular tax does not have to be paid.

Someone was mentioning to me in the lobby a little while ago that if her mother sent her a gift from offshore, she would have to pay the $5 surtax. Well that is not so. That only applies to goods purchased offshore. If a gift is received from offshore, right now one does not pay customs or any kind of administrative fee on the first $40 of value of the gift.

The bill proposes to increase the $40 to $60 and the amendments I have proposed would delete those clauses. At the very least, let us leave it the way it is now at $40. Let us not give an advantage to companies outside of this country. Let us give every advantage we can to the ones operating within Canada.

The Minister for International Trade and a few others across the way have recited to us at length the phrase "operating on a level playing field". That is their favourite line across the way. What is level about the playing field I have just described when we are plugging up loopholes in our system and creating new ones that will not make the plugging up we are trying to do half as effective?

Again, I repeat that we want those provisions to be tight but we cannot help but wonder why the government created this new loophole in the bill under this foreign certification clause.

I have here briefing documents for people working in Revenue Canada. These are questions and answers. These are prepared questions for the officials. This information was sent to me. I do not know whether I should call this information a leak or what, but anyway I have it. The information works this way. Proposed question No. 6: Finance has announced the foreign certification program, how does it work?

• (1100)

The proposed answer for the government official who is supposed to recite those prepared lines goes this way: A foreign mail order business can apply for certification which would allow it to collect duties and taxes on behalf of the Government of Canada. It would collect duties and taxes from its clients in Canada when the Canadian pays for the good and then send a cheque to the federal government on a periodic basis. This would in turn reduce the number of dutiable/taxable parcels to be processed by customs.

Then there is a supplementary question in case the person is real nosy and wants to know more. Question No. 7 goes this way: If I understand you correctly, by allowing foreign businesses to collect duties and taxes, Canadians can bypass customs altogether along with the Canada Post handling fee and have the parcel delivered right to their door. Is this not really facilitating cross-border shopping through these American mail order houses?

Well, thank you for asking, Mr. Speaker. Listen clearly to the proposed answer the official is supposed to give because you might find that it does not quite answer the question. As a matter of fact, I submit to you it does not answer the thing at all. Here is the proposed answer the government official is supposed to give to whoever is nosy enough to ask this supplementary question. Answer: Not at all. Foreign firms of course will have to consider this option in light of the cost that they will have to absorb or pass on to perform the collection and remittance function.

That is very clear, is it not? That is the proposed answer.

Again I recommend to this House the two amendments that I propose to close in on the loophole for gifts, but in addition I ask the government to really reconsider this foreign certification program because it is itself creating a new loophole that will not make its bill half as effective as it would be otherwise.

Mr. Horner: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am seeking unanimous consent of the House to table a report from a standing committee. Could we revert to that now?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

JUSTICE AND THE SOLICITOR GENERAL

NINTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the ninth report of the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General, in both official languages.

Pursuant to Standing Order 108(2) the committee has considered certain questions concerning the Christine Lamont and David Spencer case and has agreed to report it.

In its report the committee makes two recommendations: First, the committee unanimously urges the Secretary of State for External Affairs to request without undue delay the expulsion of Christine Lamont and David Spencer in accordance with the laws of Brazil and Canada's international human rights law obligations.

Second, the committee urges that the minister enhance the program of informing Canadians as to the number of Canadians in foreign jails and the importance of conducting oneself in a way so as to avoid any conflicts with laws in other countries.

CUSTOMS ACT

The House resumed consideration of Bill C–74, an act to amend the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff and the Excise Tax Act, as reported (with an amendment) by the Standing Committee on Finance.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, let me begin by complimenting the committee that just reported. It is another example of how parliamentarians can work together in a very complex matter and come to agreement that I think all Canadians will be proud of. I hope that the minister will respond appropriately.

With regard to the group of amendments put forward by my colleague from the Liberal Party, I want to say that I do not support them. We have to recognize that in our two countries, Canada and the United States, there are a lot of intermarriages and a lot of families who live on both sides of the border. By restricting the exemption for gifts between families, between friends, between business colleagues, to the current amount as opposed to what the government is attempting to do which is to increase it is wrong.

For that reason I will be opposing the amendment. I certainly do agree with the member in his comments about the registry and giving the opportunity for American–based direct mail firms to have an advantage over Canadians. We have to recognize that all this bill does, and I will come back to this on third reading, is facilitate cross–border shopping. It also facilitates cross–border driving because there are no fees attached to the processing when you drive across the border and bring goods in, but if you are using the mail or courier services, there are. In effect the Government of Canada has made it more attractive to drive south to buy goods than reducing that opportunity.

Mr. Barry Moore (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, in response to the amendments of the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott–Russell, I would just like to say that amendments Nos. 1 and 2 would force the gift exemption to remain at $40 instead of being increased to $60. The gift exemption was increased to accommodate families and friends sending gifts from abroad. It brings it in line with the gift exemption in other countries. Gifts must be sent by an individual, not from a company, in order to qualify for the gift exemption.

As regards amendment No. 3, this amendment would restrict the exemption for postal and courier imports to $5 instead of the $20 proposed in the legislation. Dropping it to $5 would mean additional costs to customs because it would require processing an additional nine million parcels. Dropping it from $40 to $20 would result in an additional five million parcels being processed.

The proposed changes in Bill C–74 which we are advancing is in direct response to Canadian business demands that this government make the necessary changes to existing legislation to balance the scales. Representations were received from the Retail Council of Canada, the Canadian Direct Marketing Association, independent retailers and other small business people.

So we have responded to these changes. Some of these changes were also requested by members of this House.

I have a response to the hon. member from Mr. Light of the department who says: "We open a number of gifts that arrive in Canada and if we find an invoice from a company in the package we know it is not an unsolicited gift. Basically, when a package is sent from an individual to an individual and the declaration declares it as a gift, we basically accept that, except where we have evidence to the contrary. Since we sample parcels on a regular basis and if we find something that indicates it is not a gift we then disallow the gift exemption".

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question is on Motion No. 1 standing in the name of Mr. Boudria. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion, the nays have it. Motions Nos. 1 and 2 are therefore defeated.

Motion No. 1 negatived.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Motion agreed to

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When shall the bill be read the third time? With leave of the House, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Agreed and so ordered.

Mr. Loiselle (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

• (1110)

Mr. Barry Moore (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to begin today third reading of Bill C–74, an act to amend the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff and the Excise Tax Act.

This is an important piece of legislation, important to both Customs and Excise, and important to Canadian business. It is designed to enhance voluntary compliance in the importing community and also to assist Canadian businesses by ensuring a level playing field and greater opportunity to compete in the global trading environment.

This bill is composed of two main parts. The first is directed to the elimination of the imbalance that currently exists in the interest provisions of customs legislation and to introduce penalties for the lack of compliance in certain instances.

It is noteworthy to mention at the outset that Customs and Excise has a very large commercial clientele who for the most part are very familiar with and who comply with customs legislation. For these importers then the proposed amendments will have no impact on their day–to–day operations. It will be business as usual.

Rather, these measures are aimed at those commercial importers who find it financially rewarding to delay filing their accounting documents or paying their fair share of duties and taxes. Current legislation requires Revenue Canada, Customs and Excise, to pay interest on moneys owing to an importer. However, the same obligation is not required of an importer who owes money to the Crown.

These proposed interest and penalty provisions have been designed to bring customs and excise business operation more into line with current commercial operating practices and they are fair to both the importing community and to customs, as the regulator. The proposed amendments are quite straightforward. Moneys owing by either party would be subject to interest provisions. As well, to further encourage compliance, the proposed amendments dealing with penalties will provide an incentive for the provision of timely and accurate information to customs.

The second part of Bill C–74 is directed to the importation of parcels through the mail. This aspect of the proposed legislation would modify current policies which encourage significant Canadian shopping through foreign mail order houses. As well, the system today encourages Canadian mail order houses to establish direct marketing operations outside Canada to sell back to Canadians. The net effect of the current policy on postal imports is a significant loss of revenue to the government and is a subsidy to those who use the mail to import goods.

We have mentioned the government's commitment to ensure that Canadian business has the effect of competing on a level playing field. Perhaps the most serious ramification of today's policy is that it puts Canadian business at a disadvantage in a highly competitive industry.

The proposed changes hon. members have in front of them are a direct response to Canadian business demands that this government make the necessary changes to existing legislation to balance the scales. Representations were received from the Retail Council, the Canadian Direct Marketing Association, independent retailers and other small business people. Changes were also requested by members of this house.

The necessity of these changes is well borne out in fact. Over the last two years customs has experienced a 46 per cent increase in the volume of dutiable and taxable parcels. Estimates put 1990 Canadian purchases from foreign mail order houses in excess of $900 million, almost a staggering $1 billion. All indicators point to a worsening of the situation as foreign mail order houses direct aggressive marketing and sales campaigns to Canadians.

This has become an important issue affecting an important sector of the Canadian economy, the Canadian direct marketing industry. When trying to make the argument for a case, in this instance the bill before this House, sometimes it is good to have all the facts in front of oneself. The industry over all has an annual sales volume of $7.8 billion. The catalogue direct marketing business represents $2.2 billion of these sales or approximately 28 per cent. Catalogue direct marketing represents approximately 600 firms and employs an estimated 35,620 people.

The proposed amendments before this House are critical to the health of this industry and it is our responsibility to put an end to the competitive disadvantage under which Canadian firms presently find themselves.

During second reading of this bill hon. members may recall some of the statistics that have provided further impetus to the necessity for revised legislation.

The facts continue to be alarming. Estimates are: $260 million in lost sales in 1990; 4,170 jobs lost since 1986; a once healthy growth of 7 per cent annually has declined and stagnated since 1986 at 3.2 per cent per annum. The comparable U.S. growth rate in this industry was 8.3 per cent in 1985 and a very significant 12.4 per cent through 1990. The facts are there and they speak for themselves.

Why the difference in growth rates? This has been previously explained but bears repeating. Simply put, an Ontario-based firm selling a Canadian-made article for a $40 catalogue price would deliver it to a customer in Canada for $50.26 including GST, provincial sales taxes, shipping and handling. However, the same company could ship the Canadian-made good to the U.S. and deliver it to the same customer in Ontario for $45.36 with the same dollar value of profit margin and allowing for differences in postal rates. It does not make sense and it is easy to see how the duty and tax exemptions for parcels valued at $40 or less create a serious competitive inequity for Canadian retailers competing for Canadian mail order business.

The bill in front of us today is designed to provide the Canadian businessmen with a relief from the present day onerous legislation.

You will agree, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure most members of this House will agree that there exists very solid valid reasons for the proposed legislation that would lead to the implementation on July 1, 1992, of the following changes which I would like to highlight: duty and tax-free entry of postal or courier imports valued at $20 or less; collection on behalf of Customs and Excise by Canada Post of a $5 handling fee to cover the costs of services such as collection of duty, provincial sales tax where provinces are harmonized and GST on importations over the $20 threshold; Canada Post will bear the cost of clearing priority courier items through customs as is done by private couriers; voluntary registration of foreign mail order firms for the collection of GST and duties; and, options for non-resident mail order houses to collect and remit applicable duties and taxes on all shipments over the $20 exemption limit sent to Canada destinations.

The review of the exemptions for postal and courier imports provided an opportunity to reassess our policy on gifts and to consider the merits of amending current exemption levels to make them more liberal.

As a result of the review and in response to numerous recent representations received from Canadians, the gift exemption level would be increased from $40 to $60 under this proposed legislation.

It is important to note that the gift exemption is intended to deal with unsolicited gifts sent to Canadians from family and friends abroad.

Mr. Speaker, you have in front of you a comprehensive piece of legislation that has been carefully thought out which is designed to improve existing legislation both for the benefit of the user and the regulator. It is not the cure-all for some of the complex issues with which we are faced. Specifically here we refer to cross-border shopping. Rather, this initiative proposes fair, balanced measures to restore the level playing field and gives Canadian mail order firms the opportunity to compete on an equal basis with foreign competitors in Canada.

As well, the bill proposes to bring customs legislation more into line with other statutes administered by Revenue Canada and continues concerted efforts by Customs and Excise to streamline operations and to manage in a more business-like fashion.

Bill C-74 has been a joint effort between the department and the Department of Finance. It is the culmination of many months of thoughtful hard work, work that has been directed toward being fair and trying to balance the different interests that inevitably collide when you are in the process of change.

I would like to thank all those who helped bring the bill to third reading and to suggest that we hear from members who may wish to contribute.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak in favour of this bill at third reading. I must indicate, however, and reiterate the fact that the government is only partially plugging loopholes that it says it is plugging. The difficulty is, of course, that it has created a system within the bill that will make the measure it is announcing only half as effective as it would otherwise be.

Let me be perfectly clear, however, that this bill even with that loophole is going to be much tighter than the present legislation. No one is denying that. Right now, a person can ship goods into Canada worth $39.90 by mail from the U.S. exempt of all duties, exempt of the GST and everything else. It means that the large mail order houses, the L. L. Beans of this world, ship into Canada several goods in individual packages. They will ship a tie in one box, a shirt in the next and so on. They will send those goods into Canada in individual parcels and completely bypass our Canadian taxing system.

With the bill, the exempt amount will only be $20. We are referring to purchases not gifts. It is still possible that many goods will be shipped into Canada duty free because the $5 surcharge will not apply to large mail order houses for the reasons that I have previously indicated.

I first brought this issue to the attention of the House on May 30, 1990. In a speech in the House at that time, I asked the Minister of National Revenue what he was going to do to plug that loophole in our law which makes it possible for U.S. retailers to ship into Canada and completely undercut Canadian retailers, not because Canadian retailers are taking too much profit but for a reason totally different. They are exempt from taxes.

The member for Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle indicated in his speech a while ago that a $40 parcel costs $50.26 if purchased in Canada and the taxes have been paid. Similarly, a $20 parcel will cost $25.13. For a U.S. company taking advantage of the registration system, when it sends a $20 parcel to Canada, the parcel will cost $20 plus postage. That's it.

Canadians selling the same goods will have to charge its customer $25.13, using the hon. parliamentary secretary's own calculation. There is still going to be a $5.13 advantage on a $20 item.

The Canadian Direct Marketing Association issued a press release on February 12, 1992. It expressed its concern about this exemption system in the bill. It stated: "The changes in the postal and courier emission policy are definitely a step in the right direction". No problem, I agree with that. The hon. member across said that a while ago. However, let us read the next sentence: "But we still have concerns about goods valued under $20 being shipped to Canada duty free, tax free and exempt of the $5 handling fee".

That is because of the registration system that I described a while ago. They will not have to pay the $5 fee in question to Canada Post. That is what is wrong with that loophole that exists.

The particular concern of the Canadian Direct Mail Marketing Association is the following, and I read the next sentence: "Many Canadian companies, those that specialize in smaller ticket items such as nursery, garden products, small tools or books will still be facing unfair competition". Most books shipped from the United States into Canada are under $20, particularly when they are sold in large quantities. When they are to be shipped across the border, large book distribution companies will obviously use the certification mechanism. They will ship their books in the mail and be exempt from the $5 fee. That is what is wrong. That is the hole in there. It will eliminate some of the cross-border shipping by mail.

Yes, a small fishing and tackle shop located in Massena may not be able to do it any more, and that is good. I accept that. I am in favour of the bill. I will vote for it. However, we are not going to eliminate the large ones because of the certification program we have created. That is the deficiency in the legislation before us. In other words, it is good but it could be a lot better had the government not put in that particular exemption.

I want to speak briefly about the damage caused by the present policy, the one that exists now, the $40 exemption. Let me read from a letter I received from McIntyre and Dodd Marketing, a company located in Hawkesbury in my riding. They sent me this letter on May 22, 1990 and it reads as follows: "I would like to draw to your attention a loophole in our laws that an American company is making use of, that if it continues may force us to close our Hawkesbury plant. Our plant in peak periods last year employed 165 people".

I had my assistant, Francois Giroux, make a phone call just recently to the company in Hawkesbury. We asked how many people were on staff right now. Here is what McIntyre and Dodd said to my assistant. They have 52 people on staff versus 165 in 1990. All these jobs have been lost in my constituency, 113 jobs lost in that one business alone because this loophole existed. That is why it is so important for us to fix it. We could fix it better if the government would listen to my last minute plea to plug this new loophole it is creating.

I read on from the letter sent to me by McIntyre and Dodd. "The U.S. company in question, Direct Marketing Enterprises out of Westbury, New York, is using Canadian media", I am almost tempted to say the Canadian Post Office, but I will not, "to promote its mail order products with a return address in Windsor, Ontario".

Get a load of this. The orders are dispatched to a fulfilment operation in Detroit where the orders are processed and shipped to the border, ready to be mailed at the closest Canada Post parcel centre.

Here is how it works. The U.S. company places ads in a Canadian magazine, The Canadian Weekender that we get in our newspaper and says: "Do you want to order our such and such widget? Write in giving your Visa or MasterCard number to box so-and-so, Windsor, Ontario". Canadians are first of all misled into believing they are buying this through a Canadian store, outlet or a Canadian mail distribution company in Windsor. It is not true. It is not even in Windsor.

Someone from Detroit crosses the bridge into Windsor, opens a little box, takes the orders out and brings them to the United States, fills them over there and ships them back in the mail. That is the loophole we have created and that we are trying to plug today.

That will still exist for the large mail order houses because we have only partially plugged it. Nevertheless, that is the damage caused by the previous policy, one I raised in this House over two years ago and at that time begged the government to have it corrected because we were losing all these jobs in Canada.

Now, of course, the government is partially addressing the issue in question. I say only partially because of the situation I described only moments ago.

• (1130)

The Canadian Direct Marketing Association in its press release —and I want to come back to that for a minute—told us that there were 700 member companies of that organization involved in $7.8 billion worth of Canadian direct marketing. That is the amount of sales we are talking about. This is not small potatoes. This is big business, very big business in Canada. Many people purchase goods by mail.

Some people living in large downtown centres might perhaps be under the mistaken belief the only people who use mail shopping are those wanting to avail themselves of these loopholes and buy something in the United States. It is not so.

I know my colleague from Thunder Bay represents a rural riding as I do. He will know many people order from the Sears catalogue or wherever else within Canada. It is a large business within this country, particularly in rural Canada but also in urban Canada for some people, elderly people or people for whatever reason who do not want to go out, cannot go out, or just enjoy shopping that way because it is less trouble than standing in line before the cash register at one's not so favourite store in the shopping centre. People do a large amount of business that way.

The Canadian direct marketing business is certainly a very legitimate business. There are many jobs there. They provide a very useful service to Canadians.

There is the odd person involved in direct marketing who advertises in a comic book or something and sends a little plastic piece of junk instead of the item we thought we were buying from the photograph. I am sure that is generally not the case. Those are the unfortunate circumstances we are sometimes made familiar with as MPs. We usually complain to the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs when we see people using devious methods to sell products. I do not think that is the general case. As a matter of fact I know it is not.

In closing I want to say it is about time we tightened up on that rule. My speech today is not to say that it is about time we charged Canadians more taxes. That is not the point. The point is that no one should be exempted from those taxes because he or she can cross the border to shop by letter or by the mail system.

If all taxes were collected equitably it would mean that each and every one of us paying taxes would have to pay proportionately less. Those who are less fortunate than others and cannot avail themselves of the loopholes are being punished right now because they are paying taxes that others are not. That is the point in tightening up on loopholes.

The issue is not whether one is in favour of higher taxes. I am certainly not in favour of having more tax increases after this Canadian government across the way has had 34 tax increases since it came to power in 1984. That is not the issue.

The issue, I repeat again in closing, is to ensure there is fairness, to ensure that a person who owns a store in my riding, in Thunder Bay or elsewhere in Canada does not see his or her business undercut by an envelope ordering something across the border and a product being sent back using, of all things, the Canadian postal system as a method to avoid paying Canadian taxes. That is the unfairness right now that many people are living with.

I intend to support this bill, which is badly needed, although unfortunately it still contains a loophole. I predict that the big multinationals and mail order companies will take advantage of the loophole which the government put there, in a piece of legislation that is basically a good bill.

I also think the $5 fee to be charged by the Canada Post Corporation should be $10. Fees should be reciprocal. The American fee is $8.40, which is about $10 in Canadian funds. The government across the way always insists on a level playing field and wants the rules to be more or less the same on both sides of the border. That is not the case here since their fees are twice as high as ours. Fees should be almost identical for the sake of fairness. They should be about $10 and we should eliminate the loophole that allows American companies to register and by-pass the whole fee system.

Finally, I hope Canadians can soon look forward to having fairer laws, especially Canadians who own small businesses in this country and who feel they are not getting fair treatment. They are right. At this very moment Ontario's entrepreneurs are faced with federal legislation that is not to their advantage. At the provincial level, they will soon have to contend with new labour legislation about which they are apprehensive, to say the least. I would say they are more than apprehensive about these new developments. Merchants in the riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, which is a border area, simply want a chance to do business and make an honest living. That is all they ask and I do not think that is unreasonable.

In any case, I am sure that the 113 workers at McIntyre and Dodd in Hawkesbury would rather have jobs than be on unemployment insurance or welfare. They want to be able to earn a living.

I hope the bill will be adopted today and that it will be a step in the right direction towards reducing transborder shopping. In concluding, I would like to repeat my request to the parliamentary secretary.

[English]

The parliamentary secretary—and I will predict it now—is making a mistake by going ahead with this clause that will permit large, foreign mail order firms from using what is known as the foreign certification program.

If they want a foreign certification program for administrative simplicity, so be it, but let us not use it as a way for them not to pay the $5 fee at the border. If they want to do it all at once, fine. If they want to send one cheque at the end of the month, fine. I am not going to object to that, but if we say to those companies that they can avoid paying a fee that others are paying then I think it is wrong. That is the problem. I repeat it again for the parliamentary secretary and the government officials who are listening in the lobby.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I rise to participate in third reading debate of Bill C-74.

At the outset let me say that when my children were very young—and I suspect this is the same for pretty well every other parent on this continent—and they came in with a scratch or a scrape that was not bleeding but was sort of roughed up, they demanded a bandage. The parents complied and gave them a little bandage to put over the cut even though the parents knew it was not needed. However, for psychological purposes the child needed to feel secure and needed to feel that there was some kind of treatment happening.

That is what this bill does. It really is a very tiny band-aid to try to give the impression the government is taking some action to stem or stop cross-border shopping. The reality is there is so much else that can be done to reduce people's need or desire to travel across the border to buy consumer goods. They do it personally as people in my community do. They travel to Duluth, Minnesota; Superior, Wisconsin; and Grand Marais, Minnesota. People in other communities also go across the border to get goods at a price less than they can buy them in their home community.

This bill deals with the symptoms, not with the problem. I regret that the government has chosen not to act seriously about the real problem.

Prior to this year's federal budget I wrote to the Minister of Finance and offered some suggestions to him. One of the suggestions was that he conduct a pilot project in northwestern Ontario to take a look at the cost differentials to see what really were the causes of the higher prices in Canada.

I used as an example two-by-fours produced in Thunder Bay from Canadian trees that were available at a price in Duluth, Minnesota, which was much less than the price at Beaver Lumber that was about one-half mile away from the sawmill. I asked the minister to take a look at those input costs to see what the impact of transportation was, to see what kind of mark-up there was, to see what impact hydro costs had in terms of the over-all costs of doing business in northwestern Ontario, and to take a look at all of the inputs to see if there were any areas where we could do better, where we could be more competitive.

I premised my remarks on the basis that I did not believe anyone in the system was ripping people off, that they were all legitimate costs. The minister never replied.

However, another organization did a national study because it too wanted to find out what the causes were. The key element it discovered—and it is one this government should be reacting to and working on—was in terms of the number of times that goods were handled in Canada compared to in the United States.

In the United States there is much more factory to retail outlet direct. In Canada it goes through two or three middle people whether it is domestically produced or whether it is imported. If the government really wanted to get serious about stemming out-shopping, it could work to assist the retail, manufacturing, transportation and handling industries in terms of reducing their cost elements.

When I raise this matter with my constituents they say: "Look, I have no choice. I don't have enough money every month to get by on. If I can save $100 or $200 by buying product x in Duluth and get a short holiday out of it to boot, I am sorry but I am going to do that because I need to it for my survival".

Some people feel very guilty about do that because they know it is their consumer purchases in Thunder Bay that help to pay the taxes for the municipality, to pay the wages for their neighbours and what not. But they feel they have no choice.

This government could act on that. This government could also act on the high cost of the Canadian dollar. There is no question that as long as our dollar is strong as compared to the American dollar imported products are much cheaper. If we allow the dollar to go where the marketplace says it should be, somewhere between 75 cents and 79 cents, then those products from the United States will become less attractive.

There is another thing we need to look at in a serious way. We need to re-examine our taxation policies as they relate to our competitor to the south, not to give corporations a break per se, but to make sure that our products are affordable and to make sure that we are not really tempting people to go south of the border.

Let me specifically deal with gasoline taxes. In the same letter to the Minister of Finance I indicated that perhaps it was time that all of us, whether all of us are the political parties or whether all of us are the federal, provincial and even municipal governments, re-examine how we tax fuel. There is a strong belief that the higher the tax on the fuel, the lower the consumption. From 1981 to 1989 the total cost of automobile gasoline went up by 198 per cent. What happened to consumption? It declined to just around 3.5 per cent.

If we look at that isolated statistic and at the number of people in Fort Francis, Rainy River, Sault Ste. Marie, Windsor and Cornwall who go across the bridge or down the road to cross the border to buy their gasoline because of the big difference in price we must recognize that if we do not change our gasoline pricing system, including taxation, there will continue to be that kind of draw. While they are down there getting gas they will pick up some milk, hurting our dairy producers, they will pick up some other consumer goods, hurting our retail operations, and on and on and on.

I suggested to the Minister of Finance that he convene an inter-ministerial, inter-governmental team to re-examine gasoline taxation and re-examine how that money is used. Obviously we need tax revenue of some kind or user fees of some kind to maintain, build and rebuild our highway infrastructure. We cannot just say that we would no longer tax it, we must look at it and find a way that treats the north fairly, treats the south fairly, treats the regions fairly and so on. We need to re-examine that because therein lies part of the solution to cross-border shopping.

One of the ironies of this particular bill and the steps the government has chosen to take is that it is actually working against the environment. It is discouraging the use of an integrated postal system that has economies of scale and the ability to take in a diverse range of items into one particular method of transportation and move them short and long distances for redistribution. Compare that to a neighbour of mine driving down to Duluth to buy that same item and only that item and then coming back. Think about the difference in fuel consumption and in emissions. There will be that many more vehicles on the highways, and it goes on and on and on.

Ironically by choosing to target mail order rather than any other method of bringing the goods into Canada the government is saying that it wants us to use the less environmentally friendly way of transport. People will do that. People will drive a hell of a long way to save $5. They do it all the time, even though it may cost them more in the long term. That is how they will approach it.

Let me conclude by saying once again that this is just a band-aid and for that reason we will not support this bill. We will not force a vote on it. We will do it on division. The government needs to know that it must find better ways to deal with a very real problem that is costing Canadians thousands of jobs in both the retail sector and the manufacturing sector.

I would like to leave members of this House and the people who are watching with one final comment. Let us all go out and buy something Canadian today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

EXCISE TAX ACT AND INCOME TAX ACT

The House proceeded to consideration of Bill C–75, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Income Tax Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Loiselle (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Ken Monteith (Elgin—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to begin debate at third reading of Bill C–75, which has passed committee stage without amendment.

First, I would like to express my gratitude to the members for their co–operation in facilitating the passage of this bill. I am confident that there is general agreement on the nature of the bill, and on the importance of a healthy and vibrant transportation sector in Canada.

This bill amends the Excise Tax Act and Income Tax Act to implement two key measures announced on December 6, 1991 to boost the transportation sector.

The measures included in this bill are a temporary loss offset program with a partial rebate of the federal excise tax on diesel and aviation fuel, and an exemption from non–resident withholding tax for payments in respect of cross–border aircraft leases. The temporary loss offset program will provide a benefit of $120 million in each of the next two years to transportation firms experiencing temporary cash flow difficulties.

The withholding tax exemption will provide an on–going benefit to Canada's airlines at a cost to the treasury of about $15 million per year.

In December the government also announced changes to the capital cost allowance structure and funding for an institute for research on trucking issues and an owner–operator's trucking co–operative.

These measures, along with the measures included in this bill, respond in a meaningful way to issues raised by the transportation sector. As well, the measures announced in the budget to bolster the economic recovery and build confidence will reinforce the transportation sector as more Canadian goods are shipped to markets at home and abroad.

Response from this sector to these measures has been positive. Of course, this bill does not include everything the sector requested. However, it does provide considerable benefit to transportation in a fiscally responsible way. For example, the temporary loss offset program will yield significant benefits to the transportation sector.

This program provides transportation firms with a 3 cent per litre rebate in exchange for reductions in income tax loss carry forwards. For each dollar rebate received businesses will have to reduce their loss carry forward by $10, reducing future tax deductions.

This 10 to 1 ratio was chosen in order to target the cash flow benefits to those firms that need them most. This targeting will allow the program to deliver significant cash flow benefits while still being fiscally responsible.

I would like to remind the hon. members that maintaining our fiscal strategy is the way to achieve long–term prosperity for the Canadian economy, and therefore for the Canadian transportation sector.

There is an administratively simpler option available for truckers. This option provides a rebate of 1.5 cents per litre of the 4 cent per litre federal excise tax on diesel fuel, up to a maximum of $500 per taxpayer per year. Individual truckers have responded to this program very positively.

Although some members of the opposition may differ with the government on certain aspects of these measures it is encouraging that partisan differences have been set aside to ensure the speedy passage of this worth while bill.

It is clear that all parties in this House are in agreement on the importance of transportation to the Canadian economy.

For the information of members, application for the rebate can be made at customs and excise offices across Canada. Application forms will be made available as soon as the bill has received Royal Assent. The sooner this bill is passed the sooner rebates will be received by the transportation sector.

In closing, this bill will provide a timely and substantial boost to the transportation sector while maintaining the government's commitment to sound fiscal management. This is a responsible package of measures that deserves the support of this House.

I urge members to pass this bill without delay.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I am privileged to rise in this House on third reading of Bill C–75, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Income Tax Act.

When the bill was tabled in this House back on May 1 it was largely a result of the situation with respect to Canadian truckers and trucking firms. I am sure Canadians can vividly remember the situation involving truckers last summer when major highways and many of our international bridges were blocked by these trucks.

Trucks parked in front of Parliament Hill for a number of days. Truckers and their families were and still are angry and frustrated with this government because of the high cost of doing business as truckers in this country. Their business is becoming increasingly competitive, and compared to their counterparts in the U.S. doing business is much more expensive in Canada.

The protests by the truckers centred on that fact. They were demanding help from the government. This legislation is supposed to respond to those concerns. While it merely attempts to deal with a very real situation affecting Canadian truckers it falls far short of what we would have liked to have seen in this bill, in other words, practical solutions to a complicated problem.

According to the government the trucking option would be a simpler option for small truckers and independently owned operators. It would consist of a rebate of 1.5 cents per litre of excisable fuel to a maximum of $500 per year. Such a rebate would have no effect on income tax losses according to the government. It would be included in income in the year it was received which is the normal practice. I will have more to say on that aspect in just a moment.

Another failure of the bill is that it does not help those truckers with capital cost struggles at the present time. The proposed capital cost allowance on a trucker's rig will only cover acquisitions made after December 6, 1991. The thousands of trucks parked on highway 401 last summer were purchased before December 1, 1991.

We are not talking about those truckers who may encounter difficulties in the future but those who have difficulties today. Some operators might be able to take advantage of the capital cost allowance in the future. Therefore we agree with the thrust of the bill in that direction. However, we must re–emphasize our concern that the legislation does not affect those purchases made before December 1991.

Another aspect of this legislation is the temporary excise tax transportation rebate, the proposed loss offset program. A general rebate will apply to the purchase of diesel fuel used for the purposes of transportation. The second component of this scheme is the loss offset that would reduce tax loss carry–forwards by $10 per $1 of rebate received.

In plain English it means that while the government is attempting to provide assistance to truckers in the purchase of fuel it is pulling the rug out from underneath truckers on the other side. It is simply robbing Peter to pay Paul. Is that the responsive, responsible way to deal with the situation? While Canadians are plagued with a very high level of taxation, and as businesses fold and our economy continues to struggle, in fact some would say crumble, where is the government? While the cost of doing business is less expensive in the United States, and we know that because many of our businesses and thousands of workers are moving south of the border, the government cannot even offer a helping hand.

The truckers are not looking for a handout they are looking for a helping hand.

As an example of this Peter robs Paul scenario with respect to the diesel fuel rebate, it will be in effect on fuel purchased in 1991 and 1992. The only way it helps small firms and independent truckers is by easing their temporary cash flow problems, which of course is acceptable. However, to cut off the program at the end of the year, if this bill is passed soon, is frankly too little and too late.

In summary, while I welcome the measures contained in this bill I am critical of the extent to which they would assist the trucking industry in regard to the depreciation of highly expensive capital equipment and the amount of tax relief on diesel fuel as it relates to the loss carry–forward provisions.

We support the bill and we will not attempt to delay it. However, the government's response to what is nothing short of a crisis in the trucking industry is very disappointing.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I too wish to make a few comments on Bill C–75. I will not take very long at all.

The need for this bill actually goes back a number of years. It goes back to the white paper Freedom To Move and it goes back to the deregulation of the aviation industry, the rail industry and the trucking industry.

That deregulation of the trucking industry, which was not only passed by this House but also put forward and passed by the then Liberal government of Ontario, led to the situation that we saw outside of this House, in Toronto, in Windsor, and elsewhere in this country. Block after block, if not mile after mile, of rigs stopped at the side of the road, their operators and their owners protesting against the lack of government action.

We ended up with too many trucks chasing too few cargoes. That was something that we predicted.

Under regulation there was a balance. Public necessity and convenience had to be met and people could only get into the business if there was sufficient demand for the service. While the system was not perfect it did ensure that there was some stability. It did not allow someone with a dream to invest his or her life savings into a rig on the chance that they might make a good buck.

When deregulation came into being we opened the floodgates. A lot of decent men and women decided to get into their own business. They were entrepreneurs, they felt they could do it, and they felt they could out–hussle. However, they did not count on everybody else having the same thought and everybody else convincing the bankers to give them the money and put them in hock for many years to come. They did not count on the competition from United States carriers. They did not count on the kind of consolidation that began to occur, even though there were enough warnings out there about what was going to happen. They did not count on the fact that there would not be enough work to keep them going.

They said: "Help". They demanded action from both the federal and provincial governments to make it possible for them to survive.

What did the federal Government of Canada do? It talked a lot for a long time and it had meetings and consultations. The end result was Bill C–75, a token effort.

In terms of the fuel tax rebate $500 will be a lot for my car but for a transport truck operator it is one, two, three or maybe five tanks full. I am not sure about the capacity and the costs. That is all that means, only to have it pulled back down the road, almost like sleight of hand.

In terms of depreciation, it still does not match their competitors in the states. In the previous bill I talked about band–aids. This is a band–aid to try to make the truckers feel better, to convince them that the government is really concerned about them and is going to great lengths to do something about them. I would bet that a lot of the truckers will not even agree to dance. They will not participate because it is meaningless.

As my colleague, the member for Hamilton West, pointed out quite rightly it does not do anything for those folks who already have their rigs, their trailers. It is only for new people or new acquisitions. If the existing truckers go out of business there will not be any new acquisitions. They certainly will not be buying a new rig, replacing their trailer.

It is a meaningless attempt by the federal government to do something for the truckers. If it was really serious it would re-examine its own philosophy about deregulation. It would allow the Standing Committee on Transport to enter into its own review to find a way to provide stability in the trucking industry, stability that would protect those carriers in the industry today and give them a chance to survive, but also design a system in co-operation with the provinces to make sure the chaos created by this government is never allowed to happen again, whether it is next year, in 10 years or whatever.

I will be supporting the bill because even though it is a minimal bill we must at least get it passed so those who are able can take advantage of it. If we can save one trucker somewhere out there in this country then great, but I sure wish we could have saved a lot more.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

NATIONAL PARKS ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-59, an act to amend the National Parks Act, as reported (with amendment) from a legislative committee.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment) moved that the bill, as amended, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Charest moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

TRANSPORTATION OF DANGEROUS GOODS ACT, 1992

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-45, an act to promote public safety in the transportation of dangerous goods, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have a ruling on Bill C-45, an act to promote public safety in the transportation of dangerous goods. There are two motions standing in the name of the Minister of Transport on the Notice Paper at the report stage of Bill C-45, an act to promote public safety in the transportation of dangerous goods.

• (1210)

Motions Nos. 1 and 2 will be grouped for debate and voted on separately.

I shall now propose Motions Nos. 1 and 2.

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Marcel Danis (for the Minister of Transport) moved:

Motion No. 1.

That Bill C-45 be amended in Clause 19 by striking out lines 1 to 3 at page 11 and substituting the following therefor:

"(b) any person who is responding to the occurrence or imminence of the release in accordance with an emergency response assistance plan approved under section 7; or".

Motion No. 2.

That Bill C-45 be amended in Clause 20 by striking out lines 7 to 11 at page 11 and substituting the following therefor:

"20. A person directed or required under subsection 17(3) or (4), 18(2) or 19(2) to do or refrain from doing anything is not personally liable, either civilly or criminally in respect of any act or omission in the course of complying with the direction or requirement or doing any".

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate you reading the motions just to give the House and those watching an idea of what we are doing here.

I am pleased to rise at report stage of Bill C-45, an act to promote public safety in the transportation of dangerous goods. We expect speedy passage. I think there is general agreement and I hope we will be able to continue in the fine spirit of co-operation that was exhibited in Legislative Committee E, as we addressed the two further amendments that have been proposed.

To address Motion No. 1, members will know that Bill C-45 is directed not only at preventing accidents but also at ensuring that the industry will respond properly to any accidents that may occur. To ensure rapid response our Canadian industry has established a most comprehensive and highly professional network of response teams from various companies. It is the response team nearest an accident that responds even though it may be another company's product.

In order to promote and support this industry response Bill C-45 provides such teams the measure of liability protection. It was intended in the drafting of the bill that this protection would clearly apply with respect to all the emergency response teams carrying out an emergency response plan approved by the Minister of Transport.

As unfortunately sometimes happens we have had recent advice that paragraph 10(3)(b) covers most but not all such teams as it is presently written. We want to ensure that we absolutely do cover every such response team. That is Motion No. 1.

Motion No. 2 refers to clause 20 of Bill C-45, which contains a reference to clauses 17, 18, and 19. Unfortunately, we have been advised by the drafting experts that while the words used in clause 20 do appropriately reference clauses 17 and 19, the reference does not work for clause 18. Hence, the wording of Motion No. 2.

I hope the House will be disposed to accept these two amendments. I appreciate the co-operation of the opposition parties on this bill.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of Her Majesty's Official Opposition I do support those motions being put forward by the government.

I would like to rise at this point in debate on this reading of Bill C-45. The entire piece of legislation is welcomed by the Official Opposition. While not as completely thorough as we would have liked, it nonetheless greatly improves the safe transportation of dangerous and hazardous goods.

The bill provides for a clearer framework for regulating the transportation of dangerous goods and places additional emphasis on steps that must be taken prior to the transportation of those goods.

In legislation passed back in 1980 a federal-provincial transportation of dangerous goods program was established and adopted by all the provinces and territories as set out by federal regulations. The bill would make it an offence for any person who displayed a safety mark on a vehicle transporting dangerous goods that was misleading in terms of the product being transported. This aspect comes down to an important issue which the Canadian fire-fighters have been seeking within the framework of legislation.

Fire-fighters who are engaged in the containment of goods released as the result of an accident or impending release of goods as a result of an accident are rightly concerned about dangerous and toxic substances. They are, after all, our first line of defence.

They also want to make sure that the product the vehicle or any transportation mode is carrying is the same product that is appearing on the vehicle's manifest. On the outer side of vehicles is a box displaying a card with a number identifying the hazardous product being shipped. This card is supposed to be displayed from the time the vehicle is filled with the substance until the time it is emptied.

Let me give you an example of the type of goods transported and the identification displayed.

Transport Canada provides an important booklet. It is entitled the "Initial Emergency Response Guide". If an accident occurs the identification number on the vehicle is referred to in the booklet and suggested procedures for emergency response crews such as fire-fighters or police or our medical teams are set out.

For instance, identification number UN2806 refers to lithium nitride. The "Initial Emergency Response Guide" procedures say that crews must not use water or foam but should use sand, lime or soda ash to contain that fire.

If the identification label, heaven forbid, were improperly displayed, if the wrong label were placed on the vehicle, or when another product was pumped into the vehicle and the card was not removed, the results would make a very difficult situation, especially in an emergency situation with respect to a fire.

Some other products might be contained by water only or foam. Some types of accidents require a local evacuation. We saw evidence of that a few years back in the city of Mississauga in which we had a train derailment and many units of that train had turned over on their sides, some of them spewing their substances. Those substances were highly toxic and when released into the atmosphere could do great damage to the population living nearby and so the order was made to evacuate. As I recall, being a reporter and walking the streets of Mississauga on that very quiet day, the plume of smoke was in the distance and there was no one to be found on the streets and sidewalks of Mississauga.

There are many potential cases where if an accident were to occur, improper containment methods could be used. This is why fire-fighters have been pressing for legislation that would encompass the right to know what is being transported on a vehicle and what the response is.

What this means is that fire-fighters want to enhance the manual system that is now in place in which a card is placed on the outside of the vehicle in that little box and the contents of the vehicle, its manifest, are known through an electronic data base which can be accessed immediately.

Currently in our trains when the locomotive is up front and it carries the manifest of what it is carrying behind the locomotive, oftentimes, and sadly so sometimes, the main locomotive is involved in the collision or the accident that occurs on those tracks and with the damage to the locomotive can come the loss of the manifest and you can understand the concern when we or the fire-fighters or the police or the medical response teams will not know what is contained within those train units behind the locomotive.

What the fire-fighters have been asking for is this electronic data base and all vehicles transporting dangerous goods would be required to register on a nation-wide data base at the source of transportation and destination. Certainly accessing the most current information this way would be a vast improvement over what we have in place today.

Although the right to know is encompassed in this bill in its language, the bill does not set up such an electronic system of information. That is too bad, for we have the opportunity. Such a system would undoubtedly have be to arranged with the co-operation of labour and business and government.

We look forward to such a system eventually being put into place.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I have a few brief remarks in support of the latest amendments that the government has proposed to this bill. They are welcome and we do support them.

I will briefly comment on some of the background to the point that we have reached today. I would like to take the opportunity even at this stage to pay some tributes. One may seem self-serving but it is to the transport critic for our own party, the member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan, who has done a great deal of work over a long period of time on this bill and the components that go into it, including extensive public meetings and hearings in his own area and elsewhere with virtually all of the parties that are affected by this legislation in order to ensure that we got it right this time as much as humanly possible.

While there are always deficiencies in any piece of legislation, I think the efforts of all parties, the Official Opposition, ourselves and the government, on this one have been excellent. The co-operation has been excellent. There has been a willingness to horse trade back and forth, to share concepts and ideas.

I would also like to congratulate one of my other colleagues, the member for Mission—Coquitlam, who is not here today. She is out in British Columbia. She presented three private member's bills, one which touched on the same area of the right to know and the computerized tracking system that has been referred to by my colleague from the Official Opposition a few moments ago.

The basic thrust of that private bill and the amendments which the International Association of Fire Fighters has sought in its two legislative lobbies in the last two years are incorporated in this bill. The government accepted and put forward an amendment which we suggested in order to accomplish that. Again, I thank the government for its openness in that regard.

The final tribute I would like to pay at this stage is to the International Association of Fire Fighters. In the eight or nine years that I have been around this place, although it was interrupted on one occasion—time off for good behaviour, as I like to put it—I would like to pay particular tribute to the International Association of Fire Fighters and in particular to its Canadian Director, Doug Coupar. Of all the various lobbies, especially the labour lobbies that I have seen on the Hill, I have found the association to be the most specific and the most effective of any of the ones that I have ever had the pleasure or sometimes not quite the pleasure of dealing with. It got to the point. It dealt with everybody openly and specifically on issues with which it had immediate concern and experience. It made its points. In large part the points were accepted insofar as it was within the capacity of the legislation before us to deal with those.

I am particular pleased again to have had incorporated into this legislation the wherewithal, the enabling legislation, to allow an electronic computerized tracking system to occur.

This is all I want to say at this point. I will address it perhaps in a little more at length when we get to third reading.

Again, I want to thank all parties and all individual members who have been involved as well as the staff of the Ministry of Transport which was very co-operative in giving its assistance and background knowledge in the furtherance in what I think is essentially a very good bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt Motion No. 1?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt Motion No. 2?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motions Nos. 1 and 2 agreed to.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (for the Minister of Transport) moved that the bill, as amended, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When shall the bill be read a third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Loiselle (for the Minister of Transport) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I realize it has been a long day already. You may find that there is a willingness to call it one o'clock and we can come back to government business at 3 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being one o'clock p.m., I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon, pursuant to Standing Order 24(2).

The House took recess at 12.27 p.m.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

SHOP CANADA DAY

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, the riding I have the privilege to represent, Thunder Bay—Nipigon, through the Chamber of Commerce and its Citizens Outshopping Committee led by Roy Smyth, have taken the initiative in asking this House to proclaim July 4 "Shop Canada Day".

Shopping outside Canada means billions of dollars are not spent at home, resulting in the loss of many thousands of jobs. What Canada most needs today are jobs and a return to the prosperity we once knew.

By adopting July 4 as Shop Canada Day, we can start to journey back to what we once knew as full employment and prosperity for all Canadians to enjoy.

I compliment the Thunder Bay Chamber of Commerce, the executive director Rebecca Johnson, the president Dick Dolphin and all those involved in taking the initiative of committing July 4 to Shop Canada Day and allowing all of us to buy back into Canada.

PENSIONS

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, when is an agreement between two countries not an agreement?

I believe the Canada–Italian Pension Protocol that has been implemented since January 1, 1988 has no legal authority. The protocol states: "This protocol shall enter into force on the date of the exchange of the instruments of ratification and its provision shall have effect on the first day of January, 1988".

This was confirmed by a letter to myself dated November 28, 1990 from the Minister of Finance.

The instruments of ratification have not been exchanged, leaving the agreement in limbo. The agreement allows the Canadian government to tax approximately 60,000 Canadians of Italian descent on $250 million of yearly pension benefits. The agreement is flawed, unjust, unworkable and at this moment, illegal.

On behalf of these 60,000 Canadians my question to the Minister of Finance is, what are the consequences of having collected these taxes on $1 billion of revenue if the agreement is never ratified. Are the cheques in the mail?

CITIZENS AGAINST CHILD EXPLOITATION

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, young children are the heart of any great nation.

One group that is attempting to provide a better system of protection for our children is CACE, or Citizens Against Child Exploitation. This organization is headed by Mrs. Monica Rainey of Kelowna, B.C.

They have a plan that would go a long way to providing a safe environment for our children at school, at day care and in our neighbourhoods. Much like legislation already in existence in some American states, CACE proposes changes to our system that would:

(1) Establish a central registry for convicted child sex offenders in order to allow schools, day care centres and children's clubs to ensure that our children are not at risk by being placed in classrooms with known child sex offenders.

(2) Pass both provincial and federal legislation prohibiting a sex offender from holding a position of trust or authority with children.

A recent provincial study in B.C. specifies that 82 per cent of all sex offenders outside the home are in professional positions of trust. This is obviously a frightening thought for all Canadian parents. Now is not the time for further study, now is the time for action. The foremost priority of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms is to protect society, and what segment of society is more in need of our protection than our children.

CONSTITUTIONAL NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, when will Quebecers understand that they are a minority here in Ottawa and that they will get nothing more to help them develop to their full potential?

Let us take a look at what is happening in the constitutional negotiations. Mr. Castonguay himself had to quit because he saw the rug being pulled from under him. The same thing happened to the hon. member for Outremont who was losing his credibility on the Bélanger–Campeau commission. The same thing goes for the hon. member for Jonquière who realized that his own party did not even respect his proposals on his amendments to the bill on a renewed Canada.

Yesterday the Minister of National Health and Welfare, withdrew after being laughed at for two years although he did not know it, because here in Ottawa he can do nothing to change the Constitution.

FUTURE OF CANADA

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec–Est): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure to announce in this House that on July 11 my riding will host a conference on young Canadians' commitment and attitude to the future of Canada.

This conference is part of the Forum for Young Canadians project, a joint initiative of the Government of Canada and the private sector. Its purpose is to give young Canadians, age 18 to 25, from 15 ridings in Canada an opportunity to study the economic situation of their riding and of Canada.

Following the regional conference in Quebec City in July two young people from my riding will have a chance to share with young people from the other provinces and write a national report.

These young people are expected to meet with officials from the House of Commons and the government in the fall to present proposed solutions to them.

Finally, these young leaders will appear on a special television program to ask Canadians to work toward building a more prosperous and more economically competitive nation.

I would like to congratulate my colleague, the hon. member for London—Middlesex who initiated the project, and the organizers of this event. I also want to wish all the young participants great success.

MINERS' MEMORIAL DAY

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, today, June 11, is Miners' Memorial Day in Cape Breton. This day holds a special place in the hearts of Cape Bretoners as it commemorates the work of coal miners.

The life of a coal miner has changed through the years, but danger of working underground continues to be a haunting element of that industry.

Today is a day when we recognize the hard work of our miners and remember those who have sacrificed their lives for that industry. Today is an emotional day for many. In particular one must remember the miners whose lives were lost at the Westray Mine explosion on May 9, 1992.

The coal industry has taken many of our miners. Today we reflect with respect, admiration, and a sense of loss upon those men who have died in our mines.

Today we also remember the families of our coal miners, the mothers, the wives, and the children who waited on the surface only to find their worst fears coming true.

On behalf of my constituents in Cape Breton—East Richmond I salute miners for their contributions, not only to the economy of Nova Scotia, but also to our culture, our history, and our sense of pride on our great island.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Gus Mitges (Bruce—Grey): Mr. Speaker, Macedonia has always been an integral part of Hellenic history and Hellenic civilization that dates back almost 3,000 years.

Therefore the usurpation of the name Macedonia which from ancient times has been identified with Greece by a republic whose population is mainly of Slav origin is totally unacceptable and would constitute a destabilizing effect and an ongoing concern in the Balkan region.

On the other hand, a timely settlement of the question of the name of the Republic of Skopje without reference to the Greek historic name Macedonia constitutes a stabilizing factor and paves the way for co-operation and support from Greece for Skopje within a framework of security and stability in the region.

Let us hope that Skopje will follow this course of action which would assure a more peaceful and secure future for the country and its people.

URBAN INFRASTRUCTURE

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, last Saturday at the annual convention of the Federation of Canadian Municipalities the Minister of Transport said that his government would not participate with the municipalities in the $15 billion project to renew urban infrastructure. In addition to the billion dollars which this government took from the municipalities in 1991, the minister had the nerve to suggest to the convention of municipalities that $14 billion should be invested in the Trans-Canada highway system instead of urban infrastructure.

• (1410)

[English]

The Liberal Leader at the same municipal convention called for a shared-cost infrastructure program between the three levels of government.

This new partnership would stimulate the economy, create 60,000 jobs and address the decaying urban infrastructure problem while decreasing the ever-growing unemployment and welfare payments.

THE LATE WILLIAM SMITH

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, Canadian agriculture suffered a great loss with the untimely death Tuesday of Canadian Wheat Board Commissioner Bill Smith. Mr. Smith died as the result of an accident while on a trade mission in China. He was 55.

Bill Smith was raised on the family farm at Inland, Alberta. After graduating from the Vermilion School of Agriculture, he worked his way up through the Alberta Wheat Pool from elevator agent to manager of grain sales.

Appointed a commissioner of the Canadian Wheat Board in 1983 he was very active in international marketing and developed an expertise in dealing with the Chinese and Russian markets, two of Canada's major customers.

As Wheat Board Minister Mayer said: "Bill will be sadly missed. This marks a great loss for his family, friends, the agriculture industry, and Canada as a whole".

Besides his many friends and colleagues in the grain industry, Bill Smith leaves his wife Kathy and five children.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure all members join in extending condolences to Mrs. Smith and her family.

JUSTICE

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, on June 9 on Poundmaker Reserve in northwestern Saskatchewan about 300 western Canadian judges, lawyers and law enforcement people met as part of a six-day seminar on racial, ethnic and cultural equality.

The seminar, the first of its kind in Canada, included a talking circle that heavily criticized a court system which makes little sense to aboriginal people.

Poundmaker Chief Blaine Favel said that the non-Indian court system seeks to punish offenders while the native model strives to heal and bring the offender back into the community.

I commend the people of Poundmaker Reserve, the seminar organizers and the judges of western Canada who participated in this unique and ground-breaking seminar for their recognition that a new judicial relationship must be created and for their willingness to make the seminar a success.

The work they have undertaken is an important step in opening the lines of communication that must eventually lead to fundamental changes in structures and attitudes and a fair judicial system for aboriginal people.

SENATE REFORM

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I returned from the Eco Summit in Rio. Thousands of people from some 140 countries have gathered to try and achieve consensus on the future of the globe.

Ninety per cent of these people would give their eye teeth to have a Canadian passport because to the world Canada is the best place on earth.

Meanwhile back in Canada, rather than an Eco Summit, we have the ego summit wherein some provincial politicians have discovered that by being intransigent at the constitutional bargaining table they can become national TV stars. Now constitutional renewal has come down to the issue of Senate reform.

Mr. Speaker, I believe most Canadians would simply like to see the Senate abolished. However, if Senate reform is a priority with western Canadians then let us reform it rather than scrap it.

Reform and renewal mean compromise. Canadians are tired of constitutional bickering. They simply want their country preserved. So do I. Perhaps if our constitution ministers would hold a few sessions in Panama or Sri Lanka they would realize how trivial their pious constitutional principles may really be.

So I say to them all: Quit horsing around with the Senate. Get on with the job. Stop putting the future of the greatest country on earth at risk.

DR. GEORGE CHANG

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, this week I received a visit from Ms. Chen Chu, a member of the National Assembly of Taiwan and human rights activist, regarding the wrongful imprisonment of Dr. George Chang, a democratic reformer who was jailed immediately upon his return to Taiwan last December after 30 years of exile.

Dr. Chang, a professor and dean at Cooper Union University in New York, is presently being denied proper medical attention by the Kuomintang government of Taiwan.

As confirmed by Amnesty International, Dr. Chang suffers from acute high blood pressure and a tumour which was recently discovered in his neck.

At the very least Canadians abhor the incarceration of political dissidents but to deny medical attention to prisoners of conscience strikes at the heart of our most cherished and fundamental respect for human rights.

The eyes of the world are watching now. I call on Premier Hau to demonstrate Taiwan's commitment to human rights and free Dr. Chang before it is too late.

NATIONAL NEIGHBOURHOOD PARTY

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, this coming weekend, Sunday, June 14 to be exact, marks one of the main events in Canada's 125th birthday celebrations, the National Neighbourhood Party.

In communities large and small across the country picnics and block parties are being organized to bring Canadians closer together in a spirit of pride and goodwill as neighbours and fellow citizens in this great nation.

In my own riding of Fredericton—York—Sunbury, a host of volunteers calling themselves the Fredericton Civil Pride Committee and representing a broad range of organizations and associations will put on a block party to please every age and to make us proud to be Canadians.

I am particularly pleased that we have been able to include my own annual public constituency picnic as an integral part of this 125th anniversary salute to Canada.

These national neighbourhood parties are open to everyone. Just like the future of our country, the potential of coming together in a sense of common Canadian citizenship is limited only by our own imagination.

Let us all join in toasting Canada with conviction and commitment as we celebrate its 125th birthday party this Sunday.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, earlier today this House passed a bill to curb cross-border shopping. At the same time, the left hand of the government across the way, namely Crown-owned Petro-Canada, was busy opening a gas bar in the well-known Canadian city of Plattsburg, New York. There displaying proudly the Maple Leaf of Canada, Petro-Canada advertises cut-rate gas, discount cigarettes and everything else that this great Crown-owned corporation can use to entice Canadians to cross the border and shop in the great U.S.A.

The milk of this U.S. cash cow is so plentiful that Petro-Canada wants to repeat the same exercise in other northern U.S. cities, namely in Vermont and elsewhere. One American is reported to have said to the media: "I can't get over your Canadian government. They tax everything so sky-high you can't pay it and then they go and open a gas bar down here. What are they trying to do?" That is what all of us are asking ourselves as well.

GROSSE ÎLE

Hon. Bob Layton (Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to bring the attention of the House to Grosse Île, an island in the St. Lawrence River just east of Quebec. The island was a clearing house for European immigrants and served as a quarantine station between 1832 and 1860. Over-population and general starvation forced many Irish families to immigrate to Canada on what were later dubbed coffin ships. Disease was rampant because living conditions were poor and in very cramped spaces. Many immigrants were hospitalized on arrival at Grosse Île and thousands eventually died.

Since more than 12,000 Irish immigrants are buried on the island, Irish Canadian communities continue to have a special concern for its future. Parks Canada has proposed the creation of a national park on Grosse Île commemorating and celebrating European migration to Canada. Canadians of Irish descent are requesting that this historic site be attributed to our Irish ancestors.

I hope the parks department can accommodate this request.

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

In light of the information we are now receiving on the constitutional conference and the inability to reach agreement, could the government tell this House what it intends to do in the coming days?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, we are waiting for the report from the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs. Once it has received this report the government will make a decision on what comes after.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Yesterday we saw the minister of health walking out of the conference. As everyone knows, he was named by the Prime Minister to be there to help the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

My question to the Deputy Prime Minister is this: Was the departure of the minister of health authorized by the government or was it just another Laurel and Hardy show?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. Leader of the Opposition will know, the Minister of National Health and Welfare has enormous portfolio responsibilities. He has been attending the constitutional meetings as a senior minister from Quebec. He indicated yesterday that he felt that he could contribute no more time to that process since his portfolio responsibilities required his attention. If I can quote him, he said: "I repeat once again, I didn't walk out. I didn't want to protest against anything. I just want that we realize that this step for me is over, that we have to move on to another step". He continues to be very supportive of the government's activities and hopeful, as all of us are, that the process will result in success.

• (1420)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, how can the government believe that the people of Canada will take this government seriously in the matter when two senior cabinet ministers representing Canada at this negotiating table cannot agree? We would like to know from that side of the House what this government intends to do next and give some example to the nation that first the government will have order in its own House before trying to solve the problems of the nation.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to say what the government will do next when this step of the process is not completed. We will see what the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs reports.

One thing I can tell the hon. Leader of the Opposition is that this government will do everything possible to ensure that this country remains united.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the same minister. There has been a lot of agreement on fundamental issues of critical importance to Canadians, for example, the aboriginal question, distinct society, linguistic duality, the social charter.

Will this government now call a First Ministers Conference to try to unravel this constitutional impasse, to solve this constitutional labyrinth?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I would simply repeat that we do not yet know what the final results of this stage of the process will be. When we do know, we will be in a position to evaluate what is the most appropriate next step.

Once again I underline that we are committed to the preservation of this country and doing whatever it takes to ensure that end.

[Translation]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Health and Welfare talked about a new approach, "a new way", of taking another step, of pursuing a new path when he left the meeting last night.

Can the minister tell us what this new path or further step to be taken is? Can he tell us what Canadians can expect from this government in this constitutional crisis situation?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as I said, it is impossible to define a new approach until we know what the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs will report to the government and the House.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

I want to turn to the proposed purchase of helicopters at a cost of $4.3 billion. The government has defended this purchase by saying that 15 of these 50 new helicopters will be used to replace search and rescue helicopters.

There is no question that it is necessary to upgrade the search and rescue helicopters and the service we have. We know that rather than buying new ones, these helicopters could be upgraded for another 20 years of life for $200 million.

The Deputy Prime Minister often says as Minister of Finance that he has no choices. Here is a choice: $4.3 billion or $200 million. Which is it going to be?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I must advise the hon. member that quite honestly that information is not correct.

To just put this project into context, for some long period we have been looking at a replacement helicopter project, both to replace the existing Sea Kings on the ships and the search and rescue. This has been a longstanding project. It is a project that will take about 13 years to come to completion. The department has been allocating within its budget appropriate funds to provide for this new equipment.

Obviously, no decisions have been made at this point. The minister will be looking at a variety of alternatives. All members would agree that we do need to look at this in terms of what will serve our needs best over the long term, the kind of helicopter that will enable us to provide the capability to do all the different tasks that are required, that will lead us into the 21st century up to the year 2035. Indeed, it may be more appropriate to spend some money now and over the next 13 years to enable us to have that up–to–date modern capability for the long term.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Deputy Prime Minister. We know that in 20 years technology will change radically.

If we are able to upgrade those helicopters to make sure that we can provide search and rescue efficiently and with safety for those pilots, that is what we should be doing and doing it now.

[Translation]

My supplementary is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. The other day, the Prime Minister said in the House: We can't spend money we don't have. I assume the Prime Minister can spend the money he does have. I also assume the government now has $4.3 billion to spend. Instead of spending this money on helicopters to defend us against enemies that no longer exist—the Soviets—will the government spend this money on Canada's children who need daycare since that problem does exist?

[English]

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, again I would ask the hon. member to look at this issue in its proper context.

We have within the Department of National Defence an allocation of funds that is required to enable us to carry out missions that the government and the defence committee agree upon. Within that budget, we try to allocate funds between personnel, infrastructure and capital.

We have over the years, in the 1970s, not spent the amount of money on capital that is required to maintain our capital equipment effectively. We need to change that to provide the equipment that our men and women can utilize to provide the sovereignty patrols, fisheries patrols, drug interdictions, search and rescue and to protect our sovereignty on both our coasts.

If the hon. member looks at that within the context of the over-all defence budget, this indeed is going to be a requirement to replace our existing equipment such as helicopters with new modern equipment that can take us well into the 21st century and assure that we can undertake our responsibilities effectively.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, since 1975 there has been a 57 per cent increase in real dollars to defence in this country.

There are many long term investments this country has to make. One of them is in this country's children and in training for this country's citizens. We are busy fighting a country that no longer exists, the U.S.S.R. Maybe it is time to invest in a country that does exist and that is Canada.

I want to say to the minister that for the cost of one-third of one helicopter we could restore the Court Challenges Program for 10 years. We could introduce a decent student employment program for the cost of one helicopter and for the cost of 10 helicopters, we could have a real training program in this country.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance scrap this $4.3 billion boondoggle and invest the money in Canadians so that we can go into the 21st century with pride and with well-trained citizens?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that all of the outrage does not really respond to the actual situation. The government responds to all the various needs of its citizens in terms of all of our departmental responsibilities.

Would my hon. colleague indeed want to scrap the Department of National Defence to make us incapable of providing defence of our sovereignty, so that we are unable to do the kinds of operations on the east coast dealing with fisheries interdictions and unable to work at drug interdiction and search and rescue?

Can the hon. member not understand that we have a long-term planning process within the Department of National Defence. We have been planning for years for replacement equipment, a 13-year program. We will be looking at all of the options and the minister will be bringing forward recommendations to cabinet in due course.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

One day before his departure for Rio, the Prime Minister stated in this House that reductions in greenhouse gas emissions are firmly on Canada's agenda at home and at the earth summit.

However that position was contradicted by the official position taken by the Minister of the Environment at the summit when he called not for reduction in greenhouse gas emissions but rather stabilization.

My question to the Deputy Prime Minister is this: Which is the position of the Canadian government, reduction as stated by the Prime Minister or stabilization as stated by the Minister of the Environment?

Hon. Pauline Browes (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister arrived in Rio de Janeiro today. He was greeted by many good reports. He said that the biodiversity convention was signed this morning. We expect to sign the global warming greenhouse gas convention within the next few days.

• (1430)

But I must mention the number of people who have spoken about what Canada has done at the United Nations. It says: "For years Canada has set the example of the green country that we hope all countries will use as an example". This is the administrator of the United Nations Development Program. Eve Savory from CBC says: "Canada's delegation has won the respect of other countries by going out of its way to be helpful".

We are going to be working very closely with other delegations. We will be signing the convention at Rio in the next few days.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, it is a good press release, but it doesn't answer the question, which was very specific.

We already know that Australia, New Zealand, Germany, Austria, Italy and Denmark have endorsed a policy for the reduction of greenhouse gases. However, there is a contradiction between the position taken by the Prime Minister on reduction and the Canadian government's official policy which wants to stabilize levels at those existing in 1990.

My question is simple: Which policy does the Canadian government endorse? The policy announced by the Minister of the Environment or the policy announced by the Prime Minister? Mr. Speaker, we can't do both!

[English]

Hon. Pauline Browes (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, we will be signing the global warming convention in the next few days. But I want to say that within the green plan we have the stabilization of the greenhouse gases by the year 2000 at the 1990 level.

But the green plan has gone further than that. We have allotted more than $150 million directed at the uncertainties within the global warming issue in order to reduce those at some point in time.

We are working with the provinces. We have a national action strategy dealing with the provinces as to how we are going to reduce the greenhouse gases. We are on course and we will be signing that convention in Rio de Janiero in the next few days.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of external affairs and in her absence the Deputy Prime Minister.

The justice committee this morning unanimously passed a motion asking the minister of external affairs to request the expulsion of David Spencer and Christine Lamont from Brazil. The committee heard clear evidence of a travesty of justice and discrimination against these two Canadians.

The minister continues to drag her heels. When will the minister make that request?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I am prepared to advise the hon. member that I understand the report will be going to her. I believe she will be back next week and I am sure she will take the committee's recommendations under advisement and will be back to the House.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, that response is not good enough. The Lamont family and the minister's officials met with the judge who told them that he was under extreme pressure to bring in a clean sweep verdict.

The minister has agreed that 28 years is excessive and the trial was clearly flawed. Canadians and members of all three parties want the minister to act.

Why will the minister not do the right thing and act now?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the report of the standing committee was just tabled this morning. I think my hon. colleague must recognize that the minister and officials will obviously want to read that report and to discuss it. Upon her return next week I am sure she will have that opportunity.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Justice.

I want to read a quote from a gun store owner in Los Angeles. He says: "It's scary—they're buying guns; they are going to carry on them—Some of these people have never held a gun or even seen a gun close up". Gun sales in L.A. have gone up from 50 to 500 per cent, depending on the gun store.

Is the minister aware that British Columbians are concerned that the dramatic increase in guns being bought south of the border will spill over into British Columbia?

Is the minister aware that this week during the hearings on the draft regulations on gun control, Staff Sergeant Neal Jessop of Windsor, Ontario said that officials at the border are, and I quote: "only scratching the surface of the cross-border gun trade"?

I want to ask the minister: What steps is the government taking to prevent the flow of prohibited and illegal guns into Canada?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, in case the hon. member has not noticed, a great deal has been devoted over the last 18 months to strengthening Canada's gun control legislation and bringing forward regulations and an implementation scheme that would in fact give full force to that legislation.

Among the legislative amendments are not simply amendments to the Criminal Code but also amendments to the statutes affecting customs and excise that are important.

Those who are opposed to gun control sometimes point out that no gun control legislation will ever completely succeed in preventing crimes committed with firearms or the smuggling of firearms. However, I believe that what we have done in this House in passing the gun control legislation is to increase the number of tools in the hands of police and customs officers to enable them as much as humanly possible to protect Canadians from the illegal traffic in arms.

I congratulate members of the House for passing that legislation. I thank them for the consideration they have been giving to the regulations. The recommendations of the committee will be taken into account before the final enactment of the regulations. I think we are doing as much as is possible in this House to try to make sure that we do not have the same kind of situation.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, as the minister knows, I am not talking about the good work we have all been doing on the gun control regulations here. I am talking about the guns flowing across the border.

In front of a committee of the House, here is what a customs officer said: "It is a virtual paradise for anyone who may be inclined at this point to do any smuggling of guns. As I say, you should be alarmed because we are alarmed". The government has been warned. We want a safe, gun-free country in Canada.

Is the minister prepared to toughen up controls at the border? Is she prepared to bring in tough new laws for the criminal misuse of guns and is she prepared to crack down on the illegal violation of the new gun control laws?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, in case the hon. member had not noticed, we have brought in tough new sentences for firearms related crimes. We have tried to clamp down legislatively on the criminal use of firearms. Alas, we have no control over the firearms climate in the United States.

It is clear that the majority of people in the United States favour a national gun control scheme. They do not have it there. Perhaps they should consider adopting a parliamentary style of government which would enable the government to reflect the wishes of the majority of Americans, instead of people here looking south to adopt inefficient American institutions of government.

Canada and the United States have the longest undefended border in the world. In many ways that is good; in many ways that is negative. I think many Americans are looking at the kinds of decisions that have been made in this House and the ability of this Parliament to reflect the wishes of Canadians. They are beginning to seriously question the will of their own legislators to translate the concerns that Americans have into effective legislation.

The example we are providing here is perhaps one of the best ways that we can influence in an extraterritorial way the developments south of the border.

FISHERIES

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. He knows that last week a scientific report was tabled which shows that the northern cod stock is in such poor condition that the fishery may have to be closed.

This has really come as no surprise to the people involved in the fishing industry. What is a surprise and a disappointment to them is that this government refuses to talk about specific plans about compensation.

I ask the minister, as an Atlantic Canadian, will he have compassion and show some leadership and tell us what compensation plan he has in mind with this situation?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I answered that question yesterday and that answer remains valid today.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, the minister's answer yesterday was that he could not give me answers to a hypothetical situation and he needed more specifics. If he needs specifics, I will give him specifics.

Specifically, in mid-February a specific plant in Port Union on the Bonavista peninsula closed down and 80 specific families were without compensation because they did not have enough time to qualify for unemployment insurance. Right now, specifically, they have no fish, they have no jobs, they have no compensation and they have no idea how this government is going to look after them.

I will now ask the minister as a supplementary what specific action plan he has for those specific people under this specific situation?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, specifically, the government has committed over $600 million for the fishery crisis in Atlantic Canada.

If he wants more specifics, I could send him a copy of the Fisheries Adjustment Program. I could also be specific and send a detailed account of the hundreds of millions of dollars that UI spends in Newfoundland and Labrador to help those people.

He refers to 80 people who are not in receipt of UI. Last year we had an emergency response program of some $53 million to help those very people. As I indicated yesterday, if the past is an indication of what the future will be for people that need help, they can count on the government.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans announced today that Canada would start negotiations with France to give France fish quotas inside Canada's territorial zone outside of the zone awarded to France yesterday in New York.

Does the government not realize it is scandalous to be giving France these extra cod bonuses when our scientists, our fishermen and the world community all agree our cod stocks are in danger of extinction?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, what is scandalous is that the hon. member will issue a press release that claims certain things will happen at the will of this government when in fact what he is asking this government to do is to ignore the words given by Canadians in a treaty signed by a Liberal minister under a Liberal government in 1972.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, this is 1992 and not 1972. A lot of water has flowed under the bridges of our fishing boats and there ain't no fish in it.

The Government of France, in these new negotiations announced today, is claiming fishing rights and this government is not disputing those rights to use ten French trawlers, each 50 metres long, with factory freezer capacity "to fish along the coasts of Newfoundland, of Nova Scotia, with the exception of the Bay of Fundy, and in the Canadian fishing zone within the Gulf of St. Lawrence". That is on the coast of five provinces in this country.

Does the government not realize that from an environmental point of view, given the state of our stocks, giving France these bonus cod stocks is nothing short of criminal negligence?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I thought the hon. member was going to stand up and congratulate the government and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans for having obtained at Rio an international conference on the failing stock.

I thought he was going to congratulate the government for having piloted this case into an international court that gives almost a 92 per cent victory to Canada. Today he stands up and he again blows a lot of wind.

He talks about negotiations. The minister was clear this morning in Newfoundland and Labrador. The government is entering into discussions with France pursuant to the 1972 treaty that provides access for both countries to fish in the other's waters. That is all the discussions will be about.

LUBICON BAND

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

In consequence of questions asked in the Austrian Parliament on May 5, the Austrian ambassador to Canada sought an audience with the minister during the week of May 18. He expressed the Austrian government's concerns about the situation of the Lubicon Indian people and their treatment at the hands of successive Canadian governments.

The minister being unavailable, the ambassador met with the deputy minister for the better part of an afternoon.

Can the parliamentary secretary advise whether or not the ambassador discussed what further steps, in addition to his meeting with the deputy minister, the Austrian government was considering taking regarding the Lubicon situation?

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, first I thank my colleague for notice of this question.

I can confirm that the deputy minister did meet with the Austrian ambassador at his request. They spent a long time discussing not only the current status of the Lubicon negotiation but particularly reference to the accusation in the motion from the Parliament that talked about clear-cutting.

The deputy minister made it very clear to the ambassador that while Daishowa holds the rights, they are not and have not been logging within that sensitive area.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I must thank the parliamentary secretary for an answer, although of course it was only glancingly related to the question.

Among other matters raised it is my understanding that the ambassador spoke of possible Austrian overtures to the CSCE and other European countries and, as well, consideration of Austrian imports of Canadian lumber.

In any event, let me ask the parliamentary secretary whether or not the government now is sufficiently concerned with the impact of the Lubicon situation on Canada's international reputation to undertake at the very least to provide the Lubicon people with a detailed, point by point response to the band's draft settlement proposal which it has had now since the late 1980s and to which it has never yet responded.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to win in this House. You get accused of not answering the question; you get accused if you answer too much. So I will try to keep to the question.

The minister met on June 5 with Chief Ominayak and they discussed a number of things. The most important thing is the mutual commitment by the Lubicon and by the government to seek a successful, fair and appropriate negotiation and resolution to this dispute.

Both sides have committed, first, to pursuing that result and, second, they have both committed not to negotiate in public. Certainly for me to take a step in that direction would not serve the interests at all.

FAMILY VIOLENCE

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Several months ago the minister called for proposals to establish three research centres for family violence and violence against women at regional locations across Canada.

In a similar vein some years earlier, in 1985 to be exact, steps were initiated toward creation of such a research centre on family violence in the city of Fredericton with an alliance struck between the University of New Brunswick and the Senator Muriel McQueen Ferguson Foundation to pursue that goal. Naturally these original New Brunswick proponents strongly aspire to being included under the federal government program.

Would the parliamentary secretary please tell us what is the present status of the selection process for these research centres on family violence? Does the New Brunswick application remain under serious consideration?

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased the hon. member reminded us that proposals were put out for national research centres on violence against women and the problems of children.

Yes, the New Brunswick proposal was received. It has undergone intensive review both by the Department of National Health and Welfare and SSIRC, the Social Science Immunities Research Council.

I would also like to assure him that the New Brunswick proposal has been short-listed and will undergo another review. I would hope that within the next three or four months a decision will be made.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Ken Monteith (Elgin—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Unemployment in Elgin—Norfolk is higher than the national average. As such, constituents in my riding welcomed the news that additional federal funding would be directed toward retraining programs.

Can the Minister of Employment and Immigration tell the House when local Canada Employment Centres will know their share of this funding so plans can be made to retrain workers?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member noted that indeed $150 million more will be spent to train Canadians.

• (1450)

Mr. Valcourt: It is a pertinent question because even in the other party's caucus members have asked questions about these moneys. These moneys have to be divided into some 525 Canada Employment Centres throughout the country.

It will be done according to needs as expressed by the local work force. These decisions are being made today and tomorrow so that next week the money should be in the regions to help with training those unemployed Canadians.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The minister is aware that in Westmorland, workers must work 17 weeks to qualify for employment insurance, while in Kent they only have to work 10 weeks, although they all work in the same plants.

Does the minister intend to take steps to deal with this unfair situation since he only has to take his pencil and say that both Westmorland and Kent are rural ridings and that the people of Westmorland are not part of the city of Moncton?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I can inform the Leader of the Liberal Party that I spent a lot of time working on this issue with his predecessor, the former member for Beauséjour, Mr. Fernand Robichaud, and because of the symmetry required with respect to the statistics we get from Statistics Canada to establish unemployment insurance areas, we have already changed the entire map. I know this creates a problem for the people in the riding of Westmorland, but the hon. member will admit, knowing his riding as well as I know he does, that these people are very close to Moncton's urban area and that their circumstances are entirely different from those of the people in Kent.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is very evident the minister has not been there. Some people in Kent are closer to Moncton than some people in Cape Tormentine and places like that which are at least 45 miles away from Moncton.

If the minister knew how to do his job and accept his responsibilities, he would make sure that fishermen qualified as fishermen and the people who live in cities qualified as people of the city. He should do that now that he knows the problem. If he does not correct it, it is because he does not want to correct it. We will fix that problem after the next election.

An hon. member: There will not be any more elections.

[Translation]

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): I am surprised, Mr. Speaker. When we were in Beauséjour not long ago to announce several million dollars in funding people thought I was doing an excellent job. It is too bad the hon. member does not share that view. But in any case—

Ms. Copps: Call an election and you'll see.

Mr. Valcourt: Be patient, Sheila. I will take the representation made by the Leader of the Liberal Party under advisement just the same. It is an important question, and as they say, nothing is graven in stone, and I am prepared to look at the situation to see how we can help everyone in Beauséjour.

VISIBLE MINORITIES

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship.

In the aftermath of the serious racial protests which occurred in Toronto over a month ago, the federal minister announced on May 7 in Toronto that the federal government would bring forward "an integrated plan of action to address the urgent concerns of the black community in metro Toronto in four weeks' time".

Could the minister share with this House and Canadians that federal integrated plan of action?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, the four levels of government committee has already started work with members of the black community. As we are speaking today meetings are continuing. We expect that by the end of the month we will have a report from that committee.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

While Stephen Lewis has reported to the Ontario government and while municipal levels of government, both metro and the city of Toronto, have programs for employment for visible minorities this summer, this federal government lags behind with empty words which has little comfort for anyone. There is no action plan and there is none in the conceivable future from the mayor's office this morning.

Given that the minister stated this problem was an urgent one and given that he stated and committed that there would be a federal response by way of a solution within four weeks, when can the Toronto community expect real and meaningful action from this government, not words, not more meetings and not more press releases?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): We have been carefully bringing forward this program, Mr. Speaker, for the last four years beginning in the spring of 1988. We made fighting racism and racial discrimination and programs of immigration and quality a high priority of this new department in particular.

We very quickly initiated this particular committee. It is being chaired by my special assistant, Mr. John Dennison, along with staff and officials of all levels of government.

They are working very well with members of the black community at the moment. I have every inspiration that they will bring forward suggestions for a very immediate kind of solution within our own program area and for some longer range ideas over the next six months of what we can do together.

PORT OF QUEBEC

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board in that capacity and that of the political minister for Quebec City.

As the minister knows, the port of Quebec, with the permission of Treasury Board, has leased a parcel of land on the Quebec waterfront for $28,000 a year so that a private company can build an IMAX theatre. The minister also knows that this theatre will destroy the view of the old city, which is Canada's only world heritage site, and that it is opposed by nearly 60 community groups.

My question is simple: Will the minister act and have this lease revoked?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform the member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan that this project has still not been processed because its promoters have not indicated that they want to proceed in the immediate future.

Before the approval was given, the projet went through the necessary EARP process, consultation with the municipal and provincial authorities, and everybody was in agreement that it should be processed.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that work has come to a standstill at the site, but the reality is that the people of the port of Quebec do not want a theatre such as IMAX blocking the view of the cruise shipping industry, of the marina, and destroying the raison d'être of the old port.

Will either the Minister of Transport or the President of the Treasury Board immediately act to take the federal government's responsibility seriously and cancel the lease so that the land can be turned back to a viewable point and access to the river and the port?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think the member will acknowledge that we live in a democratic country where everybody has a chance to say their words.

This project has gone through consultation by Quebec City. It was approved by all the authorities. The fact that there are some people against it is recognized, but in a democracy it is the majority that rules.

AIRCRAFT

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport.

Canada has led the way on the development of regulations which have now had an influence around the world regarding ultra light advanced aircraft.

Is Canada now ready to do the same thing for our recreational category of aircraft which could mean thousands of jobs and thousands of opportunities for Canadian investments?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am pleased to inform the member that this is a problem we have been looking into very seriously over the past few weeks.

We are making progress and hope to be able to give a valuable answer to the member and to the industry in general over the next few months.

PRINTING INDUSTRY

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism recently unveiled the new logo for the Canadian Printing Industry Association, he was justifiably proud that this initiative was strong support for the government's own buy Canadian program.

In light of the numerous difficulties that this government's economic policies have caused to our printers, will the minister reaffirm today his commitment to do everything possible to support this printed in Canada program?

• (1500)

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted that my hon. friend has raised this question about the printing industry. It is a very important part of the manufacturing sector of Canada. That is why the Minister of Finance in his last budget increased the capital cost allowance which is of great value to this industry.

He also lowered the tax on manufacturing and processing from 23 per cent to 21 per cent.

It is an industry of small entrepreneurs and it is very important that we have kept in place the lowest rate of corporate tax on small businesses in the OECD. All of this is there to help this very important industry.

Anything else we can do through NEBS and NEXIS and export programs, we stand ready to help them out as well.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, this is a full colour, 92-page publication entitled The Official Travellers Guide to Canada, published in co-operation with and financed in part by Tourism Canada.

This was the minister who unveiled the printing industry logo. On page 3 of this publication beneath a smiling picture of the minister—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows that there is a rule here about using props. I am sure the hon. member could put the question without waving the magazine around.

Mr. Peterson: On page 3 underneath a picture of the smiling minister are the words "Printed in the U.S.A."

Some hon. members: Shame.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, if this government will not honour its own buy Canadian program, who will?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is holding up a copy of an American publication for American markets.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

POINTS OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, during Question Period I might have inadvertently misled the Minister of Justice in the House. I spoke about a gun-free Canada. I meant to say a gun-safe Canada.

I did not want the minister to think that we were not supporting strong but effective gun control and of course we are aware that we have guns in Canada. I wanted to make the point that I was talking about gun smuggling not dealing with the existing regime in Canada.

PUBLISHING INDUSTRY

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, I think it is important that the House not be misled. This publication is distributed in Canada and elsewhere. If the government of Saskatchewan publishes a book for distribution in the United States but has it printed in—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I think that is a continuation of an earlier debate.

OFFICIAL REPORT

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a correction to Hansard. I think through some inadvertence Hansard misprinted a word on June 9, 1992, page 11659. It used the word "will" when it should have used the word "was".

If you check on June 8, you would see that the tabling was done the day before and not to be done in future.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, today being Thursday, I would like to ask the government House leader if he can tell us what the House business will be for tomorrow, Monday, Tuesday and the remainder of next week.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, we hope to complete this afternoon Bill C-41, energy efficiency, at third reading; Bill C-71, the Criminal Records Act, at third reading; and Bill C-7, status of the artist act, report stage and third reading. If there is time available before the normal hour of adjournment, Bill C-58, oil and gas production, at report stage and third reading.

There is general agreement that in view of the progress, and so on, we would strive to get out at the normal hour of adjournment.

On Friday, June 12, the government will call Bill C–55, Public Service Pensions Act, for debate at report stage.

On Monday the order of business will be Bill C–82, the National Housing Act, on which I understand there is general agreement and we could complete that at all stages; Bill C–49, the sexual assault act, for debate at report stage and hopefully third reading. If not completed Thursday, June 11, we will proceed then with Bill C–58, the oil and gas production act, as well as Bill C–51 and Bill C–52 which are the Northwest Territories Waters Act and Yukon Waters Act, respectively, and Bill C–79 the divorce act, for debate at second reading.

I would like to formally designate Tuesday, June 16 as the last allotted day.

In terms of the rest of that week, and indeed up till June 23, we will carry on the usual discussions among House leaders to see if we can schedule the business in a way that is to our mutual satisfaction.

ENERGY EFFICIENCY ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Epp that Bill C–41, an act respecting the energy efficiency of energy–using products and the use of alternative energy sources, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, just very briefly I want to note that first of all we were pleased at the changes made in committee study of the bill, especially the inclusion of door and window systems in the bill's scope.

We believe there is much that is yet to be done. We believe that the bill can still be made significantly better and we are looking forward to what we hope will be amendments to what will now become the act, to be introduced by the government even before the next election.

However, having said that, we note that this is a good albeit small, step forward in the fight for energy efficiency and conservation in Canada. On that basis I am pleased to say that the New Democratic Party caucus will support the bill at third reading.

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to participate in this debate this afternoon on behalf of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources on the third reading of Bill C–41, the energy efficiency act.

It is of great interest to watch and see how Bill C–41 moved through the legislative process in this House. You may recall that at second reading the minister suggested that Bill C–41 was a good example of the kind of legislation that could be improved at the legislative committee stage. I am happy to say that he was right. The legislative committee on Bill C–41 has proposed amendments to this bill that will enhance the effectiveness of the legislation.

Several proposed amendments were technical in nature, related to the compliance provisions. However, most of the significant amendments approved by the committee expanded the scope of the legislation to include doors and windows.

The committee members agreed that the scope of the bill should include doors and windows because of their significant role in achieving greater energy efficiency in buildings and their amenability to the regulatory scheme contemplated by the legislation. I am pleased to note that the legislative committee took great care in developing the appropriate wording for this amendment.

The legislative committee also agreed on proposing amendments which would strengthen the compliance system, primarily by allowing inspectors to direct an importer of a non–compliant product to remove it from Canada, and explicitly providing for court orders as alternatives, or in addition to fines as punishment where a person is convicted of an offence under the act.

Bill C–41 has been improved as a result of the legislative committee deliberations and decisions. Useful insights were offered concerning the operation of regulatory programs under authority of this legislation. The committee's hearings confirmed the value and importance of proceeding expeditiously with this legislation. The legislative committee is also to be commended for its pragmatic review of Bill C–41 and for the useful amendments it has brought back to this House. I would like to take this opportunity to thank members of the legislative committee on Bill C–41 for a job well done.

I would like to turn my attention for a few moments to the specifics of Bill C–41, the energy efficiency act, which provides statutory authority for initiatives related to energy labelling, minimum energy efficiency standards and the collection of statistics and information.

With regard to labelling, the bill will facilitate enhancement and expansion of the existing Energuide labelling program which currently applies to refrigerators, ranges, ovens, freezers, dishwashers, clothes washers and dryers. Energuide regulations require that new appliances bear a specified label providing information on a product's use of energy. This is to encourage and assist more energy–efficient purchasing decisions.

Bill C–41 will provide EMR with statutory authority and Energuide regulations which have been the responsibility of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. EMR is redesigning the label to make it easier to read and comprehend. The department is analysing how the program could best be expanded to cover other products.

The bill will permit the government to make regulations requiring that specific products provide at least a minimum level of energy efficiency before they can be marketed in Canada. This meets requests from the provinces, territories and industry that the federal government help establish a consistent national energy efficiency regulatory regime.

I would like to stress that the regulatory actions will only be taken following consultations with affected parties. Regulations will be developed so as to avoid unnecessary costs to manufacturers and to facilitate co–ordination with provincial authorities. They will be developed with due regard for Canada's international trade obligations and the nation's ability to compete.

I feel that it is worth while to note that EMR will seek to ensure that new energy efficiency standards will be consistent with those in force in provincial and American jurisdictions.

Part II of the bill concerns the collection and use of statistics pertaining to efficiency of energy use and the adoption of alternative energy sources.

It is hoped that most of the data and information required by EMR's new efficiency and alternative energy program can be obtained from existing data bases held by Statistics Canada and others, or from voluntary surveys, so that recourse to the energy efficiency act can be avoided.

I would like to stress to this House that this government will ensure that regulation will be used in moderation in co–operation with other authorities and in consultation with those who will be most affected.

This government is confident that the energy efficiency act, along with the efficiency and alternative energy program it supports, constitutes an important and responsible step for Canada to take toward the issue of global warming. The EAE program will have net environmental and economic benefits. The environmental benefits include improvement of air quality, preservation of water and land resources and reduced emissions of greenhouse gases.

Canadian consumers who consider energy efficiency carefully when making their purchasing decisions will be able to reduce their annual energy costs, thereby freeing up some of their income for other uses.

Through investments in energy efficiency and alternative energy sources, Canadian industry can lower its energy costs, raise productivity and improve the ability to compete internationally.

There is a growing international interest in competitive products, technologies and services offering energy efficiency or employing alternative energy sources. Thus, Canadian companies responding to increased domestic demand in these areas gain international opportunities to expand their markets.

In conclusion, I would like to say that Bill C–41, the energy efficiency act, is part of a broader program to help Canadians use energy more wisely.

This government believes that the improvement of energy efficiency is an essential component of any responsible response in the use of global warming.

However, governments alone cannot resolve the issue. Individuals and organizations need to re–examine how these energies are used. This government's new energy efficiency alternatives energy program emphasizes actions that are economic in their own right.

It also emphasizes co-operation since we can only hope to achieve our global warning objectives with the help of all Canadians.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, if I may, before beginning to talk on third reading of Bill C-41, I might bring to the attention of the House what happened at the energy committee this morning relating to the Westray Mine.

If my hon. friend disagrees, I hope that he will get up after and tell me if I have not given the facts to the House correctly. The hon. member of the New Democratic Party and I moved that the committee examine the federal role in what had gone on at the mine, not to look at issues of safety such as are going to be discussed by the Nova Scotia public inquiry.

Mr. MacDougall: Madam Speaker, on a point of order. I believe that we are debating Bill C-41 in the House and the relevance of that bill. What happened in the committee earlier today really should not be discussed here in the House. We are dealing with Bill C-41.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Chair was listening very carefully to the remarks made by the hon. member for Edmonton Southeast. The Chair was hoping that he would very shortly come around to the bill and not bring back to the House events that took place in a committee.

Mr. Kilgour: Madam Speaker, I had one more sentence because I think it is important. The parliamentary secretary was there and voted against the motion. I believe in a stronger Parliament and a stronger role for MPs in parliamentary committees. We should have been entitled to look at the federal aspects of that catastrophe and I regret profoundly that the government members voted unanimously to stop the energy committee from looking at that tragedy.

On this bill, energy efficiency and conservation now occupy a central role in the energy policy of all industrialized economies. Their importance as tools for balancing energy supply and demand has risen with each new supply, disruption or price rise.

I understand that my colleague from Cape Breton was at the hearing on behalf of our party. Most of the witnesses wanted the matters of this bill to be extended to things like windows, Canada 2000 for building homes. The government members again in committee resisted opening up the bill. Most of us on this side feel that the bill does not go nearly far enough in terms of energy conservation, particularly at a time when the conference in Rio is discussing the state of the world environment.

All industrial nations have curbed their use of energy after the 1973 oil crisis and even more after the 1979 one. During that time, Canadians "found" twice as much energy through conservation as was added in new oil, gas and electricity supplies. Experts are of the opinion that the potential for further energy efficiency is believed to remain very large. In the mid-1980s, the International Energy Agency estimated conservatively that further efficiency gains of 30 per cent are feasible among its member states.

For Canada specifically, Dr. John Robinson of the University of Waterloo, not far from the member's riding, has calculated an untapped, cost-effective energy conservation potential of up to 43 per cent. A 1988 update of the soft energy path analysis first carried out in 1983 by Friends of the Earth argues that Canada might achieve a 50 per cent reduction in primary energy intensity between now and 2025.

The comparison of costs of confirming electricity with those of generating it, in other words, saving a dollar by not developing a new mega project, is better than investing taxpayers money, in many cases, in new energy mega projects with all of their environmental costs.

It clearly indicates that improving electricity efficiency is more economic and reduces the demand for fossil fuels. Even if energy saving technology is available now, how do we get people to buy it? The public, our fellow citizens, must make a conscious decision to reduce the demand for fossil fuels, realizing that improved efficiency will not necessarily lead to a decline in living standards or the work environment.

The member who just came in is laughing. I assume that is because he used to be in the oil business at the pump level.

The buyer's financial criteria typically emphasize short-term benefits but more efficient end-use devices generally have a higher cost than the inefficient ones. Besides, it is common knowledge that the purchasers of residential appliances tend to place a higher priority on product characteristics such as colour and brand identification than energy efficiency. Consumer reluctance for energy instruments could be overcome through aggressive marketing of high-efficiency models of appliances. New standards alone are not enough, I would submit.

Insufficient information is a powerful barrier preventing efficiency from being improved. The introduction of energy-efficient housing technologies is slower than it could be because many builders and architects are still, unfortunately, unfamiliar with energy-saving technologies. For example, "Energuide" labels which show the annual energy consumption of appliances do not translate these figures into annual operating costs. Why? Why would it not make sense to do so?

Probably few consumers are able to make this calculation and therefore the program may not lead to more rational decision making by consumers. I would sincerely hope the government is prepared to deal with the issue of promoting customer acceptance of new energy-efficient technologies.

Perhaps I can say that I very much believe that our party, when elected, will give attention to those matters. Forgive me for pointing out today that 44 per cent of Canadians indicate they are going to vote for this party to form a new government. When we are elected, if the Canadian people so will it, I believe that will be the case. I hope we will then put genuine, sincere stress on conservation and energy-efficient appliances and so on.

Have our energy planners considered, for example, the introduction of information, demonstration programs on energy efficient targets for industry in an attempt to shift market demand in favour of more energy-efficient items?

The bill is a step, a very small step, in the right direction but its scope should have been broadened in order to leave the door open for examining energy-efficient trends and other sectors, like commercial and residential lighting, improved voltage regulations, transportation mode shifts, use of waste heat to generate electricity and fuel-switching options. We should take advantage of all feasible options and there are many options available around the world. Many of them were developed in Canada and, if I may say, were cruelly defused by the budget policies of this government since 1984. I am thinking of wind energy, solar energy, alternative energy, photovoltaics and many, many others.

If we had taken advantage of all the feasible options for saving energy more cheaply than producing it, our need for new production facilities would be reduced.

If a consumer replaces a single 75-watt bulb with an 18 watt compact fluorescent lamp that lasts 10,000 hours, the consumer can save the electricity that a typical Canadian power plant would make from 770 pounds of coal. As a result, about 1,600 pounds of C02 and 18 pounds of sulphur dioxide would not be released into the atmosphere. What is Rio about if not things like that?

In 1990 Ontario Hydro estimated reducing demand in houses heated by electricity could save 1,350 megawatts. Even half of what was saved would defer and perhaps eliminate the need for a large nuclear reactor with all of its risks and hazards in the view of many people living outside of Algoma.

Increasing energy efficiency should become a priority with this government. As I said before, I believe this will be a priority with the Chrétien government to be elected as soon as Canadians have a chance to get to the voting booths.

When the U.S. introduced conservation laws which years ago prompted the manufacturing of energy-efficient appliances, our regulatory authorities in Canada did nothing. Now, instead of the threat of confiscation and destruction of private property, the government might better set an example by emphasizing energy efficiency and conservation in its overall operations, particularly in government-funded facilities.

Energy-efficient operations and cost-effective energy retrofits should be increased to demonstrate to our fellow citizens everywhere the many opportunities for improvements. After all, if the government approves of wasting energy, it should not be surprised if other people, citizens, react accordingly.

Energy efficiency could be given increased priority when purchasing new government vehicles and equipment. Madam Speaker, you deserve enormous credit for what the House of Commons is doing to try to promote energy efficiency, a green House of Commons. Perhaps the rug colour here was an early prediction of what you would be doing now in terms of the environment around this building. Could you please talk to the people in the Senate and see what they are doing? They should be green as well.

More than 3 million personal computers are in use in our offices and the number is increasing. According to Ontario Hydro as much as 90 per cent of the energy consumed by computers can be saved by introducing more laptop models, inkjet printers, new PowerKey technology, which allows users to control computer times, peripherals, et cetera.

Industries such as appliance manufacturing are global in scope. Products are designed and manufactured to meet the needs of a market which is much broader than our Canadian market. In 1987 the U.S. national appliance energy conservation act established standards for minimum energy efficiency in 13 classes of major household appliances.

I could not agree more and most members on this side would agree as well with the view of the Canadian Manufacturers Association that the standards used in the United States should provide a benchmark so that Canadian companies are not put to a competitive disadvantage by more stringent requirements in the United States than in Canada.

A thorough regulatory analysis of the U.S. standards and provincial standards, both those currently in place and planned in the future, is needed if the bill before us now is to benefit Canadians and our economy significantly.

This issue becomes of utmost importance especially in view of the fact that our industrial infrastructure might not be able to cope with new regulatory initiatives that are too intrusive and out of step with current economic realities.

In its submission to the energy, mines and resources committee, the National Energy Conservation Association stated that:

> The industry infrastructure as it now exists in Canada falls significantly short in its ability to deliver the conservation products and services demanded by tomorrow's market.

There is unfortunately a lack of skilled trades to implement energy efficiency measures, a lack of access to capital financing for energy efficiency improvements, a lack of provincial incentives for investment in energy efficiency.

There should be some vehicles designed which would assist manufacturers, especially small and medium-sized ones, to change over to the state of the art technologies. Small Canadian producers are particularly vulnerable, as they would have to gear up their operations to deal with new regulatory standards and at the same time with a larger marketplace and stronger competition.

The concerns of manufacturers have also been the level of stringency with respect to proposed standards, deadlines they would have to meet, additional costs and so on. Consideration should be given to offering tax credits to manufacturers that exceed existing standards.

In fairness to the bill, regulations would phase out some inefficient equipment from the Canadian market and impose restrictions on imports of electricity guzzling appliances to Canada.

The bill will not prevent our manufacturers, as I understand it, from clearing their inventories by exporting substandard appliances to countries where government efficiency standards are non-existent or less than our own.

The widespread public concern about our natural environment which is at the heart of the debate on energy efficiency and conservation is of global proportions. Exporting inefficient equipment for instance to developing nations would only undermine efforts undertaken by Canadian consumers and manufacturers.

As the Friends of the Earth put it: "We do not want to see a repeat of the tetraethyl lead issue where lead was banned for use in gasoline here but the manufacturer is still allowed to export to developing countries". Is that not exactly the kind of thing that the developing world is objecting to both at Rio and in many other fora?

As reported in the Scientific American, economic projections show that if nothing is done to hasten energy technology development and to introduce existing efficiency technology in developing countries, global climate change and other major environmental problems will escalate beyond unacceptable levels.

Even if our so-called developed countries manage to reduce our LCO_2 emissions by 50 per cent, population growth and economic development in the so-called developing countries would most likely increase their CO_2 emissions from 450 to about 900 kilograms per person annually by the year 2030.

World-wide emissions of CO_2 will then be two and a half times what they are per year now. In addition, Canada does not have specific policy objectives in its foreign aid and trade policies and programs that encourage and enhance the transfer of environmental technologies, including energy efficiency technologies to developing nations.

This legislation is a small mini-step in a better direction. If properly implemented, it could assist Canada not only in supplying other countries with such technologies but could also provide Canadians with competitive trade opportunities.

In closing—my colleague from Prince Edward Island will be speaking momentarily I believe—we will be supporting this bill but are profoundly regretful that the government did not take a large step in the right direction, rather than what I think can fairly be called a milli-step—"milli" as in millimetre—in the right direction.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, I am pleased today to rise and speak in favour of this legislation, Bill C-41, which is the government's long overdue energy efficiency legislation.

This bill, among other things, will allow the government to establish minimum energy efficiency standards for energy-using products like stoves, fridges and dishwashers. It also will allow the government to require labelling of energy-using products to say how much energy they use. It will compile statistics and other information on energy use and alternative energy, and promote energy efficiency and alternative energy like solar power, for example.

I want to congratulate my colleague from Edmonton Southeast, who has just spoken, on his very excellent speech on Bill C-41. I also want to applaud his efforts at prodding the government to promote energy efficiency in this country.

As a former opposition energy critic, I can appreciate the difficulty he had in trying to persuade the government to increase its effort in the energy efficiency area. I tried repeatedly do this when I was the critic, but the government did not seem to get the message that energy efficiency not only helps Canada's environment but it helps the Canadian economy as well.

By using less energy, Canadian industries make their product more cheaply and that makes them more competitive internationally.

It is no wonder that the government did not get the message when you look at the record of what has happened since this government was elected. In 1990, this government allowed Canada to become the first in energy use per capita among industrialized countries. It also allowed this country to become the second in per capita energy carbon dioxide emissions.

We all know that carbon dioxide is the gas that is released when fuels are burned and which is believed to cause global warming.

This is the same government that cut the energy conservation and renewable energy funding from about $500 million in 1984 to roughly $30 million in 1990-91. It cut the funding for research on solar, wind and hydrogen energy to name a few.

This government also closed down energy department offices across this country, offices which provided information and grants for energy conservation and renewable energy projects. I know in my own province of Prince Edward Island we had an office that provided very valuable information to people living not only in my riding but in all of Prince Edward. It provided information on how we could save on energy and it also provided grants.

This government closed those offices and therefore took away the outlet that provided this very valuable information as well as the grants for conservation and renewable energy projects.

The programs to financially help people insulate their homes, to inform people about energy efficiency of home appliances and so on and to advise industry on how to reduce energy consumption were all discarded by this government.

Largely because of this government's abandoning the energy efficiency programs established by the previous Liberal government, we in Canada, as a result, have a more polluted environment and a less competitive economy.

The statistics that I mentioned earlier prove this fact, but I want to mention a few other statistics. In the early 1980s there was a 10 per cent reduction in per capita carbon dioxide emissions in this country. We also know that less carbon dioxide emissions means cleaner air. Yet over the last five years there has not been any reduction in carbon dioxide emissions by the energy industry. In fact there have been increases. Carbon dioxide emissions have been allowed to increase by 8 per cent in the last five years.

Clearly this government has a long way to go to match the record of the previous government on carbon dioxide emissions.

I am pleased that the legislation we have before us today shows that the government has finally answered calls from environmental groups and from this side of the House. Certainly the passage of this energy efficiency legislation is necessary if the government is going to come even close to meeting the target of stabilizing the CO2 emissions at the 1990 level. We on this side of the House have been saying this all along. It is what environmental groups have been saying as well. Reducing energy demand is one of the best ways to reduce pollution.

• (1540)

In commenting on the current environmental summit in Rio, one expert said recently: "The ultimate environmental issue is how we use energy, the technology of energy for fueling our cars, heating our homes, producing goods and services".

I am very pleased today to see that the government has finally started to get this message. It has proceeded with Bill C–41, legislation which I said earlier is long overdue.

I want to turn for a moment to my home province of Prince Edward Island and to the progress that has been made there on alternate energy work.

A waste plant at Charlottetown burns the local garbage to provide heat for several nearby buildings including a hospital, a high school, two shopping malls and two colleges. The garbage that would otherwise get landfilled is turned into steam for local use. This plant was given a beautification award not very long ago by the local community. My province is extremely dependent on imported oil for its fuel needs, yet the energy from this waste plant has reduced the amount of oil needed to be imported. At the same time, it has helped to clean up the environment.

I will conclude my remarks by saying I am pleased that this government has finally moved in this direction and has brought in legislation for energy efficiency and diversity in energy. Certainly, it is legislation that is long overdue.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, I rise to speak on Bill C–41. This bill is certainly a very minor step by the government with regard to energy efficiency and energy efficiency for Canadian industry.

I doubt this bill will actually take us to the situation we were at in 1983 or 1984. The former Liberal government had a very aggressive program for energy conservation and alternate energy use. It was a massive national program to try to take us off oil and fossil fuels.

This legislation sets some standards. It makes provisions for efficiency in appliances and prohibits the use of appliances which are traded or moved across provincial or international borders. It regulates the sale of such equipment which is transported interprovincially. It establishes minimum levels of energy efficiency for household refrigerators, freezers, ranges, ovens, dishwashers, clothes washers and dryers. It tries to do it in parallel with the United States so that whatever is produced in either country would be compatible for trade and useful in that regard.

But if we look back to where we were in 1984 before this government came to power, the Main Estimates will show that with conservation and renewable energy the Government of Canada was spending $575 million then. By 1988–89 the actual expenditures had been reduced to almost nothing. In 1989–90 it was something like $44 million. Since then there has been no commitment for energy conservation and renewable energy.

That is a tragedy. During all those years that the Government of Canada was putting energy conservation and renewable energy mechanisms in place the carbon dioxide level was falling down. Since that time, the carbon dioxide levels in the atmosphere have been going up.

This is really one small step back to the future, back to the past. I hope that the government, having made this one small step, will move on to making more steps with regard to energy conservation. That surely is the future.

In my constituency in the last couple of years Ontario Hydro has put in place a massive program to reduce energy use in the town of Espanola which has a population of about 6,000.

Ontario Hydro operates on the basis that if one kilowatt of demand can be saved, it is willing to spend up to $3,000 because to provide that in new generating capacity the cost would be even greater. What it has done in the community of Espanola is to provide some $9 million to go through every home that is heated by electricity. A composite program is put in place in which Ontario Hydro pays up to 80 per cent of the cost of reducing the demand. It will spend up to $3,000 to reduce the demand by one kilowatt per year.

That is an excellent thought. I have heard it said that whatever the cost of the Great Whale project is in northern Quebec, if we spent an equivalent amount of money on the island of Montreal we could save the amount of power that is going to be generated by the Great Whale project.

The genius of conservation and saving energy is it is not saved once, it is saved every year. For example, one of the programs the Liberal government had back in the early 1980s provided, I think, $800 to replace an oil-fired furnace with a gas-fired furnace. I took advantage of that, along with everyone else on my street. I spent something like $800, the government provided $800 and I had a new gas furnace in my home. It was a big advantage because the oil-fired furnace was 20 years old and getting worn out in any event.

Now a typical home on that street is heated for about $450 to $500 whereas with oil it was costing at least $1,000 or $1,200 a year. With electricity it was even more.

It is not the initial cost, although that is a stumbling block. But even with the program the former Liberal government had, that cost was reduced. So in that example, at least $500 to $700 is saved each and every year. At the same time, the fuel being used does not contribute nearly as much carbon dioxide to the atmosphere.

I am touching on the program in Espanola because, as far as I know, it is the first community in Canada and perhaps in the world where audits have been conducted in every electrically heated house to determine the heating and lighting costs.

Replacing light bulbs reduced the demand for electricity by some 70 per cent. Homes were completely reinsulated. Heating costs for hot water were cut by installing new shower heads. Windows and doors were replaced.

In this program being carried out over these past two years by Ontario Hydro the energy demand has been reduced significantly. There is a weakness in the program in that it should have been used for all homes in the community including those not heated by electricity. However, the idea of spending money on energy conservation really is a good one.

Bill C-41 of course does not do anything like that. It simply establishes standards for appliances, equipment and those kinds of things. We are running out of oil in the western sedimentary basin. As a northern nation we should be looking at ways of converting to natural gas and ways of reducing demand for electricity through conservation. To that extent, I support the bill.

In the community of Elliot Lake there are a great many homes which were originally sponsored by Ontario Hydro. Unfortunately, they were built in the early 1980s and were not particularly energy efficient.

One of the diversification projects we have planned for that community is one in co-operation with Ontario Hydro to make it a very energy efficient community. A proposal was presented to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources just this week where we would like to see the federal government establish standards for retrofitting existing homes.

The R-2000 program has been going for many years for new homes and has been very successful. I believe it is being used now in Japan.

The federal government has a responsibility and we are proposing to the minister that we should be developing those standards in Elliot Lake in co-operation with what Ontario Hydro is doing in retrofitting that community. I certainly hope that the government will look at that as an important energy conservation and an alternative energy mechanism for that community.

If Ontario Hydro carries through with what it was talking about which was in terms of $2 billion and $4 billion of energy conservation and retrofitting of homes throughout the province, it seems to me that that would be a major industry. Just as building the Great Whale power project or building new dams, there is no question that in many circumstances we can reduce the demand and provide a lot of employment for people.

There comes a point in a free and democratic society where standards cannot be imposed below a certain level, but clearly with incentives we can reduce the demand for electricity, for our fossil fuels and at the same time help the environment.

This bill is one small step. If the government would maintain the support that was there in the early 1980s, we not only would have much lower levels of carbon dioxide in our atmosphere today, but we would also be a much more efficient energy user. We have one of the highest uses of energy in the world and that certainly is nothing we want to brag about.

What we were able to achieve in the early 1980s shows that if the government has the will and determination to move in that direction we can become a very efficient country. It must be a co-operative operation because it involves the general masses, giant provincial utilities like Ontario Hydro, the entire energy industry, and natural gas pipelines and so on.

I am told that the building of the natural gas pipeline to New York had a powerful impact on the State of New York and New York City deciding to cancel their contract with the Great Whale Project. It meant they had relatively cheap natural gas for energy conversion to electricity and for energy heating purposes in that state and city.

Last year we had an important seminar on the greenhouse effect and the impact of carbon dioxide. It was chaired by the hon. member for Perth—Wellington—Waterloo, who is the chairman of the agriculture committee. Many members of our committee on agriculture took part along with those in transport, environment, and energy.

No one could sit through that seminar and participate in it without believing that the world faces a quantum change in the environment because of the use of fossil fuels. We must use every mechanism whether it is converting to natural gas, which is still a fossil fuel but produces less carbon dioxide, or moving in other directions.

There is a private members' motion next week from the member for Lambton—Middlesex about the use of ethanol. Clearly that will have a powerful impact if we in this country are able to switch to the use of ethanol in our automotive fuels. We will see a dramatic reduction in the amount of carbon dioxide and carbon monoxide produced by the use of ethanol as a blended fuel with gasoline.

There are many things we can do in this country. We simply must put in place the standards, incentives, and the directions we want to go if we want to reach our objective of keeping carbon dioxide levels in the year 2000 at the level they were in 1990.

I am sorry we did not maintain the momentum we had in the early 1980s to switch away from fossil fuels, but that was a decision made by the government of the day in 1984. It is regrettable but at least the introduction of this bill shows that it realized the errors it made. We hope we can get back on track and move toward a society that is less wasteful of our natural resources and more concerned about our environment.

This bill is one small step in that direction and that is why we will be supporting Bill C-41.

CRIMINAL RECORDS ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-71, an Act to amend the Criminal Records Act and other Acts in consequence thereof, as reported (with an amendment) by the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (for the Solicitor General of Canada), moved that the bill, as amended, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Madam Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time? With the unanimous consent of the House, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

• (1600)

Mr. Corbeil (for the Solicitor General of Canada) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mrs. Monique Tardif (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to begin third reading debate of Bill C–71, an Act to amend the Criminal Records Act.

I would like to begin my remarks by stating that I am extremely appreciative of the spirit of co–operation that has brought us to third reading in what may be a record time for legislation of such importance.

[English]

These changes directly respond to serious concerns about the pardon granting process that have been raised by members of this House on behalf of constituents and by representatives of the wider criminal justice system.

I believe that the broad support of my colleagues reflects the pressing need for this legislation. Our goal was to find a way to reform the system without disrupting its basic objectives. These include providing fair and timely service to eligible ex–offenders, creating a more efficient records system, and, most important, ensuring public safety.

The government has reviewed various options for reform. We were assisted in our review by some very useful consultations with affected constituencies. These included the police, victims groups, offender–assisting agencies and provincial government representatives. They all provided excellent advice and suggestions which helped us develop our final proposals.

I would like to thank officials of the Ministry of the Solicitor General for undertaking the very important task of canvassing constituencies with a stake in this legislation. The Department of Justice also deserves a vote of thanks for its assistance and careful drafting of a bill that reflects such a broad range of interests.

I would also like to thank the members and chairman of the Justice and Solicitor General Standing Committee for their timely review and support of this bill. The government was pleased to accept an amendment proposed by the opposition during clause–by–clause review of the bill. The fact that this amendment passed with the unanimous consent of all members of the committee demonstrates once again the positive and co–operative spirit in which this committee works.

This being the government's final opportunity to address the House on this matter, I would like to again praise the work done by the member for Mississauga South who proposed a Private Member's bill which identified and sought to remedy an anomaly in the Criminal Records Act. I commend my hon. friend for the time and effort he put into preparing his Private Member's bill C–238, for our consideration, and for his ongoing interest in this government initiative.

You are already aware of the proposed changes and I do not intend to spend too much time today going over ground we are all familiar with. However, I would like to address some important points.

As parliamentarians, we have all responded to requests from Canadians to help expedite the granting of a pardon.

It is usually for someone who has been living in the community without criminal activity for many years and who needs a pardon for work or for another personal reason.

We have all been frustrated that it can take up to a year and a half for the pardon to be granted, even in the most straighforward and deserving of cases.

Why, we ask, does it take as long to investigate and decide on a pardon for a law-abiding citizen with an old record for a minor offence, as it does to investigate and determine if a pardon should be given to a person with a record for serious crimes of violence. This does not make any sense.

We have also been frustrated to learn that a person who has been granted a discharge in court and thereby has not been convicted of an offence must apply for a pardon to have the fact of the discharge removed from his record at a later date.

Why should a person who has never been convicted of an offence be put to the trouble and expense of applying for a pardon if the courts have granted a discharge? This makes no sense, particularly since the pardon has invariably been granted.

I would now like to briefly address concerns about good conduct raised by the hon. member for Brant. The government has considered the cases of those convicted of summary or less serious offences. The current system requires a period of crime-free behaviour in the community before being eligible to apply for a pardon. As well, there is a provision for a community investigation of good conduct.

We have chosen to increase the waiting period to three years from two for summary convictions but to require only that the ex-offender be without conviction during this period to indicate a crime-free lifestyle. There will no longer be the requirement that a decision be based on a judgement of good conduct in addition to the criteria of a conviction-free waiting period.

It should be noted that fewer than 100 pardon applications per year are denied. Of those denied following an investigation of good conduct, most were for people with more serious records for indictable offences. It is these offences on which the government has chosen to concentrate its investigative and decision-making resources.

Madam Speaker, I do not want to take much more of your time. I would like to add that I think the changes which are before us clearly follow a middle ground between various proposals which have been previously discussed. I believe that the changes respond effectively to the various problems in the current system.

All members of Parliament will no doubt find that the proposed changes to the Criminal Records Act are intended to create a more effective pardon system, to improve service to increasing numbers of eligible ex-offenders, to achieve cost savings and reduce delays in the granting of pardons.

[English]

The amendments will assist the government to achieve these goals while protecting the integrity of the system and continuing to provide protection for the Canadian public from offenders who have chosen to continue their criminal lifestyle.

[Translation]

That was the goal which the government had in mind as it drafted these changes and I believe that is the goal that we will all achieve when these changes become law.

[English]

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise to debate Bill C-71, which deals with amendments to the Criminal Records Act.

I want to indicate at the outset that the Liberal caucus fully supports all of the amendments. It is not a begrudging "Yeah, we support it but it is sort of a weak bill". The Liberal caucus fully supports the amendments and they have been fully discussed in committee. They have been dealt with quite well by the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General.

I do want to put on the record a number of remarks to clarify some issues for the public, for my constituents and for the record because I believe that this matter will have to be addressed again in the future as the judicial system evolves.

Perhaps most members come into contact with what is known as the Criminal Records Act when constituents have difficulty accessing the pardon mechanism and encounter delays or other administrative obstructions. That is how most MPs come into contact with it, and I have noticed a bit of an increase in the number of complaints by constituents.

I suppose it does not speak so well of the past, in that people who have criminal records must come forward and acknowledge the fact that they have these records, but it does augur well for the future in that many more individuals are able to come forward and put an unfortunate part of their past behind them and approach the future fresh with a new start. That augurs well for the individual and for the community.

The changes that have been proposed and are in the process of being adopted here were all needed. There are five key areas of change. The first is a totally new process being adopted within the National Parole Board that will actually grant the pardon instrument.

Previously the pardon instrument was granted by a special committee of the cabinet. Given the great increase in applications over the last few years—this bill has been around since 1970—this has created a bottle-neck at the cabinet level because all the National Parole Board did was make recommendations for pardons.

You had the circumstance in which cabinet ministers were simply provided with lots of paper. They probably did not have a chance to look at it in too much detail and they probably accepted in most cases the recommendations of the National Parole Board. It created a bottle-neck. That meant that sometimes we were ending up with one and two-year delays and in some cases maybe longer in a decision on whether a pardon should be granted.

That bottle-neck now is removed because those who used to recommend the pardon are now going to be in a position to actually grant it. That is a good thing.

The second item is that the act provides for revocation of pardons where a subsequent offence is committed. This was not as clearly provided for in the existing act and most Canadians would find that very fair and most appropriate when a person is pardoned of an offence and subsequently reoffends. It would not be appropriate for that individual to say, "I have no criminal record because I was pardoned and you must deal with me as a first offender". The act speaks very clearly on that.

The third area is that the waiting period for the non-indictable, less serious offences that were dealt with summarily in the court system, is extended by one year, from two years to three years. That provides a better window for the administrators, the National Parole Board, to review the circumstances and perhaps to be more certain about the appropriateness of the pardon application.

In return for that, the process has been expedited, as we have already mentioned, so that it should not take two years to have the application dealt with.

The fourth item I have always regarded as the area that needed reform first. It was bizarre that this circumstance actually came into existence. In the Criminal Code there is a provision for granting to an offender a discharge for the offence, conditional or absolute.

The code states very clearly that when a discharge is granted, conditional or absolute, the offender is deemed not to have been convicted of the offence. That makes sense to me. In the process that developed into the Criminal Records Act that statute reversed the whole process and stated that even though you were deemed never to have been convicted of an offence, this act deemed you to have been convicted of the offence and so your criminal record was there.

That was bizarre. It meant that all of these people who had committed relatively minor offences, because the court does not give discharges for serious offences, for subsequent offenders and for multiple offenders, had this circumstance in which they were drawn back into the administration. They were brought back in to apply for pardons when the court and the judge had already made a decision that the person should not have a criminal record.

Foolishly in a bizarre twist, that was creating extra work for the National Parole Board and the special committee of cabinet. I do not know how the system evolved. I know that the Criminal Records Act was passed in 1970. At about the same time the provisions for conditional discharges and absolute discharges were passed and implemented. Somewhere in the system the right hand did not know what the left hand was doing. The government of the day let it evolve to the point at which now, some 20 years later, it is undoing that unfortunate administrative overlap.

That is a good thing. We have a conditional or an absolute discharge at the time of conviction within one or three years depending on whether it is an absolute or conditional discharge and automatically the criminal records are removed.

I guess I should not call it the criminal record. The act specifically refers to the record of the discharge being removed because, as I will point out later, there are still some problems in the field dealing with the definition of criminal record.

The fifth area is that the act envisages special guidelines now to assist the board and the public in developing criteria in relation to special kinds of offences when maybe we should be looking more closely at the process of pardons. Here we are talking about serious offences of violence and certain types of sexual offences.

It may well be that our society should be looking closely at the whole process by which we pardon individuals who may find themselves locked into patterns of conduct that are unsociable and it may be that we should look at that more closely.

The act envisages that and requires those criteria to be developed.

In the end after those five changes and some more minor changes we have a much more effective administration of the process of applications for pardons. That is better for individuals and for the community.

We also have a more expeditious disposition so that when an individual has reached the point in his or her life that time has passed, whether it be three years, five years, or whatever other period is appropriate, when they feel they are entitled to the "pardon", they can come forward and have it disposed of within a reasonable period of time so that they can get on with the rest of their lives.

If they need a pardon to apply for a job, a certain type of job, a career change, go to school, whatever entitlement or advancement they are looking for, hopefully they will see that the pardon can be there and they can move on and leave the past behind.

For the sake of the record, and not to detract from our indication of support for these amendments, I want to address some areas in the existing act that remain in my view unaddressed. In some way I want to be critical of those who drafted the law some 22 years ago because they made some errors which are visited upon this generation two generations later.

The act is called the Criminal Records Act. In point of fact, this act does not even deal with criminal records. It does not even try. It does not even use the concept of criminal records. It is an act about pardons. It is a statute that deals with pardons.

I should pause here to say that the act does not even define what a pardon is. That is a problem for the technocrats, the lawyers. I will leave that one.

I want to go back to this criminal record issue. Because the title contains the words criminal record, people tend to think in terms of criminal records, but the act does not try to deal with criminal records.

It does not even try to deal with the specific item called a record of conviction. That is the document that is created when an individual is convicted of an offence under the Criminal Code. That is called a record of conviction and it is a real piece of paper in a file and copies of it are forwarded to the appropriate filing locations in the country. Ultimately outside the original court files it ends up with the Canadian police information system, which we call CPIC.

It is regrettable that this act which tries to deal with this field of all of the records, the records of conviction, the records of the evidence, the letters going back and forth, the record of decisions by the prosecuting attorney, the submissions by the defence counsel, the records in the press—all of that—does not deal with it. It just leaves it sitting there and that is a bit of a problem which we will ultimately want to address.

Here are some of the reasons. The act does not deal with destruction of the criminal records. The act says you get a pardon. The layman out there and the MP right here do not really understand what that means because the act really is not clear. The act does not define pardon, but it tries to show the effect. It states what the effect of a pardon is without defining what the pardon is. One of those is that "in the case of any pardon the conviction in respect of which the pardon is granted or issued should no longer reflect adversely on the applicant's character". The verb here is should—should no longer reflect.

The individual who applies for a pardon really expects that the conviction will not or may not or cannot—not should not—affect adversely on the applicant's character.

That remains unaddressed by this. When the pardon is given you would expect something to happen to all of the records of conviction and criminal records but nothing happens. This bill does not try to do anything and the system does not either. All the records that were in the courthouse, all the records that were with the police, all the records that were in the media and all that were sent out remain exactly where they were. There is no destruction of any of the records. The record of conviction is still out there; it is still in the police files, still in the court files, and it is still with CPIC.

What happens is that the federal government requires that CPIC delete the record of conviction, delete the notation of the criminal conviction from the CPIC record. That is really all that happens. That only happens in this great Canadian computer data base. It does not happen in the province. The province does not change any of its records. Do not forget that the individual was convicted in a provincial court. The province and the court still have all the records and the police still have all their records; no changes in their computer system.

One of the other things that is still unaddressed is that when Canadian authorities convey the record of conviction or a notation of the conviction to American authorities—which they sometimes do to the border patrol, the U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service and the FBI—the policing authorities, border services and the customs services exchange this data on their memoranda of understanding which this government enters into. Those notations are given to our American friends and they give us theirs also. There is no mechanism to require the Americans to delete the notations from their records. This bill does not provide for it, there are no regulations to provide for it. That is unfortunate because most Canadians would think that when they get the pardon it is a clean slate. All they get is a deletion of a computer record on CPIC. All those other records I have just mentioned remain there, including the American records.

We are told that the Canadian authorities do not have the ability to force the Americans to delete the record. That is nonsense. We have memoranda of understanding and there is no reason why the memoranda of understanding cannot be amended to require all the parties to delete the records when the pardon is given under Canadian law.

I want to point out that this act does not affect any of the records of conviction in private hands such as insurance companies, bonding companies. All of that is still out there.

All of this is for another day when we can attempt here in Parliament, and hopefully we can do it as well as we have worked with and expedited this bill, to address in a more comprehensive fashion, with more definition and more certainty, all the areas of these criminal records.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, I too wish to enter the debate at third reading of Bill C–71, an act to amend the Criminal Records Act and other acts in consequence thereof. As the previous speaker mentioned in considerable detail the act in a way is a misnomer. I am not saying that it misleads but it really is a misnomer.

However, despite its shortcomings my party is pleased to support Bill C–71 because it makes an honest effort at updating an act that goes back to 1970 and at least brings it into the 1990s, perhaps not as a completely as we would have liked but it does improve the present situation with respect to that act.

The government has gone some way in improving the whole pardon system. I appreciate what it has done and I thank the government for that. However, we have some concerns with this bill. The first one is that nowhere in this bill is there a definition of criminal records. We have searched the revised Statutes of Canada and have been told that nowhere is there any definition of "criminal record". Therefore, we are really talking about something that we have not clearly defined and we are amending a process of something we have not defined. We do not know whether we are in fact amending the Criminal Records Act because we do not know what criminal records are.

As the previous speaker pointed out there are records of conviction. However, there are also all kinds of other criminal records relating to a specific crime and the perpetrator of that crime that are held by the police that investigated the crime, by the court that convicted, by the newspapers that covered the trial and by the various libraries that keep those records. Probably carrying this to its extreme, there is the memory of those who were involved in one way or another with that crime.

One could argue that it is virtually impossible to completely expunge the entire record of a criminal act. Perhaps that too is for another day.

I still think that sometime in the near future a government is going to have to come to grips with that anomaly. It is one thing to purge the record of criminal conviction from one computer bank, CPIC that is administered by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. It is another thing to entirely eliminate one's criminal record after a pardon has been granted. Therein lies the anomaly. While the person receives the pardon that person still has a criminal record, even though the record of conviction has been removed from the central data bank at the RCMP headquarters here in Ottawa.

We have other concerns as well. I mentioned the lack of definition of a criminal record. I am also still not satisfied that we know what good conduct is. I know the member has gone a long way in her remarks in defining good conduct by saying that good conduct is an absence of criminality. That is what the officials said at our committee hearings. I am satisfied that is one definition, but I think it is a very limited one.

If the Parole Board restricts its interpretation of good conduct to that narrow interpretation then I am satisfied. If the person who applies for a pardon has not committed another offence, has not been charged and convicted of an offence, then I would say the person should be granted the pardon, all other circumstances being equal.

However, if good conduct has something to do with one's behaviour in society, if it is a community-based assessment, then I am not so certain.

I may have a neighbour who lives beside me who has not committed a criminal offence since the original crime. Perhaps he committed it as a teenager in this hypothetical case. I am asked whether I think my next door neighbour has displayed good conduct. On Sunday morning in the summertime when we want to sit out in our backyard and have a quiet cup of coffee he decides to turn on his radio full blast and play rock music. I would say that is not good conduct. I do not like it and go and tell him to turn it down or turn it off. That might somehow influence my assessment of that person's conduct.

It could be some narrow religious or moral interpretation of his or her behaviour, about which I should not have any concern because it is none of my business. I might say to somebody investigating that he or she is doing this or doing that and I do not think that is right because it is contrary to the Judaeo-Christian sense of morality. I hope it is not given that broad an interpretation.

If the Parole Board sticks to the one important criterion, an absence of criminal behaviour, then I would say that good conduct is acceptable from our point of view. I hope this will be the restrictive approach that the Parole Board adheres to.

The other point with which I still have some concern, as do some of my constituents—and no doubt I speak for virtually every member in this House—is the situation in which a young lad commits a relatively minor offence in his teens. We will say it is shoplifting. We have all heard the story. It is the same right across the country.

He grows older and he matures. He applies for and gets a job as a truck driver. On his first trip across the border he is stopped. They punch his name into the computer and out comes a criminal record. He is prohibited from crossing the border. He could be going across the border for strictly recreational purposes or for a holiday. He says: "Well, good heavens, I was granted a pardon three years ago for this". However, that does not matter because it is still in the computer.

I will go over in some detail what can still happen, even with this bill that greatly improves the Criminal Records Act. Let us suppose that John Q. Public, a Canadian citizen, gets convicted of a Criminal Code offence on January 1, 1985. I am using this as a hypothetical case. He serves two years in jail with no probation. On January 1, 1987 his sentence officially ends. He must wait five years before applying for a pardon. In June 1989 he wants to go to the United States. At the border his record is called up on the U.S. immigration computer because it is linked to the Canadian information banks because of the reciprocal agreement we have, a memorandum of understanding, with the United States. He is denied entry. This information is now in the computer memory of U.S. immigration, not only his criminal record from Canada but the fact that he was denied access to the United States. That is put in the computer at that time.

On January 1, 1992 he applies for a pardon. Within a few months, and this bill will fortunately hurry it up, he is granted that pardon. In May or June 1992 he tries to go to the U.S. again. They will have no record of his new pardon but will see the record of his 1987 conviction. He is denied entry again. If he has the pardon documents with him it is then up to the U.S. border immigration people or officials to decide. It has been my experience that most of the time they still refuse entry.

The point is that if this person had been granted the pardon and between the time of his conviction and the time that he got the pardon had not tried to enter the United States then the information that would come up on the screen at the U.S. border would include the pardon. The pardon would be there. Then he would probably be allowed in. If he tried to enter the United States after he was convicted and came out of jail and before a pardon was granted and then subsequently tried to enter the United States after a pardon had been granted he would be stopped.

That is the point I am getting at, and it is still a problem. I do not know whether this bill could have dealt with it anyway. I do not think it could have.

I hope that government officials in the Solicitor General's office will meet with their counterparts in the United States to try to get that anomaly worked out. A pardon is a pardon. I do not think a person should be penalized for attempting to enter the United States before his pardon has come through rather than trying to enter the United States after his pardon has come through.

There are two distinctly different records kept in that U.S. computer at the border. That is the point that must be addressed if we are going to be equitable and fair to the people who are granted pardons. I know we cannot force the United States to do anything in this regard. However, I am certain that by getting together a reciprocal agreement can be worked out. After all, this works in our favour too. We do not want their criminal elements coming into Canada and they do not want our criminal elements going to the United States.

When a pardon is granted—and in the overwhelming majority of cases pardons are granted for relatively minor offences, although I think they can be granted for all offences but possibly not capital. I am not sure about first-degree murder or capital offences.

Those are some of my concerns: the definition of criminal records itself, the definition of good conduct, and the problems that Canadian citizens who have been granted a pardon often experience when attempting to enter the United States.

We are supporting this bill. We do appreciate what the government has done. However, the fact still remains that we still have this situation in which a pardon is granted but the criminal record remains. The record of conviction is gone from the RCMP computer but it is in the files of the provincial police forces and municipal police forces, and private agencies such as bonding houses and insurance companies. That record is still there.

This bill is well intentioned in terms of employment, and one of the most common reasons for seeking a pardon is for employment purposes. When this bill goes through the federal government cannot, and I think even at the present time, demand to know whether a person has been pardoned. It can ask whether they have a criminal record and if they have been pardoned they are perfectly within their rights to say, in fact they should: "No, I don't have a criminal record". If they have committed one offence and have been pardoned for it the assumption is that the record is gone. Therefore they can say: "No, I don't have a criminal record".

I am still very concerned about some components of the private sector. A small company may ask: "Have you got a criminal record?" It has checked a bonding company and knows that the person was convicted of shoplifting when they were 17 and pardoned. There is still a record there, and they do not get the job. The company will not say that is the reason they did not get the job but it still works against people.

Unfortunately, that means that a relatively minor crime, and I think shoplifting at the age of 15 or 16 or younger is a petty offence, will dog the person for the rest of his life even with this well-intentioned piece of legislation. I do not know how to deal with it.

I think we can legislate and order those other groups and organizations to purge the criminal record, not just the record of conviction but the criminal record itself, from their files so that it cannot be used for any reason. Perhaps I will narrow that down and say that it cannot be used for crossing the border and cannot be used for employment purposes, and there are no doubt several others.

I know that there are times when we will still want a record of that conviction somewhere because that person could be suspected of committing another offence later in life or a few years later.

Obviously the investigative authorities and peace officers would want to have some source to which they could go to verify fingerprints, pictures or behavioural patterns.

Certainly for employment purposes and for travel purposes, I think the entire record should be purged and not just the record of conviction but the criminal file itself.

That is all I wish to say about Bill C-71. We support it, and I presume it will be passed today at third reading and go to the other place.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair—Visible minorities; the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception—Unemployment Insurance; the hon. member for Mount Royal—Broadcasting; and the hon. member for Calgary Northeast—Calgary Airport.

STATUS OF ARTIST ACT

The House resumed from May 13, 1992, consideration of Bill C-7, an Act respecting the status of the artist and professional relations between artists and producers in Canada, as reported with amendments) by the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The question is now on Motions Nos. 1 and 2.

[English]

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal) moved:

Motion No. 1.

"nomic interests of their members;";
(b) by striking out line 20 at page 2 and substituting the following therefor:
"other questions concerning them, and (d) the right of artists to equity through programming and employment opportunities which serve the needs and interests of Canadian men, women, and children, the linguistic duality and multicultural and multiracial nature of Canadian society and the special place of aboriginal peoples within that society."

(a) by striking out line 16 at page 2 and substituting the following therefor:

"nomic interests of their members;";

(b) by striking out line 20 and page 2 and substituting the following therefor:

(d) the right of artists to the equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination and, in particular, without discrimination based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age, sexual orientation or mental or physical disability."

She said: Madam Speaker, first of all may I say it is a pleasure to finally rise to this bill and address the issue of the status of the artist in Canada. It is an issue that we have been trying to address for a long, long time.

The first amendment deals with the non-discrimination clause in the status of artist legislation to be found in the general principles and policy statement section of the bill. The principle behind this amendment is really to bring a sense of clarity and a proclamation of policy and directives that I believe all of us in this country wish to support and see brought into being.

In this particular amendment we are talking about the right of the artist to equity through programming and employment opportunities which serve the needs and interests of Canadian people. The first amendment deals, I believe, with the right of artists through programming and employment opportunities which serve the needs and interests of Canadian women and children, the linguistic duality and multicultural and multiracial nature of Canadian society and the special place of aboriginal peoples within that society.

It is really vital that we ensure that Canadians of different cultures are seen as well as employed. The principle that we are placing before this House in this particular amendment is that it is not good enough just to have employment equity as a principle and that we would have people of all races, colours, languages and religions before us. We have to make a concerted effort to ensure that people of colour, people of different ethnic backgrounds are present and can be heard by all people.

It is in seeing the diversity of Canada on the screen, it is in hearing the different voices and the different accents, it is in an appreciation of this incredible diversity that is the reality of the Canadian picture. In fact, it is something that we have been talking about really through this whole constitutional debate, the debate about who we are as a people and what we are as a people. If the what we are as people and who we are as a people is fundamentally the differences that make the greatness of this country then you have to have those people involved, in front of the scene, behind the scene, helping us select the news and in helping us to understand the different messages that are coming because there are cultural differences. It is through these cultural differences and in the eyes and voices of these people that we are able to appreciate and understand not only local, regional, provincial and national news, but also the international milieu.

This amendment is similar to a provision that you can find in the Broadcasting Act. When the Canadian Actors Equity came before the committee they told us that we need to be able to ensure that, as an example, aboriginal cultures are not left to wither away and die not only because it would be tantamount to intellectual genocide for those who spring from those cultures but because those who do not must be able to have a knowledge and an understanding of it.

The more you see people, whether it is our aboriginal people who we are becoming more and more aware of, more and more sensitive to and have a greater and greater curiosity about their life and and their lifestyle, or it is the newly arrived Canadians be they from South America, Asia, East Timor, the islands in the Caribbean or in the Pacific, all these people come to us with a different approach and a different lifestyle. It is through exposure to these people that we will have a better understanding of our society.

Actors Equity went on to say: "We need to be able to ensure that those who came here as immigrants from different countries have access to Canada's cultural life and the opportunity to participate in it".

A 1989 study for the Department of Communications by Eko's Research found that for affiliated visual and literary artists women on average earned 63 per cent of the artistic income of men and that this is even worse for unaffiliated female visual artists who learn less than half; they earn 46 per cent of the average incomes earned by their male counterparts. Unaffiliated female literary artists earn 57 per cent of the average incomes of their male counterparts.

I would suggest that while I proposed this amendment, there is a strong sense that when you are telling a story, when you are selecting a history, when you are picking the news that should be told, people must be in the news room. They must be there and available to be talked with to enable the information to flow.

The Canadian Conference of the Arts and ACTRA expressed their support for this particular amendment.

We have had an awful lot of discussion around the term "cultural appropriation". If we do not want to be concerned about cultural appropriation I would suggest we need to have the kind of people who will help keep around us this mix that is Canada. People must be around, be near us, in order for us to be able to collaborate.

There is some question as to whether or not this is relevant and necessary given the nature of other legislation we have had in the House. It is my sense we would be moving in the right direction if we would ensure employment equity that would bring us to the point of ensuring artists of these different backgrounds, both men and women, are seen as well as employed was put into place in this particular bill.

As the Speaker, you have seen fit to group two amendments. The first one is on employment equity where I sincerely hope there will be a positive move on the part of the minister to consider this. It does not have a kind of legislative action; it has a hope and direction in that it falls under the policy statement. It does not fall under an action statement. It is part of the general principles and policy statement of the bill.

Similarly the second amendment I was dealing with in clause 3 directs itself to the question of the clause of non-discrimination. It is the clause that, as you probably recognize in section 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights, ensures legal equality without discrimination.

Some of the characteristics have been regarded traditionally as objectionable grounds of discrimination and they are listed in the clause. We all know them pretty well: race, national and ethnic origin, colour, religion, age, sex, mental or physical disability. This list is by no means exhaustive. One area of serious omission is the protection against discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation.

When the Equality for All task force brought forward a recommendation in 1985, it was to the effect that the Canadian Human Rights Act be amended to add sexual orientation as a prohibited grounds of discrimination. I think any piece of legislation, until such time as this government chooses to make the proper amendment to the Canadian Human Rights Act, has to be noted in these provisions where they are of general principle. The general principle and the general policy is well suited to a policy statement that addresses the question of sexual orientation as a prohibited ground of discrimination.

The government responded in 1986 that it would act but it is now six years later. Nothing has happened, and there has been no action.

I believe all members of this House will recall when the Prime Minister of Canada spoke to the issue of sexual discrimination and sexual orientation. He said in regard to the question in the future, which refers to the Human Rights Act, on April 27, 1992, page 9714 that Canadians should be judged on their merit, not on their sexual orientation. He adds:

> For my part I believe anything that discriminates against anyone's rights in any way, any discrimination of any kind, is unacceptable in a pluralistic society such as ours.
> The Minister of Justice and others are examining these matters very carefully to see what they can do to advance the cause of elimination of discrimination in Canada.

I would ask the minister to give very serious consideration to both these amendments. I would hope he would find favour with the non-discrimination clause and the equity for artists through employment and programming, both clauses in section 3 of the policy statement of the status of artist legislation.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, first of all perhaps I could express my thanks to the hon. member for Mount Royal for moving these amendments and giving the House the opportunity to speak to two very important matters.

I would also like to express a word of thanks, which I will repeat a little bit later when we are speaking on third reading, to members on all sides of the House who belonged to the committee for the spirit of collaboration and co-operation that has been shown throughout the consideration of Bill C-7. It has been truly remarkable. It demonstrates that it is possible to build a partnership that stretches between parties and which recognizes the important public interest which is at stake.

The degree of collaboration we have seen today and the amount of co-operation has really been something which has been very encouraging to me.

It is with regret that I have to indicate to the hon. member that the government cannot support the two motions which she proposes today, notwithstanding the fact that the gist of the motions, the substance of them, attempts to move the bill in the direction which we would like to see things going in Canada, all of us, I believe.

All of us are in favour of employment equity. As well all of us are in favour of anything that can strike down discrimination in Canada. Discrimination by its very nature is abhorrent to any of us. In my view the only thing it is acceptable to hate is hatred itself.

The fact that all too many Canadians find themselves discriminated against on the basis of irrelevant criteria is simply unacceptable in 1992. As we look at amendments to human rights legislation we have to do everything we can to ensure that Canadians are judged on their merits and what they can contribute as individuals and not on the basis of irrelevant criteria.

It has to be our goal in Canada's 125th anniversary year to promote a spirit of respect for one another and respect for humanity.

I realize that the spirit in which the hon. member poses these amendments is very much consistent with that.

My concerns about the motions are the following. As the hon. member will know Parliament adopted the Employment Equity Act which came into force on August 13, 1986 and which covers people employed by an employer that hires 100 or more employees.

Trying to extend federal jurisdiction and private contracts with independent contractors would not be appropriate, nor in some cases would it be legally feasible. One has to remain mindful of our limited jurisdiction in this area.

Further, it is hard to see how the tribunal could force a producer to contract according to equity while selection of artists is usually based upon, for example, a scenario which dictates the type of performer required or musical partition which requires specific talents. It would be very hard to understand how this would work.

As drafted, the amendment deals with employees and would therefore not apply to Part II of the bill. Since Part I is not binding on Her Majesty, it is not clear who this would be aimed at or who it would be binding upon.

Certainly if we want to see amendments made, if we want to see broadening in terms of employment equity, the appropriate place for us to do that would be in amending the Employment Equity Act and it should be in the context of that act that we raise our concerns.

Finally the charter protects to some extent Canadians with respect to their right to work. Recently the Chief Justices of the Supreme Court of Canada stated that the court felt that the charter had been under-utilized with respect to economic rights and one should expect some judicial evolution on that matter in the coming years.

With regard to Motion No. 2, again I repeat and I support enthusiastically the comments that were quoted from the Prime Minister by the hon. member earlier, that discrimination in Canada is simply unacceptable.

The purpose of the proposed amendment is to ensure that artists are not discriminated against on the basis of race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age, sexual orientation, or mental or physical disability.

For the most part it does not appear that this amendment is necessary because with the exception of discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation, all of the criteria enumerated in the motion are covered by the Charter of Rights and Freedoms already which supersedes this legislation.

The bill on the status of the artist is not the appropriate venue to introduce protection against discrimination based on sexual orientation in one area which is not included in this other legislation as it should clearly be done in the larger context such as in human rights legislation.

Let me simply indicate with regard to employment equity that it certainly is the policy of the Government of Canada that it should be our goal to ensure that both in its portrayal of Canada and in terms of employment opportunities which are offered to Canadians the media, including the arts in Canada, should do everything they can to be as representative of the Canadian population as possible.

That is the goal which is shared by members on all sides of this House. It is one which we are all committed to work to try to achieve. It is unfortunate that in this particular case, it would not be appropriate to include these motions in the legislation. We will be forced to vote against them if we come to that point.

But I do want to indicate with great sincerity to my hon. friend from Mount Royal that I understand the direction in which she would like to go. I am certainly supportive of that.

Madam Deputy Speaker: We will resume debate at report stage of this bill after private member's hour.

It being five o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(6), the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

INTERPROVINCIAL LIVESTOCK TRADE ACT

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie) moved that Bill C-254, an act respecting interprovincial livestock trade, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Natural Resources envelope.

He said: Madam Speaker, this bill was drafted three years ago because of shortfalls in the existing Bankruptcy Act.

It is a coincidence that it has been chosen for debate at the same time as the members of this House have been debating the current Bill C-22 which also attempts to amend the Bankruptcy Act.

If producers do in fact receive protection from "inventory and accounts receivables and cash resulting therefrom" which is one of the amendments that has been proposed for Bill C-22, then there will be no need for the type of trust fund that this private member's bill would create.

Let me give a quick review. This legislation seeks to settle the problem of security for producers who sell livestock outside their own province. Most of the provinces have legislation built into their legal systems which sets up funds to avoid problems for livestock delivered to packing houses within the province. Livestock that is sold across provincial boundaries escapes that legislative coverage because it is federal legislation under the British North America Act. The amendments that we are proposing here today would attempt to provide similar protection to those producers who sell across the provincial border.

The bill attempts to set up a trust fund to which abattoirs and slaughterhouses purchasing livestock and poultry from farmers outside of the province would contribute. In the event of the bankruptcy of those processing firms, the producers would not be left wanting their money.

What prompted this legislation in part, as is often the case, was pressure and lobbying from affected producer groups. Experiences that I recall, growing up in a rural community, also influenced introducing this legislation.

I can recall when I was in my teens, one of my neighbours whose wife was a postmistress at the time decided to dispose of his tiny livestock herd. There were 18 head. They went from Saskatchewan to a plant in Winnipeg. In the process, a cheque was paid when they left the farm. The cheque bounced. The plant that purchased the livestock had declared bankruptcy. It was many months before the farmer received about 10 or 15 cents on the dollar for the disposal of his small herd.

A lot of producers, when they deliver product to the plant, are delivering one year's supply of livestock at that time, depending on the kind of production they are engaged in. Those who produce on their own farm for fattening and finishing often will send the whole year's production to the plant at one time. If that happens to coincide with the time when the plant goes bankrupt, they can be left with the loss of a whole year's work and absolutely no income, even though they still have all the bills to pay.

Ordinary suppliers to plants that might declare bankruptcy are never caught in that kind of situation because their billings take place weekly or monthly and so they do not get caught with a whole year's production on the line.

The model for this legislation is the U.S. Packers and Stockyard Act which is administered by the packers and stockyards administration of the United States Department of Agriculture. The trust fund which was started in 1968 covers all cattle transactions and has been expanded to include poultry and most perishable agricultural produce.

I understand that American legislators are now drafting protection for the dairy sector. In fiscal year 1989 the trust paid out $1.2 million to producers in the U.S. The figures for 1990 and 1991 are $4.7 million and $4.2 million respectively. Therefore, without this kind of fund and protection for producers, individual livestock growers would have been left carrying this bill and it would have effectively forced many of them into receivership or bankruptcy along with the processor to whom they had sold.

Many of the provinces in this country, as I have said, have set up similar types of protection to provide a fund for producer financed insurance to compensate livestock producers against such losses. But these do not apply to livestock that moves across a provincial border because, as we all know, when we put agricultural trade across a provincial border it comes under federal jurisdiction and the responsibility of the federal government. Provincial jurisdiction does not apply. While the provinces have been more aware of this problem over time than the federal government, the provinces have been unable to act fully because of the reality of quite a lot of the trade in livestock going across borders.

In my province of Saskatchewan, for instance, for years and years most of the livestock processing occurred outside the province. That has turned around in the last couple of decades, but there is still a considerable amount of beef and pork that goes outside of the province for slaughter.

The plans that have been in effect in Canada work under different schemes. The Ontario financial protection plan is one that recognizes claims if the sale is deemed to take place in Ontario. It has a couple of wrinkles that provide for licensed dealers outside of the province. When we inquired there was one in Manitoba, one in Saskatchewan and several located in New York and Michigan. Licensed dealers purchasing livestock outside of Ontario for slaughter in Ontario would in those few cases be protected by the Ontario financial protection plan.

This legislation, or if the House and the Senate adopt the amendment to Bill C–22 of which I spoke earlier and which would make this unnecessary, would provide the kind of protection in interprovincial trade to which Canadian producers are entitled. I would urge the House to support the thought behind this legislation. This has not been deemed to be a votable motion.

When we are dealing with Bill C–22 and when the Senate is finished with Bill C–22, I hope the joint concerns of this House will be such that Bill C–22 will contain an adequate amendment to the bankruptcy laws which will protect producers of livestock and other farm products that move across provincial borders for processing so that in the event the processor goes bankrupt those farmers will receive their money.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to speak on second reading of Bill C–254.

The issue of suppliers being unpaid after a buyer has failed financially has been a longstanding and very difficult problem not only for livestock producers but for business people throughout Canadian industry as well.

In the agricultural sector various producer organizations have been involved in trying to find solutions to this problem for quite some time. For example, the Canadian Cattlemen's Association has suggested that a program like the United States Packers and Stockyards Act be established.

Under this act meat packers must hold all inventories, accounts receivable and cash in a deemed trust until full payment has been received by any unpaid sellers of livestock. But in Canada such comprehensive legislation would be beyond the constitutional power of the federal government and in any case would address the difficulties of only one sector of the Canadian industry.

Clearly a much broader approach to the problem of unpaid suppliers is needed. For that reason in June 1991 the government introduced Bill C–22, amendments to the Bankruptcy Act.

At present suppliers who are unpaid at the time of a buyer's bankruptcy have the status of ordinary, unsecured creditors. The proposed amendments would add to the act the right of suppliers to repossess goods for which they have not been paid in cases of either bankruptcy or receivership. This right would be subject to the conditions that the goods are both identifiable and in the same state as delivered.

For unpaid farmers and fishermen whose products are often not identifiable after delivery or are quickly reprocessed, these conditions limit the usefulness of the proposed section.

Therefore an additional amendment to the act introduced under Bill C–22 on May 5 of this year would provide special protection for these producers. This amendment provides unpaid farmers or fishermen with a priority claim on the inventory of the purchaser for the full value of the goods they have supplied.

Where a farmer or fisherman sells and delivers products within 15 days before the purchaser becomes bankrupt or goes into receivership, the farmer or fisherman has 30 days to file a claim on any unpaid amount. That claim would be secured by a charge on all of the purchaser's inventory and it would rank above all other claims except those of other unpaid suppliers.

Clearly this amendment which was proposed by the hon. Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in response to a recommendation of the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs would go a long way toward improving protection for fishermen and for all agricultural producers.

On the other hand, Bill C-254 in terms of what we wanted to do is extremely limited in scope and would give enhanced protection to livestock producers only on interprovincial sales and only on sales to corporate slaughterhouses. In such cases the company would be deemed to hold any unpaid portion of the sale price in trust on behalf of the producer.

Bill C-254 does not provide a time period after which the trust lapses. Since unpaid supplier protection would be provided under all circumstances, not just bankruptcy, the bill could conflict with existing provincial unpaid supplier legislation made under property and civil rights authority.

As well, because Bill C-254 does not allow for provincial co-operation and participation, as does the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act for instance, the legislation would be very difficult to implement.

I appreciate the remarks of my hon. colleague and recognize as well that when this bill is finally passed hopefully it will deal with his concerns as well. When he says that this bill has been on the Order Paper for close to three years, that is a long time and a lot of things have changed in that period of time.

The Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations completed its clause-by-clause examination of Bill C-22 on May 13, accepting the bill as amended including a special right for farmers and fishermen. When the bill is passed into law it will be closely monitored to determine whether fine-tuning is required in the future. In fact Bill C-22 requires that the amended Bankruptcy Act be reviewed by a parliamentary committee three years after coming into force.

In the interim the amendment to the act to provide unpaid farmers and fishermen with a priority claim on inventory represents a very real gain. At present unpaid farmers are unsecured creditors. With the enactment of Bill C-22 they would be ahead of the secured creditors, which we think would be a great benefit to agricultural producers.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have a chance to say a few words about the Bill C-254 of the hon. member for Mackenzie. This bill deals with a problem that many agricultural producers face from time to time when they ship livestock to a packing company, a grower or a buyer outside their own provinces. The individual goes broke. His cheque is no good for the livestock that he has purchased. The farmer is left holding the bag with no benefits.

This bill seeks to deal with the situation where it is a no credit sale. The money would go into a fund which would ensure that the bill was paid. If the livestock or whatever produce was kept, the farmer would be paid.

I was interested in the words of the parliamentary secretary when he talked about Bill C-22. Most agricultural groups were not happy with the amendments made in Bill C-22 respecting bankruptcy legislation which was just passed this week. The parliamentary secretary said that the bill would be closely monitored, that there would be a review after three years and all the rest of it.

There has been an ongoing review for the last three or four months in which practically every farm organization made clear they did not want to wait three years for a review. They did not want to worry about monitoring. They just wanted the bill amended as it should be.

The hon. member for Dartmouth brought forward amendments to the legislation which the government steadfastly refused to accept. The parliamentary secretary glossed over the super priority where a farmer or fisherman sells his produce to a company and the company goes broke. He would have a super priority on inventory, but on accounts receivable or other accounts payable it simply would not apply. If there is inventory in the company at the time it goes into bankruptcy then it works, but if it is a claim against accounts receivable it simply does not work.

For instance, James Goodhand of the Ontario Pork Association, Pork Ontario, wrote to members of the agriculture committee. In describing the deficiencies of Bill C–22, he said:

> Specifically the proposed changes only allow livestock producers to be repaid from inventory on hand, which is inadequate. As with cattle, hogs are slaughtered and become which will remain in inventory for only a very short time.

If the inventory moves on there is nothing, but if there are accounts receivable for hundreds of thousands of dollars the farmer cannot claim that. The Tories know that, but they have their little deal all cooked up with the big companies. They are looking after them rather than looking after Ontario pork producers, beef producers or whatever other group.

Mr. Goodhand went on to say:

> Hence, for this section to provide much needed help to the hog industry, it should be changed to allow claims to be secured by inventory plus accounts receivable and the cash resulting from the livestock originally purchased.

It is most unfortunate that the parliamentary secretary is trying to lead the House to believe that the agricultural industry is satisfied with Bill C–22. The bill of the hon. member for Mackenzie deals with a no cash sale. It would provide the greater protection that is required.

• (1720)

We turn to the Ontario Wheat Producers' Marketing Board and its comments with regard to Bill C–22 which is trying to alleviate some of the same problems outlined in Bill C–254.

In a letter from David Alderman, chairman of the Ontario Wheat Producers' Marketing Board, it is stated:

> Section 81(2) of the bill was intended to protect suppliers of agricultural products from dealers who have become bankrupt or forced into receivership. It is the opinion of the Ontario Wheat Producers' Marketing Board that this protection has not been accomplished under the present form of this section.
> Our board, in support with other commodity organizations, is proposing the attached appendix, Minor Redraft of Section 81(2), which will help protect producers of agricultural products.

It is the same as the super priority for agricultural producers and fishermen in the bankruptcy legislation. They would be able to make a claim not only against inventory which moves on in the very nature of the production of farm produce but for cash on hand or accounts receivable.

I do not think that the parliamentary secretary was being completely fair and above board with the House by trying to present Bill C–22 as being adequate to cover the problems raised by the hon. member for Mackenzie in his Bill C–254. Clearly none of the mainline agriculture groups are satisfied with the way that Bill C–22 dealt with this problem. Surely it is inadequate and will ultimately have to be changed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There being no further members rising for debate, the time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

The House resumed consideration of Bill C–7, an act respecting the status of the artist and professional relations between artists and producers in Canada, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture; and on Motions Nos. 1 and 2 (p. 11846).

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Madam Speaker, I wish to say a few words in support of the amendments introduced by my friend and colleague, the critic from the Liberal Party.

Most of us would agree with the amendments. The first amendment talks about employment equity. As the mover pointed out, it lacks legislative action but it is a policy statement.

Basically it would come at the beginning of Bill C–7, an act respecting the status of artist. It would set forth an ideal with which no one in this House would disagree. The minister, when suggesting why the government would not be able to support the motion, felt that it should be left to other pieces of legislation.

I am certain the minister indicated in his brief remarks that he in no way disagreed with the aims of Motion No. 1 regarding employment equity. It is a policy statement.

It is a statement of ideals. It is a statement we all agree with. We will support that amendment.

The second amendment is to a clause on non-discrimination and is, as the minister correctly observed, in every way consistent with the charter of rights except that it does include one other important addition which the mover of the amendment included. That would disallow discrimination based on sexual orientation. Again we can make the argument that the battle really should be done in another way; changes to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms should be introduced and therefore discrimination based on sexual orientation would no longer be tolerated legally by our society, by our country.

One could make that argument, though the fact is that we might not move toward that as quickly as the Prime Minister has done with commitments in the past, the way that I think most members of this House would like to see us move.

Therefore, I support the mover of the amendment in attempting to include it in Bill C-7. In some ways, what better piece of legislation to pioneer this area than in the status of the artist legislation.

Artists in many ways are pioneers. They are at the forefront of social thought as well as artistic thought and cultural thought. To have that section included to ensure that there will not be discrimination based not just on race, religion, creed, et cetera, but also on sexual orientation as a reason not to allow for discrimination is an excellent suggestion.

Again, my party will be supporting that amendment.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The first question is on Motion No. 1. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

Motion No. 1 negatived.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The second question is on Motion No. 2. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

Motion No. 2 negatived.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications) moved:

That Bill C-7 be amended in clause 54 by striking out line 2 at page 32 and substituting the following therefor:

"paragraph 51(d), (e), (f) or (g), order an art—".

He said: Madam Speaker, the proposed amendment to clause 54 is a technical modification consequential to another amendment introduced during clause-by-clause study.

• (1730)

Clause 54 defines the circumstances under which the tribunal can make orders and take remedy against infractions to certain sections of the act.

Clause 51, which was also amended during clause-by-clause review, is one of these particular clauses which deals with the duties of artist associations mentioned in clause 54. What used to be paragraph 51(e) became 51(g). The amendment now proposed simply puts back in clause 54 the reference to paragraph 51(g) which disappeared through a renumbering mistake.

I am sure that is abundantly clear to all of my colleagues. I am confident that it will secure the support of all sides of this House.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, speaking for my party on this side of the House, we accept the amendments brought forward by the minister. They make good sense.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina–Qu'Appelle): Madam Speaker, speaking for my part of the House in this corner here, I also wish to indicate our support. I also wish to reiterate what my friend and colleague from the Liberal Party has said, it does make good sense.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The question is on Motion No. 3. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 3 agreed to.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I will now put Motions Nos. 4 and 5 to the House.

[Translation]

However, I may remind hon. members that these two motions are grouped for debate. An affirmative vote on motion No. 4 would obviate the need to vote on motion No. 5. However, if motion No. 4 is negatived, a vote on motion No. 5 will be necessary.

[English]

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications) moved:

That Bill C–7 be amended by adding immediately after line 20 at page 35 the following new clause:

"66. (1) In the seventh year after the coming into force of this section, the Minister of Communications, in consultation with the Minister, shall undertake a review of the provisions and operation of this Act and shall immediately submit to each House of Parliament a report thereon including a statement of any changes the Minister of Communications would recommend.

(2) The report submitted to the House of Commons pursuant to subsection (1) stands permanently referred to the committee of that House that normally considers cultural matters."

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal) moved:

That Bill C–7 be amended by adding immediately after line 9 at page 36 the following new clause:

"67. (1) Seven years after the coming into force of this Act, a comprehensive review of the provisions and operation of this Act including the effect of those provisions shall be undertaken by such committee of the House of Commons as may be designated or established by the House for that purpose.

(2) Within six months after the completion of the review referred to in subsection (1), the committee so designated or established for that purpose shall submit a report on the review to Parliament including a statement of any changes the committee would recommend."

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, both of these motions that are before the House seek to give to a committee of Parliament, with the responsibility for supervising this government's actions with regard to culture, the responsibility of reviewing after a period of time how this act functions.

These amendments initially were the initiative of my colleagues on the opposition side and I want to commend them for their initiative. All too infrequently we as members of Parliament put clauses in bills which trigger a review of Parliament's work and all too often what we find is that we pass legislation with the best of intent. It is very clear what each of us would like to see done with the legislation and yet we do not take the trouble years later to review the legislation and determine whether it is serving the purpose for which it was originally intended.

I gave the undertaking to my colleagues, the members of the committee at the time that we were before committee, that I would consult with artist organizations to seek their views as to whether they would agree to a review clause being in the bill. What we found was that this particular structure of allowing the bill to run for some seven years, then having the Minister of Communications prepare a report in conjunction with his colleague, the Minister of Labour, tabling that report in Parliament and sending it to the committees of the House of Commons and Senate charged with the responsibility for cultural affairs was the formulation which they felt would be the most appropriate.

I will not disguise the fact that there was some disquiet within the artistic community as to whether any review of the legislation might mean that hard fought games, which it had won in this legislation, could be lost as a result of review.

I can assure the artistic community that in this House, neither on the opposition side nor on the government side, is there any intention or interest in eroding any of the gains that have been won in this bill.

It is just the opposite. We want to ensure in this pioneering piece of legislation in which we have undertaken to make massive reforms to try to recognize the status of Canada's artists that we have done the job right and we have achieved what we were hoping to achieve. If amendments are subsequently needed to the bill at a later date which will ensure we can do the job better, those amendments will be made.

What we have done here is to say we will review Parliament's work, make a public report, give the opportunity for the committees of Parliament, which have the responsibility for reviewing artistic and cultural affairs, to ensure artists' needs are met as effectively as possible.

It is, I believe, a good amendment, one which is very positive. It could enable us to make improvements to the bill some years down the road. It in no way threatens the position or gains that have been won by the cultural communities in Canada. It does mean we as parliamentarians are accepting more fully our responsibility to examine our handiwork years from now to ensure we have done our job properly.

I would ask for support of Motion No. 4 which is moved by the government. I prefer it to Motion No. 5, although I understand the reasons for Motion No. 5 by my colleague for Mount Royal. They are entirely appropriate and consistent with the one proposed by the government.

On the government side we will be supporting Motion No. 4 because it is the one which has secured the support of the artistic and cultural community.

Mrs. Finestone: Madam Speaker, through you to the minister, I recognize you have done some consultation with respect to a review procedure and I appreciate that. It was our feeling in light of the fact this is an entirely new tribunal, a new experience, a new approach for our artists, that this will be successful in terms of the artists' economic and social goals.

It may be your finding that it would be in the best interests of the artists who have some concerns about majorities of the day and perhaps attitudes of majorities in a parliamentary committee. They seemed to have placed their sense of trust with the minister and the minister's department. That does not prevent the review procedure from proceeding thereafter to the standing committee if the standing committee so desires.

Further to that, the standing committee is really master of its own agenda and it could under its own initiative, not withstanding this particular clause, undertake such a study if it seems inclined to or if so indicated by the arts community.

I therefore feel there is a responsibility on the part of the artistic organizations that will be involved in this new undertaking of the government. They as well as standing committees of the House should be vigilant. They should certainly be prepared to respond to the initiative of the minister at the end of the seven year term and if they do not do so it would be regretfully a lack of responsibility on the part of those organizations as well as perhaps individual parliamentarians or the standing committee.

I am pleased to support the amendment of the minister and I would be pleased to withdraw if I could get unanimous consent of the House.

This has been a very collegial committee and we have worked very hard jointly on this matter. As my colleague from the New Democratic Party has been very much involved in the on-going discussions, I would appreciate it if you would allow him to speak before you withdraw the amendment I proposed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I was not going to officially withdraw that amendment which was very similar to the one presented by the hon. member for Regina—Qu'Appelle which had not been chosen because it was actually similar to Motion No. 5.

As I said earlier, a yes vote on Motion No. 4 would eliminate the need to vote on Motion No. 5. I do not see the advantage of withdrawing Motion No. 5 at this time.

• (1740)

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Madam Speaker, we also, as you rightly pointed out, had submitted an amendment. I believe it was identical to Motion No. 5 as found in our papers. I am also quite happy in accepting the minister's Motion No. 4. I think for all intents and purposes it is almost exactly the same. Motion No. 5 calls for an automatic review within six months. The minister's motion calls for a review by the parliamentary committee which could occur at any time.

Again there is no difference as the member for Mount Royal pointed out. The committee is in charge of its affairs. Therefore it could deal with the report almost immediately. The minister is specific in that it goes to the committee that deals with cultural matters.

Motion No. 5 is perhaps a little bit more vague on that in that it talks about the committee so designated or established for that purpose.

There is not much substantial difference at all in the two motions. To try to debate this would be, I think, splitting hairs and out of tune with how we have operated in this committee which has been very much on the consensus basis.

The general thrust is an excellent one. It is a new piece of legislation. We are pioneering a new area. The federal government is to be congratulated in having finally advanced Bill C–7. We are playing a leadership role in the world. As such it makes some sense that at a period in the future we should stand back and Parliament should stand back and have a look at how the legislation has worked and functioned.

I am sure at that time there will be some areas that will need readjusting, perhaps minor, perhaps major, but on the general basis it is always good when we introduce new legislation, exploring new areas, to build into it sort of an automatic review so that some time in the future Parliament will be forced to look at this again.

Quite often, as we have certainly seen in the past with copyright legislation, important pieces of legislation can sit on the back burner for many years. We certainly did not want to see this legislation sitting on the back burner for many years needing changes but never important enough to put on the front burner of the government's agenda.

In this way I think we have assured ourselves that Parliament will look at this or some committee of Parliament will look at this at some future time. If changes are needed at that time, I am sure the committee will recommend it.

Again, I will be voting on behalf of my party in favour of Motion No. 4.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Motion No. 4 agreed to.

Mr. Beatty: Point of order, Madam Speaker. It is my understanding that there would be unanimous consent in the House to move immediately to third reading of this bill.

Madam Deputy Speaker: If the hon. minister would agree with me, we might go for concurrence at report stage and then go to third reading.

Mr. Beatty: Agreed.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications) moved that the bill, as amended, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Madam Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time? With leave of the House, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Beatty moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

He said: Madam Speaker, this is a very exciting and a very pleasurable day for me, as it is for many of our colleagues in this House.

At the outset, I simply want to acknowledge that I am particularly pleased that as we call third reading of Bill C–7 that you, Madam Speaker, as a distinguished former performing artist yourself, are seated in the chair. You have contributed a great deal to the artistic and cultural life of this country and in many ways nothing could be more appropriate than to have you in the chair at the time we in this Parliament move to recognize the contribution that has been made by artists from one coast to the other.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

An hon. member: It is too bad we did not have that bill 20 years ago.

Mr. Beatty: Theatre director Jonathan Miller once said: "The artistic community is like a great forest which simultaneously alters and depends upon the composition of the air which surrounds it".

Canadians live in a society which is coming to understand that our artistic community influences our sense of identity as much as our sense of identity influences our artists. A symbiotic relationship has developed between the two which makes it impossible to separate one from the other. The artists that we encourage or discourage provide the atmosphere in which we see ourselves, raise our children and speak to the world.

I realized that the status of the artist in Canada was a crucial issue when I was Minister of National Revenue. In fact, I had occasion to work with the leaders of Canada's art community while preparing the government's response to the report of the Sub-Committee on the Taxation of Visual and Performing Artists and Writers.

Today, more than ever before, I am convinced that the contribution of artists to our society goes to the very heart of our identity as individuals and as a country.

Their creations express our deepest convictions and give them a human dimension. They amplify our voices and make them more expressive. They breath life into our culture.

[English]

When artists speak, whether on paper, on canvass or in clay, through the movement of their bodies or the flickering light on the cinema screen, they express our deepest thoughts. They see into the hearts of Canadians and they focus bright light on what is real and what is true. They help us to speak to the rest of the world in a voice which is distinctly our own.

While many people would acknowledge the debt that we owe to our artists for contributing to our culture, I am not sure how many people realize how much artists also contribute to our economy.

How many people realize that half a million Canadians earn their livelihood from this sector of the economy? How many Canadians understand that our cultural activities generate a larger percentage of our Gross Domestic Product than the wood and textile industries combined? How many people are aware that for every $1 of non-profit arts revenue we have the result of a spin-off of another $3 in spending.

It is a vital and thriving contributor to our identity and to our economy and yet artists are among the most poorly rewarded and the least recognized members of our community, a fact made evident in Revenue Canada's recently released income statistics for 1989.

In 1989 the highest paid group in Canada was doctors earning an average of $120,000 per year; dentists came in second with $98,000, lawyers came close behind them in third place. At the very bottom of the heap came pensioners with annual incomes of $15,000. Although this fact is disturbing it is not altogether surprising. What is surprising, however, is that second last came entertainers and artists with an average of $15,877, just $900 away from the lowest income group in Canada.

As a result, our artists have trouble supporting themselves and their families and cannot afford to invest in the future. As educated professionals they deserve to have an income that will enable their children to aspire to excellence. Under the present circumstances that is impossible.

• (1750)

Many artists must look for alternative employment which restricts the amount of time they can spend on perfecting their art. Their lives are a succession of periods of feast or famine.

Because the artist does not fit the norm, qualifying neither as an employer nor as an employee in the course of his career, does not enjoy professional status in Canadian society and has limited access to the social security programs available to the rest of the population.

It is neither desirable nor necessary to tolerate this kind of situation any longer.

[English]

Our artists need a framework in law which acknowledges their special and distinctive contributions to our country and which allows them improved access to certain rights and benefits which other Canadians are routinely privileged to enjoy.

This is not a revolutionary idea. We have been discussing it for as long as I have been in politics. The principles that lie behind it were established more than 40 years ago. The Standing Committee on Communications and Culture has examined it thoroughly, devoting more than 50 hours of committee time to this bill. Close to 15 key artists' organizations have appeared before them and many more have made their wishes known to me and to my department.

The time has come for us to take action. Bill C–7 underscores the important contribution made by artists in Canada to the cultural, social, economic and political enrichment of our country. It recognizes the central role played by artists in celebrating the human spirit and in giving expression to the Canadian experience. It acknowledges that artistic creativity is a vital force behind the growth and prosperity of our cultural industries.

Bill C–7 will at last articulate the policy of the Government of Canada on the status of the artist. It will establish the principles which we believe to be essential, including the recognition of the importance to artists that they be compensated for the use of their works. It will create an advisory council whose purpose will be to inform and advise me on all matters of concern to artists in Canada.

By legally acknowledging the specific working conditions of artists and recognizing their right to form associations and negotiate minimum conditions of work, this bill will finally establish a place for artists in our labour relations legislation. It will create a new agency, the Canadian Artists and Producers Professional Relations Tribunal, which will determine sectors within the artistic universe, certify an artists association for each of these sectors, and force any scale agreements into which certified associations and producers enter.

A principal advantage will be that certified artists' and producers' associations will no longer be subject to prosecution under the Competition Act simply for indulging in labour practices commonly accepted as a basic right by the rest of the labour force.

The tribunal will be granted the power to settle cases of unfair practices, ensure duty of fair representation by associations, and remedy infractions. It will allow producers and artists organizations to freely negotiate satisfactory agreements in accordance with existing practices.

Last November when we sent Bill C–7 to the standing committee, I indicated that I would be open to suggestions to improve this bill. A key issue expressed by a number of witnesses concerned the matter of closed shop practices. My officials and I carefully reviewed these concerns and with the full support of the committee we have amended the legislation to allow for a continuation of current artistic professional relations practices where preference for association members are often negotiated as part of collective agreements.

The amendments will also provide important protection through the tribunal to important artists, to individual artists, who might lose the opportunity to work because of unfair treatment by associations. I believe that our amendment strikes the fair balance between the rights of individual artists and associations that a bill always strove to achieve.

Bill C–7 will not solve all of the problems facing Canadian artists today. However, it will be an important step in a complex process designed to improve the environment for artists and the arts in Canada today. It will provide the context, the framework and the impetus for further improvements.

I have heard the criticism that the bill does not answer all of the concerns of all of the interested parties. Indeed, no bill could fully satisfy all of the divergent needs and points of view.

Let me try to put the issue into perspective by using an example from the arts world itself. A work of art is created in stages. The artist must do the planning, preparation, rough draft and revisions before the final work becomes reality. Sometimes in the artist's view, the work is never really finished. By its very nature, the creative process is never finite.

Similarly, this proposed legislation has undergone repeated and careful revisions and reworking in order to reach the final stage. However this process, by nature critical, comprehensive and creative, must be finite or there would be no point to it.

[Translation]

After years of discussion and months of debate, I believe that we have managed to draft a bill that strikes judicious balance between what is desirable and what is possible. I think that this bill will do much for Canadian artists; it assures them that the Parliament of Canada recognizes their worth and wishes to improve their status.

Along with Quebec's legislation on the status of artists, it will encourage the other provinces to adopt similar legislation at the provincial level. But we do not want to stop there. Bill C–7 must be seen as a part of all the measures intended to improve the lives of artists in Canada. One might even say that it is a most important part, since our strategy must be based on the principle of fairness.

History shows that the value of artists must be recognized in law if they are to be treated fairly. We must make this bill on the status of artists a proper piece of legislation.

Another important part of our strategy is artists' remuneration. We must protect the Canadians who work in the fields of intellectual and artistic creation. Our cultural products are profitable and will continue to be so; we must ensure that their creators benefit from them. That is only fair and economically sensible.

We must revise the Copyright Act, updating it and making it fair by setting clear and effective rules that apply to both the creators and the consumers of cultural products. That will not be easy. There are many interests and many markets. We want a law that benefits everyone, a law that strengthens the rights of some without infringing on those of others. That will take time, but it is worth the effort.

[English]

A third element of our strategy will deal with training. Professional development is as important in the arts as in any sector and we must do what we can to improve accessibility and availability.

A fourth element will focus on marketing, giving artists the information which they need to identify those Canadians who wish to purchase cultural products.

The Department of Communications, together with all 10 provinces and with the municipalities of Vancouver, Montreal and Toronto, has just released the first pan–Canadian survey of current and potential customers of the performing and visual arts in Canada.

I am confident that this 600–page report will provide an extremely useful marketing tool, one which is sorely needed by the cultural community in these tough times.

A final focus of our strategy must be to critically examine the structure of our cultural industries, ensuring that they are forward looking and flexible, capable of competing with the best that the world has to offer.

This means continuing to move ahead with the next phase of the broadcasting summit, consolidating what we have accomplished to date. This means encouraging our radio action plan consultative committee to look for creative solutions to ensure the future of Canadian radio. This means consolidating the progress that we have made in the field of publishing by getting changes to the Copyright Act and the Investment Canada Act passed by the House.

It does not mean selling off Canadian culture to the highest bidder. Canadians have much more to offer the world when they speak with a voice which is truly their own. The Prime Minister believes it. The Minister for International Trade believes it and so does everyone else who understands that Canadian culture is something which is both valuable and unique. It is the reason why we did not include culture in the Canada–U.S. Trade Agreement and it is the reason why we will not include culture in any North American free trade agreement.

When you view the components of our strategy to improve the lives of Canadian artists, equal treatment, economic reward, training, marketing and structural change, you will see how a wide variety of initiatives are meant to complement each other.

The result must be an environment which encourages the arts and does not discourage them. It must be an environment which values diversity, honours creativity and fosters growth. It must be an environment which stimulates a strong Canadian voice, different from that of our neighbours to the south and secure in its own identity. Bill C–7 can only help to foster that environment.

When Bill C–7 was proposed last spring, the headline in The Globe and Mail read: "Proposed bill on artists' status called a cause to celebrate". And so it is, Madam Speaker.

This bill is so elementary, so straightforward, so absolutely necessary that we should not hesitate to enact it. It will, after 40 years of discussion and debate, give us the foundation from which we can move forward on a whole range of policies.

The standing committee did an outstanding job of considering this bill, Madam Speaker. All of your colleagues in the House of Commons who were on the committee from all three parties deserve credit for their thoughtful consideration of the bill and for the amendments which they made to it. They demonstrated that it is possible for people of different political parties to work well together in the public interest.

Let me simply elaborate on that by saying that for me it was a tremendous pleasure to be able to work with my colleagues, to see the commitment which they demonstrated on a day-to-day basis to the status of the arts in Canada, to see the flexibility and the genuine generosity of spirit which was exhibited on both sides of the committee and to be able to report, as I have done, to members of the artistic and cultural community across Canada that there is a commitment that transcends partisanship in this House of Commons to do what any of us can do to strengthen the arts in Canada and to give long overdue recognition to Canadian artists for what they have contributed to our society. That bipartisan support, coming from all sides of the House, is something that speaks loudly and clearly as Canadians celebrate their 125th anniversary.

As we look to our future, we will need our artists to help us to continue to define who we are as a people. But our artists also need us. They need our support here in Parliament and they need the support of Canadians from one coast to another. This bill is in one small way an attempt by members of Parliament on all sides of the House to lend them that support.

All parties represented on the standing committee have urged the government to act on the status of the artists. The arts constituency is urging the government to act on this bill and the public at large is supportive. Our homework has been done. Thoughtful discussion and consideration have been given. The time for action has come. Bill C-7 is our opportunity to paint a new and a brighter picture for Canadian artists. Let us seize that opportunity.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, I wish to express to the minister our appreciation for his having brought this bill to light finally and to suggest to him that although the cup is only half full, I sincerely hope he is going to put every effort into completing the picture so that truly we can celebrate with full glasses of champagne, which I am sure the minister might want to indulge in tonight if he sees this bill finally going through.

It is with pleasure and some emotion that I participate today in this debate on Bill C-7 concerning the status of the artist and governing the professional relations between artists and producers in Canada.

I say with emotion because our creative artists who inspire us and reflect our collective soul are also, we must admit, the most poorly paid and often among the least fortunate in our society.

[English]

I think I can truly say that all members of our committee view this legislation as a first step in responding to the many serious needs of our arts community who are not just nation builders or educators but are custodians of the values other civilizations struggle to preserve.

To paraphrase Maria Tippett in her 1990 University of Toronto book which I have just enunciated, she expressed that very clearly. As Greg Graham said so well, even in a bill on the status of the artists, artists are marginal. This is not a bill for artists. It is a bill for arts' organizations and institutions.

That may well be, but the artist will also benefit in some measure from this bill, not to the extent that we would have appreciated, however. This bill is another step in public policy that attempts to secure the economic and social rights of the artists who are defined as you follow the peregrinations of this bill in a very circuitous route throughout the course of the beginning of the particular bill in question.

It is such a complicated route, I was going to outline it for everybody but I decided it would be far too lengthy and too complex, so I will just let it pass and let members read it for themselves and try to figure out how they are going to define themselves as an artist.

Culture is the sum of a country's shared perceptions, beliefs, conventions and values. It is what makes a country different from others. It is what indicates their uniqueness on the world stage.

In the 1979 task force on Canadian unity Coming to Terms, it was stated that:

> Culture draws individuals together, supports thought, judgment and action, gives a community its character and personality, differentiates it from other communities and encourages its members to seek common objectives.

A year ago, the Belanger–Campeau commission report—I see some of its members in this House—went even further in the definition of an artist and included artists in the following way. They said:

> Culture is the sum of the works which the artists of an entire people had gleaned from the collective imagination as well as from the habits, words, songs, and accents that represent the everyday expression of that people. It is its culture, nurtured and supported by creative artists and researchers, nurtured by artists, experienced by every element that breathes life into identity.

Clearly the arts help us to better understand ourselves, who we are, where we come from. Through the personal expression and performance of individual artists, we develop a better sense of our personal and collective identities. Canada's creators express the great diversity of this nation's people, and it is our strength.

A country's artists are key to its identity. They are a country's ID card and our artists are our seers. It is through our creators that society better understands itself.

As we travel the world or the world comes to our shores, it is our cultural identity that distinguishes us from other nations. They say we are a peaceful people. I hope we keep it that way, that we believe in fairness and equity. I hope we keep it that way, but that is what distinguishes us in the world of nations.

It is difficult for a lot of us if you think about it. How do you associate countries? You associate Russia and Tolstoy, n'est pas? I wish I could have said that in Russian, but I cannot. How do you dissociate France from Hugo, Ireland from Joyce, England from Dickens or Shakespeare and from a musical perspective we just had the world of Beethoven and his homeland rings clear as a bell in his musical cutouts.

I could go on and name many of the musical artists around the world, and you could almost immediately identify them with the country of origin. It is so easy, Rodgers and Hammerstein and American jazz. You think American jazz, do you not, when you think of the United States?

We have the same kind of ability right here. We are growing very quickly and we have some wonderful artists who are easily now identified as Canadians on the international arena.

Dr. Jean-Pierre Wallot of the National Archives during our committee hearings and in particular on The Ties That Bind, when we were looking at the Canadian Constitution and cultures' place within the Confederation said:

• (1810)

> The United States and France have a strong national identity. This national identity is constantly being nurtured. Through the erection of monuments, the collecting of archives, and through teaching in schools et cetera, a highly developed sense of patriotism and attachment to the nation is developed in these countries, even when deep splits exist.

During their lifetimes artists have challenged their countrymen and often were anything but celebrated in their own homelands. They were broke and they were exiled, yet they revolutionized their country's identities. Today it is our singers, performers, film makers, visual artists, broadcasters, writers, and dancers who bring culture to life. We have many successes and many stars in every field.

Unfortunately, far too often they are overlooked until they get an international reputation. They have not been seen very often as central to the formulation of cultural policies here in this country.

Paul Siren, who has been a proponent of the status of artist legislation for 20 years, is a stalwart in the field of the arts and a person upon whom we can count for wise counsel. In appearing before the committee he hit this point so eloquently. He said:

> We need to recognize the artist as a human being rather than simply as an appendage to some property rights, whether they're copyrights or the national conventions governing the insurance for the transportation of works of art, or other legislation that deals with a specific property. We want to be able to recognize the human spirit and the human contribution as an artist in the legislative sense.

That is what Bill C-7 attempts to do. However, it barely brings artists to the starting line and it only goes a small part of the way.

[Translation]

The former Minister of Communications described to the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture the plan of action which we must pursue. He explained that the absolutely unique working conditions of artists remain an obstacle which prevents them from having access to our social benefits. Their income is small and seasonal and often artists are not eligible for unemployment insurance because they are self-employed. The same restrictions apply to the workers' compensation program and the Canada Pension Plan.

[English]

It has been said that the greatest subsidizers of the arts are the artists themselves. Unfortunately the numbers prove that. According to Revenue Canada professional artists are the lowest paid group of workers.

In 1988 self-employed artists received an average income of $15,877, barely $1,300 a month. Higher on the list is the $18,298 received by farmers and $22,515 received by fishermen. The only group lower on the list is pensioners.

There is little understanding that artists' careers are not comparable to others.

It is interesting to note the portrait of the artist because it identifies the uniqueness of the skills and talents and the maturity that one very often sees in the artists. They are about 44 years old and self-employed. In most cases they have acquired 17 years of experience in their artistic field. They devote 35 to 45 hours a week to their art, and merely to subsist they spend another 10 to 15 hours a week on a job not directly related to art.

The net annual income derived from their art is $13,000 for dancers, $11,079 for authors, $11,444 for visual artists, $15,210 for actors, and $18,248 for musicians. There is also little understanding that culture is also a business, and it is both information rich and labour intensive. The arts industry employs 400,000 people. It is a big business. It generates about $14 billion in economic activity in culture and broadcasting. I believe the minister gave us a figure on the fall-out, I do not remember it but it was a very significant amount.

These figures demonstrate that cultural investments has direct economic benefits too. We often forget that. It is vital to our society. It makes the wheel roll.

I see another past chairman. This place is filled with past chairmen of the standing committee: the members for Edmonton Southwest and Portage—Interlake. That is very nice. Welcome.

Mr. Edwards: Thank you.

Mrs. Finestone: When the chairman of the Canada Council, Mr. Allan Gotlieb, appeared before the standing committee he described how perilous the situation has become for the arts community in this country. I am quite sure he has spoken into the minister's ear in a very diligent manner and tried to convince the minister to go and get some dollars from Treasury Board and that tight-fisted Minister of Finance, but to no avail. If they only realized the economic fallout they can derive from a small investment. I think they could receive about 11 per cent return, if not more, on their investment. What could be better than that?

I would suggest that we go back and speak to the powers that be to see whether we can remedy some of the crisis in the Canada Council.

This bill is about artists, and therefore I think it is important for the government to note that its cutting of the financial support is a serious threat to these very artists that it says it is trying to assist in this bill. There are some contradictory messages being sent. On the one hand we support artists and on the other hand we are sort of starving them a little bit, through a lack of financing that would be very helpful for their promotion and to their welfare.

Mr. Gotlieb said that the Canada Council, whose main client is Canadian artists, is financially going backwards. Its parliamentary appropriation for ongoing grants and services has been virtually frozen since 1986-87. The council appropriation has been declining in real terms since the mid-1980s. I am aware of the fact that our side is also guilty of some cuts that were unnecessary, in my view.

However, I would suggest that we can make it up. That would be very helpful to artists because since 1987 funding has increased by a mere 2.6 per cent while inflation has stood at 21 per cent over the same period.

We have had death by decrement and that is the result, according to Mr. Gotlieb.

However, the situation is quite different internationally. It is good to put things into perspective. Some of these countries that have a long history and have made their mark in the world over time have seen how important it is to invest in the cultural life of their country from all kinds of points of view.

A study conducted by the international cultural policy group of the Department of Communications pointed out that in the late 1980s levels of art support in Canada are below that of many countries. Canada Council per capita funding in the 1980s was below that of the arts council of Great Britain and about equal to that of the Australian council. However, both of these arts agencies have received substantial increases to their appropriation since then making them better positioned to address the financial difficulties facing the arts community in the 1990s. The Canada Council has not been so favoured.

It would appear that the government had the facts and understood the problems because this bill has had a very long history in the making. There has been an extensive process for which Parliament, all sides of this House, should be quite proud.

Bill C–7 had its genesis in 1980 with Canada's signature of the UNESCO recommendations in which signatory states agreed to consider the implementation of a broad range of policies to recognize and encourage the development of the role of the professional artist within society, including funding, training, professional status for artists and access to social programs such as health care, pensions and unemployment insurance.

In 1986 a task force headed by Gratien Gélinas and Paul Siren, after extensive consultations within the artistic community, presented 41 recommendations to the government on how to implement the spirit of the UNESCO declaration.

After that the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture issued two reports on taxation and the arts. In 1989 the standing committee studied and issued another report calling for the status of the artist legislation. I believe it is as a result of some of these pressures that this bill was finally drafted and introduced.

This is an act respecting the status of the artist and professional relations between artists and producers in Canada. That title would lead one to believe that this piece of legislation deals with many artists' issues, but beyond the title and the introductory part that deals with a set of principles and policy directions there is very little.

It brings artists to the starting gate. There is much more that needs to be done. Pages 3 to 36 address labour relations, remaining silent on issues concerning social benefits, bankruptcy protection, income averaging, et cetera.

This bill is largely a labour relations bill and as such does not address the concerns of independent writers and visual artists who are not engaged in this field.

It provides self–employed artists the right to collectively bargain through organizations such as ACTRA, Union des Artistes, and the American Federation of Musicians.

In order to receive recognition for the purpose of collective bargaining, organizations will seek certification from an independent commission known as the Canadian artists and producers professional relations tribunal. The efficacy of this independent body for the management of collective bargaining will largely depend on the quality and experience of the appointments made to it by the Minister of Labour, after consultation with the Minister of Communications. We made it quite clear we would have preferred that the Minister of Communications should be charged with making the nominations.

There are serious concerns being expressed about certain aspects of this nomination procedure because the minister involved is very closely related to and involved with decisions of the Canada Labour Relations Tribunal, and that is making widgets.

Madam Speaker, as an artist you know that the manufacturing trade and assembly plants are not exactly the milieu in which you work. Your conditions of work and the product you produce is not a widget. It is not a manufactured good. It comes from the heart, the soul, and the creative energy of people involved in this very particular field. It requires a very particular skill to be able to determine the right kind of answers in situations in which there are disputes that need to be settled.

The Canadian Conference of the Arts has pointed out that the experience of Quebec artists with the introduction of their tribunal was almost one of chaos because appointees did not have a background in the cultural fields.

During clause-by-clause I moved an amendment that would have had the Canadian advisory council on the status of the artist develop a list of appointees from which the Minister of Labour would be invited to make appointments.

This approach has a precedent in the Public Service Staff Relations Board and this amendment had the support of the artistic community that appeared before the committee. Unfortunately the government refused.

This bill also creates a permanent Canadian council on the status of the artist. This body's predecessor, the Canadian Advisory Committee on the Status of the Artist, was responsible for providing the impetus to progress on this issue.

As well, this advisory council created the Canadian artists' code, which has served as a benchmark for the development of policy and legislation.

The details regarding staffing and administration of the council are not part of this bill. There have been calls for the council to be "managed at arm's length" from the Department of Communications and other government departments or agencies for it to be able to reach the highest possible level of effectiveness. Here again we attempted to provide more openness.

This bill requires the council to make a report annually to the Minister of Communications but does not require the report to be made available to the arts community or the public at large. The whole point of making a report is so that the constituents and the constituency should be advised of what is going on.

Once again this amendment was rejected even though it had the support of the artistic community. The answer was that some things might be contained within this report that we do not not want the public to know about. That is a very poor excuse for not having an open process so that artists and our creators can air their views in the public arena.

Although I support this bill in principle and certainly will pass it with pleasure, as a first step, I have argued and will continue to argue that this bill is only half-full because there is so much left to be done from a socio-economic perspective for our Canadian artists.

Simultaneously the government did do some things that were worth while. With the tabling of this bill in the House the finance minister announced tax measures that will benefit artists. These were passed by the House in December 1991. The first concerned the income tax treatment of donations made by artists of culturally significant works of their creation and of expenses incurred by employed artists in connection with their artistic employment.

The second allowed employed artists to claim a deduction in respect of actual expenses incurred in the exercise of their artistic employment of up to the lesser of $1,000 or 20 per cent of their income from artistic employment. It is not exactly going to allow them much latitude.

However, even with those two measures the artists are still waiting for this government to take action on what is called income averaging provisions. All of us know that artists have rich times and poor times. If you are in any of the creative arts fields you have a period of employment and then all of a sudden there is a period of famine. You make sales of your creative works and all of a sudden sales dry up or you have to stop selling in order to create new product.

The standing committee unanimously recommended that artists be given the right to stabilize their income by setting aside a part of their artistic income in what was called an artist's account on which tax liability would be deferred and that the Income Tax Act be amended accordingly. The government in its response to that recommendation promised in 1990 only to examine income averaging provisions. It would seem to be the government's point of view that such allowances already exist through the liberalized RRSP rules.

The arts associations' view of the RRSP solution is one that is seriously flawed according to them. They argue that RRSPs were created to provide pension income not to serve as an income averaging device.

Bill C–7 does not address the government's commitment to protect artists' royalties from the bankruptcy of producers. In its response to the standing committee the government said it was prepared to protect royalties flowing from the copyright of self–employed artists against bankruptcies of cultural industries with which they contract and to propose the best measures to reach this objective.

Since the government's response it has introduced bankruptcy legislation. That was Bill C–22 which has just gone through this House. It does not have one single word or any protection for the artist in this life even though those promises were made.

The bill remains silent on the right of compensation by the government for the public use of works of art. While clause 2(e) was amended in committee to recognize the importance to artists that they be compensated for the use of their works including the public lending of them, it does not provide any formal recognition or mechanism of that right for compensation for public use.

In 1986 a public lending rights program providing compensation to Canadian authors for their works in public libraries was introduced. However, it has no statutory basis, which is what the standing committee has recommended. This position was reiterated to Parliament by the Writers' Union, the Canadian Conference on the Arts, CARFAC, SARDEC, the Public Lending Rights Commission itself and the Minister of Communication's own Advisory Council on the Status of the Artist.

We have argued on this side for the inclusion of statutory recognition, even suggesting that if it is not done in this legislation, hopefully it will be included in the new Canada Council legislation which will soon see the formal merging of the council and the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council. Let us hope the minister will hear that plea and include it at that stage when it comes before this House.

As you know, Madam Speaker, the unique working conditions of the artists put a major obstacle in the way of them gaining access to several benefits most Canadians routinely enjoy.

The fact that artists are often self–employed also denies them access to several programs such as wage loss insurance and extended health coverage or unemployment insurance which all employees get through their employers.

That is why the Standing Committee unanimously recommended right off that this bill on the status of the artist allow those who are members of certified associations to become "employees" for the purpose of the regulation on the insurable portion of a wage–earning job and that the Unemployment Insurance Act be amended in consequence thereof. That makes a lot of sense, does it not?

Second, the standing committee recommended that the Minister of Communications look into the need to establish private group benefit plans for creative artists as well as the viability of such plans.

• (1830)

In the government's response to this first recommendation a commitment was made only to continue to examine the eligibility criteria of the unemployment insurance program with a view to expanding coverage to artists within the framework of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

In response to the second recommendation the government passed off the issue to the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of the Artist to propose options to solve this problem.

The former Minister of Communications suggested the following possible solutions to make such benefits more accessible to artists: For example, could not the Canada Pension Plan contributions be determined according to gross revenue rather than taxable income? Could we not recognize for performing artists their status as employees under the Unemployment Insurance Act without impinging on their status as entrepreneurs under the Income Tax Act?

Has the current Minister of Communications investigated those options of his predecessor? Could he tell us what the conclusions are? What are the results of the government's promise to continue to examine the eligibility criteria of the unemployment insurance program? These matters remain unresolved. They are critical to the financial well–being of this sector of our important cultural enterprises.

Bill C–7 only applies to the National Film Board, the National Arts Centre, the CBC and federally regulated broadcasters. It does not apply to companies that receive money from Telefilm Canada for the making of films. It is really quite a restricted number of clients within the framework of this legislation.

When the minister was asked why he did not at least include Telefilm Canada the reason given was that the operation of companies falls under provincial jurisdiction. That may well be the case. Yet Telefilm requires certain Canadian content criteria when it gives money. Therefore, why could the federal government not provide within the context of this bill that when Telefilm money is involved in a film project, the status of the artist legislation would apply? I do not have the answer to that. It would be interesting to know some day if we could do that.

In conclusion, I would like to say that this has been a very interesting exercise. It has highlighted all the areas that need to receive some attention. I know Rome was not built in a day and so the status and the health of our artists is certainly not one I can anticipate, particularly at this time and unfortunately with this government. I would like to add that working together in the best interests of the arts and the artists in a collegial and non-partisan way and if we could continue in this mode of operation and if it could be extended to other committees, I do believe the well-being of Canada could be assured. We could see through these expressions the sense of hope and the sense of future that we can look forward to in this wonderful land in which we are privileged to live.

I would like to reflect at this point on the words of a cultural nationalist for whom I have a great deal of respect, Mr. Bernard Ostry. In a recent speech at Carleton University he said:

> Only developing the mind and imagination of Canadians can we survive with influence over our life and our community. Only by that influence can we come together, even if only in the old way we know so well, the way of agreeing to differ, of live and let live.

He went on to say: "One thing remains. We have to act". I might add it is my hope that the work for the Canadian artists has only just begun and we will work and act so that it may continue and flourish and grow.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Madam Speaker, it gives me much pleasure to have the privilege of being able to add a few words on this historic occasion on behalf of my colleagues in the New Democratic Party.

First of all, I also mention as the member for the Liberal Party and the minister did, how well we worked on the committee. We worked as a team. We were not in there trying to score political points. We were trying to advance the cause and the interests of the artists and we were doing this together.

Working on the committee shows the best of Parliament, the best of our democratic traditions and of this institution. I join both with the minister and the critic from the Liberal Party in expressing our wish that if more institutions of Parliament could operate the way our committee has operated, certainly this institution would be held in much higher esteem by Canadians. I would suggest as well we would be much more effective. Part of the problem with our committee is that you sort of go bump into the bureaucracy. In some ways it would seem to me that government members, including the minister, are caught in the hands of the bureaucracy.

I suspect, although the minister has never formally indicated this to us in committee or privately, many of the things we were suggesting the minister was in agreement with, but that also his hands are tied as were the hands of the governments members on our committee who very often and very openly expressed agreement with the things we are all proposing, amendments that were being introduced, suggestions that were being made. Their hands were tied. Perhaps some day we will have a committee system in which the politicians are the representatives of the people and will again become masters of this House and its committees.

Having said that, I commend all members on the committee. I commend the minister for the work that has been done that leads to this moment and it is an historic moment. I have heard both the minister and the critic from the Liberal Party mention that it has been some 40 years in discussion and debate. Sometimes progress is slow—40 years. Let us then also celebrate. Let us also celebrate, and I will mention this later in my remarks, some of the things that still need to be done. The fact is the glass is not half empty but half full. Therefore, my anticipation is that the movement is toward filling it and not emptying it.

In Canada, more than in many other countries, we should recognize the importance of culture. Art is like a mirror. It reflects who we are and through seeing who we are we become ourselves. We become more. We begin to gain our sense of identify, a sense of ourselves as people. Nationalism and patriotism could not have existed without the arts, without paintings, without song, without sculpture and without drama. A nation could not exist.

Its identity could not exist without the artistic reflections of that nation. It is essential.

This young country is struggling in an attempt to maintain itself and its identity, culture and the arts are vital to the survival of Canada as a nation. It is not easy. The job has never been easy for Canadians stretched across this huge geographic land mass from ocean to ocean to ocean, a society with many different peoples from many races and different parts of the earth who have come and lived here and with the different geographic districts and regions.

To begin to try and bring this together into a sense of oneness is not an easy job. It is not something that the state or some bureaucratic planners could bring about. It is only through giving its people the ability of expressing themselves and other peoples and other regions and districts being able to view and experience that expression that we can finally begin to bring together this nebulous notion of Canadian identity. I think we have been successful.

You cannot quite define it, you cannot exactly put words to it or measure it or weigh it, but we as Canadians know we are Canadians. We know we are different. We know we share some values that are different from the values of many of our ancestors in Europe or our friends and neighbours to the south or other locations on this globe. We know we are different because we have been able to see the reflections of other Canadians in the mirror through culture and through artistic expression.

Culture and the arts are more than just creating patriotism and nationalism. They help to bring forth our individual self-consciousness. Why do artists participate in this activity? It is certainly not a money-maker in terms of economic activity. Many of them will tell you that it is the challenge and the pleasure of exploring one's own self, one's own consciousness and expanding that and moving on to newer and higher levels.

As individual artists engage in that exercise, we as a collective all benefit from that. Not only do we as Canadians benefit from the artistic productions of Canadian artists, but in this day and age of globalization, through giving artists new tools for expression, new audiences which are global, a new form of consciousness also begins to arise and is allowed to arise. It is more of the global consciousness. It is a consciousness that begins to recognize the humanity of all. The universality of the human experience is now beginning to be appreciated as it has never been appreciated before in the history of the human race.

When the Beatles, for example, in the early 1960s started to use the sitar and the harpsichord, instruments from different cultures and different time periods, bringing them together into the here and now, we began to recognize that human awareness now spreads not only over all different cultures of this globe but also back in time, in historic time.

Through these artistic expressions a new global consciousness is arising. It is exciting and new. It points to a new human relations between peoples. It destroys the mystique of different cultures in the sense that those different cultures are now understood better and appreciated better through the understanding of the universality of the human spirit.

I appeal to my fellow artists in Quebec who are so concerned, and rightly so, with the national spirit of the collective consciousness of the Quebecois, of the French experience on North America, not to isolate yourselves, caught in 19th century nationalism, and escape the marvellous experience and opportunities of a global consciousness and a global awareness in which the experience, as expressed through its culture and the arts of the francophones, can be presented on the global stage and participate with the global human family.

I make that appeal because while I understand the origin and the importance and the drama and the poetry of nationalism, we are surely also living in this tremendous opportunity of living in a post-nationalist period. Surely the artists in Quebec would do themselves a disservice and the people and audiences in Quebec a disservice if they cut themselves off from that rich possibility of a more global and a more universal form of art.

While we celebrate the passage of this legislation, and I expect I will be the last speaker and that this House will unanimously give approval to Bill C-7, things must be said to indicate that this cup is only half full. More needs to be added.

The minister strongly indicated, and certainly the official spokesperson for the Liberals has eloquently laid before the House, the economic hardships that many artists face. While they have this important task of giving identity to themselves, they are hardly recognized in an economic sense. Next to the pensioners they are the lowest and the poorest as an occupational group in this country.

There are many things to be added. I was not entirely happy with Bill C–7. There were many shortcomings in the bill. Again, going back to how our committee worked, all members of our committee, whether they were government or opposition, recognized the shortcomings of the bill. Rather than trying to score political points and sitting here moving amendment after amendment, trying to hold up the bill and voting against it and doing all these things that opposition parties are supposed to do, we decided not to do that. We recognized there were more miles to travel.

Let us take what we have now. Let us try to approve as much as we can, given the possibilities and the state of awareness, not by the minister and the government members in this case, but by the bureaucrats. Let us go with that.

There was one very important amendment. I could not have voted for this bill and I could not have advised my colleagues to support this bill had the minister and the department not agreed to change that one section to allow for a closed shop.

The original bill was a step backward. Where a victory had been achieved, especially by the musicians to allow them to negotiate in a united way, the original bill would have forced them backwards. That would not have been acceptable to us in this party.

I am happy that the minister and the committee unanimously supported the minister and the government's amendments to the bill.

There are other problems. The definition of the minister is the Minister of Labour. Here we have the Minister of Communications introducing the bill. The bill came to the communications committee, not to the labour committee. It is the labour minister who in the end is referred to as the minister who sets up the tribunal and who is, for all intents and purposes, in charge of this legislation. This is obviously something that needs to be corrected.

We are concerned and we have expressed this. We suggested amendments. The tribunal should consist of people who should be nominated by the Minister of Communications or at least who have some input from the cultural organizations.

I am glad to see that the Minister of Communications will advise the Minister of Labour but the Minister of Labour need not heed that advice. We wish the legislation had been different and the Minister of Labour would have had to heed the advice of the Minister of Communications.

We are concerned that the Department of Labour, which is experienced and knowledgeable about industrial disputes, will look at the cultural sector in that same light. Culture does not produce widgets. The human relationship and the human dynamics are different. It is not on the industrial union model side. It is not on the industrial labour relations side. It is different. There are different practices and understandings that have been created in this field. We hope that this tribunal will understand that and will consist of men and women who fully and totally understand that and will be able to deal with potential labour disputes in this sector in a knowledgeable way and in a way that is sympathetic.

We hope that the rules, regulations and practices of the labour department will not be imposed on the cultural sector.

There are certainly indications around that different departments do not share the sensitivity and understanding of the arts and the cultural sector.

The other day I asked the Minister of Employment and Immigration about the job training program, professional job training, an essential element for artists and the training of professional artists in this country.

There was an important task force that brought down its report on December 1, 1991. The Minister of Employment and Immigration has not even responded to that. His department is the most important department when it comes to professional training. All sorts of important cultural institutions are dependent upon those training dollars—not a word from the department.

What I am hearing from within the department is that the people in the employment sector of that department who have experience and dealt with the arts community and the cultural community are not having their contracts renewed. The department is losing its ability, its expertise, in the cultural sector.

I am hearing from within the department that this minister is not interested in culture and the arts, that the job of the department is not to open the doors to the cultural community but rather to close them.

The arts community and the leadership in the arts organizations have not been able to meet with the minister. They have not even been able to meet with the deputy minister.

This is outrageous and I am afraid if the Department of Labour deals with the arts community the same way the Department of Employment and Immigration is dealing with the arts community, Bill C–7 might not produce the things we are all hoping it would produce today.

There is a lot more work to do and a lot to add to the glass to enable us to have a full glass of champagne to celebrate. Certainly we need more changes in the Income Tax Act to make it appropriate to the artists.

We are concerned as well, and the committee reported this in its report, about some of the constitutional changes. Are some of the politicians, provincial and federal, willing to shuttle the arts off to the side? I hope not. There is that concern.

We have concerns about the funding of artistic organizations and the artists themselves. There is concern about book publishing and the authors, trying to make certain there remains an industry in this country.

We are concerned about broadcasting and films, that Canadians are able to see their own films, their own cultural products. I go back to what I said before. A nation gets and develops its identity when it is able to see itself in the mirror and the artists create the mirror.

If Canadians cannot see each other through television and film, by reading books and magazines, if these are not available, if we all get sucked into that mass culture from south of the border and we lose our identity, as a country we have lost our soul and we have lost our reason for being. Then we begin to feel as Canadians that we are no different from other people south of the border. We really begin to lose our will of remaining as a separate nation, a separate people and a separate identity.

That would be so sad.

I believe, and I speak here as an immigrant, that what Canadians have achieved is something unique in the pages of human history. We have developed a society that has values and sensitivities and that is really the most civilized in the world.

The Prime Minister quoted that the United Nations, through some measurement, has considered Canada to be the number one place. I agree in this one instance with our Prime Minister and certainly with the United Nations. In many ways Canada is number one. We have and share values that in the evolution of our humanity are unique. It is at a high pinnacle. It is worth not just preserving but broadcasting to the world. It is a beacon of hope. The arts and the artists are the means of communicating that. These people help create and engender that.

Bill C–7 goes some way in helping them. I am certain all of us in the House will continue in our own way to make certain we begin to fill that cup so that it is not half empty but will become fuller and fuller and fuller.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With the permission of the House now that third reading of this bill has been concluded, I would like to tell the minister and all members who have been working on Bill C–7 for so many months and have been talking about it for so many years that it is for me—

—a very emotional moment as well as one of great satisfaction. I am fully confident that we can go the rest of the way together. I am truly honoured.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

CANADA OIL AND GAS OPERATIONS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–58, An Act to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act and other Acts in consequence thereof, as reported (without amendment) from a legislative committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Madam Deputy Speaker: There are nine amending motions on the Notice Paper concerning the report stage of Bill C–58, An Act to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act and other Acts in consequence thereof.

[English]

Motions Nos. 1, 2, 6, 7, 8 and 9 will be grouped for debate. A vote on Motion No. 1 will apply to Motions Nos. 2, 6, 7, 8 and 9.

[Translation]

Motions Nos. 3 and 4 will be grouped for debate and the vote on Motion No. 3 will apply to Motion No. 4.

[English]

Motion No. 5 will be debated and voted on separately.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke) moved:

That Bill C–58 be amended in clause 8 by striking out line 24 at page 4 and substituting the following therefor:

"environmental programs or studies or studies on evacuation systems; and"

That Bill C–58 be amended in clause 8 by striking out line 22 at page 5 and substituting the following therefor:

"ing procedures, evacuation systems and personnel".

That Bill C–58 be amended in clause 58 by striking out line 34 at page 30 and substituting the following therefor:

"environmental programs or studies or studies on evacuation systems; and"

That Bill C–58 be amended in clause 58 by striking out line 34 at page 31 and substituting the following therefor:

"operating procedures, evacuation systems and personnel".

That Bill C–58 be amended in clause 96 by adding immediately after line 25 at page 51 the following:

"environmental programs or studies or studies on evacuation systems; and"

• (1900)

That Bill C–58 be amended in clause 96 by adding immediately after line 22 at page 52 the following:

"operating procedures, evacuation systems and personnel".

He said: Madam Speaker, I will speak very briefly to this group of amendments to Bill C–58, the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act. The purpose of all these amendments is to insert specifically reference to studies and implementation and inspections of evacuation systems.

During both committee hearings and in other discussions outside committee there was a great deal of information relayed to many of us who had become involved in working on this legislation.

One of the areas in which significant progress had not yet really been made was coming up with safe evacuation systems that could be relied on in stormy sea situations such as those which gave rise to the disaster commonly known as the Ocean Ranger that cost some 84 lives just a little over 10 years ago.

For this reason and considering, if we go back to second reading debate, some of the concerns expressed at that time about the importance of effective and efficient evacuation systems for offshore oil rigs in emergency situations, we felt a greater degree of specificity ought to be accorded to the whole matter of evacuation systems in mentioning it concretely within the legislation.

One example I will quote as far as Motion No. 2 is concerned, for instance, in paragraph 5.02 found on page 5 of the bill under Safety of Works and Activities. The amendment would cause it to read:

> The minister shall, before issuing an authorization for a work or activity referred to in paragraph 5(l)(b), consider the safety of the work or activity by reviewing, in consultation with the Chief Safety Officer, the system as a whole and its components, including its installations, equipment, operating procedures, evacuation systems and personnel.

The effect of all the other amendments is simply to bring the other provisions of the bill before us into line with that change. That fairly clearly spells out the intent. It might be argued that evacuation systems are covered by the more general wording. However, concern was expressed by many to me and to a number of my New Democratic colleagues, particularly those who attended the committee from the province of Newfoundland where this tragedy was most closely felt. They believed it was important in order for greater onus to be placed on the need to develop, test and implement safe evacuation procedures that we have specific mention of that particular problem within the legislation itself.

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate all my colleagues on the work that took place in the legislative committee. There is no doubt that during the hearings we heard representation from many witnesses.

I want to be very brief. Our officials and I have had the opportunity to review the amendments of my colleague. Motions Nos. 1, 2, 6, 7, 8 and 9 are not required on each of the activities. We would certainly be turning down the amendment by my colleague.

On Motions Nos. 3 and 4, this is going to be considered as the drafting of the legislation takes place. There is no commitment today for zeroing in on one special group. There will be opportunity when the bill is being drafted for consideration of the workers and other individuals at that time.

On Motion No. 5, this ties down too strictly into one department. There is a combination of all departments that are involved in this legislation. Rather than zeroing in on one department, we believe that it is better that it is the entire operation of all departments involved in this. Again, we would be rejecting the motion.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I have had a very close look at the amendments and discussed them with my colleagues. I think I see the intent of some of the reasoning. I did not sit on the committee, but I reviewed the four committee reports. I have been in contact with three members and I see another one waving across the floor.

Essentially I do not believe that the intent of the bill will be changed significantly by these amendments. Without grouping them separately, I do not believe there is a necessity for the amendments. While I do have some reservations about the bill which I will express in third reading, I am quite happy with it the way it is with respect to these amendments.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, very briefly I want to intervene on these amendments put forward by my colleague. I sat on the committee for one of the sessions. I have had an ongoing interest in the legislation in the safety of workers at sea, whether they be on stable platforms or on vessels. I am flabbergasted that both the government and the Official Opposition do not want to include in the bill a reference that eventually will lead us to some form of safe egress from the platforms.

All the amendment called for is adding the words "or studies on evacuation systems" which would force the government, would mandate the government, to do some work on that. It has been 10 years. The Government of Canada has done diddly as I understand it to ensure that the research is done to find a way to take the workers off a platform in the event that one of the legs buckles or the seas become so strong that the whole structure is in danger. We know that you cannot get a helicopter over in that kind of weather. We know that you cannot get a ship close enough. There needs to be a way that those workers can get off that platform, which is high above the sea, safely into the water and withstand the kind of swells that will occur. I am flabbergasted that both parties have rejected that particular amendment.

The other one in terms of the comments from the representative of the government talking about the amendments that focus things on the ministry of labour, it is my understanding that the bill gives paramountcy to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In the event there is an emergency, it is up to the minister responsible for raising oil and therefore raising revenue who will make the decision on safety of this particular rig or this particular platform.

I argued in committee and I argued in the briefings that the parliamentary secretary gave to me that either the Minister of Labour or the Minister of Transport should be the one who is paramount. In consultations with my colleague who moved the motion, we decided that the best approach was for the Minister of Labour who has the ultimate responsibility for the health and safety of the workers. We do not feel the minister who is responsible for revenues, as it relates to energy of the economic development, should be the one who has that power.

Let us put a neutral person from the cabinet, from the government, in that position so that the workers will be the bottom line, not the expendable line.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I have had an interest in the particular subject from some long time ago when we dealt in this House with the tragedy of the Ocean Ranger and the difficulties surrounding the safety issues. I would like to support and concur with what my colleague said, that it is an absolute conflict of interest for the minister of energy to be responsible for the safety of the individual on the rig when it comes to pumping oil and raising revenue versus protecting human life.

They dealt with the ocean danger before and after the tragic event and tried to deal with an American company, Odeco, benefits for the families that went through tragedy and suffering. It was just a catastrophe.

I want to add a little bit more. My colleague mentioned the dilemma of extracting people, getting them out of the operation in very dangerous circumstances. I recall the morning after the Ocean Ranger disappeared. The Armed Forces were out in very dangerous seas. Maybe some of my colleagues in the House will recall the event on the front page of The Globe and Mail when there was a Labrador helicopter with rescue specialists hanging into the water searching for survivors after that event.

I can remember at the time the pilot of that particular aircraft, Mike Clark, in the opinion of many people here deserved a medal for the kind of activity that went on in that very dangerous situation.

The current purchase by the Government of Canada of $5 billion worth of military helicopters impinges on this. If we were taking that kind of money and spending it to ensure that these kinds of recommendations were put in place, we would be far better off protecting the lives and safety of Canadian workers.

We have seen a terrible tragedy in the coal mines in Nova Scotia. We have seen marine problems, but in terms of this helicopter purchase at $5 billion, it is an absolute obscenity. I suspect that right now, today, we could probably buy the Soviet nuclear fleet and turn it into junk for less than $5 billion.

I wonder exactly why we are making this purchase when we could be putting the money to work in terms of safety for workers involved in just the kind of proposals that my colleagues have put forward.

The present Armed Forces equipment with Labradors and Chinook helicopters is absolutely adequate. They need to be refitted with engines and then they can provide the kind of safety in equipment that both the member for Kootenay and the member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan have been talking about here today, and the proposers of this amendment.

The Labrador helicopters on the coast of British Columbia with the twin rotors are ideal equipment in mountain valleys where you need stability while you are trying to work in very careful environments. You need decent engines in those aircraft and those twin rotors give far more stability than the Prime Minister was trying to talk us into yesterday with a single rotor piece of equipment. They absolutely lack the stability.

At almost $5 billion, and we have seen over–run after over–run come into this, this is a disgusting proposal. I say we ought to be sending the Prime Minister to what is left of the Soviet Union to attempt to purchase the Soviet fleet. They would give it to us for less than $5 billion. We could scrap it safely. This purchase is absolutely insane.

We should be spending that money making the kind of safety improvements that we are dealing with. We do not need this purchase. I see the Minister of State for Defence here today. I would love to see her stand up in the House and justify this thing.

Mr. MacDougall: Mr. Speaker, I believe we are speaking to Bill C-58 and the amendments. I wonder if my hon. colleague would get back to the amendments and in other places he can debate other things.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Brightwell): I think that is probably a reasonable request.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I have always respected my hon. colleague's interventions but one of the things I have noticed in his interventions is that he does not know when people are on the topic or off the topic.

I will try to provide a little more elaboration in my remarks so that he understands clearly how important this is and how relevant it is to Canadians.

There is one more point, and it is especially important with the Associate Minister of National Defence sitting here. This $5 billion purchase of new military helicopters is absolutely irrelevant. We should be spending the money on the kind of safety improvements that my colleagues from Kootenay and Thunder Bay—Atikokan have been proposing to this House and we should not be involved in this insane squandering of money.

At the same time she might indicate what we are going to use the Aurora aircraft for.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Brightwell): I beg to interrupt the hon. member. I really do feel I would like him to come back to the topic before us. If he wishes to discuss expenditures as a whole as compared to this particular expenditure for safety reasons I think it is proper to do so.

The hon. member seems to be spending all his time on this particular issue and I do not think it is really in order.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate your guidance on this matter. I would certainly be prepared to yield the floor, under your wise guidance, to the Associate Minister of National Defence who might be able to explain to us why she is prepared to take that perfectly safe helicopter and scrap it and then squander $5 billion.

The remarks of the Prime Minister the other day were absolutely irrational and it is time we had the minister make some sane statements in the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Brightwell): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Brightwell): The question is on Motion No. 1. A vote on this motion also applies to Motions Nos. 2, 6, 7, 8, and 9.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Brightwell): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Brightwell): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Brightwell): In my opinion the nays have it.

The motion is negatived on division. In consequence Motions Nos. 2, 6, 7, 8, and 9 are negatived.

Motion No. 1 negatived.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke) moved:

That Bill C-58 be amended in clause 12 by striking out line 27 at page 9 and substituting the following therefor:

"isters who is representative of workers, a person designated by one of the".

That Bill C-58 be amended in clause 12 by striking out line 3 at page 10 and substituting the following therefor:

"tions, and at least one of whom is representative of workers."

He said: Mr. Speaker, the major reason for Motions Nos. 3 and 4 is to introduce into this legislation which is essentially, this part at least, health and safety legislation some tripartite representations instead of the bipartite nature of virtually all of the bill.

I must admit that one of the reasons for doing so has to do with perception. In addressing that I would like to read a letter I received in early April from the Seafarers' International Union.

It seemed almost beyond belief to me that after 10 years' investigation of this disaster in 1982 that we could have been constructing a bill dealing largely with the safety aspects arising from the Ocean Ranger disaster without close consultation among the government, the ministries involved, and those segments of organized labour most closely associated both with the industry and with the specific disaster which gave rise to this legislation, especially in an area such as safety which in every jurisdiction in Canada is recognized as being an area in which industry, labour and government must be closely involved, particularly in the development of the legislative and regulatory regime.

The letter I want to refer to, and it is in perhaps stronger language than I would normally use, is from the president of the Seafarers' International Union of Canada and is dated April 2.

He says:

> Let me firstly thank you for bringing Bill C–58 and its contents to our attention. The scoundrely attempt by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources to go through a legislative back door with safety legislation without the input of labour, regardless of its content, shows the blatant disregard this government and the oil industry truly have with respect to fair representation of the industry work force.
> This designed attempt by EMR to usurp the mandate of Labour Canada, a federal department which does utilize the consultative process with its clientele and is responsible for occupational safety and health warrants investigation. Why were labour representatives not invited to participate? What are the government and the oil industry hiding? As employee safety is an issue, is EMR the right department to responsibly handle it?
> This bill should be referred to a committee consisting of labour, management and government representatives for review.
> Thanking you in advance for your assistance in helping to achieve this goal in getting answers to the above questions.
> Yours fraternally,
> Roman Gralewicz,
> President Seafarers International Union of Canada.

As I said earlier in my remarks, I find it unfathomable in this day and age that the government would proceed with safety–related legislation and not have the closest consultation with all of the parties that are involved and all of the parties that are at risk.

More than capital is at risk in the oil and gas industry, as countless families, especially in Newfoundland and other Atlantic provinces have found out to their great sorrow. Surely it is time to learn.

The administration of the Offshore Oil and Gas Training Standards Advisory Board seemed the appropriate agency to myself and my New Democratic colleagues. We also felt, not only on this board but other advisory boards, that representation should be accorded to those employees who work in the industry.

It is not only the lack of consultation in this bill but the attitude of the oil and gas industry regarding organized worker representation across Canada which has not been an enlightened one. They are very resistant to having any employee organization, whether onshore or offshore. They have failed, as in a recent industrial accident, to have the appropriate kind of tripartite consultation taking place.

One of the results of that is that we have these disasters and we do not seem to learn from them. On the day–to–day administration of safety it is vital. In the development of the procedures and the technology and in matters of the appropriate training for the personnel on offshore rigs, there should be representation from those organizations and from those employees who are putting their lives at risk every day.

That is the purpose of these particular amendments and I would hope they would receive some favourable consideration.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, in advance of my remarks I would ask for a little time to develop the context into which these remarks fit. I notice the Minister of State for Transport laughing over there, but in this matter I really support what she has done. I know that she supports my colleague here 100 per cent in asking for equity for the workers and people directly affected by the safety of a situation. The workers have the right to be involved in it.

I would like to lay out for her a very serious case about safety in the transportation field. The Ocean Ranger has been quoted here often, but if you go to the coast of British Columbia, extricating an individual from a marine platform is often a very difficult thing.

The development of oil and gas off the coast of British Columbia has, from time to time, been advocated over the years. These are very difficult, dangerous waters. What concerns me more than anything else is the government's proposal to destaff the lighthouses and tear up the other safety infrastructure on the coast of British Columbia while it talks about these kinds of oil and gas developments and other marine structures. We recognize that the government has made the move under tremendous pressure to postpone or to temporarily stand down from withdrawing staff from these important safety features, the lighthouses.

We urge the Minister of State for Transport as an act of good faith to stand up in the House and say that the government is prepared to implement the report done by her department on the future use of lightstations. It advocated upgrading to provide greater safety to the travelling public. It advocated improvements by returning the person years to the department that the government removed from the lightstations along the coast of British Columbia. It talked about returning the person years and the budget dollars. We are looking at $1 million. We are looking at about 10 to 12 staff returned.

Perhaps the minister could stand up and talk to us in this House about the return of lightstations—

Mr. MacDougall: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member of the NDP has been in this House for many years. He understands the legislation and the clauses we are dealing with. I think that he will have the time and many other days to discuss lighthouses and whatever. We are concerned with trying to get the clauses of this bill through tonight.

I know a lot of my colleagues have given up their evenings to make certain to be here. I wonder if he could stick with the clauses of the bill so that we could get on with third reading.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Brightwell): I would ask the member to try to keep his speech relevant to the point. I think I stood twice the last time he intervened and I have stood now. I would hope he would not try my patience too far by continuing to diverge from the topic. Please relate comments to the topic of the bill.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again your guidance is appreciated. I take the remarks from my hon. colleague in the vein and value that they were given.

In concluding my remarks, I would point out that there is rarely an opportunity where the Minister of State is in the House and is asked to make a brief comment on implementing the FURL report and restoring the person years and the cash that was removed. If she would do that, it would be a tremendous opportunity.

As the hon. Liberal member is pointing to his watch, wanting to rush to wherever he wants to rush, regardless of the safety of the people who live on the coast of British Columbia, I will try to accommodate him if we could get some small commitment about implementing the FURL report, returning that cash to the lighthouse operations and returning those person years.

Mr. Mifflin: I want the record to show that the Liberal member who was pointing at his watch was not this hon. member.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Brightwell): It is on the record. Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): The only thing we do recognize is that that is probably the only member of the Liberal Party who can tell time, so there is no problem.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Brightwell): That is not a point of order. Is the House ready for the question?

The question is on Motion No. 3. A vote on this motion also applies to Motion No. 4.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Brightwell): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Brightwell): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Brightwell): In my opinion the nays have it.

Motion No. 3 is negatived on division. Consequently Motion No. 4 is also negatived.

Motion No. 3 negatived.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke) moved:

(a) by striking out line 36 at page 12 and substituting the following therefor:

"tion, where the Minister of Labour is of the opinion";

(b) by striking out line 45 at page 12 and substituting the following therefor:

"safety of persons or equipment, the Minister of Labour";

(c) by striking out line 18 at page 13 and substituting the following therefor:

"the Minister of Labour or the Governor in Council"; and

"(4) Before the Minister of Labour makes or revokes a declaration under this section, the minister responsible for the federal law that, in the Minister of Labour's opinion, is in conflict with this Act".

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is the last motion we are proposing. The effect of the motion is to touch on the ministerial override clause which is at page 12 of the bill where it states:

• (1930)

16.1(1) In a prescribed emergency situation, where the Minister is of the opinion that there is a conflict between the provisions of this Act or the regulations and the provisions of another federal law, other than provisions implementing an international treaty or convention to which Canada is a party, and that compliance with that law and this Act or the regulations is likely to create a situation that would seriously endanger the safety of persons or equipment, the Minister may issue a written declaration to that effect.

The purpose of the amendment in this regard is to substitute the Minister of Labour for the minister, which in the current context is the minister of energy.

The major reason is simply that the purpose of the clause we have before us is strictly to have a ministerial override for co-ordination and direction in the event of serious endangerment for safety reasons.

There is a lack of respect for the consultative process which is recognized by the federal jurisdiction and every provincial jurisdiction in Canada. Those jurisdictions recognize there has to be tripartite development and tripartite consultation given the total lack of recognition of that by this department and by the minister of energy in the creation of this bill.

My colleagues and I feel it is appropriate in health and safety matters that the ministry of labour, which has both the experience and the expertise and the habits of good consultation because it is required by its legislation, would be the appropriate one to have the ministerial override in the event of serious endangerment of the safety of persons involved in the offshore industry.

I will leave it at that and I think that is a good point to be made.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Brightwell): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Brightwell): The question is on Motion No. 5. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Brightwell): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Brightwell): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Brightwell): In my opinion the nays have it.

Motion No. 5 negatived.

Hon. Mary Collins (for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Brightwell): When shall the bill be read a third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mrs. Collins (for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to my friend opposite.

I am going to be very brief. This is a very important piece of legislation. Tragically, it has been 10 years in the making since the February 1982 disaster which affected so many people in Newfoundland and Labrador and across Canada.

This piece of legislation has been developed with the input of a tremendous number of people, certainly officials from a number of federal departments who have carried out extensive consultations themselves. The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Department of Labour, the Department of Industry, Science and Technology and certainly the Department of Transport consulted client groups and interested parties throughout the discussions.

Discussions have been held with a number of provincial governments that have been directly involved, not only in their ongoing responsibility for resource development, but also their responsibilities particularly in the areas of worker safety and health and safety regulations.

The industry, the workers in the industry and those who over a period of years have developed either in this country or particularly in the North Sea a capacity to understand the real risks that are involved in this business were also consulted.

There have been a number of discussions about amendments. Having participated in all of the hearings in the legislative committee, we had some very interesting testimony and some very good witnesses with whom we had the opportunity to discuss a number of important things.

Two of the important things that have come up in this House and in committee are our ability to to continue to develop the newest systems for evacuation and our ability to know that we have the best equipment and the best technology available to protect the offshore workers in this very dangerous business. That technology continues. That technology is supported by the federal government. It is supported by provincial governments. It is supported by the industry and it is certainly being supported and enhanced by labour groups in an ongoing way.

I recently met with the oilfield workers in Newfoundland. Some of the things they are doing are very much on the leading edge. This legislation not only allows for that but also encourages it. It makes it absolutely mandatory that everybody understands the regulations and everybody understands the systems that are in place and that they are approved before projects can proceed.

When the bill was first introduced in the House the question of the ultimate responsibility of the minister was debated. I think all members of the House will remember that the Hickman royal commission on the Ocean Ranger disaster recommended that one minister be responsible.

The task force which reported in 1985 or 1986 brought together many people who looked at the expertise here in Canada, looked at comparable regimes, particularly in the United Kingdom and Norway, and recommended that it be the minister of energy who played that role.

It is a role that ensures when this process of regulation, this process of ensuring maximum safety, of ensuring the best and the most advanced systems of evacuation and protection are put in place, ultimately one minister is responsible. I asked a number of people why it would be the minister of energy. The reason is that ultimately, this is an industrial project.

There is a substantial labour component and real responsibility not only for the federal Minister of Labour but also in some situations depending on the jurisdiction, the provincial Minister of Labour.

We are dealing with a ship and all the regulations that exist to govern ships and shipping in this country prevail today in this legislation. The Minister of Transport and his or her officials continue to play a very substantial role not only in the responsibility under all the shipping acts, the Canada Shipping Act and others, but also in the role that the Minister of Transport and the officials must play in the development of regulations that govern the offshore.

Ultimately, a minister has to be responsible. Ultimately, it must be remembered that this is an industrial project.

• (1940)

Ultimately it must be remembered that the first responsibility of these regulations is the health and safety of workers aboard rigs, the protection of those who depend on the seas for their living—such as mariners, people who depend on the fishery, those who must know that not only are the seaways safe but the ocean is clean and protected from pollution—from the tragedies that come from accidents.

All the responsibilities of the other departments come into play but when action is needed there must be one minister.

There is one other component that I would briefly like to touch on that is as important as any. All the regulations we have in place, all the systems we may put in place are of no value unless our people are properly trained in the use of those systems and fully understand their responsibilities as individuals, their responsibilities as part of a production or exploration team and their responsibilities to each other, not only for the preservation of the environment and their own lives but for the preservation of the lives of those people around them.

It is that training we must focus on. It is that training that we have done a lot of in the past. However, it is that training that needs to continue to be developed. We need to know that when those people are trained they are fresh, they are trained under the right conditions and they are trained to do the things that matter, not only in a crunch situation, when they are faced with a serious situation because of weather or mechanical problems, but day to day, hour by hour so that the workers know their responsibilities and can protect themselves and avoid the creation of accidents. It is a responsibility, in the situation I am most familiar with in Newfoundland and Labrador, that the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador has undertaken very seriously.

It is a situation that the Newfoundland and Labrador Oil Workers Society has looked at intensively. It has worked very hard to develop not only proper sources of training and proper courses but to ensure that their workers are as trained and as skilled and as capable as possible so they can contribute to the job they are doing that they are very proud of. Many Newfoundlanders and Labradorians have been working offshore and around the world for well over 20 years, and some for longer.

We have a capacity in Newfoundland and Labrador today because we have undertaken a number of technological advances and innovations and because we have worked so hard on training. We have the potential to export that skill and export skilled workers and give them the opportunity to work around the world when the opportunity is not available at home. That is something we do not like. We do not like to have to go overseas but we recognize that it is something that is important.

This legislation will ensure that as we develop the offshore—be it off Newfoundland and Labrador, be it in the Arctic or off the coast of British Columbia—those who are actually doing the work on the site can do their job knowing that they and those around them will be safe. It will ensure that they know that the environment, which is so fragile and with which they have a balanced relationship, will be protected and that if there is an emergency they can respond in a way that is responsible and positive and that contributes to a solution to the problem not to the problem itself.

In February 1982 this tragedy brought a lot of sadness to a lot of individuals, families and communities, and to our whole province and, I would suggest, to our country. In many ways the passing of this legislation signifies the passing of a time. The hurt and the loss will never be erased or eradicated. The hurt and the loss will never be compensated. It never can be. However there should be some satisfaction that we now have in place a mechanism that will ensure the top level of safety.

We can never guarantee there will never be another accident. Anybody who suggests that we can is misleading themselves and anybody else who listens. However, we can guarantee that we have the best tools and the best skills available.

This legislation ensures that, and assures it to the people directly affected and indirectly affected, those who depend on our oceans and our frontiers.

I commend the House for the work that has been done by all parties in first and second reading and particularly commend the work of the legislative committee and the work done this afternoon. I commend this legislation to the House for its consideration.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I want to congratulate my hon. colleague from St. John's East for his presentation on this bill which is very important to him, to me and I am sure to all Canadians, in particular those of us who live in the areas where offshore oil rigs have been the order of the day in the recent past.

I would perhaps like to take more time than I would normally because this is the first time I have spoken on this bill. It is important to give the perspective under which the the bill developed, how it came about and why it is addressing what it is addressing.

Between 1970 and 1990, I do not have the figures between 1990 and 1992, 123 oil rigs were destroyed and over 1,300 lives were lost. The one that we are all concerned with mostly today is the Ocean Ranger tragedy. I will speak about that later because the Ocean Ranger tragedy is related directly to the recommendations of the report and the bill itself.

Just imagine this. In the North Sea on July 6, 1988 an oil rig called the Piper Alpha had an explosion that ripped through its steel superstructure. After a series of explosions and fires the rig was destroyed. One hundred and sixty-seven lives were lost but 61 people miraculously escaped by jumping 175 feet into the water and by sliding down the hoses, sometimes accidentally and sometimes on purpose, in a raging storm in the North Sea.

With that background we can understand the necessity and the concern of all members who have spoken on this bill at first reading, second reading, report stage and now. It does concern safety. It concerns life. It concerns the very reason we are here, to protect life and to make it better.

I now want to address the Ocean Ranger. I do not want to go into all the details of the tragedy, but on February 15, 1982 during a severe Atlantic storm a semi-submersible drilling unit, the Ocean Ranger which was the largest of its kind in the world at the time, capsized and sank 166 nautical miles east of St. John's, Newfoundland. All 84 men on board perished.

In response to the tragedy the Governments of Canada and of Newfoundland and Labrador appointed the joint Royal commission on the Ocean Ranger marine disaster. It was called the Hickman commission and was chaired by the Hon. T. Alexander Hickman, who is now the Chief Justice of Newfoundland.

In August 1984 the commission submitted its initial report that dealt solely with the facts and events pertaining to the ocean disaster. In 1985 the commission submitted its final report that dealt with the broader issues of petroleum operational safety off the Canadian east coast.

It was a comprehensive report. They were comprehensive hearings. The report contained 136 recommendations. On April 14, 1986 the Government of Canada released a status report of the initiatives it had taken in response to the Hickman commission's recommendations. This report indicated that 85 per cent of the commission's recommendations had been implemented in whole or in part.

The commission recommendations that had not been addressed included those dealing with the consistency of regulations of offshore operations and those recommending maintaining the approach of having a single agency exercise regulatory control over mobile operation drilling units.

• (1950)

At the time of the status report's release it was also announced by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources that he had been given a mandate by cabinet to develop legislative and administrative procedures to address the royal commission's remaining recommendations. To assist the minister in this regard, a private sector task force on Ocean Ranger regulatory recommendations was appointed. The minister requested that the task force prepare proposals, not only for mobile drilling units, but for all types of equipment used in frontier land petroleum activities.

This task force to which I am referring was chaired by Mr. Roland J. Harrison and was known as the Harrison task report and was made up of three specialists: Mr. Harrison, with expertise in oil and gas law, Vice-Admiral Dan Minguay, who had recently retired as the vice-chief of the defence staff, an expert in marine operations, and Dr. Pallister, a Calgary oil and gas industry consultant and who had previously been the vice-chairman of the Science Council of Canada—all expert advice.

They consulted extensively with provincial and industry experts and they examined the regulatory regimes for offshore petroleum operations in the United Kingdom, Norway and the United States. The task force submitted its report, The Promotion and Enhancement of Safety in Oil and Gas Operations on Canadian Frontier Lands, on July 31, 1986.

As a result of this report and that of the Hickman commission, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources developed the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act, a proposal for amending the legislation governing petroleum operations on frontier lands.

The effort of which I have just spoken culminated in this bill, C–58, an act to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

This bill received first reading in the House of Commons on February 20 of this year second reading on April 9th of this year four committee reports, and now we are here for the third and final reading.

There is a lot in the bill and I do not want to repeat a lot of the excellent material that my hon. colleague from St. John's East presented. I know that he sat on the committee and although I did not sit on the committee I have reviewed the testimony of the committees. Certainly there were a number of things that would impress one, having read these committee reports. I want to bring to the attention of the House the two principles of safety that were brought out by Mr. Harrison in his report.

It is very important when you are looking at this legislation to understand these principles. The first one is regarding safety. It reflects the fact that responsibility for the safety of oil and gas operations must rest squarely on the shoulders of those engaged in the operations and of the suppliers of equipment used in the operations.

I am going to use the words of the task force report: "It is fundamentally the responsibility of industry to undertake its activities in a safe manner".

The second principle is that the proposed regime reflect the fact that safety ultimately results not from mere compliance with regulatory requirements as we have here today, nor necessarily from using the best available equipment, but rather from the proper integration of equipment, procedures and personnel. It is an integrated thing.

Those principles have to be borne in mind when you look at the bill and it was for that reason I had some difficulty with some of the amendments.

The purpose of the bill is very simple. It is designed to deal with the technical aspects of regulation of oil and gas and the safety of the installations involved.

I want to get to the main points of the bill. I want to make a personal comment and then I want to state a reservation I have but it will not prevent me or my party from agreeing with the bill. Nevertheless, it is a reservation that I would like to state.

There are essentially nine issues in my mind that this bill addresses. I will go through them as briefly as I can.

The first and probably the paramount one is related to the fact that over and above marine activity, because it happens on the seas, you have another activity, an industrial activity. Both these activities are very hazardous. Sometimes marine activity is more hazardous than industrial activity and vice versa. It is because of this that we have the difficulty of who is the responsible person. Quite frankly, the bill addressed it very nicely.

The bill essentially says that in an emergency situation in which the safety of personnel or operations is in jeopardy, the federal energy minister will override all other federal legislations in accordance and in response to the emergency. This override position will ensure that emergencies are immediately responded to in an efficient, co–ordinated manner.

I would have to add at this juncture that I will be looking forward to the regulations that will follow from the legislation once and if it is passed.

The second point is that on every petroleum facility operating on frontier lands, an installation manager who has to be expert in both marine and industrial petroleum operations will be in charge at all times. The qualifications of this manager will be prescribed in regulations and his responsibility will include the safety of all personnel as well as the safety of the facility itself.

The third point is that operators will have to obtain a certificate of fitness issued by an approved independent body in order to obtain the authorization required to conduct petroleum activities. I am not going to go back to any of the disasters. It is not my job here or that of anybody else to go back and look at the causes of accidents. That is encompassed in the bill.

It is significant that a certificate will be required for any facility, installation or equipment defined in regulations and will verify that it is fit and complies with all appropriate regulations and requirements. The certificate will further verify that the facility, installation or equipment can be operated safely for the intended purpose without threat to the environment.

The fourth point is that operators of equipment or facilities used in petroleum operations will have to issue safety declarations to the regulator in order to obtain authorization. These declarations will verify the appropriateness of the operating procedures as well as demonstrating that personnel are qualified, competent and have received appropriate training.

The next point is that a chief safety officer and safety officers will be appointed as statutory officers responsible for independently monitoring safety standards. In other words, this is not self-monitoring. A safety officer will be appointed. There will be somebody overseeing this. I believe that is very important.

The minister must consult with this chief safety officer before issuing any work authorization through his officials. The officer will be responsible for reviewing the system as a whole as well as its components, including all the installations, individually and collectively, the operating procedures and the personnel.

The next and probably one of the more important aspects of this is that an offshore oil and gas training standards advisory board will be created to encourage the development of new training standards, qualifications, accreditation standards and course assessments for positions on offshore facilities. The appointments to this board will be made by the federal energy minister in consultation with the Newfoundland and Nova Scotia energy ministers.

Training with regard to the things that are hazardous is probably, after the regulations, the legislation and the administration are set up, the most dynamic part of this whole business. You can have it all but without the training it is no good. I have taken a personal interest in these events for reasons that my hon. colleague from St. John's East has mentioned. We have made it our business, irrespective of our parliamentary responsibilities. I have learned and I am pleased to learn that in terms of training and training standards work has been going on for the last six or seven years in developing qualification requirements for individuals working offshore.

Shortly after the Ocean Ranger disaster anyone working offshore had to have rather extensive survival training. I use that in a qualitative sense. Experts could argue with the degree. The important thing is that the training was intensive. Also it is important for people who work offshore that it is not treated as an onshore facility without proper training in things that are marine.

In addition to the other points I mentioned, an oil and gas administration advisory council will be established as a forum for inter-agency promotion of consistency and improvements in the administration of the regulatory regime across frontier lands. In particular, the council will seek to avoid any inconsistent or duplicative requirements which could jeopardize the safety of frontier petroleum activities.

Of the two final points the penultimate one is that the member of the council will be the chairman of the two petroleum boards. A representative will be designated by the federal minister and a representative will be designated by each of the Newfoundland and Nova Scotia energy ministers.

Finally, when a serious spill, accident or incident occurs as defined in these regulations, the minister must order that an independent inquiry will be held to investigate its cause. I do not think it was really that necessary to have it there, but it is always nice to dot the *i*s and cross the *t*s.

It is important to me that the province of Newfoundland in my case, and the province of Nova Scotia in the case of others here tonight, have signed the frontier development accords with the Government of Canada. The two territorial governments, the Newfoundland and Nova Scotia petroleum boards and the industry itself have indicated their support for the amendments that have culminated in this bill.

I have a reservation and it is one that I think should go on the record, but I add that I do not think it should hold the bill up. The Hickman commission emphasized the need to impose a graduated scheme of penalties for failure to comply with the regulatory requirements and to ensure the severity of penalties reflecting the significance of non-compliance.

That was not really addressed specifically in the bill. I would not say it was totally disregarded, but specifically as a series of graduated penalties it was not there. I am hoping that perhaps this could be picked up in the regulations as we develop further from the backbone of this particular legislation.

By way of conclusion and if I could be permitted a personal note, I do not mind saying that I have been involved with this bill from the night of the Ocean Ranger tragedy. I happened to be in New York at the time. It was a very bad February night in New York, the middle of February. I remember watching the television. When I heard what I heard I could not believe it. I said: "It is a nightmare".

In the aftermath of the disaster Chief Justice Alex Hickman was appointed as the chairman of the investigative committee. He came and sat in my office in another role I had at the time. We discussed at the very beginning of his investigations some of the aspects of the tragedy and where it may end in the sense of regulations and what recommendations would be taken. Little did I know I would be standing here tonight as the spokesman and associate energy critic for the Liberal Party making comment on it.

I then attended many of the hearings of the Ocean Ranger inquiry itself, read the reports, and I supposed followed the progress of this activity as it progressed.

There is criticism that it has taken 10 years. I am not going to engage in that criticism tonight. There is not a lot we can do about it. The fact that the bill is here tonight, I am thankful for and grateful for. I know it does take a lot of work and a lot of time. If it is any solace, if it is any consolation, perhaps the bill is more complete and more thorough because of the thoroughness of the Hickman report and the Harrison report themselves.

I suppose my final comment on this bill would be that on February 15 this year I attended the memorial service for those men who were lost in the Ocean Ranger tragedy. I had an opportunity to speak with a few of their survivors. It was a very solemn moment, but I got a message from them and from others who knew them.

They do not want to prolong the agony. It is something they want to have over. They have put their lives in order. It has left a scar on their lives forevermore, but there were two things they wanted to know. They wanted to know when something was going to be put in law. The second thing they wanted to know is when it is put in law, when the legislation does come forward, will it prevent another disaster like the Ocean Ranger?

I am pleased to say that the legislation is here. In my opinion, in the opinion of my party and I think in the opinion of the House, it will prevent another tragedy such as the Ocean Ranger.

We are supportive of this bill and I personally am privileged and honoured to have the opportunity to speak on it this evening.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, I listened with care to the remarks of my colleague. I understand and appreciate that he, especially as a representative of the province which was most heavily victimized by this particular tragedy, has both personally and in his role as a public representative very strong feelings and concerns about the subject at hand.

I face a problem with this legislation. Generally we are supportive of it. We had some amendments that we utilized as a means of expressing some concerns. We do feel this is a legitimate and longstanding expression of concern by many people in government, both elected and within the bureaucracy and the staffing of the various departments involved. It was a major piece of work to achieve what we all hoped would be the goal of a safe and efficient work place in the offshore.

While my own background is in health and safety and mostly in the lumber industry, I still hold a seaman's card and worked on the ships off the west coast for a number of years. My father was a seaman for some 45 years but involved in a lot of life-boat drills. My dad was almost killed in one when a 500-pound tackle almost crushed his skull at one point.

Even though we go through all those drills in that industry, and especially when there are passengers at stake, we ever have enough familiarity with what is likely to happen in a disaster when it happens, especially a disaster such as the one that happened in the heavy seas off the coast of Newfoundland on that tragic day a little over 10 years ago.

We cannot predict the sea. The only thing we can predict is that it will be unpredictable at times. She is a hard master or mistress, I guess as the case is, and can be very unforgiving. I would like to read into the record the remarks from one witness before the committee, Miss Cynthia Parsons, the former chair of trustees of the Ocean Ranger Families Foundation. The foundation was funded by government and private donations and was served by a board of directors drawn largely from the community and the families. The government fund ceased in December 1986. The foundation has closed its offices and has not been active since 1986.

• (2010)

Miss Parsons accompanied Mr. Clay Newhook to the committee and gave short testimony. I think it is important to put the whole disastrous matter into perspective. I will read into the record her few words. Miss Parsons said:

> In the early morning of February 15, 1982, the drilling rig Ocean Ranger sank in a violent winter storm off the Grand Banks, killing everybody on board. Nobody in the industry, in government, in the community, in the families were prepared in any way for the disaster. My husband Clyde died that morning, leaving me with two small children.
> At present, ten and a half years later, most families have put their lives back together. However, all of us carry scars from this tragedy and will never forget the experience.
> We found no comfort in the findings of the Hickman commission. When all of the evidence had been sifted, it was clear that with proper training and appropriate safety precautions the rig need not have sunk. Indeed, it was also clear that every corrective action taken after the first major incident only added to the certainty of the disaster.
> It further appears that if the rig had been shut down completely after the panel and the ballast control room flooded, the Ocean Ranger and its victims would have survived.
> It is not necessary for our purposes today to take you through the history of the Ocean Ranger story. However, two questions need to be asked, which is mainly why I am here this morning.
> First, while we are pleased to see that many of the recommendations of the Hickman commission are being reflected in federal and provincial legislation, I have to ask why this has taken so long.
> Second, is the committee satisfied that we have all learned from the Ocean Ranger incident to prevent such a tragedy from ever happening again?
> The Ocean Ranger Families Foundation closed its offices in December 1986. There has been no independent agency to watch over this industry and the regulating agencies, nor has there been much offshore activity off the coast of our province. However, we are poised for renewed activity both in drilling and production. We, the public, must now look to our governments and the oil and gas operators to safeguard the public interest in the hostile environment. Failure to do so would mean not only more loss of life but also that my husband would have died in vain.

The major comment I want to make is that when I first came to this place, one of my concerns was that politics was often too full of people who were still idealists and especially idealists about the workplace. While I know that the input of many public servants and politicians to this legislation has the best intent in the world, I also know and many of my colleagues know that as people who have worked in industry we recognize that the best laws and regulations, unless they have ongoing inspection and ongoing enforcement, are not going to accomplish the goals we set out.

That is one of the reasons we have continuously hounded—I think that may be the appropriate word—this government on this bill and on other bills having to do with health and safety.

There is the importance of establishing tripartite representation on a continuing basis at every level through all of the responsible agencies to ensure that the goals and objectives of our laws and regulations are lived up to on the job. For those of us who have worked for years on the job, we know that safety is never in practice the prime consideration.

Anyone who expects safety to be the prime consideration on the job quite frankly is a damn fool. The world does not work that way. It never has, and it never will, even on the part of some employees in industry who get familiar and say: "I have been doing this for years. My family has been doing this for years. We can handle this". It is the risks that go with it that tend to some time, to their own peril, adopt attitudes, and some time ignore and take short cuts that lead to these kinds of tragedies.

Our purpose in law and our purpose in setting up regulatory mechanisms is to minimize the chances of that pattern of behaviour happening whether in employees, among management, in middle management or in government regulators.

We recently had another industrial disaster at the Westray mine in Nova Scotia. I hope that it will not take 10 years to learn and implement the lessons that we learned from that disaster. I read through the background notes on the legislation now before us, especially when it came to the description of the duties and the responsibilities of the chief safety officer, the chief conservation officer or installation manager.

My colleague from the Official Opposition a few moments ago gave quite good praise I think to the delineation of responsibilities which is fairly clearly set out in the legislation. That is set out. In every act and set of regulations there is a provision for exemptions.

One of those same kinds of exemptions I suspect will be found to have caused the most recent major industrial disaster in this country. While the laws and regulations in the province of Nova Scotia set out that there must be coal mining inspectors, the minister waived that and instead had hard rock mining inspectors investigating in that coal mine.

There is not an insistence on a day-to-day basis by representatives of both management and employees and government that keep a continuing watch on the application of the laws and the regulations that we construct.

With all the best intent in the world, and I am sure all of us here have that, we are living in a dream world to think that management, government inspectors and employees will do what is necessary to create safe work places, especially in these most hazardous potential conditions, unless there is an ongoing process where they keep tabs on each other, on their purposes and on their practices on a day-by-day and sometimes minute-by-minute basis.

We tried through a number of our amendments—again, some of them were simply there in large part to make a point—to attempt to stress the importance of developing evacuation systems. I know a lot of work has been done. We are aware of that, but we still have not developed, according to everything we heard, a system that will work.

If we want to put some priorities on human life and on human life in the work place, especially when there are large numbers of lives at risk, surely we as a society ought to get some of our financial priorities right.

If we can put men and women in the most hostile of environments, in outer space, and have them floating around and bringing vehicles together and pulling them apart surely it is not too much to expect that we could keep people alive in the water, evacuate them with some security and safety and get them into vessels to keep them alive for reasonable periods until we can bring them back to shore. If the will is there and if we are willing to place a high value on human life, as we do on many other objectives in this society and in other developed societies, we can accomplish that.

However, unless we set ourselves some specific targets and say that efficient, effective evacuation systems are a must then that is going to get by-passed, particularly when the overriding responsibility is with the ministry. For all the excellent people involved in it the ministry's prime objective is the production of our energy resources and the maximizing of both private and governmental revenue from those resources rather than the safety and security of people who work in hazardous industries.

In conclusion, if we want a regime that protects people's lives it must be a regime that sets up on an ongoing basis, not just sketched out in regulations or in law but in living, breathing people who we pay to be involved at the bottom level, as well as the medium and upper levels, to insist that all maximum measures are taken to comply with both the letter and the spirit of that law and of those regulations. Otherwise, we are just a bunch of flaming idealists and nothing will happen to make the oceans or the rigs any more secure for the people who work on them or for the communities they come from.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Could I find unanimous consent of the House to call it ten o'clock p.m. so we could proceed with the Adjournment Debate?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am doing better this week in getting unanimous consent.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

VISIBLE MINORITIES

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Madam Speaker, I rise with respect to a question that I posed to the Deputy Prime Minister and that was responded to by the Minister of Justice as recorded in the House of Commons Debates of May 4.

My question concerned the rejection, until that point, by the government and the Official Opposition of a proposed amendment to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms that would have provided for a commitment on the part of governments to preserve and promote racial and ethnic equality.

I take this opportunity to point out that under present circumstances equality and non-discrimination rights are provided for in section 15(1) of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

That provision is subject to section 33 of the charter which is the notwithstanding clause. That clause provides of course for legislatures, including the Parliament of Canada, to override the rights which are set out in section 15(1).

The essential effect of those two sections in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms is to provide an explicit declaration of the inequality of the groups listed in section 15(1).

My specific reference in the question was to ethnic and racial minorities because the proposition was advanced that would amend section 27, which presently provides for the preservation and enhancement of the multicultural heritage of Canadians, such that it would provide for a commitment by those governments to preserve and promote racial and ethnic equality.

Since that question was posed to the minister, the province of Ontario has advanced propositions for the inclusion of the recognition of racial and ethnic equality in the Canada clause and in fact proposed the amendment to section 27 that I just set out.

I understand as well that the government in the negotiations which took place last week expressed some support for some form of expression of that principle of a non-contingent recognition of racial and ethnic equality in the revised Constitution which we hope will result from the present constitutional negotiations.

In my question, I identified the refusal of the Leader of the Official Opposition to support this proposition, a position that the Leader of the Official Opposition still maintains.

In fact, in recent correspondence the Leader of the Official Opposition launched upon a defence of the notwithstanding clause which did not address the issue yet to this day whether the Liberal Party is able and willing to recognize the principle about which I asked the Minister of Justice.

Therefore my intervention here takes the form of inquiring what is the present status of that proposed amendment? What is the position of the government with respect to it?

I want to make reference as well to the latter part of the minister's answer. She seemed to exhibit some misapprehension of my understanding of the role of the charter and attempted to therefore explain the implications of what I said which I fully understood in the first place and that is what I said required amendment.

The minister had an interesting final or penultimate sentence in her response. She said: "I do think that we have within the hands of responsible authorities at all three levels of government in this country enough legal devices to do the job". Now we must construe that what she was talking about was the enforcement of the principle of equality through actions of government and in legislation.

Madam Speaker, I would only say this in closing since I see that you are demanding I do so. There is much outside of that context that needs to be done but the establishment of a principle in the Constitution that all Canadians are equal is of fundamental importance. It is an issue I hope this government and the Leader of the Official Opposition and the Official Opposition collectively will support.

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I have quite detailed information from the Justice Department and I am hoping that if I am not able to read all of it into the record that the balance will be placed on the record.

The multicultural and multiracial character of Canada was officially recognized by the federal government when the federal multiculturalism policy was introduced in 1971.

Since then equality rights and multiculturalism have been entrenched in sections 15 and 27 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The Canadian Multiculturalism Act was passed in 1988. As well federal, provincial, and territorial human rights laws prohibit discrimination on the basis of race and colour.

• (2030)

In view of Canada's increasing ethnic diversity the Department of Justice is taking steps to consider the multicultural nature of Canada's society in the development of policy and discharge of responsibilities.

The principles of a fair and equitable justice system are basic to the goals of the Department of Justice and apply no less to our approach to multiculturalism.

All Canadians should enjoy uninhibited access to the system including legal assistance, victim/witness services, recourse to the courts, and other legal mechanisms for redress and resolution of disputes.

The Department of Justice is committed to promoting a harmonious multicultural society.

Madam Speaker, I would like to table the balance of my response.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Would there be unanimous consent for the hon. member to give the balance of his answer to Hansard?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: The portion of the response tabled is as follows:]

Immigrant populations need to learn as quickly as possible about the laws regulating important aspects of daily life and ways to get information about the legal system.

They also need to use and to feel comfortable using the Canadian justice system. In addition to its cost-shared access to justice programs, such as public legal education and legal aid, the department conducts research and supports pilot projects in order to assist service delivery agencies to improve the delivery of justice services to members of multicultural groups.

Lawyers and judges and, indeed all justice system professionals, must be sensitized to the various ethnocultural clientele they will encounter, and the laws and legal process must be clear to all Canadians, regardless of their first language. The department is supporting the Canadian Judicial Centre and the Western Judicial Education Centre in their efforts to provide judges with training to sensitize them to cultural differences of minority groups.

Further, the department is committed to hiring practices which will increase the representation of visible minority personnel to better reflect their representation in the population. Awareness training concerning multiculturalism is being provided to managers in order to enhance the notion of "inclusive justice" which means making the justice system more accountable, more responsive, and more reflective of the interests and value of all Canadians.

I should add that the compounded inequities encountered by minority women will be considered in all research by the Department of Justice. One of the most powerful messages delivered at the National Symposium on Women, Law and the Administration of Justice hosted by the Minister of Justice in June 1991, was that visible minority women face multiple disadvantages resulting from gender bias and racism.

The Department of Justice is committed to work with the provinces and concerned groups to ensure fair treatment of all people who become involved in the system and to eliminate barriers affecting visible minorities.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I rise on the question that I asked the Minister of Employment and Immigration, a question relating to an event in my riding that goes back to February 21 of this year.

I think the fish processing plant in Port Union is going to become a very well-known plant because this is about the fifteenth time that I have been up to speak on this subject. I will be up 15 more times, until I get some kind of an answer or some kind of redress to the question that I have been asking.

It is a very simple question. On February 21 this plant, on the tip of the Bonavista peninsula in the town of Port Union, closed. It employs 1,200 people and at the time all those working were laid off. The crux of the question was that are 80 families, less than that at the time because of other events that have occurred, that were not covered by unemployment insurance. Some of them had two weeks, three weeks, or four weeks.

My basic point has been that since the government is responsible for managing the fishery, it has been responsible for eight years, and since the fishery has failed dismally then it is my belief, and it is shared by others, that the government has some responsibility to those people who through no fault of their own are without work, without fish, without income, and now they are almost without food.

I am not known in this House for dramatizing, exaggerating or over-emphasizing. However, I cannot emphasize with more vigour, enthusiasm and feeling the need of those people who have no source of income.

Imagine the frustration. By the time I asked the minister this question it was question number 7 or number 8 in two months, and that is not unreasonable. I asked the minister about the families and wondered when could I expect some form of compensation. In the response this Minister of State for Employment and Immigration said that: "We could look for a way out in conjunction with the private sector".

I had to inform the House and the parliamentary secretary that there are no other jobs, there is no other industry, there is nothing. We can train people for as long as we are alive, but train them for what. They cannot even go to Toronto or Montreal because the unemployment is so bad there that people are leaving there and going somewhere else.

However, the minister did give hope and she went on to say in response to my supplementary: "For the time being we are trying to do what we can and to focus on the training and adjustment of the workers".

Only yesterday, on the same subject, the minister responded and said with respect to contingency funding that when the need arises the government will come forward with a response.

Today I was very specific. He was talking about hypothetical questions. He asked: "How can I give you an answer to a hypothetical question?"

I was very specific today, which relates to the question that I asked May 8. The specific thing was that 80 families had no work, no compensation and no idea as to what sort of compensation, support or care they are going to get from the government.

It is a very desolate situation when you wake up in the morning and have no job, no money and no place to go except to hope that somebody is going to come to your rescue.

I do not like pleading but I am pleading to the government with all the emotion that I can muster without getting loud and without becoming obstreperous.

Please come to the rescue of these people who badly need it. They are in hardship. They are in dire need and they are crying out to me for the government's help and I am crying out to the government.

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, I would like to respond to the hon. member's question tonight.

The situation in the Atlantic fishery has been and continues to be of major concern to the government. In this regard, a number of programs and services have been put in place to deal with the problems in the fishing industry.

I would like to mention to the House that since 1984, the federal government has directed almost $1.4 billion in unemployment insurance and training benefits to individuals in the fishing industry.

The five-year, $584 million Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program was announced in May 1990 and includes measures to rebuild fish stocks and to help those who wish to leave the industry adjust.

There have also been short-term emergency response programs such as last year's $130 million relief program to help plant workers and fishermen adjust. Another $22 million has been distributed to assist Newfoundland fishermen affected by ice conditions.

As we speak, a task force on incomes and adjustments is advising the government on issues such as the continued supply of the resource, the future stability and profitability of the industry and the achievement of stable and adequate incomes for those who make a living in the fishing industry.

The recent decision by the World Court on St. Pierre and Miquelon, the fishery treaty signed at the earth summit in Rio de Janeiro and the continued pressure on countries that overfish along the Grand Banks, all of these demonstrate that this government is doing its utmost to put the needs of the fishing industry at the forefront of its national and international agenda.

BROADCASTING

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have another opportunity to pursue a question which I raised in this House concerning the move by cable companies to remove Canadian broadcasting services like MuchMusic or TSN from Canadian consumers television sets unless they decide to take on more American stations or more American services at an additional price.

I find this a rather curious way to promote Canadian programming for all of us here in Canada. To deliver this choice, the procedure is for the cable companies advise their consumers that the onus of responsibility is on them to call the cable company if they do not wish to have and do not wish to pay for the new service. Otherwise it becomes an automatic "I accepted".

In other words if you want the service you do nothing but if you do not want it you must call. It is a very strange way to do business. Ottawa has been the latest area to take this approach and the response has been very interesting.

I would just like to quote from one area resident who wrote: "I find somewhat disconcerting that MacLean Hunter Cable Television can send out under the guise of an exciting new concept a brochure to an unsuspecting subscriber and this in my opinion, amounts to an unsolicited increase in the monthly cable charges. Particularly disquieting is that MacLean Hunter places the onus on the consumer to reply". He went on to say that he felt that the CRTC should shield consumers from such practices. He felt the CRTC has a responsibility to the Canadian populace to protect it from such practices.

This marketing technique is known as the negative option. I find it very objectionable. In fact, in the province of Quebec, the technique is against the law in the selling of products while its use with services is currently under debate.

Canadian broadcasters are concerned about the potential impact. They see this as a potential loss of income from advertising and decline in audience ratings. That is the last thing we need here in Canada as we are trying to build up our television broadcasting situation.

The president of the CBC, Mr. Veilleux in his speech to The Financial Post conference on April 8, 1992, said the following:

> To be blunt, we—none of us—can afford to have our audience bled from above by satellite and bled from below by cable systems who are prepared to create even greater American competition for Canadian program services.
> I have in mind, of course, the negative option marketing approach now being used by the cable industry—an approach in which subscribers are given the choice of dropping two or three Canadian services and saving a bit of money—or adding four or five American channels and paying more. Canadian programming—and jobs—become hostage to U.S. broadcasters. What a prospect!
> This effectively means "basic" cable for at least 90 per cent of subscribers, will expand by that many new U.S. services, and the further fragmentation will cost Canadian channels both viewers and commercial revenues.

• (2040)

Canadians have access to a broad array of television services. Choice is one of the cornerstones of government's policy on the Canadian broadcasting system. At present some 50 per cent of Canada's cable subscribers have access to what is called an extended basic tier, which is sort of a package of TV services that includes Canadian specialty services and TV services linked with U.S. specialty services.

The negative option marketing practice used by the cable industry to ensure higher penetration of this tier is the mechanism. However, I do believe this is not based on the principle of consumer choice or fairness. Rather I believe it is based on silent acquiescence of the Canadian cable subscriber.

In conclusion, I call upon the Minister of Communications to ask the CRTC to investigate the financial, cultural and consumer impact of the introduction of more American channels on the Canadian broadcasting system through the use of negative option marketing strategies.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, what a pleasure it is to be re-engaged in debate on these matters with my hon. friend. We had discussions for over seven years on these matters. I am pleased to deal with this issue which results from the practice of cable operators making available to their subscribers an extended basic tier.

An extended basic tier involves providing a new service or a group of services to all subscribers on a free trial basis for a period of time, then inviting those customers who do not wish to subscribe to the tier to advise their cable company.

I wish to point out this practice is not new and has been used by cable operators, many of them in western Canada but not confined to western Canada, for some time.

The benefit of the approach to subscribers is that they are given more flexibility to choose to receive specialty services of particular interest to them at a very low cost. The Canadian specialty service available on the extended basic tier include Much Music, the Sports Network, and TV5.

Some American specialty or narrow cast services such as the Nashville Network, Cable News Network, and the Arts and Entertainment Network are authorized by the CRTC for this tier as packaging partners with the Canadian services.

The CRTC has permitted the offering of the U.S. specialty services to enhance the attractiveness of the tier in order to maximize the penetration of the Canadian specialty services. TV5 is an example of a Canadian service "that is now much more widely available than previously because of this practice".

Recently the CRTC announced that it will be holding hearings to look into the whole issue of specialty services tiering. As many members may be aware—and I am sure my hon. friend for Mount Royal is aware of it—discussions are now taking place between representatives of the Canadian broadcasting industry and the Department of Communications toward developing a long-term industrial strategy in the context of the second phase of the Canadian television summit.

The impact on the Canadian broadcasting industry of an increased number of American television services being offered in Canada is currently being studied as part of the second phase of that summit. The industry has been asked to submit a report to the Minister of Communications, and that report is expected in the very near future.

CALGARY AIRPORT

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the Minister of State for Transport for her attitude in responding to my question of June 3 regarding the obsolete Soviet flag being displayed at the Calgary airport during the North Atlantic Assembly meeting that was held in Banff from May 14 to May 18.

I found it very strange that months after the Soviet Union had disappeared and months after Canada had recognized the nations of the former Soviet Union participating in the North Atlantic Assembly, for instance Russia, Ukraine, Byelorussia and the Baltic states, and months after Canada had established diplomatic relations with those nations, this obsolete symbol would still be displayed at the Calgary International Airport.

It indicates to me a lack of communication between the government and the bureaucrats at the lower level. It is not because we do not have enough bureaucrats or infrastructure that would respond to such an action.

Therefore we can ask ourselves: Was it because there was lack of communication, intelligence or simply negligence? I am sure all three elements played a role. It is not the minister's responsibility if a faux pas has been committed by one of the department's bureaucrats. This incident proves that the minister cannot be responsible for all the actions taken on his or her behalf.

This puts in question the tradition of ministerial responsibility. Those responsible should be taken to task. In this particular instance it is those at the Calgary airport. They should not hide behind the minister of state's skirt. Bureaucrats should be responsible for their actions, but if those higher up want to protect them, they should be taken to task as well. As long as this type of system exists, you will not have efficiency or good government in Canada. We will be unable to address the problems of expensive and inefficient government. This is why we have a problem with debt and debt deduction and the huge deficit of $420 billion.

opportunity to respond to the question by the hon. member for Calgary Northeast about the flag display at Calgary International Airport. I had the same questions when I saw those flags flying and have discovered, as the minister has reported, that the many international flags that hung until recently in that air terminal building were intended as a visual tribute to the nations which sent teams of athletes or officials to the 1988 Winter Olympics.

Although Calgary International Airport management was fully aware that the geopolitical state of the world could change over time, it was decided to maintain the original flag display to remind the many visitors to that airport of the countries which were represented in the 1988 games. In other words, it is kind of a snapshot display of the international scheme which emphasized the significance of the 15th Winter Olympics and remembered the nations which had participated in those games. It was neither intended to reflect ongoing international geopolitical changes nor to symbolize the nations which attended the North Atlantic Assembly Conference recently held in Calgary and Banff.

I understand that the airport has recently substituted the display's Olympic motif with flags from Canada's provinces and territories which is a fitting salute to Canada's 125 anniversary. The flag of the former Soviet Union has been removed and flags from nations that provide the largest number of tourists to Calgary have now been given prominence.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 38(5), the motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted.

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (for the Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C-70, an act to amend the Criminal Code (jury), be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, Bill C-70, an act to amend the Criminal Code, is a series of amendments that deal specifically with jury selection in Canada. It is a direct response to a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in the case of Regina v Bain. That decision was handed down on January 23, 1992. It struck down certain provisions in the Criminal Code as they relate to jury selection. Specifically, the Supreme Court of Canada felt that the present jury selection method as contained in the Criminal Code placed the Crown at an unfair advantage vis-à-vis defence counsel.

This bill that is before Parliament is a direct response to that. Prior to its tabling on I believe April 6 of this year, there were consultations with the Canadian Bar Association and other interested individuals as to what should go into this particular bill.

I believe that because of the consultation process that took place, this bill is as non-controversial as it is. There is a recognition within the legal community that these changes can, should and must be made. Indeed, they must be in place by July 23, 1992, because the Supreme Court of Canada suspended the operation of its decision for a period of six months. Therefore, we are under some time constraints to have this bill enacted.

When this bill went before the legislative committee, there were no witnesses before the committee. No one expressed a desire to appear. The bill passed the legislative committee without amendment and was returned to the House of Commons for the report stage.

There was an amendment by the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam that was dealt with yesterday. It concerned the multicultural justice review. I indicated to the hon. member that study would continue and that it would continue within the Department of Justice. As well, I indicated that if the hon. member wished to pursue an outside inquiry, certainly that was something that was within the purview of he and his fellow colleagues who sit on the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General. They could do that.

There is some urgency to the particular bill that is before Parliament. It addresses a specific problem. It goes further than was required by the Supreme Court of Canada inasmuch as the procedure in Bill C-70 allows the selection of jurors to be done on an alternate basis between the defence counsel and the Crown attorney. That in and of itself was not called for by the Regina v Bain decision, but we went slightly beyond that in the interest of fairness in the judicial process. That is welcomed.

At one point, my friend in the New Democratic Party suggested that we might consider abolishing the ability of the Crown attorney to reject certain jurors. That would be going too far. Most people would recognize that the Crown is there to represent the interests of the people of this country and however else we might design the judicial system and the jury selection, there should be an even handed approach between the defence and the Crown.

Bill C–70 accomplishes that. As well, I might point out that the specific provisions that related to the territories allowed juries of six people. Those references have now been removed from the Criminal Code. That as well is a step in the right direction.

The bill was passed by the legislative committee and sent back here. The government certainly has not dawdled in bringing this matter forward.

I ask hon. members in the best interests of the judicial system, the legal system of Canada, to pass this bill as quickly as possible because this is a non–controversial bill. It is good. It is required. Every major group in Canada that has had an opportunity to either be consulted or to comment welcomed this bill. I ask the House of Commons to pass this bill as quickly as possible and send it on to the other place.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague for his comments. We participated, of course, in the legislative committee and I have checked with my colleagues on the subject.

Bill C–70, as the hon. member said, is a bill that essentially relates to a better system for the selection of jurors. We agree it is critical to the legal system. While it may not be non–controversial, which I can certainly agree with, it is time sensitive. We are pleased to see it here at this particular point in time.

It is in response to the charter and it is time sensitive. We have no amendments. We have no problems with the bill. We would also like to see it go forward as quickly as possible.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to speak to this bill at third reading stage on behalf of the New Democratic Party.

I should tell the House that back in 1980, the Law Reform Commission recommended changes. Governments, both this Conservative government and the previous Liberal government, never did anything about it. In fact, we see once again a government that is reacting to a decision of the Supreme Court. This is the pattern for this government.

The Minister of Justice would have us believe that she is taking a lot of initiatives. In fact, her initiatives, including the new rape shield bill which we support, are still reactions to decisions that were rendered by the Supreme Court of Canada. In other words, the government has to do something. One should see that pattern, and this is another example of the pattern.

The parliamentary secretary admitted that there is a report on multicultural issues, racism and racism in the justice system. This is a priority issue in Canada today. Just look at the Lewis report of the other day in Toronto. Look at other patterns across this country, some of which I will speak about in a minute. There was a report. It had to be dug out of this government. It was an uncompleted report by the Law Reform Commission. The government has abolished the commission now. This report was dug out by a reporter from the Toronto Star and we never had the benefit of considering this report before our legislative committee.

I got a lot of flack yesterday from the Conservative opposition, including some cabinet ministers—Conservative government, it will soon be opposition—when I raised the issue and delayed the passing of this bill.

I had a simple request which was that the report be completed. It is a crucial report. We just had a draft report. I asked that the report be completed and that it be done by an outside person. In other words, it should be done by a consultant, that it be continued by people who were doing work for the Law Reform Commission. I wanted that procedure so that it could be tabled in the House of Commons and made public. It would be an objective report.

We have been offered a report which will be done by the Department of Justice. It may never see the light of day. We do not have to get these reports. They are not tabled as a right.

What can I do? I could go and pursue the issue in the justice committee. That is not good enough.

The government wants our co–operation. We have given it a lot of co–operation on a number of bills. Surely my request could have been met. The parliamentary secretary could have said: "This is an important issue. The Conservative government is concerned about racism. We are concerned about these problems, we are going to complete this report and we are going to table it in the House of Commons."

This is a rigid ultra-conservative government on this issue. It does not have much interest, as shown by its actions in multiculturalism or in attacking these racist problems in our society. That is the only conclusion I can draw from that rigidity of the parliamentary secretary in this matter. He is not always that rigid, I will give him that. I do not know why he was so rigid in this case, but he was. I think the country is poorer for it.

We had a great opportunity here when we were forced to take a look at the jury selection process in the draft amendments. It is unfortunate we did not take time to examine the issues more thoroughly and we did not use the opportunity to address some of the features of the justice system which have recently come into question. I found our justice system unequal.

I will state the problem, to make it simple. We are dealing in this bill with the question of how a defence counsel or Crown counsel—and I have been both—in all levels of all courts in Canada can choose a jury. People are selected by lot, they come before the court and a jury is chosen.

• (1020)

In our system, defence counsel or Crown counsel can stand up and challenge someone, not have that person on the jury because they do not like the colour of their skins or they might think they are Jewish, Arab, aboriginal, or of some other group. We have a case directly on that point which I will mention in a moment.

We should not have a system like that. It is a challenge on a purely subjective criteria and we should at least have a look at that. That is what I am saying. It is why I was pressing for the report to be completed. I hope the government will listen.

I am on a little bit of a tangent here but the parliamentary secretary said I had suggested in committee that the Crown counsel not even have a challenge. Let me suggest to you what the argument is.

Remember the government makes the laws through the majority in Parliament. The government sets up the courts. The government chooses and pays the judges. The government pays the police. The government has such control of the system that it is not really equal.

One way of giving the accused a better break in this matter is to consider the fact that it should be only the accused person who has the challenge and not the Crown. The Crown has to take the ordinary people from the street. I put that out. Of course, we are not going to do that and it will not come for some time.

Canadians can be rightly proud of the commitment we have made as a people to the principles of equality and fairness and we have all done that. Sections 15 and 28 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantee all Canadians the right to equality.

It is because of that statement of principles we have rulings like the Bain case we are dealing with from the Supreme Court of Canada and has forced the government to make these amendments to the jury selection process. Both Liberal and Conservative governments were not going to act on their own. It took the court to force them to act. It took the Charter of Rights and Freedoms to get the court that power.

There is more to the standards we have set for ourselves when it comes to fairness or equal rights. Section 27 of the charter provides: "This Charter shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with the preservation and enhancement of the multicultural heritage of Canadians".

We as a people have recognized the multicultural and multiracial composition of our society and have stated clearly our commitment to respecting the diversity in the Canadian Multiculturalism Act.

We have stated clearly that all of us deserve equal treatment and equal protection regardless of race. We are not asking that anybody get unequal treatment. We want equal treatment for everyone. It seems to me it is a fundamental principle of democracy; it is certainly a fundamental principle of what my party stands for.

Canada has signed the International Convention on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination. Clearly, Canadians believe that racism is not to be tolerated in our society, yet we also have a good indication that Canadians believe that racism or racist attitudes are increasing in Canada.

I mentioned the Lewis report. A recent Angus Reid poll for Southam News found that 55 per cent of Canadians feel that racism is increasing in Canada. What is perhaps even more disconcerting, there is growing evidence to show our justice system has elements of racism and that is a serious charge.

Unfortunately, there are some individuals working within the justice system who do not hold to the principles I have outlined. The inquiry into the killing of Leo Chance in Prince Albert, Saskatchewan revealed there are Aryan nation sympathizers in the police department in that city. Other inquiries have found individuals who promote and act on racial stereotyping in cities like Montreal. These things need to be said.

These incidents and individuals must be dealt with. Even more urgent is the need to deal with the systemic flaws which make our system racist or at the very least undermine the perception of fairness and equality. For example, visible minorities make up over 20 per cent of the population of Toronto, but only 6.2 per cent of its uniformed police. That can and should be changed.

There have been numerous studies revealing just how deeply flawed our justice system is when it comes to fairness and equality for visible minorities and even how deeply flawed and prone to racism the jury selection process can be. The jury selection process is what we are debating now.

A draft paper from the Law Reform Commission, the paper I was talking about that was only recently brought to our attention, notes that between 1974 and 1989 nine commissions investigated allegations involving racism and ethnic discrimination in the justice system and made over 229 recommendations for changes.

We will remember the Marshall inquiry, for example. We had eight other commissions and they made 229 recommendations for changes. The draft paper I spoke about states: "The repetitiveness of the proposals reveals almost two decades of", to be charitable, "slowness in reaction, a phenomenon that has been characterized as the gap between discourse and political will". That is an academic putting it. I will be less polite: we have been dragging our feet.

The inquiry into the Donald Marshall case and the Manitoba inquiry into the deaths of Helen Betty Osborne and John Joseph Harper are two of the inquiries which most of us are familiar with.

The Marshall inquiry found that throughout the entire history of the province of Nova Scotia no aboriginal person had been on a jury. This is the fair jury system we are rushing through the House today.

While the inquiry found no evidence to suggest aboriginal people were deliberately excluded from jury duty, it did strongly recommend, as did counsel for the Attorney General, a full study concerning proportional representation of visible minorities on juries. We never even considered that in this bill when we opened up the Criminal Code—and we do not do it very often—to look at the provisions on the jury. That is a shame for this House.

In Manitoba the inquiry found that on the Osborne case there was clear evidence that six aboriginal people who were called to the jury panel were excluded because of their race. All were challenged by Johnston's lawyer, Greg Brodsky. Mr. Brodsky excluded all of them through use of his peremptory challenges. The result was there were no aboriginal people on the jury that heard a case involving the brutal murder of an aboriginal woman in an area in which a large percentage of the population is aboriginal.

Was that jury really representative of the community? Was that justice the way we want to see it?

As a result of the finding of the aboriginal justice inquiry of Manitoba, it was recommended that the Criminal Code be amended so that only the challenge to prospective jurors be challenges for cause, that stand asides and peremptory challenges be eliminated.

Bill C-70 only removes stand asides and only addresses the perception of unfair advantage of the Crown. It does not address the use of peremptory challenges on the basis of race or culture. It is purely subjective. We could have another case like the Osborne case where defence counsel or even Crown counsel could make sure that the jury did not represent any people of a racial group they did not want on the jury. That is not right.

There are ways to make the jury selection process fair, ways to free the process from racist abuse. It is unfortunate that the report of the Law Reform Commission on ethnic minorities and the justice system appears to have been another casualty of this government's attack on independent thought in this country.

That is why the government got rid of the Law Reform Commission. That is why it got rid of the Economic Council of Canada. That is why it cut the Science Council. That is why it got rid of the Court Challenges Program. The government does not want independent thought. By independent thought I mean thought that would challenge the in-house positions of government departments.

With a report such as this one, we might be able to make these changes in the jury selection process. It is not going to be easy. It will have to take some real thought to tackle this matter and that is why we needed that report.

There are suggestions on how to deal with other aspects of trial procedure and policing in the report. In particular, during the discussion of this specific bill, it would be nice to have completed the report.

There may be some useful directions from that report however. There is already a suggestion for a study of the use of peremptory challenges including the frequency of their use and reasons for an effectiveness of their use, particularly in relation to minority prospective jurors. There are in fact useful recommendations regarding the use of challenge for cause as opposed to peremptory challenge, and that is what the government should focus on.

We should be looking at these recommendations now, not in another 12 years from now when another Supreme Court of Canada, after going through all this expensive litigation, tells Parliament to make this justice system fair.

• (1030)

At about the same time the Law Reform Commission first recommended the stand asides for the Crown be abolished, the recommendation 12 years ago that foresaw the Supreme Court ruling that has pushed the government to bring forward this bill, a justice of the Ontario high court denied defence counsel for a black accused challenge for cause involving questions relating to prejudices against black people. The reasons given were that to allow such questions would have admitted to a weakness in the nation and a community which should not be acknowledged.

These are still strange goings on in the justice system in this country. Times have changed and today we are forced to acknowledge that weakness. The evidence of a system-wide injustice demands it. We should not be satisfied with a bill that simply reflects the recommendations put forward 12 years ago in an environment that commonly included rulings that turned a blind eye to racism, the kind of rulings we look upon with horror today.

We should be working on a bill that will create the kind of jury selection process that will serve us well into the future, that will ensure our justice system upholds the principles of fairness and equal treatment before the law that we value so highly.

Before I sit down I want to tell the government that one government in Canada has committed itself to eradicating racism in the justice system and changing procedures that foster it. I am speaking about the recent comments of the attorney general of Ontario, Howard Hampton. He is to be congratulated for those comments.

The commitment includes the formation of a race relations unit in the ministry of the attorney general to implement anti-racism training aggressively and to hold the ministry accountable for rapid progress on race relations initiatives. What is the federal government doing in this area? Nothing.

While there is much the provincial governments can do to improve the jury selection process, including amending their own juries acts, because the juries acts are provincial acts, in each province they could amend it for that province to ensure that a broad representation of society is available for jury duty. The attorney general of Ontario is calling upon his federal counterpart to eliminate any possibility that visible minorities are being excluded without cause as jurors at criminal trials. He has asked the Minister of Justice to look at the entire way in which criminal juries are selected, including the ability of counsel to disqualify jurors at trial other than for valid causes.

I suggest that the attorney general of Ontario is on the correct path here. He is talking about looking at the peremptory challenge in the jury selection process in a new and innovative way. Why is the federal government not doing it? Why is this House not doing it when we are looking at this bill? This is not a bill we should be rushing through.

The federal equivalent would be on the right path by calling upon the Law Reform Commission to complete the study and to see how we make changes at the federal level, but the government has not done that.

I will conclude there saying that the bill does have to go through. The reality is that we have to meet the timetable of the Supreme Court, although we could go back and ask for changes. I asked the government about that and asked for an extension of time, but the government is not about to do that.

Reluctantly and I say reluctantly—when I started on this bill it was not so reluctantly—I was quite prepared to see the bill pass very quickly. Indeed a New Democrat, the member for Brant, chaired the legislative committee and pushed the bill through in record time. I had been prepared to let the bill go through like that.

The more I began to see what else is involved, the more I began to see that we are behind the times on this. We are reacting. We are not up to date. We have a problem of racism in the justice system, especially as it affects aboriginal people and black people. We should look at it. One area to look at is the jury selection process.

I urge the government to complete that study and not put the onus on us to go back to a committee. "We will go back to the committee. We will do that". I ask the government to complete the study that was being done by the Law Reform Commission, to be careful about doing it in-house because it gets warped inevitably by a government constitutorial point of view, to try to do it from an outside consultant and make it public so that we can debate it in this House of Commons and that a Toronto Star reporter does not have to go and dig out this thing. It should be out for all people to see.

Having said that, we will not put up any other speakers and will let the bill go through now.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, I will be brief.

My colleague from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception has already indicated that our party will be supporting this bill. My colleague from the New Democratic Party who just spoke has had a lot of experience with juries. I would like to to reinforce some of the points he was making.

Juries have taken a very bad rap recently because of the decision in Los Angeles. An awful lot of people and most of us in this House feel that the decision was completely unfair in the matter of Mr. King. There was untold havoc, pain and suffering inflicted because of the representation of the jury that heard the case outside of Los Angeles.

I feel it is worth making the point that when you have 12 of your peers judging the matter, if there are 12 representative men and women, in my experience you are going to get a better decision than when it is one man or one woman sitting on the bench deciding the guilt or innocence of an accused. As somebody once put it, the biases should cancel out on a jury because when it is one individual judging, even if they have been legally trained, they are all products of our environment and they tend to have biases and so on which often tend to work against the interest of justice.

It is very, very important, as the member for New Westminster indicated, that we do everything we can to ensure that the people chosen for jury panels and the people who sit on juries are representative of the community. Had that happened in the Los Angeles case—I believe all the jury members were white except for one—we could have avoided an enormous tragedy and a setback for the jury system in a neighbouring country.

I appreciate that the jury act in the provinces is the primary legislation dealing with that. There are fewer and fewer of us who are lawyers in this House and I am sure that everyone else will agree with that. Those of us who have watched panels come into courts and who have seen often how unrepresentative they are would identify with the view that we must ensure that in a community in northern Alberta, for example, or the Vancouver area justice not only be done but is seen to be done by the representation of the people who are called for jury duty.

As my colleague just indicated, more work needs to be done on this matter. I am sorry I was not on the committee that looked at this bill. I must say that I do not see that it does very much about the problem that seems to be the central problem which is that juries do not reflect the demographics and so on of the communities they should represent.

I will close by saying that I hope more work will be done both at the federal and the provincial levels to make sure that in future, wherever jury trials are held in Canada—they should be held as often as possible, not as rarely as possible—those called for jury duty will be fully representative of the men and women in the community in which the case takes place.

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member. Both of us were Crown counsel together, perhaps at different times. He was first in Vancouver.

An hon. member: Many years before.

Mr. Waddell: I know my colleague has also been a defence counsel. He has been through the process.

I am very pleased that he picked up a point that I really missed and that is how good the jury system is. It is one of the great inventions of Anglo-Saxon culture, going back years and years.

• (1040)

It stood the test of time by and large and it can still stand the test of time. I agree with what the hon. member said and I am glad he said it. I am glad he mentioned the King case because it is giving juries a bad name. He put his finger right on the button, if you like, by saying for the jury system to really work it has to represent the community and that means it has to represent all aspects of people in the community and not exclude people. If it represents all aspects, it tends to convict the guilty and acquit the innocent. It can even be ahead of society, as the Morgentaler juries in Quebec were. It is a real protection both for the accused and for society.

That is why it is important that when we have an opportunity like this, as my hon. friend said, we could do so much more. I am thankful for his comments and I am sure the government was listening. At least I hope it was.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

PUBLIC SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-55, an act to amend certain acts in relation to pensions and to enact the Special Retirement Arrangements Act and the Pension Benefits Division Act, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

Madam Deputy Speaker: If the House would show a little patience, the Speaker will have the total ruling. I have part of it but I am told the Speaker will be with us in a minute with the ruling on the 112 motions that you can see as notices. Since so many of them were tabled later yesterday, the Speaker has just now finished.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: Before I begin, I again want to let the House know that motions, that is, proposed amendments with regard to Bill C-55, total 112. Over 80 of those were received the day before yesterday and the rest were received by six o'clock last night. Members will understand that is, again, a very heavy task for the table officers and there have been attempts made to discuss these rulings I am giving with the concerned members. I hope those discussions have been satisfactory. However, it may be that because of the numbers of motions and the limited time, discussion has not been as extensive as some members would have wished.

However, my duty now is to bring to the House the consequence of my deliberations.

Therefore, I am prepared to give a ruling on Bill C-55, an act to amend certain acts in relation to pensions and to enact the Special Retirement Arrangements Act and the Pension Benefits Division Act.

There are 112 motions on the Notice Paper for the report stage of Bill C-55. Motion No. 1, standing in the name of the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur, is extending the bill to cover an additional class of persons. In this respect I refer the hon. member to Beauchesne's citation 698(1) which states that motions that go beyond the scope of the bill are inadmissible. Therefore Motion No. 1 will not be selected.

Motions Nos. 2, 17, 36 and 72, standing in the name of the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway, will be grouped for debate with a vote on Motion No. 2 being applied to Motions Nos. 17, 36 and 72.

Motions Nos. 3, 18, 37, 69 and 70, standing in the name of the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway, appear to be going beyond the scope of the bill as it was agreed to by the House at second reading. The purpose of these proposed motions is to broaden the class of persons who would be eligible to receive benefits. As a consequence, this concept is out of order. In this regard, I refer hon. members to Beauchesne's citation 698(1).

Motions Nos. 4, 19 and 38, standing in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa West, will not be selected as they are identical to Motions Nos. 5, 20 and 39.

Motions Nos. 5, 20 and 39, standing in the name of the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur, will be grouped for debate with a vote on Motion No. 5 applying to Motions Nos. 20 and 39.

Motion No. 6, standing in the name of the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur, will be debated and voted upon separately.

Motion No. 6A, standing in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa West, will not be selected as it is identical to Motion No. 6B.

Motion No. 6B, standing in the name of the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur, will be debated and voted upon separately.

Motions Nos. 7, 30, 31, 57 and 58, standing in the name of the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur, and Motion No. 8, standing in the name of the hon. member for Kootenay East, appear to be introducing a new concept for surplus funds which is going beyond the scope of the bill as read a second time in the House. Accordingly, I must rule these motions out of order, pursuant to Beauchesne's citation 698(1).

Motions Nos. 9, 26, 27, 28, 29, 52, 53, 54, 55 and 56, standing in the name of the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur, will be grouped for debate but voted upon as follows: (a) Motions Nos. 9, 26 and 27 will be voted upon separately; (b) an affirmative vote on Motion No. 28 obviates the necessity of a vote on Motion No. 29; (c) a negative vote on Motion No. 28 requires a vote on Motion No. 29; (d) Motion No. 52 will be voted upon separately; (e) an affirmative vote on Motion 53 obviates the necessity for a vote on Motion No. 54; (f) a negative vote on Motion No. 53 requires a vote on Motion No. 54; (g) an affirmative vote on Motion No. 55 obviates the necessity for a vote on Motion No. 56; (h) a negative vote on Motion No. 55 requires a vote on Motion No. 56.

Motions Nos. 9A and 58B, standing in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, will be grouped for debate with a vote on Motion No. 9A applying to Motion No. 58B.

Motions Nos. 10, 32 and 59, standing in the name of the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur, will be grouped for debate with a vote on Motion No. 10 applying to Motions Nos. 32 and 59.

We would be able to then start preparing our debate on the amendments. We could probably even start statements by members immediately if we decide not to suspend the House.

• (1100)

REFORM PARTY OF CANADA

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Madam Speaker, the Reform Party is making headlines, the type usually reserved for the National Enquirer.

For example: "Manning would end universal medicare" or "Luxury cars on parade as Manning held court", or "Manning rhetoric like Hitler in 1939". It is what the editorial writers are saying under these headlines, for example: "Manning's stance on GST is a complete joke. He called for one of three alternatives, scrap it, replace it with a reformed tax system—whatever that is—or revise it by expanding it to food and health care".

Another quote: "Manning, the self-described champion of the grassroots everyday Canadian voter, was himself chauffeured in the back seat of a grey Jaguar Sovereign". There is this one: "This smooth talking, mild mannered Clark Kent type could just be more of a danger to Canada than was the little Austrian with a moustache, but beware of politicians who tell you just what you want to hear".

Canadians will not be fooled by this phoney leadership.

SMALL BUSINESS

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Madam Speaker, it is only the federal government that sees the reflection of prosperity in the sea of bankruptcies drowning small businesses across Canada. Businesses that spent their last votes on the promise of a Tory lifeline of loan guarantees have seen their dreams scuttled.

The government's television ads are a futile investment in its own popularity at the expense of Canadian prosperity. I call upon the government to stop trying to sell illusions and begin investing in real solutions to help the small business sector. Businesses need less flash and more cash.

CYPRUS

Mr. Gus Mitges (Bruce—Grey): Madam Speaker, UN resolution 750, approved on April 10, endorses a set of ideas proposed by UN Secretary-General Boutros Ghali which reaffirms that a Cyprus settlement must be based on a state of Cyprus, with a single sovereignty and a single citizenship.

There is no question that the time has come for a solution to the 18-year old division of the island. The occupation of northern Cyprus by Turkey, or the occupation of any nation's territory by another nation, is an anachronism and strictly out of place in the emerging new world and European order as we approach the 21st century.

We hope that the forthcoming discussions at the United Nations on June 18 between Secretary-General Boutros Ghali, Cypriot President George Vasiliou and Turkish Cypriot leader Rauf Denktash will be positive and will result in a genuine breakthrough toward a united Cyprus.

CANADIAN LABOUR CONGRESS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Madam Speaker, yesterday at the biennial convention of the Canadian Labour Congress, delegates elected new leadership including a new president, Canadian Auto Workers leader, Bob White.

On behalf of my colleagues in the New Democratic Party and in particular our leader, Audrey McLaughlin, I want to congratulate Bob White and the other officers on their election and to express our best wishes and thanks to the outgoing president, Shirley Carr, and the other retiring officers.

Bob White has shown strong, dedicated and effective leadership not only on behalf of his membership in the CAW but on behalf of all Canadian working men and women. He has worked all his adult life in the trade union movement, and in fact he was first on a picket line with his father and his brother at the age of 16.

In 1990, he was named an officer of the Order of Canada. Bob White will be a progressive and powerful voice for working men and women in Canada and internationally. Again, on behalf of all of my colleagues, congratulations and continued strength to you and all of the officers and members of the Canadian Labour Congress.

AMYOTROPHIC LATERAL SCLEROSIS AWARENESS MONTH

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming): Madam Speaker, I wish to bring to the attention of the House the fact that June is the month of amyotrophic lateral sclerosis, ALS, awareness month.

More commonly known as Lou Gehrig's disease, it is a fatal, rapidly progressing disease attacking the nervous system. Individuals suffering from this devastating disease become completely dependent on their families and friends for their every day needs.

The ALS Society has been working diligently over the last 15 years to help improve the quality of life for the ALS patients and their families, and to find the cause and cure of ALS. To mark ALS awareness month, the society will be handing out replica cornflowers in return for donations toward medical research.

I salute this fine organization and its many volunteers, and would ask all Canadians to help support the important work that the ALS Society does.

CELEBRATIONS

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, a birthday marks a significant date in time. The calendar this year is full of important dates, not just one's personal birthday, for it includes as well special highlights such as the 500th anniversary of Christopher Columbus' discovery of America, Montreal's 350th birthday, and Canada's 125th.

An exciting year of celebration has been unfolding, specifically to date Montreal's grand parade and weekend fireworks with lots of choice for everyone down in the old port. All are welcome to this dynamic cosmopolitan city, so come along.

Canadians love to party and celebrate, in particular our birth as a nation, Canada Day on July 1. This year on May 1 a bill was introduced in the Quebec legislature to rescind an article in the Quebec Labour Standards Act so that we are assured that Canada Day will officially be celebrated on July 1 across our land from coast to coast to coast.

I urge that this legislation be proclaimed as soon as possible so all of us can join—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I apologize. The time has expired.

RP AWARENESS WEEK

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, I would like to remind the House that this is RP Awareness Week which is sponsored by the RP Eye Research Foundation.

I commend the work of the RP Eye Research Foundation in providing information about retinitis pigmentosa, promoting public awareness of RP and related disorders and providing funds in support of RP research.

Funds collected from this year's tenth annual "Ride for Sight" fundraising events will help to continue the advancement of knowledge about RP that is so important to thousands of Canadians and their families.

I wish to thank the volunteers of the RP Eye Research Foundation for their hard work and dedication. I encourage all Canadians to take part in the "Ride for Sight" activities in their communities.

REFORM PARTY OF CANADA

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, I hate to criticize "Presto" Manning and the Reform Party once more since they certainly do not like examination of their policies, but I see that Mr. Manning is being chauffeur driven around Ontario in the back seat of his fancy Jaguar making speeches to fat cats to tell them the Reform Party is opposed to universal medicare and old age pensions. We know Mr. Manning does not care about minorities, but one would have thought that he would care about senior citizens and sick people.

I have called the Reform Party a lot of things. Let me add to the list: callous, heartless and dumb.

Maybe Mr. Manning in his great big limousine thinks we do not need universal medicare, but senior citizens in my riding who are waiting for heart operations do. Maybe Mr. Manning thinks we do not need old age pensions, but we happen to believe that senior citizens who have worked for 65 years to build this country deserve a decent retirement.

Why does Mr. Manning not get into his limousine and drive off into the sunset?

MUSLIMS

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, I rise today to wish Canadian Muslims "Eid Mubarak".

Eid is a three-day religious holiday in the Muslim religion, an equivalent to the Christian Thanksgiving, during which Muslim families all across Canada will donate food to those in need.

This humanitarian gesture commemorates for Muslims the ritual sacrifice of Ishmael by the prophet Abraham.

The Muslim community was established in Canada at the turn of the century with the immigration of a few hundred Lebanese Muslims. The first mosque was built in Edmonton by that community in 1935. Since then the Canadian Muslim community has grown to encompass more than 400,000 members from all over the world.

The diversity of races and cultures within the Muslim community is a testament to the Canadian dream of multiculturalism.

On the occasion of this Muslim religious holiday and Canada's 125th birthday, I want to thank the Muslim community for the contributions they have made to Canada over the past century and wish them success in all their endeavours.

THE LATE BILL SMITH

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Madam Speaker, on behalf of the Hon. Charles Mayer, Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds, it is with deep regret that I inform the House of the death of Canadian Wheat Board Commissioner Bill Smith.

Mr. Smith died as a result of an accident while he was on a trade mission in China.

Bill Smith had a distinguished and extensive career that began on his family farm in Alberta. He was employed with the Alberta Wheat Pool where he provided invaluable service. His many achievements and his contributions to the agricultural industry led to his appointment as a Commissioner of the Canadian Wheat Board in May 1983.

Bill was very active in international marketing and developing an expertise in his marketing relationships with a number of Canada's customers including China and Russia, two of Canada's major purchasers. He will be sadly missed. This marks a great loss for his family, his friends, the agriculture industry and Canada.

I would like to offer my personal sympathy to his wife Kathy and their children and their families.

MPS' PENSIONS

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Madam Speaker, my constituents know me to be a member of Parliament who is not afraid to take a stand.

I want my riding to know exactly my position on pensions for MPs. Quite frankly, there must be some changes. I applaud the efforts of my colleagues, the hon. members for Winnipeg—St. James and Edmonton Southeast. Both have private members' bills that would make the pension system more fair.

I believe no one should get a pension until at least the age of retirement, after four years of service, or at age 60 at a reduced amount. Double-dipping should be eliminated to prevent someone from getting a pension while holding another government job.

The grassroots in my riding want to know where we stand on this issue. It is a difficult one that may upset some people here in Ottawa. I was elected to represent the views of the people of Kent and not have the opinions of Ottawa told to them.

As we discuss Bill C-55 in the House today, I believe we must show leadership to Canadians by making our pension system more equitable. It must be seen to be fair and—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I regret the hon. member's time is expired. The hon. member for Niagara Falls.

EARTH SUMMIT

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Niagara Falls): Madam Speaker, one of the things that Canadians can always take pride in is the leadership role this country exerts. Whether it is through the Commonwealth, the Francophonie or the United Nations, Canadians can always be counted on to exert a positive influence, and that role is obvious at the United Nations conference at Rio.

As you know, there have been no shortage of critics of the earth summit, yet one thing is clear, Canada's Prime Minister has done everything possible from the beginning to make this environmental conference a success. When other world leaders dithered on whether they would take part in the conference, our Prime Minister stepped forward and said he would be there.

When the United States said it had problems with the biodiversity convention, our Prime Minister again stepped forward to make it clear that Canada would sign. That kind of leadership in the environment has wide-ranging consequences. Among them is the fact that it encourages other like-minded countries to lend their support to important environmental initiatives.

Every Canadian can take pride in the role that Prime Minister Mulroney has taken in the area of the environment.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, Inuit from Nunavut who are concerned about the Great Whale James Bay II hydro project met in Ottawa this week. They are concerned because so far the federal environmental review of this proposed project has largely excluded them, yet they will be directly impacted by this project.

At particular risk is the community of Sanikiluaq located on the Belcher Islands in Hudson Bay. Sanikiluaq is situated almost directly opposite the Great Whale River, a mere 90 miles from the outfall from the project.

The Keewatin region coastal communities of Arviat, Whale Cove, Rankin Inlet, Chesterfield Inlet, Coral Harbour and Repulse Bay will also be impacted. The marine environment of Hudson Bay is the traditional food source for the Inuit people of all these communities. The environmental threat to these marine resources is real.

I urge the federal government to fully include the Inuit of Nunavut by funding them in the environmental review process. Without the full and sufficiently funded participation of the people of Hudson Bay and its western coast, the review of this project will be incomplete.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, I rise in this House today to point out to Canadian taxpayers the second most stupid proposal in the history of the world to spend taxpayers' money.

The most stupid proposal in the history of the world to spend taxpayers' money was the proposal by this government to spend $15 billion on a fleet of nuclear submarines for Canada.

The second most stupid proposal was to spend $5 billion of taxpayers' money on 50 helicopters for anti-submarine warfare. It forgot that there is no justification any longer for this expenditure. There is no longer a Russian submarine fleet as a threat.

As far as the search and rescue role, the existing Chinook and Labrador helicopters, with upgraded engines, are far superior to the present proposal.

Let us be clear: This is in fact the most stupid proposal to spend taxpayers' money since the last election.

FÉDÉRATION DES CLUBS DE L'ÂGE D'OR

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Beauharnois—Salaberry): Madam Speaker, tomorrow evening, hundreds of people will meet in Valleyfield to celebrate the 20th anniversary of the Fédération des clubs d'âge d'or du sud-ouest, which includes 28 senior citizens clubs in the diocese of Valleyfield. My wife Colombe and I will be delighted to join in the festivities.

The Prime Minister has sent his best wishes, and today, I would also like to congratulate all members, and especially Gérard Malouin, president of the federation, and Gaston Lafontaine, the federation's director general. We also have special greetings for four members who were present at the founding of the federation 20 years ago: Rebecca Trépanier, of Valleyfield; Lucienne Goyette, also of Valleyfield; Marielle Legault, from Huntingdon; and Albert Besner from Dorion.

TERRA NOVA NATIONAL PARK

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I am fortunate to have in my riding one of Canada's most scenic parks, Terra Nova National Park.

It was beautifully carved by glacial activity a long, long time ago. Unfortunately the same glacial activity occurs every winter and it has taken a serious toll on the conditions of the 42 kilometres of Trans-Canada Highway that runs through it.

My constituents from the 22 communities in the immediate area have been writing to me with petitions by the thousands protesting the deplorable state of the highway. Elizabeth Blackmore, town clerk of Clarenville recently wrote me and she said:

> In past years a drive through Terra Nova National Park with its beautiful scenery was a very enjoyable experience. Today, that same drive is a nightmare.

I have written to the minister several times on this subject. I now appeal again to the Minister of the Environment, in the wake of thousands of tourists who will be celebrating Canada's 125th birthday in Terra Nova National Park, that repairs be expedited to the Trans-Canada Highway through this beautiful piece of land.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

STEEL INDUSTRY

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade, but first I would like to say that we in the Liberal Party wish the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs Godspeed in his last minute negotiations. We await his successful return to the House of Commons.

I would like to ask the Minister for International Trade about his trip to Washington this week to meet with U.S. trade representative Carla Hills. The minister was supposed to convince his good friends in Washington to intervene with the American steel industry so that Canada's steelmakers would not be the victim of a vicious American steel war.

Could the minister confirm that all he got in Washington was a great big American kiss-off?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure what my hon. friend means when she uses that expression.

I did have a discussion of this matter with Mrs. Hills. I expressed very strongly the concern we have in the Government of Canada about the impact of the actions that could possibly be taken by the U.S. steel industry. She indicated that she is continuing discussions with the industry. I asked her to make sure that these views would be conveyed to the industry.

As my hon. friend knows, if members of the private sector in Canada or the United States wishes to institute a trade action it is within their power to do so. If the Canadian steel industry wanted to initiate an action against the U.S. industry I am sure she, representing a steel city, would not want me to step in and tell the steel industry exactly what it should do. She would expect that I would convey views of other countries, which I would hope Mrs. Hills would be doing. More than that I think would probably be inappropriate.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, I am shocked and surprised by the about-face of the minister who claimed as late as last week that in fact he was going to convince the American administration to get the facts through to the American steel industry.

I can tell him that what I intend to continue to do on behalf of the constituents and the workers in my riding is to stand up for the Canadian steel industry against an unfair, unfounded U.S. complaint that has already cost Canadian jobs and is going to cost further Canadian jobs.

[Translation]

I am getting to my question. We already know that Canadians are losing out to other suppliers. U.S. customers are reluctant to rely on Canadian suppliers because of the trade war that might start as early as next week.

What specific action does the Canadian minister intend to take to at least urge the U.S. administration to approach the U.S. companies directly, in order to stop this useless trade war which will cost us thousands of Canadian jobs in an industry that is already hard hit?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I met Mrs. Hills on Tuesday, and we discussed the issue of measures that might be taken by the U.S. industry. I mentioned that since both the Canadian and U.S. steel markets were highly integrated, the impact of these measures, if taken by the U.S. industry, would create very serious problems for our own industry. I made it clear to Mrs. Hills that it was extremely important to discuss the problems effecting the Canadian steel industry with the U.S. industry. And I hope that as a result of our meeting, Ms. Hills will discuss those problems with the industry.

The Canadian government's position is to work together with the U.S. industry to defend Canadian interests, bearing in mind any measures that may be taken by the U.S. industry.

I believe that as soon as a decision is made on the U.S. side, the Canadian government's position will be quite clear.

• (1120)

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, the position of the Canadian government may be very clear. The fact is that Carla Hills told the minister to take a hike. She has no intention of intervening to get the message through to American industry.

Since the Minister for International Trade failed miserably in his mission last Tuesday, I would like to ask the minister whether he is prepared to call upon our Prime Minister because we know the clock is ticking on this one and there could very well be action taken as of next week, formalized action.

Will he ask the Prime Minister of Canada to have a chat with President Bush while in Rio, to take 10 seconds to try to help save thousands of Canadian jobs, to stop this steel war before it starts, not after the fact when it will be too late?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, what the hon. member from Hamilton East has said is quite right. It is much, much better to avoid this type of trade war before it starts, rather than get into it and have the damage that flows from that. That is precisely the position that I took with Mrs. Hills on Tuesday.

The position we have taken all along, whether it was when the Prime Minister met with the President earlier this month or late last month I guess it was, was the position the Prime Minister took with the President.

As the Prime Minister has said on other occasions, these are issues that are initiated by the industry. We cannot stop what industry wants to do. We can make our views known, and these views have been made known very, very clearly. We will continue to do so on every occasion that we have.

TRADE

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Madam Speaker, the fact of the matter is that Canada's special relationship with the United States just is not working.

I have another question for the same minister. The GATT report released yesterday on Canada's trade policies concluded that Canada's present recession has been prolonged because of its overdependence on a single country for its trade. In fact, Canada's share of total world trade has declined from 5 per cent to 4 per cent under this government.

Why is Canada so intent on tying our trade to one single country rather than expanding our trade to other markets around the world like these GATT countries are telling us?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, my hon. friend has distorted the facts. The facts are that Canada has not suffered because of the free trade agreement. Our exports to the United States in the first quarter this year were at record levels. They are at record levels in total.

An hon. member: What about jobs?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): My hon. friend from Edmonton asks: "What about jobs?" Surely he can understand that every billion dollars worth of trade adds 15,000 jobs. If we add $5 or $6 billion of trade we get somewhere between 75,000 to 100,000 new jobs in Canada that would not be there without the free trade agreement.

An hon. member: Where?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): My hon. friend asks where they are. They are in her city. I could give her some specific examples of companies that have increased their market share and have created jobs in Canada because they are taking advantage of the opportunities that are there with the free trade agreement.

My hon. friend suggests that we are becoming too reliant on the United States market. One of the considerations in entering into a free trade agreement with the United States is to expand into that U.S. market, build our competitive position by increasing our competitiveness through rationalization and specialization into the U.S. market and use that position to increase our sales into other countries. That is precisely what is happening.

Companies are gaining market share in the United States. They are using that increased competitiveness to sell into other markets.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Madam Speaker, what I am telling the government and what I am telling the minister is that other countries around the world are telling Canada that it is too overdependent on a single economy and that it will be disastrous for this economy.

Although the Asian bloc accounts for some 60 per cent of the world's population and 50 per cent of global production, Canada only does 11 per cent of its trade with Asia. It is incredible, but since 1988 our share of exports to Japan and to Europe have been declining.

Why is this government preaching competitiveness and preaching globalization yet at the same time increasing the integrating of our economy with one single country?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, the simplistic conclusions that my hon. friend is drawing demonstrate clearly his total lack of understanding of how companies and countries build their competitive positions.

If my hon. friend looked at the statistics and read them honestly into the record, he would see that the reliance on the United States market started back in 1980. At that time our percentage of exports to the United States market was at about 65 or 66 per cent. They reached a peak in the middle eighties of close to 80 per cent. They have come down to 75 per cent.

The precise approach we are following is to increase our trade promotion activities into other countries. I have personally led trade missions to China, Japan and Korea. I will be in other parts of the Far East in September this year and also in Spain, the Middle East and the reforming countries of the former Soviet Union.

These are the efforts the government is taking to broaden our trade but we need a competitive position. The best way that we can build that competitive position is by rationalizing and specializing in the United States market. With access to that market companies are able to do so and are doing so right now.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Associate Minister of National Defence.

Yesterday she said that the $4.3 billion helicopter deal was necessary because the existing search and rescue helicopters were unsafe.

The minister will be aware that the proposed new helicopters are single rotor and that the existing Labradors are twin rotor and are therefore much safer in the kind of terrain in which they have to operate.

Perhaps the minister is also aware that most of the $4.3 billion purchase is not for search and rescue helicopters but is for very expensive anti-submarine helicopters.

Is the minister not aware that the existing 12 Labradors, the 12 Labrador search and rescue helicopters, can be made safe and efficient for another 20 years for simply $200 million, not $4.3 billion?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Madam Speaker, there are so many erroneous assumptions in the hon. member's question that it is hard to deal with them all.

First of all I want to make it clear the existing Labradors are safe. They have limited capability and we have had to limit their operations in that respect. They do not even make Labradors any longer. They are already getting to be 30 years old.

We are looking now at a replacement helicopter both for search and rescue and for shipboard aircraft which will take us through to the year 2035. Is my hon. colleague saying that we should be operating 70-year old helicopters at that point? I do not think so.

We have to plan ahead. We have to look at what our needs are going to be both for search and rescue and for our new frigates which involve all of our new missions including the patrol of sovereignty. I think my hon. colleague, coming from Victoria, British Columbia, would have a very strong awareness of the importance of providing that kind of support to our navy. It is going to benefit British Columbia and the maritime provinces primarily.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, neither my party nor I have to take a back seat to anyone in our support for the navy.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Brewin: I am glad the House is listening. The fact remains that 35 to 50 of these Cadillac version helicopters the government is proposing to buy are for anti-submarine warfare. That is what they were designed for. That is how they will be equipped.

Is the government not aware that the American house armed services committee has frozen a similar U.S. program because the deep sea Soviet submarine threat is over and that these kinds of helicopters cannot meet the likely threats of the future?

How can the government leave this project alive while killing national child care programs and leaving over one million Canadian young people in poverty?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Madam Speaker, as I have said several times in the House this week, there has been no decision on this matter. There has been no recommendation to cabinet.

This project has been worked on internally for the past six years. If my colleague had kept up to date with the various defence journals he would have been following the developments which have gone on in a very extensive manner looking at a whole variety of options.

I would like to advise my hon. colleague that the helicopters on our new frigates are capable of performing a whole variety of tasks. The ability to detect submarines is only one small component.

The major missions, as my hon. colleague will know from our new defence policy, will require them to be involved in sovereignty patrols, fisheries patrols, interdiction of drugs, the whole mechanism by which we maintain the navy's capability on each of our two coasts.

DRUG TESTING

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, on another subject to the associate minister. The government has announced that every employee in the Department of National Defence, no matter what the employee's duties, will be obliged to undergo mandatory drug testing. The government has said the program will be extended to other departments.

Has the government ignored the strenuous objections of the Human Rights Commission and the Privacy Commissioner, Bruce Phillips, that these tests simply do not contribute to public safety, are unnecessarily expensive and are an Orwellian infringement on individual rights? If the government does insist—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think the question has been put or it is turning into a very long preamble.

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Madam Speaker, I do not exactly consider that a supplementary. Once again, my hon. colleague has his facts wrong. There is no program to test all employees of DND.

We are in the process of introducing a drug testing program for our Armed Forces personnel. It will be phased in. We will focus first on those who have had high risk jobs in those areas where we are most concerned. Over a period of time, we will be extending it to other units.

We are having discussions. I met with the chairman of the Human Rights Commission just this week to discuss these matters with him and to ensure that what we plan to do will be compliant with both the Privacy Commissioner and the Human Rights Commission.

SMALL BUSINESS

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, my question is to the minister of small business. Canadians need jobs and small business needs financing to help create those jobs.

The minister has stated in this House that he is concerned about the constriction of financing to small business by the banking industry. If the minister is so concerned, why has he allowed the Federal Business Development Bank to cut back on loans and guarantees to small business in this past year by over $385 million?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, last year the Federal Business Development Bank did close to 4,000 loans that the private banks would not do.

It is playing a complementary role in terms of providing credit to small business. The problem the FBDB faces is it has fewer applications than in previous years. Therefore, its volume is down. The FBDB has been very active in spite of that.

Also, I am delighted to see today the chartered banks are coming to terms with what I have been complaining about. They were in Ottawa this week and I have spoken to a number of them. They assure me that they will move in the opposite direction, away from constriction of credit.

The banks say the business level has been down somewhat for credit and that accounts for it. I do not know whether that is the case or not.

This week, two of the banks did announce a freeze on service charges to small business for the next year or two. Then we see one bank announce today it is cutting its loan rate to small business 1 per cent below prime to 6.2 per cent. I do not think we have had a rate for small business at that level for over 30 years.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, if there is a lack of demand for financing from the Federal Business Development Bank as the minister indicates, then this government should start looking for a better way to provide this service.

Many small businesses are desperate for financing. How can this minister be taken seriously when he is urging the banking industry not to be as restrictive on small business if his own government has allowed the Federal Business Development Bank to cut loans and guarantees by over 43 per cent this past year.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, first of all, the Federal Business Development Bank does not provide guarantees. I think the hon. member should understand that. She does not understand what the FBDB does.

Second, in terms of the volume of loans, her figures are exaggerated. It has moved into a venture loan program which is totally new. Its marketing and management assistance to small business has been stepped up further and has been extremely well received. As well, it has maintained a very healthy level of loans filling a complementary need in the market.

Beyond that, this government through financial institution reform as of June 1 now makes it possible for insurance companies and trust companies to do an unlimited amount of commercial lending. That is going to put competition in the market for the banks. The hon. member speaks only of the banks and the FBDB. She should also urge the insurance companies and the trust companies to get into small business lending as well.

CANADIAN COAST GUARD

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Transport.

There has been a recent announcement that the Canadian Coast Guard's regional headquarters will be moved in 1993 from Toronto to Sarnia. Will the minister assure me and the House that this is not the beginning of greater centralization affecting other Coast Guard offices in Canada?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Madam Speaker yes, the regional headquarters is moving from Toronto to Sarnia this year.

This move was taken because of space requirements in Toronto and the end of a lease on the particular space we were occupying. It was a move to take the Coast Guard people closer to the those with whom they were working.

We have combined the services in Sarnia. This was a move to better provide service to the coastal and marine people. It is only one move; it is not part of an over–all move at all.

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is to the same minister.

In order to dispel the rumours circulating in my riding and reassure the other Coast Guard employees, would the minister's office issue a statement or a directive to employees advising them that the Toronto to Sarnia move of the Coast Guard in 1993 will affect Toronto employees only?

• (1140)

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Madam Speaker, I would be glad to have a letter sent to the employees in his area to reassure them.

NUCLEAR REACTORS

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister of energy and concerns a grave situation affecting Essex county and Windsor.

On June 2 the Fermi II nuclear plant in Michigan locked out skilled unionized workers. The U.S. Nuclear Regulatory Commission has said this could cause maintenance problems within several weeks.

Given two accidents at Fermi since the lock–out the Canadian consul in Detroit today tells me that she contacted Fermi and I quote: "To express our deepest concern about the operation of the plant".

Is the minister prepared to go further through the contacts which the Atomic Energy Control Board of Canada has kept up with the Nuclear Regulatory Commission in the United States?

Will the minister tell Fermi to cease operations, to end this lock–out, to do something to see to it that Canadians are protected during the course of this labour dispute, to see that this labour dispute is in fact settled before this plant goes back to full operation?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the hon. member raises a valid point. I say to him the Atomic Energy Control Board as he has also indicated in his question has been making the point in respect of nuclear plant operation safety.

There are two points that I have to add. One, obviously the Government of Canada cannot get involved in a domestic labour strike. Two, the United States, Canada and other countries are members of the International Atomic Energy Agency. We all have agreed to various means by which we will safely operate our nuclear plants.

I will take the member's point further and check with the AECB today as to what response it has received or what further actions it is contemplating with its counterparts in the United States.

TRADE

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology.

Champion Sparkplug in Windsor has been thriving up until recently. Indeed, up until yesterday it was hiring new workers. In fact, the vice president in charge of operations said in a letter that Windsor workers were known for their efficiency and quality of work ethic in the Windsor plant. However, in that same letter the vice president says that 225 people are going to lose their jobs at Champion Sparkplug because production is being moved to Burlington, Iowa.

In the last two weeks five other plants in Windsor have closed. Three thousand men and women have lost their jobs. We have lost 50 plants.

The workers in Windsor want me to ask the minister this question: When will this government recognize the failure of its industrial policy, of its free trade agreement, and its prospective North American free trade agreement and produce an industrial strategy that will stop this haemorrhage of Canadian jobs and produce real industrial growth in this country?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I am not aware of the specific incidents that my hon. friend refers to.

I can tell him that Pratt & Whitney opened a $12.5 million plant that will bring some good technology into Canada and help create jobs in Canada. I can refer to a company in the Hamilton area, Linde Canada, that is going to be the headquarters for its new industrial and specialty gas distribution system.

No one is happy in raising these types of concerns. My only point in making these other two observations is that we live in a dynamic economy. There are some changes going on. There are changes for the good and changes for the bad, but I think the fact that our exports to the United States were at record levels in the first quarter of this year indicates we are having more successes than downturns.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

The government is telling the Canadian public to shop at home. We all know the profound impact that cross-border shopping has had on border communities and on the Canadian economy in general.

Can the government explain to those same Canadians why Canada Post is currently supplying each of its 23,000 letter carriers with three short sleeved shirts, three long sleeved shirts and three ties; 200,000 pieces of clothing made in the United States?

Will the government direct its own Crown corporation to buy in Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, on behalf of the minister responsible for Canada Post, I know that we have often heard the minister say here that in recent years, since it came to power, this government has taken a Crown corporation that was running a $400-million annual deficit and now we have a team at Canada Post that is one of the best in the world. So I think that people are fed up with paying taxes for money losers and I think that the whole country wins if we have policies that make Canada Post profitable.

[English]

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Madam Speaker, I fail to understand how buying in the United States is going to reduce the Canadian deficit.

My supplementary question is for the same minister. Canada 125 is buying outside of Canada. Canada Post is buying outside of Canada. What directives, if any, does this government give Crown corporations about cross-border shopping?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I am sure my hon. friend is aware of an advertising program we have under way called "Canada: Buy Into It".

Some hon. members: Whoopee!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): If my hon. friends on the other side would relax for a minute I will give them the answer.

This program is being presented in conjunction with a number of companies in the private sector, major retailers like The Bay, Sears, Dyelex; companies that are using the program we have introduced to reinforce their advertising and sales promotions to increase sales within Canada and, in that way, deal with the difficulties of cross-border shopping.

I am sure my hon. friend is aware that there was a significant drop in cross-border shopping in the month of April. I am sure my hon. friend is also aware that there is a 6 per cent to 7 per cent increase in department store sales. I think this is an indication of a trend of business coming back to Canada, supported fully by the activities of this government.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, my question is for the same minister.

If there is a small drop in cross-border shopping I cannot help but wonder why this government is trying desperately to bring it back up.

The minister will know that at the same time as his government is spending all that money on advertising, telling people to shop at home, the government-owned, to the tune of 85 per cent, Petro-Canada is opening up gas bars across the border in the very famous Canadian city of Plattsburg, New York with the sole purpose of getting Canadians to go across the border to buy cut-rate gas? What is the government going to do about this?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I am sure that my hon. friend would support a position of the Government of Canada whereby we are reducing our ownership in Petro-Canada so that we can use those resources more effectively to support such things as social programs and economic development here in Canada. We provide support through the provinces for education and health care through the privatization of Petro-Canada.

Once we move down that track it is not within our power to direct Petro-Canada as to where it should or should not do business.

My hon. friend and I may well agree that Petro-Canada's activity is something that we do not agree with. This is something that I am sure Mr. Hopper will be sensitized to when he watches this show this evening.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I am at least glad to hear that message and I hope Mr. Hopper gets it loud and clear.

I want to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Energy, Mines and resources on cross-border shopping as well.

• (1150)

The Government of Canada has embarked on another patriotic adventure. It has decided to use the Dutch company Interpost to ship mail from Canada to other countries. The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources uses Interpost, and I quote from the minister's documents here: "because it offered low rates and 'reliable service'".

I want to ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources why is it that his department is spending $301,237 giving contracts to the Dutch company Interpost to deliver Canadian government mail outside the country?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the minister who reports for Canada Post would probably like to have the answer as well.

Putting it very directly, I will do some checking on the file. I say to the hon. member that he has to be a little careful; I had the same type of question in Halifax on the weekend, on why for example did we—

Ms. Copps: That's a good answer!

Mr. Epp: The most the hon. member ever does is sit and make inane comments. Motor-mouth Sheila.

Madam Speaker, what we are saying to them, as for example, that energy that we got out of the ground last weekend for the first time was dropped in the Gulf of Mexico. We made good money on it. The question then becomes, well, why did we not drop it in Canada? If we can get some more money for Canadian products, we will do it. The reverse works as well.

Mr. Boudria: That was from Canada.

Mr. Epp: Precisely, but it works the other way as well. I guess that is what you do not understand about an economy.

THE VICTORIA CROSS

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Associate Minister of National Defence and concerns the Victoria Cross.

Does the minister support the restoration and Canadianization of the Victoria Cross as Canada's highest medal for valour in the face of the enemy?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Madam Speaker, I know my hon. colleague's interest in this subject, but I would like to point out to him that the Victoria Cross is a British medal bestowed by the Queen. It is not a Canadian medal. Obviously Canadians would still be eligible to receive it. It is given for extraordinary valour in the face of the enemy. We hope we do not have to face such an enemy.

At the same time, within Canada we have been developing our own system of honours and awards over a number of years. The final component of that would be to develop our own awards for valour in the face of the enemy. That work is not complete but is ongoing.

I am sure that the hon. member would agree that it is important that we have within Canada a method of recognizing bravery of Canadian men and women in the Armed Forces.

WAR CRIMES

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice and it concerns the bringing to justice of alleged Nazi war criminals who are currently living in Canada.

Recently the minister announced a cut-off date of March 1994 for completion of all current war crimes dossiers. In view of the very strong criticism of that decision by many groups, both in the Jewish community and beyond, and recognizing that there must be no statute of limitations on these crimes against humanity, I want to ask the minister to clarify to the House just how many files remain active in this area, and will the minister assure the House that her announcement will not in any way preclude further investigations based on new evidence or information on these terrible crimes?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I did not announce a cut-off date of March 1994. I indicated that March 1994 was the target date by which we had to try to complete the dossiers that came out of the Deschênes commission and dealt with World War II crimes.

This was not by any means to suggest that we would not continue to investigate after, but to recognize that those particular offences took place at a period of time which creates problems for us now in accumulating evidence. We have set that target date for ourselves as a way of allocating resources in our department, to try to ensure that we get that evidence within a reasonable period of time. We do not have an unlimited period of time to investigate these offences.

I indicated that date during the hearings on my estimates to indicate to people that we are deeply committed to this process and have set for ourselves a target, not to cut off investigations but to ensure that we devote sufficient resources to resolve those problems. In fact, we are devoting more resources to that file than have been allocated by Treasury Board. We have allocated additional resources to try and meet that challenge.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I appreciate that assurance. The minister still has not indicated how many files do remain active. I trust she will answer that.

I have a supplementary question for the same minister. Respected Canadian historian, Dr. Alti Rodal, prepared five years ago for the Deschênes commission a full study on Canada's shameful record of closing the door on Jews fleeing Nazis while allowing war criminals to enter.

In view of Judge Deschênes' statement at that time, that this study deserves wide distribution, will the government finally release the full Rodal report so that the truth can be told about this shameful chapter in Canadian history?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, with respect to the first comment of the hon. member, as he will know, it is the policy of the government and of every attorney general in the country never to confirm or deny whether investigations are under way.

It is awkward because there was some misunderstanding coming out of the Deschênes commission of precisely what number of files there were that had promise of prosecution. He will know that Justice Deschênes did not have access to evidence from outside of Canada, from eastern European files, or have the ability to evaluate the viability of those files, based on the full range of evidence and availability of witnesses. Some have proved to be more promising than were expected and some have proven to be less promising.

With respect to the release of any kind of report, he will know that there are very important charter and privacy considerations that are involved in these reports. These have governed our approach to releasing that kind of information.

HIBERNIA

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

In mid-February shock waves went through Newfoundland when the news broke that Gulf Oil would pull its 25 per cent share out of the Hibernia project. Since that time there has been wild speculation, as the minister knows, both positive and negative, about the future of this project.

Since this is such a critical project to Newfoundland, indeed to the whole of Canada, I wonder if the minister could share with us what are the prospects of another fourth partner to replace Gulf and what is the possibility of success for this project.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for the question because he and members of the House have been very helpful on this project.

I want to say to the member that his assessment of the period post-February 4, when Gulf served notice on the consortium and the two governments that it was pulling out its 25 per cent share in Hibernia is correct and that all concerned have been working very diligently across the world in an attempt to find investors in the project.

I do not think it comes as any surprise to the hon. member when I say that it has been difficult because of the investment climate in the oil business world-wide. Returns are not as buoyant in the oil industry as we have experienced in past years.

I can indicate to the hon. member that as we speak we are in negotiations for a possible partner or partners who are examining very seriously the possibility of their entering into an arrangement with the two governments and with the consortium.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I do appreciate the minister's response and the somewhat delicate nature of the negotiations.

With the future of the Newfoundland economy hinging on the possibility of a shutdown fishery, the Hibernia project takes on an even greater significance, if that is possible.

The critical date of early October, when the 240 day penalty clause is up for Gulf, their continued funding until that date is fast approaching. In fact, we are a little bit more than midway there. I think the minister can appreciate how anxious people in Newfoundland are getting right now.

I wonder if perhaps he could reconsider and give us some indication of how many options are available, whether there is any likelihood of success and perhaps even more important, the dates that we may know more information.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I would like to be as forthcoming as possible. I appreciate the member's sensitivity to the timing of this question.

• (1200)

I appreciate what he says about Newfoundland having difficulties in the fishery, the announcement that Hibernia had lost a partner on February 4 and the general state of the economy. It is that reality that has doubly motivated all of us to try to get a solution on Hibernia.

I have always said that Hibernia is important, but it is important in the larger context of Newfoundland being able to develop a resource. That is why I mentioned earlier today about offshore oil coming into Nova Scotia. I saw on Saturday the buoyancy in Nova Scotia. Again, it does not solve every problem in Nova Scotia but it does add to the buoyancy.

I can only say to the hon. member that I do not want to raise false hopes in Newfoundland because they have been dashed too many times. We are going to use this weekend to negotiate. In fact, starting tonight I will be involved personally as well as members of the Newfoundland government with a consortium and with potential investors. We will be dedicating this weekend in the hope that we can bring this to closer fruition.

CHILDREN

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, following the conference on the rights of the child, the government put forward the child tax credit. In fact, this proposal will actually make children on welfare poorer, not better off.

If the government is really concerned about child poverty, will the minister promise to fully index the child tax credits to inflation?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Madam Speaker, I have always maintained here in this House that the best way to ensure quality of life for families and children is to reduce the deficit, improve economic growth and create jobs, and that is what we are working on.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, I know that the minister is aware of this question. We have had a discussion about it and his sympathies in the matter.

Is the minister prepared to meet with representatives of the Gwa'Sala–'Nakwaxda'xw council to discuss some of the problems that it has had over the last 30 years in terms of social disintegration? Also, is he prepared to meet with his colleagues to co–ordinate the response from the ministries of health, employment and aboriginal affairs in this very important matter?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I certainly am prepared to meet with various First Nations chiefs and councils as I travel across the country.

I certainly would be prepared to meet the representatives of the Gwa'Sala–'Nakwaxda'xw council at an appropriate occasion when I am in British Columbia, which is almost weekly.

I should say that the department is reviewing a specific claim from this community on northern Vancouver Island, and we are undertaking a number of capital improvements within that community of which the member is well aware.

I thank the hon. member for bringing this matter to my attention.

GOVERNOR IN COUNCIL APPOINTMENTS

REFERRAL TO STANDING COMMITTEES

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to table today in the House, in both official languages, Orders in Council announcing appointments made recently by the government.

Pursuant to Standing Order 110(1), these Orders in Council are deemed to have been referred to the standing committees indicated in the appendix.

CANADA'S SENIORS

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Madam Speaker, as Minister of State for Seniors, I have the pleasure and honour to remind all of us assembled here that at this time of the year, seniors are honoured all across Canada.

From the end of May until the end of June, all provinces and territories have ongoing activities for seniors. These activities, organized at the community, municipal or provincial level, vary from social gatherings to officially designated events, such as the Seniors Day in the Manitoba legislature.

I am particularly happy to take part in this tribute to our seniors. As you already know, the mandate the Prime Minister entrusted to me as Minister of State for Seniors is to give a voice to seniors in cabinet and to represent their interests in Parliament.

Very early in my mandate, I decided that one of the most important contributions I could make was to become a good listener. Consequently, I have spent many hours consulting with older Canadians from coast to coast and in our northern territories. I have also talked with those who represent seniors' organizations, with self-help groups and with individuals who work with older Canadians.

The government has also commissioned a number of studies to learn about seniors' views and we can now rely on the results of two interesting studies.

The first, conducted by Statistics Canada, explored issues affecting the independence of older Canadians. The topics addressed included: preparation for retirement, employment, physical and social activities, health and well-being, life experience, mobility and travel, accidents and safety, housing, income and finances, and satisfaction with life.

The second study, by Health and Welfare Canada, was a series of focus groups exploring the meaning of independence and quality of life for older Canadians. This research and my extensive contacts with seniors have enabled me to understand what seniors expect. They expect independence, equality and recognition as individuals.

For Canada's seniors, independence is both a state of living and a state of mind. Independence, for seniors, means being free to do what they want to do, being responsible for their own initiatives.

Aging is indeed a life long process which involves a series of changes from birth to death, but unfortunately many misconceptions and myths on this subject persist.

[English]

Canada's seniors expect to be integrated into society, not seen as a group apart. They want to be treated as equals. They want people to take their views into account, to listen to them and involve them in decision-making. They want to have the opportunity to participate directly in the design and implementation of programs that affect them. They want to be seen as contributors to society, not as yesterday's corporate leaders, retired teachers or mechanics.

[Translation]

Seniors also want to be recognized as individuals, as different from one another. They do not want to be viewed as a statistic, an age group. I find these expectations very reasonable. Canadian seniors vary in income, cultural and educational backgrounds, state of health, and life experiences. They have different aspirations and fulfil themselves in many different ways. While they have many common concerns, their priorities and opinions differ.

Administrators, health care workers and elected officials often ask themselves how they can best help seniors achieve and maintain this desired independence.

In Canada, we have a number of supports available to seniors. The first major program for older Canadians began in the late 1920s, when the federal government co-operated with various provinces to finance a joint old-age pension scheme. Today, our government's concern for seniors is reflected in the fact that Canada's "elderly benefit system" is now the largest program expenditure area within government.

The rapid increase in the senior population has stimulated the development of other federal programs and services for seniors in such areas as housing and health and social services.

Worthy of special mention is the Seniors Independence Program designed to help seniors improve their health, well-being and independence and to enhance their quality of life. This program encourages seniors to get involved in designing and carrying out projects which affect their quality of life and independence.

New Horizons is another program that has encouraged and supported projects planned and carried out by seniors themselves.

[English]

In concluding, I would like to build on our experience in developing a new strategy that also promotes improved co-operation between departments and increased partnerships with the various interest groups, including seniors themselves.

I think you will agree with me that in a world concerned with preserving the environment and making the best use of resources, it will be unacceptable to ignore the experience and knowledge of seniors.

[Translation]

Like many other cultures in the world, let us give our seniors the place they deserve.

• (1210)

I encourage hon. members to take part in Seniors Month and to respond to the aspirations of all of these people who have helped build our vast country.

[English]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to respond briefly to the statement made by the minister.

[Translation]

Needless to say, we all listened attentively to what the minister had to say and we support the wishes that she expressed today.

Personally, I would have some things to add. This statement is off the cuff. I would like to tell the minister that I spent almost all my life with seniors, since I was raised by my grandmother, my grandparents. Every time I hear something like what the minister said, I remember those childhood years.

[English]

There is no doubt that for many of our seniors the greatest enemy, if I can refer to it that way, is solitude. To that extent, programs such as New Horizons and others have contributed to getting seniors together in order to counter that solitude that so often affects our senior citizens.

It is regrettable, though, that quite often those seniors we would want to make part of a group of other seniors are often the ones who are the hardest to approach. They live perhaps in more remote areas, not in our cities and towns, or they sometimes have lived alone for a long time and they are hesitant to join groups of other seniors.

Our golden age clubs, our seniors' clubs, have succeeded in large measure in bringing the seniors together and organizing good, sound recreational activities, both physical and otherwise, in order to occupy the time of many of our seniors who have retired, particularly those living alone.

One should not stereotype our senior citizens as people who have necessarily all retired and are living alone because that is not the case.

[Translation]

Many seniors, of course, live very productive lives and contribute to the labour force, directly or indirectly. I for one am glad to see that the old way of looking at things, of forcing seniors to retire at 65 or some other arbitrary age, is disappearing or observed less and less.

The time has come when Canadians must consider our seniors as people who are as much a part of society as those who are younger and, of course, we must consider them as full members because they contribute so much.

[English]

Another thing we should consider in all of this is the aging of our work force. We must ensure strong and meaningful participation for our people who have reached some of those milestone years in their lives. They are needed components of our work force and elsewhere.

In a study I participated in some years ago about skilled trades people in Canada we were noting that some of our skilled people, machinists, skilled people in other specialized areas, were all approaching that so-called age of retirement we use to talk about a lot.

If all those peoples did retire at that arbitrary age, which granted is disappearing now, their retirement would have meant that others would have lost their jobs because they were the team leaders, the organizers, the high-tech people, the machinists, the trades people on whom others depended.

Sometimes some will say, wrongly, that if so and so retired, that would make room for the rest of them to go up that ladder. Perhaps there are occasions when that may be so, not that it would make it a credible argument. In many cases the exact opposite is true.

[Translation]

The same thing is happening now in the academic field. Teachers at the secondary and post-secondary level who have doctorates are almost all approaching so-called retirement age. Fortunately, we are eliminating that arbitrary age limit.

[English]

In conclusion, I want to indicate the support of my colleagues of the minister's statement but I want to inform the government that we certainly do not want the episode that took place some years ago in which pensions were attacked to happen again in this House. It is my hope that not only that government but any government would have learned its lesson from the attacks of that particular time.

I do not want to end on a negative note. I want to conclude, though, by saying that we consider the message of the minister to be a very positive one, one which we support but again with the caution I have expressed earlier.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise today on this occasion on behalf of my party and our critic from Beaches—Woodbine, the seniors critic for our party, and express my congratulations to the minister on her statement today. It is my pleasure to be able to be part of a statement in the House of Commons, pointing out to the people of Canada and to anybody else watching the parliamentary channel the resource we have in Canada; namely, our golden agers, our seniors.

One of the things that has been brought out in the speech by the Minister of State for Seniors, and it is an important one, is the need for seniors to be and to feel they are independent.

Independence comes from a sense of economic well-being, a sense of security in the knowledge they are surrounded by friends, acquaintances, and that they have sufficient funds squirrelled away, if you will, to see them through their golden years.

When I look at the aspect of aging in the reports of Statistics Canada and others I see that 57 per cent of seniors, those over 65, are women. As it gets up into the higher age groups, those percentages increase. We look at the report of Statistics Canada and we see that women are more likely to be single, widowed and living alone and independently and that fewer women own homes than their male counterparts.

I also look at the recent study by Statistics Canada on aging and independence and see that in the ages 65 to 69, 18 per cent of males have incomes under $10,000. Of those females over the ages of 65 to 69, the figure is 48 per cent having incomes under $10,000 per year. When I speak of independence and the economic well-being that goes with independence, I point to those figures as an area that we as parliamentarians must look at carefully in deciding the course of our legislation and our thrust for seniors in the future. I know this minister has been one who has worked hard on behalf of seniors throughout the time I have been here and I have appreciated her forthrightness with me and others regarding seniors.

I want to point out that all has not been rosy throughout the time I have been here. As seniors critic for my party and as one who has been interested in the problems of seniors, I have noted health care cuts to various provinces, including my home province of British Columbia. Seniors tell me the GST has hurt them enormously in a number of ways that were not thought of when the GST was brought in. The clawback of old age security has hurt them.

One thing that has been brought out very graphically to me is that as people get older they need various other hygienic products. In one recent case, I am aware those particular products cost an elderly gentleman over $200 a month. There is no tax deduction and there is no way he can get these products under his pharma-care program. It is an out of pocket expense.

I know all of us as parliamentarians have had calls flooding into our offices since April 1 from seniors who get Canada pension, advising that their over all income has dropped by $8 or $9 a month.

For many of us who make reasonable salaries, $8 or $9 a month does not seem that significant. However, when you are receiving under $10,000 a year and you are scraping together enough money to be able to eat properly, $8 a month may make the difference between three full meals in a month. It can make the difference if you want to get out and see a friend that month. I want to highlight that.

Although this is a time to celebrate with seniors and draw attention to seniors, I do not think we can turn our backs on the problems that seniors have. There are also other areas we must look at.

I have travelled across the country as the seniors critic. We speak about independent living. As medical breakthroughs come along, people are living longer, but we do not seem to have proper facilities for people that require them, the wandering confused, those with Alzheimers disease, those who have had strokes that have rendered them incapable of looking after themselves. We are just starting to be able to properly and adequately look after these people. When you speak to people who have experienced the trauma of having to place their loved one in a home, it is essential that we have those homes for people and make those facilities available.

I point to the Hardy View Lodge in Grand Forks which just celebrated its 10th anniversary as an example of one that has made a community effort out of this.

I want to mention in closing that I know the minister has worked hard and I know there are many things she would like to do that cannot be done. One thing I want to emphasize as we proceed with the celebration of Seniors Month, is that we have to ensure there is more research and development done in the area of aging, gerontology and the whole process of growing old. We know that it happens. However we must deal with some of the results of aging. I want to congratulate the minister. I want to congratulate the seniors for all of the things they are doing this month. It has been a pleasure to speak on behalf of my party in this celebratory month for seniors.

ELECTORAL DISTRICT OF TIMISKAMING

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-351, an act to change the name of the electoral district of Timiskaming.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. MacDougall: Madam Speaker, on July 13, 1987 when the Electoral Boundary Readjustment Act came into effect, the riding of Timiskaming, which was noted as a north-south riding, was changed to more of a north-south-east-west, taking in a large part of the Nickel Belt riding.

Communications in Timiskaming normally followed a north-south path, and in identifying the new part of our riding it was felt that the French River, which was the most southwest point of the riding, that we would be able to change the name to recognize the new portion of the riding and to rename it Timiskaming—French River.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr. MacDougall moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed carried.

Bill read the first time and printed.

JUSTICE AND THE SOLICITOR GENERAL

AUTHORIZATION FOR COMMITTEE TO TRAVEL

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I think you will find there is unanimous consent for the following motion. I move:

> That three members and one staff of the Standing Committee of Justice and the Solicitor General be authorized to travel to Halifax, Nova Scotia from August 22 to 27, 1992 to attend the annual meeting of the Canadian Bar Association.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, I am not aware of this and I do not have to give my consent until I get some information as to who has been informed here on this side of the House. Until I get that kind of advice I will not give my consent.

Madam Deputy Speaker: This is a discussion that might be held behind curtains. It would be helpful to the House.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ELECTRONIC VOTING

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, I and a number of my colleagues in the House would seek unanimous consent of the House to place a motion before the House to implement electronic voting. I wonder whether there might be unanimous consent.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has heard there is not unanimous consent at this time.

Mr. Kindy: Madam Speaker, I am sure you will now find unanimous consent in the House in view of the fact that the McGrath commission recommended electronic voting. I am sure the Liberal Party is going to give consent and you will find consent to have electronic voting in this House.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, this attempt to negotiate putting or not putting a different kind of voting system in the House is very interesting. It is normally done between House leaders of the parties, brought to the committee of internal economy if it involves an expenditure and then given to the House.

• (1230)

I am 100 per cent in favour of what is proposed by the hon. member but I am 100 per cent against the scheme he is trying to develop right now. He is trying to get the House to commit to something that his House leader is not even around to see whether or not he agrees with.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, I appreciate what the hon. member is saying, and possibly that is going to be the best route to follow.

I gather from the other side that it is now likely to be under way next week. I think certainly calling attention to the situation has proved useful. Hopefully it will proceed.

Mr. Kindy: Madam Speaker, on the same point of order, as the hon. member who just spoke said, I think there is agreement on the other side to have a serious look at this question of electronic voting.

I am sure that the House leaders are going to meet and try to implement that type of voting in this House.

JUSTICE AND THE SOLICITOR GENERAL

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I was unavoidably out of the House for a moment a little earlier when the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader moved a motion.

I can now confirm that there have been the usual consultations. I apologize that I had to leave the House for a moment at approximately the time that the motion was moved. I am able to confirm now that in fact the usual consultation and agreement has been sought and obtained.

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, I can confirm that is the case. While I appreciate the unflagging vigilance of the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, I would not have moved the motion in bad faith. I can assure him of that.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, I never even implied that the member for Edmonton Southwest would move such a motion in bad faith. If it is in his mind that he may, then I am glad that he withdrew it.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Not only is it Friday, I think the full moon is just about to be upon us.

Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Agreed and so ordered.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

CO-OP HOUSING PROGRAM

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Madam Speaker, I knew we would get to this portion of Routine Proceedings.

I have with me five petitions, the first one being from a group of residents in the Toulon area asking the federal government to reinstate the federal Co-op Housing Program.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Madam Speaker, I have four other petitions signed by a large number of constituents from the Portage, Oakville, St. Claude area of my riding.

The petitioners are requesting Parliament to revise the laws of Canada and replace the Young Offenders Act in view of a 15-year old who was accused of murdering a 13-year old and given a slight slap on the wrist.

They humbly pray that the government will look at these petitions.

[Translation]

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, I have five more petitions this morning which are part of a campaign to persuade the government and Parliament to reinstate the Court Challenges Program.

As you know, this program has helped many individuals and minority groups to clarify their constitutional language rights and equality rights before the courts.

These people maintain that the program, which was not very costly, was very useful in that it enabled all Canadians to clarify these constitutional rights.

At a time when we are reviewing all our constitutional commitments, I think the government would do well to listen to these Canadians.

Your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to consider the option of reinstating the Court Challenges Program, which gives Canadians equal access to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

[English]

STEVEN OGUNWUYI

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to table a petition signed by residents of my own constituency of Burnaby—Kingsway as well as North Vancouver, Richmond and a number of other cities in British Columbia who note that Steven Ogunwuyi, a Nigerian, 23 years of age, was unwittingly implicated in an unsuccessful coup attempt against the unelected Nigerian president. Other people implicated in the coup have been executed after unfair trials and prisoners awaiting trial have died in Nigerian prisons because of the terrible conditions there.

They note that Steven has escaped from Nigeria, made his way to Canada, applied for refugee status and has been denied and ordered removed from Canada back to Nigeria and that he fears for his life.

Therefore, they request that the House of Commons urge the Minister of Employment and Immigration to allow, on compassionate grounds, Steven Ogunwuyi to remain in Canada.

CANADIAN HUMAN RIGHTS ACT

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): I have a second petition which contains signatures gathered by the Alberta Union of Provincial Employees, particularly Gordon Christie, executive member, which notes that in February of 1985 the House of Commons mandated the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs to prepare a report on equality rights in Canada.

That committee did report in October, unanimously recommending that the Canadian Human Rights Act be amended to prohibit discrimination based on sexual orientation in all areas of federal jurisdiction. Despite a promise by the federal government in March 1986 to act on this commitment, there has still been no amendment forwarded. The other provinces have acted and the Canadian Human Rights Commission has called for such an amendment.

The petitioners, therefore, call upon Parliament to ensure that government and Parliament act to bring forward immediately an amendment to add sexual orientation to the Canadian Human Rights Act as a prohibited ground of discrimination.

HOUSING

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Finally, Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition which is signed by hundreds of residents of my constituency of Burnaby—Kingsway, particularly the residents of co-operative housing in Burnaby—Kingsway.

This petition notes that recent government constitutional proposals will transfer jurisdiction over housing to the provinces, including the responsibility for non-profit, co-op housing. It notes that non-profit, co-operative housing provides thousands of Canadian families with quality, affordable shelter. It also notes that many provinces will be unable to support a non-profit, co-operative housing program. It condemns the recent elimination of the co-op housing budget in the federal government budget.

It therefore calls upon Parliament to recognize housing as a shared provincial-federal responsibility, to support the federal non-profit, co-op housing program, to maintain the Canadian Mortgage and Housing Corporation and to restore the budget for co-operative housing.

Having knocked on many co-operative housing doors in my constituency, I know this reflects the concerns of many residents of Burnaby—Kingsway, both in co-operatives and elsewhere.

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, it is my honour and privilege to present to the House a petition that is signed by 2,250 or more residents of Canada, most of them in Ontario but some of them in Alberta and Quebec. It was gathered by the British Heritage Institute of Canada. A particular moving force was my friend and constituent, George Penfold.

This petition calls upon the Parliament of Canada and the Government of Canada to recognize explicitly, respect and retain in the Constitution all those elements of Canada's British heritage that benefit all citizens through historical honesty, fair play, good manners and precedent, including one dominion under the Queen, the supremacy of Parliament.

It also calls for the repeal of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms to ensure that the supremacy of Parliament is recognized through the majority of the elected representation.

It also calls for equality of all individual citizens. It calls for individuals' responsibilities for the consequence of their actions rather than prescriptive rights to be recognized in the Constitution. It calls for all of our basic freedoms and it calls for the continuation of the British parliamentary tradition within our Constitution.

JUSTICE

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Madam Speaker, I have two groups of petitions. There are several but I will table them according to the two subject matters.

The first petition calls upon Parliament to recognize that crimes of violence against the person are serious and abhorrent to society. It calls upon Parliament to amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act of 1972 and the Parole Act accordingly.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): This petition calls upon the government to put forward a referendum on the constitutional amendments and the acceptance or rejection of the proposed amendments to be determined by a majority vote of the total votes cast in the whole of Canada, together with a majority vote in a majority of provinces, with the territories being given the status of one province.

• (1240)

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, the attached petition is hereby certified correct.

I have the honour to present this petition on behalf of the Kinettes and Kinsmen Club of Kootenay East with over 300 signatures on it.

Whereas Canadians are normally a reserved people, often concealing their patriotic feelings, and whereas Kinsmen and Kinette Clubs of Canada have created an opportunity for all Canadians to participate in the proud to be Canadian project during the celebration of our 125th anniversary of Confederation in 1992, the undersigned, your petitioners, hereby support the proud to be Canadian project as an opportunity to nurture a positive life-long relationship with our heritage and our flag, to encourage stronger ties among all Canadian for the further advancement of Canada as a leader in world circles and promote our tremendous pride in being Canadian.

GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise to introduce a petition signed by many of my constituents who are calling on the government to take action in order to correct the discriminatory action on the part of some of the major suppliers of gasoline in the Ottawa area.

These petitioners want to see this injustice corrected.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to table a petition today signed primarily by residents of Saskatchewan who are concerned—and it ties in very much to an announcement expected to be made today by the CRTC regarding long distance communication—that the consequence of this possible rate restructuring will lead to increases in telephone bills for nine out of 10 Canadians, particularly those in rural and more isolated communities, and will jeopardize Canada's tradition of affordable universal telephone service. They are very concerned about this expected decision.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, I also have a petition that I have the pleasure of presenting to the House. It is signed by a large number of residents of Vancouver Island and the coast of B.C. It asks that the government repeal the goods and services tax.

The petition points out that the tax is regressive and punitive, that it is of tremendous harm to small business and people in lower incomes. The petition notes that the New Democratic Party is the only party to advocate the repeal of the goods and services tax.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I would ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: I wish to inform the House that because of the ministerial statement, Government Orders will be extended by 18 minutes, pursuant to Standing Order 33(2)(b).

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-55, an act to amend certain acts in relation to pensions and to enact the Special Retirement Arrangements Act and the Pension Benefits Division Act, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I will now put to the House the first group of motions which includes Motions Nos. 2, 17, 36 and 72.

I will remind the House that a vote on Motion No. 2 will apply to Motions Nos. 17, 36 and 72.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway) moved:

Motion No. 2

That Bill C-55 be amended in clause 13 by striking out line 11 at page 13 and substituting the following therefor:

"residing with a person to".

Motion No. 17

That Bill C-55 be amended in clause 43 by striking out lines 30 and 31 at page 41 and substituting the following therefor:

"death, residing with a person to whom the contributor was not mar-"

Motion No. 36

That Bill C-55 be amended in Clause 72 by striking out lines 26 and 27 at page 67 and substituting the following therefor:

"death, residing with a person to whom the contributor was not mar-"

Motion No. 72

That Bill C-55 be amended in Schedule II by striking out lines 34 and 35 at page 150 and substituting the following therefor:

"sion plan, means a person who"

He said: Madam Speaker, it is an honour to be able to rise to put before the House today this group of amendments to federal pension legislation in Canada.

The fundamental purpose of these amendments is to ensure basic fairness, equity, and justice for thousands of Canadians who are currently denied that in this country.

The amendments would amend five pieces of federal legislation which deal with federal pensions: the Public Service Superannuation Act which is the pension plan that currently covers some 312,000 federal government employees; the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act which covers nearly 88,000 Armed Forces members; the RCMP Superannuation Act which covers some 20,000 RCMP members; the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act which covers that pension plan for members and senators; and finally the Pension Benefits Division Act which provides for the division of benefits if a marriage or common law relationship breaks down.

We are talking about tens of thousands of Canadians who are affected by this legislation. Among those tens of thousands of Canadians are lesbians and gay men who are involved in committed loving relationships.

Current federal pension legislation does not explicitly preclude the possibility of the survivor of a lesbian or a gay man within the scope of the legislation being eligible for a pension. However, Bill C–55 would explicitly amend these statutes to make it clear that we would be denying access to benefits to couples involved in lesbian or gay relationships.

We have been told the federal government is reviewing all federal legislation to determine whether distinctions which are made with respect to spouses constitute a violation of the equality rights section of the Charter of Rights based on discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation.

We have been told the results of that review will be available in June 1993. I therefore have to ask, why is the government now moving ahead to explicitly close the door to equality and justice for lesbians and gay men in this country who would otherwise be eligible for such pensions?

I would note the Government of Ontario recently extended a series of job benefits to same sex partners of government employees, but the government was told because of current federal pension legislation it could not extend its pension scheme to lesbian and gay employees within provincial jurisdiction.

I would argue the amendments which are being proposed in Bill C–55 violate the Charter of Rights because they deny fundamental equality on the basis of sexual orientation. The purpose of the amendments which I am placing before the House at this time would be to repeal the explicit reference to families being of the opposite sex and would in fact leave open the possibility that these pension benefits would be available to lesbians and gay men involved in committed relationships.

I would have preferred to have put in amendments which explicitly and clearly set out that entitlement, but I was told such amendments would be out of order.

I would note as well that some six years after the government promised to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to prohibit discrimination based on sexual orientation, we are still waiting for that basic justice, for that promise to to be fulfilled.

Meanwhile the courts have ruled in a number of instances. The British Columbia Supreme Court ruled that a gentleman there, Mr. Timothy Knodel, was entitled to health care benefits. In fact, the provincial legislation which governed the Medical Services Commission discriminated because it did not extend benefits to same sex partners. The judge noted that the two men in question were deeply committed to each other emotionally and sexually, exchanged vows and rings in a private ceremony, established a home together, pooled their finances and shared bank accounts and credit cards.

She noted that evidence in the case by psychiatrist Michael Myers pointed out that the type of emotional bond between homosexual couples is no different than that between heterosexual couples.

Others have made similar arguments, the case of Haig and Birch before the Ontario high court, Brian Mossop whose appeal was recently heard by the Supreme Court of Canada, seeking one day of bereavement leave to attend the funeral of his partner of some 11 years.

I would note as well that we are not talking about a major cost here to the Canadian taxpayer. Indeed, it has been estimated by Mr. Bernard Dussault who works with the federal government in this area that the costs would be minimal. In fact, Mr. Dussault who is the Acting Chief Actuary for the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions in Ottawa has said that it would add, based on the maximum possible estimate, some 1.5 per cent to the over-all cost of the pension plan if all those who were eligible claimed their benefits.

Similarly, Jim Egan and his partner Jack Nesbit, over 40 years together in a committed, caring relationship have been told that in the eyes of the law their relationship does not exist. Others have moved for justice in this area. In fact, I would note that a number of jurisdictions, including the city of Toronto, the Government of Ontario, the Regional Municipality of Ottawa-Carleton, the city of Vancouver, the city of Montreal, the government of the Yukon, a number of universities and a number of major unions have moved in this respect.

Frankly, I as a gay man and as a member of Parliament am tired of hearing that somehow our relationships are not just as strong and just as committed and just as loving and caring as any other relationships in our society, that somehow we are incapable of being families.

In fact, we have heard from REAL Women on this. Peggy Stacey, the president of the B.C. chapter has said: "The traditional family is a mother, a father and children. This ruling affects the fabric of our country". Well, tell that to the tens of thousands of lesbians and gay men in this country who are involved, often against considerable odds, in deeply committed and caring relationships.

I must say that I have seen those relationships, the partners of people with AIDS who have demonstrated incredible love and care and compassion in the course of their struggle against that terrible disease. I think we could learn a great deal from those couples in terms of how to love and build commitment into our relationships.

I would hope that in Canada we will see that it is time to recognize and to celebrate the diversity of our communities, to recognize that lesbian couples and gay couples have been a part of Canadian society, a part of our communities for many, many centuries and to recognize that we too pay taxes. We are not asking for any special rights or special privileges. We are asking for basic equality and basic justice, a recognition of our relationships.

As Dorothy King wrote in a letter to the former premier of Saskatchewan: "Your definition of family is a very distorted one, indeed. If you would care to look outside your own narrow concept of family, you will find an amazing array of family units and many of us, thank you very much, are doing extremely well in spite of the odds against us. My partner and I are just as concerned about our kids as you are about yours. We ski on the weekends, have pets, work, play games, do homework and communicate with each other. When my daughter comes home from school giggling over the cute boy who sits behind her in school, we laugh together and talk about her feelings. She is nine by the way. I do not attempt to make her into anything".

That is one of the many families in Canada. The purpose of this amendment is to ensure that we recognize that in Canada that among the splendid diversity of families in our community are families of lesbians and gay men as well and we should be entitled to full equality. The purpose of this amendment is to ensure that we are entitled to full benefits, pension benefits and survivor benefits. Hopefully this amendment will meet with the approval of the House to ensure that the words of the Charter of Rights in section 15 apply to all Canadians.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I just wish to say a very few words in support of this amendment.

This is an important amendment. It is an historic day in this House that the amendment is being discussed and I hope an even more historic day if it is accepted by the government and adopted.

One of the very positive things about our times is that the scourge of homophobia is slowly lifting. It has not completely lifted, but it is beginning to lift. Thus, it brings a freedom with it from a fear which those who are gays and lesbians have had to suffer for years and years and years.

I just wish to say that I give my support and I know that of many, many members of this House to this motion. It is a matter of right, I believe, that this motion be included in this bill and I hope the House supports it.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The question is on Motion No. 2.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

[Translation]

We will now proceed with the second group: Motions Nos. 5, 20 and 39. I may remind the House that a vote on Motion No. 5 will apply automatically to Motions No. 20 and No. 39.

[English]

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur) moved:

Motion No. 5.

That Bill C-55 be amended in Clause 14 by striking out lines 37 to 47 page 13 and substituting the following therefor:

"repealed."

Motion No. 20.

That Bill C-55 be amended in Clause 44 by striking out lines 7 to 16 at page 42 and substituting the following therefor:

"repealed."

Motion No. 39.

That Bill C-55 be amended in Clause 73 by striking out lines 4 to 13 at page 68 and substituting the following therefor:

"repealed."

He said: Madam Speaker, I will be as quick as possible. I know we have a number of amendments today. Basically these Motions Nos. 5, 20 and 39 were put forth to remove what we commonly refer to as the gold-diggers clause in the various pension plans. What it basically does is remove the age 60 limitation on marriages in the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Armed Forces Superannuation Act and the RCMP Superannuation Act. This is for survivor benefits.

The age 60 rule is clearly contrary to the charter on the basis of age discrimination and must be removed. It is also discriminatory because of the changing demographics. I also think it is basically an insult to many of our senior citizens who receive a pension.

If I may be permitted, I will explain what the clause is all about.

• (1300)

For anyone who marries or remarries after age 60, their spouse would not be entitled to survivor benefits unless the person paid extra pension benefits to have those benefits assigned to his or her spouse. That goes back many years ago to the thirties or forties. I do not not have the exact date.

At that time governments felt that maybe people were retiring much older, in their seventies and some in their late seventies. Sometimes they were remarrying and apparently they thought that the remarriage was basically because someone was looking for some type of advantage. The younger person would marry the older person and take advantage of that person with regard to survivor benefits and whatever.

Now with the change in demographics people are retiring earlier. People are remarrying more often, in the sense that there is a higher divorce rate. This would remove that gold-diggers clause.

We had a witness appear before the committee who was a very specific example. He was part of the RCMP for 33 years. He had contributed pension benefits for 33 years. He had remarried because his first spouse had died. He had been married for 12 years. In this case his spouse would not be entitled to survivor benefits unless the person took a decrease in the pension money he was receiving and put it toward survivor benefits in another plan.

It is a reasonable amendment. We have discussed it in committee with the witnesses who appeared. It seemed to have a lot of approval, but the amendment was not put in committee because we wanted it put in the House to explain to everyone exactly what the clause was all about.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Madam Speaker, I would like to rise in support of the amendment. I too was in the committee when this former RCMP officer appeared before it. It was a sad experience to see someone who had devoted his whole life and paid into a pension scheme have his spouse pass away before his retirement and then be told that if he wanted to include his new spouse, even though he had a spouse and paid into the program, there would be extra expense costs to him.

It is an injustice. The amendment that has been put forward is a very realistic one. I realize that there have to be some guidelines as to how it is implemented, but I would urge the government to take this amendment very seriously.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, I would like to say a few words in support of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur.

At the present time, pensioners who marry after the age of 60 do not have the option of making provision for survivor's benefits. Bill C-55 provides this option, because it allows pensioners to finance such benefits by reducing the amount of their own pension. The excess amount will be used to finance the pension of the surviving spouse.

Whether this puts an end to age discrimination, which goes against Section 15 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, is a very moot point. The Federal Superannuates National Association, with a membership of several thousand retired public servants, supports the principle of extending survivor's benefits in the case of marriages that take place after retirement but does not agree with the proposal that would require pensioners to reduce their own pension in order to provide for survivor benefits.

Since the regulations will be determined later on and we have yet to be advised of any details concerning the amount of such benefits, I think we could reasonably expect the government to support this motion. Because so much depends on the regulations, we are still in the dark about how much it will cost pensioners to finance their pension and how much survivors will receive.

The Liberal caucus is proposing this amendment at the report stage. It would simply eliminate the rule relating to marriage after 60 as well as the need for this financing provision.

I would urge hon. members to support Motion No. 5, standing in the name of the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur) moved:

Motion No. 6.

That Bill C-55 be amended in Clause 21 by striking out line 7 at page 18 and substituting the following therefor:

"tion referred to in section 37 or 68, and prescribing a procedure for informing bargaining agents and other organizations representing contributors and pensioners of the amounts to be paid into the Superannuation Account by these corporations."

He said: Madam Speaker, I have just a quick explanation. This amendment deals with the pension cost of Crown corporations. Government decisions to subsidize the pension cost of privatized Crown corporations, et cetera, are not a proper concern of employees and pensioners.

However it may be a different story when employees and pensioners are required to bear the cost of these subsidies in the form of lower salaries and benefits.

As a minimum, when the pension cost of Crown corporations and other organizations having employees under the PSSA are subsidized by the government, employees and pensioners should be informed of these subsidies. Accordingly they should have the necessary data to defend their interests in a collective bargaining and consultation process.

Motion No. 6 does that.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The question is on Motion No. 6. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

• (1310)

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur) moved:

Motion No. 6B

That Bill C-55 be amended in clause 22 by striking out lines 33 and 34 at page 21 and substituting the following therefor:

"Account;

(w) prescribing circumstances in which a surviving spouse or child of a contributor shall receive an allowance in excess of 50 percent but not exceeding 60 percent of the annuity otherwise payable to the contributor; and

(x) generally as the Governor in Council".

He said: Madam Speaker, the purpose of this amendment is to attempt to increase the survivor benefits on 50 per cent to 60 per cent in those cases where it is needed.

The scope of Bill C-55 does not extend to this particular issue. Legal counsel feels that the only way to bring this issue into the discussion on Bill C-55 is to provide for regulation making power, to provide circumstances in which a surviving spouse or a child of a contributor can get more than 50 per cent of the annuity.

To put it bluntly, it conforms to the benefits standards act which the government tries to make private companies follow. To put it even more bluntly, it is in the MPs pension plan and it should be in the other plans as well. It is simple as that. If it is good enough for us, it should be good enough for all of the others.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, I thought members would appreciate a bit of history behind this motion and some consistency with regard to the attitude that the government takes toward public servants.

Since 1984 Canadians have become disillusioned about the political institutions of this country and the whole political process. This has been created and fostered in no small measure by this government's philosophy of do as I say, not as I do.

This hallmark of the present government's approach to public policy matters is evident in Bill C-55. The purpose of the motion before the House at this time moved by my friend from Restigouche—Chaleur is to correct a serious fault in the present legislation.

In 1985 the Canadian government introduced a pension benefits standards bill. This bill which was enacted into law set out a series of minimum standards that Canadian private sector employers required to observe and to follow in setting up and managing pension plans for their employees. This was the government telling the private sector: "Here are the standards".

One of the key provisions of this legislation that affects benefits is the requirement that employers observe the 1966 Canada Pension Plan standard with respect to widows' pensions, namely that as a minimum widows be provided with 60 per cent pensions.

We know at this time that the widows of public servants get 50 per cent of the entitlement. In so far as we are concerned, we have tried over the years to convince this government to stick to its promise of treating public employees, their dependants and their surviving relatives with minimum attention to what this government preaches; in other words a minimum of 60 per cent rather than maintaining the 50 per cent which is presently the order of the day.

The government did not include that in Bill C–55, although it had given the indications in prior communiques, prior declarations or statements that it would.

We are talking of a fairness issue. That is why I wanted to take a few minutes to cover this. If ever there were a longstanding fairness issue, it is to treat our own employees, those who work for the Government of Canada, in the same way as the Government of Canada states the private sector should treat its employees.

I must confess that I have great difficulty in understanding why this bill does not increase widows' pensions from the 50 per cent to the 60 per cent level as promised by the government some time ago.

As I have mentioned, this feature has been in our own Canada Pension Plan for 25 years. It now exists in the MPs pension plan and was made a mandatory requirement for private sector pension plans over five years ago.

I know of no one who disagrees with the proposition that the widows of public servants should not be accorded the same treatment as those of former employees in the private sector.

The government's failure to act on this matter I find even more difficult to fathom given the assurance the President of the Treasury Board gave this House on April 17, 1985. He said: "The Public Service plans will as a minimum generally meet the requirements of the federal Pension Benefits Standards Act". That was a promise, it has not been kept, and we feel it is contributing to this atmosphere of mistrust of politicians by the population.

The only conclusion I can come to is the many words used by the government to express its concerns over the financial plight of older women in Canadian society are just that, nothing but words.

It is equally obvious the government's 1985 promise to correct this human tragedy is turning out to be as empty as many of its other promises to correct long–standing unfairness; unfair processes, unfair programs, unfair application of laws as they affect women.

In this House we should stand up and keep our word to the Canadian public and treat our own employees in the same way we expect the private sector to treat its employees.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I want to echo the words of my colleague for Ottawa—Vanier.

There are three points I would like to make. Purely on the issue of fairness, this is a very difficult amendment not to support. Purely on the issue of fairness, how do we leave this House and go out and explain to widows they will have to accept less than those in the private sector and other sectors of the Public Service?

Also, it is probably not a good basis for an argument from a logical viewpoint, but from the pure viewpoint of compassion, if there is anytime that compensation is important it is after the death of a loved one. The last thing in the world a bereaved spouse needs is to be in need of funds. This extra 10 per cent allows for flexibility. To the issue of fairness I would add the issue of compassion.

The third point is the one made by my hon. colleague for Ottawa—Vanier. If you make a promise, you should keep it. If you do not know how much it is going to cost, you should not make the promise. But if you make the promise, then you should keep it.

I would find it very hard for anybody to stand up in this House and not support this amendment on any one of those three principles.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The question is on Motion No. 6B. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

We will now proceed with Motions Nos. 9, 26, 27, 28, 29, 52, 53, 54, 55 and 66.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur) moved:

Motion No. 9.

That Bill C-55 be amended in Clause 27 by striking out line 2 at page 28 and substituting the following therefor:

"times as determined by regulations provided that

(i) subject to subparagraph (ii), the terms of the regulations relating to the calculation and crediting of interest to the account are determined through negotiation with bargaining agents and other organizations representing contributors and pensioners, and are acceptable to a majority of the bargaining agents and other organizations representing a majority of affected contributors and pensioners, and

(ii) if an agreement cannot be reached under subparagraph (i) with a majority of the bargaining agents and other organizations representing a majority of affected contributors and pensioners on the terms of the regulations relating to the calculations and crediting of interest to the account, the matter shall be referred to an arbitrational panel under the provisions of the Public Service Staff Relations Act for a final and binding decision."

Motion No. 26.

"perannuation Account upon the coming into force of this section an amount equal to the amount of the government contribution required to meet the cost of the benefits accrued in respect of the last quarter of the preceding fiscal year, and in each fiscal year".

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, I have no problem with the principle that the Chair may dispense with reading the full text of the amendment. However, I think we should realize that although the proceedings are televised, in this case people watching have no way of knowing what is going on. I think at least one amendment should be read. If there are seven or eight, one amendment should be read, and we could then dispense with reading the rest, since the same will apply to the other amendments.

I think we have to give Canadians who are listening some indication of what we are talking about.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's comment has been noted, and I am quite prepared to read them all, every single one.

[English]

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur) moved:

Motion No. 27.

That Bill C-55 be amended in Clause 50 by striking out line 45 at page 47 and substituting the following therefor:

"Account, provided that the amount credited to the Account in respect of every month shall not be less than 12 percent of payroll, and".

Motion No. 28.

That Bill C-55 be amended in Clause 50 by striking out line 2 at page 48 and substituting the following therefor:

"monthly balance to the credit of the Account, calculated in such manner and at such rates as the regulations provide and credited to the Account monthly, provided that the rate so calculated is not less than the rate obtained from using the method of calculating interest in force on March 20, 1991."

Motion No. 29.

That Bill C-55 be amended in Clause 50 by striking out lines 5 to 11 at page 48 and substituting the following therefor:

"times as determined by the regulations provided,

(i) Subject to subparagraph (ii), that the provisions of the regulations relating to the calculation and crediting of interest to the Account are determined through consultation with the Canadian Forces Pension Advisory Committee and are approved by a majority of the members appointed pursuant to paragraphs (a) and (b) of subsection (2) of section 49.1 of this Act;

(ii) if the approval of a majority of the members referred to in subparagraph (i) is not obtained, the matter shall be referred to an arbitrational panel under the provisions of the Public Service Staff Relations Act for a final and binding decision."

Motion No. 52.

That Bill C-55 be amended in Clause 78 by striking out line 24 at page 72 and substituting the following therefor:

"perannuation Account upon the coming into force of this section an amount equal to the amount of the government contribution required to meet the cost of the benefits accruing in respect of the last quarter of the preceding fiscal year, and in each fiscal year".

Motion No. 53.

That Bill C-55 be amended in Clause 78 by striking out line 31 at page 72 and substituting the following therefor:

"Account, provided

(i) subject to subparagraph (ii), that the amount estimated by the President of the Treasury Board shall be determined through consultation with th Royal Canadian Mounted Police Pension Advisory Committee and is approved by a majority of the members appointed pursuant to paragraph (b) of subsection (2) of section 25.1 of this Act;

(ii) if approval of a majority of the members referred to in subparagraph (i) is not obtained, the matter shall be referred to an arbitrational panel under the provisions of the Public Service Staff Relations Act for a final and binding decision; and".

Motion No. 54.

That Bill C-55 be amended in Clause 78 by striking out line 31 at page 72 and substituting the following therefor:

"Account, provided that the amount credited to the Account in respect of every month shall not be less than 14 percent of payroll; and".

Motion No. 55.

That Bill C-55 be amended in Clause 78 by striking out lines 33 to 43 at page 72 and substituting the following therefor:

"monthly balance to the credit of the Account, calculated in such manner and at such rates as the regulations provide and credited to the Account monthly, provided that the rate so calculated is not less than the rate obtained from using the method of calculating interest in force on March 30, 1991."

Motion No. 56.

That Bill C-55 be amended in Clause 78 by striking out lines 36 to 43 at page 72 and substituting the following therefor:

"times as determined by the regulations provided,

(i) subject to subparagraph (ii), that the provisions of the regulations relating to the calculation and crediting of interest to the Account are determined through consultation with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Pension Advisory Committee and are approved by a majority of the members appointed pursuant to paragraphs (a) and (b) of subsection (2) of section 25.1 of this Act;

(ii) if the approval of a majority of the members referred to in subparagraph (i) is not provided, the matter shall be referred to an arbitrational panel under the provisions of the Public Service Staff Relations Act for a final and binding decision."

He said: Madam Speaker, as everyone will recognize there are a number of motions grouped together here. I will try to be as succinct as possible.

Motion No. 9 deals with interest on the death benefit account. Although this clause of Bill C-55 addressed by Motion No. 9 broadens and clarifies existing unilateral authority of the government relating to the calculation and crediting of interest to the death benefit account, it also proposes that the government will have sole authority in determining the amount of interest earned by the account. This amendment recognizes the preponderant role played by employees and pensioners in financing death benefit payments.

Motion No. 26 deals with the military and with regard to payments. Since military personnel have already made their contributions to their plan for the last quarter of 1990-91 our party felt in all fairness that the government should do likewise instead of giving itself a three month premium holiday. This is where this amendment flows from.

Motion No. 29 also flows from the military as well with regard to employee contributions to the CFSA. Military personnel should have some say in determining the proportion of their compensation in pay benefits and pensions. In this case, the amendment provides that amounts credited to the superannuation account will be decided by the President of the Treasury Board in consultation with the Canadian Forces Pension Advisory Committee. Moreover, these amounts shall be acceptable for a majority of committee members.

Motion No. 27 basically ensures that at least the minimum, the status quo in government employer contributions would prevail until the minister has tabled his studies and has reviewed the pension plan as promised several times over.

Motion No. 28 again is similar but deals with the next plan. The RCMP plan as well has a number of amendments to it.

Motion No. 52 again refers to the benefits and the contributions paid by the members of the plan and is more or less asking the government to put its contributions in rather than giving itself a three month premium holiday.

I believe the others are similar in nature to the other plans. I would maybe want to mention Motion No. 56.

Employers in the private sector cannot borrow from their employees' pension plans. The income tax pension registration regulations and the conflict of interest provisions of the Federal Pension Benefits Standards Act forbid such action. The federal government simply ignores its own laws in this area. The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier spoke awhile ago about fairness and about the government making rules for the private sector and other sectors, but not following its own rules and not setting a standard for itself.

Motion No. 56 would ensure that the government observes the laws that it has enacted and imposed on the private sector. The regulations relating to the calculation and crediting of interest to the account would be determined in consultation with the pension advisory committee depending on which pension plan we are dealing with. I would ask the government members to review the amendments and I would ask my colleagues from other parties to review the motions as well. I ask for their support.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Madam Speaker, I too would like to add a few words on these amendments. Many of the amendments that are being provided by the Liberal Party at this time I presented when the committee was sitting.

I want to emphasize the importance of these amendments because they are tied very strongly to the bill. We have to recognize that this bill is changing the whole structure of our pension schemes for public servants, for the military, the RCMP, for members of Parliament, for spouses.

The amendments which the member put forward will give some security to these people who are contributing to pension schemes. The government is changing it from legislation to regulation. I think that has to be the context in which we discuss the amendments that have been put forward by the Liberal member—I am not sure of his riding—who has addressed the areas of concern. We should have some teeth in the bill itself so that the government cannot change all the rules through the Governor in Council or whatever group after the bill gets Royal Assent.

I urge the members opposite to look at these amendments in a more serious way. They did not do that in committee—no, I should not say that. There were areas of concern where the public servants came out very strongly with regard to the indexing portions and the Income Tax Act. There were some changes there and I give them credit for that.

I do want to emphasize the importance of some of these changes which are being put forward by both sides and I support the amendments put forward by the member.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, I would also like to make a few comments and express my support for the amendments to Bill C-55 proposed by the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur.

The Liberal caucus has spent a lot of time and held a number of meetings to try and understand the basic principle of Bill C-55. I think we made it clear in debate, both at second reading and in committee, that we supported the clauses that will help make our pension legislation fairer and more equitable.

We are in favour of harmonization with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, as I said earlier in my remarks on Motion No. 6, but we strenuously object to the government doing to the Public Service pension plan what others are prohibited from doing.

Let me explain: There are funding: mechanisms in public and private pension plans that are regulated by federal legislation, such as the rate of return on investment. In this case, the rate of return on investments for public pension plans is much lower, over the long-term, than the rate obtained by the private sector, because we are obliged to invest this money at lower rates.

Furthermore, this government is in the habit of borrowing from its employees, in other words, from their contributions to the pension plan, to finance its own requirements.

To date, the government has borrowed $71 billion from the Public Service Superannuation Fund. I am certainly not impressed with the way this government manages our money, when I look at the reports in the Public Accounts of Canada. As chairman of the Public Accounts committee, I think I speak with some credibility.

It was debated in committee and in this House whether the government's accounts were indeed credible with respect to pensions, for instance. If I remember correctly, $1.367 billion was used to reduce the national debt, and this was not government revenue. Just the same, that money was used last year to reduce the government's deficit, which would otherwise have been some $2 billion more than it was at the time.

[English]

There are several areas of Bill C-65 that go well beyond the changes needed to comply with the income tax regulations. The minister has used that argument over a period of time, saying: "We are just trying to comply with the income tax regulations, which is the law of this country".

Why does the government not say: "We will comply with all the laws of this country, including the Pension Benefits Standards Act which says that you cannot borrow". The private sector cannot borrow from its own pension funds to finance its operations. It cannot do that.

Why can the government do it? I ask that question. It does it. It goes against the laws of this country. It decides what kind of interest it is going to pay on the money it borrows. That again is not allowed in the private sector. Why is it this government does it?

Here we have a bill which was supposed to comply with the laws of the land, the Income Tax Act. The minister has used that many, many times.

Bill C-55 proposes to remove Public Service Superannuation Act provisions that until now have been prescribed by a minimum government-employer contribution, minimum interest that the government must pay on pension funds it borrows and prescribed also in which pension plan deficits are to be amortized.

The government is now proposing that these long-standing provisions be replaced by a regime under which the minister alone decides how much the government, as employer, will contribute to the Public Service Superannuation Act, how much the government will contribute to the RCMP pension plan, how much the government will contribute to the armed forces pension plan.

It will do it by regulation. We do not know what those regulations will say, but I know for sure it will be a unilateral decision taken by the government without consulting with the pension people or consulting with the joint Public Service Council which oversees many of these things. Pensions, as we know, are not negotiable in the Public Service.

I come back to that principle of fairness. How can this government continue to do things which, in my view, are contrary to the laws of this land, which it forbids the private sector to do? However, it does it. I do not understand. I wish the minister would get up and break the silence of this place this afternoon.

It is only 1.30 p.m. We are going to go on for several hours yet. He can explain to us how fairness applies in this bill, because it does not. I am afraid that this is a step backwards and I am not happy at all with the way we are going on this question.

I would tell my colleagues in the House, it is certainly a step in the right direction to adopt the amendments put by my colleague from Restigouche—Chaleur and I implore members of this House to look at them seriously and to consider supporting them.

He said: Madam Speaker, in the process of trying to get my notes organized, I must have mislaid the amendment in question. I will do it from memory. I take it my friend from Burlington will help me get my point across.

Amendment No. 9A again deals with the question of financing of these pension plans. I would like to say, without repeating myself, that the fairness issue is again the point at hand here. Speaking for the caucus of which I am a member, we would encourage members to support the amendment in an effort to show that the government, and the purpose of Bill C-55, has at heart the future and the well-being of its pensioners.

These amendments would enhance the credibility of the government in the eyes of the Public Service.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur) moved:

Motion No. 10.

That Bill C-55 be amended in Clause 30 by striking out line 28 at page 33 and substituting the following therefor:

"and to conform with the Pension Benefits Standards Act, make regulations".

Motion No. 32.

That Bill C-55 be amended in Clause 58 by striking out line 9 at page 59 and substituting the following therefor:

"and to conform with the Pension Benefits Standards Act, make regulations".

Motion No. 59.

That Bill C–55 be amended in Clause 80 by striking out line 18 at page 79 and substituting the following therefor:

"and to conform with the Pension Benefits Standards Act, make regulations".

He said: Madam Speaker, we have heard a lot today about the Pension Benefits Standards Act. Basically, these three motions apply to the three different superannuation acts and are the same motion in the three of them. It asks the government to have the Pension Benefits Standards Act apply to those three acts.

It also looks forward at the process where the minister has promised a review and has promised consultation in that review. It would also permit the minister to implement some of the recommendations out of that process without using the excuse that the statute would have to be amended because it does not conform to the Pension Benefits Standards Act.

Again I come back to the fairness issue that has been talked about time and time again here today. The government has made rules that apply to the private sector and it should have to follow those rules as well.

It is a very straightforward, reasonable amendment. It is a reasonable request and it is a matter of fairness. The minister has talked about fairness, therefore the minister and his colleagues should recognize that this is one point they should support.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, again I want to talk about this amendment in terms of trying to convince the government. I do not think we are making too much headway on trying to do this, but nevertheless we will try again to convince the government to follow its own laws.

As I said, the Pension Benefits Standards Act was a bill of this government and was adopted by this House and it should be, in my view anyway, adhered to by the government.

An hon. member: Absolutely.

Mr. Gauthier: I mentioned a few minutes ago that there were longstanding provisions dealing with funding, financing, borrowing, the amount of interest that is paid on Public Service pension plans, be they the public servants, Armed Forces or the RCMP.

What I alluded to in my previous comments was that this bill takes a different tack and allows the government to unilaterally decide and determine how and when the pension plan deficit will be amortized, what kind of interest rates will be paid, what kind of contribution the government will make. In my view, it changes the rules of the game without giving us too much information in terms of regulations that will flow from this.

The levers the government is giving itself could launch a large scale financial raid on Public Service pension funds. Bill C–55, if enacted, will allow the government to pass some of its pension bills to the next government, if I may use that word, for payment. I will explain.

This bill will allow the government to reduce its budgetary deficit at the expense of an increased budgetary deficit for the next government. These proposed changes and their timing also raise serious doubts as to the sincerity of the statements made by the government that it intends to address the serious question and issues raised by the Auditor General in his reports over the years in the way that Public Service pension finances are managed by this government.

The timing of these changes also casts a long shadow of doubt on the minister's promise to carry out a review of the financial and benefit features of the program.

I was privileged today to get a copy of a letter sent recently to the hon. Audrey McLaughlin, PC, MP, in which the government makes an undertaking that it will review the Members of Parliament Retirement Allowances Act after C–55 receives Royal Assent.

The government has promised public servants that C–55 was nothing but a technical bill that was going to give public servants certain advantages that they did not have in the old law. What it does, in our view, is give a few crumbs here and there, but it takes away a lot of things that we believe were important to the pension administration programs of the government.

The implications and the issues that we tried to raise in terms of the management of the funds for example have fallen on deaf ears. The Federal Superannuates Association which presented many briefs to the legislative committee, for example, made some rather interesting contributions and some positive, I thought, proposals. The head of the group in his testimony to the committee says: "The government's move to propose these changes before these important studies are completed is akin to putting the cart before the horse".

I also agree with the Public Service representatives when they said: "The government's move to give itself full and unfettered authority to do whatever it wants with Public Service pension finances before it carries out promised reviews raises very fundamental questions about the purpose of these reviews". We heard another today, that it is going to review Public Service pensions, but it is also wants to review members of Parliament pensions. Well, it is well time it did. We agree with that, we have asked for that and the people of Canada have asked for it.

However, are we going to be facing the same kind of situation that the cart is going to be put before the horse in terms of here is the government's plan? We decide what is good for Public Service pensions, we decide what kind of interest rate we will pay from now on by regulation and we decide what our contributions will be. Will it again tell the Canadian public that it will decide what members of Parliament will have in terms of pensions, that it will decide God knows when what kind of contributions will be made? Whether we will correct some of the faults in that program which are needed, we agree, is another question.

We received this letter that the minister sent today or yesterday with some apprehensions. We would like to see that start now, but we are not confident that this government will act in a way that will be open, clear, fair and equitable to all those who are concerned. If we rely on what has been done with C-55, we are concerned.

The experience that we are going through at this time is that this government has absolutely no ears for amendments and absolutely no understanding of what fairness is about if it pursues this bill with final approval in third reading and Royal Assent. These amendments that we are studying at this time are important amendments. They only ask the government to comply with the laws of the land. They only ask the government to do what every other company in Canada that has a pension plan has been told to do. It will not create any additional expenditures of public funds.

It does not oblige the government to make any regulations to apply the Public Service Superannuation Act or the other two acts, the RCMP and the Armed Forces.

If the government bought those amendments, if it did comply with the Pension Benefits Standards Act, it would oblige the government to follow the law. It would be in favour of that. It would want to give that kind of an indication by supporting these amendments, by saying it will comply, it will follow the laws of the land adopted in 1985 by its initiative. The government should not try and outwit, out do or out manoeuvre public servants, be they public servants, RCMP or Armed Forces, by having its own regulation in there all the time telling them what we the government thinks is good for them.

All we ask is fairness. We want the government to be fair with its own public servants. We want this fairness to apply to them as it applies to the private sector. We would like to see a commitment that the government will apply the Public Service pension plans to the benefits standards act.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Madam Speaker, I will be very brief. I would like to pursue a little further the comments made by the member for Ottawa—Vanier.

We in the committee tried to get the Auditor General before the committee because in his report he identified some very serious problems with regard to the invest of pension funds and the interest accrued to those accounts and so on.

Here we have a situation in which we on this side of the House are proposing—I did in committee—that there be some protection and some methods of making sure those funds are secure and properly invested and taken through.

By accepting this amendment not only would you be strengthening the bill and making it fairer you would also be carrying out the concerns that the Auditor General had when he looked at the pension structure of public servants.

I would urge the government to take these amendments very seriously.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question is on Motion No. 10. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur) moved:

Motion No. 11.

That Bill C-55 be amended in Clause 30 by striking out lines 6 to 12 at page 34 and substituting the following therefor:

"(3) Subject to subsection (3.1), in the vent of any inconsistency between the provisions of any regulations made under subsection (1) or (2) and the provisions of this Act or any other regulations made under this Act, the provisions of the regulations made under subsection (1) or (2) prevail to the extent of the inconsistency.

(3.1) In the event that the provision of any regulations made under subsection (1) or (2) would reduce or have the effect of reducing any benefit payable under this Act, the provisions of this Act relating to the payments of such a benefit shall prevail."

Motion No. 13.

That Bill C-55 be amended in Clause 30 by striking out line 11 at page 34 and substituting the following therefor:

"Act".

Motion No. 14.

That Bill C-55 be amended in Clause 30 by striking out lines 24 to 26 at page 34 and substituting the following therefor:

"payment that is payable to any person to whom the Public Service Superannuation Act applies."

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East) moved:

Motion No. 15.

That Bill C-55 be amended in Clause 30 by adding immediately after line 26 at page 34 the following:

"72. (1) The Governor in Council may not, by regulation made under section 71, reduce or in any way diminish pension benefits that accrue under this Act before the coming into force of section 71.

(2) Subsection 71(3) does not apply in respect of subsection (1)."

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur) moved:

Motion No. 33.

That Bill C-55 be amended in Clause 58 by striking out lines 29 to 35 at page 59 and substituting the following therefor:

"(3) Subject to subsection (3.1), in the event of any inconsistency between the provisions of any regulations made under subsection (1) or (2) and the provisions of this Act, or any other regulations made under this Act, the provisions of the regulations made under subsection (1) or (2) prevail to the extent of the inconsistency.

(3.1) In the event that the provisions of any regulations made under subsection (1) of (2) would reduce or have the effect of reducing any benefit payable under this Act, the provisions of this Act relating to the payment of such a benefit shall prevail."

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East) moved:

That Bill C-55 be amended in Clause 58 by adding immediately after line 8 at page 60 the following:

"81. (1) The Governor in Council may not, by regulation made under section 80, reduce or in any way diminish pension benefits that accrue under this Act before the coming into force of section 80.

(2) Subsection 80(3) does not apply in respect of subsection (1)".

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur) moved:

Motion No. 60.

That Bill C-55 be amended in Clause 80 by striking out lines 38 to 42 at page 79 and lines 1 and 2 at page 80 and substituting the following therefor:

"(3) Subject to subsection (3.1), in the event of any inconsistency between the provisions of any regulations made under subsection (1) or (2) and the provisions of this Act, or any other regulations made under this Act, the provisions of the regulations made under subsection (1) or (2) prevail to the extent of the inconsistency.

3.1 In the event that the provision of any regulations made under subsection (1) or (2) would reduce or have effect of reducing any benefit payable under this Act, the provisions of this Act relating to the payment of such a benefit shall prevail."

Motion No. 62

That Bill C-55 be amended in Clause 80 by striking out line 1 at page 80 and substituting the following therefor:

"Act".

Motion No. 64

That Bill C-55 be amended in Clause 80 by striking out line 8 at page 80 and substituting the following therefor:

"on which this subsection comes into force and shall not be before the day on which the Income Tax Act required the making of the regulations"

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East) moved:

Motion No. 65

That Bill C-55 be amended in Clause 80 by adding immediately after line 16 at page 80 the following:

"42. (1) The Governor in Council may not, by regulation made under section 41, reduce or in any way diminish pension benefits that accrue under this Act before the coming into force of section 41.

(2) Subsection 41(3) does not apply in respect of subsection (1)".

Mr. Arseneault: Mr. Speaker, I have a number of motions here and a lot of them deal with the empowerment of cabinet and the Public Service; higher functions of the Public Service.

Motion No. 11 deals with the government's possible reduction of indexing with the PSSA benefits by regulation. The minister in a letter tabled with the committee promised to make it absolutely clear that this could not be possible.

It is not absolutely clear. In the government's mind it seems to feel that it will not be able to do it without going through statute. Those who belong to the plan are fearful that it is still possible. It is not absolutely clear.

This amendment, and if the government is really sincere about making it absolutely clear, would make it absolutely clear.

Motion No. 13 is an even more serious amendment, not necessarily for all of the persons who benefit from these plans, but for democracy itself.

There are a number of provisions in Bill, C-55, that where there is an inconsistency, the regulations will supersede the statute. In other words, we could debate here. We have elected members of Parliament who could put forth a law, pass a law, so that it becomes the law of the land. Through regulation, if there is an inconsistency between the regulation and the statute, Bill C-55 would permit the regulation to supersede the statute.

In committee that raised a lot of concern. Some members went so far as to say it was a direct attack on democracy. It is. When the legal counsel was asked whether this was a normal practice, he said it was becoming a normal practice. In other words, the government was trying to run things by regulation. We know what happens with regulations. Quite often they are left in the hands of a few and quite often the regulations change overnight, depending on who and where and what it applies to.

Motion No. 14 would make it very clear. This amendment attempts to make it absolutely clear that the government cannot unilaterally use regulations to change amounts of pensions, annual allowances, annuities, supplementary benefits or lump sum payments.

If this amendment would have been adopted some time ago, after the first meeting of the committee, it would have prevented a lot of the anxiety of the members who belong to these plans. I cannot understand why, when the minister says he wants to make it absolutely clear, he does not make it absolutely clear.

• (1410)

Motion No. 33 is similar because we are dealing with a number of pension acts here. They follow in line. We are trying to standardize them in certain cases. It deals with that provision of regulations superseding statutes where there is an inconsistency.

Motion No. 60 would deal with the indexation again. It would again in this case make it absolutely clear, as the minister wants. I do not know why the government would not accept this amendment. It would make it absolutely clear in the case of the RCMP Superannuation Act that the benefits would not be reduced through regulation, especially the benefits with regard to indexation.

The government says it is just getting it in line with the Income Tax Act. The Income Tax Act provides for a lot of changes through regulation, so we do not know exactly what we are getting to.

The other thing that was alluded to earlier is that we talk about these regulations as if they are already there, as if we know what they are, but they have not been tabled. I do not even think that we have started that much work on them.

Motion No. 62 deals with the regulation-making power of the government. If this were accepted, it would prevent governments now and in the future—not only this government but other governments as well—to run roughshod over certain acts through regulation.

Motion No. 11 deals with indexing and is with regard to trying to make it absolutely clear, as the minister really wanted to make it clear. Again, we are asking government members to support these amendments.

These amendments are probably the most important ones in the bill at this stage because we talk about regulation. We talk about giving the government all this power through regulation. For the members of the plans, publicly and privately, in committee, in press conferences and in press releases there was the concern.

The government kept on saying it would not do that. We know what it has done. I can assure you that there is cause for concern. If the minister actually does want to make it perfectly clear, he should start with these amendments.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pursue the amendments I put forward, Motions Nos. 15, 34 and 65.

All three are identical but we have three pension plans here. We have the Public Service pension plan, the RCMP pension plan and the military pension plan affected by this.

I want to start off with regard to clause 30 because there was some very, very positive work done. Through the agreement of all three parties, some major amendments were made to the bill. I want to commend not only the government and the Liberals but also the department that understood fully the concerns that we had in those areas. There were some significant changes made.

The fact is that this is a regulatory bill and we do not know what the regulations are going to be when the bill comes into place. Therefore, I have placed this amendment with regard to clause 30 of Bill C-55.

It says:

> That Bill C-55 be amended by adding the following immediately after line 32 on page 32.
> The Governor in Council may not, by regulation made under section 71, reduce or in any way diminish pension benefits that accrue under this act before the coming into force of section 71.
> (2) Subsection 71(3) does not apply in respect of subsection (1).

This is a very important amendment. If the government is intent on telling the public servants, the RCMP and the military that it does not want to roll back their pensions or change their pensions, then it will adopt this amendment to ensure that they will not be rolled back.

If it does not accept this amendment, those pensions are in jeopardy because future governments, even if this minister commits that he will not do it, what is to stop a future government, knowing that the regulatory powers are in this legislation, to do the things they want.

I want to urge the government to support this amendment to ensure that the pensions and the provisions that are now in place are protected.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, this whole group of amendments deals with a very important point. The amendment debated in committee, as my friend from Restigouche—Chaleur said, was highly contentious because what it proposes to do is give the government the right to do by regulation certain things, not by legislation.

We asked questions about it. I admit in the beginning in committee it was difficult to get an answer from the government. After a while they came to understand that we were concerned about this unilateral power of the government to make regulations affecting the pension plans of public servants, armed forces and RCMP.

We asked them for total assurance that none of the standard benefits, the indexing of the pensions, the contributions made by the employer, et cetera, would be changed by regulations. It took some time. It took about three weeks to a month before we got an undertaking from Treasury Board and the government, and the minister made the commitment that it was not their intention to do certain things by regulation. They intended to follow the law.

I want to come back to the Pension Benefits Standards Act, which people are now starting to understand is wide-ranging legislation passed by this House in 1985 and which, in my opinion, the government is not following.

In addition to legislating minimum benefit levels for Canadian pension plans for the private sector, it sets out in the Pension Benefits Standards Act a code of conduct for pension plan administrators and managers by making it a condition of pension registration that pension plan administrators, and I will read from the act: "shall exercise a degree of care that a person of ordinary prudence would exercise in dealing with the property of another person". It goes on to require that administrators not be in a material conflict of interest.

I for one do not believe that Public Service employees and pensioners are being unreasonable when they ask that the many billions of dollars they have put into their pension plans over the years be protected by the same code of conduct.

Over the years this government has been in the centre of many conflict of interest situations. These conflict of interest involvements have seriously eroded public trust in governments. However, as serious as these conflict of interest scandals have been, in my opinion they pale in comparison with the conflict of interest situation that confronts the government if it refuses to endorse the spirit and the principle of these amendments.

They also pale in comparison to the possibility of conflict of interest that could come from the administration of Public Service pension plans. To use a variation of an expression that has been in wide use in the last few years: this will be mother of all conflict of interest situations.

We have the government refusing to say publicly in this House today that it commits itself by supporting these amendments not to use regulations to change the standards of pension plans of public servants, armed forces personnel or retired RCMP officers or personnel.

I do not understand this. Let me highlight for a few minutes the nature of this conflict of interest. As the sole administrator of Public Service pension plans, the government has a duty to protect the many billions of dollars that public servants and pensioners have put in their pension plans, a duty to get the best possible return on the billions of dollars that are in that fund. There is about $71 billion; a lot of money. The government must do its best to get a return on those billions of dollars in pension funds of the Public Service and RCMP.

On the other hand, as a borrower—and the government it does borrow the money—of that $71 billion, because the government borrows that fund to finance its operations or its deficit, the government has a natural interest in minimizing the interest it pays on those borrowings.

You can see the conflict. Furthermore, the opportunity of the government to short-change public servants and pensioners in this regard is being increased in my opinion by this bill, not diminished. Bill C-55 tightens the monopoly stranglehold of the government on the management of the Public Service pension funds.

The serious nature of this conflict of interest was serious enough that the Auditor General, an impartial person, an agent of this House, a servant of Parliament, in his 1991 report said that the bookkeeping of this government in the matter of pension leaves a lot to be desired. He did not like the way it was keeping its books and he said so. That, in my view, is a serious comment made by a very important agent of Parliament to the effect that the management of the pension fund was not taken very seriously by the government.

Over the years the government has made high-sounding speeches about doing something about conflict of interest situations. Most Canadians would agree that the time for talk in this area is long gone and the time for action is long overdue. I know that we have before this House now a study by a committee dealing with conflict of interest. I hope the government reads it and applies some of it.

I also believe that five years, the length of time since we adopted the Standard Benefits Pension Act, is sufficient time to allow for the government to get its act together and to get out, as it requires everybody else, of the direct conflict of interest it is in managing the Public Service funds. Five years is long enough to make a decision on whether it will or will not abide by the same code of conduct it has legislated for the pension administrators of the private sector.

The situation the government is in was well described by the present President of the Treasury Board in his appearance before the legislative committee on March 17 of this year. Without getting into the question of how much blarney he was spouting that day, I do not consider it to be blarney when he said: "It would look a bit ridiculous"—this is a minister of the Crown speaking—"to ask all pension plans in Canada to conform while our own plans are away offside".

This statement was made in relation to government conformity to the 1992 income tax regulations. I hope the minister would agree the logic of his observations on March 17 apply equally to June 12 and that he will get up in his place and support an amendment which clearly sets out the position of this Parliament that the Government of Canada will not remain in a conflict of interest, but will abide by the laws of the country and follow the laws of the country.

I would therefore urge the minister and his friends on that side to bring the government on side with the code of conduct and other features of the 1986 Pension Benefits Standards Act. That is all we ask and that is all these amendments propose to do.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, very briefly, we are debating a number of amendments, one of which is put forward by the member for Kootenay East.

This is the first opportunity I have had to intervene in the debate generally. The member for Kootenay East was very successful in committee in persuading the government to adopt a number of amendments that have significantly improved the bill. He has encouraged this House to adopt this amendment.

It has the very simple effect of reassuring those who are covered by these plans that under the regulations there is no way in which the government can diminish their pension benefits. It is a valuable amendment. It does no harm to the bill, and I would hope that the government would see its way clear to agreeing to it.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make some short comments on the amendments that have been proposed by the member for Restigouche—Chaleur.

I think that he hit the major point of what is being considered. It is the question of regulation and statutes. It is very important that this bill should not be amended by regulation. It is extremely valuable for the pensioner to know that he is secure in what he is going to get in the future. That is why these motions should be supported by the members opposite.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur) moved:

Motion No. 16.

That Bill C-55 be amended by adding immediately after line 26 at page 34 the following:

"30.1 The said Act is further amended by adding the following, immediately after section 71:

72. Where the Minister is satisfied that as result of erroneous advice or an administrative error on the part of any person acting in an official capacity in the administration of this Act, a person has been denied a benefit to which the person was entitled or the opportunity to exercise a right to elect a benefit or to opt for a benefit, the Minister may take such remedial action as the Minister considers appropriate to place that person in the position that the person would have been in if that erroneous advice had not been given or that administrative error had not been made.

73.(1) The Minister shall provide a bargaining agent or pensioner organization with such data, estimates, projections, and other related information which may reasonably be required and requested by the bargaining agent or pensioner organization to monitor and oversee the operation, administration planning, policy analysis and development activities under this Act on behalf of its members.

(2) Where the Minister fails, within a reasonable period of time, to provide a bargaining agent or pensioner organization with information requested under subsection (1), the bargaining agent or pensioner organization may seek redress by referring the matter to an adjudicator under the provisions of the Public Service Staff Relations Act, and if the adjudicator determines that the request made by a bargaining agent or pensioner organisation under subsection (1) is a reasonable request, the Minister shall provide the requested information within the period set by the adjudicator."

Motion No. 35.

"81. Where the Minister is satisfied that as a result of erroneous advice or an administrative error on the part of any person acting in an official capacity in the administration of this Act, a person has been denied a benefit to which the person was entitled or the opportunity to exercise a right, to elect a benefit or to opt for a benefit, the Minister may take such remedial action as the Minister considers appropriate to place that person in the position that the person would have been in if that erroneous advice had not been given or that administrative error had not been made.

82.(1) The Minister and the President of the Treasury Board shall provide an organization representing members or pensioners of the Armed Forces with such data, estimates, projections and other related information which may reasonably be required and requested by such organziation to monitor and oversee the operation, administration, planning, policy analysis and development activities under the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act on behalf of its members."

Motion No. 66.

"42. Where the Minister is satisfied that as a result of erroneous advice or an administrative error on the part of any person acting in an official capacity in the administration of this Act, a person has been denied a benefit to which the person was entitled or the opportunity to exercise a right, to elect a benefit or to opt for a benefit, the Minister may take such remedial action as the Minister considers appropriate to place such a person in the position that the person would have been in if that erroneous advice had not been given or that administrative error had not been made.

43.(1) The Minister and the President of the Treasury Board shall provide an organization representing members of pensioners of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police with such data, estimates, projection, and other related information which may reasonably be required and requested by such organization to monitor and oversee the operation, administration, planning, policy analysis and development activities under the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act on behalf of its members.

(2) Where the Minister or the President of the Treasury Board fails, within a reasonable period of time, to provide an organization representing members or pensioners of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police with information requested under subsection (1), the organization may seek redress by referring the matter to an adjudicator under the provisions of the Public Service Staff Relations Act, and if the adjudicator determines that the request made by the organization under subsection (1) is reasonable, the Minister or the President of the Treasury Board shall provide the information requested within the period set by the adjudicator."

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria) moved:

Motion No. 84A.

That Bill C–55 be amended in Schedule II by adding immediately after line 34 at page 156 the following:

"10.1 Where the Minister is satisfied that, as a result of erroneous advice or an administrative error on the part of any person acting in an official capacity under this Act, a person has been denied a benefit to which the person was entitled or the opportunity to exercise a right, to elect a benefit or to opt for a benefit, the Minister may take such remedial action as the Minister considers appropriate to place the person in the position that the person would have been in if the erroneous advice had not been given or the administrative error had not been made."

Mr. Arseneault: Mr. Speaker, I will speak to the three motions that I put. They are very similar and have to do with the three superannuation acts that we are dealing with, Public Service, the military and the RCMP.

Motion No. 16 deals with remedial action in situations where employees are denied benefits to which they are entitled or the opportunity to exercise rights because they have made bad decisions concerning their benefit options due to some erroneous advice or administrative errors. It gives them a chance of reprieve. Deputy ministers and deputy department heads, senior military, and senior RCMP officers, and also I must add political appointees, have that option right now. If there is removal of benefits or rights because of an error, misinformation or whatever, that can be corrected by the minister once it is pointed out to him or her.

• (1430)

The second part of the amendment deals with the problems facing Public Service unions and pensioner organizations when they try to obtain information from the government on the operation of their pension plans. This section would facilitate the obtaining of this information.

We heard the word fairness many times today. In fact I believe the minister mentioned that many times in referring to Bill C–55, that it was one of the objectives.

I say again that senior personnel, senior public servants, senior officers in the RCMP and in the military have this option. There is no reason why the every day person cannot have the very same option.

I will not speak to the three motions as the three motions just follow in line with each superannuation act. I would appeal to the justice that should be in this House. I would say it is only natural that we should accept this amendment.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I too have an amendment that is in this group. My amendment affects schedule II which is the part of the bill that deals with spousal benefits under the legislation.

This is one of the amendments which the committee for spousal and children's pensions survival and related benefits was particularly anxious for the government to accept. There are cases in which there are administrative errors made or in which there is some kind of erroneous advice given and someone loses their rights.

This amendment simply gives to the government the opportunity of making a correction. It gives to the minister the opportunity to take remedial action.

There is not a piece of legislation in the world that is perfect. In our constituencies we all face the problem from time to time where people come in after having been given wrong advice. Perhaps they did not understand the advice very well or the advice was actually incorrect. No public servant can be counted on every day of the week, every week of the year, to be sure of the information they give. They are often hurried. The issues are complicated. Perhaps the person has not explained the full story. Those of us who are lawyers will probably know those days where we did not ask a key question and it turned out our advice was not as good or as correct as it should have been. That can happen.

All we are asking with this amendment is that the House agree to give the minister authority to take remedial action. What is so hard about that? What is so difficult about that?

I hope that the government will consider this seriously and agree to the amendment.

Mr. Jean–Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, we are dealing with amendments that could be entitled fairness, fairness in treatment of public servants when they look forward to retiring or have retired.

The amendment before us deals with affording remedial action to employees for many reasons. In my files I have dozens of cases where public servants, either because of ill health, because of bad advice or because of the stress situation they were in at the time, decided to take an option which proved to be the wrong decision. They cannot come back and look and ask for a fair hearing.

Yet deputy heads, senior military RCMP and political appointees, are protected in this bill. If they make a mistake, they can go to the authorities and say: "Change the rules for me". My point is why is it that we do it for deputy heads, senior military, RCMP and political appointees and we refuse to do the same thing for public servants?

It boggles the mind. I call unfair legislation unfair when it treats people unfairly. All these amendments put forth by the hon. members from Restigouche—Chaleur and Victoria ask the government to show some heart and consistency and to come to grips with an issue which is something that we must address, fairness, and treat all public servants equally, be they senior administrators of the government or the average worker.

That is a request which we make in all honesty in the spirit and hope that a government will get off its fanny and do something constructive.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The next question is on Motion No. 84A. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Motion No. 45.

That Bill C-55 be amended in Clause 75 by striking out line 8 at page 70 and substituting the following therefor:

"(d) three persons apointed from among".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Motion No. 47—

Mr. Arseneault: With regard to Motion No. 47, Mr. Speaker, I would like to withdraw that motion at this time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is so ordered.

Motion No. 47 withdrawn.

• (1440)

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur) moved:

Motion No. 51.

That Bill C-55 be amended in Clause 77 by adding immediately after line 20 at page 72 the following:

"26.2(1) Subject to subsection (2), any regulation made by the Governor in Council or other regulation making authority under this Act is void if the regulation making authority has not obtained approval of the regulation of a majority of the members appointed to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Pension Advisory Committee pursuant to paragraphs (a) and (b) of subsection (2) of section 25.1 of this Act.

(2) If the approval of a majority of the members referred to in subsection (1) is not obtained, the contents of the proposed regulation shall be referred to an arbitrational panel under the Public Service Staff Relations Act for a final and binding decision."

He said: Mr. Speaker, a number of these motions deal with representation of those who contribute to the plan. Besides the government, there are a number of individuals who do contribute. Also there are those who are receiving benefits, some of the pensioners who are receiving those benefits.

Motion No. 21 deals with the establishment of a Canadian forces pension advisory committee. This would also put forth certain points where the government could not move by regulation without consent of this advisory group.

Motions Nos. 22, 23 and 24 increase this representation on the advisory committee.

Motion No. 25, this amendment stipulates that to enact regulations the government must obtain consent of a majority of the members of that advisory committee.

Motion No. 40, this amendment authorizes the minister to establish an advisory committee for the RCMP.

Motions Nos. 41, 44 and 45 would increase the numbers on that committee. Motion No. 51 would outline the way the committee would function. In so doing, it would allow the pensioners to feel confident that their benefits would be protected by at least the advisory committee.

I would ask again that the members of the House look favourably upon those recommendations.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, just briefly on this amendment.

God knows the government needs advice. The government needs advice to manage many things, but it needs to be told also that sometimes it is good to pay attention to what is being said.

All these amendments propose is to establish a structure that would give the government advice on how to better manage these pension plans. I hope the government does not vote against this. I hope the government members see their way to accepting this motion because it makes sense.

Pensions over the years have not been negotiable. Usually the process works this way: Unions, Public Service employees represented by unions, the employer, Treasury Board and some other specialists in the field usually meet regularly and discuss the pension plans. It is called the National Joint Council.

Membership is restricted but nevertheless it is an input to the government. It is a structure which is very helpful in giving the government sound advice on many, many things. One of them is pensions.

All we are asking is that the three large components—possibly four but I will just mention the three largest ones—be well recognized and represented on boards, that the Canadian forces pensions advisory committee should be established. It makes sense that the RCMP advisory committee be established. It makes sense. The Public Service, and possibly the superannuates, who are retired people, have a commitment, a vested interest in that their funds in their pension plans be well administered. They should be listened to occasionally by the government.

All this proposes to do, and it is simple, is to give advice to the government. I know it is difficult for Tories to take this and understand what it means, but nevertheless it would be good for once if they would come to their senses and say: "Yes, we will listen and we will approve this amendment. We will vote for it and we will give these people sound boards where they can make their contributions. We will listen to what they have to say".

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to speak to these amendments because we moved them in committee. We went a little further than what this amendment does. We recommended that spouses—and the government is now starting to recognize it in this legislation—be given the opportunity to sit on the advisory committee. We also recommended that retirees be allowed to sit on the advisory committee. It is very simple.

I wanted to go even further than that. If we were going to regulations, I wanted to have a management board that would have representatives from the government, from the employees who are contributing to the plan and from the various groups. They would sit on a management board and have some input as to how their money—and that is what we are talking about—was going to be invested or taken care of, but the government said that was beyond the scope of the plan.

There is an advisory board in this arrangement. This amendment calls for various things within that advisory board. We were told at the committee stage from one of the advisory board members at the present time that the board had not even sat for over two years because the government did not even listen to the recommendations it made.

Here we are with a regulatory bill and an advisory board is set up. We are asking for specific things to be done on that advisory board so that at the very least it would have the input of the retirees, of the various groups and of the pensioners coming before it in an advisory capacity only. This amendment is calling for someone to be on that advisory board to advise the government at least.

I would urge the government to accept this small watch-dog program we have put forward in this amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question is on Motion No. 21. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur) moved:

Motion No. 48.

That Bill C-55 be amended in Clause 77 by striking out lines 12 and 13 at page 72 and substituting the following therefor:

"the Account;

(i) prescribing the terms and conditions under which the Minister may enter into reciprocal pension transfer agreements with other Canadian police agencies, commissions, and organizations; and

(j) generally as the Governor in Council".

Motion No. 50.

That Bill C-55 be amended in Clause 77 by striking out lines 17 to 20 at page 72.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Motion No. 48 would enlarge the regulation-making authority contained in the RCMPSA. Actually it would allow the minister, or I guess the Solicitor General in this case because we are dealing with the RCMP, some portability in the pension plans.

For instance, once the government has entered into a reciprocal pension transfer agreement it could agree to transfer the employee and employer contributions made to pension plans to or from the federal plan. This would occur whenever an individual moved to or from the federal Public Service under circumstances outlined in specific agreements negotiated by the federal government with another level of government. In short this amendment would facilitate portability of pensions. It is a common sense amendment and I would ask members to support it.

• (1450)

On Motion No. 50, this amendment removes the power to apply regulations retroactively respecting annual rates of pay, interests rates and so on. The purpose is to limit the power of the government to make regulations and then apply them retroactively.

It should be pointed out that we are making these amendments now in the spirit that it will apply to all governments; the one that is here today and those that will be here in the future.

I should also use this opportunity to point out that 112 amendments were put forth at report stage. It is a bit unusual but we can see why it is unusual. It is a very technical bill. We have gone through it with a fine-tooth comb. In committee we got the same results that we are getting here. There is no compassion, no flexibility, and quite often members opposite do not even want to look at an amendment that deals with common sense. I would ask them to look at the amendments. A number of their constituents has an interest in this matter. It has to do with justice and fairness. It starts with the minister's own words. It is the minister who came up with these words and started the ball rolling with Bill C-55.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East) moved:

Motion No. 67.

That Bill C-55 be amended in Clause 81

"13. (1) Subject to subsection (2), an allowance or other benefit shall be paid in accordance with this Part to or in respect of a person who, being a member, ceases to be a member or, being a member or former member, dies.

(2) Notwithstanding subsection (1), an allowance or other benefit payable to a former member under this Part is not payable to the former member if and for so long as the former member is employed by or receives remuneration from the Government of Canada, an agency of the Government of Canada or a federal Crown corporation.";

(b) by striking out line 39 at page 91 and substituting the following therefor:

"14.(1) Subject to sections 13 and 58, where a per–"; and

(c) by striking out line 35 at page 94 and substituting the following therefor:

"15.(1) Subject to sections 13 and 58, where a per–".

Motion No. 68.

"13.(1) Subject to subsection (2), an allowance or other benefit shall be paid in accordance with this Part to or in respect of a person who, being a member, ceases to be a member or, being a member or former member, dies.

(2) An allowance payable under section 14 or 15 to a former member or, in respect of a deceased member or former member, to a person under section 20 is not payable to the former member or the person unless the former member has reached sixty years of age or, in the case of an allowance under section 20, the deceased member or former member would have reached sixty years of age."

(b) by striking out line 39 at page 91 and substituting the following therefor:

"14.(1) Subject to sections 13 and 58, where a per–";

(c) by striking out line 35 at page 94 and substituting the following therefor:

"15.(1) Subject to sections 13 and 58, where a per–"; and

(d) by striking out lines 11 to 18 on page 101 and substituting the following therefor:
"(a) begins to be payable,

(i) where the member or former member is sixty years of age or older at the time of death, on the first day of the month following the month in which the member or former member dies,

(ii) where the member or former member has not reached sixty years of age at the time of death, on the first day of the month following the month in which the member or former member would have reached sixty years of age, and".

Motion No. 68B.

That Bill C-55 be amended in Clause 81 by adding immediately after line 38 at page 91 the following:

"13.1 An allowance or other benefit payable to a former member under this Part is not payable to the former member if and for so long as the former member is employed by or receives remuneration from the Government of Canada, an agency or the Government of Canada or a federal Crown corporation."

Motion No. 68C.

That Bill C-55 be amended in Clause 81 by adding immediately after line 38 at page 91 the following:

"13.1 An allowance payable under section 14 or 15 to a former member or, in respect of a deceased member or former member, to a person under section 20 is not payable to the former member or the person unless the former member has reached sixty years of age or, in the case of an allowance under section 20, the deceased member or former member would have reached sixty years of age."

Motion No. 69A.

That Bill C-55 be amended in Clause 81 by striking out lines 12 to 18 at page 101 and substituting the following therefore:

"(i) where the member or former member is sixty years of age or older at the time of death, on the first day of the month following the month in which the member or former member dies,
(ii) where the member or former member has not reached sixty years of age at the time of death, on the first day of the month following the month in which the member or former member would have reached sixty years of age, and".

He said: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to enter the debate on this bill and to speak to the five separate motions I had moved all respecting the pensions of members of Parliament. As we are well aware, this is a very controversial area with respect to the bill. These amendments are extremely controversial.

I must say, however, this issue is not a new one for me. It is an issue of longstanding. It is one that has been with me for at least some 15 years, dating back to my days serving in municipal government when numerous constituents came to me and raised matters of pension concerns and particularly raised matters relating to the pensions of members of Parliament.

I have had over those 15 years constant discussion and constant correspondence with constituents who had concerns relating to the pensions of members of Parliament. I will just name one, Mrs. Margaret Hunt, a personal friend and a long-time constituent of mine who constantly over those 15 years among others has raised this issue.

Shortly after the our government took office in 1984, the then President of the Treasury Board introduced legislation to make some modifications in pensions relating to public servants and also relating to members of Parliament. There was a great outcry at that time, particularly from public servants. As a result that particular piece of legislation died on the Order Paper and was never renewed and never pursued.

In fact this is the first time since then to my knowledge that there has been a piece of legislation before the House presented by the government dealing with this particular issue.

When Bill C-55 was introduced the present President of the Treasury Board indicated that he wanted to appoint a review committee or some review body to look at the pensions of members of Parliament. He indicated that orally and he indicated that in a letter, copy of which I have with me that appears to be dated April 2, 1992.

As I understand it subsequently he wrote a letter yesterday—I have a copy which is undated—to the Leader of the New Democratic Party in which he again indicated that he intended to proceed with some sort of an inquiry into the pensions of MPs. At the same time, of course, he did not say when. He did not indicate what the terms of the inquiry would be or who would be making the inquiry.

It would seem to me, given the concerns that have been expressed about this situation and about the pensions of members of Parliament, it would have been very wise indeed for the President of the Treasury Board to have in fact at the outset of this whole entire debate on this bill set up that inquiry formally so that it would have dispensed with any question whatsoever about where we were going from here, particularly in light of the fact that things can quite logically happen along the way, and they did with the previous government bill which died on the Order Paper.

All members of Parliament know that the public has three main areas of concern, particularly my own constituents, with the pensions of members of Parliament. They include something called double-dipping. They include the whole question of indexation of the pension and they include the question of the age at which the pension begins.

These motions, and specifically Motions Nos. 67 and 68, deal with the issue of double-dipping. Double-dipping means that if an MP is already receiving a pension and then gets another government job of some sort he or she would be in a position of being paid twice for their time. This amendment would put an end to that.

The other motions I have before the House at the moment, Motions Nos. 68, 68C, and 69A, deal with the issue of when the pension begins. Right now after serving for six years in Parliament one's pension automatically begins when one ceases to be a member of Parliament. These particular motions would make it law that the pension would not begin until the age of 60.

In my view that would deal with both the issue of when the pension begins and, at least to some extent, the question of indexing because there could be no further indexing prior to the age of 60. Both those issues are dealt with in these particular motions.

There have been questions put to me as to why I chose the age of 60. I suppose I could have chosen the age of 65 or I could have chosen the age of 55 because there are pensions that fall into those categories. I chose the age of 60 for two reasons. First of all, if I had chosen the age of 55, I would have qualified immediately and I did not think that made any logic, any sense. I thought it would have been self-serving and hypocritical of me.

• (1500)

Second, I chose the age of 60 because one is able to qualify and receive a Canada pension under the Canada Pension Plan at the age of 60. In those terms that is the reasoning behind the age of 60.

A good many people have raised concerns with me.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have to go into Private Members' Business. If the hon. member would like to complete his 10 minutes I will not see the clock. You will have three minutes after Private Members' Business. If you can complete it within a minute, fine. If not, we will wait until after Private Members' Business. Is the hon. member ready to complete it right now?

Mr. Redway: I would conclude by saying many members have raised with me the issue of grandfathering and that certainly is not dealt with in these amendments.

It seems to me that there is a good argument for saying this sort of a change should not occur retroactively. On the other hand, it seems to me that it would be hypocritical of me to suggest I make a change which would not affect me but would affect others in this House.

It is with that in mind that I put the motions as they are. It seems to me these amendments would bring it in line with the kind of pensions that other people in the private sector have.

As a lawyer, I only had the benefit of registered retirement savings plans. As a member of municipal council, I only had the benefit of a pension that would start at age 65. These motions, if adopted by the House, would bring members of Parliament's pensions into line with those of the private sector.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): If there is going to be continuous debate on it, I am going to have to call it 3 p.m.

It being 3 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Thursday, May 7, the motion of Mr. Hicks, that Bill C-227, an act to amend the Criminal Code (desecration of the flag), be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as I was saying the other day in debate on Bill C-227, having to do with the desecration of the flag of Canada, various sources in the legal community have urged the government to exercise restraint in the application of our criminal law. The government has been urged from time to time to use the criminal law only to reaffirm fundamental values. Our Criminal Code should contain only acts which are both punishable and wrong; that is, acts contravening fundamental values and nothing more.

The criteria for real crimes are fairly clear. A real crime in my opinion is an act which is morally wrong and that threatens and infringes on fundamental social values. These values are of two kinds: those which are essential to the very existence of a society and those which are essential to the existence of our own particular society.

Generally, essential values are those without which social life would be impossible. Society is, after all, a co-operative enterprise. Its members must have some give and take, must respect each other's needs and vulnerabilities and must enjoy some mutual trust and reliance.

In other words, they must prefer order to anarchy, peace to violence and honesty to deceit. All social life therefore commits its members to such values as the sanctity of life, the inviolability of the person, the virtue of truth and the necessity of order.

Transgressions against these essential values are crimes of violence, fraud and crimes against peace, order and good government. These are the major candidates for inclusion in the code of real crimes.

Besides these generally essential values, most societies hold certain other values. For example, we in Canada set high value on individual liberty. This is by no means necessary for social life, for many societies have existed without it, and an unfree society is still a society but not a society in which we would want to live.

For us, no society would suffice without a measure of freedom, justice, tolerance, human dignity and equality. Transgressions of these important values are crimes such as false imprisonment, interfering with justice and hate propaganda. These form the second category of real crimes.

I also wish to comment on this bill from the perspective of the Canadian Charter of Rights of Freedoms. I think that it is important that members of the House keep the charter in mind whenever considering new legislation. The charter in section 2 sets out the fundamental freedoms which Canadians enjoy. That section states that everyone has the following fundamental freedoms: (a) freedom of conscience and religion; (b) freedom of thought, belief, opinion and experssion, including freedom of the press and other media of communications; (c) freedom of peaceful assembly; and (d) freedom of association.

Honourable members will note that paragraph (b) explicitly guarantees freedom of expression. Any ban such as proposed in this bill would have to be considered in light of the charter guarantee of this fundamental freedom.

For all of these reasons, this bill proposes an inappropriate extension of the criminal law. I believe that we should explore more appropriate ways of dealing with such offensive behaviour.

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a few minutes to give you my views on the hon. member's bill, which deals with values and symbols.

I have always been impressed by the changes that take place in society and how our interpretation of certain actions may differ. Today, we have a generation of young people for whom certain symbols no longer have the same value they had for us.

Let me give you an example. Today, a contract is always in writing. Everything has to be in writing, whether it is signed or initialled. I know, because I was involved as a negotiator in the collective bargaining process for quite some time. Today, everything has to be exactly right and somebody's signature has to be on it. A signature commands respect. Although we are now starting to have some doubts about that, because if there were no witnesses or a person had no authority to sign— When we see someone's signature, we immediately start wondering whether they had that authority.

Formerly, it was a matter of giving your word. Our parents and grandparents felt that very strongly. When someone said: "I give you my word or I swear on the Bible", that was sacred. This ritual hardly exists any more. We still see it among some older people, but today, even someone's signature or initial on a letter may be challenged. We saw this recently, even in contracts with native tribes or societies; today, 100 years later, they say that the person who signed the contract, which according to the White man was legal, had no authority to sign. So this has far-reaching implications. My point is that our values have changed.

To me a flag is sacred. There are other symbols that are sacred as well but today we have a generation of young people that has been told, and there is nothing wrong with that, that they must express themselves. Well, they do. The way they do it is, of course, not my way, just as my way is different from my grandfather's way.

Today, we are being ask to vote on this bill and refer it to committee for consideration. I suggest referring the bill to a committee in the departmental envelope, for consideration, because it has implications that are quite substantial. We are talking about a bill that appeals to different values in a different context.

People were told to express themselves, and so they did. We had one example last year, or was it two years ago, when five or six people trampled the Quebec flag. It was estimated that the same scene was shown on television 21 or 22 times. Each time, it was always the same five or six people making the same gesture, which was meant to insult those for whom the flag is a symbol.

We must be careful here. When we vote for a bill, it has to be votable. Second, it has to be enforceable. By the way, what is a symbol? Then we get legislation that interprets exactly what a symbol is, because we cannot start defining every single symbol. The Canadian flag is a symbol of my country: Canada. But there are provincial symbols as well. There are coats of arms and any number of other ways to symbolize something or other in this country.

Today, thanks to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, we have freedom of expression, which is what I am doing today. We have certain symbols in this country and there are more. Our values and our laws are changing—this legislation, for instance—but we should not let legislation make matters worse.

One of the problems we have in this country is that our communications are becoming increasingly efficient. Although that may be a good thing, there are a number of drawbacks, and some of them are quite harmful. I said earlier that we saw the Quebec flag being trampled 22 times. That is 22 times too many. It should not have been done in the first place. However, it was shown 22 times, with some kind of ferocious glee. Because we have this information overload today, people make up their minds just on the basis of a picture or perception. Of course people weren't in front of their television sets 22 times to find out what they were talking about. When the people involved in the incident apologized, the media showed them, but if you have a television set on and you are cooking or knitting or working on a puzzle or talking on the phone, you don't hear the message. The only message you get is the picture. And you say to yourself: Not again! Even if it didn't really happen 22 times, it was shown that many times on television and that was so many times too many. This is one of the problems we have today. It amplifies problems to the point that they become an irritant to people my own age, to my colleagues here in the back or to younger people. And of course with our own symbols we probably irritate young people as far as some of their symbols are concerned. It is all part of the whole problem.

This bill should be referred to committee for consideration because it contains implications for the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and we need a better definition of our symbols.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to participate in this debate today and I want to speak in favour of the bill proposed by my colleague. I want to congratulate him for bringing it to the attention of the House.

I have a bill myself, presently being drafted, which is similar except it would also cover the flags of the provinces. I share very much the concerns the parliamentary secretary has raised. I totally agree with him.

In the French media we have seen the flag of Quebec being desecrated time after time. In the English media we have seen the flag of Canada being desecrated every now and then. Of course the reverse is seldom shown because what is shown is meant to tantalise whatever audience one is attempting to tantalise.

For that offence to have occurred once was once too many as the member for Beauharnois—Salaberry has said. To have shown one incident 22 times suggesting the incident had happened 22 times makes it that much more unacceptable.

[Translation]

We in this House can take action to try to rectify the situation. Our colleague has proposed a bill today, and I must tell him that I support his initiative. I would like his bill to apply to the provinces as well.

[English]

Once the bill does reach committee, and I hope of course it will be passed by this House and go to a parliamentary committee, I hope my colleague who moved the bill and the committee will recommend including the provinces.

There might be a technical difficulty that might be beyond the scope of the bill under our present parliamentary definitions, but with the unanimous consent of the House, I am sure we could report the bill that way and correct it in the way I am suggesting.

I have had a research document prepared by the Library of Parliament as to the constitutional authority we have to legislate in such matters.

[Translation]

I note here, for example, that subsection 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867 says very clearly that Parliament can pass legislation to protect the Canadian flag from any form of desecration. That is the opinion of researchers working for us in the law and government division of the Library of Parliament. Our expert advisers tell us that the authority to legislate in this area certainly exists, at least under the Constitution Act, 1867.

[English]

How did I get into this? Some weeks ago I received a phone call from a constituent of my riding. Unfortunately, I have not had the opportunity to ask him permission to use his name in the House. I will nevertheless read his letter. Here is what the constituent said:

> I am writing in reference to our conversation this morning. My family and I were absolutely shocked when we received this advertising in the mail.

The advertising in question is the one I have here:

> How can anyone show that little respect for our Canadian flag? We are Canadian immigrants, i.e. are Canadians by choice, not chance and as such we are very proud of our flag. In our opinion this brochure clearly defaces and dishonours our flag and the companies responsible for it should be held criminally responsible for their actions.
> I do hope that you will be able to stop further distribution of the brochure and would appreciate it if you would inform us of the results.

This is a letter I received from a constituent. It is in regard to a brochure which I have in hand. I will not put it before the cameras, pursuant to our rules, but I will share it with you. The brochure in question shows a flag of Canada which is half red and half blue.

The reason for it is to show an alliance between Air France and Canadian Airlines. They have a merger for their travel points and will give 2,500 bonus points. In so doing, they display the flag in a manner which I find totally unacceptable. I will share the document privately with colleagues afterwards, pursuant to our rules. I will show them the information so they can appreciate what I am referring to.

I regret having to say it, but other groups do that as well. It has recently been brought to my attention that a group I support very much is using our Canadian flag in an offensive way. It is not a secret in this House I am a supporter of pro-life causes, but I totally disagree with the brochure pro-life organizations have put out. They show a Canadian flag under the heading of the Canadian holocaust and on the Maple Leaf is what obviously looks like an aborted foetus. I must say to that group, a group I agree with, I find it equally offensive, whether it is Canadian Airlines, pro-life, pro-choice or whoever else is desecrating the flag of this great country.

This is the 125th anniversary of Canada. I hope in this year we will at least pass this bill, send it to committee and ask colleagues and experts to review it. Perhaps in some small way we can show the Canadian people we as legislators feel strongly about our national institutions. Perhaps we can show them we care about the future of Canada and about those symbols and institutions that keep us together.

• (1520)

[Translation]

The flag of our country and of all the provinces and territories deserves the respect advocated by our colleague in his bill.

I trust that we will pass this bill on second reading, send it to committee and make changes to include all the provinces and territories of Canada so as to protect their flags too, to ensure that our national, provincial and territorial flags get the respect they deserve.

[English]

In doing so, maybe we will contribute in a small way to showing the people of Canada we care about this country.

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, along with my colleague for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, I am very honoured to participate in this debate on this private members' motion from my colleague from Scarborough East. He has introduced a very, very timely and important piece of legislation that may well affect all of us in this country in a very positive way.

As members of Parliament, we all receive a large number of Canadian flags to distribute. I am not sure about your riding but I could probably distribute 10 times the number of Canadian flags, the property of the Government of Canada, without any difficulty. A number of things have happened in the past to flags in this country, and not just to our Canadian flag. Some years ago some Canadians from the New Democratic Party in the Manitoba legislature were upset with an American activity in Nicaragua and participated in the burning of the American flag in front of the consulate office in Manitoba. I felt very sad this was allowed to happen and no one was brought to task for it, especially since it involved elected members of a legislature participating in a flag burning.

If the law could be extended, all national flags in my view should be protected in this way. It should be an offence because the national flag is a symbol of the country. While some people may have difficulty with certain countries, I do not believe they should have the right to desecrate another nation's flag.

My colleague from Scarborough East tells me well over 80 per cent of Canadians think this is the right thing to do. I resent any member of Parliament asking the Department of Justice if it agrees with this type of legislation. We are the legislators here. We are the people who decide what laws should rule and govern us. If the Department of Justice does not happen to like it, that is too damned bad. I think this is one of the things Canadians want us to do, and we should do.

I very much want to support this. It is something that should have happened a long time ago. We would not be witnessing things happening now to our national unity where people can use that symbol of unity and try to persuade others across this land in a negative way about what is so very important.

The use of the flag and twisting it in a way is probably also done in very bad taste. My colleague for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell has highlighted this and it should be done more often. If some of these organizations want to push their point, they should certainly rethink the use of the Canadian flag as they have portrayed it.

I will close by stating I hope this comes to a vote. I will assist the House in bringing it to a vote because I believe elected representatives want to decide the fate of this bill. I hope it passes in all forms.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to speak as a private member and I will only speak for a couple of minutes on this.

This is a very interesting topic and I want to congratulate my colleague for introducing it. Protecting our national institutions and our symbols is very important.

With respect to this bill I would imagine there would be some interesting charter questions on this. I know in the United States the Supreme Court of the United States has ruled on a similar bill. Nonetheless, committee stage would be another opportunity for members of Parliament to have a look at this.

The member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell made an interesting suggestion concerning provincial flags but the point that the member is making here is that we should protect these national symbols.

One of the speakers indicated how important and how appropriate it would be that we would want to do something to protect one of our national symbols in Canada's 125th year.

Heaven knows, there are enough attacks on Canada's institutions and enough attacks on some of those traditions and some of those things that we believe in.

Recently, the CBC ran a program called The Valour and the Horror. In it was a very thinly veiled attack on Canada's role in World War II, an attack on the leadership of Canada's war effort, and an attack on the role that Canada's allies played.

In the example of what happened in the Far East, in Singapore and Hong Kong, that particular program leaves the implication those who ran our allied war effort were either stupid or were just setting up our allies in that part of the world. It goes on to show and talk about the allied war effort in Europe and again portrays the individuals who ran Canada's allied war effort in a very negative way.

One of the unfortunate things about that is I notice the program is now available in libraries. It is in the library in Niagara Falls. This is now available for people to see the portrayal of what Canada did in World War II. That is a shame because Canadians should feel very proud about what Canada did in World War I and World War II.

It is unfortunate that when the National Film Board or CBC spends money, it is in a way that shows these things in a very bad light.

I watched part of a program called Tom Alone that was on the CBC. It showed the Mounties, another one of our national institutions, one of our national treasures, one of the legends of the 19th century and it showed a Mountie bullying some young boy. I did not know what channel it was on, but I said to my wife: "You don't have to tell me, this is on the CBC isn't it?"

I just knew it would not be Global. It would not be CTV. It would not be the private network. It would never be an American station because an American network would not show the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in that kind of light.

I knew right away that the Canadian taxpayers would end up picking up the bill for this very negative portrayal of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Of course it was not done in this wonderful story about a boy looking for his father. Toward the end just before the last spike was driven into the CPR, one of the foremen arranged it so the Asian workers who have worked to put the railway together were all blown up in a tunnel.

God knows there have been instances of discrimination in this country but as I say, leave it to the CBC to put together that kind of spin, that kind of presentation, of again one of those things that all Canadians feel good about, the CPR.

One of my colleagues told me years ago that there was a suggestion CBC might do a story on General Brock, a hero from my neck of the woods. I remember my colleague saying he did not want CBC to do anything. Please, please leave some of these heroes alone. Thank you, thank you very much. Do not do anything on General Brock. He knows what a lot of us know and that is any look at this by the CBC would have the usual negative connotation.

One of our members has come forward and suggested we protect the national flag. I know this is a young country and there are very few symbols, very few legends in a country the age of Canada. The Mounties are one of them, the building of the railway is another. Our role in the wars, which Canadians are very proud of, our flag and our national anthem are others. There are few enough in this wonderful country of 125 years.

I commend the hon. member for bringing forward this initiative.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in support of Bill C–227. It is only fair to respect one of the most noble symbols of our nation and that is the Canadian flag. Look at this country from coast to coast, at the mountains, the valleys, the institutions, the people. There is one single thing that we all think and believe in and look up to as the symbol of Canada and that is our Canadian flag.

My colleague who just spoke was talking about the importance of protecting the institutions. Unfortunately, in his discussion he moved on to attack the CBC. The CBC is a national institution. The CBC has contributed in the past, and continues to contribute to our society as a whole, to Canadian unity and to the well–being of our people.

Attacking, defacing or burning a flag is an assault on the whole nation. It is an assault on the people. It is an assault on the dignity of the nation.

Historically, going back thousands of years, whenever there was a war between two tribes, groups or families, the first thing the winners would do would be to run up their flag. Then they would burn the other tribe's flag. Simply stated, it is a put–down to burn someone else's symbol of pride.

Even now, whenever there is an international dispute between two nations, the winning nation will pull down the flag of the other nation and raise its own flag.

It does not matter whether you look back thousands of years or whether you look at the present situation, a flag of a nation or of a group is a symbol of dignity.

Nothing irks me, hurts me and burns me more inside than seeing someone tampering with the Canadian flag. I say this because it touches me deeply. I get very mad and upset about it, simply because I know what a flag means to the people as a whole, what it means to me and to the people I represent.

What sort of punishment should we give someone who burns the flag? The maximum punishment possible. I say this because anyone who burns the Canadian flag obviously is a vicious and mean person, a person without a backbone, without any kind of respect, a person who believes in vengeance.

My colleague mentioned that we are a young nation. Well, yes, in one sense of the word we are a young nation, but in reality, no. Historically, Canada has been around for thousands and thousands of years. Since the beginning of this planet Canada has been here. People moved to this land thousands of years ago. Our native people were here. We now have a country with a population in excess of 26 million.

We have a responsibility to respect the law and protect our institutions and the Canadian flag as a symbol of unity and pride.

My colleague did not make any suggestion in terms of punishment. I suggest the person should go to jail and there should be a fine. Ten years in prison, 20 years in prison; if it were up to me, even 100 years in prison would not be enough for anyone who burns or defaces the Canadian flag. This is a betrayal of the country we live in. I know we do not have capital punishment. I do not believe in capital punishment, but it irks me to the point where I would say that someone who defaces the Canadian flag should be put in jail for life. It is an incredible offence. I know it is not my decision, it is the government's decision.

The recent event that took place in our province where people walked on the Quebec flag was reprehensible. That is a provincial flag and it is a symbol of Quebec, just as the Ontario and B.C. flags are symbols of those provinces. This event was highly unfair and I was quite upset about it. Everyone knows the uproar, the animosity and the hurt it caused people. They are our brothers and sisters and part of this great land of ours.

In my final comment, I wholeheartedly support this amendment to the Criminal Code. I do not know if anyone has moved unanimous consent to the House, but if not I would like to move that this bill be adopted unanimously by this House and be passed on to the specific committee to deal with it.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to prolong the debate, I just want to make a point.

I have noticed in the last couple of years some of the documentation coming out of government offices has been defacing the Canadian flag as far as I am concerned in my interpretation. Quite often what I have noticed is that the Canadian flag is no longer red. The government has intentionally coloured it blue.

I will give a very specific example. Not too long ago, I was invited to a special ceremony honouring our Olympic athletes who represented us in the winter games. I was very honoured to go. It was sponsored by the Secretary of State. It was right here on Parliament Hill.

In the room there was a nice big backdrop. There was a large Canadian flag on the mast, the proper Canadian flag, red with the maple leaf. Plastered in that backdrop of blue were blue Canadian flags. I even go a step further to mention the uniforms that our athletes wore in some of the Olympic games. They were representing Canada and the colours of our flag were not the number one predominant focal point of those uniforms.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and other colleagues that the Canadian flag is recognized throughout the world. I would hope that at least the Canadian government would help to preserve the true colours of that Canadian flag.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

PUBLIC SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-55, an act to amend certain acts in relation to pensions and to enact the Special Retirement Arrangements Act and the Pension Benefits Division Act, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to rise to speak on the motions which are now put before the House by the hon. member for Don Valley East.

I want to commend the hon. member for Don Valley East for giving the House a long overdue opportunity to debate these important issues surrounding the pensions of members of Parliament. At the same time, I want to point out that it was my own leader, the leader of the federal New Democratic Party, the member for Yukon, who first drew to the attention of Canadians in a very powerful speech on February 24 of this year the profound inequities which many Canadians believe exist in this pension plan.

I want to make it clear that in speaking today on these motions I am speaking personally. I am not speaking on behalf of my caucus colleagues, I am not speaking on behalf of my party. I am speaking personally and I am speaking as the member of Parliament for Burnaby—Kingsway.

I know my colleague for Victoria has strong feelings on this issue as well and he may very well be participating in the debate. Because of the intensity around this issue, it is a debate which transcends political considerations. I did want to make that very clear.

Certainly many of my constituents in Burnaby—Kingsway have raised concerns about the equity and the fairness of the members of Parliament's pension plan. As the member for Yukon, the leader of the New Democratic Party stated during her speech in February, we are accountable for the public trust. We are accountable to those who elected us to make sure that what we support is fair, not less, and that each and every one of us can stand before the electorate of Canada and say that we have put in place a fair system.

That is the benchmark which surely must guide us as we examine this pension system. As I look at the pension system today and as I looked at the pension system when I was first elected to this House some 13 years ago, it is clear to me that there are inequities in the system and that certainly this House should direct an independent review of those inequities.

On December 5, 1991 I tabled in this House the following motion: "That in the opinion of this House the government should consider the advisability of establishing a non-partisan, independent commission to review all salaries, pensions and benefits of members of Parliament and particularly to identify inequities in the pension plan by holding public hearings and examining other jurisdictions within and outside Canada, and such commission to report within six months of its establishment.

I believed then and I believe now that kind of completely independent review of our pension plan is long overdue. The leader of the New Democratic Party, the member for Yukon, has said in her speech in February that it is long overdue that we raise the question of pensions of members of this House, pensions that at this time mean that after six years of service members of this House receive a pension regardless of age or whether they move on to employment elsewhere in the federal government.

That refers to the so-called double-dipping provisions and these are the two fundamental elements of the amendments which are proposed by the member for Don Valley East.

I welcome the opportunity provided by the motions of the hon. member for Don Valley East for a comprehensive and independent review of the pensions and benefits of members of this House.

I also want to take this opportunity to signal the fact that as a result of the leadership of the hon. member for Yukon, the President of the Treasury Board within the last 24 hours has signalled that at last he is prepared to put together an independent and ad hoc review of the pension scheme. It was in response to yet another letter from the hon. member for Yukon, a letter in which the leader of the New Democratic Party called upon the President of the Treasury Board to establish an independent committee, an arm's length committee, that would be able to examine and make recommendations on all aspects of MPs' pension plans and to report back to Parliament within six months of being struck.

In response to that letter, the President of the Treasury Board replied as follows: "At this time, I am developing final proposals on the terms of reference for and composition of the ad hoc group which will undertake this review.

There is no question in my mind that all aspects of the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act must be examined and that the study group should be made up of individuals with expertise and public credibility in the area of pensions and compensations".

I would certainly hope that it would be a completely independent review body, separate and at arm's length from members of Parliament and from retired members of Parliament.

This does give us an opportunity to review these issues. Certainly the member's motions are not likely to be adopted by the House today. As I understand it, there is some considerable resistance to the amendments. Again, this does give us an opportunity to help spur that long overdue review of the area of MPs' pensions and benefits.

Whether that review will result in proposals for change identical to those made by the hon. member for Don Valley East, whether there will be other proposals, a combination of service and age, whether there will be other proposals with respect to double-dipping, the independent commission will have an opportunity to review.

Again and in conclusion, I want to signal the leadership of the hon. member for Yukon, the leader of the New Democratic Party, in flagging this issue. I know it was a rather sensitive subject because I was in the House the day that she spoke. I remember the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell for the Liberal Party and members of the Conservative Party getting up and braying that this was sacred territory; do not touch members of Parliament's pensions, for God's sake.

It was that unholy alliance that coalesces every so often in this country too often for many of us between the Liberal Party and the Conservative Party.

I want to take this opportunity to commend the hon. member for Don Valley East for once again speaking out independently and in particular for underlining and re-enforcing the leadership and the courage of the hon. member for Yukon on this important issue of public concern.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, I will not debate the point but for the record, those who are watching the proceedings should be aware of the position in committee of the members of that committee.

From day one, the members of that committee have asked for an independent review and that includes the members of the government. It was the government that has gone along and has agreed to that independent review. I do not see where the NDP leader should be the great one who decided that thanks to her we now have an independent review. I do not see why she should get all this credit.

It has been an agreed direction from day one. The members of the Liberal Party in committee asked for it and agreed with it. The member of the NDP who was there asked for it. Even the parliamentary secretary at one of the committee meetings put forth the point of view that he would support an independent review and would take that message to the minister.

Obviously the minister did listen to the hon. parliamentary secretary. It is not necessarily one member who should get the credit. If I recall well enough, when the hon. member for Yukon spoke here, the hon. member changed her position not too long after, publicly, a couple of days later. She did not seem to have the same position all of a sudden. I would not be too quick in saying the hon. member should deserve all the credit on this one.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. Certainly if there is any uncertainty I would be very pleased to seek the consent of the House to table the exchange of correspondence between the leader of the New Democratic Party and the President of the Treasury Board. I would seek that consent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there consent?

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, as the New Democratic Party critic who attended the committee meetings and sat before the minister when he came before the committee, that was the argument the New Democratic Party had put forward. Our leader made it very clear in the House as I remember and the record in Hansard will verify who took the leadership in this.

I want to speak to the amendment because I think I have a great deal of respect for the member for Don Valley East and I admire his courage in bringing this forward. I have a problem with his amendment and the reason I have a problem with it is that I am a former mayor of a city. I remember when we used to have to vote ourself an increase in the city and I found that appalling.

I find it appalling today that we should be putting amendments forward on our own pension schemes. I like the process of having some actuaries out there and look at the problems that members of Parliament have because maybe we should not be dealing with those problems within a pension bill.

I came here in 1980 and in 1984 I was defeated. I stood up in this House and took on my company, CP Rail. I travelled across this country fighting against the Crow's Nest agreement. I stood up in this House and criticized the other place when the president of CP Rail was appointed as a Senator in that House and I had to go back and work for that company.

When you criticise such as we do in this party, criticize the banks, criticize the major industries on pollution and other things and try to seek employment after you leave here, there are some serious problems there.

That is why I admire the leader of the New Democratic Party when she asked for an independent inquiry to look at the situations with members of Parliament and what happens to them during that.

They cannot be impeded in any way. When you are elected to this House of Commons, the citizen's coalition can talk about comparative in employment. I want to tell you there is no comparative in employment opportunities when you are defeated after four years and you have those kinds of problems and you try to anchor back into the work force.

That is why with this independent inquiry we would be looking far over the pensions of NDP or members of Parliament and maybe at the situation of how we can address this problem.

The member who represented my riding prior to me, a government member, when he was defeated he was appointed to the Parole Board as a representative, getting an $80,000 a year job.

People on the opposition do not get that kind of opportunity. I would urge the members to support the amendment we have put forward. It is imperative that independent actuaries do the job of checking into the situation and come back with a full report.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I compliment the member who just spoke now. He gave some balance to what had been said previously and it is not easy. This is not an easy subject. I have tackled the critics of MPs' benefits and pensions probably more than anyone in this House, save the member perhaps from Mississauga South. I feel somewhat bruised by the process, but as they say, them's the breaks. I am not ashamed to be a member of Parliament. I think it is the greatest honour any Canadian can have. I started my working career on Parliament Hill as a busboy in the Parliamentary Restaurant on October 25, 1966. I looked in awe at members of Parliament, looking in awe at those people who had been chosen democratically by fellow citizens to represent them in this the highest court in the land.

Every election I would see new members come in, each one of them vested with this great honour, each one of them with every intention in their own way of best serving the people who sent them here. You sir, Mr. Speaker, will remember because you were one of the people who was here as an MP when I was a staffer here on Parliament Hill. Through much luck and probably some elbow grease, I ended up some 18 years after I first came here as a member of Parliament.

I do not mean to say this to describe my own political rags to riches story, although some others may have described it that way from time to time. I feel very proud of the fact that I am here, not for my own accomplishments, although I like to think that way from time to time but for the fact that we live in a country where it is possible for the Prime Minister to be an ex-truck driver and to eventually become Prime Minister of this country or for the busboy of the Parliamentary Restaurant to come back as an MP. There are not that many nations in the world where that could happen.

We live in one of them and I am proud of that. I work hard at it. Most mornings, hon. members will know, certainly the cleaning staff knows, I am here at 7.15 a.m. and many, many times particularly in winter, I go through days and nights without seeing daylight. I am not complaining because I enjoy my job. There is nothing else in the world that I would rather do and I am very proud of it.

I have some problems with organizations like the National Citizens Coalition, who for their own selfish interests of trying to raise funds for whoever they are, however many members they have if any, pretend that they are on a crusade against every member of this House and at the bottom of their little crusade block there is a little cut-out which says: "Want us to do more of the same? Please send us your cash". Cut this out and send it to David Somerville who will gladly take your money to continue fighting more of this great stuff he is fighting now.

An hon. member: That is his income.

Mr. Boudria: Well, some other members have said it, that is his income, and we are catering to this. We as MPs are catering to this. I do not mean that our pensions are sacred or our salary is sacred or anything else. It is not. A recent study said that Canadian members of Parliament are paid the least of the G–7 nations. That is a fact. Maybe the pensions were 5 per cent more and the salaries 5 per cent less. Let us have that independent inquiry, that independent review the way the government has suggested. It was suggested in the heat of the night in correspondence between the government and the members in the New Democratic Party.

However, it does not matter how the process got started. The point is there is going to be that independent review. I welcome it because I am not ashamed of the salary I make or how I use the stationery I have in my office to correspond with my constituents or the photocopier or the fax machine or all other so–called perks we have to correspond with the people who sent us here to represent them to start with.

I am not ashamed of any of that. I am proud to have the opportunity to represent my constituents and I welcome that study. But let us not take off to please the National Citizens Coalition and adopt an amendment or two or three amendments just because we are afraid of the Reform Party or David Somerville or somebody else. Let us have a bit more backbone around this place for once. Let us do that independent study. I know right now what it is going to say. I can tell you that most members of Parliament work hard—not just me, not just the member for Ottawa Vanier, although he works very hard, too, but members across the way, on all sides of the House. We all work hard around here and it is time that we took pride ourselves in the greatest honour that was given to us by our constituents who sent us here to start with.

• (1600)

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I strongly support the proposal for an independent inquiry into MPs' pensions, as proposed by the Leader of the New Democratic Party. It is an excellent initiative she has taken and it is long overdue.

The motion before this House from the member for Don Valley East I am afraid does not do the job because it is too rigid. I would think that the proposal he has put should go to this inquiry and be considered along with it. It does not have the necessary flexibility to cover some particular situations. Someone may be asked to do a short–term job. Someone may have a pension after six years which is minimal and which the member is entirely entitled to. That member ought to be free to accept some additional income.

The problem that the member's motion deals with and which I think is the public's concern is the person at full pension who is offered some full–time job in the public sector. That issue does need to be dealt with.

There are terrible inequities in this country in the whole pension field. Probably none is worse than the pensions of the captains of industry in this country who are paid grotesque pensions. We cannot do anything about those issues today in this bill. We can today deal with the issue of pensions of members of Parliament. It is incumbent upon us as members of Parliament to be prepared to have our pensions undergo the scrutiny of an independent inquiry.

We, too, may have to make sacrifices in this particular time of economic restraint in our country. Therefore, I welcome the initiative of the Leader of the New Democratic Party and I fully support the inquiry that she has proposed and has persuaded the government to implement.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): I think it is very important in this present economic time that we who are members of Parliament think not just of the work which we do as MPs, think not just of the sacrifices which many members of Parliament make in terms of giving up income to be MPs. I think it is more important and more sensible in looking at this question from a broad economic perspective across the country to ask where we are at in Canada today.

In my constituency just today, workers at one of our large parts plants received notices that that plant is going to be shut down. Close to 200 workers will lose their jobs. Most of those workers will have been proud of their jobs. They will have been proud of their contribution that they have made to the company for which they worked. They are going to be proud of the community of which they are part. Many of them will have worked in that company for 15, 20, or 25 years. Yet when they leave that company by September after that amount of work, they will not receive a pension. They will have worked more than six years but they will not receive a pension.

For those people let me suggest it will be considerably more difficult than for virtually anybody in this House of Commons to be able to find a job. Those who are 50, 51 or 52 or even if they are a little younger will not find it easy at all with unemployment at 11.2 per cent in this country to go out and find employment.

They will face exactly what each of us will face if we are defeated in the next election with one major difference. For somebody who has been here for six years, seven years, for eight years as in my case or for longer as in the case of other members, they will go out to seek employment. They will find it difficult perhaps but frankly, their experience here will help them rather than hurt them in virtually every case.

They will carry with them right from the day they lose their position in this House of Commons a pension of $20,000, $30,000 or $40,000. I have had to talk with union presidents from plants that have faced this kind of shutdown. They said to me: "Steven, I have 23 years in at the plant where I happen to work and I am not going to have a pension. I do not know what I am going to do. I fought the company hard as chairperson of the union or as president of the union and it is not going to be easy for me in this community to find a new job because I am recognized as a union activist".

I say to members of this House of Commons, as I have said within my own caucus, that we have to recognize that the world is not an easy to place for many Canadians. It is not an easy place for the 460,000 Canadians who have lost manufacturing jobs in the last three and a half years.

It is not an easy place for people who find the unemployment insurance system much tougher now as a result of measures passed by a majority of members of Parliament in this House of Commons. I say that the motions which have been brought forward today by the member for Don Valley East are motions which personally I support and which I have supported before the time that I was elected as a member of Parliament.

One of the issues in the first campaign that I ran in in 1984 involved the fact that the member whom I was running to replace, the former member for Essex—Windsor, the former Minister of Agriculture, was being appointed to a government position in Rome. Yet he would receive a full pension from this House of Commons. I said at the time and I say now that it is not right. We need a good pension system for members of Parliament. There is no question about that.

As finance critic for our party, I also want to say that this country is hurting. There needs to be examples set. These examples should be set by this House of Commons by putting into effect positions such as those that have been put forward by the member for Don Valley East.

The member for Don Valley East would probably be the first to agree that it is not right that this House of Commons should have control over our pensions or over our other benefits. I do not think this House of Commons should be responsible for setting our salaries. I do not think it should be responsible for setting the allowances which we receive for keeping a residence in our constituencies and so forth.

An independent commission should be established to set these things out, just as is done with the setting of boundaries for constituencies in this country. We learned long ago that if we left the setting of boundaries to members of Parliament that there would be inevitably self-interested motives that would creep in to the setting of those boundaries. We must learn the same thing with respect to the whole set of benefits which a member of Parliament receives for the work which he or she does in this place, in our constituencies and elsewhere throughout the country. That is what we have to establish.

This is an important debate. It is an important set of motions which the member for Don Valley East has put forward. I hope they will be taken to an independent commission and we will reform the pension system of members of Parliament to make it fair and to make it in a context of difficult economic times for all Canadians.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I would like to add a few remarks to the debate.

I would like to quote from the report on the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act for the fiscal year, 1989–90. What I would like to mention is that members do contribute to their pension plan. In the fiscal year 1989–90 they contributed $2.082 million and the government contributed the same amount.

The plan that is presently in force has a surplus in the bank of over $30 million. Naturally this brings in interest so that it is self–financing, I would say.

If we look at the number of pensions ex–members are getting, it is surprising to see for instance that about 60 former members are getting pensions in the order of $500 to $3,000 and there are only seven former members who get $50,000 plus. The average is probably around $15,000 to $16,000.

I would like to mention a friend of mine who was a member here for many years, about 20 years, and who was a cabinet minister in the Clark government. When he was defeated in 1980 his pension was $14,000. At the present time he is receiving $20,000 because his pension is indexed. I do not see how he could spend 20 years in government service, been a cabinet minister and receive a pension of $20,000.

If you look at the whole issue I feel it has been blown out of proportion. The plan is self–financing, it has a surplus and it has been very well run. I think the stories that we hear about members getting huge amounts of money are somewhat false. Members who have served in this House for some time deserve a pension. These members left their professional lives and businesses. Many come from long distances such as British Columbia and the Atlantic provinces and cannot run their businesses from Ottawa.

My feeling is that members are really not getting what the public perceives they are getting. The report further states that another 15 members are getting from $3,000 to $4,000. In total there are only 332 ex–members who are getting pensions and of that only seven receive $50,000 and 27 receiving $40,000 to $50,000. It then goes down to $500.

Therefore, I believe we should have a serious look at the pension proposals. We should not be defensive about what members of Parliament are getting. If you look for instance at what some provincial members are getting you might be surprised. They get much higher pensions than we do. Some of the salaries in the provinces are double what members of Parliament get.

I do not think we should be defensive about our pensions. I tend to disagree with the member who just spoke. He talked about other institutions and double–dipping. If there is double–dipping I think it should be disallowed across the board because there are certain members who retire in other government institutions at age 50 with huge pensions and they are double–dipping as well. If we have double–dipping I think it should apply across the board.

He said: Mr. Speaker, when the bill was drafted they had expected it to be passed and part of the act by fiscal year April 1, 1991 and that date was selected arbitrarily as the new fiscal year. The bill will be coming into effect in a new fiscal year so rather than make it retroactive to April 1, 1991, I assume it should start April 1, 1992, the start of the last fiscal year.

Motion No. 72B.

That Bill C-55 be amended in Schedule II by striking out line 40 at page 150 and substituting the following therefor:

"less than two years, or".

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is a very important amendment. It deals with the fairness issue, something which I have been repeatedly saying today. I think that our amendments over-all addressed fairness.

Prior to the change in the family law legislation, many spouses received their pensions as support. Legislation stated that the pension was an asset but it was either implicitly recognized by the courts that the spouses had an entitlement to the pension or that it was unfair that they be deprived of an entitlement especially after long-term marriages.

I could quote, but I do not want to take too much time, letters from constituents, as well as comments and statements. I want to quote briefly from a constituent of mine, Joyce Struthers, who has been very active in representing the committee for spousal's and children's pension survival and related benefits. I think we owe Ms. Struthers a vote of thanks for her presentation and her fairness.

Many spouses were married for 20, 30, 40, 50 years. They shared all the contributions, supported all the employment, carried all the family responsibilities, bore the children, lost their own employment in many cases, lost their pension opportunities as an individual because they were married to a public servant and were keeping house and doing things that were required because the spouse was away from home, sometimes in a foreign country. They often represented Canada side by side with their spouse.

These people are asking for an amendment that would fine tune the legislation, making it appropriate that since many spouses have elected to take their entitlement to the pension as support rather than as an asset in order to be able to obtain enforcement through the Garnishment, Attachment and Pension Diversion Act, these persons would be allowed to apply for the benefits available under the new Pension Benefits Division Act.

To them and to the Liberals on this side, this is crucial because these women were advised to take the pension this way by their lawyers, by Treasury Board officials. Many judges have made similar orders because the Garnishment, Attachment and Pension Diversion Act did not allow for a division of assets but only for support.

Those provisions under the Garnishment, Attachment and Pension Diversion Act are currently being challenged in the courts under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Again it is a question of justice. It is a question of equity. It is a question of fairness. All these people are proposing through us in this amendment is that this House be sensitive to a difficult situation. I could speak at length on this subject matter but I will not because I think the point has been made. We must show some considerate attention to these particular cases and adopt a motion that indeed would correct it.

"(5) A lump sum payment under subsection (4) shall be determined with reference to life expectancy tables applicable to persons of the same gender as the spouse or former spouse to whom the payment is to be made."

He said: Mr. Speaker, I rise on Motion No. 73. What we are calling for here is that schedule II of Bill C-55 be amended by striking out lines 35 to 36 on page 145 and substituting the following:

"intention to live separate and apart from the other and gave notice of the intention to the other spouse; and".

The reason we have put forward this amendment is that there have been some changes in the regulations with regard to common law relationships. The bill as it stands now refers to one year living together as a common law spouse. Many former spouses are not even aware that these relationships have taken place.

• (1630)

We are saying with this amendment that it is incumbent upon the member who has the pension to notify the spouse so that she is aware of the divisions within that pension. It is a small amendment and it is one that the government should certainly accept.

During the debate in committee and during the debate in the House on these amendments, on simple amendments such as this one, not one member of the government is getting up and telling us why he or she would not consider this amendment. I think that is disrespectful to the employees of the Public Service, disrespectful to members of the RCMP and disrespectful to military groups.

We have put forward some very simple amendments. I think there should be an explanation from the government as to why it is not going to accept those amendments. I found it offensive in committee and I find it offensive in the House that we are not even getting an answer from the other side as to why these amendments are not being considered.

That is why there are 112 amendments before the House today. It is because we were not getting those kinds of answers in committee. Now we are seeing the same performance in the House of Commons. I think this is disgraceful on the government side. I say to the government: "For goodness' sake, have a little bit of fairness, a little bit of compassion for this piece of legislation". It is going to become law. We all know the government is going to win when the day is over. It will become law and the regulations will be put in place. We are only asking for a little bit of fairness in this piece of legislation.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I am speaking to Motions Nos. 73B and 78B which I moved and which were seconded by my friend and colleague from Restigouche—Chaleur.

The purpose of these amendments is directed primarily at the Canadian forces, diplomatic services and other federal employees who may be posted in different locations across the land or outside the country.

Some of these employees have been known to live apart from their legal spouses and take on common law spouses without the knowledge of the legal spouses. This section, unamended, would not be fair to a spouse who carried on her duties raising the family and believing herself to be in a stable family relationship, and meanwhile her spouse had struck or arranged a common law association unknown to the legal spouse. In my view the legal spouse in this situation is short-changed. She is short-changed of benefits without even knowing what her legal or economic position is.

The amendment I am proposing is simply trying to require that the legal spouse be informed, and I underline that, that the couple is living separate and apart. It sounds to me like a reasonable, sensible amendment.

On that question there has been a long debate as to why the government would not come to grips with this situation, which in many cases is a tragedy. It is a tragic situation because innocent people are being hurt. We all know this could be avoided by amending the law, by making it possible to avoid serious injustice, by adopting a motion which would correct this exploitation and by simply dropping one optional basis, that is the provision for payout on marriage breakdown, and providing instead authority for making the former spouse of the public servant a member of the pension plan. It does not seem to me to be a very complicated proposal.

I take it that the spouse at home is entitled to half, at least, of the contribution that her spouse and herself make to a pension plan. That is fair. That is an entitlement which I understand to be a just analysis of the situation.

This does not belong to one spouse. It belongs to both of them. These are earnings that are put away, saved for later use. That is a pension plan. That is why we contribute to pension plans. It is earnings today that are saved for future use.

Instead of having some injustice in a situation of marriage breakdown because the spouse receiving or contributing directly to the pension plan is having another relationship, common law or otherwise, all we are saying is that there should be an additional clause that says the spouse who is legally entitled to it should receive half those contributions and be entitled to some pension plan.

In my riding many families are affected. I know families in the Canadian forces at Rockcliffe who were subjected to this kind of situation. It is not an easy thing to settle.

I dare say that the government's answer to our proposal was: "We do not want to increase the numbers of recipients or the number of pensioners". It does not sound to me like a very positive answer or a very acceptable one in that sense.

Logic would simply dictate that this amendment is not a far-reaching or very difficult one to understand. It would be one of fairness and it would be one of justice. I hope my colleagues will see their way to supporting this amendment.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, we have now moved into a section of the bill which in effect is a whole new bill to be entitled the Pension Benefits Division Act, schedule II of the bill before the House.

The bill rights a very long injustice mostly to women who are the ex-spouses of public servants, including the military, the RCMP and so forth. Under federal pension plans ex-spouses have been denied what the courts and the provincial level have agreed they should have, that is a clear recognition that through their marriage they have contributed equally to the pension plan earned by their spouses. That has already been recognized in the Canada Pension Plan. It has been recognized at the provincial level. It has been recognized by the courts, and now finally it is being recognized by Parliament. It is a change which we on all sides of the House support.

• (1640)

The member for New Westminster—Burnaby has been one of the leading spokespeople on this issue and has worked with women's groups across the country in bringing this issue to the attention of Parliament.

In my own riding there are courageous women who have come forward with petitions and requests. Some of the most poignant letters I have read have dealt with the plight they have been put in by this Parliament's failure to move earlier on this issue. They have been deprived of rights they should have. It is in this context therefore that I want to speak about the particular amendments before the House.

The member for Kootenay East moved a number of amendments in committee and made some great strides forward. He won an amendment for disclosure requiring that the non-plan member spouses will now have equal access to their spouses' pension information. In the absence of a court order specifying the period of cohabitation, the minister can and must use provincial family law guidelines in determining the period. Finally, there have been improvements in the valuation of the pension rights.

There are still a number of key points missing from the bill and issues which the committee heard eloquent pleas about. The committee for spousal and children pension survival and related benefits led by Joyce Struthers and others across Canada have made a very persuasive case for these issues.

I would just like to review them. We have already heard about some. The member for Kootenay East referred to Motion No. 73, which simply says that for calculating the period of contribution, the spouse at least ought to be given notice of the separation. That is a simple matter of justice.

Motion No. 75 which is included in this group would deal with the problem that an appeal of a court order could unfairly defer the rights to the asset which this Parliament concedes is earned by the ex-spouse.

Motions Nos. 76 and 76A in my name deal with the issue of retroactivity. The bill already provides a certain limited transitional provision. If the ex-spouse is lucky enough to have had this included in the court order or separation agreement entered into before this act comes into force, she or he may be all right.

If the court order or separation agreement does not cover the division of pension benefits, which may well be the case because of course up until this act comes into force it is not the law, then that person may be out of luck. The ex-spouse can try to go back to court, try to go back to the ex-spouse and negotiate a new agreement, but if that cannot be done, and there may be statute limitations and other reasons why that is not possible, then the ex-spouse is out of luck.

What the amendment I have moved proposes is simple and I ask the House to support it. Give the minister the authority to change the court order or pension plan and approve a division of pension benefits in appropriate cases.

I had extensive discussions with officials of Treasury Board and the associate Minister of National Defence, who is also the Minister responsible for the Status of Woman. She gave strong support not only to the bill itself, but to the thrust of the amendment I was proposing.

Somewhere deep in the bowels of Treasury Board they could not agree to this simple amendment because they are afraid their minister might have to make a difficult decision. So what did the government members of the committee do? They simply said we will only do what Treasury Board says. What is the government doing today? Silence. Silence in the face of the call for justice for women in this country who have inadvertently been deprived of a possible benefit. I think it is unconscionable for the members of the government to sit silent through this.

There are other amendments which are covered in this package. Frequently a court order or a separation agreement may recognize the spouse is entitled to more than 50 per cent because there are trade-offs, but this bill prevents the minister from recognizing that.

It is an arbitrary limit which has no basis of justice. I am amazed that the members of the government would sit silent and allow this to not be supported in this House.

We finally come to two or three other amendments. I do not know how much time I have. Two minutes. Well, in two minutes I can try to make a further pitch for those who have a case here to which the government is deaf.

Motions 82 and 82A would give the option of a trust in the ex-spouse's name. The idea here is to just provide a simple rough justice. This bill goes a long way to dealing with the problem. It provides that in the case of a proper application, the ex-spouse will be essentially given her property, which is her share in the pension, but it establishes a relatively convoluted way of doing that. Whereas the spouse from whom she is separated gets a cheque every month from the government, that cannot happen under this bill. This amendment sets up a system to allow that to happen so she too can get a cheque from the government for her share rather than have to go through more convoluted methods of doing it.

The other amendments, Motions Nos. 83 and 84 also provide for important improvements. I call on the members of the government to listen to what the women of this country are saying, what the member for Kootenay East so eloquently argued in committee, and what the member for New Westminster—Burnaby has argued across this country. They have pleaded for the government to just open up long enough to give these additional changes the consideration they are due and be fair.

This is a very thick bill. As we already heard, it has 112 amendments and 150 pages. This bill surfaced just a few months ago. It has not had the opportunity necessary for the kind of discussion it should have. We are seeing a travesty of the report stage procedures in this House. The government has not even explained the reasons why it cannot find these amendments to make the sense I see they do.

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, as you know I had moved some motions myself to amend this portion of the legislation, which deals with credit splitting for spouses and ex-spouses of pensioners under this legislation.

I would like to commend the hon. members who have spoken and moved motions on this portion of the legislation. They include the hon. member for Kootenay East, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier and the hon. member for Victoria.

I suspect almost everyone in this House has constituents who have a problem, and who have had a problem which they hope will be solved by this legislation. I have many, but I would just like to put on the record the concerns of one of those constituents who I have been discussing this matter with for many years.

Mrs. Joyce Bisset, one of my constituents who lives in Vicora Linkway, wrote me on October 31, 1991 to say: "I have written you several times in the past, specifically in 1987 and 1988, in regard to the unfairness of federal legislation, which discriminates against former spouses of military and public servants. I wrote to you about both pension credit splitting and survivor benefits earned during the years of marriage".

"Just prior to the last election, I invited you into my home at which time we discussed these issues. I did provide you with copies of my correspondence for you to read. You did tell me that if federal legislation was not forthcoming following your letters of referral to the correct ministers in charge that you would introduce a private members' bill yourself to have the legislation changed".

"I am sure that you can understand my disappointment in not receiving anything positive in regard to these pressing issues. I have enclosed a petition which has been signed by my doctor because of the stress-related illness that I have suffered including life-threatening major surgery in 1990 and also by strong supporters of this issue, some of whom find it to be unbelievable that in this day and age such discrimination exists".

That petition read:

> That many women in Canada are living in poverty after years of home making, which allowed their husbands to pursue careers without the burden of of child rearing and housework.
> That many of these women are disentitled by divorce to an equal share of their husband's federal pension credits accumulated during their marriage, and
> That the government has stated in the past that it is in favour of mandatory, automatic pension credit splitting.

• (1650)

In fact, the Canada Pension Plan has had that for some time.

> Therefore, your petitioners request that Parliament consider amending all federal superannuation acts in which inequity exists to allow for the retroactive pension credit splitting for all divorced spouses so that they may receive one-half of the federal pension credits accumulated by both spouses during the years of their marriage.

That is not an uncommon kind of situation. There are lots and lots of homemaker spouses who are in that situation and have been in that situation. I know that myself from my own family's circumstances.

My uncle was a military officer until his retirement, my aunt worked along with him. They were a team. It seems incredible to me that somebody in Mrs. Bisset's case could not share on a credit splitting basis the pension of her husband in a situation like that where suddenly as was the case with Mrs. Bisset almost to the day that her husband retired from the military he left and is living with another woman.

As a result of that, Mrs. Bisset did not have any access whatsoever to the credits of her husband's pension. This bill helps to correct some of those inequities but as hon. members have said already there are many more inequities that have not been corrected as yet by this bill.

In the motions that I have put before the House, Motion No. 74 deals with the whole situation of what happens when there is a separation. Do you go on for a period of weeks, months, years perhaps before suddenly the credit splitting starts, or the payments to the one spouse end pending some sort of decision.

I have provided in Motion No. 74 that there will be a freeze on those payments upon notice from the spouse who is a party to this separation until there is a decision made.

I have also provided in Motions Nos. 77 and 78 that there is a right for the minister to determine that the deserted, separated or divorced spouse in those cases should be entitled to receive more than 50 per cent of the pension if she has contributed that proportionate amount over the time, in the judgment of the minister.

I would hope that the members of this House would see fit to adopt all of the motions that have been put on this issue which raise very longstanding concerns on matters of complete inequity and it is long overdue that this Parliament correct these inequities. After all, we have corrected them in the Canada Pension Plan. There is no reason why we should not be correcting them in this legislation also.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I just want to touch briefly on Motion No. 78B. That is the amendment that was offered by my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier. As members will know, particularly those who serve on the committee that my colleague from Ottawa West as well was very active in raising this issue.

Just very briefly I want to say to the House that Motion No. 78B is meant to address the following problem. Bill C–55 currently says that the amount of the pension to be transferred is 50 per cent or less even if the court order takes the entire pension into account in the division of assets, and the words "more than 50 per cent" to one spouse.

If this was a pension in the private sector regulated by any statute, federal or provincial, none of us would interfere with that. A court order would be respected. However, when we are dealing with pensions for public servants it seems that we have decided that we can inject something into the bill whereby we will supersede the order made by a judge of the court, having taken a number of things into consideration in the disposition of assets. The proposed amendment would enable the federal government to award the amount of the pension stated in the court order, whatever the court order, whether it is 50 per cent, more than 50 per cent or whether it is less. In fact, the amendment would bring this legislation in line with the Pension Benefits Standards Act which is the act which we use to impose those kinds of rules on everyone else. The amendment proposed by my colleague would inject that element of fairness that has been raised by other colleagues earlier today. I just wanted to take a moment of the House and so indicate.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier) moved:

Motion No. 75D.

That Bill C-55 be amended in Schedule II by striking out lines 16 to 22 at page 154 and substituting the following therefor:

"those grounds are based."

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this amendment is to remove two paragraphs of the proposed Pension Benefits Division Act which state that the minister shall refuse to approve the division of pension benefits if, and it reads:

(d) That periods subject to division cannot be determined under subsection 8(2) or 8(3) or

(e) The minister is satisfied, based on evidence submitted to the minister that it would not be just to approve this division.

Mr. Speaker, we want those two paragraphs deleted.

In the case of (d), subsections (2) and (3) of the same act give ample guidelines as to how to determine a period subject to division and gives the minister the power to declare a period as the period of co-habitation even in the absence of court order or spousal agreement specifying such a period. Spouses should not be refused the part of the pension they earned because the minister has not exercised his power to declare a period of co-habitation.

Concerning paragraph (e), which we also want deleted, the proposed Pension Benefits Division Act states that pension credits cannot be divided in the absence of a court order or agreement. Paragraph (e) gives the minister the power to ignore a provincial court order or agreement between spouses as to the division of benefits for unnamed reasons. This is probably unconstitutional, as marital property is under provincial jurisdiction and provincial law is paramount in this area.

Other paragraphs are in place to prevent division if a court order is found to be invalid, the application for splitting is withdrawn or an appeal is underway.

Paragraph (e) may allow the minister to make decisions based on moral or other grounds, superseding valid court orders. This is unacceptable.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, the present law does not provide for sharing pension rights. This new bill, C–55, would allow sharing pension benefits at source. Of course, we are pleased with that and support some of those recommendations. The spouse's agreement or a court order would be required, if we take the bill literally; up to 50 per cent of the entitlement would be transferred to a retirement savings plan for the spouse and the participant's benefits in the plan would be adjusted accordingly.

All that proposed amendment 75D does is to give clear, specific directions, because we do not want grey areas. We want the minister to meet his responsibilities, but we also want all public servants and everyone entitled to a pension to know clearly that there are difficult situations where the same rules as apply to the Canada Pension Plan will apply to the Public Service Superannuation Act. The CPP provides for automatic sharing of pension benefits at source and the 1983 report of the parliamentary task force on pension reform recommended that this measure also apply to Public Service pensions, as we recall.

The purpose of my motion 75D is simply to update the bill and make it apply not only like all other bills but like all other systems.

Mr. Don Boudria (for Mr. Arseneault) moved:

Motion No. 85.

That Bill C–55 be amended in Schedule II by striking out line 6 at page 158 and substituting the following therefor:

"16. Subject to sections 17 to 20, the Governor in Council may, on the".

Motion No. 86.

That Bill C–55, be amended in Schedule II by adding immediately after line 30 at page 159 the following:

"17. The President of the Treasury Board shall, at a time and in a manner appropriate in the circumstances, seek the views of interested parties and, where appropriate, members of the public generally on proposed regulations to be made under this Act.

18. The President of the Treasury Board shall, where the Governor in Council proposes to make any regulation under this Act, lay a draft of the proposed regulation before the House of Commons at least thirty sitting days before a copy of that regulation is published in the Canada Gazette under section 19.

19.(1) Subject to subsection (2), a copy of each regulation that the Governor in Council proposes to make under this Act shall be published in the Canada Gazette at least thirty days before the effective date of the regulation, and a reasonable opportunity shall be afforded to interested persons to make representations to the President of the Treasury Board with respect to the proposed regulation.

(2) No proposed regulation need be published under subsection (1) if it has previously been published pursuant to that subsection, whether or not it has been amended as a result of representations made pursuant to that subsection.

(3) In calculating the thirty day period referred to in subsection (1), there shall not be counted any day on which the House of Commons does not sit.

20. Where, within twenty five sitting days after a proposed regulation is laid before the House of Commons under section 18, a motion signed by no fewer than thirty members of the House to the effect that the proposed regulation should be reviewed by a committee of the House and should be the subject of a report by the committee to the House, is made in the House, the Speaker shall within five sitting days after the filing of the motion, without further debate or amendment, put every question necessary for disposition of the motion."

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier) moved:

Motion No. 88.

That Bill C-55 be amended in Schedule II by adding immediately after line 30 at page 159 the following:

"17. Organizations representing parties interested in or likely to be affected by a regulation under section 16 must be consulted in the formulation or amendment of such regulation."

He said: Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. I do not want to take too much time of the House.

The purpose of this amendment is to allow for pension advisory committees to have representation from organizations representing spouses or former spouses of pension plan members.

It is a proposal that is fair, that would not cost any money. It would give us a chance to hear from those who sometimes are affected by these dispositions of the law and who clearly have a financial interest in the formulation of regulations that apply to these laws.

This amendment is strictly an attempt to ensure that these groups be heard, that they be consulted, and it is an amendment that wants to open up the process to those people involved and it simply asks that they be allowed to be heard at these advisory boards.

It is a simple amendment. It is a just amendment.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak briefly on Motions Nos. 85 and 86.

The bill as presently drafted would allow the government to settle by regulation a number of important issues related to the division of pension benefits as a result of a marriage breakdown.

The amendments we are offering would only require the minister to consult before drafting the regulations and it would give the House of Commons an opportunity to review the draft regulations before they are promulgated.

In other words, we want Parliament to be consulted in the process, thereby giving the government further input that we as MPs would get from constituents. It seems to me to be a very reasonable thing to ask. It in no way contests the government's ability to make the regulations, but it does provide a useful device to ensure proper consultation with members of Parliament and with the representatives of the people of Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question is on Motion No. 85. This vote applies to Motion No. 86. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

AUTOMOTIVE POLLUTION REDUCTION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex) moved that Bill C-226, an act to reduce automotive pollution, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Natural Resources envelope.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present Bill C-226 for debate in the House today.

This bill is called the automotive pollution reduction act. It requires that all automotive fuels in Canada contain at least 3.2 per cent oxygen and that the use of MMT be banned in Canada.

This bill sets out an implementation period of six months. Being a realist, I am prepared to accept an implementation period of two years from the date of passage. This change can be implemented in committee.

This is an important bill in this day of environmental concerns and the amount of automotive pollution taking place.

Because of incomplete gasoline combustion hydrocarbons are being released into the atmosphere. The three largest aromatic hydrocarbon components of gasoline are benzenes, toluenes and xylenes. They all have a serious health impact and have been placed on the Canadian Environmental Protection Agency's priority substance list.

• (1110)

Increasing the oxygen content requirement to 3.2 per cent will result in complete combustion of the fuel burning of these hydrocarbons. As a result, emissions are much cleaner.

Since the introduction of this bill the government has introduced its green plan initiative. I believe this bill dovetails the green plan very well and strengthens it.

Ground level ozone and greenhouse gases will be reduced. The government did take steps to reduce automotive pollutants as promised in the green plan in its 1992 budget announcement of a tax break for the ethanol portion of ethanol blended fuels. Although this is an important commitment and I applaud it, it is one that has to be strengthened.

Because of this initiative, United Co-operatives of Ontario now has ethanol for sale in 21 of its stations and gas bars in southwestern Ontario. The first was opened on May 28 in the riding of the member of Parliament for Kent.

Although the green plan has proposed tighter emission standards by 1994, the proposals in this bill before us today will have a more immediate effect by changing the formulation of fuels which will reduce the emissions without substantial redesign of pollution control devices.

By banning MMT it will keep present control devices operating effectively. For example, studies show that compared to regular unleaded MMT-free gasoline, a 10 per cent ethanol blended gasoline reduces automotive emissions as follows: carbon dioxide by 5.9 per cent; carbon monoxide by 25 per cent; volatile organic compounds by 8.5 per cent; nitrous oxide by 5.7 per cent; and urban ozone by 5.3 per cent. This is particularly significant if one considers that a 1984 Environment Canada study found that adding the allowable amount of MMT to gasoline increased hydrocarbon emissions by 27 per cent.

The Canadian Renewable Fuels Association predicts in its brief to the House of Commons committee on global warming that the use of a 10 per cent ethanol blended gasoline would mean a direct reduction of 10 per cent in toxic carbon dioxide emitted into the atmosphere once the photosynthesis process and benefit of by-products are taken into account.

Denver, Colorado reported an 8 per cent reduction in carbon monoxide levels after just two months of use of ethanol blended fuels.

In the course of our research, we found that Canada allowed the use of this gasoline additive that has been banned in the United States since 1978. The gasoline additive I am referring to is MMT.

In the most recent waiver application to have MMT reinstated into the automotive fuels in the United States, the amount requested was only half the amount allowed in Canada. The request was for 31 milligrams of manganese per U.S. gallon compared with 66 milligrams of manganese per U.S. gallon allowed in Canada. Why is it applying for a waiver using only half the amount currently being used in Canada?

This gasoline additive, methylcyclopentadienyl manganese tricarbonyl or MMT, was first banned in 1977 in California. One of the U.S. leaders in air pollution control, the California Air Resources Board, in response to the concern expressed by that state's department of health regarding the potential health hazard of the manganese additive officially requested that MMT be phased out of all gasoline sold in California, effectively banning its sale. In 1978, it was banned throughout the United States in unleaded gasoline by the Environmental Protection Agency of the United States government.

This discovery led to a whole series of revelations.

First of all, I discovered that Canada does not conduct emission testing with gasoline containing MMT as the Canadian testing standards cite the American code which prohibits the use of MMT in unleaded gasoline. Therefore, Canadian emission testing of new automobiles is conducted with MMT-free gasoline imported from the United States. Consequently, Canadian automobile emission testing is a fraud.

I also discovered that in June 1990 while I was drafting my legislation the Environmental Protection Agency was conducting hearings into a waiver application submitted by Ethyl Corporation to reallow MMT in unleaded gasoline in the United States, again proposing to use half the amount currently being used in Canada.

Ellen Silbergeld of the University of Maryland, formerly with the Environmental Defense Fund served on the EPA peer review panel on the EPA's most recent health assessment document on manganese. In her testimony in Washington, D.C. on June 22, 1990 she stated:

> Manganese, like lead, is a cumulative toxin in that both its absorption and retention as well as its toxicity increase with time. At present there are insufficient data on the low level chronic sequelae of manganese exposure, similar to the case that was made for lead in 1925.

That was 67 years ago and here we are going through the process again.

Dr. John Donaldson is one of Canada's top neurotoxologists. He along with other recognized experts in the field, such as Dr. Frank Labella and Dr. Andre Barbeau, have conducted research on this issue. Dr. Donaldson was one of the scientists selected by the National Research Council of Canada to participate in the mid-eighties study entitled "Manganese and the Canadian Environment". Dr. Donaldson told the EPA in Washington on June 22, 1990:

> —one of the major theories in leading edge neuroscience which relate to the environmental issues of today is that there are agents, neurotoxins—insidious neurotoxins like manganese which are age accelerating neurotoxins.

Most vulnerable to the MMT's toxic hit are unborn children, infants, and young children whose defence systems against the retention of manganese have not yet been fully developed.

Manganese in its normal form is not that dangerous; we have it in our food, in our bodies, and we have it in the earth. But in the form of MMT which comes out of the exhaust systems of cars is the area where we are most concerned.

To quote Dr. Donaldson:

> What we are talking about here is that manganese is insidious, a stealth toxin, hitting early and perhaps often and then revealing the damage as we get older.

Dr. Donaldson's contention is supported by other scientists including Aljandro Daniels of the large pharmaceutical company Burroughs Wellcome. "I totally agree with Donaldson," he is quoted as saying on the basis of his own animal research.

The U.S. Congressional Energy and Commerce Committee, Subcommittee on Health and the Environment in a letter to the United States Environmental Protection Agency dated June 29, 1990 and signed by the chairman and three other members of the committee warned:

> As a nation, we cannot afford to subject ourselves again to the tragic results of using a neurotoxic heavy metal in gasoline. Nor is the use of such a dangerous compound necessary, given the wide availability of octane enhancers that are a derivative from farm products, such as ETBE and ethanol, and are not hazardous air pollutants.

If anyone wishes to examine the credibility of corporate arguments and their environmental and public health record, North America's experience with lead and gasoline is the place to start.

To quote toxicologist Ellen Silbergeld again, she says:

> MMT is exactly like lead. All you have to do is substitute the word "lead" and you will have what they said (back in 1925).

Again in the 1990s, the company that manufactures MMT in the United States for export to Canada argues the amount of manganese in gasoline is insignificant in health terms but very important to the U.S. economy. I should point out there is no MMT manufactured in Canada.

It should be noted this corporation has attempted four times to have the additive reallowed in United States fuel. The most recent attempt was denied by the EPA in January 1992.

EPA noted in its denial of waiver that five car manufacturers, Ford, General Motors, Toyota, Chrysler, and Nissan, as well as the Association of International Motor Vehicle Manufacturers, the Motor Vehicle Manufacturers Association, and Manufacturers of Emission Controls Association all recommended the denial of requests and expressed two major concerns with regard to the addition of MMT with unleaded gasolines.

Thus the intent of Bill C-226, an act to reduce automotive pollution is to ban MMT and to require that all gasoline sold in Canada contains 3.2 per cent oxygen.

Studies show a net energy benefit in the production of ethanol, taking into consideration such agriculture inputs as machinery fuel, fertilizer and ethanol production costs, such as processing heat and electricity.

If existing waste heat from another industry could be utilized such as from Ontario Hydro's Douglas Point reactor on Lake Huron, then the net energy balance would be even better. Such utilization, plus modern technology would result in a balance of approximately four times the energy inputs required.

But the process squeezes more than ethanol from the feedstock. When ethanol is made from grain, the by-product is a high protein stillage, a mash that includes original vitamins and minerals which can be used as an animal feed or as an additive for low nutrition human food.

• (1120)

This by-product can be dried and used as a flour for cookies, biscuits, bread or muffins. It is extremely low in calories and high in protein and fibre content. It will be of particular value for Third World countries and for starving children of which there are millions in Third World countries today. It has great potential as a low calorie health food right here in Canada.

In August 1991 Mohawk Fuels and Sask Pools opened an ethanol plant at Lanigan, Saskatchewan, with an adjacent feedlot to utilize the stillage for beef cattle production. It is projected that this will allow them to produce ethanol for as little as 27 cents a litre.

The financially fragile farm sector will benefit by producing grain for ethanol fuel.

Rural small town Canada too will gain financially from increased employment in the fuel ethanol plants which would have to be built and operated. In turn, the depopulation of Canada's rural areas would be reduced. In addition a new market would be created that would consume about one-fifth of Canada's grain production.

I hope that members on all sides of the House will support this bill. It will benefit our environment, this planet, our economy, and the health of the Canadian people, particularly our children.

Mr. Speaker, because of the number of members who wish to speak on this bill I request at this time that the House give consideration to allowing the members to split their 10-minute time slots into five-minute speeches. Would that be acceptable to the House?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Hon. members have heard the terms of the motion. Is there unanimous consent to have five-minute speeches?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to participate in this debate on Bill C-226, an act to reduce automotive pollution. I would like to indicate that I have a variety of concerns about the bill.

MMT, the manganese-based gasoline additive, was first introduced in Canada in 1977. It was introduced into Canadian gasoline in 1978 and has been in continuous use since that time.

MMT is manufactured by the Ethyl Corporation of Canada which also distributes and sells the product to refineries in Canada. Ethyl has 170 employees located in my riding of Sarnia—Lambton.

I rise today to present Ethyl's concerns and interests. There are always two sides to a story. I would like to focus my remarks on three areas: concerns about MMT and health; MMT and the United States situation where the company made an application; and ethanol and MMT.

My friend and colleague from Lambton—Middlesex has raised concerns about the issue of MMT and health. Members of this House will be interested to know that like many natural substances, manganese can have a harmful effect if consumed or inhaled in large quantities. However, to produce adverse effects the exposure must be chronic. The level of airborne manganese also must be in excess of 1,000 micrograms per cubic meter.

All members of this House will know that many organizations have established exposure guidelines to ensure human safety, including the World Health Organization and the province of Ontario.

Ethyl's research has demonstrated that MMT use in gasoline will result in a maximum of approximately 0.02 micrograms per cubic metre, which is insignificant in terms of air quality and health concerns. This is 50 times less than the lowest standard listed by health organizations as safe. The World Health Organization lists one microgram per cubic metre as being safe. So the tests show that it is 50 times less than that.

At the same time, Ethyl Corporation has undertaken extensive research in this area to add to the scientific understanding of the way manganese affects human health. In 1985 the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency studied airborne manganese levels. The levels studied were approximately 10,000 times higher than the level that results from the use of the additive which is, as I noted earlier, 0.017 or as I used, 0.02 micrograms per cubic metre at the most.

The EPA determined that even at the level studied, which was of course 10,000 times higher showed, according to their statement as "caused or contributed to air pollution which may reasonably be anticipated to result in an increase in mortality or an increase in serious illness". Certainly they have indicated that even 10,000 times higher would not be a health concern.

Ross Associates, a group of respected toxicologists, conducted a comprehensive literature search on the health effects of manganese. Ross' literature search determined that "the anticipated increase of manganese in the environment from the use of MMT is sufficiently small in comparison to the natural levels of this element and human intake of it that the body's ability to maintain consistent manganese levels should be unaffected. Indeed, manganese is necessary for proper functioning of the human body; thus, no effect on health would be anticipated".

Let me turn to MMT and the United States situation, which my colleague brought up. Much attention has been directed to Ethyl Corporation's application to the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency for permission to use MMT in unleaded gasoline. This request was based on a comprehensive series of tests to scientifically evaluate and document the effect of MMT on automobile tailpipe emissions and air quality.

The members of this House may find it interesting that these tests show conclusively that the additive does not harm the catalyst and, in fact, significantly reduces pollutants, especially nitrogen oxide and carbon monoxide. In fact, nitrogen oxide emissions are reduced by 20 per cent and carbon monoxide emissions by 7 per cent, with no practical effect on hydrocarbon emissions. Overall tailpipe emissions are reduced by 8 per cent.

Ethyl's testing program also showed that the use of MMT in unleaded gasoline will not adversely affect the ambient air concentration of manganese.

A study done for the company by Stanley Industrial Consultants Limited of Calgary went on to say, in summary: "This study examined changes in air emission patterns in the event that the use of the octane-enhancing additive MMT in Canadian gasoline is eliminated". The tests say: "The Fleet Test Program results indicate significant decreases in nitrogen oxide and carbon monoxide emissions and a slight increase in volatile organic substance emissions due to the presence of MMT".

The study also went on to say they estimate "that benzene in vehicle emissions will increase in the order of 5 to 10 per cent due to the increased aromatic content of gasolines without MMT".

The ability to use MMT in Canadian gasolines is of major importance to Canadian refiners and the driving public. If MMT is eliminated, nitrogen oxide emissions will increase. The addition of nitrogen oxide emissions will be approximately equivalent to an extra 500,000 vehicles on Canadian roadways in 1995 and 1.3 million additional vehicles in the year 2000.

Without MMT, Canadian refinery crude demands will increase by approximately 6,500 barrels per day, equivalent to $60 million a year in 1995, assuming crude is selling at $25.50 a barrel.

• (1130)

Capital needs of great consequence will be required by our refineries. It would affect the refinery in Sarnia. Esso is in a difficult productive mode at this time so it could have a serious effect. Some companies would need to spend millions of dollars of investment.

If MMT is eliminated from Canadian gasolines there will be increased emissions of nitrogen oxide, carbon monoxide, sodium dioxide and volatile organic substances, all of concern.

It is important to put on the record that Ethyl does not oppose the increased use of ethanol as a blended agent in gasoline. It clearly can reduce emissions of carbon monoxide and hydrocarbons but members will know that ethanol does not have the same attributes as MMT and is mistakenly represented as an alternative to this additive.

I appreciate the opportunity to participate in this debate today on behalf of Ethyl Canada and its workers. In the interests of the public present studies should be examined as we evaluate this bill as presented by my colleague from Sarnia—Lambton.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, before getting into the main body of my remarks, I would like to note that the speaker who just finished at one point stated that a series of effects would follow from a positive series of assumptions, one of which was a $25.50 per barrel price for Canadian crude oil.

I must say that I desperately hope God is listening today and will take that suggestion to heart and effect it because I can tell you $25.50 for a barrel of oil would be welcome news in Alberta. I suppose that is beside the point of the discussion here today.

Mrs. Sparrow: How about Canadian dollars.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): We even take Canadian dollars, $25.50.

Mrs. Sparrow: You want U.S.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Yes, that would be great. $25.50 U.S. would be wonderful, but $25.50 Canadian at this point would be really great too.

In general I must say that we in the New Democratic Party are in agreement with the notion underlying the bill, which is that of replacing hazardous additives in gasoline with less hazardous and much more environmentally friendly additives that can achieve much the same result.

Again, referring back to the member who just spoke, he enumerated a number of very nasty things that would happen were MMT to be removed from gasoline, but the majority of effects in that list are predicated on the assumption that no replacement would be placed in that gasoline that would have equivalent or similar effects.

Whereas it is true that MMT mitigates several environmentally unfriendly elements of gasoline at the moment, that mitigation can be achieved as well in most instances by other additives, including biomass derived ethanol which is what I want to concentrate on today.

I should note as well that we acknowledge the effort of the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex in encouraging the greater use of ethanol. We agree whole-heartedly that the greater use of biomass derived ethanol could expand Canada's domestic market for grains.

In fact, testimony last year before the Standing Committee on Energy, Mines and Resources indicated that a 10 per cent blend of ethanol, which is to say 10 per cent ethanol to 90 per cent gasoline, would require 3.45 billion litres of ethanol annually and would consume 9 to 10 million tonnes of grain annually. Canada's annual production of principal grains now totals between 50 and 60 million tonnes. Therefore, ethanol production, were it to reach the 10 per cent blend level in all gasoline sold in Canada, would require the equivalent of slightly less than 20 per cent of the entire Canadian annual grain harvest at present. That would be a real boon for grain producers.

I would also note that we agree with the hon. member's contention that ethanol use should be stimulated because this would be good for the environment. That is clearly the case. It is the case not just because of its additive qualities but because biomass generated ethanol is derived using carbon that is already in our biosphere and to the degree it is used it backs out carbon that is dredged up from the lithosphere and added as new carbon to the biosphere. Therefore, for every litre of ethanol you use in preference to a litre of gasoline, you have stopped the introduction of that new equivalent amount of carbon into our biosphere. That is the principal environmentally sound attribute of ethanol in our contention and one that ought always to be borne in mind when we consider the question of ethanol use.

Unfortunately, if passed in its current form, this bill would only achieve part of what it sets out to accomplish. The bill would succeed in banning methylcyclopentadienyl manganese tricarbonyl, or MMT, a manganese-containing compound for which there are legitimate health concerns despite the submission of the previous speaker, but it would not ban other hazardous compounds like the aromatics toluene, benzene and the family of xylenes. These are very worrisome elements in current gasoline and are left unaddressed by the bill. However, again, it would ban the methylcyclopentadienyl manganese tricarbonyl.

The bill's biggest failing, however, is that it would not succeed in encouraging the greater use of ethanol derived from agricultural products and byproducts or from wood waste. By stipulating that no gasoline sold in Canada, and I quote from the bill "has an oxygen content of less than 3.2 per cent by weight", the bill would allow the use, not just of ethanol, but as well of MTBE or methyl tertiary butyl ether and ETBE, ethyl tertiary butyl ether.

MTBE is a petroleum-based product. It does not stimulate domestic markets for grain. It does not result in reduced CO2 emissions. But, because it is produced by the oil industry and because it is easily shipped through pipelines, MTBE is the additive of choice for that industry which is why, for example, a large new methyl tertiary butyl ether plant was recently built in Edmonton. The bill would essentially result in the replacement of MMT with MTBE, not with ethanol.

As for the use of ETBE, the bill does not stipulate that ETBE, although derived from ethanol, be derived from ethanol produced from grain or wood. The same with ethanol itself. Therefore, the same problem could arise in that you would be using lithospheric carbons to generate this new additive rather than using the biospheric carbons we have available.

However, the bill in its principle is a commendable one. Its elements can be individually addressed and repaired in committee. Therefore, the New Democrat caucus will be supporting this bill at second reading and attempting to get it into committee where what we submit are salutary changes could be made.

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to rise today and speak in full and complete support of the private member's bill by my colleague, the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex. It is not very often that a private bill of such merit and importance gets called for debate in the House. This bill is well-researched, well-intentioned and totally worthy of support. However, I would expect nothing less from the member whose riding borders mine in southwestern Ontario.

This bill would require all gasoline sold in Canada to have a minimum oxygen content of 3.2 per cent. That is consistent with the original draft of the U.S. Clean Air Act of 1988.

Hundreds of my own constituents have signed petitions calling on the government for more action on ethanol with a legislated blend. Indeed, this comes on the heels of a meeting in my riding on March 23, attended by over 350 people. It was sponsored by the Kent Federation of Agriculture and the Chatham and District Chamber of Commerce and chaired by Stephen McGrail, president of the Kent Corn Producers Association.

We all met to determine the possibilities of locating an ethanol industry in Kent county. It makes both economic and environmental sense, since my riding is the number one corn producer in all of Canada. It is the fuel of the future while creating other markets for our grains and helping the local economy.

Environmentally friendly green gas was pumped for the first time in Ontario last month in Chatham in my riding of Kent.

• (1140)

Frank Anthony, president of the Ontario Corn Producers Association, said that the move to ethanol at UCO's 21 Ontario stations will generate about $57 million dollars from 22.5 million bushels of corn in the province.

My riding alone has over 5,000 corn producers. Industry predictions indicate that 20 per cent of the Ontario corn production, some 200 million bushels, will go into the making of ethanol.

In 1990, Ontario drivers used over 12 billion litres of gasoline not including gasoline for aviation, marine, farming, construction, transportation or other off-road transportation. That accounts for over one-third of the 31.8 billion litres of gas used across the country. With that ethanol represents a lucrative market. While it cannot be used alone in conventional engines, when one part of ethanol is mixed with nine parts of gasoline, it becomes a viable alternative.

In the United States, 375 million bushels of corn annually are distilled into fuel ethanol. That could grow to one billion bushels within the next seven years. The market is there so we now have to meet the demand.

Due to the clean burning and renewable nature, ethanol fuel blends were recently awarded the eco logo by Environment Canada. This is the first time any transportation fuel was ever granted the logo.

This private members' bill is important both to help the environment and our agricultural economy. Plagued with drought, low commodity prices and rising costs, farmers have taken a battering in recent years. The situation has become so bad that there have been predictions that the family farm will disappear within the next generation.

The Chatham ethanol consortium is showing the type of forward thinking attitude needed as it conducts a feasibility study on whether or not a plant can be located in the city.

My colleagues will speak more about the dangers of MMT. My friend from Lambton—Middlesex has spoken out often and strongly for the banning of this deadly additive.

It is useful to point out that the Leader of the Opposition is the first federal party leader to support the use of ethanol and abandon the use of MMT in Canada.

We have consistently shown leadership on this issue by developing the policies for the future. Indeed, I was a member of the Standing Committee on Environment when in 1990 we released a report calling on the government to introduce a major research development and demonstration program to reduce greenhouse gases. This has already been done for ethanol. It is something positive that we can do right here in our own backyard to reduce global warming and thinning of the ozone layer.

I congratulate the member for Lambton—Middlesex for his fortitude and determination in sticking with this proposal, for developing this important private members' bill and for his leadership on this issue.

This bill is worthy of support by members on all sides of this House. Environment and agriculture need this type of initiative and Canadians are demanding concrete action. I am proud to support this bill and the efforts of my colleague from Lambton—Middlesex.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have five minutes to speak in support of this bill, Bill C-226, a private members' bill proposed by my colleague from Lambton—Middlesex. There are so many winners in this particular bill that I just cannot imagine why the entire House would not get behind it.

I will not go into all of the benefits that would accrue to the agricultural industry in this country. I will not go into all of the benefits in terms of new job creation that would result because of the fact that it is a new industry that would result with a commitment to this fuel. I would like to focus on the reduction of CO2s.

You have to understand that in a city like Toronto we probably have 50 to 60 per cent of the entire CO2 emissions of this entire country. If you fly into Toronto on a day like today, you can see the smog hovering over the city. If you ever have an opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to visit Toronto you will just be amazed at the Don Valley Parkway, the 401 highway, east and west, the Trans-Canada Highway and our Gardiner Expressway to the south. For at least five hours of every day these major thoroughfares are like parking lots. The health hazard that exists because of the emissions that are coming from the automobiles right now in the city of Toronto are unquestionably a danger to the health of that community.

In fact, in 1986 when there were air quality monitoring stations in Toronto, during an eight-hour maximum period that they were monitoring the air quality, at that time just at Yonge Street in downtown Toronto there were over 10 different times that the levels had exceeded the recommended amount by over seven times. This was in 1986. The situation is worse right now.

A member of Parliament has put forward a private members' bill which is going to reduce this toxic emission, and that is what it is. Doctors from all over the world are saying that this MMT is showing health effects that are certainly hazardous. I listened to the member for Sarnia-Lambton who had a different point of view. I cannot imagine all of these doctors from all around the world putting forward their position unless there was some scientific and substantive basis to their concern. I do not really see how we cannot get behind this bill.

From a member representing an urban area of close to 2.5 million people where we are just a step away form wearing masks in that city, those of us who are responsible for urban areas plead with this House for support. Anything that would reduce the toxic emissions into our community is something that we hope all members from all regions of this House would get behind.

For this particular fuel there is scientific information that shows that this ethanol fuel reduces these toxic emissions by close to 60 per cent and so we are pleading for support of this bill.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to rise and speak to this motion which was brought forward by the hon. member opposite. The issue under discussion here today is whether we might by requiring some change in the way gasoline is produced in Canada create some benefits for the citizens of Canada in the form of a cleaner or a healthier environment.

The changes proposed in Bill C-226 would require the elimination of the anti-knock additive MMT and the addition of a fuel oxygenate, likely ethanol.

The United States has recently completed a thorough review of the potential for various changes to gasoline quality to address a variety of environmental concerns in several parts of that country. This process included extensive consultation with concerned parties, environmental groups, health authorities, vehicle manufacturers, fuel producers. The outcome, the Clean Air Act amendments of 1990, represents the consensus of all these parties about which gasoline specifications will improve the local air quality.

• (1150)

However, since different parts of the United States have different environmental problems, it is not surprising there are several so-called reformulated gasolines with the properties of an individual fuel being set to address most effectively the environmental concerns of the specific region where it will be sold.

Under the Clean Air Act amendments of 1990, gasoline sold in winter months in the 44 cities which exceed carbon monoxide standards must contain at least 2 per cent oxygen, rising to 2.7 per cent in 1992.

In addition, reformulated gasoline must be used in the 10 areas most severely exceeding the desired ozone levels beginning in 1995. This gasoline must have a 2 per cent oxygen content year round. Ethanol and MTBE, an ether produced from methanol and butane, can both be used to meet this requirement. The demand for ethanol and MTBE are therefore expected to increase in the U.S.

The Clean Air Act regulations also provided for a waiver to allow fuel blends containing 10 per cent ethanol to exceed the standard for Reid vapour pressure by one pound per square inch. This higher vapour pressure however increases the fuel's tendency to emit hydrocarbon vapours and so the state of New Jersey, which is very concerned about local smog problems caused by high ozone levels, is currently refusing to allow alcohol fuel blends to exceed the normal vapour pressure. The Environmental Protection Agency's proposed regulations on reformulated gasoline released on April 16, 1992 do not provide a waiver for RVP.

That may have a number of effects such as giving preference to MTBE and affecting planned ethanol production expansion. Already the largest producer in the U.S., Archer, Daniels and Midland has cancelled a planned ethanol production expansion. It may require that petroleum producers provide a special tailored, in other words a lower RVP base gasoline for blending with ethanol. Various options to reach a compromise on standards for oxygenates in gasoline are yet being discussed in the U.S.

Canada too has its gasoline reformulation agenda. Government officials are reviewing the extensive information coming out of the U.S. process to determine how it applies to Canada's situation. They are beginning to consult with the many parties who will be affected by any decision to change gasoline specifications. They are beginning a dialogue with vehicle and fuel manufacturers in Canada to discover what changes are possible in Canada, what their effect on air quality might be, and what will be the likely cost to Canadians. Provincial governments, which largely have jurisdiction over fuel specifications, will have to be actively involved in this process.

Four years ago the concerted efforts of the government resulted in the most powerful piece of environmental legislation in the history of this country. Proclaimed as an act of Parliament on June 30, 1988, the Canadian Environmental Protection Act gave the government the legislative power to address the kind of issues raised in Bill C-226 in a rigorous and comprehensive way.

Sections 46 and 47 of the CEPA provided a comprehensive regulatory framework to prohibit the production or importation for the use or sale of any fuel that contains an element, component or additive in a concentration or quantity that exceeds the concentration or quantity prescribed with respect to that element, component or additive in relation to the fuel when in the opinion of the Governor in Council the combustion of the fuel would result in a significant contribution to air pollution.

This government went much further than that. In May 1989 the Ministers of the Environment and Transport announced a five-year plan to reduce emissions from internal combustion engines.

In 1990 the green plan reinforced several pollution issues such as smog, toxins and climate changes to name only a few which will result in several strategies to achieve the objective of a clean and healthy environment in a sound and prosperous economy for future generations of Canadians.

Energy, Mines and Resources; Environment Canada; Transport Canada; Industry, Science and Technology; and Health and Welfare are reviewing all aspects of gasoline formulations. They will workshop the complex subject of gasoline formulations with representatives from provincial ministries, consumer environmental groups, members of the petroleum industry, the motor vehicle industry, and consultants in the near future.

The cost of fuel quality changes to improve the environment will likely be high. A forecast of the capital expenditures required for refining and marketing by the industry to the year 2000 has been estimated at between $12 billion to $31 billion depending on what changes will be required. This estimate includes ongoing capital expenditures, low sulphur diesel, reformulated gasoline, stationary source emission control, and other refinery modifications for environmental controls.

Members of the House should be reminded that there is already in place a comprehensive review and consultation process as well as a regulatory framework to assist the linkages between gasoline components and air pollution. These comprehensive technical and social economic reviews will provide facts to assist government in addressing the need to make changes to existing gasoline formulations to respond to environmental issues and concerns.

I doubt at this time that there has been sufficient data on the use of oxygenates in motor vehicle fuels and the effect on air quality in the Canadian urban areas.

Therefore I would make the point that I cannot support Bill C–225, given its restrictive nature and its failure to address a number of important factors which impact on the entire issue of automotive fuels and air pollution.

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of privilege to stand in the House today to give full support to this bill which I believe is a bill of common sense, a bill that is bringing the pollution question forward and giving a reasonable way to bring a solution to something which has become a major problem not only in this country but world–wide.

We all watched very much with interest at what was happening in Brazil with the environmental talks. I heard the minister for this country state: "We are entering a new era of environmental development". I believe it is the responsibility of this government to enter that era along with the minister if the minister is heading in that direction. However I do not see a move when I hear statements from the ministry or getting close to the ministry: "We do not have enough information". I believe that is wrong.

The information is there from a multitude of sources, information enough that could fill this room with environmental problems from auto emissions and other types of emissions in this world.

Before I continue though I want to offer my congratulations to my colleague, the member for Lambton—Middlesex. He has taken it upon himself to put together a tremendous background of research information and possibly that backgroung of research information should be pushed on to our government if it does not see research is there.

I really have a strong question about the availability of research. It is not because it has not been done, but if I understand that the United States has banned a product since 1977, the research must clearly show that this product is not acceptable to the majority of North Americans. Certainly the track record of the United States has not been up front and first in the race to clear up environmental problems. When it has taken the initiative to ban MMT, we must be aware that there are negatives and there is proof. We have to stop that type of emission occurring.

The product itself is causing, as my colleague earlier stated, a manganese problem which becomes accumulative and may cause a tremendous amount of neurological damage to young, old and all people alike.

It is important to understand then that there are great volumes of information which tell us that MMT is not an acceptable product to be used in our country. Canadian emission testing does not use MMT. That seems to be a fraud in itself. When we do not see the product itself being used in the testing that we are sending out results on, there must be a major reason for concern. In that case I would question the whole process of testing itself.

• (1200)

It must be remembered that our goal is a goal of a cleaner atmosphere, a goal of a better environment for people to live in. Certainly MMT is not the only product we are talking about within this bill. We are also suggesting that we raise the oxygen content of our fuels up to a percentage of 3.2 by weight. That would—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but the time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 93, the order is dropped to the bottom of the list of the order of precedence on the Order Paper.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES WATER ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–51, an act respecting water resources in the Northwest Territories, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There are nine motions in amendment to Bill C-51, an act respecting water resources in the Northwest Territories, on the Notice Paper for the report stage.

[Translation]

Motion No. 1, standing in the name of the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River, will be debated and voted on separately.

[English]

Motion No. 2, standing in the name of the hon. member for Nunatsiaq, is identical to Motion No. 1 and will not be selected.

[Translation]

Motions Nos. 3, 4, 5, 6, 7 and 9, standing in the name of the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River, will be grouped for the purposes of debate and voted on as follows: the vote on Motion No. 3 will apply to Motions Nos. 5, 6, 7 and 9; Motion No. 4 will be voted on separately.

[English]

Motion No. 8, standing in the name of the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River, appears to be amending the Northern Canada Power Commission Act which is not before the House in Bill C-51. Accordingly I must rule Motion No. 8 out of order pursuant to Beachesne's citation 698 at paragraph (8)(a).

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River) moved:

Motion No. 1.

That Bill C-51 be amended in Clause 5 by striking out line 1 and the heading preceding line 1 at page 4 and substituting the following therefor:

"Application

5. (1) In the event of any inconsistency between the provisions of this Act and the provisions of any land claim agreements affecting the Northwest Territories, concluded between aboriginal peoples of Canada and Her Majesty, the provisions of the land claim agreements prevail to the extent of the inconsistency.

(2) Nothing in this Act, the regulations or".

He said: Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure this morning to rise in the House to debate Bill C-51, an act respecting water resources in the Northwest Territories. There will be a bit of confusion today as we get into these two bills because Bill C-51 and Bill C-52 are so similar. Those who are watching us at home will have to watch very carefully because they are tied together and what we are doing is simply taking one bill and splitting it into two bills. There will be some very technical amendments, as people at home will notice, that we are talking about which in essence will make the new bill more consistent with the old bill.

I want to talk for a moment about Motion No. 1 and of course Motion No. 2 which was the identical one submitted by the hon. member for Nunatsiaq. I want to read it for the folks. It relates to the application of this particular bill to ongoing land claims in the Northwest Territories under Bill C-51 and also under Bill C-52 in Yukon.

It states:

In the event of any inconsistency between the provisions of this act and the provisions of any land claim agreements affecting the Northwest Territories, concluded between aboriginal peoples of Canada and Her Majesty, the provisions of the land claim agreements prevail to the extent of the inconsistency.

I am aware, after discussions with the government, that it will not be accepting our amendment. I tend to think this is a grave mistake for the simple reason that in committee, as we discussed this, we became aware that this legislation, Bill C-51 as well as Bill C-52, would have to be amended on a fairly regular basis because of the inconsistencies in it as it relates to the land claim settlements that are ongoing and, of course, those that have already been accepted. I use the Gwich'in land claim as an example of that.

I want to inform the House that the Northwest Territories Water Board calls the Northwest Territories water bill an interim measure because the inconsistencies in it in relation to the land claims are so glaring and so obvious.

I want to quote the minister, who is here today, as to the relation between land claims and these bills. The minister has agreed there are going to be some problems with this particular situation. He agrees the land claims will have to take precedence over the bills we are debating today.

I want to quote the minister in his press release of December 12, 1991 when he introduced the bills in this House:

> Aboriginal rights and management roles concerning water resources may be defined and set out in future comprehensive claim settlement legislation. Where there is any inconsistency between these acts and future claim settlement legislation, the latter will prevail.

That is exactly the intention of the motion before us today, to show the inconsistencies and the glaring differences between what the land claim negotiations will give aboriginal people in the Northwest Territories and the legislation itself in this particular bill and the powers under it.

What I am suggesting is not something that is earth shattering. Basically what I am asking the government to do is acknowledge the fact we will have to revisit these particular bills as land claims go through the system and are negotiated and approved in the Northwest Territories.

In Yukon that may not be as difficult because there is only one group involved in negotiations in that particular area, but if we take a look at all the different aboriginal groups in the Northwest Territories, as many as five or six different negotiations may be undertaken over a period of a few years and we will be continually revisiting this legislation.

It is imperative that governments at all levels be very straightforward and frank with those who are involved in these licensing processes in those jurisdictions, that they understand there is going to be some revisiting of these particular bills in the future. It will not have to be a process of word of mouth to particular groups be it either the mining companies or individual user groups. They will understand there are land claim negotiations going on and they, as individuals who are concerned or interested in doing business in the Northwest Territories will be apprised of all changes as they go through because we have recognized that is a necessity in the bill.

What we did ask for in committee, what we suggested to the government and to the minister through discussions with his staff and with the parliamentary secretary, is that this particular legislation should be delayed somewhat in order for the Council of Yukon Indians, who wanted to make a further presentation to the different groups in the Northwest Territories, to have more input into this particular legislation.

It seems to me that this has been going on, and the government will say so when it has an opportunity, since 1988. It needs these technical changes in order to get on with a more modern process of dealing with water and the environment in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon.

I would ask the government to consider our amendment simply because it is more straightforward. It deals with the most important aspect of the issues that are ongoing in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, and that is the land claims process that we hear so much about and so often in this place.

If we as parliamentarians can acknowledge the fact that this is an interim measure and that applicants for licences in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon are aware of it, then they will deal with their business accordingly. This is the most appropriate way to govern and to do business in this place and indeed all across Canada.

I think I have presented our concerns as a party in relation to Motions Nos. 1 and 2. We feel it would be to the government's benefit to consider looking at this in detail in order not to make it any more confusing than it already is for those who have been trying to follow these two bills in the last few years. Because of the processes that are going on in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, they can expect these bills to be revisited on a regular basis as time goes on.

I ask the government again to consider accepting this amendment as it is a very legitimate amendment considering the facts that I have outlined today.

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to be able to play a role in this important debate on Bills C-51 and C-52, when we come to those amendments momentarily.

At this point I want to respond to the amendments just put forward and explained by the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River. He would have provided in Motion No. 1 for an amendment to clause 5(1) suggesting that in the event of any inconsistency between the provisions of the proposed amendment to Bill C-51, and the provisions of any land claim agreement affecting the Northwest Territories that the provisions of the land claim agreement prevail to the extent of the inconsistency.

I certainly understand the spirit of the hon. member's proposal and that also put forward as Motion No. 2 by the member for Nunatsiaq. As the land claim agreements are being negotiated both in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, it is anticipated that certain of the existing laws of general application will be affected, as will policies and regulations flowing from that legislation at the time.

When the land claim settlement legislation and self-government legislation is presented to Parliament, if there is then any overriding or paramount effect caused by the legislation which establishes the legal basis for the land claim agreements, then the question of paramountcy will be determined at that time.

At present there are four northern land claims agreements under negotiation. All of these agreements could affect many federal statutes, not merely Bills C-51 and C-52. But the paramountcy of those agreements is not necessarily an unqualified general right; it will be determined in a way which also respects certain of the overriding laws of Canada. Therefore, when the land claim agreements are finalized, they will be implemented through settlement legislation brought before this House and debated in this Chamber.

The individual agreements will set out the matters which these settlement acts must address and the manner in which inconsistencies or conflicts with federal legislation shall be dealt with. Legal working groups within the claims negotiation process will develop the necessary consequential amendments to federal legislation.

Therefore, I would submit that the inclusion of a general amendment such as the one advocated by the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River would constitute a precedent in that it would anticipate the conclusion of negotiations, the ratification by aboriginal groups and the governments affected, of the provisions of those settlement acts. If one were to make an anticipatory amendment of this nature it invites the question: Why not amend all federal statutes that will ultimately be affected by claims negotiations?

To come to the point, the inclusion of such a provision now would pre-judge the manner of implementing future land claim agreements and the specific development of legislation which enshrines the principle of paramountcy in those jurisdictions which will be affected when that legislation is brought before the House.

So the government at this time, while understanding the spirit and the intention of the proposal made by the hon. member, is not able to support the amendment at this time.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, my constituency of Prince Albert—Churchill River has a fair amount of water that flows into the Mackenzie River system through Lake Athabasca and the Athabasca River system.

I would like to rise in support of Motion No. 1 which states that in the event of any inconsistency between the provisions of this act and the provisions of any land claim agreements affecting the Northwest Territories concluded between aboriginal peoples of Canada and Her Majesty, the provisions of the land claim agreements prevail to the extent of the inconsistency.

That is an excellent amendment to be proposing at this time. We have just heard the minister indicate his rationale for not accepting that particular provision, but I really think that he has in many ways side-stepped the question.

First of all, he says that paramountcy as envisioned here is not necessarily binding or unqualified in all areas. This contradicts a quotation of the minister, contained in a press release which he sent out on December 12 which says that "aboriginal rights and management roles concerning water resources may be defined and set out in future comprehensive claims settlement legislation". The press release continued: "Where there is any inconsistency between these acts and future land claims legislation, the latter will prevail". Those were the words of the minister at the time.

As I understand the amendment before us, it intends to include that thought, those words virtually, in the legislation before us. It seems to me when the minister issues a press release to the nation arguing that if there are any inconsistencies, that the land claim settlement will be paramount, that the latter will prevail, in his precise words, and now he argues that it is not necessarily the case, that kind of inconsistency really starts to undermine the good faith that has to underlie these negotiations.

I have some experience with these negotiations with constituents of my own. The Dene people of northern Saskatchewan, as well as those in northern Manitoba, have been very frustrated in dealing with this ministry and, with all due respect, with this minister regarding their traditional uses of the territories. There has not been, in many cases, an atmosphere of goodwill surrounding these talks.

• (1220)

For the minister to argue that while there may be inconsistencies and the negotiated land settlements may not prevail, and that is essentially what he is arguing, really serves to undermine the goodwill that needs to underlie these negotiations.

Also, the minister said this was anticipatory of what may happen and that if we were to make these kinds of amendments, then we should make amendments to all other legislation which the land claims negotiations might affect in the future.

In some ways it is a bit of a specious argument and I guess he needed to also round out his remarks. The fact is this is the legislation before us and the other bills are not before us. Therefore, it is not particularly germane to suggest that we would get into all of those at the same time. However, if we are to demonstrate our good faith in these ongoing negotiations at this critical time in history, as they do come up it is very important that they become recognized before the House.

It is important for the aboriginal people and all other people in this country to know that Parliament is taking seriously the general trend in constitutional negotiations toward self-government, the trend in the courts toward interpretation of aboriginal rights which very liberally interpret the right to traditional hunting, fishing and gathering rights and other trends in our society. It is incumbent upon Parliament not only to recognize those but, in fact, to show some leadership which we could do by accepting this particular amendment.

As well, I would like to make reference to the fact that the issue of water is a very substantial part of the negotiations which are under way with respect to claims agreements in the Yukon and Northwest Territories.

I note in testimony by the Council for Yukon Indians on April 28, 1992 before the committee studying this legislation that about 12 pages in the umbrella agreement initialled in November are devoted to water management. It is a very critical aspect of that whole agreement. In that chapter it does something very important in establishing a new use not recognized in the Yukon Waters Act, the traditional use for Yukon Indian persons for purposes of trapping, non-commercial harvesting, transportation, traditional heritage, culture and spiritual purposes. This is a traditional use that is very much a part of the negotiations that are under way. In fact, it is something that the federal government has already initialled.

My understanding is that this particular legislation before us does not even make reference to this new and very important right for native people and important use as far as regulating waters are concerned that will come into being with the finalization of these agreements.

I do not blame the people of the north, particularly the Dene and the Yukon Indians, for feeling that if we proceed with this legislation without recognition of this important new use which is a part of all the new negotiations at a time when we are negotiating self-government agreements and other agreements that will fundamentally change the jurisdictional relationship between native peoples and the Government of Canada and if we proceed without recognition in this legislation through the amendment that has been proposed, we are going to fall behind the course of history and might well be creating difficulties down the road as we proceed with these negotiations.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The motion is negatived.

An hon. member: On division.

Motion No. 1 negatived.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Motions Nos. 3, 4, 5, 6, 7 and 9 are grouped together for debate.

[English]

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River) moved:

Motion No. 3.

That Bill C-51 be amended by adding immediately after line 3 at page 30 the following new Clause:

"Transitional Provisions

45. Persons who, pursuant to the Northern Inland Waters Act, were members of the Northwest Territories Water Board immediately before the coming into force of this Act continue as such thereafter as if they had been appointed pursuant to this Act."

Motion No. 4.

That Bill C-51 be amended in Clause 45 by striking out lines 5 to 9 at page 30 and substituting the following therefor:

"day fixed pursuant to section 54 of Bill C-52 entitled an Act respecting water resources in the Yukon Territory, as introduced on December 12, 1991, for the coming into force of that Act."

Motion No. 5.

That Bill C-51 be amended by adding immediately after line 9 at page 30 the following new clause:

"46. (1) Licences relating to the Northwest Territories that were in force under the Northern Inland Waters Act immediately before the coming into force of this Act continue in force thereafter as if they had been issued in accordance with this Act.

(2) On the day on which this Act comes into force, the Board shall send a written notification to the holder of each licence referred to in subsection (1), stating whether the licence is a type A licence or a type B licence in accordance with the regulations made under paragraph 33(1)(c), and that licence shall henceforth be deemed to be of the type stated in the notification.

(3) Subsections 40(2) and (3) of this Act do not apply in respect of any condition of a licence referred to in subsection (1)

(a) until the ninetieth day after the coming into force of this Act; or

(b) if, on or before the day referred to in paragraph (a), the licensee has applied to the Board to amend the licence in relation to that condition, until the day on which that application is finally disposed of by the Board."

Motion No. 6.

That Bill C-51 be amended by adding immediately after line 9 at page 30 the following new clause:

"46. Where, immediately before the coming into force of this Act, a person was using waters or depositing waste under the authority of regulations made under paragraph 29(f) or (g) of the Northern Inland Waters Act in such a way that, after the coming into force of this Act, that use or deposit would constitute a contravention of subsection 8(1) or 9(1) of this Act if the person were not a licensee, the person may, notwithstanding those subsections, continue to use waters or deposit waste in a substantially equivalent way

(a) until the ninetieth day after the coming into force of this Act; or

(b) if, on or before the day referred to in paragraph (a), the person has applied to the Board for a licence to continue that use or deposit, until the day on which that application is finally disposed of by the Board."

Motion No. 7.

That Bill C-51 be amended by adding immediately after line 9 at page 30 the following new clause:

"46. The Board shall deal with applications referred to in paragraphs 46(3)(b) and 47 (b) in priority to all other applications received by it."

Motion No. 9.

That Bill C-51 be amended by adding immediately after line 9 at page 30 the following new clause:

"Other references to Northern Inland Waters Act

46. A reference to the Northern Inland Waters Act in any Act, regulation, document, instrument, proclamation or order in council shall be deemed, unless the context otherwise requires, to be a reference to

(a) this Act,

(b) the Yukon Waters Act,

(c) this Act and the Yukon Waters Act, or

(d) this Act or the Yukon Waters Act, whichever is appropriate."

He said: Mr. Speaker, before I start debate, it is my understanding that the government and the opposition have agreed to accept my Motion No. 8 which was ruled out of order by the Table. We have had some discussion and what I would like to do is ask for unanimous consent of the House to accept Motion No. 8 for debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Hon. members have heard the terms of the motion on Motion No. 8. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): moved:

Motion No. 8.

That Bill C-51 be amended by adding immediately after line 9 at page 30 the following new clause:

"Consequential Amendment

Northern Canada Power Commission (share issuance and sale authorization) Act

"46. (1) Section 12 of the *Northern Canada Power Commission (*share issuance and sale authorization) Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

12. The Minister may, with the approval of the Governor in Council, make an order exempting the Corporation as continued pursuant to section 10 from the requirement to pay fees for the right to use waters or deposit waste pursuant to a licence under the Northwest Territories Waters Act.

(2) An order made under section 12 of the *Northern Canada Power Commission (*share issuance and sale authorization) Act before the coming into force of this Act continues in force as if it had been made under that section as amended by this Act."

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On Motions Nos. 3, 4, 5, 6, 7 and 9, the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River, debate.

Mr. Nault: And No. 8, Mr. Speaker. I will talk about that at the same time. Let me again talk about these motions all in one lump and try and put them in a context that would be easily explainable to our folks back home and of course to the members who have not been following these bills as closely as they could.

First of all, we understand the difficulties that the Table had with Motion No. 8. We are aware that it does go somewhat outside of the legislation. What we had intended on doing with Motion No. 8 was merely to lift clause 50 which is in the Yukon Waters Act and transfer it into the Northwest Territories Waters Act. This is a clause that deals with the Northern Canada Power Commission in the Northwest Territories. What we are attempting to do in a technical sense, in the hope of reducing confusion, is take a particular clause out of the Yukon bill that deals with the Northwest Territories and deals with the Northern Canada Power Commission, which is in the Northwest Territories, and put it into the legislation that we are now talking about.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I do not like to interrupt the hon. member, but we checked on Motion No. 8 and it is possible to group that motion with the other motions. Debate is on all motions, including Motion No. 8.

• (1230)

Mr. Nault: Mr. Speaker, as I said the first time I rose, I felt that it was going to be an interesting day because of how things were structured here. Of course, we are seeing that.

I would like to take this opportunity to thank the members of the NDP and the government for giving us unanimous consent to put this motion on the floor of the House of Commons because it is a very appropriate one. It is more of a technical one. Again, it is one that we are trying to deal with to reduce the confusion that is within the original bill.

When we divide the bill into two separate bills, of course, we would like to remove clause 50 out of the Yukon Waters Act and put it in the Northwest Territories Waters Act because the Northern Canada Power Commission deals specifically with the Northwest Territories.

I will go back to all the motions to try to explain the technical aspects of these particular motions in order to put some semblance of understanding before the House.

The motions are technical amendments which respond to concerns expressed more so by the Northwest Territories Water Board than anyone. In fact, Motions Nos. 3 through 9 are all transitional amendments which have been, if I can be so bold, accepted by the government and the opposition as amendments that would be accepted because of their technical nature.

The transitional provisions which are the bridge between the current Northern Inland Waters Act and the new Yukon and Northwest Territories water bills are all contained in the Yukon bill.

It is somewhat baffling to come across references to the Northwest Territories in the Yukon Act. It is equally disconcerting to read the Northwest Territories water bill as it currently stands and see no reference whatsoever to any transitional provisions.

When the Northwest Territories Water Board appeared before the legislative committee in April, this issue was raised. I will quote from the remarks made by the chairman of the Northwest Territories Water Board on this matter: "If a licensee picked up a copy of Bill C-51, he would not know whether his licences were going to lapse when this comes into effect, or what was going to happen to him. He would not know who to phone or whether the old board was going to be in business after the new act came into place".

"We found afterwards that these transitional provisions had been put into Bill C–52 so you could either address this concern by putting the same or similar transitional provisions into Bill C–51 or alternatively, writing to every licensee and doing a public relations campaign to make sure they know where that information is available".

As you can see, there is a lot of confusion as to how things will apply once we split one bill into two. What is suggested by these technical amendments is to remove references to the Northwest Territories from the Yukon bill and to put the transitional provisions of one bill into another bill. I hope that does not confuse anyone, because it sometimes confuses me.

Clause 45 of the Yukon Waters Act, for example, says that persons who were members of the Yukon Territory Water Board or the Northwest Territories Water Board before the coming into force of this act continue as such thereafter.

Motion No. 3 creates a similar clause 45 for the Northwest Territories Waters Act. We have in this case struck out the reference to the Northwest Territories Water Board in the Yukon bill and put it as a new clause 45 in the Northwest Territories bill.

In essence, to make a long story short, these technical amendments are basically the process of removing references of one particular area in one bill that do not relate to that particular area.

Of course, Motion No. 8 on which we just got unanimous consent was somewhat different in that it dealt with the Northern Canada Power Commission as it relates to the Northwest Territories and, for the sake of removing confusion, we are hoping to take that particular clause when we get into discussion of Bill C–52 out of that particular bill completely and put it into the Northwest Territories Waters Act.

That explanation is as concise as I can give in the short time I have to explain the technical amendments. It is my understanding, and I hope it is correct, that the government accepts those amendments. It is also my understanding that the New Democratic Party accepts those amendments. Basically they are ones to clarify the two different bills as they were lumped together in one bill.

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the government is prepared to accept the amendments put forward by the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River to Bill C–51, Motions Nos. 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8 and 9.

I certainly understand the confusion as it has been described by the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River which appeared to arise from cross–references in the alternate pieces of legislation when each was to have been a self–standing bill affecting either Yukon or the Northwest Territories water act.

Bill C–51 and Bill C–52 are drafted in such a way that they both must come into force at the same time since they will replace one existing statute, the Northern Inland Waters Act. Thus the legislative drafters felt that the transitional provisions need only appear in one of the bills. Bill C–52 was chosen to repeal the existing Northern Inland Waters Act, so it also contains all the transitional provisions for both Yukon and Northwest Territories, hence the confusion.

As the member has pointed out, when the legislative committee was reviewing these bills one of the witnesses, specifically the Northwest Territories Water Board, indicated that some confusion among the affected stakeholders might arise due to the absence of these transitional provisions in Bill C–51.

I want to thank the hon. members for Nunatsiaq and Kenora—Rainy River for their co–operation in putting forth these important amendments. Their adoption will only help to improve and clarify these bills for all the affected stakeholders.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to rise and briefly indicate that on behalf of the New Democratic Party we will also be supporting the motions currently before us. I think it behoves us all to try and make sure that the legislation that we produce in this Chamber be as watertight—I guess that is the proper word—in this particular debate as possible.

Therefore it was important that some of these technical changes be made to ensure that the legislation is clear. I as well would like to thank the members who have put hard work and effort into making sure that this legislation is as complete as possible.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on Motion No. 3. I would remind hon. members that the vote on Motion No. 3 will apply to Motions Nos. 5, 6, 7, 8 and 9.

• (1240)

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 3 agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The next question is on Motion No. 4. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 4 agreed to.

[Translation]

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved that the bill as amended be concurred in at report stage, with further amendments.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Siddon moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

YUKON WATERS ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-52, an act respecting water resources in the Yukon Territory, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There are eight motions in amendment to Bill C-52, an act respecting water resources in the Yukon Territory, on the Notice Paper for the report stage.

[Translation]

Motion No. 1, standing in the name of the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River, will be debated and voted on separately.

[English]

Motion No. 2, standing in the name of the hon. member for Nunatsiaq, is identical to Motion No. 1 and will not be selected.

[Translation]

Motions Nos. 3, 4, 5, 6, 7 and 8, standing in the name of the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River, will be grouped for debate. The vote on Motion No. 3 will apply to Motions Nos. 4, 5 and 6. Motions Nos. 7 and 8 will be voted on separately.

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River) moved: Motion No. 1.

That Bill C-52 be amended in Clause 5 by striking out line 7 and the heading preceding line 7 at page 4 and substituting the following therefor:

"Application

5. (1) In the event of any inconsistency between the provisions of this Act and the provisions of any land claim agreements affecting the Yukon Territory, concluded between aboriginal peoples of Canada and Her Majesty, the provisions of the land claim agreements prevail to the extent of the inconsistency.

(2) Nothing in this Act, the regulations or".

He said: Mr. Speaker, we are now debating Bill C-52, which is the Yukon water bill. What we are trying to achieve with the amendment that I have presented and classified as Motion No. 1 is the same thing I attempted to do in debate under Bill C-51, namely, to put in the legislation a transitional clause regarding inconsistencies between the provisions of this act and the provisions of any land claims agreements affecting the Yukon Territory concluded between the aboriginal people of Canada and Her Majesty. Those land claim agreements will prevail to the extent of the inconsistencies.

I listened very intently to the minister's response and rationale to my amendment under Bill C-51. I find it somehow difficult to understand the approach by the government on this particular amendment. The necessity of being consistent in these particular pieces of legislation related to the land claims negotiations is obviously completely impossible.

Therefore, what is going to be negotiated when there is a land claim may vary depending on the particular group the government is negotiating with. The particular aboriginal group in that area may decide that there are certain provisions necessary in its land claims agreement but which are not necessary to another group. In essence, every particular land claims negotiation will be unique in certain respects.

Therefore, what we are suggesting is during the negotiations that the government will undertake with the four or five different groups during the period of the next few years, and I hope it does not take much longer than that, the government will go into these negotiations with the understanding that the land claims settlements enacted through the negotiations will take precedence over this particular piece of legislation. This is in order that the traditional users of this particular resource in a particular area will have the ability and the jurisdiction to control that piece of land and the waters that flow in and out of that land to the point of giving them the jurisdiction and the wherewithal to deal with the problems that may occur within that boundary.

If the minister suggests that is not necessary, once the land claim is settled we would have to go back to the House to amend these particular pieces of legislation every single time. It seems to me that would be a waste of the House's valuable time and a considerable expense to the Government of Canada. In essence, with a clause like we have suggested what could be done is that there could be a clause put in during the negotiations on the land claims settlement which would give precedence to the particular aboriginal group that is being negotiated with.

Therefore, the inconsistencies within the bills that are being passed, Bills C-51 and C-52, would no longer play an important role. Aboriginal people in those particular areas would feel comfortable in that these particular pieces of legislation that are being passed today would not trample over their rights in the area of inland waters.

I would have hoped that the minister would see the very common sense rationale to this particular amendment and not look at it as a precedent. We are suggesting that the land claims settlements will take precedence over these particular bills. That in itself may be classified by the government as a precedent.

I would suggest that every land claim settlement that will be done in the future would not take place unless the aboriginal people are assured that they will have some legitimate rights and control over the water resources within their own borders. Therefore, it may seem on the surface to be somewhat of a precedent but in reality the facts are that these land claims will suggest and be put in place with that understanding and belief by the aboriginal people once they are signed.

I was hoping that the minister would look at this as a friendly amendment in order to make things much clearer to the people who live in the Northwest Territories and to the people who live in Yukon. It would be a practical amendment that would put in place a regime of better understanding as to what we as members of Parliament are really trying to achieve by putting this new regime in.

We drafted an amendment on this issue for clause by clause.

• (1250)

First, we were advised before the meeting started that our amendment would be ruled out of order by the chairperson at the particular meeting when we were trying to deal with this in committee. We felt it was important to bring this to the people's attention in Canada, the Northwest Territories and in Yukon because it is going to come back to haunt us down the road. I suggest the new government that will come into this House after the next election will have to deal with this inconsistency.

In conclusion, Motion No. 1 recognizes that there are inconsistencies between the water bills and the water provisions of soon to be finalized land claims agreements. The inconsistencies have been acknowledged by our own government and the water bills will have to be amended as soon as the claims agreements are finalized.

The government acknowledges that amendments to the water bills will be necessary in order to bring them in line with the claims agreements because the minister has suggested that.

The government is also well aware that aboriginal organizations had requested a delay in the passage of these bills. They preferred to have their claims agreements finalized first so the water provisions of their agreements could be integrated into the proposed new water bills before they were brought into this House.

In this way the water bills would be completely updated. There would be no need to amend the bills subsequently to make them consistent with land claims, as is now the case. The government, however, did not want to wait for the finalization of the claims before bringing the new water management legislation forward.

Members on this side accept the need for a new water management regime in the north. We would have preferred, however, that the government acknowledge in these acts what it is prepared to acknowledge outside these acts, namely, that the bills are inconsistent with what has been negotiated in northern land claims.

Our amendment is a compromise which avoids delaying these bills until land claims are finalized. It is simple and straightforward. It informs everyone of a basic fact on which there is no disagreement. It confirms the minister's position. It clarifies what could be a very confusing situation for northern residents and industry.

Again I suggest to the minister and the government that this is a very friendly amendment. It is meant to make things a little clearer, which we were attempting to do, and it is hoped the government will reconsider because we feel it may cause a lot of confusion, especially in Bill C–51. We may be back in this place every year amending that particular act because of the land claims settlements that are going to be ongoing and approved in the near future.

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to the proposed amendment, Motion No. 1 to Bill C–52 and also the companion motion offered by the hon. member for Nunatsiaq, I would like to say to the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River that I do look upon his amendment as a friendly amendment. There is no question about that.

I understand the spirit in which he is offering this proposal. However, this amendment is premature and it is premature for the reason that, as the hon. member has stated, every land claim negotiation will be unique in certain respects.

I know he has made the case that it would save time later in not having to return to the Northwest Territories and Yukon waters acts to further amend them, but when the settlement legislation is brought before this House, after it has been ratified by a particular first nation, well after a negotiated agreement has been reached, when that settlement legislation is brought into this House the amendments he is concerned about will be but consequential amendments to other pieces of existing federal legislation.

There is no doubt the federal government is committed. I have publicly committed myself to ensuring that in the affected jurisdictions, in the areas which are the settlement areas contained within a land claims agreement, the first nation's laws or the laws of the aboriginal party will prevail according to the terms that are negotiated in each individual case.

In terms of Bill C–52 and the amendment before the House, it is premature to anticipate the nature of those negotiations and the time it might take to include them, notwithstanding the suggestion of the hon. member that we might save time in the future. It is an inappropriate principle to anticipate agreement on a particular land claim until that agreement is reached.

I restate one final time for the record that there is nothing in Bill C–51 or Bill C–52 which prejudices the future implementation of land claims agreements with any of the aboriginal parties north of the 60th parallel. When those agreements are implemented, the settlement acts which will be brought before this Parliament and debated will determine what changes might be made to laws of general application in order to accommodate the land claims agreements.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, we are engaged in a debate on Bill C-52, the Yukon waters act, and particularly Motion No. 1 which states:

> In the event of any inconsistency between the provisions of this Act and the provisions of any land claim agreements affecting the Yukon Territory, concluded between aboriginal peoples of Canada and Her Majesty, the provisions of the land claim agreements prevail to the extent of the inconsistency.

This is an excellent motion. I am a little disappointed that the minister twice within the last hour has offered arguments against its adoption. I really cannot understand the basis for his argument. I was impressed on December 12 when he issued a press release from his department saying that aboriginal rights and management roles concerning water resources may be defined and set out in future comprehensive claims settlement legislation. Then he added that where there is any inconsistency between these acts and future claims settlement, the latter will prevail.

Mr. Siddon: I said that here.

Mr. Funk: The minister adds from across the way that he has made a very strong statement to that effect again. I appreciate that he says those things but that is why I have trouble comprehending why when he is prepared to put it in a press release he is not prepared to put it in this legislation.

The minister is arguing that it anticipates land claims agreements which may be different from case to case and may be included in specific settlements legislation. That much is true. However, at the same time this amendment anticipates such differences existing between different agreements and says provision of the land claims agreements—plural—prevail to the extent of the inconsistency.

Really the wording of the motion is such that it would not make any difference which particular claim would come before us and what the provisions would be. This provision would automatically kick in and be an operative clause.

I really cannot see what the minister's argument is and I see some danger in not pursuing this particular motion and not including it in the legislation.

The legislation before us is very important. It covers probably half the land area of the country. The waters in that vast tract of land are some of the cleanest and least polluted waters in the country that we as Canadians have an absolute stake in preserving and keeping from going the way of much of the water in southern Canada.

This legislation is important to my constituency, which borders on the Northwest Territories. The northern waters systems do not necessarily reflect political boundaries. It would probably be a mistake to wait two, three, four or five years until all these settlements are negotiated. At the same time, it is important to recognize in very practical ways, as well as in symbolic ways, what is happening in these negotiations.

The Council of Yukon Indians made an excellent presentation to the committee in which it said that in the umbrella agreement which was initialled in November between the Yukon Indians and the Government of Canada there are a dozen pages devoted to water management.

It is a very important aspect of that particular umbrella agreement. What happens in there is that it establishes an entirely new use as far as legislation is concerned when it comes to water management. That is the traditional use for the purposes of trapping, non-commercial harvesting, transportation, traditional heritage, cultural and spiritual purposes. This use is guaranteed to Yukon Indian persons without a licence or a fee.

This is what is being anticipated in the land claims negotiation. The courts, in decisions like the Sparrow decision, have made very clear it is part of the fundamental fabric of the country. At the same time, we are at the constitutional table trying to convince the aboriginal peoples of this country, the Métis, the Indian and Inuit people, that we are serious in recognizing what traditionally has been the self-government role which has not been recognized in the Indian Act and other kinds of legislation. We are now saying that is an inherent right, it has always been there. We will finally get around to recognizing this in the Constitution. That is a commitment that has been made not only by the Government of Canada but I believe by at least nine out of the ten provinces and the two territories of this country.

It seems to me that if we are establishing that kind of a jurisdictional context in the country, it really calls into question how serious we are about that kind of rhetoric if we refuse to include in legislation like the Yukon waters act an operative clause that basically indicates that when we are talking about these kinds of changes we are talking in good faith.

Aboriginal people have some reason to be concerned about this. First of all, the consultation process with respect to this bill was somewhat flawed. We were assured earlier on when this legislation was introduced and scheduled for quick passage that all the interested parties had been consulted and basically went along with this legislation. When the committee checked around with those people, the interested groups in Yukon and the Northwest Territories, it turned out those people had not felt they had been consulted at all and that if they had been consulted they certainly had not been listened to.

That is a bit of a pattern, unfortunately, with some of the people who consulted on behalf of the present minister and previous ministers. Certainly in my experience with issues like post-secondary education, Oka, and most particularly with the Nunavut settlement with the Inuit people and how it affects the Dene people in Saskatchewan and Manitoba, there has been a long string of instances in which negotiations and consultations certainly have not met the expectations of the aboriginal people even though they may have exceeded the expectations of the minister.

As I mentioned, in this case we had again an instance in which people felt they had not been consulted and various groups came forward to make presentations on this legislation. That was as it should have been. There were the Council of Yukon Indians, the Northwest Territories Water Board, the Klondike Placer Miners Association, the Northwest Territories Chamber of Mines and a submission from the Dene Nation.

Central to those presentations was this whole question of what is going to happen with the land claims. On the one hand you have the aboriginal peoples saying that water use, traditional use, is part of their treaties, part of constitutional negotiations, part of the claims negotiations. It is the stated intent of the minister to include recognition of this kind of jurisdiction by aboriginal people. These people ask why this is not in the legislation.

On the other hand there are the other water users in the Northwest Territories and Yukon who need to know and have before them in legislation the fact that times are changing, that there are new actors on the scene, that there are new jurisdictional arrangements being made.

While it is important that this bill goes forward, I really do believe that it is a mistake for this bill to go forward without Motion No. 1, which would eliminate any inconsistencies between land claims and this bill. It is a real mistake to let that legislation go forward the way it is without that particular amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

An hon. member: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Motion negatived.

Motion No. 1 negatived.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River) moved:

Motion No. 3.

That Bill C-52 be amended in Clause 45 by striking out lines 33 to 39 at page 30 and substituting the following therefor:

"Yukon Territory Water Board immediately before the coming into force of this Act continue as such thereafter as if they had been appointed pursuant to this Act."

Motion No. 4.

That Bill C-52 be amended in Clause 46 by striking out lines 40 to 46 at page 30 and lines 1 to 24 at page 31 and substituting the following therefor:

"46. (1) Licences relating to the Yukon Territory that were in force under the Northern Inland Waters Act immediately before the coming into force of this Act continue in force thereafter as if they had been issued in accordance with this Act.

(2) On the day on which this Act comes into force, the Board shall send a written notification to the holder of each licence referred to in subsection (1), stating whether the licence is a type A licence or a type B licence in accordance with the regulations made under paragraph 33(1)(c) and that licence shall henceforth be deemed to be of the type stated in the notification.

(3) Subsections 40(2) and (3) of this Act do not apply in respect of any condition of a licence referred to in subsection (1)

(a) until the ninetieth day after the coming into force of this Act; or (b) if, on or before the day referred to in paragraph (a), the licensee has applied to the Board to".

Motion No. 5.

That Bill C-52 be amended in Clause 47 by striking out lines 36 to 50 at page 31 and substituting the following therefor:

"or 9(1) of this Act if the person were not a licensee, the person may, notwithstanding those subsections, continue to use waters or deposit waste in a substantially equivalent way

(a) until the ninetieth day after the coming into force of this Act; or

(b) if, on or before the day referred to in paragraph (a), the person has applied to the Board for a licence to continue that use or deposit, until the day on which that application is finally disposed of by the Board."

Motion No. 6.

That Bill C-52 be amended in Clause 48 by striking out lines 1 to 5 at page 32 and substituting the following therefor:

"48. The Board shall deal with applications referred to in paragraphs 46(3)(b) and 47(b) in priority to all other applications received by it."

Motion No. 7.

That Bill C-52 be amended by deleting Clause 50.

Motion No. 8.

That Bill C-52 be amended in Clause 54 by striking out lines 36 to 39 at page 33 and substituting the following therefor:

"tion (1) unless Bill C-51 entitled An Act respecting water resources in the Northwest Territories and introduced on December 12, 1991, has been".

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, without anticipating any words that the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River might want to bring to his amendments at this point, the government has accepted Motions Nos. 3, 4, 5, 6 and 7 with respect to transitional arrangements. Therefore, we are prepared to curtail the debate and move on if that would be the wish of the other members.

Mr. Nault: Mr. Speaker, the minister failed to mention Motion No. 8. If he accepts No. 8 then we do not have any difficulty in dispensing with rehashing old ground that we have already talked about under Bill C-51. As has been mentioned by the minister they are accepted and we would be prepared to go to third reading.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on Motion No. 3. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 3 agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The vote will apply to Motions Nos. 4, 5 and 6.

Motions Nos. 4, 5 and 6 agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The next question is on Motion No. 7. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 7 agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The next question is on Motion No. 8. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 8 agreed to.

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved that the bill, as amended, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

• (1310)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Siddon moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

Government Orders

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-49, an act to amend the Criminal Code (sexual assault), as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There are two notices of motions set down on the Notice Paper in amendment to Bill C-49, an act to amend the Criminal Code (sexual assault).

[Translation]

Motion No. 1, standing in the name of the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby, will be debated and voted on separately.

[English]

Motion No. 2 standing in the name of the hon. member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys was moved, debated and negatived in the legislative committee.

I understand that there was a tie vote in the committee on this particular amendment, with the chairman casting his vote in the negative, allowing for further consideration of this amendment at the report stage.

Therefore, in this particular case, I am selecting the motion which will be debated and voted upon separately.

MEASURE TO AMEND

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby) moved:

Motion No. 1.

That Bill C-49 be amended in Clause 1 by adding immediately after line 32 at page 2 the following:

"(4) Consent shall not be presumed on the basis of the complainant's clothing, appearance, age, ability or membership in any group, including on the basis of race, colour, religion, country or ethnic group of origin, marital status, sexual orientation, immigration status or employment, including prostitution.

She said: Mr. Speaker, this amendment seeks to name in the body of the bill the women most vulnerable to violence and the women with the least access to the justice system. The amendment states that consent on the part of the complainant cannot be presumed on the basis of membership in a disadvantaged group.

Over 60 diverse women's organizations in this country came together and agreed on a set of amendments to Bill C-49. They shared their experiences and their perspectives, and suggested amendments which would tell all women and men that sexually assaulting a woman because she is an aboriginal woman, a black woman, a prostitute, an immigrant or on any other basis would also be punished.

I introduced many of these amendments at the committee stage of this bill, and all but one was defeated by the majority on the committee. The amendments I introduced used the words that these women had worked on and struggled over, and had come to an unprecedented agreement on.

Members of Parliament are barred from proposing the same amendment twice so I have had to reword what is among the most important of the amendments and ask that members of this House reconsider it. The amendment I am proposing states that:

Consent shall not be presumed on the basis of the complainant's clothing, appearance, age, ability, or membership in any group, including on the basis of race, colour, religion, country or ethnic group of origin, marital status, sexual orientation, immigration status or employment, including prostitution.

This amendment would mean that sexist and racist myths about women would no longer be acceptable excuses to commit a sexual assault.

Women are still divided in our society into "good girls" and "bad girls", with the bad girls being less worthy of protection. Prostitutes, lesbians, black women, aboriginal women are often considered targets of violence in a society in which all women are not equal.

The Native Women's Association stated in their brief to the committee:

Aboriginal women are doubly damned by stereotypes.

> As women, we are often subject to the presumption that we lie about being assaulted, that we are emotionally unstable, that we are spiteful and seek revenge, or that we provoke the attack.
> As aboriginal women, we are also subject to the presumption that, if we had been drinking, we are drunks and would not have been assaulted if we were sober.
> There is also still the perception that aboriginal women are available to provide sexual gratification to any man who demands it. People still cannot rid themselves of the notion that there are "good girls" and "bad girls".

People who think this way perceive that aboriginal women by their nature are bad girls.

> In recent years, Inuit women have been subject to other judicial proclamations that incest is normal in Inuit societies, that a girl is ready for sex when she begins to menstruate, and that it is acceptable to have sexual relationships with young girls.

Aboriginal women experience higher rates of violence than most other women. Aboriginal women are living with the legacy of destruction and abuse in their own communities born of residential schools, powerlessness and poverty, as well as the history of abuse by a white dominated society which called them savages and treated them as such.

Aboriginal women live with Helen Betty Osborne in their hearts and other aboriginal women, raped and murdered, and on which no action was taken by society at large.

Kitty Nowdluk–Reynolds is an Inuk women who was dragged across the country, handcuffed and imprisoned for eight days. Her crime was that she was a victim of sexual assault. There were no charges against her. She was locked in a van with her rapist, not by the rapist but by police. Ms. Nowdluk–Reynolds said this would never have happened to her if she were a white woman.

We heard during the committee hearings that most police officers, Crown counsels and judges are white, middle class men, and they find it easier to protect women who look like their wives and mothers.

Jails are filled over–proportionately with aboriginal people. Many aboriginal women do not trust the justice system and do not come forward because the justice system does not work for them.

We need to overhaul the criminal justice system, educate judges, lawyers and police, get more women and minorities integrated as an essential part of this system, but right now we can start with a law that would make a racially motivated sexual assault a crime rather than an excuse to escape punishment.

The Native Women's Association says that naming aboriginal women in the bill would make it easier for aboriginal women to come forward with reports of sexual violence.

More than 40 per cent of disabled women have been sexually assaulted. We heard at committee that disabled women are targeted because they are more vulnerable and less likely to be believed by police and in the courtroom. Disabled women are often more dependent on others and have learned to keep silent in order to survive.

A study of assaulted disabled women found that charges were laid 14 per cent of the time, few cases were taken to court, and 5.8 per cent of the accused were found guilty. That means that 94 per cent of those who assault disabled women are still out there targeting perhaps other disabled women for assault.

• (1320)

The committee heard that the excuses made in the sexual assaults of disabled women included, "it is okay to rape her, she did not know what was going on anyway" and "it was okay because she could not feel anything anyway".

Bill C–49 must explicitly state that such excuses will no longer hold up in court and that consent cannot be presumed on the basis of disability.

Prostitutes have been raped and murdered and their reports of violence against them are not taken seriously. It seen they cannot be raped because they take money for sex. This should not mean that they never have the right to say no to sex or no to sex for free or that they deserve to be beaten or deserve to die. There have been 38 sex trade workers killed in the lower mainland of Vancouver. Even murders of prostitutes tend to be closed and abandoned earlier by the police. Prostitutes' rights organizations have told us that they have been put into the position of having to find the evidence and do the work.

Immigrant and refugee women are also particularly vulnerable to abuse. Women have been deported for reporting that their husbands abused them. If their husband is their sponsor and the sponsorship breaks down, the woman might find herself out of the country very quickly.

There has also been a case of a Canadian immigration official demanding sex in exchange for entry into the country. We must make it clear that this is not acceptable in our country and is punishable with strong criminal sanctions.

A recent survey of college men in Canada found that 30 per cent of men said they would rape if they thought they could get away with it, one-third of the young men who were surveyed. What we need to say clearly and strongly is that they cannot get away with it, not any more.

During the committee hearings we heard stories of racism, lack of access to the justice system and aboriginal women and women of colour less likely to be believed by the police and the court system.

I have also added clothing and appearance to this amendment because these are often used against women. Everyone, woman, man or child, has the right to security of the person. This right is not given up on the basis of a low-cut blouse, lack of underwear or any other excuse.

A judge found that a woman provoked a physical assault against her because she was wearing a T-shirt that made her husband mad. Our assault laws must be clear that clothing and appearance are not the issues in sexual assault. Violence is the issue. We are looking at whether someone committed a crime, not at the fashions that have been sported by the complainant.

The Minister of Justice has refused to support an amendment that would name doubly oppressed women in this bill because she and her department have said that all women are vulnerable to sexual violence. That is true. Every woman, young or old, can be a target of sexual violence but some women are much more vulnerable than others.

It is important that Parliament of Canada make it clear that sexist and racist myths can no longer be used as excuses to sexually assault women. I would hope that all members will take this important amendment into consideration today.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I would like to support the amendment suggested by the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby. It is an amendment which has a lot of good common sense.

We in the legislative committee on Bill C-49, as the hon. member said, heard a great deal of testimony from women's groups that wanted this sort of amendment. Frankly, the hon. member and I both presented amendments in committee to achieve this result but unfortunately they were defeated. While I do not particularly like the wording here as much as I liked the wording we presented in the legislative committee, certainly the House should support the amendment.

Frankly, there is no other way to word it because it cannot be worded in the same way and brought in at report stage and that is unfortunate. The member has done a very good job in wording this amendment. As I mentioned, I would like to support her on this.

The women's groups that came before us made a great deal of sense in their application. They said that women of colour, aboriginal women, disabled women and women who are under pressure because of immigration or employment status are not given the same consideration in our criminal justice system as are white women who are gainfully employed and do not have these pressures or these disadvantages in presenting themselves before our criminal justice system.

They say that white women are believed in front of the criminal justice system without any question by the judges and by the lawyers and by the police, much more so than women of colour, aboriginal women, sex-trade workers, disabled women and those who have some kind of employment or immigration question pending. They say there is more of a tendency to assume that they consented to the sexual assault than is the case with other women.

They say that in our system, as it is today, all women should be given the benefit of the doubt and believed that they are telling the situation as it happened. However, they say they are not receiving the benefit of the doubt which may go to other women. They say that regardless of the law stating that all women are equal in their complaints on sexual assault, they are not believed.

They are not believed by the courts and they are not believed by the police.

While it can be said that this type of an amendment is not necessary in our country because we have equality before the law, there is the de facto situation which has been pointed out to us by these women which says that they are disadvantaged before the law. They want this amendment included.

They wanted some changes to the preamble. The Minister of Justice has stated that the preamble is not going to be part of the Criminal Code. It will be a part of Bill C–49, a part of the legislation and presumably will be mentioned in the commentary of the Criminal Code but will not be a part of it. For that reason we need this clarification in the bill.

The request being made by these women is perfectly understandable and I feel that the House should support them completely and unanimously.

One of the reasons I was pleased that we were having a report stage is that I thought the minister would actually be tabling an amendment to accomplish this. From her commentary, it seemed that she felt there was a valid concern here that these women did have a very valid point that needed to be addressed and that she would be bringing forward an amendment. However, the Department of Justice has not brought forward an amendment either in legislative committee or in this report stage today. I am very disappointed in that. I was hopeful that the government would support the concern that it seems to have been stating.

However, I do feel that this amendment is very important and certainly I would support it.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, we are dealing with Bill C–49, a sexual offences bill. It has been at second reading stage, it went to committee and the committee heard many witnesses and it is now back to report stage at which we have two amendments to be made.

The history of sexual assault, and some years ago rape, is very interesting. There is absolutely no doubt that under the common law the law was very much weighted against the interests of women in this area of sexual assault and rape.

• (1330)

Parliament stepped in and in 1976 it made some amendments to limit the old common law rules. In 1983 Parliament stepped in again and refined them further. Now in 1992, as a result of the Supreme Court decision in Seaboyer, Parliament is stepping in again.

I am quite convinced, although one can never predict these things with any absolute certainty, that this bill will come as close to being charter proof as any bill can at this point because the law is really starting to reflect the changing attitudes of our society.

The women's groups did a very good job in the consultation process leading up to the bill and this bill constitutes a real step ahead.

With respect to this motion which purports to add a new subclause 4 to the bill, I submit that it would really be a fundamental flaw to put such a list in the actual body of the statute.

The committee had an extensive debate on this. The committee made changes to the preamble to point out in the preamble the prevalence of sexual assault against women and children. Parliament is declaring to the courts across the whole land the importance of judges in that context. That is about as far as Parliament can go.

We had before us in the committee a number of different words for this type of clause and every one has a problem because the minute you start to put a list, some people might be left off it. Because the wording of it is that consent shall not be presumed, they make a list and if you are somebody who is not on the list there is an implication that maybe you have consented. We could all come up with our own lists.

For example, what if a woman is a hitch–hiker? She is not on the list, therefore is it presumed that she has consented? Other things could include motorcycle riders or a woman going to a man's apartment after having two or three drinks. Is that not capable of being abused?

We have to get back to the point the minister stressed again and again which responds to the latter point my friend from Cape Breton made. This law, as framed, applies to all women, all people, in terms of sexual offences. The minute you start limiting it down you are going to get yourself in trouble. The minister persuasively argued that we should stick with a law that covers everybody and makes it crystal clear.

It is very important that we do not make laws based on decisions of individual judges or individual instances because they often reflect only a foible of one person at that time or poor administration rather than a fundamental flaw in the law. Therefore, for those reasons I am asking members of the House to defeat this motion.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to rise along with my colleague, our justice critic, in support of this amendment.

The member for New Westminster—Burnaby in her remarks brought some information forward to the House which I found particularly interesting. She said 30 per cent of men surveyed in college thought that if they could get away with rape they would commit it.

As I listened to the member going through all of her remarks, all of her insights, I could not help but think that one of the problems we have in our society is the lack of awareness when a bill like this goes through the House with all the different changes.

In my own riding there are many immigrant women who are constantly suffering from abuse. This new law that we are going to put through the House might get into one or two of the major newspapers, but for all intents and purposes most of those women will not know anything about it.

I certainly support the amendment. However, once this does become part of the legislation we must figure out a way to communicate all of these changes, and not just in a press release or by sending out copies of the bill to the various institutions involved. We are conducting a competitiveness campaign in this country and are buying ads on television and in the ethnic press, et cetera. There is enough dramatic change in terms of education in this particular bill so that we should consider how to ensure that all of those people who are directly affected—aboriginal women, immigrant women and disabled women—are aware of the changes in this law.

To return to the survey that the member quoted, if people realized that they were not going to get away with this form of abuse or rape, or the other acts of abuse related to it, then that might go a long way in diminishing the number of attempts.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I also rise to support this amendment.

In looking at the amendment one must first look at the nature of rape itself. It is not a sexual act, it is an act of power and violence. People who perpetrate sexual assaults and rape are trying to demonstrate their power over women.

This amendment is trying to deal with the fact that there are some women in our society who are doubly disadvantaged. They are powerless because they are women but they are also powerless because they belong to identified minority groups that have traditionally not had power in our society. They have been the ones who have disproportionately been abused by society and subject to sexual violence.

The other thing we must understand is that legislation, including criminal legislation, tries to do two things. It sets out the kind of behaviour that society says is not acceptable, and it also tries to change the attitudes of people toward certain kinds of behaviour. This amendment is definitely trying to change the attitudes that people have toward sexual violence to women who are in a disadvantaged position. As a result of that it would go a long way in providing protection for these women. Once we start changing attitudes then we can start changing behaviour.

I have worked in the court system and in corrections. Very clearly, women in these disadvantaged groups are the ones who are subject to the highest incidence of sexual violence, particularly aboriginal women. Women in the inner cities, particularly native women, and women on reserves have always been subject to a disproportionate amount of sexual abuse. Immigrant women feel particularly vulnerable to sexual abuse during the time they are landed immigrants because they are concerned that if they make an issue of it they will be deported or will not be allowed to proceed with their Canadian citizenship.

We should take the opportunity when we are passing legislation to ensure that we clearly set out not only standards of behaviour but the changes in attitude that we want in this society.

This amendment goes a long way toward that goal because it points out clearly that it is no longer acceptable in our society for people in disadvantaged positions to be abused.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on Motion No. 1. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: No.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion No. 1 negatived.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys) moved:

Motion No. 2

That Bill C-49 be amended in clause 2 by striking out lines 4 and 5 at page 4.

He said: Mr. Speaker, there are some areas in this bill that I would rather see changed, I do not think there is any question about that, even though I support the bill and think it is a major step forward.

However, there is one area that really must be changed. It causes me a good deal of concern. It is not a major point and can be deleted without any difficulty. It is just that the government has chosen not to.

This bill deals with two major areas. One is consent, the woman giving consent to the sexual activity or consent between two adults and what constitutes that consent. The other major area is the past sexual activity of the complainant and whether that should or should not be an issue.

It has been decided in this legislation that during the trial there will be a hearing within the trial, in other words a voir dire. It will be determined at that time whether the past sexual activity of the complainant is an issue and can aid the case of the accused, or whether it may just dredge up a lot of information that cannot help the accused but can cause severe distress and embarrassment to the complainant.

It is an important area. The government in this bill has listed the things that will be taken into consideration. It says in clause 2, which is an amendment to 276(3) of the Criminal Code, that:

(3) In determining whether evidence is admissible under subsection (2), the judge, provincial court judge or justice shall take into account—

Then it lists the things that will be taken into account.

The second item to be taken into account is society's interest in encouraging the reporting of sexual assault offences.

In my opinion this is particularly unacceptable because it interferes with due process and the right of the accused to a fair trial. I think that society's interests are of paramount importance. Please do not misunderstand me on that.

However, there are areas in which society's interests are taken into consideration. For instance, society's interests are now being taken into consideration when we debate this bill in the House of Commons, when we go through the second and third reading stages, and report stage and when we are before the legislative committee.

We are taking society's interests into account because we are trying to make this bill as good a bill as we possibly can and deal with the needs of society, particularly those people who are going to be involved: the complainant and the accused. All of society's interests must be taken into consideration, so we do that. We take society's interests into account when we consider the bill.

We also take society's interests into account when the Crown prosecutor is determining, in co-operation with the police and other parties, whether to lay charges, what charges will actually be laid and what section of the Criminal Code will be applied. We are taking society's interests into account then.

Once the determination of innocence or guilt is brought forward we take society's interests into account in the sentencing. In these three major areas we take society's interests into account. That is the way it should be.

However during the trial itself what must be of paramount importance and what we must never lose sight of at any time during the trial proceedings is the innocence or guilt of the accused. That person who is brought before our courts is entitled to a fair trial without any outside agendas being imposed on the case. That is not only the case with respect to the actual trial itself, the main trial, but it also must be the case when we are taking into consideration voir dires or other hearings that determine what is to be introduced in the main trial.

It is not that society's interests are not important, but they cannot be allowed to interfere with the determining of the innocence or guilt of the accused. That is what is going to happen if we allow society's interests to be a factor in this process.

The other thing that is perhaps even more alarming is that it will undoubtedly become a precedent. It will become a precedent when we are talking about other legislation. Once we bring the concept of society's interests into a court of law then it is going to be very difficult to withdraw it.

For that reason I ask that those lines regarding society's interests as a consideration in the hearing of the past sexual conduct of the complainant be struck out.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, as my friend opposite pointed out the committee had a debate on this motion. The vote was divided equally among the committee members. As the chairman I voted against it on the basis that it could be brought back and the member could make his case here in the House.

I would like to put the arguments against accepting this motion. It seeks to delete one of the factors that a judge must consider in determining whether evidence of the complainant's sexual history is admissible in accordance with the test for admissibility set out in the bill.

It is important to make a distinction between the factors to be considered and the actual test that is set out in the bill. The test follows those principles enunciated in R. v. Seaboyer and Gayme.

Evidence of a complainant's sexual activity is not admissible unless it is evidence of specific instances of sexual activity, it is relevant to an issue to be proved at trial and it has significant probative value that is not substantially outweighed by the danger of prejudice to the proper administration of justice.

When applying this test the judge is guided by a series of factors that have been set out in the bill. The judge must take these factors into account when determining whether the evidence has significant probative value that is not substantially outweighed by the danger of prejudice to the proper administration of justice.

In other words, the judge must weigh the probative value of the evidence against the danger of prejudice. I appreciate that these are fancy legal words but they have very real meaning in the day to day operations of the court.

• (1350)

The factors are offered to guide and to assist and to ensure that all judges in Canada are guided by the same considerations when determining the admissibility of evidence.

Bill C–49 proposes seven specific factors which the judge should consider. In addition, the judge may take into account any other factor considered relevant. No one single factor will determine admissibility. The factors are not the test.

For all of those reasons I would ask members to vote against this motion.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I too speak in opposition to this amendment. In all of the testimony that we heard at the committee from women's organizations and in the arguments I put forward on my amendment which has just been defeated in the House to include doubly disadvantaged women, one of the things that women understand very well is that we have been conditioned in our society not to bring forward charges of sexual assault. Young girls are still socialized today to keep things of this nature—perhaps being touched by a person, which is inappropriate to a little girl—secret and to be quiet about them.

Women are conditioned this way all through society. I understand my friend's concern from a legal perspective but I must speak very strongly from a personal and female perspective on the need for our society to encourage women and children to come forward, to speak clearly about these issues and to have some sense that their concerns and their personal experiences as women and children will be taken seriously by the court.

I would encourage members in the House today to vote against this amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on Motion No. 2. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion lost.

Motion No. 2 negatived.

[Translation]

Hon. Thomas Siddon (for the Minister of Justice) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Siddon (for the Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C-49 be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Debate. The hon. member for Lethbridge.

[English]

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on point of order. Given that we are only five minutes from Question Period and members of all three parties would like to speak at third reading, you might find unanimous consent to suspend the sitting and we will take it up at three o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

SITTING SUSPENDED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The sitting of the House is therefore suspended until two o'clock this afternoon.

At 1.56 p.m., the sitting of the House was suspended.

RUSSIA

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, another chapter in the struggle for democracy in the countries of the former Soviet Union unfolds this week as we prepare to welcome Russian President Boris Yeltsin to Canada.

In the interest of international peace and security, Canada has thrown its full support behind all of these countries. For example, last February Canada signed a declaration of friendship and co-operation with Russia.

Canadians are disturbed, however, by the continued presence of approximately 200,000 Russian troops in the Baltic states of Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia. This is an unwanted occupation in complete violation of international law.

Just yesterday Lithuanians voted 90 per cent in favour of an unconditional withdrawal during a national referendum in that country. All of us are aware of the difficulties associated with sending these troops back to Russia where shelter and employment opportunities are rare, but the time has come for their troops to leave.

I therefore urge the Prime Minister to raise this issue with President Boris Yeltsin and insist that further assistance to Russia be contingent upon a complete troop withdrawal from the Baltics.

ABORTION

Mr. Gus Mitges (Bruce—Grey): Mr. Speaker, in 1990, 94,180 Canadian babies were aborted. That comes to approximately 24 abortions for every 100 live births.

For those abortions done in hospitals and even in some private abortion clinics, medicare funded by tax dollars is paying for a procedure that has nothing to do with health care and everything to do with the destruction of human life.

Abortion is not therapeutic. It treats no medical, psychiatric or social problem. It cures no disease. However, we know for certain abortion eats up a hefty chunk of the health care budget.

We have a crisis in medicare with people waiting for life-saving treatment while provincial governments fund an elective procedure, abortion, at a time when genuine health services are being slashed. By paying for abortions, governments are mismanaging scarce tax moneys entrusted to their care.

In view of the increased pressure on health funding, I call upon all governments to stop public financing of abortions.

THE TORONTO STAR

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, as a former unionized employee of The Toronto Star, I regret the present situation at the Star. The management of the newspaper is refusing to negotiate with the union representing journalists and support workers. Indeed, the owners of the paper have brought in replacement workers to try to keep the paper operating despite this legal strike.

Not surprisingly, they have been met by continuing protests aimed at stopping strike-breaking. This angry confrontation shows how essential it is that the labour law reforms in Ontario be passed. These changes will prevent the hiring of strike-breakers. The result will be greater fairness and less violent confrontation in labour relations in Ontario.

Meanwhile, I urge the owners of the Star to remember Joseph Atkinson who made the Star a crusading paper for the rights of workers and to settle this dispute through fair negotiation instead of the use of force.

EARTH SUMMIT

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, the earth summit in Rio was the largest and most important global gathering in human history. There were some who cast doubt on what would be accomplished in Rio.

I believe the five principal documents that came out of the earth summit, namely, the Rio Declaration, the Statement of Forest Principles, Agenda 21, the Global Warming Convention and the Biodiversity Convention, all attest to the over-all success of the summit.

Prime Minister Brian Mulroney did all Canadians proud in not only his excellent address but especially in the way he provided a clear direction and acted as a constructive bridge on the many important issues dealt with by the world leaders in Rio. Environment minister Jean Charest is to be commended for his outstanding contribution as leader of our Canadian delegation. I believe the earth summit will go down in history as the point when all nations of the world began to focus on preserving our common home. I am glad to have been part of that process.

PRINTING INDUSTRY

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, printers across Canada are deeply concerned by the impact of this government's economic mismanagement of their industry. Canada's fourth largest manufacturing employer has lost 10,000 jobs in the past 18 months.

When the federal government recently announced its "Buy Canada" campaign, the Canadian Printing Industries Association launched its new "printed in Canada" logo as part of its contribution to this effort. The Minister for Small Businesses and Tourism personally unveiled this logo on Parliament Hill.

Last week we learned that Canada's main tourism guide, the official Traveller's Guide to Canada, paid for in part by Tourism Canada, was printed in the United States. The minister was wrong when he said in this House last Thursday that this was an American publication. It is a Canadian publication that the government had printed in the U.S.

The federal government is spending $4 million to encourage Canadians to shop at home. It is a sorry day, Mr. Speaker, when this government will not support its own "Buy Canadian" program.

ABITIBI-TÉMISCAMINGUE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, Abitibi—Témiscamingue has been left out in the cold again.

Sélection du Reader's Digest has just published a Guide de la route au Canada, in which No. 117, the Trans-Canada Highway, is shown as ending at Mont Tremblant in the Laurentians. This perpetuates a situation that is one of the grievances of the general director of the Val d'Or Tourism and Convention Office, Ms. Louise Potvin, as well as of the general public in our area. They feel that once again, their region and James Bay are being given short shrift.

A researcher with the publishing department of Sélection in Montreal added that only the more densely populated areas had been chosen. In the pages on Quebec specifically, among the peripheral regions only the northwest and north were left out. The Gaspé, Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean and the north shore were included.

I would like to invite the directors of the Reader's Digest to come and visit our vast and beautiful region.

CLEARWATER LOBSTER PLANT

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, a labour dispute in my constituency has been allowed to get out of hand due to inaction by the Nova Scotia government and over-reaction by the RCMP.

Workers at the Clearwater lobster plant in Cape Auget have been on a legal strike since May 14. Union and management had been progressing toward a new contract settlement. However, the appearance of scab workers during this strike has created strong feelings among workers and poisoned the bargaining atmosphere.

Last week's use of riot police, complete with attack dogs and billy clubs to break up a demonstration against replacement workers, provoked a violent confrontation.

The industrial inquiry agreed to Thursday by Nova Scotia Minister Leroy Legere at the insistence of MLA Richie Mann is better late than never.

Now it is time for cooler heads to prevail. Both labour and management need to suspend their mutual suspicions and focus on the issues that matter: wages, working conditions and seniority provisions that will allow the workers at Clearwater to go back to work.

Considering the millions of dollars in grants and loans which Clearwater has received from the federal government, management can afford to be generous.

ROBERT STEWART

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize the achievement of Mr. Robert Stewart, a native of Barrie, Ontario, and a son of a former member of Parliament of Simcoe South, now Simcoe Centre, Mr. Ron Stewart.

Robert Stewart is one of the four Canadians chosen by the Canadian Space Agency to attend a NASA training program in Houston to become a full astronaut and a candidate for a future shuttle mission.

I know that the members of this House join me in extending most sincere congratulations to Robert Stewart and best wishes for his future success. I know he will do Canada proud.

ATHABASCA

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, for the 3,000 people in the Athabasca region of Saskatchewan isolation carries a heavy price tag. Overcrowded housing is causing outbreaks of tuberculosis, communities lack proper sewer and water systems, food prices are sky-high, economic opportunities are limited because of the cost of shipping out local products like freshwater fish. Meanwhile, the Coast Guard reports that the construction of an all-weather road would save $1 million to $2 million now being spent annually on dredging and navigational aids for barging.

• (1410)

Studies by the Prince Albert Tribal Council indicate a road would save the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and First Nations $1.5 million on operations each year.

The cost of shipping materials for new housing, schools, and sewer and water systems, would be cut by additional millions. This is an obvious case of where we can save money and help people at the same time.

Therefore, I call on the Department of Indian Affairs, the Coast Guard, and the provincial Department of Transportation to get their act together and start work on an all–weather road into the Athabasca.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, as Canadians make their travel plans for the summer months, I hope they consider visiting the place where Canada was born, my province of Prince Edward Island.

This year marks the 125th anniversary of our Canadian nation and celebrations are happening all across the country. Special events are happening on Prince Edward Island as well, as Islanders recreate the spirit of the historic Charlottetown Conference which led to Confederation.

Visitors to the island in search of rest and relaxation will also appreciate our magnificent beaches, delicious seafood, exciting live theatre, and our famous island hospitality.

Our reputation for celebrating the many aspects of our lives and of our history continues to draw visitors to our enchanted isle. In fact, whenever you visit the island there is certain to be an unforgettable community event awaiting your arrival.

On behalf of the citizens of Malpeque, I am delighted to extend an invitation to all members of this House, their families, to all Canadians to visit Prince Edward Island, one of the world's great islands.

THE VALOUR AND THE HORROR

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, veterans in my riding of Fraser Valley East are outraged at the biased and defamatory CBC National Film Board series The Valour and the Horror.

Terence McKenna and his brother Brian decided to use public funds to develop a revisionist view of World War II. Despite technical and factual errors identified by academics and veterans, the CBC is quite happy to rerun this series.

Freedom of expression is a fine freedom. It is a freedom for which Canadian sailors, soldiers, and air personnel fought and died, but freedom without responsibility is dangerous. It creates an imbalance and is a drain on the very system which guarantees the freedoms in the first place.

I do not advocate censorship, nor do veterans. What I do advocate is that the CBC begin to act responsibly and inject some balance of measure and fairness into the programs it funds and airs.

Terence McKenna can cast aspersions as he wishes. He is entitled to his views. But when it comes to representing Canadian war efforts, a biased and a very subjective diatribe is not worthy of public funding.

This series could well be the only information that many Canadians see about Canada's war effort. It is therefore imperative that the CBC provides a balance so that the public can make up its own mind and not be contaminated by the poisoned view of revisionist journalists and pseudo–historians.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to again state my support for the Canadian panel on violence against women. This panel has heard from thousands of women across the country, women who have dared to come forward to tell their stories of physical and mental abuse endured for years.

These women come from all levels of our society but they share one thing in common, the violence that has been directed at them for years.

The final report of the panel will be a comprehensive plan to deal with violence against all women: native, minority, rural, disabled, elderly, and young.

The changes needed in our society will be great. The greatest change is to change attitudes to women themselves. It is a difficult task but this is where the co–operation of law makers and society in general is crucial. We must unify our energies around this issue to work together on a common agenda and not be affected by incongruous demands.

Let us all work toward exterminating violence against women in Canadian society and let Canada be an example for the rest of the world.

TRADE

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, the headline in The Globe and Mail of June 12 reads:

> Canada a winner in free trade. Survey shows exports to the U.S. gained with imports no threat.

This was a survey of 325 companies conducted by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association in April and May and the data compiled this month. It covered a wide range of business issues.

For the most part the results confirm claims made by the proponents, the supporters of the FTA, and it states that nearly half of the respondents said they increased capital investments in Canada since the agreement came into effect while only 9 per cent reduced investment.

It also pointed out that 56 per cent said they have not lost domestic market share to imports since 1989 and 39 per cent said exports to the United States have grown since 1989. Also, three-quarters of the companies see the U.S. as Canada's most attractive market in the future, 30 per cent citing Europe as the best market.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

THE DISABLED CONSUMER SOCIETY OF COLCHESTER

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, the disabled community in my area has worked hard to improve their quality of life and have succeeded in several areas.

The Disabled Consumer Society of Colchester has established a special bus system to provide transportation in the Truro community. They have organized an employment service to locate employment for the disabled with funding from Canada Employment and Immigration. They have also participated in drafting legislation to provide access, opportunities and awareness.

The society is now urging Parliament to pass amendments to the Human Rights Act which will include a duty to provide accommodation for people with disabilities. As well, they are seeking to provide an undue hardship clause and they want a barrier removal process to be implemented right away.

These amendments would enhance the employment opportunities for the disabled and help them participate in every aspect of Canadian society. They have proven that if given the tools with which to work they will achieve their goals. I hope that I can play a small part and be of assistance to them in their efforts.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, six Innu children died in a house fire in Davis Inlet in February of this year. They died because there was no running water to fight the fire in their community.

One hundred and fifty members of this Innu community were forced to relocate to an isolated island off Labrador by the Government of Newfoundland. The result of this forced relocation was the complete social disintegration of the community.

It is time for the premier of Newfoundland and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to stop denying responsibility for this community and to sit down and develop a plan for implementation of complete self-government and to institute a plan with sufficient resources for community and social reconstruction.

Action must take place by these two parties before any other children die in similar circumstances.

CYPRUS

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, the Turkish Cypriot leader, Mr. Denktash, has said he is not troubled by Canada's threat to pull our peacekeeping forces out of Cyprus. Of course not. Mr. Denktash is backed by 30,000 regular Turkish troops facing a much smaller Greek Cypriot national guard across the green line.

If Canada did pull out, it would hurt one side and help the other. Giving one party the upper hand will certainly not create an incentive for a peaceful, just and viable solution to the Cyprus problem. In fact, just the opposite.

Rather than removing our peacekeepers, Canada, through the Prime Minister's special relationship with President Bush, should push the United Nations during the Cyprus meetings scheduled to begin on Thursday in New York City to bridge the differences between Greek and Turkish Cypriots once and for all.

TRADE

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the government's principal justification for a free trade agreement with the United States was secure market access, but Canadian exporters, most recently steel producers, continue to face long and costly trade actions launched by the United States.

Contrary to the earlier statements of the Minister for International Trade that the U.S.–Canada Free Trade Agreement would not be re-opened, the Minister for International Trade is now suggesting that the North American free trade agreement will correct some of its flaws.

Can we assume from this that Canada will finally win true secure access to the U.S. market and real exemption from U.S. trade law?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the hon. member has acknowledged that the dispute settlement mechanism under the free trade agreement is working. He would like to see it working a little bit better, but in fact we have won ten of those panels and lost nine, which is pretty good. We have equality with the United States when we have a dispute.

If that mechanism can be improved in any way, of course the government will do so.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the minister is fond of saying that the dispute settlement mechanism somehow resolves all trade questions between Canada and the United States, but he knows, as we all know, that the process takes months or even years to bring about any resolution, if indeed there is a resolution.

The minister also knows that there will be no secure access to the United States market unless all three countries in the North American free trade agreement can agree on a definition of subsidies and on dumping. Yet all the government ever says is that somehow this issue is being addressed in the current Uruguay round of the GATT. It is NAFTA, the North American free trade agreement, which this government is on the verge of signing, not a still uncertain Uruguay round.

• (1420)

Can the minister now assure Canadians that the government will not sign the North American free trade agreement until it includes a clear definition of subsidies and a clear definition of dumping?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member complains about the amount of time that it takes to resolve a dispute under chapter 18 or chapter 19 of the free trade agreement.

In fact, the limit in one case is 180 days, the other, 315 days. He complains that it is too long, but what did we have before the free trade agreement? Nothing.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hockin: We had three or four or five years, millions of dollars of expenditures on the American terms alone in order to settle any kind of trade dispute.

Now we have a time limit. Now we have panels that are constituted with one American, one Canadian, a neutral chairman. We have equality when it comes to a dispute. This is a tremendous improvement compared with what went before.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows perfectly well that in the pork dispute, for example, it took 21 months to reach a settlement.

During that long and costly process, Canadian exports to the United States were severely disrupted. Let me put the question to him even more simply. Is there going to be in the North American free trade agreement a subsidies code and a dumping code, or will there not be? Will this government sign a NAFTA that does not include a subsidies code?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give a premature disclosure of that.

The government will announce what is in the agreement when it is signed. However, the hon. member does know that the whole subsidies discussion is part of the free trade agreement. It is the same with dumping, and it is important that progress be made.

What the hon. member must remember is that there are some American actions when it comes to dumping. There are American actions when it comes to subsidies that we do not find acceptable. We have an interest in making sure that there is progress on both those dimensions.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. Full integration of sustained development in all trade treaties is one of the major items on which a consensus was reached in Rio. For Canada, the next trade treaty on the horizon is the one now being negotiated with the United States and Mexico. In this regard, could the minister give the House the assurance that all three countries will be subject to common environmental standards integrated as part of the principal agreement, and second, that failure to apply these standards will result in trade reprisals?

[English]

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, environmental considerations with respect to NAFTA are being addressed in several different aspects simultaneously during the negotiations. They are part of the negotiations themselves.

Key participants of the environmental communities are part of the SAGITs. The Government of Canada has agreed that there would be an environmental assessment of the plan when it is completed.

Also there is an agreement that each country will continue to have its sovereignty right as you would wish, to establish and to protect its own environmental standards.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the parliamentary secretary.

How future historians will judge the conference in Rio depends on how the nations of the world act in the months to follow. The issue is, will the focus of international trade shift from raw market forces to the needs of sustainable development?

Canada's position on this is about to be put to the test in the Mexican agreement.

First, will a dispute settlement mechanism in the agreement enforce the environmental standards of the countries involved? Second, will the parliamentary secretary or the Deputy Prime Minister assure us that the onus of proof in any dispute will be such as to favour those who would protect the ecosystem? That is the lesson of Rio.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, first of all the hon. member makes reference to Rio.

I want to say that I, and I am sure the vast majority of Canadians, are exceedingly proud of the leadership that this government provided at Rio.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, there are a series of quotes that I am sure you would be interested in, but time does not permit me to read all of them today or even any at this particular point in time.

As I said just a moment ago, what is very clear is that this government is committed to sustainable development. It is evident in the green plan. It is evident in our actions in a number of instances. It is evident in the way in which the NAFTA agreement is being negotiated.

Furthermore it was very evident at Rio. That was perfectly clear in view of the response with which the Government of Canada, including the Prime Minister, was received at every available public opportunity.

TRADE

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the spokesperson on international trade.

Given the fact that in this House the only two parties that support the North American free trade agreement talks are the Liberals and the Conservatives and the fact that they are out of tune with 67 per cent of Canadians who are opposed to the talks, the government has decided to launch a program to suggest to Canadians why this is good.

I would like to ask the minister this question. Will the minister, in preparation for this discussion with the Canadian people about their views of the free trade agreement, release as requested by me on April 1 all of the sector by sector studies done, so that the people of Canada can have hard facts in front of them? Will the minister release those sector by sector studies or were they ever done before the government went into the negotiations?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the sectoral studies that have been done by the Department of Industry, Science and Technology and other parts of the government are well known to the hon. member.

Every time the Minister for International Trade or the Minister of Finance appears before a committee, they quote from the studies that the government has done. He knows that these documents exist.

He also knows that the confidential studies which have been done are not public. Generally, most of these sector studies are well known to the hon. gentleman through various briefings that he has attended and continues to attend.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I have been present at every single committee meeting when the Minister for International Trade has been there to address these questions. Never once has the minister referred to any sector by sector studies. Unless I have been struck stone deaf, we must be talking about two different meetings.

I ask the minister who is speaking on behalf of the minister, on behalf of the excuses for the government, if the government is prepared to spend millions of dollars in an advertising campaign to sell its point of view on the free trade agreement and whether those who oppose the free trade agreement will have access to taxpayers' dollars to present the other side of the argument to the Canadian people?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that he and his party have been offered confidential briefings on the NAFTA arrangements and the NAFTA negotiations. As I understand it, he can make himself available for those. I gather he does not want to make himself available for those.

His position and the position of the NDP, if it is similar to the NDP in British Columbia where the hon. member comes from, is that we should not negotiate at all for NAFTA. What should happen is that Mexico and the United States should negotiate and they should do a deal. Then at the last minute they would decide whether Canada should do a deal.

This is a ridiculous approach to tripartite negotiations. That is not our approach. Our approach is to be there from the beginning and to get the maximum benefit for Canada.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I am just a humble boy from the country.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Barrett: When I go into negotiations to buy a house or sign an agreement, I hire a lawyer. Some of the best firms in British Columbia are available to me.

I also talk to scientists and researchers before I put my name to any document. Could this government explain to Canadian people why it would call a meeting where there are no sector by sector studies, say that it is quoting from such studies that do not exist, and then go out and tell Canadian people that it is good for them without showing one shred of evidence to the people?

• (1430)

I would not sign a deal like that on a mortgage on a house. Why would the government mortgage this country without some hard evidence before it goes into these negotiations?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the humble country boy opposite would have us do the following. This is one of the problems perhaps with having that particular humble boy doing any negotiating for Canada. What he would do is have our whole negotiating position made public before he went in to negotiate. This is absolutely ridiculous.

UNITEL

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, like many other members of this House during the weekend I was stopped many times and was asked: "Is my telephone bill going to go up because of Friday's CRTC decision?"

Mr. Epp: Where? At the tennis club?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has the floor.

Mrs. Finestone: With the opening up of telephone competition in the long distance field people are worried about their local rates. The industry says it doubts that local rates can stay down and Mr. Spicer says: "Don't worry. They will be protected".

What specific assurances can the government give to local phone users that their rates will remain reasonable and that these rates will not go up? What kind of confidence can they have?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, my first inclination if somebody put that question to me would be to quote the hon. member who was on CBC a couple of days ago.

She said about the CRTC: "Really they opened the whole box of competition. I would say that with that open door I am certainly not going to tell you we should close that door. I am going to say that we are going to watch what Mr. Spicer said when he made a very important point of ensuring that we would have affordable local rates, that they are going to be maintained. That is what I would say to them".

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, that is fine. That is what I said. That is what Mr. Keith Spicer said. What does the minister say? Is the minister going to ensure that local rates will stay down for all Canadian consumers?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member will know, a key part of Bill C–62 is designed to ensure that all Canadians in all parts of Canada have affordable phone rates and the best possible service anywhere in the world.

I would think the best way to guarantee that sort of service to all Canadians would be for this House to move expeditiously on Bill C–62.

CHAMPION SPARK PLUG

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Last Friday the American owners of Champion Spark Plug in Windsor announced that they were turning it into a warehouse and transferring the production jobs there to their plant in Iowa in spite of the efficiency and co–operation of the Canadian workers.

I ask the minister: Why is it that, since the signing of this government's free trade deal with the United States, when these kinds of moves take place they are almost always at the expense of the Canadian workers?

I further ask the minister: Will he contact the American owners of Champion Spark Plug today to urge them to keep that plant open and recognize the productivity and efficiency of these Canadian workers?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is doubly out of date. First, he does not know, at least in his question, that there has been a drastic decline in the size of the North American spark plug market as a result of smaller and cleaner burning engines.

He is from an automotive town. He should know that these cleaner burning engines have been a major factor in this industry and this is what has led to a downsize in the demand for spark plugs.

Also he does not know—and the Canadian Manufacturers' Association made it clear last week in its big survey, the survey of its membership—that in fact capital investments in Canada have increased since the free trade agreement.

In fact twice as many manufacturing firms in Canada expanded their investments in Canada since the free trade agreement than decreased them; 56 per cent said they had not lost domestic market share to imports; 39 per cent said that exports have grown significantly; 42 per cent expect higher exports; and so on.

What is happening since the free trade agreement is that our manufacturing sector, contrary to everything we hear from the hon. member, is increasing and improving. The hon. member refuses to recognize this.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, plants that have closed down do not answer surveys, so what he has to say has little meaning to the workers at Champion Spark Plug and at plants like it which are losing their jobs because the jobs are going to the United States.

He has not answered my question as to why, if the market for spark plugs is declining, the jobs are not consolidated in Windsor rather than in Iowa.

Why was it that when the minister of industry was asked about this on Friday all he could say was that this was a sign of "a dynamic economy"? Canadians will shudder at the idea that for this government a dynamic economy is one that means our plants are turned into warehouses and the jobs go to the United States.

Will the minister assure us that in any North American free trade deal there will be a return to Canadian content for automobiles to help prevent further Champion Spark Plug situations? If not, how will such a deal help Canadian workers in the auto industry, in that industry as a whole?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I think it is dangerous for the hon. member to stand up and ask questions about the automotive sector in Ontario when in fact in his riding, in Windsor for example, Chrysler has just added a third van line. We have a $2 billion to $3 billion announcement by Ford in Oakville. There is tremendous expansion coming there. Ste. Thérèse in Quebec has just added 800 workers to expand its work force.

There is example after example of the fundamental truth about the North American environment for automobiles, and that is 10 years ago we had a 14 per cent share of the automotive production in North America. Today we have 24 per cent.

UNITEL

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs regarding the Unitel matter.

In the CRTC decision the minority opinion said: "The United States is an example of a country where, with long distance competition, there have been significant increases in local rates".

We were told that it costs $300 to install a phone in California. I checked today and in a rural town such as Southend in northern Saskatchewan as a result of the competition they are talking about $5,000 now. We know it went up in Japan as well and anywhere else there was deregulation.

Will the minister ask for a cabinet review of this decision? In the cabinet review will the cabinet build in guarantees that the ordinary Canadian phone user, the home phone user, will not be gouged as a result of this decision?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I can hardly believe my ears. Is the hon. member saying that Sask Tel which is owned by the NDP Government of Saskatchewan wants to charge $5,000 for telephone service to residents of that province? It is astonishing if that is so.

On the particular point raised by the hon. member with regard to the situation in the United States, all I can do is quote the chairman of the CRTC who said, directly on the point raised by the hon member: "Canadians of all social and economic circumstances want us to be vigilant in maintaining affordable local telephone service". We are committed to doing exactly that and to preventing unnecessary or excessive increases. Before anyone tries scare tactics on Canadian consumers, let me underline that today's decision was made in Canada, not the United States. It is not deregulation. No phone company is being broken up. Canadians can still buy both their local and long distance services from the same company.

Let us not use phoney arguments to scare Canadian consumers. Let us stick to the facts.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, phoney arguments. If the minister had any guts he would stand and answer my question and give the consumers a guarantee—

Some hon. members: Order, order.

Mr. Speaker: I ask the hon. member to withdraw that remark and then put his question.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry. I know the minister has lots of intestinal fortitude and I withdraw that.

I would have asked him to give a guarantee because the CRTC itself said it did not predict significant increases. It did not say there would not be increases. I ask him to consider that.

On another tack and as a supplementary question, I want to ask him this seriously. The Unitel decision will hurt one of Canada's largest companies. Indeed I think it may be the largest; Bell is the 40th largest in North America. Jean Monty, president of Bell, has said that the real competition will not come from Unitel but that it will come from the American telecommunications giants.

• (1440)

How does the minister propose that Canada compete in the North American communications trade when we are hamstringing one of the few Canadian businesses that could in fact compete with the American multinationals? What is he going to do to change that situation?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I never thought I would live to see the day in this House when the spokesperson for the NDP would call on us to protect one of the largest companies in Canada against competition. What a change in philosophy there has been there.

When the hon. member raises the issue of Saskatchewan, the best way to deal with protecting consumers in Saskatchewan is for members on all sides of this House to pass Bill C–62 to ensure that there are rate hearings for the residents of Saskatchewan on their phone service, which there are not today; to ensure that the CRTC can continue to bring down rates across the country; local rates do not go up; and that the people of Saskatchewan also have that protection.

When we talk about protecting Canadian companies against the United States, the best way to do that is to ensure that Canadian phone services are affordable and that Canadian companies are not routing through the United States to get cheaper services.

OFFICIAL DEVELOPMENT ASSISTANCE

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

In 1986 Canada announced that official development assistance would no longer be meted out as loans to developing countries. Since then Canada has provided unconditional ODA debt forgiveness to the poorest sub–Saharan and Caribbean countries.

Last week, however, the Prime Minister in Rio targeted 10 impoverished Latin American countries to receive $145 million of conditional debt relief.

Unable to service any ODA debt in any manner, what incentives will Canada provide to these countries to invest in sustainable development projects?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, this is one of the initiatives at Rio of which Canada is very proud and in which our Prime Minister played a lead role.

The forgiveness of the debt in relation to environmental projects is very specific. What it means is that it is not a blanket review of debt of these countries. It is tied to specific proposals.

The forgiveness of debt over time under the Trinidad terms has been very generous to underdeveloped countries, and indeed we have taken the lead in putting that into place as well.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister used words in Rio to promote the enhancement of our International Development Research Council's independent and internationally renowned reputation, but the government continues its plans to scrap the council's independence by incorporating it under the Financial Administration Act.

Will the government agree today to stop its meddling in the mandate of the IDRC and give up its intention of internalizing it under the Financial Administration Act?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think this is an entirely appropriate role for the IDRC which has really embraced this expanded mandate. It is an organization that we are very proud of and that will now be in a position to have even more impact on the world than it has had before.

I believe this move is a very constructive one and it will be very helpful to the countries involved.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of the Environment, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

At the earth summit in Rio, Germany, the Netherlands, Austria, Sweden, Denmark, New Zealand and Australia all pledged to reduce carbon dioxide emissions by as much as 20 per cent from 1988 levels.

If the government is really committed to sustainable development as the parliamentary secretary earlier announced, why did Canada fail to exercise leadership in this crucial area by not committing to carbon dioxide cuts beyond stabilization?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, Canada is one of a relatively few number of countries in the world that have in fact provided leadership at Rio by indicating that we would stabilize at 1990 levels by the year 2000. There are other countries we wish had chosen to adopt that same significant standard of leadership but did not. We are very proud of the fact we were there and were in the forefront.

Furthermore, we also made a commitment to quick-start the same convention. In fact, the Prime Minister was one of the first leaders to sign the convention in question. He indicated we would be ratifying it this very year.

I would also hope that those who had the opportunity to attend Rio as part of the official Canadian delegation would come back and be very supportive of that commitment which, indeed, is a significant one.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Contrary to the answer by the parliamentary secretary Canada unfortunately is not leading the pack.

Therefore, I have to repeat my question. If Canada is really committed to sustainable development, why does the government not implement the commitment made by the Prime Minister last Tuesday in this House as recorded on page 11654 of Hansard, to put reduction in gas emissions, not stabilization, firmly on his political agenda?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): First of all, the question of what happens after Rio is very significant. We on this side have understood that Rio was in a very real sense just the beginning of a very important process. The debate will probably go on for a few weeks as to who did what at Rio.

I would just like to take this opportunity to refer to the quotes of Mostafa Tolba, the executive director of the United Nations Environment Program, who said: "Canada has broken the ice by signing. We are grateful to Canada and we are grateful to the Prime Minister." That was with reference to the biodiversity convention which was one of several very important achievements at Rio.

I truly believe, as do most Canadians, we were in the forefront with respect to environmental change, with respect to the convention to which the hon. member refers, with respect to biodiversity and with respect to fisheries. We have made some progress with respect to forestry as well.

ABORIGINAL SELF-GOVERNMENT

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs. I appreciate the sort of hiatus in the discussions now. The Prime Minister is returning and I know the minister has to brief the Prime Minister. Perhaps eventually the House will find out in more detail what we have heard in the press which has led us to this present hiatus.

I would like the minister to clarify some confusion and uncertainty about one of the very important matters which seems to have been agreed upon in principle. That is the inherent right of the aboriginals to self-government and the statements of the minister and others at the conference that in effect this item can be delayed for three years and be negotiated and then perhaps referred to the courts.

How can this be a very tenable position when I am sure the minister knows, and certainly the Minister of Justice knows coming from British Columbia, on this very day in British Columbia the Court of Appeal is hearing the case of Delamuukw v. the Queen and the Attorney General of Canada on this very issue?

I would like to know how that can be rationalized. It is clear from the court case in British Columbia what the aboriginals believe self-government means is a little different from what we have seen in the press.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, obviously constitutional discussions are now underway. Once they are concluded in the next two to three weeks they cannot affect a question that is before the courts now.

What has been agreed on is there would be a recommendation to Parliament and the legislatures that we recognize the inherent right to self-government, that we recognize it is not a contingent right but that the Constitution would also reflect an agreement entered into voluntarily by all governments and by all aboriginal leaders and groups that no one would take that new non-contingent inherent right to court for at least three years. That period of time would allow for discussion and negotiation as to the interpretation of an inherent right in a particular case.

That is an admirable compromise. I congratulate the aboriginal leaders on being willing, once they have established their right, to negotiate its application during a three-year time period.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): I appreciate, in part, the minister's response.

• (1450)

Talking about compromise, how can the fact be rationalized that one party says it is going to delay the interpretation when at the very moment in British Columbia there is another three weeks of this very fundamental and important case, an appeal from Chief Justice McEachern, on this very issue?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, for one thing, I understand that the issue is different.

For another thing, I do not think anyone has suggested that the fact a matter is under discussion in constitutional deliberations should mean all actions in all courts having relation to that matter should suddenly cease.

We cannot act retroactively that way. The hon. member would be one of the most vigorous to oppose it were we to suggest that kind of retroactivity. We are dealing with matters that might arise in the future and I think we have found a way.

Frankly, it needs a little more refinement in the discussions that are going on. That will occur and we will be able to find an agreement which will be broadly acceptable.

AGRIFOOD INDUSTRY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Agriculture. Both the Quebec farmers' union, UPA and the Quebec agriculture minister, Yvon Picotte, think that the agriculture summit which ended in Trois-Rivières yesterday gave Quebec's agrifood community new confidence in the future. The UPA president took the lead on Thursday by announcing to everyone's surprise that his organization was determined to take on export markets, provided the risks were shared by the other partners, namely the distributors and other intermediaries.

Can the minister tell us today that Quebec farmers will have help from the Canadian government in making Quebec's agrifood industry more competitive internationally?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I think that these statements reported in the press last week show how sensible farmers in Quebec and Canada are. It also ties in with the review of all our agricultural policies that we began about two years ago.

I will repeat some of what the UPA president said:

> The UPA president thinks that Quebec agriculture has everything it needs to gain new export markets. "The farm community is ready for change. It is better equipped with its expertise to face international competition in the future," said Mr. Proulx.

That shows that this government's policies asking farmers in Quebec and Canada to prepare for the future in a positive and dynamic way will have good results.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Associate Minister of National Defence.

The government has tried to justify the $4.3 billion helicopter deal by saying it would be unsafe to modernize the existing Labrador and Sea King helicopter fleets.

If that is so, why did the United States navy, the Australian navy and the Japanese navy recently upgrade their Labrador fleets at one-fifth of the cost? Why has Great Britain just upgraded its Sea King helicopter fleet at a substantially lower cost?

Finally, why is the government wasting money on this $4.3 billion helicopter deal when it tells the world all it can do for the global environment is forgive $145 million of Third World debt?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to remind my colleague that there is no deal. There is no decision. Our department is looking at a variety of options by which we can ensure we will have the kind of equipment needed to go into the 21st century.

To upgrade equipment is still not the best answer. It is like having a car. You can keep on upgrading the car but eventually there comes a time when it really does not work as effectively as it should.

We could spend a few dollars perhaps to put in some new engines. That will not provide the capability really needed for the future. We could spend a few more dollars but actually, looking at the costs of doing a full upgrade, it is almost comparable to buying a new helicopter.

If I were to ask what the hon. member would rather have, would he rather have a refitted engine, a refitted car, a refitted helicopter that still would not do the job, or a brand new one that would get us ready for the 21st century?

CHILD CARE

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, the Minister Responsible for the Status of Women has shown herself to be a very strong advocate for helicopters at a cost of over $4 billion to the Canadian taxpayers.

When will the minister become just as strong an advocate for the women and children of this country? When will she honour the commitment her government has made over and over again to a national child care program for the over one million children in desperate—

Mr. Speaker: We must try to keep going.

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, this supplementary is perhaps not in order. Nevertheless, I am pleased to respond to my hon. colleague.

I can assure the hon. member of my advocacy on behalf of women in this country by ensuring that we deal with the primary issues of equality, of violence against women, of looking at ways in which to ensure that work and family responsibilities are attended to not just by government but by employers as well.

On the issue of child care, this government provides over $1 billion a year to the provinces for child care, a substantial portion to assist those families requiring those kinds of needs. We will continue to attend to the needs of children through such programs as the $2.2 billion child tax credit.

I can assure my colleague that this government looks after every sector of people in this country, including the men and women in the Armed Forces, including the children of this country.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister of fisheries.

Last week's decision at the earth summit to hold a conference on high seas fishing may help to address the problem in the long term. The real question of course is whether there is a long term and whether there will be any fish left to save a year or two from now.

What assurances does the minister have from the European Community that it will now honour the NAFO moratorium until the conference deals with the issue?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, it was very significant that at the summit meeting in Rio a week ago, for the first time as far as I know, the organized world community of 180 countries recognized that overfishing and the failure to apply principles of sustainable development in the fishery was a major world environmental problem.

The 180 nations there adopted a resolution which was an initiative of Canada together with 39 other countries. This will be a great help to us in the longer term with reference to future fish stocks.

We have to start somewhere. No one can expect that the whole world will arrive at the decisions one would like within five minutes or five months, but we are well on the way.

In the meantime, there is a short-term problem, hopefully short-term, in the northwest Atlantic with reference to the northern cod and flatfish stocks. I am sorry to have to relate to the House that there is a problem with cod fish in other areas as well, for example, off Iceland. There is a problem this year off Greenland in the Baltic with reference to cod stocks. While misery loves company, it is too bad that this is happening in other areas as well.

With respect to our own problems, we will act when we have all the information that is necessary in July. If we have to close any fisheries—

Mr. Speaker: Let us see if we can move on. The hon. member for Burin—St. George's, a supplemental.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, when the minister gets all the facts. How many more facts, how many more closed fish plants does he need for proof? He has enough facts. The problem is right on his doorstep.

The straddling stocks are as vulnerable as ever. In that respect, despite all the optimism and the rhetoric of last week, very little has changed, if anything.

I want to know how far the minister is prepared to go to protect that resource? How far is he prepared to go? Why is he ruling out taking over custodial management despite the fact that last week at Rio he was strongly urged by an expert in international law to do exactly that?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I am disappointed to see that the hon. gentleman is more negative today about the achievements we made in Rio last week than he was in Rio. I am sorry that he has had this change in attitude.

How far am I prepared to go? I am prepared to go as far as is necessary to overcome the issue of overfishing in the northwest Atlantic as well as in the rest of the world.

• (1500)

What is the best way of achieving that? The best way is by getting 180 nations on your side, not having 180 nations oppose you because you want to adopt some premature cowboy tactics and unilaterally extend management controls in an area.

MARINE ATLANTIC

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

After three years of disastrous fishing activities the incomes of Labrador fishermen have gone consistently down, yet the increase in rates of Marine Atlantic which is their supply line in the summer have gone consistently up. This year there is another 15 per cent or 20 per cent, at least, increase in rates of Marine Atlantic.

In view of the fact the government may very soon I hope announce a compensation program for the fishery on the Atlantic coast, will he now order Marine Atlantic to freeze its rates at last year's level on behalf of the fishermen on the Labrador coast?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his question. At this stage I would like to invite him to meet with the CEO and other officers of Marine Atlantic so some of the misconceptions arising out of its tabling of its recent structure can be ironed out.

In fact, the minimum charge on small shipments is going to remain at $25 a piece. If the shippers are prepared to work with Marine Atlantic, they will find they have ways to minimize the increases because what Marine Atlantic is really trying to recover here is not full recovery. It is $600,000 out of the $28 million in subsidies we have been providing it over the past few years.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, a short supplemental. I met last week with the Chamber of Commerce in Goose Bay and I have talked to small businessmen along the Labrador coast. They are not fooled by the snow job the minister has been given by Marine Atlantic. There is going to be an increase in rates, at least 15 per cent to 20 per cent.

Will he listen to the people there? Will he listen to the businessmen there and freeze Marine Atlantic rates this year at last year's level?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I hope the member opposite agrees with the mandate of Marine Atlantic to manage the taxpayers' money properly. It has put in a structure that will do that without overcharging for small shipments. Again, I invite him to meet not with the Chamber of Commerce or others, but the CEO of Marine Atlantic who have put this new rate structure in place and dispel many of the misconceptions that have arisen from that.

PETITIONS

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, I have five petitions again today dealing with the Court Challenges Program.

Canadians have made it known that they are very supportive of this program which gave access to the courts for those of us, groups and individuals, who wanted to test our constitutional right to come to court dealing with freedom of expression, the question of language rights and equality rights.

These petitioners would like to have the Court Challenges Program reinstated. It was abolished by the government some months ago. It was not a very expensive program at about 10 cents per year per Canadian. It was a very good program. In times of reviewing our constitutional arrangements, I think it would be appropriate if Canadians had access to public funds to defend themselves in front of the courts when their language rights and their equality rights are questioned.

Therefore, these people humbly ask the Parliament of Canada to reinstate the Court Challenges Program.

NATIONAL REFERENDUM

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Madam Speaker, I rise today to present a petition signed by 27 constituents of Sarnia—Lambton. The constituents call upon Parliament to enact legislation providing for (a) a referendum of the people binding upon Parliament to accept or reject constitutional amendments proposed by the government; (b) the acceptance or rejection of the proposed amendments to be determined by, one, a majority vote of the total votes cast in the whole of Canada, together with, two, a majority vote in the majority of provinces with the territories being given the status of one province.

I thank these constituents for their interest in our constitutional amendment process.

PROUD TO BE CANADIAN

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Madam Speaker, I rise today to present petitions that have been signed by many constituents of my riding of Sarnia—Lambton.

These petitions were organized and distributed by the Kinsmen and Kinettes of Sarnia. They urge all Canadians to take pride in a united, strong and independent Canada by participating in the Proud to be Canadian project. This project is an opportunity to nurture a positive life-long relationship with our heritage and our flag and to encourage stronger ties among all Canadians for the further advancement of Canada as a leader in world circles and promote our tremendous pride in being Canadians.

I thank the Kinsmen and Kinettes of Sarnia for their Proud to be Canadian project and thank the many people of Sarnia—Lambton who signed the petition.

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I have two petitions today, pursuant to Standing Order 36, calling upon the Government of Canada to reinstate the Court Challenges Program. These are residents from the province of New Brunswick who have signed the first petition.

The second petition is from residents primarily of the province of Ontario again calling upon the Government of Canada to reinstate the Court Challenges Program which they believe to be a very important program for Canadians to have at their disposal.

I would hope that the government would see the wisdom of the suggestion and would rescind its earlier decision to cancel this most worthy program.

NATIONAL REFERENDUM

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Madam Speaker, I wish at this time to present a petition which was started by my friend Bob Newell in Waterdown. It has about 50 signatures.

• (1510)

It is virtually the same language as the petition of my hon. friend from Sarnia—Lambton.

It is asking for a referendum of the people, binding upon Parliament, to accept or to reject constitutional amendments proposed by the government to be determined by a majority vote in a majority of provinces with the territories being given the status of one province.

As is duty bound, these petitioners will forever pray. I know that they are all Canadians to the core as I am and I pray too that the outcome of a referendum, if necessary, will mean the preservation of this country as we know it.

RIGHT TO LIFE

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have three different petitions to table today.

The first one is regarding the subject of individuals within the bodies of their mothers. The petitioners state that the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms applies to the Parliament and Government of Canada and that the charter in article 15(1) states:

> Every individual is equal before and under the law and has the right to equal protection and equal benefit of the law.

They call upon Parliament to call on the government to enact laws which protect individuals while they reside within the bodies of their mothers.

CANADA POST

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, the second petition is about the closing of postal station 'B' in my riding of Parkdale—High Park.

The constituents state that they have heard that postal station 'B' is going to be closed whereas they believe that as Canadians they have the right to efficient mail service and that the service rendered by postal station 'B' is very important to the local businesses, seniors and those wishing to mail parcels or use priority post.

They call upon Parliament to call upon the minister responsible for Canada Post to review the decision to close postal station 'B' and instead renew the lease and ensure the service remains at the Ritchie Street location.

RWANDA

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, the third petition is three different petitions on the same subject. To save time I will put them all together regarding the human rights violations in Rwanda.

These petitioners state that the issue in the current armed uprising in Rwanda is not an ethnic conflict as the current Rwanda regime and its backers would like the world to believe. Rather the real issue is the fact that Rwandan people are rebelling against a military dictatorship.

They humbly pray and call upon Parliament to urge the Canadian government to apply pressure on the Rwandan regime to immediately stop killing innocent Rwandans. They urge the Canadian government to support the EEC resolution on Rwanda, issued on February 20, 1992.

POVERTY

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, I have the honour of presenting to the House of Commons a petition signed by residents, many of them and most of them senior citizens from my riding.

They point out that hundreds of thousands of Canadian citizens live below the poverty line and particularly that 80 per cent of single women over the age of 65 live in poverty.

They are complaining of the 37 cents increase in April on their Old Age Security cheque. They are petitioning this government and this House to ensure pension benefits for seniors that would allow them not only to have their ends met, but to also allow them to have dignity at the same time.

We are asking this government to review this policy and to think that it was a shame to send a 37 cents increase per month per senior citizen.

TRUCKING

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present three petitions on the same subject representing about 90 people in my constituency and elsewhere.

The petitioners represent dump truckers which have little or no legal means of enforcing prevailing rates on the 'stated in contracts'.

They call upon this government to enact legislation for adoption of minimum rates schedules for dump trucks on federal projects at rates not less than the minimum truck haul rate and conditions set by each province with a federal project that is to be undertaken.

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, it is my privilege to present a petition concerning the Court Challenges Program.

This program has helped many individuals and minority groups to clarify their constitutional language and equality rights before the courts.

The elimination of this program represents an incalculable loss for social justice and equality in this country.

Parliament should consider the option of reinstating the Court Challenges Program, which gives all Canadians equal access to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

NATIONAL REFERENDUM

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to present to the House a further petition spearheaded and gathered by Mrs. Eileen MacDonald from my riding. It is signed by around 70 residents of North York, Don Mills, East York, Toronto and Scarborough.

It calls upon the Parliament of Canada to enact legislation providing for a referendum binding upon Parliament to accept or reject constitutional amendments proposed by the government, the acceptance or rejection of the proposed amendments to be determined by a majority vote of total votes cast in the whole of Canada, together with a majority vote in a majority of provinces with the territories being given the status of one province.

This is a further petition presented through the hard work of Mrs. MacDonald. I am sure that the Parliament of Canada and the Government of Canada will ensure that this petition is granted.

GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise to introduce a petition signed by many people in the national capital region. These people are complaining about the unfair gasoline prices in the Ottawa–Carleton region.

As you know, gasoline prices in the Toronto area are much lower than in our region. This issue has really been of concern to many residents in my area. They look at it as discrimination against the consumers in this region and are calling on the federal government to take action on this issue.

SRI LANKA

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise to present a petition signed by 100 people from Winnipeg who are very concerned about the treatment of the Tamils in north and east Sri Lanka.

Many of these people have had first-hand experience in dealing with this situation. They call upon the Government of Canada to intervene and to stop the flagrant human rights violations committed by the government of Sri Lanka and to ensure basic food, medicine and fuel supplies be permitted to reach the Tamils in the north and east of Sri Lanka.

TRUCKING INDUSTRY

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to present a petition today signed by several hundred people from the province of Prince Edward Island.

It states that all provincial ministries of transportation and departments of highways have long recognized the validity and stabilizing effect of establishing minimum rates and cites a base for their own contracts involving dump truck work.

The lack of such minimum rates in federal projects leads to ruin of such prevailing rates. It creates predatory pricing and opens the door for other abuses.

The truckers have little or no legal means of enforcing prevailing rates unless stated in the contracts.

In the interests of keeping a viable and meaningful dump truck industry, these petitioners call upon Parliament to enact legislation for the adoption of a minimum rate schedule for dump trucks on federal projects at rates not less than the minimum truck haul rates and conditions set for each province where a federal project is to be undertaken.

LIGHTHOUSES

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition concerning the proposed closure of light stations on the Pacific coast.

The petitioners request that the Government of Canada having decided not to close these lighthouses implement the terms of The Future Role of Light Stations report and that it return the roughly $1 million a year of federal funding removed from these light stations and the person years that were removed in anticipation of closures.

According to the petitioners, this would restore the safety and viability of light stations as a major component of the safety net on the coast of British Columbia.

• (1520)

RWANDA

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I would like to present a petition which relates to the Canadian government applying pressure on the regime in Rwanda to immediately stop killing innocent Rwandans.

The petitioners urge the Canadian government to stop economic aid and other forms of assistance to the current Rwandan regime. They urge the Canadian government to support the EEC resolution on Rwanda issued February 20, 1992.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 294 and 314.

[Text]

Question No. 294—Mr. Jordan:

For the years 1990 and 1991, have any departments, agencies or crown corporations contributed funding to the Legal Education and Action Fund and, if so, which ones and in what amounts?

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I am informed as follows:

Department of the Secretary of State:

1990 $257,498
1991 $257,198

*Multiculturalism and Citizenship Canada:

1990/91 $4,000
1991/92 $20,000

*Amounts available by fiscal year only.

Question No. 314—Mrs. Mitchell:

What is the total cost of television ads produced for Multiculturalism and Citizenship Canada dealing with Canadian citizenship, entitled "Citizenship, Take it to Heart" and what was the date and value of this contract, and to whom was it awarded?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): The advertisement was produced by the firms Gingko of Toronto and Everest of Montreal for $408,000. The placement cost for the ad was $2,476,504. The television ad started April 12 and was aired until May 3, 1992.

The total cost of the "Citizenship, Take It to Heart" advertisement was $2,884,504.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, if Question No. 218 could be made an Order for Return, the return would be tabled immediately.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that Question No. 218 be deemed to have been made an Order for Return?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Text]

Question No. 218—Mr. Fulton:

Since 1984, has the government established paid informant programs and, if so, (a) for which departments, agencies (b) at what cost (c) what are the names and positions of responsible officials (d) for what purpose are the informants used (e) what types of benefits do the informants receive?

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. Edwards: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre) that Bill C–49, an act to amend the Criminal Code (sexual assault), be read the third time and passed.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I introduced amendments to the Criminal Code regarding sexual assault on December 12, 1991.

The driving force behind the Bill C–49 amendments was the need to restore protection for victims of sexual assault in the wake of the Seaboyer decision which struck down former section 276 of the Criminal Code, commonly referred to as the rape shield provision.

Bill C–49 received second reading on April 8, 1992 and was referred to a legislative committee for detailed review.

[Translation]

I was struck by the favourable reception given by members to Bill C–49. The same attitude and co–operation were evident during discussions before the legislative committee.

I have said many times, in response to questions about the wording of certain provisions of this bill, that the legislative committee was the appropriate venue for fine tuning the text to reflect accurately the general principles and substance of the bill. I am very grateful to the committee for the attention and care it gave to analysing the text of the bill, and I am also very grateful to the many witnesses who came to offer their comments and advice and tell us about their concerns.

The legislative committee heard a large number of witnesses, including representatives of the Canadian Bar Association, the Criminal Lawyers Association, the Canadian Civil Liberties Association, the Women's Legal Education and Action Fund, the Disabled Women's Network, the National Organization of Immigrant and Visible Minority Women of Canada, the Native Women's Association of Canada and the Canadian Association of Sexual Assault Centres. The committee also received briefs prepared by interest groups, individuals and academics.

Despite the extremely diverse interests represented by this broad range of witnesses, the principle of the bill was very well received by all. Comments and concerns tended to concentrate on a few similar aspects of the bill and the amendments proposed by the legislative committee are in direct response to the concerns expressed while the bill was being examined. I think these amendments have done much to improve the bill.

[English]

Before I begin to sketch out the amendments made by the legislative committee, I would like to set the record straight for those who have been following the media coverage of this issue by making some general comments about what Bill C–49 is not.

Bill C–49 does not outlaw sexual activity after a few glasses of wine. It does not require that written consent forms be signed before sexual activity, or that a third party be present as an observer to ensure that consent was given. It does not prohibit sexual activity between an employer and an employee, nor does it permit a person to wake up in the morning and revoke the consent given to the previous evening's sexual encounter.

This may seem like a frivolous thing to say about the legislation but it has been extraordinary in my mind to see some of the commentary and caricature of the very serious intent of this legislation that, in fact, makes it necessary to make those kinds of comments about what the bill is not.

On the contrary, Bill C–49 deals with three fundamental issues regarding sexual assault. The admissibility of evidence of a sexual assault and the complainant's sexual history and the applicable procedure, the definition of consent, and the defence of honest but mistaken belief in consent. Amendments made by the legislative committee touch upon all three of the key features of Bill C–49.

With respect to the consent provisions, the committee amended three subsections which set out circumstances where no consent is obtained.

The subsection dealing with incapacity and intoxication was revised to delete the phrase "by reason of intoxication or other condition". The paragraph now reads: "No consent is obtained where the complainant is incapable of consenting". The revision puts the emphasis where it belongs, on incapacity rather than on the reason for the incapacity. It states the obvious. A person does not consent where they are incapable of consenting.

Section 273.1(2)(c) was revised to avoid the possible interpretation that an abuse of a position of trust or authority would exist where two people involved in such a relationship engaged in sexual activity, that is, to avoid the criticism this provision prohibited sex between an employer and employee or professor and student.

The key issue here is the abuse of the position. The revised wording will provide that no consent is obtained where the accused induces the complainant to engage in the activity by abusing a position of trust, power or authority.

The revision adds the requirement that the accused induce the complainant to engage in the activity and maintains the requirement of abuse of the position. The word "power" has been added to cover relationships not captured by the phrase "trust or authority".

Section 273.1(2)(e) was revised to avoid the criticism that consent could be revoked after the fact. For example, the next morning a person could claim that they no longer consented to the previous evening's sexual encounter. Although the law would never have permitted such a retrospective revocation, in the interests of clarity the provision has been amended. The revised wording will provide that no consent is obtained where the complainant, having consented to engage in sexual activity expresses by words or conduct a lack of agreement to continue to engage in the activity. That lack of consent of course only applies to the continuation of the activity for which there is no consent.

With respect to the defence of honest but mistaken belief in consent, the Canadian Bar Association, the Criminal Lawyers Association and the Civil Liberties Association argue that the requirement that the accused take all reasonable steps in the circumstances known to the accused at the time to ascertain consent in order to assert the defence imposed a standard which would be impossible for the accused to meet. However, the central idea that an accused should have done something to ascertain consent in order to argue that he honestly believed the complainant had consented was not disputed.

The committee, therefore, amended the provision to delete the word "all". The revised provision will state: "It is not a defence that the accused believed that the complainant consented or the accused did not take reasonable steps in the circumstances known to the accused at the time to ascertain that the complainant was consenting".

I believe this sets a standard which protects the complainant, the standard that was suggested by the Canadian Bar Association, "or any steps", we all agreed was too low. At the same time, it also respects the fundamental principle of criminal justice and that is the need to have a guilty mind or mens rea in order to establish criminal culpability.

I would also like to point out that this defence arises only after the Crown has proved that the complainant did not, in fact, consent to the sexual activity.

[Translation]

The legislative committee has amended the provisions relating to the prohibition of the publication of the judge's decision and reasons.

These amendments came in response to concerns expressed by the Canadian Civil Liberties Association, the B.C. Civil Liberties Association and the Canadian Association of Journalists, as ardent defenders of freedom of the press. They also respond to questions raised by various women's groups which maintain that the complainant's right of privacy should be protected, but the public should know how the law is applied.

According to the amendments made by the legislative committee, where the evidence is judged to be admissible, the judge's determination and reasons may be published. Where the evidence is judged to be inadmissible, the judge's determination and reasons may be published if the judge so orders, after taking into account the complainant's right of privacy and the interests of justice. The judge who initially decides that a hearing should be held to determine whether the evidence is admissible may, after taking into account the complainant's right of privacy and the interests of justice, order publication of the decision.

• (1530)

[English]

In addition to the amendments made to the clauses of the bill which I have highlighted, the legislative committee carefully considered the contents of the preamble. I attach a great deal of importance to the preamble since it states our collective intentions as members of Parliament and as legislators in reforming our sexual assault laws.

The legislative committee has amended the preamble to refer specifically to the prevalence of sexual assault against women and children. In addition, the order of the paragraphs has been changed to put greater emphasis on the protection of charter rights, which will now be in paragraph 3. Some minor changes in the wording have also been made.

[Translation]

We now have before us a considerably improved and readily comprehensible bill that aims to identify and codify the rules of law for determining the admissibility of evidence relating to the complainant's sexual history, a bill that fills in the gaps in the former rape shield provisions which caused them to be struck down.

Procedural safeguards for victims of sexual assault have been reinstated. The complainant is no longer obliged to testify at the preliminary hearing to determine the admissibility of evidence relating to the complainant's sexual history; the hearing will be held in camera. Publication of the judge's determination and reasons may be prohibited in certain circumstances. The current provisions of the Criminal Code will prohibit publication of information revealing the identity of the complainant.

These amendments are based on present day reality and on the principles set forth by the Supreme Court of Canada. They take into account the fundamental principles of trial procedure and admissibility of evidence.

[English]

I would like again to thank all members of the House, particularly the members of the legislative committee, for their comments and careful consideration. The provisions of Bill C–49 will ensure the much needed improvements to benefit sexual assault victims while respecting the rights of accused persons to defend themselves against allegations of sexual assaults.

I would also like to emphasize that during the period of time since this bill was tabled in the House, particularly over the period of time when my colleagues on the legislative committee were hearing witnesses and discussing the bill and generating public debate, I have had an inordinate number of comments made by members of the public across this country with respect to this legislation. I have been very gratified to see that irrespective of gender and irrespective of region, Canadians feel very comforted by this piece of legislation. I have had men thank me for this piece of legislation and for the law relating to sexual assault, and women who feel very strongly gratified and validated that the reality of life as they live it in Canada and their concerns have been reflected in this legislation.

I want to conclude by again thanking my colleagues in the House, the critics and the member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys over there who has played such a fundamental role along with his colleagues. Our colleagues in the New Democratic Party I believe at the moment are involved in a very important press conference on another issue relating to women. They have been very, very helpful as well. I want to thank them again for their care and consideration in dealing with what was in many ways a contentious and sensitive issue. They did it in a way that I believe represented the finest of the parliamentary tradition. I believe that we have made an important statement. I believe that we are dealing with an important provision of law that is respectful of the fundamental traditions of criminal justice that we all uphold but, at the same time, is a law for the last decade of the 21st century and truly enfranchises all Canadians.

Therefore, I want to again say thank you and to say that it will be many years before I forget the second reading debate on this legislation and the kinds of comments made by members in this House. They represented a quantum leap in the enfranchisement of Canadian women and the ability of parliamentarians of both founding genders of this country to respect and understand the reality of all Canadians. I thank them very much for that experience.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to debate today on Bill C–49.

I want to share with the minister my feelings and my satisfaction that we have here a good piece of legislation. There are some points, some things about it, that I had hoped would have been changed and I will refer to some of those. Basically, as the minister has said, we have made a major leap forward with this legislation.

I do feel that we have to have some idea in Canada, everyone in this country has to be aware, of what we are trying to do with this legislation. There have been a lot of things said by various members of the bar, by other segments of society, which indicated to me that they really did not know the depth of the problem that exists, not only in Canada but throughout the world, and the disadvantaged position in which women find themselves in this country and throughout every country in the world.

What we have to do here is ask if we are going to accept that. Are we going to say that we want to keep legal niceties at the risk of putting women in a position in which they will constantly feel fear, will constantly question the justice system, will constantly ask members of Parliament and other members in authority in this country when they are going to realize that women do not have an equal position in this country?

We have talked about job equality. We have talked about equal pay for work of equal value. This is an area in which men in Canada do not realize that women have had a very, very detrimental position as far as their rights within the law are concerned. We have not realized that the law has actually put women in a very derogatory position as far as their rights are concerned.

What we have to look at is what we want to achieve. We want to achieve for women in this country the right to be able to bring action against sexual assault. We want every Canadian to feel that sexual assault is not something that is going to happen or that there is nothing that they can do about it. We have to erase the feeling that sexual assault is a part of growing up, that it is a part of living and there is nothing to be done, that you just have to endure it. That is not the way it has to be in Canada. That is not the way it should be in Canada.

Before 1983, a woman who brought a charge of sexual assault was questioned without, in some cases, any bounds whatsoever on her past sexual history, not only with regard to the accused, but generally speaking on all her sexual activity that the other side could conjure up. It would get to the point at which the woman was actually the accused because she was placed in such an uncomfortable position within the court structure that no woman wanted to bring an action of sexual assault.

Fortunately in 1983 there was an amendment to the Criminal Code in section 276 in which it was stated that you could only bring evidence of the past sexual history when: one, the Crown opened up the area by bringing in allegations or information on past sexual history; two, where it was alleged that the accused did not commit the assault; and three, where the accused was saying that it was important that this information come forward because there was other sexual activity that happened just before, just after or about the same time so that it was an integral part of his or her case.

This greatly reduced the trauma that women felt in bringing sexual assault cases before the courts. Unfortunately or fortunately, whatever way you want to look at it, we could not maintain section 276. It is also fortunate that within our system of law in Canada our courts are looking after the rights of all Canadians. They decided that section 276 could not stand a charter challenge and that it contravened section 7 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. That was in August 1991.

Then the Minister of Justice brought forward this bill, Bill C–49, last December. As the minister said, we had a very good debate on second reading and then it went to legislative committee. There were some changes made. The bill is a much better bill.

The bill we have today does three things mainly. It provides for strict guidelines in determining the admissibility of past sexual history as far as the evidence in court is concerned. It outlines clearly the procedure which must be followed in admitting such evidence.

It also defines the notion of consent to sexual activity. This idea of defining consent is a very important one and a bold move on the part of the Minister of Justice. It is a very difficult thing to do. It is very important because this is the way we can state in the legislation exactly what consent is going to be.

We will be able to say that women in this country have means by which they know what their rights are. The men will have to learn this act and realize that things such as extreme intoxication of the woman are not consent. That is very important.

That is going to mean that a lot of people who go out and party and get intoxicated are now going to realize that their actions are going to be under severe scrutiny if the complainant states that he or she did not give consent. That is a major step forward. It is important that the ramifications in this bill receive a clear screening and that we educate Canadians as to what this bill really does. It is an important bill. It is important for Canadians to realize exactly what it says.

One of the aspects which raised concern initially was that there may be no consent if the complainant is incapable of consenting by reason of intoxication or other conditions. We have since in the legislative committee taken out the words "intoxication or other conditions". That does not, however, mean that intoxication has been taken out of the bill as far as prohibiting consent is concerned.

If a person is intoxicated, severely intoxicated and really would not know what she or he is doing, consent cannot be assumed. It will have to be determined by the courts whether he or she gave consent to the sexual activity. That is very important.

In the next section the minister says that honest but mistaken belief in consent is not a defence. We mentioned the fact the accused did not take "all reasonable steps" in the circumstances known to the accused at the time to ascertain if the complainant was consenting.

You look at that and you say well that is just not reasonable. If a person is before the courts and they are accused, then evidently they did not take all reasonable steps. You cannot have it as a criteria that the accused took all reasonable steps.

Second, who is to say what all reasonable steps are. In each case a judge will determine whether there is something else the accused should have considered. If every time there is a trial, a judge or defence counsel states this is something else that could have been considered, the case would have to be thrown out, because here is a new criteria of reasonable steps that was not taken into consideration.

While there are concerns among some of the women's groups that the bill is no longer strong enough, I believe this amendment was made in the best interests of the legislation and of really protecting this legislation from a charter challenge.

There were groups which said that instead of saying all reasonable steps we should say any reasonable steps. That would go too much the other way. We would then be weakening the bill. By just saying reasonable steps, it would leave it to the court and I think that is a very fair way of doing it.

There are some things about the bill, however, I have difficulty with. One is that the question of whether the complainant's past sexual history is to come before the courts is going to be decided in what is really a voir dire. It is going to be a hearing within the main trial itself, at which time the judge will decide in closed court if the evidence is or is not suitable to the nature of the case and if it has a bearing on the accused's case.

The question is, what is going to be considered as relevant? That has to be left up to the judge and that is important. If the judge determines that the past sexual history should be allowed in and it is in the interests of the accused that this be brought forward, the judge can also then decide whether the press should be able to report on that evidence. That was another change in second reading.

My concern here is that the complainant is not compelled to testify in this hearing. It may be a problem as far as the courts are concerned as they may feel the accused is not able to get a fair hearing because the complainant does not have to testify. That is not to say that in most cases the complainant's testimony would be important. It may very well not be important in most cases but in certain cases it may be necessary.

I am also concerned because if the complainant is not being compelled in certain instances to testify, there is going to be a lot of hearsay evidence brought into the hearing.

Another thing that concerns me is that in the hearing the judge has to consider society's interests. I honestly feel in a court of law there is to be one major objective, and that is the innocence or guilt of the accused. Under no circumstances should we be trying to decide anything else.

• (1550)

When we are talking about legislation, we are talking about society's interests. Right now debating this bill, we are discussing society's interests. That is very important. We have to look at society's interests. It is a fundamental obligation of members of Parliament when we are discussing legislation. We are now looking at society's interests.

When the Crown prosecutor decides whether he or she wants to proceed and on what grounds, under what section of the Criminal Code for instance, the Crown prosecutor is looking at society's interests and taking them into consideration.

When the decision of innocence or guilt is brought forward, the judge will determine sentencing in society's interests. In the actual body of the trial or any hearing within the trial, to me it is not right to inject society's interests. That is not a fundamental factor in determining the innocence or guilt of the accused. The accused should not have to bear that hurdle. I feel that should not be in the legislation and frankly, it is harmful to the legislation.

I do feel there was one area in which we did not go far enough, not that the area is of vital importance legally because not everything that is in legislation has to have strict legal terminology and is only for legal purposes. We are saying in this bill, by the wording in the preamble, that we want to get our intentions to the judge and that we want the justice system to know about our feelings on why this bill is being presented and what we want to achieve as parliamentarians.

The government stated that very eloquently in the preamble. The language is very good and it is very clear. I think it is going to be helpful. The minister has said that the preamble is not going to be a part of the Criminal Code. That is fair enough. It will presumably be in the commentary in the Criminal Code. That is going to be helpful as well.

Women's groups that came before us said that we did not really understand the problems of disabled women, the problems of visible minorities, of sex trade workers, of those who are under pressure because their immigration hearing is pending, or because they are in a vulnerable position because of their employment. They explained to us that we do not realize that these people are not able to convince a judge or a policeman or somebody else in the criminal justice system that they did not consent more easily than a white woman would. What judges who are mainly white middle-aged men see in a white woman is their wife or their daughter or somebody like that. They do not see that when the person is from a visible minority. They do not as readily give the benefit of the doubt to somebody who was not a visible minority.

We know what the law says. The law says that everybody is treated equally before the courts, that justice applies equally to all Canadians. We know that. We have heard it, we have had it told to us, we have read it and that may be the case in most instances. That is something we want to believe. We have seen it. They have been assaulted by policemen who feel because that person is a visible minority, it will not matter if they are sexually assaulted. We have seen cases of that. We know that the law does not apply equally.

We want to overcome that. We want to redress that problem. We want to say that consent should not be implied because the person is a sex trade worker, because the person is disabled, because the person is a visible minority, because the person is under pressure of an immigration hearing or because of their employment. We want that in the bill. They may say it is not necessary but we feel it is.

After hearing these women I frankly feel it is necessary because there is obviously a problem. I think it is important not only to these women but also to people in homosexual relationships, and where we in Canada believe the rights of people have to be upheld. We also feel that if Canadians feel they are not being given equal treatment before the law then we have to bring forward a statement that would help these people see that the law is going to be equally applied to them.

This is a very important request. I know the minister thinks there should be something done in this regard. I am hoping that something will be done even though it is not in the bill.

The education of the members of the judiciary is very important. I think that should be done. I was hoping the government would bring forward an amendment at report stage that that would deal with this, but unfortunately it did not.

I leave it with the minister and I ask her to please consider this concern that many Canadians have. I ask her, in ways that she may think expedient, to address this concern.

The concern does not end there. This bill is, as I have stated, a major advance as far as women's rights in Canada are concerned. We have to do considerably more. We need new pornography laws. As a result of the Butler decision the minister has said that she hopes to bring forward new pornography laws in the fall, hopefully in September, particularly with respect to child pornography.

These are all parts of what we want to achieve. The question of urban violence is a major concern in this country.

What we have to realize is that in this country women have not had the same feeling about protecting themselves that men have seemed to feel that women should have.

They do not realize, and I have said this before, that a woman leaving a bus stop, getting off a bus after dark in any size Canadian city these days is in constant fear as she walks to her home or to her apartment. That fear does not end upon the woman going into the building. The fear can exist that someone on the elevator, or someone on the very floor on which she lives, could assault her. This fear is constant and I do not think many men in this country realize this.

Frankly I think it is this bill and legislation such as this that will help to address this question.

It is really not satisfactory when we realize that in this country one woman in four is sexually assaulted. Of those one in four that is sexually assaulted only one in 10 will actually report that sexual assault. That is largely because the woman does not think that her concerns are going to be taken seriously by the judicial system. She feels that she is just really letting herself in for a very difficult time when all of the past sexual activity is going to be brought up in open court.

We should not be convicting people who are not guilty, but we should be making sure that those who are guilty are going to be convicted. Not every time, there is no way you can assure that that is going to happen. The circumstances have to be such that the woman will come before the court to lay a charge and that the structure will indicate that there is a path to follow, that there is a means of bringing forward the evidence and that a conviction actually can be brought forward, certainly more frequently than once every 20 cases when it comes to trial.

We had some concern in the legislative committee. There were people proposing that this bill was not going to be charter proof on the basis that it did not differentiate between a sexual assault that was done through the mistaken belief that the accused had consented, on the one hand, and a sexual assault that was premeditated and done with full planning and intent to injure on the other. There were those who said that it is unconstitutional if you cannot ensure that those who do something through negligence or by accident do not receive a lighter sentence than those who commit an offence intentionally. One case that comes to mind is the Martineau case where Chief Justice Lamer gave the decision. He stated that it was a constitutional principle that those who cause harm intentionally must be punished more severely than those who cause harm unintentionally.

I asked the minister and officials of the Department of Justice and they were able to assure us that that principle would be upheld. They gave the assurance that he who commits an assault through the mistaken belief that he had consent would not be treated as harshly as somebody who intentionally committed the assault. I feel that that is important and I have every reason to believe that the Department of Justice has looked at this point.

In closing, I feel that this bill is a major step forward. We have done something here which is going to greatly correct the imbalance that women have suffered as far as their equal rights before the judicial system are concerned. These were not intentional oversights; it was just the way the law was. It seemed to indicate to women that they were going to be victims themselves if they were willing to withstand the harsh cross-examination on past sexual history. We now have a clear idea of what constitutes consent. There are those who will say that this is too rigorous, but I want to say that we have the definition and that is very very important. Because we know what we want to do, because it is stated in the bill, I think that this will be a major step forward. This is a good bill. We are doing something here that really has needed to be done for a long time.

I think this is going to be accepted by Canadians, both men and women, throughout the country as a major step forward.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I rise on behalf of my party, the New Democratic Party, to make some remarks on this bill.

As the House knows, in committee and in the debate the major spokesperson for the NDP was my colleague from New Westminster—Burnaby, who is our spokesperson on women's issues. She will be speaking later in the debate today. I rose because as my party's justice critic I wanted to make some specific comments on the bill.

This is a bill which we are supporting, a bill on which we worked very hard in committee to make better. We succeeded somewhat but in other parts we did not succeed. I will speak about that in a moment.

It is an important bill, one of the most important bills of this Parliament. I want to be honest and straightforward here and give a little bit of a personal reaction if I might. Before I do so, I congratulate my colleague, the hon. member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys, the Liberal critic who spoke eloquently today. He spoke especially eloquently at second reading of the debate.

That leads me to my confession. I come at this issue as a former criminal lawyer, as a prosecutor and especially as defence counsel. I guess I have the focus that the criminal bar has on the accused and the rights of the accused. It was put well by the member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys. We were taught the old saying that it is better that 10 guilty men go free than one innocent man be found guilty. Notice the word "men" that is used in the expression.

Where the criminal bar comes in, the defence bar, is a real focus on protecting the rights of the accused. I came at the debate with support of the bill but with some scepticism about the bill. I had an opportunity to listen. As Tommy Douglas used to say when people heckled him: "The good Lord gave you two ears and only one mouth. That means you should listen twice as much as you speak". Maybe we should take that advice more in politics.

I had the opportunity since my colleague from New Westminster—Burnaby was the lead spokesperson on the bill to junior, if you like, in legal terms, to be the kind of second lawyer or the second string part of the team here. I got a chance to listen.

What I heard was remarkable, in three areas. One was in the House in the debate on second reading. Second was in committee and third in the level of public debate that we had in the country in the papers, on radio and television.

Let me talk about the House because it was a remarkable debate. There was a clear view expressed in this House of a determination to change the present law, more than any other debate I have seen in a long time. It was really a wonderful debate. It was wonderful in the sense that people poured out emotions and spoke from the heart, especially the women members of the House.

I learned that violence against women and children is epidemic in our society. I knew that, but I had not had it expressed in the same kind of way it was expressed in the House. That male violence seems to be rooted in the inequality in our society. That inequality reinforces the violence and that is something we should all think about.

The statistics are dramatic. One in four women are victims of sexual assault, half before the age of 17. One hundred and ten women are murdered every year by a male intimate, 110 women. One in eight women is battered by a partner. The majority of women in Canada are afraid to walk the streets of our cities and towns.

You may say: "You should have heard that before". Coming at things from a male point of view, especially a white, middle class, WASPish male, sometimes you are not aware of that. You are aware but you do not really feel it. You can walk down the street at night. You can park your car in a dark garage with no problem. What is the problem?

When I heard my fellow members of the House express their concerns and feelings, it made quite an impact on me, and I hope it made an impact on Canadians.

In the committee the National Action Committee on the Status Women in a first-rate brief said: "We believe from our experience that the majority of women have experienced some form of male violence if we include sexual harassment, sexual assault, incest, and battering". That is staggering. I was listening to that in committee.

Some of the other evidence or words that I heard were that sexist and racist stereotypes and myths promote sexual assault and prevent access to justice for survivors. Men are socialized to become aggressors in sexual relations, women to be passive and submissive.

I remember these comments in the House where women members said that women are divided into good girls and bad girls, with the bad girls being less worthy of legal protection. Aboriginal women experience a significantly higher level of violence than other women. More than 40 per cent of women with disabilities have been sexually assaulted. Prostitutes experience an average of five rapes a year each. These were staggering—

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): More than that.

Mr. Waddell: My colleague says "more". The evidence that came out in committee was pretty staggering. I guess what I am saying is that I was listening to that in the House.

Then we went into committee and we had a number of briefs in the committee. Again, according to the rape crisis centres in the country, only one in 10 women who report sexual assault to the crisis centres get access to the criminal justice system, yet 27,000 sexual assaults were reported to the police in 1990.

A 1977 study found that 70 per cent of rapes reported to the police never reached trial and only 10 per cent of the original charges resulted in conviction. One would like to think that things have dramatically changed but a 1990 study shows that 15 per cent of sexual assaults reported to police were considered unfounded compared to 4.3 per cent for break and enter reports.

I had confirmed to me in committee what I knew before, but I never had it confirmed in such a systematic way. Sexual assault is the most under-reported and under-convicted crime against a person.

There you have it. There you have the need for this law. That is a situation where a crime is not being reported because women are afraid to come forward. They are not listened to and so on. They have to go through a hassle in the trial including, before we had passed the previous law, their whole being coming under attack, their own sexual history. In fact instead of being the victim they become almost like the accused. That is rough. That is the problem. That is why this bill is here.

I should say that I am disappointed that the government did not accept the amendment introduced by my colleague, the member for New Westminster—Burnaby, to specifically name doubly disadvantaged women. Sixty diverse women's organizations came together to work on the wording and finally agreed on amendments that all women felt comfortable with. I believe their perspective is not reflected in the bill.

In some ways the bill is still a bill for white, middle-class—this time—women. We have forgotten about visible minorities, disabled people, and other groups of women who are particularly hard hit. We have introduced amendments on behalf of the New Democratic Party to address the concerns of these particular groups.

Nevertheless, the bill is a step forward from the sexual assault law that we now have, in which men can claim that they have an honest but reasonable belief that there was consent and that is good enough to get them off no matter how hard the woman fought, what she said, or whether there was really any consent. I have already said that the number of sexual assaults that were unreported and the rate of conviction were very low.

The law also states for the first time that consent cannot be given by a third party. A man was acquitted of sexual assault despite a clear lack of consent on the part of the woman in the case because her husband told the man that she liked rough sex. Husbands and pimps can no longer encourage other men to rape women and get away with it under the provisions of this law.

In other words, an accused cannot come into court and say that this other man, this third person said that she was willing. That is not consent; you have to ask her. That sounds logical, does it not? It sounds simple but it is a big change in the law and it is in this bill. That is one of the reasons we are supporting this bill.

The bill defines an abuse of trust and authority as an assault. If a woman is forced into sex by virtue of the fact that the man is a police officer, or has other power over her, that is now unacceptable in the eyes of the law. Again, that is an amendment that was a long time coming.

There is a preamble in this bill, making it a different sort of bill. It makes explicit that the Parliament of Canada wants to see justice served by protecting the rights of the accused as well as the victims. This is something new, and it is a good direction for Parliament. We are looking at the rights of victims as well.

It clearly states what this law is for and why it is being enacted. We hope this will prevent the misuse of sexual assault laws, such as the sexual assault charges levelled against an HIV positive woman in my own province of British Columbia who had sex with two men without condoms. She was charged. We should look at the intent of this law, the courts should look at it, the prosecuting officers should look at it, and it is set out in the preamble of the bill.

Under this bill a man cannot rape an unconscious or incapacitated woman and get away with it, as in several unfortunate and painful cases in the past. There was a case in the Northwest Territories in which a woman was raped who was incapacitated by alcohol. The judge said: "Well, if there is a pair of hips there, that is asking for it".

There are some things we should watch with regard to the bill, and the member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys considered them. We should be watching the media provisions, the reaction of the court in terms of whether the bill is charter proof, the development of the cases, the conviction rate and so on to determine whether the bill makes any difference.

I said when I started that I listened to speeches in the House and in the committee, and I mentioned the level of debate in the public. I recall waking up one morning—,I was trying to sleep in—and listening to the Gzowski show on CBC Radio. Who did I hear on it but the Minister of Justice debating with Clay Ruby, a distinguished lawyer in Toronto and a very good friend of mine.

Mr. Ruby and I handled our first case together in Yorkville in the hippie days in Toronto. He is a very articulate and experienced lawyer and this was an articulate debate. The Minister of Justice certainly held her own, and perhaps did even better than hold her own.

I think the Minister of Justice would agree that there was a high level of debate in the public. The minister wrote a letter to the editor. There was a high level of debate in that. There were replies, especially in The Globe and Mail. The matter was treated seriously. It was treated seriously in editorials.

• (1620)

I know that J. J. Camp, president of the Canadian Bar Association, made a real effort to try to get the rough edges off the bill but keep it an effective bill.

We have been lucky in this debate. It is the way Parliament should work. We will see what happens as the bill becomes law and it affects cases.

A strong rape law will not prevent sexual assault. I think we all recognize that. I wish it would. I wish all we had to do was pass this bill and that would be the end of the problem.

It may not even convince most women to report the crime of rape, although we genuinely hope they will. We hope the bill will help there. Eliminating the sexist and racist biases of our society as a whole and the judicial system in particular is necessary if we want to convince more women to report rape.

A strong "no means no" law is a beginning step toward the other changes that must be made. A strong "no means no" law would be a signal to judges, Crown counsels, defence lawyers, police, and most important, women, that Parliament intends justice to apply to women as well as men. A strong "no means no" law could help to change our culture in regard to sexuality.

That is why I am supporting this bill. I learned a lot in the debate. I think it was an excellent debate and an excellent process with regard to this bill. My colleague from New Westminster—Burnaby will have other comments to make and I hope some of my other colleagues will speak in this debate this afternoon.

With that, I will conclude and urge that the House pass the bill.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Victoria—Government expenditures; the hon. member for Cochrane—Superior—French colleges; the hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands—The environment; the hon. member for Edmonton East—Petroleum industry.

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Madam Speaker, I am delighted to stand today in support of Bill C-49, on the admissibility of evidence of sexual conduct.

On August 22, 1991 the Supreme Court of Canada struck down section 276 of the Criminal Code, which was commonly known as the rape shield provision, in the case of Seaboyer and Gayme.

Section 276 prohibited the reception of evidence in sexual assault cases of a victim's previous sexual history except in three narrow circumstances. The Supreme Court of Canada held that section 276 overshot the mark in protecting complainants. It held that section 276 had the potential to exclude evidence relevant to the defence and was therefore a violation of sections 7 and 11(d) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The Supreme Court of Canada suggested guidelines to govern the receipt of evidence of past sexual activity in the absence of legislation.

The decision of the Supreme Court of Canada was swiftly criticized by equality rights-seeking women's groups. It cannot be denied that although sexual assault can be committed against a man the overwhelming majority of victims are women and children. Women feel very vulnerable without the protections formerly provided by the law. While the Supreme Court suggested guidelines for the admission and use in evidence of a sexual assault victim's sexual activity the judgment was silent on a number of issues of great significance to victims of sexual assault.

The proposed amendments in Bill C–49 will clarify the law and the procedure regarding the admissibility of evidence of the victim's sexual activity and will restore essential protection for the victims.

Victim's rights advocates have long maintained that victims of crime are the forgotten persons in the criminal justice system. The amendments proposed in Bill C–49 are an excellent example of how law can effectively respond to victims of crime without jeopardizing in any way the fundamental rights of accused persons. The Bill C–49 amendments are also an excellent example of how the law must conform to current social realities.

The offence of rape was abolished in 1983 and replaced with three levels of sexual assault offences. The trauma suffered by rape victims cannot be so easily abolished nor can the image of the rape victim being once again victimized, this time by the court process.

The Supreme Court of Canada has clearly stated that striking down the so–called rape shield provision does not revive the old common law rules of evidence that permitted evidence of sexual conduct and condoned invalid inferences from it. The rules must be adapted to conform to current reality. The myths that the rape shield provisions sought to eradicate have no place in a rational and just system of law.

The Criminal Code amendments proposed in Bill C–49 will ensure that a rational and just system of law prevails. With respect to the admissibility of evidence of a sexual assault victim's sexual activity with any person, including the accused person, the proposed amendments include a general statement about the purposes for which such evidence may not be used, a new test for admissibility of such evidence, and detailed procedural provisions to govern determinations of admissibility.

The Supreme Court of Canada has unequivocally stated that the fact that the complainant has engaged in other sexual activity with any person, including the accused, should not lead to the inference that the complainant is more likely to have consented to the sexual activity in question nor should it lead to the inference that the complainant is less worthy of belief.

Subsection 276(1) will put this principle into the Criminal Code to ensure that evidence that the complainant has engaged in sexual activity is not admissible to support an inference that the complainant is more likely to consent or is less worthy of belief.

Bill C–49's single most important feature is the test for admissibility of evidence of a complainant's sexual activity. I would prefer not to use the term "new rape shield provision" but this may be unavoidable.

Proposed subsection 276(2) sets out the test for admissibility of evidence of a complainant's sexual activity with any person, including the accused. The amendment avoids the pitfalls of the former section 276 that was struck down. It does not set out a blanket exclusion with narrow exceptions that the evidence an accused seeks to introduce must fit into. The new test for admissibility places the responsibility of determining whether the evidence is admissible on the trial judge. The trial judge has the task of assessing whether the evidence meets the requirements of section 276.

The questions the judge must ask are: Is it evidence of specific instances of sexual activity? Is it relevant to an issue at trial? Does the evidence have significant probative value that is not substantially outweighed by the danger of prejudice to the proper administration of justice? If the answer is yes to all three questions then the evidence will be admissible.

The task of determining admissibility will not be a simple one. Trial judges will be required to give serious consideration to this issue.

Proposed subsection 276(3) sets out a range of considerations which a judge must take into account in determining whether evidence of a complainant's sexual activity is admissible in accordance with the new test of admissibility. These factors are intended to assist judges in the difficult task of assessing whether the evidence should be admitted. The mandatory factors ensure that all Canadian judges will be guided by the same considerations in exercising their discretion in determining the admissibility of evidence.

• (1630)

The factors to be considered include: the interests of justice, including the right of the accused to make a full answer and defence; society's interest in encouraging the reporting of sexual assault offences; whether there is a reasonable prospect that the evidence will assist in arriving at a just determination in the case; the need to remove from the fact–finding process any discriminatory belief on bias; the risk that the evidence may unduly arouse sentiments of prejudice, sympathy or hostility in the jury; the potential prejudice to the complainant's personal dignity and right of privacy; the right of the complainant and every individual to personal security and to the full protection and benefit of the law; and any other factor that the judge considers relevant.

Bill C–49 also includes a clear and enhanced procedure applicable to a determination of admissibility of sexual conduct evidence. Basically a two–stage procedure is proposed. First, an application to adduce evidence of a complainant's sexual activity must be made. Second, if the application is granted a hearing must be held to determine whether the evidence is admissible in accordance with the new test proposed.

The procedure begins with an application in writing setting out detailed particulars of the evidence sought to be introduced and the potential relevance to that evidence. The application must be made to a judge with a copy to the prosecutor and clerk of the court. A seven–day notice period is provided to enable the prosecutor to prepare argument as to whether or not the evidence should be subject to a determination of admissibility. Provision is also made for an abridged notice period where the interests of justice so require.

The application stage is designed to discourage frivolous attempts to introduce evidence of sexual activity. Where the judge is of the opinion that the evidence sought to be introduced is not capable of meeting the test for admissibility, the judge will not hold a hearing to make such a determination. Where an application is granted, the judge will hold a hearing to determine the admissibility of evidence in accordance with the test proposed.

The hearing will take place in the absence of the jury and members of the public. Note that the complainant is not a compellable witness at the hearing. At the conclusion of the hearing, the judge will determine if the evidence is admissible and will be required to state the reasons for. the determination.

The reasons must be written or recorded and must refer to the factors that have influenced the determination. The reasons must also indicate the manner in which the evidence is expected to be relevant. The judge may determine that only part of the evidence sought to be adduced meets the test of admissibility and, if so, the reasons would state the part of the evidence to be admitted.

These procedural provisions require judges to proceed through a staged analysis when considering admissibility. More than a brief reference to the test of admissibility is required in the judge's reasons.

The amendments proposed in Bill C–49 also restore provisions which protect the victim from embarrassment and which respect the victim's privacy and dignity. For example, the hearing to determine admissibility shall be held in camera, that is the public and the jury are excluded. The victim shall not be compellable at the hearing, that is the victim cannot be compelled to be a witness at the hearing although the victim may voluntarily take the stand. Evidence taken or information given at the hearing shall not be published in any newspaper or broadcast.

The re–enactment of the non–compellability provisions is essential in order to protect victims and encourage their co–operation in prosecutions. Note that the complainant may give evidence if he or she chooses to do so.

However, the complainant could not be required to testify at the hearing to determine admissibility. Bill C–49 also provides that the determination of admissibility of evidence of a complainant's sexual activity shall be conducted in the absence of the jury and members of the public, i.e., in camera.

The procedural provisions set out a two–step process, an application followed by a hearing. A judge considering an application to introduce evidence of a complainant's sexual activity must do so in the absence of the jury and the public. If the application is granted and a hearing is held to determine the admissibility of such evidence, the hearing must also be held in camera.

The objective of the in camera hearing is to ensure that the jury and the public do not hear evidence of the complainant's sexual activity before a judge has determined whether such evidence is admissible. The exposure of evidence of the complainant's sexual activity which may be misleading and irrelevant would have a highly prejudicial effect on the trial process and would cause unnecessary embarrassment to the complainant.

The proposed amendments governing the reception and use of evidence of a sexual assault victim's sexual history reflect the current reality of the 1990s. That is that evidence of the complainant's sexual history is rarely relevant to the issue before the court.

However, where that evidence is relevant, the Criminal Code permits its admission. Bill C-49 amendments reflect the very sensitive balance between the interests of the victims and the rights of the accused persons.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, I am delighted to rise to participate in this debate at third reading because of the absolute essential nature of having this legislation.

The problem that this legislation is meant to address is essentially a problem of attitudes and it is very, very difficult as everyone in this Chamber knows to legislate with regard to attitudes. Indeed, for many years one of the arguments against legislation of this nature, one of the many arguments against the legislation that this is replacing—in other words, the charter defeated rape shield provisions of the Criminal Code—was that you cannot legislate attitudes. I think all of us who support this bill say that not only can you legislate attitudes, but you must.

There is a very frightening attitude if you will in this country today. It is not held by all fortunately, but unfortunately it is held by enough people. That attitude is that women somehow are less believable, that women are less credible witnesses, that women invite sexual assault, that women are somehow less innocent victims when the crimes of which they are the subject are crimes that have "a sexual nature".

First of all, it is well established in the academic and scholarly literature surrounding these criminal issues that such crimes are not crimes of a sexual nature. That is the first attitude that legislation like this must change. Indeed, crimes of this nature are crimes of power and crimes of violence. Women in our society are by and large powerless. This is why they are so frequently the victims of these cowardly crimes.

When the legislation was first changed some 10 to 12 years ago, one of the things that was changed was the removal of the word "rape" from the Criminal Code. The theory behind that deletion was that the word itself was so pejorative that it set up a victimology, the same kind of victimology we are trying to delete right now with this legislation. The word rape was so pejorative that people immediately reacted to it by blaming the victim.

It is interesting. We do not deal with it in this legislation nor indeed is it perhaps necessary to deal in this legislation right now with these particular amendments. I hope we will deal with it at some other time.

A lot of feminists and criminologists thought that perhaps we moved too quickly and moved too soon on the removal of that word from the Criminal Code. There is no question the word is blunt, it is direct and you know what it means. We have removed that and replaced it with the words "sexual assault" which somehow contributes to the attitude that these crimes are not as serious as the vast majority sitting in this room know they are.

We are hearing over and over again, as we read in the papers, as we watch television, as we listen to our radios and as we as parliamentarians hear the experiences of our constituents, that there is an upsurge in crimes of violence against women including those crimes of sexual assault. My own fear, and sometimes I almost hesitate to articulate it for fear of articulation making it more true, is that we are suffering through a major backlash that relates to the further emancipation of women in our society today. The fear of women stepping out of the traditional roles of homemaker and mother and into the boardrooms, into the professions and even to a small extent into this Chamber, Madam Speaker, and into your chair, is creating a backlash of fear, anger and yes, even hatred among certain sectors in our society.

Because of this backlash of fear, anger and hatred, crimes of violence against women are on the increase. We certainly know they are on the increase. We are waiting for various people and various organizations such as the Canadian Panel on Violence Against Women to give us some answer as to why they are on the increase.

When the old rape shield laws were thrown out by the Supreme Court based on the charter argument, it was absolutely crucial that the government step forward and give us something to replace them with. This legislation may not be perfect. My colleague, the member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys, brought forward a number of amendments that I certainly supported. By and large, this legislation deserves to be supported because it is a fairly substantial step in the right direction.

There are two major problems, the first one being the attitudinal problem. The second one is the need to convince women that they can get justice without too much fear in our law courts. Without legislation such as this, it makes it all the harder for those people working in the area against sexual assault to convince women of this.

As every one of us must know, those of us who are lawyers have seen it first hand, others have heard about it, read about it or witnessed it through family and friends, the events surrounding a trial, surrounding charges being laid on matters of sexual assault create a double victimization. Even if all of the victim's rights are protected, her privacy, her right not to have to disclose irrelevant background information, et cetera, even if these rights are respected, the mere fact of pressing the charge means that she has to relive the horror of the sexual assault. That is going to be a difficult endeavour for anyone. How much worse will it be if she does not feel that she is protected against having to be cross-examined on what is ostensibly irrelevant information.

It is crucial that the women of Canada understand exactly what this legislation will do. We know the statistics but they bear repeating. In 1990, 27,000 sexual assaults were reported to the police—27,000, Madam Speaker, and we know that over 60 per cent of sexual assaults are not reported. So when you see those figures, you see just how widespread a problem it is and how many people are affected.

This year it is estimated that one in four Canadian women will experience sexual assault, yet fewer than one in 10 will report it. Unless we make it known to Canadian women and back it up with legislation that they need not fear a double assault, an emotional assault in the law courts, then we will not see an improvement in these statistics.

The other thing that Bill C-49 will do is make all Canadians aware of sexual assault law. There is no question that in this area women practise denial, as do men. "It cannot happen to me" or "It cannot happen to my sister, my wife, my daughter. It can't, it can't, it can't". It can, Madam Speaker, we all know it can, and we know sadly that the streets are not safe for Canadian women. We know that. We know that Canadian women are not safe in their houses from assault. All of us know the horror of the case involving the 911 line in Calgary, when a woman called while a man was trying to break in through her back door and police protocol was such that they did not respond in time. We all felt the horror to some degree that the woman must have felt when she lived through that experience. Only an awareness of how widespread sexual assault is will lead to the proper protocols and the proper responses.

One of the most important things in Bill C-49 with regard to an attitude change is the message that no means no. Interestingly enough, this is the message that has received the most intense response.

If this subject were not so serious and so crucial to the well-being of not just Canadian women but Canadian society in general, I could almost say that I am faintly amused by the response. I have had men of my acquaintance say to me things—I mean, seriously, one man said to me: "Well, it's sure not going to make courtship much fun". My response was: "Gee, dates with you must have been really terrific".

I do not know what people who are afraid of the no means no statement in the law are really afraid of. The amendment brought forward by the government and supported by our side of the House that you remove all reasonable means to establish consent to reasonable means, is indeed a reasonable amendment. But I am not sure what the difficulty is in the minds of those people who still think that this is going to create a terrible tyranny on men in their social endeavours in this country.

It is true that a great deal of what passes between men and women in these relationships is tacit. But what women are saying is that too much has been taken for granted and taken tacitly for granted. When we have had in this country a woman who was deaf and mute, who kicked and screamed and fought back, and a judge still said that she had not been able to establish her lack of consent, I think that the women of this country have a right to stand up and say: "We want it explicit that no means no".

When we have had a judge of the Supreme Court of British Columbia call a three year old girl sexually aggressive—it is so difficult to encompass the thought it is almost hard to say the words—then women in this country, and men too, have a right to see a law that says no means no.

When we have had a judge in the Northwest Territories say that: "It does not matter as much if you assault native women because they are either drunk or asleep", then the time is long overdue for a law in this country that says no means no.

• (1650)

The time has come for all Canadians to understand that there is a responsibility in social relationships. Women are not playing games when they say no. Women are in the vast majority of cases not walking around on the earth to torment and bedevil men, although with the greatest of respect sometimes that might not be such a bad idea. Women have a right to say what they want and what they do not want, and if they happen to say it in a bar room or in a bedroom or on a beach, or in a public street, the location does not matter, the circumstances do not matter. What matters is that no means no.

Again and again we have heard from various groups that this is going to be impossible to establish. That is one of the stupidest things I have ever heard.

I said to a rather well-known lawyer in this country who made that statement at committee: "Which word did you not understand?" I think that phrase is something all of us should carry forward in arguing in support of the no means no section of this bill.

For too long the tacit belief that women when they say no mean yes has been accepted and has been laughed about and joked about. For too long there has been some sort of general belief among a certain segment of the male population and I want to make perfectly clear to all of my esteemed colleagues that I do not put all of them in that category. I put some of them in there but not all of them.

The response is such that women have a right to be taken seriously and what this law finally does is take the reactions and the responses of women seriously. It may be more difficult. It may make social interaction more complicated and complex, although I cannot imagine how that could possibly be the case, it is so complicated and complex right now.

Unquestionably it is what we must have. Unquestionably it is what we must put in the Criminal Code for the protection of women in this country.

It is a sign to the judges, to the police officers, to lawyers and to society in general that sexual assault is not a joke and it will not be tolerated. It is something we need to say to judges when we stand here in this Chamber and know that 40 per cent of Canadian judges have yet to avail themselves of the gender sensitivity training courses.

I have already listed in my remarks this afternoon the most outstanding shall we say, of horrifying comments by judges in the area of sexual assault. I know of another judge in this country who hears the majority of sexual assault cases in his particular jurisdiction and on the rare occasions when he convicts will give intermittent sentences or very light sentences, sentences that show he just does not take these offences seriously.

We have to make a change. This legislation is a step in making that change. While the government still refuses to institute mandatory training for federally appointed judges, then all the more reason to support legislation of this nature. We must have something that the women of this country can depend upon to protect them in the rising epidemic of sexual assault, and the rising epidemic of violence against women.

This is not an anti-men amendment. This is not going to change the actions of the vast majority of good, decent men who live their lives understanding that women have a perfect right to make their intentions known.

It is going to make a difference to that subspecies of humanity that does not seem to believe that women have a right to make a choice. When we lost the old amendments to the code after the Seaboyer and Gayme decision, it was absolutely crucial that the government step in with new amendments. Bill C-49 fulfils, to the best of its ability in this particular circumstance, the steps which must be taken for the proper admission of evidence.

I want to say a few words about the preamble to the bill. The preamble makes special mention of the prevalence of the crime against women and children. We know that this is absolutely so. We also support the naming of doubly disadvantaged groups: visible minorities; sex-trade workers; disabled persons; lesbians and those whose immigration status is questionable. Unfortunately the government did not accept that.

We are also aware that the preamble to the bill does not really have much of an influence on courts per se so we had wanted both of these changes to be moved to the body of the bill to give it more weight in a court of law.

The last time that we brought forward sexual assault amendments to the code we lost them after a number of years under the charter in the Supreme Court of Canada. There is no doubt in my mind, nor do I think there is doubt in anyone else's mind, that these amendments will also be the subject of a charter challenge.

We support this bill and we hope it will survive the charter challenge. If it does not then we will have to go back to the drawing board once again because this issue is perhaps the most crucial issue that women have to fight under the Criminal Code of Canada.

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join with my colleagues from the committee and the Minister of Justice in this debate today on the third reading of Bill C–49.

First I want to say that I was pleased to be a member of the legislative committee. The committee worked very well and co–operatively in hearing the witnesses and extracting from them substantive arguments and some technical amendments. We put them forward and the committee process was one of consensus and co–operation. I am pleased that it was so. I am also pleased that we were able to agree on the amendments and bring them forward.

I am very proud to be part of a government that has made security of women in our society a priority. Our government recognizes that security of the person and the ability to live without fear are essential to women's achievement of equality. We have taken action to ensure that these fundamental rights for women are protected in Canada.

Bill C–49 is evidence of our government's and society's efforts to ensure the security of women who are victims of sexual assault.

Last August the Supreme Court of Canada struck down section 276 of the Criminal Code in the Seaboyer decision which governed the reception of evidence of a victim's sexual history during the course of a sexual assault trial. The Supreme Court of Canada held that section 276 overshot or overstepped the mark in protecting complainants. That decision evoked expressions of concern from many women and women's groups. If assailants could use the provisions of the charter of rights to strike down protections such as the rape shield provision, it would seem that the justice system was offering greater protection to the assailant than to the victim.

The government moved quickly to respond to these concerns. It was a narrow decision by the Supreme Court, but the perception was that women did not have very much protection and, in some cases, they did not. Therefore, we had to move very quickly.

The Minister of Justice undertook an immediate consultative process with women's groups, the bar, provincial and territorial governments and other legal experts to canvass as many views as possible on the direction that the new law should take.

I would emphasize that it was the consensus, and I would say society's consensus, that the new law had to take into account today's reality of violence against women. The Minister of Justice agreed.

Bill C–49, an act to amend the Criminal Code regarding sexual assault, received first reading in the House of Commons on December 12, 1991. It is of landmark value in protecting the rights of women victims of sexual assault.

The bill provides for strict guidelines in determining the admissibility of past sexual history as evidence and outlines clearly the procedure which must be followed in admitting such evidence. According to the bill's provisions, evidence of the victim's sexual activity would not be admissible unless that evidence was specific, was relevant to the issue to be proved, and its probative value was not substantially outweighed by the danger of prejudice to the proper administration of justice.

The bill also legally defines for the first time the concept of consent, a definition of consent to sexual activity, that is clear and unambiguous. Under the present law, a man accused of sexual assault can be acquitted if he can persuade a judge that he honestly believed the woman consented.

Under the legislation proposed by Bill C–49, the test of consent would be whether the woman's behaviour was sufficient to convince an objective third party that the woman had agreed to the man's sexual advances. Bill C–49 clearly states that submission does not signal consent nor does silence and that is very important. Under this bill, no clearly means no. This means a great deal to the women of Canada.

Also, for the first time in the history of Canadian common law, or one of the few times, the bill has a preamble. This was the subject of much discussion and debate.

When I found out that I would be sitting on the committee, I sent letters to constituents who had expressed an interest in issues affecting women. I sent them copies of the bill and some of the information about the bill and I asked them for their advice.

One woman, a professor at the University of Alberta, Professor Susan Jackel, wrote me a four-page letter in response. She is a professor of history and Canadian studies and also has offered advice to the government on constitutional matters. She is not a lawyer. I want to quote what she had to say on the preamble. I believe this to be very important.

> I cannot tell you how important it is to the women of Canada to see their own experience and understanding reflected in the wording of a law, not only in its technical sections, but in the general statement at the beginning about the values of Canadian society. To read that "the Parliament of Canada is gravely concerned about the incidence of sexual violence and abuse in Canadian society"; that Parliament is likewise cognizant of "how sexual assault and, more particularly, the fear of sexual assault affect the lives of the people of Canada"; and that "the Parliament of Canada wishes to encourage the reporting of incidents of sexual violence or abuse," in the interests of justice for all Canadians, is indeed a milestone.

She goes on to say:

> Much of my recent research on the history of women as citizens of Canada, and as activists in the reform of law, has uncovered a long, rather regrettable story of many intelligent women's sense of alienation from the laws that govern them. Women have seen the law as an oppressive, or at best insensitive, instrument when it comes to the daily reality of their lives.

This departure from the practice of common law, to put a preamble to a bill, is welcomed by women in society for these very reasons. It provides guidance to the courts. It interprets the daily lives and fears and the reality of violence against women for those who read the law. I believe that is very important.

The amendments of Bill C–49 are of crucial importance in protecting the rights of women who have been victims of sexual assault. These women should not have to be revictimized in the course of bringing the accused to justice. Bill C–49 sends a clear message that our society will not tolerate sexual assault or any other form of violence against women.

Once again, I want to quote from Professor Jackel's letter. It was four pages long and she puts it in much better words than I can. It is important to read what she has to say about sexual assault and put it on the record. She states:

> The fact of sexual assault is part of that oppression for a minority of women; the fear of such assault—and it is present in the vast majority of women, in many circumstances—is one of the major impediments to free, trusting relationships between men and women.

She goes on to say:

> As a professor and student advisor, I am especially aware of the limitations that women place upon themselves in pursuing their studies, out of justified caution about being in the wrong place at the wrong time. Women students make academic decisions—not to take an evening course, not to study in the library in the evenings, not to take a course that might end in their being labelled "feminist"—because of fear. Combating that fear, through the law and the administration of justice, is thus not only a security-of-the-person issue, but it is also an equality issue, as defined in sections 15 and 28 of the Charter.

She says further:

> Women who cannot take equal advantage of education and training opportunities out of fear are at a disadvantage relative to men. The law should act positively to ameliorate this disadvantage, without removing the safeguards that are needed for an over-all balanced approach to justice.

That is what this law does. It helps remove the fear women have about the law itself and about how they will be treated before the courts and within the judicial system. I believe that is important.

I want to thank Professor Jackel for her advice to me which I was able to bring forward to the committee.

The Prime Minister has said that one Canadian woman suffering violence at home or elsewhere is one too many. Therefore our government has made a priority in putting an end to violence against women.

Our government's goal is zero tolerance. Our commitment to that goal is evident in the federal family violence initiative announced in February 1991. It is providing $136 million over four years for programs in the area of health and social services, criminal justice, community action, housing and support services for aboriginal communities.

Women's security is a key focus of the family violence initiative. As children, as seniors and at all ages in between, women are the most frequent victims of family violence. Through the family violence initiative our government has pledged to work closely with its partners in society to eliminate family violence through activities such as the promotion of community–based projects, the creation of new emergency shelters for women and support for training for police and the judiciary in understanding the depth and breadth of family violence.

I would also note that an estimated one–quarter of the federal government's Canada Assistance Plan contributions to the provinces and territories is used to provide support to victims of family violence.

I would also like to point to our government's establishment last August of the Canadian Panel on Violence Against Women. This is the first comprehensive national examination of violence against women that has ever been undertaken in this country and indeed, the first of its kind in the world.

Co–chaired by Pat Freeman Marshall of Toronto and Marthe Asselin Vaillancourt of Jonquière, Quebec, the panel's members are representative of Canada's best knowledge, experience, sensitivity and leadership on this issue.

The panel has been mandated to examine the issue of violence against women through an interactive, responsive and grassroots dialogue. It has embarked upon an intensive schedule of consultations in large and small communities across Canada in an effort to reach all possible participants including victims of violence, front-line, social service, education and health care workers, and other community members.

• (1710)

The panel began its operations in September and has visited so far more than 130 communities in all of Canada's provinces and territories.

Early next month, the panel will issue an interim report which will provide an overview of its work done so far and what panel members have heard in the course of their public consultations, as well as preliminary proposals for eliminating violence against women. This will set the stage for the second round of the panel's public consultations which will begin again this summer.

We can expect the panel's final report in December. It will include recommendations and a concrete plan of action to help make Canadian society safer and more equitable for women.

In conclusion, our government considers the security of women in society to be of absolute paramount importance. I thank the many members of this House who have made a significant contribution through their support and through their personal efforts to the advancement of women's equality in society.

I want to quote once again from Professor Jackel as she sums up her letter to me providing advice on Bill C–49: "I know that you and your colleagues will listen carefully to all presenters at your committee hearings, but I hope that in the end your decision will be to recommend this bill to Parliament substantially unchanged. I believe it has been drafted with care and deserves to become law".

I believe that also. I call on members of the House to support us in making this bill law.

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint–Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, in most cases the women of Canada have benefited from the decisions of the Supreme Court. Our justices have, for example, upheld the laws that ban the production and importation of hard–core pornography. Unfortunately, this type of enlightened and progressive vision was abandoned when the high court struck down the provision of the Criminal Code known as rape shield.

The women of Canada were angered by the court's decision because they viewed this action as a direct assault on their security. The decision in effect would allow for continued victimization of women who have been sexually assaulted.

The decision gave defence attorneys the right to raise a woman's past sexual experiences and use them as relevant testimony in determining consent. The lack of a rape shield provision would result in brutal cross–examination of women by defence lawyers who are seeking to discredit a victim's testimony based on negative stereotypes of women.

It is time for the cycle of victimization to end. No in every conceivable circumstance means no. Men must realize that sex is a matter for two mutually consenting adults. The old power games must be put to rest. The antiquated and unrealistic view of sexuality must be shelved. This is not a time for subtlety or for carefully selected words. Far too many children and women have fallen prey to this insidious violence against their bodies and their minds.

This is why I find myself in the unusual or awkward position of having to praise the government for its swift action. I share the Minister of Justice's concern when she says we must protect the rights of rape victims. This is why I am more than happy to support this law.

Bill C–49 is the first piece of legislation in history that is founded both on the experience and expertise of women. This is a bill that recognizes the reality of a rape trial and takes into account the constitutional rights of both the accused and the victim.

The most important element of this bill is that it says a complainant's sexual history is rarely relevant. By admitting such evidence, the court would be seriously compromising the woman's case as to consent.

It completely boggles my mind that because a woman consented to sex the previous week, the last hour, or if she had sex many times with different men, that somehow this previous consent applies to every subsequent sexual advance.

This bill was introduced in December of last year and will hopefully fill the gap left by the Supreme Court Seaboyer and Gayme case.

The preamble of this bill is essential in clearly expressing to the people of Canada this House's collective condemnation of sexual violence, not only against women but against children as well. This law is the first in the Criminal Code to have a preamble that explicitly says a victim's sexual past is rarely relevant.

I find it strange that some segments of society have ridiculed this legislation. I am certain that many members of this House have seen caricatures in the newspapers that portray lawyers sitting behind an amorous couple arranging the affidavits, making certain that consent is established.

Consent is the crux of sexual assault trials. If it has been established that consent has been given, the woman's claim of attack is rejected. It is imperative that the law be absolutely clear on this matter, as must the partners involved in the sexual activity.

The bill states that consent is the voluntary agreement of the complainant to engage in the sexual activity in question. There is no need for lawyers to be present. All you need are two people who understand each other's needs and open and frank communication.

Refusing to talk about sex can lead to very serious problems. By talking to our partners we establish clear guidelines as to what is acceptable and welcome behaviour and what is, for lack of any other description, a violent attack.

This act invalidates consent obtained under certain circumstances such as agreement through a third party or when a complainant is incapable of consenting to sex by reason of intoxication or any other conditions. This law will invalidate consent when the accused has abused their position of power or authority.

Finally, the law allows women to change their minds and refuse consent at any juncture.

These provisions recognize the reality of sexual assault. They tell us that the government recognizes that far too often women have been forced to engage in sexual activities by their bosses for fear of losing their jobs. They recognize that women and children are often in subordinate positions and are at high risk of being victimized. It also acknowledges and addresses the painful reality that often the perpetrators of sexual assault are friends, relatives, or co–workers of the victims.

Bill C–49 also recognizes that the incapacity to refuse consent by reasons of intoxication is by no means consent. Men can no longer use that defensive, mistaken belief concerning consent. This bill makes people responsible for their actions. Because an individual has had too much to drink and because of this irresponsible behaviour one believes that consent was obtained is hardly a reason to let him off the hook.

[Translation]

Bill C–49 will finally give women the tools they need to confront their assailants.

It is reported in 1992 that one woman in four, or 25 per cent of the female population, has been sexually assaulted, but less than one in 10 report it. Since the law seems to have been written for the accused rather than for the victim, only 5 per cent of those accused of sexual assault were convicted.

For too long, our society has accepted violence and assault against women as a man's right and a symbol of his superiority. I am glad that we are daring to abolish that myth today.

Nevertheless, I find it hard to take that in the late 20th century, we must have recourse to the law to ensure women's right to say no. We have a great deal to learn about communication and respect.

This legislation has been eagerly awaited for a long time. I must congratulate the Minister of Justice here for her efficiency. Although I do not always agree with what the government does, I cannot overlook this major step for the greater welfare of women in particular.

It is high time for our society to face the problem of violence. We must stop finding excuses and instead look at reality as it is. The reason this bill is before the House today is that our society is seriously sick and the only way we know to exercise control is through the law.

• (1720)

This is no fairy tale and we all have our work cut out for us to make this society human again.

The preamble of Bill C–49 is a guide so that lawyers and judges understand the importance of discretion regarding the sexual history of the complainant, who is usually a woman. It recognizes the unique character of this kind of offence, as well as its effects on the population. It reminds us how serious this offence is.

Historically, a woman's sexual history and reputation were considered relevant evidence, since it was accepted that loose morals were an indication of her consent.

With Bill C–49, regardless of a person's past, consent still means saying yes and no will always mean refusal of consent. Unfortunately, for far too many men, the law will remain an abstraction. Men must organize so that the problem comes out in the open. Their education must begin with their peers if we really want to work on stopping this violence. It must start today.

Some steps have been taken and the white ribbon campaign is an example. This must continue. Men of all ages assault women; men of all ages deny it; men of all ages do not want to admit that there is a problem, that they have had a problem. But still, all these men have had at least one woman in their life, their mother.

We are barely beginning to lift the veil on all the violence and assault in the military world. As soon as the veil is lifted, voices are raised to lower the veil again and deny what is going on. This happened just a few months ago. What are we afraid of? Do we always have to go to court to protect those who have been assaulted, always after the damage is done?

Despite what many people think, sexual assault is not only physical assault. The human being as a person is violated. It leaves a deep wound that can never be forgotten, even if it can be survived. It is the violation of someone's body. In too many cases, it is done on a bet or a dare, as an initiation rite or an act of wild misbehaviour. It is using someone else to satisfy a desire, nothing else, like merchandise that is discarded once it is no longer needed. That is what we do when we let ourselves go.

[English]

The bill was modified somewhat during the legislative committee process. Aside from a few minor technical changes, there are three major amendments. The preamble to the bill was changed to make special mention of the prevalence of sexual assault against women and children.

We supported this amendment. However, we hoped that it would mention certain doubly disadvantaged groups such as visible minority women, sex–trade workers, disabled persons, lesbians and those whose immigration status is questionable. Unfortunately this was not accepted by the government.

We also requested that the preamble be moved to the main body of the legislation so that the statement it makes would carry more weight in a court of law. Originally the legislation required that the accused take all reasonable steps to ascertain consent. The bill was amended by the government with the support of our party so that it now reads "take reasonable steps to ascertain consent".

It is imperative that the new legislation be able to meet any new charter challenge. We do not want to find ourselves in the same situation as we did after last fall's Supreme Court decision.

The final amendment put forward by the government allows for the publication of a judge's decision when the judge allows evidence of a complainant's prior sexual history to be used in the trial. This decision would allow for such publication on a case by case basis.

I hope this bill will give the women of this country security and confidence in the justice system. I hope it will remove the fear that women could be victimized a second time by a system that is insensitive to the nature of sexual assault.

[Translation]

Bill C–49 is a step in the right direction to start protecting victims of sexual assault. It is a first step, but it is up to all of us to work at rooting out the causes of sexual assault. The economy must pick up so that people work. Above all, men must be educated to respect their partner and look for help when they lose control. Women must be educated to protect themselves and use the few available resources to be able to recover.

Our society is very sick when people are only considered commodities. We must all work to restore every woman's pride in who she is. We must all get involved, if only by realizing that all our sexist behaviour, from the jokes we tell to what we do, makes it harder to learn mutual respect. That is one attitude to correct and the House of Commons is a good place to practise what we preach.

We cannot expect the law to solve all problems. Together we formulate rules for our society and together we must see that they are enforced. We each have a role to play in ensuring that our children enjoy a better quality of life than those who live on the street. Violence and sexual assault must no longer be the lot of women and children, and all of us, you and I, must see to it starting today.

[English]

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I rise to speak again on Bill C–49, the new sexual assault law.

I am disappointed that most of the amendments I proposed did not pass. The amendments I put forward were those drafted by a large number of diverse women's organizations. Unfortunately some women's organizations have withdrawn their support of this bill because important amendments were not included.

One of these amendments is the naming of women who are most vulnerable to violence and who have the least access to our justice system. One of the amendments that did pass was the amendment that changed "all reasonable steps" to simply "reasonable steps".

I was alone on the committee in voting against that amendment because I believe that the provision "all reasonable steps" would have passed the charter challenge, as a number of legal experts across the country also believe that it would survive a charter challenge.

The committee which studied the sexual assault bill heard over and over again from prostitutes, disabled women, black women, aboriginal women and immigrant women that some women believe that the justice system does not serve them, that there is no point in reporting assault to the police or going to court because their race, ability and type of employment are held against them.

These women wanted their situation clearly spelled out in the bill to let doubly disadvantaged women know that this law is meant for them also and to let police, lawyers and judges know that their concerns are to be taken seriously.

In addition to being sexually assaulted, many women have further pain and humiliation in store when they try to access our justice system.

Many Canadians, including some members of this House, do not understand the depth of the pain and violation that is involved in sexual assault. They do not understand the effect sexual assault has on women. They think of it as sex that got out of hand rather than an act of violence which often leads women to suicide, to drug and alcohol use, to fear, hatred, disgust, nightmares, severe eating disorders, debilitating insecurity and self-blame, anxiety attacks and problems in relationships.

One in five rape victims attempts suicide as opposed to one in 50 non-assaulted women. Sixty per cent of female clients receiving treatment for drug and alcohol abuse at a treatment centre were found to be victims of sexual assault.

Those are some of the long-term psychological effects.

Physical effects of sexual assault can include permanent physical disability, unwanted pregnancy, sexually transmitted disease, including AIDS, broken bones, bruises and death. Our society still expects women to take responsibility for sexual assault. It does not expect the victim of any other crime to take that responsibility. It does not expect people who have been injured by a drunk driver to have worn brighter clothing or driven a brightly coloured car. Everybody knows the responsibility lies with people not to drive drunk.

• (1730)

For the first time, sexual assault laws will be brought into line with the other laws of our nation. It is the responsibility of people not to commit sexual assaults. Some people think that if women did not go out at night that would reduce the risk of sexual assault. What about the hundreds of women who are assaulted on university campuses? This kind of logic says that maybe they should stop going to university.

What about women who are assaulted in their work places? Should they stop going to work? Should we stop walking on our streets? Should we not go to the grocery store, not visit our family and our friends? One woman was sexually assaulted while shovelling her own driveway in winter in broad daylight. Maybe women should stay at home.

However, the majority of sexual assaults occur in a private home. Women are actually safer on the streets than in their homes. So where do we go to be safe? The problem with changing women's behaviour to avoid sexual assault is that no matter what we do, no matter where we are, no matter what we look like, and no matter what we wear we are targets for sexual assaults. Some are targets even more than others because as a result of their race or because they are poor or a prostitute they are more vulnerable and less likely to be believed.

The problem is not women's behaviour. The problem is the behaviour and attitudes of the men who commit this crime. This should be the focus. We are going to stop sexual assaults by convicting the men who commit them and by changing attitudes so that our society no longer tolerates them.

Most women are sexually assaulted by men they know. Often the men are men they are supposed to trust and have faith in, such as their fathers, teachers, priests, doctors and friends.

A Canadian study of sex offenders reveals that their profile does not deviate from the average male. There is no one out there who has sex offender written on his forehead. The rehabilitation programs for sex offenders in prison are notoriously ineffective.

They concentrate on sex rather than on violence, power and negative attitudes toward women. Rape is a crime of power, a crime of anger and ignorance, not a crime of sex. It does not matter what a woman is wearing or not wearing. Nowhere in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms does it state that one's human rights, that one's right to security of the person is suspended because of an item of clothing.

Different cultures and different people within a culture have very different ideas about what constitutes too little clothing. Clothing does not say yes or no, only people can do that.

Sexual assault happens to women of all ages, from three months to well into their nineties. Studies show that women who are disabled are far more likely to be sexually assaulted than other women because they are more vulnerable and often less believed.

The portrayal of women in the media and in pornography reinforces beliefs about women asking for it. Fifty-six per cent of men in a study reported that pornography played a role in their offences. A study of video pornography found that 13 per cent of all the scenes involved sexual violation, including rape, sexual harassment, sado-masochism and sexual mutilation.

A national survey of Canadians' use of pornography showed that young men aged 12 to 17 are the primary consumers of pornography. Thirty-five per cent of these young men expressed an interest in watching sexually violent scenes, including rape, torture and bondage.

The day our society says that it is not natural for boys to be interested in these things is the day that our society stops feeding our young men material that tells them it is fun to rape women and that women enjoy it. That will be another step forward in ending violence against women.

A number of respected studies have found a link between violent and dehumanizing pornography and the acceptance of rape myths, acceptance of violence against women, decrease in sensitivity to the suffering of rape victims and an increase in male willingness to rape.

I congratulate the Supreme Court of Canada on the Butler decision, in which it said once and for all that the problem of pornography was violence and dehumanization, not explicit sex.

As with sexual assault the issue is not sex but violence and degradation. Police officers, customs officers, lawyers and judges need education to examine these issues so that they will not assume that gay or lesbian erotica is necessarily obscene while the rape and torture of women and children is not.

Rarely do we see the pain of sexual assault reflected. Rarely do we see the real victims. Rarely do we see the racism and hatred that often accompanies sexual assault.

Aboriginal women and women of colour have been victims of racist attacks. There are no available statistics on this type of violence. Just over a year ago a white man was convicted of drugging, raping and videotaping 50 young native women aged 11 to 17. In Vancouver another white man targeted aboriginal women. He sexually assaulted nine women and forced them to continue to drink until they died.

I have often heard, in defence of a sexual assault law without strength or substance, that women lie about sexual assault. In fact, the opposite is true. A Winnipeg study showed that 87 per cent of sexual assault victims did not report the crime to the police. A further 12 per cent told no one at all. The reason is because it is humiliating, costly and emotionally debilitating for women to access the criminal justice system on this issue.

Forty-seven per cent of those who did not report it said they believed that the police would do nothing about it. They believed the police and courts had negative attitudes toward women and victims of sexual assault. Thirty-five per cent feared another assault by the attacker if they did report it and 64 per cent said that fear and shame kept them from reporting it.

When a woman reports sexual assault her private life is open to scrutiny as if it is anyone else's business, in a manner that no victim of any other crime is put on trial. She does not even get a lawyer to represent her. While the accused can access legal aid, she cannot. She merely has the status of a witness of a crime committed against her own body.

I have been told how police, Crown attorneys and judges can be insensitive to sexual assault victims, taking their cues from pornography, the media and misinformation rather than from compassion and reality.

An aboriginal woman from the Northwest Territories was forcibly taken from her home in Vancouver, handcuffed, confined in a space with a violent man and made to testify. Was she a criminal? No, she was the victim of a sexual assault. The man she was confined with was the man who had beaten and raped her. What other victim of a crime would be treated in this way?

The profound ignorance and insensitivity of too many police officers, lawyers and judges keeps women from reporting crimes and testifying. Many women also fear reprisals on the part of the rapist because there is no protection for them. Sometimes women just want to forget and get on with their lives rather than be tormented by the court process and wait for up to a year for the trial to come to court and be finished with.

It is finally time for that to end. This law is one legislative step. It must be accompanied by mandatory training for judges, lawyers and police officers on issues of violence against women and children, and on women's equality issues.

This law means very little when many women are afraid of the criminal justice process because they fear it will only revictimize them. Just because a woman has had sex with a partner before does not mean she has given her consent for ever and ever. No means no. It means no when the woman is a virgin; it means no when the woman is married; it means no when the woman has had several boyfriends; it means no if the woman is lesbian; it means no when she is disabled; it means no when she is a prostitute; it means no when she is homeless. There is never any excuse for sexually assaulting any woman or any child.

No means no and that is the end of it. It is clear and it is simple. We must train girls to know what their rights are and boys what their responsibilities are. Everyone—girls and women, boys and men—has the right to say no to sex. It is the responsibility of boys and men to take that no seriously.

There were amendments that I had hoped to see included in this bill, but unfortunately they were not. I still support the bill. It is a small legislative step toward that eventual goal of ending the unequal status of women and children in our society and creating a safe and open society for all of Canada's people.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, I also rise to take part in this debate. I was a member of the legislative committee. I was not a member of any of the previous committees but on the legislative committee I had very mixed feelings toward the bill.

These mixed views that I hold on the bill come from many directions. As a woman I have to say that I understand the reasons for the purpose of this bill. I also have to say that I would have liked to have seen other elements brought into consideration along with this bill. There are other stronger considerations I would have liked to have seen, but I will deal with them later in my speech.

The purpose of this bill is to tell Canadians that Parliament will no longer tolerate violence against women, particularly sexual assault.

As a lawyer I have mixed views because many of the witnesses who appeared before us have said that the bill will be challenged. As a lawyer I have to understand on what basis it will be challenged.

It will probably be challenged on the basis that this bill makes no distinction between an intentional rape or sexual assault and an unintentional rape or sexual assault. I say rape and sexual assault because rape is no longer in the Criminal Code. It is incorporated under the terms of sexual assault. I will also deal with that if I have the opportunity later. I really think that rape should be a specific section within the Criminal Code. When we can prove rape we should be proving the most offensive violence against women. As a lawyer I find it very wrong that it is not specifically there in the code.

I would like to discuss something that Professor Stuart of Queen's University said to the committee, specifically as it relates to the particular area of concern that I have about the bill being challenged under section 7. This is in reference to something said by Chief Justice Lamer.

In one of his cases he stated that there must be a difference between an intentional and an unintentional crime. As a legislator it pains me to think that we could not have come up with a better bill that would not be challenged as soon as it became law.

In the preamble the reasons for the bill are set out. It is very good to set out a preamble, but if we are using a bill to tell Canadians and educate society that this bill means serious business it seems to me that a preamble will get lost in those many statutes passed here in Parliament and across Canada.

It should have been incorporated somewhere in the Criminal Code prior to this as a preamble specifically with a sunset clause to show that after a while we should review it to see if the purpose of the legislation had been followed through or not. Therefore I really do feel, as my colleagues have said, that preamble should have been specific not just in terms of violence against women and children but specifically against doubly disadvantaged women, those groups that came before us to present their case for having a preamble that would represent visible minority women, disabled women, sex trade workers and rape crisis centre clients. They were particularly insistent in naming women who were perceived to be doubly disadvantaged. We could go on to say there are other groups that would be classified as being doubly disadvantaged.

If the minister was using a preamble to educate or to tell the judiciary and the lawyers what was the purpose of the law, then I felt it should have gone further in an attempt to hit specifically and target the doubly disabled groups. It is not doing that. It is saying women and children. Unless the woman who comes in to make a complaint looks like the policeman's wife or daughter, sometimes it is very difficult for him to believe the person is really saying: "I am serious about the charge, about the sexual assault that has just happened".

I do not think it was strong enough, for that reason, in the preamble or in incorporating it somewhere in the Criminal Code in terms of a sunset clause or in terms of a clear direction to the courts and to the enforcement people.

The women and the groups that have worked hard on this matter should be disappointed because they did not obtain a preamble for which they had worked very hard with the minister. Society as a whole knows that violence against women exists. If they are allowing Parliament to pass this legislation, they want it to be the best possible to stop the violence right away.

By the same token, I have said that there were definitely two groups of witnesses. Most of the women's groups supported the bill but wanted to see a stronger preamble. The others, the lawyers and those involved in civil liberties—no one was opposed to the purposes of the bill—felt that it lacked integrity in the sense that it would be challenged.

Probably the most important point about the preamble is the direction it gives. If a preamble gets lost in the shuffle, it has very little effect except to remind people. No judge has to be bound by a preamble whether or not what Parliament hoped to achieve by this bill is actually being followed through.

Another thing I want to say is from a legal point of view. It is difficult to pass a bill when, before it is even passed, different groups say that it will be challenged before. This bill will be challenged. It will be challenged on the mistaken belief section because it limits a defence present in the law for other crimes, shall we say. In the case of murder, if one does not have the specific intent one can be charged with manslaughter because it was a general intent.

When we do away with the mens rea that is so much a part of the Criminal Code in Canada, that specific intent, then it will be challenged.

• (1750)

Professor Stuart, who I thought had a very interesting brief, said there should be something to the effect that we have a negligent sexual assault with a five-year maximum. He said: "Given the above concerns about fairness to the accused"—and I mentioned that earlier—"and possible constitutional problems, it is suggested that section 273.2 be replaced by a provision declaring that where an accused is charged with an offence under section 271, 272 or 273, where the accused has a belief in consent but did not take reasonable steps to ascertain whether the complainant was consenting, the accused is guilty of an offence punishable on indictment with a penalty of five years imprisonment". This would take into account the person who is intoxicated and who cannot form an intent. Yet he will be found guilty, as Professor Stuart said, of a negligent sexual assault.

We are leaving too much confusion for the courts. I think what will happen is that this will become a very costly bill. Women will find that they will present a case. It will be appealed and it will be thrown out. It will become discouraging.

I realize it is encouraging that it will be made easier for women to take the process into court because of the present law, but I think women will become discouraged very quickly because it is an imperfect law. As a legislator I feel that it should be a perfect bill. If we are going to do a strict liability, that if one is intoxicated is no defence and it is the same liability as someone who took the specific intent to commit a sexual assault on a woman, we are educating Canadians in a very tough way.

I have to admire the present advertising that is being done by the Government of Ontario in terms of telling the people of Ontario that when out on a date they could be committing a sexual assault unless there is consent. It follows through from that.

By the same token, there is no education. The minister has said that there is a panel to review violence against women. Yet in the news this weekend or this past week we heard that the people on the panel were upset. The National Action Committee has said that the panel is not representing the purposes for which it was set up and has questions on that.

There is no more Court Challenges Program. Women cannot challenge decisions or find money to challenge decisions. I see a bill that should have been better perfected to enable a clear direction. Maybe there should be a panel that reviews a judge's decision that has been so clearly offensive to society in terms of a judge, as he reviews a woman before his court, saying there was no crime.

I just feel that we are passing a bill for which the purpose is very relevant, very much a part of our society, and very much a part that is not only distasteful but hateful and against women. Yet we are not talking about education in the schools, education in the universities, or education of the general population, those in law enforcement or our judicial process.

We are passing something that again leaves women exposed. We did not even put in a preamble as groups of women that came before our committee wanted. We made a few changes, mostly as a result of the Canadian Bar Association. They will perhaps improve the bill but they will not stop the challenges.

I have said already in the House tonight that I think a bill people say will be challenged before is perhaps, as some women say, better than no bill, but I find it a bit of a disservice. I find it will allow lawyers to take more challenges to court in an already heavily overworked court system in terms of the charter.

If we wanted better justice in this bill, we would have clearly stated that it was a liability, that if one was drunk one was liable on a sexual assault. We should have noted the difference, that if one is drunk and has a specific intent to go out and rape a person or sexually assault a person tonight then there is a difference. That should be noted. The crime is the crime but for the person who is intoxicated, if found guilty of the assault, the punishment is the same.

Another area I found wanting is when it comes down to the determination of allowing the voir dire, under what grounds we will allow the admissibility of past sexual history. Again I think it will be challenged unfortunately because it could go to the very basis of the truth of the matter, the full answer, and the defence.

I just think we could have passed a better bill, a stronger bill with a preamble. We could have passed a bill that would have precluded any arguments on the defence, but we would have excluded the consent based on the argument that there is no defence based on belief of consent or doing away with somebody's basic right of mistaken belief.

We could have said it clearer in this bill and we would have been telling Canadians that no means no, that there is a no means no law. At the same time we would have been telling the courts, the legal system, that there are no loopholes and that it will not be challenged the day after or the first time a charge is laid in court by a complainant. There will be a negative to what should be a good bill. This has been my concern from the beginning about this bill both as a woman who knows what is happening out there and as a lawyer who has heard in committee that it will be challenged and knows full well why it will be challenged. As a legislators I think we could have done better on a bill we all agree on so that it would not be challenged the day after it is passed.

Mr. Kilgour: Madam Speaker, it is about two or three minutes to six o'clock. Might we call it six o'clock so the bells might begin?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for me to call it six o'clock?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock p.m., pursuant to the Standing Order 45(6) the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred divisions on the motions at report stage of Bill C-55, an act to amend certain acts in relation to pensions and to enact a Special Retirement Arrangements Act and the Pension Benefits Division Act.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Friday, June 12, consideration of Bill C-55, an act to amend certain acts in relation to pensions and to enact the Special Retirement Arrangements Act and the Pension Benefits Division Act, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

And the division bells having rung:

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: The first vote is on Motion No. 2, standing in the name of Mr. Robinson.

The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:

Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare Motion No. 2 lost. I therefore declare Motions Nos. 17, 36 and 72 lost.

Mr. Gagliano: On a point of order, Madam Speaker, I think that you will find unanimous consent to apply the result of the previous vote to Motions Nos. 5, 6, 6B, 9, 9A, 10, 11, 16, 21, 25, 26, 27, 28, 51, 52, 53, 55, 73, 76A, 80, 83 and 84A.

On the motion for concurrence at report stage, we could apply the vote in reverse.

[English]

Miss Grey: Madam Speaker, I would like to have my vote recorded in reverse. I would like to vote yea on all the remaining motions and then reversed again, nay, at concurrence stage.

[Translation]

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I would like to vote with my colleagues in the Liberal caucus on all remaining clauses and of course on the motion for concurrence at the end. Unfortunately, I was not here for the first vote.

[English]

Mr. Nystrom: Madam Speaker, I was not able to be here for the first vote but I would like to have my name recorded as voting with my party for the remaining motions.

Mr. Nowlan: Madam Speaker, with respect, I think it might help if we had one more vote. I am in the same position as my colleagues. I voted one way on this motion and I intend to vote for the rest of the amendments.

After all the other members stand up and speak one more vote would take care of it. But anyway—

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am quite prepared either way or to take some votes all over again. I think it would be wise to listen to those who want to change some votes. It might be possible, with the co-operation of our clerks, to save a lot of time.

Mr. Blais: Madam Speaker, I missed the first vote. I would just like my vote to be recorded with the government for the subsequent votes.

Mr. Lapierre: Madam Speaker, I was delayed for a few minutes and it kept me from voting for the first series of amendments. I was in favour of the first motion and I agree with the proposal made by the Official Opposition Whip.

Mr. Kindy: Madam Speaker, I would like to vote with the Official Opposition.

Mr. Bélair: Madam Speaker, I too was away for the first vote, unfortunately. I would like to follow my party, as recommended by the Whip.

• (1830)

[English]

Mr. Redway: Madam Speaker, I wish my vote on Motion No. 5 to be recorded as a yes vote. On all of the other motions I wish to have my vote recorded with my party.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: I would like to point out to the House that the results of the previous vote will also apply to Motions Nos. 29, 54 and 56.

The next question is on Motion No. 5, standing in the name of Mr. Arseneault.

The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:

Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

[English]

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre) that Bill C-49, an act to amend the Criminal Code (sexual assault), be read the third time and passed.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, as a former Crown attorney who has prosecuted a number of rape cases before both judges and juries, I would like to speak in favour of Bill C–49.

In doing so, I would like to pay tribute to speakers on all sides of the House, many of whom spoke this afternoon. It seems to me that it was the House at its best. Members were speaking from both their heads and their hearts. Members on all sides of the House were doing that and I would like to pay tribute to what many of them said this afternoon.

I have a couple of comments by way of introduction of the probably thousands of cases that I have taken part in either as a Crown or defence lawyer, including a number of murder cases.

The one that troubled me the most was a rape case. Found by a passing motorist, the victim was running partly naked down a gravel road, I believe it was in November, in a snowstorm. The two accused, however, were acquitted by a jury. I do not blame either the jury or the judge but rather the tactics of the defence counsel in that particular case.

A second case involved a former constituent whose apartment was broken into by a total stranger. Afterward she worried greatly, and understandably, that she might contract AIDS. She was told when she asked if her attacker might be given a blood examination that it would constitute assault and could not be done. She worried for weeks, or possibly months, and finally the assailant, to his credit, did allow a blood test for HIV.

Third, I think of the serial rapist in Edmonton who attacked 138 women. He eventually pleaded guilty to most of those charges and was sentenced to a period of time in the penitentiary.

Recently I happened to be at a social event and I met, if you can imagine the coincidence, two of his former victims. One of them is still taking physiotherapy. The assault took place in the seventies, I believe. The other has been severely traumatized by this rape.

In that context I would like to say a few things about the subject generally. Many other speakers have spoken about the particulars of the matter and I do not think I need to go into those details.

Violence against women takes place in our homes, in our work places, in our streets. Increasingly it affects women of all ages, races, cultures and economic status. It takes many forms, from the physical such as rape, battering and dating violence, to the ideological such as misogyny and pornography, to the institutional such as wage gaps and equal career opportunities.

Family violence and violence against women in society, although occurring throughout history, have become social issues unfortunately only in recent years. The current statistics, as we have heard this afternoon, underline the scourge of violence against women across Canada.

Three women are killed every week by an intimate male partner. In the last decade half of the 2,517 women murdered were killed by men with whom they were intimate. A sexual assault is evidently now committed every 17 minutes and 90 per cent of the victims are women. One in four women will be sexually assaulted at home some time during their lives, half before the age of 17. About 56 per cent of women who live in Canadian cities fear for their safety at night.

A Decima research poll found in 1986 that one in five men admitted to having been physically violent to their wives or partners. Four years later in 1990 Decima asked women across the country what they were most afraid of. The responses, in order, were violence inside the home, poverty and violence outside the home.

Last year brought increased awareness of the continuing violence against women and more media focused, thank goodness, on the issue.

Two years after the Montreal massacre of 14 women by Marc Lepine, December 6 was designated by federal legislation as National Day of Remembrance and Action on Violence Against Women.

Finally, not so long ago the Supreme Court of Canada unanimously held that pornography is not victimless. New legislation replacing the so–called rape shield law, the bill we are discussing today, was introduced to protect the rights of women in sexual assault cases. The panel on violence against women has been established to travel across the country and seek consensus on action to end violence against women wherever it takes place.

Gun control legislation has now been passed, making it marginally more difficult to obtain weapons. Police and social services are trying harder to co-ordinate their work to assist victims of violence.

All this effort, although important and long overdue, does not address the root of the problem, for it deals only with symptoms. Effective prevention is needed to change the prevailing attitudes and stereotypes in society that lead to such widespread abuse.

• (1840)

More vigorous and smarter education aimed at 15 to 25-year old minds would help in reducing violence against women and eliminating sexism and socially imposed gender limitations from class-room practices and curriculum material. Family violence should also be part of family life classes during which techniques of peaceful conflict resolution could be taught.

In the spring of 1990, the Canadian Teachers' Federation sponsored a project entitled "Young and Female: The Realities, Concerns, Expectations and Barriers Experienced by Adolescent Women in Canada".

Approximately 1,000 adolescent girls, aged 11 to 19, and their teachers were invited to talk about the experience of being young and female in the 1990s, a period of gender role upheaval. The results reported reflect concerns, opinions and the fear of respondents and provide a startling picture of what it is like to be a teen-age girl in Canada today.

More than half of the participants expressed concerns about issues relating to violence, including child abuse, 68 per cent, and sexual abuse, 65 per cent. Dating violence and wife battering were among the top 20 issues mentioned.

I would like to say a few words about television violence because I am one of those who believe that there is a definite link, perhaps not provable at the moment, between violence on television and violence against women.

A report published in February this year by the American Psychological Association says that the average child in the United States has seen 8,000 murders and 100,000 other acts of violence on television by the time they leave elementary school. The programs were found to devalue and stereotype social groups, including Afro-Americans and women, by either excluding them from shows or giving them negative roles.

The report, based on a five-year study of nine psychologists, showed that the violence on television influences viewers, particularly children and teenagers, to use violence to resolve conflicts and makes sexual violence and rape more acceptable. Canadian statistics, though not readily available, would probably mirror such findings.

Consolidated efforts by parents, educators and policy makers should aim at stemming the avalanche of violent images broadcast into our homes as well as limiting the time young people watch TV through alternative, more active entertainment.

The extent of dating violence is difficult to estimate because it is rarely reported to police. Date rape has the lowest report rate of all forms of rape. It is estimated that only 1 per cent of such crimes are reported.

The Ms. campus project on sexual assault, an extensive study on patterns of sexual aggression on college campuses, revealed that one quarter of women in American colleges today have been victims of rape or attempted rape.

Almost 90 per cent of them knew the assailant. A study on dating violence conducted by the Richmond Women's Resource Centre Association last year revealed the extent of the problem in B.C.'s lower mainland, which only recently became more known to the general public.

The authors, while outlining preventative measures, stressed that social services simply lack the resources to deal effectively with violence against women or date rape. Existing prevention and educational programs were found to be inadequate. In short, there simply still is not enough awareness and sensitivity to the issue of date rape to result in a closely co-ordinated and effective response to the victims and those perpetuating such violence. All of us must do our best personally to change the status quo here with all deliberate speed.

Many universities have attempted to face the issue of violence against their female students. Sexual harassment policies are being redrafted, workshops on gender issues, date rape, sexism and racism are held, and codes of discipline for social behaviour are being considered.

The most important change which would have the greatest impact on eradicating violent attitudes toward women has to come from within. As I speak, I refer to men in this House and elsewhere who have not yet fully accepted women as equal partners in all walks of life. They must critically examine their own latent prejudices, sexism and outdated attitudes.

The problem of violence is not a women's issue; it is a societal issue in general and a men's issue in particular. We cannot legislate attitudes but we can work together to get them changed. It would be in the best interests of all Canadians.

Canadians finally appear to have become convinced that pornography is simply hate literature against women, children and the family. The perennial question our legislatures ignore, however, is: Does pornography defined as the visual representation of sexual behaviour that includes a degrading portrayal of a human being result in increased violence to women and children?

One recent book by two Canadian authors, W. J. Marshall and Sylvia Barret, Criminal Neglect, presents a disturbing account of how our criminal justice system ignores the devastating effects of sexual assault and outlines how most offenders go free.

The authors, among other equally disturbing evidence, cite the case of Ted Bundy, perhaps one of the most notorious serial killers. He admitted that his repeated exposure to violence, particularly sexual violence in various media, triggered his sexual fantasies and dreams and eroded his inhibitions from acting them out. By his own admission, Bundy's taste for violent and graphic pornography started at the age of 12 when he first discovered the type of soft pornography commonly sold in corner grocery stores.

It is also known that our own country's worst serial killer, Clifford Olson, carried a brief-case full of pornography on his trips around British Columbia during which he murdered 11 children over a period of nine months.

Pornography is now estimated as a $10 billion a year industry on this continent and is one graphic expression of anti-women, anti-child sentiments rampant in our society. Advertising is as guilty of conveying this message of pornography by using sexually explicit images of half-naked women selling particular types of cars, brands of beer or after-shave. Movies and songs often portray men in positions of power and authority and women in submissive, often negative stereotype roles.

Personally, I do not believe the increasing availability of hard-core pornography reflects contemporary values or attitudes in our country. Au contraire, there has been a strong public demand for the elimination of violent and kiddy porn from our society. People who purvey this type of smut cannot expect to find protection under the charter of rights as we found recently from the Supreme Court of Canada.

I believe that legislation prohibiting or restricting pornography would fall squarely within the provisions of article 1 of the charter, "subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society".

There is no doubt that the ultimate effect of revised legislation on pornography would be more controls on material that is widely available in Canada today. The point must be made that most pornography is dehumanizing and serves to perpetuate unacceptable myths about women in our society. It is simply hate literature against both sexes. These stereotypes are also consistent with the attainment of full equality for Canadian women which is required by both common sense and section 15 of the charter of rights.

This fact, combined with strong indications that women and children are the victims of pornography, make smut something to be restricted in any civilized society. This is an area where we, of course, need as much consensus as possible.

By way of conclusion, I wish to make a few specific comments on Bill C-49. There are certainly things about the bill which are less than perfect. As my colleague the member for Cape Breton mentioned, there are certainly things we could have done better in the bill.

In fairness, it does provide for strict guidelines in determining the admissibility of past sexual history as evidence. It does outline clearly the procedure that must be followed in admitting such evidence and it does define the notion of consent to sexual activity.

The Minister of Justice intends that the preamble to the bill will be used for guidance by trial judges and lawyers alike. I would point out, however, that to my knowledge the preamble to a bill is not a direction that courts can or should follow. My understanding of preambles to bills is that they are simply so many words put together which any court or any judge across the land essentially would ignore. The minister may be overly sanguine in thinking it is going to act as a guide to judges and lawyers alike.

• (1850)

All members in this House hope the fact that an accused has to make a written application to the court for a hearing to determine the admissibility of sexual conduct evidence will help. The prosecutor and the court clerk would then have seven days to review the submission before any hearing to determine admissibility. Such evidence would have to be of specific instances of sexual activity, be relevant to an issue to be proved at trial and have significant probative value not "substantially outweighed by the danger of prejudice against the complainant". There would, of course, be a publication ban on all evidence obtained in such a submission.

There are matters that the court should consider in determining whether to admit such evidence. The Supreme Court of Canada will presumably have to decide whether this is valid under the charter of rights.

The boldest feature of the bill is its attempt to define consent. It defines it in the bill as "the voluntary agreement of the complainant to engage in sexual activity but also removes or limits the defence of honest but mistaken belief in consent". It also, thank goodness, invalidates consent obtained in a number of circumstances which I will not go into. It removes the defence of mistaken belief in consent where the belief was based on the accused's self-induced intoxication or recklessness or wilful blindness. It also adds "all reasonable steps" must be taken by the accused to ascertain consent. It places an evidentiary burden upon the accused using the defence of mistaken belief and consent.

I think it is clear, it seems to be clear, to everybody in the House that we do need a new law against sexual assault which will deal with the reality of the crime, in some cases lifelong devastation on victims who find themselves victims of this type of horrific crime. I think that it will be no surprise to other members—and my time is up too, or virtually up—that we will be voting for this bill and hoping that the courts, defence counsel and Crown counsel across the country and above all the victims of these crimes will be significantly better off with its passage.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak on this particular bill as I did during second reading and to reiterate what has been said by other of my colleagues that we on this side are supportive of the bill, supportive of its direction and will support the bill when it is voted upon. That is not to say that there are not some concerns, some worries, but as to the general direction and what was trying to be accomplished with the legislative process, we are supportive. Everyone knows that the Supreme Court of Canada struck down the law and there is some question mark as to whether this bill will follow the same fate. It is possible that this legislation is not charter-proof.

When we read the statistics and hear the information as to the number of unreported rapes that occur and the number of rapes that occur and get a sense of the magnitude of the problem, I think we have to go that extra mile to try to come forward with legislation which encourages women to report rapes and encourages the process of reporting and dealing with this particular problem because it is a major problem.

As some have mentioned earlier, I had the privilege of being on the committee that looked at Bill C-36. We met the victims of the Takahashi rape case and realized that perhaps over 150 women were raped and only six to nine were considered for charges. The lesser number were charged. We heard about the trauma that those women went through. Some came forward and reported the rapes and some could not face that reality. We have to put in place a system which makes women feel comfortable in dealing with that particular problem. We have to come up with the necessary support mechanisms to assist the victims. Some of the information that came forward was really quite horrendous as to victimizing the victims throughout the whole process rather than rendering that kind of assistance.

In my opinion, one of the victimizations would be the introduction on a wholesale basis of a person's previous sexual conduct which, in all candour, has nothing to do with the particular case or 99.44 per cent of the time has nothing to do with the particular case before the bar. Therefore, in that sense, it is incumbent upon us to come forward with some legislation to deal with that.

When you look at the history of this whole area of the law, it goes back to the concept that a woman's sexual history and reputation were considered relevant in a rape or an indecent assault trial since the lack of chastity of a female complainant was accepted as indicating her propensity both to agree to sexual activity and to lie about the fact afterward. That was the whole idea of introducing all of this evidence on previous conduct. We all know that is not really relevant in today's society, nor is it relevant to deal with the events of whether or not an offence in fact has occurred.

As I indicated earlier, one of the key points is to find the mechanism that will allow women to feel free to report the situation and come forward, and not feel that they are the ones who are going to be charged and on trial during the process. We have to change that system so they do not feel they are the victims and the ones who are on trial.

We are supportive of the legislation, but we have some concerns. I just want to read a few things into the record just to give you an idea. I think the Liberal Party has talked about changes to the preamble and, in particular, the first whereas clause. I will read this clause into the record first and then some of the comments of groups who appeared before the committee and had some comments about it.

I will quote the first clause: "Whereas the Parliament of Canada is gravely concerned about the incidence of sexual violence and abuse in Canadian society and in particular the prevalence of sexual assault against women and children". That is in the preamble and we are supportive of that, but we feel that it should be expanded because there are some specially disadvantaged women and children who require that special notice.

I would like to read from a number of those groups just to give an idea of their thoughts and to have them on record with respect to this legislation. I will deal first with the Disabled Women's Network of Canada which stated: "On the preamble, because women with disabilities belong to every other group and because we are the most vulnerable in each case, it is imperative that we be identified and named in the preamble of Bill C–49. The naming of women and children with disabilities in the preamble will not only advise any would–be perpetrators that women with disabilities are protected by this law, it will also let women and children with disabilities know that they are protected and that sexual offences against us are punishable. Mentioning women with disabilities in the preamble makes us visible. It makes us know that we are part of this new bill. It also lets police and judges know. They have not always been sensitive to the fact that we are as worthy of that protection as other women".

Another national organization dealing with immigrants and visible minority women in Canada states: "Immigrants, refugees, domestic workers and women of colour experience racism as well as sexism in every aspect of their lives in Canada, and that includes our dealing with the justice system. We must neither assume that there are no differences nor must we stereotype the differences. The point is to recognize and respect the differences. When you talk about people you have to make it so tight for us that we can then fight our own battles. We do not want you to do all our work, but you have to arm us with the tools so we can say to the police that Parliament says we are a vulnerable group".

Look at native women. All you have to do is look at the statistics dealing with native women and you realize the problem that is there and why that perhaps should have been included in the preamble of this bill. I will quote from the Native Women's Association of Canada: "It has been estimated that eight out of 10 aboriginal women will be beaten or sexually assaulted in their lifetimes. While fear of assault may be a real part of the lives of most Canadian women, being assaulted is too often just a daily reality for aboriginal women".

I also have a statement from the National Association of Women and the Law which states: "We note that the bill says there be no publication. We are concerned with that because we believe there is a clear directive that our judicial system must be accountable for the decisions that are made. If there is a publication ban on the reasons in the voir dire, clearly there is no judicial accountability".

• (1900)

Women are playing a very strong role in wanting the system to be accountable to them. Women and children from different groups, the disabled, minority groups and native groups, want to feel they are getting protection from the system. As we go through the process that I have gone through, sitting on a number of committees that deal with justice bills, we are left with the impression that all of the protections for those disadvantaged groups are not available.

Turning to the minister's decision to take out "all reasonable steps" and substituting "to take reasonable steps" in the legislation, we think that it has achieved the desired goal and we hope that the change will help the bill to withstand a charter challenge. We want this legislation to survive. We want it to function and function properly. We are hopeful that this change will achieve that goal.

In essence, we on this side have made our contribution to try to make the law better. The government has not seen the wisdom of some of the amendments that we have brought forward but at the same time that does not stop us from trying to lead this government to the right conclusions and in the right direction, even though it is sometimes stubborn.

This bill will go a long way to help solve the problem. It will not solve the problem of rape. It will not solve the problem of abuse against women and against children. It will take one small step in that particular area. It will take that one step of protecting women so that they do not become victims of the process. We still have to face those other fundamental issues and get to those fundamental root problems, but at least we are remedying part of the problem in the area of process.

We on this side are supportive of Bill C–49 and will be there to vote for it when the time comes. Thank you for the opportunity to address this bill, Mr. Speaker.

Government Orders

DIVORCE ACT

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada) moved that Bill C–79, an act to amend the Divorce Act and the Family Order and Agreements Enforcement Assistance Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure to present to you today for second reading a bill which contains a series of amendments to the Divorce Act and the Family Order and Agreements Enforcement Assistance Act. The bill is intended to improve the operation of both those statutes and in some cases avoid serious problems of application.

In the summer of 1991 the Minister of Justice announced a comprehensive review of family law which should, over the next few years, lead to reforms in the crucial areas of child support, spousal support and custody and access. The bill before us today constitutes the first phase.

Phase two of the initiative includes public consultations on child support, spousal support, and custody and access in co–operation with the federal–provincial–territorial family law committee.

I am certain the family law initiative will convey two significant benefits. It will ensure our legislation is up to date and in keeping with the realities of today's families. In addition, the reforms in the areas of family support and federal support enforcement will enable some single parent families to live independent of public assistance, thus making more effective use of public resources.

In June 1986 a substantially revised Divorce Act took effect. Changes in terminology and substance were introduced to almost every section of the former divorce legislation. In addition, the Family Orders and Agreements Enforcement Assistance Act was passed the same year. This new act enabled the federal government for the first time to assist the provinces in the enforcement of child and spousal support orders.

Part I of the Family Orders and Agreements Enforcement Assistance Act provides for the release of information to locate persons who defaulted on these orders or missing family members, while Part II regulates the garnishment of various federal moneys such as income tax refunds payable to the support debtor.

The justice department has carefully monitored the implementation of this legislation and consulted with the various groups affected by it.

Through the process of consultations, proposals were developed to address the problems of application with respect to each act. These are the proposals that are now found in Bill C–79.

I will first deal with the amendments to the Divorce Act which propose to reform the jurisdictional rules regarding corollary relief proceedings after divorce and interprovincial variation proceedings. This bill would provide greater flexibility in choosing the proper jurisdiction.

A second problem of application relates to the provincial order section. A provisional order is the result of a two–step procedure to vary a support order where the parties do not reside in the same province.

Bill C–79 clarifies that the two–step provisional variation proceedings be used where spouses reside in different provinces and the proceedings must proceed in the absence of the applicant or respondent party, as the case may be, if the parties cannot agree on the jurisdiction. This amendment then carries out the intent of the 1986 Divorce Act.

The bill also introduces a provision which would offer an alternative to provisional variation proceedings. This new section would highlight the use of affidavits, teleconferencing, or other means of telecommunication in variation proceedings where the parties agree and where territorial and provincial court rules allow.

The bill also addresses the problem of application relating to the Family Orders and Agreements Enforcement Assistance Act. This act mandates two services to Canadian citizens. The first is a tracing service designed to access federal data banks to obtain information which will help trace individuals in contravention of a custody access or support order agreement. The second service is provided by a unit which garnishes designated federal payments payable to support debtors.

The amendments to the Family Orders and Agreements Enforcement Assistance Act would facilitate police officers' access to the federal tracing service.

As well, the bill proposes to make all tracing searches ongoing for a period of one year rather than there being only one search as at the present time. Among the amendments affecting garnishment it is proposed that a garnishee summons bind Her Majesty for five years as opposed to the current one–year binding period. We expect that a five–year summons will save both the enforcement service and provincial services time and expense.

Pursuant to section 58 of the act, a fee may be charged for each garnishee summons served. The bill will provide for a regulatory power for collecting the fee so that it may be collected in a manner which is more bearable to the debtor. For example, the fee could be collected in yearly instalments rather than in one lump sum.

• (1910)

Other proposals in the bill before us include clarification on the operation of the notice of garnishment. A new provision would enable the establishment by way of regulations of federal levels of hold back. A hold back is that portion of a payment not subject to garnishment and is usually applied to the sum needed by a debtor for subsistence.

These levels of hold back would replace the current plethora of provincial hold back levels which have the effect of subjecting recipients of federal funds to different hold back conditions, depending upon their province of residence. The hold backs will simplify administration and ensure a quality of treatment of all creditors and debtors.

It is the government's intention to introduce a hold back level of 50 per cent for the following funds: unemployment insurance payments; Canada Pension Plan payments; federal training allowances and old age security payments.

In conclusion, I believe that Bill C–79 can accomplish the following two objectives in answer to the previously noted problems of application concerning the Divorce Act and Family Orders and Agreements Enforcement Assistance Act.

First, it would make both acts more responsive to the needs of today's divorced and separated families, and second, it would streamline the tracing and garnishment systems to make them more accessible and more efficient.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, Bill C–79 goes somewhat toward making the situation in this country a little less of a national disgrace.

It is the problem of child support, of spousal support. I do not think it is possible to relate to this House the misery and the deprivation that single parents, divorced women with children, are going through because the system is not working for them. I think we should be going farther than we are going in this bill to address this situation.

As I mentioned, there are some good points in this bill and this does help the process. It is mainly a technical bill, but it does make some improvements. It was written in consultation with the provinces, the territories and the Canadian Bar Association and it is part of phase one of the minister's family law reform initiative.

The other part is a feasibility study for a national family law data base. We have a lot of data on this question already. We have the data that support payments are well below what they should be. A lot of them are not enforced at all, and I will give more information on this later. The system is not working for people in this country. While it is nice to have feasibility studies, the information that we need is already known to the government.

Bill C–79 will amend the Divorce Act and the Family Orders and Agreements Enforcement Assistance Act. Its goal is to improve the effectiveness of the support payments system. That in itself is very laudatory. It will also improve the tracing and garnishment systems for support payments, as the hon. parliamentary secretary has stated.

The major change to the Divorce Act appears to be a simplification of the law so that it will be easier for former spouses living in different provinces to apply for a custody or a support order. They would no longer have to be heard in the province where the divorce was granted, and only one of the former spouses would have to reside in the province where the application for the order is made. This will save both time and money and greatly benefit single mothers, most of whom, as I have mentioned, live under the poverty line.

There is also an allowance for the use of teleconferencing of sworn affidavits if the provincial court allows it. This should also free up court time.

Changes to the Family Order and Agreements Enforcement Assistance Act will also reduce costs, this time for investigating child abduction. The proposed amendments would remove the requirement that police officers get court authorization to use federal data banks for tracing individuals in cases of spousal child abduction.

Other changes to this act make garnishee summonses valid for five years rather than the present one year, as the parliamentary secretary also stated.

These amendments would also allow the garnishee summons fee to be paid in instalments. This is to avoid financial hardship for former spouses, mostly women in this case, and regulations would allow that part of the garnishee payment held back for subsistence needs to be set at 50 per cent for UI payments, CPP payments, federal training allowance, and for OAS payments. The parliamentary secretary mentioned that also.

These provisions, as far as they go, are important, but so much time has been wasted in getting to the real problems that exist in this country for single parents. Why are we not doing more at this stage? Why are we doing more studying when the need to aid these families is so great?

At the outset I would like to say that the majority of Canadian child support orders are in arrears. That in itself is a disgrace. Most mother–led post–divorce families live in poverty. That is also a disgrace. This would still be the case even if all payments were made because the orders are ridiculously low.

First, most child support orders are in arrears. Second, most mother–led post–divorce families live in poverty. These families would still be living in poverty even if the payments were made because the payments are so low.

This is a tragedy in this day and age. Two–thirds of divorced mother and children households live in poverty, even with the support payments arriving on time. Contrast this with the fact that 16 per cent of ex–husbands are living below the poverty line after making support payments. Without these payments 75 per cent of mother–children households would be living in poverty.

During the 1980s there was a drive to reform the support system but this has done very little to resolve the problem. The Ontario government has now taken over the collection of support payments, and 75 per cent of those support payments, of those collections, are in arrears.

The larger problem of unrealistically low court order payments remains even if we have a better system of collection.

This is presumably why the minister introduced her child support guidelines research paper. However the research paper, the data base and all of the talking is not going to help these people. These are young families, young children and former spouses, who are in need of some financial assistance and they are not getting it. The system must be speeded up. It must be more resolved to do something to help these families.

The minister outlines in her paper four approaches to estimating the costs of child rearing and includes detailed calculations based on each of them for families of different sizes, children of different ages, and so on. That is very important information. However, if they do not have the money then this is going to be of very little use to them. They need the actual support.

• (1920)

A research paper by Miriam Grassby, published in the May 1991 issue of Reports of Family Law, shows that the average support awarded is considerably less than half of the actual costs of raising children. Even the support payments, when they are obtained, are less than half of what is actually needed to raise those children.

An already impoverished wife ends up paying a disproportionate share of child costs. She is left with no money whatsoever for leisure or savings for even a modest retirement. Any kind of retirement package is out of the question. She also ends up footing the bill for the emotional and recreational needs of her children, needs an absent and considerably wealthier ex-husband could in most cases give and can very easily ignore because of the system.

Ms. Grassby says:

> It is easy to deprive children if you appear to be paying a large amount for child support. It is very difficult to deprive children if you are living with them.

While the ex-husbands and the fathers may be living in a different province and feel they are being very generous, in most cases they are not. They are not even beginning to meet the needs of the children they profess to care for and have such concern for.

While mothers are living in abject poverty trying to meet the needs of the children, and in most cases using every cent that comes forward for their children and denying themselves of anything other than the bare necessities, the system continues to roll on with studies and does not make a meaningful contribution or meaningful declaration to end these injustices.

Judges also often seem unaware of the barriers to a woman becoming self-sufficient if she is older, even in her forties. Not only may she be lacking in skills, experience and opportunity, but as the custodial parent she is not free to travel, work long hours, study at night or socialize with colleagues.

We might also bring up the terrible inequities that exist within our tax system. It is a fact that in this country today a man gets to deduct his child support payments directly from the amount of tax he must pay. The mother must pay income tax on what she receives from him as well as on her own earnings. Where is the justification for this?

First, the payments are ridiculously low. They are not receiving anywhere near the support payments they should be getting.

Second, the orders to enforce these payments are in arrears. They are not being served or enforced.

Third, the meagre amount that the single mother, the former wife, receives she must pay income tax on while the husband gets the amount he pays deducted from his tax payable. I do not see how we can continue to drag our feet while this sort of thing goes on in this country.

I would ask the parliamentary secretary and the minister to do more to correct this injustice.

I know that a lot of this is provincial jurisdiction. It will require working with the provinces. The sooner these conferences and meetings start the sooner we will get somewhere in dealing with this problem. We cannot go on just talking about it and saying that because we have made some improvements that we have corrected the system. We have not corrected the system. We are a long way from correcting the system.

We need to get all of the governments involved in this together. There must be a more meaningful determination to correct this situation.

I would once again ask the government to do more to bring a speedy end to this problem. These children are growing up in poverty. They are a concern to their parents and they are a concern to this country because they are not being treated fairly.

We can only surmise what this is contributing to in terms of juvenile delinquency or problems with young offenders. There are no statistics on that nor will we be able to get any. Certainly if they see the injustice that is continuing there will be a bitterness on their part against the system, against the government, and against the way in which they have been treated.

This is really not helping anyone. It may be allowing the ex-husband to have more disposable income for himself. When we consider the real needs more disposable income for him is certainly not at the top of the priority list. Concern and support for these children and former wives is much higher on the priority list, and if it is not it certainly should be.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to speak on behalf of the New Democratic Party on this matter and also to speak on behalf of our justice critic, the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, who is unable to attend this debate this afternoon.

The bill before us is Bill C-79, an act to amend the Divorce Act and the Family Order and Agreements Enforcement Assistance Act. As the parliamentary secretary stated earlier in his speech, this bill will result in less red tape and simpler procedures for obtaining and updating support orders and better tracing services. The legislation should mean an improvement to the respective acts. We welcome the opportunity to examine the specific changes proposed.

The bill includes amendments to the Divorce Act so that future applications for custody or support will no longer have to be heard in the province in which the divorce was granted and only one of the former spouses would have to reside in the province in which application for the order is made.

This is a very important section. Anybody who has dealt in the area of family law has often run into problems in which the custody area has to be changed and the applicant is in a different jurisdiction than the respondent. It often causes many difficulties when there simply is not enough money for either one of the parties to change venues or meet the court in the venue in which the application has been commenced. This is a very positive part of the bill that will and should be supported with some changes.

This bill also includes amendments to the Family Order and Agreements Enforcement Assistance Act that would remove the requirement that police officers obtain court authorization to use federal data banks for tracing individuals in cases of spousal child abduction. Police officers will no longer be expected to lay a charge before accessing the name and address information that will help them with their investigation. This certainly makes sense to me.

As well, garnishee summonses for the support payments would be valid for five years rather than the present one-year term. This is particularly important as it is often the experience of custodial parents, those women and children who are waiting for support payments, that they must wait many months for tracing services to find the father who has failed to meet his support payment obligation.

For example, presently a wait of six months leaves only six months of garnisheed support payments until the process must be started all over again. There seems to be a loss of time, a loss of effort, and often a loss of money to the spouse who is looking for the support payment. This must be seen to be an improvement, though recent developments at the provincial level give rise to hope that the wage garnishment procedure will become less and less the tool of last resort for women and for the children who have been abandoned by their fathers. Historically, the responsibility for enforcing family orders and agreements has fallen to the provincial governments.

• (1930)

Until the passing of the Family Order and Agreements Enforcement Assistance Act in 1986 there was no tracing information service available at the federal level and federal moneys were immune from garnishment.

In fact, most of the data we have available telling us just how many thousands of fathers are skipping out on their obligations to support their children comes to us from provincial levels.

In Ontario alone, for example, over 75 per cent of support payments are in arrears. That is $400 million that mothers and children have done without because fathers do not want to make their payments. I say fathers because evidence shows that over 97 per cent of payers are men.

There is no need to rely upon terms like payer and recipient when we know that we are talking about women and children who are doing without because men do not want to make payments and have skipped out on the responsibility to their children and their former spouses.

In Ontario, the government has responded to this chronic situation with a new family support plan that is a radical and positive departure from the wage garnishment procedure. In order to apply for wage garnishment, women have had to wait until there has been a default or non-payment. Often they end up waiting over a period of months until there is clear evidence of this. They then have to apply for tracing and location services from the appropriate provincial offices which will turn to the federal services if necessary.

In Ontario, wage garnishment lasted six years. So bringing the federal equivalent closer into line by raising it to five years from one year as this bill will do is a welcome change.

The Ontario government has gone one step further. It implemented a support deduction order which will come into effect at the same time a court makes the support order. The program will serve notice to the employer who must begin deducting support payments from the father's net wages. The support deduction order is portable. It will move from employer to employer and the father must inform the program office of a new employer.

But just as important, this support deduction order lasts as long as the support order so it is really a positive step and a bit of a radical step. It is a step that we should be looking at when this bill gets into committee.

But as I have said, this is new in Canada. It may, in fact, make garnishee summonses a thing of the past for many cases in Ontario, as it has in most of the United States. I hope that other provincial governments are watching this development. There may already be others planning such an initiative. We need to take all of the steps we can to improve the enforcement of support orders.

As I mentioned at the beginning of my speech, we welcome the opportunity to examine this proposed legislation in more detail in committee. We do not want to subject this bill to lengthy debate at this stage. I do want to raise one more matter before I conclude.

At the same time as the minister introduced this bill, she also released to this House and to the public a report entitled The Financial Implications of Child Support Guidelines. That report is the second report of the federal-provincial-territory family law committee and is part of the minister's family law reform initiative announced in June 1991.

There can be no question of the need to establish guidelines on child support payments. Support payments established by the courts are often far too low to meet the basic needs of children and vary widely in rulings of an otherwise similar nature. Those of us who have been in court on occasion, in family court, from court to court and from region to region, have seen some of these disparities.

That report may provide some valuable insight into the process of determining those guidelines. It may have a significant impact on the well-being of 40 per cent of Canadian children who are affected by family breakdown, the three-quarters of a million children in Canada living with their mothers in poverty.

We need to arrive at adequate guidelines for support payments through an accurate evaluation of the needs children have. As the government-released background to this report states, the report has been released to ensure informed public discussion on the child support guidelines option.

It is based on the work of three economists contracted separately by the department to examine the economic models used to estimate expenditures on children, identify the strengths and weaknesses of each model, suggest appropriate approaches and provide data using those approaches in simulation with family expenditure survey data provided by Statistics Canada.

The report makes absorbing though technical reading. As I mentioned, it is available to the public as are copies of the studies completed by the three economists.

The Department of Justice has also contributed to a committee of two economists, an accountant and a legal anthropologist. That committee produced a report which gave an independent review of the literature and studied the suitability of various economic methods for estimating expenditures on children in Canada.

The results of the work of that group have not been included in the document released by the minister. The only reference to it states, and I quote from page 4 of the report: "The report contains two very different conclusions regarding economic modelling and the best way of measuring the cost of children. This came about because the participants brought to the project two fundamentally different views of how to approach the problem of estimating child expenditures."

The report also mentions that there were time constraints involved. It is clear that the primary reason for exclusion is the fundamentally different views brought to the project by this group. Were this an independent body or an independent inquiry responsible to the House of Commons and not an internal Department of Justice project we and the public would have access to that report. As it stands now, we do not.

It certainly would not cost more money if the report was to the House of Commons rather than the Department of Justice, would it? So as we are not saving money in this case, one might ask if we are going to save any money for example on the studies that the Department of Justice has assumed on behalf of the former Law Reform Commission of Canada.

I leave it to the members of this House to ponder yet again the question of why this government and this department is so eager to do this kind of work in the House as opposed to outside where we can all observe the findings, where we can learn from and engage in informed public discussions.

The members present might be interested to know that this other report, what I will call the fourth report, suggested an entirely different approach to the economic models proposed for examination after the non-economists on the team questioned the assumptions implicit in them and after they raised some points which got the economists working with them looking at the models under a new light, perhaps a more reality-based light.

The fourth report found that there were many limitations to the existing economic research. It was found that there had been statistically unreliable results from this research. Further, some results showed negative child-rearing costs. In the real world, it is not unusual for a mother to take maternity leave and then work fewer hours in the paid work force. Such a situation results in those economic models showing a negative cost in raising that baby. Perhaps the academics have missed something here.

What we are saying in this report is that while the mother may have earned a set amount of money, originally she made certain cutbacks in her expectations and therefore spent less money when the baby came along. By doing that, these studies have shown that in fact she is spending less money even though she has a child which is supposedly costing her more.

At the very least it would be most useful for us to have all of the information available to have a complete picture of what we are dealing with including all of the warts, false assumptions and mistakes that have been made if we are truly to have what the minister has identified as informed public discussion of child support guidelines.

In conclusion, I would like to say we are pleased to have the opportunity to work on these amendments to the Divorce Act and the Family Order and Agreements Enforcement Assistance Act.

We want to encourage the minister to continue to move in a direction that will address child support guidelines. We also want to encourage the government to examine closely the taxation of child support payments, a situation which, to quote from one man who said to Mary McIver of Homemaker's: "Because my wife and I are living apart I get rewarded with a tax break and she gets screwed".

• (1940)

In a recent Statistics Canada study, it was shown that the per capita income of families receiving support payments was 41 per cent of the per capita income of the support payer's family. This issue needs to be looked at soon.

I would also encourage the minister to carry further her commitment to the well-being of Canada's children, to work hard in her caucus to support those initiatives that will really benefit the hundreds of thousands of Canadian children who continue to exist in poverty.

Take another look at a national child care program. This government has not provided any improved access to child care. Lack of affordable, accessible, non-profit child care is one of the major reasons for keeping poor Canadians, particularly women and single mothers, out of the work force.

Take another look at the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan. Take another look at the decision to cut the co-op housing program. Take another look at better funding for job training programs. These are the kinds of programs that will give Canadian women the help they need to provide adequate support to their children, the opportunities they need to get good jobs and provide for their families.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works) moved that Bill C-82, an act to amend the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act and the National Housing Act and to amend another act in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

He said: It is a pleasure for me to speak briefly on these rather important measures that pertain to housing and to confirm that they will be referred to a legislative committee.

I had understood that this was perhaps more in accordance with what the original arrangement had been agreed upon rather than to try and do it in all stages as we had discussed earlier.

The purpose of this bill is to refine the legislation governing federal housing policies and programs. There is nothing more important to Canadians in general than the state of their housing. The management and access of financing are key to this. It is kind of interesting to see how things have changed in that regard. I was reading the other day a quote from the Danish writer, Henrik Ibsen. He was talking about housing in those days in his celebrated work A Doll's House. He said that there can be no freedom or beauty about a home life that depends on borrowing and debt.

I suggest to the House that this is exactly the opposite now and that one has to have access to borrowing and debt in order to enjoy the kind of amenities in housing that Canadians feel they are entitled to have.

The purpose of this bill is to refine the legislation governing federal housing policy and programs. The government is putting forward these amendments with three important principles in mind.

Public loan insurance under the National Housing Act should promote reasonable, equal access to housing finance, and lowest feasible costs and over-all self-sufficiency of the mortgage insurance fund.

In both market and social housing programs, Canada Mortgage and Housing seeks out and takes advantage of opportunities to improve the cost-effectiveness of the programs. The efficiency of their delivery and the ongoing effectiveness is basic and Canada Mortgage and Housing should and must exercise responsibility for its financing activities within a framework and in accordance with standards promoted by the Department of Finance.

As the federal government's housing agency, Canada Mortgage and Housing works with other levels of government and a host of stakeholders to ensure that Canadians have equal access to decent, affordable, and adequate housing.

The corporation is responsible for promoting the construction of new homes, the repair and renovation of existing ones, and improving the level of housing conditions in general across our country.

Canada Mortgage and Housing is a leader in the development of new financial mechanisms to stimulate the private housing market. It also is at the forefront in providing social housing programs for Canadians most in need and it is the prime source of housing expertise right across the board.

The Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act and National Housing Act contain the legislative authority for Canada Mortgage and Housing to carry out its mandate of helping to house Canadians, a mandate which everyone involved with the corporation takes very seriously indeed.

We recognize the importance of being able to change with the times and to ensure that we will be able to carry out our mandate effectively in the future. That is why the House is being asked to consider very seriously the amendments contained in Bill C-82.

These amendments introduce new financial and administrative measures designed to improve the efficiency of CMHC's business operations. The corporation will be able to operate more effectively by improving over-all cost-effectiveness, administration and the delivery of federal housing programs, and some of the main provisions of this legislation are as follows.

This bill will allow Canada Mortgage and Housing to assume more direct responsibility and accountability for its financial affairs. It will do this by enabling CMHC to obtain funding from and invest in the capital market.

The bill contains a provision to allow CMHC to directly finance social housing projects at lower interest rates. CMHC will look to the lending community as a source of funding to allow for the direct financing of social housing. This, we feel, could save more than $150 million in social housing costs over the next five years. By so doing it becomes evident these savings can be utilized for the benefit of the Canadian housing sector.

The Mortgage-Backed Securities program is often used when renewing assisted housing mortgages to obtain lower interest rates. Direct financing is another financial mechanism and the advantages of the various options included therein will be compared and perhaps levered in order to achieve the best possible rates which again will be of great benefit. The direct financing provision will require Order in Council approval, needless to say, before it comes into force.

Another significant amendment involves requiring owners of assisted housing projects to accept as a condition of assistance that they will not sell their projects without CMHC approval. This provision is needed to help ensure that where CMHC agrees to provide assistance, the assisted housing remains as a societal asset which cannot be sold or converted for some other purpose without prior approval.

The existing legislation does not provide this support and it is possible for some assisted housing projects to be sold or taken out of the social housing portfolio if sponsors wish to take advantage of market appreciation. This is, of course, contrary to the federal government's goal of maintaining assisted housing for social housing clients over the long term.

The proposed amendment would clearly establish the government's intent to preserve this stock of existing housing. It will reinforce clauses in project operating agreements to ensure that owners maintain the social purpose of the housing for the life of their agreement with Canada Mortgage and Housing.

• (1950)

This bill also contains provisions which would allow CMHC, depending on its future business needs, to consider the option of delegating some of its mortgage insurance responsibilities to selected approved lenders, provided that appropriate arrangements are in place for Canada Mortgage and Housing to monitor and control these delegated functions.

The amendments proposed also allow Canada Mortgage and Housing to supply housing-related property management and developmental services to federal government departments and agencies. It allows CMHC to supply services to support federal-provincial housing arrangements in a cost-effective manner. The proposed amendment makes it clear that CMHC may—it has the possibility, it is an enabling provision—charge fees for these services.

It is obvious to the House that Canada Mortgage and Housing has a contribution to make across the board to other government agencies as well in matters relating to housing. Probably these enlarged powers would have come in very handy in the case of Summerside when all resources were being focused in an effort to find a solution for that problem.

With this amendment, Canada Mortgage and Housing would no longer be required to acquire ownership of the relevant property in order to apply its expertise. Over the years, Canada Mortgage and Housing has accumulated extensive, specialized expertise in housing-related property management and development. As I mentioned earlier, we know that many other federal departments and agencies would benefit from it.

The Canada Mortgage Loan Insurance Program is a vital component of facilitating Canadians access to mortgage funds which are needed to acquire decent and affordable housing. We want to continue to provide that kind of assistance in the future. Bill C-82 will therefore increase the existing limit on outstanding loan insurance from the current $60 billion up to $100 billion. The new limit of $100 billion is estimated to be adequate for the next five years.

The bill also contains a number of amendments to consolidate CMHC's borrowing authority. These amendments will give CMHC access to financial markets, modernize its investment authorities and rationalize its income tax status. There will be one central statutory authority for CMHC to borrow to fund its program loans and investments and financial management. This means that the agency will enjoy more flexibility in finding sources of funding and will be able to take advantage of favourable interest rates and conditions.

The income tax exemption for the mortgage insurance fund and the guarantee funds will also be removed. This is intended to have CMHC taxed on the same basis as financial institutions and registered insurance companies. Other amendments are included of a purely administrative or housekeeping nature in order to provide clarification of various provisions.

Briefly, I have presented some of the highlights of this legislation which I hope will be given favourable consideration and provide a clearer understanding of what the government is trying to accomplish with Bill C-82.

I would like to take a moment to speak about the role which Canada Mortgage and Housing has played throughout its history in helping to facilitate proper housing for Canadians and to respond to various challenges.

In my reading the other day I came across some incidents where a former president was reminiscing about the days when C.D. Howe was responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing. I believe this occurred on April 1, 1946 and he was reminiscing about how Mr. Howe needed to respond to the needs of some 16,000 families of war veterans who needed housing. Shortly after that, there was a further need to respond to conditions implicit in the Korean war, so Defence Construction Limited was created.

Since its inception in 1946, CMHC has carried out under varying circumstances adjustments to conform with the evolving needs of Canadians of many different kinds of housing assistance. This has traditionally involved providing assistance to the most disadvantaged of Canadians and encouraging self-sufficiency in the private housing market to support the financial markets and the housing industry.

The government, as colleagues know, has a number of social housing programs in place to assist those Canadians who cannot obtain affordable, suitable, and adequate shelter in the private market.

The government will continue to do what it can to assist households in need across this country through its programs. It will continue to spend approximately $2 billion annually and about $10 billion over the next five years to help meet the housing needs of low-income Canadians.

As colleagues know, at the present time over 650,000 social housing units are being assisted. This will allow CMHC to maintain its obligations to those that it now assists.

One of the most important jobs that Canada Mortgage and Housing does on behalf of the government is to make sure there is mortgage money available for people who want to finance the purchase of a home. Through its mortgage loan insurance program Canada Mortgage and Housing helped over 186,000 households last year to obtain access to home ownership. That is a record for Canada Mortgage and Housing, representing $13.3 billion in business taking the total of insurance in force to some $58.3 billion.

The federal government has been looking into creative ways to attract new sources of funding to respond to the housing needs of low to moderate income Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, I understand that there may have been an arrangement concluded since I began to speak that would involve proceeding through all stages of the bill tonight. If this is the case, I will conclude and simply thank the members from London East and Edmonton East for their understanding in consenting to this rather summary and cursory way of proceeding with this important legislation.

I know that this was not the original intent. I also know that my colleagues opposite had to interrupt important business to come back and facilitate this measure. It is important to Canadians. It is important to the agency and I want to thank them very much for their flexibility.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for those kind remarks. We are trying to facilitate the workings of the House and to deal with legislation that is important to this House and to this country.

Let me take a few moments to speak to this bill. I am glad to have the opportunity to speak on Bill C-82, an act to amend the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act and the National Housing Act. Both of these acts have a long history in this country and have played a crucial role in the development of housing and the promotion of home ownership for all Canadians.

The federal government made excursions directly into the housing sector when a shortage of accommodation occurred during the Second World War which created some difficulties. In response to this crisis, the government created a Crown corporation, the Wartime Housing Corporation, with a budget for communities where a shortage of housing retarded defence projects.

After the war, in an effort to provide housing for returning soldiers, the federal government transferred the assets of the old Crown corporation to the newly created Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Now called the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, CMHC was legislated to administer the National Housing Act of 1944. This included the administration of loans for housing and the construction of public housing. As the economic circumstances of Canada changed throughout each decade so did the housing needs of Canadians.

Through amendments to both the acts, the House of Commons addressed these challenges and tackled Canada's housing problems.

In 1949 the NHA was amended to provide social housing for Canadians in need through cost-shared programs between the federal government and the provincial governments.

• (2000)

In 1954, the federal government changed the Bank Act and the CMHC Act and replaced direct lending with a mortgage loan insurance program which provided the foundation for the private mortgage market in Canada.

In 1964, the acts were further amended to address the problems of urban renewal and rapid population growth in urban centres. In the 1970s and 1980s, rapid inflation changed housing affordability forever, as we all know. The price of a home increased over 200 per cent in some areas of the country. In the communities in and around Toronto a family now needs an annual income of approximately $60,000 to afford the average starter home. In the Vancouver area, the income required is about $50,000 a year for that starter home. In my home city of London, Ontario, you need an average income of $42,000 in order to afford a starter home.

Under these tough economic conditions, CMHC has had to adapt to meet the changing requirements of Canadians looking to buy their first home as well as needy Canadians trying to afford the ever-increasing cost of rental accommodation. Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation has successfully manoeuvred these difficult economic obstacles. Within the confines of the limitations imposed by this government, it has delivered programs across the country.

In 1988, the then Auditor General, Kenneth Dye, named CMHC as one of the eight shining examples of high-performing organizations within the Canadian bureaucracy. As well, in 1988 CMHC was surveyed by an international management consulting firm which found it to have a high level of employee satisfaction. More recently it was listed in the publication called The Hundred Best Companies to Work for in Canada.

CMHC has served the housing sector very well. It has served home owners and people seeking affordable housing very well. Despite the budgetary constraints imposed by this government, it has served low-income Canadians to the best of its ability. With the help of CMHC programs, the housing industry in Canada has shown a remarkable ability to change in response to changing economic and market conditions.

Canada's industry increased its productive capacity sevenfold in the 30 years from 1946 to 1976 and it has expanded ever since. The evidence of successful adaptation to change in the past very strongly suggests the industry will be equally capable of responding effectively to the evolving markets and circumstances of the future.

The National Housing Act and the CMHC Act have been amended in the past by the House of Commons as a reaction to changes in the Canadian economy. However, reacting to changes in the economy is only one reason to introduce amendments to these two acts as we are being asked to do tonight.

Through many of the administrative amendments of the National Housing Act and the CMHC Act included in Bill C-82, CMHC can continue to maintain its high level of efficiency and cost effectiveness. There is another important reason for the need to adapt these instruments of national housing development. The housing sector itself is a vital component of the Canadian economy. CMHC cannot simply react but it must also become a vehicle for economic health and growth in this country. Housing activity in Canada has played an important role in the economic advancement of the country, as we all know.

Housing has had the advantage of being labour intensive, focusing much of its economic benefit in the locality or region where the housing is constructed. It is required in all parts of the country and it has considerable economic ripple effects beyond the actual building site. It creates not only construction jobs, but jobs in the sectors that must service the construction as well as spin-off jobs in servicing the communities which are being constructed. Therefore a comprehensive housing policy and a well-administered housing corporation is well suited for use as federal tools of macroeconomic stimulation.

As we face the challenges of the future, this House must again examine these acts to facilitate the most efficient operation of CMHC and its administration of the National Housing Act.

Bill C-82 provides for the authorization of approved lenders such as banks and others to act for the CMHC in insuring loans. The CMHC will set up the criteria which allows approved lenders to process the mortgage insurance, and the Crown corporation will set up a rigorous monitoring system, which will enable them to supervise these procedures. It is expected to take two to three years to implement these changes fully. Ultimately it should make the operations of CMHC more efficient; it should speed up the processing of mortgages.

The bill also increases the limit of loan insurance the CMHC can now authorize. The current limit of $60 billion has almost been reached and the new limit of $100 billion is expected to be adequate to service the demand for mortgage insurance until 1997.

This proposed legislation also closes up a loophole. The owners of assisted housing will be prevented from selling their projects without CMHC approval. This amendment is long overdue because there have been some horror stories with respect to assisted housing being converted to something other than was planned and designed for.

This ensures that CMHC subsidized housing will be maintained as social housing and not sold as a market rental project. This amendment will allow for better enforcement of the legislation, and ensures government housing subsidies are protected and targeted to those in need.

Another amendment to the National Housing Act enables CMHC to develop and manage housing projects without having to buy the land. CMHC can be contracted on by a government department, for a fee, to administer lands and develop housing.

Currently we all know that CMHC must first acquire the land before developing any housing on it. This fee-for-service change also allows CMHC to sell some of its services to non-profit housing corporations and to co-op housing projects.

These services could include, for example, training programs and computerization. This amendment will be of most interest to the provinces, which have the option of purchasing these services in a block for all of their housing projects.

The provinces have other alternatives. They can provide these services through their provincial housing ministries or they can contract these services from the private sector.

Perhaps the most significant change affected by this bill is the clause which would allow the CMHC to directly finance and refinance loans. This change alone is estimated to be able to save government over $150 million over five years and I would hope that the government in saving this money would recirculate these savings to produce more affordable housing for those people in need.

CMHC studies have shown that the Crown corporation could provide lower and more favourable rates for the first mortgage of many social housing projects. The subsidies that CMHC spends on social housing projects are based to a large extent on the interest needed on the first mortgage.

By lending itself money at a better rate, savings can be achieved through lower subsidies. Other savings will be achieved through the creation of a more competitive financing environment.

The entrance of CMHC into the lending market will create I believe more competition in the financial community. Since the social housing projects are cost shared between the federal and provincial governments, this amendment would have the reciprocal effect of saving the provinces money because of the reduced subsidy level.

Another major amendment will expand CMHC's investment authority. Currently the Crown corporation is limited to investing in government securities or guaranteed government securities. This legislation will allow broader authority, subject to government review.

Last, the bill changes CMHC's income tax status, removing its tax exempt status for some funds. This will make CMHC more like a financial institution and registered insurance company. Currently CMHC is limited to $25 million of accumulated surplus. This means that any additional net profit is turned over to the government as dividends. The extra profit already goes to the government and taxes. This bill will result in the money being shifted from dividends paid to the government to taxes paid to the government.

These amendments to the National Housing Act and the CMHC Act will allow for greater efficiency in the operation of the Crown corporation.

In these times of economic hardship, the federal government must pursue cost saving measures while at the same time maintaining an adequate level of service. Bill C-82 has introduced amendments which are not only cost saving but are also cost effective.

These legislative changes are aimed specifically at administrative functions and operational structures. What is not included in this bill are the policy changes necessary to ensure that federal housing programs are as efficient as possible in meeting the housing needs of Canadians.

While this bill takes care of the administrative functions of the CMHC, improving its efficiency, housing policy itself has been neglected by this government.

The legacy of CMHC has been to learn from the past and adapt itself to meet the future requirements of Canadians. Unfortunately this government is neglecting to make the policy changes that are required to deal with the housing problems of today. Moreover, it lacks the vision to address the housing problems of tomorrow.

Despite the accomplishment of CMHC, there are still challenges that this government must address. There are still many Canadians who are inadequately served by the marketplace and for whom government assistance is required to ensure that they are adequately housed. The aging of Canada's population presents a number of challenges to public and private sectors alike and the government must now begin to implement new and more innovative ways of dealing with the housing needs of this emerging population.

The federal government must implement policy changes that will address sectoral changes that are expected. Canada's housing requirements are projected to decline considerably over the next two decades. There will not be as many housing units produced as there were in the past unless the trends in our population growth change and change dramatically. While the markets for new production are shrinking, they are also becoming more discrete and specific. The federal government must facilitate the development and servicing of these newly emerging markets.

This government must also facilitate the development of housing technologies with the view to exporting Canadian expertise and services in this field. Similarly, an industrial capacity must be nurtured which is capable of responding to the emerging economic importance of renovations of Canada's existing housing stock.

As the century comes to a close, a considerable proportion of Canada's housing stock will require the upgrading of its electrical, plumbing and mechanical systems in order to preserve its operating efficiencies. This presents the prospect of a great deal of labour intensive work which to some extent will replace jobs through the decline in new production.

This will also entail facilitating the development of an industry with a different mix of skills from those required for new construction. The federal government must acknowledge the importance of renovating Canada's existing housing stock and facilitate that end now, not ten years from now. The scrapping of the residential rehabilitation program as it related to rental stock by this government some years ago was not forward looking on behalf of this government.

The policy environment in Canada is well tuned to the development of jointly shared solutions to the issues in the housing field. A wide-reaching network has been established between all the participants active in the production, consumption and the regulation of housing. However, this government is not willing to become a responsible partner in these joint solutions.

For example, currently only 6 per cent of Canadians are served by social housing programs. There are 15 per cent or more, over one million Canadians, who are still in core housing need. Despite such overwhelming need, the federal government has consistently cut social housing programs in consecutive budgets.

The most recent budget will amount to a 50 per cent reduction in the construction of new social housing units within three years. As this is a cost-shared program, the federal government is letting down the provinces in forcing reductions in provincial allocations, particularly in the have not provinces.

The recent budget cuts also eliminated the co-op housing program. This is a cost-effective housing program which provides mixed income housing, not massive housing projects for the poor, which unfortunately and inevitably are labelled as ghetto housing.

Studies have indicated that the problem of social mix appears to be increasing in recent decades. Whether this is because of a shift in society's goals or an increasing awareness of the impact of poor mixing is not clear. What is evident, though, is that housing policy must not be viewed simply in terms of delivering numbers of housing units. Rather, it must also be related to the placement of those units, physically and socially, within the community.

A CMHC document concludes that the emphasis on so-called targeting in the name of program efficiency has resulted in the casualty of social mix. By eliminating co-op housing, a program in which mixed income housing was a key element, this government has sacrificed healthy community development. Despite changes made to the program over a year ago which met the targeting requirements of this government, this government still sacrificed this program.

Rather than facing the challenges of providing a healthy community environment, this government has opted out of its responsibilities. This government is also ignoring other housing problems that demand immediate attention.

The family projects, where 37.5 per cent of residents are children, have the highest incidence of crime. The program also puts disabled seniors and single mothers at risk as well.

The desperately needed repairs to many public housing units have made the federal government for all intents and purposes a slum landlord.

A 1990 public housing evaluation indicated a serious problem with security and crime has put almost half of our residents in danger, especially women and children.

There are 13,000 public housing units which fail to meet minimum property standards and more than half of all the units barely meet these standards and are at risk of falling below standard.

The money this government must allocate for renovations has not met these immediate requirements. Given the aging of these public housing units, these conditions have worsened and will continue to worsen and the costs are forever increasing.

Public housing was developed to provide affordable and adequate housing. The public housing program must be deemed a failure because the evaluation indicates that two out of every five tenants still live in core need because their housing costs are too high.

Since 80 per cent of the total repair budget was required within three years, an increase in the budget should have been accompanied by a needs based allocation of funds. This government has deprived CMHC of the resources it needs to meet the needs of these Canadians and provide adequate shelter.

Given the current difficulties with urban crime and safety, this government should get its own properties in order and provide a safe living environment for its tenants.

The Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program was also drastically cut by the federal government in recent years and I have already noted that.

The program is needed to upgrade our private housing stock for Canadians in core need. Statistical evidence indicates that future demand for new housing construction will be generated primarily through immigration. Despite this, the federal government has not facilitated the development of any housing programs that would meet the shelter requirements of legitimate refugee claimants and the increased immigration population in this country.

The federal government must acknowledge its role as a partner in ensuring healthy Canadian communities. While C-82 creates an efficient administrative framework for the Crown corporation, it does not allow for efficient policy delivery.

CMHC's five-year corporate plan outlines the Crown corporation's commitment to "promoting good living environment" and "ensuring that housing and its supporting urban framework combine to produce quality of life in urban environments".

The federal government has not provided the legislative framework which would allow the CMHC to meet these goals. Instead, the federal government has cut the CMHC's program budget and limited its activities to studies, consultations, demonstrations, evaluations, seminars and conferences.

In the previous corporate plan, CMHC stressed the importance of addressing the problems of "displaced low-income earners, the increase in homelessness, and the eroding safety and security". However, this focus has been eliminated in the current corporate plan due to lack of government commitment.

Although I applaud the efficiency measures aimed at CMHC's administrative functions, I want to chastise the government for ignoring possible improvements to policy efficiency. With a projected savings of $150 million over five years, I want to urge the government to use these savings to fulfil its responsibilities as a partner in the housing sector.

It really is a partner, along with the provinces, the municipalities, the private non-profit sector, the co-op sector, in working toward solving Canada's housing problems.

While the government might be introducing legislative changes to Bill C-82 to make CMHC work better, it remains that this government must provide the leadership to have affordable housing in this country. It must not relegate its responsibilities to the provinces, the municipalities and other groups.

So while we are supportive of this bill, I look forward to the next stage, of asking some questions of the minister relating to the administrative changes being proposed in this bill.

Let me just say one other thing.

• (2020)

CMHC has served this country well. While the country is trying to redefine itself in terms of its constitutional responsibilities the fact is that housing in this country has been served well because all levels of government, the private sector and the non-profit sectors have all worked together. CMHC has been that glue.

If someone wanted to be really cynical with respect to this bill, and I do not want to be too partisan or cynical, one could say, because this has been a very successful Crown corporation—and I can tell the government right now that we are going to draw a line in the sand if it moves to privatize this Crown corporation which provides equality and equity in terms of affordable housing and mortgage insurance across this whole country.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In view of the urgency of this measure, I would ask that it be referred not to the standing committee but to Committee of the Whole.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, it might reasonably be inferred from the fact that the NDP caucus went along with the unanimous consent to run this bill through the House in its entirety today, correctly in this instance, that it is the intention of the NDP caucus to support the bill at all stages.

That is so principally because, unlike much of the legislation that the government introduces in this House, this bill will do no great harm and may indeed accomplish some small good. The two areas in which we are most interested are clauses 48 and 18.

Clause 48 will essentially prevent land flipping of social housing projects of the sort that we saw for example in Cloverdale in Montreal. A private developer got a bagful of government money on the promise of providing social housing, built a project and then sold it off to people who rammed it into the private sector. The social housing component was gone, the guy kept the bag of money and the new owners are presumably making a great deal more. CMHC was left holding the empty bag. With luck this bill will prevent that sort of thing in the future. To that degree it is commendable.

Clause 18 allows for direct financing of social housing projects by CMHC. It is assumed that this will give CMHC far greater flexibility in its operations and therefore could conceivably allow savings of up to some $150 million over the next five years. This is a best case scenario but we all wish the corporation well and hope that this comes to pass.

This would be a much more significant number and a much more significant hope if the government had shown any intention of financing any more social housing. As we know from the budget presented in this House this year the government's intention is in fact the reverse. It is scrambling as quickly as it can to extricate itself from virtually all prior social housing commitments.

It merely remains to note that new social housing projects will be cut from their current levels by about 51 per cent over the next two years as a consequence of this year's budget, for example. The co–op housing program is gone completely, and I will return to that in just a moment.

Of course the government is, to be charitable, stalling on additional financing required by those housing co–ops built under the ILM, the indexed link mortgage program, introduced in the mid–1980s. As a result of that program and consequent housing charges imposed by CMHC in an effort to not offend local private landlords, boosting housing charges in the co–ops to a level which the residents cannot afford to pay, there are tremendous shortfalls going on in ILM housing co–ops across the country.

These shortfalls amount in total to a requirement of possibly some $20 million. This too is money that is not forthcoming at this time, which is why some of the more recently constructed co–ops are in serious trouble.

I would like to draw one quick lesson from this, if I may. I do not intend to use up a great deal of House time on this but it seems to me to be instructive that in this bill the government basically is cleaning up the system whereby it can continue to give bags of money to private developers who promise to build housing with some social element in it. This is at the same time the government has axed completely the paltry $6.5 million annual expenditure on the federal co–op housing program and has radically cut back on its commitment to non–profit housing programs.

What this tells me is that the government, in fact, suffers an ideological bias in this regard. It is simply put this way. The government feels better about turning money over to private sector developers to create housing in which tenants will live always under the control of that private sector developer. It feels much better about doing that than it does about funding programs which would otherwise allow tenants to control their own housing.

This government lacks faith in the Canadian people. It assumes that lack of money is a clear indication of lack of responsibility and lack of ability. Therefore, because people without money cannot be trusted to devise and maintain and administer their own housing, we must have people of merit evidenced by the fact that somehow or other they already have money to do that for them.

This is the fundamental bias of the government that is expressed in many of its programs and policies across the vast host of issues but is clearly set out in its approach to social housing.

The real tragedy of this is that they could not be more wrong. Anyone dispassionately examining the record of co-op and non-profit housing in this country versus the record of housing provided with government assistance through the private sector, especially tenant housing, cannot conceivably come away from such a dispassionate examination concluding other than that if you put the responsibility for their own housing in the people's own hands you will have a more responsible, better administered, longer life and better maintained housing than you will if you place them in a standard tenant relationship to some private sector landlord.

The record is so crystal clear in this regard that the government's decisions of this year flying in the face of that historic evidence begs credulity and cannot be attributed to the result of any kind of dispassionate analysis of the actual programs.

Therefore, when I conclude it is quite literally blindly ideologically motivated and in the long term will do great disservice to the people of Canada.

However, if I may conclude that digression and get back to Bill C-82, I would say again on the face of it, it does no harm and maybe some small good. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it will enjoy our support.

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have this opportunity to say a word or two with respect to Bill C-82 which is an act to amend the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act and the National Housing Act because as you know, I have rather a great interest in this area as the former Minister of State for Housing.

This bill does not make dramatic changes to either CMHC or to the National Housing Act but it does deal in a number of areas that I think are very significant.

• (2030)

As you know, on the one hand there are a great many Canadians who own their own homes. In fact, 63 per cent to 64 per cent of all Canadian householders are home owners. On the other hand, about 21 per cent of all Canadian householders cannot afford to own their own homes and need some sort of assistance to be able to live in affordable and decent housing.

Right now the federal and provincial governments, all taxpayers because the money does come from all Canadians as taxpayers, do assist about one-third of that 21 per cent of Canadians who need some assistance in their housing. Right now there are some 650,000 units of housing across Canada receiving that kind of assistance.

Clauses 18 and 48 of this bill deal with the assisted housing situation. In fact, clause 18 allows CMHC to go out and to get into the direct financing business in order to provide the money and the funds to finance that assisted housing, those 650,000 homes that are now provided across the country. Also, CMHC can find the financing for the other two-thirds of that 21 per cent, or 14 per cent in effect, of Canadian householders needing some further assistance.

Hopefully, the ability of CMHC to get into the direct financing of additional social housing will mean more assisted housing. I suppose in an indirect way it will provide that because the government faced with an enormous deficit and national debt has been trying to find ways to economize.

One of the ways it has been looking at is to have CMHC do the direct financing itself to try to cut down the financing costs in order to have the wherewithal to provide as much additional social housing as it has budgeted for in the next two years.

Without this ability, without this provision in the legislation I suspect there would even be a smaller budget, fewer funds available for assisted housing in the next two years at least than was indicated in the budget of February 25.

Clause 48 of course puts a cap on the ability of assisted housing builders, the non-profit organizations that are loaned money with a CMHC guarantee and then receive subsidies. It puts a cap on its ability to sell off those social housing or assisted housing projects without the consent of CMHC.

That is a good thing because as other members have pointed out, there have been problems in the past as far as the sale of social housing complexes to the private sector, taking those housing units out of assisted housing and depriving Canadians needing housing assistance of those homes and those units of housing.

I suspect this provision is not going to apply retroactively. I am sure the minister would like to comment on that a little later. Also, this provision is only going to be effective for the term of the mortgage financing through CMHC which is generally a 35-year period.

While this clause is going to protect the Government of Canada and the taxpayers of Canada as far as their investment in assisted housing is concerned, it will not apply retroactively as I understand it. It also is only going to apply for new commitments for 35 years from the time of the commitment and will not go beyond that.

It would be nice and helpful if somehow legally we could find a way to allow these kinds of provisions to apply retroactively and also to allow them to continue on in future, bearing in mind the fact that Canadian taxpayers have actually provided for these facilities. That commitment probably will not come to an end after 35 years.

There is one concern I have with respect to the conditions for consent. That relates to whether or not there will be consent given by CMHC and by the government if a project is to be sold with the purpose of using the net receipts to produce more social housing units in the future than there are at present.

One of the possibilities within this whole area of providing assisted housing is with the appreciation of land, with the appreciation of housing, it may very well be possible to sell a particular project and to use the funds to develop new projects and in fact develop more housing units using the same investment made originally. That, I hope, will be taken into account by CMHC and by the government in the days ahead.

As far as social housing generally is concerned, it seems to me that all of us face a major difficulty. That is the cost involved in providing assisted housing down the road. We still have a lot of people to try to look after. It is going to take an awful lot of taxpayers' money if we are going to do it unless we find some new and innovative ways.

I have brought one way to the attention of the minister. I know CMHC is aware of the Delancy Street concept in San Francisco in the United States. It is a project where the residents build the housing themselves. They finance it through small businesses they are engaged in. Not a dollar or cent of public money is in that project, yet it is one of the projects that is a showcase for the city of San Francisco. Everybody in San Francisco is extremely proud of it and extremely proud of what can be done by individuals using their own initiative.

Again I say to the minister, to CMHC and to the government that this is a model that perhaps will not solve all the housing problems we have down the road, but it is one that certainly has some possibilities to solve a good many of them.

The other aspect of the bill relates to home ownership. Clause 25 and clause 7 relate to the mortgage insurance aspect of CMHC's role and the ability of CMHC to insure mortgages that allow people to buy their own homes.

Clause 25 obviously is a very helpful provision because it means that the total limit on the mortgage insurance fund of CMHC is being increased from $60 billion to $100 billion. That means that CMHC is going to have the ability to ensure a greater volume of mortgages, a greater dollar value of mortgages. That means more Canadians will be able to own their own homes.

All of us would agree that is a good thing, whether we are in favour of social housing or assisted housing as everybody in this House is. For those people who can afford to pay for their own homes, then they too need some assistance through the mortgage insurance fund and this is a good thing.

Clause 7 also relates to the mortgage insurance fund. It gives CMHC the power to delegate loan insurance to other governmental bodies or other private sector bodies.

I suppose that begs the question for all of us as to whether this is opening the door toward the privatization of the mortgage insurance fund. Or perhaps under the constitutional discussions it will be the peeling off of the government's commitment and responsibilities to mortgage insurance to provincial governments. I hope that the minister in his remarks during Committee of the Whole proceedings will address that issue as well. There is one thing that is not in this bill that I had hoped would be in it. That is the question of mortgage insurance for something called the reverse mortgage.

• (2040)

The reverse mortgage is a provision for people who own their own homes. These people have a lot of capital locked into their own homes. People perhaps have their own home as their only investment, but it is a very major investment. These same people may very well be living on extremely modest incomes. A lot of senior citizens are in this category. They are asset rich in their homes but they are income poor in the amount of money they have to look after themselves. As a result, even though they have this great asset locked in, they often have to live below the poverty line.

The reverse mortgage concept would allow senior citizens, and others for that matter, who have this capital locked into their own home to get it out while they are alive. They could still live in their own home, but get their investment out either in a lump sum, several lump sums, a monthly payment, or a yearly payment on a program basis. This would allow them to improve their own standard of living, allowing them to live affordably and decently while still in their own home.

There are such things as reverse mortgages now. There are one or two mortgage companies in Canada that provide for reverse mortgages, but other financial institutions are very reluctant to get into the reverse mortgage business because there is no such thing as reverse mortgage insurance.

This bill could very well have given the authority to CMHC and the mortgage insurance fund to allow them to insure reverse mortgages. I had hoped that this bill would have allowed that but, unfortunately, that is not the case. There will be a lot of Canadians right across our country who will be disappointed as a result of that fact.

I hope once again that the government, CMHC and the minister are looking very carefully and still examining the possibility of introducing a reverse mortgage insurance program. It would be a great boon to Canadians and most helpful to many senior citizens who are living below the poverty line and have this great asset locked in that they cannot access without getting rid of their own home and having to suddenly move into circumstances they do not want and which would be unfamiliar to them.

Finally, I would like to comment on a statement by the hon. member for London East when he was referring to the condition of public housing across Canada. I am trying to recollect from memory, but I think there are some 300,000 public housing units across Canada that are assisted by the federal and provincial governments.

It is quite true that a study found that there were things that had to be done to improve that public housing stock. By and large that study found that the public housing stock we have is generally in good shape, that the residents of that public housing are very happy and that it has been of great benefit to them.

I can say that there are people across this country who live in public housing projects, people such as Margaret Mitchell in Vancouver. That is not the Margaret Mitchell who sits in this House but another Margaret Mitchell in Vancouver who would be shocked by the comment that there is something wrong with public housing. She is so enthusiastic about public housing that she is the president of a public housing tenants association in Vancouver. She is so enthusiastic about it that she wants the government, CMHC and the minister to build a lot more of the same thing because it does such a great job.

The last thing I would like to do on that subject is to draw the attention of the House once more to the fact that about two weeks ago in the city of Toronto, there was an international conference held entitled the Organizing for Social Change Conference, sponsored by the International Federation of Settlements and Neighbourhood Centres.

The delegates to that conference toured public housing projects in metropolitan Toronto. After touring those projects they made comments such as the following: "If that is inner city, it is nothing like we know inner city to be" said one American."We do not see that in Cleveland." "I have yet to see any slums in Toronto."

That speaks for itself as far as public housing is concerned. It has been and continues to be a great triumph. There is no doubt that improvements can be made. Improvements can be made in everything and should be made. I trust that the minister and CMHC are going to be doing that. By and large, we have done an enormous amount in the area of housing in this country.

I trust that this bill will reinforce that. We are going to see the federal government playing what I believe is the role it should be playing. Quite frankly, notwithstanding some of the comments that have been made during the constitutional debate, I believe the federal government clearly has a constitutional role in housing and that it should continue to play that. I trust that this bill will reinforce that effort.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to address myself to second reading of Bill C–82, an act to amend the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act and the National Housing Act and to amend another act in consequence thereof.

My colleague from London East has outlined the position quite clearly and succinctly of our party with regard to this particular piece of legislation. As hon. members will know, there are a number of traditions within the act which intends to amend a number of statutes. I call to the attention of the House a number of important clauses, clauses Nos. 7, 24, 25, 48, 49 and 18. These are the major provisions of this bill which, as I said earlier, were addressed by my colleague from London East.

While the subject matter of housing is important for Canadians, I wish to bring to the attention of the House particular concerns that I have with regard to the expenditures or lack of expenditures under the social housing envelope of Canada Mortgage and Housing particularly when it relates to what we know in Atlantic Canada as the RRAP program.

Unfortunately, my colleague from St. John's East is not in the Chamber. I would have hoped that he would have stayed and participated in the debate. Some individuals would say that he is here. Others would say that he is here but he is not all there. However, having said that, the hon. member knows that the point I am attempting to make is that funding for the RRAP program in Atlantic Canada requires the support of all members from Atlantic Canada.

In a few moments I would like to address my comments to the minister of employment. I do not believe he has shown any leadership whatsoever in supporting the minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing in attempting to find additional income in revenues from the Government of Canada for the various programs which will be needed under the RRAP program.

The hon. member shouts from his seat. I let him shout and I will give him the opportunity to participate later in the debate since he is so concerned about the RRAP budget. I can conclude from that he will support me in supporting the minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing in order to obtain additional funding and in order to provide the citizens in Atlantic Canada with that kind of funding and thereafter in order to increase the employment opportunities in Atlantic Canada.

• (2050)

In my constituency, as I am sure the minister for housing can attest, in such metropolises as Glace Bay, Dominion, New Waterford, parts of Richmond county such as L'ardoise, Loch Lomond, Enon and Johnstown, as well as communities in Cape Breton county such as Birch Grove, Main-à-Dieu, the Victorias, South Bar, and a host of other ones, there is a large number of citizens who would like to avail themselves of RRAP.

RRAP needs more funding. I do not think any member can doubt that. In fact just the other evening at a special caucus meeting of our party my colleague from Kingston and the Islands, supported by my colleague from Saint-Léonard, made strong references and strong interventions that additional moneys were needed in that particular envelope in order to assist those individuals.

I want to clarify for members opposite, and particularly while the minister responsible for housing is in the House, what we are talking about here. Individuals, because of the restrictions which were placed on the RRAP funding, are being denied the opportunity to make application for that funding.

The figure in some municipalities, as the minister knows, is $16,000 to $17,000 and in other municipalities it may even be a little bit higher, urban as opposed to rural.

I say to the minister with great sincerity that a lot of those individuals may be over the allowable limit a small fraction and hence denied the opportunity to apply for the grant.

I do not think there would be too many members in this House who could argue that one of the things that governments ought to do for senior citizens is to provide them with the necessary wherewithal in order to remain in their own homes. I think from a cost-effective perspective that is certainly the best route to pursue. In terms of attitude, in terms of quality of life or in terms of one's own well-being, they would prefer to remain in their own homes. But the problem is they do not have sufficient resources, either publicly or privately, to make the necessary renovations to their homes.

This is the point we tried to make with the minister's predecessor and it fell on deaf ears. In fact we raised this issue in the House and his predecessor dismissed all the recommendations and sound interventions made by all sorts of members of Parliament from the various political parties.

It is absolutely essential that within the next period of time, hopefully by September, the Government of Canada could avail itself of putting a much higher priority to giving greater amounts of money under RRAP.

We are talking about such renovations as new roofs on various homes. I know hon. members opposite, particularly the minister's predecessor in that portfolio, may or may not understand that senior citizens require them for their housing stock.

It may be the necessity of putting in a second washroom downstairs in an older home. It may be a request to put a new electrical system into a home. It may be the addition of a ramp for a person who has to use a wheelchair, a cane or a walker. It may necessitate renovations with regard to new windows and perhaps a new chimney. Those are the kinds of things that RRAP has been able to do over the years.

I do not think there is a place anywhere in the country where the need is greater than that in Atlantic Canada. That is not to suggest that such a program could not or would not be utilized in other regions of the country. In point of fact I think the need has been demonstrated beyond a shadow of a doubt that in Atlantic Canada RRAP is needed.

In my own district, in the county of Cape Breton, there is in excess of 2,000 applicants who are awaiting the possibility of making an application for the purposes of funding under RRAP to make the kinds of necessary repairs that I alluded to in my previous remarks, as well as on previous occasions to the minister's predecessor. However that fell on deaf ears with his predecessor. I would hope the minister will show more initiative, more concern for those individuals who are seeking funding under RRAP.

RRAP, as we know it and as we understand it in Atlantic Canada, could in many ways be enhanced by other government agencies. Perhaps later in the debate the Minister of Employment and Immigration will join in to give his views, but I am somewhat concerned that we have under his auspices a program called Community Futures. I would hope the minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing would share with his colleagues that a Community Futures organization in co-operation with Canada Mortgage and Housing ought to give careful consideration to the housing needs of a particular community, both in the short term as well as the long term.

However, if we talk to chairpersons of various Community Futures groups across this country, and in particular in Atlantic Canada, we find that very little—and I underline very little—is being done under the auspices of Community Futures. That is not to say to the minister that no Community Futures group is doing anything with regard to housing needs, but by and large they are not. I would hope the minister would give careful consideration to having that agency of the Government of Canada attempt, as best it can and within the resources of the federal government, to expand its horizons with regard to RRAP.

There is another advantage to RRAP that I am sure members must be aware of. I have heard my colleague from London East on numerous occasions and I know what a tremendous debater he is.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dingwall: Hon. members opposite agree. He has made repeated interventions in the House to the predecessor and to the present minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing that moneys put into social housing, particularly those which focus on RRAP, the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program, add immensely to increasing employment opportunities in rural and urban Canada.

I know my colleague, the former minister, is shaking his head because now he agrees. He sees the folly of his previous ways. I think he has had a change in attitude and a change in approach. It is never too late. It is never too late to change. Our only hope is that he will put additional pressure and give support to the minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing so that when he goes before the cabinet committee on economic development he will be able to see that moneys under RRAP not only provide needed assistance to senior citizens and other Canadians in terms of renovations to their homes but add immensely to increasing the employment base in Canada.

There are some who would argue that it adds to the employment base in Canada but not appreciably. I disagree. For communities in Nova Scotia such as the one the minister responsible for housing comes from or ones in Pictou county, Annapolis Valley, Cape Breton county, Halifax county and other parts in Atlantic Canada, that kind of economic spin-off would create meaningful jobs. It would utilize carpenters who are so massively unemployed across this country. It would add immensely to the construction industry. In many parts of this country unemployment is in excess of 70 per cent to 75 per cent in the various trades, whether they be plumbers or electricians. These are the kinds of individuals whom we represent in the Parliament of Canada.

• (2100)

That kind of money is better spent on the housing industry, as I know my colleague from London East would agree, than the $21 million being spent on a propaganda war for the minister of industry, trade and commerce. It is absolutely asinine to be buying photographs, newspaper advertisements and television advertisements when we could be providing much needed assistance to the housing industry, consequently making an appreciable difference in the employment rate.

I have disagreed with the present minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing on a number of issues, but I hope that the minister opposite shares my objectives. I am confident that the minister opposite would want to have additional resources to answer those kinds of needs.

However, I am not certain that he has the support of his colleagues. I do not know if that minister, the phantom minister as I refer to him, the Minister of State for Small Businesses, has any understanding whatsoever of the housing needs in this country. I think that minister is more interested in having nice coloured photographs—

Some hon. members: Booklets.

Mr. Dingwall: —and booklets printed in the United States to promote some of the programs in his own department. The money that is spent on that kind of a brochure, a glossy, multicoloured brochure, could be better spent on the housing needs of ordinary Canadians.

I do not know where the Minister of Communications is when it comes to the housing needs of Canadians. We have not seen any demonstrable signs from that minister to support the diligent efforts of the minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing. We think this minister is the Lone Ranger. He is the only one concerned with the housing needs of Canadians.

We do not know if the Minister of Employment and Immigration understands the importance of housing or the housing needs in this country. We think this minister has all of his priorities wrong in terms of trying to develop jobs in this particular country.

I am somewhat saddened to say that the Minister of State for Small Businesses has been a complete and utter failure, and I say that with sincerity. He has been an utter failure in supporting real economic developments in this country. He is only exceeded in that capacity by the Minister of Communications. I do not know if that minister would understand the difference between an outhouse and a four-bedroom home in downtown Toronto.

I would hope that those members opposite would give serious consideration to supporting the minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing in providing the necessary dollars so desperately needed in this country for housing, as alluded to by my colleague from London

East and in some of the comments I made regarding specific programs in terms of the RRAP program.

In conclusion, I reaffirm my support for the RRAP program. I reaffirm my support for the minister responsible in terms of possible additional moneys he might be able to obtain in furthering the objectives of that program, and lessening the restrictions which have been placed on that program, urban versus rural.

I speak in somewhat of a selfish manner if I may, but I think I have a duty and an obligation on behalf of those constituents that I represent to inform the minister and to inform this House that I have a large number of constituents who wish to avail themselves of the RRAP program, but because of the restrictions which have been placed by Canada Mortgage and Housing do not have that opportunity.

I hope that the minister would give serious consideration, if not during second reading but at Committee of the Whole as well as third reading stage to at least entertain the possible intention of going back to cabinet. Perhaps the Minister of State for Small Businesses may have a change of mind and lend his support, as well as the Minister of Communications, to get the necessary kinds of dollars that all of us in this House need.

I congratulate my colleague from London East who has carried the can on this particular bill, Bill C–82, as well as on the housing needs of Canadians for quite some time.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and, by unanimous consent, the House went into committee thereon, Mr. DeBlois in the chair.

[Translation]

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. House in committee on Bill C–82, an act to amend the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act and the National Housing Act and to amend another act in consequence thereof.

[English]

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

On Clause 3—

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Chairman, perhaps I could ask the minister a question with respect to clause 3(1) which will deal with 28(1)(d)(i) where it makes it possible for CMHC to incorporate subsidiaries subject to an Order in Council approval.

This as I understand it would have the effect of trying to implement fees for services authority under clause 49 as well as existing property development management authority, particularly a joint undertaking with others.

I was just wondering whether or not it is possible for CMHC to do that under its current formation as opposed to having to form a subsidiary company in order to do such undertakings.

• (2110)

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Chairman, to my colleague opposite, this is really designed to deal with a situation like Granville Island, for example, in which it may be more expedient to deal with it in the form of a subsidiary organization. It is not meant to do anything radical to create a plethora of these organizations or anything like that and it may not really be something that is used a great deal. It is more an enabling situation.

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Chairman, since the minister has raised the issue of Granville Island, I would like to ask him whether it would be the intention of CMHC and the government to incorporate a separate body and transfer Granville Island to that separate organization and then privatize Granville Island.

Mr. MacKay: I know of no intention at this time to do that. If the hon. member is making such a representation I will take it under advisement. However, it is not something that CMHC has any immediate plans to do.

Clause 3 agreed to.

On Clause 4—Profits credited to fund

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Chairman, I would like a clarification again from the minister with respect to clause 4 which has amendments to the CMHC Act, section 29(2). This is a housekeeping amendment that authorizes CMHC to set aside money to cover future losses. I take it those losses are with respect to any losses in the mortgage insurance fund. This is technical and clarifies that authority.

I am wondering if the minister would care to comment on the need for this additional authority and whether it will stop the government from raiding CMHC of the surplus in its mortgage insurance fund as it did this year to the tune of $55 million just before the end of the fiscal year in order to make its deficit books look a little better. The needs of the corporation are not as well served as they could be when it is requiring CMHC to set aside moneys to cover future losses. Having said that it turned around and raided CMHC of $55 million in surpluses.

I wonder if the minister might want to comment on how this is going to protect the government from grabbing CMHC's surplus funds in the future.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Chairman, I want to say to my friend opposite it is not the intention to prevent the government from grabbing funds.

The member knows, as do all members in the House, that our government is involved in a very serious exercise to try to reduce the deficit so we will have discretionary funding so that we will be able to respond to some of the requests that have been made, such as the one made for the RRAP program by his colleague opposite, the member for Cape Breton—East Richmond.

It might not be a bad time to reflect upon the comments made by the treasurer of the province of Ontario, Mr. Laughren. When he was commenting on budgetary matters, I think it was on March 21, he indicated that he never wanted to see the government of his province put in a position such as the federal government found itself. To his credit he is resisting.

I think he indicated, as the member for Kingston and the Islands would know being a financial expert, that around maybe 14 or 15 cents of every dollar of the revenues of the province of Ontario are applied to paying the interest on past borrowings, which is only about half of what the federal government has to contend with.

When this money was appropriated from the fund which my colleague from London East talks about it was a considered act and it was done after careful consultation so that it would not interfere with the actuarial sums of the MIF. I can tell him that this other provision does not have any sinister background. As he indicated it is a housekeeping and expedient thing for the corporation to do.

Clause 4 agreed to.

Clauses 5 to 8 inclusive agreed to.

On Clause 9—

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Chairman, with respect to clause 9 and the changes in the National Housing Act, subsection 11(1)(a), dealing with co-operatives, I want to ask the minister if the content of this amendment would remove the statutory requirements that CMHC review housing co-operatives' by-laws.

I know that this is just an administrative step but in the past co-operatives were supported by CMHC and the federal government. Unfortunately this government has not as of this year because it cancelled co-operative housing programs. That was a brutal blow to those people who were looking for a form of housing that had security of tenure, that was affordable and had a mixed income concept.

CMHC now wants to not review the by-laws of the co-operatives. It would seem to me that the government, and if not this government then future governments, and CMHC would want to ensure that by-laws could not be changed by co-operatives. By-laws that are passed can easily be changed in the future. If one wants to ensure that co-operatives are functioning as they should and are protecting public investments then those by-laws should be reviewed on an ongoing basis by CMHC.

I am wondering whether the minister would comment as to why this clause is being put in.

• (2120)

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): I am informed that Canada Mortgage and Housing will continue to review these by-laws. It is put in for flexibility to eliminate the practice of more or less making it mandatory. Provincial legislation has a role to play here.

Despite any misgivings my colleague has about the lack of supervision or lack of interest he does not have to be concerned. We are still going to be looking at the by-laws and provincial legislation also has a role.

Mr. Fontana: I am not entirely satisfied. CMHC may want flexibility but it has that flexibility now. It is clear that clause 9 essentially will be that the rule will not be that they will review the by-laws.

I would like to deal with co-operatives because the by-laws of the co-operatives may very well relate to the indexed link mortgage. That has been the model for the past five years in the delivering of co-operatives.

The co-operatives have been killed. The ILM, indexed link mortgage, is a popular financing mechanism for co-operatives. While the federally subsidized co-operatives unfortunately might be finished in this country there are opportunities for co-operatives and other social housing groups to look at ILMs as a feasible mechanism.

I understand that even the Canadian Bankers' Association supports the ILMs. I am wondering if the minister would care to comment because in one of those by-laws the ILM may very well be mentioned. I am wondering whether that review of those by-laws is not absolutely necessary for CMHC to ensure that co-operatives are functioning within the mandate of the federal government's policy with respect to social housing and market housing.

Mr. MacKay: I think there may be a valid distinction to be made with respect to the charter and the by-laws. In any event, my colleague mentions the ILM mortgage. We are still involved, as he probably knows, in discussions with officials in the omnipotent Department of Finance. There may well be a light at the end of the tunnel or there might even be a tunnel at the end of the light.

I can assure the House and my colleague from London East that this is an ongoing issue. We are looking very closely at the future of ILM mortgages.

Clause 9 agreed to.

Clauses 10 to 16 inclusive agreed to.

On Clause 17—

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Chairman, clause 17 deals with this new amendment to the National Housing Act, section 15.1, that will essentially authorize CMHC to make loans, just like the approved lender loans for housing where CMHC will be providing financial assistance to setting operating agreements. This is a relatively new authorization that will allow CMHC to directly finance social housing and similar projects.

I would like to know what the criteria will be for writing those loans directly. As the minister knows, there are present agreements that will in fact come due. There are federal-provincial agreements that are in place now. How and when will CMHC directly intervene in financing that specific social housing program?

There are a number of groups, namely the Canadian Housing Renewal Association, and even co-operative groups, the Co-operative Housing Federation, as well as some municipalities that have some questions as to whether and when CMHC will decide to directly finance those projects.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Just scanning this I think that clause 17 to which my colleague refers is really concerned with the title. Clause 18 is the clause that has the substance in it. Insofar as the criteria are concerned it is as he would expect. It is where we can expect to get the proper financial backing. Of course we must go by reputation. It is not going to affect to any extent the existing arrangements that are made with financial institutions with which we have been used to doing business.

I cannot give him an exhaustive or even an exact definition of all the criteria. However, the reputations and capacity of the designated lenders with which we will be dealing are something that will be looked at very carefully.

Mr. Fontana: Mr. Chairman, I do apologize. Clause 17 is the title so I will make my comments with respect to clauses 17 and 18.

How will that criteria be established? Will it be done by regulation? Will it be done by CMHC directly?

While I am at it, one of the benefits that CMHC has indicated will accrue because of direct financing is that the government may save some $150 million over five years.

I am wondering whether CMHC intends to use those funds for the purposes of rehabilitating the public housing programs the minister, my colleague, the member for Don Valley East and I spoke about, which are in need of serious repairs. Is the $150 million going to be a dividend that is going to be paid to the government or will an additional mandate be given to CMHC in order to regenerate those funds for more useful purposes in terms of providing more housing and making sure those public housing units that CMHC now manages are maintained to the standards to which everybody else has to maintain them?

Mr. MacKay: We would hope that at least a portion of the savings that we are reasonably confident about can be achieved by this direct method of financing, which is another option as well as the delegation to direct lending, which I think my colleague would agree might save us as much as 50 basis points under some circumstances. We would be able to take some of those funds and use them, as he and other members have suggested, to refurbish existing public housing. That is a very good suggestion and one we hope to explore and to carry out.

Clause 17 agreed to.

Clauses 18 to 21 inclusive agreed to.

On Clause 22—

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Chairman, clause 22 deals with the National Housing Act, section 19. While it is a housekeeping and incidental matter, it does repeal the mortgage and loan purchase fund. One could make the case that discontinued funds really have no substantive role any more because a central borrowing authority is being created in order to give CMHC flexibility.

Could the minister provide us with an outline as to why they are removing flexibility presently in the National Housing Act such as the mortgage and loan purchase fund which may be required or may be a useful tool in the future?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): It is my understanding that this has already been repealed in a sense in that the effect of this legislation sets out CMHC's programs. We have taken out of the NHA basically all of the borrowing and investment authorities. Should this bill be adopted by the House, we will have one large borrowing and investment authority in the CMHC act. A lot of the other provisions, while they have served a useful purpose in the past, will in effect be obsolete in light of the new flexibility and the central borrowing authority we will have.

I can understand his observations. However, that in effect is the general purpose of what the bill hopes to accomplish.

Clause 22 agreed to.

Clause 23 agreed to.

On Clause 24—Agents

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Chairman, clause 24 is a new one and it deals with the approved lenders and indicates that CMHC may authorize approved lenders, municipalities and provinces to process loan insurance on behalf of CMHC.

• (2130)

I have no difficulty with that. Part of the main purpose for this bill is to have formations deliver the mortgage insurance program other than CMHC and therefore expedite the processing of applications and perhaps even save money.

I was rather curious in terms of the words municipalities and provinces. I wonder if the minister would care to give me an example of why or where a municipality or a province may want to process the loan insurance program itself when usually it would be a bank. As I understand it the banks are providing the mortgage insurance now, primarily the commercial banks. CMHC underwrites the risk to bring that level from 75 per cent up to 95 per cent of the mortgage now. I wonder why the words municipalities and provinces are mentioned. Is that in any way related to the constitutional discussions that are going on and therefore will allow CMHC to directly deal with municipalities and provinces?

I am rather curious to know if the minister might take a little bit of time to explain my concern with an explanation as to why municipalities and provinces are named and whether it really does have anything to do with the constitutional discussions that are going on.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): I can assure my colleague that it has nothing to do with the constitutional discussions. There may be times under a federal-provincial agreement when this would be a useful provision. There is really nothing more to it than that. It is enabling in effect and it is there to be utilized if needed.

I want to repeat again that this has no application to the best of my knowledge to any of the provisions that are being negotiated at this time with respect to the Constitution as it may relate to housing.

Mr. Fontana: That answer is not good enough. Would I then understand that if I moved an amendment to strike municipalities and provinces the minister would not have any objections to that and neither would CMHC? I would like the member to give me an example of when municipalities have asked for the authority or provinces have asked for the authority to deliver mortgage loan insurance. For the most part CMHC is doing it now. It wants to essentially let the mortgage lenders do it because they are underwriting most of the risk and providing most of the money. I would like to know if that means that municipalities will be able to lend money for the purposes of housing or whether provinces will be able to do so. I am not getting the right answer and unless I get a good answer I am prepared to move to strike the words municipalities and provinces unless I am quite convinced there is a good reason to have these two formations in place.

Mr. MacKay: Basically it is just part of the business process. There is nothing there, as I say, that is intended to be irregular. It is just a case that part of the process of ensuring and obtaining finance may be utilized under certain circumstances by the provinces or municipalities. It is something that gives the act more flexibility and gives Canada Mortgage and Housing more options in dealing with these entities. That is all.

Mr. Fontana: Mr. Chairman, I am sure that the minister would acknowledge to this Committee of the Whole that while this constitutional debate is going on in this country with respect to governments in housing, average Canadians are sometimes fed up with governments fighting turf wars over whose responsibility it is. They want problems in this country solved and housing is one of them.

The minister had discussions with big city mayors and with the Canadian Federation of Municipalities. The one thing that is clear is that when it comes to housing they believe that CMHC is absolutely essential to ensuring that we do have a national housing program, a national housing equity across this country. They are nervous about what potentially may occur to this great Crown corporation that represents Canadians from across the country, from Vancouver right to St. John's, Newfoundland. It does provide the security that people will be treated equally across this country.

I would like to understand and know whether it would be possible for municipalities and provinces to process loan insurance as per this new clause that has been introduced. I am rather suspicious that it has much more to do with flexibility in terms of potential constitutional results than it has to do with the delivery of the mortgage insurance process.

I wonder if the minister could try to convince me and perhaps others that in fact inserting those two words, municipalities and provinces, does not take away at some point in time the glue of CMHC in terms of its national obligations.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry if I am not getting my point across adequately but the provinces are in effect doing this now. They are underwriting it now. This will make the process more visible. Canada Mortgage and Housing still has the ability to approve it in the final instance. This just allows them to be more flexible in doing what they are already doing and have been doing for some time.

Again I want to assure my colleagues that it has nothing to do with any constitutional negotiations.

Mr. Fontana: Mr. Chairman, I know that the minister has CMHC officials near him. Could he give me an example of a few provinces or municipalities that are now delivering such a program so that for the record we could have it and I could be assured that that is exactly the past, present, and perhaps future precedent?

Mr. MacKay: Again, Mr. Chairman, I stand to be corrected, but I think all of the provinces—the member asked for a specific province—are doing it at the present time.

What this does is allow them slightly more power to commit Canada Mortgage and Housing to do this but it is not a giant step or anything like that. It just improves and enhances what has been going on. They are doing it.

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Chairman, as I read this clause, it indicates that the corporation may authorize any approved lender, municipality, province, or agency of a province to act as agent for the corporation in insuring loans. It goes on to say that in the case of an approved lender, insuring the loans that are made by the approved lender.

I take it in the case of the provinces and municipalities we are talking here of merely insuring loans that are made by CMHC. Is that the case? It is not insuring loans made by themselves.

Does it mean that we are in effect by this clause authorizing the municipalities and the provinces to go into the mortgage insurance business and to provide mortgage insurance themselves from a mortgage insurance fund of their own?

If it does not mean that, I would have to again ask the question that my friend across the way has asked, what specifically does it mean?

• (2140)

If there is now a province or municipality that is either lending money for mortgages or insuring mortgage loans I would like to know which ones they are.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman, the provinces under this provision would be acting as an agent for Canada Mortgage and Housing.

They have been acting, but not in the sense that they can do so independently. This gives them greater scope but it does not allow them to lend money, as my colleague suggests, but simply to act as an agent of Canada Mortgage and Housing.

Mr. Redway: Mr. Chairman, I take it then that this provision just delegates the authority to approve all the insurance provisions that CMHC has to the provincial government or municipal governments, as the case may be, that it only concerns the paperwork and the mortgage insurance fund stays with CMHC.

I take it this would only be for social housing or assisted housing projects and not to provide for a private market home ownership kind of mortgage loans insurance. Is that right?

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman, my distinguished colleague has stated the situation as I understand it. That is correct.

Clause 24 agreed to.

On clause 25—Aggregate maximum

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Chairman, being somewhat fearful of rushing in where prudent angels may fear to tread I would nonetheless ask the minister about clause 25 and its new section 21 and clause 28 and its renewed section 21.5. What is meant by the phrase "the aggregate outstanding amount", or in the case of clause 28 and section 21.5, "the aggregate outstanding principal amount"?

Does that mean at any given time the total of the original principal amounts issued or is there a running total based on the aggregate of the paid down principals at any given time?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Chairman, it is the aggregate. It is up to $100 billion.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Chairman, to take a simplified example let us say I have a mortgage with an original principal of $100,000 and after five years I paid that principal down to $99,000.

For the purpose of the aggregate set out in the bill would the aggregate include the $100,000 figure until such time as the loan is completely paid off or would it, after five years, be the $99,000 figure and so on as it is paid down?

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman, would my colleague run his question by me one more time?

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Chairman, I am trying to find out what precisely is meant by the phrases the "aggregate outstanding amount" and the "aggregate outstanding principal".

In a fevered attempt to explain this question let us again assume that the entire portfolio consisted of an initial principal of $100,000 and that after five years, because of payments on that principal, that amount had been reduced to $80,000.

For the purpose of these sections of the act would the aggregate outstanding amount still be the original $100,000 after five years or would it have become the $80,000 that in fact was the outstanding principal at that time? Which would be the total for the purposes of the act?

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman, it would be $80,000, it would be the lesser figure.

Clause 25 agreed to.

Clauses 26 to 35 inclusive agreed to

On Clause 36—

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Chairman, my comments would be on clauses 36, 37 and 38 as they relate to changes to the National Housing Act, sections 51(2)(b), 52 and 54. It talks about rehabilitation. My question relates very much to RRAP and ERP. In fact it calls for a maximum for loans forgiveness and contributions to be set by the Governor in Council rather than by regulations.

I know this is a simplified procedure, but I get rather nervous with respect to Order in Council as opposed to doing it by regulation because the regulations are transparent and up front. Everyone knows exactly what the rules of the game are as opposed to Orders in Council which are subject to a number of potentially different factors. I am wondering whether or not the minister might want to explain this.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): The member makes a good point with his observations on the merits of Orders in Council and regulations as he has stated, but the intent here is simply to let us respond more quickly to the needs of RRAP customers as it were. We are looking at ways of perhaps enhancing or improving the delivery and some of the limits on RRAP. We thought that by doing it this way we could do it more quickly and be more responsive. That is the only reason for it.

Clause 36 agreed to.

Clauses 37 to 40 inclusive agreed to.

On Clause 41—

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Chairman, if you want to call clauses 41, 42, 43, 44 and 45, I do not have any problem with doing that because all of these essentially have to do with repealing separate borrowing authorities for several programs and in fact changing them to that central borrowing authority for flexibility.

Let me ask again with respect to indexed linked mortgages whether or not we can get a commitment from the minister that this financial mechanism, which has proven its weight in gold with respect to co-operatives, has the support of CMHC, Canadian bankers, the co-operatives and even groups that may use it in home ownership, and would not take away the ability of CMHC or the government to continue to use them for other uses.

Can the minister tell me whether or not in any of clauses 41, 42, 43, 44 and 45 separate borrowing authorities may have been required? I know ILMs are now something in the neighbourhood of about $180 million. I mean CMHC has been promoting pension funds. Will the passage of these clauses kill the ILMs?

• (2150)

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Chairman, my initial reaction from listening to my colleague was that it would not. I have checked with my officials and I am told that indeed that is the case. It will not affect it whatsoever.

I might say to him that I share his positive feelings toward the ILM as an instrument, but unfortunately I cannot give him any commitment tonight that this will be quickly utilized. I am an advocate for it and I know he is, so we will continue our discussions with the Department of Finance.

Clause 41 agreed to.

Clause 42 to 45 inclusive agreed to.

On Clause 46—

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Chairman, with respect to clause 46, it introduces changes to section 95(1) of the National Housing Act. It relates to housing expense contributions. I take it that this is authorizing CMHC to make contributions to landlords to reduce rentals including where CMHC is the landlord.

I understand that this broadens the class of eligible contribution recipients. Can the minister tell us how that is being monitored? Is it by virtue of agreements with specific landlords?

I want to know what safeguards are in place to ensure that when CMHC is making contributions to landlords to reduce rents, hopefully with the view of providing affordable rents, they are living up to those agreements and they can be revoked at any time those landlords are not fulfilling their obligations.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Chairman, I can assure my colleague that these will be monitored. As he knows, this provision and the necessity for it were perhaps best illustrated when we had to use a device in order to deal with the province of Prince Edward Island which had no shared cost housing in the conventional sense. This is one reason for that particular clause.

I take his admonition on the other. We will be monitoring it to make sure there is no abuse.

Clause 46 agreed to.

Clause 47 agreed to.

On clause 48—Condition re sale, etc.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Chairman, I note in reading this proposed new section, section 97.1, which briefly provides that the corporation may require any person who is to benefit from a loan of the corporation at a lower interest rate or a contribution from the corporation or a forgiveness of any amount by the corporation, to provide the corporation with an undertaking that basically would, in the event of the person failing to comply with any of the requirements associated with the benefit, compel that person to pay back the benefit in whole or in part to the corporation.

For the purpose of this section clearly the definition of person is very important. I understand as regards housing co-ops, for example, the co-op is itself a corporate person and as regards a non-profit housing society, for example, that society is a corporate person. There is no problem there.

What I am wondering is whether or not it may be possible to further back that up either by the co-op or the housing society, in the instance of the co-op backing it up to its individual members or in the instance of the society backing it up to its individual board or even individual residents. Is that contemplated in this proposed section?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): I think the best way to answer that initially is to say that the intention, as I understand it, is at the project level. I do not think it is intended to go back to the individual members. It is at the level of the project itself.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Chairman, I had assumed that was the case. What troubles me somewhat is I see nothing here that precludes the individual project operator, be it the corporate person of the co-op or of the board or of the society, from backing that further to the membership on the one hand and the residents or board on the other.

I was just wondering if the minister could identify something in the new section or elsewhere in the act that would prevent that further backing of that responsibility in this instance.

Mr. MacKay: I am not sure I can fully answer my colleague without conferring with my officials, but I think it is a question of interpretation.

I think it is fairly clear that it was intended to operate at the project level and it would not be applied in an unreasonable or shall we say a Draconian way. If he wishes to give me a moment or two, I will try to elaborate a little more.

Mr. Harvey: I would be willing to let the matter hang.

Mr. MacKay: I would appreciate it. I do not want to give a misleading answer.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): We have heard the horror stories of where in fact this has occurred. We obviously want to stop it.

Can the minister say whether or not this will give the authority to CMHC to rewrite some of these old agreements and perhaps even look at the principle of retroactivity to ensure these loopholes are closed and closed quickly so that in fact nothing like this can occur again as has happened in the past.

Mr. MacKay: On the question of retroactivity I think the answer is definitely no. Again, I am sorry I cannot be more specific on some of the nuances here, but there would be no retroactivity involved.

Clause 48 agreed to.

On Clause 49—

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Chairman, this appears to be a very positive move on the part of CMHC in order to start charging fees for its services.

I am just wondering whether or not these fees are going to be charged to social housing groups or municipalities? Where is the criteria? I know you talk about training and non-profit but some of these fees now that are offered by CMHC to groups are in effect done now gratis, free of charge, as part of the partnership that exists between CMHC, the provinces, the non-profit groups or what have you.

I agree that sometimes the fee for services is a good idea but I would like to know who is going to be charged and when will they be charged because it is just a blank and wide-open clause. I would like some more specificity with respect to those fees for services.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): It is really basically an enabling provision. As the explanatory note in the bill as my colleague no doubt knows states, it is enabling to supply housing-related property management and development services to federal government departments and agencies. That is the main purpose of it. We are not going to impinge on what public works does, for example, but to the extent it relates to housing expertise it would enable us to deal with a situation like Summerside where there was a need for our services.

It allows CMHC to supply services to support federal-provincial housing arrangements in a cost-effective manner, so it gets us into that area as well. It makes it clear that Canada Mortgage and Housing may charge fees for these services.

I cannot see us, to use the vernacular, soaking non-profit housing groups or co-ops, but there may be certain services that we have that we could assist them with for a modest charge.

I will check with my officials here but I do not think there is any schedule of fees or any plans have been made. It is an enabling provision.

Clause 49 agreed to.

Clauses 50 to 52 inclusive agreed to.

On Clause 53—Coming into force

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): On a technical point. I know that clause 53(2) makes revised CMHC income tax status effective January 1, 1991. That was one and a half years ago.

I know that clause 53(3) talks about ceilings on the insurance and the MBS guarantees effective January 1, 1992. Is January 1, 1991 the date? It is about a year and one-half too late.

• (2200)

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): I will put it again in the vernacular if I may. That is the deal that has been made with finance, basically. That is the arrangement that has been made. It is part of the discussions.

Mr. Fontana: Not to hold it up here but perhaps I would be interested to see in the financial figures why finance would have wanted it on January 1, 1991. Perhaps that information could be provided to the Senate when it is reviewing this bill as well.

Mr. MacKay: That certainly could be arranged. My colleague at finance is very benevolent in this regard and I am sure he did it for our own best interests.

Adjournment Debate

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to elaborate for a few minutes on a question which I asked the other day in respect of the government's proposed purchase of $4.3 billion "worth" of anti-submarine and search and rescue helicopters.

The government's proposal is to buy 35 EH-101 helicopters, which are basically British helicopters, for anti-submarine purposes, and 15 of the same helicopters to be equipped for search and rescue purposes. These are to replace the current Sea King helicopters that are used on board our ships for anti-submarine and other purposes, and the 12 land-based Labradors which are used for search and rescue.

We have heard now from the Associate Minister of National Defence and from the Prime Minister that no decision has yet been officially made. What we have seen is that the Department of National Defence has made a very clear and specific recommendation to proceed with these helicopters.

We have also had the privilege of reading correspondence from the chief of the air services, Lieutenant-General Huddleston, and the commanding officer of air transportation who have really not criticized the idea of modernizing the current fleet, but rather said they do not want to proceed with that until the proposed purchase of new helicopters has at least been tested on cabinet.

Cabinet has before it now the possibility of a decision on this helicopter proposal. In the House, the ministers responsible have ducked the question of whether they are actually going to recommend it. In fact, today the Associate Minister of National Defence said that no decision had yet been made, no recommendation had gone forward.

I would like to say on behalf of the people of Canada that the government has to not only look carefully at this proposal, but ought in the general interest decide now that this proposal should not be proceeded with.

The proposal is obsolete in view of the changed world conditions and what we are hearing from authorities in the United States and other countries. First of all, with the end of the cold war, the end of the Warsaw pact and the dismantling of the Soviet Union itself, the Soviet submarine threat to North America has ended. If there is any sub threat to the western nations it is of a totally different order, and as a result of that the U.S. Congress has frozen a similar proposal from the U.S. navy. In fact, the U.S. navy has proceeded to modernize the Labradors, and because the Labradors are twin rotor, they are far safer working on search and rescue than would be the EH–101 helicopters that DND proposes we should be spending $52 million a crack for.

Our position is that, sure, the navy and the air force in Canada need helicopters, but for one–fifth the price they can end the proposal and can save the taxpayers billions of dollars. It is a responsibility the government should respond to.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, all Canadians know that there have been drastic changes in the over–all geostrategic situation. The conflict between east and west has thankfully receded, we hope permanently, into the pages of history.

That being said, all members are no doubt aware that there are unfortunately significant areas of instability throughout the world.

The April 1992 statement on defence policy makes it clear that Canada cannot isolate itself from the world. We must be concerned about threats to the larger community of nations with whom we live, work and trade.

Specifically that April statement notes, and I quote:

> Military capability is in itself an essential element of national policy, even in peacetime. The government is responsible for the surveillance and control of areas under Canadian jurisdiction, be they on land, in the air or at sea, regardless of any immediate or apprehended activity by anybody else.

There is a limit to which a nation can relinquish its defence responsibilities and continue to remain an independent country. If Canada is to maintain the capability to carry out surveillance and control of our sovereign areas of responsibility as well as operate in supportive collective security, then we must have the equipment and expertise for a general purpose capability.

The proposed new shipborne helicopters of which we have heard so much recently will, in fact, be used in multiple roles. The helicopters will possess a wide variety of capabilities, including anti–submarine warfare, anti–shipping surveillance, and of course search and rescue. These helicopters will represent the main weapon system of the new Canadian patrol frigates and, as such, are essential to the full realization of the operational effectiveness of the new frigates.

I also want to add that these helicopters will contribute to the Department of National Defence support of other government departments in the roles of fisheries protection, drug interdiction, environmental monitoring, and protecting environmental resources.

Much has been made of alternative options to spending funds on the new shipborne helicopters, including modernizing the existing CH–113 Labrador fleet. Does the hon. member really want the brave men and women of the Canadian forces eventually to be flying 70–year old helicopters because these ships are to be used to the year 2035.

[Translation]

FRENCH COLLEGES

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, on May 4, I asked the Secretary of State why the matter of a French college in northern Ontario was dragging on so long. The Bourbeau report, which unequivocally recommended building a French college in northern Ontario, was published two years ago. The issue has moved forward very slowly. People were and still are tired of being told again and again that something is coming soon.

First of all, I would like to make my colleagues in the House aware that such a college is essential.

At present, it is sad to see young people move out, exiled as it were, to southern Ontario. The attraction of the big city and the possibility of completing their education in their mother tongue are the main reasons for this unfortunate migration. There is no doubt that northern Ontario loses a little of its future every time a student decides to stay in the big city. Of course, the ideal solution is to have a French college in our region as soon as possible.

It is estimated that about 22,000 people have left the north in the past 15 years. Most of them are retirees and young people. The time is therefore right to found a new academic institution which would put great emphasis on the quality of written and spoken French. The illiteracy rate among francophones is thought to be 40 per cent. This situation is urgent, even though a sustained effort should be made at the primary and secondary levels starting now.

Nevertheless, in a national perspective that would ideally seek to create a climate of acceptance for linguistic minorities, such an initiative should be supported. Section 23 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees Francophones outside Quebec the right to education in French at the primary and secondary levels, where numbers warrant. In my humble opinion, these rights could be extended to the post-secondary level and it could be left to the Supreme Court of Canada to decide if such an extension were challenged.

From a practical point of view, students and parents would save tremendously on transportation costs; depending on where the college was located, the costs of room and board would be substantially less for those who would stay with their parents. Establishing such an institution in the north would also provide very significant economic benefits.

In conclusion, I would like to take the opportunity to remind the government that the province of Ontario announced on the weekend that it was approving the creation of two colleges, one in the north and the other in the south. This is subject to a contribution from the federal government, which I think is urgent.

Might the government be waiting for the right moment to make it an election promise? I hope not, because one should not play games like that with people's futures.

[English]

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, since at least 1989 it has been a priority of this government to do whatever it can to help the government of Ontario meet the legitimate demand of franco-Ontarian communities for the creation of a viable network of French language community colleges.

Of course in becoming involved in a project such as this we always have to keep in mind that education is in the area of provincial jurisdiction.

Nevertheless it is our conviction that the federal government has a duty to co-operate with the provinces to help ensure the highest possible standards of services to our official language minority communities throughout Canada, when the provinces indicate to us that they want our help and co-operation in this field.

In the case of Ontario, we are dealing here with a project of three separate colleges, one in northern Ontario, one in southern Ontario and one in the eastern part of the province.

The third project, La Cité collégiale has already been completed and is now receiving students right here in Ottawa—Carleton. It has proved a resounding success with an enrolment of almost 50 per cent of the number originally forecast.

It is in fact the tangible result of the agreement signed in 1990 between the Government of Ontario and the Government of Canada. That accord covered a seven-year period and an involvement of federal contributions of $50 million. To date, the government has paid out $19.5 million to the province as its share of expenses.

Negotiations with Ontario are proceeding for the creation of two other colleges and have been going on for the past several months. During that time the Secretary of State has had regular meetings with the provincial Minister of Colleges and Universities, the hon. Richard Allen.

There are of course problems to solve in terms of cost, definition of perceived location and institutions involved but discussions have been going on well and real progress is being made. We are confident that the agreement can be reached very soon.

Adjournment Debate

PETROLEUM INDUSTRY

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, let me try to bring my hon. friend opposite back to duties closer to those he has as parliamentary secretary.

On March 25, the government announced the removal of the last vestiges of significant limitations on foreign investment in the Canadian petroleum industry. This move will create no new investment in our price-depressed oil patch. As analyst Ian Doig was quoted as saying in a March 21 Globe and Mail article: "Why would you invest in an industry that has had a rate of return of less than 5 per cent in the last two or three years?"

This universal abandonment of restrictions on American control in the Canadian oil patch will, however, effectively treat the symptoms of the ills facing Canada's strategic energy industry with a further dose of the disease. Disease it is, for while Canadian control builds Canada, foreign control bleeds Canada.

Between 1980 or 1981 and 1990, Canadian petroleum companies generated a modest $1.5 billion net flow of capital into Canada. By contrast, foreign-controlled companies extracted over $25 billion from Canada including nearly $8 billion in dividends alone.

In the same period, Canadian-controlled companies reinvested 94 per cent of their cash flow. Foreign-controlled companies reinvested much less, just 77 per cent.

If that were not enough, the Conservatives caved in on this issue right smack in the middle of negotiations on the North American free trade agreement. The government effectively stepped away from the bargaining table for an instant, and there, in the same room utterly without strings attached, in full view of the Mexican and American negotiators threw one of Canada's best bargaining chips out the window.

The energy minister denies that his government's action was a result of pressure from the United States government. Maybe, but note that for at least the last four years the annual "National Trade Estimate Report on Foreign Trade Barriers" issued by the office of the U.S. trade representative in Washington, D.C. has contained specific reference to Canada's foreign ownership restrictions in energy.

In any event, it seems virtually certain that this relaxation of our limits to American investment in Canada's energy sector, a move taken right during the NAFTA negotiations, increased the pressure on Mexico to do the same.

As a result, this will have the effect, at a stroke, of significantly increasing the likelihood that large volumes of Mexican natural gas—so far starved for investment capital—will come on stream in less than a decade. It will thereby compete directly with Alberta gas, holding down its already pitifully low price. Some strategy.

I ask the government again: Does it have any estimate of how much more capital foreign-controlled companies will bleed from Canada as a result of this retreat, this capitulation, this abandonment of the Canadian national interest in Canada's national energy industry?

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would like to respond to the question by my hon. friend from Edmonton East regarding the potential level of foreign investment that might result from the announced changes to the foreign investment regime in the oil and gas industry in Canada.

The member knows the oil and gas industry has been performing poorly. Compared to other sectors of the Canadian economy, profit levels have been low and the level of capital investment has been insufficient to prevent a decline in employment. Since 1989 it has been estimated that the oil and gas industry has lost 9,000 jobs in western Canada.

Foreign ownership rules are only one of many factors influencing the level of foreign investment in the oil and gas industry. Other factors affecting the financial performance of the industry such as the price of oil, finding costs and the prospects for growth in the industry are very important.

Because so many factors are involved it is next to impossible to predict the level of new foreign investment in the industry in the long run. However, the executive director of the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada has estimated that the changes should stimulate increased investment within the year which may lead to increased annual investment flows in the range of $300 million to $400 million.

The honourable member quotes figures in an attempt to show that foreign ownership of the oil and gas industry has led to excessive repatriation of funds. The truth is that the outflow of funds during the period 1980 to 1989 was primarily due to the increased levels of Canadian ownership of the industry through takeover activity. Further, the $8 billion in dividends paid to foreigners over the past 10 years is not out of line compared with the $50 billion of investment and the roughly $60 billion of cash flow their investment dollars have generated.

The elimination of the Canadianization policy has allowed Canadian and foreign oil and gas companies to rationalize their operations and improve their competitiveness in global markets. This will contribute to a stronger industry with increased investment opportunities to improve future prospects for prosperity for all Canadians.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 10.22 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1), the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m.

The House adjourned at 10.22 p.m.
