Hon. Mr. DAVID—I think we are having a discussion for no useful purpose. Nobody is in a position to say whether the company will not accept the amendments suggested by the hon. gentleman from De Salabery. Why not postpone the consideration of the Bill until Tuesday next, and give the company a chance to say whether they accept or not. It will be time enough for us to say then whether we consent to withdraw the Bill or not. The company may prefer to accept it as amended by the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry rather than to withdraw it.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—So far as that is concerned, surely they must have been cognizant of what had taken place, at the time I was asked to withdraw the Bill. However, if it is the desire of the Senate to have the matter postponed until Tuesday next, I have no objection.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Why spend any more time over it.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The question is in regard to adopting the report of the committee. It does not prevent a motion being made to withdraw the Bill a little later on The adoption of the report is a different matter altogether. You cannot withdraw the Bill on the motion for the adoption of the report.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Oh, yes. It is more difficult to withdraw after the adoption of the report.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—I now formally move for leave to withdraw.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Give notice of an amendment.

Hon. Mr. POWER—My sympathies are altogether with the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry as to the substance of the case; but we have always to try and proceed according to the rules of parliamentary practice, and I propose to read a couple of passages from May on the subject. At page 687 of the last edition of May, I find the following:

> In passing private bills parliament still exercises its legislative functions, but its proceedings partake also of a judicial character. The persons, whose private interests are to be promoted appear as suitors for the bill; while those who apprehend injury are admitted as adverse parties in the suit. Many of the formalities of a court of justice are maintained; various conditions are required to be observed, and their observance to be strictly proved; and if the parties do not sustain the Bill in its progress.

This is the point which I wish to draw attention—

> By following every regulation and form prescribed, it is not forwarded by the House in which it is pending. If they abandon it, and no other parties undertake its support, the Bill is lost, however sensible the House may be of its value. The analogy which all these circumstances bear to the proceedings of a court of justice, is further supported by the payment of fees which is required of every party promoting or opposing a private Bill, or petitioning for or opposing any particular provision. It may be added that the solicitation of a Bill in parliament has been regarded, by courts of equity, so completely in the same light as an ordinary suit, that the promoters have been restrained, by injunction, from proceeding with a Bill, the object of which was held to be to set aside a covenant.

Then there is this note on this page—

Compare 827 as to parties not proceeding with their Bills. In 1828, the Manchester and Salford Improvement Bill was abandoned, in committee, by its original promoters; when its opponents, having succeeded in introducing certain amendments, undertook to solicit its further progress. But in another case, the committee would not allow this course to be taken (Minutes, 1859, 84, Cork Butter Market Bill.) And, in 1873, the committee on the Kingstown Township Bill, after the commissioners, under their corporate seal, had withdrawn from its promotion, refused to allow them to proceed with it, as individual petitioners.

Hon. Sir Richard CARTWRIGHT—Do I understand my hon. friend, that the parties opposing has to pay fees ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, the parties promoting. At page 827 of May, the procedure is laid down as follows :

If parties acquaint the committee that they do not desire to proceed further with the Bill, this fact is reported to the House; and an order is then made that the Bill be withdrawn or, merely, that the report do lie upon the table. In 1902 a committee having thus reported that the parties did not intend to proceed with their Bill notice was given of a motion to recommit the Bill; but Mr. Speaker ruled that such a motion would be out of order, on the ground that a private Bill was the property of the promoters and that the House could not compel them to proceed with it against their wish.

My sympathies are with the amendment, but I think that the parliamentary rule is the other way. I may say that I recall a case which arose shortly after I came into the Senate, where a man applied for a Bill of divorce from his wife, and the Senate decided not to grant him a divorce, and the committee recommended that instead of a divorce Bill, a Bill practically in favour of the wife should be passed. The man who promoted the Bill was not allowed to withdraw, and the committee reported this other Bill, which was adopted. I thought that was bad practice at the time, and I think so still.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I do not propose, as far as I am concerned, to insist unduly, but I must confess that I cannot appreciate what I have heard from the other side as bearing on the question. I quite understand that when a Bill is presented in committee that it is open to the promoter to proceed with the Bill or not; but that is not the case here. The Bill has been proceeded with by the committee, has been reported to the House, and it has become the property of this House, and, so, far, with the consent of the promoter. They say that the consent was given by error, and it is for this honourable House to appreciate the circumstances, and mete out justice to all parties. I would be very much surprised, when we have in our revised statutes reserved the right in granting any charter to retain it, amend it, and change it, as may be desired in future, any practice followed that may tend to curtail the power of parliament to consent or not, to the demand which is made, of withdrawing a Bill. It has been suggested that we were acting in the face of vested rights. I say no. If this company had actually commenced to construct the tunnel in question, it would be a matter of vested rights, but nothing in the way of construction has been done as yet. In fact, the main object of the present Bill was to obtain an extension of time to commence the work. They have now one year, and they desire to have an extension of two years, and when parliament finds, as the committee found, that when this charter was granted last year, this provision in the interest of the protection of the city should have been included. I submit that it is for this House to examine all the facts, and see whether the interests of the public are to be protected, and in protecting those interests to see that no injustice is being done to the promoters of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I think it would be in the interests of the company to postpone the consideration of the Bill till next week.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—Then I move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman has spoken.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I would move that the debate be adjourned until Thursday next.

The motion was agreed to.

INTERCOLONIAL BRANCH LINES BILL.

IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on Bill (No. 17) An Act to authorize the Government of Canada to acquire, by lease, lines of railway connecting with the government railways.

(In the Committee).

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I desire to say that while I would be glad to have some discussion upon this measure, I do not propose to press it through to-day. We can take subclauses that are unopposed, and then consider some of the amendments that have been suggested; but the questions are of some importance, and I do not propose to carry the Bill through committee stage to-day. After a reasonable discussion, I propose the committee shall rise.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not propose to make any lengthened observations at this stage of the Bill. I said all I had any desire to say at another stage; but hon. gentlemen may possibly remember that in speaking against the second reading of this Bill I took the case of the Canada Eastern railway, which was the most promising of all the roads connected with the Intercolonial railway, and tried to show from data in the possession of the House that the taking over of that road had been an unprofitable speculation for the Dominion government. Some hon. gentlemen may possibly have thought that I exaggerated; but I hold in my hand a letter from Mr. Pottinger, for so many years the chief superintendent of government railways, and still one of the Railway Board, which I shall read to the House. It is addressed to the secretary of the Department of Railways and Canals, and is as follows :

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY OF CANADA
—PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND RAILWAY.

Moncton, New Brunswick,
March 15, 1910.

Sir,—Replying to your telegram of the 12th instant asking information for the minister in regard to receipts, expenses, &c., of the Canada Eastern section of the Intercolonial, I send you herewith a statement that has been prepared by Mr. Shannon showing that the amount expended in the years 1905 and 1908 for the purchase of the Canada Eastern railway was $819,000. In the year 1906 an amount of $300,000 was paid in connection with the Fredericton and St. Mary's bridge, making a total of $1,119,000. The amounts expended on capital account in the years 1904-05 to 1908-09, inclusive, amount to $312,014.81. The statement shows the works on which these expenditures were made; they were almost all for improvements. The items for the strengthening of bridges are partly for improvements, as the wooden bridges with cedar foundations were replaced by steel bridges with concrete and masonry foundations.

The Blackville branch of the Canada Eastern railway, extending from Blackville to Indiantown, and forming the connection between the Canada Eastern railway and the Indiantown branch of the Intercolonial railway was repaired and improved at a cost of $116,641.61, which was charged to capital account during the years 1906-07 to 1908-09, inclusive. The total expenditure on capital account has therefore been $1,547,656.42.

I send you a statement from Mr. T. C. Burpee, showing that he estimates the amount required to put the Canada Eastern division into good condition at $319,000. This statement shows the items on which the estimated expenditure is to be made. Some of these items seem high.

In regard to the receipts and expenses, I inclose a statement showing the approximate expenses charged to revenue by years, from October, 1904, to March 31, 1909, and the total amount is $849,341.32.

A statement of the approximate gross earnings, by years, to March 31, 1909, is also inclosed. They amount to $627,738.03.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

D. POTTINGER.

Inclosure.

L. K. JONES, Esq., I.S.O.,
Secretary, Railways and Canals, Ottawa, Ontario.

So hon. gentlemen will see that in the first place there has been already an expenditure on capital account of over $1,547,000, and that an additional expenditure will have to be made of $319,000.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—The expenditure on the line from Blackville was not on any line purchased by the Intercolonial railway.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If is one of the roads improved.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—But it was not acquired by the Intercolonial railway.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Adding the $319,000, which Mr. Burpee says will be necessary to put it in proper condition, to what has already been expended, will give an expenditure on capital account of nearly $1,900,000. The gross revenue is $627,000, and the expenditure $849,000, that is $222,000 less than the working expenses. I am not going to read these statements; they are on the table and any one who wishes can see them, but I think it shows that the House cannot be too cautious in intrusting power to the government to take over these branch lines.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—What is the date of the statement?

Hon. Mr. POWER—It comes down to the 31st March, 1909.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I was not present when this Bill was fully discussed, but when I saw the measure, my curiosity was aroused to know what explanation my right hon. friend would give as to why the government should take authority to purchase branch lines. I suppose it will be readily conceded that power is already vested in the government to purchase any of those lines which from time to time they may consider it wise to acquire. But it seems to me that the mischievous element of the Bill lies in this fact; an invitation is placed on the statute-book to the bankrupt or nearly bankrupt branch lines in the maritime provinces that the government is ready to acquire them and make them part and parcel of the Intercolonial railway system, on what grounds it may be considered wise by the owners of those roads and the government to adopt. I have not heard it successfully controverted in any public way that the Intercolonial railway system has been a financial disappointment from the time it was acquired down to the present, that it has been a system involving the Dominion in enormous expenses from year to year, and a burden which is becoming almost intolerable and a commentary upon the inability or incapability of the government to manage a public utility. Those who favour the acquisition of public utilities by the government should combine and make every possible effort to induce the Dominion government to get rid of the Intercolonial railway, or put it under independent management, because it is the most destructive commentary that can be pointed to on the management by the government of a public utility. Ever since confederation the Dominion has been squandering large sums of money year after year in the management of the Intercolonial railway. It seems to me that it is not to the advantage of hon. gentlemen coming from the maritime provinces to support the continuance of the present system of management of the government railways. Surely the very limited advantages which flow from the administration of the Intercolonial railway by the government cannot be a matter of very substantial profit to the people of the maritime provinces. Is it not a matter of very much greater consideration to them that the government railways should be properly managed and placed upon as sound a basis as the other great railway systems of this country? It is a matter of notoriety that the other railway systems operating in the maritime provinces, the large trunk lines, can be made to pay not only their running expenses but a fair profit from year to year. Why this system cannot be made to pay, practically paralleling those roads, is one of the most mysterious problems I have been called upon to solve in connection with the government of Canada. Are the people to tolerate for all time to come the enormous loss which we are suffering from year to year through the political management of the Intercolonial railway. Do the small advantages which flow from the administration of that road by the government compensate the people of the maritime provinces? An hon. gentleman a few days ago, in discussing this matter, advanced the rather unique proposition that the expense of this road was to be attributed to the people of the upper provinces, and that they must assume the responsibility for the loss. I venture to say, and I make this proposition feeling that it is based upon common sense and fact, that the people of the maritime provinces are suffering from the mismanagement of the Intercolonial railway under government administration than from any other industrial source, in life of the maritime provinces. If this road were under private management, the maritime provinces would be infinitely more developed than they are at present. Would it not be everything to the lower provinces, if some great railway company were administering that road, throwing all the vitality and business enterprise into its administration that is found to be thrown into the administration of railway systems in other parts of the Dominion? We owe more in the western provinces to the proper operation of our railway systems than to anything else which contributes to the development of our country. Would it not be the same if similar management prevailed on the Intercolonial railway? Therefore, I cannot possibly understand why the government, in view of the fact that we are yearly losing hundreds of thousands of dollars in the operation of this road, should continue this wasteful administration and intensify it by the acquisition of roads which up to the present time have proved unprofitable.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—I should like to draw the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that for ten months of the year ending March 31st, there is a net profit on the operation of the road of $662,000.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Let me point out to my hon. friend, that that is a surplus purely above running expenses. The road is not made chargeable with interest on capital, and most of the betterments of the road are made chargeable to capital account. If my hon. friend would compare the administration of that road with the administration of any of the other great railways of the country, he would find that the result shows an enormous deficit in the management of the Intercolonial railway, and when we speak of deficits we do not take into consideration that there is any interest chargeable on capital. If this were a private road, managed by a private corporation, what would my hon. friend say if the capital sunk in the building of that road for years had never realized a cent of interest?

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—I would draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to the canals which have never paid a dollar on their cost.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The hon. gentleman surely does not say that the Intercolonial railway should be placed on a par with the canals, and made a sink hole for all the capital that we have put into them? We have discussed the operation of the Intercolonial railway on a business basis. I should like to have heard from my right hon. friend some explanation as to why this disastrous administration of the Intercolonial should be intensified by acquiring branch roads which admittedly are not paying, and which would be a further drag on a system which has been in an incubus on the exchequer of this Dominion ?

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (British Columbia) —The letter which the hon. member from Halifax has read, is an eye-opener to the House. It shows that branch lines have been bought which are decayed and useless. They have had to be repaired at a heavy cost, and have not paid working expenses. In the face of all that, are we going to repeat the experience? We have the statement of a reliable man who knows all about the condition of those roads, that they have been repaired and improved at heavy expense, and have never yielded a revenue to cover the working expenses. When this Bill was before the House for the second reading, I asked the right hon. gentleman who had charge of it, if he could tell the House whether the suggestion to buy these lines came from the government or from the people who owned the railways. Have they offered the railways to the government, or did the government see that by acquiring those lines a profit was to be made, and they are necessary to the trade of the country. Did the suggestion come from the management of the Intercolonial railway? I should like an answer to that now.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I am not aware that the branch lines owners have individually communicated with the government. As I understand, the suggestion came from the Department of Railways. My hon. friend beside me reminds me that at the instance of certain members of the House of Commons a request was made, and it was decided that certain officers of the government should investigate and report on these branch lines. I think that commission did report that some such power as is now asked for should be obtained from parliament.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What is the real cause that has led to the adoption of this policy? Are we to accept as the sole reason for acquiring these branch lines the reasons explained in the preamble of this Bill, which declares that these branch lines are to be feeders of the Intercolonial railway? If the information, which has been laid before the Senate, particularly the statement quoted by the hon. member from Halifax, is at all correct, instead of being feeders, I am rather inclined to think they will be suckers. Are there any other reasons which have induced the government to adopt this policy? It seems to me the policy has been forced upon the government in order to relieve those who have become involved in the construction of these lines, and for the purpose of making a raid upon the public revenues to repair and maintain them at a loss to the country, while the parties who own them, or the owners of the bonds have not the means to put them in proper condition. We know there are branch lines in the maritime provinces that have not been paying running expenses, that some have been abandoned, notwithstanding the fact that they have received large subsidies from the Dominion government. Is it proposed to take over these roads which have been abandoned because they would not cover the expense of management, to keep them in repair and in operation for a few people who use them, at the expense of every taxpayer in the Dominion? There can be but one reason for the policy which has been adopted, and that is to relieve those who have become involved in the construction of these roads and to acquire influence other than that which is legitimate in the maritime provinces. It has already been very clearly shown from the statistical records of other countries that government roads may be made at least to pay working expenses. In some cases they pay in addition some return on the investment. The success attending the management of the Australasian government railways is well known. Where they have been put under proper management, and freed from political influence such as has injured the Intercolonial railway—they have been made to pay working expenses, and contributed to the public revenue over and above the interest on the investment. Why should not Canada adopt a policy of that kind? It is quite clear why it has not been adopted. The government has not the courage to place this road under an independent commission, which would manage it on business principles. It has not the courage, because political influence has been brought to bear to such an extent on all governments since the road has been built, and until public men arise who have the courage to set at defiance the demand of political followers who are constantly urging them to do that which their consciences tell them should not be done, the Intercolonial railway will always be an incubus on the revenues of this country. I am rather surprised that my right hon. friend, the leader of this House, should be a party to an act of this kind, involving, as he well knows, a very large expenditure from which there will be no proper returns. I should like very much to see the right hon. gentleman on this side of the House and the Conservative government making such a proposition as this to him. I think I should hear his stentorian tones ringing through the Chamber loud enough to be heard from one end of this building to the other in condemnation of such a policy, unless he has marvellously changed since the days he was in opposition. I am sure if one could get at the inmost soul of the right hon. gentleman, he would find him not heartily in accord with this policy. The sooner an end is made of the extravagant, vicious expenditures which have been going on in connection with the Intercolonial railway for years and years, the better it will be for the country. My hon. friend from Moncton threw out the suggestion just now that during the last year there has been a surplus in the operation of the road, that is since it has been under the management of a government commission. That was very effectively answered by the hon. member from Calgary. I can remind him of the fact that when the Conservative government came into power a number of years ago, and the road was placed under the control of Sir Charles Tupper, he presented to parliament a report showing a surplus, and there was a surplus for that year; but it was gained in the same manner, I fancy, that it has been gained during the last year. So long as the political influence which has been exerted in the past, and is now being exerted, to compel the government to assume the responsibility for these expenditures, so long will the revenues of the country be depleted in the management of that road. We had an instance of it at the last election. It is a fact on record that immediately after the elections some hundreds of men were dismissed from that road, not being required. Does the government think for a moment that the people of this country believe that just on the eve of an election it was necessary to put five or six hundred men on that road in order to keep it in repair, and immediately after the election was over their services were found to be unnecessary? That is the sort of thing that has attended the management of the Intercolonial railway. If we acquire these branches, the same result will follow that has been indicated by the hon. member from Halifax in connection with the eastern road. We shall have a lot of them taken over, put in order and maintained at the expense of the government. There are some short roads in the maritime provinces that are paying expenses, and a little more. It will be interesting to know whether the government will take those over. I have no doubt the gentlemen who are interested in those roads will be quite ready to dispose of them if they can get anything like the amount they have invested. We are running riot in connection with the expediture of public money, and the hundreds of millions in which we are involving the country will ultimately tell seriously upon the interests and welfare of Canada.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —As I have already intimated, I have no desire to cut short the discussion of this important measure, and I do not propose to attempt to push it through to-day by any means. Every opportunity will be given hon. gentlemen to express their views. I would be disposed to regard this measure rather as a restrictive than a permissive measure. My hon. friend stated, and I think quite correctly, that the government had the power, if they saw fit, to purchase—and I presume by inference to lease—any of these roads as matters stand. He will observe that in this measure now before us, inferentially at least, that power is put under restrictions. In place of doing it as was done, practically speaking by an order in council in the case of the Canada Eastern, first of all the Board of Control, who are a reasonably independent body, not as fully independent as my hon. friend would desire, but still reasonably independent and not subject to the same pressure as the Minister of Railways might be expected to be subject to, have to examine and recommend. After that has been done, the Minister of Railways has to pass upon the proposition. After that is done, the matter has to be formally and specially submitted to parliament. These are safeguards to a reasonable extent that do not exist at the present moment? I think the practical result of the measure, if passed, will therefore be rather to restrict than to augment the powers the government at present possess. Because it is tolerably clear that any railroad which may be leased under the provisions of this Act will have to undergo a stricter scrutiny than was the case in the Canada Eastern, which my hon. friend has referred to. Therefore, the probabilities are that there will be less risk of any abuses arising if this Bill becomes law than if we pursue our present practice. I am afraid my hon. friend, the hon. gentleman from Hastings, may have to wait longer than he or I would find it convenient to wait, before he will see the displacement of the present government and the installation, shall I say of his friends, or some of his former colleagues on the benches in the lower chamber; but however, that may be, while I——

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Let us hope there are others.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Coming up?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Let us hope there are others besides those to whom the hon. gentleman refers.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I heartily, entirely and cordially agree with my hon. friend. I must admit candidly that no one of us, I think, on either side can feel that the results of the Intercolonial railway have been such as were hoped for when the project was undertaken. It is a very difficult problem, and the government ought, and will, and intend to make use of their best exertions to try and remedy the state of affairs that at present exist. They did take a step which has produced considerable good results, when they placed it under the control of a reasonably independent board of management, and from all I can find out, I think the administration of the railway has been very considerably improved under the management of those gentlemen, and that the political pull which, beyond all question, has been a source of mischief at times, has been very greatly diminished; that it can be altogether removed in this wicked world of ours is more than I dare promise. I do not want to prevent any other hon. gentleman from expressing their opinion; but unless other gentlemen wish specially to speak, I think I will move that the committee rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again, more especially as the important communication laid on the table and read by my hon. friend from Halifax should be fully before the House before we decide on the question.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—I should like to draw the attention of the House and of the hon. gentleman from Halifax to the fact that in the case of the Canada Eastern a very large amount of expenditure shown on the statement does not belong to the purchase of that branch; the only money spent on the Canada Eastern purchase is the $300,000 shown on the statement.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Excuse me.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—Only that amount expended since its purchase, making its cost lsss than $10,000 a mile for the railway. To-day we would authorize it to issue bonds to the extent of anywhere from $25,000 to $45,000 a mile for the purposes of the railway. The one million odd thousand which he read to the House, as shown in the statement is made up of $819,000 paid for the road, the $300,000 for the Fredericton bridge and other items. The Fredericton bridge was an institution which belonged to the government from its inception. It was built at the instance of some of our friends, and the money was furnished by the Dominion government, for which they were to pay four per cent. This $300,000 would have to be paid, whether the branch was purchased by the Intercolonial or not. Then we have an item of $116,000 on the Derby line to Blackville which really belonged to the Dominion government from the time of its inception. It was not part of the Canada Eastern. So that, in point of fact, all the moneys that have been expended since the purchase of the road amount to $312,000 instead of $1,700,000. The Canada Eastern, when it was bought, was not a played out railway. We had an equal number of trains running at the time it was passed over to the government as are running to-day, and the rates maintained on that road under private operation were less than are being now imposed by the Intercolonial railway, except on some classification of goods, and I may say just at this moment in respect of the Intercolonial, that while there have been no large enterprises developed under the present administration in marked distinction to what existed prior to the present government coming into power, it is not a pic-nic road, for the people down there as they pay a large amount of money towards sustaining and keeping up the railway service over the Intercolonial railway. By reference to the railway returns of this year, I find that the average amount of earnings over all the railways in Canada, amount to $6,000 a mile. The earnings on the Intercolonial railway, with 1,450 miles of road, amount to $6,200 per mile. Therefore, somebody is paying considerably towards the keeping up of the Intercolonial in the maritime provinces. The Canadian Pacific railway earnings per mile amount to $7,307, the Grand Trunk $8,590, the Intercolonial to $6,200, and the Canadian Northern, if you take their mileage as given in the Railway Report, the amount of their total earnings is less than $5,000 a mile. I do not say that in the administration of the affairs of the road the upkeep is not costing too much; but I want to say that more money is earned per mile on the Intercolonial railway than is earned on the Canadian Northern railway.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Does the Post Office Department pay the railway for carrying the mail?

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—I cannot answer for the moment.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—If they do not, that diminishes the earnings of the road.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I can inform the hon. gentleman that the late government and the present government pay a certain amount for the carrying of the mail, and charge it to the earnings of the road.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—The statement I am making is that in the railway returns of the year, the number of miles are given of all the railways throughout Canada. I have divided the total earnings with the number of miles, and the average is as I have stated.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I quite agree with what the right hon. leader of the House has said, that this Bill is rather restrictive in its character than otherwise.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Than other Bills.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—No, rather restrictive than permissive. The government certainly had all the powers which this Bill confers and has had them since the Intercolonial was built, and the only affect of this Bill can be, if they decide to acquire any of these roads, is to place certain restrictions on their action. I do not propose to say anything with regard to the general policy, as I understand that was discussed and settled on the second reading of the Bill, and what remarks I had to make on the subject I made at that time. I only wish at present to call the attention of the right hon. gentleman who has charge of the Bill to one of the clauses in section three, which provides that before any of these roads shall be taken over there must be a certificate from the chief engineer of the Department of Railways and Canals, that they are in good and safe condition for operation. While that appears at first sight to be a very desirable condition to impose, and while it was hardly to be expected that the government would take over any of those roads unless they were in a safe condition for operation, yet this appears to me to open a way for a class of transactions of which we have had a good many instances in the past, by which private individuals may profit at the expense of the government or of the railway companies, and I would like to point this out in the first place. Take the case of the Canada Eastern that has been referred to, and the large expenditures that have been made since it was acquired by the government. Supposing the condition had been imposed that those expenditures should have been made, and the road put in condition before it was taken over, I do not imagine the company would have been in a position to do it at all, and I think the same condition applies to the other branch roads of the Intercolonial railway, that if any branch line company were required to make large expenditures for the improvement of their road it would simply mean that it could not be taken over, because they would not be able to provide the funds to put it in very much better condition. So far as I am acquainted with their roads, they have at the present time exceeded their bonding powers as well as their ability to issue stock, and except what little surplus funds they have from the operation of the road, they are unable to make any improvements either in the road bed or in their rolling stock.

I should fear that if this clause were insisted upon, it would be opening the door for the intermediary to come between the company and the government to secure the taking over of these roads. Such a person, if he had any connection with some ruling power in the government, and had an assurance that a certain road would be taken over, might on the strength of that assurance be able to raise money to make the necessary improvements; but I venture to say that under such circumstances the rent fixed upon would have to be sufficient in addition to what the company would accept to pay the cost of these improvements and a good deal more. I think the provision is rather dangerous than otherwise, and if the government really intends taking over any of these roads, the proper way would be to negotiate with the companies themselves, and fix the price of rental which was to be paid according to the condition in which the road was found at the time it was taken over. I am calling the attention of the right hon. gentleman who has charge of the Bill to this point, and I trust, that as the committee stage has to be adjourned that he will give it consideration. In my opinion these words should be eliminated from the clause.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—I do not think the Intercolonial was ever in better condition that it is at present, or less susceptible to political influence. It is equipped with new heavy rails, powerful engines, as any one can see by the number of passengers that come over it on the arrival of every steamer in Halifax. As to placing the Intercolonial railway under an independent commission, it is a pity that that idea did not originate with my hon. friend from Belleville when he was premier of the Dominion, and when the road was in poor condition. I stated the other day, and I may repeat it again, that in taking over the branches, I hope the government will be extremely cautious to observe the condition those branches are in before they are accepted and taken over by the Intercolonial railway.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I should like to make an observation with regard to the remarks of my hon. friend from Westmorland. It is well known, at all events in the province of Ontario, that nearly all the railways built either by county or township subsidies were originally built by men who had an interest in the part of the country they lived in when they came to operate them, and when they found it necessary to exchange traffic with other counties they found themselves so handicapped with the cost of handling freight in small quantities that none of these roads paid; consequently they were taken over by the Grand Trunk railway or the Great Western or the Canadian Pacific railway or the Canadian Northern railway. This applies not only to Ontario but to Quebec. Take the Intercolonial railway entirely from under political influence and I venture to say there is not a gentleman in this House who would offer objections to branch lines being bought by the Intercolonial if it were a private corporation. The fear that my hon. friend has before his eyes is that some one connected with the powers that be might induce the government to accept a railway under alleged conditions that did not exist. I hope my hon. friend and all of us have confidence in the employees of the government of this country, and I am bound to say, after an experience of 40 years, that there is no higher class of men to-day in Canada than the railway civil engineers. Not one of these men, I am sure, would give a railway a certificate of a character that it did not deserve. If the Intercolonial railway is ever going to be of any service to the Dominion of Canada, we all know it cannot be so until it has feeders, and without these branch lines it cannot be a success.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The branches are there now.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Yes, they are feeders, but not to the same extent as if they belonged to the railway.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Why?

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Because each would be under different management. If you were to take the remuneration of the commissioners, double the amount and give it to one man, as the Canadian Pacific railway does with Sir Thomas Shaughnessy, Mr. McNichol and Mr. White; as the Grand Trunk does with Mr. Hays, and as the Canadian Northern railway does with Mackenzie and Mann, there would be no deficit. The whole trouble is that it is under this hydra-headed management, and why? Simply because the people of Canada took advantage of the political situation to criticise the government, and the government is afraid to give any one man power to control the men who are under him—the power that the Grand Trunk and Canadian Pacific railway give their general managers, to say to this man go and he goeth and to another come, and he cometh. Remove the Intercolonial railway from such conditions, and give a man who is capable of managing it a salary of $50,000, hold him responsible, and we will not hear of political influence at all. I believe there has been political influence. I am glad the Hon. Senator Thompson has been able to show this afternoon that the Intercolonial railway, so far as its earning power is concerned, is no worse off than the Canadian Northern railway. It has not as high earning power as the Canadian Pacific railway or the Grand Trunk railway, but it must be borne in mind that the Canadian Northern railway, so to speak, is a new railway, and it has been adding new branches to its line, but were the Canadian Northern railway as long in existence as the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Pacific railway, I am satisfied that the earning power would be just as great per mile, and I will venture to say that under the same kind of management the Intercolonial railway will be found as economically managed and savings made, and political pull would be abolished and men would pay and have to pay the proper rates upon frieght and other service. Under these conditions, I think this Bill is a step in the right direction, and I hope every safeguard will be taken to see that the government is not made to pay more for these branch lines than they are worth. I am satisfied that no engineer with his reputation behind him and his honour in front of him would give such a report as would mislead the government or any individual who wanted to buy the branch lines. This is the first step the Intercolonial has made in the direction of having feeders which will be jointly managed by one central head. The whole trouble, as I have said, was that these branch lines were not competently or economically managed. They could not exchange traffic one with the other. These difficulties will be abolished; the roads will all be under one management, without having a general engineer or chief engineer on each branch line.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I should like to say a few words on this measure, which perhaps I should have said on the second reading, but I was somewhat diffident about doing so, inasmuch as there is a statement in the preamble of the Bill, which I am not in a position to controvert. So long as the Intercolonial railway belongs to the government of Canada, and is managed by the government directly or indirectly, I am not able to deny, and I have not the necessary information to say to the House what is contained in this preamble: 'And whereas it is deemed that such traffic, development and increase can be facilitated and advanced by the acquisition, by the government of Canada, of lines of railway connecting with the government railways, as feeders thereto,' is a true statement of fact or not. Possibly so long as the railway remains under the government management, directley or indirectly, there may be something to be said in favour of leasing some of those branch lines. The question does not present itself in such a way as to militate in favour of my recording my vote against the policy contained in this Bill. I think I have already stated my own view to the Senate and it is in favour of getting rid of the Intercolonial railway by leasing it or selling it. I cannot understand how, when this country agrees to collect no interest on the hundred million dollars sunk on this road, that the tax-payers should allow themselves to be bled to spend more millions on this government railway. It is all very well to speak of surpluses. It is merely a question of book-keeping. There may be in the running expenses of the road and the ordinary receipts a balance in favour of the railway; but this is not taking into account the million or two, or three, or four which yearly we are asked to spend on capital account. This is the reason why, after the long experience we have had of the administration of this road, I have come to the conclusion that it would be much better for all parties interested, those using the railway, and those not using it, outside of Quebec and the maritime provinces, that this railway should be put in private hands. These are my views, and so holding them, I am disposed to vote in favour of any amendment which will surround the purchase of these branch lines with all necessary safeguards.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Do the branch lines mentioned in the Bill come under the control of the Railway Commission? Are they chartered by the Dominion government?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The Intercolonial is not, but the branch lines I think are.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—They are not under the control of the Railway Commission.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—That may be true of a part of them, but I think not of the whole of them.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I think the branch lines are under the control of the Railway Commission.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Those which have federal charters are.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I understand that all railways connecting with the Intercolonial are subject to the legislative jurisdiction of parliament, and, therefore, subject to the Railway Commission.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—If those branch lines of railway are being operated by companies that are under no control, it appears to me that the people in the part of the country where they are being operated would feel that some change is necessary to have somebody control the rates and so on. The statement by the Hon. Senator Thompson that the Intercolonial has an earning power of over $6,000 a mile as compared with the earning power of $5,000 a mile on the Canadian Northern railway, is a revelation to me. The Canadian Northern railway at $5,000 a mile gives as good service as any road could give, pays all its expenses and the interest on its bonds. Here we have the Intercolonial, according to this statement, earning a thousand dollars more a mile, but paying no interest at all, and hardly paying expenses. So there is something radically wrong, and I would agree with the hon. member from Welland that it is pretty nearly time that the management of the road was so improved that its earnings would cover the expenditures. The present losing system has been in existence long enough.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—I am somewhat surprised to hear the leader of the government and the hon. member for Westmorland say that this is a Bill to tie the hands of the government so that they cannot take over these roads. I thought it was the other way. It is a well settled policy with all railway managers in this country that branch lines are as necessary for the main line as streams are to take sawlogs to the mill for the lumberman. If twenty or twenty-five years ago the government of that time had followed the railway policy pursued by the great railway companies of this country, and taken over branch lines, I do not think the Intercolonial railway would have been a sink-hole, but would have been a revenue producer for the country. I hope the Intercolonial railway will take over the branch lines the same as the great railway corporations are doing, not only in the interests of the main line itself, but in the interests of the people along those branch lines, who have to pay two rates to-day.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Will the leader of the House inform us if offers have not been made to the government of a tolerably large sum if they would give the management of the Intercolonial railway to certain railway companies? My reason for referring to that is, that if the road were placed under the same management as has been indicated by the hon. member for Welland, it would pay. If private parties interested in railways are in a position to offer some half a million of money per annum, for leasing the road, surely under proper management the government could make it pay its way. Can my right hon. friend tell me if any such offer has been made, and if so, has it been considered?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —No formal offer has been made to the government.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to point out to the hon. member from Fredericton, that his remarks and the figures he quoted did not touch the point raised by the hon. member from Halifax. The statement made before the Senate shows that the earnings of the road do not cover the expenses of management and operation, and that every year there is a loss. Now, no matter what may have been the origin of the construction of that road, or what has occurred since, the vital point has not been touched. I admit the correctness of all the hon. gentleman has said in reference to the building of the road, the subsidies which were given for the bridge at Fredericton, and the other matters to which he alluded, but I should like to call attention to the fact that he did not touch the point raised by the hon. member from Halifax. While I am on my feet, permit me to say that the arguments and statements presented by the hon. member from Welland are the only reasons that have been given for acquiring the road. The same traffic however, that exists to-day exist if they were not branches of the Intercolonial railway; but there is some force in the argument that under one management the branch lines connected with the Intercolonial railway could be more cheaply operated. I do not see, however, how the traffic is to be increased by the Intercolonial railway absorbing them, any more than there would be under private management

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG from the committee reported that they had made some progress and asked leave to sit again on Wednesday next.

MR. L. M. FORTIER'S POSITION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

1. Is there in the Department of the Interior, in the immigration branch, an employee who answers to the name of L. M. Fortier?
2. What is the nature of his functions?
3. What is the amount of his yearly salary?
4. Is he obliged to know the French language?
5. In reality, does he speak it, as the name which he bears would seem at first sight to indicate?
6. If he knows the French language, why does he make a point of not using it in the answers which he gives to letters which are sent to him in French?
7. If he does not know the French language, why was he chosen last month to hold an inquiry in English in a matter where the complainant and the accused and the witnesses, all familiar with the French language, would not have been able to be understood without the help of an interpreter?
8. Is it because that in the whole Department of the Interior there is not one single employee with a sufficient knowledge of the French language to be able to preside over an inquiry held in French?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The replies furnished by the department are as follow:

1. Yes.
2. He is the chief clerk of the Immigration Branch.
3. $2,300.

4. No.
5. No.
6. See answer to 5.
7. All connected with the immigration service at Quebec are obliged to know English, 70 per cent of the immigration through that port being English speaking.
8. No.

DELAYED RETURNS.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the orders of the day are called, I would like to ask the hon. leader of the House to press upon the proper party for the production of a few returns for which I moved some months ago, one giving the contract entered into by the department and the Koenigan Company for the removal of the debris of the Quebec bridge, which I have not yet received, and another one for the copy of the complaints and inquiry made in the matter of the Quebec Rock City Tobacco Company.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Ifj the hon. gentleman will kindly send me a memo, I will bring it to the attention of the department.

Bill (UU) An Act respecting the Essex Terminal Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. McHugh.

Bill (No. 99) An Act respecting the Vancouver, Victoria and Eastern Railway and Navigation Company.—Hon. Mr. Bostock.

SUPPLY BILL.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (No. 196) An Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1910.

He said: The total amount involved in this Bill is $1,636,000, the details of which hon. gentlemen will see set forth in the schedule to the Act itself now in their hands. They are chiefly for the purpose of completing improvements at Port Arthur and Fort William, and dredging boats; also a considerable sum is required for the additional service of the post office.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am aware that we have no power to interfere with money Bills; still it has been usual, if there were any items which required explanation, to ask that the explanation be furnished. The hon. gentleman in this instance has given us the correct amount required for the public service in this supplementary estimate, but I would call his attention to the fact that he overlooked the amount that he asked for in the last. If he had taken the trouble to look at a portion of the estimates which we were asked to pass a short time ago, he will find the answer he gave me at that time was not quite correct. I presume it arose from the fact of his not having looked at the estimates which he was asking the Senate to approve. I put this question to him, 'What is the amount?' and the answer was twenty-one million,' and I said 'Is that all,' and the hon. gentleman said, 'That is all at present,' but if he refers to that estimate he will find that it amounted not only to twenty-one million, but to forty-three million. The only explanation that occurs to my mind is that if he had looked at the first part of the Bill he would have seen that the estimates were divided into three, and the total of the three would be $43,000,000, so that it was a very much larger amount than the hon. gentleman at that time informed the House we were asked to pass. I do not desire to be understood that I accuse him of making the statement with the intention of deceiving the House. No doubt it arose from the reasons I have advanced. The first part of it was the amount to which the right hon. gentleman referred, and he must have overlooked the fact that there were other portions which brought up the total to the sum I have mentioned. I find an item in the miscellaneous list for an amount required for seed grain. Are we to understand that there was seed grain for distribution in the Northwest Territories a year or two ago, when there was a failure, and that the sum exceeded by $42,000 the amount voted by parliament? Then item 386 provides a sum to enable the Department of the Interior to settle the claims of Jas. Richardson and Sons for loss on seed grain, to the amount of $4,480. Can the hon. gentleman tell us how the loss occurred?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —As I understand from the Department of the Interior, who had this matter in charge, this sum is required to pay for an amount of seed grain that had been distributed to settlers in the Northwest—that is with regard to the $42,000. The exact details of the transaction with Richardson and Sons, I can only state from memory, but I believe they are something to this effect: the oats which they purchased were bought in England, and were allowed to be sent forward to St. John. There objection was taken to their quality; but for some reason, I do not understand why, instead of being allowed to sell them there, which could have been done without any loss, they were obliged to forward them on to Winnipeg to be formally inspected and refused. The oats, I believe, were good, but not quite up to quality. In that way a loss of $4,486 was incurred, which on consideration, the department thought it would be unfair to exact from these parties. That is why this item is put in, as far as my memory serves me. I did not expect to give a detailed account of all these estimates, inasmuch as we must pass them en bloc, and can only criticise them.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is probably the explanation. When a bargain is made to purchase for the government, if there is a loss on the transaction, the purchaser ought to be recouped unless there is good reason for not doing so. I do not think I am exceeding the rights of a member of the Senate in asking these questions. Occasionally the Supply Bill has been passed in this House without comment, but I can remember occasions when I occupied the position which my right hon. friend fills to-day, being subjected to severe criticism, and obliged to answer many questions, and furnish explanations of different items in Supply Bills. I am not, therefore, exceeding the privileges of parliament, nor am I adopting any course which has not been pursued in the past.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The hon. gentleman has a right to put his questions.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the third reading of the Bill presently.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I see an item of $30,000, working expenses, further amount required for Prince Edward Island railway. Have the expenses of running that road exceeded the estimates of last year by $30,000?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Apparently so. My hon. friend knows that that railway has both in the time of our predecessors, and in our own time, never been able to pay its operating expenses. The expenditure has always been very considerably in excess of the receipts.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am aware of that fact.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I think the total loss is now $90,000.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This is further evidence of the results of government ownership and management of railways. Whether that deficit is due to the same causes as on the Intercolonial proper, I cannot say. Perhaps the hon. gentleman opposite, who is smiling at my remark, can tell us why there should be $30,000 voted in addition to the sum appropriated last year to cover the management of that road?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Perhaps it is because of a lack of branches as feeders.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Thank you. Then we are to add to the expenses of the Intercolonial railway by acquiring branches?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —No branches at present are proposed for the Prince Edward Island railway. I may relieve my hon. friend's mind on that subject.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a third time, and passed.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 123) An Act respecting the Central Canada Manufacturers Mutual Fire Insurance Company.—Hon. Mr. Frost.

Bill (No. 124) An Act respecting the Eastern Canada Manufacturers Mutual Fire Insurance Company.—Hon. Mr. Frost.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I notice that the two Bills that we have just passed are practically the same in name. Does that mean that one is to confine its operations exclusively to Central Canada, and the other to Eastern Canada.

Hon. Mr. FROST—They are just two separate Bills.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understand that; but they appear to be for the same purpose. Is one to confine its operations to Central Canada, and the other to Eastern Canada, and where are the divisions drawn?

Hon. Mr. FROST—The Bills are two separate Bills, one for Eastern Canada and the other for Central Canada.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I know that, but where are the divisions to be?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—It is merely in name; there are no divisions.

CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

SENATE RECEDES FROM ITS AMENDMENT.

The order of the day being called:

Consideration of the amendment made by the House of Commons to the amendment made by the Senate to (Bill 61), An Act respecting the Canadian Northern Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS moved that the Senate recede from its amendment. He said: When this Bill came up yesterday, some hon. member asked for explanations. When the Bill was in committee, an amendment was made, which provided that the total issue of bonds on the railway should not exceed $25,000 a mile. The Senate did this, supposing that that was the extent of the bonding power. Clause 4 of the Bill regulates the bonding power, and the company is allowed not only the $25,000 a mile, but $5,000 a mile for terminals, and an increase of the amount the other side of the Rocky mountains. What the Commons did was merely to change that with respect to the issue of bonds.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS ASSENTED TO.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

His Honour Mr. Justice Girouard, Deputy Governor General, being seated at the foot of the Throne.

The Honourable the Speaker commanded the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to proceed to the House of Comons and acquaint that House :

It is the Deputy Governor's desire that they attend him immediately in this House.

APPOINTMENT OF FRENCH CANADIAN SENATORS AND JUDGES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (British Columbia) rose to direct the attention of the government to the following statement which appeared in the Ottawa 'Citizen' newspaper of the 19th March, 1910:

French Canadian Deputation to the Premier. Want More Senators and High Court Judges. 'Resolution of Recent Congress is Presented.'

"Senator Belcourt headed a deputation from the recent French Canadian Congress of Ontario, which waited upon Sir Wilfrid yesterday. Representation of the French people of the province in the Senate and on the High Court Bench was discussed, and the resolution adopted by the congress was presented.

"It was pointed out that the French population of Ontario exceeds 300,000, but they have only one senatorship. They contend that they should have another. On the High Court Bench there is no French-speaking judge, and it was argued that in both of these cases the French representation is disproportionate to that of other nationalities.

"The premier gave a sympathetic hearing to the delegation, but made no definite promise in his reply other than that the matter would be considered carefully."

And inquired if such a deputation as that named waited on the Honourable the Premier. If so, is it the intention of the Government to take into consideration the request of the deputation?

He said: The senator chiefly concerned in this matter is not present, and I am not quite certain whether the statement which appeared in the 'Citizen' which I copied in my resolution is correct or not; but I want to assure the House that I do not raise this question in any way hostile to creed or race, but purely on public grounds. It is a question which affects the Senate and judiciary of Ontario. Assuming this statement to be correct, the request made by the delegation headed by the senator from Ottawa, contravenes the British North America Act. That Act clearly sets forth what the composition of the Senate is to be for the old divisions, and there is no mention of any representation for creed or race. The senators are appointed for the whole country, irrespective of religion or race. If the hon. gentleman and his delegation to the premier the other day had asked for representatives to fill vacancies, there would be nothing to say in the matter; it would have been quite a legitimate request to have vacancies filled by representatives of the French Canadians and Catholics. But, supposing other denominations of Canada asked for similar privileges, would it not be a most deplorable case—each denomination demanding representation in this House and on the bench? If this hon. gentleman were here I would ask him what strength it would be to French Canadians, or what benefit to the Catholics of Ontario if they had another senator in this House? Fortunately, no religious questions are discussed here. Such matters are entirely removed from this arena; so that I cannot see myself, if half of this House were composed of Roman Catholics. that it would be any special benefit to that denomination. So far as I can see, we have hitherto worked harmoniously together. I cannot see that any French Canadian gentleman in this House is under any disability or disadvantage. He is liked by his brother senators, and, as far as I can see, there is no disparagement of any kind, and why this delegation should ask for representation of that kind I cannot understand. I think the suggestion should be scouted by this House. Does a move of this kind lead to homogeneity of this House, or elevate public spirit? After the two peoples living together in harmony and peace for a hundred years is it not time that questions of race and religion died out? Let each work in their own sphere as they like, and not bring such matters prominently before public bodies like this. With regard to the bench of Ontario, and the appointment of a French Canadian judge to that position, if it be to fill a vacancy, there is no objection; but I take it that the very fact of asking for a judge of that religion and race is a reflection on the Anglo-Canadian judges of America. It is tantamount to saying that they have favourites; that they do not act in an impartial way, but rather unfairly towards the Roman Catholics in the province. Perhaps the hon. gentleman from Ottawa might know of some case of partiality. I never heard of any. The fact of asking for a judge of this race or creed would be a reflection on French Canadians themselves. It would be tantamount to saying that if they had a judge on the bench of their own nationality and religion he would favour them. That inference can fairly be drawn from the request of the delegation. Otherwise why ask for a judge of that nationality or creed?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I have just this moment come into the House, and have not had the advantage of hearing what my hon. friend said in connection with the question on the order paper. I have been asking myself why the hon. gentleman brings this question before the Senate. What the Senate has to do with it at the present moment is something I fail to understand. The French Canadian Educational Congress for this province passed a resolution asking the government, when making appointments, to take into consideration the claims of the members of the bar of the province who belong to the French Canadian race to representation on the bench. Surely the hon. gentleman does not think that is not a legitimate ambition? I do not know whether he objects to that. If he does it will enable me better to know what I am expected to say.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (British Columbia)—No, I do not object to representation of any element of the population on the ground of race or creed. I object to the proposition of the hon. gentleman as unconstitutional. If he and his delegates did ask for a new senator, then they were proposing a contravention of the British North America Act, which provides the number of senators to be appointed for each province, without regard to creed or race. It is true the Governor General can appoint three or six senators, but one must be from Ontario, another from Quebec, and another from the maritime provinces. If the hon. gentleman asks simply for appointment of a senator to fill a vacancy, he takes away my argument except that I claim that all the denominations should have the same right to representation.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I do not know what my hon. friend objects to.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (British Columbia)—I object to contravening the British North America Act.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—My hon. friend must see that there was nothing of that kind in the request. We simply asked the premier, when making appointments to the bench of this province, or filling a vacancy in the Senate for this province, that the claims of the French Canadians of Ontario, who number a least one-tenth of the population, should be considered. They were taken into consideration when the French Canadians were less than half the numbers they are to-day in Ontario, and it was thought proper to give them recognition in the Senate. I am a living example of that principle. The hon. gentleman I had the honour to succeed in this House, Mr. Casgrain, was appointed in recognition of the presence of the French Canadian population in this province. He was appointed at a time when the French Canadian population was in Ontario about half what it is to-day. The French Canadians, acting on that principle, which was recognized by the preceding as well as the present governments thought that they might very well urge upon the premier, now that they are double in number, that their representation should be increased proportionately. That is all there is to it. We did not go to the premier and ask him to amend the British North America Act so as to get an additional senator for Ontario, nor did we ask him to create a new position on the bench of this province for the purpose of finding a position for a French Canadian judge.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (British Columbia)—I am very glad to hear it.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—We simply asked that when a vacancy occurs in the Senate, or on the bench of Ontario, the claims of French Canadians, who number 225,000 of the population of the province, shall be considered.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (British Columbia)—There is nothing in this article stating that.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—There is nothing indicating the contrary.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—There is just one statement made by the hon. member from British Columbia which should not be allowed to go on record on the 'Debates' unchallenged. His statement is not one of fact, but one of assumption—I allude to the desire of the French Canadians to have a judge on the High Court bench. The hon. gentleman assumed that they wanted such representation because they would feel more at home, and would expect from such a judge a partial hearing. That statement must not be allowed to go forth unchallenged. The French Canadians of Ontario are not seeking representation on the High Court bench with any such object in view, because for the last hundred years they have given proof of their complete confidence in the judiciary of the country, without regard to creed or race. To-day, the judge of the Exchequer Court is a gentleman, who though a very able and excellent judge, does not understand one word of French. The French Canadians seek no partial judgments from their judges. They are quite willing to entrust their civil rights to the judiciary, and juries, whether French or English, so the supposition of the hon. gentleman is not based on fact. It is controverted by history and by the position that the French Canadian people have held in this Dominion. They never seek to override the rights of others, and when they ask for representation as a matter of right, they should not have their motives impugned. They are simply showing that the French Canadian people are progressive, and developing strength, and adding that strength on the right lines of toleration for all. They are not trying to subvert any constitution or principle in this matter; they are simply exercising the right of all citizens to seek representation, and I am prepared to say here that they have never abused it. On the contrary, we find tolerance in the French Canadian ranks when we do not find it in the English ranks. Take the last election in Montreal; they elected an Irish Catholic mayor. How many Irish Catholic mayors have been elected in Toronto? The French Canadians of Ontario are only seeking at the hands of our government a recognition of their intelligence and their worth in this country, and no senator has a right to question their motives in taking that course. The government cannot do better than take this matter into their serious consideration. Of course, we know that governments have to move slowly in such matters, and it may be some time before the French Canadians of Ontario will realize their aspirations.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I did not understand it was the intention of the congress which has been alluded to here to ask for an increase in the representation of the Senate from Ontario. I understood, as I read it, that the demand was, if a vacancy should occur, the French Canadians of Ontario should be given increased representation. I might draw attention to the fact that the four great western provinces have only 15 representatives in this House as against 24 from Ontario. The hon. gentleman can, therefore, possess his soul with patience, because if it was the intention of the government to increase the representation from Ontario in the Senate, the western provinces would have a much better claim. Taking into consideration the fact that the western provinces are rapidly assuming increased importance, they are entitled to at least as large a representation in this House as the three maritime provinces. The west is producing the wealth which is building up the great cities of eastern Canada, and they should have larger representation in the Senate. I have heard remarks made here, and in the other House also, about the broad-mindedness of French Canadians in electing people of other nationalities; that spirit is not confined to the province of Quebec. In the part of the country I represent, the English speaking people of the city of Battleford elected a French Canadian, Mr. Champagne, although there are not a hundred French votes in the constituency. It all goes to show that there is a spirit of broad-mindedness in the western provinces, and I think also in certain parts of Ontario; and it is a good thing for the country that there is.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I submit that the question raised by my hon. friend from British Columbia, might have not been put, but since it is under discussion, I feel that I might go to the extent of endorsing in toto what my hon. friend from Ottawa has said. I happened to be present at that convention of the French Canadians of Ontario; in fact I was a little associated with it, and the impression I got from what I heard and saw, both in public and in private, is that a wholesome spirit prevails even here in Ontario, which is a little bit maligned, between the French and the English generally. Anything that we witness here which is jarring in its nature does not come from the majority, either English or French. What the French Canadians of Ontario ask for is legitimate, and before any audience in any English speaking community, what is legitimate is always harkened to with favour. The adage of British fair-play is not based upon non-realities, but it exists pretty well throughout the Dominion. I will answer my hon. friend from Victoria division, that it is not only in the province of Quebec you find liberality and generosity. My hon. friend from the west has just told us what happened in Battleford. That same spirit prevails in the maritime provinces, and I am glad here to give testimony to the English speaking majority of the maritime provinces in regard to their large spirit of generosity, and fair play towards the French, who happen to be in the minority. This little diversion is for the purpose of coming to this point: that what the French people of Ontario have been doing and asking, we, from the maritime provinces have done and asked, and our request was responded to favourably, just as we expected from our English compatriots. I might give myself as an example, though in my case the result has not been what it might have been. My appointment to the Senate is due to the fact that the English majority of New Brunswick desired that the French minority should be represented in this House, and Sir John Macdonaid, leader of the Conservative government at that time, a high-minded man—and it would be superfluous for me to pass a eulogy on him here—at once assented to the appointment, and although a very young man, and having no political or other attainment, I was appointed to the Senate. The other case is my friend from Nova Scotia. Three years ago, in an assembly very much similar to the one referred to by my hon. friend from Ottawa, a general assembly of the French Acadians of the martitime provinces, a resolution was passed that a petition be sent to the Liberal government asking that they who were the first pioneers of North America in the matter of colonization and evangelization of the Indians—they for one century owned Nova Scotia, and are now about 50,000 in population—be represented in the Senate. I myself had the honour of being secretary of that assembly. I was appointed to see the Liberal ministers, and the same spirit of generosity and fair-play that I found in Sir John Macdonald and his colleagues, we found in Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his colleagues, and our good friend from Digby

(Mr. Comeau) was appointed, he having won his spurs, having been minister in the local cabinet and possessing political experience. The result is that peace and good-will among citizens of all nationalities has been cemented in the maritime provinces. The community of good feeling that existed between the different nationalities has been increased, and to-day there is not in the whole Dominion of Canada a province or provinces where friendliness and cordiality between the French minority and the English majority exists in greater intensity; therefore let the government here accede to what is demanded by the French of Ontario, which the majority will not refuse them and that good spirit that exists, but perhaps not to the same extent as it does with us in the maritime provinces, will be increased in Ontario also. Why? Because the edifice of confederation will continue to be based upon justice and fair-play, and upon the spirit of good-will towards men.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not know that I should have risen had not allusion been made to one of the cities of Ontario as having been so exclusive in its appointment to and election to office by the people. Those who know anything of Canada are aware that Toronto stands relatively as a Protestant community as strong as Montreal is Roman Catholic, and it is too often the case that when questions of this kind arise (which I deprecate to the fullest possible extent) Toronto is alleged to be one of the most bigoted of the cities in this country, because it is Orange and Protestant. What are the facts? The hon. gentleman from Montreal stated that no one had been elected in that city except——

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I beg pardon.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL— The hon. gentleman should not interrupt.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I rise to a point of order. My statement was that the city of Toronto never elected an English speaking Scotch or Irish Catholic. I never said 'no one.'

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman may not have intended it, but he said it. The hon. gentleman said no one of that religion.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is putting words in my mouth which I never used, because I could not say so, knowing that Claude Macdonell, a Scotch Catholic, was elected in Toronto.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Has any hon. gentleman a right to make a correction and follow it up with a speech.

The SPEAKER—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Certainly not. I wish to point out that Toronto is not so bigoted as the hon. gentleman from Victoria division represents it to be. The late Mr. Dafoe, who was born in the city in which I live, was an alderman in the city for some time. He is of French descent and has occupied for the last seven or eight years the position of chairman of the Court of Revision, which is an important position in a city like Toronto, and at his funeral the other day, he had nearly all the notables of the city of Toronto, if I may so term them, paying respect to his memory. He was a Roman Catholic, Mr. Ward is an Irish Catholic, and he has been elected by that city over and over again to a position of controller, which is a well paid office, and in South Toronto they elect Mr. Claude Macdonell, formerly from Glengarry, but of Scotch descent and a Scotch Roman Catholic. The same constituency elects the Hon. Jas. Foy, who has been Attorney General for the province of Ontario, and is elected principally by the votes of those gentlemen who are characterized as being so bigoted in the recording of their vote, and the Orange vote is polled for him almost exclusively, not because he is a Roman Catholic, but because he occupies a prominent and honourable position in that city. I am glad to say that personally he is respected by every one who knows him, both for his probity as a gentleman, and for his political career. He was selected by a Protestant premier a member of the Conservative government. I could point out what has been the result in that city upon other occasions. It is only when questions of this kind are brought before the people and attempts made to prejudice them against individuals on account of their nationality and religion that difficulties arise. I repeat, that every well-wisher of his country should deprecate the introduction of questions affecting a man's religion or his nationality in the matter of appointment to office. I know the difficulties I had when I had the honour of being at the head of the government, in the appointment of a judge in the city where my hon. friend resides. The appointment made by me was condemned. Why? In the first place, it was said the man was not fit for the position; in the second place he was an Irish Catholic. I laid down the principle that I knew no religion or race in the appointment to office, where I thought the man's talent and ability justified the appointment, and I am glad to know that after years of occupancy of the bench in Montreal he proved to be—I won't say the most brilliant—he was a brilliant man, but one of the most fair and honourable judges who ever sat on the bench in that city. His conduct on the bench justified the course I pursued; and I will add, that one of the most complimentary letters I received on the course I had taken in that matter in the government of which I was then the head, was from one of the most eminent Presbyterian clergymen in that city. I prize that letter more than any of the others I received, because he laid down this principle, that in the appointment to an office, no matter whether it was an inferior office or whether it was a seat on the bench, a man's qualification and character should be the standard that should guide the minister in the appointment, not because he worshipped at one altar or another. In my position I incurred the opposition of certain people not of my own political creed, because I laid down that principle and acted upon it, a principle that I propose to adhere to so long as my ordinary common sense will justify a course of that kind. This government appointed a French Canadian in the Northwest Territories to fill the place vacated by an English-speaking gentleman, the hon. member from Wolseley (Mr. Perley). I have not heard any opposition to the appointment of that gentleman. They selected him from another section of the Northwest Territories, and I presume that because he occupies a prominent position and is otherwise qualified, they thought it was a proper appointment. I object in toto to the appointment of any man to any office in the government solely on account of his religion or of his race. It should be sufficient for any government to know, before the appointment is made, that the man who is to receive the honour has the qualifications for the position, and that his character is such as to justify his appointment and the placing of him in the position, more particularly if it is a prominent position. I have recognized from forty years experience my own deficiency in respect to the French language. I have often thought that one of the greatest drawbacks to a man in public life, and occupying a prominent position, is the fact that he does not understand both languages. In a country like ours, where such a large number of people speak the French language, I think every man should understand French as well as English. I had no opportunity to acquire the language. When I grew up I might have learned to speak French if I had not been too lazy. The best evidence of that is the fact that I sent my own children to Quebec to be educated, that they might be better enabled to take any position that might be offered them in life. I regret exceedingly that in a country like ours, composed as it is of a homogeneous population of every race, that any public position should be claimed for any man simply because he happens to be of a particular race. That is not the sole qualification a man should have. When a vacancy occurs, if the present government think it proper to appoint a French Canadian in Ontario, providing he has the qualification that a man should have. there would be no fault found with such an appointment by the people of the province. Perhaps my hon. friend from Ottawa may think it is necessary to have another French Canadian to represent the French population of the western section of this country, because when the late Senator Casgrain was appointed he lived in Windsor, and in that section of Ontario, which is composed largely of the French Canadian race, the present representative having been taken from Ottawa, where I fancy the French Canadians are very well represented already, perhaps he considers it to be an injustice to the people of the west that they did not receive from the present government what they should have given them when they opened the door for my hon. friend into the Senate. I can understand that. It is a kindly feeling to those of his own race, living in a county where he may think they are not properly represented in parliament. In the administration of the affairs of justice some French judges were selected in portions of western Ontario, where it was necessary to have judges who can speak that language, because a large portion of the population who settled there were of that race, and did not understand the English as well as their own language. For that reason French speaking judges were appointed to some of the lower courts. I have heard no objection to that. But I would like to ask again, whether there has been any case in the province of Ontario in which complaint could be urged against any of the judges as not administering the law in accordance with equity and justice, whether they were French speaking litigants or Roman Catholics. I merely rose because I was a little sensitive on hearing this constant cry against one of the cities of Ontario, when I know, Protestants as the population are, and to a large extent Orange, as they are, they never hesitate to do justice when a gentleman appears before them for election for municipal or public office. When it is a political appointment, if the candidate is of their political complexion, they do not stop to ascertain whether he goes to St. Michael's, St. George's the Church of England or St. Basil's, and if the hon. gentleman studies the history of that city, and ascertains the number of gentlemen who have been elected to the different offices, many of whom have passed from my mind just now, he will find they are not so illiberal as he has represented them to be.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—They are against the Grits and have never elected a Grit.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In that they were right.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I have no disposition to prolong the discussion, which is not very edifying.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS. The hon. gentleman has spoken twice.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—No. I have only spoken once. This discussion is neither edifying, nor is it pregnant with good results; but my justification for rising is because it has been intimated since I sat down that, in his remarks, my hon. friend from British Columbia seemed to be of the opinion that it was unseemly for a senator, and especially for myself, to have headed the deputation in question which waited upon the Premier of Canada, and if my hon. friend had in his mind something which has occurred to my mind since, I am prepared to agree with him that it would be unseemly. If my hon. friend had for one moment the idea that I, a member of the bar of this province, being of the particular nationality whose claims were being advocated, had any aspirations for an appointment to the bench of the province, then I admit that my being there would be unseemly; but I wish to completely disabuse my hon. friend's mind in that respect, and all I have to say on that score is that I am quite contented with my seat in this House, and have not any idea of any other judicial function but the one I am performing here. If I had entertained any aspirations of that kind for myself, I would have been one hundred miles away from the deputation which waited on the premier on that occasion. I was there for the purpose of urging the claims of the French Canadian members of the bar for recognition in appointments to the bench and their claims to additional representation in this House when the occasion would arise. My hon. friend from Hastings put a question which I think, after all, was directed to myself; he asked if any one should say where there had been any complaint made in the province concerning the administration of justice by reason of the fact that English speaking judges did not understand the French language.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I did not put the question to the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT. The hon. gentleman put it generally. I am not prepared to say there has been any complaint of that kind. I do not think there have been.

But I think the hon. gentleman from Hastings will recognize that there are portions of this country where it is almost impossible for an English speaking judge to do complete justice in the cases that come before him unless he has some understanding of the French language. Where a judge sits in this province and witnesses give evidence in French because they do not speak English, their evidence must be interpreted. Any one who has had experience in the courts—and I speak advisedly, because I have had over 25 years experience in the matter—knows that it is utterly impossible for an interpreter to convey exactly the meaning of the witness. It is, therefore, only fair and right that the large population of French Canadians in this province should aspire to have a gentleman speaking their language appointed to the bench, so that in districts where people cannot speak English they would have the advantage of appearing before a judge who understands their language. What the congress urged on the premier was not only the appointment of a French Canadian to the bench, but that some judges who understand the French language should be appointed to meet the requirements to which I have referred. Since the hon. member for West Hastings has put the question to me, I may say this: I remember quite a number of years ago arguing a case at L'Orignal, before the late Chief Justice Armour, in which a number of French witnesses were heard who had to be interpreted. The result was, the trial was so protracted that the chief justice got very angry, and he suggested to me afterwards that on his return to Toronto he would advise the government that this county be annexed to Quebec. I said 'That is all right, but you would have to carry the principle further. You are going from here to Cornwall, and the chances are you will have witnesses before you there, who speak only Gaelic, and you might suggest that the county of Glengarry be annexed to Scotland.' I am only pointing out that after all there is more in these questions than appears on the surface. Far from advocating that a French Canadian be appointed to the bench simply because of his race, without regard to other qualifications, I assure the House that the French Canadians of this province, and especially those who attended the congress, had no such thought. It would be deplorable if the day ever arose in this country when any nationality should seek the appointment of one of their own people simply on the ground of nationality. If the French Canadians of Ontario should have no one of their own race fit to discharge the duties of a judge on the High Court Bench, they would be the first to recognize it, and would not look for any such appointment. The hon. member from West Hastings intimated that the French Canadians from Ontario had been badly treated in my appointment as successor to the late Mr. Casgrain, and that the western part of the province had not received a fair deal. I had nothing to do with it; I was offered the post and I accepted it, and I should be very sorry if the people of western Ontario thought they were not properly represented . But I think the hon. member has no mandate to voice their views in the matter. If there is any complaint, it should come from the French Canadians from west Ontario, and not from my hon. friend. I have not heard of any such complaint any more than there was from the French people of eastern Ontario when Mr. Casgrain represented in this House the whole French population in the province. If, however, my hon. friend thinks that there is ground for any such complaint, all he has to do is to join hands with me in my efforts to get a French Canadian appointed from west Ontario.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Possibly the House may desire to have an answer to this question some time or other. If they do not so desire, though I am sorry to interrupt so spirited a discussion, I will withdraw; but I am happy to inform the hon. gentleman who put the question that such a deputation as that named in the inquiry did wait on the premier, and further inform him that in this instance, as in all instances, any deputation of equal weight and worth that waits on the premier and government may rely upon it that such representations as they may choose to make will receive most careful consideration. With respect to the other questions that have been raised, although I do not propose in the slightest degree to enter into a discussion as to the merits or demerits of appointments on racial or other grounds, I may say this: For seven and forty years I have had a considerable experience in the public affairs of Canada, and I willingly bear testimony to the fact that no people here or elsewhere have ever shown more consideration to those of a different nationality and race than the people of Quebec. No one thing attracted my attention more, when in 1863 I first took my seat in the parliament of the United Canada, than the fact that while in Lower Canada, although I think the proportion of English to French at that time could be scarcely more than one seventh or one eighth, if my memory serves me, one fourth of the entire representation was composed of Englishmen and Protestants elected very often by constituencies which were largely Catholic and French, and I would be glad to be able to conscientiously declare that in my own province of Ontario there was as little prejudice against Catholics as I found to exist in Quebec against Protestants.

REGULATIONS FOR THE CLOTHING OF THE CANADIAN MILITIA.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

1. Has the Militia Council published, or caused to be published, a volume entitled "Regulations for the Clothing of the Canadian Militia, 1909, published under the authority of the Militia Council?"

2. Does a French version of such work exist? If not, why?

3a. Is it the intention of the Government to see that the French element in the Canadian Militia shares the same advantages as those accorded to the English element of this country; b, and in consequence is it going to order that the French version of the aforesaid work be immediately published for distribution?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The answers furnished by the department are:

1. Yes.

2. No. It is the intention to have the regulations printed in French as soon as possible.

3. (a) Yes.

(b) Answered by No. 2.

FISHING RIGHTS OF RIPARIAN PROPRIETORS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY rose to call the attention of the government to the following facts:

I. On the third of March of the present year, the Honourable Mr. Landry put, amongst other questions to the government the following one, the fourth, which has elicited the answer hereafter given:

"4. Has the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council declared that the federal parliament had no right at all to enact section 4 of chapter 95 of the revised statutes of Canada 1886, in so far as that section allows the federal government to issue licenses for exclusive rights of fishing?

"Right Honourable Sir Richard Cartwright—The reply of the department is as follows:—No."

II. On the eighteenth day of July, 1898, over ten years ago, Her Majesty the Queen had rendered the following decision, as appears by the present extract of a minute in Council of Her Majesty's Privy Council

"AT THE COURT AT WINDSOR CASTLE

The 18th day of July, 1898.

Present.—The Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, Lord President, Mr. James A. Campbell; Mr. Goshen, Mr. James A. Lowther, Mr. Ritchie, Mr. Edmond Wodehouse, Sir George Taubman-Goldie, Sir Charles Scott.

Whereas, there was this day read at the board a report from the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council dated the 26th May, 1898 in the words following, viz.:—

"Your Majesty having been pleased by your General Order in Council of the 27th November, 1896, to refer unto this committee the matter of an appeal from the Supreme Court of Canada between the Attorneys-General for the provinces of Quebec and Nova Scotia, appellants, and the Attorney-General for the Dominion of Canada, respondent, (in the matter of certain questions referred to the Supreme Court of Canada by two Orders of His Excellency the Governor General of Canada in Council, approved on the 23rd February, 1894, and the 23rd February, 1895, respectively). Likewise a humble petition of the above named appellants setting forth that by order in the council approved on the 23rd February, 1894, and the 23rd February, 1895, respectively, the Governor General of Canada, pursuant to chapter 135 of the revised statutes of Canada as amended by section 4 of the Act of the Dominion of Canada (54 and 55 Vict. ch. 25) referred to the Supreme Court of Canada for hearing and consideration the following seventeen questions:—

1....2....3....4....5....6....7....8....9....

10. "Has the Dominion parliament jurisdiction to pass section 4 of the revised statutes of Canada, chapter 95 intituled: "An Act respecting fisheries and fishing" or any other of the provisions of the said Act or any and which of several sections or any and what parts thereof respectively?

"11. Had the Dominion jurisdiction to pass section 4 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, chapter 95 intituled: "An Act respecting Fisheries and Fishing" or any other of the provisions of the said Act so far as these respectively relate to fishing in waters the beds of which do not belong to the Dominion and are not Indian lands?

12....13....14....15....16....17....

"That the appellants were heard.

"The Lords of the committee in obedience to Your Majesty's said General Order of reference have taken the said humble petition and appeal into consideration and having heard counsel for the parties on both sides their Lordships do this day agree humbly to report to Your Majesty as their opinion that the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada of the 13th October, 1896, ought to be discharged and that the following answer ought to be given to the said seventeen questions hereinbefore set forth, that is to say:—

1....2....3....4....5....

"6. In answer to the tenth, eleventh and twelfth questions:—That the Dominion parliament had not jurisdiction to pass section 4 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, chapter 95, intituled: "An Act respecting Fisheries and Fishing" in so far as the said section purports to authorize the grant of fishery leases conferring an exclusive right to fish in property belonging not to the Dominion but to the Provinces, and that the subsidiary provisions of the said last mentioned Act in so far as they are intended to enforce rights which the Dominion parliament was not empowered to confer, are of no effect.

"And in case Your Majesty should be pleased to approve of this report, then their Lordships do direct that the parties are to bear their own costs of this appeal."

Her Majesty having taken the said report into consideration was pleased by and with the advice of Her Privy Council to approve thereof and to order as it is hereby ordered that the recommendations and directions therein contained be punctually observed and carried into effect in each and every particular. Whereof the Governor General of the Dominion of Canada for the time being and all other persons who it may concern are to take notice and govern themselves accordingly.

(Sgd.) J. H. HARRISON.

III. On the sixth day of April, Hon. Mr. Landry, comparing the answer given by the Department of Justice to his fourth question put to the government on the 3rd of March, with the judgments given by the Privy Council on the 18th of July, 1898, naturally asked:

How can the fourth answer of the government be reconciled with the decisions of the Privy Council as given in reply to the tenth question which had been submitted to it?

Such a question brought forward the following answer:

To this the department say this is not a question which the government should answer. Senator Landry put his question, No. 4, on 3rd instant, and it was properly answered in the negative as is manifest by reference to the judgment of the Judicial Committee. The exact words of the Judicial Committee are: 'It follows from what has been said that in so far as section 4 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, chapter 95, empowers the grant of fishery leases conferring an exclusive right to fish in property belonging not to the Dominion but to the provinces, it was not within the jurisdiction of the Dominion parliament to pass it.

It is perfectly obvious that the committee did not decide that the federal parliament had no right at all to enact section 4. They merely decided that section 4 could not have effect as to property which did not belong to the Dominion. If Senator Landry cannot understand this, I do not see how it is possible to make it any plainer.

And inquired—

Is it not perfectly obvious:

1. That the question put by the Hon. Mr. Landry in relation to section 4, chapter 45, of the Revised Statutes, 1886, was entirely based on the decision given by the Privy Council;

2. That the negative answer given by the Department of Justice to such a question can only be accounted for because the question itself was not well understood;

3. That at all events the answer given by the department to the question as put is an erroneous one, and that the final remark viz.: If Senator Landry cannot understand this, I do not see how it is possible to make it any plainer, is merely an impertinence of an employee;

4. That the same employee is under a false impression when he sets up what he calls the exact words of the Judicial Committee against those quoted by the Hon. Mr. Landry and which are taken verbatim from an official document, the report of the Judicial Committee of the Queen's Privy Council?

Is it not also perfectly obvious that before giving an answer to a question, such a question should be well understood and that before attempting to insinuate that certain quotations are false or incorrect, one must make sure that he is not falling himself into the error he tries to impute to others?

Is it not the intention of the government to see that the proper answer and the correct one be given to the question put by the Hon. Mr. Landry in relation to the decision given by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council on the subject of the parliament's jurisdiction in the matter, and on the constitutionality, in specse of the 4th section of the 5th chapter of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1886?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The Department of Justice, to whom I referred the matter, advise me as follows:

I have attentively considered Senator Landry's question, No. 12, printed in the Minutes of the Senate for Friday 8th April, with regard to the decision of the Judicial Committee in the fisheries case, and I do not see how it is possible to afford him any further information.

I think his questions may be properly answered by the statement that these questions call for expressions of opinion, and do not relate to matters of fact, and cannot be usefully or in accordance with the practice answered by the government.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not know if it is a matter of opinion or a matter of fact, when the department puts in my mouth expressions that I never used. I took the trouble, in referring to a certain judgment rendered by the Privy Council, to quote verbatim all the words in the judgment itself in the case, and the Department of Justice says the true words are the following, setting aside the words I gave. Is that a matter of opinion or a matter of fact? When the Justice Department says: If Mr. Landry cannot understand it, they are very sorry, is that a matter of fact or a matter of opinion? If it is a matter of their own opinion, they have a right to give it, but I do not see why I have not an equal right to give mine. We should have equal, fair play.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —You have equal rights I should say.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is my opinion they will not give the correct answer.

THE CASE OF J. M. CROTEAU.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired;

Does the Honourable the Minister of Trade and Commerce know, and can he say, whether a surveyor answering to the name of J. M. Croteau is employed in the office of the cullers of lumber at Quebec?

What is his special employment?

His salary?

Has this employee contracted the habit of drawing regularly at the end of each month the amount of his salary?

Is he paid, without any deduction whatever, the whole amount of his salary, or has the superintendent of cullers at Quebec given an order to deduct, and as a matter of fact has there been deducted, from the salary in question, the amount which the said Croteau would earn by the exercise of his profession to the detriment of the time which he owes to the employment in which he is occupied?

Is it the intention of the government, if it grants to this employee the liberty of serving two masters at one time, at least to see that the said employee does not levy a double charge on the money of the people.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The reply which is sent to me by the department is as follows:

I beg to state that J. M. Croteau is employed in the Cullers' office in Quebec as a specification clerk, at $750 per annum. I am informed by Thomas Harney, acting supervisor of cullers, that Mr. Croteau is also a provincial land surveyor, that he has been absent at various times for a few days at a time in the past two or three years, but that the office work has in no way suffered.

I beg to state that the work in the Cullers' office has been decreasing, no additions have been made to the staff, and few increases in salary have been given. At certain times in the year there is absolutely no work in the office at all. Some of the officers so employed on small salaries, for example Mr. Croteau, have been permitted to engage in outside work when the work of the office does not suffer.

Under section 20, chapter 24, Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, officers receiving a salary of $1,000 or more are not permitted to hold any other office of profit. As Mr. Croteau's salary is only $750 he has been permitted to engage in other work so long as his duties in the Cullers' office are not neglected.

I am informed by the acting supervisor that Mr. Croteau has frequently worked both before and after the usual office hours when his work in the Cullers' office demanded.

Mr. Croteau, therefore, has been paid his usual monthly salary without any deductions.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (No. 126) An Act to correct a clerical error in the French Convention Act, 1908—Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

Bill (No. 151) An Act to provide for the adjudication of small claims arising in respect of operations of the government railway—Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

Bill (No. 182) An Act respecting the payment of bounties on lead contained in lead bearing ores mined in Canada, and to promote the production in Canada of zinc.—Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

Bill (No. 188) An Act to amend the Act respecting the National Battlefields at Quebec—Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

Bill (No. 191) An Act to provide for further advances to the Harbour Commissioners at Montreal—Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

Bill (No. 193) An Act to amend the Meat and Canned Foods Act—Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright

IMMIGRATION BILL.

SECOND READING.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (No. 102), An Act respecting Immigration. He said: This Bill is mainly a consolidation of the existing Act, and the amendments thereto which have been made from time to time; but the main object of it is to give greater power to the department to deal with the cases of persons entering our country by misrepresentation or stealth, or possibly by force. Not sufficient provision was given for the re-arrest of parties under the old law apparently, and it would seem that they were practically able to set the department at defiance or to involve them in very tedious and troublesome prosecutions. They also desire to have some further power given them in the matter of deportation of undesirable immigrants, and to deal with the question of requiring the various steamship, and railway companies to provide for the return of undesirable imigrants to the countries from which they came. As the clauses are very numerous, amounting I think to very nearly 100 or more, I presume that the House would prefer to discuss them one by one in committee. And therefore without further delay I move that the Bill be now read a second time, and considered in committee a couple of days hence, if that meets the views of my hon. friends opposite.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Some of the provisions of this Bill are very excellent and very salutory, about disarming immigrants—taking stilettos and other dangerous weapons from them. It would be most useful. A number of immigrants who carry those weapons with them, get into the country, and day after day we hear of stabbings and killings in Montreal. If the municipalities will take this matter up and pass by-laws and regulations to disarm immigrants, it would be a very excellent thing. The use of the stiletto and pistol is very objectionable. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman whether line 44 would include Italy?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —That would include the entire southern portion of Italy. I am not sure whether it would include the whole, but I think line 44 would go somewhere through the Apenines, a little south of the Alps. What is my hon. friend's view? Did he want to establish a geographical line below which immigrants could be subject to a special kind of treatment?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is a very good idea.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —That would include the entire southern portion of Italy. I am not sure whether immigrants from southern Europe have come into Canada; a vast proportion of our immigrants consist of people from northern Europe and from the States, and British Isles. The proportions in our favour are very largely in excess of that class of immigrants who come from the United States, and I think it will be found that the great bulk of immigrants who may be classed as undesirable are brought in for the purpose of working in gangs on railways and similar enterprises, and are not very likely to remain, I think, in great numbers as settlers here.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If it does not involve the right hon. gentleman in too much labour, I should like upon the committee stage being reached, that we should have data, which I fancy has already been prepared by the Department of the Interior, as to the number of immigrants who have been refused entry as well as the number of deportations, and to the causes which have led to the same; also the application of the old Act as to steamship companies being compelled to carry deported immigrants.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I will call their attention to the desirability of supplying that information.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I fancy a great number of returns have been brought down to the House of Commons touching those points; but I have not seen them myself, and it would be desirable to have them.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —It is a most proper point to be inquired into in connection with the Immigration Act. I will likewise ask that one or more officials of the department, who are more or less conversant with this information, be in attendance.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The right hon. gentleman might give us some information as to the extent to which the bonus system is being carried on?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I think I can answer that off-hand. That system, to a great extent, has been discontinued, and if applied at all, is only applied in regard to domestic servants and agricultural labourers. It is not extended to any other classes. But my hon. friend will see that those matters, which should be given in detail, would be better given if I have a couple of the officers at my elbow to supply the information, and that I propose to have when this Bill is being considered. If it would not incommode my hon. friend, to send me a short memorandum of the particular points that he specially wants information upon, I shall make it my business to see that the department are advised and provide for it. I will have his remarks in the Debates, but perhaps he will like to explain them and put them in black and white for me.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Probably I will do so.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I was going to allude to the examination of immigrants at the port of embarkation, which is an important thing. These unfortunates having sold out all their gear and furniture, pay their passage, cross the Atlantic and are turned back on account of disease, to go nowhere. It is a cruel thing. I do not know how it is to be remedied. But were I in England, a minister of the colonies there, I would not allow those men to land in England after coming back. If they are not fit to land in Canada, they are not fit to land in Great Britain, and they ought to be prohibited at the port of embarkation.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I entirely agree that that system causes great hardship; but it is imperatively necessary in the interests of Canada that undesirable immigrants should not be allowed or encouraged to come here, more particularly those who unfortunately may be diseased in mind or body. I know that the Department of the Interior, under whose control the business of immigration is, are anxious to enforce some such system of inspection as the hon. gentleman has alluded to, but what success they have had or what steps they have taken up to the present time, I am not able off-hand to state. That also is a subject on which the officers in the department must be prepared to give information, when the Senate is debating the measure in committee, and I will see that they are notified to do so.

The Motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

TRANSPORTATION OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS BILL.

IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (M) An Act to regulate the transportation of intoxicating liquors.

(In the committee.)

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—In the debate on the second reading of this Bill, attention was called to the fact that the Bill could only operate in one province of the Dominion, Prince Edward Island, and an hon. gentleman on the other side suggested that the Bill should be so drafted as to apply to that particular province. That seems to be the opinion of a number of hon. gentlemen. It has, therefore been recast. At page 684 of the 'Minutes of Proceedings', hon. members will find the Bill as proposed to be amended. Parts of the Bill have been struck out. As the Bill proceeds, I shall be glad to give any information on the subject.

On clause 1,

Whereas the province of Prince Edward Island did, in the year 1900, pass 'An Act prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors,' and in the year 1907 pass an Act to consolidate and amend the various Acts relating to the prohibition of intoxicating liquors; and in the year 1909 pass 'An Act to prohibit the soliciting of orders for intoxicating liquors,' and whereas the Legislative Assembly of the province did, in the month of March, 1909, adopt a resolution declaring that it was essential to prohibit the importation for sale of any intoxicating liquor, except through the official vendors under the prohibition Acts, and except to any person for his personal or family use, and requesting that such restrictive legislation should be passed at Ottawa as will prevent the importation into the province of any intoxicating liquor, to the end that as regards the importation of intoxicating liquors, the province may be put in the same position as the counties in the Dominion of Canada which have adopted the Canada Temperance Act, especially having regard to chapter 71 amending the said Act. Which resolution was transmitted to the Privy Council in April, 1909. And whereas it seems only reasonable to give effect to the request of the said legislative assembly of the said province: Therefore His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, enacts as follows:—

1. No person shall, except as in this Act specially provided, by himself, his clerk or agent,—

(a) send, consign, ship, bring, carry, or cause to be sent, consigned, shipped, brought or carried, any intoxicating liquor to or into the province of Prince Edward Island in which the sale of intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes is prohibited by provincial statute; or

(b) deliver to any consignee or other person, or store, warehouse, or keep for delivery in said province aforesaid, any intoxicating liquor; or

(c) send, consign, ship, bring, carry, or cause to be sent, consigned, shipped, brought or carried to or into that province as aforesaid, any intoxicating liquor under any other name, or in packages bearing any other label than that of the liquor contained therein, or in packages not having the name of the liquor contained therein plainly labelled and marked on the outside; or

(d) deliver to any consignee or other person, or store, warehouse or keep for delivery in that province as aforesaid, any intoxicating liquor under any other name or in packages having any other label than that of the name of the liquor contained therein or in packages not having the name of the liquor therein contained plainly labelled and marked on the outside.

Provided always that nothing in this Act shall prohibit the vendors who are legally appointed by the provincial government from importing intoxicating liquors for medicinal, sacramental or mechanical purposes under the law or regulations now in force in the province. Provided also that the common carriers shall not be liable to the penalties for violation of this Act when carrying and conveying intoxicating liquors consigned to the vendors in the foregoing paragraph named, or to the persons importing intoxicating liquors for their personal or family use as defined and set forth in section 3 of this Act. Nor will common carriers be so liable when, in ignorance of the fact, they carry intoxicating liquors labelled and invoiced under a misleading description.

Provided further that common carriers, when carrying and conveying intoxicating liquors into the province of Prince Edward Island, shall be bound under the penalties named in this Act, forthwith to notify by letter the provincial secretary at Charlottetown of the arrival of the intoxicating liquor, giving the name and address of the consignor and consignee of the intoxicating liquor, and the place of delivery.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I move that section 1 of this proviso be adopted.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Before that section is adopted, I should like to call attention to the provision with regard to common carriers. I referred to this matter on the second reading of the Bill, and I presume the clauses which have been inserted here, have been intended to meet the objection which I made to the Bill as it then stood. It appears to me that while this has no doubt been the intention, the manner in which this clause has been amended does not carry out that intent. This matter commences at the fourth line from the bottom at page 684, and reads as follows:

> Provided also that the common carriers shall not be liable to the penalties for violation of this Act when carrying and conveying intoxicating liquors consigned to the vendors in the foregoing paragraph named, or to the persons importing intoxicating liquors for their personal or family use as defined and set forth in section 3 of this Act. Nor will common carriers be so liable when, in ignorance of the fact, they carry intoxicating liquors labelled and invoiced under a misleading description.

In the first place, I would like to point out to the hon. gentleman that liquors which may be shipped in to Prince Edward Island after this law is passed, will, in most cases, at all events, have no label on them. The word 'invoice', I presume, has been used for the words 'bill of lading'. The common carriers never see the invoice of the goods which are shipped. They only have before them the packages and bills of lading. This clause, as it is worded, appears to me to be an attempt to compel the common carriers to act as a sort of constabulary force to prevent the violation of this Prince Edward Island statute. I do not see how the object can be accomplished in that way. By looking at the wording of this section a little more carefully I think the hon. gentleman will see that it is impracticable. Common carriers under this clause are permitted to carry intoxicating liquors, provided they are consigned to the vendors appointed by the law of the province. How are the common carriers to ascertain who the vendors in the province are? When a package of liquor is brought to an express company to be shipped to Prince Edward Island, how is the express officer to tell from anything on that package, or by the person who ships it, whether it is going to a person who is a legalized vendor, or to some other person? In the same way, how is he to tell if it is marked for John Jones, for instance, whether that man is a person who wants it for his own use, or whether he is importing it for sale? I do not see how it is possible for this responsibility to be placed upon the common carriers, and I do not see that the next clause which will relieve them from liability in case the goods are improperly labelled, meets this objection at all. That clause only relieves them from liability in case an improper label or direction or some improper marks have been placed upon the package containing the liquor. It does not relieve them from liability at all supposing, instead of taking liquor to a person, for family use, or to a legalized vendor, they happen to be taking it to some other person who was importing it for the purpose of sale. When my attention was called to it, I studied it and gave considerable attention to it, and the amendment of which I gave notice afterwards appears to me to be the only way in which the objection to the Bill can be met. I have certainly not heard anything suggested which appears to me to meet the case except that amendment, and that amendment is to relieve the persons who are engaged in the business of common carriers only. It does not relieve any one who takes a boat, for instance, and goes across the strait and brings in a cask of liquor knowing he is violating the law. It does relieve any one regularly engaged in the business as a common carrier taking liquors to Prince Edward Island. It appears to me also that so far as the view of the temperance people is concerned, this amendment should meet their views and accomplish the purpose they have in view. It only exempts common carriers, and the officers of justice in Prince Edward Island could very readily, by applying at the offices of the companies engaged in business as common carriers, say once a day or once a week, or more often if found necessary to do so, ascertain what is being brought into the island by persons engaged in that business. Under the Canada Temperance Act, these officers would have the full power to require companies to show their books and bills of lading, and they could ascertain from whom any bill of lading came, and who was the person shipped it, and who received it after it came to Prince Edward Island. So that the parties who would really make these shipments, knowing what the law is, and knowing they were violating it, could in that way be discovered and could be punished. I cannot see why the attempt should be made to make the common carriers liable for any breach of the law in this way. I may say that this corresponds very closely to the Act which was passed two or three years ago imposing the same penalties upon those who shipped liquors to counties where the Scott Act was in force. In New Brunswick, under the law, there have been three or four charges brought against parties who in discharge of their duties on the railway, or as express officers, happened to handle a case of liquor. So far as I am informed—and I think my information is correct—in none of the cases have the fines actually been imposed. In one case, the station master was called before the magistrate and was found guilty of having received some cases of liquor which came from the train and were put into the station. The magistrate decided that under the law he had been guilty of receiving liquor, and he was liable to the fine which the law imposed; but he was a man, I believe, of very high character in the community, and the magistrate said that it was such a glaring injustice that he would not impose a fine, and he did not. I understand that in another case, very similar, one of the officials of an express company had received some liquor at McAdam Junction without knowing it was really liquor. The boxes are handled from one freight train to another in a hurried manner, and the agent has no time to examine to see what they are until they reach their destination. This person had a complaint lodged before the magistrate, and a fine was actually imposed; but public opinion was so strong against the imposing of a fine under the circumstances, as the person had no intention whatever of violating the law and did not know he was violating the law until after the work was done, that the fine was never collected. There was a third, and I think a fourth case. I do not remember the particulars of them; but I believe in none of the cases were the fines actually imposed. Public opinion resented any attempt to impose upon officials in those circumstances simply doing their duty, responsibility for violation of the law, by some one in another town shipping liquor into a Scott Act county. It appears to me that in the case of common carriers, it is a violation of every principle of justice to try and make them responsible for the conveyance of liquor into counties where the sale of liquor is prohibited; and, as I said before, the object of the law can be fully carried out without doing it. The object of the law appears to be to get at the men who knowingly and wilfully ship liquor into a Scott Act county, or into Prince Edward Island, where they have prohibition, and knows he is doing that in violation of the law. He should be punished, and the officers of the law in Prince Edward Island or in any Scott Act county, when they have the power to ascertain from the records of the railway company, or the express or steamboat companies, carrying on business as common carriers, who ship the goods, to whom they were consigned, and who received them, have no trouble in getting at the parties who were really guilty and having them punished. I do not see why this duty should be imposed upon the common carriers, and I do not think that even if this law is passed that it will be operative at all. I doubt if you will find any magistrate whose sense of justice will not lead him to the conclusion that it is an unfair duty to impose upon persons of this kind, and he will not inflict a fine. I wish the amendment of which I gave notice should be submitted for the latter part of this clause, commencing at the second proviso, the fourth line from the bottom of page 684—that the words that are in the clauses be struck out and the words in my resolution substituted.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—The circumstances attending the moving of that amendment I think will make it clear to the House that it is now a matter of public notoriety in the province of Prince Edward Island that it is contrary to the law as it stands to-day to aid in carrying liquor into counties where its use is prohibited. The circumstances in Prince Edward Island are so public that all the transportation companies and common carriers are perfectly aware of the law, and to say that they shall be exempt from it will make this legislation of ours absolutely useless. Prince Edward Island has been under absolute prohibition for ten years. The Act has been amended year after year to make it as effective as possible. They found that they could not reach the common carriers and parties who were deluging the island with liquor, and so they applied to parliament for power to deal with common carriers who take liquor into the province without the consent of the people. I have added another proviso, which ought to cover the point mentioned. It is as follows:

Provided further that common carriers, when carrying and conveying intoxicating liquors into the province of Prince Edward Island, shall be bound under the penalties named in this Act, forthwith to notify by letter the provincial secretary at Charlottetown of the arrival of the intoxicating liquor, giving he name and address of the consignor and consignee of the intoxicating liquor, and the place of delivery.

If they observe that they will be absolutely free from any prosecution; without it, parliament would deliberately give them the opportunity of sending liquor in without any check.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—How does that giving of the notice free them?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—The notice of the company will.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—How does that relieve them?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—No court would inflict the penalty on them if they conformed to that proviso. They surely cannot place themselves above the law of the land.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—That surely is not the law.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—The proviso is part of it.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—But the imposing of the penalty does not depend on that.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—No one would prosecute them if they intimated at once by a letter to the Provincial Secretary that a consignment of liquor has been sent, say to John Brown at Summerside, or some other place. That would show that they were entirely innocent of any intention to violate the law. It is a matter of public notoriety to all the express agents, railway companies and transportation lines doing business with Prince Edward Island that the province is under absolute prohibition, and it would be monstrous to say that they should be free from the observance of the law. At present the law is being broken constantly, because there is no way of enforcing it against them. That proviso is there for the very purpose. If they act frankly and fairly, notifying the Provincial Secretary that a consignment has been sent to some particular person, it protects them, and that is the end of it. The Intercolonial railway have already given instructions to their officials. I have here a letter from Mr. Graham, in which he says:

> You can rest assured that this department is prepared to do everything possible to see that no violation of the law is assisted by the railways or their employees.

The Intercolonial railway is the principal common carrier in the maritime provinces.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will my hon. friend explain how they are to prosecute the Intercolonial railway?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Voluntarily they have consented to this. The minister's attention was called to the fact that there were violations by the Intercolonial railway, and he replied that if the culprits were named to him he would prevent it, and he wound up with the statement I have read.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does my hon. friend think that we can place the same reliance on this assurance that we place on other assurances given on behalf of the Intercolonial railway?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—You can quite see that unless the transportation companies refuse to accept liquor except it is consigned to officials, they can defeat this law day after day. The Bill will be absolutely useless if you modify it any more than I have done. I have endeavoured to meet the point as far as possible, and it would be extraordinary to maintain that a common carrier should not take notice of the statute law of the country. They have had it in every other case, and why not in this case, particularly as their attention has been called to it. Surely the House will not refuse to the people of Prince Edward Island the request they make to be protected from the outside. They have made liberal exceptions. There are officials well known to every one at Charlottetown, at Summerside, and other points, to whom shipments of liquor can be made for medicinal, sacramental, and mechanical purposes, and also for providing individuals who are entitled to receive up to five gallons, if they so choose. So that every possible latitude has been given to meet all the objections that might prevail in the minds of hon. gentlemen who are opposed to the principle of prohibitory legislation. Nothing could be done with a greater desire to meet the views of those who dissent from the principle laid down; but if the peoples' wishes are to be at all respected or met, you cannot cut down the amendments I have suggested any further than they are at present, because the Bill would be absolutely useless if the transportation companies could send in liquor day after day. Therefore, I must ask the House, if they are willing to meet the demands of Prince Edward Island, more particularly as this Chamber has already extended the right to the counties that are under the Canada Temperance Act. We have recognized the principle of this legislation for over thirty years, that parties are not at liberty to send liquor into localities where prohibition prevails. Under the Canada Temperance Act, that provision was clearly laid down, and therefore this is no innovation in our legislation. Here is a case where it is very easy to carry out the principle, much more so than in the case of a county. Here is an island where, as we all know, the transportation lines are limited, the regular steamers running from the mainland to Summerside, and occasionally to Charlottetown. Unless the House is prepared to accept the Bill as it is drawn, it would be absolutely useless to the people of Prince Edward Island.

Hon. Mr. WOOD. The hon. gentleman did not appear to me to touch at all on the point which I raised, that is the impracticability of the transportation companies obtaining the knowledge necessary for them to comply with this Act. Paragraph 3 allows a person to ship quantities of liquor not exceeding five gallons to any person in the island for family use. Suppose some one in St. John or Halifax does so, and marks it for family use, still the transportation company would be subject to a fine if that was paid for on the island. The company would also be subject to a fine if the person to whom that liquor was shipped had within a term of five years been convicted of a violation of a Dominion or provincial statute regarding the sale of liquor? I should like the hon. gentleman to explain how the transportation company could ascertain, when taking that liquor to the island, whether the person to whom it was consigned had paid for it before, or was going to pay for it afterwards, and how they could ascertain whether that person had violated the Act within five years?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT. They would have no right, under the law, to take in liquor unless they knew it was consigned to the official entitled to receive it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED. That is not the case under the Act.

Hon. Mr. WOOD. That is not the case at all.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED. They have a right to carry liquor on behalf of persons entitled to receive it, and those persons are not necessarily officials. The officials of Prince Edward Island may be the general consumers of liquor; but it does not follow that other people have not the same rights.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT. The transportation companies can always guard themselves by consigning it to an official, or by giving the notice provided for in the second proviso. I am willing to add to that, that it will exempt them from any penalty under the Act by complying with the second proviso. They will be exempt from any penalty imposed under the Act.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED. In connection with that, will my hon. friend give a reply to this question: Provided a consignment be made by a common carrier, and the common carrier is not aware of the nature of that consignment—

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT. They are not liable, if it is shipped under a false label.

Hon. M. LOUGHEED. Provided it is consigned to say John Jones.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT. If it is not brought to their attention that it is liquor, I do not consider that under this clause they would be liable; but I am quite prepared to adopt the suggestion to relieve them if they give the notice to the provincial secretary of the shipment of liquor.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—How can they give notice if they are in ignorance of the contents of the package? That is the difficulty which presents itself to my mind.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Unless it is marked as liquor they would be in ignorance of it.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—This law is a peculiar one in many respects. It interferes with trade, and with the way a man should do his business. It forces a man to pay for goods before they are delivered. Is parliament prepared to pass legislation of that kind? What right has any association to disturb trade relations between different provinces and with foreign countries? What right has parliament to force

Mr. Brown of Summerside to pay for goods not delivered? Yet we are going to put that condition into this Bill, and give a few officials in Prince Edward Island the right to subvert all our trade. This Bill also asks parliament to consecrate another principle, a principle to my mind which should never be tolerated in a civilized community. It proposes to turn all our great transportation companies into a pack of spies and informers. What right has the parliament of Canada to make the officials of the Grand Trunk railway or the Intercolonial railway a nest of spies and informers, and to interfere with the privacy of a citizen, even though he does live in Prince Edward Island? Under this law, every one in Prince Edward Island is entitled to import five gallons of liquor for family use. Now, suppose out of the hundred thousand people in the island there are ten thousand who send abroad for their liquor, what right has parliament to reveal the privacy of their way of living? You want to force navigation companies and railroads to become spotters on the men who would send for a case of liquor. You want them to inform the Solicitor General at Charlottetown that a certain person in the back concessions have ordered a case of claret, or a quart of highwines. The thing is absurd, and should not be tolerated by an intelligent body of men. This goes to show, as the hon. member from Halifax stated in his very able speech on this matter, how far people will venture to insist on others doing as they do themselves, subverting all laws. I say that this provision is not fair or honourable to the transportation companies, because very often these companies carry goods not knowing, and not being supposed to know what the cases contain. How often we find gifts at Christmas and other feast days, sent to friends in the shape of a case of champagne or other liquor. Now, are you going to force the company to divulge the name of the man who sends a gift of that kind to a relative? Are you going to force the publication of his name in official documents? Are you going to compel the companies to submit to government inspection that there is a case of champagne lying in the warehouse at the disposal of any citizen? We are told that common carriers must not violate the law. Then I say, make the law so that it will be respected. Do not make laws that run counter to the needs of a large number of people, including many who contend that they are prohibitionists. How many men are there in this House to-day whose cellars are not well stocked with wines and liquors? Many of those who advocate a measure of this kind use intoxicating liquors. Are they prepared to indulge in these delicacies while refusing them to others? It is well known to every one here, that many of the most ardent advocates of prohibition are themselves, without violating any law, divine or civil, indulging in wine, or Scotch whisky themselves, while they are trying by their votes here to prevent other people from having some little luxuries of the same kind. I hold that this provision is ineffective. How are you going to prosecute foreign companies, United States railways and foreign vessels? Are you going to force foreigners to give to the Solicitor General at Charlottetown a list of all the goods they have on board which contain intoxicating liquor? The thing is absurd on the face of it. You cannot enforce this measure. The permission given to each individual to have at least five gallons of liquor is an absurd provision. Five gallons of what? The man may import five gallons of beer, in which there might not be a quart of alcohol all told. Another man would import five gallons of alcohol over proof. Now, what is going to happen to that man with his five gallons of over proof? He is not able to drink it in that form; he must dilute or adulterate it, and that alcohol will take three gallons to one, with the result that he will come under the penalty prescribed in this Bill for keeping in his possession more than five gallons of liquor. So that under this Bill you give a man a right to import five gallons of liquor; but if he adds water to it he becomes a criminal, and is liable to arrest. We all know that every person cannot afford to import five gallons of liquor at one time.

The average bank clerk receiving $40 to $75 a month, or the ordinary working man being paid from $10 to $15 dollars a week, and small merchants who have a revenue of one or two thousand a year, are not able to purchase five gallons at a time, and the result is that you will force them to send their orders to Halifax, Montreal, Portland or Boston for a bottle at a time. They are not able to buy much more than that. The poor man is just as much entitled to his glass of ale or wine as his wealthy neighbour who pretends he does not take it, and has his cellar stocked with it. You deprive the man who is wealthy—and it is no crime to be wealthy—from putting into his cellar what he should be allowed to put in, five gallons of claret, which will not last long in a French family, where the natural beverage at dinner and supper is claret. What would five gallons amount to? He would be entitled to have his port wine, sherry, rum in his cellar—to have all the liquors which are manufactured. We take that privilege away from him, and men who are able to use liquor and do not abuse it, will not be able to bring in anything but five gallons. Is that not an absurd position to place these families in? Then I refer to the social clubs purposely, because this law is practically directed—and I know whereof I speak—against one of the few social clubs which exist at Charlottetown, where lawyers, bankers and merchants congregate in the afternoon and evening, it is their home. Many of them are old bachelors, and many have no other place to go except to the club, as we all do in other parts of the civilized world. If this Bill become law, that club will not be allowed to have one drop of ale, claret or wine in the institution. Is that fair? Is parliament prepared to say to men of standing in the community: 'You shall not have any liquor in your social club'? You cannot put before the people public action which is in contradiction of a private action. If you want to insist on the people of Prince Edward Island doing this thing, then do it yourself before you cast a vote to this effect. That is the proper attitude to take as far as frankness and fair play are concerned. You are making a distinction in favour of the wealthy man against the poor man. We know that when an order is given for foreign goods—they will be practically foreign—it is cheaper to buy a large rather than a small quantity. We know that claret, port and sherry can be purchased by the cask, and the longer you keep it in your cellar the better it becomes. Why force the poor man to send to Portland, Halifax or Boston for half a dozen ale, because he cannot buy it on the Island, and then have his name published all over the country that he has sent for half a dozen bottles of intoxicating liquor? I cannot see the legitimacy or effectiveness of this Bill. I can see much that is unfair and weak in it, that we should not ask the courts to interpret and apply. I think the amendment of the hon. senator from Westmorland is much more to the point, less offensive and more effective than the provision in the Bill.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—There is a reference made in the preamble as printed in the minutes to a resolution carried by the legislative assembly in the month of March, 1909. Have we a copy of this resolution, or can we have it?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I read it, I will send and get it.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Is it printed in the Debates?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I think it is.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I should like to ask the hon. member, is the Scott Act not in force in Prince Edward Island?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—The Canada Temperance Act is not.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Would it not be better to make the provisions of the Canada Temperance Act applicable to Prince Edward Island so long as the Prohibition Act will be in force, instead of adopting an exceptional law. I must say that I cannot appreciate the advisability of proceeding, by sectional laws, applicable merely to one part of the country, and dependent entirely upon the existence of a local law. Suppose we pass this Bill making it a criminal offence to do all these things, and in a month or two months, the Provincial Act is repealed.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Then it drops.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Is that a position parliament should expose itself to? It seems to me parliament should legislate, as far as the criminal law is concerned, because it is a criminal act in a sense, it should legislate for all time, not only for a portion of the time. If it is a crime to drink in Prince Edward Island, it is a crime in Ontario, and if it is not a crime in other provinces it is not a crime there. If they are not satisfied with the Canada Temperance Act, it is open to them to make stringent provision by a provincial Act, to prohibit, to confiscate, to do what they like, but we are here legislating for the purpose of making it a criminal offence to export or ship liquor to any part of Prince Edward Island when it is not an offence to do the same thing in any other province of Canada. I am most favourable, as far as I am personally concerned, to anything that tends towards temperance; on the other hand we must not adopt a Bill which will be thrown out in the other House, for very good reasons, or a Bill which cannot commend itself to the good judgment of the House.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—My hon. friend took exception to the Bill and said it would create confusion, and then, at his suggestion, and the suggestion of my hon. friends opposite, it was drafted to apply to Prince Edward Island, and in order to meet the objection of the hon. gentleman from Moncton, I propose to add to the second proviso the provision that if the transportation company gave the official notice to which I refer, that they should be exempted from all penalties, to make it absolutely clear. Hon. gentlemen talk about trade and commerce. This Bill has no reference to trade and commerce.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is only in that way we can legislate. It is by reason of that we legislate.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—This is under the criminal law. Then with reference to its applying to a particular province, why only this session we passed an Act relative to ore. It applied only to one province, and then we whittled it down until it applied only to a particular part of the province, which the Governor in Council may chose to name. There are abundance of precedents. I could give innumerable instances; therefore, that objection does not exist, and it is legislation only in reference to a subject matter on which public opinion is so decided that this legislation should be enacted. There is a constant attempt to check the liquor traffic. In Newfoundland, where we would least expect it, they have passed a law limiting licenses, and there is another provision, 'No liquor shall be sent C.O.D. into any local option county.' Since we have discussed this question, it appears from the record of Ontario that no less than 200 licenses have been cut off, local option being carried in a number of municipalities.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—With what result?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—The number of licenses in force was about 6,000, and to-day it is less than 2,000—an evidence of the necessity of crippling the trade.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The trade is crippled.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Because it is arbitrarily cut off. In Megantic, prohibition has carried unanimously. There is only one dissenting voice. There had been six before. If one wanted evidence of public opinion, take the 'Globe' of last Saturday, referring to a fearful death that occurred a few days before. The 'Globe' said:

> That instance reported in the 'Globe' yesterday is only one out of the almost daily list of murders and suicides and other crimes of violence charged up against the drink habit and the barroom. Every newspaper that reports the day's events, even in Canada, bears witness to the ruin wrought by the liquor traffic.

Showing that you are not to deal with this traffic as you deal with any other.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The hon. gentleman has quoted figures in regard to the diminution of licenses in the province of Ontario. I put the question to him, with what results? There were two results. When they had six thousand licenses the province was receiving nearly three-quarters of a milion revenue; to-day they are only receiving two hundred and fifty thousand of a revenue, and there is more liquor consumed in Ontario than there ever was. There were 18,000,000 gallons of beer alone manufactured last year.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I will read another extract for the benefit of the House.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—The hon. gentleman is making an extended speech.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I move that the committee rise, and report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY, from the committee, reported that they had made some progress with the Bill, and asked leave to sit again to-morrow.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—To be the first order after 3rd readings.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It should take its place.

GUELPH JUNCTION RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON moved the second reading of Bill (FFF) an Act respecting the Guelph Junction Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Gibson.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to ask if the hon. gentleman has considered its provisions, and if he is prepared to explain the reason why this extraordinary Bill should be presented to parliament? If the Bill was really entitled an Act respecting the Guelph Junction Railway Company, and the confiscation of private property at the instance of the corporation at its own price, which they put on the rights——

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—All I can say is that I quite agree with everything the hon. gentleman has said, and it is a reason why it should be sent to the committee. I believe there are parties who have just claims against this company, and I think the Bill should be referred to committee when all parties can be heard. I believe there has been an attempt to confiscate certain interests.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In allowing the second reading to go, we affirm the principle of the Bill, unless it is distinctly understood that members who do not agree to the principle are not to be held to it.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The House is not bound to the principle of a private Bill by adopting the second reading.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (GGG) An Act to incorporate the Buctouche Railway and Transportation Company.—Hon. Mr. Thompson.

Bill (No. 52) An Act to incorporate the Nelson River Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Watson.

Bill (No. 98) an Act respecting the Trust and Loan Company of Canada.—Hon. Mr. Scott.

The Senate adjourned until Three o'clock to-morrow.

THE SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 13, 1910.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

ORGANIZATION OF NAVAL MARINE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE inquired:

Who is the person specially charged with the preliminary organization of the naval marine, in view of the passing of the Naval Bill? What is his rank? Has he already had in England the command of a battleship? Has he lost it? If so, for what reason?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The answer to the hon. gentleman's question is:

Pending the passage of the Naval Bill no definite organization has been made of a naval staff. The Bill has been prepared by the regular staff of the Department of Marine and Fisheries with the assistance of three officers who were lent by the admiralty to the Canadian government; these three officers are: Commander James D. D. Stewart, Lieutenant Richard M. T. Stephens and Staff Paymaster Percy J. Ling. None of these officers has ever commanded a battleship.

CLASSIFICATION OF WORK ON NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE inquired:

1. Has the person named Francis, who was formerly resident engineer on the part of the National Transcontinental railway passing through the county of Bellechasse, had any difficulties with the government or with the contractor Davis, or with the sub-contractors Murdock or Murdock & Brothers, with regard to the classification of the works at that place, or in the neighbourhood of the place called Armagh? If so, what has been the result thereof?
2. Does the government find that it has lost directly or indirectly, any money by its manner of classification of the work?
3. Had the contractor Davis or the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company laid any complaint against that engineer, with the government or with the Transcontinental Railway Commission? If so, what have been the consequences thereof?
4. Was Mr. Charlton, engineer of the division, mixed up in this affair? If so, what complaints have been laid against him by the persons mentioned above?
5. What has been the result of these complaints?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follow:

1. (a) No difficulties with the government. (b) The government has no information as to difficulties with contractors or sub-contractors.
2. No.
3. No.
4. Answered by 1 and 3.

ACCOUNTS OF C. E. A. TASCHEREAU.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate a statement showing:—

1. How much Mr. C. E. A. Taschereau, of Quebec, notary, received during the last five years from the government or from the Transcontinental Commission for professional services, disbursements, travelling expenses, &c., and the amount of his account to the government or to the said commission which have not yet been paid?
2. Was the said Mr. Taschereau employed only in the city of Quebec, or also in other counties of that district, and, if so, what counties?
3. If he has been employed in other counties, were there not in these counties notaries capable of acting for the government or the Transcontinental Commission?
4. And if there were notaries in those places why were they not employed?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —There is no objection to the motion.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I am under the impression that this question has been already put fully once or twice by the hon. senator from Stadacona.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I put that question some years ago; but I suppose the party has not been lost in oblivion yet. Perhaps there are some more additions to that.

The motion was agreed to.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Before the orders of the day are called, I wish to rise to a question of privilege, and it is a personal matter. I have been in this House seven years, and I have never yet been obliged to raise a question of this kind. I have one thing which I hold dear in life, and that is my character for fairness, fair-play and truthfulness. I find by the records of this honourable House, and by subsidiary efforts through the public press, that the position I took on the question which was raised by the hon. senator from British Columbia has been misrepresented and not fully reported in the public press. I am not going to charge the reporters with any dereliction of duty in the matter. I rose yesterday to take exception to the statement made by the hon. member from British Columbia (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) and to take issue with him on it. The statement he had made was one that did not appeal to my sense of fairness and justice. The statement was this: while he was discussing the propriety of the senator from Ottawa going with a delegation of representative French Canadians from the province of Ontario to the government.

seeking fair representation in this honourable House, and on the bench of this province, one of his statements was as follows:

> The fact of asking for a judge of this race or creed would be a reflection on French Canadians themselves. It would be tantamount to saying that if they had a judge on the bench of their own nationality and religion he would favour them. That inference can fairly be drawn from the request of the delegation. Otherwise why ask for a judge of that nationality or creed?

That was the declaration made by the hon. gentleman, and seeing that no member in this honourable House took exception to that statement, I thought it my duty to point out that the French Canadian people asked for no such concession with a view to receiving partial treatment from the bench, or more than their fair representation in the Senate. In the course of my argument, I stated that the French Canadian people were very generous, and as an instance of that quoted the fact that last winter the French Canadians, by a vote of four to one, elected an Irish Catholic mayor of Montreal, and by way of illustration to show that there was more tolerance in the French ranks than in the English ranks, and to fortify my argument, asked when Toronto had ever elected an Irish Catholic Mayor. That is all I said. What do I find in the official report of this House? Notwithstanding my contradiction on the spot, I find that the ex-Prime Minister (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell), a man who holds a high position in the esteem and confidence of this country, stated that I had said no Catholic was ever elected in Toronto, and when I gave him my humble denial he insisted on saying I had said so. Here are his words:

> What are the facts? The hon. gentleman from Montreal stated that no one had been elected in that city except——
> Hon. Mr. CLORAN. I beg pardon.
> Hon. Sir MACENZIE BOWELL. The hon. gentleman should not interrupt.
> Hon. Mr. CLORAN. I rise to a point of order. My statement was that the city of Toronto never elected an English speaking Scotch or Irish Catholic. I never said 'no one.'
> Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL. The hon. gentleman may not have intended it, but he said it. The hon. gentleman said no one of that religion.
> Hon. Mr. CLORAN. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is putting words in my mouth which I never used, because I could not say so, knowing that Claude Macdonell, a Scotch Catholic, was elected in Toronto.
> Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL. Has any hon. gentleman a right to make a correction and follow it up with a speech.
> The SPEAKER. No, certainly not.

I received a flat denial from the hon. gentleman in regard to the statement I had made a few minutes before, and of which I was perfectly certain. I am not going to accuse the hon. gentleman of having intentionally wronged me. I understand very often he cannot hear; but once he got my denial he should have accepted it, and having failed to do so it was the duty of the hon. Speaker to compel him to accept it, but the hon. Speaker did not do so. Now if that is going to be a precedent in discussions of this House, I should like to know where we are going to end. This is a question of privilege that ought to be decided. The hon. member from Hastings has put into my mouth words that I would not condescend to utter. Although I fight for the rights of my people and my own rights, I am most considerate of the rights of others. I never try to deny to another what I want for myself. That has been my stand in public life for the past thirty years, and it is my stand today, and I want the hon. member from Hastings to understand that he cannot put words in my mouth which are a travesty on my past record, and a contradiction of my sentiments. I would also submit to his hon. the Speaker that when his attention is called to a flagrant breach of the rules of the House, he should compel the offender, no matter what his age or position, to respect the rules of parliament in regard to even its humblest members. I am here on the strength of my own capacity and fairness in dealing with all classes. I do not want my word challenged in this House unless it can be shown that I am in error, and I will not permit it as long as God gives me power to protest against it. When I rose yesterday to address the House it was not for the purpose of vaunting the generosity of the French Canadian people. Why, it is written on every telegraph post on every road in this country; but I rose to protest against the insinuation, unfounded, unmerited and dishonour-able, that the French Canadian people wanted a judge of their own nationality so as to get partiality from the bench.

An Hon. MEMBER—Who said that?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The hon. member from British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (British Columbia)—No.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The hon. gentleman says 'no.' I will read again what he did say:

> The fact of asking for a judge of this race or creed would be a reflection on French Canadians themselves. It would be tantamount to saying that if they had a judge on the bench of their own nationality and religion he would favour them. That inference can fairly be drawn from the request of the delegation. Otherwise why ask for a judge of that nationality or creed?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I rise to a question of privilege? My hon. friend has no right to contravert the inferences which another member may draw. A certain act having taken place, that is not a question of privilege. My hon. friend from Victoria division is answering the argument of the hon. gentleman from British Columbia. If he has a question of privilege as to what he himself said, it is another thing.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I think he is travelling beyond his question of privilege. I think he has covered the point and should not go beyond that.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I have covered it as far as this House is concerned, and I have another point. I have a point regarding the honourable House in regard to its debates, in regard to the want of decision on the part of the Chair in regard to the persistent assertions of an hon. gentleman against the word of another, which should not be tolerated.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is not a question of privilege. If my hon. friend from Victoria division desired to set himself right, he should have done it yesterday. He cannot do it to-day. I submit that point to the Speaker. He is too late at the present time.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I sympathise with the hon. leader of the opposition. Yesterday I insisted on what I am saying now; but I was given a flat contradiction, and the Chair did not decide on it. I have the official report of parliament in my hand, and is the hon. leader of the opposition going to prevent an hon. gentleman from justifying his attitude and safeguarding his character in the matter?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I press the point of order. I am fully assured that my hon. friend's character will not suffer in the slightest degree.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I do not depend on the hon. gentleman for an assertion of that kind.

Hon. Mr. SPEAKER—I understood the hon. gentleman when he rose to raise a question referring to the debates published here or elsewhere with reference to the statement he made yesterday, about which a question was raised when another hon. gentleman was speaking. I understood the hon. gentleman to say, as he is reported here at page 550: 'How many Irish Catholic Mayors have been elected in Toronto'?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I asked has there ever been one.

The SPEAKER—I understood the hon. gentleman to say, as is reported here: 'How many', and I understood the hon. gentleman to put it as an interrogatory, as is often used in language to convey the idea that none have been. The hon. gentleman may have been misunderstood by me, but that was my understanding. Subsequently, the Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell reverted to what the hon. gentleman said in the following language:

> Those who know anything of Canada are aware that Toronto stands relatively as a Protestant community as strong as Montreal is Roman Catholic, and it is too often the case that when questions of this kind arise (which I deprecate to the fullest possible extent) Toronto is alleged to be one of the most bigoted of the cities in this country, because it is Orange and Protestant. What are the facts? The hon. gentleman from Montreal stated that no one had been elected in that city except——

Hon. Mr. CLORAN. I beg pardon.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL. The hon. gentleman should not interrupt.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN. I rise to a point of order. My statement was that the city of Toronto never elected an English speaking Scotch or Irish Catholic. I never said 'no one.'

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL. The hon. gentleman may not have intended it, but he said it. The hon. gentleman said no one of that religion.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is putting words in my mouth which I never used, because I could not say so, knowing that Claude Macdonell, a Scotch Catholic, was elected in Toronto.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL. Has any hon. gentleman a right to make a correction and follow it up with a speech.

The SPEAKER. No. Certainly not.

That is all I said. I was not called upon to make any further review. The question of order was raised, as I understood, by the statement made by the hon. gentleman from Hastings objecting to a correction being made, and as my understanding of it was that it was really making a correction in what he said, under those circumstances I do not see where I was called upon to give any ruling. The debate was not stopped. No question was pressed. If it had been, I should have given the ruling as I gave it now—that the point of order was not well taken.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I submit to that decision and hope it will be borne in mind in the future.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (British Columbia)—I would raise another point of order. Is it in order to traverse the debates of a previous day?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We have no right to do that.

The SPEAKER—No. But I apprehend if any hon. gentleman perceives that he has been misreported in the debates which are to be published, he has a right to make a correction.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But no right to discuss the whole question.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I am in hearty consonance with the Chair. I asked for the correction yesterday and did not get it, and I hope the hon. gentleman from Belleville (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell) will make the correction in his speech, and withdraw the statements he made yesterday, which are now in print in the 'Debates' of the Senate. I now desire to refer to what has been done by the official press reporter in regard to this matter. It is the first time in my experience that I have ever found fault with the press reports or criticisms. I have been used to it for the past thirty years. I have a thick skin and can stand it all. I have been put down as a dynamiter and a fiend, and as the murderer of Hackett, and had to lose two elections on account of that accusation, when I was four thousand miles away on the college benches of Paris. That is only an illustration—your Orange friends accusing me of being the murderer of Hackett in 1878. They never vote for a Grit. The hon. gentleman says they vote for Catholics. They do when they are Tories.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Who told the hon. gentleman that?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Clarke Wallace told me that.

The SPEAKER—This is entirely out of order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—If the hon. gentleman interrupts me, he will get his answer right from the back. I am not going to challenge the honesty or the competency of the press reporter of this Senate; but he simply sent the press one or two sentences from my remarks which made my position ridiculcus, and I have a right to protest, as he is the paid official of this honourable body. The reporter sent six lines and a half of the remarks I made yesterday, and they were simply bearing on the tolerant qualities of the French Canadian. As I said before, that was not my object when I rose to answer the hon. Senator from British Columbia. It was to destroy the assumption and the insinuation against an honourable people. That is why I rose, and that point was not published. The reporter in this House, according to his own production, was delinquent in his duty, and I want him to understand that in the few words he sent to the press he misrepresented my position.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I rise to another question of order. That is not a question of privilege. There is a method of correcting any mistakes in the reports.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—If the reporter had simply given the essence of what was said instead of giving the incidental illustrations, I would have been satisfied; however, I am satisfied as it is now. Imperfect reports do not affect me. I call attention to the fact that our reporter very often—I do not say out of dishonesty or ill-will—misleads the public in regard to the utterances of hon. gentlemen in this Chamber.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have no desire to follow the hon. gentleman in the harrangue in which he has indulged. Had it not been for the impetuosity of his own character and the constant habit of interrupting hon. gentlemen when they are speaking, the probabilities are that all this difficulty would not have arisen. I was about pointing out at the time, what I understood him to say, when he instanced one exception of the election of a Catholic in the case of the election of Claude Macdonnell as Mayor of Toronto; but before I had time to finish the sentence he interrupted me and stated what I distinctly understood him to say at the time, and what I believed at the time he said. I turned around to him this way, and told him he did not know what he was talking about.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The hon. gentleman did not say that. It is not reported.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I know it is not reported, but it is what I said to him, and I said it plainly enough, 'There he is at it again. He cannot hold his tongue for a minute.' What I said to him was, when he made that broad statement in reference to the city of Toronto, that he did not know what he was talking about, His answer to me was, 'Yes, I do,' and then he went on with the statement. What I understood him to say at the time, and what I still believe he did say, was in speaking of the city of Toronto, that no Catholic, or any one of that persuasion, had been elected by the people.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I never said so. I rise to a point of order. This is insisting on the statement he made yesterday. I would ask him to withdraw the statement.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I withdraw nothing. Understand that.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I will contradict the hon. gentleman every time he says so.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I was about to make an explanation of what I understood him to say, and in making the explanation the hon. gentleman was constantly interrupting: 'I did not, I did not.'

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—There is no such record.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to draw the attention of the House to this, that that is all I intended to say, and I am quite sure that if the hon. gentleman had not made the interruption at the time, the probabilities are that there would have been no particular misunderstanding between him and myself. During his speech, he characterized the statement made by the hon. gentleman from British Columbia as being dishonourable. I should like to know if that is in accordance with the rules of this House? He has used other strong language with reference to remarks made by that hon. gentleman. He had the right to draw any inference he thought proper from the action of French Canadians who appeared before Sir Wilfrid. That is a privilege every one has. Those inferences may not be correct; but if you misunderstand an hon. gentleman when he speaks, it is not dishonourable to give your own interpretation. I do not desire to occupy the time of this House any further. There is one thing I feel sure of, that from my long public career, I am not afraid of anything the hon. gentleman may say about me will have any effect in the country.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—That is all right.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—As the arch offender, I am not going to waste words in replying to the unparliamentary, out of order, and intemperate address of the hon. gentleman from Victoria division.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I have just one word to say——

The SPEAKER—I think the discussion has proceeded far enough.

DELAYED RETURNS.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I would ask the right hon. leader of the House if we could obtain one or two returns which have not yet been furnished? There was one short return moved for on the 21st January last, the contract between the government and Mr. Koenig, the contractor who was to remove the debris of the Quebec bridge. I think it is time we should get it if parliament intends to prorogue this year. The other document is an order of this House for the production of all the correspondence that took place between the Quebec Rock City Tobacco Company and the government on the occasion of certain seizures made during the last five years.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I will make inquiry about that.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (No. 185) An Act respecting the Commission for the Conservation of Natural Resources.—Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

Bill (No. 195) An Act respecting the currency.—Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

THIRD READING.

Bill (A) An Act to incorporate the Retail Merchants Association of Canada.—Mr. McHugh.

INCREASED ACCOMMODATION IN PARLIAMENT BUILDING.

DEBATE CONCLUDED.

The order of the day being called:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of the Honourable Mr. Costigan: That in the opinion of the Senate the question of increased accommodation for the parliamentary library should be considered, with a view to providing a new chamber for the House of Commons, and additional committee rooms for the Senate.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—When I moved the adjournment of the debate, I did so for the purpose of getting on with the business of the day rather than to make a speech on the subject. However, I avail myself of the opportunity to throw out a few hints in connection with this question. There is no doubt our parliamentary representation is already large, and if it is to increase with the development of the country, more accommodation will be needed. At present, for a population of about seven millions, we have something like 220 members in the House of Commons. Should the population increase to ten millions, we must have 333 members in the Commons, and with 20 millions, which it is likely to reach before many years, under our present system we would have 666 members.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—We could reduce the number.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Not without recasting the Confederation Act.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The hon. gentleman does not take into account the growth of the province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—The representation in parliament is based upon the population of Quebec, that province having always 65 members. That number divided into the population of the province gives about 23,000, as the unit of representation.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The representation of Quebec can be reduced from 65.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Only by recasting the Confederation Act.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Under the Act.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Then we had better get the consent of the province of Quebec to do it right away, because the present representation is altogether too numerous, cumbrous, and expensive for the Dominion under present conditions. We have 24 senators in this House from Quebec. The state of New York, with a population greater than that of the entire Dominion, and with wealth equal to, if not larger than the wealth of the Dominion, is represented at Washington by two senators. Ontario has 24 senators, while Illinois, including the city of Chicago, a wealthy state, with a large population is represented at Washington by two senators. Every other state in the union has but two senators. Texas, with a population of over three millions, and a territory, over a thousand miles long, and eight hundred miles wide, is represented at Washington by two senators. It is clear, therefore, that our system of representation in both Houses of parliament is too expensive. Compare the cost of representation in the United States with that of Canada. The entire cost in the United States, including mileage, President's salary and every item that justly comes under the head of money paid to representatives, amounts to about five cents per head of the entire population of the republic, while in Canada the cost of representation is a little more than 14 cents a head. How long will the people of Canada stand this condition of things? Will they consent to increase the number of members in both Houses, and construct additional buildings to find room for them, or will they insist upon a substantial reduction of the number of representatives in both Houses? I think the government should take up the question, and if a reduction can be made let it be done at once, and relieve the people of an unnecessary burden. At confederation, there was a combination of both Grits and Tories, so that no particular party is responsible for the system of representation adopted then; but it was clearly too expensive. No doubt, they looked forward to Canada having a large population by this time, possibly four times the number we have. We have not increased as rapidly as we desired; but we have reached such a point of expense connected with legislation that it becomes the duty of the government to see if some method cannot be devised to reduce the number of representatives rather than increase the accommodation here for a larger number. I hope some prominent man will take hold of this whole question and educate the people to look for a reduction of the number of their representatives.

Hon. Mr. COSTIGAN—I am willing to withdraw the resolution. My object when giving notice of this motion was not to interfere with the rights of the House of Commons. Some hon. gentlemen have expressed the opinion that it might give them umbrage to move it here. I felt it my duty to bring this matter up, to call attention to the fact that the extensive improvements suggested may be made economically.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—When I said that the British North America Act could be altered in the way I suggested, I had in mind section 52, where reference is made to the possibility of increasing the number of members. I had the impression that this applied also to decreasing the representation. I see that it only refers to an increase.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—It is well that that fact should be emphasized.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—My recollection was that our figure of 65 representatives for Quebec was not a fixed one, and could be altered by maintaining the same ratio; but I find it does not apply to a decrease.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Section 51 settles the matter. It provides that 'Quebec shall have the fixed number of 65.'

The motion was withdrawn.

ACQUISITION OF BRANCH LINES OF GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole consideration of Bill (No. 17) An Act to authorize the government of Canada to acquire, by lease, lines of railway connecting with the government railways.

(In the Committee).

On clause three,

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN moved that the clause be amended by adding the following words to clause 3, after the word 'lease':

'And the rental to be paid therefor shall in no case exceed one-third of the gross earnings of the line so taken over, and the accounts of such line or lines are kept separate from the accounts of the Intercolonial, so that they will appear by themselves in the Minister of Railways' annual report.'

He said: The official return shows that of the earnings of all the railways in Canada, 72 per cent was required for running expenses. Only about 28 per cent was reserved for the payment of dividends, interest, &c. Now this amount provides that the government shall not pay more than one third of the gross earnings of any such branch lines in the way of rents. That is a reasonable provision to make. I would much prefer to have the law as it stands now than legislate in the direction of placing this matter in the hands of the Railway Construction Board, and the chief engineer. Both are largely under the control of the government, and would have to do what they were ordered to do by the government. We do not want any minister placed in the position when he comes before parliament, that he can throw the responsibility of anything being done in connection with taking over those lines on the Railway Construction Board, or on the chief engineer. They are not in either House of parliament to answer questions. My amendment proposes that no matter what the Railway Construction Board or chief engineer may recommend, at least two-thirds of the gross earnings shall be kept for the payment of rental, whatever the earnings of the line may be.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—At what point will the hon. gentleman determine what the amount of the lease shall be? At the time of taking over the road, or will it be the gross earnings distributed over a period of so many years previous to taking over the line?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—During all the existence of the lease, the government shall not pay more than one-third of the gross earnings in the way of rents. The amendment would limit them to that.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Do I understand it will be a shifting rent from year to year, as may be determined by the gross earnings?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Yes.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—Is this amendment accepted by the government?

The amendment was agreed to, and the clause as amended was adopted.

Mr. POWER moved that the following be added to the Bill as clause 4:

4. No such lease shall be ratified by parliament, unless a return has been laid before both Houses for at least one month showing:—

(a) The cost of the road proposed to be leased together with the amount of stock subscribed and all moneys received from sale of bonds or by way of bonuses or otherwise.

(b) Present equipment of road together with the average rate of freight and charges for passengers on the same and a statement showing approximately how above rates compare with those charged on the Intercolonial railway.

(c) Present condition of the road and the estimate of outlay required to put it in good running order.

(d) Total receipts and expenditures for three years last past.

(e) List of shareholders and bondholders.

(f) Other creditors of the road.

(g) Estimate of future receipts and expenditures in the event of the road being leased by the Intercolonial railway.

Such return to be signed and certified to by the chief engineer and traffic manager of the Intercolonial railway and the deputy minister.

He said: It seems to me that is information that the government and parliament ought to have before entering into a lease. I trust that it will meet with the approval of the right hon. gentleman who has charge of the Bill.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT I have looked carefully over my hon. friend's amendments, and I am bound to say that the information he asks for is information which, no doubt, the government would require to obtain themselves before recommending such a lease. At the same time, if the opinion of the Senate is in favour of the amendments, I shall not object to them though I would not undertake to guarantee that in another place, they may not be overhauled, and possibly modified. I think, in a general way, the hon. gentleman is fairly justified in asking that the information my hon. friend mentions should be furnished. Therefore, if the Senate approves of the amendment, I shall not interpose any objections.

The amendment was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved the following as subsection 2 of clause 4:

Such lease should in no case exceed a term of twenty-one years.

He said: Sometimes those leases are entered into for 99 years. A lease of 99 years is practically a purchase, and if the government find their bargain to be a bad one, they are bound to it in perpetuity. Twenty-one years is a reasonably long time, and I do not think the country should be bound for a longer term than that.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—If the government should lease a road for 21 years there is not the slightest doubt they will spend money on it to put it in good running order, and at the expiration of the lease the company would have the right to take over the road when it is in perfect order. Is the hon. gentleman prepared to allow that condition of things?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I would say to my hon. friend that it would be a question which would have to be decided by the terms of the lease, and I have no doubt that the Minister of Railways, whoever he may be, would take care that the interests of the country were guarded if it became necessary to spend a considerable sum of money. The hon. gentleman will see that under the main provisions of the Bill, which were passed in clause three, a road is not to be taken over unless it is certified to be in good running order, and in good condition; it is presumable, therefore, unless in very exceptional cases, that no considerable sum should be required to be expended.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—There is another point the hon. gentleman forgets. In 21 years, if the country continues to grow at the rate it has been growing, this road will be very valuable, and the government will have developed a business for the people, and at the end of 21 years the company may take the road back. I think it is a very bad amendment.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is there anything to preclude the government, even should there be a limitation of the lease, from expropriating the road at any time?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think not.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—That would cost a very large sum.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think the government has a right to expropriate a road, just as the company has a right to expropriate the ground on which it is built.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is a great deal of force in what has been said by the hon. gentleman from Victoria division, and the hon. gentleman from Sorel division, and in the face of two gentlemen of such business capacity as they undoubtedly are, I do not presume to set up my humble opinion; and with the concurrence of the committee I propose to amend this motion by adding to it 'With the option of renewal.'

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—On the same basis.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—The option of renewal on the same terms.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Very well, on the same terms.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—At the end of 21 years, the government will have the right to expropriate. There is no doubt about that. They have the right, but the expropriation expense to-day would be very much less than it will be in 21 years hence.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—That is as might be.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—As the hon. gentlemen from Sorel (Hon. Mr. Forget) pointed out, this country will not be at a standstill, and in twenty-one years these leased roads will probably be worth three times as much as they are to-day.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I hope so, but experience has not shown that.

Hon. Mr. McGREGOR—Surely the chief engineer and traffic manager and deputy minister will provide all those safeguards in any contract they make. I do not think there is any danger.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—It is just as well not to run any risks.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I think the suggestions as to the renewal are ill-advised. It is not likely that an option for renewal will be entertained on the same terms, and that possibly might destroy the effect of it. My hon. friend might put it in this way: 'With the option of renewal or renewals'. It is for the parties themselves, without being bound by the terms of renewal, to consider the matter.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middlesex)—The words 'on the same terms' should not be in the motion.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If those words are not inserted. It seems to me there is a risk that the owners of the road would contend at the expiration of 21 years that their rental should be increased by perhaps 100 per cent.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I would point out that this lease is, in the nature of the case, on a sliding scale. It is proposed to pay 30 or 33 per cent, as the case may be, of the gross receipts.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is not to be more than that?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—But it would be made undoubtedly on the proportion of the gross receipts. If, therefore, the road became much more valuable than it is at present, the lease would increase in value in proportion. The amount to be paid to the owners of the road would be very considerably increased if the gross receipts are increased.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That would be a case of unearned increment. The owners would not have done anything to increase the value, and I think the public should have the benefit of it.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—Why put in the amendment restricting it to the twenty-one years, if the hon. gentleman's contention is right? Why not have a long term?

Hon. Mr. FORGET—I suppose the government is guaranteeing the bonds, and leasing the road at 33 per cent of the gross earnings. The hon. minister says the lease will be made on the basis of the gross earnings; but the government must also be responsible for the bonds already issued on that road. The road has not been built for nothing. What are the obligations of the road to-day? We should know what they are.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—There is no particular road mentioned. If the motion passes as amended by the hon. gentleman from Halifax, all that information will be given in detail under the certificate of the board and deputy minister, and chief engineer, and it will be before parliament for a reasonable space of time, so that they can decide in each individual case.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not suppose the lease will provide that the government are to pay 33⅓ per cent of the gross earnings. What I suppose will be done is this: It will be the duty of the government, under the amendment of the hon. gentleman from Wellington, to ascertain what the gross earnings of the road were in the year before it was taken over, and the government then agree to pay a sum equal to one-third of that.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—No, I do not think so.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—The gross earnings of the road are not a criterion to go by. Should the operating expenses equal the gross earnings, what then?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—So much the worse for the government.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Will the government still pay one-third?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—In no case is it to exceed 33 per cent of the gross receipts. It might be as much less as you please.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—If this Bill is passed now, and the government buy branch lines in the future, they will have their hands tied; they can only buy them on that condition.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—They could not pay more than 33 per cent of the gross receipts in any case.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We are rather anticipating a discussion of the next clause of my hon. friend's amendment, but in connection with this point, may I ask my right hon. friend is it the intention of the government simply to operate the road, or is it their intention to assume the bonded indebtedness of the road and to pay the interest out of the gross earnings? If there be only a lease—and we construe that strictly—then I apprehend the government does not intend to enter upon any assumption of the liabilities of the road, but simply to operate and maintain the road; or is it the intention that this lease should be of a more comprehensive character, and that the government should assume all the obligations of the road, paying the interest upon the bonds, and likewise the other obligations already contracted?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I do not so understand; what I understand is, that the government would take over the road, agreeing to pay a certain proportion of the gross receipts to whoever might be entitled to receive it, primarily to the bondholders, no doubt. After the bondholders were satisfied, if there were any surplus, it would go to the stockholders, but the government, as I understand the motion before us and I understand from the Minister of Railways, do not undertake to make themselves responsible for the bonds.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—that is right.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—They take over the road, operate the road, and undertake to pay whatever may be agreed upon between them and the owners of the road, a certain proportion of the gross receipts. That is all they undertake to pay. Out of them the bondholders, or any other parties having primary claims, should be satisfied. The balance should go to the stockholders, I presume.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It would be necessary possibly to go somewhat further. The present company for instance, would be primarily entitled to the rentals which the government propose to pay for the road, the government relying upon the company to pay its bonded indebtedness. But, let us assume that the company should make default, or that the company should not pay this rental over to the bond-holders, possibly the bond-holders might have to take proceedings and get possession of the road, and thus cut out the lease; but I presume the government would protect itself against any conditions of that kind arising.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The government will, undoubtedly, have that case, because all they would undertake would be to pay a certain proportion of the gross receipts, and if it was not sufficient to satisfy the bond-holders, and the bond-holders took possession of the road, the lease would fail.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But in the meantime the government have made very heavy expenditure on the road.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The government will undoubtedly, have to protect themselves against that in the terms of the lease; but we can hardly, I think, go the length—I doubt whether it would possibly be accepted—of specifying that we shall define all the terms of these leases, which, of necessity, will vary very greatly according to the conditions of the road, and a number of other circumstances that would easily present themselves to the mind of my hon. friend or any hon. gentleman connected with railways. I think the government must reserve a certain discretion, and the country must trust them to make reasonable provision for these contingencies. If the measure is to be before the House of Commons, and this House for a reasonable time, with the information required by my hon. friend, I think pretty considerable precautions have been taken, all that could reasonably be expected, against any mistake or error in dealing with such a matter. The lease that is to be granted must be laid before both Houses of parliament for a reasonable time. That is part of the provision in the original Bill, I think, and if not in the original Bill, it is certainly provided in the amendment.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—We must bear in mind that even if we adopt all these amendments, parliament will not be bound; that when the matter is taken into consideration it will be entirely open to parliament to remove all these conditions and restrictions. I was going to say that the adoption of these amendments would merely prevent the officials mentioned in the Bill from considering and reporting a lease on any other terms than those mentioned in this amendment and in the Bill. To that extent I approve of the principle as laid down in the amendments; but I would suggest to the hon. gentleman from Halifax to drop paragraph two of this amendment, providing that such lease should in no case exceed the terms of 21 years, with the option of renewal on the same terms. I think it might be inadvisable to adopt any restriction of that kind. It might be in the public interest, when the lease is made, that it be made for a much longer term, and I would leave it free to the officials who are to consider the terms of the Bill to report to parliament as to what terms they consider should be adopted as to the time for which the lease should be in operation.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—I quite agree with the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Beique). If the lease is made for a rental at the rate of 33 per cent of the gross earnings, the government is pretty safe, and I do not think it requires a provision in regard to the term of 21 years, for this reason: that it will cost sixty or seventy per cent of the earnings to operate the road. That is generally a fair rate. If it costs the government 70 per cent they would lose 3 per cent, so that it would not be a very bad loss, and I think by spending money on it they could operate it for between 55 and 60 per cent, and then the government would make money by it. It is only a matter of economical operation, and making a lease of 21 years is not of much importance, to my mind. The government can never lose any money, even if it is leased for ninety-nine years.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I think this particular part of the hon. gentleman's amendment should be dropped, and that is very apparent from the discussion which has taken place to-day. No fixed rule can possibly be adopted with regard to the length of the term with which a lease should be made, if these branch lines are taken over. No general rule can possibly be adopted. In such case the particular circumstances must be taken into consideration, the nature of the road, the character of the traffic and the length of the road, and a variety of considerations. I therefore see no use whatever in a restriction of this kind on the action of the government. They will have to determine those points, and they will all be subject to the ratification of parliament.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I should like to submit a suggestion. We lease these roads for 21, 50 or 99 years on a certain basis of percentage, 33 per cent. Why not have in this Bill a provision that the government, at any time after the lease is signed and the road rented, will have the right to purchase that road?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—They have that right now.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Yes, and they have the right, even without the Bill, to lease it; but the government is coming here with a Bill authorizing them expressly to lease the road. I suggest that in the provisions of the lease there shall be one giving the government the right to purchase at any time. They have all the powers which are asked by this Bill. The government is going to pay 33 per cent on the gross earnings. Supposing the government finds it is going to be a paying road, a valuable property, and that the acquisition of it by purchase will be to the interest of Canada and of the people; why not authorize them in this Bill to purchase the road, just as we are authorizing them to lease? They have a right now without this Bill to lease, but for some reason or other, we are asked to give them superfluous authority in this Bill. I do not think there would be any objection to inserting in the Bill a provision that the government should have a right to purchase as well as lease the road. If we are going to pay 33 per cent on the gross earnings, it might happen that the road will pay, and the result will be that five or ten years after the government have operated it, it would be a paying proposition, and 33 per cent is pretty good interest. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman from Sorel (Hon. Mr. Forget) that it takes anywhere from 55 to 70 per cent to run a railroad; but supposing the government find they can run it for less than 65 per cent, 33 per cent will be too much to pay, because 33 per cent is a big rental.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—But the hon. gentleman does not know what the fixed charges are.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I say 33 per cent is too much. Take a road 20 or 25 miles long, it takes $100,000 a year to run it. There is a revenue of $100,000. The road is worth $500,000. Then 33 per cent on an investment of that kind is very good revenue for the party that owns the road, and if the government at any time found that the road was going to be a paying investment, they will want to purchase it. All I ask —and it is subject to the opinion of the leader of the government—is to have a provision inserted providing that they can purchase it at any time if the government consider it in the interest of the country.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—I do not think the government could justify themselves in leasing a road for 21 years with no right to have it for a longer period. They would not be justified in spending money, knowing they would have to relinquish the road if the parties who owned it wanted it back at the end of the lease. Therefore, I am against the amendment.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Purchase the road if it is good.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—I should like to ask the leader of the government whether it is the intention that the present proprietors of these roads should put them in good order themselves as to the roadbed, plant, and everything of that kind?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —If my hon. friend will look at clause three he will see it is provided that the road must be in good running order and condition.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to ask the hon. gentleman what the particular meaning is in reference to restriction of the lease for 21 years. That would put the government in the position that, at the expiration of 21 years, if they found the road did not pay, they could throw it back on the hands of the original owners, and if it did pay, the rental would have to be increased on the same basis as one-third. So that if the road was put in good repair, and at the end of 21 years the increase of traffic was such as to make the earnings double or treble what they are to-day, in the renewal of the lease, the original owner would demand an increase of the rental in proportion to the earnings. I think that would be the effect of such legislation. So that if the road was not paying, it would be an advantage to the country that the lease should terminate. If it should pay more than it does now, it would be to the advantage of the country to continue the lease. That seems to be a principle of equity; at the same time it is a question whether it is advisable to restrict the lease to so short a period, particularly when the government will have to go to the expense of putting all these roads in repair.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —If my hon. friend will look at clause 3, he will find that it is made a condition precedent.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the provisions of clause 3 are followed to the letter, it must be put in a good state of repair before the road is leased. After a few moments reflection, I think I would approve of the dropping of that clause altogether, particularly as the hon. gentleman has succeeded in making some admirable suggestions in regard to accomplishing the best results.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It would not necessarily imply that there would be a change in the terms of the lease or the price paid, if parliament adopted the principle of limiting the lease to 21 years with the right of renewal. All would depend upon the terms of the contract itself.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is true; but it goes farther and says a like renewal on the same terms. What does the expression 'same terms' mean except the price you are paying for the lease?

Hon. Mr. POWER—When I wrote the words: 'On the same terms', I meant that the lease was to be renewed on the same terms. I have a good deal of hesitation in differing from hon. gentlemen who have had a good deal more experience in railway business than I have had; but I must admit I am not yet convinced that this amendment is not one in the right direction. If it turns out as the hon. member from Hastings (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell) has put it, after the expiration of 21 years that this road is not a paying concern, why should the country be obliged to continue to pay the rental for 99 years? While hon. gentlemen may say the business of the country will increase, it must be borne in mind with respect to some of these roads which are liable to be leased under this measure, that shorter and better roads between their terminal points may be constructed and to a very considerable extent put these branch lines out of business. Then you will have the government with these roads on their hands practically in perpetuity. I do not think that is a wise or judicious course to adopt. With respect to the terms of the leases, notwithstanding the view taken by the right hon. leader of the House, I think that the reasonable thing would be for the government to ascertain in advance about what sum they would be justified in paying for a lease of this road, not to say that they would pay 33 per cent of the gross receipts.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The amendment said: 'Not exceeding'.

Hon. Mr. POWER—When you say: 'Not exceeding' that is liable to mean that that is what the figure is to be. When you put into a statute that the government may pay a sum not exceeding so much, it generally means they pay that sum. The natural and business thing is for the government, upon the reports of their engineers, and upon absorbing the information set forth in the amendment just adopted, to fix a certain sum per year, and the renewal of the lease on the same terms means a renewal at the same rental.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—The government will be quite able to protect themselves by not allowing other people to build parallel lines. They would be jealous enough of the public interest not to allow other people to destroy their line.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—The argument of the last half hour is that we are making leases of certain roads; that we are entering into all the articles of agreement. It was suggested by one hon. gentleman that it was opening the door and offering an inducement to the government to lease these second-hand roads. Another hon. gentleman, from another county in New Brunswick, said it was driving nails into the door, and putting more restrictions upon the possibility of these branch lines being accepted. From the amendments which have been suggested and made, one would be led to suppose that we were practically closing a contract. Under this Bill, however, every lease must come before parliament, and the hon. gentlemen who are making suggestions today will have to consider such leases and make their propositions all over again. We are not fixing anything to-day; we cannot fix anything. We cannot say how long or how short a time the leases may extend. When the proposition of the government comes before the Senate, we shall have to deal with it, and can refer to what the Bill says; but each lease has to be determined by parliament. I do not think we can act to-day for the parliament of next year or future years. I cannot see that the amendments that have been proposed will control the government.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I agree with a good deal that has been said by the hon. gentleman from Fredericton (Mr. Thompson). It is all very well to adopt the first part of the amendment suggested by the hon. gentleman from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) namely that a return shall be laid before both Houses showing certain particulars; but as far as subclause 2 is concerned, we are not entering into the making of a contract, and it is altogether premature, and for my part I should be strongly against any action of that kind. I purpose going further and asking that the amendment which was adopted a few minutes ago at the suggestion of the hon. gentleman from Wellington (Hon. Mr. McMullen) be reconsidered.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Let us dispose of this first. While I was at first in sympathy with the proposal to limit the lease of a branch road to 21 years, I do not view it favourably on second consideration, and after hearing what has been said by hon. gentlemen who are opposed to such a provision. It seems to me that no modern railway system would entertain seriously taking over a branch line and making that branch line part of its system, involving a considerable amount of capital in betterments, if it were limited to a term of 21 years. We have to consider this policy, namely, that it is the intention of the railway system to absorb these branch lines, and ultimately make them part of the entire system. We can only justify this Bill on that basis. If the Intercolonial railway is to be made a modern and up-to-date railway system, it must absorb the small feeders which to-day are tributary to it; and the only way that can be successfully done will be by putting that system of absorption upon a business basis. If the Intercolonial railway is to operate those branches successfully, it must expend practically the same amount of money upon them as it would upon the main line. It must throw all its business energy and enterprise into building up business on the branch lines that it would on the main line. It must regard one as being equally as important as the other. If it is to be an experiment, limited as we suggest to 21 years to see how it would work out, it will be a disadvantage to the people of the maritime provinces and equally a disadvantage to the Intercolonial railway. If we are to have a proper system of transportation, and have that road on a business like basis, the same policy must be adopted with regard to it as has been adopted by the great trunk lines of this country, namely the Canadian Pacific railway and Grand Trunk railway. I can scarcely conceive of either of those systems taking over branch lines under limitations and restrictions such as we are now discussing, namely for a tentative period, to ascertain what the result would be. If those roads were absorbing feeders of this character——

Hon. Mr. POWER—They would not absorb them.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—They would absorb them in couse of time—at least I would so regard it; and from my observation of the operation of those large systems, when they take over branch lines on lease, it is with the ultimate object of absorbing them and making them part of the system. There are a great many things to be done in addition to improving the road bed, and putting on better rolling stock. There are industries to be encouraged along the line, and natural resources to be developed. A multitude of things must be considered in the building up of business of this character, and it is in the interest of all concerned that if the government is going to take over these branch lines they shall take them over on a business basis with the intention of making them pay and developing the interests in that part of the country traversed by the line.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I mentioned before that these matters are subject, of course, to revision. It seems to be the general sense of the House that the provisions suggested by the hon. member for Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) in the first amendment contain information which the House ought to have. That amendment has been carried. As respects these later ones, perhaps my hon. friend will allow them, under the circumstances, to stand over. They can be taken up at the third reading.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I was going to say I propose to drop No. 3 altogether, and No. 2 can stand over; but with respect to the amendment No. 4, I think it ought to be adopted.

The motion was declared lost.

On subclause 4.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I ask this clause to be adopted in an amended form. I move it in the following words:

Interest on any outlay incurred in putting the road into condition shall be deducted from the gross rental.

If the gross rental is to be one-third of the gross receipts, then the interest on the outlay which the government have to make to put the road in condition should certainly be deducted.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Proportionately.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The interest should be deducted.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Interest at what rate?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Whatever the current rate is—whatever the government have to pay.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—How will the principal expended for betterments on the road be repayable?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Of course these amendments are subject to consideration, but I take it, in any case where the government find it necessary to expend sums in putting the road in order, the principal as well the the interest will have to be repaid if the lease is terminated. That they would put in such a provision seems natural. I would look upon the suggestion of my hon. friend as in the nature of what is familiarly known as a 'bottomry' bond. That takes precedence of all other charges. If it is found necessary for the safety of a ship, or the proper working of a railway, that an additional sum should be expended, that becomes a first lien and charge, and it is reasonable that something of the kind should be done—speaking off-hand.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The question is what about the principal?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—As to both, it seems to me that that would be a reasonable proposition. You will observe, however, the bond-holders would have to consent to the lease before any lease could be made, if they had a heavy claim on the road. An essential provision in this is, that the road shall be put in good condition before the government lease it, and any further sum that might be spent would be self-evidently for the improvement of the whole road. The bond-holders would be in no worse position than the parties who own a ship, and who, when a bottomry bond is put on, necessarily become inferior to the holders of the bonds.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The amendment says that the interest on any outlay shall be chargeable to rental account. Would it be fair, under all circumstances, to charge that interest to the rental account? We will take as an average that it requires 65 cents on the dollar a mile to run the road. Now that is an outlay for incidental expenses which are paid out of the 65 per cent. Why should we charge that against the rental? I admit that the interest on an outlay springing from capital should be charged against the rental, but interest on an expenditure for ordinary operation would not be fair. The outlay might be for ties, and that cannot be charged to capital account, and the same with other things. I do not think it would be fair to deduct from the amount of rent, interest on money spent for ordinary every-day purposes. Where the government would be obliged to invest money on capital account, then I say charge interest on that against the revenue. It would be only a fair proposition.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I think the amendment would have the effect of preventing the government leasing any branch lines. Whether that is the intention of the mover or not, I am not aware. Under the provision in the Bill, the government cannot lease any one of these lines until the company itself has put it in good working order. Now, surely if the period of the lease is to be limited, the company would require the government at the end of that period to return the road in as good condition as it was when they received it. Any outlay in the meantime must be merely for the maintenance of the road in good condition. There is this point which is perhaps worth noticing: there is no doubt that when the government leases one of these roads, and undertakes its operation, it will find demands for a great many improvements which would not be made if the road were operated by the company. The majority of these demands will be for improvements of a character which will add nothing whatever to the earning power of the road, but may be simply for the convenience of some persons who have sufficient influence to induce the government to make them. Any one who has had experience with the Intercolonial railway under government control knows that large sums of money are expended in this way every year. I cannot conceive that any company would lease its road to the government and give them unlimited power to make improvements whether necessary or not, or whether the effect of them would be to increase the revenue or not, and then allow the interest on the cost of those improvements to be charged against the rent.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—They might be more than the rent.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—In many cases no doubt that would be the result. Take for instance the Canada Eastern; the amount expended already for improvements since the government took it over exceeds the original purchase of the read.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—That statement is hardly correct. The amount of expenditure on the Canada Eastern is $300,000. The other expenditure was on the Indian Town branch and on the government railway bridge: that was not part of the system, and belonged to the government prior to the purchase of that road.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—The hon. gentleman may be right to a certain extent in that.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—Absolutely right.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Perhaps if the money spent on what was originally the Canada Eastern is considered, the amount would not exceed the original purchase; but I understand some large additional expenditures are in contemplation, and if I am correctly informed, there are to be expensive improvements and operations on the road this year. I venture to say that when these are completed, he will find my original statement to be quite correct, that the money spent on improvements exceeds the amount of the original purchase.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—When they are made.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—If we are to learn anything from the experience in connection with that road so far as I can ascertain, and I think the returns will verify the statement, although I have not them here with me at this moment, these large improvements have not had the effect of increasing the earning power of the road; and the large expenditures which are contemplated, so far as my information goes, will not give any additional traffic to the road but will merely serve a little better the accommodation of the people of the town of Chatham. I should like to direct the attention of the government, and the mover of the amendment to those points. I am satisfied, if an amendment of that kind is carried, it will preclude the possibility of the government entering into a lease with any of the branch lines.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The dread that the adoption of this amendment would prevent the making of any of the leases would not hinder me from desiring the passing it. My feeling with respect to this matter—I think it is only fair to myself to explain—is largely this: In the first place I do not think the country should rush into injudicious investments any more than individuals and business corporations should do so. But, apart from that altogether, my feeling is that the Intercolonial railway will never benefit the part of the country through which it runs as it ought to do until it is put in the hands of a business corporation. The road has been in existence now, a portion of it, forty years, and it has not built up the district through which it passes, or its terminal points, in the same way that a road conducted by a vigorous company would do. What I hope is that before very long some arrangement may be made under which at any rate the greater portion of the Intercolonial railway will pass under the control of some business corporation who will, as business corporations always do, make it their object to build up the business of the road. I feel that if leases are entered into under this measure, the existence of those leases may tend very seriously to prevent any business company from acquiring the main line by lease. I should not like to see it sold; but I should like to see the greater portion of it leased to a vigorous business corporation.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Does the hon. gentleman consider the Northern Transcontinental railway as a feeder to the Intercolonial railway?

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—I should like to direct the attention of the hon. member from Halifax to this Bill. The latter part of clause three provides:

> Provided that no such lease shall have any force or effect nor shall any such connecting railway be entered upon or operated on behalf of the government of Canada until the said managing board, and the said chief engineer shall have approved the terms and conditions of such lease having regard to the beneficial results therefrom to the government railways, and until the parliament of Canada has first ratified such lease.

So I think we have wasted about two hours talking buncombe.

The amendment was declared lost.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE moved that the amendment moved by the Hon. Senator McMullen and adopted be reconsidered. He said: We are entering upon a subject upon which we have no information whatever. There are many railways whose running expenses take all the gross receipts.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—The Intercolonial railway for instance.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—In naming 33 per cent of the gross receipts as the proper rental we are inviting the fixing of that amount. It is very well to provide for obtaining information, but this is not the time for us—we have not the information—to adopt anything tending to fix the amount of the rental.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—My amendment does not at all fix the amount of rental at one-third. It says it shall not exceed one-third of the gross earnings. I find that almost all the lines that have been taken over by the Grand Trunk railway and the Canadian Pacific railway, such as the Guelph Junction and others I could name, have been taken over on the basis of two-thirds of the gross earnings being reserved for working expenses, and one-third for the rental.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE moved that the amendment be struck out. He said: I repeat it would be taken as an expression of parliament that 33 per cent of the gross earnings would not be an exorbitant price. It would be inviting the fixing of that amount as the rental, and I say we have no information whatever to pass upon a question of that kind.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Say 33 per cent of the net earnings.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask the hon. member from Halifax how he arrives at the basis of ten per cent as gross receipts?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I drop that.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I suggest to my hon. friend, it is a very opportune time to revive that portion of his amendment which he dropped. If my hon. friend has information on that point, I am sure the Chamber would like to have it.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—The very best roads in the country running through districts that furnish a great deal of traffic, do not show more than 33 per cent net earnings. That is a very good return. If these branch lines which would be acquired by the government were producing anything like that the owners would not think of selling them to the government or entering into a contract to lease them to the government. It is only because these branch lines cannot do a profitable business by themselves, that they would be willing to sell. Each of these branch lines has to keep a complete staff of its own. If a road were receiving $300,- 000, the rental would be $100,000. I think that the amendment should be struck out.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG, from the committee, reported the Bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 132) An Act to amend the Gas Inspection Act.—Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (No. 180) An Act to amend the Royal Military College Act.

He said: The object of this Bill is to alter the existing law, which limits the amount which may be paid in salaries to the total sum of $30,000. The present Bill would raise the sum to $60,000. The grounds on which that is asked are the grounds that in the first place the college has extended and has increased very considerably in size since the last time this Act was amended in 1905, and moreover the sum of $30,000 was heretofore interpreted as applying solely to the salaries of the superior staff and military staff, quite exclusive of the commandant's staff and various professors. The amount now proposed is intended to cover the whole staff, both superior, civil and military, including the commandant of the subordinate staff, among whom would be included firemen, electricians and so on. This amendment removes the restriction on the salary of the commandant. The Governor in Council has given power to fix the salary of that officer. That is recommended, because it is found that in order to obtain an officer of the qualifications and status requisite to fill the important office of commandant, we may have to pay a little more. In the present instance, we have had to do that, because the officer who is now in that position, is required to be an officer who has passed the staff college in England with a first-class certificate, and the pay that we would heretofore have given him is less than he would receive in any office in the British army where such a person is required. As in other cases, it has been found necessary to increase the number of professors. I may state that the number of students applying is many times greater now than when this college came into our hands in 1896. The number of students, if I remember right, had then fallen to something like 20 or 30, but is now about 100.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What is the salary of the present commandant?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think it is fixed at something like $3,600.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is it proposed to increase that?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It may be, if necessary. We will get him on the cheapest terms we can; but I think my hon. friend will agree with me that a few hundred dollars is neither here nor there in obtaining the services of a first-class man for such a position.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Who is the present commandant?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Col. Crow, I think, is the gentleman. He is a British officer in the active service.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is it proposed to also increase the salaries of others of the staff?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Some few of them will be increased. The salaries of the professors are very small. Some only $100 a month, and it is not found possible to secure the services of good men at that figure.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—They are provided with residence, &c.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—No; in the case of a good many they are not supplied with residences. In the case of the higher grades in the military service, houses have been provided, or an allowance made, as the case may be, but a very large number of the professors do not receive allowances for houses, and it is better that they should obtain a salary than receive these allowances. I may say, the total amount now paid, all told, is about $54,000, so that the maximum increase would be only $6,000 on the sum actually paid.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

DISPOSAL OF PUBLIC LANDS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (No. 181) An Act to authorize the sale or other disposal of certain public lands, and the acquisition of certain other lands in or in the vicinity of the cities of Toronto and Winnipeg, respectively.

He said: I may state the object of the Bill as follows. They find in Winnipeg—and I believe the same thing applies to Toronto—that the rifle ranges are too short for the arms that are now in use. As every hon. gentleman knows, the range of military arms has been increased in the last few years, and somewhat longer and wider ranges are required than heretofore. They believe that the best thing that could be done would be to take power and sell the ranges both at Toronto and Winnipeg, and purchase other sites, which can be done for a very moderate sum. I believe that no loss will be sustained; that on the contrary a considerable profit will be made, owing to the rise in the value of land in Winnipeg and Toronto.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Could the hon. gentleman tell us how far away the Baby farm is from the limits of Toronto?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It is said not to be a suitable locality for the proposed barracks and for the range, and the department desire to sell it and purchase another and larger property, better situated as a site for the barracks, out of the proceeds. I cannot tell the hon. gentleman, but I think it is quite close.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would suggest to my right hon. friend that the government should be compelled in fact to dispose of those properties by public auction. Take for instance the Baby farm, very close to a large city, as evidently is the other property in the municipality of Assiniboia; these properties are extremely valuable, and it seems to me that in the public interest, they should be put up at auction rather than resorting to tender.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think that is the intention of the Department of Militia. I will mention the fact to the Minister of Militia, who is very desirous for obvious reasons, of getting as large sums as he can from these properties, to be used in the construction of barracks, and I think when the matter comes before us again I will be in a position to give satisfactory assurances to my hon. friend.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

GLASS WARE FOR MILK TESTS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (No. 184) An Act to provide for the testing of glassware used in connection with milk tests. He said: Perhaps my hon. friend will allow me to put this through without giving minute explanations, which I am afraid it would be difficult for me to do.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—Possibly I can give explanations.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I would hesitate about giving explanations, except under the supervision of the hon. gentleman from Brockville. I understand the object of this measure is to take pains to see that glass used in testing milk and cream be properly tested. Considerable frauds have been committed in certain cases from the use of glass which professed to afford a sufficient test, and was erroneously marked. I have here a statement that the Dairy Commissioner has received test buckets bearing a 50 per cent scale, which showed an inaccuracy of 10 per cent, and dairymen in various parts of the country have asked that the legislation be passed. They also state that the verification is simple enough, and that the cost will be but trifling.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

CUSTOMS AND FISHERIES PROTECTION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (No. 138) An Act to amend the Customs and Fisheries Protection Act. He said: I understand this Bill is chiefly intended to supply an omission in the Customs Act. The statutes provide in the case of a seizure of goods, or a ship, that penalties may be recovered in the Exchequer or Admiralty Court, or any Superior Court in the province, and that there has been a great deal of difficulty in enforcing the forfeiture and penalties when actions have been instituted in the provincial courts. The Bill proposes to remedy that defect by adding as a subsec- shall be regulated by the practice and provision that in so far as there are no general rules made by the Superior Court of any province, the practice and procedure shall be regulated by the practice and procedure at the time being in force at the Exchequer Court. It was pretty fully discussed in the House of Commons, and appears to be a reasonable precaution in the interests of the government. Of course, if further information is desired, it could be obtained in the committee stage.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This amendment simply compels the trial in the different courts to be regulated by the practice and procedure at the time in the Exchequer Court. It does not compel the cases to be taken to the Exchequer Court?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —No, I should say not.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think it is a great mistake that the department has not gone to that full extent. It might be a little difficult in working it out, but I am under the impression that the decision of that court would be more in accordance with the law and in accordance with what was intended. Hon. gentlemen know that in cases of seizure tried in the different provinces in the local courts of the magistrates, the decisions that have been given would stagger any one having a proper sense of right or wrong. Experience has taught those who have had to administer that law, that the most flagrant cases of violation of the law, even to the extent of attempting to bribe the officers to become parties to smuggling transactions, have been dismissed on the merest technicalities in the different courts by the police magistrates. As an illustration of what I mean, in the province of Ontario, in one of the principal cities, an attempt was made to bribe the officer to enter into an arrangement by which they were to divide the profits arising from smuggling. The officer resisted the temptation, and made complaint to the department. The case was brought before the police magistrate, and the decision was, as the officer had not taken the bribe, therefore, there was no sin committed to any extent; but the law provided under the Act that a penalty should be imposed for attempting to bribe, not exceeding a certain amount, and imprisonment not exceeding a certain length of time. The magistrate sentenced the man to a 25 cent penalty and to go to jail for five or ten minutes.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT Was he an officer appointed by either government or simply a Justice of the Peace?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He was the police magistrate of the city.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I should say the government to whom he was responsible should have sent him about his business.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, I am simply giving a case in point, which would justify the sending of these cases to the Exchequer Court; but there would be this difficulty in deciding cases of smuggling or the seizure of a vessel: the more rapidly a decision could be come to, the more it would be in the interest of those who had been charged with infraction of the law.

I have given you an illustration of how the difficulties present themselves to a minister in carrying out these laws. In the province of Nova Scotia a smuggler was caught smuggling liquor from a tug man who had been employed to bring in liquor from St. Pierre. He brought it in and landed it, and when the prosecution of the merchant who had employed the tug owner took place, the tug owner went into the box and told the whole truth. The grand jury brought in a bill condemning the government for not prosecuting the tug owner.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT I am afraid the public mind is in a state of confusion, owing to the fact that a great many people regard the customs and tariff regulations as partaking of iniquity.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I quite agree with the hon. gentleman.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I am not in a position to argue the point with my hon. friend, whose experience as well as my own would tell him that offences against the revenue are looked upon as small affairs, but I shall call the attention of the Minister of Customs to the matter. I am simply requested to lay this Bill before the Senate. I presume he has no objection to the Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, I would only suggest that it does not go far enough. The idea held more or less by people in reference to the imposition of customs duties and license matters is just as he intimated; but we are dealing with the law as it stands on the statute-book, and not with the theory he has laid down.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT We will take this as a small measure of improvement.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the chair.

After Recess.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to call attention to the fact that by the rule of the House we are forty minutes behind time. The rule is that when the Senate sits in the evening it meets at 7.30; it is now ten minutes after eight. It is understood by mutual consent when the House rises at six o'clock that we adjourn to meet at eight o'clock, but some of us have been here for forty minutes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The rule has been, to my knowledge, constantly honoured in the breach. When the rules were revised, I suggested that seven thirty should be made eight, because it had always been the hour at which we met when the House sat in the evenings, but the time honoured practice of violating that rule seemed to be so pleasant to all, that we left 7.30 as the nominal hour of meeting.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There could be no misunderstanding, because this is the first time this session that we have met after six o'clock. I know that the ununderstanding is, so far as meeting in the afternoon is concerned, that while the rule is that we meet at three, by mutual agreement, we meet at fifteen minutes after three. But there has been no such understanding about the evening meetings.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I am not speaking of the present session. I am speaking of the constant practice in all the years I have been here.

SECOND READING.

Bill (SS) An Act to incorporate the Federation of Chambers of Commerce of the province of Quebec.—Hon. Mr. Cloran.

TRANSPORTATION OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS BILL.

ORDER OF THE DAY POSTPONED.

The order of the day being called:

House again in Committee of the Whole on (Bill M) An Act to regulate the transportation of Intoxicating Liquors.—Hon. Sir Richard Scott.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—In the absence of the hon. senator, I would ask the representative of the government if he would have any objection to refer this Bill to the Department of Justice on the ground of constitutionality.

The SPEAKER—That would not be fair.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—I move that the order of the day be discharged.

The SPEAKER—The hon. member from Ottawa left the House with a distinct understanding that this Bill was to be left over until to-morrow, and it would not be fair to take any other step in his absence.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The hon. gentleman is not moving—simply asking a question. I would ask him to renew it to-morrow?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—In regard to this matter, I may state that the same courtesy that I am prepared to extend to the hon. promoter of this Bill was not extended to an hon. gentleman who was absent the other day, the hon. gentleman from Rothesay (Hon. Mr. Domville). The pledge of the hon. leader of this House was given that no contentious measures would be taken up in the absence of senators just before the holidays. Advantage was taken on a Friday afternoon, when a senator was absent, and the promoter of this Bill went on with it. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that a pledge was given by the right hon. leader of this House and by the hon. gentleman who was promoter of the Bill. Now, in deference to the explanation given by the hon. speaker, and out of courtesy to this House, I am prepared to let the order stand, giving him a lesson in courtesy.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I do not know if the imputation of discourtesy applies to the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce or to the hon. member from Ottawa. I suppose he refers to the promoter of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I will draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that the statement that was made by the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce did not apply specifically or specially to this Bill, but generally to contentious Bills, and this statement of the right hon. gentleman may have escaped the attention of the hon. senator from Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I certainly did not cast any reflection on the right hon. leader of the House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I move that order (No. 15) be discharged and that it be placed on the order paper for to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Before the motion is put, I may point out that this Bill is a very contentious one, and I am fully aware of the declaration made by the right hon. leader of this House that to-night no contentious measure should be taken up. To impart force to that declaration, I am prepared to abide by it, and all hon. gentlemen who are opposed to this measure are equally prepared to do so. I have only to express regret that the promoter of the Bill did not exercise the same amount of courtesy towards those opposed to another Bill when the right hon. gentleman the leader of the House said the Bill would not be taken up, and it was taken up in the absence of the hon. gentleman from Rothesay (Mr. Domville).

The motion was agreed to.

PIONEER LOAN COMPANY BILL.

AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON moved concurrence in the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce to (Bill XX) An Act to incorporate the Pioneers Loan Company.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Can my hon. friend say what the amendments are?

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—The amendments are in compliance with the policy of the Department of Insurance to make the measure comply with the general Act, and with the other loan companies, to have a continuity of the policy, and with regard to similar legislation of the different provinces.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The Bill, as referred to the committee, sought to allow the company to commence operations with $300,000 subscribed, and $80,000 paid up. This was increased by the amendment to $500,000 subscribed and $100,000 paid up. There were several other amendments which are to be found in the minutes.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I was not present when this Bill was passed in committee, although my name was attached to it. The promoters object to the fact that the committee have seen fit to increase the amount of stock to $500,000 and they think it is rather strange that the committee should have decided on that, because I understand that under the provision of the general Act, $300,000 was considered sufficient for a joint stock company. But they have seen fit to make it $500,000. I do not suppose there is any use of suggesting changes. The committee decided that by a large vote, and if the company have serious objections, they can appear before the House of Commons Committee and have changes made there. I presume if they succeed, there will not be any objection to accepting them here.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I may explain that when the company adopted the plan of doing a banking business in addition to a loan business, the capital was increased to correspond with the provisions of the General Companies Act. The part relating to the ordinary loan transactions was the same as in any other company's charter; but when they adopted the banking part of it, that large amount was insisted upon. Whatever success they may have in the House of Commons, the opinion was almost unanimous in the committee here that the amount should be increased.

The motion was agreed to.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 20) An Act to prevent the introduction or spreading of insects, pests, and diseases destructive to vegetation.—Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

Bill (No. 125) An Act to amend the Land Titles Act.—Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

THE HOUR OF MEETING.

Hon. Mr. POWER (acting Speaker)—Before the House adjourns I would like to say a word of explanation with respect to the hour at which the House met this evening. The hon. gentleman who is leading the House to-night is perfectly correct as to what has been the uniform practice, although the rule says that we meet at half past seven, the uniform practice has been to meet at eight. I was here prepared to take the Chair at eight o'clock sharp. It has always been the practice to wait until fifteen members are in the House before the Speaker took the chair, and I took the Chair this evening almost immediately after fifteen members were here. I think that explanation is due to the House.

The Senate adjourned until three p.m. to-morrow.

THE SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 14, 1910.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

PUBLICATION OF LAWS AND REGULATIONS IN THE CANADA GAZETTE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved:

That in the opinion of this House the most elementary justice and respect for the constitution demand that every time laws, regulations, orders in council, or any document concerning the public in general, are published in English in the 'Canada Gazette', that journal, which is the official organ of the country, ought equally and simultaneously to contain the publication in the French language of the same laws, regulations, orders in council, or documents concerning the public in general.

He said: The object of my motion is obvious, and must commend itself to the consideration of this House. Some of the laws passed during the session come into force the day of the proclamation, or, at the latest, two months after the prorogation of parliament. When a law goes into force the day it is sanctioned, it is published in the 'Canada Gazette.' The law is for the whole country, and I am sure that every member of this House must feel that it is only just when such a law is promulgated in the 'Canada Gazette,' it should appear in both languages, so as to afford an equal opportunity to all to become cognizant of such law. The same thing applies to orders in council or regulations which affect the people generally. I do not ask for the publication in the two languages, where it is otherwise. Where an order in council or regulation affects only some province or provinces in which French is not an official language, I do not ask for its publication in French. Where it affects the community in general, however, I think the publication in both languages is necessary. This resolution affirms the right of the public to have orders in council and regulations which affect the people generally published in both languages.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I may say in reply to the hon. gentleman, that technically I have no doubt he is correct, and that it is the desire of the government, as far as possible, to give all the information that he asks for in both languages; but it is sometimes exceedingly difficult to comply literally with the terms of such a declaration as this. A considerable number of documents are occasionally presented which require to be published immediately, and each would be very considerably delayed if it was always found necessary to translate them and publish them in French. I can say to the hon. gentleman that I will not oppose the motion. As far as practicable the request he has made will be complied with.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I should like to point out to the hon. gentleman that he is continually complaining of the delay that occurs on account of documents not being printed in the French language; and now he is going to delay the publication of English documents, and he is therefore not consistent. I do not dispute the general proposition he lays down; but if the effect will be to delay the publication of the English documents, I appeal to my hon. friend's good sense that he should not press the motion.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think I should press the motion for the reason given by my hon. friend; but if great inconvenience is going to occur on any particular occasion, I might drop the words 'and simultaneously'; that would meet the objections raised by my hon. friend. I do not desire that the French documents should be published before the English documents are issued. I am willing that the French version should appear in the following number. I will drop the words 'and simultaneously.'

The motion, as amended, was agreed to.

FISHING LICENSES IN TIDAL WATERS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

Does the government refuse to give fishing licenses or permits to those who ask for them to fish in the rivers where the tide makes itself felt?

If it refuses, upon what does it base such a refusal?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The answer is: It does not, in waters where it is administering the license system, if the conditions will warrant the fishing privileges applied for.

That reply answers both my hon. friend's questions.

THIRD READING.

Bill (XX) An Act to incorporate the Pioneers Loan Company.—Hon. Mr. Watson.

MONTREAL CENTRAL TERMINAL COMPANY BILL.

ORDER OF THE DAY POSTPONED.

The order of the day being called:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion for the consideration of the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, to (Bill 44) An Act respecting the Montreal Central Terminal Company.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I adjourned the debate on this Bill the other day to accommodate the hon. gentleman from Russell, who had exhausted his right to move the adjournment, and I do not see the hon. member in the Chamber now.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—He left the House a moment ago, because he had an appointment with Mr. Sifton, and he asked me to request that this order be withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—No.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Let it stand until Tuesday next.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Better take it up to-morrow and put it through.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—I understand the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry is opposed to the Bill, and he will not be here to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—If he is not here to-morrow, we can postpone it again.

The order stands until to-morrow.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

ORDER POSTPONED.

The order of the day being called:

Second reading of Bill (CCC) An Act to amend the Criminal Code.—Hon. Mr. Belcourt.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE moved that the order of the day be discharged, and that it be placed on the orders for Tuesday next.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Why has the hon. gentleman moved to postpone this order? Has Mr. Belcourt asked for it?

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—No, but he is not here.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I do not think this order should be postponed. It should meet a sudden death. There is not a labour union in the Dominion that is not opposed to this Bill. I do not see why it should remain on the order paper, keeping all the labour organizations in hot water. They have passed resolutions throughout the Dominion on the subject, and they are very strongly against it. Of course, if it is to oblige the hon. senator, I shall not object to the postponement, but I would be in favour of having this Bill settled at once. I have quite a number of documents here protesting against it as being a very insidious measure. It is a very small Bill, only adding one word to a section of the criminal law; but it brings every labour union under the criminal Act.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (British Columbia)—And rightly.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Others may want it, but others do not. However, under the circumstances, I do not object to its standing over.

The motion was agreed to.

FRENCH CONVENTION ACT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (No. 126) An Act to correct a clerical error in the French Convention Act, 1908.

He said: This Bill is simply to correct a clerical error by substituting the word 'twenty-six' for twenty-three' in the English version of the French convention.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—If the House does not object, I shall move that the Bill be read the second time at length at the table.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The Bill has already been read the second time, and I do not see how it can be read the second time at length at the table.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—If the hon. gentleman objects I shall not press it.

SMALL CLAIMS AGAINST GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (No. 151) An Act to provide for the adjudication of small claims arising in respect of the operation of the government railways. He said: It has been found that considerable inconvenience and unnecessary expense has been caused to diverse claimants and suitors, against the Intercolonial railway, especially by reason of the provision of the present law, under which, I understand, they must go before the Exchequer Court. It is proposed by this Bill that in all claims under $200, or thereabouts, they may be heard in courts having jurisdiction to that extent, with power to appear in the usual way.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Can my right hon. friend say if there are many suits of the character mentioned in this Bill?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —A considerable number, I understand, have accrued from time to time. I presume it would be largely cases concerning the destruction of animals on the Intercolonial railway. I am told that in certain regions the price of cows has been largely increased by reason of the operation of the railway.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Through being crossed by locomotive ?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Yes.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

PROMOTION OF ZINC PRODUCTION BILL.

SECOND READING.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (No. 182) An Act respecting the payment of bounties on lead contained in lead-bearing ores mined in Canada, and to promote the production of zinc.

He said: The House is probably aware that there is at present a bounty granted on the production of lead in British Columbia. That is for a certain limited amount, and it expires within some two or three years, if I remember right. The various parties who are interested in the matter have petitioned the government that a certain portion of this, to an amount not exceeding $50,000 shall be set apart for the purpose of making experiments in seeing how the production of zinc can be effected at a reasonable rate. No additions will be made to the burdens of the public by it, inasmuch as a part of the existing lead bounty will be diverted to this purpose and apparently all interests concur in desiring that this should be done.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is it the intention to continue the same bounties and amount as hitherto?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The bounties are limited to a certain amount, and expire in three years.

Hon. Mr LOUGHEED—Are the amounts the same as formerly?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —This does not affect the amount at all. It simply diverts a certain portion of the bounty now at the disposal of the lead producers to the production of zinc. Probably my hon. friend is aware that zinc and lead occur in the same mines, and have given a good deal of trouble in their treatment.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

NATIONAL BATTLEFIELDS AT QUEBEC ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (No. 188) An Act to amend the Act respecting the National Battlefields at Quebec.

He said: This Bill has been found necessary in consequence of the powers granted to the National Battlefields Commission proving inadequate. They have power, as I understand, to apply the expropriation clause of the Railway Act, but the Department of Justice consider that it would be better to refer them to the ordinary expropriation, and they have proposed, therefore, this measure for the purpose of enabling them to expropriate the lands in the ordinary way. That, I am informed, is the purpose of this Bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Can my right hon. friend say whether expropriation has been invoked in any case yet, and also what amount of land has been acquired up to the present time in connection with this project?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I am not aware of the extent or the amount that has been acquired. As a rule, anything that has been acquired up to date has been acquired by private bargain between the parties.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Yes.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Of course any information my hon. friend desires on that point I shall be happy to obtain for him and give to him when the House deals with the Bill in Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (British Columbia)—Have the rights of Sir Charles Ross been extinguished?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I will be happy to reply to my hon friend as I have disposed of this matter. The memorandum from the Department of Justice goes on to state that the expropriation provisions of the Railway Act were found unworkable, and they ask for legislation subject to the provision of the government expropriation Act, whereby the lands will be expropriated by fyling a plan and description signed by the chairman and secretary of the commission, the amount to be assessed upon information fyled by the Attorney General of Canada, in the absence of an agreement in the Exchequer Court. Those are the provisions which are inserted in this Bill. It would appear that no harm could arise through this change, since by section 10 of the original Act no land or removable property can be purchased or acquired by the commission except with the previous authority of parliament; and no expenditure could be made on it until it has been approved by parliament.

Hon Mr. CHOQUETTE—The chairman of the commission, Sir Geo. Garneau, told me the object of the Bill was to enable them to proceed under the Expropriation Act, instead of the Railway Act, because it would be done more quickly and would be less expensive.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—I should like to know if, in acquiring those battlefields, the rights of Sir Charles Ross have been extinguished?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I could not answer that point, but I can obtain the information if needs be. I suppose that has reference to the rifle factory, the small arms factory which is erected in the vicinity of the Plains of Abraham.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—They have a lease for 99 years, I think.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Did I understand the right hon. gentleman to say that no steps have been taken to acquire the land that was given, I think, or allotted, to the Rifle Company by Sir Charles Ross?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I do not think any land was given, but that a lease was made of the land on which the factory has been erected. Very likely my hon. friend opposite, who resides in Quebec, knows the details of that and could furnish the information.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Yes, I think it is only a nominal lease for 99 years.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The property has been built upon?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Yes, and a large amount of money spent.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—There are two large buildngs, which it would cost a lot of money to remove, the jail of the district and the Ross Rifle Company building. The jail belongs to the provincial government, and could be removed by them, and the Ross Rifle Company's factory has been erected under a lease from the federal government. I think the plans which have been prepared by the commission leave those two buildings there for the present. If providence ever willed that these buildings be burned down, I suppose we could then secure those lands for the increase of the battlefield grounds.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I suppose we might have a battle between the hon. member from Victoria division and the hon. gentleman from Halifax to settle the question.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I hope my hon. friend is not suggesting that in the public interest.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I understand there is no question of tearing down the buildings and buying the land. I do not think the commission require the land for the battlefield. The Ross factory may disappear if the government expropriated it, and, perhaps, before long, in Quebec, we shall not require any jail.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—When that happy period comes, perhaps we will cease to celebrate battlefields of any kind. I forget what the description in Revelation is, but I think it is that there are to be no more battles, that lions are to lie down with the lambs, and there is to be no more war. I will obtain the information for hon. gentlemen when the House is in committee. I have confined myself to the legal aspect of the question, and to the desirability of substituting the ordinary expropriation procedure for the powers granted under the Railway Act, to which I presume there is no objection.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Who is now the secretary of the Battlefields Commission in Quebec?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Those details have not been supplied me.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There is a battle waging at this time.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—There is no secretary appointed.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The chairman is Sir George Garneau, and I think Mr. Courtney, the late Deputy Minister of Finance, is treasurer.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—A temporary secretary was appointed. His services have been dispensed with, and there is no secretary now; but I was informed that later on they were going to appoint a permanent secretary.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I understand that Sir George Drummond was one of the commissioners Has he been replaced?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I cannot say who has taken the place of Sir George Drummond. My hon friend to my right (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) thinks the vacancy has not been filled.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

MONTREAL HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (No. 191) An Act to provide for further advances to the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal.

He said: This Bill provides for the raising of six million dollars on the terms set forth, for the purpose of carrying out certain improvements in the harbour of Montreal. These improvements are of a very extensive character, and will be spread over several years. I do not at all expect that any very large proportion of the money will be immediately wanted; but it is, of course, desirable that the commissioners shall have the power to raise what is required, so as not to have occasion to come to parliament every year to obtain an estimate for the exact amount. The full details are set forth in the Bill itself.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Can my right hon. friend say to what extent this loan has been paid over to the Harbour Commissioners?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I think none of this has been paid over.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This is the loan which we authorized last session, or the session before?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —This is an additional sum, I understand. Although the government has not yet consented to these improvements, they are on a very extensive scale, and will probably ultimately be carried out, and will require a great deal more than six million dollars. I may observe that the interest has always been punctually paid by the commissioners to the government, and so far the work may be regarded as a good live asset.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Can my right hon. friend say what the entire debt of the Harbour Commission to this government amounts to?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —It is stated in full up to the 31st March, 1909, in the Public Accounts. I do not think the accounts have been made up for the year just passed; but if my hon. friend would add a million and a half to the sum he will find in the public accounts now in our hands, I think he will get a pretty exact statement of the present debt.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—How does that million and a half arise? Is that an additional loan?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —That arises because they have been carrying out considerable improvements during the past year. They had a certain sum at their disposal, and that, I believe, is not quite, but very nearly expended in various improvements which they have carried out up to the 31st March, of this year. This six million is for the future improvements.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—When this Bill goes into committee, possibly my right hon. friend will be able to tell us how the Harbour Commissioners intend repaying this money. Is there any sinking fund established?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Out of the tolls which they will levy. I do not think they have established any sinking fund. The interest is paid from the tolls collected from the shippers, and parties using the accommodation provided by the Harbour Commissioners.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Harbour dues.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Those dues in no way contribute towards the retirement of the principal.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—No.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —No, they are merely calculated to provide for the interest.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I quite understand that the right hon. gentleman may not have all the information at hand to-day; but I would beg of him, when we go into committee, to have all this information as to the exact amount due to-day by the commissioners, and the amount of interest, if they have ever paid interest.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—They have always paid interest.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Yes.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Because I intend to make a comparison between Montreal harbour and Quebec harbour in order to see which is better. On Tuesday I shall take the liberty of asking a few questions of the right hon. leader of the House.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I am informed by the Finance Department that the interest on the debt has always been punctually paid up to date by the Montreal Harbour Commission.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—And how about Quebec?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I will have to ask my hon. friend to give notice of that question.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Do I understand the hon. gentleman from Quebec to disapprove of the precedent set by the Montreal Harbour Commissioners in paying off their debt?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I had a discussion with two gentlemen with regard to the question, and one of them was willing to bet that Montreal never paid the interest.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Was he a Quebec man?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—No.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The Finance Department advise me that the interest has been paid on the debt due by the Harbour Commission.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not see anything in the Bill relating to the interest.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Three and a half per cent.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—A debt may be paid by remittance, or in some other way.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I think that the moneys that have been voted for the improvement of Montreal harbour have been duly expended, and that the interest has been paid out of the tolls; but I shall obtain further information for the Senate.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If we keep on loaning large sums of money to improve the harbour of the city of Montreal, we will load it down with such a debt that the dues would have to be immeasurably increased to pay interest, or sinking fund to pay the capital? I notice that when that question was asked, my hon. friend said the capital had not been considered. The sixth clause of this Bill provides that the interest and capital shall be paid out of the receipts from the harbour dues after the improvements are completed. I should like to know the total amount of indebtedness after the six million has been advanced. We ought to be very cautious in regard to the amount of dues that are imposed at that port, because if they are made too high it will drive commerce to ports in the United States. It has been a complaint in the past, as hon. gentlemen well know, that harbour and pilot dues on the St. Lawrence have been so much greater than they are in some of the United States ports that commerce has been diverted to the south rather than to the St. Lawrence. That is one point where great caution, to my mind, should be taken in incurring that debt. I recognize, and I think every person in Canada recognizes, the importance to the trade of the Dominion of the harbour of Quebec and also that of Montreal. The difference in the past has been to the advantage of Montreal, which has always paid its interest, and all its indebtedness, while Quebec, to my recollection, has not paid anything, although a very large amount of money has been expended there, and it will be a question for the government to consider whether Montreal, being the principal port in this Dominion for goods coming from Europe for consumpttion in the interior of the country, should not relieve Montreal harbour of a certain proportion of its indebtedness, so that the commission may be enabled to establish such rates of harbour dues as would not drive from that port any commerce, no matter whence it came.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I may say to my hon. friend, that that point has engaged the attention of the government, and I know has engaged the attention of the commission. The last time I had occasion to discuss that matter, the commissioners expressed a very proper desire to keep the dues down to such a point as would not hamper the commerce of Montreal. The hon. gentleman will know that the shipping coming into Montreal, and the exports and imports of Montreal have increased enormously within the last few years, and the same rates of toll have prevailed and they consequently yield a much larger revenue. It may be—and the point is well worth considering—that the very extensive improvements that the commissioners contemplate may bring about such a state of things as the hon. gentleman has hinted at, when the dues necessary to be imposed for the purpose of providing the interest on the large sum borrowed, might hamper the trade of the port. That point, of course, the government and the Harbour Commissioners will have to bear in mind. Up to the present date, I think I am justified in saying that no damage has arisen to the port of Montreal. My hon. friend beside me (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) who is more familiar with the details of the port than I am, could perhaps give more information on the point; but I think I am correct in saying that up to date no injury has ensued.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The only increased charge has been caused by the better accommodation given to the steamships. I know that when they were being built, some steamship companies were somewhat fearful of the increased charge that it would represent, inasmuch as they would have to bear it; but I know that not later than this spring some of the companies were complaining very much that they were given some of the old sheds, and they were very desirous of paying the large fee to get the better accommodation.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I might add that a source of revenue, and a new source, for the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal, arises from the fact that they have taken possession of all the railway lines within the harbour limits. It is quite an item. They have their own locomotives and the right of way costs them nothing. Some of those rails have been laid by the railway companies.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They have paid for them?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Those rails were laid there by the railway companies under an agreement by which the Harbour Commissioners could use them when they liked, and they kept the right of way themselves. The Harbour Commissioners derive quite a revenue by handling all that enormous traffic, delivering trains to the Canadian Pacific railway and to the Grand Trunk railway, and some even to the Canadian Northern. That is proving a profitable business and will tend to reduce the dues in the near future.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

MEAT AND CANNED FOODS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (No. 193) An Act to amend the Meat and Canned Foods Act. He said: This Bill contains a number of somewhat minute changes in a variety of sections, which I shall be very happy to explain in detail in committee, but which would hardly be of much interest to the House to go through now. They cover quite a number of folio pages. The chief object is to make it a little clearer than at present that the department has the power granted by parliament under the existing Meat and Canned Foods Act. So many sections are involved, I can hardly select any one that is of importance by itself, except possibly the fact that it gives a little more power to inspect the books, shipping bills, bills of lading, or other papers in respect to exports. If hon. gentlemen have no objection, I shall move the second reading, and we can discuss the details in committee.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—While there is no objection whatever to moving the second reading, it seems to me the department is not keeping up with the progress of legislation in the United States. Hon. gentlemen have had their attention directed to the disclosures which have taken place in that country as to the storage of food products in warehouses, in excessive quantities, and for extremely long periods of time, in some cases exceeding three years. It seems to me the department should have gone further than they have gone in this Bill, and have placed on the statute-book legislation quite as advanced as that adopted by our neighbours to the south of us. Attention is being called in the United States every day to the necessity of having full and adequate inspection of cold storage warehouses. I would suggest to my right hon. friend that before this Bill goes into committee, the attention of the department should be directed to the fact, and that they should keep, as far as possible, pace with the legislation of the United States on the subject.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I am not in a position to give the reasons why the department have not thought it expedient to go further than they have gone in the present Bill. As a rule, I think, that department is quite willing to introduce as much legislation as the House will swallow at one time. Generally speaking the complaint, down below at any rate, has not been that the Department of Agriculture introduced too little legislation or have said too little about it, but rather the reverse. Possibly they may have been deterred by the strictures which have been made by my hon. friends in another place from going further than this at present. I think we should accept what we get, and I have no doubt when the Minister of Agriculture sees, as doubtless he will, and as I shall take care he shall, see my hon. friend's criticism, he will lay it to heart and very likely give us a Bill of one hundred clauses next year.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The principle of that department seems to be 'small mercies but numerous.'

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The principle of the department is to move cautiously and steadily in the direction that public opinion desires. I do not think there is quite the same necessity here for those stringent measures which are being adopted in the United States. I do not think any legislation in that direction has yet come in force. There are Bills before the legislative bodies in the state of New York, and two or three other states, but I rather think that they have been laid over for further consideration, especially those dealing with the length of time that articles should continue in cold storage.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The United States government have seriously taken up the subject.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Yes, the question is one of importance.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I noticed lately, a report of its official expert in which a recommendation is made to that government that there is no necessity for keeping goods in cold storage for a longer period than nine months at most. That, of course, is in contradistinction to the period of three years and more for which large quantities of goods have been stored in those warehouses.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I do not think such cases have occurred yet in Canada. It would be well to prevent them.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The difficulty that confronts us is, that we have no machinery for a proper inspection of goods in cold storage warehouses. There is no comprehensive machinery by which such an investigation has been made in the United States can be made here.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I rather think, in the case of those cold storage warehouses that have been assisted by the government, we possess the power of inspection. Probably my hon. friend may remember that the Minister of Agriculture took authority to advance money for the erection of cold storage warehouses, and in the leases or agreements made with those parties, he reserved to himself considerable powers of inspection. However, I shall inquire into that matter, and call his attention to my hon. friend's remarks as to the desirability of taking precautions against goods of a perishable nature being stored too long. In the United States, there is no doubt it has become a serious and positive abuse. Food has deteriorated very considerably owing to the length of time it had been stored. The system of cold storage is of comparatively recent growth with us; and I do not think similar abuses have as yet developed themselves here.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—The difference between the policy of the United States and that of Canada is this, that the Department of Agriculture here only take cognizance of goods put up for export, entirely ignoring the advantage of inspection of goods consumed in Canada. I think that is a mistake. It is not fair to the Canadian consumer. You may go to a warehouse and buy a barrel of apples graded No. 1, and find, when you open them, that they are No. 2 or No. 3. The department takes no cognizance of goods sold in Canada. Its jurisdiction is supposed to be limited to goods intended for export, and we have not the same advantage of following up fraud by prosecution. Inferior apples are now sold in Canada and the poorer canned stuff, whatever it may be, whether meat or any other article, is given to the Canadian consumer. There is no inspection of that. You buy it, and when you find yourself defrauded you are told by the department you can undertake the prosecution yourself. That is not reasonable or fair. The department have all the machinery at hand, and can follow up such cases. To say that a Canadian should be obliged to go from here to London or Liverpool to prosecute, is to deny justice. The department itself should look as closely after the interests of the Canadians as it looks after the interests of consumers abroad.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—It may be pointed out that there is machinery already in existence for the inspection of cold storage warehouses. Under our system, the boards of health and health inspectors have a right to go into every store within their jurisdiction, and make an examination of all goods. A case happened the other day where the food inspector went to inspect a small cold storage warehouse. The proprietor would not allow him in and barred the door. The officer went before a magistrate of the municipality, and got an order from the court to force this man to open his cold storage, and if he would not open it to empower him to break it open. The result was, the inspector examined the goods in that cold storage warehouse and confiscated and destroyed nearly everything in it. So there is already in existence, if the public only knew it, under the boards of health, the power to appoint a food inspector who may, under the law, go into all places and inspect food and confiscate it if it is not found in good condition.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL — To what extent is the principle of inspection to be abolished? I notice that by the second subsection, which repeals everything in section 3 of the Act, it is intended to abolish some inspection that now obtains. I know that some difficulty has arisen in the administration of the inspection laws. The question arises as to how far the Dominion government has the power to impose inspection upon the foods that are consumed within any one province. The present law of inspection applies to all meats and other things that are prepared for export. Meats brought from the west have to be inspected and labelled before they are exported; but other meats imported from the west for consumption locally are not inspected. That I have noticed has been the complaint of some butchers in the city where I live. The explanation given of that is that the local governments only have power to enact laws for the inspection of foods going into consumption. The boards of health, as has been indicated by the hon. gentleman from Victoria division, (Hon. Mr. Cloran) have power to inspect foods, and if the provinces would enact laws to compel the inspection of foods, as they are now inspected by Dominion authority, when they are intended to be exported, we would secure proper food for consumption by the people. In committee we can ascertain the extent to which these repealing clauses go, but until that information is secured you can scarcely understand the extent of the changes in the Act.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The details can be dealt with much more effectively in committee for that reason.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (No 102) An Act respecting Immigration.

(In the Committee.)

On subclause (d) of clause 2.

(d) 'domicile' means the place in which a person has his present home, or in which he resides, or to which he returns as his place of present permanent abode, and not for a mere special or temporary purpose. Canadian domicile is acquired for the purposes of this Act by a person having his domicile for at least three years in Canada after having been landed therein within the meaning of this Act: Provided that the time spent by a person in any penitentiary, gaol, reformatory, prison or asylum for the insane in Canada shall not be counted in the three-year period of residence in Canada which is necessary in order to acquire Canadian domicile. Canadian domicile is lost, for the purposes of this Act, by a person voluntarily residing out of Canada, not for a mere special or temporary purpose, but with the present intention of making his permanent home out of Canada unless and until something which is unexpected, or the happening of which is uncertain, shall occur to induce him to return to Canada;

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Must this residence in Canada be continuous? I notice in line 25 it says: 'By a person having his domicile for at least three years in Canada, after having been landed therein within the meaning of this Act'.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I understand that is three years continuous residence.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Should not that be expressed? For instance the courts have held that though a man was absent in a foreign country, his domicile remained undisturbed. I can conceive of a case of an immigrant landing in Canada making this his domicile, though he may be absent in a foreign country for a great part of the three years, and yet claim that Canada is his domicile. It seems to me the residence should be continuous.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I think that is provided for in the clause.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The case I mentioned would not come within this classification, and in fact this would seem to infer that an immigrant arriving in Canada and leaving his family in Canada might go to a foreign country, treating Canada as his home, though he might be absent for a large portion of the three years. The word 'continuous' should be used.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Would not that bar any man from obtaining the benefit of this Act if he were called away for a few months?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That condition might possibly arise, and yet such a case as I have mentioned may give trouble in the interpretation of the Act, namely that of a person being absent in a foreign country and yet having his domicile in Canada. I direct attention to it, but I am not prepared to suggest how it should be overcome.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I will have a note taken of it, and call the attention of the Minister of the Interior to that point.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This question of domicile is a very contentious one in the courts, and inasmuch as we are making elaborate provisions for the deportation of people from the country, it had better be defined.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It would be an inconvenient thing to say that a person who might leave Canada for a short time should forfeit his domicile. The legal meaning of domicile is a place where a person has his family, and where he habitually resides, and what he calls his home. The right hon. gentleman in charge of the Bill, with a view of facilitating the progress of the measure through the committee, might call attention to the changes which this Bill proposes to make in the existing law. There is no particular object in discussing at length provisions which have been in force for years.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I disagree to a considerable extent with my hon. friend. The Act is being consolidated with a view to improving former conditions. The Immigration Act is largely an experiment, at least the provisions of it that we regard as most salutary, are evolved from conditions which arise under its administration. My hon. friend cannot be serious in asking this House to accept the old Act without criticism. If the old Act were not to be subject to criticism, there would be no reason to have this Bill.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The object of this Bill is largely to prevent the introduction of undesirable citizens, and to give the government increased facilities for dealing with the deportation of such persons. The desire, of course, to encourage immigration, would be the desire also to encourage immigration of a good quality, and quality is often more important than quantity. Heretofore, as everybody knows, repeated attempts have been made by a number of well meaning societies and official bodies in the old country, particularly, who send a very doubtful class of immigrants to Canada. This Bill is largely designed to give the Department of the Interior power to deal with such attempts, and especially with these classes of persons, who are on the face of it, undesirable parties to encourage to settle here. That is the main object which underlies the whole Bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I should like my right hon. friend to consider that question of domicile.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I will. I am taking a note of those matters for that express purpose.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is one of the fundamental principles of this Bill. If a man has established his domicile for three years in Canada, I understand he cannot be deported. We want it clearly defined that his domicile is substantial and not technical.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —If I understand my hon. friend, he thinks that it would not be an infraction of the three years residence if the immigrant were absent for a few months. If he were continuously absent, that would be another matter.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In that case, should it not be provided for?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—That is the point of which I have taken note; and I shall call the attention of the department to it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—When you provide for a continuous residence, that might make provision for a man taking two or three months' holidays in a foreign country or going outside the country to transact business.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—We shall endeavour to see that it is made right.

The subclause was adopted.

On subclause (ii):—

'A British subject who has Canadian domicile'.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—A question has often been raised that if a person born in Canada should go to another country and become naturalized there, and then return to Canada, he would still be a British subject; but under this clause he would not. I know that question has been repeatedly raised in election contests, where objections have been taken to a man voting on the ground that he had left the country and taken the oath of allegiance in the United States. After his return to Canada, he has claimed the right of a British subject, and the courts have decided that he was not.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think the courts have held that once a British subject, always a British subject.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—That was so up to 1870, when the law was changed by the imperial parliament.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The imperial government has taken a different view of it and recognized the fact that a British subject becoming a United States subject is no longer a British subject.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I think that until about 1885, it was generally conceded that once a British subject always a British subject.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—1870.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—No, later than that. The Election Act was changed, and a provision was made that any person who was a subject of a foreign country could not qualify as a voter in Canada.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—How far does that annul the principle?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I do not know.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This says 'a person born in Canada who has not become an alien.' If he had become an alien and returned, that would not relieve him of the alienship.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I do not think so.

Hon. Mr. KERR—Are we not getting away to the discussion of another matter altogether? It does not appear to me that we are going to make or unmake British subjects by this Act, except for the purpose of the Immigration Act, to deal with undesirable immigrants. The law as to aliens and British subjects generally would not be affected by this Bill. It is for the purposes of immigration, I understand.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I may say to my hon. friends who have been discussing this clause, that if they look at section 12 of the Naturalization Act, they will find a full answer. That section provides that any British subject who has left the country and become naturalized in a foreign state shall not be deemed within Canada to be a British subject, and shall be regarded as an alien, and there are further provisions as to his repatriation.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—These clauses are just a repetition of the provisions of the existing Act.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—Down to No. 3.

On paragraph 5 of subsection (g),

(g) 'immigrant' means a person who enters Canada with the intention of acquiring Canadian domicile, and for the purposes of this Act every person entering Canada shall be presumed to be an immigrant unless belonging to one of the following classes of persons, hereinafter called 'non-immigrant classes':—

v. Students entering Canada for the purpose of attendance, and while in actual attendance, at any university or college authorized by statute or charter to confer degrees; or at any high school or collegiate institute recognized as such for the purpose of this Act by the Minister.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Can my hon. friend say whether paragraph 5 of (g) includes Asiatics—students entering Canada?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Yes, it would; students, Chinese, Japanese and otherwise.

The clause was agreed to.

On clause 3, paragraph (b),

3. No immigrant, passenger, or other person, unless he is a Canadian citizen or has Canadian domicile, shall be permitted to land in Canada, or in case of having landed in or entered Canada shall be permitted to remain therein, who belongs to any of the following classes, hereinafter called "prohibited classes"

(b) Persons afflicted with any loathsome disease, or with a disease which is contagious or infectious, or which may become dangerous to the public health, whether such person intend to settle in Canada or only to pass through Canada in transit to some other country: Provided that if such disease is one which is curable within a reasonably short time, such persons may, subject to the regulation in that behalf, if any, be permitted to remain on board ship if hospital facilities do not exist on shore, or to leave ship for medical treatment.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Referring to paragraph (b) of clause 3, to what extent is discretion exercised by the department as to the admission of persons suffering from an incurable disease? I know it is a provision already embodied in the Act, but may I ask what hospital facilties exist, for instance on board ship, as mentioned here, or what hospital facilties are furnished on shore to permit of medical treatment being extended to people afflicted with incurable diseases?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —If my hon. friend will turn to clause 34, he will find it fully dealt with in that clause.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is not so much a matter of statutory enactment as administration of the Act. I should like to know whether the department has taken the necessary steps to afford every facility to treat cases of that kind?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The department has taken the necessary steps; but the increased amount of immigration has rendered it difficult. Very considerable sums of money are spent in erecting places of detention for just such passengers as may be suspected of being undesirable, or subject to the disabilities contained in this clause, and, I think, everywhere these facilities or accommodations are being enlarged.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Are the steamship companies compelled to furnish hospital accommodation of the kind alluded to? To what extent will the department or the government impose upon steamship companies the necessity for furnishing the facilities?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —It would be to a large extent a matter of administration. Very considerable sums, as my hon. friend will see, on looking at the estimates and the various supplementary estimates which are being brought down, are taken for the express purpose of providing for such contingencies as he refers to, and I think they will be sufficient.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Should not those facilities be provided by the steamship companies? They profit considerably by this class of trade. They are bonused either directly or indirectly by the government in the carrying of those immigrants, and it seems to me the most adequate provision should be made, and regulations also, so as to enforce upon steamship companies the furnishing of facilities anticipated by this Act.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —As we proceed my hon. friend will see that these things are pretty well looked after. When we get to the special provisions as to passengers, I think he will find the precautions he speaks of are provided for.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Before the clause passes, I would like to draw attention to paragraph A, because it is a subject we discussed once before in the House. Paragraph A provides that idiots, imbeciles, feeble-minded persons, epileptics, insane persons, and persons who have been insane within five years previous, are actually excluded.

Suppose the case of a family of eight or nine persons, and it happens that one of the children is feeble-minded, it does seem to me to be rather a cruel thing—

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Clause 4 gives the minister discretion in special cases to grant a permit.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I was going to suggest that there does not seem to me to be any reason why feeble-minded persons or epileptics should not be put in the same category as those who are deaf or blind. If the hon. gentleman will look at the latter part of paragraph C, he will find as to immigrants that are dumb or blind that the government has to be satisfied that they are not likely to become a public charge, or that they belong to a family accompanying them or already in Canada, and who give security to the minister against such immigrants becoming a public charge. It seems to me that provision would be quite sufficient in the case of feeble-minded persons and epileptics, as well as in the case of deaf and dumb.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I would think the discretion should be left with the department. I do not feel that it is desirable for us for humanitarian reasons to encourage that class. Under the special conditions they may be let through. We will do what we can to bring the healthy class into this country; but we must do what we can to exclude persons of doubtful character.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What about the blind and dumb?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —There are exceptional cases in which they may be admitted to the country.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There is what would appear to be a very considerable amount of inhumanity in the proper administration of this Act, but it is absolutely necessary that the most positive restrictions should be placed upon the admission of undesirable immigrants coming into Canada. But to avoid much of what might be termed inhumanity, it seems to me that instead of examining these immigrants at the point of debarkation, they should be examined at the point of embarkation. I fail to see why the government should not provide the necessary machinery to make a thorough examination of all immigrants bound for Canada at the various shipping ports in Europe. It would prevent much of the difficulty of a harrowing kind which presents itself to our mind when those immigrants land in Canada. It is certainly a case of severe hardship upon a family when they are permitted to embark for Canada, apparently under the supervision of our own officers at European ports, and in steamships subsidized by the Canadian government and then be prohibited from landing upon our shores immediately they reach a Canadian port. I directed the attention of the Senate to this matter when this Act was before us for consideration before, and up to the present time I have never received any satisfactory information upon the subject.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I agree that it is very desirable that those cases of hardship should be avoided as far as possible, and one of the objects in the provision of this Act is to compel the railroad and steamship companies who bring immigrants here to exercise, of their own motion, a much stricter inspection than they have hitherto done. Much heavier penalties have been imposed upon them than heretofore. As to examination at the various ports, not being Canadian ports, that is a question of administration, which, while it deserves the consideration of the department, I am not prepared to give assurances about at present. All I can do is to call the attention of the department, as I shall, to the point taken by my hon. friend, because I feel that he is correct in saying that it is a very serious hardship that parties of this kind should be brought at expense from one side of the Atlantic to the other, and then, perhaps, deported after they had sacrificed nearly everything they had in the world to get here. I would be glad to see some such system as he speaks of put in force, if it can be done; but there are some practical difficulties in the way, I am afraid.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Are they of an international character? Do foreign governments, from whose countries our immigrants come, prevent our officers, or the representatives of our country from taking such steps as would be necessary to carry out the proper examination?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —To some extent. I think we may be able to overcome it; but no doubt the difficulty to which my hon. friend alludes exists to some extent.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Since I spoke a few moments ago, the hon. gentleman from Killarney has handed me the existing Act on the subject, and I find the provision that I suggest already exists.

Section 2 of the Act reads—

"No immigrant shall be permitted to land in Canada who is feeble minded or an idiot or epileptic, or who is insane, or who has had an attack of insanity within five years, nor shall any immigrant be so landed who is deaf or dumb, or blind, or infirm, unless he belongs to a family accompanying him, or already in Canada, and who gives security satisfactory to the minister, and in conformity with the regulations in that behalf, if any, for his permanent support, if admitted into Canada.

I think it is a very unnecessary and improper thing to alter that law.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —That is substantially what is enacted here.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—The remarks of the hon. leader of the opposition show the absolute necessity that people coming from any country to Canada should be carefully examined, and it should be known whether they are in a healthy condition.

We can understand the reports published from day to day of the cruelty that is perpetrated, not perhaps so much by our own country as by the United States, and where they are about to be examined. The immigrant is separated from the other members of the family and is taken away. The torture of the family so separated takes place. This could be avoided if the suggestion of the hon. leader of the opposition could be put into effect. There should be a thorough investigation of the immigrants coming here, at the point of embarkation as well as after arriving in this country. Then again, we find that if the immigrant is diseased, and is prevented from landing from the boat on arrival at a Canadian port, who has to bear the expense? It is not the transportation company. If he is taken off the vessel he is placed in the hospital. Has provision been made as to how he should be treated, and who is to bear the cost?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Yes, that is provided for. All those things are very fully dealt with.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—We should see that the patient is in a proper condition of health when he embarks; but we know from experience that immigrants are allowed to embark, who are not in a healthy condition. We also know that they stay here after they arrive, when they are, some of them incurable. Who is to be the proper judge? Who is to say whether they are curable or incurable? It is supposed to be the officer at the landing, and therefore I think this is a very important clause in the Bill, and should be carefully considered before being enacted.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —If the hon. gentleman will read the Bill through he will see that a very great number of these points have been considered by the department and provided for.

On clause 14:

14. Such boards of inquiry shall have authority to determine whether an immigrant, passenger or other person seeking to enter Canada or detained for any cause under this Act, shall be allowed to enter or remain in Canada, or shall be rejected and deported.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Can the hon. minister say to what extent these boards of inquiry are to be constituted? Are they to be found at all points of embarkation?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —This is copied from United States practice I think we have power of appointment; but up to the present time it has not been found necessary to do so. It is believed, however, that they would be useful in many cases.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is proposed to appoint a permanent board at all important points?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —At the chief points. This is designed to deal with the immigration from Europe, and it is at the seaports that these boards of inquiry will be found necessary. It would be quite out of the question, with a frontier of 3,000 miles, to endeavour to have boards at all places in the country.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I should like to know what are the arrangements between the two governments—that is the government of Canada, and that of the United States—as to those officers charged with making inquiry into the entry of immigrants into both countries. There has appeared in the public press very recently a number of very aggravated cases, in which officers of the United States Department of Immigration have interfered with Canadian citizens, have for instance exercised their authority upon Canadian territory in demanding information, insisting upon information, and in preventing our own citizens from crossing the international boundary, and I have noticed in the press within the last couple of days two cases of hardship resulting from United States immigration officials preventing members of Canadian families joining the head of the household on the United States side. I presume some arrangement exists between the kindred departments of both as to the enforcement of the immigration laws at the international boundary line?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —There have been certain exchanges of courtesy between the two governments; but they refer more particularly to the presence of Canadian or United States officers at the ports of landing. The incidents my hon. friend has referred to—that is the arbitrary interference with travellers—were not by persons who are responsible to the Immigration Department, but by subordinates. That matter is the subject of correspondence between the Canadian and United States authorities. To do the United States authorities justice, I believe they have in a great many cases disapproved of the action of their officers, and have issued instructions that they should be very much more careful in the future. Some of these officers have been most insolent, and tyrannical in the exercise of the duties entrusted to them. That is a thing likely to happen at any time. All that can be done is to make representations to the chief officials at Washington, whenever such cases occur. We have always found the chief officers of the United States courteous, and desirous of enforcing the law with as little hardship as possible, but some of their subordinates have gone far in excess of their instructions.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does the United States government allow the Canadian officials to exert practically the same powers on the other side of the line as the United States officers exert on this side?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—With better results, I hope.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I hope so. If an official of our government acted in the way some United States officials are reported to have done, his official head would be severed from his official body.

On clause 21,

21. Pending the decision of the Minister, the appellant and those dependent upon him shall be kept in custody at an immigrant station, unless released under bond as provided for in section 33 of this Act.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The term 'custody,' is used there, and I have noticed many press reports of late as to the inadequate provisions made for holding immigrants within the various places of custody prepared for that purpose. It seems to me that fairly comfortable provision should be made for keeping immigrants in custody. I have noticed in the press, and I presume that the reports would have come from reliable sources—that very great cases of hardship have arisen where women with tender children have been practically imprisoned in some small room, without any of the necessities of life being furnished them. I do not know whether there is any truth in that or not, but this is a matter to which the attention of the government should be specially directed, and where adequate provision should be made for such cases.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The hon. gentleman is quite right. The attention of the government has been directed to it. The department is taking measures, and spending considerable amounts for the express purpose of remedying these inconveniences, and if he will turn to subclause (3) of clause 31 he will see that we are providing that the government may, in certain cases, impose upon transportation companies the duty of providing and maintaining suitable buildings for the examination and detention of passengers. That is a new provision.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 27,

27. Before any passengers are permitted to leave a vessel in Canada the immigration officer in charge, or any officer directed by him, may go on board and inspect such vessel, and examine and take extracts from the manifest of passengers, and from the bill of health.
2. The master shall permit any examination of passengers required under this Act to be made on board his vessel whenever so directed by the immigration officer in charge.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The master of the ship apparently furnishes a Bill of health which is accepted by our government. What obligation is imposed upon the master of the ship as to the professional standing of the medical officers? We know that on many ships the standing of the medical officers is not the highest possible.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The only provision we have is taken from the British Shipping Act, which requires, I believe, that vessels carrying passengers shall have what they call a duly qualified medical officer; but what 'duly qualified' means, I have considerable difficulty in explaining. Prima facie, the graduate of any known medical school would be accepted, and, as a rule, the leading companies do not employ medical officers unless they are graduates of some well known school.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Have we any provision for requiring that they shall have a certain standing before accepting their certificates? That would be within our power.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I am not sure. I think our powers are limited. I do not think we can interfere with those who comply with the British Shipping Act.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I quite agree with my hon. friend; but you could refuse to accept the certificate which they might issue, because we make that qualification ourselves.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Would we be justified in refusing the certificate of a medical officer reported under the British Shipping Act to be duly qualified?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I may be wrong about that. I am not prepared to suggest any improvement on it.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —There are two things which can be done, and would be done under this amended Act. In the first place, if the department sees its way to appoint a sufficient number of examining officers at the chief ports of departure on the other side of the Atlantic, I think they can do that and carry out the suggestion of my hon. friend, to cause all the immigrants to be examined by a medical officer of our own, which perhaps, would be the best way.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The practice is to employ young men who have just passed through a college education, and obtained their certificates. They are duly qualified to practice. I do not think you will find a single ship sailing from Canada which has not a duly qualified medical man on board.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I would not go that length, but the majority are undoubtedly provided with medical officers of that class. A strict examination made by officers of our own, presumably qualified medical officers, at the port of departure, coupled with the other provisions which are here, in virtue of which the various steamship lines and railways are being held responsible under heavy penalties for bringing in such parties, will I think pretty well weed out the undesirables.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—As a rule, vessels engage some medical man who has just passed his examination. He may, or may not be well qualified, but I think the latter part of this clause will cover that difficulty —'such examination shall be made in accordance with, and subject to regulations prescribed by the superintendent of immigration, under the direction, or with the approval of the minister'. Therefore, if the medical man is not an efficient one, and has proven himself not to be, the department has a right to say that a further examination be made of the cases brought before them.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I notice a subsequent provision, by which the certificate can be readily checked.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 29,

29. The immigration officer in charge, after satisfying himself that the requirements of this Act, and of any order in council, proclamation or regulation made thereunder, have been carried out, shall grant written permission to the master of the vessel to allow the passengers to leave the vessel.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I wish to call the attention of the leader of the House to a case which arose in Quebec last fall, and which would come under this clause, though I do not see any provision to cover such a case. It was brought to my attention by the agent of one of the steamships which carried immigrants to Quebec. There was sickness on board the ship on its arriving at the quarantine station at Grosse Isle, Those who were sick were kept at the hospital there, and the doctor gave a discharge to the other immigrants, fourteen in all. They were bound for the United States. When they arrived at Quebec, they had their discharge from the doctor at Grosse Isle, but the United States doctor informed the officers of the department at Quebec that if they sent those people on to the United States, they would be stopped at the border, because while they might not be sick themselves, they had been in contact with sick people and ought to have been kept at Grosse Isle for fourteen days. He said: 'You must send them to the hospital in Quebec'. The officer at Quebec said: 'We have nothing to do with that; those immigrants have been discharged and have their certificates.' The officer gave written permission to the master of the vessel to let them leave the vessel, and they were on the wharf. They telegraphed to Dr. Montizambert, the head of the department at Ottawa, who answered back that they were no longer under their care, because they had been discharged from Grosse Isle. Then they telegraphed to the Minister of the Interior, who said: 'We have nothing to do with them; inquire of the Department of Agriculture or send them back to Grosse Isle.' They were refused to be sent back to Grosse Isle, so those fourteen people were left on the streets of Quebec. Nobody would receive them since the United States doctor had refused to let them enter the United States, because they might be sick. They were left like tramps, under the charge of the municipality. The agent of the White Star line got a colonist car from the Canadian Pacific railway and put them in it, and took care of them for four or five days, and at last the United States doctor conceded the right to let them pass the border. When a memorandum was sent to me by the agent of the company, I saw both of the ministers in Ottawa here. Mr. Fisher said: 'See Mr. Oliver.' I saw Mr. Oliver, and he said: 'I think Mr. Fisher ought to attend to that.' However, I left a memorandum asking that a provision be inserted in this Bill to prevent a recurrence of the incident. When the representatives of the department at Quebec refused to take those people, they were left on the streets and could have been arrested as tramps and subjected to penalties. If they had been really sick with small-pox or something of that kind, what would have been the effect upon the Quebec population? Therefore, I draw the attention of the government to that case. I have looked through the Bill and do not find any provision which would prevent such a case happening to-morrow. I should like to have a clause added to this Bill to the following effect; supposing after immigrants leave a vessel a difficulty or difference should arise between the doctors, or trouble should arise at the frontier, let the parties be sent back to Grosse Isle and not thrown as a charge on the city of Quebec. Something was said in papers on the other side about the treatment of those people at Quebec. It was not the fault of the city. The railway companies were told by the United States doctor: 'If you put them on your trains, I will telegraph and prevent them being admitted into the United States, and instead of having them in Quebec, they will be left on the border.' There should be some provision to meet such cases. They should either be sent back to Grosse Isle, which is only 35 miles below Quebec, pending an agreement between the doctors, or something else should be done. Mr. Oliver told me he understood the situation and he would do something, but I find nothing in this Bill to meet such an emergency, and I call the attention of the leader of the House to this fact.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—If I followed the hon. gentleman correctly, what he complains of is due to the fact that certain immigrants going to the United States, chose to come via Quebec, and that the United States official refused to give them a clean bill of health.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—They got a clean bill of health from the officers at Grosse Isle.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—We cannot control the action of the United States official.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—But you could send those people back to Grosse Isle if they could not go to the United States.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—That is a matter for the department.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—The Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of the Interior ought to intervene and send them back to Grosse Isle, as if they were really sick and under the charge of the steamship company that brought them out, but they should not be left in the city of Quebec. You might compel the company to take them on to their destination, if the railway companies refused positively to take them on their train. In Ottawa nobody would intervene. After a few days' negotiation with the United States doctor he allowed them to proceed. If they had really been sick with small-pox or some disease of that kind the public health might have suffered.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I do not see that my hon. friend should insist upon the government making further provision than they have already in the Bill. It is evident the United States government interfered. The government of Canada had made all necessary provision and employed officers in whom they had confidence. If the officer at Grosse Isle gives a certificate for passengers to leave quarantine that ought to be sufficient. If the officer is deficient, there is a means by which a further examination might be made. It would be a mistake if any clause were added here to make the government responsible

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I should like to call the attention of the committee to a case which came under my observation, and which was not affected by any act of the United States government. A trader in the city of Hamilton, an Englishman, by his industry gathered enough money to build himself a little home, and afterwards enough to send for his wife and children. When they arrived at the city of Quebec, it was found that one of the children had ring-worm. I do not know whether that is a contagious disease; but the family were held in quarantine on account of this child having ring-worm. I was in Quebec and got a telegram from the St. George's Society of Hamilton to relieve these people, because there was a Bill against them amounting to $50 or $60. I saw Mr. Price of the city of Quebec, who assisted me in the matter, and I left him the money to clear these people or they would have been sent back that afternoon on one of the Canadian Pacific railway boats. Now either the Canadian Pacific Railway Company or the Canadian government were responsible for detaining these people, because there was no need to hold the mother and two children because of that case of ring-worm. The woman telegraphed to her husband that unless she and the children were relieved she would go mad. The man had expended all his money to bring them out, and had not enough to pay the claim against them at Quebec. That is a case where the Canadian government should not have imposed that charge upon the immigrants. Some provision should be made whereby immigrants coming to Canada to settle should not be subject to a hard and fast rule, and held in quarantine for such a small cause. If it had not been that the secretary of the St. George's Society knew I was going to Quebec to meet my family, and wired me to pay whatever claim there was against these immigrants, I do not know what would have happened. An incident of that kind does more harm to our country than we dream of. I went first to one officer and then to another in Quebec, and I am sorry to say discovered that there was really nobody at the head of affairs to determine whether these people should be relieved or not.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —If the hon. gentleman looks at subclause 2, of clause 34, he will see that provision is made for any such case that may arise in the future.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I have simply given my own experience in the city of Quebec. I hold to-day, as I held then, that the government had no right to allow its officers to hold that family. They should have been sent on to Hamilton, where any charge against them could have been collected. If they had not been detained, the expenses would not have been so great, and it seemed a cruel thing on the part of the government of Canada to hold these people a week, simply because one of the children had a disease to which all children are more or less subject.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I am not certain as to whether my hon. friend is correctly informed as to the contagious nature of ring-worm. I am told it is contagious. However, the clause to which I have referred will meet the hardship in similar cases.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I should like to know if there is anything in the Bill to prevent a recurrence of cases such as the one I have described?

Hon. Mr. GIBSON

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I doubt it. If parties go to the United States through Canada, they are subject to the regulations laid down by the United States government.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Could you not provide that if a company brings immigrants for other places than Canada, and anything should prevent them going on to their destination, the company will be held responsible, or the officers at Quebec will have power to send them back to Grosse Isle at the expense of the company?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —That can be done.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If immigrants come by the St. Lawrence, intending to go to the United States, they must be subject to the United States regulations; but the difficulty in this case is that after the family had passed Grosse Isle, and had taken all the steps necessary to allow them to stay in Canada, the United States official said: 'You cannot cross the border.' The difficulty is, what is to become of those immigrants, particularly if they have no money?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —It is no doubt a hardship.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Take the case brought before the Senate by the hon. gentleman from Welland, where the people had not the money to pay the additional expense imposed upon them? The government should take power to deal with such cases.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —They are taking power to deal with such cases.

Hon. Mr. POWER—When these difficulties take place, the steamship company should be obliged to take charge of them.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The Bill contains provisions to deal with such cases.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Why were not these powers exercised?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Because this clause did not exist at the time. I move that the committee rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Three o'clock to-morrow.

THE SENATE.

FRIDAY, April 15, 1910.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 129) An Act to incorporate the Ontario and Ottawa Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Jones.

Bill (No. 106) An Act respecting the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Jones.

Bill (DDD) An Act respecting the Alberta and British Columbia Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Lougheed.

Bill (AAA) An Act respecting the Brandon, Saskatchewan and Hudson Bay Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Watson.

Bill (GGG) An Act to incorporate the Buctouche Railway and Transportation Company.—Hon. Mr. Thompson.

Bill (No. 111) An Act respecting the Dominion Millers' Association.—Hon. Mr. McGregor.

CONSERVATION OF NATURAL RESOURCES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (No. 185) An Act respecting the Commission for the Conservation of Natural Resources.

He said: I would say to my hon. friends opposite that if convenient I would like to give these measures a stage. If there is any one of them they think would require a long debate as a matter of principle, of course it will stand over; but, as I think I will be able to explain any objections that may come up, no injury can be done by giving them a stage, and in one or two cases where it is probably desirable that parties should be heard, I propose to refer the Bills to a standing committee of this House, and a good deal of time would be saved to us if this Bill received a stage to-day. This particular measure we have in hand contains a few trifling alterations for the purpose of enabling the Commission on Conservation to carry on their business with more expedition, and to shift from place to place. There is a provision in it under which the gentlemen who form it are allowed their expenses, but no fee is paid them, I understand, for their services. They will simply be allowed what expenses they may be put to in attending committee. Of course we can go over the details in committee.

The motion was agreed to and the Bill was read the second time.

CURRENCY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (No. 195) An Act respecting Currency. He said: The object of this Bill is chiefly to enable the government to provide gold coins which will be more easily used, on this continent at any rate, than the English sovereign. It will be desirable that our gold coin should represent five dollars, which suits our currency better than the English sovereign whose statutory value, as hon. gentlemen know, is four dollars and eighty-six cents and a fraction. I have pretty voluminous explanations from the Department of Finance with respect to their calculations, with which I do not propose to trouble the House at this stage.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—How will those coins circulate in Great Britain? Will they circulate at their par value?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think they will circulate just exactly as the United States half eagle does in Great Britain. The United States half eagle, as I understand, although as a matter of course very few of them are in circulation, are taken by the Bank of England at the value of five dollars, a little more than the sovereign, which is $4.86.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will there be any understanding between the Bank of England and our Department of Finance as to the value of the coin?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Undoubtedly there will. My hon. friend is aware that this is a branch of the Royal Mint. The officers are appointed by the British government under certain stipulations made with our government, but they are really officers of the British government rather than of the Dominion government.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Still I suppose in no sense will the profit of the mint go to the government of Great Britain?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Oh no, the profit of the business, if there is any, will come to us; but I do not anticipate there will be much profit from the coinage of gold. It differs from the coinage of silver.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (British Columbia)—I believe the Australian sovereign passes the same as the English sovereign now in England. At one time there was a discount, but it is not so now.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—My hon. friend, of course, is aware that in Australia, as I think was the case in California, gold enters considerably into the circulation; but as everybody knows in Canada, where we have paper money of very small denomination, going down to one dollar, gold will never enter into the circulation to any appreciable extent. It may be, and no doubt will be, used by the banks and the government themselves, in their specie reserves; but I do not think there is the slightest chance of a considerable amount coming into circulation.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What will be the smallest coin in gold?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Of that I am not absolutely certain; but I can find out. I think the intention is not to have anything smaller than five dollars.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Two dollars and a half.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Power is taken, but I do not think that power will be used. Those very small gold pieces are not found to be convenient. If they were ever in circulation, a man might pay them out readily enough for a six penny bit. I have known such things to happen—after dinner.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Do I understand that the gold coin to be issued here by the Canadian government is to be of the same value as the gold coin of the United States?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And not that of the English sovereign?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Yes, our five dollar piece would be equivalent to the United States half eagle.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Has the government considered the result which might follow from the issue of a gold coin in Canada of the precise value of the coin in the United States? When gold is valuable, and is the medium of exchange between banks and those who are dealing with brokers, it very often occurs that they demand from the government a sum equal to the government paper issued, and called in in return therefor, particularly when they want to use it for speculative purposes in the United States. If the Canadian gold is not of the same value precisely as the five dollar gold piece in the United States, difficulties would present themselves in securing gold here to speculate with in the New York market; but if it be precisely the same value, it would enable them to use it in the Exchange. I will give an illustration of what I mean, and hon. members will understand it better. At one time, during the absence of Sir Leonard Tilly, I was acting for him in the Finance Department, and gold was of very great value at that moment in the United States. Hundreds of thousands of dollars of Canadian bank bills were presented for redemption in gold by the banks in different parts of the country. To such an extent was that carried on, that the reserve was becoming depleted, and after conversation with the then Deputy Minister of Finance, Mr. Courtney, we decided to cable to England to send out a sufficient quantity of gold to meet the demands which were then being made. But the moment the banks were offered the English sovereign in exchange for the Canadian bank bills, they said, 'Oh, we do not want that.' We cannot use that in the United States, because it is not equivalent to the United States five dollar bill.' I then put the question to Mr. Courtney, 'Is it a legal tender under our law,' and he said it was. And I said, 'Give them nothing else.' The result was that the run on the exchequer stopped at once. When I noticed in the debate in the Commons, as I understood it, the issue of Canadian gold currency in Canada was to be principally in coins of the same value as that of the United States, I thought probably the bankers, when they wanted a large amount of gold, would demand Canadian gold, which they could use in the New York market in the same manner as they used the American gold. Whether that question came under consideration of the Finance Minister, I am not aware. Perhaps my hon. friend the leader of the House could tell us?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—As I understand, one of the objects of this Currency Act is to provide a uniform standard of value, which may enable us to exchange our gold coin freely with the gold coin in the United States. If that is not attained in the Act, I think it would be desirable it should be attained; but I understand that it is. When we go into committee I shall be in a position to state exactly what the facts are. I have somewhat voluminous memoranda here, so voluminous that I think it would be hardly worth while inflicting it on the House at this time.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Have gold coins been made in the Mint since it was opened?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I do not think anything has been coined yet.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Except as souvenirs?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Except as souvenirs.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Does the hon. gentleman know the amount?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—No, but I can find out.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Because I had inquiries from Europe to obtain some coins, and I wrote to the Mint and they told me that they had not coined any. The coins are in demand as a matter of curiosity more than anything else.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Very few gold coins are likely to go into circulation among the people. A certain amount of them will be held by our banks, and a certain amount will be held by the government itself for a part of the specie reserve; but other than that the gold will probably only to a very limited extent indeed, go into circulation. Everybody will see the convenience of our having a gold coin of the same value as the gold coin of the United States.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

INCREASE TO SENATE EMPLOYEES.

The SPEAKER—I desire to submit to the House a recommendation by the Clerk, which I should have submitted some days ago, but for the fact that I desired to show it to two or three members. It reads as follows:

Clerk's Office, Ottawa, April 15, 1910.

The Honourable J. K. Kerr,
Speaker of the Senate.

Sir:—

I have the honour to report, should the Senate desire to give to the members of the staff the yearly increase of salary which may be granted to them under section 37 of chapter 15, statutes of 1908, that I know of no one who should be deprived of it by reason of misconduct or neglect of duty.

In the case of Arthur Hinds, clerk in the law office and stenographer? I desire to commend the cheerful readiness with which he has answered the many calls made upon him by the different branches of the staff for his services, and the exceptionally thorough manner with which he has discharged the various duties assigned to him. This statement is made with a view of securing for him a further increase of $50, referred to in subsection 3 of said section 37.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
(Sgd.) Samuel E. St. O. Chapleau,
Clerk of the Senate.

I hereby recommend that the increase of salary referred to in the above report be paid to the staff of the Senate.

(Sgd.) J. K. KERR,
Speaker of the Senate.

I would say by way of explanation, if I might be allowed to do so, that this would have been presented earlier, but the Clerk was under the impression that the action of the Act was automatic, and that it went into operation without any recommendation being required from him. His attention being called to it, he made the recommendation, and if the Senate sees it way to deal with it to-day it would facilitate matters, as the salaries begin to be paid to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Personally I think that this recommendation should stand until the report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts comes before us on Tuesday next. There is involved in that report the consideration of the payment of salaries to many of the messengers, and minor officers or servants of the House.

The SPEAKER—This does not interfere with anything in that report.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It does not deal with that class of servants?

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—No.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I think this report should stand until the other is dealt with.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the hon. leader of the opposition is under some misapprehension. This is simply a recommendation that the officers of the House, as to whose status there is no question, shall receive their monthly pay. This is pay-day, and if we postpone action until next Tuesday it is possible that some members of the staff would be put to inconvenience, and the report of the committee, which has been on the table for some time, does not in any way touch the subject matter of this recommendation. In fact, it is so long ago since that report was presented, that I do not distinctly remember what it contains; but it does not contain any recommendation with respect to certain servants whose increases were not granted last session, and those servants should get their month's pay as well as other employees; therefore, I was hoping that the committee would soon have another meeting so as to present some report in connection with the very important matter to which the hon. leader of the opposition has referred. I think we ought next week to try and meet and be in a position to submit to the House some recommendation with respect to the cases of certain members of the staff to whom the committee and the House last year recommended increases, which increases they did not get; but I think it would be a great pity that all our employees should be put to some inconvenience now without any particular object, because this report, which is to come up on Tuesday, does not deal directly with the increases.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—I quite agree with the hon. gentleman from Halifax, that the report now presented does not touch the question involved in the matters that were dealt with by the Committee on Internal Economy, and which report will be considered on Tuesday next. There were provisions of the Civil Service Act made applicable to certain members of the staff, and there were increases allowed in the several divisions that were adopted, which had to have the approval of the Governor in Council, and that is covered in the report made to-day. It has been reported that they know no reason why the increases that are provided under the Act should not be paid to the staff of the Senate, and unless some member of the Senate here knows any particular reason why this matter should be investigated before being approved of, I cannot see why we should not accept the recommendation. Reports of this nature should be handed in earlier, so that they might be dealt with by the committee, which practically stands as a Finance Committee for the management of all the financial questions involved in the parliamentary work of the Senate. Bourinot says matters of expenditure have always been referred to that committee to make some recommendation under which the Governor in Council might act. It would seem, perhaps, a little harsh if by reason of any mistake in regard to our understanding of the Act, that this report had not reached the Senate earlier, so as not to inconvenience the staff of the Senate. Under these circumstances, I cannot see that the report of the committee is involved in the recommendation. I cannot see why we cannot accept the report to-day.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have the honour to move that rule 24a be suspended, that this memorandum be taken into consideration at once.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I will not object to the suspension of the rules. I must say my sympathies would be in the direction of taking that objection were this report, which has been before the House I think for the last six weeks or more, not in prospect of being dealt with on Tuesday next. I have a great deal of sympathy with men who have been looking forward since last session to getting the increase of salary indicated in this report. I am not disposed to raise any question as to the adoption of the report.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved that the change recommended in the memorandum submitted be authorized.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—May I ask if this report includes the payment to certain employees of money that was voted to them last session, but which has been withheld from them?

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—This report does not deal with that feature of it at all. It only deals with the annual increases.

The motion was agreed to.

FRENCH CONVENTION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (126) An Act to correct a clerical error in the French Convention Act, 1908.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I hope this is not the mistake which proved so alarming to the United States authorities?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I do not know what proved alarming to them; but ultimately they seemed to have swallowed a good deal.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (No. 141) An Act to amend the Indian Act.

He said: This is a Bill to enable the department to deal with trespassers, and to provide for the sale of lands in a more satisfactory fashion. Further explanations I can give when we get into committee.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is more satisfactory than recent transactions on St. Peter's reserve.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I am not aware that there was anything unsatisfactory in that instance.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Not to the purchasers.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—As I understand, the House of Commons, by a large majority, declared that they were satisfied. The object of the Bill is to protect the Indians.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 186) An Act to amend the Irrigation Act.—Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

MILITIA PENSIONS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (No. 194) An Act to amend the Militia Pension Act. He said: This Bill is to enable officers who have had periods of service in the ordinary militia force, and in other ways, to count those towards their pensions. The details are given pretty fully in the Bill itself.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understand that the reason for departing from the principle laid down for pensions is to enable the Minister of Militia to utilize experienced men who are found in positions where they could not receive a pension until they had served twenty years. That is, if they accepted the offer made to them. This Bill will enable the department to take the best men who are not able to serve the twenty years, and who might not accept the position unless the time they had already served is counted for pension.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The hon. gentleman is correct.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think it is a good provision.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It will facilitate the transferring of officers from the militia to our permanent force.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

TELEGRAPH AND TELEPHONE RATES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved that Bill (No. 104) An Act to control the rates and facilities of Ocean Cable Companies, and to amend the Railway Act with respect to Telegraphs and Telephones and the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners be read the second time.

He said: The principle involved here is one of considerable importance no doubt; but what I purpose doing with this measure, and the one to amend the Telegraphs Act, is to refer them to the Committee of Railways. A number of hon. gentlemen in this House, some of whom are not present to-day, have pressed upon me, and I believe a petition has been addressed to this House, the desirability of allowing parties interested to be heard before one of our committees before the Senate finally decides upon this Bill. Ordinarily, this being a government Bill, I should have hesitated to do it; but under all the circumstances, and in view of the representations made, I think it would be a fair and reasonable thing that these two Bills should go to our Committee on Railways, so that parties who think they have any grievance may present their case for a hearing there. Therefore, if the House consents, I will, when those two Bills are read, move that they be referred to the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours afterwards. I am desirous of doing it this afternoon for the reason that the officers of the committee may give notice to interested parties that they will be heard, and I would submit also that in yielding to the wishes of my hon. friends who have asked for this, that a report of the committee should be brought forward with all convenient speed. Of course, the Bill has passed the Lower House, and there will be time enough to consider it; but I wish it to be understood, and it is on that condition that I agree to this reference, that all reasonable expedition shall be used on behalf of the parties concerned.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Can my hon. friend say to what extent, if any, we now control cable rates?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I do not think we control them at all as matters stand. This is introducing a new principle, the principle of putting these rates under the control of the Board of Railway Commissioners, and, of course, being a new principle, as I say, I would not press it, only for the fact that at this late stage of the session, if it does go before the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, I am desirous of having it done at once.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved that the Bill be referred to the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—This is a very peculiar motion. We have had Bills referred to standing committees when they should have been considered in Committees of the Whole House. I do not think it a reasonable thing to send this Bill to a special committee. In the Commons, the parties had an opportunity of carefully considering the details of this Bill. Why did the companies neglect to appear before the committee there?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The companies had no opportunity of appearing in the Commons.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—They had an opportunity of going before the committee there.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —No, they had no opportunity.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—It was a Committee of the Whole House. The Bill is a government measure, and originated in the House of Commons. It passed through a Committee of the Whole there, and outsiders had no opportunities of making representations there.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Why did not the companies make some representations there?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —They could not appear there. They could not appear before a Committee of the Whole House.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—If the companies are so deeply interested, why did they not appear there?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Is the hon. gentleman not aware that a company cannot appear before a Committee of the Whole House?

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I understand that perfectly well, but I want to know why, if the Bill is so important, it was neglected in the House of Commons?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —It was not neglected.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I suppose it will be another case of referring a Bill to a standing committee, and when it is reported back it will be read without discussion, and passed, as happened in the case of the Insurance Bill. I feel that the House will not have an opportunity of really considering this unless members belong to or attend the meetings of the Railway Committee. What I object to is that these Bills are not referred to a Committee of the Whole House for consideration in addition to being sent to a Standing Committee. I have complained of that frequently. Many of those Bills get through the House without due consideration after they have been reported from the Standing Committees. I am not reflecting on the special committees. They do their work well; but members who do not belong to those committees have no opportunity of knowing what is being done at their meetings. However, I withdraw my opposition to this Bill going to a special committee. I hope, if we live to see another session, we will be given an opportunity of seeing all public Bills here, as in the House of Commons, considered by a Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE—I think that the proposal made is a very reasonable one, and I gladly support it. There is a popular prejudice that the rates charged by the cable companies are excessive. That supposition is a very superficial one, not arising at all from knowledge of the amount of business done, or the amount expended. I have the advantage, it may be, of having on one side of me the Halifax cable plant of the Mackay-Bennett system, and on the other hand the cable plant and steamers of the Anglo-American Cable Company. I am quite familiar with the very great expense these companies are at upon recovery expeditions, and the maintenance of a large plant for the recovery of cables when lost. I am told that the dividends paid by these companies are from four to six per cent, which is not an extravagant remuneration for the large amount of capital involved, and for the very great expenditure and risk to which these companies have to submit. Therefore, I think it would be reasonable, in view of that popular prejudice which more or less pervades the minds of commercial people, and also of parliamentarians, that the cable companies should have permission to appear before the committee and state the off-set to that popular prejudice, and that would be by allowing an investigation into the receipts and expendtures of the cable companies to see if the public are charged excessive rates.

The motion was agreed to.

TELEGRAPHS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (105), An Act to amend the Telegraphs Act. He said for the same reason, and with the same intent I move the second reading of this Bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Has any question arisen as to the authority or jurisdiction of the Railway Board over the telegraph and telephone companies?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I think there has been some.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My attention has been directed recently to an investigation into the rates by that board, before which the telegraph companies of the Dominion have appeared.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I cannot lay my hands on the memorandum with respect to it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Perhaps some doubts have arisen.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I think some doubts have arisen.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

IMMIGRATION BILL.

IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole consideration of Bill (No. 102) An Act respecting Immigration.

(In the committee.)

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —As the attendance to-day is not large, if any hon. gentleman is not satisfied with the explanations I make on any clause, I will let it stand; but I think the chief clauses which are likely to cause discussion have been passed.

On clause 31:

31. Regulations made by the Governor in Council under this Act may provide that the obligations of transportation companies bringing immigrants and passengers into Canada by land shall be similar to those imposed by this Act on masters and owners of vessels bringing immigrants and passengers to Canada, including the furnishing of names and descriptions of such immigrants and passengers.

2. Such regulations may also provide that officers under this Act shall have the power to hold and detain railway trains, cars and other vehicles entering Canada until examination of immigrants and passengers has been made as required by this Act; and may provide penalties for non-compliance with such regulations by transportation companies, or any official or employee thereof.

3. Such regulations may also impose a duty upon transportation companies to provide, equip and maintain suitable buildings for the examination and detention of passengers for any purpose under this Act at such ports of entry or border stations as may be designated by the minister; and may provide penalties for non-compliance by transportation companies with such regulations: Provided that no transportation company shall be made liable for the safe-keeping of any person who is in custody of an officer for any cause under this Act, unless such person is on a vessel, railway train or other vehicle belonging to or operated or controlled by such company.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This imposes upon transportation companies the obligation to build immigration sheds and provide facilities for immigrants. Is this new?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —That is new. No. 1 is an old provision.

but the others are new. The whole object is to put the transportation companies decidedly on their metal, and make them careful how they bring in undesirable persons.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It seems to me that subclause 3 gives the government rather arbitrary powers so far as imposing upon transportation companies the obligation to maintain suitable buildings for the examination and detention of passengers and so on. That is to say, the government is practically throwing upon the transportation companies the duties or burdens which heretofore fell upon the government in administering the Act. I am not prepared to say it is not a salutary provision. I should like to know to what extent the government intends to insist upon the carrying out of an obligation of this character involving a very considerable expenditure, I should say, upon the transportation companies.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —That is true; but I may say in the first place that the government propose to incur very heavy expenditures themselves, and the hon. gentleman knows that the transportation companies are not inclined to allow themselves to be fleeced, without remonstrance.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I have no great solicitude for the transportation companies; they usually look after themselves, but I desire to know to what extent this new policy had been discussed with the transportation companies. Has there been any discussion between them as to the extent to which this policy would be carried out?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —On the other side of the border, the United States government have similar regulations, and the transportation companies there have to conform to them. We are merely putting our companies on the same footing as the United States companies.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I understand from the minister in charge, that they have buildings of this kind on the other side of the border?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Yes.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We all know that in the case of large cities, in Canada, the United States government have officers who examine the luggage of passengers going into the United States, and also conduct the necessary medical examination in Canada; so that it is not necessary that there shall be any building inside the United States border for the purpose of conducting that examination, and it occurred to me it might be possible to arrange with the United States authorities so that in cases where they have those buildings the Canadian officers might be allowed to make the necessary examination there, without compelling the transportation companies to erect expensive buildings.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I understand from the officials of the department that there is an exchange of courtesy between the officers covering such points; but my hon. friend can easily see that that is better done by understanding than by regulations.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 33:

33. Every passenger or other person seeking to land in Canada shall first appear before an immigration officer, and shall be forthwith examined as required under this Act, either on shipboard or on train or at some other place designated for the purpose.

2. Every passenger or other person seeking to land in Canada shall answer truly all questions put to him by any officer when examined under the authority of this Act.

3. Every passenger or other person so examined shall be immediately landed unless the examining officer has reason to believe that the landing of such passenger or other person would be contrary to any provision of this Act.

4. Every passenger or other person, as to whose right to land the examining officer has any doubt, shall be detained for further examination by the officer in charge, or by the board of inquiry, and such examination shall be forthwith conducted separate and apart from the public and upon the conclusion thereof such passenger or other person shall be either immediately landed or shall be rejected and kept in custody pending his deportation.

5. An order for deportation by a board of inquiry or officer in charge may be made in the form B in the schedule to this Act, and a copy of the said order shall forthwith be delivered to such passenger or other person, and a copy of the said order shall at the same time be served upon the master or owner of the ship or upon the local agent or other official of the transportation company by which such person was brought to Canada; and such person shall thereupon be deported by such company subject to any appeal which may have been entered on his behalf under section 19 of this Act.

6. Every person who enters Canada except at a port of entry shall forthwith report such entry to the nearest immigration officer and present himself for examination as provided by this section.

7. Any person who enters Canada except at a port of entry may be arrested and detained by any officer for examination as provided under this section; and if found not to be a Canadian citizen, or not to have Canadian domicile, such entry shall in itself be sufficient cause for deportation whenever so ordered by a board of inquiry or officer in charge subject to any appeal which may have been entered under section 19 of this Act.

8. Any transportation company or person knowingly and wilfully landing, or assisting to land or attempting to land in Canada, any prohibited immigrant or person whose entry into Canada has been forbidden under this Act, shall be guilty of an offence and shall be liable on conviction, to a fine of not more than five hundred dollars and not less than fifty dollars for each prohibited immigrant or other person so landed in Canada, or whose landing in Canada was so attempted.

9. Any transportation company or person interfering with an immigration officer in the performance of his duty under this Act, or knowingly and wilfully assisting in the escape of any person detained by an officer, or at an immigrant station, for any purpose under this Act, or giving false information to an officer, whereby such officer is induced to land or permit the landing of any person in Canada who otherwise would be refused landing for any cause under this Act or would be detained for examination, shall be guilty of an offence, and shall be liable to a fine of not more than five hundred dollars and not less than twenty dollars for each such offence.

10. Every person who enters Canada as a tourist or traveller or other non-immigrant, but who ceases to be such and remains in Canada, shall forthwith report such facts to the nearest immigration officer and shall present himself before an officer for examination under this Act, and in default of so doing he shall be liable to a fine of not more than one hundred dollars and shall also be liable to deportation by order of a board of inquiry or officer acting as such.

11. Pending the final disposition of the case of any person detained or taken into custody for any cause under this Act he may be released under a bond, which bond may be in the form F in the schedule to this Act, with security approved by the officer in charge, or may be released upon deposit of money with the officer in charge in lieu of a bond, and to an amount approved by such officer; upon condition that such person shall appear before a board of inquiry or officer acting as such at any port of entry named by the officer in charge, and at such time as shall be named for examination in regard to the cause or complaint on account of which he has been detained or taken into custody.

12. If such person fail to appear for examination at such time and place named, or shall fail to keep and observe every other condition under which he is so released, then such bond shall be enforced and collected, and the proceeds thereof, or the money deposited in lieu of a bond, as the case may have been, shall be paid into the hands of the Minister of Finance, and shall form part of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada; and such person may be taken into custody therewith and deported by order of a board of inquiry or officer acting as such.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That seems to be rather a high-handed power for the government to take and exercise, particularly as to passengers. A distinction must be drawn between passengers and immigrants. There is an interpretation under paragraph (j) of the interpretation clause, stating what a passenger shall mean. Surely it is not seriously intended that a passenger who is a person travelling through Canada, should first appear before an immigration officer and undergo an examination whether on ship board or on train, or at some other place designated for that purpose.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—If my hon. friend will look at clause 32 he will see that this word would cover 33. Clause 32 reads:

32. Subject to any regulations made under the preceding section, the superintendent of immigration, under the direction or with the approval of the minister, shall prescribe regulations for the entry, inspection and medical examination of immigrants and passengers along the border of Canada so as not to unnecessary delay, impede or annoy passengers in ordinary travel.

The minister has a discretionary power in all these matters, and it is expressly provided that the regulations shall be carried out so as not to annoy or delay passengers.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Paragraph (j) of the interpretation clause says a passenger is not a person coming under the class required to submit himself to all the procedure of the Act. It seems to me that a term other than passenger should be used. I refer to the first clause of section 33, which reads as follows:

Every passenger or other person seeking to land in Canada shall first appear before an immigrant officer.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Supposing a person comes from Buffalo to Toronto?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There are passengers and passengers.

Subclause (j) of the Interpretation Act reads:

(j) 'passenger' means a person lawfully on board any ship, vessel, railway train, vehicle or other contrivance for travel, or transport, and also includes any person riding, walking or otherwise travelling across any international bridge or highway; but shall not be held to include the master or other person in control or command of such vessel, ship, railway train, vehicle, bridge, highway or other contrivance for travel or transport, or any member of the crew or staff thereof; or military or naval forces and their families who are carried at the expense of the government of the United Kingdom, or the government of any British Dominion or colony: Provided that any member of the crew of a ship or of the staff of a railway train or other contrivance for travel or transport who deserts or is discharged in Canada from his ship or railway train or other contrivance for travel or transport shall thereupon be considered a passenger within the meaning of this Act.

A person living within Canada is a passenger under this Act.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The minister may be trusted to have sufficient good sense not to put it in force unnecessarily. There may be cases in which it is desirable he should be armed with the power, but he should be chary in exercising it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I quite appreciate that; but we must not forget that many men clothed with a little brief authority and sent to a place to carry out a regulation, act like automatons and exercise no judgment, and think that they are there to arbitrarily carry out the provisions of the Act. Therefore, in framing the Act, we should take every precaution to prevent any misconception as to its meaning.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I doubt the wisdom of entrusting powers to the government and their officers, which are very likely to be abused. I take it for granted that what we are doing is assimilating the Canadian to the United States law. Every few days we read in the papers of most arbitrary and objectionable conduct by the United States officers in regard to respectable passengers going from Canada to the United States. Our officers may be better and more considerate than those of the United States; but they are not all considerate, and I think this enactment is very liable to great abuse. Is the minister in a position to say that any serious difficulty has arisen in the past because passengers have not been subjected to that treatment?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I do not think that has occurred; but I am advised by the officers of the department that as respects the action of the United States officials, seventeen cases have been brought before their notice recently in which the actions of the United States officers were complained of, and over which the newspapers have made a great row, and in every one of those cases the complaints were found to be grossly exaggerated.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Some officers on the border are very particular in that respect. Last year, when I was returning from St. Paul, an officer in uniform asked me if I was going to Canada. I said: "Yes." He asked: "How long are you going to remain there?" I said: "As long as I live." He said: "Have you lived there before?" I said: "For about seventy-five years." He said: "Do you intend to remain there?" I said: "Yes; would you like to know my name"? and he did not say whether he would or not, and I handed him my card and he smiled very politely and walked off. There is a case where a very officious officer might put one to annoyance. I answered him very civilly, and he said I might go.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT Was he an Orangeman?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I did not try him. I did not give him the grip nor give him the sign. I shall act upon the suggestion next time, and will ascertain whether the official is an Orangeman or a Freemason. Perhaps I would get along better if he were a Freemason, because he would not allow any prejudices he might have against the other order to influence him. I was somewhat gratified that he was so carefully looking after the interests of the country to keep suspicious people out.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Any regulations we may make might be abused by indiscreet or foolish persons on a frontier like ours; but the department have asked to be invested with these very considerable powers, and I have heard very little complaint. I think my hon. friends have heard very little complaint of any Canadian officials exercising undue severity on passengers coming into Canada. I think the complaints have been all the other way as against the United States officials.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Not altogether the other way. I remember a case under my own notice during last summer, when I was down in northern Dakota. I might say that in going down from Canada into Dakota, on the Soo line, a United States official boarded the train at Estevan and went through the train, canvassing every person on the train, asking where they were going and what means they had. He canvassed all the passengers going to the United States side. When some 250 miles south of the boundary line, a matter was called to my attention. They knew I was a Canadian, and they called my attention to the case of an old lady who had made an attempt to visit her two sons, who were farming in Alberta. She had been there before, and she had gone down home, to meet the other members of her family in North Dakota, and was going back to her son's in Alberta. She had her ticket bought right through to destination, and had some $20 on her person, but the Canadian officer at Portal turned her back, and would not let her enter Canada, and she had to return to her people in Dakota.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—On what grounds?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Simply because she was an old woman, that was all. That officer came to the conclusion that she might be a burden on the Canadian taxpayer. It was really a case of hardship. I do not think there was any reason to reject her, from a medical point of view. She looked to me to be a hale, hearty old German lady; but there was no question that she was turned back, having $20 on her person to pay expenses, and a ticket to destination. That should not take place again, and I thought it well to mention the incident.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I am very glad my hon. friend mentioned it, because I entirely agree with him that if abuses of that kind are found to occur, the powers granted to these officials will have to be restricted. I hope and believe that these cases are of very rare occurrence.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I would just like to say, in justification, that placing those severe restrictions on our statute-book will probably be the means of making our United States cousins let up on their restrictions. I have known, in my own country, one case in which a gentleman wished to leave our rigorous climate and go to California a few years ago. He was troubled with rheumatism. He was worth some $12,000 or $15,000 in his own right. He was healthy, except that he was troubled with rheumatism. He wanted to go to California for the winter. It happened I was in Winnipeg at the time. There was a party made up, and he was going along with them, on the tourist train, and, on account of suffering from rheumatism, he was laid out in his berth before the train left Winnipeg. A young United States officer came along, and told them they would have to take that man out of the car. His daughter, who was a trained nurse, was going with him to spend the winter in California; but he was ordered out of the car. Knowing me, the daughter came to me and said, 'What shall I do? The doctor says he will never get past the boundary,' and I said, 'I am inclined to think he will.' I saw that officer's superior and finally, after using some pretty strong language towards that gentleman, speaking of it as a case that might be heard of in Ottawa and Washington, if the gentleman was interfered with, he condescended to send a telegram to the boundary line, to let this man pass, I paying for the telegram. That was very harsh treatment. A number of our people go south to a warmer climate in winter time, and I consider this officious interference at the boundary line is barbarous treatment. There was no question of this man's ability to pay. Another gentleman and I went to the United States officer who sent the wire, and said that if they wanted a bond of ten thousand dollars that this man would pay his way, and not become a burden on the country, we would cheerfully furnish such a bond, and he was allowed to pass. Such things should not occur in a civilized country. The treatment is inhuman and harsh, and it is possible that if our Canadian officers enforce pretty rigid regulations, they will be able to force the United States officers to come to some reasonable understanding, and allow passengers such as I have described, to pass.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —In a great number of cases, the action of the United States officers has been exaggerated and misrepresented; but there have been cases beyond all question in which they have behaved abominably. There is a case that is attracting a great deal of attention in the United States, of a gentleman of a well known English family, a wealthy man and the son of a scientific gentleman, who has been consigned to durance vile in an asylum, and whose wife and family have been obliged to take refuge in a place for second class passengers in a steamer. I may say that representations have been made, and are being made through the British Ambassador at Washington, calling the attention of the government there very strongly to the conduct of some of their officials in interfering with passengers.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—In this connection, may I suggest to my right hon. friend who has charge of the Bill, that the sections from 25 down to 33 should be modified, so as to indicate the class of passenger that may be subjected to an inspection of the kind described. Reverting to section 25 it reads:

> 25. It shall be the duty of every transportation company bringing passengers or other persons to Canada by vessel to prevent such passenger or other persons leaving such vessel in Canada at any time or place other than as designated by the immigration officer in charge, and the failure of any such company to comply with such duty shall be an offence against this Act and shall be punished by a fine of not more than five hundred dollars and not less than twenty dollars, in respect of each such passenger or person and every passenger or other person so landed may be arrested and detained for examination as contemplated under section 33 of this Act.

This subjects them to all restrictions. It is surely not the intention of the government to surround tourists who are merely passing through the country with all the onerous restrictions mentioned in the Act.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Oh, it is not.

Hon Mr. LOUGHEED—It seems to me the interpretation clause should be amended to indicate the class of passengers who will be subjected to those restrictions. The class of passenger liable should be an objectionable person coming to Canada, practically an undesirable immigrant. May I mention in connection with the courts of inquiry it is proposed to establish, that there should be an amendment to provide that counsel should have the right to appear before that court of inquiry on behalf of the immigrant.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I am told they have the right.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I do not see it in this Bill. The great majority of those who will appear before a court of inquiry, or may be detained for investigation, will be foreigners. They may not even have the advantage of an interpreter. They may be possessed of means. Every opportunity should be given them to present their case before the board of inquiry.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —If my hon. friend will look at clause 15, he will see that such immigrant, passenger or other person shall have the right to be represented by counsel.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is a question in my mind whether that deals with the same class of cases as is described in clause 33. If it does I am satisfied.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I will point out again that the question involved in this is a very difficult one. I will give an illustration. One would suppose that we might safely admit first-class passengers of all descriptions without subjecting them to restrictions. Yet it has been found in practice that very objectionable persons, gamblers, and persons of loose character, have frequently availed themselves of their spoils, to come forward as first-class passengers. You cannot lay down hard and fast rules as to the class of passengers who may be subjected to this examination.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—You might say every passenger to whom suspicion may attach.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It does say that. If my hon. friend will look at clause three, he will see that it is intended to cover such immigrants.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That may qualify it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Clause 32 gives the minister power to make any regulations he may consider necessary with regard to the entrance of passengers of all classes. If they issue regulations explaining what the interpretation of 'passenger' is, that will cover the case to which my hon. friend refers.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I do not mean to deny that the regulations we pass here may be abused, but we must trust to the discretion of the department to a large extent in dealing with these questions.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Where persons have a right to enter, and are improperly treated. have they any recourse? Take the case mentioned by the hon. gentleman from Marquette (Hon. Mr. Watson). If it was known that by a telegram to an officer of the department in charge of such matters she could have the case properly dealt with, say within two or three hours it would be better. Under the present system, she had to go back three or four hunrded miles. The public should know to whom complaints shall be addressed.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think clause 19 covers that.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—It should be known that a complaint could be made by telegraph to some officer competent to deal with such matters.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The telegram should be sent to the Superintendent of Immigration.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—He is not always here. There should be officers such as large companies have.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I have had complaints against big companies that have taken me weeks and sometimes months to get redressed. I will call attention to the criticisms of my hon. friends, but I must again repeat that you are giving the department power to prevent undesirables coming into Canada, and you will have to give them pretty large discretionary powers. There is no getting around that. It may be quite true that in certain individual cases, hardships will arise.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—You should have a court of appeal.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—That is provided for.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I mean on the spot.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—With such a frontier as ours, that is not an easy matter. Our press and public men will exercise a strict scrutiny over cases such as those mentioned. I may state for the information of the House, that the moment the Minister of the Interior heard of the case in question, he caused an investigation to be made. In the case mentioned by the hon. gentleman from Welland (Hon. Mr. Gibson) I am told that the charge per day by each of the parties detained was fifty cents, and in the case of the child that had ringworm, it was seventy-five cents.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—By whom are those charges made—by the government or by the transportation company? Under what law or regulation are those charges made, and imposed on an immigrant?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Everybody knows that doctors differ as to what is contagious, and what is not. This ringworm was considered by some medical men a serious case of contagious disease. I take it for granted that some cases might be serious, and others trifling.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The most objectionable feature of the case was the fact that the transportation company threatened the family with deportation if the amount was not paid. That was a threat which should not have been made, and which could not have been enforced legally.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —That will be stopped, I am informed.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The transportation company should not be in a position to take immigrants by the throat and threaten them with deportation.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —That is fully guarded against in clause 44.

The clause was agreed to.

On subclause 6.

6. Every person who enters Canada except at a port of entry shall forthwith report such entry to the nearest immigration officer and present himself for examination as provided by this section.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Cases may arise under this which would be a hardship. We have certain lake ports where there are no immigration officers, and there is no one to look after parties coming in. If you have no officer or medical man there to examine the immigrant, what are you to do? Have him arrested on account of the department not supplying an officer to perform the duty? Where an immigrant crosses Lake Erie, Lake Ontario or Lake Huron, would you compel him at once to report himself to some officer?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —My hon. friend is arguing a matter which has been provided for in subclause 8. If you give the department power to keep out undesirables, you may make up your mind there will be cases of hardship.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—The point I raise is the case of an immigrant coming from the United States, and entering a port where there is no officer. Will you compel him at once to seek out some officer to whom to report?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Undoubtedy.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—It may be that subclause 8 will cover that point. There ought to be some officer at each of these lake ports, and the officer ought to have a medical gentleman to examine persons entering that way to ascertain whether they intend to remain in the country, and whether they are undesirables. If you use arbitrary means you will create a good deal of friction along the border. The minister might consider the propriety of authorizing the collector of customs, or somebody at the port, where immigrants from the United States enter, to examine them.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to direct the attention of the right hon. minister in charge of this Bill to the fact that this clause does not professedly deal with immigrants. If he will look at the beginning he will see that it says:

33. Every passenger or other person seeking to land in Canada shall first appear before an immigration officer, and shall be forthwith examined as required under this Act, either on shipboard or on train or at some other place designated for that purpose.

Now, I can readily understand that might be a desirable provision in the case of an immigrant; but where our boundary is coterminous with the United States for something like 3,000 miles, it just comes to this, that if subclause 6 were rigidly interpreted and enforced, it would mean that a man strolling into the state of Vermont from Canada could not return without reporting to the immigration agent.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —It is possible that incidents of that kind might occur; but if you do not give that power how is the Act to be enforced?

Hon. Mr. POWER—If this provision were limited to immigrants, I would not object.

Subclause adopted.

On clause 37:

37. Regulations made by the Governor in Council under this Act may provide as a condition to permission to land in Canada that immigrants and tourists shall possess in their own right money to a prescribed minimum amount, which amount may vary according to the race, occupation or destination of such immigrant or tourist, and otherwise according to the circumstances; and may also provide that all persons coming to Canada directly or indirectly from countries which issue passports or penal certificates to persons leaving such countries shall produce such passports or penal certificates on demand of the immigration officer in charge before being allowed to land in Canada.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Might I refer my hon. friend to paragraph 'h' of clause 3, which provides:

(h) Immigrants to whom money has been given or loaned by any charitable organization for the purpose of enabling them to qualify for landing in Canada under this Act, or whose passage to Canada has been paid wholly or in part by any charitable organization, or out of public moneys, unless it is shown that the authority in writing of the superintendent of immigration, or in case of persons coming from Europe, the authority in writing of the assistant superintendent of immigration for Canada, in London, has been obtained for the landing in Canada of such persons, and that such authority has been acted upon within a period of sixty days thereafter.

So long as an immigrant possesses all the other qualifications required by the Act, should it make any difference where he secured his financial assistance? Of course, I can appreciate the undesirability of challenging immigrants being sent to Canada, yet the standard fixed by our Act is so restrictive it seems to me we might possibly with profit dispense with making inquiry as to where the money comes from so long as the immigrant possesses the other qualifications.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—As I understand, the minister has reserved very considerable discretionary power as to the admission of immigrants. The officers of the department inform me that the particular class meant by this section, have proved very undesirable immigrants. There are exceptions no doubt. Every now and then valuable immigrants may come in that way, but the vast majority of them are not people that we would like to see in Canada.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I quite appreciate the force of what my right hon. friend has said, but as there are so many deserving persons who may secure assistance from philanthropic organizations, which would not be termed charity organizations, it seems to me there should be more latitude as to the admission of those people than is permitted by subclause (h) which I have quoted. It would appear that the assistance must be obtained at the point of departure. Take for instance the case of a deserving immigrant arriving here who may unwittingly have received assistance in the direction alluded to; the minister should exercise discretion on this side so as to relieve him of this obligation, and permit him to land.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think he has that under another clause.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Under this clause, which purports to deal with it, he has not.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—He has very large discretion, and will exercise it in all such cases. I admit—there is no possible use in denying it—that in putting up those barriers for the purpose of excluding persons we do not want, we may exclude some people who would be valuable citizens. That is unfortunate, but my hon. friend knows, and I think the experience of everybody who has looked carefully into the class of immigrants heretofore sent to Canada, particularly by guardians of the poor in England, and people of that kind, is that they send us the refuse, and not the best of their population.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I want to see a high standard maintained, and yet I want to see the regulations divested of their appearance of being inhuman.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Can my hon. friend suggest any other way than granting considerable discretionary power to the minister and his officers?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, I am quite willing that the discretion shall be wide so far as the minister is concerned.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—If it appears there is not sufficient discretionary power. I think the minister would be glad to accept suggestions in that line. I shall bring it to his attention. Every now and then a valuable settler may be excluded by a too rigorous adherence to this regulation. Still, the balance of advantage is in favour of keeping a pretty high standard. From all the information that has come to the department, the class of immigrants coming to Canada from Europe has been immensely improved within the last year or two. We are getting a very much better class of people, with very considerable capital, and people of a higher type.

On clause 40,

40. Whenever any person, other than a Canadian citizen, within three years after landing in Canada has been convicted of a criminal offence in Canada, or has become a prostitute or an inmate of a house of ill-fame, or by common repute has become a procurer or pimp or person living on the avails of prostitution, or has become a professional beggar or a public charge, or an inmate of a penitentiary, gaol, reformatory, prison, hospital, insane asylum or public charitable institution, or enters or remains in Canada contrary to any provision of this Act, it shall be the duty of any officer cognizant thereof, and the duty of the clerk, secretary or other official of any municipality in Canada wherein such person may be, to forthwith send a written complaint thereof to the minister or superintendent of immigration, giving full particulars.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It seems to me the time is a little long—three years. The immigrant might have fallen into evil ways after coming to Canada, and I do not see why he should be deported in that case. I think two years quite sufficient.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Two years was the limit in the old law.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It was quite long enough.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The United States government, after full consideration, advised the adoption of such a provision. They found two years a very short time.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Has the hon. gentleman been able to obtain the statistics as to the deportations which have taken place, and the causes?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—In 1907, there were 4,573 inspected, and 1,172 rejected. In 1908, 2,554 were inspected and 500 rejected. In the eleven months of the present year—that is the year just terminated, 1,346 were rejected.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Are those deportations made at the expense of the steamship companies that brought them to Canada?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—At the expense of the company, I believe.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will those statistics show the causes approximately that led to the deportation?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—That refers to parties who were rejected. The hon. gentleman asks also who were deported. We deported in 1907, 8,825, and in 1908-9, 1,748 were deported. In the eleven months of the last year, 599 were deported. I have not a statement of the causes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Have there been any deported under the two years' criminal clause?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I am informed that a considerable number have been deported under it.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—Were any rejected on account of lack of funds?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Partly for lack of funds, partly on account of physical infirmity and risk of their becoming a public charge on the community, and partly for the other reasons on which parties are rejected.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 51,

51. The master of every vessel embarking outbound passengers from any seaport of Canada shall, on the return voyage of such vessel to Canada, deliver to the immigration officer in charge a manifest in form prescribed by the regulations in that behalf giving the names of all such passengers on board such vessel, or booked to sail by such vessel, and stating in every case whether they are British subjects or aliens, and their sex, nationality and port of destination.

2. If the master of any vessel refuses or omits to deliver such manifest of outbound passengers he shall incur a penalty not exceeding one hundred dollars and not less than twenty dollars for every passenger with regard to whom he has refused or wilfully neglected to give the required information and clearance of such vessel may be refused until such manifest has been delivered to the immigration officer in charge: Provided, however, that the master of any vessel plying between seaports of Canada and adjacent or neighbouring seaports in Newfoundland or the United States may, by written permission of the minister or superintendent of immigration given to such master or to the transportation company of which he is an employee, be exempted from the requirements of this section.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What is the object of that?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It is information as to the number of people that leave Canada.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does it apply to railway transportation companies as well as steamship companies?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It would cover railway companies.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If the intent is to obtain statistics as to the number of people leaving Canada, it would be more desirable to secure these statistics from railway companies rather than steamship companies. More go out in that way than the other.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think the customs officers do obtain such information from the railway companies. This refers particularly to the Asiatic immigration.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 55,

55. Every person who causes or procures the publication or circulation, by advertisement or otherwise, in a country outside of Canada, of false representations as to the opportunities for employment in Canada, or as to the state of the labour market in Canada, intended or adapted to encourage or induce, or to deter or prevent, the immigration into Canada of persons resident in such outside country, or who does anything in Canada for the purpose of causing or procuring the communication to any resident of such country of any such representations which are thereafter so published, circulated or communicated, shall be guilty of an offence against this Act, and liable on summary conviction before two justices of the peace, to a fine of not more than five hundred dollars or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months, or to both fine and imprisonment.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—How is 55 enforced where the representation is made outside of the country? Is the application of that clause within Canada or without Canada?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—We would have no jurisdiction outside of Canada. I speak with some hesitancy; but I think if evidence were presented to show that false returns had been made, under which parties came to Canada, and we could catch the parties in Canada, we could punish them.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 59,

59. If any vessel from any port or place outside of Canada comes within the limits of Canada having on board, or having had on board, at any time, during her voyage—

(a) any greater number of passengers than one adult passenger for every fifteen clear superficial feet on each deck of such vessel appropriated to the use of such passengers and occupied by stores or other goods, not being the personal luggage of such passengers, or,

(b) a greater number of persons, including the master and crew and the cabin passengers, if any, than one for every two tons of the tonnage of such vessel, calculated in the manner used for ascertaining the tonnage of British ships, the master of such vessel shall be liable to a fine not exceeding twenty dollars, and not less than ten dollars for each passenger or person constituting such excess.

2. For the purpose of this section, each person of or above the age of fourteen years shall be deemed an adult, and two persons above the age of one year and under the age of fourteen years shall be reckoned and taken as one adult.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—To what extent is there an inspection or examination of passengers with a view to ascertaining whether the requirements of the Act are observed?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The present practice is that the master shall certify to these particulars on the back of his manifest.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No Canadian officer is charged with that duty?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—There is not at present any special officer charged with it.

The clause was adopted.

On subclause 3 of clause 59,

3. If there shall be a bar or other place for the sale of intoxicating liquors on any such vessel in the quarters assigned to third-class or steerage passengers, or to which third-class or steerage passengers are permitted to have access at any time during the voyage of such vessel to Canada, the master of such vessel shall be guilty of an offence against this Act and shall be liable to a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars and not less than fifty dollars; and any officer or member of the crew of such vessel who sells or gives intoxicating liquor to any third-class or steerage passenger, during the voyage of such vessel to Canada, without the consent of the master or ship surgeon or other qualified medical practitioner on board thereof, shall be guilty of an offence against this Act and shall be liable to a fine not exceeding fifty dollars and not less than ten dollars for every such offence.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—How would the government enforce that?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The master would be liable.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend from Ottawa (Hon. Sir Richard Scott) should direct his good offices towards this. I am prompted to ask why this restriction should apply to third-class or steerage passengers. Are they so much more demoralized than the first or second-class that the distinction should be made?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I would be loath to pass on the degrees of morality of the different classes of passengers. But on these vessels there is a large number of third-class passengers, far exceeding the first and second-class, and cases have come to the department where orgies have occurred and serious riots, which are not at all likely to occur amongst first or second-class passengers.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE—May I ask if the parliament of Canada has jurisdiction on the high seas?

Hon. Mr. POWER—No.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I do not suppose it has; but when the vessel reached Canada if evidence was produced that members of the crew had sold liquor to these passengers, then our courts could take cognizance of it once they got within the three mile limit.

The subclause was adopted.

On clause 66,

66. The Governor in Council may make such regulations and impose such penalties as are deemed expedient to safeguard the interests of immigrants seeking employment from any companies, firms, or persons carrying on the business of intelligence offices or employment or labour agencies at any place in Canada.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—To what extent does the department supervise the employment agencies? Many of them are of a very questionable character. There is scarcely a fairly large city in the west where those employment agencies are not abusing their privileges in extracting money, without giving any value, from unsuspecting immigrants?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT Those provisions are new, intending to deal as far as they can with such evils.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It seems to me it would not be unreasonable for the government to exact a license from the parties who conduct employment agencies of this character, particularly agencies looking to give employment to immigrants; and it is only in that way, it seems to me, that you can bring the necessary pressure to bear upon the proper conduct of such an office. I would suggest that the government should not permit an employment agency to be carried on, except as under license and bond.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I have no doubt the Minister of the Interior will take that into serious consideration. I am aware that abuses of this character have prevailed.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 67.

67. The superintendent of immigration may issue to agents of transportation companies, forwarding and transfer companies, hotels and boarding houses, a license authorizing such persons to exercise the vocation of immigrant runners, or of soliciting the patronage of immigrants for their respective companies, hotels or boarding houses, or of booking passengers. Such license shall be in the form prescribed by the superintendent of immigration, and may at any time be cancelled by him under the direction or with the consent of the minister.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the license were found to be desirable in one case it might be in another. In line 5, it is provided a license shall be obtained. It should be in the plural.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 69.

69. Every person licensed under this Act as an immigrant runner, or person acting on behalf of any transportation company, or forwarding or transfer company, or hotel or boarding house, and every person in his employ, who sells to any immigrant a ticket or order for the passage of such immigrant, or for the conveyance of his luggage, at a higher rate than that for which it could be purchased directly from the company or person undertaking such conveyance, and every person who purchases any such ticket from an immigrant for less than its value, or gives in exchange for it one of less value, shall be guilty of an offence against this Act, and the license of such person shall be cancelled.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—How do they keep check on this?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I suppose if the department discovered that the agent had been disposing of a ticket at a higher rate than the regular one, they would take proceedings and punish the party.

The clause was adopted.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—There are some two or three amendments suggested by the department, which I propose to place on our minutes for consideration, and we can take them up at the third reading.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS from the committee reported the Bill without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (No. 79) an Act respecting the Hamilton, Waterloo and Guelph Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Gibson.

Bill (No. 116) an Act to incorporate the Toronto Eastern Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Ross (Middlesex).

Bill (HHH) an Act to incorporate the Alberta, Peace River and Eastern Railway Company.

The Senate adjourned to Tuesday next at Three o'clock.

THE SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 19, 1910.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

VACANT SENATORSHIP.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Before the orders of the day are called, may I ask my right hon. friend what the intention of the government is as to filling at an early day the vacancy created in Bedford through the death of the Hon. Senator Baker? I notice that the press has persistently insisted upon filling that vacancy by the appointment of the Hon Mr. Fisher, Minister of Agriculture, and my experience has been that where the press has persistently repeated a rumor of this kind it has some foundation of truth. It seems to me unfortunate that parliament cannot secure information of this character at as early a period as the press of the country. I might say in this connection that we should certainly hail the advent of Mr. Fisher to this Senate with a great deal of satisfaction, inasmuch as he would carry with him the portfolio of agriculture. I think it goes without saying that the importance of this Senate and its influence in the country have usually been in the ratio of the government representation on the floor of this Chamber. While I appreciate the strength of the representation individually at the present time upon the floor of the Senate, yet for many years, in fact almost without interruption from confederation, down to a comparatively recent date, we have had in the Senate as many as three, and not less than two ministers, until the advent of the present government. May I ask if he can take us into his confidence and inform the Senate what truth there is in the report in this morning's 'Gazette' as to the probable early appointment of the Hon. Mr. Fisher to this House?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I would advise my hon. friend not to repose implicit confidence in any newspaper reports, whether friendly or unfriendly; and in particular, I advise him not to repose confidence in the statements made by an opposition newspaper as to the intentions of the government. Due consideration will be given to the remarks he has made as to the importance of strengthening our hands in the Senate, and strengthening the Senate. For my own part, it would give me great pleasure to have a colleague in the government joined with me in carrying on the work of this Chamber. There is much force in what my hon. friend has said with regard to precedents, and the fact that for a very long time the Senate had always two members of the government here; but as to the other matters, I am afraid I must ask my hon. friend to continue his soul in patience. I shall inform him as soon as possible when the government have time to consider the important question he has raised.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—When I saw the statement in the 'Gazette,' I thought there must be something in it.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The 'Canada Gazette' would be good authority, but not the Montreal 'Gazette.'

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 52) An Act to incorporate the Nelson River Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Watson.

Bill (No. 130) An Act respecting the Vancouver Island and Eastern Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Bostock.

Bill (No. 108) An Act to incorporate the Rainy River Radial Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Watson.

LAND TITLES AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING POSTPONED.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the third reading of Bill (No. 125) An Act to amend the Land Titles Act.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I direct my right hon. friend's attention to what seems to be an inconsistency in the Bill, which should be amended. It is intended to amend chapter 110 of the Revised Statutes. That Act makes provision that in each of the unorganized districts in the Northwest Territories, the Governor in Council shall in the district determine where the office shall be to be called the Land Titles Office. This Bill proposes to name the place where that office shall be, namely the city of Ottawa. It is quite manifest that Ottawa is not in the unorganized districts. It seems to me that section 20 should have been further amended, so as to dispense with the provision fixing the office in an unorganized district.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The hon. gentleman means that a portion of section 110 should be repealed.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is chapter 110, section 20. Part of section 20 should be repealed, because it is manifest that if the city of Ottawa is to be the place of registration, it is not in the district.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —As my hon. friend has brought the point up, I will let the third reading stand and mention it to the Department of the Interior.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If my right hon. friend will look at the section, he will see that it is quite clear the one provision is repugnant to the other.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The hon. gentleman's suggestion is that a clause be added repealing a portion of section 20.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My contention is that the words 'in the district' should be stricken out. The city of Ottawa cannot possibly be in the unorganized district.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —No, certainly not.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—And yet we leave the expression 'in the district' in the Bill.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The hon. gentleman means that it should read, 'until a more convenient and suitable place can be selected.'

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The Act reads 'for each registration district there shall be at such place in the district as the Governor in Council determines, an office to be called the Land Titles Office.' In this Bill we say: 'Provided that such place may be the city of Ottawa.' Therefore the words 'in the district' should be stricken out.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —We shall let it stand. I move that the order of the day be discharged, and that the third reading of the Bill be placed on the orders of the day for to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

TRANSPORTATION OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS BILL.

DROPPED.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole consideration of Bill (M) An Act to regulate the transportation of intoxicatng liquors.

(In the Committee).

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middlesex)—Before the Bill proceeds further, I would like to offer one or two observations in the line previously offered before the Bill took its second reading. It is a very important Bill. I think the feeling of every member of the Senate is that the liquor traffic should be kept under reasonable restriction, and that if it were necessary to make prohibition effective in Prince Edward Island, that we should offer any reasonable assistance within our power. Before proceeding that far, however, I think the Senate should inquire if Prince Edward Island, through its own legislature, has done all that lies within its power to do constitutionally. I read on a previous occasion the judgment of the Privy Council, in which it was held that, under certain circumstances, a province can pass a prohibitory liquor law. For a long time it was understood the prohibition could only be enacted by the Dominion parliament. Later, the province of Manitoba assumed the responsibility of passing a provincial law enacting prohibition. An appeal was taken against the action of that legislature, and the Privy Council held that the province had the right, as a province, to pass a prohibitory liquor law. Previous to the action of the provincial legislature of Prince Edward Island that province was under what is known as the Scott Act, or the Canada Temperance Act. The legislature felt that it could pass for its own people a law more suited to its own purposes than the Scott Act, and, consequently took the action embodied in the Act now in force. So it is quite clear that the province has a right to prohibit within the province, and to the people of the province, the sale of intoxicating liquors. A larger question, however, was raised in the early history of the discussion before the Privy Council, and that was whether a province had the right to prohibit the manufacture and importation of intoxicating liquors. Both questions were argued before the Privy Council. The question which was asked will be found in appeal cases of 1896, page 365, and was as follows:

> Has a provincial legislature jurisdiction to prohibit the manufacture of intoxicating liquors within the province?

That is going a great length, and to go that far would interfere very much with the rights of the Dominion. The answer to that was:

> In the absence of conflicting legislation by the parliament of Canada, their lordships are of the opinion that the provincial legislature have jurisdiction to that effect, if it were shown that the manufacture was carried on under such circumstances and conditions as to make its prohibition merely a local matter in the province.

So that the judgment, although somewhat tentative in its form, indicates that there are circumstances under which a province might pass a law prohibiting the manufacture of intoxicating liquors within the province. The other question was:

> Has the provincial legislature jurisdiction to prohibit the importation of liquors into the province?

Their lordships answered this question in the negative, and here it is somewhat modified. It appeared to them that the exercise by the provincial legislatures of such jurisdiction—that is to prohibit the importation of liquors—taken in the wide and general terms in which it is expressed, would probably trench upon the exclusive authority of the Dominion parliament; but then they go on to say:

> It is not impossible that the vice of intemperance may prevail in particular localities within a province to such an extent as to constitute the cure by restricting or prohibiting the sale of liquor, a matter of merely local or private nature, and therefore falling prima facie within No. 16 of section 92. In that state of matters it is conceded that the parliament of Canada could not imperatively enact a prohibitory law adapted and confined to the requirements of localities within the province where prohibition was urgently needed.

That was the judgment of the Privy Council in 1896, when the Manitoba Act was argued before the Privy Council. The judges made this observation, which is confirmatory of the view already referred to, and it was this. The Privy Council held that there might be circumstances in which a provincial legislature might have jurisdiction to prohibit the manufacture within the province, and the importation of intoxicating liquors into the province. That was given in 1902, and is the latest judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. From that I would argue, and I think I may do so with propriety, that the legislature of Prince Edward Island is within its constitutional right in passing a law prohibiting absolutely the importation of intoxicating liquors into the island. If the legislature take that step, it would be merely to supplement the legislation already passed prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors within the island, and if it took that step I think it would be quite unnecessary—at least as far as I can understand the matter—for the legislature to apply to this House for such a Bill as my hon. friend from Ottawa proposes, or for any legislation at all. If they took to themselves the power of prohibiting the importation, then the landing of intoxicating liquors on the island, from any source whatever, would be contrary to law, and would be like the introduction into the province of goods that were forbidden by the law to be imported. Liquors would be in precisely the same position as impure or obscene literature, for they could not be landed, or, if landed, they would be liable to be seized and confiscated. That is the position the people of Prince Edward Island would be in if they exercised their full constitutional power. I am in perfect sympathy with the movement of our hon. friend to prevent the importation of intoxicating liquors into the island by the means which he proposes, because so far as my private feelings are concerned my sympathy is with those who wish to get rid of the liquor traffic. But when my hon. friend's Bill is passed, here is the position—while he will prevent the landing or consignment of liquors from the mainland to the island, the Bill does not go far enough to prevent the importation of liquors into the island from foreign countries. If the legislature of Prince Edward Island went the full length of their constitutional right, then liquors would be prohibited from being imported into the island from any country in the world. That is the position I should like to see them in. I think they should put themselves in that position at the earliest possible moment, but, pending that, there is another position which the people of the island could very well take; they might reasonably go as far as we have gone in the province of Ontario. Nearly half the province of Ontario is under local option. There has been a great deal of difficulty in enforcing the law, particularly in the mining camps of Northern Ontario, and in 1909 very drastic legislation was passed which was practically supplementary to the legislation which had been in force in Ontario for many years, to prevent the importation of liquor—I use the word in its widest sense --to the regions north of us, commonly known as the Cobalt mining district. The province of Ontario is not so easily protected against the conveyance of intoxicating liquors from one point to another as is the province of Prince Edward Island, but what was the course taken? I will read you subsection 133a of section 32 of the License Act:

> Where an officer, policeman, constable, or inspector finds liquor in transit or in course of delivery upon the premises of any railway company, or at any wharf, railway station, express office, warehouse, or other place, and believes that such liquor is to be sold or kept for sale in contravention of this Act, he may forthwith seize and remove the same.

The Act of the province of Ontario does not deal with the consignor; it pounces upon the goods, because they are contraband, being delivered at a warehouse or in transit by a railway, or at an express office, or railway station in the district where the sale of intoxicating liquors is prohibited. There is a precedent for you. Subsection 2 goes further:

Any officer, policeman, constable, or inspector, if he believes that liquor intended for sale or to be kept for sale in violation of this Act is contained in any vehicle on a public highway or elsewhere, or is concealed upon the lands of any person, may enter and search such vehicle, and may enter upon and search such lands, and seize and remove any liquor found there and the vessels in which the liquor is kept.

I read in the papers the other day that eleven hundred bottles of liquor had been taken from people in the Elk Lake district, a district under prohibition. There the Act is very strictly enforced. Now, if Prince Edward Island passed a law to that effect, and said that if liquor is landed at Charlottetown, Summerside, Georgetown, or any other port in Prince Edward Island, it comes immediately within the grasp of the license inspector, whom they have authority under law to appoint. It is contraband goods, just the same as obscene literature would be under the Customs Act. It could be seized, and confiscated. What is the process in Ontario when contraband liquor is seized? The inspector makes an affidavit before the justice of the peace, that he has seized certain liquor. If it is for private consumption, the consignee or owner appears before him, and an investigation is held as to whether that liquor had any right to be there. If it was intended for the use of the owner himself, it is released; if it was intended for sale, it is confiscated. That is a very simple law which Prince Edward Island might take advantage of. It is only a year and a half old, and is more conclusive than any other word in the statute-book, so far as a measure can be designed to overcome difficulties. How do we deal with customs? We do not deal with the common carrier or the consignor. When goods are landed at a port, the customs officer takes charge. If the goods are contraband, he forfeits them. The legislature of Prince Edward Island might pass a law giving inspectors a right to examine any package landed on the Island, with power to seize it if it was found to be intoxicating liquor, and find out whether the person who imported it did so for his own use under the law. If the liquor is imported to be sold again, he should have power to destroy or otherwise dispose of it, and let the proceeds go to the provincial treasury. I mention this that my hon. friend and the people of Prince Edward Island may see that there is a very effective remedy for the evils of which they complain without seeking legislation from parliament. Now, do not let it be understood that I object to legislation from parliament if there is no other remedy. I go on the theory that every province should act up to its constitutional limits before asking aid from parliament. But if Prince Edward Island should say to us, 'We are not able under our own laws to entirely overcome the evil which we are fighting against; we want your assistance,' I for one, should I have a place in this Senate, will be most happy to give them all the assistance in my power. The Canada Temperance Act of 1878 applies to New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and I understand that a Bill which is being passed through the Legislature of Nova Scotia makes very stringent provisions for preventing the smuggling or transportation of liquor into prohibited districts, just as the province of Ontario has done in the statute which I have read. There is another clause in the Bill of my hon. friend to which I want to call his attention, and that is the limit which he proposes upon the quantity of liquors that may be imported into the island. That is briefly stated as the five-gallon clause. Whatever may happen to the rest of the Bill—and I may say frankly I am prepared to support it, if in my judgment the Senate think nothing better can be done—as I understand the Act of Prince Edward Island, to pass such legislation here would be entirely beyond our jurisdiction. I read in section 37 of the Prince Edward Island Act the following:

> While this Act is intended to prohibit, and shall prohibit, transactions in liquor, which take place wholly within the province of Prince Edward Island, except as otherwise specially provided by this Act, and restrict the consumption of liquor within the limits of the province of Prince Edward Island, it shall not affect and is not intended to affect bona fide transactions in liquor between a person in the province of Prince Edward Island and a person in another province, or in a foreign country, and the provisions of this Act shall be construed accordingly.

Now, as I understand it, by the Act of Prince Edward Island, it is not proposed to interfere with the importation of liquor into the island, either as to quantity or quality. Here it is proposed to force upon the people of Prince Edward Island liquors to the extent of five gallons Under the Act, as I have read it, they may import any quantity they please, five gallons, five barrels, or five hogsheads. There is no restriction as to quantity. That is the law of the local legislature. Have we any right to say to the people who pass that Act they must not receive more than five gallons? We are perhaps improving their legislation as a matter of fact, but have we a right to improve it? Have we a right to amend an Act of the local legislature in a matter which is entirely within their jurisdiction? Have we a right to amend their liquor Act any more than we would have a right to amend their school or municipal Acts? Even if an amendment is to improve their Act, I do not think we have a right to do so. If we attempted such a thing in the case of the province of Ontario, there would be a cry about provincial rights that would be heard to the very sky, and justly so. The legislature has a right to do wrong if it chooses. I think the legislature of Prince Edward Island was entirely wrong in enacting such a clause as that. What Prince Edward Island should have done was at least to remain silent on the subject of importation; but when it closed the door of every tavern and hotel in the province, it threw the door wide open as to importations from all parts of the world. That is a weakness in their Act. Would they be advised by us to repeal that clause? I understand that in a certain sense the clause was enacted as part of the Bill, through fear that if the importation of intoxicating liquors should be prohibited, the Act would be ultra vires. I know that was the history of similar clauses in the legislation of Manitoba, and our Ontario Prohibitory Act of 1902. We had a similar clause for a similar reason, but with the judgment of the Privy council in our hands, we have now more light on the subject. If I were advising the legislature of Prince Edward Island, I would say, repeal section 37 of your Act, and take to yourselves the right of prohibiting intoxicating liquors, or, if you do not do that, copy the legislation of the province of Ontario, and instruct your officers to seize contraband liquor on the ground, and make such use of it afterwards as circumstances warrant. If you do that, you get rid of the common carrier difficulty. As I said a moment ago, when we are dealing with customs duties we do not ask the owner of a ship or any common carrier, 'Have you contraband goods on board?' We allow the goods to be landed, and the moment they are landed on Canadian soil they are in the possession of Canadian government officers. The Canadian government deals with the corpus. It never asks any question of the carrier. The officer may ask the owner of a trunk, 'Have you any contraband goods?' and though the owner says with a smiling face, 'I have none,' the officer may search and find some in the trunk. Does he pursue the company that carried the trunk? Not at all. He says to the owner of the trunk: 'The goods are in your possession. They are dutiable. I will punish you for having landed them, and if you do not pay the duty I will confiscate them.' He deals with the article itself. Even if the legislature of the island does not take this line, let me suggest other means. Goods are landed on the island by vessels, any of which are subsidized by the Dominion government. They might very well ask the Dominion government to say to the owners of these vessels: 'You are under prohibition, so long as you are subsidized by the government of Canada against conveying to the province of Prince Edward Island contraband liquors. If you are found violating this, you shall pay the penalty.' I think we have that right; or we could say to the customs officers in Prince Edward Island, 'The island is under a prohibitory liquor law; examine every package of goods landed on the island. If intoxicating liquors are found in them, hold them, subject to the order of some clerk competent to deal with the matter.' These are two lines that might be taken. If, however, such amendments are made to the Bill now before us as would simplify the matter for the common carriers, it might get over some of those difficulties.

But my argument is, first, that I think Prince Edward Island should take action herself, either to prohibit the importation of intoxicating liquors, or, second, to adopt the law of the province of Ontario. Then, if having done so she finds it impossible to make prohibition effective, and comes to the parliament of Canada, if the parliament of Canada sees that the need is an urgent one—and I think in that case it would be, then I think legislation should be given to assist her, and I should be most happy to assist in the passing of such legislation. If my hon. friend, however, thinks the matter is so urgent that it ought to be proceeded with now, he is within the judgment of the Senate, and the Senate will have to take its own course. The only regret I have in speaking as I have done is, first, that I appear to be not in harmony with the view of my hon. friend who has done so much for temperance and prohibition, and whose wish in the matter ought to perhaps be responded to readily, by almost everybody; and, secondly, that for the time being it may be that such assistance is not rendered as is necessary to make the liquor law in the province effective. My feelings are entirely one way, and my judgment very largely the other; and it is perhaps on mature discussion in the Senate that one will see the course he ought to take. I have laid down, as I understand, the constitutional law, and I think the sound view, and, on the whole I think better results in the long run will be obtained if we hesitate a little while before proceeding the length which it is proposed to go by the present Bill.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—When I spoke before, I suggested to the hon. gentleman in charge of the Bill that his best course might be to apply the Temperance Act to the whole province of Prince Edward Island, and that he would obtain a good result. I further asked him whether we should have access to the resolution to which reference is made in the Bill as amended, the resolution which was passed by the legislature of Prince Edward Island. It will be found in the Debates of the Senate at page 275. I was glad to find on reference to that resolution that it is exactly in accord with the resolution that I moved. The only demand made by the legislature is not that a Bill of this kind should be passed for the province, but that the Temperance Act might be made applicable to the province of Prince Edward Island by reason of a Provincial Act having prohibited the sale of intoxicating liquors. The resolution was cited by the hon. gentleman as being taken from the Journals of the Legislative Assembly of Prince Edward Island for the year 1909, page 85, and the motion read as follows:

On motion of the Hon. Mr. Cox, seconded by Hon. Mr. Laird—

Whereas, the province of Prince Edward Island has adopted the Prohibition Act, 1909, and amendments thereto, in all parts of the said province;

And whereas, it is desirable to prohibit the importation for sale of any intoxicating liquor, except through the official vendors under such prohibition Act, and except to any person or persons for his or their personal or family use:

Be it therefore resolved, that this legislature memorialize the Dominion government to pass such restrictive legislation in the traffic in intoxicating liquors as will prevent the importation into this province of any intoxicating liquor as aforesaid, to the end that, as regards the importation and exportation of such intoxicating liquors, this province may be put in the same position as counties in the Dominion of Canada which have adopted the Canada Temperance Act, and especially having regard to 'An Act to amend the Canada Temperance Act,' assented to on July 20, 1908, 7-8 Edward VII., chap. 71, paragraphs (c) and (d) of subsection 1.

And the question being proposed thereon. It was carried in the affirmative.

And the hon. gentleman after reciting the resolution says:

It does not appear that it was subject to any vote. It was carried unanimously. This House having enacted the law at the instance of Nova Scotia, there should be no hesitation in applying the principles laid down in that Act to other parts of Canada which desire this protection.

I repeat the suggestion, that the better way to attain the object, and to meet the emphatic desire of the legislators of Prince Edward Island would be to amend section 117 of the Canada Temperance Act by adding a few words to it. Section 117 reads:

From the day on which this part of the Act comes into force and takes effect in any county or city, and so forth.

Then he should add the words:

Or any provincial Act prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors in any province comes into force and takes effect and continues to be in force.

That would undoubtedly attain his object, and the law would be uniform.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I foresaw that this Bill would considerably divide public opinion in this House and throughout the country. The feeling against the Bill is not based on any desire to see intemperance prevail throughout the province of Prince Edward Island. On the contrary, I think the opinion which is marshalled against this Bill is as strongly in favour of temperance, as the opinion in favour of the Bill, because one must not run away with the idea when a man says he is a prohibitionist that he is a true friend of temperance. Very often in the past, experience has proved that to be a fallacy. The best friends of temperance are not prohibitionists, and especially the extreme ones, those who wish to invoke the criminal law to enforce their peculiar ideas in regard to the use of intoxicating liquor. I desire to say, after the very lucid speech made by the hon. gentleman from Middlesex, that this House cannot very well proceed further with this Bill. It has been opposed, up to the present, very largely on sentimental grounds, and largely in view of the fact that crimes are created by this Bill to come under the Criminal Code, which are very ordinary acts in the every day life of man, and I am heartily in sympathy with the principle laid down by the right hon. leader of the House last year, and this year by the hon. Minister of Justice, that it is not the duty of parliament, and it certainly is not its obligation, to create crimes and make every little individual act of domestic or private life a crime to be dealt with by whom? By people incapable of judging. To be denounced by whom? By the first individual that comes along, the first tramp, the first silly person, the first person who has a fad. It is our duty to study this law and understand it, because I say this Bill in itself is the ordinary law; but the sting of it is in the two schedules. The sting lies in the fact that parliament gives to any tramp, as well as to an honest citizen, the right to denounce his fellow man. According to this Bill, any man without responsibility in the community, without any stake in the province, can go before an ordinary police magistrate, or justice of the peace, make an affidavit that according to the best of his belief, that such a person, has over five gallons of liquor in his house, and under this Bill, the magistrate is thereupon obliged to grant him a warrant of search and arrest. The magistrate is further obliged to grant him all the aid the constabulary force of the municipality can put at his disposal, to go into your house, my house, or your neighbour's house, and to find out really if there is five gallons and a half of liquor on the premises. We talk about the tyranny of the Russian laws, but this is the most tyrannical expression of legislation that I have ever come across. It puts no limit to the action of the man who has a spite against you.

Have hon. gentlemen read this Bill? I was obliged to state a couple of weeks ago to a very high and important authority in the Department of Justice, that I did not think there were ten gentlemen in this hon. House who had read the law and studied its effects, and I know whereof I speak. Now that is not fair to Canada; it is not fair to Prince Edward Island, yet we are asked to place this tryannical provision in our Criminal Code. That is speaking from the criminal side. It is a weighty argument for those who love liberty and freedom of action that the Creator has given to man. It is true the prohibitionists say: 'We will take away the corpus delicti; we will take away the substance, so that you cannot become intemperate'. What right has the prohibitioners to do what the Creator does not do? If there is any merit in being temperate, it is in exercising your free will to take or not to take, and the same with all other virtues, and where you take from men the opportunity of offending against the law, that man has no credit either in this life or the next for his temperate habits. Parliament, like individuals, is subverting Divine law in thus seeking to administer the affairs of human life. I will admit that opportunities are provided for the perpetration of crime, whether it be murder, theft or intemperance; but we are not called upon by any reason, or by any necessity of the situation to put into our criminal law such clauses as are contained in this Bill, and I know whereof I speak, when I say that men high in the administration of justice in this country tremble at putting such provisions into the Criminal Code. They say that they should not be inserted in the Code. That is as far as the sentimental and criminal sides are concerned. To-day we have had a lucid explanation of the constitutional side of the subject, and I have felt right along, with the hon. senator from Middlesex (Mr. Ross) in regard to this matter that we are overstepping our power, and are forcing upon the island provisions that the people did not ask for and they did not insert in their own provincial laws. Under these circumstances, why should we go on with this Bill? If I were in order—and I think the right hon. leader of the government would not hesitate to accept the proposition—I would move that this Bill be submitted to the Minister of Justice and to the deputy heads of that department for careful scrutiny and careful weighing of its provisions from a constitutional point of view, and from a criminal point of view. I do not think the hon. leader of the House would say that that would be an unwise step. We are all friends of temperance, some rigidly and some virtuously. I would move, seconded by the hon. Mr. Derbyshire, that before proceeding with this Bill it be submitted to the Department of Justice for examination and report thereon, but I find that the procedure of this honourable House compels the motion which I have made to be offered in the Senate, and that the committee is unable to deal with it at the present moment. Therefore, I move seconded by the Hon. Mr. Derbyshire that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—The course adopted by certain hon. gentlemen who profess to be friendly to this Bill is not new to me. At any time that I have had legislation of a similar character before this Chamber, I have been met with the opinions of gentlemen who considered that another way was more desirable and ought to be adopted. I explained fully, when the Bill was placed in my hand, that it was given to me by a deputation representing the people of Prince Edward Island. I stated at the time that I did not consider that I had any power whatever to interfere with the Bill. There were clauses in it—particularly the five gallon clause—that did not coincide with my judgment; therefore it does not come with very good grace now to be told that the Bill ought to be drafted on other lines. Prince Edward Island probably has had more experience in legislation relating to the temperance question than any other part of the Dominion. It must be at least thirty-two years ago since they first adopted parts of the Canada Temperance Act. The contestation of the Act originally took place in the maritime provinces. The battle ground on which the constitution was fought, originated in the lower provinces, and I reverted to that fact in my opening remarks. It is to be presumed that the lawyers who had been engaged in the preparation of the Bill in those provinces should have given the constitutional question the fullest consideration, and in presenting the Bill to the Senate, I am simply obeying the will of the people of Prince Edward Island. They wanted it in this form. They thought it was the only method in which it could be obtained. It is quite true they wanted the provisions of the Act of 1908. That particular Act was passed without a vote in this Chamber. It referred, however, only to sections of this country which were under the Canada Temperance Act, and they desired some of the conditions and some of the provisions in that Act to apply to Prince Edward Island. They believe that this Bill would meet the wishes they had expressed. I understood further, that it had been submitted to the Department of Justice. I never verified that, but they assured me that they had seen some of the officials of the department, and I assumed therefore that it had met with their approval. Probably I ought to have verified that, and I had intended doing so; but from time to time other engagements prevented my doing so. I think, therefore, it is scarcely fair to the people of Prince Edward Island to be met at the outset now with the statement: Oh, we will pass this, but we will pass it in some other shape, and at some other time'. That is not what they want. They want this Bill; it is what they ask for. This applies to Prince Edward Island, exactly the provisions this Chamber passed in 1908 as applicable to all counties under the Canada Temperance Act. That is a very simple proposition. That is the fact. The Act of 1908 did not meet with the opposition which is given to this Act. It was passed nem con, and all the people of Prince Edward Island I think had a right to say: 'If you have passed that Act, and we have unanimously asked to have the terms of that Act apply to Prince Edward Island', it seems to me only reasonable their wishes should be met. Now, if that is the opinion in the maritime provinces of the true way of meeting this proposition, I would just call attention to the fact that a day or two ago a Bill was carried in the Nova Scotia legislature applying the prohibitory law to all parts of Nova Scotia except Halifax and Cape Breton, and excepting those particular counties that are at this time under the Canada Temperance Act. It prohibits transportation companies or common carriers from carrying liquor from one part of the province, not under the Canada Temperance Act, to parts of the province that have either adopted the Canada Temperance Act or would be under the Act the legislature are now passing in Nova Scotia, because I see by the papers of yesterday that the Bill has passed the second reading already. It is a government measure, and, therefore, presumably will pass. The same principle that applies in this legislation applies in that The Nova Scotia Temperance Act provides that any common carrier, express company, or other carrier who carries, or who accepts packages containing liquor delivered for carriage by or on behalf of any person and not labelled as provided for in this part 1, and the manager or agent of any common carrier, express company, and so forth, shall be liable to a fine of $50. Section 24 of the Act reads:

> No person shall by himself, his clerk, servant or agent, send or cause to be sent, or bring or cause to be brought from any place in this province where part 1 of this Act is not in force, liquor, to any person in any municipality where part 1 of this Act is in force other than to a vendor appointed under part 1 of this Act, or a legally qualified physician, chemist or druggist, &c.

Applying just the same principle in the province that we are applying outside. I hope, therefore, that the people of the island will have their application entertained by this Chamber. They have considered this constitutional question, and are under the belief that this is the only channel by which they can prevent the introduction of intoxicating liquors into the province. As you all know, the facilities for bringing liquors into an island are very much greater than those for bringing them into a place without a water front. The five-gallon provision was, I presume, introduced for the purpose of removing any personal opposition to the measure, believing that the wishes of a private individual should not be contraverted by an Act of parliament. It is their own request. As I have said, the Act came to me from official sources, and I was asked to have it passed in the shape in which it was presented to us. The chief opposition I have found here has been in reference to the common carrier; that it was interfering with him, because, in the ordinary course of his business, he might carry liquor, without knowingly or intentionally doing so. In order to meet that objection, I propose submitting an amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. gentleman from Westmorland, as follows:

That the following stipulation be added at the end of the third proviso after the word 'delivery'—and such notification shall exempt and release the common carrier from the penalties contained in this Act, and provided further; nor will the common carrier be so liable for any breach of this Act then committed unknowingly and unintentionally.

That entirely relieves the common carrier of any liability unless he is acting in concert with the person who is sending in liquor; of course, if he is doing it designedly, there should be no desire to shield him. On the contrary, the House should feel that if the common carrier knows that prohibition prevails in Prince Edward Island, he ought at least to recognize that there is such a law; but I have gone further than that; I have provided that if he carries the liquor unknowingly and unintentionally, he shall not be subject to any liability whatever. So, I entirely remove the objection of the hon. gentleman from Westmorland (Hon. Mr. Wood) to the common carrier, who might, in the course of trade, carry liquor. I do not propose to add any more to my remarks, although I have a good deal of material in my hands. I ask the committee to allow this amendment to be substituted for the amendment proposed by the hon. gentleman from Westmorland.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—We have heard a great deal on this question—a great deal has been said on the antediluvian or theatrical side, on the side which is not practical. I heard my hon. friend, for whom I have a great deal of respect, talk of the people of Prince Edward Island as though they had to be saved. I claim that they are as good and temperate as we are. Why put upon the wall that the province of Prince Edward Island is an immoral or intemperate part of the Dominion, and we have got to save those people? It might be very well, before attempting that, to save ourselves. What is going to happen to this country when it is relieved of our presence by the efflux of time? Is there any saviour to turn up and tell the country what it must do? The whole thing is rubbish. My hon. friend mentioned that the Nova Scotia government were bringing in an Act dealing with this matter, but a member of the legislature said the people would be disgusted with the whole thing, and it would end the matter. If the people would be disgusted, it shows there must be no moral force behind it. Such legislation is not necessary. There is a wave of temperance going through this country that everybody must save somebody else. Everybody in the parish I come from wants to save the other man—they are all at it. They do not seem to think it necessary to save themselves. They do not think of all the liquor they drank in their youth. They cannot drink now, because they are not able to take it. They have the gout, and they want to prohibit others from doing what they have done themselves. They feel that they must break out and do something. You remember the story of the two sailors who were clinging to an upturned boat. One asked the other to pray, and the other replied that he did not know how. Finally, they said, 'Let us do something religious—let us take up a collection.' This legislation is of a similar character. Prince Edward Island, we are told, wants it. It is much better, in my opinion to have the existing laws properly enforced. Make the sale of liquor legitimate, under proper restrictions. You cannot stop intemperance by such legislation as this. As we have been told by the hon. member from Victoria division (Hon. Mr. Cloran) it is creating a crime. Is this to be the legislation of our last days in a long parliamentary career? Are we trying to show to the world that they have to be governed by us? I have had the honour of a seat in this Chamber for many years, and during that time about forty of my colleagues, who were here before me, have been cleared out. If I remain three or four years longer, probably forty more will be cleared out. By such legislation, we are simply admitting that we have done wrong in the past, and we want to prevent other people from doing wrong in the future. I have to complain of a breach of faith in connection with this Bill. When I left here before the last adjournment, it was understood that this Bill should not be taken up before I returned. Faith was broken absolutely.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Not by me. I never heard of it.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Who did hear of it?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I did not hear of it. I did not know anything about it until it was brought up here.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—It was nevertheless a breach of faith, because it was understood that an arrangement was made not to proceed with the Bill in my absence.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN. That is correct.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE. Well, the arrangement was broken. Before we go any further, I should like to ask the Chair what motions he has before him. I have one to make myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is that the committee rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE. I move that all the words after "rise" be struck out.

The CHAIRMAN. That is out of order.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE. I think it is perfectly in order.

Hon. Mr. POWER. I sympathize with the hon. gentleman, and if his motion were in order, I would be very happy to vote for it. The motion before the House is that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again. That is equivalent to a motion to adjourn, and you cannot amend that.

The motion was declared lost.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE moved that the committee do now rise.

The committee divided on the motion, which was adopted.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (115) An Act to incorporate the St. Lawrence Power Transmission Company Limited.—(Hon. Mr. Watson.)

Bill (120) An Act respecting the Royal Guardians.—(Hon. Mr. Casgrain.)

INCREASES OF SALARY TO SENATE OFFICIALS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON moved the adoption of the third report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts of the Senate. He said: Possibly there has been a feeling in the Senate that there was some disposition on the part of the committee to unduly reflect on the officers of this House in respect to their attitude in the matters dealt with. Last year, we tried to adopt the provisions of the Civil Service Act; it was a new departure, and we found a great deal of difficulty in connection with the new classification of the officers under the Act, and in complying with its terms, The classification of the officials of the Senate reported by his honour the Speaker and the Clerk was referred to the Committee on Internal Economy, not particularly for revision, but to advise the House in respect to financial matters which had always been dealt with by that committee. The revision of the recommendation made by the head of the department, was subsequently adopted by the Senate. Later on, the Speaker as head of the department, by the advice of the Clerk, brought to the notice of the House that, under the Act, provision was made for certain annual increases to the officials in the subdivisions A, B, etc. On the 18th of May, his honour the Speaker, introduced, by recommendation, the payment of the salaries mentioned in the schedule, which will be found on page 746 of the Minutes of Proceedings of 1909. This matter was brought up in the Senate on the 19th of May, when it was moved by the Hon. Mr. Lougheed, seconded by Sir Mackenzie Bowell, that the schedule be so amended as to correspond with the classification submitted by the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, the said schedule showing the names of the members of the staff entitled to such increase of salary, and including the names that are mentioned here, John Carleton and others. This was the recommendation made by the Senate which, ordinarily speaking, might be termed the Governor in Council, but, which, in my judgment, transcends the Governor in Council, because, under the Act, 'the Governor in Council' is simply the heads of all those departments who have control of the official staff, and whose work it is to supervise the services of those over whom they have control. In the motion made by the Hon. Mr. Lougheed, and seconded by Sir Mackenzie Bowell, to which I have referred, I think we rose superior to the Governor in Council. We acted as a Senate, which in past history was absolutely self contained, so far as financial matters connected with our staff were concerned. The Senate has always determined its estimates for the service of the Senate, and has never been prevented from carrying out its expressed views, in respect of whatever the Senate deemed proper and right. This amendment to the schedule was passed by the Senate, and the schedule, as amended, was adopted. The total amount of increases under the amended form was $1,604.17. The recommendation made to us by his honour the Speaker was an increase of $1,254.18. For the year beginning September 1, 1908, to March 31, 1909, and from April 1, 1909, to September 1, 1910, the amount is $2,150. The amended schedule adopted by the Senate increased that amount in the same ratio; and the additional names were added by the action of the Senate itself. I am not a lawyer, but in looking through the several sections of the Act I am of opinion that the action of the Senate was in accordance with this Act. Section 38 of the Act says:

> No salary or additional remuneration beyond the regular salary of the office he holds, shall be paid to any deputy head, officer, clerk or employee of the Civil Service, or to any other person permanently employed in the public service, except by a special vote of parliament, in which the name of the person who is to receive the remuneration shall be given.

The recommendation that was made, and which was adopted in the Senate, carries the individual names of the employees of the Senate, as hon. members will find by reference to page 755 of the 'Minutes' of last year, and, subsequently to that, the action of the Senate was confirmed by the Commons, thereby becoming a statute. In accordance with section 38, not only did the recommendation name the individual official to whom additional salary was to be paid, but parliament dealt with it afterwards and provided the money to pay every individual official that was employed in the Senate, as named by the recommendation, and the amendment by the Hon. Mr. Lougheed. On page 87 of the Statutes of Canada, 1909, the Act authorizes certain increases of salary to various members of the inside service. Section 5 reads:

> All sums of money voted by parliament for the financial year ending on the 31st day of March, 1909, and applicable to the payment of salaries or increase of salaries of persons in the inside service shall be applicable to the payment of increases of salary granted under this Act so far as said sums are not required for the specific purposes for which they were granted, and during the financial year ending on the 31st day of March, 1909 and 1910, respectively, there may be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada such further moneys as may be required for the payment of increases of salaries hereunder as have not been voted by parliament, not to exceed the detailed amounts in each case as set forth in the schedules of this Act.

The schedule referred to provides, from September 1, 1908, to March 1, 1909, the sum of $1,604.17, increases to salaries, exactly the amount the Senate passed and approved of by their vote. The Speaker recommended $1,254.18. The action of the Senate in respect of adding certain other names, to whom increased salaries were to be paid, made the amount of that schedule $1,604.17, which is appended to this Act, and additions have been made to that since. The amount in the schedule is increased to provide for the increases that the Senate sanctioned. It looked as though parliament, not the Governor in Council, but parliament itself, off its own bat, so to speak, with the very powers my hon. friend the senator from Middlesex, referred to to-day, could do wrong if it wanted to. The right of parliament, therefore, to interfere with the Civil Service Act, in my judgment, cannot in a sense be doubted. The Act was made to apply to the Civil Service, but in its application here in places that it pinches, particularly in regard to matters which might be varied, parliament would have the right to exercise judgment, and the only one in my opinion who could question the right of parliament to do so would be parliament itself. I am not of the opinion that parliament, having passed a statute, it is within the power of anybody but the people of this country, through their representatives constitutionally to change it; and if, after parliament has determined that certain matters shall be carried out, it can be interfered with by the officials inside or outside of parliament, then the Czar of Russia would be a moderate ruler as compared with an oligarchy in Canada that could interfere with parliament. Such a power, if it existed, could tear up the Magna Charta. In vindication of the right of parliament, your committee believed that parliament having determined on a certain course, there was no other power that could interfere with that decision being carried out. The committee, vindicating the rights of parliament in respect to the Civil Service Act, made the report that is now before the Senate in respect of that reference. It is section 2, of paragraph 2, and reads as follows:

Your committee would recommend that, by the adoption of this report, the action of the Senate in respect to the increases referred to be reaffirmed, and that the Clerk of the Senate is hereby authorized and instructed to sign and issue cheques for the payment of said increases.

The next section involves the opinion and judgment of your committee. There was no difference of opinion on this subject, that the order of this Senate in respect to officials should be carried out and obeyed; and my judgment in that respect is that officials of the Senate should obey even to the infraction of the ten commandments if so ordered. Should they refuse to obey the orders of the Senate, such refusal should be accompanied with their resignation. I do not suppose the Senate would order an infraction of the ten commandments; but I think the pronouncement in regard to the duties of the officials of the Senate, is covered in the section or paragraph of the report, and expresses the views that every member of the Senate would entertain. The fifth paragraph reads as follows:—

In respect to the reference made by the Senate to your committee on the 12th January, of a 'letter,' a 'memorandum' from the Clerk of the Senate, your committee have—
Resolved, That the said 'letter' and 'memorandum,' which appear in the Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate, page 124, December 2nd, 1909, be expunged.

I do not think any explanation is necessary to go with that. It was felt it did not involve any constitutional right or question, and did not add to the dignity of our Minutes, and without any breach of confidence I may say that the oldest member of this Senate made the suggestion that the motion should be adopted, and it received the unanimous approval of the committee. The next paragraph is as follows:—

6. Your committee would recommend that Mr. Trudel, of the French translation staff, be paid as a bonus the sum of $300, for extra work as translator, outside of office hours, during the present session.

There was a vacancy on the staff, last year, to which Mr. Cyr was appointed, but he did not accept the position, and an extra amount of work was performed by Mr. Trudel outside of his ordinary hours. This was reported to the committee, and the views of the committee were that he was entitled to some remuneration, as he had, in fact, performed the work of two men. The seventh paragraph reads as follows:—

7. To remove doubt in respect to the power of your committee to initiate and recommend the appointment of certain of the lower grade of employees of the Senate, resolutions were submitted to the Department of Justice for an opinion. Copies of the said resolutions and the opinion of the Justice Department are as follows:—

(1) Your committee would respectfully draw attention of the Senate, That all appointments to be made under the provisions of chapter 15, an Act to amend the Civil Service Act, section 32, are restricted to a minimum salary of $500, and any appointment calling for less salary than $500 would of necessity follow the former practice of the Senate in respect thereto, and have its initiation through the Standing Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts.

(2) That the chairman be requested to obtain for the information of this committee from the Department of Justice as to whether or not the recommendation of His Honour the Speaker and action thereon by the Senate is necessary for the appointment of a charwoman in the rooms of the Senate, and further whether such action is necessary for the appointment of a page to the Senate.

This paragraph, and the two paragraphs attached to it, are self explanatory. There was some doubt as to how far the Civil Service Act deprived the Senate, or the Internal Economy Committee of powers which previously, from almost the formation of the Senate to the present time, have been exercised by them. The committee thought it better to refer the whole matter to the Department of Justice, and the opinion of the department is contained in the paragraph I have quoted. With these remarks, I move the adoption of the report.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As a matter of convenience—and I suppose the hon. Chairman will have no objection—the report should be dealt with paragraph by paragraph. We can all concur in most of the paragraphs, but there are one or two on which there may be some discussion, and I think time would be saved, and it would be on the whole more convenient. I move in amendment, seconded by the Hon. Mr. David, that the report be considered paragraph by paragraph.

The amendment was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. POWER—With respect to the third paragraph, I doubt the wisdom of our adopting it. I quite concur in the action of the Senate, last year, and I regret that our action should have been thwarted in any way; but the fact is that the recommendation at the close of this paragraph is one which can hardly be carried into effect at the present moment. The paragraph reads:—

Your committee would recommend that by the adoption of this report the action of the Senate in respect to the increases be re-affirmed.

I should not object to that part of it.

And that the Clerk of the Senate is hereby authorized and instructed to sign and issue cheques for the payment of said increases.

If we were beginning de novo, that would be a perfectly right and proper thing to say; but, unfortunately, the question with respect to those payments was raised by the Auditor General. The Auditor General asked the opinion of the Minister of Justice or the Department of Justice, and the Department of Justice was adverse to carrying out the will of the Senate. Should we instruct our clerk to issue the cheques again, necessarily the Auditor General will say: 'The objection which I made to paying these amounts at a previous date has been sustained by the Department of Justice, and I decline to sanction payment'. I agree with the hon. chairman of the committee, that the Senate had a right to make the order which they did make; but I think we had better consider the form of our procedure before we go any further. I understand the view taken in the House of Commons—and I know it is taken by some members of the government—is that the Senate have a right to amend their classification if they so desire. The Commons had proposed to do that, and in order to avoid what I think would have been a kind of humiliation to the Senate to have this order made and the cheques issued and the payment again refused by the Auditor General, it would have been better for us to have the committee reconsider this question and see if we cannot get around the difficulty and provide that our officers shall be paid as we think they ought to be paid. On consultation with the Department of Justice, I think we can find a way out of the difficulty, and it would be better to do that than to subject ourselves to a further humiliation. I am not going to move an amendment. If I were in the place of the chairman I think I should let this clause stand.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON. I do not quite understand the hon. gentleman. I am quite unable to appreciate the point. I do not understand that we are just in that position. I question whether the Auditor General will think it proper to cancel or refuse our cheques. We do not make our cheques on the Auditor General. All he could do is what he did with the House of Commons. The House of Commons paid the salaries, and the money went to the employees, and I fancy while we might be asked to consider it in some way or provide for it, there is no question but parliament could rectify it, and it is the only authority that has the power to do it. I think we can do wrong and ratify it. I think we can tie ourselves up to-day and untie ourselves to-morrow. I am satisfied that in the case of the head of a department or the deputy, it would be absolutely illegal for them to increase salaries, but when parliament meets and says: 'We propose to increase certain salaries', I question whether the Auditor General can, after the provision is on the statute-book, do otherwise than see that the statutory instructions are carried out. So far as the Commons is concerned, there was a reclassification introduced by the clerk some eight or ten days ago. This classification was suggested to the Commons under date April 5. On the 14th, some member in the Commons made an inquiry of the premier in respect to the classification of officers of the House, and said that if a new classification was to be made, they desired to make some suggestion in respect to it. The premier said:

I do not know much about the report myself. I will have to inquire and let my hon. friend know.

There seems to be more difficulty and confusion over the classification of the Civil Service Act than there is over the British North America Act. The provisions do not seem to be better suited to parliamentary life than a red shirt would be suitable for a state dinner. If the Act of 1909 is any good, the statute is there to take care of the recommendation. The schedule is a part of the Act, and the funds are there to provide for the recommendations made by the Senate. We made them deliberately, and there did not seem to be anybody at that time who suggested to the Senate that we were going wrong, because I presume that the opinion prevails that parliament could not go wrong. We kept going in the direction which, in our judgment, we thought was the proper direction to go. We adopted certain resolutions and amended the schedule, and it became embodied in the statute. We named the individuals, according to section 38, which said if any salary was to be increased the name of the individual must be given—not a general provision. We added all that. Personally I would like to see the report adopted.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think it is a pity the hon. gentleman has not adopted the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman from Halifax. We all know there were differences of opinion as to the power really contained in the Civil Service Act to do what we did do. We have heard a good deal about the power of parliament, but my hon. friend seems to forget that parliament consists of both Houses, and the representative of the Crown and the question is whether the Senate has the power within itself to do that which is diametrically opposed to the provisions of the Civil Service or any other Act. I fully recognize the argument of my hon. friend as to the power of parliament. That was laid down very clearly by the Hon. Edward Blake when he was Minister of Justice, when he was asked to disallow some Acts of the Ontario legislature. His reply was that though it might be wrong in the opinion of some people, the parliament of Canada had the right even to do wrong, and they were responsible to the people; but I question very much whether either branch of parliament has the power to do wrong, but that view seems to be entertained by the officials. Let me put this case: Supposing the Senate made its classification and orders were issued as to payment of officials that in effect exceeded the power given to them in the classification of their clerks, was the Auditor General right or not right in refusing to pay these salaries? I remember distinctly when the hon. Senator from Calgary moved the resolution which has been read by the chairman of the committee and seconded by myself. It was done under the impression that the officers referred to in that report should receive their salaries. I am still of that opinion; but the Auditor General declined to pay them. Is it not a fact that the Auditor General in refusing to pay them intimated to the House of Commons that they would have to refund the money? Then the question arises in my mind whether the Senate has the right to vote moneys and appropriate money for any purpose which the Civil Service Act says shall not be paid, as is the provision in one of the resolutions; should we place ourselves, as has been forcibly pointed out by the hon. gentleman from Halifax, in the same position that we were when we passed the original resolution. I would like to ask the Chairman whether we would be justified in reaffirming the resolution passed by the Senate last session, under which the Auditor General refused to recognize our rights, and was sustained by the Minister of Justice to a certain extent—not altogether I am prepared to say—or are we to understand that the appropriations of the moneys which have been set aside for paying the contingent accounts of the Senate can be dealt with as we think proper, irrespective of the provisions of the law? I question very much whether we have that power. It may be argued that when a certain sum is voted by parliament to pay the officials of the Senate and other contingent accounts that may arise which must be paid, that we can pay out of the fund which is set apart for that special purpose in a manner that is directly contrary to law. It seems to me the Senate could not have that power. If the Speaker, on the recommendation of the clerk, would prepare a new schedule, or a classification of the officials of the Senate, as has been done in the House of Commons, and those provisions were within the clauses of the Civil Service Act, then we would be placing ourselves in a proper position. We all know that the Auditor General has extraordinary powers under the law, and is independent altogether of the ministers. They have no control over him, and parliament alone can control and direct what he shall do. If he says to the clerk or Speaker of either House: 'If you want to authorize the payment of certain sums, I will ask you to keep within the provisions of the law'—which I understand is the position he has taken. Why should we, to use a common expression, run amuck against the power that exists under the law, and which has been placed in the Auditor General's hands? I am not opposed to the payment of the sums which were voted by the Senate, but I contend that the Senate has no power to violate the provisions of the law under the pretense that parliament has the power to do wrong if it thinks proper. Parliament consists of three branches, and anything we might do here would not bind the Auditor General, neither would it affect the opinion of the Department of Justice as to what the power vested in the Senate by the law is.

For these reasons it strikes me the Senate had better not put itself in the position indicated by the hon. member from Halifax. The object which the committee had in view would be attained by passing the resolution as has been suggested. Under the circumstances, as the hon. gentleman declines to move the amendment, I will take the responsibility of moving 'That all the words after "re-affirmed" to the end of the clause be struck out.'

That is, these words, 'And that the clerk of the Senate be hereby authorized and instructed to sign and issue cheques for the payment of said increases.' What I cannot understand is whether the passage of a recommendation by the committee without giving instructions by the clerk to have it carried out, authorizes the issue of cheques in payment. Let me give my hon. friend one illustration. Some years ago, a recommendation was made to the Senate by the Contingent Accounts Committee that no senator should be permitted to draw stationery from the Stationery Department exceeding the amount of $5, and if he should do so he should pay the excess. When that question was brought up in the Senate, I remember distinctly the hon. member from Portage la Prairie (Hon. Mr. Watson) took the ground in conjunction with myself, that though the committee had made the recommendation, no order had been passed by the Senate confirming it, and that consequently the clerk of the Contingencies Committee had no right or power to refuse stationery exceeding the amount of $5 unless the excess were paid for. I think I am safe in saying that though the matter was brought before the Senate, no member who had drawn more than $5 of stationery ever paid the excess. The reason was that the recommendation of the committee had never been confirmed by the Senate, and the clerk of the committee had therefore no right to exact payment for stationery in excess of the limit of $5. Is not the case under consideration somewhat parallel to that? Recommendations were made by the Contingent Accounts Committee, but there were no resolution afterwards authorizing him to issue the cheques or to pay them. At the time, the hon. gentleman from Calgary (Hon. Mr. Lougheed) thought an injustice had been done to some of the officials, and therefore moved the resolution to which the hon. gentleman has referred. There are features of this report which I think ought to be confirmed, and there are others which some of us are opposed to. I would ask the chairman if he accepts the proposition made by the hon. gentleman from Halifax?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am sorry I cannot view the matter in the way that my hon. friend, the mover of the amendment, has suggested. It seems to me if we adopted this amendment we should simply be wasting our sweetness on the desert air. The Senate certainly should maintain the dignified position which it has heretofore taken. We claim, in issuing instructions to an officer of this House, to do a particular act, that we believe we were justified in so doing. What are the circumstances of the case? We find that the Senate on a particular occasion, referred to when it adopted the report in question, and issued instructions to have the cheques made out to the minor officers of this House, did precisely the same thing as the Commons did. What was the result? We find the action of the Commons maintained. The Clerk of the Commons issued his cheques to the various officers designated in the report. The minor officials received their cheques notwithstanding the protest of the Auditor General, and are, I understand, to-day receiving those cheques. We find the Senate issuing a similar order, and that order being blocked by the Auditor General. I do not find anything in the statute-book, nor do I know anything by practice that would warrant the Auditor General drawing a distinction between the orders of this House and the orders of the House of Commons. We simply owe it to our own dignity that if the order of the House of Commons is observed, we should insist upon our order being also observed. Another thing I have noticed; in looking through the Auditor General's Reports, I find no letter directed to him by the clerk of the House of Commons, casting doubt upon the action of that House; but I find in the report of the Auditor General a doubt cast upon the legality of the order of this House by our own clerk as to the payment of our orders. True, the clerk of the one House may have been more scrupulous than the clerk of the other about the orders of his House being carried out. I am not exaggerating the importance which should be attached to the order of this House, when I say that when the House issues an order the officers should have sufficient confidence in the House to know that that order is within the law. What further do we find? We find no statement made in the reference made by the officer of this House to the Auditor General that the money in this case had been voted by parliament. I find in the Supply Bill of the 19th May, that this money was voted directly by parliament for the payment of these salaries. Hon. gentlemen will find on page 101, of the statutes of 1909, this particular amount, $1,604.18, voted to the Senate of Canada, for the particular purpose embodied in our report, namely, to pay so much to the first division, so much to the second division, and so much to the third division. Now, the attention of the Auditor General was not directed to that fact. The attention of the Department of Justice, to whom an appeal was made from the decision of the Auditor General, was not directed to that fact. Highly as the officials in those departments, the Auditor General and the Deputy Minister of Justice may value their own opinions in giving judgment upon such a matter as this, they would not venture to say that money voted by Act of Parliament could be thus blocked. But doubtless their attention was not directed to that important fact. The whole matter is in a nutshell. Money was voted last session for the payment of this specific sum which we voted to these particular officials, and we instructed the clerk of this House to issue his cheques accordingly. That being the case—in fact my attention was not directed to this before, I thought we had a sufficiently strong claim without it. Looking at the Supply Bill, there is no doubt whatever as to these officers being entitled to this money.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE. The Auditor General's opinion was overruled, I suppose, in the case of the Commons.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED. No, the Department of Justice agreed. The clerk of our House went from the Auditor General to the Department of Justice.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE. Then how could the Commons pay it?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED. The clerk of that House paid it, taking the responsibility on himself.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE. In spite of the Auditor General?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED. That is what I am told. It simply amounts to this, that all the Auditor General could do was to withhold the credit for all the expenses of the Senate, and I venture to say that if the clerk of this House should carry out the instructions of the Senate, and issue those cheques, the Auditor General would not venture for a moment to withhold a credit for the payment of the expenditures of the Senate. We owe it to our dignity to reaffirm our past instruction and to see that cheques are issued by our clerk accordingly.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL. The hon. gentleman has made a comparison of the course pursued by the clerks of the two Houses. The clerk of the House of Commons, irrespective of the impropriety and wrong they had committed in the classification adopted by them, and without considering the provisions of the Civil Service Act, and the powers given to them, issued the cheques. The Auditor General then called their attention to the fact that the clerk had issued cheques which he had no right to issue, and demanded that the money expended should be refunded. The clerk of the Senate took a different view of the matter, and asked what should be done. The Auditor General told him that if he paid this sum he would be made to pay it back, and the deputy minister of Justice confirmed the position taken by the Auditor General, and also by the Treasury Board in regard to the improper classification by both Houses of parliament. The result is that the clerk of the Commons has been obliged to recommend to the Commons a reclassification of all the officers. That is the difference between the action of the two officials. My hon. friend cites a lump sum in the estimates to provide for the payment of officials in the different branches of the civil service, but there is nothing in what he read to indicate to whom that should be paid. The presumption must necessarily be that the Finance Minister put a sum into the supplementary estimates for the purpose of meeting expenditures of the different branches, irrespective of the parties that were to be paid, and on the presumption that the classification had been made correctly, and that the moneys would be paid under that. The Auditor General took the other view; the Department of Justice confirmed that view, and there the matter stands. I am not going to draw a distinction between the ability or knowledge of the two clerks; but had I been clerk or had I been consulted, I would have said: 'Take the responsibility and issue the cheques, and run the risk of the Auditor General punishing you if he has the power; but you must not forget this fact that Parliament is omnipotent when the two Houses join. The Auditor General has certain powers which he has a right to enforce, not only to punish the officials of both Houses, but to punish Parliament itself until Parliament so changed the law as to deprive him of the power which he exercised, and which the Auditor General had constantly been exercising ever since the office was created under the administration of Mr. Mackenzie.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Referring to chapter 7 of the statutes of last session, I find that the reference which is made to the schedules annexed to this statute, and by section 5, the sums mentioned in the schedules were voted by both branches of this parliament, and therefore I, at first sight, would think that this removes any authority on the part of the Auditor General to criticise or withhold the payment, because the payment is made by authority of a statute sanctioned by both branches of parliament. Therefore, if a vote is taken on the amendment, which has been proposed, I shall vote against the amendment. I am quite satisfied that the adoption of the amendment would not advance us any. It would leave us weaker than the report itself. But it is a matter of consierable importance, and I should prefer for my part, that this debate be adjourned until to-morrow, so that we may be sure that we are proceeding in the right direction, and we shall not expose ourselves to coming against any authority which would nullify the action of this honourable House.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Vote now.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE. It may entail the spending of another half hour in discussion, but I submit it is wiser to spend another half hour than to have to take up the matter again and possibly have to recede from the position taken by this honourable House. I therefore move that the debate be adjourned until after the third readings to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We have spent some time discussing this matter, and if it is to be put down until after the third readings to-morrow, all the government orders will be kept back. We had better dispose of it now.

The paragraph was adopted.

On paragraph 5.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I cannot concur in this, because our 'Minutes' have gone broadcast to the world, and our expunging certain matters which have appeared in the 'Minutes' of the 2nd December, will have no effect whatever. It is an exceedingly undignified thing for the Senate, after four months have elapsed, to undertake to strike out something which is of trifling consequence.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Would the hon. gentleman explain to us the reason for placing this fifth paragraph in the report? Is it a reflection on the clerk of the Senate, because he asked what his duties were in connection with the issuance of the cheques, or is it because certain members of the Senate took upon themselves the responsibility of giving orders diametrically opposed to the provision in the Civil Service Act, placing the management of the messengers and other employees of the Senate under the clerk? Are we to understand that any senator has a right to give orders, no matter what position an officer may be in, after orders have been distinctly given by the clerk that such and such shall not be carried out? If that is what this means, I shall object strongly to having it placed on record. If my hon. friend will take the trouble to look at the 'Minutes and Proceedings' for 1894, he will find the following resolution was adopted:

The clerk of the Senate is the recognized head, with general supervision over all the clerks and employees of the Senate.

That is re-affirmed in 1902: precisely the same resolution can be found on page 223. It re-affirms the power given to the clerk. Let me ask this question, whether the business of the Senate can be carried on properly if the clerk, who is given the authority and who is really the head of the staff, gives positive instructions that a certain employee, who is not a permanent official, is not required—are we to understand that any one senator has a right to declare that that employee shall be kept on the staff, and paid out of the contingent accounts? If that is so, then we can understand the difficulty that must necessarily arise in trying to maintain anything like order or obedience among the servants in the Senate. Before that is passed, I should like very much to know how far the members of the Contingent Accounts Committee have power to do what I have indicated they have done. It is not necessary, I suppose, that this question should be answered; it might place some members in an unfortunate position.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—There is no answer to give to the question. There were no circumstances, conditions, or situations, of that nature. The committee thought, as nothing of that character had arisen, there was no answer to make. It was the motion of Hon. Mr. Miller entirely, and we felt it was against the dignity of the Senate to leave it there. There was no situation that fitted into it, and it did not belong to any condition.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I understand the basis of the letter that was brought before the House was the fact that an employee claimed to have been appointed by the committee, and the clerk maintained that that employee could not go on the pay-rolls until the report of the committee had been approved by the Senate.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—That is not right.

The paragraph was adopted.

On the sixth paragraph.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to understand by what authority the Contingent Accounts Committee have recommended the payment of $300 extra. The Civil Service Act provides that:

No salary or additional remuneration beyond the regular salary of the office he holds, shall be paid to any deputy head, officer, clerk or employee of the Civil Service, or to any other person permanently employed in the public service, except by a special vote of parliament, in which the name of the person who is to receive the remunaration shall be given.

The recommendation of the committee is that Mr. Trudel, of the French translation staff, be paid as a bonus the sum of $300 for extra work as translator, outside of office hours during the present session. I am not prepared to deny that the gentleman is not entitled to the money, and perhaps richly earned it; but I should like very much to know how the Senate can pass a resolution of that kind, in the face of the provision of the Civil Service Act, to which I have called the attention of the House? If the Senate is prepared to adopt that, I can imagine what the Auditor General will do under the circumstances.

The paragraph was adopted.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

THE SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 20, 1910.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

Hon. M. DANDURAND.

MISLEADING ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS.

MOTION POSTPONED.

The order of the day being called:

By the Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE:

That he wishes to call the attention of the government to the fact that the answers which were, on the 17th March last, given to the different questions asked by him to the government, and reported in 'Hansard' on pages 509 and following, are not sufficient answers to certain questions, and that the answers so given to a certain number of these questions are incorrect and such as to mislead this honourable House and the country.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Before proceeding with the first motion on the order paper, I should like to have the answer to motion No. 5, in order that if the answer is not satisfactory I may deal with the two motions at once. Motion No. 5 has been on the order paper for some days, and it seems to me it could be easily answered.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I may say to my hon. friend that I applied immediately to the Department of Railways and Canals for an answer, and unless they have sent it here this afternoon, it is not in my possession.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I think the answer will have to come from the members of the Transcontinental Railway Commission. The question refers to that railway.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Yes, of course; but I must apply to the Department of Railways.

The SPEAKER—I call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the form of the motion. It appears to me that instead of its being a reflection on the minister who gave the answer, it should be a distinct question, calling attention to so and so—putting it in the form of a question—and I would suggest to him that perhaps he had better frame it in that way.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—It seems to me to be very plain. I should like to know if the offer was made by Mr. Parent to the city of Quebec, by virtue of a resolution passed by the Transcontinental Railway Commission?

The SPEAKER—I submit to the hon. gentleman whether it is not better to reframe the question. It does not show wherein the answers are insufficient, and it also casts a reflection on the officials who furnished the answers, by the statement that the answers are incorrect and such as to mislead this honourable House and the country. That is not the usual form in which to bring such matters before parliament.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—The hon. Speaker is referring to the first question.

The SPEAKER—Yes.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—This is not a question. It is the resolution I refer to. I will speak on the resolution, but before proceeding to do so, I should like to have the answer to No. 5, because if that answer is not satisfactory I shall proceed with the two orders at the same time. If my right hon. friend would send the motion to the president of the Transcontinental Railway Commission, he will probably furnish the answer.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I have sent it to them, and have stirred them up two or three times, but that is all I can do at present.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I will let it stand.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I will endeavour to obtain the answer.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—If the hon. minister presses the commissioners a little more they will give the answers, because the questions are easy. They read as follow:

1. Was the offer of $100,000 which Mr. S. N. Parent, chairman of the Transcontinental, has made to the city of Quebec, for the Champlain market property and other properties, for the purpose of building a central railway station there, made in virtue of a resolution passed by the Transcontinental Commission and approved by the members of the commission, or by the president himself only, without authority from his colleagues or from the government?

2. Does the government know that the properties for which the chairman of the Transcontinental Commission has thus offered $100,000 are worth at least three-quarters of a million, and that nevertheless the council of the city of Quebec has offered to grant them for $250,000 in order to hasten the commencement of the works which are to be done at Quebec, for the use of the Transcontinental, and has also offered to leave the matter to arbitration by experts?

3. Why have these offers not been accepted?

4. Does the government, and especially the hon. the Prime Minister, who represents one of the divisions of the city of Quebec, intend to cause the city of Quebec to be paid the real value of Champlain market and the wharfs, &c., which may be required by the Transcontinental, in the same manner as it was intended to cause to be paid the real value of the harbour commission's properties, which were also spoken of for the establishment there of this central station, and this according to the statement of the Hon. Mr. Pugsley, Minister of Public Works, a statement made to the House of Commons on the first of December last, as reported in 'Hansard,' page 858?

5. Is it true that everything concerning the Transcontinental railway, works, appointments, purchase of lands, contracts, &c., is left to the sole discretion of the chairman, Mr. Parent, without regard to the opinion of the other commissioners, according to the statements made by the said chairman and his son, Mr. Geo. Parent, M.P., privately, and at public meetings held in the city of Quebec during February last?

6. If so, is it the intention of the government to thank the other three commissioners for their services and leave the whole in the hands of the chairman, seeing that he states and causes to be stated, that he is the sole master of the undertaking and that the other three commissioners are only his subalterns?

The motion was allowed to stand.

OIL FUEL FOR THE NAVY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE rose to call attention to the following extract from the Manchester 'Guardian':

The use of oil fuel in the United States navy has got beyond the experimental stage, and a Bill has been introduced into the Senate which provides for the creation of a reserve oil-fuel supply for naval purposes. It also authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to acquire suitable lands adjacent to the oil fields of Oklahoma for the erection of tanks for the reserve oil supply, to establish buying agencies and to obtain all information necessary with regard to the cost per barrel of the oil required and the cost per mile of the pipes laid. This latter clause is rendered necessary to prevent unfair transportation charges and it is provided in the Bill that if 'by combination and conspiracy an unfair transportation charge is demanded for transporting oil from the reserve fuel oil tanks to the service tanks at the coast forts' the Secretary will be empowered to construct a suitable pipe line. Section 5 of the Bill reads as follows—The Secretary of the Navy is authorized to purchase as fast as the market conditions will justify 25,000,000 barrels of oil for the reserve supply of the United States navy before the great flood of oil production from the mid-continent oil-field is over, in order that the said 25,000,000 barrels may be acquired as cheaply as possible. The price the Secretary is prepared to pay will be posted at certain fixed places, such prices to be without discrimination in favour of or against any oil producer.

Meanwhile, rumour has been busy in London, and the suddenness with which an active and bouyant market has been created in the shares of well-known and little-known oil companies is remarkable. It is based on the reports, current for some days past, of the British admiralty having given a big order for oil to be used in the navy. The order is said to be for the supply of 225,000 tons, of which 200,000 tons will be provided by the Shell Transport Company—a circumstance which probably explains the recent pronounced strength in these shares—and the rest by the Scottish companies. The following shows the rise this month in the leading oil shares.

And asked if the government has made any provision to supply, from Canada, crude oil for the Canadian navy when constructed.

He said: The object I have in view is to place before the civilized world, and more especially Canada, the fact that oil will be in the future a great factor as a motive power, not only for vessels but for machinery, and so much so that the naval authorities have taken up the question in England and in the United States. I hold in my hand a copy of the 'Illustrated London News' of the 5th March, in which illustrations are published showing the advantage of the use of petroleum as fuel for ships. The argument used is that ships going into action are enabled to conceal their presence. If they had to burn coal, the smoke from their funnels would be seen for a great distance, while with the use of oil they can approach the enemy without their presence being discovered. Also they can transfer the oil at sea from transports without having to go through all the hard work of carrying coal from the bunkers of one ship to the bunkers of another, sometimes in a heavy sea, and sometimes under other disadvantages. By the use of oil, the fuel can be transferred by pipe, and in a short time a sufficient quantity could be transferred from the transport to enable a vessel to go into action. I have here a newspaper article dated London, April 6, which I wish to read for the information of the House:

Herald Bureau,
No. 130 Fleet Street,
London, April 8, 1910.

The 'Herald's' naval correspondent writes as follows:—

With the use of liquid fuel, the greatest trouble was experienced at first both in regard to the system of firing and because so much of the heating power was wasted in the shape of soot. It seemed as if nothing could prevent the dense volumes of smoke which poured from the funnels of the vessels during the early trials. Nevertheless, an extensive oil fuel establishment was fitted up at Haslar, near Portsmouth, and there experiments were carried out with various kinds of boilers, systems of firing and mechanical stokers, while further trials were made both in big ships and destroyers. Thus, eventually, what with improvements in the furnaces and a development in the system of using the fuel, which is said to be a secret, the difficulty with the smoke was overcome. At present it may be said that with the consumption of liquid fuel alone there is almost complete freedom from flame and smoke at the funnel, even when the boilers are pressed.

When oil is used in combination with coal the results are not so good. Quite recently in the home fleet experiments were made for the purpose of ascertaining with which kind of coal the oil should be used to give the best results. In one ship Welsh smokeless coal was used mixed with oil, and in another North Country coal with results, it is said, that some hope is expressed that a mixture of North Country coal and oil has been discovered which gives off very little smoke indeed.

Oil gives no smoke.

However, these trials are yet in progress and at present, although the problem of burning oil alone without revealing the presence of the vessels by their smoke has been solved, the allied one of how to combine the liquid fuel with coal and obtain the same result has so far proved insoluble. With a nation possessing ample supplies of oil as cheap as coal the question would not arise.

Liquid fuel is used either in internal combustion engines, when the oil is vapourized, mixed with air and exploded in the cylinder of the engine, or it may be used in the furnaces of boilers, with or instead of coal. It is, of course, in this latter way that it is used in war vessels, and perhaps its greatest advantage, as compared with coal, is its high or calorific value, while, in addition, it is more cleanly and labour-saving.

Many experts assert that there is a difference of fifty per cent in the calorific value of liquid fuel and coal in favour of the former. at the least, it is claimed, sixteen tons of oil will convert the same amount of water into steam that twenty-five tons of coal will. Something must depend upon the apparatus used to burn the oil and upon the various natures of the oil and coal burned. About cleanliness there can be no question, and not only is labour saved and many difficulties overcome in the process of shipping the liquid fuel, but fewer men are required for firing when the oil goes into the furnaces by the simple process of turning on a tap.

How oil is used.

The mechanical contrivance by which oil is supplied to the furnace is based upon that which was first used in the trials of the 'Surly' in 1902 and indeed, in all the various appliances employed for the purpose the principle is the same. The oil is broken up into minute particles, and its temperature raised as much as possible, while by means of compressed air or steam, it is sprayed onto the fire bricks or the coal in the furnaces. The pipes leading from the oil supply have nozzles fixed to them inside the furnace and by means of the air driven through the nozzles an action is set up similar to that in a scent spray, and the fuel is injected on to the fires and there burned. Once the fuel is ignited, the man in charge has merely to manipulate his valves to insure a regular and uniform feed, a perfect consumption and a steady pressure of steam. With the apparatus in use in the destroyers, there is no waste material, combustion is perfect, and no dust or dirt is carried forward and up the funnels with the hot gases, as in the case when burning coal.

The introduction of liquid fuel lightens the task of the stokers, reduces the heat in the stokehold, and there is an avoidance altogether of the dirt and discomfort where the furnaces have to be fed with coal from the bunkers. Taking in fuel, when it is merely necessary to use a hose and a pump, becomes not only a quicker operation, but puts far less strain upon the ship's company than the dismal and disagreeable evolution of coaling ship. Liquid fuel can be transferred from one vessel to another at sea in all but the roughest weather, and thus its use has solved another problem which, particularly in regard to small craft, has puzzled the naval authorities for many years past.

That is the conclusion arrived at by experts in England. If I am not mistaken, the Admiralty is purchasing in England 1,250,000 tons of oil for fuel. That multiplied by 250 gives an immense number of gallons of crude oil that they intend to use. In other words, it has been forced upon them that, in order to cope successfully with other navies in the present age, science has to come into play. The fleet using oil as fuel, in going into action, has a great advantage. I am going to read a few lines from a despatch dated London, April 14:

Clyde shipbuilders on the admiralty list have been invited to tender for twenty destroyers for the British navy. Fourteen of the destroyers will be of the existing pattern, whilst the remaining six will be adapted for ocean-going service and will burn liquid fuel. The builders, apart from the initial plans, are left a free hand in their designs.

That follows up the subject that I had in view. I sent to Washington and received from the Secretary of the Navy a resolution of the 9th February, which was passed directing the Secretary of the Navy to furnish the Senate with a statement of the amount, in barrels, of fuel oil (petroleum and naphtha) consumed by the navy on torpedo boats and torpedo boat destroyers or other naval vessels, together with the average cost of same per each year, for the last five years. The letter goes over the details and gives the average cost of fuel, which was 91 cents a barrel, equal to about two and one-half cents a gallon; and I follow the statement up and I find on another page that the cost was $1.28 a barrel, which is 3½ cents a gallon. If hon. gentlemen peruse the papers, they will see how alive the United States government are to the question. They have ascertained exactly what oil fuel costs, showing the advantage of discarding coal as a fuel. There is no use going further into the argument. It is well known that the small amount of oil carried on the vessel leaves a large amount of free-board. It is not half as much dead weight as coal, and it is handled very successfully in all cases. I have ventured to place before parliament the fact that we are able to produce oil in this country. In the maritime provinces we have abundance of crude petroleum oil. We have deposits of oil shale in the maritime provinces, and there is a depot at Newfoundland and other places. If we have a fleet, we must be in a position to secure the oil. Our ships must be up to date in respect to fuel and everything else. I do not propose to discuss the merits of the navy to-day; but we have to face the question whether our navy is to be up to date, or whether if possible we should be ahead of other nations by considering the facts that are before the public in regard to oil fuel. I venture to ask whether the government has looked into the matter and given it consideration. It is not forcing the hand of the government, it is merely asking an expression of opinion from them.

Hon. Mr. RILEY—The hon. gentleman wants them to turn on the tap.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Yes, as long as it is not a whisky tap. We can show to the world abroad that oil can be obtained in this country. That will mean an investment of capital, and the development of the maritime provinces, and the public naturally would see that Canada was up to date. We must impress upon the world generally that Canada is alive to the fact that oil is being used as steam fuel, and its attention is aroused in regard to the utilization of it in the fleet of the country. The Admiralty have been in communication directly with Canada with a view to see how far they can rely upon procuring oil in this country. They want to be independent of any foreign country for their supply of oil fuel.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The question which has been raised by my hon. friend is one of very considerable scientific interest, but one upon which, personally, I am not in a position to offer an opinion, nor do I suppose any hon. members would care to pronounce ex cathedra upon it. All I can say to him is that up to the present moment the question of the fuel which is to be supplied to the Canadian navy of the future has not been considered; but I shall have much pleasure in calling the attention of the Naval Department, as soon as we have one, to the remarks made by the hon. gentleman. I am aware that the question of substituting oil for coal as a fuel for the navy has attracted a great deal of attention, both in the United States and Canada, and I quite appreciate the importance of having a proper quantity of oil in reserve if we decide to employ it. That, however, is as far as I can go at the present moment. I will see that the government are in possession of my hon. friend's views.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Does the right hon. leader of the House not put a block on the development of the coal mines?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—How?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—In Sydney? Is the government prepared to take up the proposition of the hon. gentleman from Rothesay for the furnishing of petroleum as fuel for the future navy, instead of using the ordinary coal from Cape Breton and Nova Scotia mines? I think the hon. gentleman is placing a fair proposition before the government. It is a commercial proposition, and one that ought to command the attention of this government, especially if we are going to build a navy and will require a large amount of fuel. The proposition is one that will command the attention of capitalists; but I fail to see in the answer of the right hon. leader of the House that his proposition will meet with any favour from the government.

AN ERROR IN THE MINUTES.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Before the orders of the day are called, I desire to call attention to an omission in the 'Minutes' with respect to a Bill intituled 'An Act respecting the Alberta and British Columbia Railway.' The Bill was reported from the committee with amendments, and there is no mention in the 'Minutes' of any amendment to the Bill. The Clerk at the table is not responsible for the omission. It was the fault of the Clerk of the Committee.

PAYMENT OF INDEMNITIES OF ABSENT SENATORS.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the orders of the day are called, I should like to call the attention of the right hon. the leader of the government to an item in the Supplementary Estimates just circulated, with a view to pointing out an omission to which he might call the attention of his colleagues, especially the Finance Minister. It has been our practice for many years, that if any of our colleagues die during the session, an item is inserted in the Supplementary Estimates to cover the full indemnity. The Supplementary Estimates this year contain no such provision. The item reads as follows:

To provide for making good the full sessional indemnity of members of the Senate—days lost through absence caused by illness during the present session—and $2,500 to pay the sessional indemnity of the Honourable James Domville for the session of 1906, absent through illness—notwithstanding anything in chapter 10 of the Revised Statutes.

That would not cover the case to which I have referred, unless the words 'illness or death' were added. This item goes a little further than any item providing for those omissions in the past. Under the present law, a member who is ill during the session of parliament is entitled to the full indemnity for the time that he has been prevented through illnes from attending, if he lives within ten miles of the capital. This item goes beyond that, and provides for the payment of the full indemnity to those who have been ill and have been detained at home. I find no fault with that. I see no reason why that should not be done, though it is something new. I notice also a difference in the payment of Commoners, not included in the provision for senators. The item reads:

To provide for making good the full sessional indemnity of members of the House of Commons—days lost through absence caused by illness or public business during the present session—notwithstanding anything in chapter 10 of the Revised Statutes.

That has never been included in the past. I am not objecting to it, but I see no reason why these words should not be included in the item providing for indemnities to members of the Senate. The inference that I draw from it is that when it speaks of public business it means business of the government. If I am correct in that, there is still greater reason why the same privilege should be extended to members of the Senate, provided there are any such cases.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I will mention to my colleagues the views of my hon. friend. If it is found necessary to insert the words, 'by death,' that can be easily done. As to the public business, I am not aware, and I think my hon. friend can hardly mention any senator who, during this session, has been debarred from attendance at the Senate by public business.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, I am not aware of any.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I presume that finding there was none and none likely to arise during the remaining days of the session, it was not thought necessary to insert those words.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—I desire to call the attention of the right hon. leader of the government to the case of Senator Sullivan, of Kingston.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It would be covered by the words of the amendment that my hon. friend from Hastings has suggested.

BRANCH LINES OF GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS BILL.

THIRD READING.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the third reading of Bill (No. 17) An Act to authorize the government of Canada to acquire by lease, lines of railway connecting with government railways, as amended.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I have given notice of an amendment that this Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be read a third time six months hence. I had arranged for a seconder, but the gentleman is not in the Chamber, and unless I can get a seconder I presume I will have to drop it. The reason why I should like to move the amendment is this: I proposed an amendment that the rent paid by the Crown should not exceed one-third of the gross earnings of the line. Subsequently, on a motion by the hon. gentleman from Montreal (Hon. Mr. Beique), it was struck out. Not only was it struck out, but a provision which I considered an exceedingly important one was also struck out, that is that the accounts of these branch lines should be kept separate from the general accounts of the Intercolonial railway, so that the Minister of Railways could furnish a report showing the receipts and expenditures of the branch lines taken over. I therefore move that the Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be read a third time this day six months, if any hon. gentleman will second my motion.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I second it.

The motion was declared lost.

The Bill was then read the third time, and passed.

IMMIGRATION BILL.

THIRD READING.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the third reading of Bill (No. 102) An Act respecting immigration. He said: I promised at the third reading of this Bill to give some information with respect to certain matters that have been called to my attention by two hon. senators. I have communicated with the department, and I will give briefly their answers:

With regard to the complaint of Senator Gibson re the detention of a woman and her two children at Quebec, for the treatment of ring-worm, if the statements as made by Senator Gibson are found upon investigation to be correct, the department will refund to the St. George's society the amount which they paid for treatment and maintenance of mother and children. With respect to the same matter I may say that, hereafter, before persons can be deported, they have the right to appeal to the Minister of the Interior against the decision of the Board of Inquiry or immigration officer acting as such, and in the event of their appeal being favourably considered, cost of maintenance, &c., shall be borne by the department.

Then regarding the complaint of Senator Watson, that a mother going to her son settled in Canada was refused admission by the immigration officer, such action under the law as it now stands, would be entirely illegal. Inquiry is being made into the case.

Under the new Immigration Act now before the Senate, the minister has the power, if thought desirable, to conduct the medical examination of passengers before they sail for Canada. The feasibility of such examinations will be given due consideration.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—What about the case I brought to the attention of the government, where fourteen people were thrown on the streets of Quebec, and were not allowed to go to the United States?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—If people choose to go to the United States via Canada, they must be subject to the action of the United States officials.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—But what are we to do at the city of Quebec?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—We cannot help that. We have no power to interfere with the United States officials.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—There were fourteen people thrown on the streets of Quebec last fall. There may be a hundred this spring. Suppose they really had small-pox, surely the government cannot let the matter stand like that?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The department have no reply to give.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—That is extraordinary. I cited an important case. Answers have been given to two minor cases, but no reply is given to the case I brought to the notice of the government. Last fall fourteen people who had been discharged from quarantine were detained in Quebec because they were supposed to have small-pox. They were left on the street as tramps.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—These people had passed our officers, was that not the case?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Yes.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—They were refused by the United States officer admission to the United States.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Why do you not authorize your officers in such cases to take such people to Grosse Isle at the expense of the company that brought them there, and keep them pending the investigation?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —If the people get into scrapes with the United States officers, we cannot help it.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Surely the government must see that the people should not be left on the streets of Quebec without going to their rescue? Surely the government have a right to insert a clause in the Bill to provide that in case of disagreement at Quebec between the doctors, the officer in charge shall take the people back to Grosse Isle at the expense of the company who brought them there, as if they had not been discharged from quarantine?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —When they are passed by the Canadian officials, our responsibility ends.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Supposing the officer at Grosse Isle had, corruptly or otherwise, passed a number of people who should have been detained there because of their sickness?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Then complaint should be made to the Department of Immigration, that the officer had misconducted himself.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—But if the people are really sick, what will happen?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I do not see how we can help it.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I think that the government can do it easily. Just add a clause to the Bill, that in cases of disagreement between the doctors, the immigrants shall be taken back to Grosse Isle at the expense of the people who brought them there. The government would incur no responsibility, and the city of Quebec and those people would be safe. And these people will be stopped. Everybody will be afraid of them if they are allowed to go on the street, they will have to tramp the streets. If the government would adopt an amendment of that kind it would remedy the evil. Insert a clause that if there is a disagreement at Quebec before they disembark there, after they have passed Grosse Ile, giving our officials authority to send these people to the Quebec hospital as immigrants, or to Grosse Isle at the expense of the company who brought them. The government will accept no responsibility, and everybody will be safe. The government will be to blame if they do not do that.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The department must take the responsibility.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I have had a little experience of these matters, and I think the hon. gentleman from Quebec is perfectly within his rights and perfectly justified in bringing this matter to the notice of the government. It was his duty to protest to this honourable House against the landing of immigrants under the circumstances narrated. Montreal and Quebec are the two receiving ports for the Dominion in the summer time, and I for one want no immigrants landed in Montreal who are not receptible, or who are undesirable, and I think the hon. gentleman from Quebec takes the same position that I do. We want no such immigrants, whether by the fault of the company who brings them here, by the fault of this House or by the fault of the immigrant agent. I think the principle stated by the hon. senator from Quebec is very fair. He cited a case where fourteen people were passed by the Canadian medical officer as desirable and admittable. I am not going to accuse the medical officers of partiality in the matter, but they, knowing that these people were not going to remain in Canada, gave them a clean bill of health subject to examination by the United States officer, and what is the result? The United States officer says to the Canadian officer, 'your report is not correct, these people are diseased, and we do not want them in the United States.' What is the government of Canada to do in that regard? They do not come to Canada for the purpose of remaining here. Is the city of Montreal or Quebec obliged to keep these people in hospitals or poor houses?

There is the obligation thrown on the city of Montreal or the city of Quebec to keep them.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —There is ample provision for deporting all such people, and you can invoke the law for that purpose.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—If they have a clean bill of health, you cannot deport them.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —If they are undesirable, and likely to become a charge on the people of Canada, you can deport them.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Who are the judges of that?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The department are the judges of that matter.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The medical officer?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The medical officer simply reports on the state of their health; that is all he reports upon.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—It is on that ground the hon. senator from Quebec has taken his objection, that these people have been passed from the quarantine as clean and in good health. The doctors cannot pass them as having the required amount of money.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —If the hon. gentleman chooses to represent to the department that these people are undesirable immigrants, and if the department so consider, it can have them deported under the existing law. That can be done any time within two years.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I am not here as a detective. I am here as laying down a principle of law and nothing else.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The hon. gentleman can move his amendment.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I am moving no amendment. I am simply sustaining the position taken by the hon. gentleman from Quebec, that the government has no right to place on our shoulders either in the city of Montreal or Quebec, immigrants who are rejected by the United States officers after being passed by the Canadian officers. When our Canadian officers pass them at quarantine, and say they are desirable as far as health is concerned, and the United States officer comes in and says, 'No they are not,' who is going to take care of them? I have no grievance against the government, but I want the government to understand that the city of Montreal must not be made to pay for the maintenance of these people, and I am with the hon. senator from Quebec in saying the same thing, that when such immigrants are cast on our shores that the city of Quebec shall not be made to care for them. There is the whole question: who is to pay for the maintenance of these people? Charity if you will; but I am not talking of charity. I am talking of principles of legislation, and the hon. gentleman from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette) has raised a valid objection because I know of many such immigrants who come to Montreal and our jails and charitable institutions are obliged to maintain them. I suppose the same thing happens in Quebec. It is not a question of party politics, it is a question of administration, and I submit to the right hon. leader of the House that the position taken by the hon. gentleman from Grandville is properly taken. As representing the city of Montreal, where hundreds of thousands of people are coming that way, I submit that we should not be burdened with keeping such people when it is the duty of the Dominion government to look after them.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (British Columbia)—The contention of the hon. gentleman from Quebec resolves itself into a question of charity altogether. I believe there is no legal obligation on the Dominion to support these people, neither is there any obligation on the city of Quebec or Montreal, to keep them. It is a matter of charity. It is a question of humanity. These people are thrown on our shores. Who is to look after them and feed them? It is true that the United States officials have rejected them. I suppose something was done for them by Quebec or Montreal, and if the government would see fit to recoup these cities for the expenses they were put to, it would be a very good thing, even if they do not see it is a case where there is no legal obligation on the part of the Dominion. Perhaps the right hon. gentleman will call the attention of the Minister of the Interior to this very unfortunate question.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —As I understand the law, any immigrant who is likely to become a charge on the people of this Dominion can be forthwith deported by the department. It is a question of administration by the department.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (British Columbia)—Before the Bill is read a third time, I want to direct the attention of the minister to clause 3 of the Bill, page 5. Attention was called to it previously by the hon. gentleman from Calgary; it seems to me to be the most extraordinary clause of the Bill. It reads:

(h) Immigrants to whom money has been given or loaned by any charitable organization for the purpose of enabling them to qualify for landing in Canada under this Act, or whose passage to Canada has been paid wholly or in part by any charitable organization, or out of public moneys, unless it is shown that the authority in writing of the superintendent of immigration, or in case of persons coming from Europe, the authority in writing of the assistant superintendent of immigration for Canada, in London, has been obtained for the landing in Canada of such persons, and that such authority has been acted upon within a period of sixty days thereafter.

We know that many young men have no money. Money is given them by their friends or parents, or they borrow money, and because they have this money, borrowed or loaned, they are not permitted to land. I can understand the last section, where men are sent out to charitable organizations, they should not be allowed to remain. But here is the case of a person who has been given the money or borrowed it to come out to Canada, and is not allowed to land. Surely that is not the meaning of the Bill. But these are the words in black and white, on page 5 of the Bill.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —That is designed to deal with a particular case which has been found to exist, that a sum such as is required by the law had been handed to one man, and as soon as he landed was passed to another man, so that one twenty-five dollar bill would let in a dozen.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—It is not a question of charge at all. I do not wish to put a charge on the Dominion government; it is a question of public nuisance. Public health is at stake. I would suggest that as soon as there is a disagreement between the doctors at Quebec, the government should compel the company to take such immigrants back to Grosse Ile at their expense. I will prepare an amendment, if the government will accept it. It is in the interest of those people brought to our shore. They may be millionaires, but if they are stopped at Quebec nobody will receive them if they are supposed to be sick. The railway companies will not take them to the United States, because they will be refused as being sick. Therefore the only solution without placing a cent of charge on the government or Quebec City, is to compel the company who brought these immigrants to keep them on board, or send them back to Grosse Isle, and they shall have their recourse thereafter against the party who compelled them to stay there.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I will call the attention of the department to what the hon. gentleman suggests; but I do not think they will alter their policy.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I am sure if such a case should happen in Halifax or St. John it would not be tolerated, and the amendment would be adopted. I am prepared to state that.

The motion was agreed to, and the amendments were adopted and concurred in.

The Bill was then read a third time and passed.

LANDS TITLES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING POSTPONED.

The order of the day being called;

Third reading Bill (No. 125) an Act to amend the Land Titles Act—

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—With respect to this Bill I think the hon. gentleman from Calgary is right, that the words he speaks of in section 20 might be eliminated; but in eliminating them it might be necessary to put in some other words so as to show that if the office were established at Ottawa and afterwards removed, it must be removed to some place within the district; otherwise it is possible, though it would never be likely to happen, that in moving it to another place it might be placed in some inconvenient position.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would simply suggest or point out to my hon. friend the inconsistency of the provisions. I am not concerned as to it one way or the other, except as to the desirability of an amendment of this kind being in harmony with the Act. Does my hon. friend propose moving the third reading of the Bill as it is?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I was going to propose moving the third reading of the Bill, striking out the words in the earlier part of the section, clause 20, 'in the district', but I think that some words should be added to show that if the office were removed from Ottawa it should be removed to some place within the district.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I do not think so, for this reason. You amend the Act by providing that in Ottawa shall be the registration office. When the time arrives to change it from Ottawa, you will have to repeal that clause, and you can then add anything you choose.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think it had better be enacted that when it leaves Ottawa it be moved to some place in the district. I move that the order be discharged and that it be placed on the Orders of the Day for to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 150) an Act respecting the Restigouche Boom Company, and to change its name to 'The Restigouche Log Driving and Boom Company'.—Hon. Mr. Thompson.

SECOND READING.

Bill (HHH) An Act to incorporate the Alberta, Peace River and Eastern River Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Watson.

Bill (No. 79) An Act respecting the Hamilton, Waterloo, and Guelph Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Gibson.

Bill (No. 116) An Act to incorporate the Toronto Eastern Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Ross, Middlesex.

GAS INSPECTION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 132) An Act to amend the Gas Inspection Act.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 3,

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understand this clause reduces the standard from three to two, and from four to three, which would be one degree in favour of the consumer, and one degree as against the manufacturer. That is for the purpose, I suppose, of making the meter more correct?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Yes, more correct. At present a meter is passed if the error is four per cent, and this reduces it.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 4,

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is there any change made in the lighting power? It would be much better if the standard were made 18 instead of 16. Some time ago, I was looking over a report on the lighting power of nearly all the lighting companies in Ontario, and I found that a large number exceeded the standard, which is 16. Some go much higher than that. I think the strongest and most powerful light was manufactured in Napanee.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I believe it was.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—A large number go as high as 18 c.p., while the standard in the past has been 16. It would be much better if there were a uniform standard of 18. Of course when gas is manufactured from crude oil, it may be made so strong as to become offensive. I would not ask the hon. gentleman to change this Bill, but it would be well if the department would make it a uniform standard not lower than 18.

Rt. Hon Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I dare say my hon. friend's view is substantially correct, and in the interest of the consumer. I am glad to find that the Napanee gas, which I know something about, is a good article. My impression is that the Act gives the authorities power to amend the standards if they see fit.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think not. Upon inquiry, I find that the gas produced in Napanee is so strong that they have to reduce the power.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 180) An Act to amend the Royal Military College Act.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What is the increase?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The present amount expended is $24,000. This would give an opportuity of raising the salaries of some officials, not exceeding $6,000.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will my hon. friend say how they got over the present statutory restriction?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Because a large part of the officials are not paid under the statute. A very considerable portion will be brought in now that were not included under the old Act.

Hon. Mr. GILLMOR, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

ACQUISITION AND SALE OF PUBLIC LANDS.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 181) An Act to authorize the sale or other disposal of certain public lands, and the acquisition of certain other lands in or in the vicinity of the cities of Toronto and Winnipeg respectively.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 1.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think the hon. gentleman was asked at the second reading how far the Baby farm is from the city of Toronto?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I think it is within a couple of miles.

The SPEAKER—It lies within the extended limits. It is at Toronto Junction, near the Humber river.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Have the lands near Toronto or Winnipeg, which will be required in substitution of these being sold, been selected?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I think they have an option on some, but I do not think they have concluded any bargain.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Because it is well known that the moment lands are required by the government prices go up.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The department is keenly alive to the fact and are quietly obtaining options, I believe.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Can my hon. friend say what the government will now do for rifle ranges if these two are disposed of?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —One was not a rifle range, and was never intended for a rifle range. They have a rifle range in Toronto. In the case of Winnipeg, the purchase money received for the land they are selling is specifically ear-marked for the purpose of a rifle range at or near Winnipeg. It could be only used for that purpose.

Hon. Mr. McKAY (Truro) reported the Bill without amendments.

GLASSWARE TESTS BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on Bill (No. 184) an Act to provide for the Testing of Glassware used in connection with Milk Tests.

(In the Committee).

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What department will administer this Act? Is it the Department of Agriculture or Inland Revenue?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —It is the Department of Agriculture, I believe.

The CHAIRMAN—Administered by Mr. Ruddick, the chief of the Dairy Department.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

CUSTOMS AND FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 138) an Act to amend the Customs and Fisheries Protection Act.

(In the Committee).

On clause 1.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think there should be some little explanation of this. It seems a rather remarkable thing that whereas the Exchequer Court rules govern generally, the Superior Court of a province, which is a court, notwithstanding its name, recognized as being inferior to the Exchequer Court should have the right to make rules to govern the procedure in that court.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The reason is this: The statute relating to the protection of customs and fisheries, chapter 47, Revised Statutes of Canada, provides that in the case of the seizure of goods, or of a ship, every penalty of forfeiture may be recovered, or enforced in the Exchequer Court, on its Admiralty side, or in any Superior Court in the province, within which the cause of prosecution arose. Pursuant to that provision of the statute, the Exchequer Court has promulgated its rules of procedure, but some of the provincial courts, and possibly all of them, have not done anything of that nature. The result has been that when proceedings to enforce a penalty or forfeiture of this character have been instituted in the provincial courts there has been no practice laid down by any rules which could be followed, and such proceedings have, in consequence, in some instances, proved nugatory, and the advantage of being able to resort to provincial courts has been thus practically taken away. This Bill proposes to remedy that defect by adding as a subsection to the section I have referred to, a provision that in so far as there are no general rules made by the Superior Court of any province, the practice and procedure in cases of this character in the provincial court shall be regulated by the practice and procedure for the time being in force in the Exchequer Court.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. BOYER reported the Bill without amendment.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING MOVED.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT moved the second reading of Bill (CCC) An Act to amend the Criminal Code.

He said: The object of this Bill is as stated in the title, to amend the Criminal Code. The sections which are sought to be amended are sections 497 and 498. Those two sections, with the section which precedes them, and some following sections, all deal and are connected with offences against trade and breaches of contract, the two sections in particular having to deal with combinations in restraint of trade. Section 496 reads:

A conspiracy in restraint of trade is an agreement between two or more persons to do or procure to be done, an unlawful act in restraint of trade.

Section 497 reads as follows:

The purposes of a trade union are not, by reason merely that they are in restraint of trade, unlawful within the meaning of the last preceding section.

Section 498 reads:

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a penalty not exceeding four thousand dollars and not less than two hundred dollars or to two years' imprisonment, or, if a corporation, is liable to a penalty not exceeding ten thousand dollars, and not less than one thousand dollars, who conspires, combines, agrees or arranges with any other person, or with any railway, steamship, steamboat or transportation company—

(a) To unduly limit the facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing and dealing in any article or commodity which may be a subject of trade or commerce, or,

(b) To restrain or injure trade or commerce in relation to any such article or commodity; or,

(c) To unduly prevent, limit or lessen the manufacture or production of any such article or commodity, or to unreasonably enhance the price thereof; or,

(d) To unduly prevent or lessen competition in the production, manufacture, purchase, barter, sale, transportation, or supply of any such article or commodity, or in the price of insurance upon person or property.

2. Nothing in this section shall be construed to apply to combination of workmen or employees for their own reasonable protection of such workmen and employees.

The Bill has in view the addition of the words 'Whose members are British subjects,' to sections 497, and subsection 2 of section 498, so that the section would read:

(497) The purposes of a trade union whose members are British subjects, are not merely that they are in restraint of trade, unlawful within the meaning of the last preceding section.

Then subsection 2 of section 498 would read:

(2) Nothing in this section shall be construed to apply to combinations of workmen or employees who are British subjects, for their own reasonable protection of such workmen and employees.

As the law stands to-day, foreign and domestic trades unions, that is to say, trades unions of any kind organized anywhere, incorporated anywhere, controlled from anywhere, are entitled to the exceptions and benefits which are mentioned in sections 497 and 498, whether these members are citizens of Canada or not; whether they are British subjects or otherwise. Trade unions, whether composed of British subjects or foreigners, or partly of both, wherever organized, even though controlled from foreign countries are allowed to do in Canada what no other two British subjects are allowed to do. These sections impose penalties upon persons, British subjects, for the commission of the offences charged in these sections. By section 497 and the subsection 2 of 498, trades unions are exempted from the operation of these penalties; that no two members of a trades union can be prosecuted for a combination in restraint of trade, when every other two British subjects in Canada may be so prosecuted. What is the result? The result is that you may have a trade union organized in Canada—and I put it in three categories—and controlled wholly by foreigners and not British subjects, for the purpose of operating in Canada, or you may have a trade union organized in a foreign country for the purpose of operating in Canada, and this union may be governed wholly from a foreign country, or you may have a trade union started and organized in a foreign country for the purpose of operating in Canada and only partly governed or controlled by British subjects. Yet a trades union coming within any of these categories would enjoy the privileges and exemptions created by the sections now under discussion. The simple fact of being a member of a trades union would be a complete defence to a charge under these provisions. So that any member of a trade union living in the United States, governed by the laws of the United States, and owing allegiance to the United States, could come to Canada and commit some of these offences, and would be free from all prosecution and from the penalties imposed by the Act, while British subjects doing the same thing in Canada, would have no such defence. I had intended to go into the subject more deeply, but for many reasons I shall only briefly mention the main argument which I had intended to urge. What has caused me to be alarmed, and what has made me think very seriously over this matter, is the possible results which may happen to Canadian trade, Canadian commerce, and Canadian industry. I say that with these provisions as they exist to-day, Canadian trade and commerce might be controlled either in a small or large way, and more or less seriously hindered, hampered and injured by large and powerful trade unions organized in a foreign country and governed from a foreign country. Hon. gentlemen will see at once what possibilities are involved in such a condition of affairs, and how Canadian trade and industry might be at any moment put completely under the control and power of foreign institutions, not necessarily labour institutions, but possibly and probably institutions which, whilst calling themselves trade unions, might for the purpose of destroying our commerce and industry organize themselves under the cloak of a trade union, and they would, under the protection of these sections, be entitled and be allowed to come to Canada and have Canadian industries at their mercy. These unions, corporations or organizations, could send emissaries or agents through Canada to do that which no British subject could do, and yet, as I have said, they would not be liable to prosecution. It is to prevent and avoid such a possibility that I have thought the amendments which I now propose should be made to the Criminal Code. They are, I think, as much in the interest of the working men and employees as they are in the interest of Canadians generally, because I take it that working men in this country are as much interested in the preservation intact, and the progress and development of our industries, as the people who have put their capital into such industries. I have not introduced the subject with the desire of helping any class, or with the intention of injuring any class, but solely in the interest of the whole community. It is true that labour unions have not taken the same view, and that some of them have indulged in more or less extravagant and hysterical language over the proposed amendment. I think they would have been better advised had they considered the question in the broad view in which I am now presenting it, and if, instead of blindly opposing the legislation, they had addressed themselves to the task of devising or suggesting some amendments calculated to meet the difficulties I have referred to.

The difficulty is there. The danger, the menace is there. Perhaps up to the present it has not become very serious, but it threatens to be so every day. With the great commercial rivalry which exists between our neighbours and ourselves, I have no doubt that measures of this kind will some day be thought of and resorted to. Members of trade unions, I repeat, are as much interested in the preservation of our national industries as anybody else is. I hope that members of trade unions will see that the danger is one that threatens them as well as everybody else, and that they will, at the earliest possible moment, get together, with a view to meeting what is, to my mind, a very serious peril which must some time be met. We cannot, because of fear of offending the prejudices or narrow views of trade unions, shirk this question indefinitely. We must meet it some day or other, because if we do not, it will in the meantime have wrought serious damage to the country. I need not say I have no prejudice against trade unions. On the contrary, I am a strong believer in the good accomplished by trade unions. I am not bringing in this measure, as has been stated, with a view of favouring capital against labour. I am one of those who think a combination of labour is as justifiable, probably more so, as a combination of capital; but I believe that both labour and capital need regulation. It is the duty of parliament to provide legislation to control both. Whilst I am inclined to the view that capital needs the closest kind of control and regulation, and is much more in need of it than labour, yet it is clear to me that labour also must be regulated or controlled. The time will come when parliament must apply some remedy to the evils which I have pointed out. The object of the Bill is to compel all trade unions operating in Canada to be at least governed and controlled by British subjects, and to submit to British laws and British jurisdiction, as well as to British public opinion. It may be that the amendment goes a little too far in providing that all members of trade unions shall be British subjects. Possibly the trade unions themselves may be able to suggest some measure which would not require that every one who belongs to a trade union in Canada should be a British subject. The difficulty pointed out is this, that if it were necessary for every man to be a British subject, the immigrants recently arriving could not be admitted as members of the union. I do not think that such would be the effect of the amendment proposed. I do not think the amendment would make a union illegal if it contained some members who were not British subjects. It is possible that some words could be inserted which would meet the difficulty. I would invite the union men in Canada to consider if Canada for Canadians is not a good enough motto for them.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Sure.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—If Canada for Canadians is good enough for the labour men, why have trades unions that are organized and governed wholly from a foreign country? That the motto 'Canada for Canadians' is good enough for trade unions is shown by the fact that one of the most powerful of these associations, the Canadian Federation of Labour, has adopted it as the motto of the association. I have two letters here from a very prominent officer of the Canadian Federation of Labour, which I shall read to the House, because they constitute a complete justification for the steps I have taken even when it is considered from the point of view of the trade unions. On the 4th March, I received from this prominent official of the Canadian Federation of Labour the following communicaton:

Hon. N. A. Belcourt, Senator.

Hon. Sir,—Will you kindly oblige me with a copy of Bill introduced by you relating to restraint of trade, and to which, I see, by the papers, there has been some objection by trade unions. It is quite possible that I may offer a suggestion re this, as I am of opinion that there should be some provision made for liability of trade unions holding charters from a foreign country, and governed by officers and laws of such country.

Respectfully yours,
(Sgd.) J. W. PATTERSON.

Having forwarded a copy of that Bill to the gentleman in question, I received from him some time afterwards the following letter dated April 13:

Hon. N. A. Belcourt, Senator.

Hon. Sir,—
Re Bill CCC to amend the Criminal Code, I would suggest that perhaps the object you have in view would be better served if you changed the amending words in the proposed Bill after the word 'union,' to say 'not chartered or having direct affiliation with any union in a foreign country.'

So there, from a prominent official of the Canadian Federation of Labour, is the adoption of the principle embodied in the amendment which I propose. He goes on in his letter to say:

This I think should be done, as there is no doubt that there should be some responsibility attached to foreign organizations operating in Canada, not only as a matter of protection to employers, but to Canadian workmen. The Canadian Federation of Labour would unanimously support such an amendment as I suggest. On the other hand, I could not approve of the Bill as it now stands for the very good reason that in this new country, as a matter of protection, we must enlist the support and membership of newcomers, and any trade union is too jealous of any infringement of the liberty of the people to make it imperative for a man to take citizenship before being eligible for membership.

Should this meet with your approval, and if it would be of service, I can arrange for our executive to come to Ottawa in support of such an amendment as I suggest.

I remain,
Your humble servant,
(Sgd.) J. W. PATTERSON
President C. F. of L.

There is a direct offer from the Federation of Labour to support such an amendment as I propose. Some hon. gentleman, or I myself later on, may suggest some slight alteration of the amendments to meet the views of the official whose letters I have read. I do not think I should take up any more time of the House in discussing this measure. I realize fully that at this stage of the session, with a great deal of work to be done, it would be almost impossible to have this Bill considered by a committee. I assume that a Bill of this kind would not be considered in Committee of the Whole, but would be referred to a special committee in order that parties who wish to be heard might be given an opportunity of urging any objections they may have to the Bill. That would take considerable time, time which is evidently not now at our disposal. For that reason, I do not insist upon the Bill being proceeded with further. Again, I realize fully the importance and seriousness of the legislation which I propose. I realize fully that the effect of legislation of that kind would be far reaching, and possibly it might be better to give time for further consideration. I introduced the measure for the purpose of provoking a discussion and drawing the attention of the country to what appears to me to be a very serious and very threatening evil, and for the purpose of directing information in a proper channel, so that when opinion is quite matured, it may be embodied in legislation. I do not pretend to think that the Bill as introduced should be adopted; nor do I think it constitutes the sole nor a complete panacea for the evils I can foresee. I introduced the measure merely for the purpose of provoking discussion, of causing members of trades unions to give it their serious and earnest consideration, and with their consent, and co-operation, if such is possible, to enact legislation which, while not interfering with their rights, would afford Canadian labour and Canadian capital the protection to which they are entitled. If this protection is not secured the result is bound to be very serious damage to the country at an early date. I ask hon. gentlemen to take the matter into their very serious consideration, and request permission that the Bill be dropped. I shall not ask that it be read a second time.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There can be no question as to the great consequence of the subject of the Bill which the hon. gentleman has introduced, but it seems to me that at this comparatively late hour in the sitting, and with such a thin House as this, it would not be proper on the whole that we should go on and discuss it, I think we had better postpone further discussion until such time as there will be a larger attendance of members, and we will have more time to consider it. I therefore move that the debate be adjourned.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Before the motion is put, I wish to point out this fact, both to the honourable House and to the mover of the Bill, and incidently to the gentleman who moves the adjournment of the debate, that this Bill has been on the order paper for a number of weeks against the best interests of the country, against the interests of the workingmen of Canada, organized legally under the constitution of Canada. This Bill has been a menace to every man who wields a spade, a pick, a shovel, or other instrument of labour. Probably the hon. gentleman who introduced the Bill did not see far enough to weigh its consequences and effects. If he had been simply the ordinary member of the city of Ottawa, this Bill would not have been introduced; but to-day I stand here voicing the opinions of hundreds of thousands of people in this country, saying that this Bill is a violation of their rights, as subjects of this country.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I rise to a point of order. I moved the adjournment of the debate, and the hon. gentleman is not dealing with the adjournment, but with the merits of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I am awfully sorry that the member for Halifax is continually interfering with my liberty of speech, and I hope he will—

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman will perceive that this is not a motion to destroy the opportunity of speaking, but one for the purpose of enabling others as well as himself, to speak, and, therefore, any discussion now should be on the motion for adjournment, and not on the merits of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—In conjunction with the hon. member from Halifax, and with the decision of the Speaker, if they will outline what I should say I will say it. Does the hon. member from Halifax understand that? Is he going to be a constant menace to my liberty of speech in this honourable House?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The rules of the House are the menace. The hon. gentleman has no right to reflect on the rules of the House. He is entirely out of order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I am not reflecting on the rules of the House; I am reflecting on the man who interprets them.

The SPEAKER—Every hon. gentleman should observe the rules of the House. The motion is for the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The debate should not be adjourned, for the reasons I am giving.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—The hon. gentleman will have an opportunity of speaking when the Bill comes up again.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I hold that this Bill should not even be adjourned. I hold that the Bill standing in the name of the hon. senator from Ottawa is a blot on our paper. I hold it is a challenge against the rights of the workingmen of this country, and why should the hon. senator from Halifax challenge my right, on a motion to adjourn the debate, to state the facts? What right has he to rise on the floor of the House and say I have no right to champion the cause of the workingmen of this country? It goes against his grain, but points of order cannot silence the tongue of truth and of justice.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I again rise to a question of order. The hon. gentleman is neither discussing the Bill, nor is he discussing the motion to adjourn the debate. The hon. gentleman does not know what I was going to say, or what I proposed to say. For all he knows, I was going to advocate the claims of the trade unions of Canada, but I did not think it was a wise thing to do it with so thin a House as this. I moved the usual formal motion for the adjournment of the debate, and the hon. gentleman rises and bellows here in the most absurd manner.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Is that a parliamentary expression?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman should confine himself to the question of adjournment, which is the only question before the House.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I rise to a point of order. I want to know whether the word 'bellows', which becomes a bull, a calf, or a cow, is parliamentary? If the hon. gentleman says 'yes,' I accept his ruling.

Hon. Mr. SPEAKER—I appeal to hon. gentlemen that this is not an attempt to shut off discussion, or deal unfairly with the Bill? It is merely a motion to adjourn the debate to an early date, so that there will be ample opportunity for everybody to be heard. I appeal for the good of the Senate, and for the good order and character of the Senate, and on my own behalf personally to the hon. gentleman to give way, and to allow the motion to go.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I am quite willing, on condition the hon. member from Halifax is forced to withdraw the word 'bellows'.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I withdraw it with pleasure. I should not have used it; but it was suggested by the hon. gentleman's manner of speaking.

The motion was agreed to.

BATTLEFIELDS OF QUEBEC BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 188) An Act to amend the Act respecting the National Battlefields at Quebec.

(In the Committee.)

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—This Bill is simply to substitute the ordinary Expropriation Act for the Railway Act, under which they have been attempting to act.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 191) An Act to provide for further advances to the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Can my hon. friend tell me the total indebtedness, including the present loan?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The present loan has not been made.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Excluding that?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —It amounts to $11,170,000. During the years 1896 to 1909, inclusive, the commissioners have paid in interest to the government, $1,859,275. The whole of this amount of interest, with the exception of $355,000, which was interest accruing during construction. as regulated by the provisions of chapter 35 of the Act of 1909, has been regularly paid out of the revenues of the commissioners.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—In what way is this loan secured? By mortgage on the property of the Harbour Commissioners, or in what way?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —It is a lien on everything they possess, I understand; and that the interest must be paid out of the dues they collect. It is to all intents and purposes a mortgage.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—They can issue debentures under the 5th section.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Might I ask if anv of the principal has fallen due upon the loans made from time to time?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Some of it has, and it has been renewed.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—None of the principal has been paid?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —None of the principal has been paid, I understand. I should mention to my hon. friend that a comparatively small amount is held by the public. There are debentures in addition to those issued by the government held by the public, to the amount of $1,972,000. I will lay the information on the table.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What has been the practice of the government with reference to those debentures? I notice that under section 5, the Harbour Commission will issue debentures and deliver them to the Minister of Finance and Receiver General as the advances are made from time to time. Does the government make use of these debentures in any way, whether by selling them or otherwise?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —No, as I understand, the government, up to the present time, have held every thing in their vault.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There is nothing to preclude the government from selling the debentures?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —No, there is nothing; but it is very unlikely they would part with any such security.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does the government think the securities are entirely too good to part with?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The government think it would not be in the interest of the public policy that they should part with them.

Hon. Mr. ROY, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (III) An Act for the relief of Emily Maud Nicoll (Jaffray.)

Bill (JJJ) An Act for the relief of Edna Sibley De Mar (Jaffrey).

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (No. 6) An Act to amend the Criminal Code.

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I move that the Bill be read a second time on Friday next.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I should like to inquire if the evidence which has been taken before the special committee in the Commons has been translated and printed in French, and if we shall be furnished with it? I understand it is a special case on which special proof was given in support of the Bill, and it is most important we should have all the documents before us before passing judgment upon it. Therefore, I think it would be better to adjourn the second reading until next week.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I think it has been decided in another place that in matters of this kind it is not necessary to have the evidence printed in French.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I am not inclined to take that as a precedent.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I think this House will take that as a precedent. I do not think evidence taken in another place in a matter of this kind should be translated for the benefit of the members of the Senate. We have no control over that evidence, and we have no right to it. We may get it, and read it, but I might say, in connection with this matter, that this is a compromise Bill. They heard evidence on both sides in the Commons, before a special committee, and at last they agreed on a Bill, which they passed unanimously in the House of Commons—a compromise Bill —and I have no hesitation in moving the second reading for Friday. I do not think the point is well taken by the hon. gentleman, or that he has seriously considered the matter.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I shall raise the objection on the second reading.

The motion was agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (No. 197) An Act to amend the Post Office Act.—(Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.)

The Senate adjourned until Three o'clock to-morrow.

THE SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 21, 1910.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

ST. LAWRENCE POWER TRANSMISSION BILL.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG, from the Committee on Standing Orders, presented their report regarding Bill (No. 115) An Act to incorporate the St. Lawrence Power Transmission Company (Limited), and moved the suspension of the rules relating to the same. He said: This report reduces the operations of the company to the area which they have advertised. The report also recommends that your committee shall eliminate from the Bill the declaration that the work is for the general advantage of Canada, and, when these amendments are made, we ask to suspend the rules so that the Bill may be read a second time.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What territorial restriction would that make?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Between Brockville and Montreal, along the north side of the St. Lawrence. They were also restricted in another place, but we go a step further and recommend that the committee who will have the Bill under consideration shall strike out any clause asking that the work be declared for the general advantage of Canada.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG moved the adoption of the report.

The motion was agreed to.

TRAIN SIGNALS ON THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

1. It is the case that since the middle of the month of March last, or thereabouts, the authorities of the Intercolonial railway have decreed that every railway train shall, henceforth, carry in rear of the last car of each train, two green lights instead of the red light during the night, and two green flags during the day?
2. Has the providing of new lanterns and of new flags been asked for by way of tenders?
3. Who has obtained such contract?
4. For what amount?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The replies to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follow:

1. On the 14th March, 1910, instructions were given for all trains to carry marker lights showing red to the rear and green to the front and sides during the night, and to carry two green flags on the rear during the day.

2. Messrs. N. L. Piper & Co., of Toronto, and H. L. Piper, of Montreal, submitted prices on marker lamps and the ones from H. L. Piper & Co. were the most suitable, and were purchased at their tender price.

3 and 4. The lamps were purchased from H. L. Piper & Co., Montreal, at a cost of one thousand seven hundred and seventy dollars, ($1,770). The flags were made up at an agreed price of twenty-two and a half cents (22½ cents) per dozen, from bunting supplied by the railway, which bunting was purchased from Greenshields, Limited, Montreal, at fourteen cents (14 cents) per yard, after tenders had been called.

CENTRAL RAILWAY STATION AT QUEBEC.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE inquired of the government:

1. Was the offer of $100,000 which Mr. S. N. Parent, Chairman of the Transcontinental, has made to the City of Quebec, for the Champlain Market property and other properties, for the purpose of building a central railway station there, made in virtue of a resolution passed by the Transcontinental Commission and approved by the members of the Commission, or by the President himself only, without authority from his colleagues or from the Government?

2. Does the Government know that the properties for which the Chairman of the Transcontinental Commission has thus offered $100,000 are worth at least three-quarters of a million, and that nevertheless the Council of the City of Quebec hs offered to grant them for $250,000 in order to hasten the commencement of the works which are to be done at Quebec, for the use of the Transcontinental, and has also offered to leave the matter to arbitration by experts?

3. Why have these offers not been accepted?

4. Does the government, and especially the honourable the Prime Minister, who represents one of the divisions of the city of Quebec, intend to cause the city of Quebec to be paid the real value of Champlain Market and the wharfs, &c., which may be required by the Transcontinental, in the same manner as it was intended to cause to be paid the real value of the Harbour Commission's properties, which were also spoken of for the establishment there of this central station, and this according to the statement of the Houourable Mr. Pugsley, Minister of Public Works, a statement made to the House of Commons on the first of December last, as reported in 'Hansard,' page 858?

5. Is it true that everything concerning the Transcontinental railway, works, appointments, purchase of lands, contracts, &c., is left to the sole discretion of the chairman, Mr. Parent, without regard to the opinion of the other commissioners, according to the statements made by the said chairman and his son, Mr. Geo. Parent, M.P., privately, and at public meetings held in the city of Quebec during February last?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The following information is supplied by the Transcontinental Railway Commissioners:

1. It was the offer of the Transcontinental Railway Commissioners.

2. No.

3. The city council at Quebec was wanting more.

4. As soon as the Transcontinental Railway Commissioners will submit report.

To questions five and six there are no answers. It appears to me they are out of order.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Why, are they out of order?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Because they contain allegations which I think should not occur in questions of the kind.

PAY LISTS OF PARLIAMENTARY AND DEPARTMENTAL OFFICERS.

The SPEAKER—I have the honour to lay on the table of the House, for the information of the Senate, the inclosed letter which I received from the Treasury Board, together with the accompanying extracts from the minutes of the meeting of the said board:

Clerk's Office,
Ottawa, 15th April, 1910.

The Hon. J. K. Kerr,
Speaker of the Senate.

Sir—I have the honour to ask that you will lay on the table for the information of the honourable the Senate, the inclosed letter which I have received from the Secretary of the Treasury Board, together with the accompanying extracts from the minutes of a meeting of the said Board.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
(Sgd.) SAMUEL ST. O. CHAPLEAU,
Clerk of the Senate.

February 22, 1910.

S. E. St. Onge Chapleau, Esq.,
Clerk of the Senate,
Ottawa.

Sir,—I have the honour to inclose herewith for your information and guidance, a minute of the Treasury Board, dated 9th instant, in reference to the payment of departmental employees at Ottawa, on paylist certified by the Auditor General before payment.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
(Sgd.) H. BOVILLE,
Secretary of the Treasury Board.

Ottawa, February 9th, 1910.

Audit—

The Board had under consideration a communication from the Auditor General representing that on the 29th November, 1905, a Minute of the Treasury Board was passed directing 'that hereafter all departmental employees at Ottawa (other than those extra clerks and messengers who are paid from Civil Government Contingencies, and labourers and mechanics) be paid on pay lists certified by the Auditor General before payment.'

It is further represented by the Auditor General that the Civil Service Amendment Act, 1908, has brought the staffs of the Senate, House of Commons and Library under the Civil Service Act, and for the purpose of uniformity and the better auditing of the accounts he suggests that the above Minute be amended so as to include the monthly paylists of those bodies among those to be sent to the Audit Office for certificate before payment.

The Board direct that the said Minute be amended accordingly.

H. BOVILLE,
Secretary.

LAND TITLES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The order of the day being called:

Third reading, Bill (No. 125) An Act to amend the Land Titles Act.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I move that this Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be amended so as to read:

Section 20 of the Land Titles Act, chapter 110 of the Revised Statutes of 1900 is hereby repealed and the following substituted therefor.

20. For each registration district there shall be an office to be called the Land Titles office, which shall be in the district at some convenient and suitable place to be determined by the Governor-in-Council. If in any district no such place can be found, the Governor General may order that the Land Titles office for that district shall be in the city of Ottawa, province of Ontario, until such place can be found.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is satisfactory.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—That appears to conform to the request of the Department of the Interior.

The motion was agreed to.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved that the Bill be now read a third time.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 126) An Act to correct a clerical error in the French Convention Act, 1908.—Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

Bill (No. 132) An Act to amend the Gas Inspection Act.—Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

Bill (No. 180) An Act to amend the Royal Military College Act.—Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

Bill (No. 181) An Act to authorize the sale or other disposal of certain public lands, and the acquisition of certain other lands in or in the vicinity of the cities of Toronto and Winnipeg, respectively.—Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

Bill (No. 184) An Act to provide for the Testing of Glassware used in connection with Milk Tests.—Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

Bill (No. 138) An Act to amend the Customs and Fisheries Protection Act.—Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

Bill (No. 182) An Act respecting the payment of bounties on lead contained in lead-bearing ores mined in Canada, and to promote the production of Zinc.—Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

Bill (No. 191) An Act to provide for further advances to the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal.—Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

Bill (No. 98) An Act respecting the Trust and Loan Company of Canada.—Hon. Mr. Gibson.

Bill (EEE) An Act respecting the British Northwestern Fire Insurance Company.—Hon. Mr. Gibson.

CLAIMS AGAINST GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING POSTPONED.

The order of the day being called:

Third reading, Bill (No. 151) An Act to provide for the adjudication of small claims arising in respect of the operation of the government railways.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved that the Bill be read the third time.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I would ask that the third reading be postponed until to-morrow. I have two small amendments to this Bill which I wish to submit. I mentioned the fact to the Hon. Mr. Dandurand, and I think he has gone to see about them.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I have no objection, but notice of the amendments should be given.. What are they?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—The first is to raise the amount from $200 to $500, and the other is an amendment to clause 7, which provides that the Attorney General may have cases transferred to the Exchequer Court. I wish to have that power apply the other way also, namely, that on application, a case now before the Exchequer Court may be taken to the provincial court. As this Bill will affect the province of Quebec, where we have some difficulty about the judge speaking the French language, it will be a great convenience to the witnesses. I congratulate the government on the introduction of this Bill, and I think the amendments which I propose will make it more satisfactory to our province.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The hon. gentleman should give notice of his amendments, so that we may have an opportunity to consider them. They are very difficult to appreciate without having them before us.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I meant to have proposed them in committee yesterday, but was called out of the Senate, and the Bill passed through the House while I was away. It is a public Bill.

The order was postponed until to-morrow.

NATIONAL BATTLEFIELDS AT QUEBEC ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the third reading of Bill (No. 188) An Act to amend the Act respecting the National Battlefields at Quebec.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I should like to make an explanation on behalf of the Battlefields Commission. Recently a question was put about the dismissal of the Secretary, and some questions about the purchase of the Ross rifle factory. It is only fair, therefore, to put the following explanation on record to make the whole question plain before the House and the public. The chairman of the commission, Sir Geo. Garneau, writes me as follows, and I will translate it for the benefit of the House:

> In answer to the question put to me this morning, I may say that the Secretary of the Commission must be appointed by virtue of section 3 of 7 Edward VII., chapter 57, which is as follows: section 3, the Governor in Council may appoint a competent person as secretary of the commission, and this appointment may be cancelled, and shall be paid a salary to be fixed by the Governor in Council, and voted by parliament. The commission had chosen two temporary secretaries during the Tercentenary celebration, and these secretaries having discharged the functions for which they were appointed, were discharged on the 1st July last. The commission expect a permanent secretary will be appointed very soon by the Governor in Council according to law. As to the Ross factory and the jail, it is not the intention of the commission to acquire these properties for the present. If, in the future, it should become necessary to deal with the question, it will be necessary to obtain the consent and approval of parliament, according to section 10 of 7 Edward VII., chapter 57?

I hope this explanation will satisfy the House and the public.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I hope the government will be satisfied.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The government want the third reading of the Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time, and passed.

MEAT AND CANNED FOODS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 193) An Act to amend the Meat and Canned Foods Act.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1.

1. Section 2 of the Meat and Canned Foods Act, chapter 27 of the statutes of 1907, is amended as follows:—

By repealing paragraphs (a) and (c) thereof and substituting therefor the following paragraphs respectively:—

(a) 'carcases' means the carcases of cattle, sheep, swine, goats, game or poultry.

(c) 'export' means export out of Canada, or out of any province to any other province thereof;

By adding thereto the following paragraph:—

(h) 'a farmer' is a person whose recognized occupation is that of farming, and who slaughters only such animals as are fed by him on his own premises.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —These are better definitions than were in the Act before.

The section was agreed to.

Subsection 2, of section 3:

2. Subsection 2 of section 3 of the said Act is amended by striking out all the words after the word 'inspection' in the third line thereof.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What is the effect of this?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I might say, the section in the Act reads as follows:

No animal shall be allowed to enter the parts of an establishment where slaughtering is going on unless it has undergone such inspection and found to be healthy and fit for food.

I think it broadens the section and is an improvement.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

CONSERVATION OF NATURAL RESOURCES BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 185) An Act respecting the Commission for the Conservation of Natural Resources.

(In the Committee.).

On clauses 14 and 15.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (British Columbia)—Has any occasion arisen calling for the enactment of these clauses which debar officials of the commission from acquiring lands?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I am not aware that any occasion has arisen, but it is thought expedient to expressly prohibit parties connected with this commission as secretaries or officers, from being concerned in the purchase of any lands as to which they may have been supposed to have acquired information in their capacity as officers of the commission. It is simply a matter of precaution.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (British Columbia)—It is a very wise provision.

The clauses were adopted.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

GUELPH RAILWAY JUNCTION BILL.

AMENDMENT CONSIDERED.

The order of the day being called.

Consideration of the amendment made by the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours to (Bill FFF) An Act respecting the Guelph Junction Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Before moving the consideration of the report, I propose to place before the House the facts bearing on the question. This Bill deals with a railway incorporated and built in the interests, I understand, of the city of Guelph. In 1887 the city of Guelph advanced the sum of $155,000 towards the building of the railway, and took bonds for the amount. The promoters, or the gentlemen who had been chartered as a company in connection with this railway, subscribed a few shares, on which they paid a hundred dollars each, and that was the only amount which was ever paid. When this advance of $155,000 was paid by the city, and when a mortgage on the railway property was granted to secure repayment of the amount, a clause was inserted at the request of the promoters or incorporators to this effect: It was understood and agreed that no stockholder of the company should be called upon or held to be personally liable in respect of any portion of his unpaid stock to contribute towards the payment of principal or interest on the said bonds, or any of them. That was in 1887. In 1890 the railway was built, and there remained an outstanding indebtedness of some $18,000, which had to be provided for. On the application of the shareholders of the company, the city of Guelph again advanced the amount for the purpose of paying the balance of the indebtedness on the railway. I have a copy of the deed, in which I find the following clauses:

It is also agreed by and between the said corporations that none of the stockholders in the said Guelph Junction Railway Company shall be personally liable in respect of their unpaid stock for any of the principal money or interest which shall fall due or be in arrears upon any of such bonds given for the repayment of the said sum of $18,000 or any part thereof.

This was passed in March, 1890. Before this could be passed, a by-law had to be voted on and passed by the ratepayers, authorizing the advance of $18,000, and when this by-law was submitted to the ratepayers the following communications were placed before them: First, a letter of the 23rd March, and then another letter of the 17th July, of the same year. The letter of the 23rd of March was addressed to the editor of the 'Herald,' a local paper, and reads as follows:

(Herald.)

Letter to the Editor:

The $18,000 by-law.

Sir,—Citizens please note that the directors or stockholders of the Guelph Junction Railway Company have no money interest in the railroad stock. They have already assigned to the city all their right, title and interest, and have handed over practically all the money they have paid on their stock to the city for nothing whatever, and will not receive one cent of benefit from their stock whether they pay up in full or whether they pay only $100. The city owns everything and has all the earnings of the road to pay interest on its money advanced. The stockholders gave all these priveleges and advantages to the city on the distinct understanding that they were to be relieved from all further liabilities on their stock. It was enormously for the benefit of the city that it should be done in this way. I hope the citizens will look on the matter in a just manner to the stockholders, who have given valuable time and means to build this road, and which will be and is a great benefit to the city.

WM. BELL.

Guelph, March 23, 1889.

Mr. Bell was then the president of the company.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Was that the first by-law or the second?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—That was, I think, at the time of the first by-law. The by-law was defeated. A second by-law was introduced for the same purpose, and the letter of the 17th July, 1889, was published in the 'Evening Mercury,' as follows:

Wednesday, July 18, 1889.

Important letter from the stockholders of the G.J.R., to his Worship the Mayor of Guelph.

Dear Sir,—We understand that some persons object to the $18,000 by-law to be voted on to-morrow, upon the ground that the loan of the money to the Guelph Junction Railway Company will enable the stockholders to obtain the benefit of their stock without really paying for it.

This is not the case, and it was never supposed that the stock held by the undersigned would be of any value to them individually.

As the loan of the money will enable the undertaking of the Company to be completed, to show our good faith in this, we now offer and agree with you on behalf of the city that upon the loan of $18,000 being made we will surrender or assign our stock, and all benefits which might be derived from it, including the payments which have been made by us, to the city or to any persons designated by the city, or to hold the stock in trust for the city, as the council may deem advisable, the city assuming our position with regard to the same.

GEORGE SLEEMAN,
JOHN M. BOND,
J. B. ARMSTRONG,
CHAS. RAYMOND,
CHARLES DAVIDSON,
D. GUTHRIE.

Executor for the estate of the late John Hogg. And the following also agree to the above:

D. McCRAE,
C. KLEEPFER,
W. BELL,
T. GOWDY.

These were all the shareholders and directors of the company at the time.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Did they sign that document also?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Yes, it purports to be signed by them.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—By all?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE. Yes.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—No.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It was signed by all except the four, and the four also agreed to everything. They agreed to sign.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—They agreed to sign, but none were responsible for their names.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Unless it is forgery, they have agreed to sign the document; but the report being before the House I think it is proper to state what took place. The parties were heard for and against the Bill. These documents were placed before the committee by the promoters of the Bill, and Mr. McCrae was one of the parties who objected. There remained some four or five gentlemen who have not assigned their shares; all the other shares have been assigned, and all the rest of the stock is held by the city of Guelph and Mr. McCrae made the statement that he did not remember having signed the agreement, but admitted that he never repudiated the document as published in the paper.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He went further than that.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I am not aware that he went further than that. On these facts the committee came to the conclusion that the parties from the beginning held the position as agents for the city; that the whole capital was advanced by the city, and they were promoting merely the city's interest, and that in fact by the first letter they admitted that they had assigned all; that they had no interest whatever in the enterprise. By the second letter, they undertook to assign whatever interest they held in the company.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—May I ask the hon. gentleman if the first letter was signed by Mr. Bell? Did he sign it as president of the board of directors or for himself alone?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—From the statement in his letter it does not appear. He signs merely 'Wm. Bell'; but he was president of the company at the time.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—What I want to know is, was he authorized by his board to sign such a letter?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—That fact was not elucidated, but it was a letter which was published in the paper at the time, which evidently came to the knowledge of all the parties interested, and which was not repudiated, as it should have been repudiated if they had not agreed; but the first letter was followed by the other letter to which, to my mind, all parties interested were bound. I think that, by reason of the nature of the Bill, the preamble should be changed, and I propose on the third reading to make a motion, to substitute for the preamble of the Bill the following:

Whereas, the Guelph Junction Railway Company, hereinafter called 'the company,' has by its petition prayed that it be enacted as hereinafter set forth, and has established, in effect, that the corporation of the city of Guelph holds, itself or by trustees on its behalf, all the shares in the capital stock of the company except a few shares upon which five hundred dollars in all have been paid, which few shares were subscribed for by persons acting in that behalf as agents for the city, and that, with the exception of the said five hundred dollars, all the capital for the construction of the railway of the company has been furnished by the city; and whereas it is expedient to grant the prayer of the said petition: Therefore, His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:—

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have listened with a great deal of attention to the remarks of my hon. friend. I was not inclined to enter into a discussion upon this question, for this reason: There is a conflict of opinion as to really what did take place, and there are documents which have not been read by the hon. gentleman and which would not justify, I think, if read, the course he is now proposing. I wish it to be distinctly understood that I am not accusing him of suppressing anything; but there are other papers which have been placed in the hands of members of this House, which were not before the committee. As this is a question of changing the preamble of the Bill, I would suggest to my hon. friend and the House that the better and more equitable way would be to have the report sent back to the committee for the purpose of hearing both sides as to the position held by the shareholders who object to some of the provisions of the Bill. There is nothing in the preamble as presented to this House, to show that the objectors were either agents or trustees for the city of Guelph. I frankly confess, if I could be convinced that any of these gentlemen were acting as trustees or agents, I would make no objection to the passing of the Bill. This is a measure which I think the government should give a little attention to before allowing it to pass the Commons. It involves a very serious principle—an infringement of the rights of private individuals. If these gentlemen subscribed for the stock, unless it can be shown that they were trustees or agents acting for the city, it is little less than confiscation on the part of parliament to step in and say that they shall surrender their stock at a certain price. It would make no difference if they were offered ten thousand dollars per share for stock which cost them a hundred dollars, the principle would be the same. The Bill provides for giving the corporation the right to purchase a certain stock which is held by four or five gentlemen. I have no objection to that; but it goes further and says that the parties holding stock shall sell it to the corporation at a certain price. It may appear like presumption on my part, as a layman, to differ from legal gentlemen who have spoken on this question; but there was nothing before the committee to lead me to the belief that these gentlemen were either agents or trustees for the city. I have had some experience in connection with the construction of local railways, and have myself been placed in exactly the same position as those who were connected with the promotion of this railway. I was connected with what is now the Grand Junction railway, now owned by the Grand Trunk railway. I subscribed for stock, and gave my time, and paid the expenses, not only of myself but of other promoters of the railway, and I never supposed for a moment that I was either an agent or trustee, responsible for what any of them should do, other than being responsible for what I did myself. I never imagined that any of us contemplated occupying the position of agent or trustee. The Bill which is now before us provides for the confiscation of stock held by those gentlemen, and specifies the price which shall be paid for it. The committee came to the conclusion that $100 would not be sufficient compensation for the gentlemen who held stock, and they increased it to $400. The representatives of the city of Guelph consented to pay the $400, and probably if it had been urged, might have consented to pay $1,000 rather than have the stock remain in the hands of those individuals. It appears strange to me that the Chairman of the committee, having come to the conclusion himself that those gentlemen were agents or trustees, should so change the preamble of the Bill, as to justify him in voting for the Bill itself. If the preamble had not been changed in the manner in which the hon. gentleman has suggested, I venture to say he would not vote for the passing of the Bill. The only possible justification for the measure is to make those gentlemen trustees for the city, and in order to do that and to justify the act of the chairman of the committee, it is proposed to amend the preamble of the Bill to declare that which, to my mind, was not established before the committee. I do not at all desire to impugn the motives of my hon. friend in this matter. I think he is just as conscientious in the view he takes as I am in the course that I am following; but he has not told the House that the by-law which was submitted to the city for the raising of money for the company was defeated. He might have made it stronger by adding that some of the gentlemen whose names are mentioned here actually voted against the by-law and defeated it.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—The by-law was actually carried as far as the voting was concerned. There was a majority for it; but under the Ontario Act it could not be passed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the by-law containing these names and the alleged offer made by these four gentlemen with regard to surrendering their stock, was carried?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—Yes, there was a majority in favour of the by-law.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman is dealing with another question altogether. I have the authority of Mr. McCrae who says that he never saw this document, which appeared in the 'Guelph Mercury' the evening before the election. It was what would be termed in an election contest a 'roorback.' It was signed by the gentlemen whose names have been mentioned, but it does not appear that the president of the company, Mr. Bell, signed it. Why he did not, has not been explained.

Then at the bottom of the letter we find the following:

And the following also agree to the above:—D. McCrae, C. Kloepper, W. Bell, T. Gowdy.

That is an assertion made in this document, which was published in the newspapers, but it appears that Mr. Bell declined to sign this document, though his name appears among those who, it is said, agreed to sign it. This letter, which the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry has read, was published on the 17th June, 1899, and the vote on the by-law took place on the 18th. Mr. McCrae, who is a farmer living outside the town, says he never saw this, and that he voted against the by-law, though we are told by this document that he agreed to surrender his stock. This is a clear case of a 'roorback' on the eve of the voting on the by-law. Even in a city of ten or twelve thousand inhabitants, everybody does not read the newspaper, and we may believe Mr. McCrae when he says that he knew nothing about this, and had he been asked to become a consenting party to the surrender of his stock he would not have done so. Now, as to the question of agency, I have had placed in my hands the following document, which was presented to the House of Commons in 1891:

To the honourable the House of Commons of Canada.

The joint petition of the corporation of the city of Guelph and the Guelph Junction Railway Company humbly showeth:—

That your petitioners have mutually agreed that subject to the approval of your honourable the Senate and of your honourable House the amendments set forth in the schedule hereunto annexed marked (a) shall be substituted for sections 2 and 3 of Bill (No. 23) as passed by your honourable House, entitled an Act respecting the Guelph Junction Railway Company. Your petitioners therefore pray that your honourable House may be pleased to concur in the amendments to the said Bill accordingly. And your petitioners as in duty bound will ever pray.

That is signed by John Kennedy, mayor; Richard Mitchell, city clerk; Wm. Bell, president; and H. Macdonald, secretary of the company.

Here are the condition, the amendments to which they agree:—

No person shall be a director of the company unless he be the holder of at least one share of the stock of the company and have paid up all calls thereon. (a) But so long as the city of Guelph shall hold $20,000 capital stock of the said company, and shall be the holder of the bonds of the said company, any alderman of the city and any bona fide ratepayer of the city then qualified for election as an alderman of the said city, and all shareholders of the company shall be eligible to be directors of the company; the mayor of the said city for the time being shall be ex-officio a director; and the council of the said corporation may, by by-law passed after its organization in each year, appoint five directors of the said company from among those qualified by this Act for such appointment, and such directors so appointed shall take office immediately after the holding of the annual general meeting of the company first held after such appointments are made, and shall hold office for one year thereafter. (b) That the word 'five' in the fifth line of the sixth clause of an Act to incorporate the Guelph Junction Railway Company be struck out, and the word 'three' inserted in lieu thereof, and that the words 'by the shareholders other than the city of Guelph from among themselves be inserted after the word 'chosen' in the sixth line of the said clause. (c) The three directors so elected together with those appointed by the council of the city of Guelph as herein before provided and the ex-officio directors shall constitute the board of directors of the company.

3. The directors of the company may and shall upon the request of any of the present shareholders of the company, being the holder of ten shares of the capital stock of the company, and upon whose shares ten per cent only has been paid, issue a fully paid-up share for $100 to each of such shareholders holding ten shares as aforesaid, being for the aggregate amount paid upon his present shares, and pass a by-law or by-laws, which the said directors are hereby empowered to do, cancelling the subscription for and of liability upon the remaining nine shares held or subscribed for by any such shareholder or shareholders, and thereupon all liability of any such shareholders for the payment of the amount of the said remaining shares subscribed for or now held by them respectively or any part thereof shall cease and determine, and the word 'shareholder' in this section shall include as well any one or more persons holding shares in trust, as those holding the same in their own right.

There is only one gentleman, as I understand, holding shares in trust, and that is Mr. Guthrie, the solicitor, who holds a certain number of shares in trust for an estate. Provision is made—

Then it shall be lawful for the corporation of the city of Guelph, subject to the laws of the province, to acquire any fully paid-up shares in the said company, and to hold the same as well as those now held by the said city.

Section 7 of the said Act to incorporate the company, Chap. 79, &c., are repealed.

The subsection is just simply the repealing of another section. This document shows clearly that when they entered into the arrangement with these shareholders they were to have a fully paid up share of $100, and were to be relieved, in consideration of their not objecting to the passage of a certain Bill, of the payment of the other $900; but when it is shown specially that it includes those who hold shares in trust as well as those who hold shares in their individual right, there is no recognition whatever of their having been either shareholders or agents of the company. They acted with the company, in conjunction with the company for the promotion of an enterprise which they believed would assist the city. Almost any citizen, of any city, would take the same ground and act in the same manner. What I contend is, that at one time all these shareholders agreed to surrender their stock. The corporation refused to take it, simply because they were not in a position at that time to complete the road, and there was no probability of its paying; but just as soon as the road began to pay a good dividend, then they say to these gentlemen: 'you must surrender your stock, no matter what it is worth', and these four or five gentlemen having refused to surrender their stock, they come to parliament and ask that it shall be surrendered at a certain price. I repeat that if I could be convinced that these gentlemen were acting as trustees, and they got their own money back again, I would hold them responsible for whatever was done; I hold very strong views as to the misappropriation or handling of trust funds, and feeling convinced it is not the case in either of these matters, I do not think parliament is justified in passing a law compelling a man to surrender his right in the shares, whether they are worth anything or not. There is another clause in this Bill which was not discussed in committee and not considered. The company issued bonds to the extent of $40,000. They have incurred debts of $40,000 in bonds. The road, since its connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and its connections, has proved to be a paying concern. The corporation ask parliament to give them power, when the bonds are paid, to issue stock in lieu thereof. Why should that be asked? Why is it necessary that that should be done? If the bonds are paid off, and the company own the whole road, and everything connected with it less these four or five hundred dollar shares, then the extra earnings over and above the working expenses would belong to the city; but that is very clearly not what is meant. It is meant that if the bonds are paid and there is no indebtedness of the company, they issue stock on which they will draw the dividends. That is all right enough, but if they have to pay the dividends on the $40,000 extra stock which has been issued in place of bonds which have been paid, there will be less to pay to those who hold small amounts. How far is the Senate that is supposed to guard the personal and private interest of every individual in the Dominion, justified in passing a law of the character which is now before us, particularly should it reject the proposition to declare in the preamble of the Bill that which the Bill does not contain, and which even the chairman himself, I think, will tell this House, if he speaks again, he would not confirm if it were shown that these gentlemen were not agents or trustees. Let me say again to the leader of the House, in a matter of this kind where it is a direct attempt to legislate a man out of his property, that the government should protect the interests of the individual and take steps to prevent it, or at least give some reason why it should be done. The fact that this is a matter affecting trustees and agents holding a small amount of stock, makes it of no less importance than if it were ten times that amount. If there is any doubt as to whether these five gentlemen were agents or trustees, let them do as other corporations and other individuals do, go to the court and decide it. My hon. friend opposite me and my hon. friend to my left should accept that course. If these men are not entitled to all their rights pertaining to that $100 share they own, let it be so declared by the court. I have sufficient confidence in the court to place the whole of the case in their hands. I do not believe in parliament stepping in unless it is a most extraordinary case and deciding questions which legitimately belong to the courts of the country. Holding these views, from the documents I have read and the statements I have made based upon these documents, would it not be far more fair and equitable to allow this report to go back to the committee and hear Mr. Guthrie in answer to these statements? I may be wrong, but I am informed that Mr. Guthrie was not aware of the existence of the document to which attention has been called. I do not state that on my own responsibility, but I am so informed, and the denial on the part of Mr. McCrae that he was not a party to that and never saw it until after the vote took place, and that it was only published in the evening paper the day prior to the election, should be considered. I should hope my hon. friend would consent to my suggestion. It may be said: 'If you do this you kill the Bill'. We have a special committee on Tuesday, and that will give ample time for the gentlemen to come down from Guelph to answer the documents. I object in toto to pushing Bills of an important character through parliament on the ground that it is so late that these people may lose their Bill. We are now within a few days of a six months' session. Surely these people who have been conducting this negotiation for years, should have been prepared at an earlier period of the session to present their Bill, and if they did not do so, it is no reason why we should rush a measure of this character through, by which I say again we confiscate private property.

The ACTING SPEAKER—I wish to call attention to the fact that there is nothing before the House. The item before the House was the consideration of amendments made by the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I move that the amendments be adopted.

The ACTING SPEAKER—I must confess that I did not catch the motion.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I have limited myself to giving such information as I possess, without arguing the point, and I do not propose to argue the point. I merely want to place the House in possession of facts, such as they are. The hon. gentleman stated that I did not give to the House communication of the documents which he read. I had not the documents, and I knew he was going to give that information; but on following the documents which the hon. gentleman read with the statutes of 1901, I find exactly the same thing in the statute. The clauses were adopted and they form part of the Act. The hon. gentleman stated that I, as chairman, did not feel warranted in voting in favour of the Bill as it stands, unless the preamble was changed. In the committee I voted with most members in favour of the Bill on the evidence which was placed before the committee—evidence which satisfied my mind. I have a very great respect for the hon. gentleman from Hastings, but I cannot abdicate my judgment, and in this instance my judgment is the other way. I was satisfied from the evidence adduced that these parties had been acting, according to the letters which I have read, in the interest of the city as trustees. That was the only point they discussed. The majority of the members of the committee were satisfied on that point, but for this honourable House, and especially for the House of Commons, where this Bill, if it passes the Senate, will have to be considered, I think it is not proper that the reason on which the House acted should be taken as a precedent, that the preamble explained the ground on which the committee and House acted. I would have made the suggestion in committee had it not been for the fact that when this Bill was finished it was one o'clock, and the preamble had to be prepared, and it would have been delaying the committee unnecessarily. The hon. gentleman read the amendments on which all parties agreed in 1901; they are to be found in chapter 64 of the statutes of that year, and the hon. gentleman laid stress on this: the word ' shareholder ' in this section shall include as well as any one or more persons who hold shares in trust, as those holding shares in their own right. At that time there appeared in the books of the company two classes of shareholders, the corporation themselves, and Mr. Guthrie, as executor of an estate, and the other shareholders, such as those who have since parted with their shares. My understanding of the clause is that it was merely for the object of describing the different classes of shareholders as they appear on the books of the company, and for the purpose of giving effect to the first portion of the clause. But my understanding is not that it bears really on the question. I may say that, after the Bill was rejected, Mr. McCrea told me as president, that they resisted some documents which he desired to fyle, and caused the secretary of the city to be instructed to search for all documents that might exist, in order that they should be produced before the report was taken into consideration, and I hold the letter of the clerk saying that he has made searches and that he has found nothing except the documents which have been filed.

Hon. Mr. POWER (Acting Speaker)—The discussion which has just taken place is, I think, irrelevent to the question before the House. The question is the adoption of the report of the committee which amended the Bill by substituting the word four, for the word 'one,' and the discussion with respect to the preamble would naturally come up on the third reading, when the hon. gentleman would make the motion which he has given notice of to prefix a preamble to the Bill, and the hon. gentleman from Hastings would move his amendment; but the discussion now is quite out of order. I expected there would be a motion to amend, by a reference of the Bill back to the committee; as it is, the only question is the adoption of the report containing the one amendment and any discussion of the preamble I hold is now out of order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved in amendment that this report be referred back to the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours for further consideration.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middlesex)—It would appear from the amendment to the preamble to this Bill that the chairman of the Railways Committee evidently believes that the shareholders of this road were agents or trustees. I am not a member of the committee, but I understand that was the line of argument pursued by the solicitor who appeared on behalf of the city of Guelph. Up to a certain point, that argument seems very positive. I think, however, since the committee met, certain documents have been presented which throw a different light on that view; and it is for that reason I rose to say that nothing would be lost if the House agreed to the motion made by my hon. friend opposite. The committee owes it to itself, that it disposes of questions of this kind with all the facts before it, and the House owes it to itself to take care that it shall be apprised of all the facts. The latest evidence we had of these shareholders is contained in the Act of 1891, which the hon. member from De Salaberry has read. There they are plainly described, for what reason I cannot tell, unless it be the actual fact, as shareholders. The three classes of trustees are described, and shareholders include those who hold stock in trust, and those who hold stock in their own right. That is contained in the Act of parliament passed on behalf of the corporation of Guelph. Now, that statement was not submitted to the committee, as I understand. Is that true or is it not true?

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—That was before the committee.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—The document which my hon. friend is referring to is simply confirmatory of the statements made before the committee.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—I was informed that that statute and that statement were not quoted.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS. They were.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—The shareholders rest their case to a certain extent on the passage I have read, admitting that they were shareholders in their own right, and not as trustees. Of course, if these facts were before the committee at the time, it alters the situation as far as I am concerned; but I was informed they were not before the committee. I do not attach a great deal of importance to the letter that was read, and which was circulated in Guelph just before the election. It was circulated so late that it could not be contradicted in time. When Mr. McCrae was asked if he repudiated it, he said: 'No'. However, all I care about is that justice shall be done. We have to be careful not to interfere with vested rights. If these men were agents they served their purpose as agents, and ought to be treated as agents. If they made this investment as a private investment, or if on account of the evolution of this project they were placed in the position of shareholders in their own right, that right ought to be respected even though it was not a right from the start. Then I object to fixing the amount they should receive. I do not think this House is a court of record. We are not in the habit of saying when petitioners come to this House asking that certain pecuniary claims shall be adjusted that such and such shall be the value of their claims. That is objectionable in an Act of parliament. If the proposition was as stated by the hon. member from Hastings, that the price shall be mutually agreed upon, that would be reasonable or if the Bill provided that the price should be determined by the Chief Justice of the Court of Appeal or some one acting in a judicial or quasi-judicial capacity, it would be more reasonable to me. Hon. gentlemen are better acquainted with the rules of the Senate than I am; but I feel that this is an objectionable step to take, and at some stage before the Bill leaves our hands it should be corrected.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Unfortunately I was prevented from being present when this Bill was discussed in committee. The only thing I am not clear about in this Bill is as to the propriety or necessity of parliament substituting itself for a court of justice. Here are differences of opinion between the city of Guelph and certain shareholders, and I have not yet been sufficiently enlightened as to the propriety of parliament settling this question, to be able to vote in favour of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Guelph is in the county I have had the honour of representing for many years. From the inception of the scheme for the construction of that branch line connecting with the Canadian Pacific railway, it has been a city of Guelph scheme. It was commenced by the citizens of Guelph and taken up by the city council. The city council could not get a charter to build a road, and the city council could not become members of a chartered company for that purpose, and they turned round and dealt with themselves, as a council, for aiding the construction of the road. They felt that a company of independent citizens would have to be formed, and they approached a number of gentlemen, Mr. McCrae amongst others, that were large property holders interested in the city, to see if they would not lend their names and assistance to get a charter and promote, and if possible carry out the scheme. Guelph was willing to contribute, and did contribute every dollar of the expense connected with the inception of the scheme, and did everything virtually that was done. These men, from time to time showed by their own act, and by the course they adopted, that they were merely ciphers, and held the stock they subscribed for in the interests of the city. That was the system adopted generally in western Ontario in connection with the construction of almost all the branch lines in that part of the province. Take my own town, we had to do the very same thing. We had to get eight or ten men that would subscribe a certain amount of stock. They were formed into a company, and a charter was procured. They asked the municipalities to aid the construction of the road, and also obtained aid from the Ontario and the Dominion governments. We, as a corporation, could not move in the matter, and had to get private citizens to do it. In the case of Guelph, Mr. McCrae, and the others whose names have been mentioned, were men deeply interested in the city, and were anxious to get additional railway accommodation.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the city of Guelph paid the $100?

Hon. Mr. McMULLIN—No, I say the expense of securing the charter, and carrying out the project was provided by the city.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I understood from the use of the term 'mere cipher' that that was what the hon. gentleman meant.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Guelph could not, as a municipality, take the necessary steps to procure a charter. They had to get private individuals for that purpose. Every stockholder of the company, of which I happened to be vice-president, subscribed for stock in the same way that the Guelph shareholders did. One man refused to assign his stock; he thought he was being placed in a position where he might make a grab by holding on. The rest of us started a collection to pay him the amount he was entitled to receive, and he volunteered to spend it rather than be placed in a position where his neighbours were contributing money to pay him back his paltry hundred dollars, which he subscribed to lay the foundation for that road. The construction of the Guelph Junction railway was a magnificent thing for the citizens of Guelph, and Mr. McCrae amongst others, who held property. It doubled, and in some cases trebled the value of their property in securing the accommodation they obtained by the construction of that branch. My hon. friend from Hastings has pleaded very hard that this Mr. McCrae should get another opportunity of establishing his claim by producing some additional evidence that had not been submitted to the committee. The Bill has to go before the House of Commons. It has not been before them yet, and if there is any new evidence to be adduced, it will have to go before the Railway Committee of the House of Commons, and Mr. McCrae will have an opportunity of presenting there any additional evidence he may possess. The new light which the hon. member from Hastings read to the House has turned out to be a statute of Canada which was passed nine years ago. It cannot, therefore, be very new. Guelph city is justly entitled to have this legislation. The city is dealing liberally with these four men. They paid $100 apiece. They were largely interested in the progress of the city, and the city has offered generously to make them a return of $400 each, which is their hundred dollars with interest compounded every year at six per cent, in order to place the city in a position to carry out this undertaking with the company with which they are connected. I think they deserve credit for the liberal spirit they have shown, because everything indicates that these men held the stock in the interest of the city and for the city alone.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—In committee I voted for the Bill, and I must say before I voted, I did not like it. I thought it was hard to take away a man's property, and it would be better to compromise; but that proposition was not listened to. I must confess that I have since seen that my vote was wrong, and I should like to have the Bill sent back to the committee to have more evidence. In the documents which have been read before the House to-day, there is nothing to show that the stockholders were trustees for the city of Guelph. They subscribed a thousand dollars each, on which they paid one thousand dollars, and when the company was organized they asked the city of Guelph to make a loan. When that loan was made, it was stipulated in the document that these gentlemen should not be liable for the $900 unpaid on the stock subscribed. If they had been agents of the city, the corporation would have said, 'We will lend you the money to pay up.' When they said they would not be responsible for the balance due on their stock, it would have been easy for the city to say: 'This stock belongs to the city and not to you; you must remember that when you got the charter you got it for the city'. But they never said anything of the kind, and when they asked to be relieved of their liability the city consented. Since I have heard these documents read, I am not convinced that these gentlemen are agents or trustees for the city. The hon. gentleman from Wellington has told us that he subscribed for stock to aid an enterprise for his own town. When he did so, did he not transfer the stock to the town, or subscribe to a document showing that the stock belonged to the town?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—No, there was no such undertaking at all. The stock stood in the name of those who had subscribed for it for two or three years, and there was no undertaking on the part of any of them. They were all so deeply interested in securing the line that they voluntarily subscribed for the stock when they were asked to do so.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—The hon. gentleman says he subscribed stock for his town. Was it understood by the town that he was to hold that stock as trustee for the town, or was it not? That is the point.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—We merely acted in the interest of the town at the request of the town council. We subscribed the stock and paid our ten per cent, and, when the stock was wanted by the town, we transferred it.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Then they had only your word for it. Supposing some of the stockholders had died; was the estate bound to transfer that stock to the town? Surely not. If the town had no letter saying that the stock was held by the subscriber as a trustee, there would have been nothing to show that it belonged to the town. Every day transactions occur in which the subscriber is a cipher, and the stock is held by the individual to qualify him for some special purpose. In that case, the holder of the stock gives a letter showing that he holds it as a trustee. I daresay, when the gentlemen in question in this case subscribed for the stock, it was with the full intention of returning that stock at some time; but it is a hardship to come now and compel them to do so. The city of Guelph did not care to get it back, was not anxious about it, thinking the road would never pay. What happened? Suddenly the road began to pay, and then the city wanted to get the stock back, and the gentlemen in question did not want to return it, although others may have had it in their mind that it was held for the city. We may as well take their word as take the word of the city of Guelph. There is no document before the House to prove which of them owns the stock.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Did not a certain number of gentlemen who subscribed for stock show what they thought about it when they transferred it to the city?

Hon. Mr. FORGET—I do not know anything about that; but my supposition is that when they asked for a loan, they wanted to get rid of the liability. I have not seen anything to justify me in voting away the rights of those gentlemen. If there is any doubt, I would rather give my vote for them. If the stock was held for the city, the city was to blame for not putting the whole thing in legal shape. On the other hand, the gentlemen who kept it that way kept it with the intention of holding on to it if the stock should prove to be good, and if it should not prove to be good, of turning it over to the city. If the city corporation wants to prove that these gentlemen were agents or trustees, the court is there, and they can establish their claim. Why do they come to parliament, and ask us to say that these gentlemen were trustees? The hon. gentleman from De Salaberry wants to vote for the Bill, but he desires to qualify it. I did not pay much attention to the letters and documents that were passed when the loan was made; but all sorts of conditions were attached to them. However, the city never said in any of these documents that the holders of the stock must declare that they held it as trustees for the city, and they had the right to do that at the time.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It would have no effect at the time, because the city did not authorize them to hold the stock.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—If I hold stock for the city of Ottawa, because the city has no right to hold it, the city has the right to get a letter from me stating that I hold the stock for them. I feel that this Bill should go back to the committee, in order that we may get more light on it.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—If the Bill goes back to the committee at this stage of the session it will be lost. But this is not the last stage of the Bill; it must go to the House of Commons, and if Mr. McCrae, or anybody else, has any new evidence to offer, it can be produced there. We have had no evidence of anything of the kind here. The document read by the hon. member from Hastings is simply the statute of nine years ago.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is true; but it was not before the committee.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—It was before the committee; it was presented by Mr. Guthrie, who appeared for the city of Guelph. We have not heard anything new to-day. The chairman of the Railway Committee tells us that he has assurances from Mr. McCrae that other documents in connection with this matter can be produced. He has the assurance from the treasurer of the city of Guelph, however, that there are no documents in existence that have not been presented. He says all the documents in connection with this railway were in the possession of the Railway Committee when the Bill was dealt with the other day. What is to be gained by sending the report back to the committee? It would be equivalent to moving the six months' hoist.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Perhaps Mr. McCrae has more information to give.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Mr. McCrae was here, and produced the document which has been read as new information. That is the only information which Mr. McCrae claims was not submitted to the committee, but it was before the committee. If there is any further evidence to be furnished by Mr. McCrae or anybody else, he can submit it to the Railway Committee of the House of Commons. So far as the preamble is concerned, I would not like to legislate as we are asked to do in this Bill, without giving a reason for it, and that preamble gives the reason. The committee were satisfied from the evidence adduced before them, and almost unanimously, that these gentlemen were acting as trustees for the city of Guelph. There can be no question in the mind of any hon. gentleman in this House, or any member of the committee, but that was absolutely correct.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—I am one.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—You have changed your mind.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Yes.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I would not suggest for a moment that these gentlemen have not legal right if they wish to avail themselves of the position they occupied as trustees for the city of Guelph; but the evidence adduced before the committee went to show that these gentlemen, immediately after they paid their hundred dollars, did so because there was no other means of securing the railroad except by citizens acting in that capacity. The city of Guelph could not get a railway charter, but it wanted the railway. A number of gentlemen subscribed for the stock, paying one hundred dollars each, and applied for the charter. They organized as a company, and immediately Guelph passed a by-law.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Was it passed by resolution of the city council that they were to get a charter for that railway? How was it done? The hon. gentleman said that Guelph asked ten men——

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I will say ten men in the city of Guelph.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—By resolution of the council.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I do not think so. I do not know anything about that at all. The facts are that ten citizens of Guelph did apply for a charter. I said that the citizens of Guelph were practically unanimous in trying to secure Canadian Pacific railway connections with Guelph, and three of those gentlemen who were putting themselves in that position, as soon as they got in a position to determine the liability that they might be responsible for on subscribing that stock, immediately got the city to become responsible for it, and the evidence adduced before the committee was that all of these gentlemen assisted in inducing the electors of the city of Guelph to pass that by-law. Mr. McCrae said he did oppose one by-law, and gave a reason. His reason was that the company purposed extending the line up to Goldie's mill, and he voted against it, but he assisted in carrying the other by-law, and it was stated that in the two of these by-lws these very stockholders subscribed, in one case ten dollars a piece, to assist in carrying the by-law, and in another case $25. There is no question that six of these gentlemen did agree to transfer their whole stock to the city of Guelph, and they carried out their agreement. It was assumed by the information we have through the press report, that the other gentlemen agreed to it also.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—At what time did they agree to it?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Previous to the passing of the by-law.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—What year?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—1909. They agreed to it, and it was assumed that they agreed to it. The citizens of Guelph voted on the by-law on the assumption that the stockholders were going to transfer their stock.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No evidence of it.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Yes. The first by-law was defeated and the second was carried, because the taxpayers were assured that in voting for the by-law they were not voting for the benefit of the holders of the stock, these ten men, and they carried the by-law. The citizens believed they were voting for the interest of the city of Guelph, and not for the ten gentlemen. The citizens of Guelph were anxious for the road. Mr. McCrea opposed one by-law but supported the other. I have a paper here published in Guelph, the 'Weekly Herald' of January 27, 1910, dealing with this very matter. They go on to discuss the position of the railroad about retiring some of the bonds, and so on. I wish to read this article to show what the citizens of Guelph understood in connection with the whole deal. Speaking of the board of directors that they had to elect that year, and some other matters in connection with the road, they say:

> It is therefore essential that our representatives this year on the Board should be men thoroughly seized of the importance of the present situation, and should either be alder men or ratepayers who hold no stock in the road, and have such a stake in the city that they will be here for many years to come.
> It is essential, in view of the stage the matter has assumed, that it shall be understood (what has always been hitherto understood) that the ten shares held by private shareholders in the G.J.R., are held in trust for the people, the formation of the Company being the only way in which the building of the road could have been undertaken by the city. These gentlemen have a perfect right, and no one will gainsay it, to be paid six per cent on their $100 each invested, and as the city has been recouped for the interest unpaid in former years, no one will object to the private shareholders receiving theirs on the same basis.
> But there is no necessity why we should do more than that—or more than was ever intended. The G. J. R. private shareholders know full well that they went into the building of the road as patriotic citizens, who were willing to act as trustees of the people, and consequently they deposited $100 apiece in order to qualify.

That was the information given to us before the committee. It is apparently the understanding of the city of Guelph and surely we are not confiscating. We are helping the city of Guelph. If I recollect aright, I think this House and parliament have done things that probably were not quite right. If my recollection is correct, about a year ago some hon. gentlemen who expressed their views on this matter were not to-day so particular about expressing their views. The argument was advanced in this connection in the other branch of parliament as to the position of the Canada Life when that company had a Bill before us. Certain complaints were entered against the Canada Life, and hon. gentlemen in this House and elsewhere saw fit to brush them aside by legislation. Surely, if gentlemen could quell their conscience at that time, they could do it in this case.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Two wrongs do not make a right.

Hon. Mr. WATSON. No, I do not say that they are wrongs. They are both rights. There are occasions when men will object to legislation that is not objectionable. I have no fault to find with the gentlemen who supported that view a year ago, and I trust they will support this Bill now. This is not one individual asking advantage of another private individual. The corporation of the city of Guelph, have paid all the liabilities in connection with this railway, and have had those gentlemen act for them as trustees, the only way in which they could procure the road at that time, and I have no hesitation in supporting the Bill as amended. There are two of these original stockholders, McCrae and Kloepfer, who have not assigned their stock. The other two shares have been purchased by some gentleman who was a trustee at that time, and it was stated by the hon. gentleman who promoted this Bill the other day before the committee, he had sold one for $40 and the other for $135. It was bought as a matter of speculation.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—When was the stock sold?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I do not know. He showed that one of those gentlemen who sold for $135 had paid $10 to help carry the by-law on one occasion and $25 on another, which, with the $100 paid for the stock would make $135, and he was simply getting his money back. The by-law voted to give them $100 back, the amended by-law was to give them their money back with interest at six per cent compounded, which made $400. I voted in favour of that. With all the circumstances in my mind, I have no hesitation in reporting the Bill and I trust the House will adopt it. I am an old citizen in that portion of the country, and I know something of the benefit it will be. The road is some 60 or 70 miles and it will be a help to the city in the matter of business. The city of Guelph patronizes the road liberally in preference to the Grand Trunk. I think we cannot make any mistake in passing the Bill. Let it go to the House of Commons, and if Mr. McCrae or any one else has any additional evidence to offer, they will have an opportunity to do so before the Commons Committee.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am glad to hear the chairman of the committee and the hon. member who moved the adoption of the report make the statement he did, and I hope it will be a caution to us in future. It was nearly one o'clock when this Bill was rushed through, and it is not the only time that this same thing has occurred. The question of changing the preamble was never discussed. According to rules of the House we are not allowed to discuss what took place in committee; but the hon. gentleman admitted the fact that in committee the question of changing the preamble of the Bill was not considered, and he also made another very important admission, which should be a lesson to the whole of us, that the view existed at the time that very few of us—I include myself, and I think there were others in the same position—had an opportunity to give it the consideration it deserved. I am not going to refer to the remarks made by the hon. gentleman from Wellington (Mr. McMullen) in reference to Mr. McCrae. Mr. McCrae is politically of his own party. He is not a political friend of mine, although a personal friend, as I hope many other Liberals are; but I should be very sorry in a matter of this kind to charge Mr. McCrae, knowing his reputation as well as I do as an enterprising gentleman, with attempting to take that which is not his own, and to apply to it the term graft. If there was any graft in the matter at all, it appears to me it must have been on the part of the city of Guelph. Mr. McCrae tells me that when the company was in extremis, if I may use that expression, he offered to give up his stock if they would give him $100, and they refused to do so, positively, but just as soon as they wanted to raise money, and there was a prospect of success, he makes a bargain with them that if they relieve him and the other stockholders of the extra $900 for which they were liable as the balance due on their stock, and pay the $100, that they would consent to surrender the stock to the city, and the city, under the agreement which has been read, agreed to relieve them of that. Now, if they were trustees or agents, why did they make a stipulation to give him the fully paid up share in that enterprise of $100. If they were trustees as the hon. gentleman says they were, all they had to do was say: 'Give that back to the city and we will pay you what you have invested. There is the simple statement. The statement I am making now, I am making on the authority of Mr. McCrae himself, and that is the reason I put it so strongly that they offered to give it, when they wanted to relieve themselves of the responsibility they had incurred, and it was distinctly stated before the committee that when they subscribed for that stock they were told positively that they would be held responsibile for the whole thousand dollars. Under the manipulation which took place afterwards they were relieved of $900 responsibility, and the city agreed to give them a fully paid up $100 share. If they were not entitled to it as private shareholders why should the city corporation consent to do anything of the kind? My hon. friend says this information was before the committee. I am not going to deny that. It may have been before the committee, but I venture the statement that though the Bill may have been before the committee, the points to which I have called the attention of the Senate were not mentioned or discussed. What are you going to do with the gentlemen who paid for the stock? My hon. friend says that two shares were bought. If two shares were purchased from parties who had the right to sell them, it shows that they have entered into a speculation; no matter what they gave for it, and they are entitled to whatever benefit may accrue from that speculation. There was a period when they were willing to give that stock away. McCrae told me so, but the city, at that time, would not relieve them of the responsibility for $900, the unpaid balance of the stock. So all this talk about what we do for the purpose of increasing trade and aiding the city, has no relevancy whatever to the question we are discussing. We all know that. I admit all the hon. gentlemen says in reference to precedent, particularly those who are carrying on business subscribing individually or taking stock without any expectation at all of realizing any return from it for their own benefit. But in this case it turns out that four or five of them held their stock after the city refused to take it from them, and in consideration of being relieved of the $900 responsibility, they consented to the Bill becoming law. The position is that you are depriving these four gentlemen of property which belongs to them, and you are depriving two of them who went into a speculation, and bought the shares, not as trustees or agents, but at their own risk. I have some stock I would like to sell to the hon. gentleman at forty cents on the dollar if he desired to have it. That would not prove I was an agent of the company, that issued the stock. If you think proper to pass this Bill, you are establishing a precedent you are not likely to follow in the future. I am not going to discuss the Canada Life. It is too important a question. If I understood that question when it was before parliament, it was not at all analogous to the question we are now discussing.

MONTREAL CENTRAL TERMINAL COMPANY'S BILL.

WITHDRAWN.

The order of the day being called:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion for the consideration of the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, to (Bill 44) an Act respecting the Montreal Central Terminal Company.—(Hon. Mr. Landry.)

Hon Mr. EDWARDS moved in amendmentment that the promoters have leave to withdraw the Bill.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I do not think that this chamber would consent to the request of the promoters. A part of this Bill which was adopted by the Railway Committee of the Senate was looked upon as a very important matter to the city of Montreal. The committee had several sittings, discussing that particular part of the Bill which requires the company to get permission from the city of Montreal to do certain things. This Bill was considered along with another measure affecting the city of Montreal this session. An amendment requiring the consent of the city to certain things was incorporated in this Bill, and on account of that amendment being made to this particular Bill, the rival company was required to adopt it also. The representatives of the company accepted cheerfully the same amendments that are set forth in this Bill. That Bill passed both Houses, and received the sanction of the Governor General, and is now the law of the land. Under the circumstances, I do not think this company should have leave to withdraw their Bill simply because it contains similar amendments to those which the other company was required to accept. The two companies ought to be left on a fair and equal footing.

Hon. Mr. OWENS—The hon. gentleman from Portage la Prairie refers to this company and another company as being rivals. This company is for the purpose of providing terminal facilities in the city of Montreal; whereas the other company came in as an ordinary railway company, to obtain power to build a line from Montreal to the Eastern Townships.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Did not the Terminal Company oppose the other Bill on the ground that it was interfering with their rights in the city of Montreal?

Hon. Mr. OWENS—I am not aware that the other company opposed this company in any way. The hon. gentleman, in taking that ground, is imputing bad faith to the promoters of the other Bill. If he claims that they were a rival company to the one now before us, then he means that they came before parliament with a railway Bill as a cloak. If they were rivals of this company, it must have been their object to obtain terminal facilities in Montreal. He must take either horn of the dilemma, if he chooses to speak of these two companies as rivals. I was present at the committee when this Bill came up, and I must say I was rather surprised to see that the Terminal Bill was placed at the head of the list.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—So was I.

Hon. Mr. OWENS—That was not done by any of the parties connected with the Terminal Bill. If there was any object in having it so it was the object of other parties. The Terminal Company's Bill came up, however, and the amendment which was afterwards made was proposed by the chairman of the committee, not by the promoters of the Terminal Company Bill when it came up. It is true the solicitor of the company, who was present, did not object to it. He did not see the point that his principals saw afterwards when the Bill came before them, and took the ground that they did not wish to have an amendment of that kind; that so far as the Terminal Company was concerned, it was going to defeat the object of the Bill. The Terminal Company was to connect with the different railways coming into Montreal. They had already made arrangements with a number of those railways by which they would take their passengers and freight through the city. If that amendment passed, it would entirely defeat that object, and rather than have such a provision they wish, with the consent of the Senate, to withdraw the Bill. In doing that they are not imposing on Montreal in any way. If they want any facilities of that kind, they must go to the city of Montreal later; but they are not going to have a Bill with such a provision in it at the present time. Such an amendment is all very well as applied to a railway company that was coming in, and it may have been quite proper to include it in the other Bill. That was a matter for the other parties to discuss; but it is certainly most unfair to say that the city of Montreal can put through parliament a private Bill for which the promoters of this Terminal Bill must pay, and that they will impose objectionable terms on the company and refuse the parties interested permission to withdraw their Bill. I must say it is the first time in my experience, and I think in the experience of older members of this House, that the consent of the Senate has been refused to any promoters of a Bill for permission to withdraw it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. OWENS—The promoters may with perfect good faith refuse to carry their Bill through parliament with objectionable clauses in it. They may say: We would rather not have the Bill at all than have it with a clause of that kind, and we withdraw it. It is all very well to say to parliament: 'There was another Bill which was a rival Bill with similar clauses, and they were discussed together.' The Bills were not discussed together. The hon. gentlemen who were on that committee know that this Bill was at the head of the list and the other Bill was at the foot of the list. I doubt whether they were discussed the same day. I was in the Senate when this Bill was discussed, and I do not believe I was in the committee when the other Bill was considered. Therefore, it is a far drawn conclusion when you say that the Terminal Bill would be a rival in any way to the Railway Bill or vice versa. It is a poor argument. I trust the Senate will grant the reasonable request of the promoters and allow them to withdraw the Bill.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I have already spoken on this Bill, but not on the amendment now proposed. I may say I was a fervent ally of my hon. friend who has just sat down, in the committee; but I intend to remain logical on the stand I took in the committee, and the stand I took in the city of Montreal. When the two Bills were discussed, my hon. friend stood with those who thought that the franchises of Montreal should be protected and respected, and together, being in the majority, we inserted in those two Bills safeguards which we thought were in the interests of Montreal, and did so on the urgent demand of the city council of Montreal, which sent a resolution to the members representing Montreal, and residing in Montreal. My hon. friend claims that parliament should not, and could not accept amendments to a Bill made at the demand of a third party, and force those amendments upon the promoters if the promoters desired to withdraw their Bill. I will remind my hon. friend that no private Bill passes parliament which does not remain absolutely for ever under the control of parliament, and I refer him to city charters, for instance to the charter of the city of Montreal. At every session for the last ten or twenty years of the Quebec legislature, the city of Montreal has asked for amendments, and citizens of Montreal have petitioned for amendments to the charter of Montreal and those amendments were adopted.

Hon. Mr. OWENS—Does the hon. gentleman assume that the city of Montreal would not have the right to withdraw the charter which is before parliament?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Certainly not, because the city of Montreal, applying for amendments to its charter would have to accept whatever amendments the legislature of Quebec would deem fair and opportune to pass. In fact, private citizens on depositing their $200 with a Bill can come before parliament and ask that the charter of any municipality should be amended. They are supposed, notwithstanding the fact that the petitions are presented by city corporations, to be private Bills, although of considerable public import. In this instance, we have a company which ask for incorporation to do certain things in and around the city of Montreal; but certain safeguards, which presented themselves to the minds of the members of parliament, in years gone by, were included in this Bill. This company came at different times for amendment to their charter. When it is before parliament it is for parliament to deal with it, and there is considerable importance attached to this Bill in its relation to the metropolis of Canada, and the right asked for by the company is to practically exercise absolute powers without the consent of the city of Montreal, on, upon and under the ground upon which the city of Montreal stands. If the hon. gentleman will look at the different statutes that were passed, he will find tha this company, if it does not agree with the city of Montreal, can appeal to the Railway Commission.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND.

Hon. Mr. OWENS—Very properly.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It seemed to parliament at the time to be proper; but as in the Quebec resolution to-day, so did we in the Senate Committee in our wisdom think that this was giving a right to the company which it was not entitled to. It was giving the right to a benefit in all the franchises of the city of Montreal, because the city of Montreal was no more free to tell that company, 'you will proceed this way or that way; you will not proceed unless you accept certain conditions'. The city would have to abide by the order of the Railway Commission and impliedly the company had power which the Railway Commission would have to recognize and stand as a judge, as to the modus operandi, in which it should be exercised. We have added a clause by which we say that the company shall not exercise certain rights without the sanction of the city of Montreal. These terminals are for the city of Montreal, and it is the city of Montreal that has the first word to say in the matter just now. Two or three companies are fighting before the Quebec legislature for the same rights which this particular company claims to have on the surface and underground in Montreal, and very properly the Private Bills Committee of the Quebec legislature have adopted a standard clause by which it denies any right to those companies, except those that the city of Montreal will grant them, and will be pleased to grant them. It incorporates them, but it does not allow them an absolute right to exercise powers. It limits those powers to the consent of the city of Montreal. Now we have in those two last Bills laid down the same law, which is a sane one, the respect of the franchises of individuals. We claim that we shall not despoil the individual, and yet we have in the past quite too often, perhaps, neglected to remark that when we despoil a large community we are doing a larger wrong than when we despoil an individual. I claim that this Bill being before parliament, it is our right, nay our duty, to add whatever safeguards we think we should add for the protection of the public, and I do so with a lighter heart by reason of the fact that all the parties interested in that legislation concurred. I sat by my hon. friend who was interested in that Bill—

Hon. Mr. OWENS—Not a bit.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Or seemed to interest himself in the Bill, and in spite of those hon. senators who were afraid the creation of this precedent would make it imperative upon them to accept these limitations in the Bill that was coming, the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, and the attorneys for the company who were there, seemed to be agreed to accept those amendments. Now I recognize that possibly when examining this Bill more closely, there may be a need for a small amendment in order to allow companies which have rights of way to use them whenever they shall utilize the terminal facilities which this company provides, if they ever provide them; but between bringing in a slight amendment that will do complete justice to the promoters of this Bill and allowing them to withdraw the Bill because they are still within the two years within which to begin their work, there is a vast difference, and I think parliament will assert the fact that it is master of this Bill and that it is bound to do justice to the community in which the company is to operate.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I think my hon. friend is unnecessarily warm over this matter. There are two or three views of the case that occurred to my mind, one of which is, so far as local consideration is involved, that this company must necessarily come back next year for an extension of time for the exercise of its corporate powers.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Except they begin to exercise them sooner.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There is nothing to prevent the city of Montreal getting legislation restricting the rights of this or any other company. Consequently, wherever, an alleged wrong exists it can always be redressed by a substantive measure. There is something involved in this which is more important than any local consideration such as has been discussed. There is the procedure and practice of parliament, observed during a long series of years, and I challenge my hon. friend to point to any case in which parliament has refused to permit the withdrawal of a private measure. I have looked at the authorities as far as possible, and failed to find any precedent warranting the position taken by my hon. friend; but I can find authority in all the books on parliamentary practice and procedure for saying that parliament will permit the promoter of a Bill to withdraw his measure at any stage. Even a public measure may be withdrawn in either House at the instance of the promoter. That is clearly set forth in Bourinot, and if parliament will permit a public Bill to be withdrawn at the instance of the promoter, a Bill in which the whole public is interested, how much stronger is the position of the promoters of this Bill, inasmuch as it is only a private measure involving local interests. It is infinitely important that we maintain that uniformity of decision and practice which has invariably been observed not only in the Canadian but in the British parliament. Why should we depart from that well-established practice in this particular case? There is this further consideration involved in the measure; is it wise to establish a precedent in our parliamentary procedure simply because local interests of a limited character are involved? Are we to establish a practice, by which all applicants to parliament may have to look with apprehension and doubt upon any application which they may make to parliament lest parliament should violently seize upon the vested rights to which they are entitled and be stampeded, or in a moment of impulse or passion, or the clamour of the public, interfere with vested rights which may be of vital importance to the corporation interested? It is a matter of infinitely greater importance to parliament that the public should be protected in the rights given them by statute, than to seek to rectify some alleged local wrong in a Bill and thus destroy the practice that has taken a century to build up, and which, up to the present time, has never been successfully attacked, and for which I can find no precedent. I simply point out these considerations to hon. gentlemen, and also that there are other channels by which any alleged wrong can be redressed. The city of Montreal can at any time obtain legislation from parliament to restrict the rights of parties who undertake to exercise undue license, or at any subsequent time when this company comes back for legislation, it can engraft upon any measure which the company may insist upon having, this protection which is now sought. If next year this company should seek an extension of time for the exercise of its corporate rights, we can then introduce this amendment into the Bill. My hon. friend expressed some solicitude that we should be logical in this matter. If we are to follow logic out to its extremity, let me ask who is in charge of the Bill? My hon. friend from Ottawa has asked leave to withdraw. He withdraws from the Bill; who will take charge of it. The parent withdraws, and it becomes an orphan. Will the hon. member from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Beique) or the hon. member from Killarney (Hon. Mr. Young) take charge of it? Who are to become its parents?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Some one will take care of the orphan.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If a litigant introduces a proceeding in court, he has a right to discontinue his proceedings at any time. My hon. friend from De Salaberry, or my hon. friend who is leading the House to-night (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) will find it difficult to point to any case in the jurisprudence in any province in Canada in which a litigant has been refused permission to withdraw his suit. I know of none.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—In principle the hon. gentleman is right, because private rights only are affected. But when there is a public right, as in the case of a contested election, the petitioner cannot withdraw.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is under statutory enactment, but even an election petition may be withdrawn. It is so clearly established a matter of principle, that I might safely say it has never been violated. There is no good reason why because some private interest is alleged to be interfered with in this particular case, that we should break down the practice of a century, and establish a new one. On those grounds, I am entirely opposed to the position taken by my hon. friend in objecting to the withdrawal of this Bill.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Whenever the rights involved are merely private rights, any suitor is at liberty to discontinue his action on paying the costs; but in every case where public rights are affected that right is denied. Take election cases, as was properly pointed out by the hon. gentleman from De Lorimier, and take penal cases; it was a few years ago made a criminal offence to withdraw a criminal action, and that principle is recognized everywhere and in every case. Will it be seriously contended that because this Bill is before parliament at the instance of a private company, that therefore parliament, if it finds that a charter has been granted in error, and is a threat upon the public interest, that we do not possess the power necessary to protect the public from that threat and danger? The ground upon which the right to withdraw the Bill is opposed is that there are public interests in the city of Montreal which should have been safeguarded when the original charter was passed. I merely desire to put the facts before the House as they are. The hon. gentleman from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) treated the matter as if it was in the power of the Railway Board to prevent this company exercising its charter rights in the city of Montreal in violation of the franchise of the city. If reference is made to the statute of 1890, the original statute, and to the Act passed last year, it will be found there is no such recourse. Speaking from recollection, the only safeguard left to the city of Montreal is merely to locate the place where the company shall pass; but it would be the duty of the Railway Board to allow them to pass. The hon. gentleman has made an appeal in favour of the amendment on the ground of vital vested rights. I could readily apprehend the force of the argument if the company had commenced its works.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I did not refer to the vested rights of this company; I referred to the vested fights of other companies.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I see by the 'Gazette' of to-day that Mr. Armstrong was yesterday before the controllers of the city asking them to locate the place where the company shall construct their tunnel. They have not commenced the work at all. As to vested rights, in principle, as the hon. gentleman from Calgary puts it, I beg to refer the hon. gentleman to the Interpretation Act as it stands on our statute-book. I would ask him to read section 18 of chapter 1, in which it is provided that every Act shall be so constructed as to reserve to parliament the power of compelling and maintaining it, or revoking, restricting or modifying any power granted or whenever such modification or restriction is deemed by parliament to be required for the public good. It is merely that right we are seeking to exercise by inserting an amendment for the public good.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I would ask what is the question before the Chair?

Hon. Mr. POWER (Acting Speaker)—The question is the amendment of the hon. member from Ottawa asking leave to withdraw the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—As soon as that question is settled, if the House should refuse the consent which is always given in such cases, then we might appeal to the Speaker on the other motion, and I quote the following passage from May:

> In 1902 a committee having thus reported that parties did not intend to proceed with their Bill, notice was given of a motion to recommit the Bill, but Mr. Speaker ruled that such a motion would be out of order on the ground that a private Bill was the property of the promoters, and the House could not compel them to proceed with it against their wish.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—That is at another stage. The hon. gentleman will find that it is not applicable.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What I want to impress on the House is this: If the House should refuse the permission asked for, what is the next step? The hon. gentleman from Ottawa is the party in charge of the Bill. Any motion that may be made after he has asked leave to withdraw the Bill may be declared out of order, because the House having been notified the promoter wants to withdraw the Bill, the Speaker should declare that no motion could be in order.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I have been for some twenty years a member of parliament, and this is the first time I have heard in this House or elsewhere that the promoter of a Bill has not the right to withdraw it. I do not know exactly what is the meaning of the Bill, though I heard it discussed in committee. I had no interest in the measure, but as a matter of principle it seems to me that we must have rights. If any member introduces a Private Bill, he should have the right to withdraw it. The illustration given by the hon. leader of the opposition is to the point: This is a court of Justice. This Bill comes before us from the other House. We are a court of appeal here, and in a court of justice the general rule—there may be exceptions in the criminal law—is that a litigant in any court has a right to drop his proceedings, to take his case out of court, and the only thing for the court to do is to saddle the cost on him. So that in this case, those who brought the Bill have the right to withdraw it. Generally in such cases application is made to return the fee, less the cost of printing and translation. The only thing the House can do is to keep the fee. What public rights are effected by a Bill of this kind? If I understand the hon. member from De Salaberry, the opposition to the amendment is because in a Bill passed some years ago there was something prejudicial to the city of Montreal. If that is so, the city of Montreal may at any time bring a Bill here attacking the charter, and remedying the evil, but if the Bill is withdrawn, can the city of Montreal say it is master of the situation? Can it say you have deposited the fee, and have proceeded to this point, and now you want to withdraw your Bill, but I shall proceed with it. That is an extraordinary thing. I have the greatest confidence in the judgment, capacity and parliamentary experience of both the hon. member from De Salaberry, and the hon. member from De Lorimier, but in this case it seems to me they are absolutely mistaken. The very fact of these very gentlemen citing exceptions to the general principle of the law as election petitions, and criminal law, where the whole country is interested, proves that the general principle is contrary to their pretension. This is the first time I have seen the ground taken that the promoter of a Private Bill has not the right to withdraw it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It is a matter of practice rather than of principle.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—No, the promoter of a Bill, like a suitor, is master of the procedure, and has a right to withdraw his Bill. If it were an election petition or some extraordinary Bill in which the whole public is interested, there might be some doubt on the subject; when public rights are involved in a private Bill the government takes hold of it. If Montreal has a grudge, or thinks some of their rights are trampled upon, she can next session introduce legislation to remedy the evil. I, therefore, stand by the amendment. If the hon. gentleman from Ottawa has no right to withdraw his Bill, the same thing may happen to any of us. I may be forced by a majority to proceed with a Bill, which I consider against my interests. If the city of Montreal has a right to do anything of that kind, every one in the Dominion has the same right. A majority can say: 'We will use your money, and force you to go on with your Bill.' Another member would step in and take charge of the Bill. I am speaking of the principle alone, and I claim that the hon. gentleman has a right to withdraw his Bill.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I cannot understand how a member of this House can contend seriously that the Senate has not a right to do what it likes under the circumstances. A Bill was introduced in this House, and sent to the Railway Committee. The Railway Committee returned the Bill to the House with amendments which were accepted by the promoter. The hon. gentleman cannot be serious when he says that the House is not the master of the Bill. If the House were not master, what would be the result? Promoters of Bills might come before parliament and advance them to a certain stage, and after all the work of the committee had been done, would have the right to withdraw their Bills. They could play with the House as they pleased. I do not think the argument is serious. I would be the first to consent to the withdrawal of a Bill if some good reason existed for doing so; but otherwise I would oppose its withdrawal. In this case, I affirm with knowledge that it would be unjust to the promoters of the other Bill already passed. Why? Because both Bills came before the Railway Committee at the same time, and were considered at the same sitting. Amendments were inserted in the other Bill with the consent of some of those who are in favour of this Bill. Everybody consented to the amendment, because it was considered that it would be only just and in the interest of the public of Montreal to insert amendments similar to those introduced in other Bills reported by the Railway Committee. Those amendments were considered necessary to protect the interest of the public. Montreal is not the only city interested. What we ask for Montreal we are ready to demand for every other city in Canada. I have said that it was unjust to the company, because it was understood at the time, and nobody can deny it, that both would be put on the same footing, that the amendments which were inserted in one Bill would be also inserted in the other Bill, and it was done with the consent of the promoters of the Bill. I said it was a protection. At the same time it would be unjust to the promoters of the other Bill, and unjust to Montreal, and why? What would be the result if the Bill were withdrawn? The other company would be bound by the amendments which were passed, and this company would be under the Bill passed last year, and in Montreal they would come in competition with companies that pay very high for their franchises. Is that fair or just? It would be unjust to Montreal, so that for this and other reasons which I have not time to explain, I think we should oppose the withdrawal of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I do not pretend to be thoroughly acquainted with the effect of the Bill now before the House, but I have occupied a seat in this House, and in the Commons, and in the local legislature, and I cannot remember a single instance in which the promoter of a Bill has been refused permission to withdraw it. I might ask the hon. gentleman wherein is this Bill injuring the other Bill they refer to so frequently? By what means has it prevented the other Bill from assuming its general appearance and giving to the company rights under which they can operate? I have yet to learn that the hon. promoter of this Bill, with the approval and sanction of the company that first introduced it, is not acting in accordance with practice. Have the company injured the people of Montreal, or do they deprive them of any rights they possess by reason of the withdrawal of the Bill? I do not think it. Those who say the Bill is interfering with private rights are making a bold assertion not sustained by facts. A promoter desirous of withdrawing a Bill as a matter of principle, has a right to withdraw it. I do not pretend to say that parliament is not seized of that Bill, or that it is not subjected to the approval or disapproval of parliament; but parliament has adopted the principle of granting the right of a promoter to withdraw his Bill. Will any privileges in Montreal be injured by reason of the withdrawal of this Bill? Why should we refuse permission? If the Bill is going to injure Montreal I sympathize with them, but I think the parties introducing the Bill have as great rights as Montreal has in the matter. The hon. leader of the House may be strongly excited over the Bill. Why? There must be some reason. Would he feel so badly if the Bill had not been introduced this session, and the promoters had not been forced to accept certain amendments in the committee? The fact that the lawyers accepted the amendments in the committee is no reason why the company should be refused the right to withdraw their Bill if the amendments are objectionable. The hon. gentleman accepted the amendments, no doubt with the understanding that if they were not approved by the company that later on he could come before parliament and ask to have the Bill withdrawn. If the amendments be obnoxious to the company, why should we insist on passing the Bill? It is not a public Bill. It is a private Bill in the hands of the hon. gentleman who introduced it, and the company who asked for it. I therefore, feel that it is dealing unfairly with the promoters and with the company, if the House should refuse their request.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I was looking through the Commons 'Hansard' to find a precedent for the course adopted. Mr. Conmee presented a Bill in the other House, and later on begged leave to withdraw it. Mr. Sproule said he should be reprimanded for taking up the time of the House by introducing a Bill, and then asking to withdraw it; but there was not a word said in regard to refusing him the right to withdraw it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—But there was no public interest affected.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Yes, it was something about water-ways and dams. It was more a public Bill than this one.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I am not a member of the Railway Committee and know very little about the questions that were discussed before that committee or the matters that were involved between these two companies, which have been called properly or improperly rival companies. The question before the House at the present time is, to my mind, a very simple one, and that is whether the promoter of the Bill and the gentleman who has charge of it in this House has the right of his own motion to withdraw it. I quite agree with others who have spoken upon the subject that during my experience in parliament I have never known a case where the person in charge of a Bill was refused the privilege of withdrawing, and it would appear to me, not only from what has been said, but for additional reasons, that a refusal under such circumstances would be a dangerous precedent to establish, and if there has been anything in the past to warrant a course of this kind, it would appear to me very desirable that the sooner we got rid of it and adhere to what appears to be the practice almost universally adopted, the better for the legislation of this House. In addition to what has been said, it appears to me the great danger lies in affecting private interests. When a private Bill is introduced into parliament, it is necessary, under the rules, that certain notice should be given, so that all persons who might be affected by that legislation should have an opportunity to have their views presented to the House in opposition to the Bill, and the practice of parliament has been to refer such Bills to a committee, and give all persons interested ample opportunity to present their views. This Bill has passed through one stage of the legislature, and it has gone through the second and reached the committee stage. There certain amendemnts were suggested to the Bill by members of the committee, which were adopted and attached to the Bill when it came back to this House. The promoters of the Bill, or the legal gentlemen who represented them there, may or may not—I do not know how it is in this case—have represented all the interests which the passage of that Bill and the passage of those amendments might affect. It is quite possible there may be in these cases bondholders, and there might be persons with claims of different kinds, or there might have been contracts or agreements claimed by the company possessing the charter with other individuals or corporations, and by amendments which were suggested in the course of the progress of the Bill, these rights might be very seriously affected, and the persons have no notice and no opportunity to appear or to present their case to parliament. Surely, under such circumstances, the promoters of the Bill, who, when it reaches the final stage in the House, find these amendments are likely to affect any important interest, either of the persons possessing the charter, or of any person in anyway connected with the enterprise, certainly should have the right to withdraw it. It appears to me that is only common justice to all concerned. One illustration of this principle occurs to me. I have known cases in my experience in parliament where in the passage of a Bill, at the committee stage, certain interests would appear; for instance in a railway charter, persons who might have claims against the company or contractor or they would ask parliament not to grant the additional powers or rights or privileges which the company were asking for until these claims were settled. The committee in certain cases have insisted that if that Bill passed, a clause should be put in protecting the rights of these particular individuals who appeared before the committee; but in such a case if the company asking for the Bill considered these conditions too onerous, desired to withdraw the Bill, I never knew of it being refused, and I think it would be a very grave injustice if it were refused. It is not for parliament to settle the rights between disputants with regard to any measure that comes before parliament. Those are matters which should be settled in the courts. If there is evidence of a great injustice, it may be within the power and right of parliament to refuse to pass the Bill unless certain conditions are attached to it, which in their opinion would remedy those wrongs; but I cannot conceive that parliament would be justified under any circumstances in forcing the promoters of a Bill to accept certain conditions which they were unwilling to accept, and which they have a right to have decided by an appeal to a court of justice. The only answer to this view of the case, that of a very serious nature, is the answer that in this case the rights are not private rights, but are the rights of the city of Montreal. The city of Montreal is not the whole Dominion. The rights of the city of Montreal are local rights, rights of a certain locality, and there is no doubt that the fair, honourable and proper way for the city of Montreal, if it has rights which are liable to be affected by the charters which have been granted in the past and by the withdrawal of this Bill, is to come to parliament and introduce their own measure, give proper notice of it, and have all parties represented and have the matter properly threshed out and decided on its merit, and no one would be more willing than I to support a Bill which would secure to Montreal justice in dealing with railway or other corporations which desire rights within its limits. For these reasons, I think it would be very unwise and unjust and would be a very undesirable precedent if the promoter of this Bill were refused the right to withdraw it.

The House divided on the amendment, which was lost on the following division:

Yeas 15; Nays 24.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I contend the motion of my hon. friend from De Salaberry is out of order, and I submit that the hon. gentleman has a right to withdraw his Bill. I quote May's Parliamentary Practice, pages 687 and 827. At page 687 he says:

> In passing private Bills, parliament still exercises its legislative functions, but its proceedings partake of a judicial character. The persons whose private interests are to be promoted appear as suitors for the Bill; while those who apprehend injury are admitted as adverse parties in the suit. Many of the formalities of a court of justice are maintained; various conditions are required to be observed, and their observance to be strictly proved; and if the parties do not sustain the Bill in its progress, by following every regulation and form prescribed, it is not forwarded by the House in which it is pending. If they abandon it, and no other parties undertake its support, the Bill is lost, however, sensible the House may be of its value. The analogy which all these circumstances bear to the proceedings of a court of justice, is further supported by the payment of fees which is required of every party promoting or opposing a private Bill, or petitioning for or opposing any particular provision. It may be added that the solicitation of a Bill in parliament has been regarded, by courts of equity, so completely in the same light as an ordinary suit, that the promoters have been restrained, by injunction, from proceeding with a Bill, the object of which was held to be to set aside a covenant.
> If parties acquaint the committee that they do not desire to proceed further with the Bill, this fact is reported to the House, and an order is then made that the Bill be withdrawn, or, merely, that the report do lie upon the table.
> In 1902 a committee having thus reported that the parties did not intend to proceed with their Bill, notice was given of a motion to recommit the Bill, but Mr. Speaker ruled that such a motion would be out of order on the ground that a private Bill is the property of the promoters and that the House could not compel them to proceed with it against their wish.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I claim that the hon. gentleman is too late in making his point. There was a motion in the form of an amendment on the part of the promoters of the Bill to withdraw it. This was the very question which my hon. friend now claims the House had no right to decide against, that this motion being made, it was carried of course. The hon. gentleman has not appealed to the Chair against the claim of the House to deal with the point, and has allowed the House, which is supreme, to deal with the point, and the House has settled it against the promoters. If the point had been taken, I claim it would have been badly taken, because in point of fact the authority stated that if there is no other party to proceed and further the interest of the Bill, then the Bill will fall. That is as far as I could hear the citation made by my hon. friend. But it cannot be made a question of order. When the procedure of parliament declares that all Bills remain subject to the control of parliament, and when necessarily it is a question of policy with parliament to decide if it will exercise that right or not, if parliament can exercise that right, this branch of parliament can exercise it. I claim that the point even if well taken, is too late, but it is not well taken.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The argument that the point is taken too late is not logical. How could I take it before? I rose to ask the Speaker what was the question before the House. The question before the House was the permission asked by the promoter of the Bill to withdraw it. I could not raise the point of order on that motion. Was he in order or was he not?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—According to my hon. friend's argument, it was an unnecessary question to ask the House, because he had that inherent right himself.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I wanted to know the motion before the Chair. If the motion was in order, I could not raise the point of order, and that amendment was not in order.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Then he accepts the amendment as being in order. If it was in order a moment ago, how could it be out of order now.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Because the amendment has notified the House of the decision taken by the hon. gentleman to withdraw the Bill. That is the final declaration made by the hon. member, that he withdraws the Bill, and the moment he declares to the House that he withdraws his Bill, any subsequent motion made to continue with the Bill becomes out of order, so that I could not take my point of order before we were in disorder.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—But the hon. gentleman forgets that it is not a statement he has made. It is a motion.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is more than a statement.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Yes, with which the House was seized and upon which they acted.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Where on the order paper is that motion?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Does the hon. gentleman claim that once that motion had been made, it could not be taken by the Chairman. This motion is No. 18 on the paper.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Then my hon. friend has no right to make it. It is in the name of the hon. gentleman from Stadacona.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It is a debate.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The reasoning of it is quite manifest it seems to me. If any hon. gentleman will assume charge of this Bill in view of the fact that the promoter has withdrawn it, so far as he individually can do it, I for one will certainly challenge the authority of any member seeking to take charge of this Bill. Having challenged his authority, it then becomes a matter of fact whether the hon. gentleman can say he has charge of the Bill. No hon. gentleman in this House upon being challenged can say that he has charge of the Bill. If my hon. friend from De Salaberry or the hon. gentleman who is leading the House should make a motion to assume the charge of this Bill, I certainly should challenge his authority, and he could not deny it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The hon. gentleman is too late.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I was about to say that the only way any member of the House can take charge of the Bill would be upon a resolution of the House, and notice would have to be given that the House be moved to give to some particular member of the House charge of this Bill, and I submit the usual notice would have to be given before such a resolution can be submitted to the House.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Would my hon. friend kindly quote the rule?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, I could not quote the rule, and I shall point out why. I say there is nothing in parliamentary practice and I challenge my hon. friend from Killarney (Hon. Mr. Young), who at one time occupied the chair in a provincial assembly, to find any warrant for the conclusion at which this House has arrived to-night. We have adopted a practice without any warrant.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has no right to reflect on the decision of the House.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I can say this, that the House has arrived at something unique. It has established for the first time a new principle, a new procedure with reference to the charge of a Bill, and I just rise to discuss the point of order raised by the hon. member from Stadacona; to follow out the logical reasoning by which that conclusion must be arrived at, that a member has a positive right to withdraw a Bill, and once he withdraws it, it is no longer before the House.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The hon. gentleman forgets that the House has just voted, refusing permission to withdraw the Bill. As Chairman of the committee to which the Bill was referred, having reported it with an amendment, it is for me to move concurrence in the amendment.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. member has moved his motion, and I have raised a point of order.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The hon. gentleman moved concurrence a week ago. The debate was adjourned and was resumed to-day.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—When that motion came first, it was in order, because it followed the practice of this House that when amendments come from the committee, the concurrence of the House is asked in a regular way. It was in order. When my hon. friend from Ottawa asked permission to withdraw his Bill, he was in order also. I could not raise a point of order, because he was in order. But as soon as he intimated to the House that he withdrew his Bill——

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Where is the authority?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is the intimation given by the hon. gentleman to the House that he withdraws his Bill.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—By a motion which was rejected.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But it should not have been rejected. It was carried by force, not by logic.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Parliament can do no wrong.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—We occupy now a very peculiar position. Item 18 on the order paper reads as follows:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion for the consideration of the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, to (Bill 44) An Act respecting the Montreal Central Terminal Company.—Hon. Mr. Landry.

It seems to me that the Hon. Mr. Landry has the floor in this debate. Now, the debate is closed, but the hon. member from Ottawa, who has charge of the Bill, has declared that he withdraws from it, and I would like to know who has charge of it now? Has the hon. member from De Salaberry, as Chairman of the Railway Committee, the right to take charge of that Bill and say to the House: 'You must go on with it'? I should like to know where we stand. Unless somebody takes charge of the Bill, it cannot be proceeded with.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The point before the House is the point of order raised by the hon. member from Stadacona.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I know that, but I want to know how we stand. There are three points of order. What is to become of them, and who is to take charge of the Bill now?

Hon. Mr. WILSON—The question put by the hon. member from Quebec is one that ought to be answered. Certainly the hon. member from De Salaberry has no right to take the Bill out of the hands of the promoters. He has paid no fees, he has not even been in possession of the Bill. It was in the hands of the hon. member from Ottawa, and it was very unreasonable and absurd to refuse his request to withdraw it. I have never known such a course to be pursued before. The point of order is well taken. We should know who is the father of the Bill. Did the promoter of the Bill ask the hon. member from De Salaberry to look after it? Certainly not. He has no more right to take charge of it than I have. The hon. member from Ottawa presented the petition in the first place, introduced the Bill, and has been in charge of it to the present time, and now he asks leave to withdraw it. If the hon. member from De Salaberry undertakes to father it now, there will be a miscarriage of justice. We should have a ruling on the point of order.

Hon. Mr. POWER (acting Speaker)—I seem to be somewhat unfortunate in my occupation of the Chair. It has occurred to me that on almost every occasion when I have taken the place of the Speaker for the time being—I do not mean the present Speaker alone, but other speakers—everything goes on with the utmost smoothness while the regular occupant is in the Chair, and when your humble servant comes to assume the duty temporarily, all sorts of difficulties arise. Really the present condition of things is almost a climax. I understand three points of order have been raised, and now the hon. gentleman from St. Thomas (Mr. Wilson) insists that I shall declare upon the paternity of the measure. That comes naturally from a gentleman of the medical profession; but I do not assume to know much about that. Hon. gentlemen will correct me if I am mistaken; but a point was raised by one hon. gentleman that the point taken by the hon. member from Stadacona (Mr. Landry) was taken too late. I think it is our duty not to try to diminish the rights of members of the House. The hon. gentleman from Stadacona was justified, as he says himself there was not anything out of order until this motion which is now before the Chair was moved. He was justified in assuming, as I assumed, that when the hon. member from Ottawa asked leave to withdraw his measure that leave would be granted. That is what he was entitled to, as I understand, by the rules of parliament, and it was only after the House had decided otherwise, and the present motion came before the Chair, that the hon. member from Stadacona was in a position to raise the point of order. I think he was quite right in his contention, and that he has a right to raise the question of order. Then, as to the main question of order, one or two reflections occur to me which I shall state before finally deciding. The hon. gentleman who leads the House spoke about the city of Montreal, and practically intimated that the city of Montreal was affected by this Bill, and, therefore, it was not a private Bill.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. POWER (acting Speaker)—I think the hon. gentleman laid a good deal of stress on the fact that the public were interested. The Bill is a private measure. Fees have been paid upon it as a private Bill. It is in every sense a private Bill. It happens that the Bill may possibly, if it goes into operation, affect to a certain extent the corporation of the city of Montreal, but that does not make it a public Bill. I wish to call attention farther. Hon. gentlemen do not stop to think that they are not dealing with Montreal or other cities. We are dealing with a question of parliamentary procedure. I sympathize—it is only fair to say that—with the people of Montreal, and regret that the promoters of this Bill have decided not to accept the amendments; but I am not to decide according to the interests of Montreal, but according to the procedure and practice of parliament. Just fancy if the House ever undertakes to lay down the rule that no matter how objectionable an amendment may be made to a private Bill, the promoter of that Bill is bound to accept it, if the enemies of a private Bill before the House succeeded in getting a majority, they might make such amendments as to render the Bill ruinous to the promoters, and it does not agree with one's ideas of fair play and justice any more than ones ideas of business, that that should be possible. The promoter of a Bill introduces it, pays his fees, and sees it through to a certain point. If a stage arises when the passage of the Bill would do him more harm than good, he has a right to drop it. I do not repeat what has been quoted by the hon. member from Stadacona, because that is simply the law, and I quoted it, I think, subsequently in the same terms from May myself in the course of a discussion, so that while my sympathies, as a matter of business in this connection are with the city of Montreal, I must say that dealing with a very important parliamentary principle, I am obliged to own that the point of order is well taken and that the House cannot insist upon going on with the Bill which the promoters asks to withdraw.

The Bill was withdrawn.

IRRIGATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (186) An Act to amend the Irrigation Act.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The amendment in the first clause is a very slight one. The present Act imposes an obligation upon the commissioner to receive, or rather upon the parties who ask for the irrigation, to produce before the commissioner duplicate plans showing the tract of land which it is proposed to drain and the nature and location of the proposed ditch or drain, and the commissioner shall report to the minister setting forth the following conditions. The conditions are not changed except for correcting an error in subsection (a). The Act allows the minister to dispense with the production of duplicate plans upon the report of the commissioner.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I should like to ask my hon. friend to ascertain additional information that is not given under this clause. It will be observed that under clauses a and b of subsection 2a, information is to be given, but no information apparently is to be furnished as to what the effect of the building of the drain or ditch would be on the land generally. Information is to be given as to its effect upon lands under the Irrigation Act, but suppose lands are not under the Irrigation Act, should not that information be furnished? It might be a matter of very serious importance to persons interested in lands that a ditch of this character should be constructed, and very possibly their lands made arid. It will be easily seen the water will be drawn off by the construction of a large ditch, and the land affected.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Would not the minister be obliged, under clause c, to give his opinion generally as to the merits of the application?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Having specifically indicated the class of information, he might possibly not report upon the effect of the construction of the ditch upon the land generally. It seems to me, in preparing a report of this kind, he would only report upon a and b those two classes and possibly might elaborate and consider them in compliance with (c).

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Would the Act not presume to leave this part of the question to the provincial government? Clause 13 provides for the approval of the minister.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Who is to report upon the effectiveness of a ditch or drain upon any such works theretofore authorized under the Irrigation Act? Now in that district, calling it an irrigation district, there may be certain lands not affected by the work authorized to be carried out under the Irrigation Act, and those lands, by the construction of such ditch, might be drained of their natural water, and the lands very seriously affected. That seems to me to be quite as important a consideration as the two other considerations involved in (a) and (b). If my hon. friend would obtain that information before we take the third reading, there may possibly be some reason for omitting it. It strikes me in reading it generally that we should have that information.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I will ask for the information.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN, from the Committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

ST. LAWRENCE POWER TRANSMISSION COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. WATSON moved the second reading of Bill (No. 15), An Act to incorporate the St. Lawrence Power Transmission Company, Limited.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I suppose it will be thoroughly understood that we do not accede to the principle of the Bill by taking the second reading to-night? It is a Bill that will be considerably discussed.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Very well.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 103), An Act to amend the Navigable Waters Protection Act.—Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

EASTERN CANADA MANUFACTURERS MUTUAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY'S BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON, from the Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported

Bill (No. 124) An Act respecting the Eastern Canada Manufacturers Mutual Fire Insurance Company, with amendments.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Was it the intention of the committee that the amendment should cover the full premium, or that the notes taken should cover the full contingent liability—that is the entire liability present and contingent?

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—The amendment that was made to the Bill is simply the words of the Act in place of the words in the clause. Whether that would cover it or not I cannot say.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Possibly the hon. member from De Salaberry could answer me. Was it the intention of the committee that the amendment should cover the present as well as the contingent liability, either as to the premium or notes which should be given?

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—No, it does not do that.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What I desire to know is whether the amendment made in this Bill is of a character that the obligation shall be embraced in the full premium paid, or in the notes given at the time the policy was negotiated?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The amendment requires that the full mutual premium be paid in cash, or covered in a note given at the time, but subject to a further contingent liability.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will that contingent liability be set out in the note?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Either in the note or in the policy.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—It does not affect the contingent liability in any way. It leaves the contingent liability to be stated on the policy itself. I move that the report be taken into consideration on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

FEDERATION OF CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE OF PROVINCE OF QUEBEC BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON, from the Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported Bill (No. 33) An Act to incorporate the Federation of Chambers of Commerce of the Province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—In view of the late period of the session, and the fact that the amended Bill has to go back to the Commons, I move the suspension of the rules.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the motion is carried, I should like to ascertain the nature of the amendment made by the committee.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The amendment is one to satisfy the Attorney General of the province of Quebec, who represented the Quebec government in opposition to this Bill. He contended that the Bill was one exclusively within the local jurisdiction, and that an Act of incorporation should be obtained there. It was proposed to him to bring the Bill under chapter 124 of the statutes relating to the incorporation of Boards of Trade. All the Boards of Trade in the province of Quebec are incorporated under Federal authority. These different Chambers of Commerce decided one day that they should have a central body which would deal in a general way with the interests of trade and commerce.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But only for the province.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—But if it was necessary for the individual chamber on a smaller basis to get an Act of incorporation from the Federal parliament, the argument was that it was all the more necessary for the greater body to come here. To obviate the difficulty which was suggested, and which my hon. friend discussed very ably before one of the committees, the Bill is brought under Federal jurisdiction by making it general.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—They blow up the body to make it large and general.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Safeguards are introduced, and it is made subject to the Federal authority.

The motion was agreed to, and the amendments were concurred in.

FISHING RIGHTS OF RIPARIAN PROPRIETORS IN TIDAL WATERS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Hr. LANDRY inquired:

1. Have riparian proprietors along rivers in which the tide is felt the right to have licenses to fish for the fish in that part of the rivers which is situated opposite their respective properties?
2. Have any requests for such licenses been addressed to the federal government?
3. Have they been granted?
4. If not, why?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I have received the following replies to these questions:

1. The rights of riparian owners were not defined by the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council of 1898, on the Fisheries Reference, they not being a party in the case.

2. Yes.

3. Licenses have been granted by the Federal government to applicants for fishing in the tidal portion of certain rivers; but this has been done in the exercise of the right of regulation and control of the fisheries, but not in recognition of any proprietary rights.

4. Answered by No. 3.

THE SURGEON MAJOR AT ST. JOHN MILITARY SCHOOL.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

By whom has surgeon-major E. N. Chevalier, of the military school at St. John, in the province of Quebec, been replaced?
2. On what date was he thus replaced?
3. During the eleven years that he has discharged the functions of surgeon-major, had he the qualifications required by the regulations and had he successively undergone the required examinations?
4. When and where had he undergone such examinations, and what number does his certificate bear?
5. Since he has been replaced as surgeon-major of the St. John Military School, does major E. N. Chevalier occupy any position whatever in the Canadian militia?
6. What position, and at what salary?
7. Since his dismissal, has he received any salary, or emolument, or indemnity whatsoever, or has the department paid him, or is it to pay him, any amount of money whatsoever?
8. For what services and what amount, distinguishing the amounts already received from the amounts to be received?
9. In virtue of what law or of what regulation have such payments been made or are they to be made?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The reply of the department is as follows:

1. Major E. N. Chevalier, Permanent Army Medical Corps, is on leave of absence, on medical certificate, pending retirement, since 22nd November, 1909, from his duties as officer in medical charge of the troops at St. Jean. province of Quebec, but is on the strength of the St. John's detachment. Major Parke has been detailed to perform his duties.

2. See answer one.

3. The only qualifications required when this officer was appointed were those of a licensed medical practitioner. These qualifications Major Chevalier possessed. He was asked to go up for examination for promotion to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and he failed in his examination, therefore he was not promoted.

4. See answer three.

5. See answer one. Major Chevalier is still on the active list of the Permanent Army Medical Corps until retired on the 8th May, proximo.

6. He is still holding the position of medical officer (on leave) to the troops at St. Jean, province Quebec, at the same rates as formerly, viz.: pay of rank, $4.50 per diem, and allowances of fuel, light, rations, and forage.

7. See answers six and eight.

8. See answer six. A sum of $2,224.24 has been placed in the Supplementary Estimates, 1910-11, as a gratuity, based on his length of service, and the amounts deducted from his salary on account of pension fund.

9. As regards present pay and allowances, under regulations in force; and as regards gratuity. Revised Statutes of Canada, chapter 42, section 10.

SALARY OF IMMIGRATION AGENT AT QUEBEC.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

1. What was, on the 1st of April, 1874, the salary of the immigration agent at Quebec?

2. Upon what dates did that salary successively increase, and by what amount each time?
3. What is the present salary of such agent?
4. What increase of salary has the present immigration agent obtained since his appointment to that office?
5. Has he asked for an increase of salary?
6. When?
7. Did he obtain it, or is he going to obtain it?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follow:

1. $1,500 per annum.
2. 1st July, 1881, $100; 1st July, 1883, $50; 1st July, 1884, $50.
3. $2,000.
4. $200.
5. No.
6. See answer to 5.
7. See answer to 5.

SALARY OF ASSISTANT IMMIGRATION AGENT AT QUEBEC.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

1. What was on the 1st of April, 1874, the salary of the assistant immigration agent at Quebec?
2. Upon what dates was his salary successively increased, and to what amount each time?
3. What was, on the 5th April, 1907, the salary of the assistant immigration agent?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follow:

1. $800 per annum.
2. 4th November, 1874, to $1,000.
3. $1,400 per annum.

ICE BREAKER 'MONTCALM.'

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

1. Had the federal government in its service, on board the ice-breaker 'Montcalm,' before the holding of the last inquiry into the Department of Marine and Fisheries, a person named Jos. Fontaine, of Lévis, engineer?
2. At the time of the aforesaid inquiry had Mr. Fontaine been found guilty of certain charges of peculation brought against him?
3. By reason of these accusations, did he lose the position which he occupied on the 'Montcalm'?
4. Since this has he been appointed by the government an inspector of boilers and engines, and has he as such replaced Mr. Joseph Sampson, who has been retired?
5. In the interval between the moment when the government chased him from the 'Montcalm' and that when it promoted him to the position which he occupies to-day, was he employed, under his true name or a borrowed name, in the Marine workshops at Sorel?
6. What was his salary on board the 'Montcalm'?
7. What is his salary now?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follow:

1. At the time of the investigation held by Mr. Justice Cassels into the Marine and Fisheries Department, Mr. Jos. Fontaine was employed as engineer on the Canadian government steamer 'Montcalm.'
2. At the inquiry Mr. Jos. Fontaine admitted having received certain monies from Messrs. Drolet and Coté.
3. He was first suspended from his position on the 'Montcalm,' and later his further employment terminated. The order in council terminating his employment provided that the department might consider an application from him for further employment under certain conditions.
4. Mr. Fontaine was appointed Boiler Inspector at Quebec on March 1st, 1910.
5. In the summer of 1909, Mr. Jos. Fontaine was employed at the Sorel shipyard as a mechanic; he left this position to become foreman of a private machine shop at Levis.
6. $100 per month.
7. $1,400 per annum.

ELECTRIC INSTALLATION OF IMMIGRATION OFFICES.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved:

That an order of this House do issue for the production of a return showing the expenses incurred, and the date of each of the payments made, by the government for the electric installation in each of the rooms of the immigration office at Quebec during the years 1908 and 1909.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —There is no objection to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

ACQUISITION OF PROPERTY OF CARRIER & LAINE AT LEVIS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will be pleased to cause to be laid before this House—

1. Copies of all orders in council or of every order of the Department of Justice and of the Department of Public Works, and of all the correspondence exchanged between the government, the Departments of Justice and Public Works, the Bank of Montreal, the firm of Carrier & Lainé, of Lévis, and all other persons, on the subjects of—

(a) The acquisition by the government of the property of the firm of Carrier & Lainé, at the time of the sale thereof by the sheriff in 1908;

(b) the subsequent expropriation, for purposes of public utility, of the same property, which had fallen into the hands of the Bank of Montreal;

(c) its definite purchase from the Bank of Montreal by the government;

(d) the appointment of an agent to represent the government at the sale by the sheriff;

(e) the appointment of experts for proceeding with the expropriation of the lands in question;

2. Copies of all reports submitted, directly or indirectly, to the government, or in its possession, by the experts hereinbefore mentioned, or by the arbitrators to whom the Bank of Montreal and the firm of Carrier & Lainé had submitted their differences, or by the various advocates or agents acting in the name and in the interests of the government.

3. Copies of the various contracts entered into between La Banque du Peuple and the People's Bank of Halifax in 1905, between the government and the Bank of Montreal in 1909, between the government and Mr. Ernest Cann, who had become the lessee of the government, for a period of thirty years, of the lands and buildings formerly the property of Carrier & Lainé.

4. Copies of all documents whatsoever and of all correspondence relating to the various transactions aforesaid, and also a statement showing all the sums of money paid by the government with respect to such transactions, with the names of the persons to whom such sums were paid, and the amounts paid to each of them, and for what particular object.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —There is no objection to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

GUELPH JUNCTION RAILWAY BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. WATSON, in the absence of Hon. Mr. Gibson, moved the third reading of Bill (FFF) An Act respecting the Guelph Junction Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I move in amendment that the preamble be struck out and the following substituted in lieu thereof:

Whereas, the Guelph Junction Railway Company, hereinafter called 'the company,' has by its petition prayed that it be enacted as hereinafter set forth, and has established, in effect, that the corporation of the city of Guelph holds, itself or by trustees on its behalf, all the shares in the capital stock of the company except a few shares upon which five hundred dollars in all have been paid, which few shares were subscribed for by persons acting in that behalf as agents for the city, and that, with the exception of the said five hundred dollars, all the capital for the construction of the railway of the company has been furnished by the city; and whereas it is expedient to grant the prayer of the said petition: Therefore, His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:—

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not propose to discuss the question at length, further than to enter my protest against the motion made by the hon. gentleman as not being founded, in my opinion, upon facts. My understanding of the position is that these two gentlemen who claim to be stockholders, whatever they may have been at the time the agreement was entered into, or when the provisions of the Act read yesterday were passed by the Ontario government agents, or trustees, if they were either, they were removed from that position by the bargain which was entered into by the corporation of the city with the parties then holding the stock.

I cannot understand the reason which has led my hon. friend to the conclusion he has reached, when we find that the corporation was prepared to enter into an agreement with these people relieving them of the $900 due upon the stock subscribed by them on the condition that they would consent to the passage of the Act to enable the corporation to raise money to carry on the enterprise, and at the same time give the subscribers paid up shares for the amount of money that they had paid in on the stock subscribed. True it is not much, but that does not affect the principle in the least. Those parties are now to be legislated by parliament out of their legitimate holding. When the stock was good for nothing they offered to give it up, and the offer was refused. At another period they offered to pay the balance due on the stock, and that offer was not accepted. Now, through the operation of borrowing money on the bonds, the enterprise has been successful. I am very glad that it has been and that the stock has become valuable. Now that it has become valuable, the city wants to get rid of these three or four subscribers, for what reason has never been explained. In view of the correspondence, I cannot believe that they were agents or trustees, but that they acted simply as most gentlemen would do who wish to encourage enterprises for the benefit of the community in which they live. It was apparent yesterday that my hon. friend would be able to carry his motion. To my mind it is little less than confiscation, and if this were not a legislative body, and it would not be considered out of order, I should come to the conclusion that it was introducing the practice which prevailed when Jack Sheppard and Dick Turpin plied their vocation in the vicinity of London, England.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I do not think it is necessary to cover again the ground which was gone over yesterday by the several members of this honourable House, who spoke on the question. The point involved in the present motion was, to my mind, fully covered, and the majority of this honourable House, as of the committee, did not appreciate the facts applicable to the case as the hon. gentleman from Hastings does. For my part, I am satisfied that the preamble is according to the facts which have been established before the committee.

The amendments were agreed to on a division.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE moved the third reading of the Bill, as amended.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I move that the Bill be not now read the third time but that it be amended as follows:

Strike out all the words after 'respectively' in the 26th line of clause 2 to the end of said clause, and substitute the following in lieu thereof:—'of such sum as may be agreed upon by the corporation and the owner or owners of said stock.'

If this amendment were carried, it could not interfere with the principle of the Bill so far as it gives power and authority for acquiring the stock held by these four or five gentlemen; but it would strike out that portion of the Bill as amended which fixes a price to be paid for the stock. When the Bill was introduced, the corporation asked by one of the clauses that these gentlemen should be obliged to surrender their stock. That provision exists yet. It fixed the value of the stock at the price paid for it nine years ago, $100. The committee thought that the holders were entitled to interest compounded at six per cent, which would bring the amount up to $400 per share. Now, as I pointed out a moment ago, that stock, small though it is, is very valuable and is paying, I am told, about 90 per cent. Consequently the corporation desire to take the stock from those gentlemen. If any one owns stock in a company, he can sell it at any price he likes. I have sold stock which cost me 100 a few years ago for 40 cents. The committee thought if the subscribers got back their $100 with interest they ought to be satisfied. The Bill as it is now, and as it is likely to go to the other House, declares that the value of that stock is $400. I say that is not fair or equitable. I want to mention one other fact in substantiation of what I have stated in reference to the agency. I put the question to the gentlemen interested in this Bill this year, after the discussion had taken place: 'Why do you not go to the courts and have a decision as to whether these gentlemen were agents or trustees, and if they were either one or the other, and you convince me of that, you will have no further opposition from me, however feeble that opposition may be.' What was the answer? 'We would be very glad to do that if we could go without prejudice.' I asked, 'What do you mean by without prejudice?' The provision of the Bill passed by the Ontario legislature by which they agreed to be relieved of the $900 due on the $1,000 subscription? Why are they afraid of that? Evidently because they know or believe that the courts would not grant them the relief they claim, and if that be the case, I venture the opinion that my hon. friend who moved this motion never would have put such a motion on the statute book.

Hon. Mr THOMPSON—I happened to be a member of the committee and listened as carefully as I could to all the evidence which lead me to support the Bill. There was a time in the history of this transaction when the city could have had this entire property under its bonds without paying anything for it. The city held the bonds and furnished the money which constructed the road, and acted in a paternal way towards the trustees or members of the company. Subsequently, in their work of railway exploitation, the members of the company contracted a liability of $18,000. The interest on the bonds held by the city was deferred. At the time that liability of $18,000 was contracted, our friends, who were then the members of the company, by a by-law put through the city council, were able to transfer that liability over to the corporation. If the corporation desired to act otherwise than in a paternal way towards the members of the company, all they had to do was simply to foreclose their bonds and make these individuals liable for a thousand dollars each. The creditors could not have collected anything from the company other than the stock liability of the shareholders. If the city had been disposed to foreclose the bonds, they would have had the railway and all the stock, but they treated the shareholders as though they were citizens acting in behalf of the city's interest.

All through the transaction there was a desire on the part of the stockholders to get rid of $900 of their liability, and the city to protect them in respect of the contracted debt, for which the city was not liable. But the city would have owned the road through their bonds had they thought proper to foreclose. By the addition of the amendment of the hon. gentleman from Hastings, this legislation would not be any better than the paper it was written upon. It would leave the matter subject to negotiation between the stockholders and the city, and I think the amendment should be withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—This is a matter which should not be brought to parliament. The question whether a stockholder is a qualified one or not, is a matter for the court? Plenty of people would like to get questions of that kind settled by parliament. The courts, not parliament, are constituted for that purpose. We have no right to legislate shareholders out of rights of that kind.

The motion was declared lost on division.

The Bill was then read a third time, as amended and passed.

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 195) an Act respecting the Currency.—Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the third reading of Bill (No. 141) an Act to amend the Indian Act.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (British Columbia)—I beg to remind the hon. gentleman that about a month ago I moved for a return in regard to Indian affairs in British Columbia. It was a very important motion, because I thought the expenditure was too much. There is a vote for about $100,000, and out of that there is $36,000 for a hospital. I do not know of one hospital in British Columbia for Indians.

There may be one, but I do not know of it, and I moved for a return to know where the money went to. I find in the Supplementary Estimates there is another $100,000 for Indians in British Columbia. I hope the hon. gentleman will get the return.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I have asked for it, and have applied to the Indian Department again.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a third time and passed.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING POSTPONED.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the third reading of Bill (No. 186) an Act to amend the Immigration Act.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—When the hon. gentleman, who led the House last night, submitted this Bill to committee, I asked for some information which he informed me could be secured in the interim before the third reading. My right hon. friend will observe under the first clause of the Bill, that there are two paragraphs necessitating a report to be made as to the physical condition of the land in question. Under paragraphs A, B, and C, the commissioner shall report to the minister the information described in A, B and C. This presupposes the construction of a ditch or drain through certain lands; but the commissioner apparently is not to report upon the effect which this drain or ditch would have upon the lands outside of the lands described in clauses A, B and C. My right hon. friend will observe that the construction of that ditch might very seriously affect lands upon which work is not authorized under the Immigration Act, that is to say that the work upon those lands which it is proposed to drain, might very seriously affect adjoining lands upon which works under the Irrigation Act are not authorized to be constructed. The hon. gentleman from De Lorimier could not give the information.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —We will let the order stand until Tuesday.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD.

The order of the day was discharged, and set down for Tuesday next.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. WATSON moved the second reading of Bill (No. 6) an Act to amend the Criminal Code.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—What I have to say would probably come up better when the Bill is in committee; but we are now adopting the principle of the Bill. I notice in one clause of the Bill that there is a provision for allowing the operation of the Bill to apply to cities with 15,000 people.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —If my hon. friend will pardon me, I would suggest that this might very much more advantageously be considered in committee. It is a Bill on which there might be some discussion, but it will be better to take it in committee, and let us get through the motions we have on hand.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I think it is desirable we should have some explanation in reference to this Bill. It is all very well to let it go to the committee; but on the second reading certainly we ought to have some explanation as to its nature, and the reason why it is now presented to us. I agree with my hon. friend that clause 2 is very objectionable and may produce a hardship in some places with a population under 15,000. I can understand the right hon. gentleman desiring that the Bill should not be delayed; but hon. members certainly are entitled to an explanation at the second reading of an important public Bill. It is true, it is a compromise Bill, and not in the form in which it was introduced in the Commons; but we are not supposed to know what discussion took place in the Commons. We are here to consider and think for ourselves, and I think the member having charge of the Bill should explain it.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I am not an expert on the terms generally used in reference to race-track gambling, but, as the hon. gentleman has stated, this is a compromise Bill, on which all sides were heard. We are not bound by what has taken place in the other House; but I think most of us have paid some attention to the evidence given before the special committee. Since my name has been attached to the Bill, several gentlemen have made similar inquiries to the one just referred to. I agree with the right hon. leader of the House that we can better discuss this Bill in Committee of the Whole, and I trust before that time arrives, I shall be in a better position to give an explanation on some of the points than I am at the present time. However, it must be remembered that the question has been raised, will this Bill affect meetings at agricultural fairs where there is no betting? This Bill does not prevent horse-racing at all.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—We are well aware of that.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—It prevents gambling at races, and there are certain other restrictions, but I understand the Bill does not affect any race-track association now in existence. As I understand the part of the Bill referred to by the hon. gentleman from Prince Albert, in regard to 15,000 population, refers to places where new race associations or race-tracks are started.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Even so, have the people in a city of 7,000 not as large rights and privileges as those in a city of 15,000.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I do not wish to go into details. I ask that the Bill be now read the second time.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—We are discussing the principle of the Bill now, but I wonder when we are going to stop this class of legislation. This Bill was introduced in the other House, and I have reasons to believe that it has cost the country something like $40,000, even if it is a compromise. If these gentlemen, in their wisdom, had got together in the first place they could have settled the matter in twenty-four hours, without putting the country to such an enormous expense. Every session of parliament we have some legislation of this character advocated by a certain class of people who believe they should think for all the rest of the community. For my part, I am getting tired of propositions to send people to heaven by the Criminal Code. That is about what it means. Take the Criminal Code as it stands to-day. I do not think that any respectable citizen could walk around the streets for three hours without being guilty of some infraction of the Criminal Code for which he could be apprehended. We are every year passing a batch of amendments to the Criminal Code, and I think it is about time it should be stopped. If any one came before parliament with a useful proposition, and asked for $20,000 or $30,000 to investigate it, he would be laughed at. I remember when I moved for a useful committee, which did good work for the people, I tried to get a couple of thousand dollars to carry out the work, and I had a hard job to get it; yet here we find something costing the country $40,000 that could have been settled in 24 hours, without a tithe of the expense. If we are going to adopt this Bill I think a city of 5,000 should have just as many rights and privileges as a city of 15,000. I live in a town of 5,000, and we would like to have the same privileges as other cities.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (British Columbia)—You do not pay as much revenue.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Really, hon. gentlemen——

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The hon. gentleman has spoken.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I asked the promoter of the Bill to explain. If the right hon. gentleman has said that I have spoken I will yield, but when it comes up I will ask for an explanation on the second reading.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does the Bill confine the operations to any particular locality of a certain population?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—No.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—In order that the hon. gentleman who has the Bill in charge may be prepared to give the information to the House when the Bill goes into committee, we would like to know why discrimination is made between running and trotting horses, limiting the time of the one race-meet to seven days, and the other to three days? I only mention this because it is a matter which may come up, and the hon. gentleman who had charge of the Bill in the other House overlooked the fact that they were making that discrimination, and the promoter of the Bill may have leave to amend it, even though it is a compromise Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I move that the Bill be referred to Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Although the hon. mover seems so anxious to withhold information from the House, as to why the Bill is necessary, and although I have a right to demand it, I will defer doing so until the Bill goes to committee. It is unreasonable that when a second reading is called, and the promoter of the Bill is asked to explain, he should refuse to do so.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I can explain, but I cannot make people understand.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—We should be informed why it is necessary to amend the Criminal Code as this Bill proposes to do; perhaps we should call for an explanation on each and every Bill when the motion for the second reading is made. Are we any better than the Commons?

Hon. GENTLEMEN—Yes, sure.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—My hon. friends may say we are, but it appears that we are to understand things intuitively without explanation. I say it is unreasonable.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It seems to me there is a presumption that the Senate is a much more moral and conscientious body than the Commons, inasmuch as it took about seven weeks for a special committee, sitting from day to day, to convince the Lower House that betting is an evil which should be suppressed. I was under the impression that this Bill might possibly have been submitted to one of our Standing Committees, or to a special committee, so that outside parties who may be interested should have an opportunity of being heard for and against the Bill. Without pronouncing emphatically on it in any way, it seems rather anomalous that a Bill which received the consideration of the Commons and occupied some seven weeks, during which witnesses were heard on both sides, should be presented to this Chamber, which is peculiarly a revising body, without any preliminary remarks on the principle of the measure, and that it should be sent to a Committee of the Whole House, where the public will have no opportunity of presenting their views to the Senate. It is scarcely complimentary to the Senate that the Bill should be treated in this way. The greater part of the session has been occupied in considering the Bill in the other branch of parliament. The press of the country has been exercised to such an extent over it, that scarcely a day went by for seven or eight weeks that leading articles did not appear touching this question, and during the earlier part of the session both branches of parliament were overwhelmed with petitions from all sections of the country, both for and against the measure. If proper consideration is to be given to a measure which elicited so much public attention, it seems to me that it should get more consideration in this House than it is apparently to receive.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—My hon. friend has stated that some seven weeks were spent in considering this Bill in the other House; but I want to draw his attention to the fact that this is not the same Bill at all. This Bill never went to a special committee of the other House; it is practically a new Bill. The discussion was broad and may have covered this particular Bill; but, as the measure stands to-day, it never was before any special committee, and that would be a strong reason why it should go to a special committee of this House where parties interested could be heard. I have no doubt the moral reformers who introduced the first Bill would like to say something about this measure. As the mover of the Bill does not appear to be able to give much information about it, I for one would like to have more information than we have been able to get to-day. Perhaps if it were sent to a special committee, we could hear both sides and be able to make up our minds how we should vote. The Bill as introduced in the other House is dead, and this is another measure which was railroaded through the Commons in a few hours and sent up to us. I would be inclined to support the leader of the opposition in his contention, that the Bill should go to a special committee.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The very fact that this Bill has been discussed for such a long time by a special committee of the other House, is one of the best reasons why it should not require much discussion here. I will assume, for the time being, that I represent the moral reformers referred to. This is a compromise Bill. While we have not secured all that we wish to get as moral reformers, still we are satisfied to take the measure as it is, and I am sure, from the activity displayed on the other side by some hon. gentlemen in this House, that side will be protected in Committee of the Whole.

The motion was agreed to.

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (No. 197) an Act to amend the Post Office Act.

He said: This repeals that particular clause of the Post Office Act which regulates the salaries of post office inspectors, they being dealt with in the Civil Service Act, which is set down for reading next week.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is this Bill confined exclusively to the regulation of salaries?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Solely.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Has the government determined upon what the maximum and minimum salaries of superintendents shall be?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I think that is all set forth in certain clauses of the Civil Service Bill, which has not been read a second time by us yet, but will be next week.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (III) An Act for the relief of Emily Maud Nicoll.—Hon. Mr. Jaffray.

Bill (JJJ) An Act for the relief of Edna Shibley De Mar.—Hon. Mr. Jaffray.

MILITIA PENSIONS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 194) An Act to amend the Militia Pension Act.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If I understand it, the pension list for the Mounted Police already provides for a certain deduction from their pay.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —It is just to bring them into harmony with the general provisions of the Militia Pension Act, I understand.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is a percentage of deduction from the pay of the Mounted Police at the present time to form a fund out of which the superannuation is paid? My recollection is that it is so.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Apparently that is the case.

Hon. Mr. WATSON, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

DESTRUCTIVE INSECTS AND PESTS BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 20) An Act to prevent the introduction or spreading of Insects, Pests and Diseases destructive to vegetation.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 8.

8. Every person, who contravenes any provision of this Act, or any regulation made thereunder, shall be liable, upon summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months, or to both fine and imprisonment. Any vegetable or other matter imported or brought into Canada contrary to this Act, or to any regulation made thereunder, shall be forfeited to the Crown.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—We should have some explanation of this clause. It may be necessary that the government should assume to themselves all this power, but it is a very large power to grant to the inspector and the minister. They have the power, if they find in the possession of any individual, it does not say whether knowingly or not, any infected seed or trees, to subject that individual to a fine and imprisonment for six months. A farmer may purchase such seed or stock without knowing it to be infected, but the mere fact of its being found in his possession is sufficient to justify his conviction. It is very important that the country should be protected in this respect, amply and fully, but it is possible that the government are taking more power than is absolutely necessary for the protection of the country. It is a very common occurrence for a farmer to go to a market town and purchase seeds and trees of various kinds which may have been imported, and the officers at the border have not been careful to see that they are free from pests. The innocent purchaser, if found with these on his premises, is liable to this heavy fine and long term of imprisonment. It seems a very harsh clause. If it is really required for the safety of the country, I suppose it must be granted, but I hope it will not be inflicted on the farming community in its present shape.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—This Bill has been asked for by all the agricultural societies.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

Hon. Mr. WATSON.

NAVIGABLE WATERS PROTECTION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 103) An Act to amend the Navigable Waters Protection Act.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. POWER—I notice on looking at section 4 of chapter 150, of the Revised Statutes, the wording of the section is as follows: 'No boom, bridge, or aboiteau shall be constructed so as to interfere with navigation.' Why should this change be made?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The Department of Public Works represented that some trouble and litigation had arisen in some of the courts because of the construction placed on that section, and they suggested this amendment after conferring with the Department of Justice, as giving them clearer power.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But it does not protect the navigation of the river as well as the old Act does.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The Department of Justice was of a different opinion.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The Bill contains a sort of proviso that the foregoing provisions of this section shall not apply to small wharfs not costing more than $1,000, &c., which do not interfere with navigation. It is a very small wharf which would cost less than $1,000, and, taking the city from which I come, there are a great many wharfs, and every little while a proprietor feels called upon, if his business is increasing, to add to the length of his wharf. No difficulty has ever arisen, and I do not think the proprietors of these structures should be obliged to go to the Governor in Council for the purpose of submitting plans. If abuses have arisen, the provision is reasonable enough.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I have only to follow the information given me by the Public Works Department.

They ask for this as it is extremely desirable in view of certain trouble and litigaton that has arisen over their powers.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It appears to me that although it might be the case, yet there is omitted from the Bill before us a very important provision which we find in the present Act, namely that none of these structures shall interfere with navigation.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —That is there.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But we propose to repeal that.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —No. The clause provides that the foregoing provision shall not apply to certain things which do not interfere with navition. That is line sixteen.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would point out to my hon. friend that that interference with navigation only applies to small wharfs, and does not apply to the structures mentioned in the early part of the section.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT ——I would not so read it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The beginning of that section provides that no bridge, boom or wharf, &c., can be built unless the site is approved by the Governor in Council, unless the structure is built in accordance with the plan approved by the Governor in Council.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But the navigation of the river might be entirely overlooked in the adoption of the plan. My impression of the section is that the site may be selected, and the plan may be approved, leaving entirely out of consideration the all essential element in the Bill, namely, the protection of navigation. There is no mention in this section such as there is in the old section that none of those structures shall interfere with navigation, except the smaller structures in the latter part of section 4. It does not follow necessarily that because the Governor in Council might designate what the site shall be, and may approve of the plan, that the navigation of the river may not be interfered with. In fact, during the present session of parliament I noticed in the consideration of nearly all these power Bills before the Commons, that question of interference with navigation of the river has been the main question, and it almost seemed to me that insiduously power companies had brought about an amendment of the Act by which the navigation of the river might possibly be subordinated simply by the selection of a site or the approval of plans.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Not merely doctors, but lawyers will differ as to construction. I will call the attention of the Department of Justice to the hon. gentleman's criticism and endeavour to see if they think it necessary to modify the Act.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I should like to see an amendment inserted in the clause that the protection of navigation shall be observed.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I would have to consult with the department where the Bill was drafted.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Does the hon. gentlemen pretend that even the Public Works Department could not place any obstruction in the river that would interfere with navigation?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Oh, well, the Crown could do it. They are owners of the water, and can do what they please; but we are simply legislating now as to other interests interfering with navigation.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I am aware that the intention is to give the Public Works Department larger powers in order to prevent obstruction to navigation; and if the wording fails to do so it fails to carry out their intention. I will take care the matter is represented to the department and considered, if that will suit my hon. friend.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is quite satisfactory.

Hon. Mr. WILSON (from the committee) reported the Bill without amendment.

ST. LAWRENCE POWER TRANSMISSION BILL.

AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE, from the Committee on Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (No. 115) An Act to incorporate the St. Lawrence Power Transmission Company, Limited, with two amendments. He said: The first amendment is striking out clause 2 of the Bill, which declared the works to be for the general advantage of Canada, and the second amendment was inserted for the purpose of limiting the expropriation power to the transmission line only. With the leave of the House, I move concurrence in the amendment.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the motion is put, I would call the attention of the House to the fact that this committee met this morning, and I should like to know when we received notice of the meeting?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—On Thursday last, the committee, when rising, decided to adjourn until to-day.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think one of the first rules of an adjournment is to give notice to all persons who were not at the first meeting.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I received the notice.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—When were the notices given?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I was under the impression that notices were given on Friday last, but I am not sure.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am sure they were not; and I am equally sure the meeting held this morning was quite irregular.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—A committee may adjourn to the call of the Chair, or to a specific date.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not dispute the right of a committee to adjourn to a fixed date, but if the committee adjourns to a fixed date, notice must be given to the persons who were not present at the adjournment.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—That is not the rule. Everybody is supposed to be present at the meeting. In the case of joint stock companies and companies of all kinds, no notice is given to the parties of an adjourned meeting.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—In any municipal institution, when an adjournment takes place, the persons who were not present are notified of the adjournment, and that is the law.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It is not the law.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Why should a Bill be posted in the lobby? Why should notices be given to the members of a committee, if it is not required by law? Why should those things take place if not to place the members in a position to attend the meeting? If the meeting takes place without the members of a committee knowing that it is called, I say that it is quite irregular.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Rule 85 says:

A select committee may adjourn from time to time, and by order of the Senate, from place to place——

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I admit the right to adjourn, but I say that when the committee adjourns, the members should be notified. Those that are present know of the adjournment, but those who are not present do not know it, and I think it is the least we can ask.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I agree with the hon. gentleman that the practice should be to notify the parties in case of adjournment of that kind. I was taking issue with him only on the strict letter of the law. As a matter of practice, it has been done, and should be done, and I was under the impression—I may be mistaken—that the notice had been issued Friday; at any rate the notice was in my room this morning.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Did the hon. gentleman look at the date of the notice?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—No.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman is speaking of his impression. I am certain—I have that advantage over him—that he is wrong. I do not want to raise a point of order now, but I want it understood that in future, when an adjournment takes place, we shall be notified.

The motion was agreed to.

IMMIGRATION OFFICE EMPLOYEES AT QUEBEC.

MOTION.

Hon Mr. LANDRY moved.

That an Order of this House do issue for the production of a copy of the attendance list of the employees of the immigration office at Quebec, for the month of October, 1908.

The motion was agreed to.

DELAYED RETURNS.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the orders of the day are proceeded with, I should like to know the cause of the delay in producing the copy of the contract entered into between Messrs. Koenig and Company and the government for clearing away the ruins of the Quebec bridge. That return was ordered over three months ago. It would take about three hours to prepare a copy of it.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The secretary of the Department of Railways promised to have the return prepared, and sent to me in a day or two. His attention has been called to it more than once. I have applied to the Secretary of State to know why it has not been sent, and that was his reply.

LILLIE DIVORCE BILL

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN moved the third reading of Bill (KKK) An Act for the relief of Clifford Buell Lillie.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—It seems to me the Senate ought not to pass this Bill. I have given some attention to it, and though the evidence is very voluminous have read it with some care. While there is no doubt the respondent was proved guilty of the charge made against her, there is evidence to show that there was just as much wrongdoing on the part of the petitioner, and I do not see that the power of the House ought to be used in such cases to break the matrimonial tie.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time.

On motion that the Senate pass the Bill:

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The hon. gentleman from St. John having called attention to the facts which he has mentioned, it is incumbent on any other member who believes that this House should pass the Bill to state why. Otherwise I think the Bill should not be passed. If the statement made by the hon. member from St John is not challenged, I hope that hon. members will vote against the Bill.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—I was one of the members of the committee who heard the evidence in this case. The committee gave a great deal of time and consideration to the matter, and it was only after most serious consideration of the evidence that they came to the conclusion that they were justified in finding that the alleged acts of adultery had been committed. Speaking from memory, there was a tremendous amount of evidence given in this case which was not relevant to the question before the committee; but there was corroborative evidence given of the act of adultery committed by this woman. It was on that evidence that the committee considered they were justified in reporting as they did. Every opportunity was given to the wife to produce evidence to establish the wrong-doing of her husband. She stated before the committee that she was prepared to bring forward evidence of that nature, and although she was furnished with money to cover the expenses of procuring witnesses, she failed to produce any to corroborate her statement that her husband had been guilty of wrong-doing. There was no evidence placed before the committee on which to decide against him.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—The evidence all through goes to show that the petitioner was carrying on correspondence with another woman at the time of the alleged misconduct of his wife. His whole conduct indicated that he was looking for a chance to get rid of his wife. Hon. gentlemen who have read the evidence will be aware of the fact that the woman had sued her husband for support, and Judge Britton, before whom the case was tried, allowed her alimony at the rate of $12 a week. The petitioner in this case, in order to get rid of his wife, has pursued a certain course with a view to being relieved of the payment of alimony and also, there is reason to believe, with a view to marrying the woman with whom he had been in correspondence.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—As a member of that committee I desire to say a word or two. The committee carefully and cautiously examined all the evidence connected with the case my hon. friend refers to. It is true that Mr. Justice Britton granted the respondent alimony at the rate of $12 a week, but he did that in the absence of a witness that could not be found. That witness was found afterwards, and was forced to appear before the committee, and give evidence. In his evidence he clearly incriminated Mrs. Lillie for conduct that the committee could not overlook. I would like to know if my hon. friend from St. John has read that evidence? If he has read it, he would not for a moment find fault with the course the committee took in the case We carefully studied the whole matter and gave the respondent every consideration we could. With regard to the letter the hon. member refers to, which Dr. Lillie was guilty of writing, if it was guilt at all, there was nothing incriminating in that letter in any shape or form. It was one of those things that any man might possibly be guilty of; there was nothing to show in that letter that there was any criminal conduct between the lady that he wrote to and himself. So that after due and careful consideration we decided that Dr. Lillie was entitled to relief. We concluded that he had used his wife well. The fact is he had used her too well. He gave her too much liberty and allowed her too much of her own way, and she abused her liberty. The result in her case is what it is in the case of many; when they get too much rope they hang themselves. Such is her case. The committee studied every phase of the matter and endeavoured to do justice to both parties, and we came to a deliberate conclusion that, in view of all the facts, Dr. Lillie was entitled to relief.

Hon Mr. CHOQUETTE—What about the judgment of Mr. Justice Britton?

The House divided on the motion, which was carried on the following division:

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (No. 205) An Act to amend the Civil Service Act. He said: There is no question of principle of any importance involved in this Bill. Its provisions are intended to make certain amendments in the Civil Service Act, which will become manifest as we proceed with the Bill in detail. The principal amendment is a provision by which, under certain conditions, officers may be transferred from the outside to the inside service. It has been considered that if an officer in the outside service has proved eminently capable after a certain period, he may be transferred to the third division of the inside service if it is found in certain classes of cases that it would be conducive to the benefit of the public service. The other provisions chiefly refer to certain increases in the salaries of officers of customs, among the principal ones, officers of inland revenue, and officers of the post office. These gentlemen's salaries were formerly fixed by statute, and, therefore, it becomes necessary in giving them the benefit of any possible increase, to provide for them by an amendment of the Civil Service Act. That and one or two provisions of a somewhat stricter character as to the employment of officers out of hours, as it is called, on duties not strictly in accord with those which they usually perform, constitute the whole of this Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is there anything in this Bill changing the status of the employees of this House or the House of Commons?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—No, it refers simply to other officers. There is nothing about the Senate in particular.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The order of the day being called:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion for the second reading of Bill (CCC): An Act to amend the Criminal Code.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I regret to say that until just a few minutes ago I had overlooked the fact that this Bill was coming up to-day. Had I thought of it, I should have made an effort to be somewhat better prepared to discuss it than I am at present. I sympathize with the general trend of the sentiments expressed by the hon. member from Ottawa. I appreciate just as keenly as he does the amount of mischief which has been done by labour organizations whose headquarters are in another country extending their operations in Canada in certain fields. No one who lives in Nova Scotia and pays any heed at all to what is taking place, could fail to have been impressed by the almost incalculable mischief which has been caused in that province by the introduction of the United Mine Workers of North America. We have in the province a labour organization, the Provincial Workers Association, which had at any rate succeeded in placing the miners of Nova Scotia in a very advantageous position. I am safe in saying that the coal miners of Nova Scotia were as well off as any coal miners in the world, certainly much better off than the average run of coal miners in the United States. Although wages have gone up within the last two or three years, I may inform hon. gentlemen who are not aware of the fact, that in the Springhill mine, a mine which has been completely in the hands during the past year or two of the United Mine Workers, the average wages in 1907 amounted to $3.35 per day. Some miners were making as much as six dollars a day, I believe, but the average wages of the coal miners were $3.35 per day of not more than six hours. The men were very comfortably housed, and looked after, and really had no substantial complaint of any kind to make. The more important strike was, of course, down in Cape Breton. There there was some bloodshed, and if the troops had not been called out and despatched to Cape Breton immediately on the beginning of the trouble, there probably would have been very serious disturbances. The province of Nova Scotia has lost an immense sum of money in revenue; the miners have lost nearly a million dollars in wages, and the mine owners have lost more; so that the advent of this particular United States organization into Nova Scotia has done a great deal of mischief. I quite concur in the views of the hon. gentleman as far as that is concerned. But there are other things to be taken into consideration, if the hon. gentleman stops to think. Take an organization like the locomotive engineers; the work of these men naturally extends over the two territories. Owing to our proximity to the United States, and our commercial relations, a very large proportion of the trains run through both countries, and it would be almost impracticable, it seems to me, to have legislation which would compel the men on the Canadian end of a railway line to belong to one organization, and those on the United States end to another. When I speak of the locomotive engineers, I speak of an organization which has, on the whole, been a very reasonable one.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Would my hon. friend point out why it would be impossible to have independent organizations in the case he mentions?

Hon. Mr. POWER.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Simply on account of the very intimate relations that exist. If a run begins in Canada and ends in the United States, and an engineer wishes to attend a meeting of a labour organization, he would not find one of his own and could not go to the United States organization. He could not attend a meeting. International organizations of labour have existed for a very considerable number of years. It is pretty drastic legislation at this hour of the day to say to the men that they shall quit an organization to which they have belonged for a number of years. It strikes me that this measure is of such a character as calls for careful consideration. If parliament is going to adopt it as a measure to prevent the interference of outside influences, between labour and capital in this country, it is one that should be very carefully considered. It is stated, I do not know how true it is, that under existing conditions the United States organizations get complete control of labour in this country. One can readily understand that it would be possible for the coal owners in the United States, who might be competing with the coal owners in this country for a certain market, say the market of Montreal, to succeed, through the branches of the organization, in stirring up strikes in Canada to such an extent as to free the United States coal owners, in a great measure at any rate, from the competition of the Canadian coal owners. I think the hon. gentleman made some reference to that; but while I realize that the present condition of things is unfortunate, I do not think that a drastic measure, such as the one now proposed by the hon. gentleman from Ottawa, would be satisfactory or very effective. I think it is a question which, as he said in his speech, will call for careful consideration of the best minds in this country, perhaps, before very long; and although I do not like to throw unnecessary responsibility on the shoulders of the government, if this matter is to be dealt with, I think it should be dealt with not by legislation introduced by private members, but by the government of the country. I feel that I have not pleased those on either side of the question; I have simply expressed my own view.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—In regard to this Bill, I have very little of my own to say, because my opinions are pretty well known in this House, and are generally known throughout the country in matters of this kind. The hon. gentleman from Halifax has expresed two views; one view not thoroughly endorsing the sentiments expressed by the hon. gentleman from Ottawa in regard to this measure. Then he turns from that view to the other, whereby he was willing that if the workingmen of this country did certain things in a certain way, that their rights should not be interfered with. I do not know that even in parliament half-way measures can be of any effect in modelling the legislation, to give it its true ring, and national tone. I am for stating the whole truth, irrespective of any interests, corporate or otherwise. I hold, as a representative of the people, that the trades unions and workingmen of the country are entitled to as much consideration, and as much respect as any other class, and especially as much as the men who are blessed with wealth. The Bill presented by the hon. senator from Ottawa, as I stated some weeks ago, has a very inoffensive look. It seemed to me to be innocent enough on the face of it, but it did not take one half-hour's dissection of its clauses to discover that it was a most dangerous Bill from all points of view, from the workingman's point of view, from the immigration point of view, and from the view of the general welfare of the country. We were asked a few days ago to adopt another amendment to the Criminal Code, one which my hon. friend from Prince Albert said was being largely used by parliament as a means of sending people to heaven; but this Bill would be evidently a means of sending them in the opposite direction.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Where to?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The Criminal Code is being too largely used by parliament to secure the enforcement of laws, and this is simply a small amendment introducing two words that have a fine sounding name, 'British subject.' And then another—a small amendment whereby strikes would be practically abolished—at least in a number of cases. It is not what the adverse element thinks of a question of this kind that ought to guide our reason and dictate our judgment in passing such a measure. We should not always look to the capitalist to find out what the workingman wants. The most of us here have been workingmen in our earlier years. Unfortunately many people forget their younger days, and their experiences as workingmen, and are quite willing to deprive others of the privileges they would have been very glad to have themselves when they were handling picks and shovels, or were clerks at the counter in institutions of one kind and another. I have in my mind expression of that opinion, not by one man, but by thousands, and twenties of thousands of workingmen who say, and who have written to the Prime Minister and to the government of the day, that this Bill was very fully and cerefully considered by the International Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, and they have forwarded the following document to parliament:

Honourable Sirs,—At the recent meeting held in Ottawa, of the Dominion Legislative Board of the International Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, composed of representative engineers from all the railway centres of the different provinces of Canada, the Bill (CCC) introduced in the Senate by the Hon. Mr. Belcourt, and intituled: 'An Act to Amend the Criminal Code' by inserting after the word 'union,' in section 497, the words 'whose members are British subjects'; also after the word 'employees' in subsection 2, of section 498, the words 'who are British subjects', was very fully and carefully considered, and the board was of the unanimous opinion that the Trades Unionists of the Dominion had given no reason that would justify the proposed amendment to the Criminal Code; further, it was of the opinion that such a measure, if enacted, would be a menace to individual liberty. In conclusion the board believes the Act to be pernicious in its tendency and a piece of class legislation, the enactment of which it considers unworthy of any parliament and will be resented by the working people of this country. Therefore, on behalf of the above board, we very respectfully solicit the assistance individually and collectively of your honourable bodies to prevent Bill (CCC) from becoming law.

We have the honour to remain, Sirs,
Yours very respectfully,
(Sgd.) CALVIN LAWRENCE, Chairman.
(Sgd.) BYRON BAKER,
Secretary.

I attach much more importance to a declaration of that kind, coming from such a quarter, than I do to the views of any hon. senators in this House, much more important because of greater sincerity, and of greater benefit to the country at large. But that is not the only body who has spoken in regard to this matter. Nearly all the trades unions in the Dominion have put themselves on record. Take the Montreal Trades and Labour Council, who have passed a series of resolutions covering two pages of foolscap almost in solemn protest against measures of this kind coming before parliament, and being allowed, as I said the other day, to stand on our order paper, a menace to the workingmen, as stated in this document. There are also protestations from the Bricklayers' Union, protestations from the Machinists' Union, and from the Plasterers' Union. You have them from the workingmen of Montreal. You have them from the carpenters, joiners, and fraternal unions, and what do these people say? The document is long, and I will not read it, but one or two clauses will indicate to parliament what they think of a measure of this kind. They say:

Whereas this scheme of law, although notwithstanding its inoffensive appearance, contains the worst of principles, whereas this project of law, if it became law would result in the destruction of trades unions.

Because the very fact that one, or two, or three members of a union were not sworn British subjects, or naturalized citizens of Canada, that union and all its members would come under the Criminal Code, subject to fine and imprisonment.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—That is not so.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The hon. gentleman contradicts me.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I contradict the hon. gentleman. That is not the effect of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I will read the protest. It is in French:

Protestation—Parti Ouvrier de Montréal.
5 avril, 1910.

1. Attendu que le Code Criminel du Canada contient les trois dispositions suivantes:

496. Un complot pour restreindre le commerce est une convention entre deux personnes ou plus de faire ou de faire faire une chose illégale dans le but de restreindre le commerce. 55-56 V. c. 29, art. 516.

497. Les objets d'une union ouvrière ne sont pas, pour la seule raison qu'ils restreignent le commerce, illégaux dans le sens de l'article qui précède. 55-56 V. c. 29, art. 517.

498. Est coupable d'un acte criminel et passible d'une amende de deux cents à quatre mille dollars, ou d'un emprisonnement de deux ans, ou si c'est une corporation, une amende de mille à dix mille dollars, toute personne ou corporation qui conspire, se coalise, se concerte ou s'entend avec une autre, ou avec une compagnie de chemin de fer, de steamers, de bâteaux à vapeur ou de transport.

(a) pour limiter indûment les facilités de transport, de production, de fabrication, de fourniture, d'emmagasinage ou de commerce de tout article ou denrée, qui peut faire l'objet d'un trafic ou d'un commerce; ou,

(b) pour restreindre le trafic ou le commerce de tout tel article ou denrée, ou pour lui nuire; ou,

(c) pour empêcher, limiter ou diminuer indûment la fabrication ou la production de tout tel article ou denrée, ou pour en élever déraisonnablement le prix; ou,

(d) pour prévenir ou diminuer indûment la concurrence dans la production, la fabrication, l'achat, l'échange, la vente, le transport ou la fourniture de tel article ou denrée, ou dans les tarifs d'assurance sur la vie ou les propriétés;

2. Aucune disposition du présent article n'est censé s'appliquer aux associations d'ouvriers ou employés formées par eux, comme tels pour leur propre et raisonnable protection. 63-64 V. c. 46, art. 3.

2. Attendu que par ces dispositions la loi reconnait aux unions ouvrières une existence légale, implicitement il est vrai, mais avec une certitude absolue.

3. Attendu que l'honorable senateur Belcourt propose au Sénat canadien, au moyen du projet de loi CCC d'amender les dispositions légales précitées, en ajoutant après les mots 'unions ouvrières' de la première ligne de l'art. 497, les mots suivants: 'dont les membres sont sujets britanniques,' et aprés les mots 'employés' de la deuxième ligne, de la sous-section 2 de l'art. 498 dudit Code criminel les mots suivants: 'qui sont sujets britanniques.'

4. Attendu que ce projet de loi, malgré son apparence innofensive contient le pire des principes.

5. Attendu que si ce projet de loi devenait loi, il faudrait désormais que les unions ouvrières soient composées en entier de sujets britanniques sous peine de devenir des institutions criminelles.

6. Attendu que cette disposition légale décrèterait la mort de l'union ouvrière au Canada.

7. Attendu en effet qu'exiger dans ce pays particulièrement où, tous les ans, l'immigration nous amène un grand nombre d'ouvriers de tous les pays, que tous les membres des unions ouvrières soient sujets britanniques, c'est empêcher l'existence de telles unions, parce que une ouvrière ne saurait exister pour atteindre le but qu'elle se propose, sans que tous les ouvriers puissent en faire partie.

8. Attendu que pour devenir sujet britannique, il faut qu'un étranger réside au moins trois ans au Canada, ce qui serait une entrave à l'admission des ouvriers étrangers dans les unions ouvrières, entrave fixée par la loi même.

9. Attendu que ce serait là une injustice grave envers les aubains que de les empêcher, durant trois annés, de faire partie des unions ouvrières.

10. Attendu de plus qu'il ne saurait être permis à des législateurs d'imposer à des ouvriers étrangers l'obligation de devenir sujets britanniques pour jouir de la plénitude des droits du travail.

11. Attendu que l'honorable sénateur Belcourt n'a pas songé, dans son projet de loi, à refuser aux étrangers le droit de devenir actionnaires ou directeurs de banque, de compagnie de chemin de fer ou autres compagnies financières.

12. Attendu que les ouvriers ont autant de droit à s'unir leurs frères étrangers, que les capitalistes en ont à s'unir leurs frères étrangers financiers.

13. Attendu, de plus, que ledit projet de loi décrète l'abolition de la plupart des grèves par son deuxième amendement, bien que les grèves soient un moyen de défense chez l'ouvrier, tout comme l'argent est un moyen de lutte chez le financier.

14. Attendu que l'honorable sénateur Belcourt n'a pas offert de compensation aux ouvriers, en les privant de leurs droits, bien que toute institution financière que l'on dépouille de ses biens soit invariablement indemnisée pour les pertes subies.

Que nous protestons avec la plus grande énergie contre le projet de loi du Sénat CCC. comme causant une injustice irrémédiable et étant de nature à révolutionner la classe ouvrière et à mettre en défaveur les législateurs du parlement canadien, dont les mesures passées leur ont souvent été sympathiques.

GUS. FRANCQ, Secrétaire.

Many of the hon. gentlemen do not understand this protestation, as it is in French.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Read it in English.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The hon. gentleman understands French. The hon. member from Ottawa interrupted me, and said if those people came under the Criminal Code they would not be subject to fine and imprisonment. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that a man can be called a criminal in this country without being subject to fine and imprisonment?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I did not say that or anything like it.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I said on the floor of the House that those people were not criminals because they happened not to be British subjects, and the hon. member contradicted me.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—The hon. member does not recollect what he said. I distinctly heard him say that the fact of one or two of these members not being British subjects would make the union a criminal institution.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—What is the object of the protest?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I have read the document to the hon. gentleman in French, and if he does not understand its meaning I am not going to explain it. The workingmen state that by the introduction of one or two members, or half a dozen who are not British subjects, into a union, the union becomes a criminal institution, and that is the view taken of it by all these bodies. The Bill is objected to from several points of view—from the point of view of the workingmen, and from the point of view of the general benefit of the country. The government are bringing into Canada anywhere from a hundred thousand to one hundred and fifty thousand immigrants from all countries, especially from the United States. These people cannot become British subjects short of three years after their arrival in the country. They have no social clubs nor big institutions where they can be entertained. At present they join workingmen's unions, where they can get an afternoon's and evening's rest, and a little intellectual amusement, while at the same time safeguarding their own material and financial interests. Under this Bill, they would be prevented from doing so, or if they joined a union before they were naturalized, the members of that union at once become criminal under this amendment to the Criminal Code. Is that a fair proposition to put before parliament?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (British Columbia)—Not if they are domiciled in the country.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Has the hon. gentleman read the Bill? To be a British subject means more than domicile. A foreigner cannot become a British subject short of three years after he becomes domiciled in the country. We have multitudes of people coming from all quarters of the world, from large manufacturing centres as well as from agricultural sections, and when they enter the country they find they have no social standing, no place to go. The passage of this Bill would therefore be a block on our immigration, a block to the progress of the country, and would interfere with the security of the people. As these documents point out, if we are so anxious that all members of labour unions shall be British subjects, why are we not as anxious that all shareholders, presidents and directors of companies shall be British subjects? What is good for one ought to be good for another. Did you ever hear of any labour man asking that a law be passed requiring that a shareholder, president or director in a railway, a bank, an insurance company, or a manufacturing institution, shall be a British subject? No, they are too broad-minded for that sort of thing. They do not ask for such laws. Yet we are asked here to say that a labour union becomes a criminal organization as soon as a foreigner becomes a member. We can not stand for that kind of legislation. The Senate is low enough in the estimation of the country to-day without bringing us down to that level, and destroying the homes of our people, and preventing other homes from being established. If the workingmen of other countries were to learn that they would not be tolerated in any of our labour unions if they came here, how many immigrants would we get? There are many other points which I could touch upon, but I have quite enough to show the injudiciousness of this Bill as far as the country is concerned, and the partial nature of this legislation. To my mind, we should not hesitate for a moment in putting legislation of this kind under the block.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I did not think the hon. gentleman would finish his speech in so short a time, and I am not prepared to proceed with the discussion now. I therefore move that the debate be adjourned to this day next week.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I should like to know if the promoter of the Bill intends to press it this session? If he intends to proceed with it, I shall have something to say, because I think it is a bad Bill. If he intends to withdraw the Bill, it is unnecessary to discuss it further.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I distinctly stated the other day that I have no intention to press the Bill, that I had introduced it for the purpose of eliciting a discussion of the subject in the House, and by the trades unions. I said there were many sides to the question, and that I introduced the measure for the purpose of eliciting an expression of opinion from parliament, and from the unions, and with no object of pressing the Bill at this stage of the session. I distinctly stated before I sat down that I wanted to drop the Bill, and I would have dropped it then and there, only some hon. gentlemen wanted to speak.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—It should be dropped now. When I was in Quebec the other day, leading members of trades unions came to me for the purpose of convincing me that the Bill was bad. I was already convinced that it was bad, and if it is not to be proceeded with, the hon. gentleman should withdraw it now.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The motion which has been made is tantamount to dropping it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask the hon. gentleman from De Lanaudiére if he has any intention to make any observations on the Bill?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I will answer the hon. gentleman's question this day week, after I have had time to study it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I was about to say in answer to the motion for adjournment, that it means, of course, the debate cannot take place, as we expect parliament to close a week from tomorrow at the latest. I have risen to ask the question, because a document has been placed in my hand by an officer representing one of the various brotherhoods of railway men, with a request that I shall read it to the House. If the debate is to be adjourned for a week, it will be impossible to do so. If my hon. friend is disposed to continue the debate, I shall be glad to read it now.

Hon. GENTLEMEN—Drop!

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If the Bill is to be dropped, I would ask my hon. friend to withdraw his motion to adjourn the debate, in order that I may read this letter.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Read it as a reason why we should not adjourn the debate.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This letter is addressed to me, why I do not know, unless it be that some years ago I was one of the first to introduce in this Chamber a Bill which was regarded by some as of an unfriendly character to labour unions. It was for the purpose of repressing the coming into Canada of foreign labour agitators. That Bill received considerable attention at the hands of this House. Evidence was taken before the special committee appointed by the Senate as to the relations of foreign unions to Canadian labour, Canadian capital and Canadian industry. As the result of the evidence which was taken on that occasion, and the discussion on the Bill in this Chamber, it passed the Senate, but did not pass in the House of Commons. The letter which I have received reads as follows:

Ottawa, Ontario, April 22, 1910.
Grand Union Hotel.

Senator Lougheed,
Senate Chamber,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—Referring to Senate Bill (CCC), and the remarks made by Senator Belcourt on the second reading of the same.

As legislative representative of the Order of Railway Conductors, which is an international association, and notwithstanding the fact that the senator has asked to withdraw the Bill, I believe it would be unfair to Mr. Belcourt, and to the members of the Senate, if I allowed some of the statements made by him to go unchallenged.

In his remark he has displayed a serious lack of knowledge of the laws governing International Trade Unions. In his speech he endeavours to impress the Senate with the idea that international organizations are under the government and control of foreigners, who may at any time create a condition which would operate to the disadvantage of trade and commerce in Canada.

No. 1. His remarks:

Canadian trade and commerce, either in a small or large way, are more or less seriously injured, hampered and injured by a large and powerful trade union organized in a foreign country, and governed in a foreign country.

My answer:

That the organization may be organized in a foreign country, its executive officers may be foreigners, but the control and government of that organization is under a constitution made and agreed to by the representatives of the rank and file, with Canadian representation in the making of those laws, and that no officer has any authority to break any of these laws. They are made for his government as much as for the government of the members, and I am satisfied that if the senator had taken the trouble to have looked over these constitutions, which are not secret, he would not have made the mistakes he has before the Senate in respect to the power of the officers of these organizations; and, I desire as the legislative representative of the Order of Railway Conductors in Canada, to correct Mr. Belcourt's statement which is a reflection on our intelligence and loyalty, when he would even infer that any one from a foreign country could come into Canada and dictate a condition, which would have a tendency to embarrass Canadian trade and commerce, with the intent of benefiting a foreign institution.

No. 2:

The object of the Bill is to compel all trade unions operating in Canada, to be at least governed and controlled by British subjects.

My reply is:

If he will refer to the constitutions above referred to he will find that they are governed and controlled by the Canadian members, at the present time, in so far as any strikes or drastic measures are concerned. He will find that no strike can be declared until such time as a vote has been taken and that two-thirds of the members vote in favour of it; and in respect to this point there could be innumerbale instances given where, after a practically unanimous vote in favour of a strike, that those officers complained of have after considering the question vetoed and prevented a strike. In many cases arranging and bringing about a compromised settlement of the differences between the parties.

No. 3:

I would invite the union men of Canada to consider if Canada for Canadians is not a good enough motto for them?

My experience of thirty years connection with trade union, and my opportunities of social intercourse with people in other walks of life, has demonstrated to me that when the question of loyalty to our country, the protection of its constitution, the defence of its rights, and the support of the empire is necessary, that the workingmen of Canada are not found wanting; and I am of the opinion that the senator might have omitted this unless he went farther and connected a great many other institutions in the same category, such as the nickel industry of Canada, owned and controlled by foreigners; the Grand Trunk Railway Company, whose chief officers are not British subjects; International Harvester Company, McCormick Harvester Company, many of the lumber companies in Canada, numerous other concerns that might be mentioned. I do not make any reference to these concerns with the intention of criticising them, because we invite them and welcome them to Canada, but why this difference between international capital and labour.

It might be argued that there were vested interest in these institutions that had to be considered. We have some vested interest too, for instance: independent of having the united support of an international organization, of some forty-five thousand members, the Order of Railway Conductors has an insurance department in connection with their organization, in which its members are protected at a rate of sixteen dollars per thousand per annum, which is better than they can get in any other institution.

They have paid in premiums up to February last, $11,548,567.

Their reserve fund amounts to $692,669.43.

Cash in the mortuary fund, $639,652.15.

There is also a relief fund from which a considerable number of Canadians are receiving benefits to the extent of $30 per month.

There is a protective fund of $200,000.

With other cash and securities amounting to several hundred thousand dollars more, all of which the Canadian members are equally interested with their fellows.

It might be said that there was a great deal of money leaving Canada which could be used in business channels outside of our country. I take pleasure, however, in informing you that there is a very large amount invested in bonds, and on deposit, in Canada.

Surely in the face of this statement we have a vested interest which should not be lightly dealt with, and it is hoped the Senate will not be responsible for declaring an organization of such standing an illegal one, and thereby destroying the investment the Canadians have in the institution, all of which is respectfully submitted.

Yours very truly,

J. HARVEY HALL,
Legt. Rept. O.R.C.

I have no intention of supplementing this letter by any remarks of mine, except to say that I have been very strongly convinced as to the wisdom of the observations made by the hon. member from Halifax, that the question is sufficiently large to demand the best attention of the government and not a private member assuming the responsibility of amending the criminal law with reference to these unions. The result of the consideration which I gave to the measure that I brought before the Senate some years ago, was this, that the more responsible international organizations, such for instance as the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, the Order of Railway Conductors, the Brotherhood of Railway Firemen, and Enginemen, the Brotherhood of Telegraphers, the International Typographical Union, the International Moulders Union, and other responsible international organizations of that character were as unions a public benefit rather than a menace to capital. I convinced myself at the time of that investigation that when capital was menaced, it had more to gain by appealing to the responsible organizations of an international character than if the strike in question had been instituted simply by a local, limited and largely irresponsible organization; that the vested interest, so to speak, of those large organizations of an international order was such, entrenched as they are on both sides of the line, that they could not afford to deliberately do an injustice in any conflict between capital and labour. Their conciliatory attitude could be more easily enlisted on the part of capital in settling difficulties and friction between capital and labour than could be effected through local national unions, which are of a less responsible nature on account of their interests not being of the vested character, and of the important consequence attachable to the international unions. I say this simply as the result of the attention which I gave to the question at that time, and of my observations since, and of the experience I may have had in interesting myself in those questions from that day down to the present. I have never since been entirely in accord with indiscriminate legislation upon this very important question. It is too large and serious to form the subject of purely private measures that may be introduced from time to time to be thrown into the arena of public discussion. The question is a most important one to us as a parliament, and there is no question more important that should demand the attention of the government of the day than the placing upon our statute-book of salutory legislation looking to conciliation whenever those difficulties occur between labour and capital. It is desirable, as far as possible, that the very best relations should obtain between labour and capital in this country and the international unions of a responsible character, such as those I have pointed out. I am fully aware that there are unions calling themselves international, exercising authority on both sides of the line, which have been factors of mischief and agitation in many of the strikes which have taken place in Canada, but I can recall many critical occasions when the good offices of the superior officers of these international unions have been called in and enlisted by the representatives of capital in the settlement of strikes and the difficulties incident thereto to the mutual benefit and advantage of the capital invested, and of the labour interests involved. It is for that reason that we should, as far as possible, hold the balances carefully and consider as far as we can the desirability of adopting only legislation which would not be antagonistic to one or the other, but rather looking to the cementing of the relations of the two, and thus protecting the mutual interests of all concerned.

The motion was agreed to, and the debate was adjourned.

NAVAL SERVICE OF CANADA BILL.

SECOND READING

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (No. 95) An Act respecting the Naval Service of Canada. He said: I need hardly dilate on the importance of the measure which I am about to lay before you. That matter has been very extensively discussed indeed, both in the press and in another Chamber, and I would be merely going over a thrice or perhaps a thirty-told tale, if I were to enumerate or discuss the various arguments which have been brought forward for and against this policy; more especially as I find the opponents are agreed on only one thing, and that is in condemning the action of the government, whatever it may be. Some gentlemen declare that we should have no naval policy. Others that we do not go far enough; but they are all agreed that whoever else is right, the government is wrong. Hon. gentlemen are aware that a very considerable sum has been set apart in our estimates for the purpose mainly of procuring certain war vessels, and for making preliminary arrangements tending towards the construction of a navy which may be built here or elsewhere as circumstances may determine. They are also aware that it is proposed to create a new departure, or I should say, to be more exact, to give the Minister of Marine and Fisheries a new branch. He will be Minister of Naval Affairs, and also Minister of Fisheries in future. The main purpose of the measure which I am about to submit to the House is to define and arrange for the administration of some such a department. I need not trouble the House with the various preliminary details which are found in the Act of Interpretation; but I may say that the measure itself will naturally be divided into three special portions, one as I have said which will have reference to the administration, so called, of the new service that is about to be created, which will consist in the first instance of a civil branch similar to that which we now have in several other departments, and of several naval officers who will be brought in for the purpose of instructing our own militia and our own naval cadets from time to time. In a very great degree, the Bill consists of an application of the principles of the Militia Act to the naval volunteers who are about to be brought into existence. Mutatis mutandis, allowing for the difference between army and navy, the provisions will be found to be very nearly identical with those with which the House and country are familiar in respect of the militia of the country. The third, which is to some extent embodying the provision we have already made in the creation of our Royal Military College for the instruction of cadets, has reference to the formation of a naval college in which our cadets may be trained from time to time, and it is presumed and hoped that within a moderate space of time we shall have a body of young officers who will be fully competent to take charge of the navy that we propose to provide for. The miscellaneous provisions, I may say, have reference more particularly to such matters as providing suitable pensions for the officers, and for the widows and children of the officers, somewhat similar to those which are already in force in respect of the military branch, and to the infliction of certain penalties in the case of persons who may disregard the provisions of this Act, and the execution of the various warrants and sentences which may be inflicted by court martial and otherwise, against parties who, having engaged in the service lay themselves open to the penal provisions that are laid down here. I do not intend to dwell at length on this matter, although, of course, there may be no objection to any hon. gentleman who desires to discuss the policy of this measure delivering himself in any way he sees fit. The further remarks I may have to make I think will be better made when we are discussing the details in committee.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I beg to move the adjournment of the debate until to-morrow, and I suggest that it be the first order. The hon. gentleman from Hastings, who is not at present in his place, desires to speak on the measure.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I am quite agreeable.

The motion was agreed to, and the debate was adjourned.

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 197) An Act to amend the Post Office Act.

(In the Committee).

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I promised some detailed information as to the meaning of this Bill. The object is simply to repeal the present scale of salaries which are assigned to these officers, and to substitute a somewhat larger scale. The additional scale will be found in the Civil Service Act Amendment Bill, which is now ordered for Committee of the Whole. The present salaries are as follows: The inspector on appointment receives $2,000, with an annual increment of $50, for the first six years, and $100 per annum afterwards up to a maximum of $2,800. Under the proposed scale, the salary on appointment is $2,500, with an annual increase of $100, up to a maximum of $3,500. In the case of the assistant post office inspector, the present scale is $1,200 on appointment, with an increase of $50 a year for six years, and $100 a year afterwards up to $1,800. Under the proposed scale, the salary on appointment will be $1,800, with an increase of $100 yearly up to a maximum of $2,500. In the case of the superintendent of the railway mail service, under the present scale the salary of the superintendent of the railway mail service is $1,500, with an annual increase of $100 up to a maximum of $1,800. Under the proposed scale, the salary will be $1,800, with an annual increase of $100, up to a maximum of $2,500. These are the principle items of increase that will take place, and this is merely a measure to enable us to deal more effectively with the Civil Service Act Amendment Bill, which is presently coming down.

Hon. Mr. DAVID, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

FIRST AND SECOND READINGS.

Bill (NNN) An Act for the relief of James Alexander Hurst Forster.—Hon. Mr. De Veber.

The Senate adjourned until three o'clock to-morrow.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (NNN) An Act to provide for the cases of certain persons ceasing to be employed in the public service of Canada.—Hon. Mr. Power.

MONTREAL CENTRAL TERMINAL RAILWAY BILL.

PROTEST FROM THE CITY OF MONTREAL.

The SPEAKER—I have received from the clerk of the city of Montreal, the following communication:

City Hall,
Montreal, 25th April, 1910.

Hon. Mr. Kerr,
President of the Senate,
Ottawa.

Sir,—I have the honour to transmit to you herewith copy of a resolution adopted, on the 25th instant, by the city council of Montreal in connection with certain demand made by the Montreal Terminal Railway Company.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your most obedient servant,

(Sgd.) L. O. DAVID,
City Clerk.

Extract of the minutes of the city council of Montreal, special meeting held on Monday, 25th April, 1910.

Submitted and read following report of the Board of Commissioners, anent the petition of the Montreal Terminal Railway Company, to withdraw their Bill.

The Board of Commissioners respectfully report:—

That they have taken into consideration the hereunto annexed letter of the city clerk stating that the Montreal Terminal Railway Company intend to withdraw their Bill and to remain under their previous charter, which entitles said company to come in the city by the way of a bridge or tunnel without previous assent of the city council, but the location or the indication of the route or the places that the company has to run by.

After mature deliberation, your board recommed that the government and the parliament be requested to oppose the Montreal Terminal Railway Company withdrawing their Bill as amended, whereas, under terms of the existing laws, they would claim the right to come into the city, and to use therein right and franchises without the consent of the city, when no other company of same nature, incorporated in Quebec or in Ottawa, can use similar privileges without having been previously authorized by some by-law from the city council;

That the withdrawal of said Bill, under such circumstances, would be most injurious to the interest of the city of Montreal and of the citizens.

The whole nevertheless respectfully submitted.

(Sgd.) E. P. LACHAPELLE,
F. L. WANKLYN,
L. N. DUPUIS,
JOSEPH AINEY,
Board of Commissioners.

City Hall, Montreal, April 12-25, 1910.

On motion of Alderman L. A. Lapointe, seconded by Alderman Robinson, it was Resolved, that said report be received and adopted.

(Certified.)
(Sgd.) L. O. DAVID,
City Clerk.

CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE OF QUEBEC BILL.

FRENCH TRANSLATION.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Bill (SS) An Act to incorporate the Federation of the Chambers of Commerce of the province of Quebec has been passed by this Chamber, but it has not yet been printed in French, and the promoter of the Bill in the House of Commons would like to present it today, because he has to leave and will not be able to attend to it, and under these circumstances the Bill would fall. He asks that an order be given by the Senate to have the Bill sent down to the Commons, although not printed in French. The House of Commons cannot accept it until it is printed in French.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The clerk can send down a French copy.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We have nothing to do with that.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It has passed the third reading in this House, so that it is for the clerk to send it over to the Commons.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We do not require any special order for it.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—It is for the House of Commons to dispense with the French translation.

MONTREAL CENTRAL TERMINAL COMPANY BILL.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. DAVID moved:

That this House do not concur in the decision of his hon. the Speaker given on the 21st instant on the point of order raised by the Hon. Mr. Landry, That the member of Ottawa, having by his motion in amendment, notified this House of his decision to withdraw his Bill (44) intituled: 'An Act respecting the Montreal Central Terminal Company,' no other motion either to recommit said Bill or to adopt the amendments proposed to be made to it by a Standing Committee can be made.

He said: This motion was taken out of an old copy of the orders of the day, and I wish to make an amendment to it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think it is all right as it is; but I desire to say that the uniform practice in both Houses has been when a member of the House is not satisfied with the decision of the Speaker he forthwith appeals before any other business has been transacted. Consequently I hold that in its present form the hon. gentleman's motion is out of order. Not having appealed immediately.

as our practice provides, if the hon. gentleman wishes to attack the ruling of the Speaker he has to move to reconsider the action taken. He cannot make a direct motion like this to reverse the decision of the Speaker. His first motion must be to reconsider the action taken by the House. The action of the Speaker is supposed to be the action of the House; that is, when the decision of the Speaker is not appealed from, it is accepted by the House.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—There is nothing in our rules which would call for any such reconsideration any more than the motion which I make. I wish to add a few words in support of my motion for the purpose of showing that it is not too late to make this motion.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I hope His Honour the Speaker will take a note of my objection.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I want to discuss the whole question and the question of order at the same time.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman has no right to discuss the whole question on a point of order.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—It is not merely a question of appeal from the decision of the Speaker, it is rather a question of privilege. The question is not only one to reverse the decision of the Speaker, but to correct our proceedings. It is to show that we have on record a procedure which should not be there, and that the correction should be made by the House, if it thinks proper to do so.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—It seems to me the universal practice is that when an objection is taken to the ruling of a presiding officer, an appeal should be taken at once.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—The hon. gentleman's motion is not in compliance with the practice of the British parliament. In Blackhall's Proceedings, House of Commons, 1894-5, page 132, it is laid down that the proper course in a case of this kind is to give notice to put the matter in proper form before the House, so that all may be in a position to pass upon it. On another occasion, a ruling was given when the conduct of the Speaker in the Chair was challenged, and it was held that the ordinary and proper course is to proceed by notice. There is on record in Blackmore, page 293, a ruling in connection with an appeal by Parnell, who challenged the Speaker's ruling, and all these cases seem to show that when an hon. member challenges the Speaker's action, he must do so by giving notice, if the question is one of privilege. On the occasion when Parnell objected to the ruling of the Speaker, at the next meeting of the House he challenged the decision of the Speaker as a breach of the privileges of the House. The Speaker ruled that the matter was one of order and not one of privilege, and could be brought forward in a regular way by notice of motion, and not as a matter of privilege. No one objected to his taking the matter up at the next sitting of the House, and that, as I understand, is the objection raised by the hon. member from Halifax.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I have here Appeals, Decisions, 1884-6, page 90, in which I find that any question affecting the conduct of the Chair, or any ruling given by the Speaker, should come before the House in such a way that the whole House should be able to decide upon it. The proper way is to give notice, so that the whole House would be in a position to pass an opinion upon it.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I have no particular case to cite; but the authorities show in a general way that any ruling given by the Speaker may be appealed from. In Appeals, Decisions, 1887-9, page 147, I find that it is held that an hon. member is within his right in questioning the decision of the Speaker on a formal action; but he should do so on a motion that would give to any other hon. member who might wish to move an amendment, an opportunity to do so. The former reference is, I think, more specific than this one. In principle the House is supreme and its privileges cannot be impeached, except by a rule adopted by the House. It becomes a matter of precedent. In this case what have we? We have a vote of the House denying to an hon. member as promoter of a Bill leave to withdraw his Bill. A vote was taken upon that motion, and it was negatived. Therefore, the House refused to allow the withdrawal of the Bill. Then a motion was made, according to the order of the day, for the consideration of the amendment which had been made by the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, and it was on that motion that the point of order was raised, and the hon. member occupying the Chair at the time maintained the point, and, therefore, absolutely negatived a vote of the House. Now, the question arises as to what should prevail? Whether it is the decision of the hon. gentleman who occupied the Chair, or the vote of the House? That is the simple question, and this point should have been exhausted without any notice of motion, immediately during the same sitting, after the Speaker had given his decision; but because it was not made at the same sitting, then it entailed the necessity of giving a notice of motion to allow senators to consider the point. Suppose the motion is actually made by an hon. gentleman who was in the House, or suppose that the hon. member had not been in the House at the time, he would not be deprived from making the same motion, but he would have, as has been done in the present case, to give notice of motion. Two days' notice has been given, and hon. members have been called upon to consider the question as to whether a decision which is in direct conflict with the vote of the House should stand in the Minutes of the House or not.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—This point is very important, and I think we should take a little care in deciding it, in order to make of it a precedent. As in cases before the courts, we can cite precedents for and against it. It all depends on the facts and circumstances. I have heard the precedents cited in the British House of Commons, perhaps in the House of Lords; but without looking at the reports, I am not quite sure if they would apply. Moreover, they have a special code of rules there that we have not here; but we have rules, orders and forms of proceeding of our own in the Senate of Canada. This is the code on which we are proceeding and when I look at rule 16, I find:

The Speaker preserves order and decorum and decides questions of order, subject to an appeal to the Senate. In explaining a point of order or practice he states the rule or authority applicable to the case.

So the point of order decided by the Speaker is subject to appeal. It seems to me an appeal should be taken at once. Without discussing the question at length, I will refer to Bourinot, third edition, page 486, referring to decisions of the Speaker: it is as follows:

A member called to order shall sit down, but may afterwards explain. The House, if appealed to, shall decide on the question, but without debate. If there is no appeal, the decision of the Chair shall be final.

The rule says the decision is final where there is no appeal. If appeal is taken at once, we can entertain it. I submit the point. In this case, there was a decision given and an appeal should have been entered at once to reverse the decision; but there was no appeal. It seems to me after the decision was given, that the House could not proceed with the Bill as it was, and as there was then no appeal, it cannot be done now, and the point of order as taken would therefore be well taken.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG. Did the authority the hon. gentleman quoted state that the appeal must be taken immediately?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—If a member is going to speak outside the question he is called to order. If he is called, he has to sit down, but may explain. The House, if appealed to, shall decide on the question, but without debate. If there is no appeal, the decision of the Chair shall be final. Surely that would indicate that there must be an appeal at once, because if it is not final, a week later, on a motion to reverse the decision, we would have a right to do the same thing, and we would not know in the meantime what might be done. It seems to me, therefore, if there is no appeal entered, the decision of the Speaker is final, and you cannot take it up at a future time.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Supposing an hon. member is called to order, having transgressed the rules in debate, it would not be convenient to delay the debate until a notice was given. The case cited by my hon. friend does not seem to me to be analogous at all.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—The Speaker decides a point, and if there is no appeal it is final.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—But there is an appeal.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—But you cannot take a week or a month to appeal. You can make a motion to reconsider, not the Speaker's decision but to reconsider the proceedings of the House.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—This is not necessarily a motion to appeal. The effect of the adoption of the motion will be to appeal from the Speaker's decision, to reverse, perhaps, the decision of the Speaker at the time; but there are two judgments in the record of the House. There is a judgment deciding that the promoter had not a right to withdraw the Bill. This was carried by a majority of nine, and is a decision of the House. There is another decision in our Journals, the decision of the hon. member from Halifax, acting as Speaker. It was more like an opinion than a judgment; but assume that it is a judgment, then we are face to face with two judgments. Shall not the House decide which is the judgment that must prevail? This may be done by the motion which I have just moved; that is a motion on which the House is asked to decide which judgment shall prevail.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I will immediately answer the objection of my hon. friend by quoting a decision from Dennison & Brand, page 184:

Division overriding standing orders.
A division of the House cannot over-ride a standing order.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—What kind of standing order?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is answering the statement that the House is supreme and can do what they like. They can do what they like, but are bound by the rules, and there is another rule which decides that if an appeal is not taken immediately, you have no right to appeal afterwards:

Division overriding standing orders.
A division of the House cannot over-ride a standing order.
Affirmation Bill: Second reading.
Order for second reading read. Debate.

And then Mr. Crawford, a member, moved the adjournment of the debate.

It being within a minute of a quarter to six, at which hour all debates or opposed matters must cease on Wednesday, the House divided. Yeas, 50; nays, 183.
Mr. SPEAKER said: That the House on a division just taken had expressed an opinion that the debate should not be adjourned, but there was a standing order more imperative, which directed that at that hour any business under discussion should stand adjourned, whereupon it being a quarter of an hour before six o'clock, Mr. Speaker adjourned the debate till to-morrow, against the decision which had just been given by the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—What application has that to the present case?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It will come in its turn. I will answer another objection raised by my hon. friend from Kamloops (Hon. Mr. Bostock), as to the conduct of the Speaker, and as to the decision he quoted, saying that if we want to challenge the conduct of the Speaker it must be by a substantive motion. If my hon. friend will look at May, pages 277 and 278, he will find the following:

Certain matters cannot be debated, save upon a substantive motion, which can be dealt with by amendment, or by a distinct vote of the House, such as the conduct of the Sovereign, the Heir to the Throne, the Viceroy and Governor General of India, Lord Lieut. of Ireland, the Speaker, the Chairman of Ways and Means, &c.

The SPEAKER—Does this motion call in question the action or the conduct of the Speaker?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK. No.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG. No. There was no question in regard to that.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Why did the hon. gentleman try to apply those remarks to this case?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—I want to put the hon. gentleman right.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I want to put the hon. member from Kamloops right. The hon. gentleman in discussing a point of order should not say: 'I want to put you right'. If you refer to page 252, you will find that the same doctrine is laid down; if you want to discuss the conduct of the Speaker, you must do so on a substantive motion. It must be a charge made against the Speaker. Now, I take a decision of the Speaker given lately, ruling that a point of order was well taken. You will find it at page 569, as follows:

If the opinion is acquiesced in it stands as a judgment of the assembly, and is to be enforced or executed accordingly; but any member who obtains the floor for that purpose may appeal from it, and if the appeal is seconded, as it must generally be, and allowed it then entirely abrogates the decision of the presiding officer, and refers the point of order to the decision of the assembly itself, whose decision thereof furnishes the rule to be pursued thereafter.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—What is the hon. gentleman quoting from?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Cushing. On page 579, I find the following:

1465. The opinion of the presiding officer on the point of order is considered as acquiesced in, and an appeal therefrom not seasonably taken, when any parliamentary proceeding is allowed to be taken thereafter; as for example where the mover of an amendment which was adjudged to be out of order not knowing of the decision, suffered another member to obtain the floor and to address the assembly, for some moments, before he claimed his appeal; and so, where the clerk has commenced calling the roll, and five members have answered to their names, it was held to be too late to question the decision of the presiding officer on a point of order.

And at page 677 he says:—

When the Speaker's decision is thus pronounced, it is deemed to be acquiesced in, and to make an end of the question, as a matter of course, unless something is done to overrule it.

If the opinion of the Speaker is acquiesced in, then it becomes an order of the House, to be enforced in the same manner as the other orders.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—They are amending their rules at Washington now.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We are trying to amend ours now. I claim that the question of order having been raised, and the Speaker having decided, when his decision was not appealed from at the time, it cannot be changed. Three or four days have passed since that ruling, and we are asked now to annul it. I say that it is entirely out of order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Better late than never. I would ask the House to deal with this question from a sensible point of view. The city of Montreal is here through its representative asking for a certain thing.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman is not discussing the point of order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I want to show that the point of order is not well taken. The House is asked to decide one question. A Bill is before us which has been lockjawed on the way. It is a question now whether that lockjaw is sufficient to kill it for good. The city of Montreal, which has a great interest in this Bill, asks the Senate not to jeopardize its rights and interests.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman is travelling away from the point of order altogether.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I object to the hon. member's interruption. I have the floor.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I must ask his honour the Speaker to keep order. The hon. gentleman from Montreal seems to find it impossible to get on his feet without breaking some rule.

The SPEAKER—I would request the hon. gentleman to address himself to the point of order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I hope his honour the Speaker refers to the hon. member from Halifax, who is always infringing the rule.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The point of order is raised that this Bill must be sent to limbo.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The point of order is, can an appeal from the ruling of his honour the Speaker be taken after a certain procedure or a certain time has intervened. The point is that an appeal must be taken immediately. The hon. gentleman from Mille Iles (Hon. Mr. David) says it can be taken at any time, by giving notice.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I am in favour of that contention. I say the hon. member from Stadacona and others who are opposed to that Bill have no right, in view of the great interests at stake, to put up an adverse argument against the request of the hon. gentleman from Mille Iles. I am in favour of reviving this Bill. I have no objection to the point of order being settled one way or the other. What I contend for here, as a representative of the city of Montreal, is that the vital interests of that city should not be jeopardized even by the wise decision of the hon. gentleman who happened to be in the Chair when the decision was rendered.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—The point of order is, as I understand it, that the motion of my hon. friend from Mille Iles is practically an appeal from the decision given by the Chair the other day. The point of order raised by the hon. member from Halifax is that it is not open for my hon. friend to do that; though he may possibly obtain what he wants by a motion for a reconsideration of the order of the day upon which the point of order was raised, and upon which the decision was given. The point of order raised by the hon. member from Halifax is well taken, because to my mind the appeal which is now contemplated should have been taken immediately upon the decision rendered the other day, and if my hon. friend from Mille Iles is permitted to-day, under the notice he has given, to submit to the House, the conduct of the Speaker, he will be creating a precedent which will be very dangerous in conducting the proceedings of the Senate. It has been stated that this is not in the nature of a motion for revising the conduct of the Speaker. It is, and it can be nothing else, because if my hon. friend's motion is affirmed it will be merely for the purpose of having this House declare that the Speaker was wrong. He gains nothing by that except to censure the Speaker. As a matter of parliamentary usage and practice, it is not desirable that the conduct of the Speaker, which, at the time, the House accepted, should be subsequently censured. Under rule 16, the decision given by the Speaker on that occasion was absolutely settled. The rule requires an appeal at the moment, and if the decision is allowed to go without challenge at the time, it is accepted as final. Let us see where we will be lead to if the motion of my hon. friend were put to the House. It would simply mean that every decision by the Speaker, upon any subject put before the House, would be subject next day or next week, or the next month after——

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—My hon. friend says: Oh, no. My hon. friend discussed the subject without touching the question, and now he say: 'Oh, no'.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—We are in the face of two judgments. Does the hon. member consider that the decision of his hon. the Speaker at the time, is essentially final?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—No. My hon. friend misapprehends the situation entirely. I do not say that my hon. friend cannot have this question again submitted to the House, and that he cannot get a decision of this House on the question he wants to have settled; but I say he has gone the wrong way about it. I say he has no right to-day to give notice of appeal from a decision of the Speaker, which he and other members of the House accepted last week as final. If he had that right it would be impossible to conduct the business of the House. If the decisions of the Chair are to be subject to repeal at any time after they are rendered, it would disorganize the business of the House. I would suggest to my hon. friend to abandon this motion, and give notice of a different motion. The question before the Chair on the 24th was that the amendments to the Bill be concurred in. In amendment to that, the Hon. Mr. Edwards moved that the Bill be withdrawn. Upon that a question of order was raised by the hon. member from Stadacona that it was too late for him to do that, and that his motion was out of order. That point of order was settled, and to my mind finally settled as far as the decision of the Speaker was concerned. This motion constitutes nothing less than a censure of the Chair, with no result. If my hon. friend did get his motion affirmed, he would have to proceed further, by the motion which I suggest, that it be reconsidered

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—My hon. friend is not absolutely right as to the procedure followed on that occasion.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I have the Minutes before me.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The motion was made by the hon. member from De Salaberry that the amendments made by the committee to the Bill be concurred in. An amendment was moved by the hon. member from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Edwards) that he have leave to withdraw the Bill. On that motion in amendment, the House divided.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—It is very important that we should agree about the facts. The 'Minutes' do not confirm what my hon. friend says.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—They have been corrected.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Get the revised edition.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I have been reading from page 824 of the 'Minutes.'

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The motion put before the House was for concurrence in amendments. On that, the hon. member from Stadacona raised a point of order that inasmuch as the promoter of the Bill (Hon. Mr. Edwards) had intimated his intention as promoter of the Bill, to withdraw it, the Bill could not go on. The Speaker decided that the point of order was well taken, and that inasmuch as the promoter of the Bill had notified the House of his desire to withdraw it, the Bill could not go on. These are the facts as they took place.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—That does not change my argument.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I have some doubt as to the right of the Senate to reverse a decision of the Speaker, unless it is immediately appealed from when rendered, and I do not see the necessity for this motion made by my hon. friend from Mille Iles. I maintain that the decision of his honour the Speaker, being that this Bill could not go on because the promoter had stated his desire to withdraw as promoter, the next motion of the hon. gentleman of which he has given notice is not one which controverts the decision of the Speaker——

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is anticipating a discussion.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—That is true. I have some hesitancy in asserting the right of the Senate to call in question the decision of the Speaker, which is that the Bill could not go on because it lacked a promoter. The next motion, that is that the mover be substituted as the promoter would be in order.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I rise to a point of order. It is laid down quite clearly in the authorities that there can be no debate on an appeal from the decision of the Speaker. That has been held over and over again in the House of Commons. If there can be no debate upon an appeal from the decision of the Speaker, I raise the point of order that this debate is out of order.

The SPEAKER—We have been in the course of this discussion wandering very much. It is difficult, when there are so many interruptions, to keep to the lines definitely before the House; but it is perhaps, under the circumstances, desirable that there should be a good deal of latitude. I quite sympathise with the views of the hon. gentleman from Calgary. At the same time, I think it is quite clearly laid down that the Speaker is entitled, if he chooses, to get advice from the House on points of order, as well as on anything else. It is with that view that I rather invited than objected to the discussion as far as it has gone.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It seems to me that this question is in a nutshell. All the discussion has been in contravention of the rules cited by the hon. member from Calgary. The proposition before the Senate is that the House does not concur in the decision of the Speaker on a certain question. The hon. member from Halifax does not argue that question. He simply says that this is not the proper way to bring it before the House. That is not the point of order, for this reason; the House is not seized of the question until the hon. gentleman would move for a reconsideration of the whole question. That I understand to be the point of order raised by the hon. member from Halifax, and all this discussion has no more to do with that question than if hon. gentlemen had been discussing the quality of the cheese in the moon.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I have to apologize to some hon. gentlemen opposite for asking questions; but I was really seeking information. My hon. friend from Quebec (Hon. Mr. Choquette) opened the line of defence——

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (British Columbia)—Order. The Speaker has given his decision.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—You could never convince me that the rule forbids an appeal from the decision of the Speaker. I notice also my hon. friend from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt) makes the very same deduction. While it must be admitted that the practice in the past, generally speaking, has been an immediate appeal from the Speaker, it does not debar the right to reconsider any decision of the Speaker by giving the usual notice and affording members an opportunity to carefully consider the question and avoid casting heavy votes.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Is it the opinion of the hon. gentleman that the appeal can be taken any day after the decision?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—That is the rule, according to the authorities.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Does the hon. gentleman maintain that the present motion is an appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Practically it is.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Then, according to the authorities, we have no right to speak. No debate can take place on an appeal from the Speaker's decision, so I raise the point of order. I was out of order myself in discussing the question.

Hon. Mr YOUNG—I have a right to give my views.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (British Columbia)—Order, order; sit down.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—There is a difference between discussing a question of order, and discussing the Speaker's ruling. After he has given his ruling, it might be presumption on my part; but until he has given a ruling I find that the practice has been to allow discussion and the citing of authorities and rules, so that my hon. friend's point of order is as badly mixed as the argument on the other side against the proposition of my hon. friend from Mille Iles.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I would draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that the discussion is not on the motion appealing from the Speaker, but on the point of order which has been taken on that motion.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—That is an appeal.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—No.

The SPEAKER—The whole question is one on the point of order raised by the hon. gentleman from Halifax. It is that the Acting Speaker, having given the decision which he made, which is reported in the unrevised edition of the Debates at page 719, that the motion which is now made is out of order, because it is by way of appeal from that decision.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Is it discussable or not?

The SPEAKER—It appears to me that in view of the practice that we have adopted in this House, which appears to have been, so far as I have been able to ascertain, not only the usual, but the only practice, that appeal from the ruling of the Chair is taken immediately following the decision. It appears to me that no appeal having been taken at the time, that the House acquiesced in the decision then given. The House having acquiesced in that decision, it must govern the matter until something else is laid down to the contrary. This motion now before the Senate is a double motion, raising that question as to the ruling, and calling for, at the same time, consideration of a report of the committee which was before the House when the decision was given. It appears to me, therefore, in that respect that the objection is well taken, and that the motion is out of order. I call attention to the fact that the decision is binding until it is reversed, under rule 16. It decides the question, subject to an appeal to the Senate, and the practice has been for that appeal without discussion, and for that appeal being taken immediately. The object the hon. senator from Mille Iles has in view, could be attained in another way and perfectly within the rules. It is not necessary for me to advise, because there are other hon. gentlemen more competent to do so than I am. At the same time, I think the objection taken by the hon. gentleman from Halifax must prevail.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I sat down, Mr. Speaker, in answer to the point of order raised by the hon. gentleman from Grandville, in order to obtain a ruling on the point. Now, Mr. Speaker, you have delivered your judgment on the main question and I am shut out.

The SPEAKER—I am extremely sorry. I waited for the hon. gentleman for a minute or a minute and a half, to give him an opportunity to speak, and he did not rise.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I asked the hon. Speaker to rule on that point of order and sat down.

Hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Perhaps the Speaker can permit us to appeal from his ruling now.

The SPEAKER. Yes.

MONTREAL CENTRAL TERMINAL COMPANY BILL.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I beg to move for leave to take charge of Bill (No. 44) intituled: 'An Act respecting the Montreal Central Terminal Company'.

I do not want to say much in support of the motion. There is no doubt things cannot remain as they are. Where is the Bill? There are two judgments of the House of record.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I raise a point of order. It is useless to discuss that motion. It is entirely out of order. There is a ruling of the Chair which is final and which has decided that we cannot proceed with the Bill. If the hon. gentleman wants to get over that decision, let him take a proper way.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The decision is that the Bill cannot be proceeded with because the promoter has intimated his intention to withdraw it. Now, there is a motion which is made for an hon. senator to take charge of the Bill. This is an indirect way of affirming the decision of the Speaker. It is simply taking one of the steps that can be taken after such a decision as the one given by the Chair.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The same as an election case.

Hon. Mr. POWER—With all deference to the hon. gentleman from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand), I think he is in error. The decision which was given the other day was, in effect, that this Bill had ceased to be under control of the House because——

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—No, no.

Hon. Mr. POWER—My hon. friend from Victoria is strong on the negative; but that is the fact, that the Bill has ceased to be under the control of the House, and the decision given by his hon. the Speaker just now is to the effect that if the hon. gentleman wishes to impugn the decision of the Chair, and to get that Bill back into the hands of the House, he has to give notice of a motion to reconsider the action taken by the House the other day; and the motion which is now before the Chair is one which assumes that this Bill is still before the House, and it is quite out of order. When the hon. gentleman has succeeded in getting the House to reconsider the decision which they came to on Thursday last, then he will be in a position to move as he pleases; but just now he is not. The Bill is not within his power or the power of the House.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Its position is nebulous!

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Gone to Jericho.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Will the hon. gentleman answer the question, where is the Bill?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think it is my duty to answer all the absurd connundrums put to me.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The usual adjectives.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I do not agree with the point of order that has been taken. There is a motion before the House by an hon. member to take charge of the Bill, which is still in the possession of the House. I gave my opinion the other day that a member of this House has a right to withdraw from a Bill, and to say that he did not intend to proceed with it, even, when the House has decided by a majority not to take it out of the order paper, but the Bill is still in the possession of the House and another member has a right to move that the decision given by the House, not by the Speaker, may be reconsidered and the Bill be replaced on the order paper in his own name. We must be logical. Nobody is in charge of the Bill now, and our rules provide that a Bill must always be in the charge of a member of the Senate when before the House. This Bill cannot, therefore, proceed, as there is no member responsible for it.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—No father.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Like a case before the court, the record of it remains in court, and the judge, with good reason, may permit——

The SPEAKER—We are not discussing the merits or demerits of the question. It is purely a question of order. The hon. gentleman should confine himself to that.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I do not agree with the point of order, and think it is not well taken, for the reason I have just given. We must be logical; somebody must take charge of the Bill when it is still in the possession of the House. We have decided that the hon. member has no right to withdraw his Bill but he refuses to proceed and withdraw from the Bill, and before another hon. member can take charge of the Bill he has to ask the permission of the House to do so, and this is the motion he has a right to make. We will hear his reasons for taking charge of the Bill. If a lawyer withdraws from a case, the record is still before the court, and another lawyer has a right to move in that court and also to take charge of the case. By adopting this motion, the hon gentleman from Mille Iles will have the authority of the House to take charge of the Bill, and I suppose he will then move that the decision of the House will be reconsidered and the Bill restored to the position in which it was before, and the House will then proceed with it in the usual way. I think the point of order is not well taken. The logical position is to allow another member to take charge of the Bill after the House has decided that the member promoting it has no right to withdraw it.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—If the Speaker's ruling is right, the Bill cannot be introduced in the House again. He rules that the promoters have a right to withdraw it, and that the House did not know what they were doing. If that ruling was right, all the speeches the hon. gentleman can make will not restore the Bill to the order paper.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The argument of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken might have some force if there was any Bill before the House or if we were in possession of the Bill. It seems to me the matter is in this position; there is a Bill before the Senate, and the gentleman in charge of the Bill asks permission to withdraw it. The Speaker decided and quoted from May, what to my mind was a very strong point, that a member desiring to drop a Bill had the right to do so, which was tantamount to allowing him to withdraw it. The Speaker having given the decision, there is no Bill before the House for any one to take charge of. If the hon. gentleman desires to proceed with the Bill—and I wish it understood that I am not opposing the provisions of the Bill—he must introduce another Bill with similar provisions and proceed with it. The ruling of the Speaker being that the gentleman having the Bill in charge had the right to drop it, there is an end of it, and the Bill is not before us.

The SPEAKER—It seems to me the point is quite plain, if we just look at how the thing arose and what the point is. The Bill was reported from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, and a motion was made for concurrence in amendments. The hon. gentleman from Russell, who was in charge of the Bill, moved in amendment that the promoters have leave to withdraw the Bill, and that was refused, and the House still retained possession of the Bill. Thereupon objection was taken that the promoters had the right to withdraw the Bill; but up to this time no one has withdrawn the Bill, and it is still here. Now the motion comes before the House to transfer the charge of that Bill from the gentleman who asked leave to withdraw it, and vest it in the hon. gentleman who has made this motion. I think the motion of the hon. gentleman from Mille Iles is in order.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—I asked for leave to withdraw the Bill, and I now move that the Bill be withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—I think the motion of the hon. gentleman has been voted down in the House before.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—There is nothing before the Chair.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I rise to a point of order. Before the motion is put, the hon. gentleman declares that he withdraws the Bill.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The point of order settled that.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I want to put my point. Since he withdraws the Bill there is no Bill before the House. I draw attention to the following quotation from May:

> In passing private Bills parliament still exercises its legislative functions, but its proceedings partake of a judicial character. The persons whose private interests are to be promoted appear as suitors for the Bill; while those who apprehend injury are admitted as adverse parties in the suit. Many of the formalities of a court of justice are maintained; various conditions are required to be observed, and their observance to be strictly proved; and if the parties do not sustain the Bill in its progress, by following every regulation and form prescribed, it is not forwarded by the House in which it is pending. If they abandon it, and no other parties undertake its support, the Bill is lost, however sensible the House may be of its value. The analogy which all these circumstances bear to the proceedings of a court of justice, is further supported by the payment of fees which is required of every party promoting or opposing a private Bill, or petitioning for or opposing any particular provision. It may be added that the solicitation of a Bill in parliament has been regarded, by courts of equity, so completely in the same light as an ordinary suit, that the promoters have been restrained, by injunction, from proceeding with a Bill, the object of which was held to be to set aside a covenant.
> If parties acquaint the committee that they do not desire to proceed further with the Bill, this fact is reported to the House, and an order is then made that the Bill be withdrawn, or, merely, that the report do lie upon the table.
> In 1902 a committee having thus reported that the parties did not intend to proceed with their Bill, notice was given of a motion to recommit the Bill, but Mr. Speaker ruled that such a motion would be out of order on the ground that a private Bill is the property of the promoters and that the House could not compel them to proceed with it against their wish.

The Speaker ruled that such a motion would be out of order on the ground that a private Bill was the property of the promoters, and that the House could not compel them to proceed against their wish.

The SPEAKER—Hon. gentlemen will see, if they just think for a moment, that a motion was made by the hon. senator from Mille Iles. It was to that the objection was taken by the hon. gentleman from Halifax. The motion, although it had not been put to the House, had been moved by the hon. gentleman, and anything beyond that, except raising the point of order, is an interruption which cannot take place except by way of amendment. I feel quite clear about that. The motion, then, which was moved by the hon. senator from Mille Iles, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Bostock:

That the hon. member from Mille Iles do have leave to take charge of Bill (44), intituled: An Act respecting the Montreal Central Terminal Company.

That is the motion before the House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This motion is too important to be dealt with in the summary way in which some hon. members think it should be dealt with. We are in this position now, that there was a ruling of the Acting Speaker to the effect that this Bill was no longer before the House. In that ruling, unfortunately, the present Speaker, apparently, does not concur. Then we have the hon. gentleman who had charge of the Bill, who introduced it, who represented the promoters of the Bill, who represented the people who paid the fees, and employed counsel to come here—we have him declaring that he withdraws the Bill. Then we have another hon. gentleman moving to the effect that he himself be placed in charge of the Bill. Now, I submit that there is not any record to be found in Canada, or anywhere else, where that procedure has taken place with regard to a private Bill. It is a most extraordinary procedure. Just fancy what the result would be if this practice were allowed? A senator introduces a Bill, subsequently he desires to withdraw it and it has always been held that the promoter of a private Bill has a right to withdraw it. The reason a promoter may have for wishing to withdraw a Bill is that some one hostile to his interests has succeeded in having an amendment made to that Bill which will render the Bill of no advantage to him, and to those associated with him. I am not speaking now of this particular Bill; but an amendment might be made in a Bill which would cause very serious injury to its promoters; and I think it is absurd to say that we are not going to adhere to the uniform practice followed ever since we had a parliament in this country, that we are now going to lay down the doctrine that a promoter is bound to accept a Bill no matter how it has been altered, and even though it may be calculated to prejudice his interests to the greatest extent. Now we have the hon. gentleman from Mille Iles, who has shown his feeling towards this Bill, who has presented a petition from the city council of Montreal, of which city he happens to be the city clerk, a petition signed by himself against a Bill which he opposed here on the floor of this House, and he proposes to take charge of this Bill, to be a sort of step-father to it, I have no doubt.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Order.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is nothing disorderly in that.

An hon. GENTLEMAN—A foster-father.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If my hon. friend from the Victoria division can keep within the rules of order as strictly as I am doing, we shall hear very much less from him than we do. It just comes to this, that if the practice now proposed were introduced, a man or a company might be deprived of property and rights, and would have no remedy left at all. I think it is one of the most preposterous proposals I have ever listened to. I shall quote from page 299 of Cushing, showing what his view is:

Before passing a private Bill, the consent of the party or parties is essential.

That is clear as can be, and I think it is perfectly clear in this case that you cannot proceed with a private Bill against the wishes of the promoter of the Bill. Further, I may say this—I am not dealing with the point of order now, for it is not a question of order, but a question of the merits. As I said before, I was a member of the committee which reported the Bill with this amendment. I voted and favoured the amendment. If the Bill were to pass, I should like to see it pass with that amendment. But we have no right to force the Bill on the promoters. It has been said, and His Honour the Speaker has often heard the saying, that 'hard cases make bad law'; and it is just the case in this instance. We are anxious to do what we can to further the interests of the city of Montreal, but we must not lose sight of the fact that such interests must be promoted in accordance with parliamentary practice and parliamentary law. Now, as to the city of Montreal, if the ruling that I gave the other day were maintained, and it was held that this Bill was not before the House, the city of Montreal would be no worse off than if the Bill had never been introduced. Hon. gentlemen talk about the grievance under which the city of Montreal suffers. Montreal is just where she would have been if the Bill had not been introduced. Further—although I think there was some effort made to represent to the House that it had been the case—there was no agreement before the committee between the promoters of the two Bills.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—There was between the promotors and the committee.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am quite aware that the counsel who represented the promoters of this Bill did accept the amendment; but there was no bargain between the two parties, and, as I understand, there was no bargain with the committee. It was simply that he accepted the amendment made by the committee, but when he had communicated with his principals he found that they would not accept the amendment, and preferred to have the Bill withdrawn. We must bear in mind that we are not dealing solely with this particular measure. The proposal made by the hon. gentleman from Mille Iles is to introduce a totally unheard of practice—that the House, without good reasons shown, can take a private Bill out of the hands of the member to whom the promoters entrusted it and put it into the hands of another member.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I would like to take the very expression that has fallen from the lips of my hon. friend, and say that we are in the exception that he has just mentioned. Without good reasons shown, this Bill should not be taken from the hands of the promoter, who wants to drop it, and put it into the hands of another member of this House, but we believe that we have shown a good reason. Here is a Bill which has been before this House since the company was first incorporated, I think in 1890, and dragged her for the last 20 years.

An hon. GENTLEMAN—No.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Every two or five years it has been amended, and extended and explanations given. If I am not mistaken, it was in 1890 that it was first introduced here. Now, the committee has seen fit to establish certain rules, and put some limitations and safeguards around certain Bills that threatened to invade the franchises of the city of Montreal. These safeguards the promoters of the present Bill accepted with eagerness—some said with indecent eagerness. Some said in committee, with indecent eagerness—because it was felt by a certain number of gentlemen of that committee that those amendments were accepted there in order to create a precedent for the Bill that was to follow. My hon. friend from Halifax says that the Bill that is before this House, returning from the committee, is not in possession of the House to be dealt with as the House pleases; yet he will not deny the fact that those very gentlemen, the promoters of this Bill, can go before the Quebec legislature, and petition to amend the charter of the city of Montreal for their own purposes, or for the general interests of the citizens of Montreal. The only difference would be in the fact that the deposit would have to be made by the promoters. The promoters have come to parliament. They have deposited their $200. The Bill has passed through the House—through the two branches of the House, it has passed through the committee of this House; it has there stood amendments which were accepted by the promoters in the interests of the public, and I say that we are in possession of the Bill and can deal with it, and transfer its direction and promotion to another member of this House.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—I take exception to what has been said by the hon. senior senator from Halifax in regard to the position of this Bill. He seems to assume that a Bill may be withdrawn by the promoters at any stage and under any conditions. It does not appear that that is the regular procedure. When an amendment to a Bill has been objected to in committee, and the promoters of the Bill have then stated that they wished to withdraw the Bill, the procedure, as I understand it, is that the committee makes a report to the House to that effect, and then the House decides that the promoters shall have leave to withdraw the Bill. But I maintain that it is open to the House to adopt or reject that report. On this question, I might refer to a ruling given at page 46 of Blackmore's Speakers' Decisions Edition, 1857-84, in which it was stated:

> It is not competent to withdraw a Bill when an amendment is before the House postponing further procedure on such a Bill to a subsequent date, unless the said amendment be withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Will the hon. gentleman kindly state whether that was a public or a private Bill?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—It does not say.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It was a public Bill.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—It was a Bill regarding registration.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Certainly; that is a public Bill. A voters Bill is not a private Bill.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—If there is objection to that authority, here is another. On page 28, Peels Decisions:

> On a motion to adopt, on the order for resuming the debate, it is not competent to withdraw a Bill. Before it can be withdrawn, the motion must be withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. POWER—What kind of a Bill is that?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—That was a Bill referring to the boards of guardians of Ireland.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Another public Bill.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—Then if that authority does not suit the hon. gentleman, I might be allowed to read a matter that came before the Senate on a former occasion when an hon. member of the Senate, in dealing with the same question about the withdrawal of a Bill, referring to the question as to whether a Bill could be withdrawn, said: 'I forgot to say that the member in charge of the Bill,' the hon. member referred to, is the hon. senator from Halifax.

Hon. Mr. POWER—What was the Bill?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—The Winnipeg and North Pacific Company's Railway Bill. I shall read from page 516 of the Senate Debates, May 14, 1886. The question in regard to procedure was brought up, and the hon. gentleman said:

> I forgot to say that the hon. member in charge of the Bill requested and desired to withdraw it. My opinion is that after a Bill has been introduced, and certainly after having been read a second time, and referred to a committee, is not the property of any member but of the House.

Now, apparently, the hon. gentleman has seen cause to reconsider that decision.

An hon. MEMBER—It is a free country.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—Then again, some attention should be paid to a quotation given by the hon. senator from De Salaberry when dealing with the question that was put, which referred to the 18th clause of chapter 1 of the Interpretation Act, which says:

> Every Act shall be so construed as to reserve the power to repeal, amend, revoke, restrict, or modify any power or privilege thereby vested in or granted to any person whenever such repeal, amendment, revocation, restriction or modification is deemed by parliament to be required for the public good.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I take the ground that this amendment is deemed by this House to be for the public good, and, on that account, the question of allowing the promoters to withdraw the Bill is one that we should very seriously consider, and I think that the point raised by my hon. friend, the hon. gentleman from Halifax, is not correct on this occasion.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to make an explanation.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Has the hon. gentleman a right to speak a second time?

Hon. Mr. POWER—He has a right to make an explanation. It will be observed that that speech was made in 1886, when I was just about as young in the House as the hon. gentleman from Victoria division is now.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I hope you had as much sense.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is a question which I am satisfied to leave to the judgment of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—And the country, too.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The Bill that was before the House at that time was the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway Company's Bill. That scheme was one to which I was bitterly opposed, and, in opposing it, I used every argument which suggested itself. In the course of twenty-four years, I think I have gained some little wisdom, and have changed my opinion.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—It has been contended that there are no precedents for the course I have taken. In the famous Baie des Chaleurs case, the Bill was sent to a select committee, and that committee thought proper to make an investigation. The promoter, in order to avoid the investigation, asked leave to withdraw his Bill. The committee refused to let the promoter of the Bill withdraw it, and the committee made a report to the House to that effect. A long and very interesting discussion took place on the question of the withdrawal of the Bill. Some half dozen senators expressed the opinion that the Bill was in the possession of the Senate, and that they had a right to refuse their consent to the withdrawal of the Bill when there were good reasons. The hon. gentleman cites the opinion of Sir John Abbott, who at that time occupied a high position in the Senate. Some of my hon. friends say that if a private member chooses to withdraw his Bill when it is in committee, there is no objection; but the committee must report the fact. I do not understand the law that way. Sir John Abbott says:

> My hon. friend will find in the language read that it is stated with the same positiveness what the House will do as what the committee will do. It states that the House, upon the report will order the withdrawal of the Bill. I think it is merely stating the ordinary practice; but I do not understand that it lays down a law that on all occasions must be obeyed, but I look upon it as being very much like the precedent to which my hon. friend alludes.

There you have the opinion of Sir John Abbott that there are circumstances under which parliament has the right to refuse consent to the withdrawal of a Bill. I could cite opinions of many other members of the House. The Hon. Mr. Poirier took the same position, and was very strong. Then the Hon. Mr. Miller said:

> Some hon. gentlemen with all the confidence of wisdom and knowledge in their countenances and actions, tell this House that the Bill is not before the Senate—that it was withdrawn by the mere fact of the request of the promoters in the committee. I say it is almost an insult to the intelligence of hon. gentlemen to attempt to answer such an absurdity as that. A motion was made for leave to withdraw the Bill, which motion was refused, and the Bill is therefore in exactly the position it was the first day it was sent to the committee.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Was that a motion or a Bill?

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I am quoting a speech made by Senator Miller during the debate on the Baie des Chaleurs Railway Bill.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Was he dealing with the Bill or a motion?

Hon. Mr. DAVID—He was dealing with the Bill. To show that there are precedents, I will cite another. In the House at Quebec, 1856, the Speaker ruled that in his opinion a Bill which has been abandoned by its promotor belongs to the House and can be taken up by any other member. That is a precedent which means something. Mr. Cushing, who is so highly esteemed by some hon. members of this House, says on page 906:

> The motion to withdraw a Bill (unlike a motion for leave to withdraw a motion, which cannot be debated, and requires the unanimous consent of the House) is made, debated, and decided upon like other motions made in the progress of a Bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is a public Bill.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I do not think it is necessary to add anything more to what has been said. It is clear that the House has a right to do what we are asking for.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to say a word—

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I rise to a point of order. The hon. member from Halifax has already spoken several times. This discussion is certainly very interesting and edifying, but as one of the Nestors of this House, I would beg to make an appeal that the question should be settled without further discussion in order that we may go on with the very serious business we have near the end of the session. I move the adjournment of this debate, which is out of order at any rate.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I just wish to say—

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has spoken more than his turn. I ask for a ruling.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I merely wish to explain—

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I insist upon my point of order, that the hon. gentleman from Halifax has spoken more than once, twice or three times.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I propose to wind up by moving the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The hon. gentleman has no right to make such a motion, since he has spoken two or three times.

The SPEAKER—The hon. Mr. Poirier has the floor.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Then I move the adjournment of the debate.

The SPEAKER—Till when?

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—For six months.

The motion was declared lost.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I call the attention of the House to the fact that the precedent cited by the hon. gentleman from Mille Iles, does not apply to this case at all. True, the Baie des Chaleurs Bill was a private Bill, and permission to withdraw the Bill was refused; but, as it was well established in the discussion which took place afterwards, there was a large public interest involved, the squandering of public money, and the House took up that question as it was coupled with the Bill. The refusal to allow the withdrawal of the Bill was not on account of the Bill itself, but of the circumstances under which it came before this honourable House. All our friends, the Liberals, spoke against the contentions which are now invoked by the hon. member from Mille Iles. Why should such a change have taken place? What personal interest has the hon. member to step in and take the place of the promoter of the Bill, when those who are interested in the Bill do not want to go further? What is his interest? Does he pretend here that he is a senator from the province of Quebec, or the clerk of the city of Montreal.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Both.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Not only the city of Montreal, but every municipality of Canada is interested in this Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If the Bill is withdrawn, what harm will it do to anybody? Suppose the Bill had not come up at all, what harm would be done?

Hon. Mr. DAVID—The company would be under the operation of its old charter, by which it is authorized to enter the city of Montreal without the consent of the municipality, while all other companies in Canada, either under federal or provincial charters, cannot enter the city of Montreal without the consent of the city. This company alone would not require the consent of the city.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But, if there was no Bill at all that would be the case, and what would be the remedy for the evil? Why does not the city of Montreal step in and present a Bill? Why does it take the money of the promoters of this Bill, who are paying for private legislation, and appropriate it for the public benefit? Is that fair or just? The city of Montreal is rich enough, and should be manly enough if they want to have these amendments passed by the Senate, to bear the expense of their own business, and not substitute themselves for the promoters of this Bill and benefit by the fees paid by them to advance their own interest. I hold in my hand a resolution passed by the promoters of this company lately. It is as follows:

The Montreal Central Terminal Company,
Board of Trade Building, Montreal.

Extract from minutes of meeting of directors of the Montreal Central Terminal Company, held on Monday, April 25, 1910.

Whereas, the company has made financial arrangements in London for the carrying out the undertaking entrusted to it by the parliament of Canada;

And whereas any action of parliament which would have the effect of taking away or diminishing the powers granted to it for that purpose would cause serious loss and trouble;

And whereas the proposed amendment to the company's Bill (No. 44) made by the Senate Railway Committee, was not asked for by the city council of Montreal, or its legal representatives, and is not in the interests of the city;

And whereas the company's original charter was approved by resolution of the city council, that the Bill of 1909 was approved by the city's legal representatives, and that the Bill of the present session was approved in the form it passed the House of Commons.

And whereas the company never accepted the amendment inserted by the Senate Committee, but gave immediate instructions to have the Bill withdrawn when they were informed of it;

Be it resolved:

That the members of the Senate of Canada be respectfully requested to refuse to reinstate the Bill respecting the Montreal Central Terminal Company upon the Order Paper, the said Bill having been withdrawn at the request of the company.

I certify the foregoing to be a true extract.

(Sgd.) J. M. SHANLY,
President.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Was the hon. gentleman present when the Bills came before the Railway Committee?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am not sure that I was. I could not say yes or no; but supposing I was, what about it?

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Those amendments were inserted in the two Bills, the Ottawa and Western Railway Company Bill, and the Montreal Central Terminal Company Bill, with the consent of the promoters, but when they saw that the other Bill contained amendments which would put them in a more secure position than they themselves were, they tried to withdraw their Bill.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—On the authority of rule 43, I hereby ask that the motion before the House be now read.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think there is a rule that you cannot interrupt the speaker.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I rose after the hon. gentleman from Mille Iles sat down, and before the hon. gentleman had the floor.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I sat down to allow the hon. gentleman to put a question. The hon. gentleman says the lawyers for the promoters of the Bill accepted the amendments. That may be, but I am giving you the decision of the promoters of the Bill themselves. They say: 'Whereas the company never asked for the amendments inserted by the Senate committee, but gave it immediate instructions to have the Bill withdrawn.' When those amendments were accepted in committee, no doubt the lawyers who were there and accepted the amendment might have thought it was a good amendment; but it was not as good an amendment as one might think, because the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry had an amendment himself to propose to these amendments, thereby asserting that the work of the committee was not perfect, and that he wanted it perfect by adding a new amendment. This was not accepted by the promoters, and I prove it was not accepted by the promoters by the official declaration of the company. I fail to see what is the real interest that prompts my hon. friend to step into the place of the hon. member who is in charge of the Bill in this House. He never gave us any reason. It is not because he is the clerk of the city corporation of Montreal that he could do so. It is our duty to care for and defend the interests of all, and promoters should have leave to withdraw their Bills when they ask permission to do so.

It was pointed out in the decision of the Speaker, as everybody knows, that if the House is in possession of a private Bill any adverse party in this House could introduce clauses that would be ruinous to the interests of the promoters. If the hon. gentleman from Mille Iles had a private Bill in this House, and he desired to withdraw it because an amendment had been inserted which would ruin him, does he think he would not have the right to withdraw the Bill? This is the question which is now before the House. The hon. gentleman asked leave to take the place of the party who withdraws the Bill; but if the decision given by the acting Speaker has been accepted, it came after the vote of the House refusing to allow the withdrawal of the Bill. It is a subsequent act, and that subsequent act destroys the former one. It is precisely because we are in possession of a motion that the House was appraised of the intentions of the promoters. It was because of that the subsequent motion became irregular. In the face of that, the decision was given, and the Bill was ruled out of the orders of the day. How could the hon. gentleman go on with the Bill now and replace it on the orders in charge of another party if he does not take the proper means to restore that Bill before the House? He has to take the place of another in the conduct of the Bill, and there is really no such Bill at the present moment. He must make a motion to rescind the decision of the House, because the decision of the Speaker is the decision of the House. When the decision of the Speaker is not appealed from, it is the decision of the House, and the House has no right——

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—Is the hon. gentleman appealing from the Speaker's decision?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I did not make myself clear enough, and I will try to make myself more clear by offering further remarks.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? He has just stated that a decision of the Speaker is a decision of the House. Can a decision of the House over-ride a decision of the Speaker?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Not always.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Explain.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It can when it is taken in the proper time, but when there is no appeal taken, the decision of the Speaker is the order of the House. The House tacitly accepts the decision, and it becomes the decision of the House.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—As the hon. gentleman is master of the rules, and I want to get a profound knowledge of them, can the Speaker over-ride the decision of the House by a subsequent decision?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Yes.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Then please explain.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Yes. I have just quoted the decision of the House of Commons, which was that it being two or three minutes of a quarter to six they decided that the debate should proceed. This is at page 884, of the Minutes of proceedings of the British House of Commons, and is as follows:

Division overriding standing orders.
A division of the House cannot over-ride a standing order.
Affirmation Bill: Second reading.
Order for second reading read. Debate.
And then Mr. Crawford, a member, moved the adjournment of the debate.
It being within a minute of a quarter to six, at which hour all debates or opposed matters must cease on Wednesday, the House divided. Yeas, 50; nays, 183.
Mr. SPEAKER said: That the House on a division just taken had expressed an opinion that the debate should not be adjourned, but there was a standing order more imperative, which directed that at that hour any business under discussion should stand adjourned, whereupon it being a quarter of an hour before six o'clock Mr. Speaker adjourned the debate till to-morrow, against the decision which had just been given by the House of Commons.

Is that explanation clear?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—It was not the Speaker's decision. It was the standing orders.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It was the Speaker's decision. He decided in the face of the vote which had just been taken, that the debate should be adjourned. If they had appealed from that decision, I do not know what would have taken place; but I know that that decision of the Speaker over-ruled the decision of the House; so I am right in saying that in some instances, and this is one, the decision of the Speaker may over-rule the decision of the House, and when the decision of the House was given in that case, I do not contend that the decision was a bad one. The hon. gentleman asked leave to withdraw the Bill and the House refused; but as soon as the House refused it was manifest that the question of the withdrawal of the Bill was before the House, and that question being before the House precisely by a decision given by the House, then, as a consequence, when the first motion was made to go on with the Bill it became a motion out of order, because the desire of the promoters to withdraw was known to the House, and I quoted at that time what is parliamentary law, and what is found on page 827 of May, where he says:

> The committee having thus reported that the parties did not intend to proceed with their Bill, notice was given of a motion to recommit the Bill.

That was just the case. The motion was made to adopt the amendment by the committee; but what was the ruling? May says:

> But Mr. Speaker ruled that such a motion would be out of order on the ground that a private Bill was the property of the promoters, and that the House could not compel them to proceed with it against their wish.

I suppose my hon. friend from La Prairie will accept May as an authority, and will accept an authority as good as Bourinot, a standard authority on those questions. That is the rule that the motion is out of order on the ground that a private Bill is the property of the promoters, and that the House could not compel them to proceed with it against their wish.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I rise to a point of order. I submit this entire discussion is out of order, that the motion of my hon. friend from Mille Iles is out of order.

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman cannot now interrupt to do that.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I can ask your honour's ruling, that the whole discussion is out of order, and we have no right to be seized of the question.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I assume that as soon as the point of order is decided I shall have a right to proceed?

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman from Stadacona has the floor, and is perfectly in order, and that is the only question we have to deal with now.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—But if the whole discussion is out of order, will the hon. gentleman be in order?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The point of order was raised as to this motion being in order, and it was decided by the Chair that it was in order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But the hon. gentleman might have another point.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I have another point, and it is that the whole matter is out of order ab initio; that there is no substance to the motion, and it is out of order from the beginning.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I rise to a point of order.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—The hon. gentleman from Mille Iles moved to take charge of a Bill that has no existence on our order paper. I therefore submit that the whole question, ab initio, is out of order and that we cannot raise any point of order subsequent to it, as the motion rests on a subject matter that has no existence in fact in this House.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—The point of order raised by the hon. member cannot be right.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Chair!

The SPEAKER—No objection was taken to the ruling at the time. I ruled on the point when the Bill was before the House, under the control of the House. Therefore the motion is in order.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER. I did not happen to be in the House when the ruling was made.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Now, I may be allowed to continue my speech. I was just trying to convince my hon. friend, when he ran away, that we overlapped——

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—We settled that.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I was quoting from May, when I was interrupted, but I do not want that quotation to be lost, and all those points of order. If the hon. gentlemen look at page 687 of May, they will find what is the nature of a private Bill, and what are the responsibilities attaching when dealing with private rights.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I rise to a point of order. With a view to raising this point of order, I should like to ask His Honour the Speaker, who, if any one, is in charge of this Bill at the present time?

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—The Bill is not on the order paper at all.

The SPEAKER—It does not need consent to ask leave to withdraw a Bill. I suppose the motion is for permission to transfer the charge of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I take the point of order that if the Bill is in charge of the hon. gentleman from Ottawa, my hon. friend from Mille Iles is entirely out of order. It is not for the transference of the Bill; it is that he be put in charge of the Bill; and we certainly have no practice or precedent, or authority whatever to take the Bill from one member, and hand it to another.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I think the point is not well taken, because the House only intervenes when the promoter of the Bill has asked permission to withdraw his Bill, and has expressed his desire to withdraw from promoting the Bill. It is upon this expression of desire by the promoter, that the House is now seized of the motion to replace the present promoter by another one.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But my hon. friend must not overlook the fact that until the House takes action in that direction, the hon. gentleman from Ottawa is still in charge of the Bill, and if the House refuses to accede to the request that he has made, then he has the right, not only by courtesy, but under the rules of the Senate to proceed with his Bill. There is certainly no authority or precedent or practice that I can see to prevent him. Now, we are proceeding upon the presumption that this Bill is a derelict, that my hon. friend from Ottawa has retired from it, that there is no master of the Bill, and no one to take charge if it. That is a false assumption.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (British Columbia)—It is on the table of the House.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The question I put, assumes the hon. gentleman from Ottawa to be still in charge of the Bill. Therefore, I rise to a point of order that the motion is entirely out of order on the ground that there is no Bill and no one in charge of it.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The House is proceeding on the fact that the Bill, of which the hon. gentleman from Ottawa was the promoter, disappeared from the order paper, and he does not move to have it replaced upon the order paper. It is, therefore, open to any other gentleman who is a member of this House to move for this purpose. Otherwise it would be sufficient for the hon. gentleman from Ottawa to remain silent, not to take action, and prevent any other member from moving in the matter.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I rise to a point of order. My hon. friend from De Salaberry is not speaking to the point of order before the Chair. He is assuming something that he has no right to assume. If the statement made by his honour the Speaker is correct, that the hon. gentleman from Ottawa is yet in charge of the Bill, then I ask on what authority does my hon. friend from Mille Iles ask this Chamber to take the Bill from my hon. friend from Ottawa, and assume the responsibility of taking charge of it himself? The hon. gentleman's motion presupposes a state of facts that really does not exist, and it is from that I take my point of order. He has presupposed the Bill to be a derelict—a Bill without a master, without any one in charge. The statement of his honour the Speaker controverts that. Then, if my hon. friend from Ottawa be in charge of the Bill, let him proceed with it, as he decided to do.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It is for the Senate to decide whether it will be the hon. gentleman from Mille Iles that shall take charge of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—If the member from Ottawa is the promoter of the Bill, I think the motion is in order.

The SPEAKER—I think the motion is in order.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then I have a right, having raised a point of order, to ask his honour the Speaker, to give his authority for the decision at which he has arrived. Am I to understand that if an hon. gentleman in this House is in charge of a Bill, and is recognized by his honour the Speaker to be in charge of a Bill, that a motion can be placed upon our order paper by some other hon. gentleman to take charge of that Bill?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Yes, if the hon. gentleman expresses a wish to withdraw.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—His Honour the Speaker has given a decision that such is the right of every hon. gentleman. I should like to know the authority by which his honour the Speaker arrives at that decision?

The SPEAKER—The way it strikes me is this: the Bill having been reported by the committee, comes to us with the amendments made while in committee. Upon that, another motion having come up before the Senate, the hon. gentleman in charge of the Bill asked leave to withdraw the Bill. The Senate determined against him—against granting the leave; it gave no leave to do so. That left the Bill, although standing in the name of the hon. gentleman from Ottawa, still in charge of the Senate. I do not know any reason why the Senate cannot authorize any step in reference to that. On a notice of motion having been given, to forward the Bill, I do not see why any step the Senate chooses to take cannot be taken to that end.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—If I understand——

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Question. A decision has been rendered.

Mr. CLORAN—I am in hearty accord with the decision of the chair.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Then the hon. gentleman has not a right to comment on the decision of the chair. The hon. leader of the opposition——

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—That is what I wanted to say myself.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman from Ottawa asked leave to withdraw the Bill——

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has no right to comment on the decision of the Speaker.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not commenting on the decision of the Speaker. I understood the decision, or thought I understood it, and I will ask the Speaker to correct me if I am wrong. The hon. member from Ottawa asked permission to withdraw the Bill. The position of the Senate is clear, that he should not have permission to withdraw the Bill, but did any vote of the Senate, declaring that he should not withdraw the Bill, remove the custody of it from the hon. member from Ottawa? It seems to me, if I understood it, the moment the House made that decision, the custody of the Bill remained in the hands of the gentleman who desired to withdraw it; but the Speaker said 'no.' Am I correct in that?

The SPEAKER—I do not at all withdraw the statement made. It appears to me that the Senate having determined as it did against the leave to withdraw, and no action being taken further, the Senate is entitled to say that the Bill shall be passed by our House; and if the promoters in charge of the Bill do not desire to go on with it, the Senate can make an order for the stages of the Bill, and this being one of the stages towards that end, notice has been given, and I have given my reasons for my ruling

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then I take another point of order growing out of that; it is, that the member is not in a position to promote any stage of the Bill. The motion is simply made by my hon. friend from Mille Iles to take charge of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—We have no right to assume that my hon. friend from Mille Iles is going to treat the Bill in any other way than my hon. friend from Ottawa treated it. If the decision of the Speaker be right, then to be consistent, let my hon. friend from Mille Iles move to advance the Bill whatever stage may be desired. That, it appears to me, would be the solution.

The SPEAKER—I have given distinctly what I desired to express. I refer to the decisions at page 193 of the 'Speakers' decisions in the Quebec legislature'.

And notice being taken that Mr. Rinfret dit Malouin had yesterday signified his intention to abandon the said Bill;

And the question being raised as to whether a member has the right to abandon the measure which has been advanced to the stage of the present one;

And the House having continued to sit until after twelve of the clock Sunday morning. Sunday, 24th December, 1876.

Mr. Speaker ruled that in his opinion a Bill which has been abandoned by its promoters belongs to the House, and can be taken up by any other member.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Pardon me one moment. Will his honour the Speaker be kind enough to tell the House whether that was a public or a private Bill?

Some hon. MEMBERS—It makes no difference.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes, we have a perfect right to know that.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—And will his honour the Speaker be good enough to inform the House if the hon. member from Ottawa abandoned the Bill?

The SPEAKER—As I understand from the hon. gentleman, he withdrew the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Withdrew, that is not abandoning it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I must urge his honour to tell us whether that was a public or a private Bill?

The SPEAKER—I am not prepared to say whether it was or was not, for to my mind it makes no difference whatever.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There is no question of order to settle. I have the floor. I am speaking to the motion of my hon. friend from Mille Iles. The decision of this House was that the hon. member from Ottawa should not have leave to withdraw from the Bill, or to abandon the Bill. He asked leave to withdraw, and they said: 'No, you cannot withdraw.' Well, if the House is supreme in its decision, my hon. friend is still in possession of the Bill. You cannot get out of that.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—What about your point of order?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—My point of order was sustained. The point of order I raised was this: The member from Ottawa having told the House that he wanted to withdraw from the Bill, the House was in possession of that Bill, and inasmuch as the House was in possession of that Bill, every subsequent move with regard to it became out of order. That is the point I raised. The House sustained me in that point of order. I was sustained not only by the Speaker, but by the House altogether, and the House decided. I hear the hon. gentleman from Kamloops (Hon. Mr. Bostock) saying no, or trying to say no—I do not hear him. Why not? I have even the authority to say that as the decision given by the Speaker was not appealed to the House, it is the order of the House. So we have the order of the House stating that there is no Bill on the orders of the day. If you say that order of the House is good for nothing, and that we must rely on the vote taken, what does the vote say? The vote says that the member for Ottawa is still in possession of the Bill. Well, is he in possession of the Bill? The House says 'Yes.' My hon. friend says, 'The House says no.' How are we going to get out of that. If he is in possession of the Bill, my hon. friend from Mille Iles has no right to interfere. If he is not in possession of the Bill, where is the Bill? There is no Bill on the order of the day, and my hon. friend also becomes out of order. Another thing my hon. friend should have done was to make a motion to replace the Bill on the orders of the day. That is the only sensible motion that he should have made. Why did he not move for that? He tries to act when there is no Bill. My hon. friend from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) says the Bill is in possession of the House, and any member may step in and make a motion to the effect that the Bill be replaced on the orders of the day. That is quite right; but he must give a notice of motion, and I suppose it is for that reason he now makes that motion, that the Bill be made an order of the day. But we are trying to get out of that difficulty, and my hon. friend is trying to mix up the question in such a way that nobody can understand it afterwards. We must not forget that the House had decided by order that permission should not be given to my hon. friend to withdraw the Bill, I suppose my hon. friend from Mille Iles understands now in what position he is. He sees that the Bill is in the hands of my hon. friend from Ottawa, and that he has no right to try to assume the powers that have been given my hon. friend from Ottawa; and I suppose that the hon. member becomes in charge of the Bill. Suppose by the vote of this House that my hon. friend is put in charge of the Bill. What will come next? The promoters will say, 'We do not own you. Then give us back our money.' Are you going to take the promoters' money and use it for the city of Montreal? If the promoters say, 'We came here as promoters of the Bill. We put in the money and you have no right to put hands on that money, you have no right to take our money. That we disallow.' Will the hon. gentlemen come here and press that Bill on this House against the will of the promoters? Where is the public interest that would justify my hon. friend in taking such a position? My hon. friend cannot point to any public interest affected by it. It is a private Bill. The hon. senator gave arguments against the passing of the Bill instead of giving arguments in favour of withdrawing the Bill. He said the city of Montreal would be in a very awkward position if the Bill were withdrawn. If there was no Bill at all, what would be the position of Montreal? I see the hon. gentleman understands now in what position he is himself, and I hope, with the leave of the House, he will withdraw his motion and we will show him that we are able to give heed to the hon. gentleman when he asks us to withdraw his motion. But if he persists in putting his motion to the vote, we shall have recourse to every means to defeat it. There are other points of order which can be raised which have not yet been raised. I have here all the decisions of the Speakers of the House of Commons. There are two volumes. The second one is called the second edition by my hon. friend, while I tell him it is not the second edition. It is the second volume. It being six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY rose to resume the debate:

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—May I be permitted to make a suggestion with regard to the question which was before the House this afternoon. My suggestion is that the hon. gentleman from Mille Iles withdraw his motion, which is now before the House, and I will move that the Bill be placed upon the order paper for consideration of the amendments made by the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours to-morrrow.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Would the hon. gentleman be willing to give it one stage, and put it down for third reading to-morrow, in order that the amendment which the hon. member from De Salaberry wants to move, and which he could draft this evening in conjunction with the hon. gentleman and the promoters, shall be discussed and framed to the satisfaction of the promoters? I throw out the suggestion because there is a possibility that the amendment of which the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry gave notice might perhaps be made satisfactory in a large measure to the promoters of this Bill.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—It would be irregular at this juncture to suggest that it be done now. Is it not better to reinstate the Bill on the order paper?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I thought if the hon. gentleman would consent to advance it one stage now, and set it down for third reading to-morrow, notice of the amendment could be given before we adjourn.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—Is it not better to dispose of the report of the committee and afterwards proceed?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—We can dispose of the report of the committee forthwith.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—Must not the Bill be reinstated on the order paper first?

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the suggestion of the hon. gentleman from De Lorimier is to be taken into consideration, I understand it is that the amendment reported by the committee is to be modified in such a way as to perhaps meet the requirements of the promoters. If we adopt the report now, we cannot do that.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND. You can do that at the third reading.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That would be a most irregular proceeding, to make an amendment now and alter that amendment to-morrow. A better way is to have the matter settled to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If I understand my hon. friend from Ottawa, he is prepared to revive the Bill by a motion to be made now. If that revival takes place, then the Bill will be on the order paper, and it will come up regularly to-morrow for the adoption of the report, because we can object on account of no notice having been given; but we are ready to suspend the rules if we come to an understanding. If the motion of my hon. friend comes up to-morrow and the parties agree on the nature of the further amendment that the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry wants to move, there will be no objection to a suspension of rules. The Bill will be as quickly disposed of to-morrow by suspending the rule, and no objection will be taken.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—To-morrow the objection may be made. The amendments can be made to the report, and it can be sent back to the committee.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That will not advance it.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—If we are to proceed by agreement, we had better understand the agreement.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY. That is what we are trying to get at.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Why not proceed, as we have done in a number of cases when it is understood that an amendment is to be made—we defer it, as a rule, to the third reading. Then at the third reading I will have stated the nature of the amendment.

The SPEAKER—If the report be put down for adoption to-morrow, and it be then adopted, the amendment can be made then, or at the third reading, so that the whole business, I understand, will be completed to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—With that understanding I suppose the hon. gentleman withdraws his motion?

Hon. Mr. DAVID—With that understanding, I beg leave to withdraw the motion.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—To make the thing regular, let the hon. gentleman withdraw his motion and then move his other motion, and my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Edwards) motion will come in as an amendment. There is no need for a notice of the amendment.

The SPEAKER—With that understanding, and with the leave of the House, the hon. gentleman from Mille Iles requests permission to withdraw his motion.

Hon. Mr. POWER—To keep the procedure right; if the hon. gentleman from Mille Iles withdraws his motion, where are we at? As I understand, the Bill is not here. The hon. gentleman from Rockland should make his motion as an amendment to the motion of the hon. gentleman from Mille Iles. If that carries, it is all right and no question can be raised about the regularity of the proceeding.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There is no objection to taking that course with the consent of the House. Because his amendment is not germane to the motion made by the hon. member; but it would be germane to the second motion. It is for that reason I suggest that the hon. gentleman should withdraw his first motion, then move the second motion and let the hon. gentleman from Rockland (Hon. Mr. Edwards) move his as an amendment.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—If both motions are withdrawn, we shall have removed from our records two motions without any determination or declaration as to their standing. That will be so much cleared off. If it is the unanimous wish of the House that the order be reinstated and that the proceedings shall be carried on to-morrow in conjunction with this Bill, then you will have only the usual record to make in the journals of the House, and it strikes me it will improve our journals to have it carried out in that shape. I agree with my hon. friend that it is better to get these two motions out of the way.

The SPEAKER—With the leave of the House, the motion of the hon. gentleman is withdrawn, and the notice of motion is also withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS moved that the Bill be placed on the orders of the day for to-morrow for the consideration of the amendments made to it by the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—To be the first order after the third reading.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There is the Naval Bill which we may not reach to-night, which should have precedence over any Bill of this kind.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—If the House will consent to concur in the amendments made in this Bill by the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, we can place the Bill for third reading to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I cannot agree to that. I am quite willing to do this as a member of the House; if the hon. gentleman from Mille Iles and the promoters of this Bill can agree upon some modification of the amendment, then I am quite prepared to let every rule be set aside for the purpose of carrying out their intention, but having taken the ground that I have all along with respect to this particular amendment, I feel that I should be stultifying myself in voting for it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—We should put the order for the first after the third reading, and if an agreement be reached as to an amendment, we may adjourn it later.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It has been suggested that if the proposed amendments be agreed upon between the parties interested, the order should take first place after third reading.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the hon. gentleman gives notice to-night to suspend the rules, he can have it on the third reading list to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—If the same spirit should animate the Senate to-morrow that animates it to-day, we will be all day to-morrow discussing it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It is possible that prorogation will take place early next week, and I therefore move, with the consent of the House, that when the House adjourns to-night it do stand adjourned until 11 a.m., to-morrow, and that there be two sittings, the first from 11 to 1, and the second from three o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (101) An Act to provide for the investigation of Combines, Monopolies, Trusts and Mergers.—Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

Bill (25) An Act respecting the Water-carriage of Goods.—Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

Bill (192) An Act to amend the Fisheries Act.—Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

Bill (198) An Act to amend the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907.—Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

RIPARIAN RIGHTS ON TIDAL WATERS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

1. Has the Supreme Court pronounced upon the rights of riparian proprietors on each side of rivers where the tide makes itself felt?
2. In what sense?
3. Has the judgment of the Supreme Court been ever set aside by any tribunal?
4. Until it is, what value may it have, and does the government consider itself as bound to accept it in the sense which it has been given?
5. What are the names of the persons who have obtained from the federal government fishing licenses in the rivers where the tide makes itself felt?
6. What are the names of the persons to whom the government has refused such licenses?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follow:

1. Some of the rights of riparian proprietors are dealt with incidentally in the Fisheries Case,—Supreme Court Reports, Volume 26, p. 444 et seq.,—but there is no decision of the Supreme Court dealing specially with the rights of riparians on tidal portions of rivers.

2. The case must be consulted.

3. The decision was taken on appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council; but the rights of riparians in tidal waters is not dealt with in the judgment of the Privy Council.

4. The value assigned to it by the Statute 54 and 55 Victoria, Chapter 25, section 4.

5 and 6. The applications received last year numbered over five thousand. It would not therefore be possible to give the desired information in answer to questions.

EXAMINATION OF PILOTS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

1. Do the regulations made or approved by the government for the use of the pilots of the river St. Lawrence impose the obligation on pilots to undergo annually a medical examination for the purpose of assuring them as to the efficiency of their sight?
2. At what precise time of the year must this examination take place?
3. Where must they be held?
4. By whom must they be made? By an ordinary doctor or by an oculist?
5. By whom were they made last winter, and what date?
6. Does the government receive a certificate respecting this examination?
7. What are the dates of the reception by the government of the different reports made this year on such examinations?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follow:

1. Yes—For Quebec by-law sec. 21. For Montreal sec. 17.

2. March, April and May.

3. For pilots below Quebec at Quebec, for pilots above Quebec not stated.

4. At Quebec by the Examiner of Masters and Mates—At Montreal by oculist, not an ordinary doctor.

5. At Quebec by Captain Demers, Chief Examiner of Masters and Mates and Doctor Pagé. At Montreal by Doctor Duhamel and Captain Demers.

6. Yes.

7. 19th April.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

APPOINTMENTS ON MARINE SERVICE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

Is it the intention of the government to appoint competent sailors to occupy the new positions created by the establishment of the new department of the Marine Service?
How many employees is the service of this new department going to require?
What will be, approximately, for the twelve months of the first year at least, the cost of such service?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follow:

1. Yes, where technical knowledge of a naval service is required.

2. Civil government, 28; headquarters staff, 6; dockyard staff, 54; naval college staff, 54; officers and crews, &c., 'Niobe' and 'Rainbow,' 530—total, 672.

3. Approximately $3,000,000.

TELEGRAPH BILL.

FIRST AND SECOND READINGS.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE presented Bill (OOO) An Act to correct an error in chap. 126 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, entitled an Act Respecting Telegraphs.

The Bill was read a first time.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE moved the second reading of the Bill. He said: The object of the Bill is merely to correct an error in the statutes at the time of the coming into force of the Revised Statutes. My attention was called by the Law Clerk to the matter, and it was mentioned in committee the other day, and he prepared a short Bill and placed it in my hands. In 1875, an Act was passed which is chap. 26 of the statutes of that year, entitled: 'An Act to Regulate the Construction and Maintenance of Marine Electric Telegraphs.' There was no legislation of that kind before that in regard to telegraphs. When the Revised Statutes of 1886 were put into force, a wrong wording was adopted, and the same wrong wording was adopted in chapter 126 in our Revised Statutes of 1906 in this way. Section 17 of chapter 126 provides that this Act shall apply to every company:

(a) Hereafter authorized by any special or general act of the parliament of Canada under the provision of this act to construct or maintain telegraph wires or cables, or so forth.

(b) Authorized to construct or maintain such telegraphic wires or cables before the 8th April, 1875, by any special or general Act of the parliament of Canada.

Before 1875 there was no general Act. It was regulated by special Act in every case. So that the general Act came in force only on the 8th April, 1875, and by adopting this wording the consequence is it would leave a gap between coming into force of the Revised Statutes of 1906, and the date of 8th April, 1875. There is a complete gap and no provision at all for constructing any telegraph line by a company incorporated within that period. The Bill prepared by the Law Clerk is very short. It reads as follows:

Section 17 of the Telegraph Act, chap. 105 revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, is hereby repealed and amended by substituting for the words 'hereinafter authorized' in the first line of paragraph (a) thereof the words 'authorized after the 8th day of April, 1875'.

This Act shall be construed as if it had been passed under date of March, 1887, the date on which the Revised Statutes of Canada came into force.

The draft Bill was shown to the Post Office Department and received their approval.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

THIRD READING.

Bill (124) An Act respecting the Eastern Canada Manufacturers Mutual Fire Insurance Company as amended.—Hon. Mr Frost.

Bill (123) An Act respecting the Central Canada Manufacturers Mutual Fire Insurance Company.—Hon. Mr. Frost.

Bill (197) An Act to amend the Post Office Act.—Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

Bill (115) An Act to incorporate the St. Lawrence Power Transmission Company, Limited.—Hon. Mr. Watson.

Bill (104) An Act to control the rates and facilities of Ocean Cable Companies and to amend the Railway Act with respect to the Telegraphs and Telephones, and the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners.—Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

Bill (MMM) An Act for the relief of James Alexander Hurst Forster.—Hon. Mr. De Veber.

NAVAL BILL.

DEBATE ON SECOND READING RESUMED.

The order of the day being called:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion for the second reading (Bill 95) an Act respecting the Naval Service of Canada.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—When my right hon. friend presented this measure to the House yesterday, I had some hope that he would have presented it with such argument and speech of which he is a most forceful master. I was, therefore, much disappointed when I ascertained from my right hon. friend that he did not consider it necessary to state the reasons which led to the government adopting a policy of such far-reaching consequences as that involved in the Bill. To my mind, this measure is one of the most important that has been introduced into parliament since confederation. It involves the entry of Canada upon a policy which, up to two years ago, would have been derided by the present government. It involves Canada stepping out from its local status and entering the lists of naval powers, of assuming enormous expenditures, and national obligations such as two years ago were not contemplated being assumed by Canada, in the near future. I therefore did expect that my right hon. friend would have regarded it as desirable that the House should have been apprised of whatever good reasons may have presented themselves to the minds of the government for the adoption of such a policy. I presume that we may well attribute the genesis of this Bill to Germany. I should like to make a few observations as to the attitude of Germany with respect to the British empire, particularly that attitude which has led to the emergency so much discussed, and, therefore, the adoption of this policy. It is a well known fact that for more than a half century past, Germany has had dreams and aspirations looking to her becoming a dominant factor in not only European affairs, but in the affairs of the world. Long before the unification of Germany, before the Germanic empire was established, the German states dreamed of a policy to place its race in a position of dominancy through the arbitrement of war. There has been no period during the last half century or more, that Germany has not been on a war footing. With the object of carving out for herself this position of almost universal dominance, Germany in 1864 began a series of wars, and has scarcely hesitated down to the present time in making every preparation to meet any nation; in fact, to meet any nation or combination of nations that might dispute her position. Germany attacked and despoiled Denmark in 1864, she attacked and defeated Austria in 1866. In 1870-71, she picked a quarrel with France, and, as we know, levied an indemnity of £200,000,000 upon the empire of France, and in addition annexed two French provinces, Alsace and Lorraine. In 1905, France was again threatened unless she dismissed her foreign minister, and had it not been for the intervention of England, I have no doubt there would have been a repetition of the Franco-German war of 1870-71. We find Germany in 1909 menacing Russia with invasion unless she surrendered to Austria certain Baltic provinces. Thus we find Germany, down almost to the present time, consistently pursuing a policy of dominance in the world's affairs, and usually, almost invariably, so asserting herself as to secure recognition of the power she wields. In 1900, Germany seems to have awakened to the fact that in addition to her being, as she then was, the greatest military power of Europe, it was indispensable to the position which she occupied that she should become one of the greatest naval powers of Europe, and in 1900 was passed what was known as the Germany Naval Bill. There is a declaration in that Bill which outlines pretty fairly the object Germany had in view, and it reads as follows:—

> Germany must possess a battle fleet so strong that war with her would, even for the greatest naval power, be accompanied with such dangers as to render that power's position doubtful. For this purpose, it is not absolutely necessary that the German fleet should be as strong as that of the greatest sea power, because generally the greatest sea power would not be in a position to concentrate all her forces against her.

In conformity with the German Naval Bill of 1900, she proceeded to carry out her policy of building Dreadnoughts. In 1904, unfortunately for England, she departed from her policy of maintaining the two-power-standard-plus-ten-per-cent in naval force and which she had established and consistently maintained up to that time. It then became evident to Germany, as most of the hon. gentlemen will remember, that the Conservative government in Great Britain was threatened with defeat; that it was only a question of time before Mr. Balfour's government must make way for what was regarded then as the 'Little England Party'; and so much attention was given in Germany to the political situation that then obtained in England, it was not only felt, but it was absolutely known that the present Liberal government, upon its accession to office, then being led by Mr. Campbell Bannerman, would at once proceed to make a reduction of the Naval Estimates. I find a succinct statement, taken from the 'National Review,' of the attitude assumed by the British government at that time as to the reduction of its naval estimates. The facts, shortly stated, are these:

> When Sir John Fisher became First Sea Lord in October, 1904, the total expenditure upon the British navy in that year was forty million pounds against a total German navy expenditure of ten and a half million pounds. The strength in ships was about in the ratio of four to one. His first step was to drop fourteen destroyers which had been voted for the navy in 1904. The next year his first programme was submitted, calling for one battleship and four armoured cruisers of the Dreadnought type, and the estimates amounted to thirty-six million pounds. The personnel of the navy was reduced by two thousand men, and the outlay for ammunition by four hundred thousand pounds.

We then come to the introduction of what was known as the Cawdor Memorandum, indicating what the policy of the Liberal party in England at that time was, and would be with reference to a further reduction of armament, with the result that Germany increased her naval expenditures by 60 per cent, and laid down a programme of three Dreadnoughts annually instead of three comparatively small armoured cruisers. Sir John Fisher's response to this menace was a further reduction of expenditure in 1906, which amounted to £34,000,000 and the dropping of one of the large armoured cruisers voted in 1905.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Excuse me for interrupting. I got the impression from the observation the hon. gentleman made just now, that those reductions were the result of the government change in England; but I see that they followed immediately after Sir John Fisher's appointment as First Sea Lord. That was two years before the change of government.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, that policy was adopted by Sir John Fisher.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is hardly fair for the hon. gentleman to charge the new government with that.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I think so, because publicity was scarcely given to it until the Liberal government came into office, and I furthermore point out, that it was well known certainly two years before the defeat of the Balfour government that the days of that government were numbered. They no longer represented public opinion in England, and the prediction was freely made in 1904 that that government could not possibly remain in office until the expiration of its term of office. However, I am not so much concerned about that as in endeavouring to establish this fact, that there was an emergency produced largely by the facts I have stated; and I propose to show that the preparations which Germany has been making are for the purpose of building up a naval fleet to dispute the supremacy of British power on the seas. In 1907, the British expenditure was still further cut to £32,000,000. The Germans, as their challenge, in answer laid down 12 large destroyers in that year, whereas England built five. Germany also laid down five Dreadnoughts, and properly financed them, while the German government made plans for the further increase in the German fleet.

In the 'Tagblatt,' a prominent German publication, the view was expressed that the Liberal party would allow the navy to be so weakened that the Unionists, when they returned to office, would be unable to undo the mischief. Sir John Fisher's retort was to lay down only two Dreadnoughts, reducing the annual expenditure to £31,500,000, despite the fact that the tonnage of Germany's men of war had risen from 38,000 tons to 80,000 tons, and the German naval expenditures from £14,000,000 to £23,000,000. As soon as the British naval estimates of 1907 were known, German authorities took steps to augment their plants and financed extensions for Krupps, which will enable Germany to arm annually ten if not fourteen Dreadnoughts. Thus it will be seen that upon the reduction of the naval estimates by the British government, which policy seems to have been consistently carried out from 1904 to 1909, Germany accelerated the programme outlined in her Naval Bill, thus threatening, as I have said, to equal in Dreadnoughts the armament of Great Britain. It may strike us more forcibly when we consider that in 1896 the German battle fleet consisted of four small badly constructed thoroughly inferior ships, while the British navy consisted of from twenty to twenty-five battleships enormously superior, ship for ship, to those of the Germans. To-day, Germany has 18 fairly good battleships of the pre-Dreadnought type, and is building Dreadnoughts so rapidly as to make it a subject of controversy whether she or Great Britain will be in the lead in 1912. The Prime Minister, Mr. Asquith, speaking 17 Dreadnoughts. Mr. Balfour estimated that in March, 1912, Great Britain would have twenty and Germany would have 17 dreadnaughts. Mr. Balfour estimated that Great Britain would then have 16 and Germany 17. Mr. McKenna, speaking on this subject, said in the House of Commons, that the government had no reliable information as to how fast German construction was proceeding. Furthermore, Mr. McKenna said, 'There were then in Germany, with the possible exception of one or two slips, no proper yards, no slips capable of carrying a Dreadnought; to-day there are no fewer than 14 of such slips, and three more are under construction. What is true of the slips is also true of the guns, the armouries, and mountings, and as further evidence of the emergency which prevails, and which calls upon Canada to do something of an effective character, may I point to a statement made by Sir Edward Grey, Secretary for Foreign Affairs. Speaking in the British House of Commons, he said:—

First of all the House and the country are perfectly right in the view that the situation is grave. A new situation in this country created by the German programme. Whether that programme is carried out quickly or slowly the fact of its existence makes a new situation. When that programme is completed, Germany, a great country close to our shores, will have a fleet of 33 Dreadnoughts. That fleet would be the most powerful which the world has ever yet seen. It is true that there is not one of them in commission yet; but it is equally true that the whole programme comprises what I have said, and when completed the new fleet will be the most powerful fleet which the world has yet seen. That imposes upon us the necessity, of which we are now at the beginning—except so far as we have Dreadnoughts already—of rebuilding the whole of our fleet. That is what the situation is. What we do not know is the time in which we shall have to do it.

No superiority of the British navy over the German navy could ever put us in a position to affect the independence or integrity of Germany, because our arm is not maintained on a scale which unaided could do anything on German territory. But if the German navy were superior to ours, they maintaining the army which they do, for us it would not be a question of defeat. Our independence, our very existence would be at stake.

Thus, hon. gentlemen, we have the situation outlined in such alarming terms by the most reliable authorities in Great Britain, that no question should remain in the minds of those interested, either as British subjects or otherwise, as to the absolute necessity of the most effective steps being taken to ensure by a proper system of defence the integrity of the empire. We find that three great naval powers—Germany, England, and the United States—during the year 1909-10 have passed naval estimates of over £50,000,000 each for the building and the maintenance of their naval armaments. In view of those gigantic preparations one cannot hesitate in concluding that the position is one of great emergency, thus demanding the best attention and statesmanship which our government can give to so important a subject. Until 1909, the public mind of Canada was not aroused to the duty of participating in the defence of the empire. We find the Prime Minister when attending the imperial conference in London in 1907, absolutely opposing any such proposition as Canada contributing in any way to the defence of the empire, either for local or imperial purposes. I find upon the records that Mr. Smartt, who was the colleague of Dr. Jamieson, moved the following resolution at the imperial conference of 1907:

That this conference, recognizing the vast importance of the services rendered by the navy to the defence of the empire and the protection of its trade, and the paramount importance of continuing to maintain the navy in the highest possible state of efficiency, considers it to be the duty of the dominions beyond the seas to make such contributions toward the upkeep of the navy as may be determined by their local legislatures — the contributions to take the form of a grant of money, the establishment of local naval defence, or such other services, in such manner as may be decided upon after consultation with the admiralty and would as best accord with varying circumstances.

We find that the Prime Minister of Canada, who was present on that occasion, declining to discuss it, and saying in the end that those representing the other great self governing dominions of the empire might vote for it if they chose, but he would vote against it. Such was the attitude of Canada on this important question in 1907. This leads us up to the question as to what Canada, since that time has done to meet the present situation, and whether the measure introduced yesterday by my right hon. friend will effect the purpose for which it was apparently designed. To that consideration, I should like to address myself for a few minutes. The intention of this measure if we are to accept the statements of the government is to give effective help to the empire in this time of emergency, and to thus participate in the defence of the empire.

This question of participating in the defence of the empire must be regarded as the essential feature of the Bill, because, up to the imperial conference of 1907, this government, through its Prime Minister, expressed itself as not being in sympathy with our participating in the naval defence of the empire, even to the extent of undertaking any obligations involving the local defence of our own shores. Let us therefore consider whether this measure fully meets the emergency which has thus arisen, and which I have attempted to describe, by reason of the enormous preparations which are being made by Germany in building up its naval armament for the purpose, at an early day, of disputing the supremacy of England upon the seas. We had a profession on the part of the government to the British Admiralty that they were desirous of entering upon certain obligations with a view to assuming the duty of building up a fleet at the expense of Canada. The particulars are set out in the Bill before us. It is proposed to construct eleven ships. Three of them are to be unarmoured cruisers and the others of a smaller class. The recommendations of the Admiralty were not seriously regarded by the representatives of this government who went to England in 1909 to discuss the policy of details of the fleet with the Admiralty of Great Britain. They seemed to have had their own ideas as to the measure of defence upon which they would enter, and also the limit of expenditure. We find on the threshold of that conference this remarkable statement being made by representatives of our government:

> The supreme consideration is the constitutional freedom of the State, and to this question of strategy no matter how important, must be subordinated.

That seems to have been the starting point of the representations of the Canadian government in their entry upon the obligations of naval defence. The outcome of the deliberations which took place there, is, as I have said, the provision which is in the Bill before us. I do not think that any hon. gentleman present will seriously contend that this so-called Canadian fleet can be of any adequate service to Great Britain in time of war, or of efficient service at any time so far as strengthening the imperial fleet is concerned. It is proposed, I understand, to place half this fleet upon the Atlantic and the other half upon the Pacific. We have a double coast to defend, geographically covering about ten thousand miles. On each ocean we shall have practically half the ships yet to be built. Now may I ask the question of my right hon. friend, who did not favour us with any very elaborate explanation upon this Bill, if the government of Canada seriously contemplate that the half of this fleet on the Pacific or the half of it upon the Atlantic will be of any adequate service in repelling any enemy which may attack our shores? I apprehend that it is not the intention to have this fleet in its entirety upon either ocean, but to divide it. But even assuming that this fleet could be gathered in all its numbers to the extent of eleven ships upon either ocean, what enemy is this fleet going to repel? Is there any European enemy that will attack Canada either upon the Atlantic or upon the Pacific? If there be any such enemy which we are making provision to repel, that enemy would naturally be a first class naval power and one at war with Great Britain. It surely cannot be seriously considered that one-half of this fleet upon the Atlantic could repel a European power of any naval significance. In the next place what about the fleet upon the Pacific? It is not seriously contended that this fleet could withstand the attack of any Asiatic power. Are we making provision to defend our shores against any attack which Japan may make? We cannot seriously contemplate that this fleet, now or for many years to come, would be of sufficient weight to cope with the Japanese fleet.

In the next place, there is no base from which an Asiatic or a European power could operate on either ocean in attacking Canada. So that we may lay it down as axiomatic, that no Asiatic or European power can, within reason, attack the shores of Canada, for the simply reason that they have no base from which to operate. Therefore, in my judgment, the only nation that this fleet can be designed to repel would be the fleet of the United States. The United States is our only neighbour, the only naval power that could possibly attack Canada, and I do not think that we can seriously estimate for a moment that this government has entered upon building a fleet for the purpose of protecting its shores against the neighbouring nation. This fleet, small as it must be in both oceans, can only be an irritant and provocative of mischief so far as the United States is concerned. It seems to be almost absurd for one to discuss the probability of difficulties arising between these two branches of the Anglo-Saxon race. The British government, for many years past, have taken the position that the friendly relations between the two nations are such that they have not considered the United States in fixing their two-power standard against the other naval powers of the world. So remote would be the possibility of difficulties occurring between those two branches of the Anglo-Saxon race, that we may safely conclude that not only this government, but the British government would be entirely safe in accepting the risk, it being so remotely distant as to render war between the two impossible. From that standpoint, the government, in the various statements that have been made in the House of Commons and otherwise, has not advanced any good reason for the expenditure which is involved in the building of this fleet. It has been estimated that the cost of this fleet will be $58,000,000. I notice that Mr. Borden, leader of the opposition in the House of Commons, in discussing this matter, prepared a statement and placed it upon the table of the House, and asked the government of the day to check it over and to controvert it if possible. He estimated that even the present programme would cost the government of Canada for the next ten years at least $58,484,040, giving the details of the cost of up-keep in the purchase of vessels. The total was $58,484,040. This does not include the enormous expenditure which the government of Canada will enter upon in the immediate future, and the building up of dry docks, slips and other structures of that nature not only for the purpose of building this fleet, but for maintenance from time to time. Then I might point out in this connection that this will only be the initial expense of the undertaking upon which we have now entered. I noticed in the press the other day a statement made by a representative Englishman who had stated that of the 150 ships which were assembled in the Thames of last year, and which practically comprise the greater part of the British fleet, not one of those ships had been in the Portsmouth harbour at the coronation of the King. That is to say, the life of a war ship is so short that of an enormous fleet gathered in the Thames of 1909, not one of those ships had practically been in commission at the time of the King's coronation. Thus at the end of ten years for which Mr. Borden has estimated that the cost would be the amount which I have mentioned, our complement of ships would be ready for the scrap heap. I am not criticising the expenditure, provided we secure value for that expenditure, and I am answering myself the questions propounded to the House as to whether the expenditure is calculated to give value and to give efficient service, not only for the defence of our shores, but assistance to the British fleet in time of stress. I also ask is it the purpose of this fleet to help England in time of war? I venture to say that no hon. gentleman in this chamber will seriously consider for a moment that this fleet can be of any substantial service to Great Britain, either in time of peace or in time of war. There is such a consensus of opinion amongst all the naval experts of the world, I care not whether they be British or German, French or of other nationality, there is only one opinion, and that is that a fleet, to be effective, must look to one common centre and must be directed by one head. It must be all powerful and of unassailable supremacy, otherwise it can be of no effect. May I point out to hon. gentlemen some of the views expressed by well known authorities upon this subject. One writer speaking of it says:—

> The essence of modern naval strategy as universally admitted by experts, lies in the power of concentrated naval strength as opposed to a scattered naval strength. It is in defence to this principle that Great Britain has called in her far-flung battle line and concentrated 80 per cent of her naval strength in the North Sea. Any one of the naval units which Great Britain has called in from the seven seas would be infinitely superior in strength to the local navy which Canada proposes to establish. Yet here is Canada committed to a policy which adds nothing to the all important centralized naval strength and building up an isolated naval unit which British naval strategy declares to be useless appendage of effective naval power.

Hon. Mr. McKinna, first Lord of the Admiralty, speaking to the representatives of Canada at the recent conference says:—

> We cannot force our strategical ideas upon you; we should fail if we attempted to do so. If any dominion came to the admiralty at home here and asked us what our view as to the best assistance for the purpose of common defence which could be rendered, we should be ready with an answer, but we should not necessarily expect you to accept our answer. You will have your own views as to the proper development of defensive forces in your own dominions. It is only by your working out your own problems for yourselves that you can gain experience. Lessons told you by others will never come home to you with the same force as lessons which you have learned for yourselves.

Mr. Balfour speaking upon this subject says:—

The German ocean, the channel, and the neighbourhood of these islands, possibly the Mediterranean, those are the theatres in which, if there is to be an Armageddon, the Armageddon will take place, and it is impossible for us to attempt to dissipate those fleet continents so that when the time of crisis arises we shall not be able to have that concentration upon which the existence and the defence of each separate portion of the empire really depends. The fate of Australia, the fate of New Zealand, of Canada, South Africa, India, is not going to de decided in the Pacific, it is not going to be decided in the Indian Ocean; it is going to be decided here.

Speaking upon this subject may I refer to a statement made by the Prime Minister of Great Britain:—

If we were permanently to lose the command of the sea then whatever might be the strength and organization of our military forces, even allowing that you had an army like the army of Germany, whatever might be its strength and whatever might be its organization, it would not only be impossible that this country should escape invasion—invasion might not even be necessary—but the subjection of the country to the enemy would be inevitable. It followed from that proposition that it is the business of the admiralty to maintain our naval supremacy at such a point that we cannot lose the command of the sea and that against any reasonable possible combination that could be brought against us we must hold the sea and make invasion impracticable.

Speaking again on this point, the First Lord of the Admiralty, at the Conference in 1907, said to the representatives of Canada:—

The only reservation that the admiralty desire to make is that they claim to have the charge of the strategical questions which are necessarily involved in naval defence, to hold the command of the naval forces of the country, and to arrange the distribution of ships in the best possible manner to resist attacks and to defend the empire at large, whether it be our own islands of the dominions beyond the seas.

We cannot seriously contemplate for a moment that this fleet, distributed as it may be in the two oceans, half in the Atlantic and half in the Pacific, will contribute in any degree whatever to the strength of Britain's fleet. We find this string placed upon it, under the provisions of the Bill, that the fleet shall not be called into action except under authority of an order in council. Can we possibly conceive of a more grotesque situation than that which I have mentioned? Half of the fleet on the Pacific and half on the Atlantic. An invasion is not only threatened but made by the German fleet in the North Sea upon the concentrated British fleet; does any hon. gentleman think for a moment that any notice is to be given, that an exchange of courtesies between the two nations will take place, that diplomatic notes will be exchanged, to intimate that at a particular day and hour our enemy will meet us at a particular place? Not at all. We all remember most distinctly the attack which was made by Japan on the Russian fleet, of a most successful character, and which I venture to say hereafter in all naval strategy will be adopted by naval powers. My hon. friends may say that the approval of the admiralty was expressed as to the policy adopted by Canada. I admit that when the British authorities ascertained or discovered that Canada was intent upon not assuming the responsibility of building up a fleet unit, but of carrying out the share which our representatives at that conference outlined, polite congratulations took place; England expressed her satisfaction; diplomatic courtesies were exchanged, and we were told that the British Admiralty expressed its entire satisfaction at the policy adopted by this government. I need not say that we are not to take seriously the diplomatic courtesies which take place between the authorities or representatives of negotiating governments. Under the most unfavourable circumstances those courtesies are exchanged; but I venture to say there was the greatest measure of disappointment in England when it was ascertained that this country insisted upon carrying out its own views, concerning which it knew very little, upon great naval questions, and ignoring the views, the wishes, and the sentiments, not only I ly of the admiralty authorities in Great majority of our own people, but particularly of the Admiralty authorities in Great Britain. The constitutional question seemed to play an important part in the deliberations of our representatives at that conference. They seem to have gone from Canada to Great Britain tied hand and foot by the idea that our constitutional rights were to be invaded, and, as I before stated, their supreme consideration was the constitutional freedom of Canada, to which this question of strategy, no matter how important, must be subordinated. May I ask my right hon. friend in what way will this consideration play an important factor, or should play an important factor in determining an emergent situation such as that which at present faces us. Let us assume that we assert our constitutional rights as we always have been doing, and as we shall do until the end of time, I hope, what bearing has this on Canada rendering effective service in the strengthening of the British fleet at this critical time? Let us assume for a moment that Canada was right in so doing, but by reason of so doing she has contributed ineffectively to the purpose which it was designed to serve, and let us assume for a moment that owing to our refusal to participate in one imperial fleet, and our decision to adopt the separate national policy which we have entered upon, disaster overtakes the British fleet what would be the result of our so-called constitutional theory? It is simply a shadow, a phantom, an evasion to escape that responsibility which this government should have entered upon. Another view which should have been considered by the government is this, what will be the result of this policy? The logical results of a Canadian navy must be to produce in Canada ultimately a severance from Great Britain. It involves all the factors and qualities which go to establish self-containment, self-reliance, the consciousness that we are thrown upon our own responsibility.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—Is not that a good thing?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That we are building up a fleet for the purpose of defending our own shores entirely irrespective of the empire?

Hon. Mr. ROSS—No, No.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The hon. gentleman from Middlesex asks if that is not a good thing? I say, yes, it is a good thing, if that be the object for which it is built. If we have deliberately arrived at the conclusion that to establish a fleet so as to enter upon a policy of self-containment, that will and must bring about the severance of our relations from the empire, then to accomplish this purpose, I should say the building of a separate fleet is a good thing to effect such a purpose; but if the object of this country be to remain an integral part of the empire, to assume our share of the responsibilities of the empire and all the advantages which accompany it, then I say it is not a good thing. I say the whole tendency of the adoption of such a policy is calculated to ultimately cause Canada to cut adrift from the empire to which we now belong. The question arises what Canada should have done instead of what she is doing. In my judgment, it would not have been an unreasonable thing for Canada, recognizing the emergency which faces Great Britain, to have contributed a grant and to have discussed with the British government the desirability of having, say, a federal defence committee in which there would be representatives from the overseas dominions, so that one common policy should be carried out in the future as to one common fleet and one common policy of defence. This would have cost Canada less, I venture to say, than the expenditure on which we have entered; and it certainly would have contributed to strengthen the ties between Canada and the empire. On the whole, I think, this is an ill-digested, ill-considered measure, not calculated to have any immediate effect either in assisting Great Britain or being of any advantage to Canada. It is a policy into which this government has been stampeded. It is a compromise measure. It possesses, in my judgment, little or no virtue, and I venture to say that if it had possessed all the virtues which this government claim are embodied in the Bill, which we find mentioned in the Liberal press of the country, my right hon. friend, in presenting the measure, would have emphasized those merits instead of presenting the measure in comparative silence. Under these circumstances, I propose to move, seconded by the Hon. Mr. De Boucherville——

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—How many Dreadnoughts did the hon. gentleman say we should have contributed?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I did not state how many.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Perhaps the Hon. Mr. DeBoucherville may.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is a matter of opinion. Perhaps my hon. friend has very strong opinions on that point. I move:—

That this House is not justified in giving its consent to this Bill until it is submitted to the judgment of the country.

Later Mr. DeBoucherville will address some observations to the House in seconding the amendment.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—So much has been said on the Naval Service Act, that perhaps many of you may think the discussion should not be much prolonged; but, even at the risk of wearying this House I should like to place before you a few historical facts to prove the devotion and loyalty of the province of Quebec towards the British Throne, and also, if time would permit, to glance in a cursory way over the map of the world, and see why notwithstanding the alarming speech of the hon. leader of the opposition of this House, nearly all the best and strategic points on the face of the globe are painted red on that map. We deplore, I am sure, that this question has been treated elsewhere, and in the press of this country more in a partisan spirit than in the broad national spirit with which such a question should be approached by every true lover of the empire; but I hope that in this House, where we are far removed from the turmoil of political strife, and where many of us are advancing in age after years of service to the state, we may approach this question in a broad spirit of loyalty and show that at any rate the members of this House can think imperially. The question may be divided into two parts. The first, should Canada participate in imperial defence or should it not? If we decide this point in the affirmative, then it follows the answer to the second point is already given. That is, we should adopt the very best means of defence. The principle of participating in the defence of the empire is sustained by an overwhelming majority throughout this country, and if we may judge by the large majority given elsewhere for the adoption of this measure, we can decide at once that the principle of sharing in imperial defence by Canada, has been adopted by Canada.

Therefore, we have now to consider the best means to attain that object. It is strange that in many speeches that have been made on this most important subject elsewhere, and in the long articles which have been published in the press, so little reference has been made to a valuable work on this subject by an officer in the United States navy. This book is admitted to be one of the best, if not the best contributions on the subject of naval policy published for a great number of years. It has been recognized by naval authorities in Europe, and the naval authorities in this country will bear me out, as a standard work. I refer to the work of Captain Mahan on the influence of sea power upon the history of the world which has so largely contributed to shape the naval policy of European powers during the last decade. I commend the perusal of this standard work to hon. gentlemen of this House. There they will see that the growth or rise of the great British empire has followed the growth of the British fleet; that as England has obtained the supremacy of the sea she has become the paramount power of the world. If England should no longer be mistress of the seven seas, the empire is doomed, and I should like some of my fellow citizens to realize this ominous truth that if there is one portion of His Majesty's Dominion which would deplore the dismemberment of the British empire it is the province of Quebec. We are deeply attached, and justly so, to our religion, our laws, and our language, and we know that they have been jealously safeguarded under the British flag, and should any change of regime happen we are sure that no other flag would give us the generous support and protection that we have received from Britain for the last one hundred and sixty years. This explains the devotion of the French Canadian people in the defence of Canada, both in 1776 and in the war of 1812.

In 1776, to be more correct, on the 31st of December, 1775, Montgomery at the head of the United States army attempted to storm Quebec. Toronto, then called Little York, had fallen before the invader. Montreal was in the hands of the United States and I regret, after that long period, to have to say that the English speaking people of Montreal, the vast majority of them, and a few French Canadians fraternized with the invaders, but the French Canadian people, headed by their clergy, opposed the United States troops. A few days after Montreal and Three Rivers had surrendered, the only spot in Upper or Lower Canada over which the British flag still floated was the old city of Quebec. On that memorable night, when Montgomery stormed Quebec, he fell riddled by the bullets of the French Canadian militia, headed by Major Chabot. On the 26th of October, 1813, the memorable battle of Chateauguay was fought. Hampton with seven thousand United States troops was met by De Salaberry with three or four hundred French Canadians whom he had raised hurriedly for the war and who were entrenched on the shore of the Chateauguay river. Although young, De Salaberry had some knowledge of the art of war. Although only five and thirty years of age, he had served in the British army for eighteen years in Europe and in the West Indies. He managed by strategy with a little more than 300 men to repulse Hampton and his seven thousand men. The battle lasted four hours, and the enemy were routed. So eager were the French Canadians to make prisoners, that some of them swam across the Chateauguay river to capture more invaders. This shows that our province has ever been ready to do its duty. One might suppose that this was only due to their loyalty to England, but there was also a feeling of gratitude, and if hon. gentlemen will bear with me for a moment I will tell them of the noble treatment that the French priests, banished from France, received at the hands of the English people. The French Canadians could not help but contrast this with the cruel treatment by the leaders of the French revolution of their clergy whom they had either barbarously guillotined or banished. The exiles took refuge in several European countries. They were allowed to live within their borders, but to England alone belongs the credit not only of having welcomed the exiled priests with open arms, but actually inviting them to her hospitable shores.

1. In 1794-5 there were no less than 8,000 French ecclesiastics in England alone who had been driven from France and in response to England's generous invitation had sought refuge within her hospitable shores. The celebrated orator Edmund Burke ever ready to espouse the cause of the persecuted, made a stirring appeal on behalf of the unfortunate exiles. His unrivalled eloquence and the excellence of the cause he was pleading had a magical effect on every class of the community.

A national fund was opened under the august patronage of His Majesty King George III., and the Protestant Archbishop of Canterbury, the Primate of all England. Subscriptions poured in from every part of the country and soon the fund reached the almost incredible total of £440,000, a sum which to-day, taking into account the value of money then and now, would certainly be equivalent to at least $5,000,000. In fact so liberal had been the subscriptions that it was found possible to pay the bishops a regular stipend of £10 a month and to all the priests a sum of £2 a month.

2. The French priests had been despoiled of everything before being banished from France. They were absolutely destitute when they landed in England. The first care of the nation was to provide them with some shelter and here again His Majesty the King, set a noble example. He caused his royal palace at Winchester to be thrown open for the accommodation of the French priests, where some 700 priests remained for considerable time. The nobility was not slow to follow such a magnificent example of royal hospitality. Many noble families were glad to have as their honoured guests the French exiled priests.

3. But the crowning act of generosity came from that great seat of learning, Oxford University. The nation had provided for the temporal wants of these exiles. The university thoughtfully provided for their spiritual wants. The French priests had been so thoroughly stripped of all their belongings that they did not even possess that most indispensable book The New Testament. Oxford, though a Protestant university, actually printed for them, at its own expense, a French translation of the Vulgate. Four thousand copies were distributed gratuitously to these poor priests at the entrance of the little Catholic chapel At Winchester a marble tablet may be seen, commemorating this splendid example of generosity—and remains as a lasting monument of the gratitude of the French clergy toward the English people.

Is it suprising that when a few years afterwards, a subscription was raised in Quebec, in Montreal, in William Henry (now the town of Sorel), in Three Rivers, in St. Geneviève, in the county of Jacques Cartier, now represented by Mr. F. D. Monk, the French priests found it their duty, in gratitude to England, to subscribe these sums, which, with the kind permission of the House, I would like to read them. I have picked out a few names from a very large list of subscriptions, and I hope that the gentlemen from the province of Ontario will also be able to show that that province was equally loyal on that occasion in 1800 when England was carrying on a war against the French.

In order that there may be no doubt about the authenticity of this statement I have here the official letter:

Colonial Office Records, Series Q., Vol. 82.

No. 109. Quebec, 26th June, 1799.

My Lord,—I have the pleasure to inform Your Grace, that voluntary subscriptions have lately been set on foot in the province, towards supporting the just and necessary war in which His Majesty is engaged.

I have the honour to enclose copies of the papers that have been handed to me on the subject from Montreal, and this place, together with copies of the letters which I directed to be written in answer thereto.

I have the honour to be,
My Lord,
Your Grace's most obedient and most humble servant,
ROBT. PRESCOTT.

His Grace
The Duke of Portland.

P.S.—Since the above was written, I have received by the post of this day, an account of a similar subscription being opened at Sorel, a copy of which I have likewise the honour to enclose herewith.

Quebec, 10th June, 1801.

Sir,

I have the honour to inclose a bill of exchange on the paymaster general for five hundred pounds sterling, with my humble request that your Excellency will be pleased to transmit the same to His Majesty's treasury, as a contribution from the officers and privates of the 1st Battalion of Royal Canadian Volunteers, towards the support of the present war.

I am very respectfully,
Your Excellency's
Most obedient humble servant,
(Signed) J. L. de Longeuil,
Lt.-Col. 1st Battalion R.C.V., R.S.M.

His Excellency,
Sir Robert Shore Milnes, Bt.,
Lt. Governor.

Endorsed: A
In Lieut. Govr. Milnes,
No. 54,
To the Duke of Portland.

I wish to say, after reading this list, that it shows the French Canadian people had not forgotten the hospitality offered so generously in England. Before passing from that, I shall quote from a copy of the resolution which headed this list, and although it was written 110 years ago, one might easily believe it had been written to-day, as it fits absolutely the present occasion :

Resolved that the people of Upper and Lower Canada enjoy all the blessings of the British government and of all the Royal favour without feeling any part of the burden of their fellow subjects in England. Resolved, that it is the indispensable duty of every good subject of Canada to contribute all he can towards defraying the expense of His Majesty's present service.

And we all know what the service of His Majesty in the year 1800 was, and the triumphs won by the British navy. In 1800 we had taken Malta. Only two years before the Battle of Aboukir had been fought and won by the British navy. In 1801 Copenhagen had fallen and Nelson had been unsuccessful in his attempt against Boulogne. If the principle of imperial defence is adopted by Canada, then practical means should be provided for carrying it out. Some agitators, for political purposes, in the province of Quebec have tried to mislead the inhabitants of that province. I do not accuse them of having sought to deceive their countrymen; but I do accuse them of having acted without sufficient reflection and without a careful and necessary study of the question. Since we are all agreed that it is our bounden duty to assist England in her hour of danger, surely one need not be a Wellington or a Von Moltke to know that a body of men, no matter how willing they may be, untrained and unarmed, would be absolutely incapable of rendering assistance in case of emergency. Therefore, if we adopt the principle of imperial defence, we should at the same time, and at once, adopt a practical means to attain that end. But a few moments ago, the hon. leader of the opposition was, like most of his party, in a state of alarm. If hon. gentlemen will bear with me for one moment, I will show that there is no cause for alarm, and that England will be paramount as a naval power for many years to come. If we but glance at the map we shall see that all the principal coal stations in the world are painted red. The first duty of a power desiring to become mistress of the sea is to find resting places for her ships where they can replenish their coal bunkers, and where necessary repairs can be made. Coal to-day is an indispensable factor in naval warfare. Germany, so far as I know, has very few coaling stations away from her own shores. German ships like land birds—and I may say it now, so that the hon. leader of the opposition will rest easy to-night—cannot fly far from their own shores. The first duty of a nation hostile to England is to imitate her example. It has taken Great Britain 100 years to secure strategical points all over the surface of the globe. Supposing naval operations were carried on in the Mediterranean, where would Germany get its coal, which is so indispensable to a fleet? We hold Gibraltar, Malta and Alexandria. If we move a little further in, and proceed through the Suez canal we have the ports of Aden and Perim, and I do not know that they belong to Germany. If we proceed in the Indian ocean we have Bombay, Colombo and Rangoon—Colombo, the point where the ships of all nations meet, one of the best strategical points on the commercial route, and further east you come to Singapore, one of the most important harbours in the world.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (British Columbia)—May I tell the hon. gentleman where Germany would get her supply of coal in case of war?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Let me proceed, and the hon. gentleman can tell me afterwards. I have selected these few ports from the admiralty list of coaling stations. If we enter the Pacific ocean, we have Hong Kong, the Gibraltar of the orient, impregnable as the rock itself, and commanding that portion of the Pacific ocean. If we cross the Pacific ocean, north of the equator we have Esquimalt on the west coast of our Dominion. I need not dwell on the immense quantity of coal within reach of that port. Crossing the continent of North America, we come to Nova Scotia and Cape Breton, and we know that the immense coal deposits lying within the provinces of Canada will never be used to replenish the bunkers of a hostile fleet. If we move farther south in the Atlantic we have Bermuda, Santa Lucia and Barbadoes. We have glanced mostly at the northern hemisphere. If we look south of the equator we find that a whole continuent belongs to us. In Australia, we have coaling stations and immense coal deposits. At Sydney, Newcastle, and Cookstown we have immense supplies for coaling stations. Where would Germany find coal in all those places? She would be absolutely helpless. In the middle of the Pacific ocean, we have the Fiji islands, where an immense supply of coal is always kept on hand by the British admiralty. If the course is further to the east and a ship is going round the Horn and if she is delayed in that tempestuous sea, where storms rage nearly all the year round, or detained in the Straits of Magellan by fog, a few hours sailing in the Atlantic will bring her to the Falkland islands and at Port Stanley she can replenish her bunkers with coal. Now, if we find it necessary to circumnavigate Africa because the Suez canal might be blockaded by a hostile fleet or rendered impassable by submarine mines, or if the borders of the canal are held by a hostile army rendering its navigation impossible for British ships, in leaving the Mediterranean we come to Madeira, a British coaling station, and moving further south we come to Freetown in Sierra Leone and further on we come to Lagos, in the Niger district, and if it is a Canadian ship it would be welcomed there by Sir Percy Girouard, a Canadian, as Governor General of Nigeria. Then before reaching Capetown we have the Kamerun and St. Helena. So hon. gentlemen will see that the west coast of Africa is well provided with coaling stations and resting places for the ships of the British admiralty, and these stations we are proud to say are all well fortified and strongly held by British troops. You would search in vain in the annals of naval operations to find a coaling station that had ever surrendered by being besieged by men of war. A landing must be effected, and a landing would be supremely difficult. Hostile ships could not stand within range of our cannon, because, as every one knows, siege guns are much more powerful than any cannon devised, up to the present time, to serve on the war ships.

From Cape Town plying in a northeasterly course along the oriental coast of South Africa, we have Durban, and Mombassa, also two good coaling stations. Germany, as far as I know, has no coaling station in that part of the Indian ocean. Then in the Indian ocean we have Mauritius. There again Germany would be helpless. Can any other country show such stragetical advantages as England possesses throughout the world? Only a short time ago, we all followed with interest the cruise of that magnificent fleet of the United States of America around the world. Volumes have been written about it. The world followed every stage of that event. The most minute details were given in the press, but a very important one was never mentioned, that the fleet was accompanied by British colliers, and that when it did not coal from a British collier it had to replenish its bunkers from under the mouths of British guns at British coaling stations. That voyage would have been impossible but for the help of British colliers. Hon. gentlemen will see therefore, that there is no cause for alarm. We have ample time to make the necessary preparation. We can make scientific preparation. We can also see that a fair distribution of the burden of imperial defence may equally be divided, so that each sub-division of the empire may reap the benefit and profit by it. The principle being decided in the affirmative, and a conflict is necessarily remote, for the reasons I have given, ample time is left to us, and if there was ever a question in which this country should move slowly and cautiously it is this one. If there was ever a question which required technical knowledge, it is certainly that of the creation of a navy, and I find it strange that elsewhere and, to my surprise in this chamber, self-appointed naval critics condemn what the government of Canada has done under the advice of the British admiralty, criticise the purchases which have been made by Canada, but without having any expert knowledge on the subject themselves. These are some cardinal points, some self-evident facts that will appeal to every reasonable man. For instance, if one wishes to build ships it is absolutely necessary to establish shipyards, and the location of these shipyards is a most important question. They can only be established near strong fortifications, well protected by siege guns, because it is evident that without such protection, a hostile fleet would destroy a shipyard, and at the same time the ships under construction.

The location having been decided upon, the workshops must be built according to the requirements of naval architects. The laying out of the yards requires naval experts. All this involves a great deal of technical knowledge. And this government would be doing well, and would be moving with sufficient rapidity if in one or two years it could establish the shipyards. The greatest use could be made of this time in obtaining information from the very best and most reliable sources, and if, after mature deliberation, a plan were evolved which would decide the class of ships that would be the component parts of the fleet, when the keel of the first vessel is laid, the government would be in a position to place before this country exactly the programme it was intended to follow, and I sincerely hope that before producing such a programme, the approval of the British admiralty shall be obtained. Parliament having fixed the amount which the Canadian exchequer was willing to contribute, then the very best fleet available for the money should be had under the advice of the British admiralty. Surely no bone will deny that the British admiralty is the best judge, and knows better than any other authority what would be of greatest service to itself. Canada is eminently well situated for naval construction. In Nova Scotia and New Brunswick we have immense coal deposits, and, thanks to the fostering policy of the present government, we now manufacture in Nova Scotia and Cape Breton the very best steel, and it was suggested to me only a few moments ago, that in order that we may have a navy and ships with the most efficient type of armour plate it should be smelted by electricity. That would be feasible in this country, when we remember there are twenty-five millions of hydraulic horse-power in Canada, of which, 17,000,000 horse-power are in Quebec. We have an indispensable alloy for making steel plates in Canada. Canada possesses and supplies almost the entire world with the most valuable alloy, nickel. Nowhere else can nickel be found in any quantity except in New Caledonia, a French possession, and there the production of the metal is very small. Plates manufactured of ordinary steel would be useless in modern warfare, when you consider the force of modern guns with an impact of 53,000 tons at the muzzle. The immense projectile would pass through the sides of an ordinary iron or steel ship with as much ease as the cannon balls of old times passed through the sides of wooden ships. It is needless to say that in time of war the export of nickel would be prohibited, and unless hostile nations could obtain nickel from New Caledonia, they would have to do without it. One does not need to be a metallurgist to know that there is no substitute for nickel in the manufacture of armour plate.

But in the midst of all these warlike preparations, when human genius is bent on inventing fighting machines more and more destructive, and constantly increasing the thickness and hardness of armour plate, and in a like ratio the weight and force of penetration of projectiles, it is refreshing to think that in two years a centennial of peace will be celebrated between the two great Anglo-Saxon nations of the world, Great Britain and the United States of America. Let us hope that both governments will unite in commemorating in a fitting manner that event. Let us hope that a magnificent monument will be erected to the angel of peace to be an example to all the civilized world. Let us hope that our ship yards will soon be converted into modern establishments, where merchant vessels can be built and ships under the British flag plying on the seven seas will carry the golden grain of our immense wheat fields, ground into the finest quality of flour, and that our illimitable forests of soft wood may be worked into excellent paper, and all our national resources, transformed by Canadian workmanship into useful commodities, may be used for the betterment of the world. Let us remember that those who think we do not need a navy to defend our trade, and that in case of war we might ship by the United States, that the trade of the United States is largely carried in British bottoms, that in case of war those ships would be immediately liable to seizure by a hostile fleet. Something has been said about our political status. Some have said, authorities in high places, that Canada is a nation. That was a rather ambitious declaration. When did we change our allegiance? When and how did this colony become independent? One need not be well versed in international law to know that Canada is a colony; that she has never proclaimed her independence, and that she cannot be a colony and a nation at the same time. It is true, we have autonomy of a certain kind. Our parliament has a right to refuse appropriations for the militia or navy; but the moment we have navy or militia automatically thy fall undr the command of His Majesty the King. We must remain within the four corners of the British North America Act, and section 15 of the forces on sea and on land of Canada. All Canadian legislation to the contrary would be null and void. England can call upon us to help in time of danger, and we must respond, voluntarily or otherwise. This very Bill to establish a naval service provides, in clause 4, that the King shall be the commander of the fleet. Why then all this question of shall and may; go we must, and go we shall. I feel in the depths of my soul that we shall go cheerfully to assist the mother country. If we glance at the various strategical points throughout the empire we see they are all necessary for British trade, because British trade today and for the past fifty or sixty years has encircled the world. Let those who would attack the British lion, remember that the sun never sets over the numerous lairs of its vigorous progeny. Let them remember that wherever the refulgent rays of the rising sun set aglow the orient, on every land and on every sea there is hoisted towards Heaven a British flag.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We have just heard the magnificent speech of the hon. member from DeLanaudière. It is a pity we did not hear the beat of the British drum before he spoke, because such a speech reminds everybody of the songs of the Salvation Army which are, in this city, always announced by the drum beating at the post office corner in Ottawa. There is no doubt that the hon. gentleman did not say a word about the question before the House. He forgot it altogether. I know he composed the speech in advance, and that he had help to compose it. A few moments before he rose, documents were handed to him, and the information was supplied to him. The hon. gentleman divided his subject into two parts. First, should Canada participate in the defence of the empire. He never dealt with that first part. The second part was, if Canada should participate in the defence of the empire, then we must adopt the best means, and to prove that, he gave us a long recital of contributions paid in 1799, and 1800, by different parish priests of the province of Quebec and by leading people in the different parishes to assist Great Britain during the Napoleonic wars. He spoke also of the loyalty of the province of Quebec? What has the loyalty of the province of Quebec to do with this matter? When was it questioned? The hon. gentleman said some agitators had been trying to deceive our French population. Who are they? I should like to know who are the agitators that are trying to deceive our people. I have here an extract from a speech made by one of those agitators, and circulated through the province of Quebec. He said:

A fact that cannot be denied is that Canada is now going through one of the most troublesome periods of its history. The national and political complications foreshadowed by those who stood up against confederation are coming to a reality. A wind of discord is blowing over our heads. From one end to the other of Canada one may hear those rumours which foretell the coming cataclysm, and those who as my self in 1867 have abandoned the Conservative party on that grave question (of confederation) may boast that their previsions are to-day realised. They have a right to feel satisfied of the independence shown in those days gone by when they denounced that political change which has brought us the evils they then anticipated.....

We have come to this point that one asks himself if it is not better for us to have the American federation (annexation) rather than the European federation.. .. ..

What is that imperial federation? What is its organization? Its object? It is the union of England with her colonies. Its object is to create between England and her colonies a union for the protection of England, in order to help her in time of war, to establish commercial relations for her own advantage and to turn the colonies into a market for the metropole.

I consider imperial federation as an impossibility. Such a project is nothing but a dream. I ask the advocates of federation if they can conceive that the colonies shall ever tie themselves to the stupid external policy of England and mix themselves up in the quarrels and wars with nations 10,000 miles distant from them.

I say it is our duty to oppose imperial federation because its only clear and evident object is England's interests to be served by, and the only positive result would be for us an increase of our charges and the addition of national and political difficulties the nature and the greatness of which nobody can imagine.

The sole fact that it is stated that the object of the league is to oblige us to share in the expenses of any war England should undertake, is quite sujcient to determine us to fight that project.. .. ..

Let us suppose that England engages in war with the negroes of Africa.... Canada will have to send its contingent of troops at 3 or 4 thousand leagues and our countrymen will be forced to go at the extremities of the world to fight the negroes in rebellion against England.

The whole question rests on our own interests. We are of America and no one has a right to impose upon us political projects outside of the American movement. There is no reason to tie us to the old tree of old Europe when young America has for us a tree full of sap and vigor.. .. ..

I am going to be told: Why such childish fears? Where is the danger? Your liberties are guaranteed. We know the value of such guarantees. The same thing occurred when we had confederation. We received then the promise that French would be spoken in the Northwest and in Manitoba, in parliament as on the shores of the St. Lawrence and that we would have our separate schools. Would we have ever signed that compact if we had then been able to know what is now happening? All those conventions are worth nothing because all the McCarthy's of the future are able to destroy them as they have destroyed the conventions of 1867.

The is my conclusion. I have said that I was not in favour of annexation and that I preferred the British political institutions to the American one.

But I have no hesitation in saying that should we be obliged to choose between an American federetion and the imperial federation for all the reasons I have given, I would hoist the flag of the American federation.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—When was that said?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I see the hon. gentleman has recognized himself.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—When was that said?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That was said in the month of March, 1890, when the hon. gentleman was a member of the Quebec legislature. But there are other agitators. On the 21st February, 1890—at a time when strong winds were blowing over our heads, as the hon. member said—one of the ministers of to-day, the Hon. Mr. Rodolphe Lemieux, made a fine speech in Montreal. Let us listen to one of those agitators who are trying to deceive the province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Does the hon. gentleman say that the Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux was a minister at that time?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I never said that.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—What did the hon. gentleman say?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I said what I intended to say, and the hon. gentleman must not put in my mouth words that I did not utter. I said that Rodolphe Lemieux, now one of the ministers of the Crown, but at that day one of the agitators complained of by my hon. friend, was going through the province of Quebec trying to deceive the people of that province. I find in 'La Patrie' of the 21st February, 1890, under the title 'Club Nationale,' 'The McCarthy Resolution and Lemieux Motion'.

There will be this evening a meeting of the National Club at the rooms of the club. Mr. Lemieux's motion relating to the independence of Canada and Mr. McCarthy's resolution will be discussed.

The following day the same journal said under the same title:

The resolution proposed by Mr. Rodolphe Lemieux a fortnight ago and adjourned for discussion reads as follows:

Whereas the members of the House of Commons have recently voted an address to Her Majesty the Queen in which they affirm the sentiments of the Canadian people towards the maintenance of the British tie;

And whereas the members of the National Club of Montreal have already made known their opinion upon such a question and that it is the duty of the youth of this country to pronounce itself on our relations with the empire.

Resolved, That without committing themselves with regard to the opportunity of such an address to Her Majesty and though protesting their respect for the members of the House of Commons of Canada and their loyalty to the Queen;

We, the members of the National Club, disapprove of any policy which might alienate the American sympathies at a moment when public opinion asks so energetically the establishment of the most intimate commercial relations between the United tates and Canada.

Though professing a sincere admiration for the English constitutional system, the members of this club call for and desire to obtain by all possible constitutional means the independence of this country and its emancipation from any European tie.

After speeches delivered by Mr. Lemieux, Larochelle and Schaffner, the resolution was unanimously carried.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—When did the hon. gentleman object to these principles—then or now?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I have nothing to do with the principles put forward at the time. I am just showing that one of the agitators who contributed towards deceiving the people of the province of Quebec, was my hon. friend from Mille Iles, and the other a minister of the Crown who, at that time, was Mr. Rodolphe Lemieux, advocate.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Why did the hon. gentleman not protest at the time?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It was not my duty to protest. The hon. gentleman himself was in Montreal, and was a neighbour of the present minister.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Then you are not sincere in your declarations now—

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman has no right to interrupt me, and he had better keep quiet. The Bill before us is, no doubt calculated to create a naval force for the defence of our country and of British supremacy on the seas. If you look at clause 22 of the Bill it reads:

22. The Governor in Council may place the naval forces or any part thereof, on active service at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of an emergency.

This first clause puts into the hands of the government the power to assemble our forces to repulse an atack on our territory, but clause 23 gives still greater power. It reads:

23. In case of emergency the Governor in Council may place at the disposal of His Majesty, for general service in the royal navy, the naval service or any part thereof, any ships or vessels of the naval service, and the officers and seamen serving in such ships or vessels, or any officers or seamen belonging to the naval service.

The naval service by this provision of the Bill is put at the disposal of the King, and in advance, we accept that by a simple order in council. Our ships will have then to take their place in the squadrons of the empire. This clause does not say anything else. There is nothing else to be deduced from it. It is not the people who will decide. It is not the electors who will say whether we are going to participate in the wars of the empire. It is not the people who shall decide that our navy, our ships, our mariners and our sailors are to go the extremities of the globe and fight the battles of the empire. The governor in council, by a simple order in council, can send our fleet to help the imperial squadron. This is what clause 23 says. Now, what does clause 24 mean? It reads like this:

24. Whenever the Governor in Council places the naval service or any part thereof on active service, as rovided in the two preceding sections, if parliament is then separated by such adjournment or prorogation as will not expire within ten days, a proclamation shall issue for a meeting of parliament within fifteen days and parliament shall accordingly meet and sit upon the day appointed by such proclamation, and shall continue to sit in like manner as if it had stood adjourned or prorogued to the same day.

It means that parliament will be summoned; but what would be the next steps? Suppose parliament is summoned; the members are all assembled here in Ottawa; then the ministers lay on the table the order in council declaring that we shall participate in the wars of the empire. Suppose that the members of the House do not approve —a mere supposition—of that order in council, a discussion would take place. They may speak two days, three days, a week; they may have a week's sittings; if you like they may discuss it three weeks, or a month, I know a measure that never passed in the House of Commons—and my hon. friend knows it well—because members spoke more than two months on the question; and the Remedial Bill never became law, because every member of the House of Commons exercised his right to speak in committee or out of committee, to oppose and obstruct. Suppose a similar case when the House should meet. The obstruction commences. The government sees that it is going to be defeated; it obstructs by one way only one thing to do, that is to the House. The Governor General then would have only one thing to do, that is to rely on clause 15 of the British North America Act quoted by my hon. friend.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—What about clause 15?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What does section 15 of the British North America Act say? Clause 15 says: 'The command-in-chief of the Land and Naval Militia, and of all Naval and Military forces, of and in Canada, is hereby declared to continue and be vested in the King.' The Governor General having given an order in the name of the King, under the authority of the law, the fleet will go. The fleet is obliged to obey the King or his personal representative here in the country. The fleet will then go. Parliament may discuss the question; but that is not action. We may discuss; we may have a long list of the persons who subscribe for the war; we may have a long list of all the persons who did not subscribe to the war; then parliament may sit a month or two months, but the fleet will be gone.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—What if the fleet is disabled?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If the fleet is disabled we will have no more talking to do. It is undisputed that we are a colony. The hon. gentleman just now admitted that we are not a nation; but those who say that we are, are deceiving the people. The first Canadian who woke up to find that we were a nation was the Prime Minister of Canada. It is he who deceived the people. He may say we are a nation; but we are not a nation; we are simply a colony, and it is because we are a colony that we have this Bill before us. It is because we are a colony, that we want by this Bill to take from the people of this colony the means to aid the empire in her troubles. That is the object of the Bill; if we were not a colony we would not require this Bill at all. We are a colony, and because we are a colony we are bound by the written constitution which was given us, and that constitution lies in the British North America Act; and when the British North America Act says that the commander in chief of the naval forces and of the military forces of this country is in the hands of the King, no Act of this parliament should supercede the imperial law. I am glad that my hon. friend from De Lanaudière has treated that point—the only point I think that he has treated in regard to this Bill. We have an Act that was passed in the British House of Commons. We have what we call the Colonial Lands Act passed in 1865, to be found in the constitutional documents of Canada. Clause 2 of that Act says:—

> Any colonial law, which is or shall be repugnant to the provisions of any Act of parliament extending to the colony to which such law may relate, or repugnant to any order or regulation made under authority of such Act of parliament, or having in the colony the force or effect of such act, shall be read subject to such act, order or regulation, and shall, to the extent of such repugnancy, but not otherwise, be and remain absolutely void and inoperative.

That settles the question.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—What does that mean?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It means that it is an imperial measure, passed by the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. It is our home rule. Now, there are precedents. I quote from Todd on parliamentary Government in the British Colonies, page 380. What do we find? We find that in 1877 the colony of the Cape of Good Hope was threatened with disaster from a war which had broken out on her northern frontier with certain Kaffir tribes, and also from the simultaneous existence of Kaffir rebellion in the Eastern provinces. In this emergency, the Governor, at that time Sir Bartle Frere was of opinion that it was necessary to aid the colonial volunteer force by additional imperial troops. Accordinngly he addressed a minute on the subject to the British government in which he pointed out the need for reinforcements and likewise the importance of an improved organization, and control of the colonial military establishment. The colonial premier who was Mr. J. C. Molteno, in reply to the Governor's memorandum, asserted his belief that the colonists were able to help themselves without assistance from Her Majesty's regular army, whose presence in the colony tended, he thought, to depress the spirit of the people from a dread of military, or, rather of imperial domination. He therefore advised the withdrawal of Her Majesty's troops from the colony. It was the Prime Minnister of the colony who made that move. He insisted moreover upon the right of the colonial cabinet to undertake the entire management of the colonial forces; to place them in charge of a colonial commandant general, who should be uncontrolled by any imperial military authority; and that the governor himself should refrain from interference, inasmuch as he 'has no special powers over colonial forces as commander in chief.'

This arbitrary assumption of power was accompanied by an intimation to the governor that one of the ministry, the Commissioner of Crown Lands—it might be to-day the Minister of Marine, or the acting Minister of Marine—had been deputed to act as commandant-general, in command of all colonial forces whatsoever, and 'under the sole control and direction of the colonial government'. We see what are the pretensions. On one side the governor, who presided as that representative of the Crown; on the other the Prime Minister, wanting to check the governor and telling him: 'You have nothing to do in the matter; I am Prime Minister of this colony; I am responsible to the people, and have given my word to see them safe, and you have to keep quiet'.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Who was right?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—You will see. Todd says:

> In answer to these pretensions, the governor denied the existence of the alleged dissatisfaction in the colony at the presence therein of an imperial military force; he protested against the scheme of his ministers for the direction of the local volunteers as being illegal and unconstitutional; and he referred to the reasonable and constitutional practice which had hitherto prevailed since the outbreak of hostilities, whereby 'the governor and commander in chief,' was in the habit of meeting the general commanding the forces, and two or three of the responsible ministers for dails consultation and agreement, so that by their joint action and concert all necessary military measures might be authorized and determined upon.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Whose authority was there for that? The governor or the government?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It continues:

But ministers still persisted in adhering to their expressed opinions in this matter, and proceeded to carry them out by directing certain military operations without the sanction either of the Governor or of the general in command. The general, however, entered a formal protest against this proceeding. Ministers also caused to be inserted in the official gazette divers military appointments and promotions which had not been previously submitted for the governor's approval. At first these appointments were made in the governor's name; subsequently they were gazetted without any reference to this authority.

Now, we are coming to the crucial point:

'After repeated remonstrances with his ministers for their illegal and unwarranted conduct, and after ascertaining that they persisted in continuing in office, declaring that they were only accountable to parliament for their public conduct, the governor at length, on February 2, 1878, notified the premier by a letter sent through a principal officer of the civil service, that he could no longer consent to retain them as his advisors, and that they would remain in office until their successors were appointed.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Who was right?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It continues.

On February 5 and 11 Governor Frere addressed despatches to Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies, in which he narrated the preceding events, and mentioned that he had entrusted Mr. J. G. Sprigge, the leader of the opposition in the assembly with the task of forming a new administration.

In his reply, dated March 21, the Colonial Secretary expressed his full reliance on the governor's judgment, and did not question the propriety of his conduct in dismissing his late ministers, a step which appeared to have been unavoidable. Whilst endorsing the opinions expressed by the governor, in denying the right of his ministers to appoint an officer unknown to the constitution, unauthorized by parliament, and in opposition to the judgment of the governor, and to assign to him functions which would give him paramount authority, greater than that of the governor himself, in military matters, the secretary proceeded to point out that the peculiar position occupied by the governor as the Queen's High Commissioner with powers in respect to adjacent territories which were not limited by the system of responsible government, as established at the Cape, entitled him to special consideration and authority in respect to his lawful endeavours to preserve peace in Her Majesty's possessions in Africa, and to prevent any erruption of hostile tribes into those possessions.

Further on, this question was brought up before the legislative assembly of the Cape of Good Hope, a vote was taken, and the position taken by the governor was sustained by a large majority.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—What is the majority?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—This is an illustration of what are the powers of a governor in the colonies, referring to the fact that he is the personal representative of the Sovereign, on whom, under our constitution, devolves the command of the militia and navy in our land.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Will the hon. gentleman allow me one second as a matter of kindness. He has read here a certain number of documents, official and semi-official, in regard to a very important point. He has placed his interpretation on those documents. He has placed them before the House. What I ask is this: Does the hon. gentleman expect the hon. senators of this House to accept his explanation, his interpretation of those documents?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—In answer to my hon. friend, I will kindly say that I expect nothing from him.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Well, probably others. That is personal.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But I am making a point, and I suppose if anybody chooses to answer me, he is at liberty to do so. Now, one word in regard to the province of Quebec. The opposition in the province of Quebec has been misrepresented, not in this House, but in another place and before the public. I will candidly say that in the province of Quebec we are content with what we have, perfectly contented. Great Britain has been for us all that we expected she should be. We enjoy our liberties. We are not anxious to get independence. We know what independence would mean. Independence means a change of government, a change of constitution, and in any change of the constitution we would be the losers, we would not gain anything at all. We are perfectly contented with what we have; and what I am at liberty to say is this: should Great Britain, in a moment of emergency, ask us to befriend her, Great Britain would find in the province of Quebec the same help, and the same enthusiasm that she found in 1775, and 1812; there is no doubt about that. But this is not the question that has been put before the people. When this question came before parliament, we have asked that the people should pronounce upon it. It was argued that it was a question of emergency. Opinions differ. One man may have one opinion, and another may have another opinion; and, if any other hon. member has a right to his opinion, I have a right to mine. As a matter of fact, is there an emergency or is there not? My hon. friend on my left (Hon. Mr. Lougheed) says there is. My hon. friend from Victoria division (Hon. Mr. Cloran) says there is not. Well, I will take as a conclusion, or as an answer to that question, just what Great Britain has done. Great Britain has accepted the proposals of Canada. The plan now submitted to us—if we are not deceived, and I have no reason to think we are—the plan now proposed to us has been accepted by England. If that be so, in our opinion there is no emergency; because, by that plan, we are asked in ten or twelve, or fifteen years to be ready, and, as the hon. gentleman from De Lanaudiere (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) has said just now, we must go slowly. Well, we in the province of Quebec, did not pronounce ourselves against a contribution to the empire, by a navy or otherwise. We did not pronounce ourselves at all upon the question, but we expect, under these circumstances, that the government of the day should consult the people. If the provinces—I am not speaking of the province of Quebec alone, I am speaking of the Dominion—if the provinces of the Dominion as a whole pronounce in favour of sending our fleet to assist Britain, the province of Quebec would not be behind; the province of Quebec would accept the decision. Supposing the Dominion should give such an opinion, the province of Quebec would yield to the decision of the majority. That is all that we ask. We do not ask more than that, because we have asked not only what the French people of the province of Quebec are asking, but what the English people of Ontario are asking themselves. Look at their agricultural clubs passing resolutions asking for a plebiscite, asking to be allowed to give their opinion on a question that is of such momentous importance. We in Quebec are doing the same thing. Why should we not have the same fair treatment for our countrymen, when we share the opinions of the English speaking population of this Dominion?

Hon. Mr. DAVID—How many in the House of Commons voted for that?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not care for the number. Is the number, no matter how large it be now given the right?

An hon. MEMBER—It is the quality, not the quantity of votes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is the number going to give you the right? Do hon. gentlemen think that the Jews who crucified Jesus Christ had the right to do it because they were a large number?—because that is the hon. gentleman's argument.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—We must judge of the feeling of the people by those who represent them in parliament.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I deny that in toto. If we must judge of the people by those who represent them, why are the government afraid to go before the people to ask for a plebescite?

Hon. Mr. DAVID—When did they want to go?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—A plebiscite on this question would not endanger the government. If there was an appeal to the people during the general elections to consult the people on the question, the members might say: 'We fear the result, for our own sake, we might be beaten in the elections'. But a plebiscite of itself would not endanger the government, would not endanger the members of the House of Commons. It would simply ask for the opinion of the people. The government had recourse to that method some years ago, in 1898, I think, when they asked the opinion of the people on the prohibition question. And they had an answer. They acted the other way, but at all events they consecrated the principle of a plebiscite on imperial matters. I am glad of this discussion, because I think it is my duty to place before the House and the people of the country the position in which we stand in Quebec. It is not the Conservative party that tried to deceive the people by all those cries, of which I gave an illustration at the opening of my remarks. It was the Liberals, and the Liberals in the House at Quebec introduced a resolution, and if my hon. friends remember well, during the vote on that resolution the Conservative party to a man went out of the House. The hon. gentleman knows why, because of the proposal of the previous question, in order to prevent the Conservative party bringing in an amendment to the resolutions presented by the Liberal party at the time.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—That is what you did in 1886.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I beg pardon, I never did that. My motion was made in 1885 or 1886; another party moved the previous question, not myself. I think, in that instance, perhaps the hon. gentleman himself was moving the previous question.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It was Mr. Lafontaine, now judge.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—With those few words, as the hour is late, I will conclude my speech, and I hope this motion will be carried.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—The hon. gentleman means the amendment.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Yes, the main motion is for the second reading of the Bill, and the amendment is that the House does not feel justified in accepting the Bill, until it has obtained the judgment of the people. Surely, if one of the Houses of parliament should defend and safeguard the interests of the people it is the Senate. We are here to guard the interests of the people, and not be carried away by party feeling or party interest. We should judge calmly of the situation and give the people an opportunity of expressing their opinion, and we should accept their opinion. I have no doubt public opinion in this country at the present moment is adverse to the Bill, some people for one reason, and some for another. But the general opinion in the country is adverse to the policy of this Bill.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

MONTREAL CENTRAL TERMINAL BILL.

NATURE OF MOTION.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I wish to give notice of an amendment in connection with the Montreal Central Terminal Company Bill. I prepared an amendment and showed it to the promoters. The notice is in the hands of the clerk, and the amendment will have to be moved by another member, because I am to move the consideration of the main question. The notice of motion to amend will be in the name of the hon. gentleman from Mille Iles (Hon. Mr. David) so that it may come in amendment to the main motion.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Is it a notice of an amendment to the report of the committee, or an amendment to the motion on the third reading?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—An amendment to the report. It was suggested that it be made as an amendment to the report, and I complied.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Did the other parties interested agree to it.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—They are in possession of it.

REMOVAL OF RUINS OF THE QUEBEC BRIDGE.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the House adjourns I should like to know if the copy of the contract with Koenig & Company, which was ordered to be laid on the table, has been prepared?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I remember giving an answer to the hon. gentleman some months ago, as to the parties to whom the contract was awarded, so that there must have been a contract, and it must have been signed. As the hon. gentleman lives near the place where the contract is to be carried out, I think, perhaps, he can tell me if it has been carried out.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think the hon. gentleman is labouring under a misapprehension. The House, by decision—not of the Speaker but of the House—has ordered that a copy of that contract should be laid on the table. That was on the 21st of January. That is a copy of the contract made between the government on the one side, and Koenig & Company, on the other. The government is in possession of the contract. I want a copy of the contract. I asked for a copy of the contract. The House ordered the production of a copy of the contract, and I want to get it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It should be available.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It should be available, but it is not in my possession yet.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I want to know from the hon. gentleman if the contract is being carried out?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not know; that is not the question.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I know it is not.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If the hon. gentleman wants me to answer, he must give me twenty-four hours notice.

The Senate adjourned until 11 a.m. tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE.

THE SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 28, 1910.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Eleven a.m.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

MONTREAL CENTRAL TERMINAL BILL.

The order of the day being called by the Hon. Mr. Edwards:

That he will move that rules 24a and b be suspended in so far as they relate to (Bill 44) intituled: 'An Act respecting the Montreal Central Terminal Company.'

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN moved the suspension of rule 24a, of which the hon. gentleman for Russell gave notice yesterday.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I should like to ask if an agreement has been arrived at. It seems to me an assurance was given to the House that an amendment would be agreed upon between the parties concerned, and I understand the arrangement was contingent upon that.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—No, I think there was a misunderstanding on the part of hon. gentlemen. There was a hope expressed, but no assurance given, that if there was no agreement then everybody was free to judge of the value of the amendment which will be proposed, on its merits.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If there is any misunderstanding about it, in the absence of the hon. gentleman from Russell, who I know is in the corridor, the matter had better stand until he comes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—There is no necessity to adjourn the motion, because it was understood the motion would be carried.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—As a matter of courtesy, the hon. gentleman being in the corridor, I think the motion should stand until he comes into the Chamber.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—In regard to this matter, I do not know whether an arrangement has been come to. I do not know what position we are in. If there is no agreement, the House will discuss and judge the value of the amendment on its merits.

The SPEAKER—It may stand for the present.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 80) an Act to incorporate l'Institut de Notre Dame des Missions, as amended.—Hon. Mr. Ross, Moosejaw.

Bill (No. 105) an Act to amend the Telegraphs Act, as amended.—Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

MONTREAL TERMINAL COMPANY BILL.

The order of the day being called:

Consideration of amendments made by the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours to (Bill 44) An Act respecting the Montreal Central Terminal Company.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—I think this order should be allowed to stand. There is a contention over this Bill and if the amendments are adopted, the third reading has to be fixed immediately, and until it is understood whether there is an agreement or not I think it is better not to proceed.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—There was an understanding that the matter would be taken up to-day, and I was prepared to give notice of an amendment. I spent an hour last night preparing an amendment and putting it in the best shape possible to do full justice to the matter, and I gave it about ten o'clock to Senator Owens. His lawyer was in the room and he submitted it to him, and they said they would have to send it to Montreal, and I have not heard from them since. But the amendment is on the order paper, and it is for the honourable House to deal with. When this Bill as amended was reported to the House, exception was taken to it on the ground that the company being a terminal company the amendment would entirely defeat the object of the promoters if any portion of its works could not be used, unless as provided in the amendment. I rose and said I appreciated the objection which was taken; but it was no reason to object to the clause in toto, it was merely a reason why it should be properly amended. I then suggested that, in my opinion, by inserting the words 'shall not be used by the company' it would remove the difficulty. Last night, on further considering the question, I came to the conclusion that in fairness to the company a further addition should be made. I therefore, prepared an amendment, adding after the words 'shall be used' the words 'by the company' and adding to the clause this provision:

Provided that this subsection shall not be construed as preventing any other company entering into an agreement with the company in pursuance of section 361 of the Railway Act, from using such bridge or tunnel or approaches for the purpose of such urban service, within said city, if authorized to do such urban service by its own charter.

The reason for adding this proviso is that if it were not added, there would be a doubt as to whether such companies as the Grand Trunk railway and Canadian Pacific railway, or any other company with whom the present company may enter into an agreement to give them running rights over their tunnel or bridge works, might not be deprived of the right which they now enjoy of carrying passengers from one point in the city of Montreal to another point within the city. It would not be fair to the company, if we had only in view the saving of the franchise rights of the city of Montreal, and preventing any company from taking possession of the soil of Montreal for the purpose of establishing a city service equivalent to that of the city of Montreal, or a city service such as is contemplated to be established by three different companies that have been chartered by the Quebec legislature for the purpose of establishing a service of that kind without the consent of the city of Montreal, and without the city of Montreal having an opportunity of deciding upon what terms this system shall be established. That is the whole purpose; therefore, I submit that with this amendment we will do full justice to the company and reasonable justice to the city of Montreal. After the attention I have been able to give to the matter, I fail to see any reason why the company should object to that. The ground of objection was, that if the amendment were adopted it would defeat the object of the Bill and prevent the company from entering into any such agreement as they contemplate with the divers railway companies for the purpose of giving them leave to enter the city of Montreal by tunnel or bridge, and reach the terminal which this company proposes to establish in the city of Montreal, and of carrying passengers from one point in the city to another point in the city. This objection is entirely met, I submit, by the proposed amendment as it is printed on the order paper.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Would the hon. gentleman be kind enough to read to the House the amendment which he moves, so that we can see how this further amendment fits into it, and also to read section 361 of the Railway Act?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Section 361 of the Railway Act is as follows:

Where the company is authorized by any special Act of the parliament of Canada to enter into an agreement with any other company for selling, conveying or leasing to such company the railway and undertaking of the company, in whole or in part, or for purchasing or for leasing from such company the railway and undertaking of such company, in whole or in part, or for amalgamation, such agreement shall be first approved by two-thirds of the votes of the shareholders of each company, party thereto, at an annual general meeting, or at a special general meeting, of each company, called for the purpose of considering such agreement, at each of which meetings shareholders representing at least two-thirds in value of the capital stock of each company are present or represented by proxy.

2. Upon such agreement being so approved, and duly executed it shall be submitted to the board with an application for a recommendation to the Governor in Council for the sanction thereof.

It then provides for the sanction of the agreement by the Governor in Council. The present company has obtained already from parliament power to make agreements of that kind with a number of railway companies, and the Bill now placed before the honourable House seeks to obtain the same power as regards a number of additional companies. It is for that purpose it is referred to in the proposed amendment. Now, to comply with the wishes of hon. members, I shall read the clause as it is proposed to be amended:

No part of the bridge or tunnel or approaches thereto situated in the city of Montreal and which the company is authorized to construct shall be used by the company for the purpose, of urban passenger service for the passage of pedestrians, vehicles, cars, or carriages used for urban service without the consent of the said city obtained by by-law and setting out the conditions of such consent.

And then follows the proviso which I have read to the House.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—The position is this: From the first I have taken no part in the division that exists as far as Montreal is concerned over this Bill, none whatever. I have simply acted, the Bill being in my name, taking no part in the principles involved in any way whatever, and simply have received the instructions of those who promoted the Bill, in regard to it. When the amendments were suggested in committee, I was at once notified to withdraw the Bill. I proceeded to do so. Last night, on the understanding, as I had it, amendments would be suggested to the company and, if satisfactory, that that would dispose of the matter. I have my own private opinion in regard to the suggestions of my hon. friend, but I am not authorized in any way to deal with such an amendment, and I think it is only fair that the promoters should have an opportunity of knowing what is suggested. I do not know, but I would suppose it could be decided on before the afternoon meeting, and I do not see any reason why the amendment should be pressed this morning. My opinion is that it should rest until at least the afternoon, and give an opportunity to consult with the promoters of the Bill. As far as I am concerned, I have no feeling in the matter one way or the other, and I sympathise with the view that the interests of Montreal should be protected in every manner that is proper and right. But surely the promoters of the Bill have some rights, and I think it is but proper that they should be consulted.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—If the House would state that we will discuss the amendments made in committee and the proposed amendment which has been explained by the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry at this afternoon's meeting, it will give ample time to the representative of the promoters. The representative of the promoters is an Ottawa K.C., and he can correspond with Montreal by telephone, and read the amendments. I would therefore suggest that the hon. member from De Salaberry adjourn this order and let it be the first order of the afternoon meeting.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I agree to that, and I move that the order of the day be discharged, and that it be placed on the order paper for this afternoon.

The SPEAKER—It is moved by the hon. member for De Salaberry that he be allowed to withdraw the motion already made, and move in place thereof that the order be discharged and placed on the order paper this afternoon for the first place among the third readings.

The motion was agreed to.

THE NAVAL SERVICE BILL.

THIRD READING.

The order of the day being called:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion for the Second Reading (Bill 95) An Act respecting the naval service of Canada.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE—My apology for rising to speak at this early stage of the debate is that the subject is of imperial importance, that it is closely connected with patriotic and chivalrous sentiment; and thirdly, I had the pleasure of listening to the debate on the naval question in the British House of Commons, and also I have had the advantage of conversing with a number of gentlemen in shipping circles, and connected with the marine of Germany. The chief points of this question are very well marked. First, we have the sentiments and the opinions which are embodied in the Bill, and of which the Bill is resultant. The alternative is the chameleon policy of the opposition in the House of Commons, and in the press, and in the public mind. That policy seems to have shaped itself into this—that there will be a contribution in money or ought to be a contribution in money, made by parliament on behalf of the people of Canada for the building of ships in England; but I cannot say that that is the view of the opposition or of those who entertained the sentiments, because they change with the times. What was to-day asserted as the opposition policy is withdrawn to-morrow. I would call the attention of all who listened to the learned leader of the opposition last night, to the very great discrepancy that was apparent between the argument in his speech, and the amendment which was resultant of his speech. The speech indicated an emergency; it spoke of peril to the empire. It spoke of a grave situation from which we were to extricate the empire. Any one would think that the result of such an appeal as that, such statements as that, would not be based on delayed action. We thought that he was going to hale us with him into the breach; he was going to furbish up his brigandine, and lace up his corselet and go before us. But what was it? He laid it all aside, and there it hangs 'like rusty mail in monumental mockery'. What does his amendment call for? Instant action? Instant construction of ships? Immediate training of seamen, or the immediate giving of money? Is that the alternative? No, his is a policy of procrastination, of delay, of postponement. How is he to carry out his amendment? Is it by dissolving parliament? That will not extricate Britain from the situation of peril. There are the lists to prepare, to know who shall vote upon this question; there are parties to be named to canvas and prepare the public mind; there is the press to be informed, that it may give just views upon the subject; there is all the paraphernalia of an election, if that be his course, or on the other hand if it is to be a plebiscite, that cannot be taken immediately. If a plebiscite were taken it would not extricate the empire from peril. It is not something to be instantly done; it will take time; lecturers must go about the country, patriotic feelings have to be aroused, arguments have to be presented, and, finally, upon a list of the people qualified to vote, the vote will have to be taken. What would happen if the result were to be a close division of the people of the country? What would we do? Nothing. Suppose the friends of the leader of the opposition should be in majority, what would they do? Would they immediately give this money? This money is immediately required. There would be delay in that case. There is delay in the other case. There is delay on every hand, and the argument of the hon. leader of the opposition called for immediate action.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will the hon. gentleman pardon me for a moment? I cannot permit my hon. friend to misstate the position which I took. The position which I took was simply this, that the measure before us on this occasion is one involving the building of a separate national navy, of no importance whatever and of no necessity to the Dominion of Canada; and I say that this measure involving only the building of a separate national navy should be submitted to the people of Canada.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE—I must call the House's attention to what the hon. gentleman said. He may have said it in a moment of inadventure, or may have been carried away by his lines, and by the argument which he had in writing apparently; but he did say that exactly, and I took down his words on that occasion, and I think it is in the hearing of all who listened to his admirable speech that that was the ground work of his speech, the gravamen of his speech, the meaning of his speech, and that he intended it to have that meaning; but that somebody had tacked on to that speech, admirable in its execution, the reverse of all that was so admirably set out in the first part. In the first place, the opponents of the Bill have discussed the question of assisting the British government, and they think the best way would be by a money grant to build two Dreadnoughts in England. I think I may say two Dreadnoughts, because of the consensus of opinion that two Dreadnoughts should be built, because Australia and some of the other colonies had offered one or more, that Canada being more powerful and patriotic should offer two. I regret to say that the hon. leader of the opposition, and many of those who agree with him in political sentiment, in parliament and out of it, certainly largely in the press, have insinuated that the opposition are the monopolists of patriotism, that their own suggestion is the only true, loyal disposition of the money, that they are the monopolists of the sentiment of devotion to the mother country and all who hold adverse views to theirs, are actuated by patriotism of a lesser volume, or that they have sinister motives, and are veiling disloyal sentiment under the disguise of defence of our native country, Canada. I say that is a dangerous sentiment, one which should have been withheld by all who love their country. It is a sentiment that the opposition should not countenance, because we are one, and we freely grant to the opposition, while we vary from their views, that they are equally with ourselves animated by the best patriotic sentiments, only that they are mistaken in their ideas. They purpose to give say $20,000,000 of cash to build two Dreadnoughts for the British government; that the two Dreadnoughts be built in England. I think that is a correct resume of the programme of the opposition as expressed, and which the majority of that party endorsed. I say $20,000,000 because the report is that the latest Dreadnought that has been built cost $10,000,000, and, therefore, two such vessels would cost $20,000,000. I consider this plan would not fulfil their purpose to assist the British fleet and government. The burden of the argument of the hon. leader of the opposition last night was that a Canadian fleet would not aid the British fleet, and would not be of sufficient reliance and force for the protection of Canada. In answer to that part of the hon. gentleman's argument, I say that a gift of money would not assist the British government. England has plenty of money. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is about to raise one hundred million pound sterling in ordinary revenue. Therefore, our gift of twenty million dollars would not assist the British government or British people struggling under a weight of adverse finances or under a weight of taxation. It would be an insignificant sum. Neither would it add at all to their exchequer, for we would proceed to borrow that money from England, and we would pay the interest upon it. That would probably be the ordinary course, so we would not assist them with a cash payment. In the second place, England has not at the present time a sufficiency of yards and private establishments to build more than the government plans of reconstruction and addition to the navy, outside of the government yards, call for. There are in England four or five ship building establishments which have devoted themselves to the construction of ironclads, and I believe are fitted with the necessary appliances for the construction of ships. I do not know whether Harland and Wolfe have prepared themselves at all for the building of ironclads. They have devoted themselves to commercial steamers. There are Vickers & Maxim and the Armstrongs, in Newcastle, and there is Scott, and Swan & Hunter. I say that, outside of the government yards, these are the establishments on which Britain would rely to construct the navy or make an addition to it. Britain has not shops to build guns and prepare them for these large ships in excess of the British programme, and they are behindhand now in the construction of the guns necessary for large ships, which take a long time to build, and only a select number of establishments can produce them. My own opinion is that they are made in the government shops, but with that fact I am not familiar. Further, there is a great scarcity of shops capable of producing armour. I believe the armour supply is behind the construction of ships; and that therefore no matter what exertions would be made with the present outfit, England would not be able to produce any more ships than are outlined in the government programme. England does not possess a sufficient number of shops to produce with rapidity the auxiliary engines and appliances which are required for these vast ships. I see by the 'Engineering Magazine' which deals with the construction of ships in the various yards in England; that there are from 125 to 150 subordinate engines in each ship for the various mechanical appliances, and that they are largely electrical, that there are only one or two establishments able to produce them. So no matter what exertion is made, until those establishments multiply, the British fleet could not be augmented by any contribution from Canada or anything in that direction tending to the augmentation of the British navy; that it must be allowed time to work out this programme, in order that a sufficient number of high class ships may be produced for the purposes of the British navy. I would say by the policy indicated by the hon. leader of the opposition, of having the ships built in England, we would lose the inestimable advantage of starting ship building in Canada; that we would lose the advantage of having the trained officers, the advantage of trained mechanics for repairs, and the advantage of having trained seamen to man the ships after they were constructed; that all that is in embryo as regards a Canadian navy has to be laid aside and discarded, and that we are to make no start in the creation and maintenance of our own defence, but for ever must depend upon the cash we may have contributed on this occasion, and have none of these material advantages which we shall inevitably need in the future. When I was in the Commons in London, I heard the debate on the Naval Bill. A gentleman arose and attacked the government for laxity and inactivity, that they had allowed the navy to languish, that they had not maintained the proper standard, that they were playing into the hands of the enemy. I heard a reply made by the government that the British government had this year, in course of construction, and would finish five ironclads, five battleships, five cruisers, and twenty destroyers; that at the time when this alarming German programme would be worked out to completion about 1912—and my learned friend says they are delaying more or less in the execution of this—they would have thirty-eight British battleships ready to place in the line, beside all those that my hon. friend has indicated were laid off, as of ordinary value, good for whatever purpose they might be used for, as accessories to the main fleet of thirty-eight modern British battleships ready to defend the shores of Britain against the enemy or to attack the enemy if that should be deemed more expedient. I regret to say that the Conservative party in England resemble to some extent the Conservative party in other countries; that is that they use the navy scare as part of their political programme.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE—That they have introduced as one of the planks of their party platform a subject which should be sacred and above party, the defence of the nation, and they use that as a means of catching votes for the Conservative candidates, because the Conservative party favoured a strong navy, and the Liberal party were objecting to the navy and were imperilling the safety of the empire. That was a regrettable feature. It is deplorable, because all parties are united in their view of assisting in imperial defence, although they differ as to the means of execution. But patriotism is never brighter or more sincere in the Conservative than it is in the Liberal ranks.

I also had the pleasure of conversing with some shipping men of Germany, very intelligent and well informed gentlemen. They expressed astonishment at the alarm which was exhibited in England. They claimed that Germany was misrepresented in being singled out as the antagonist of England. They objected that Germany's naval policy should be pointed to as an object lesson for naval preparation in England, made a butt of in the theatre, the subject in the pamphlets and newspapers, the topic for the street and for the politician. They said Germany announced her programme and stated exactly what she would do. There was no concealment about it. At a certain time they would build so many ships, at another time so many more, and they went on with their programme undeterred and uninfluenced. Germany they said, in 1912 will have 18 battleships; Great Britain at the same time will have thirty-eight battleships. Where is the ground for alarm on the part of true British seamen? With 38 ships manned by good British sailors and competent officers with all the traditions of the British navy behind them, are they scared of 18 German ships? Of the 18 ships, there will be some modern ones; but at the present time of modern ships the German navy has but two, the 'Westfalen' and the 'Nassau.' It is true that they are armed differently from the British ships. They have about the same quantity of broadside guns; but they are fitted out with a large number of smaller guns, because the experience of the United States in the Spanish war, and of Japan in the war with Russia, has been that the damage was not done by the great guns, but by the constant shower of projectiles from small guns which destroyed the crews of ships and rendered the service unbearable and caused so much heat, as to set fire to the ships. So we have no cause for alarm because of the German navy at the present moment, so far as the ships in existence go; but Germany is well fitted out with yards for the construction of ships. I do not speak now of the dockyards at Wilhelm's Haven or Kiel, because I do not know their capacity or their programme of construction; but I know that the priavte yards, Blom and Voss, at Hamburg, and Schiseau, the Vulcan works at Stettin, are capable of constructing ironclads. They have, in addition, numerous shops where the subordinate and electric engines can be constructed probably more rapidly than in England, and they have the inestimable and unapproachable advantage of the great Krupp works at Essen, which can turn out ordnance of the largest description with greater rapidity than can be done in England. Krupp has a trained force of 6,800 men in one yard which could be augmented to 30,000 men if necessary, all specializing on that description of work. That is a formidable power in any nation, and we behold it with admiration, wonder and respect. In speaking with these gentlemen confidentially, they said to me Germany has no intention of going to war with England. Germany has not marked out England as an antagonist. Germany is closely allied with Great Britain. The Emperor of Germany is a nephew of our King. There is no family quarrel; there is no conflict of dynasty; there is nothing which crowned heads go to war about. Germany and England are kindred people. They recognize that they must march along the road of progress in company in the emulation of science, arts and construction, and world subduing if necessary; but there is no antagonism, no burning jealousy, nothing which would occasion the immediate warfare that my hon. friend has pointed out. Furthermore, they said Germany is acquiring colonies. Those colonies may be attacked; we must defend them. Germany is increasing her commerce, we must protect that commerce; Germany is embarking on a shipbuilding propaganda. They essay to have lines of ships running to all parts of the world. It is natural for them to do so. They have the production, they have the engines, they have kindred people in various parts of the world. It is very natural that they should strive to protect their commerce from the aggression from any power which would wantonly attack or injure any of their subjects. They further say that in the Franco-German war they had no war vessels. The French navy predominated. They had to lay up their shipping. They lost the commerce of the ocean; their commerce was set back for years. The French navy dominated. So soon as it was observed that the German navy could not keep the sea, and German commerce was laid up safely out of the way, the French took their guns and seamen to man their fortifications and to aid the army. Germany felt the great deficiency, so they set to protect their shipping and carry out a peaceful propaganda, and it is necessary for them to have a strong and if necessary a formidable navy, so that the wanton aggression of any strong power shall be checked at the outset by the dread of reparation being demanded and of injury being inflicted in consequence of wanton aggression. They said further: 'We are intelligent men; we do not think it is necessary for Great Britain to maintain the two standard navy. Why should Great Britain keep on constantly arming, and why should other nations not protect and defend themselves? Is this great, unmatchable, formidable force on the ocean not to be viewed with some degree of alarm by other powers? When may Great Britain cease to be moderate? When may Great Britain not wish to assert brute force if necessary, and why do they persistently keep on preparing and continuing such a vast force as the inhabitants of Great Britain say is necessary for the vindication of her honour and the protection of her flag?' Now, there can be no answer to this. They regard the fatherland as being of the first importance. We regard Great Britain as being of the first importance. Nations differ.

I think it is but fair to assume that what the admiralty did when there was a feeling that war was imminent the British admiralty would do again under similar circumstances. What did the British admiralty do? When there was a real or imaginary scare with regard to aggression by Germany, they withdrew their ships from the colonies, brought them home and marshalled them in the North sea and around the shore of Great Britain, and left the colonies to their own resources, and to defend themselves if war should be the result of that movement. Now, I do not think there is anybody in this House would urge the opinion that the colonies are of more importance than Great Britain herself. We all believe that Great Britain is the citadel of the empire; that if the citadel falls, the colonies fall as a matter of time and event, and that everything which can be legitimately sacrificed should be sacrificed so as to make the British islands immune, certainly safe, certainly secure. Nobody that I have heard differs from that opinion, but at the same time we must have a regard to what would be our own condition if the fleet of England were withdrawn and what would be our condition if after we had spent all our money, if we had built our ironclads and had placed them in line with the British ships, an attack should be made upon us and we had spent our money and had prepared nothing for our own defence. How would we face the people of the country? My hon. friend suggests a plebiscite; how would he face the country if he said we have spent all the money we should have used in the construction of ships; we have no ships, no arsenals, no place for repairing ships, no seamen, no defence whatever. We are at the mercy of any enemy that may attack us or Great Britain. We had the means and we deluded you with the idea that we were at least doing something in the way of self-defence. Could the hon. gentleman face the country on that? We are all agreed that when Great Britain is at war we are at war. Whether we like it or whether we do not, we are at war and would be subject to attack. Whether the Governor in Council declares us to be in a state of war, or whether the King puts us in a state of war, whether war is declared by England first or whether we are first attacked by another power, we are at war and must bear the brunt of war. We feel the evils of war, and we should be prepared for it. We know that an attack will be made on the battle lines, and we know also that before the battle lines are drawn together, and oppose one another, attacks will be made upon the colonies of England, and upon the commerce of England, the great ship-owning power of the world. A great portion of the wealth of England is in her commerce, and her ships are on every sea. What would be the first object of a power entering on a war with Great Britain? Before her commerce could be defended, before the colonies could be put in a state of defence, attacks would be made upon them first. The battle line may be drawn to meet the fleet of an attacking nation, but the enemy would send ships out to attack the commerce of Britain all over the globe, and to attack the colonies of Great Britain wherever they may be. For that state of affairs we ought to be prepared. I ought to say further, that while the colonies have been reproached for want of patriotism and chivalrous feeling towards the mother country, I assert, and others will confirm what I say also, that Canada at least has been always patriotic, has always been chivalrous in its regard, and has frequently sacrificed herself out of that sentiment of loyalty and attachment to the British Crown and people; and now is the time for reciprocity in sentiment. Now is the time for the British people to see that they regard and value the attachment of the colonies, and no longer isolate themselves, with a programme of defence solely for the British Isles, leaving the colonies to shift for themselves. They should take part promptly in the defence of the colonies, make arrangements for the defence of the colonies, and take such steps as would cement the colonies to the mother country by a generous treatment, by a reciprocity in sentiment in regard to the colonies matching that keen and tender sentiment which the colonies hold to the motherland—that it shall be the golden link holding together the empire everywhere, the profound and genuine sentiment of all parts contributing to the welfare of the whole. That is loyalty, and that is patriotism.

We have frequently heard of the two-power standard for the British navy, and this was dealt with in the British House of Commons by some gentlemen who thought they had the weapons for successful attack on the government. They said that the programme laid out was that Britain should be able with her fleet to match the fleets of any two powers; that is, that England should be equal to Germany and France, or to Germany and Austria, to France and Italy, or any combination of two powers. But they were not prepared to maintain any two power standard against any one power in Europe and the United States combined. The United States have doubled the population of England. The United States has greater resources than England. The people of the United States are maritime. They have prepared a respectable fleet of most formidable ships. I read in the papers the other day—I do not know whether the statements are true or not—that the 'North Dakota,' and 'Connecticut' were able to throw a broadside fifty per cent heavier than the 'Dreadnought.' The British government are striving to augment the calibre of their guns, and the weights of their broadsides, to make them equal to those ships. The experience gained in the Spanish war has been utilized in the American navy by the addition to the broadside guns of small guns enabling their ships to fusilade the enemy, and to reduce them to a state in which they cannot cope with the big guns. The United States has coal on its seaboard, and it has illimitable resources inland. It is a formidable sea power, and it will be the policy and the interest of the British government to work in harmony with that kindred nation for the benefit of the world, and for the progress of humanity. I concur in every word that was said by the learned leader of the opposition last night in his eulogy of the United States, and also as favouring a disposition towards harmony and peace; that causes of conflict should be avoided, and that we should live with our great neighbour along harmonious lines, tending to the securing of the great objects which these nations have in view. I concur in that, and I commend that portion of the hon. gentleman's speech to the mind of everybody here present as the result of enlightened patriotism and sound common sense. If, however, I commend that portion of the hon. gentleman's speech, I cannot have much sympathy with the facetious way in which he treated our efforts at an embryo navy. He said that we had just eleven ships, and he divided them arithmetically. He had five and a half of the ships on the Atlantic, and five and a half on the Pacific. I do not know whether he divided them longitudinally or whether he divided them transversely, whether he cut them up across the middle, or whether he divided them up the middle; but certainly there were only five and a half ships on the Pacific, and five and a half on the Atlantic. But my hon. friend knows that a nation cannot construct a large navy at once. The British government has been constructing its navy for hundreds of years, and as fast as they build ships they become obsolete, go out of fashion; and it is true, as he said, that there were long lines of ships that had not taken part in the demonstration at Portsmouth, and there are millions of pounds worth of ships that are no use against formidable ships of the modern type. A navy cannot be constructed to beat us in a day or a year. It requires the slow process of evolution to prepare the ship, to prepare the machinery, to prepare the officers, and to prepare the men for the great conflict which will ensue, and for which they are prepared. My hon. friend, as part of his scheme of tactics, said that our navy would be of no use to the British fleet or to Canada. I do not know by what process of reasoning he arrives at that conclusion. I do not know whose views he expressed, if they were not his own; but if those ships are to be of no advantage to the British navy, neither would the British navy employed and handled as he seemed to indicate be the best means, for the accomplishment of the purpose. We know that the British admiralty have British prejudices. We know that some of them have very narrow British prejudices, and we know that some of them have expressed the opinion very freely that the colonies are not worth very much. My hon. friend indicated that it was essential to the defence of the empire and to the successful handling of the fleet that it should be under one head and one management. I beg to differ from the hon. gentleman. If he looks back on history, he will remember that the most substantial triumphs performed and won by the British navy were won under precisely the reverse circumstances. My hon. friend remembers the great battle won by Earl Vincent. Sir John Jarvis had under him a second who disobeyed his orders, and who attacked the rear of the Spanish fleet when he saw that the van could not come down to aid their comrades, and achieved the great victory of St. Vincent, that won for Britain the command of the Mediterranean, that saved India, that led to the battle of the Nile, which vindicated the immunity of the British shores. Does he not remember that time when Sir Hyde Parker signalled to Sir Horatio Nelson the recall, and how Nelson put his eye-glass to his blind eye, and said: 'I don't see it; keep my flag flying for closer action.' Where did the second in command come in? And do you remember the victory of the great battle of Trafalgar when the immortal Nelson divided his ships into two parts, and gave one to his friend, Collingwood, and one to himself, and said: 'No man can make any mistake in tactics if he lays his ship beside the ship of the enemy', and together they went into action. There was no question of 'second in command' there. Each man acted for himself. England expects every man to do his duty, and let every man carry out that command to the best of his ability, for Nelson said that the duty of an Englishman was to kill as many Frenchmen as possible.

In my feeble way I have endeavoured to suggest to my hon. friend how the ships constructed in Canada can be an advantage to the British navy, and secondly how they can be an advantage to Canada. Would it not be a great advantage to a navy drawn up in antagonism to a navy of superior power and numbers, if the commander of that navy knew there was an auxiliary force which might aid him at a time when otherwise it might be mastered by the enemy, or at least when its attention should not be distracted, and a part of that force could not be diverted to the defence of the outlying positions or to the defence of commerce. Here an auxiliary force would come in and be of service. It would prevent the disintegration of the main force, it would take care of the vast British commerce, because, with another base, and with another place of refuge, ships could be maintained and sent out outside the main battle line to protect the interests of the motherland when her own force could not be diverted for that purpose. Consequently, a force originating in Canada would have to command all these seas. If adequate, it could protect the shores of Canada. it could protect our own shipping, it could convoy some of the mercantile fleets of the motherland. In addition to that, the conflict may not always be looked for in the German ocean or in the North sea or in the Atlantic sea or Mediterranean, it may be on the broad Atlantic alone. What advantage would it be to have in a port, immune from capture by a foreign fleet, a safe coaling place? Coal would be a contraband of war. My hon. friend went over a long list of the coaling stations of the British navy in various parts of the world. Many of them would be useful temporarily until the coal stored in them would be exhausted. Who would like to see the fleet locked up in some place where no coal is produced, where the warships would have to depend upon the fleets of colliers when the coal supply in store was shut off?

We have in Nova Scotia valuable coal mines. We have in Halifax a port fitted for the construction and repair of ships on the Atlantic ocean. It is a strongly fortified place. The British government has been working at it for a number of years. They have mounted the best of guns. They have erected forts where the engineering science has shown the best defence that could be afforded. The British government has spent one million of dollars in preparing just such a place to fit the exigencies of our Canadian navy, and at this time we should be awake to those facilities and take advantage of our opportunities in preparing for events which may happen in the near future. The British government have a great deal of coal in Bermuda. I believe they have coal stored there. What would happen to a British fleet after an accident took place, if they took refuge in Bermuda to be repaired, supposing a foreign fleet surrounded the island? No colliers could reach there. They would have to capitulate to the enemy for want of provisions and supplies, for the largest and best ships in the world cannot move unless they have the motive power; and there is no place in the western world, under British rule, which can equal Nova Scotia in the matter of supplies. We have coal inland, and have forts in the harbour which can be defended against an adversary. As a refuge, as a reliance, as an issuing point and basis for operations on the Atlantic, it is unequalled. Perhaps I should not express the views I have expressed, but I have answered some of the remarks of the hon. leader of the opposition. I had looked forward to twenty years of peace in Canada, and to the development of the country, and I hope that our population will be equal to that of Great Britain in that time, that our resources may be so developed that, should a war occur with any European nation, we may have an army and a fleet that we can depend on. I had hoped that the sentiment pervading this continent would be: The war drum throbs no longer, and the battle flags are furled, in the parliament of men, the federation of the world. Canada might have gone forward in years of peace to develop her resources, and all things that make for peace, righteousness and glory of nations, but the programme may be altered; we may have to resort to arms. We are not confronted by the barracks of other nations, and armed bodies of men. It seems as though the resources of the most enlightened nations of Europe are all directed to devising contrivances for the destruction of a possible enemy. It is a lamentable feature and a blot upon Christianity and civilization that some of the best intellects are devoted to inventing machines to destroy the greatest number of their fellow-citizens.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE—I think we may have also to follow the maxim that if you are prepared for war you are in the best position to avert it, and we cannot be prepared for war suddenly. We cannot be prepared for war in a day or year; we must necessarily commence moderately, and in accordance with our means gradually work up and expand our natural resources until we have a formidable power to prevent aggression, and to prevent insult, and at the same time defend ourselves and our commerce and give us security and peace. This measure is precise; it is along practical lines; it is moderate; and I shall be glad to give it my support.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (British Columbia)—The right hon. gentleman who introduced this Bill a few days ago said it was a Bill of very great importance. I fully agree with him, but I would like to have seen him attach a little more importance to it. I would like to have seen provision made in this Bill for the immediate assistance to the mother country to show our sympathy and loyalty. However, that was not done, and is not going to be done, and we must just take what we are given. The hon. gentleman from Calgary, in his speech yesterday, pointed out to us in a very lucid manner the progress of Germany from a number of small municipalities up to the world power it is to-day, not only a wonderful nation, but a menace to Great Britain. I may be asked what is my reason for saying that we ought to send money to Great Britain to help her build a navy. I will briefly give my reasons. The hon. gentleman from Calgary pointed out to us the opinions of statesmen in England, not our own statesmen, but the opinions of gentlemen at the helm of state, who see that there is apprehension and danger in the air. What do we find? We cannot and should not shut our eyes to the fact that two mighty nations, separated by a narrow sea, are arming to their utmost, day and night constructing engines of war—not only monsters of the deep, but monsters of the air. What is all this for? Is it for peace? German ambassadors, and other men of note, assert that Germany is building a strong navy to protect her commerce. Such statements do not coincide with common sense, the comity of nations, and daily experience. No nation, however strong, interferes with the commerce of weaker nations in time of peace. How then can such extensive preparations for war mean peace when Europe has had a long period of peace, without the arming and preparation now going on? For many years there have been no war clouds. Now, no one can deny that ominous clouds hang over Europe. As an integral part of the empire are we to sit with our hands folded and watch the shock of battle, crying peace when there is no peace? I do not speak of my own observation, but rather from the opinions expressed by statesmen, members of the British ministry, who admit there is danger and emphasize their opinions by going on as fast as workmen can work preparing engines of destruction. Is all that for nothing? Is it for peace? Is Canada, the largest and most wealthy dominion of the empire, to do nothing in an emergency by strengthening the centre of empire where the shock of battle will first be felt should war come? The British navy is the first line of defence, and our first line. Should that be broken, we are helpless. New Zealand is much more distant from the centre of warfare than Canada, and look what that colony is doing. With a population of 900,000 and 40 millions of a revenue, she is paying the cost of a first-class battleship, compared with our seven million people and $100,000,000 revenue offering no immediate help. If this Dominion had done what many in the country think ought to have been done and guaranteed the interest on the cost of two of the latest type battleships to cost about twenty millions of dollars, the annual interest on which would be at 3½ per cent $700,000—then there would be strong signs of substantial help. Should war break out in one, two or three years from now, how would we appear in our own eyes, and how would we appear to the whole world? Should we stand by without contributing in the smallest degree towards strengthening the first line of defence, which is our own defence—the strengthening of the centre and stronghold of the empire? Should that line be broken through where would Canada stand? Would it not be as a conquered country for anything we have done or could do to avert the calamity? I will now turn to the scheme under consideration. Based on a peace footing within the empire, I give it my full approval. It is a step in self-reliance and will be an excellent thing for many of our boys and men who may be unemployed, and in time, as the force grows, may be of help to the empire. Meanwhile the ships we are getting will be useful in guarding our fisheries, and shores from depredations, and at the same time relieve Great Britain of the necessity for an oversea navy. I did hope the present scheme of naval defence (although useless in an emergency) would have received the full approval of all in parliament and in the country. This important question should have been kept entirely apart from politics, and perfected from the matured opinions of leading men on both sides—unfortunately that was not done. It has been made a political football. There should not have been room for the manufacture of political capital. It has been surrounded by a torrent of language, sharp, recriminative and unbusinesslike, and not appropriate to the question.

Much to be regretted vent was given to expressions treating of separation and independence. Separation from the British empire—what next? A small republic, frequent elections, the country racked with political strife, commerce unsettled and many evils which I will not dwell on. It may be asked what presses heavily on us now? Nothing. Are we not as free as the air we breathe? Can we not say, do, and worship as we like? Who can show the benefits of separation? Thousands living under our present system and imperial connection have much to be thankful for in the freedom we enjoy. The floating of the British flag over us conveys a feeling of security and full liberty. In case of an emergency, we might lay submarine mines in such positions that no hostile ships could land on our shores. This would be an economical and effective means of defence. We have to consider that Great Britain cannot adequately protect her numerous, distant and vast possessions. Her first work will be, in case of war, to defend the British Isles, and, of not less importance, keep the food route open, which is essentially necessary to the sustenance of the nation. Without getting into a panic, I think in common with wiser men than myself, that the present condition of the empire gives cause for apprehension and gives a warning to be fully equipped and ready for the worst. It may not be out of place, whilst on the question of defence, to express the opinion that our land forces should not be crippled numerically or financially. Unfortunately we have to realize the fact that we have within our borders, an unruly, law-breaking element supported and encouraged by a law-breaking element in another country, which necessitates a strong mobile force to maintain law and order at all costs.

Seeing then there will be a heavy strain on our finances externally and internally, will it not be well to abandon large and unprofitable undertakings, such as the Georgian Bay canal, and the Hudson Bay railway, both of which would be blocked by ice from five to six months in the year?

Some hon. gentlemen may not like these economical suggestions, but they will remember they are only suggestions. Nevertheless they are worth considering.

Anything said in this House with regard to the construction of ships in this country will doubtless fall on deaf ears. Nevertheless, I would say that too much care cannot be taken in selecting naval architects and artisans of good repute and high standing. Some speakers and writers have stated that the United States would come to our assistance in case of war. A member in another place stated that Russia and France would come to the aid of Great Britain if she were assailed by Germany—Russia is not in a position to provoke Germany, and France, however willing, could not move a finger with her poor navy and with an armed force of 3,000,000 ready to cross the borders—whatever we may think, or wish, the two nations named are at present powerless to help us—dominated as they are by a third nation, which aspires to be the naval power of the world—Great Britain has to rely on herself and her dominions. It may be said it is easy to find fault. So it is, and it is doubly easy when there is a weak spot in the armour. I think, however, that every one who criticises the present scheme should be able to suggest a substitute, although the government may not accept it. My suggestion, I repeat, is to strengthen the seat of empire first, for in this lies its defence and that of the dominions, and go on perfecting the Canadian navy as fast as circumstances will permit.

Hon. Mr. LEGRIS—This Bill we are now invited to approve is of the most serious character. It involves entirely a new departure in the political and constitutional aspect of our country. It may bring with it consequences which it is impossible for us to foresee to-day. Canada's wants at present are too numerous and pressing to allow of the idea that we can afford to expend millions of money by assuming the responsibilities involved in the present Bill. To my mind it should not be adopted, for many reasons: first because it will impose upon the shoulders of the Canadian people an unjust and unnecessary burden of millions and millions of dollars; second, it will change our constitutional position in wiping out a part of our autonomy; third, because the question of a navy has never been made known to the public, but has rather been carefully concealed from those who will have to pay for an unnecessary navy. According to the Bill itself, and according to the law as laid down in the British North America Act, the whole of our navy will not only be at the disposal, but practically in the hands of the British authorities, who will control their diplomatic relations with other countries of the world and decide peace or war independently of us. At the same time, it will throw Canada under the flail of the 'vortex of militarism,' so strongly opposed by the Liberal party when in opposition, and so eloquently described as criminal by the Prime Minister himself, on many occasions, and even not very long ago. For my part I can see no pressing necessity to build a navy. On this point let me quote a few words uttered by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Speaking in the House of Commons, on the 29th of March, last year. He said:

> Canada has no quarrel with any one, she does not desire any territorial aggrandisement, she occupies geographically an isolated position, and she has only one neighbour, with whom she has been at peace for nearly one hundred years.

Hon. gentlemen, this sentence is as true to-day as it ever was. If so, where is the urgent necessity for a Canadian navy? We have had none so far. Our relation is unchanged, or rather is bettered, with other countries of the world. Surely it is useless to speak of having a navy except for vainglory's sake, or the pleasure of spending public money, precisely at this moment when the very question of a general disarming is seriously considered and discussed between leading nations of the world so as to give hope that it will take place before long. Up to date all the Canadian statesmen we have had, whom we have reason to be proud of, have been unanimous in proclaiming that the whole obligation of colonies towards the mother land does not extend beyond the defence of their own territories. This is the way which in the past we have always understood our duty. Both the present Minister of Militia, and the Prime Minister have spoken in the same terms as their predecessors on this question. Why is it that all these principles are so suddenly overthrown to-day? This is what I am unable to understand.

The vast area of this country, the exceedingly costly public works we have had and still have to construct, should justify us in declining to take action now.

Let us consider the peculiar position of this Dominion, a young country with a population of hardly seven millions scattered over a vast area stretching from the Pacific to the Atlantic, a distance of nearly 4,000 miles; a country which has already spent hundreds of millions of dollars in the opening of expensive but extraordinary commercial communications by rail and by water, large public works which are not yet all completed and which are not designed in the interests of Canada alone but in the interests of the whole empire, as proclaimed by Sir John A. Macdonald and other prominent men when advocating the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway, including the present Prime Minister, as I shall show by quoting you a few lines of his speech of the 15th of April, 1902. On that occasion Sir Wilfrid Laurier said:

> I have no hesitation in saying that I share altogether the views which have been expressed by Sir Charles Tupper more than once, that Canada has done more for the defence of the British empire by the construction of the Intercolonial railway and the Canadian Pacific railway than she could have done by spending that money in military armaments.

If the right hon. Premier had to repeat to-day the very same declaration, no doubt he would also mention the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway which will probably cost $250,000,000 before being completed.

Hon. gentlemen this is exactly my contention. We have done our large share in the advancement of the British empire and for the glory of the British flag on the American continent.

Now, let us remember that we are planning other large enterprises, such as the Hudson Bay railway, and more particularly the Georgian Bay canal, which it is estimated will cost another hundred millions of dollars and possibly one hundred and fifty millions, and which has been delayed, according to a declaration made by some ministers of the Crown on the floor of the House of Commons, on many occasions—and the declaration was repeated by the Prime Minister a few weeks ago when addressing a public meeting in Ottawa—only because it would be unwise and imprudent to undertake for the present a work of such magnitude without possibly compromising the financial position of Canada, or at least not before the completion of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway. Considering also the large public debt which is constantly increasing, and on which this country has to pay interest, I say this new departure for the construction of a navy, its origination and its maintenance, will impose upon the shoulders of the Canadian people an unfair, undue and excessive burden.

There are far better investments we can make in behalf of the empire and of Canada than expenditure upon navies or greater military organization in the immediate present.

Canada's best contribution to imperial advancement has been in the past, and still is to-day, in the opening up of her great lines of transportation and the development of her material resources in order to supply the British people with better and cheaper foodstuffs and a home for every British citizen who wishes to come and settle here.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Must we understand that the hon. member is opposed to the establishment of a naval force, and to a contribution in money or in Dreadnoughts? I do not understand.

Hon. Mr. LEGRIS—I am sorry my hon. friend does not understand; but I will ask him to try and listen to me, and when I am through, if there is something not understood by him, I shall do my best to make it clear.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—All right.

Hon. Mr. LEGRIS—As to the probable cost of that scheme, we know very little except that the Prime Minister in introducing the Bill, figured it out at $11,000,000, if ships are bought in England, or $15,000,000 if constructed in Canada, with three million of an annual expenditure. A few days later when moving the second reading, he made a jump and figured out the annual expenditure at $4,253,000. On the other hand, we have Admiral Kingsmill's report in which the annual expenditure figured out at over $7,- 000,000. This is another jump but surely not the last. I honestly think that the real annual amount required for the Canadian navy will figure out at $15,000,000 to $20,000,000 within a few years. At all events, this is not in the Bill. The whole organization is left in the hands of the government. Now, if the calculations of the right hon. Premier are, in this case similar to his calculations of the cost of constructing the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, it is very hard to say how much it will cost and where the expenditure will stop. But there can be no exaggeration in saying that the real amount required for a navy is almost unlimited and is increasing constantly. To my mind, to-day the object is plain: get the country once committed to the adoption of a navy, and it will have to face the expense whether it be 10, 15 or 25 millions of dollars a year.

When a child is born it must be brought up, it must be nourished and protected.

As I have something more to say on this subject I move the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

A SATURDAY SITTING.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I take this opportunity to give notice that I may to-morrow move that when the House adjourns, that it will adjourn until Saturday. This is merely a matter of precaution. I hope the business will be sufficiently forward to leave Saturday to hon. gentlemen; but it will depend. Meantime I put this notice on the order paper.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I draw the attention of my hon. colleagues and the hon. senator from Ottawa to the fact that we have suspended this motion to suspend the rules on this Montreal Terminal Bill, and I thought that he would perhaps move it now.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—That motion can be made when the matter is under consideration.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—If there was any one objecting we could not take that step. The notice has been given. The notice is on the order paper.

The Senate adjourned until three o'clock.

SECOND SITTING.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

MONTREAL CENTRAL TERMINAL COMPANY BILL.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS moved concurrence in the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours to (Bill No. 44) An Act respecting the Montreal Central Terminal Company.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think it is only fair to myself and the House to explain why I seconded the motion of the hon. gentleman from Rockland. The ruling which was given on Thursday last was to the effect that the hon. gentleman from Rockland, in charge of the Bill, having expressed the wish that the Bill should be withdrawn, and having, in fact, moved that the Bill be withdrawn, that the Bill was no longer before the House. The position has changed in the meantime. The hon. gentleman from Rockland, who represents the promoters, has moved that this Bill be reinstated on the orders of the day, and that motion has been carried, and consequently, the measure is now before us, and is open to be dealt with by the House. The position is different from what it was a litle while ago. The hon. gentleman from Rockland is supposed to be in place of the promoter of the Bill and having asked that the Bill be reinstated on the orders of the day, it is now in the hands of the House.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I move in amendment, seconded by the Hon. Mr. David, that the amendments be not now concurred in, but that the Bill be amended as follows:

Subsection 2 of section 1, by adding after the words 'be used' the words 'by the company,' and by adding at the end of said subsection the following words: 'Provided that this subsection shall not be construed as preventing any other company entering into an agreement with the company in pursuance of section 361 of the Railway Act, from using such bridge or tunnel or approaches for the purpose of such urban service, within the said city, if authorized to do such urban service by its own charter.'

The amendment was carried on division.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE moved that the report, as amended, be now concurred in.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—I would like to ask the mover of this amendment, if it gives the company any more power than was in their Bill when they came before the Railway Committee?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It limits their power.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—They have less power than they had with the amendments which were made in the Railway Committee, and recommended to this House.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It adds to the power they would have had if the amendment was left as it was, and for the reasons that I have explained. I think it but fair, because the amendment, as adopted by the committee, would have practically nullified the whole of the charter, it being a terminal company exclusively, not a railway company.

Hon. Mr. OWENS—If the proposed amendment is carried into effect it entirely destroys the Bill in so far as the terminal railway is concerned. The Bill before the House is the Bill of the Montreal Terminal Company. Their business is merely to do a terminal business, to take the traffic from different railways coming into Montreal, for which they have agreements, and carry it from one part of the city to another. They may transfer their passengers, freight, and cars. According to this Bill, they cannot do either. The hon. gentleman from Mille Iles claims that the amendment is much more favourable than the other. It is not any more favourable for the Terminal Company. It provides that other railway companies that have already the right within their charter may move freight or passengers in Montreal, but I fail to see how that in any way would benefit the Montreal Terminal Company. I think the impression has gone abroad that some other members and myself are interested in that Bill. I wish it to be clearly understood that I am not interested in this terminal Bill to the extent of one cent; but I am interested in the city of Montreal, and I fail to see that any company coming into the city of Montreal, which is going to expend, if they obtain their Bill as they should do, twenty-four or twenty-five million dollars, that that is going to do any injury to Montreal, and it is certainly a very great hardship to any company—not referring especially to this particular company —coming before this House with a Bill if outside parties can place an amendment in a Bill and refuse the promoters the right to withdraw. The Senate could ruin parties coming before the House for legislation. Matters would be in such a position in a short time that responsible firms would hesitate before presenting a Bill to parliament, if clauses could be inserted which were foreign to the Bill, and if the House would pass the Bill in that shape. They say the Bill is the property of the House and the promoters cannot withdraw it; but that appears to me to be a strange interpretation, something that was never heard of before in this or any other parliament, and I fail to see why we should deal with the Bill in that way. I would move the proposed amendments. They are not suggested by the promoters of the Bill or any other parties having an interest in it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I am not discussing the right of the Senate to deal with this Bill as they have been doing the last week, inasmuch as there was a vote taken and a decision arrived at. I will leave that matter aside, but the Bill now, with the proposed amendments, gives greater scope and freedom of action to the promoters than they had when in committee. They heartily agreed with the amendments which were suggested and adopted by that committee.

Hon. Mr. OWENS—Wherein do the greater facilities lie?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The greater facility as the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry stated last night, lies in the fact that a company with whom the terminal company can do business, which has already certain rights upon the soil or under the soil of the city of Montreal, will be able to freely exercise them under their charter rights.

Hon. Mr. OWENS—Other companies, but not the Terminal Company.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—But where the terminal company is somewhat tied up is when the obligation is imposed upon it to apply to the city of Montreal for the right to do a certain thing in or under the city of Montreal. This principle was declared to be a good one by the committee, and I am convinced that two-thirds, and perhaps all of the members of the Senate will agree that that is a sound and business-like principle.

Hon. Mr. OWENS—We protest that.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—I asked if a member could withdraw a private Bill?

The SPEAKER—In answer to that I would say I have found this a proposition that a member may ask leave to withdraw a Bill. As a matter of fact it has very seldom been refused, therefore the idea is that a member can always withdraw a private Bill; but where the contrary principle has been contended for, and the question is at issue, the Senate will control a Bill.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—Often a member will say: 'I beg leave to present a Bill in the Senate.' He has a right to present it; there is no necessity for him to say: 'I beg.' He can omit that and say, 'I present.' In this case the hon. gentleman asked permission to withdraw the Bill, and we consequently took a vote on the question.

The SPEAKER—We have got past that question now. Therefore there need be no discussion.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—May I ask, is the position now that this Bill has been cut out?

The SPEAKER—The House has affirmed that position.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—Then if the House has so affirmed, I feel in a very awkward position, because through this whole transaction I have not gone on my own judgment at all, but on the instructions which the promoters of the Bill, as they placed it in my hands, gave me.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—We thought so.

Hon Mr. EDWARDS—Now, it seems to me that it has become a very complicated matter, simply because of the action a few days ago, also because of the agreement which was arrived at last night.

An Hon. MEMBER—There was no agreement.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—I was under the impression that the understanding arrived at last night was this, that the Bill was allowed to stand over on the understanding that an amendment would be suggested on which the parties were more likely than otherwise to agree. I have no knowledge now, for the promoters have said nothing to me to-day, and I am in no position to say whether they have or have not agreed; therefore I feel in a very awkward position. On the other hand, I understand that hon. gentlemen sitting on the other side of the Chamber, dealing with this matter understood it entirely otherwise, to this effect, that it would be permitted that the Bill be reinstated as requested by myself on the understanding that to-day it should go through its stages in the ordinary way. Now, I will give my frank opinion for what it is worth. My opinion is that the feeling of the House is that it would be useless to attempt now to withdraw the Bill again; in my judgment the temper of the House would be against that petition, and while I regret that I am not in a position further to maintain the views of the promoters, it seems to me that I have simply to submit to the dictum of the House and allow the Bill to be proceeded with in the ordinary way.

The SPEAKER—The question is on the adoption of the report, as amended.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—Hon. gentlemen, I move that rules 24. (a) and (b) be suspended in so far as they relate to Bill (No.

44) An Act respecting the Montreal Central Terminal Company.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a third time, and passed.

NAVAL SERVICE BILL.

DEBATE RESUMED.

The order of the day being called:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion for the second reading Bill (No. 95) An Act respecting the Naval Service of Canada.

Hon. Mr. LEGRIS—The members of the House of Commons had no mandate from the electors to sustain the government and the leader of the opposition in that House in such a policy which will swallow up, without any profit whatever to the country, enormous sums of money; a policy involving the most far-reaching consequences without allowing the people, who must bear the financial burden and moral responsibility thereof, an opportunity of pronouncing on the question.

No parliament elected at a time when this momentous question was not even thought of has honestly the right to pledge the country to such an enormous capital cost and annual expenditure as will be required for a navy. I have no hesitation in saying that this navy policy will be a surprise to the electors as soon as they realize its importance. It cannot be otherwise, because the Liberal party when in opposition fought time and again against the money voted for militia expenses. We made speeches on the floor of the House of Commons and on public platforms to prevent extravagant expenditures in that way. Since the present government came into power those expenses have considerably increased, but never up to that famous resolution of the 29th of March, 1909, has a single word been uttered by any minister or any one else to lead the public to understand or to suspect that the creation of a navy was contemplated by the government. Far from it, because a number of utterances and declarations on their part have led the public to believe the contrary. It is neither right nor fair therefore, for the government and their supporters to take advantage of the resolution adopted by the Colonial Conferences held in London in 1902 and 1909, and to prtend that the question has ever since been before the country. Their contention is utterly false, because the bearing of that resolution, if it says so, has never been brought to the knowledge of the public in that way, neither by discussion before the House of Commons, nor through the press, nor on the public platform.

Speaking particularly of what took place in my own province, I have no hesitation in saying it is a well known fact that the ministerial papers have constantly until recent date, eulogized Sir Wilfrid for having been so strong and so energetic as to successfully oppose Mr. Chamberlain's imperialism, and thereby save the country from being drawn into the vortex of militarism. More than that, the country knows that on the 15th of April, 1902, the right hon. Premier, on the floor of the House of Commons delivered himself as follows:

> No, sir, I do not admit that view at all; it would be a most suicidal policy for the Canadian people to go into any scheme of that nature. It would be the most suicidal policy that could be devised for Canada to enter into the vortex, in which the nations of Europe, England included, are engaged at the present time, and which compels them to maintain great military armaments. Sir, what are the relative positions of Great Britain and Canada? Great Britain is one of the foremost nations of the world, in many ways, perhaps the foremost nation, certainly the head of the greatest empire which has existed since the Roman empire. Great Britain, by reason of her situation, has to maintain a large and permanent army. Hon. gentlemen are aware how repugnant to the British people ever was the necessity of maintaining a standing army; hon. gentlemen are aware how the British people have constantly fought against that idea, but they have been forced by events, forced by the position which the empire occupies in the world, to maintain a standing army, and to-day the principal item in the British budget is the expenses for naval and land armament. Now my hon. friend says that Canada should follow in the same course, that we should take part in a scheme of imperial military defence. Sir, Canada is in a different position. Canada is a nation with an immense territory, but with a sparse population of five and a third million of souls, scattered over an area of 3,000 miles in extent from East to West. The principal items in the budget of Canada are what? Public works, the development of the country, the construction of railways, and harbours, the opening up of ways of transportation. This is the work to which we have to devote our energies, and I would look upon it as a crime to divert any part of that necessary expenditure to the supply of guns, cannons and military armaments generally.

I must say that I am not aware that the Prime Minister has ever publicly repented that aspiration.

Why is it that those pregnant declarations are to-day trampled underfoot? This is what I am unable to understand, because I think they were true at that time as I think they are still true to-day. And this is not all, the Prime Minister has spoken that way in many other circumstances, as he declared himself by the following words uttered on the floor of the House on the 29th of March, 1909:

On more than one occasion I have said that I would deprecate Canada being drawn into the vortex of militarism existing in Europe. The situation in Europe to-day is one which cannot be characterized as other than madness.

Now, hon. gentlemen, if this Bill becomes law, we are entering on exactly the same path. And this is not all. To show in what way the conference of 1902 and the whole question of military imperialism has been interpreted and placed before the public by the Prime Minister himself, followed by the ministerial papers throughout the country, and also by men who took the trouble and had the duty to say the truth in writing a page of the history of this country, may I mention one of our colleagues, Hon. Senator David, the Prime Minister's most intimate friend, who in his book, 'Laurier and His Time,' written in 1905, writes as follows:

Extracts from 'Laurier and His Time.'—By L. O. David.

He (Chamberlain) met from the representatives of Canada and Australia a resistance which disconcerted him. The sympathetic position which Laurier had taken in regard to England upon the question of the Transvaal and the despatch of contingents, as well as on the preferential tariff, had given him hope. But, faithful to the programme which he had laid down for himself and to the declarations which he had made before parliament, Laurier refused to involve Canada in the path of imperialism. He proclaimed openly that Canada wished to keep her forces and resources for the development of her own prosperity and could not permit herself to be drawn into the gulf of militarism, but that she was ready to do all that was necessary for her own defence.—Page 97.

These declarations were the basis of the resolutions adopted by the Imperial Conference.

Chamberlain had had recourse to all the resources of his intelligence to lead Canada's representatives, especially Laurier, to modify their point of view, but Laurier remained inaccessible to all seductions. He was ably seconded in his struggle against the great supporter of imperialism by his worthy colleagues, Messrs. Fielding, Mulock and Paterson.—Page 97.

One day Chamberlain had taken him aside after dinner where he had met some of the first personages in England, and had confided to him his disappointment and chagrin at seeing him so obstinate in resisting projects destined to assure the future of the British empire. He urged upon him how honourable it would be for him to associate his name with such a great cause; he made him see in the most brilliant colours the rôle that he wanted to make him play. To all his arguments Laurier answered that England's interest as well as Canada's made it his duty to combat projects which might have the effect of weakening the ties existing between the mother country and her colonies instead of binding them closer.

As Chamberlain pressed him warmly, Laurier said to him:—

Perhaps you think I am speaking to you in this way because I am a French Canadian. Well, consult my colleagues, who are English, and you will see that they share my opinion.

Will you allow me then to see them and to try and convince them, said Chamberlain, very much pleased.

Yes; said Laurier.

Chamberlain saw them and reported to Laurier that he had found them as inflexible as he himself.

It was with difficulty that Chamberlain forgave Laurier for breaking down the scaffolding of his imperialistic policy.

Laurier came back to Canada, ill, seriously ill to all appearances, but more esteemed than ever because of the courageous position which he had taken and kept under the most difficult circumstances. In Canada it was then understood that he had not paid too dearly for the right to speak and act so proudly, and one may ask what would have happened if Chamberlain had had to do with a man dominated by the love of homage and of honours.—Pages 98-99.

In all his speeches, in all his writings, as in his conversation, he never ceases to eulogize the English constitution, the benefits which it has given the world, the liberties which we owe to it. He has more than once expressed the opinion that gratitude and loyalty make it our duty to give England tangible proofs of sympathy, but he has set himself a limit beyond which he does not wish to go. He refuses to part with the liberty and independence of Canada, to launch her into the tortuous paths of imperialism, to pledge the future.—Page 137.

In reality is there on earth a happier country than Canada, a country where can be found in greater abundance all the elements of progress and prosperity?

When one sees all other countries continually exposed to the horrors of war and overloaded with taxes to sustain standing armies, one may well put this question and reflect before throwing oneself into the unknown.—Page 139.

I beg also to quote a few lines from another book, 'Lafontaine et son temps,' written in 1907, by one of our foremost Canadian writers, Dr. Decelles, historian and general librarian of parliament, Member of the Royal Society of Canada. At pages 5 and 6, we read as follows:

Extracts from 'Lafontaine and His Time.'—By Alfred D. Decelles.

The Chamberlain plan, under the disguise of an imperialism which was not without greatness in its conception, presented seductive baits to superficial minds.—Page 5.

But this vast project concealed dangerous snares for us and even for the principal party interested. Was it not of a nature to draw us towards a militarism little in conformity with the aspiration of a young country, all of whose financial resources ought to converge on the development of the public wealth? Then, was it not to be feared that the bellicose attitude which imperialism would impose on us might some day be interpreted by our touchy and powerful neighbours as a provocation? It was the merit, and it will be the honour and glory of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's administration to have refused adhesion to the Chamberlain plan and to have seen better than the English government the peril which it would make Great Britain incur.—Page 6.

I shall now quote a few lines from the leading French Liberal paper in the province of Quebec, published in Montreal, 'Le Canada'. In its issue of October 5, 1903, I read this:

It would only be necessary that a few enthusiasts would pass a resolution and ask intervention to authorize England to take Canada at her word and say: 'all right, send your soldiers and your ships.' And our brave Canadians would be obliged to go and fight for the sake of Macedonia and at the greatest glory of Bachibazouczs. While if we remain as we are, no one can ask us to go to the front. Let those who have adopted this resolution go if they like, but the Canadians won't go. Oh, yes, let us keep for a long time to come the statu quo, where is our safeguard. Let us keep firmly in power Sir Wilfrid Laurier who has given to the Canadian people the assurance that he will not let our country run into the vortex of militarism nor meddle in the disputes of other nations. We are well, let us stay as we are.

Each and all of them, and many others I could quote, if it was necessary to go farther on this point, have said to the people and to the country that they can rest assured that Sir Wilfrid Laurier had saved Canada from the evil of military imperialism.

I have read these quotations to show what the feeling existing throughout the country with regard to this navy question is, and to prove that the good faith of the people is challenged by this Bill, and how big a surprise it will be to the electors when they come to realize that a new and heavy burden, surrounded with great dangers, is thrown upon them and will, no doubt, one day or another draw them into the conflicts of Europe and other countries of the world. Moreover, hon. gentlemen, this is done without giving the people a chance to decide for themselves or sufficient time to make their feeling known through their representatives. The people who will have to pay millions and millions should be given an opportunity to say by their votes, or otherwise, whether or not they are willing to pay the price of that gigantic folly.

For this reason, and others that I have already pointed out, I am unable to support this Bill. In not doing so, I trust I am as good and loyal a British subject as any one in this Senate and in this country.

True, we do not see our way with the same eye; perhaps we do not understand our duty in a like manner. However, I feel that I cannot be wrong in following a policy pursued up to a recent date and enunciated in the past by the most prominent Canadian statesmen we have had, including the Prime Minister of to-day and most of his colleagues and supporters.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—(Speaking in French, of which the following is a resume) said: I would prefer not to take any part in the discussion and simply cast my vote. But, owing to the attitude taken by my compatriots of French origin in the province of Quebec—I mean those who belong to the same political party as I do—I feel that I should stand out boldly and let this House know the opinion of the French Acadians on this question of naval defence. I am not here to find fault with my political friends from the province of Quebec, although their last move seems to have been a blot on their glorious record as defenders of the British empire in times of emergency. Witness Chateauguay, and their attitude in other crises which they take pride in recording. Before I knew what would be the exact position that my leaders in both Houses would take on this question of naval defence, I consulted leading men of my own nationality in the maritime provinces, as to what is their sentiment on this question, and what position we Acadians should take. The sentiment appears to me to be universal that, if any danger threatens the supremacy of England over the seas, and that we can, in however light a way, give any assistance, be it even of a moral nature, we should unhesitatingly give it.

The Speaker went on to show the analogy that exists between the Boers and the Acadians, both nations having defended their country against England with the utmost perseverance and valour. The Boers to-day are among the staunchest supporters of British institutions at home, for the simple reason that British statesmen trusted them as honourable men, and that they are receiving justice and enjoying liberty at the hands of their conquerors. It took four successive invasions from the English to conquer French Acadia. True, they were the victims of an unparalleled calamity in 1755, when they were deported from their country; but their descendants, who number to-day nearly 200,000 souls in the maritime provinces, have learned to appreciate the generous treatment they have received from the British government, and to love liberty as practised among them by the majority. Wherefore it is that, being satisfied with the conditions, they have become truly loyal and sincere supporters not only of the political institutions as they exist in the provinces, but of the higher power which has bestowed upon them the boon of equality and liberty. War between Germany and England seems inevitable, and that war will be one for supremacy. Continuing, he said: although himself opposed to war, and a firm believer in the blessings of peace, yet, since war seems inevitable, it is necessary for us to throw our sword, however light its weight may be into the balance with England. It is a question whether Britain or Germany shall have the supremacy of the seas.

Now, if the ideals of Germany were higher than those of England, if the political institutions of Germany were in advance of those of Britain, if its ethics, religious, political, civil and social were of a higher standard, then we mght remain neutral, and let events take their course in the assurance that, were Germany victorious, we would not be losers. But, in my opinion, such is not the case. I admire Germany and its people. In science, in music, in poetry, in advanced methods of industry they are possibly unsurpassed, though equalled, but in their conceptions of liberty they do not reach the high ideals of the mother of free nations. We must remember that England to-day not only stands at the head of nations that are free but that it has, after securing liberty at home, spread that boon the world over. Britain is the great sower of liberty throughout the whole world. While continental Europe, up to the French revolution, was curbed under the thraldom of despots and autocrats, the English people alone enjoyed, although in a limited degree, the blessings of liberty. Next to religion and with religion, liberty is what makes this life worth living. The one is the completion of the other. In that sense England has aided in evangelizing the world. Wherefore, England, from what it has done for human liberty in the past and for what it is doing now, is worthy of the support of all her subjects of whatever nationality or whatever creed they may profess. Her general standard in that respect, in my opinion, looms higher than that of Germany. Continuing, he declared that he was a hater of war, believing that all that is built up by the sword will perish by the sword. Every structure that is built and cemented in blood will crumble in blood. As proof of that, you have only to go back to Cain who murdered his brother, and to the kingdoms of antiquity, Babylon, Ninevah, Lacademonia and Rome, which, after having become masters of the world through conquest, became in their turn the prey of other nations more virile than themselves. What has become of the empire of Charlemagne? Broken up and disappeared. The empire of Charles V. of Spain is a thing to-day almost of the past. Napoleon's phenomenal conquests were ephemeral, and no doubt Britain will have its turn; but in my opinion the time has not come yet. So long as the ideals of England remain as they are now, so long as she stands for justice and liberty, the time will not arrive for England's fall. It can only come when, like most of the empires that have grown up and fallen in the past, it shall from corruption or other similar causes become ripe for destruction. But notwithstanding the fact that war is hateful, and should be avoided whenever possible, in this present case it seems to be inevitable. Therefore peaceful men must prepare to fight for national existence which implies liberty and justice for all. That fight, when it comes, will be of short duration. Twenty-four hours may decide the destines of Europe, and to a large extent of the world. The enemy will come down like a wolf on the fold. Germany will look, or England will look for a propitious occasion to strike a swift and decisive blow, such as Japan struck at Russia in Port Arthur, and when that battle is over, our fate will have been settled. Either Britain will win, which we all hope she will, and are ready to help her winning, and then there will be no use for a Canadian fleet and Germany will have to disarm on the seas, or Germany will win—and let us pray that she may not—and then of what use would our fleet be? It would simply be a pretext for invading Canada when otherwise she might not be interfered with.

We must not delude ourselves as to the extent of the protection the Monroe-doctrine affords. The Monroe-doctrine forbids European powers from acquiring territory in America; but there is nothing in it about the exchange of colonies, and if Germany were to cripple Britain on the seas, she would be so powerful that the United States might hesitate to prevent her from effecting such an exchange of colonies as would not conflict with the Monroe-doctrine. The danger is the greater—and this shows the wisdom and foresight of British statesmen—that Germany may possibly win, because she will not be alone when the critical time comes. Only to-day, at noon, I was reading of the feverish haste with which Austria is building Dreadnoughts. Unknown to the world, but not to British statesmen, Austria has become a formidable naval power and that for no other apparent object than to help Germany in carrying out her designs. Besides Germany and Austria, there is Italy bound by a defensive treaty to stand by her two allies, which might prevent England from striking the first blow at a moment which might seem to be opportune, for fear of bringing, through the provisions of that treaty, Italy into the fighting line with her two allies. Now, who will deny that the array of those three naval powers, Germany, Austria and Italy, is sufficiently formidable to awaken the apprehensions of Britain? True, with England will stand France and Russia in self-defence, just as Europe stood together against Napoleon for the same object. But Russia's fleet is a thing of the past, and France would have all and possibly more than she could do in withstanding both Italy and Austria. Then England would be left alone to meet that great and to a large extent mysterious power at sea, Germany, with Dreadnoughts of equally destructive capacity with those of England, with aerial engines, of whose destructive powers we know nothing, and with all the resources that science can bring to bear in new methods of naval warfare. France was perfectly secure against Germany in 1870, so was Austria in 1866. Both were defeated by an enemy whose resources in war they underestimated and despised. Germany's power, even at sea, is not to be despised by any nation, not even by England, and hon. gentlemen, when you hear Englishmen asking for aid from the colonies doing, in an imperial sense, what is an act of humiliation, it means that she feels the necessity of collecting all her defensive or offensive powers for the day when the battle must be fought. If we mean to help England in an effective way, we must be there when the battle is on. In my view, all other policies will not only be ineffective, but worse than idle. Therefore, I am entirely against the idea of Canada building a fleet. For us to go to the assistance of England in winning the day that will decide her destiny, and then lay down our arms, is altogether different from this country undertaking to build an offensive fleet. The one policy differs from the other as much as a man defending his home, or in a moment of emergency going to the rescue of his friend knocking their common enemy down, and then resuming his peaceful vocation, from the man that declares himself a professional fighter. By building a fleet, we, in a very lightweight way enter the ring, and range ourselves amongst the military nations of the world. We have no use for that. To what extent would such a fleet defend us on the seas against any first class power? To no extent whatever. It would simply, as I said before, be a provocation to attack. On land we stand to-day with no army, but our volunteer corps. With frontiers better guarded than are the frontiers of Germany itself with its five or six millions of armed men. We have what is better than an army or a fleet. We have the good-will of our neighbours to the south. Customs officers are all that we require to keep ourselves absolutely guarded from any onslaught on the part of the United States of America.

This brings me back to the question of disarmament amongst nations. On that question, I hold views that may seem chimercial, but which I none the less cherish. While all other empires in the past as well as in the present have been born in war and in blood, we have come into national existence without travail, as if born not of woman. The youngest of the family of nations, we are also the privileged one. There is no stain of blood on the charter that made us a nation. We are a child of peace. Why not continue and develop in peace when we have the possibility of doing so. Our country, in size, is the second largest in the world for compact area, the peer of any for wealth and resources, the healthiest in climate, the freest in political and civic government, where religious liberty reigns serenely supreme, whose population is drawn from the sturdiest, the bravest, the brightest of parental stock, English, French, Scotch, Irish, and the new immigrants who will, in the making up, act as reagents in the casting of the best metal. We are the latest of the best nations to come into existence. Perhaps we are destined to become, in some respects at least, the greatest of them all, but with us the cycle terminates. We complete the orbit. We are the last link in the chain of nations girding the world. Beginning of the Orient, civilization at first extended easterly to China, the Gate of Heaven, and Japan, the Land of the Rising Sun, on the Pacific. Westerly it extended to Europe, and thence with Columbus and Cabot and Cartier to America. It is now back to the Pacific coast, facing the Orient. After us no virgin nation remains to be born. At our birth the gates of the Temple of Janus were closed, as they were at the birth of the one who came saying, 'Peace unto men of good will.' In this aspect, our nationality is absolutely exceptional—one might say providential. It seems to me that Providence has reserved us for the experiment of a great country coming into existence, and developing without recourse to the sword, so that it may be an example of peace among nations, and a justification of His word, and a token that Canada may, if it choose, live as a nation up to the end of time. A dream, you say, possibly, but a magnificent dream—one that rises high, founded on the most significant passages of holy scripture. Why not try to live that dream, since we have the possibility of doing it? The building of a navy, in my opinion, would be a national crime. Nay, a crime against Providence, if what I have said is really the case, that we were destined to try the experiment of building up a great nation by peaceful methods.

The hon. gentleman concluded by saying that he would prefer that his leader had moved an amendment to the government measure similar to the amendment moved in the other House, but that he would vote for the amendment, as he considered that a referendum would be equivalent to a condemnation of the building of a fleet which is, above all things, to be avoided if possible.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I followed the speech of the very able senator from Acadia (Hon. Mr. Poirier) with a great deal of pleasure and satisfaction, and I can assure the hon. gentleman on my own behalf, and I think on behalf of a vast number of people in this country, that the sentiments expressed by him to-day are those that will find an echo in the heart of every true, honest Canadian who has the courage of his convictions, who is not bound by party ties and a slave to party considerations. I can assure him that his speech, when translated into English, and published throughout the country will find an echo large and deep in the hearts of the Canadian people. Some of his sentiments were sublime; many of them practical; a few of them contradictory. His allusions to the reign of peace on earth were worthy of the pulpit of any church in this country. His statements in reference to the administration of the country were worthy of any Senate, from Rome down to the present Senate. His last conclusion I am not prepared to condemn nor to accept. The right hon. leader of this House, in proposing this momentous question to this honourable House and to the country concluded his remarks with the following declaration:

I do not intend to dwell at length on this matter, although, of course, there will be no objection to any hon. gentleman who desires to discuss the policy on this question, delivering himself in any way he sees fit.

That declaration is worthy of a statesman. That declaration becomes the leader of the Liberal party in this House; and on that declaration I take the floor. Any member, according to the announcement of the right hon. leader, has a right to express himself and deliver his ideas as he deems best and sees fit. I would hope the doctrine would be emphasized more frequently in the consideration of public affairs, that all men would be free to discuss the affairs of the country as they see fit in the interests of the country, and not of party. As my remarks on this question will not deal with party interests, I shall try to follow on the lines of the hon. member who has preceded me, and deal with it from a higher and a nobler point of view than that of party convenience or party subserviency. I do not know whether he dreamt or whether I dreamt; but his speech was taken from this manuscript.

The ideas that he gave expression to are here in black and white. His mind and my mind run in the same groove. His heart and mine beat in unison; and I am glad to know he is an independent member of this honourable House, and I like to call myself one too, though it does not often pay. In the study and the solution of this naval question which so vitally concerns the Canadian people in growth and prosperity, my guiding star in that study will be solely the development of Canadian national life along the lines of peace and of good will to all other nations, and not along the lines of cruel and bloody warfare against others, with the probable ultimate impoverishment of our own people.

The Dominion of Canada, since its birth 43 years ago, has grown and prospered without so far shedding the blood of any other people either on land or on sea. Let Providence then continue to guide her onward march towards full and free nationhood—and I use the word deliberately. I am one Canadian who feels that colonial ties cannot exist for ever; that Canada has got to become a nation, and probably soon, and that without resistance to Great Britain or to the Crown; for I have authority higher than my own to express that, although not a heart warmer for the purpose. The highest statesmen in England wished Canada years and years ago God Speed on the way of nations. The Brights and the Gladstones and others have stated in their own parliaments that when the day came for Canada to claim its nationhood and a crown for itself, the British government and the British parliament would not stand in its way. These were the views of British statesmen, not petty loyalists of Toronto and other places throughout this country. These were the declarations of men responsible for the welfare of the empire. They cannot here be accused of disloyalty to the Crown or wishing to break up the empire when they made this declaration. I am glad to be heard on the floor of this Senate as echoing those declarations and those sentiments, for, as a young Canadian, I want to see my country, not only free, but independent. That is a dream for me; but I will give the dream to my children, so that they will in time claim Canada as a nation of their own. I have no sympathy, and I have no enthusiasm for this naval service project any more than the highest authorities in this country. I sympathize, not with the opposition, and I sympathize not with the government in creating, as hon. Senator Poirier said in his French speech, a fleet which is a national crime, and I stand here to endorse that statement—let it come either from the opposition, or from the government. The Canadian people have had no need for those engines of war in the past, and the Canadian people have no use for them at present.

In regard to this point let me answer my hon. friend from Acadia when he said in the French language that England was the mother of all liberty throughout the civilized world. As a general statement that is correct, and I hope within a very short time, say a year or two, when the British parliament under Lloyd-George and Asquith will be able to give home rule to Ireland, that it will be universal. England is the mother of liberty for herself in the first place, a most careful, undaunted guardian of liberty at home; but, unfortunately, for her sake, and I am sure for the sake of good influences throughout the world, she has denied to one of the brightest parts of her empire, that liberty which she herself enjoys. But the day is very near at hand when what the Boers enjoy, what the Canadians and Australians enjoy, the Irishmen will enjoy at home, thirty-seven miles from her own coast, and the Liberal party of Great Britain to-day, if it stands true to its promises, and its pledges will take from the Irish nation the chains that have bound it long to a destiny of misery, depopulation, want and starvation. If the Liberal government take the chains off that nation within the next year or two, the Liberal party will not go out of power for years and years to come, because there are no more grateful people than the Irish, and the Liberal party can count on a solid vote from Ireland any time they have an election, of eighty or one hundred, placing in their hands the destiny of the British empire. So that while I admire and approve of all that England has done in the development of human liberty I still call upon her to crown her work by giving the same liberty and same right of self-government to her next door neighbour, her neighbour who was with her in distress, who was with her when she needed help to carry her soldiers through battle; when in need of genius, in need of military valour, who were the heads of the British arms but Irishmen? It has always been a mystery to me that having the brains of the Irish people at her command to prosecute the works of the empire, giving the brains of the country its proper place in the administration of imperial affairs, the same government refused to the ordinary poor people the right to live, to be educated as they want to be educated, as they are seeking to-day to be educated. Casting no reflection on what has been done in the past, we have suffered for it for many and many a century. We are willing to condone all that and willing to forgive. We are willing to wipe out all the bloody statutes that drove Ireland to despair, desperation and starvation. We Irishmen, either at home or abroad, are willing to forget and forgive all on one condition, that we have the right to govern ourselves in domestic matters.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—You can do it.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—We have done it for other nations. This matter is not foreign to the subject we are discussing, because this question embraces imperial matters of great consequences, probably of very injurious consequences. We, in Canada, are prepared to do for the empire what we have done right along.

Let Providence, then, continue to guide her ownward march towards full and free nationhood on the salutary and life-giving basis of peace, and let His Majesty's government and His Majesty's loyal opposition of Canada, keep cruisers and Dreadnoughts in the background. Providence, who rules and directs the destinies of nations, has, in these times of unwieldy ambition and of organized disturbance, given to the other nations of the earth our young Canada as an example of a people climbing and winding their way up the hill of national aggrandisement without recourse to arms, and all the nations respect us for our peaceful methods, and, as a consequence, offer us no source of danger either to our national life, our national institutions, or to our national security. God did not give to Canada the best and last grain fields of the civilized world to turn the fruit thereof into engines of war for the purpose of dealing out death and destruction, but to have the fruit thereof meet the needs and requirements of those of the human race less blessed than ourselves. Therefore, let us cultivate the arts of peace, rather than the arts of war. Let husbandry, industry and commerce have their sway, instead of the old barbarous tactics of cruel warfare.

If the Canadian people will follow along these lines, which, to my mind, have been clearly mapped out to us by a bountiful and beneficent Providence, they will prosper beyond measure, and be a credit to the newborn civilization, which desires to take its key from the 'Celestial voices' of over nineteen hundred years ago, when they sang, in the heavens, 'Peace on earth, to all men of goodwill.'

Let us hearken to that all-saving voice, and let us not in a moment of manufactured foreign scare, or of exuberant and unsound domestic loyalty, cry out in foolish and childish defiance, 'We do not wish for peace, but we want war—at least we want preparations for war.' For remember, that the Highest Authority has declared that he who uses the sword shall perish by the sword. And is history not there to prove, through all the ages, the truth of this divine declaration? Individuals, as well as nations, using the sword have gone to their doom through and under the sword. Let Canada, then, keep away from the use of the sword, and its chances of prolonged and happy existence will be all the greater.

Leo. XIII. has published his opinion of European military preparations, declaring that armies drain the life of the country, withdraw labour from the soil, overtax the poor, impoverish the populace, set the people against each other and intensify national jealousies. Armies are anti-Christian and the doctrine of arbitration is the true principle. But European statesmen, concludes the Pope, do not desire truth.

Let Canada keep to its freight or box cars, as so graphically described by our Secretary of State, and not entrust its fate to cruisers and Dreadnoughts, for the former carry the necessaries of life, while the latter carry the seeds of ruin, misery and death. The moral is evident. Go not on the pathway of war, but on that of peace, and Canada will not be molested either on land or water, for there is still justice and chivalry among nations which keep them from attacking a young nation, who wants and seeks no quarrel with any people, but only desires to be on friendly and peaceful terms with all. Like unto the heroine, described in one of Tom Moore's immortal poems, who with only a collar of gold to adorn her beauty travelled from one end of the land to the other without insult or injury. So will Canada, in her youthful vigour and pride, be able to travel to the ends of the earth without harm or insult, for, as Ireland prized the virtue of a defenceless maiden, and respected and protected her therefor, so will the sister nations of the world prize our unarmed manhood and respect and protect us. If we only had the courage to be men of peace instead of feebly trying to be men of arms, what blessings would not posterity shower upon the memory of the men who would have ensured a permanent reign of peace for this fair Canada of ours, and of theirs. But give to the children of the future an inheritance of war, with its lavish and criminal expenditure and then heed, if you can, the voice of woe, distress and suffering that will arise from the body and soul of generations plunged in the blood of others, as well as of their own, all on account of your action of to-day. Hon. gentlemen, I give utterance to these sentiments not in any spirit of hostility to imperial safety or aggrandisement, nor with any thought that they may prevail in this honourable House at the present moment; but I utter them out of love for my native country and that their echo may ring down the halls of time to the ears of unborn generations, telling them that at least there was one here in the Senate who did not want them to be drawn into the vortex of militarism on land or sea.

Is not Canada taking a contradictory attitude, before the civilized world, in the adoption of this naval warlike policy? Yesterday we sent a Dreadnought of peace to Europe to attend the tribunal of the world's peace at the Hague, in the person of the Chief Justice of the Dominion, Sir Charles Fitzpatrick. His task is to settle international disputes and differences along the lines of reason and justice. To-day we are asked to put Dreadnoughts of war on the seas to settle international disputes according to the amount of human life sacrificed, and according to the amount of injury and damages done to either party; for remember, the success and glory of the victor are gauged according to the number of the killed and wounded, and to the amount of loss and suffering inflicted on the enemy. In the past, the interests of the empire were served by the valour and courage of Irishmen, and I am delighted that to-day we offer to the King the assistance of a bright Canadian brain and loyal heart, to secure the safety of his empire and to promote the general welfare of the human race, according to the Divine will, and not according to crafty statesmanship, too often influenced by and based on pilfering designs.

We have helped the empire for the past 135 years. The Canadian people have kept Canada close to the Crown. It was French Canadian valour and loyalty that kept Canada tied up with the British empire, not an empire at that time, but the United Kingdom. In all the wars before the last century and during the last century French Canadians kept Canada attached to the United Kingdom. So, when people say that Canada is not doing its duty, I fall back on history and say, 'Yes, we have done our duty, and are still doing our duty in building up this country and making it one of the most happy and prosperous portions of the empire. Then we are asked to go further, to leave the land and go on the seas. That I am not prepared to do. We have been at home within our borders during the past 150 years under British rule, and I am not prepared to go out on the seas and risk the happiness, the welfare and the union of the people by taking part in wars that do not concern us. That is our position and that is the position of millions in this country to-day. There is nothing disloyal in making that statement. Why we have followed that practice for the past 43 years since we were a confederation, so that any government in refusing to be drawn into the vortex of militarism cannot be fairly charged with disloyalty. Entertaining these views and guided by these principles, I cannot enter into the schemes of men who seek, for one reason or another, their submersion and their overthrow, for right, and truth, and justice are eternal and must ultimately prevail. Hon. gentlemen, I appeal not to partisanship but to the inner consciousness of all Canadians to uphold the contentions which I have the honour and the duty to lay before this honourable House. I know, however, they will, under the stress of party considerations, be scouted and put aside as impracticable, by this parliament, but what care the Canadian people so long as they live in peace and not at war. On the other hand, has not Canada out of its labour and bounty since the wars of 1776 helped to build up the prestige of the empire and to give truth and substance to the proud saying that the sun, for centuries past, has not gone down on the British flag? Why involve the Canadian people in uncontrollable, ever increasing and useless expense? Why not use our resources to better advantage? The initial cost of the naval outfit would more than pay, for years to come, the expense of maintaining at all foreign courts Canadian ambassadors, and of sending to the principal trades posts of the world, consuls general, who would labour to secure the trade and respect of nations with whom Canada may have to deal. Therefore I say, let Canada have these messengers of peace and trade, instead of cruisers and Dreadnoughts, and then the star of Canada's liberty and independence will shine brighter in the firmament of the political world, never to be clouded, or its light extinguished by the smoke of battle, or hampered in its upward march by foreign jealousy or aggression. And the sun of Canada's abundance will keep on shining for the special benefit of the empire, bringing hope and enjoyment to multitudes of the human kind. What nobler or more glorious future could a young nation, baptized in the pure waters of peace look forward to? What more useful ends could it serve than to be the bountiful and peaceful purveyor of nature's wealth to the other peoples of the earth. Then let Canada accomplish its destinies in peace, in prosperity and in happiness, giving out of its superabundance that, with which to succour the needy and the bleeding among the warlike peoples of the world.

And my plea for peace may be resumed in two words: 'God save the empire, and God continue to direct and bless Canada.'

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Hon. gentlemen, does the establishment of a Canadian navy deserve our approval?

I have no hesitation to answer in the affirmative and to say that the establishment of such a force is a question of duty towards Canada, ourselves and future generations.

I will first consider that question solely from a Canadian standpoint, having only in view the national interest and the future of Canada.

We are happy to be Canadians, to live in a country whose wealth and natural resources are envied by other nations. We are proud to say that there is no country where life is more agreeable, labour more remunerative, individual liberty and patriotic, social and religious institutions more respected than in ours.

But the more we love our country, the more generous the return it gives us for our devotion and our labour, the more incumbent it is upon us to strive to secure its destinies and preserve it from the dangers of the future.

More happy than all the other countries of the world, this Canada of ours has grown in peace and liberty, its resources as developed, being devoted to the country's progress and prosperity, there having arisen no necessity to exhaust its activity and wealth in warlike preparations.

But can we hope that it will ever be so? Can we expect that we will never be subject to the cruel obligations and painful necessities which seem inherent to humanity?

We are told that war is a calamity, even a crime, the most deplorable evil of humanity. It is true, but it cannot be abolished, and while they are cursing it the great nations of the world are now preparing themselves for the greatest conflict which the world has ever seen. People may say what they like, war will last as long as humanity does, and nations unable to fight will always be more or less ignored and despised. And after all it is a question whether philosophers and moralists who contend that humanity needs it in order to strengthen and reform itself, are not right.

Canada will have, in a few years, a population of 10,000,000 souls. A nation of ten millions of people may certainly be expected to contribute in some measure towards the protection of its coasts and its sea-borne trade, and to do something towards maintaining its dignity and its liberties.

Some few who oppose the creation of a Canadian navy announce as one of their objections, their fear that the adoption of this policy will destroy all chance of Canada ever becoming an independent nation. They say: 'Independence has been the dream, the ideal of all strong and courageous peoples. Why should not Canadians have the same aspirations, the same ambitions'?

If these good people were really sincere, instead of opposing the creation of a Canadian navy, they would be the first to demand its creation.

A requirement absolutely essential to a people desirous of maintaining a condition of independence, is that they must be able to protect and preserve that independence and have it respected. There is not a nation in the world, an independent or quasi-independent nation, that does not make great sacrifices to have an army and a navy worthy of consideration.

Let us glance at the following statement:

Belgium, whose population is 7,000,000, spends, annually, for its army, from 12 to 13 millions dollars.

Switzerland, population about four millions; military budget, ten millions.

Netherlands, population six millions; annual expenditure for its army and navy, $20,000,000.

Norway, population about three millions; four millions for its army and more than six millions for its navy.

Chili, population about five millions; military budget, five millions.

Sweden, population five millions; annual war expenditure, five millions.

I might continue and show that small nations having less population than Canada, but occupying, geographically, similar positions, spend three of four times more than we are asked to do, in order to have war vessels. We must, therefore, admit that if Canada were independent, it would have to spend a large portion of its revenue in armaments. And if we were annexed to the United States, our share in the cost of the maintenance of a navy would be still much more considerable, than our share in the cost of a Canadian navy. So that, considering the question solely from a financial standpoint, we are interested in remaining where we are, under the protection of the British flag and to do what is required to deserve that protection.

There is no serious difference of opinion as to the necessity of having a territorial army. Nobody contests the efficiency of our gallant regiments of volunteers, which have shown on several occasions what they could do for the protection and the honour of our country. Well, the organization and maintenance of a naval force is a necessary accessory of our territorial army.

In almost all the wars which have taken place in the country the navy has played a decisive part both under the French and the English regime, upon the sea as well as upon the lakes and the St. Lawrence.

There is in our history a memorable moment. It was in 1760, after the second battle of the Plains of Abraham. Murray was shut up behind the walls of Quebec and both armies, French and English, had their eyes turned towards the Island of Orleans to see which fleet would come first. It was the English fleet that came and Lévis left Murray in possession of Quebec, and Canada was lost to France.

Later on, in 1776, Quebec was besieged by the American and defended by Carleton and the brave little garrison under his command.

Carleton was saved, like Murray, by the arrival of an English fleet, in the spring.

And remember what took place on the lakes.

Carleton, after driving the Continentals from the frontiers of Canada, in 1776, judged that the next important step to be taken was to secure British mastery on Lake Champlain, and the victory won on that lake proved the most effective means of defending Lower Canada from attack. It forced the armies destined for a second invasion of Canada via the Richelieu to retire, and not only that, but during the war exposed the enemy's country to invasion and all the horrors of war, which would otherwise have been inflicted upon the people of Canada.

This fleet was practically a Canadian naval militia force. Its commanding officers, during the war—Captain Pringle, Schank and Chambers—were officers borrowed by the military authorities from the Royal Navy. I am happy to say that Capt. Chambers was an uncle or great uncle of our Mr. Chambers, to whom I owe some of my information in connection with the Canadian navy. So far was the force maintained on the lakes distinct from the regular naval service that Governor Haldimand, in 1778, instructed Captain Chambers that he was to ignore the orders of the commodore in command of His Majesty's ships in the St. Lawrence and even to refuse to supply him with returns as to the vessels and men under his command. Several Canadian officers and many Canadian seamen and voyageurs served in his fleet, on lake Champlain, with distinction. Conspicuous among the Canadian officers was Captain Laforce, who had served in the old French colonial marine before the cession.

The early British successes in the war of 1812-14 were largely due to the fact that with the provincial marine, a sort of naval militia maintained by the army authorities, it was possible to keep control of the lakes.

The Canadian provincial marine service had its share in Brock's glorious achievement at Detroit, August 16th, 1812, the 'Queen Charlotte' covering Brook's right when it advanced against the fort, and detachments of both officers and men from the other provincial marine ships on Lake Erie, under the French Canadian hero Rolette, assisted to man Brock's four field guns.

Without entering into all the operations of the war of 1812-13-14, I may say without any fear of being contradicted that it was clearly shown that the command of the lakes was of the utmost importance to the defence of the country.

At the time of the Fenian excitement, in 1866, so important was a naval force deemed in this emergency, that besides the extemporized gunboats, others were hurried up the canals from sea, and strong detachments of officers and men of the Royal Navy despatched to lakes Erie and Ontario. Eventually, there were 8 or 10 armed vessels on service above Cornwall. A river steamer, the 'Royal,' was armed, made into an extemporized gunboat and manned by a crew from H.M.S. 'Pylades.' Two more gunboats were hurriedly fitted up to patrol the St. Lawrence in the immediate vicinity of Montreal.

The hurried creation of this naval force was very costly; and that it was undertaken by the experienced army generals charged with the defence of Canada shows what great importance attaches to a naval force in the plan of national defence. If a similar crisis occurs again, we should not have to squander money to create an extemporized and probably inefficient naval auxiliary to our land forces.

When the second Fenian Raid occurred, in 1870, another squadron of gunboats was extemporized by the Militia Department.

Before leaving this aspect of the case, I may be permitted to quote the Duke of Wellington, who, in a letter to Sir George Murray, December 22, 1814, wrote: 'I have told ministers repeatedly that a naval superiority on the lakes is a sine qua non of success in war on the frontiers of Canada, even if our object should be wholly defensive.' (Gurwood, XIV, 244.)

It is useless to show that in our time a marine hastily prepared under the cannon of the enemy would not be worth much, and that in order to have an effective naval force it would be necessary to have it prepared in advance of the breaking out of hostilities.

A country where courage, patriotism and honour exist cannot consent to be placed in a position not only disastrous but ridiculous.

Well, let us imagine what would happen now if a war vessel, manned by filibusters, should undertake to attack our cities and towns in the maritime provinces. What would prevent it from bombarding Halifax, St. John—what is there to prevent it going up the St. Lawrence to Quebec, destroying every town and village, and returning to the high sea? And is it not true that on the Pacific ocean, as on the Atlantic, in British Columbia, as in the maritime provinces, our towns are exposed to the same danger?

No, a country like ours, extending from one ocean to the other, having a water frontier of 2,000 miles, must have a navy to protect the great maritime routes of its trade.

There has never been a commercial nation situated as Canada is, that had not a strong navy. Canada cannot think of being independent before it has an army and a navy in order to repel, at least, the first assaults, to resist long enough to allow the protective power to come to its rescue.

But if we have no reason to be unsatisfied with our present condition, if we desire to remain as we are under British rule, how can we do what England requires of us if we expect her to continue to give us her support and protection?

Some people say: 'England does not want our help. She will continue to provide for the defence of Canada as she has done in the past.' It is true that the Imperial Eagle has covered us with its great wings, and that, owing to its powerful protection, we have progressed and thrived in the most beneficent peace. But we cannot forget that at two different periods England has been able to defend Canada because she has had our co-operation. What would have happened if our ancestors, using the argument which is now urged in some quarters, namely, that what we could do to help England was so little, that we had better refrain from doing anything at all—had refused to organize the militia and the regiments of volunteers which, in 1776 and 1812, saved the country? And if that argument is so strong, how is it that all the prominent men, French or English, who have governed the country from the time of the cession and confederation, have spent so much money to organize a Canadian militia, and, mind you, at times of national emergency, marine as well as land militia? If the reasons given for opposing the establishment of a navy are good, they would apply with just as much force to our militia. In our times, a commercial nation needs a navy just as much as it does a territorial army. If then, taking into consideration solely the interest of our country, the creation of a navy is necessary, whether Canada remains under the British flag or becomes independent, why should we refuse to approve the proposal of the government to put into execution—having now the means to do so—the ideas which have occupied the minds of our public men since confederation?

Is it because England asks us to do so? Is it because the navy which it is proposed to build would co-operate in defending England when we would deem it proper? It seems preposterous, nay, absurd to put such a question, but it is justified by the extraordinary utterances of certain public men and newspapers. Our navy will be at the disposal of England when we shall so decide, when we shall deem it advisable to lend her our assistance. Is it so criminal on our part to prepare ourselves to help England to defend herself and her colonies, to defend Canada? If we are not loyal enough to aid England in time of danger, we ought to do so in our own interest, in order not to give England the right to say that since we do not appreciate the advantage of living under her flag enough to make the slightest sacrifice to help her to protect us, she had better abandon our country to its fate. She would really have the right, in the event of us holding aloof, in the way suggested, to address us in the terms indicated; and she would be within her undoubted right were she to withdraw her protection, reserving all her resources for the protection of herself and for such of the other oversea dominions and colonies as were prepared to make their share of the sacrifices which must be made to assure their safety. And then, no better able to defend ourselves than a herd of cattle, we would find ourselves at the mercy of any power that would consider us worth the while to round us up. Those who long for annexation and would have no objection to Canada passing under the American flag, are not afraid naturally, of such a result. But is it the sentiment of the great majority of the people of this country? History teaches us that there was a time when France, engaged in a terrible war in Europe, informed our ancestors who were fighting so bravely to save Canada for her, that she could not send them the help asked for. England would have the right to speak to us in similar terms, and with more reason and less scruples, for she would not have to regret, as France did, that she was forced to abandon a people who had done their duty.

No, we cannot allow the impression to be created that we refuse to do what our interest, our honour and loyalty require, because England might benefit thereby. If we refuse to act in the matter, how meaningless become all these enthusiastic declarations and professions of loyalty which we hear, every day, from one end of the country to the other; how absurd for us to proclaim with our lips that we are happy and proud to be British subjects and to enjoy the free and glorious political institutions of England? Shall we give the people of England and of the world the right to cast in our teeth the reproach: 'Words! Words! Nothing but words."

Our refusal to build Dreadnoughts or contribute to their construction or to have a navy under the control of England is reasonable, and is justified by our determination to preserve our political autonomy, and the large annual expenditure required for the development of our country does not allow us to make such a sacrifice. But how can we refuse to build a Canadian navy, which we need so much, when by doing so we can reconcile our duty towards Canada with our duty towards England.

A few words now regarding the objection that Canada, by contributing towards any scheme of imperial naval defence, courts the danger of being drawn into the maelstrom of militarism, arouses the distrust of foreign countries and invites attack. It seems to me that this objection is met by conditions which at present exist throughout the world and have existed ever since humanity has been grouped together in distinctly defined nations. Various powers combine together for their mutual advantage and form coalitions, defensive and offensive. It has been and is so common a practice, that I need not mention any of these alliances. If nations, often remote from one another, and having nothing in common but their ambitions and their dangers, can, without exciting the active hostility of their neighbours, form such alliances and maintain armies and navies to protect themseles, surely Britain and her oversea dominions, bound together by the ties of blood, of freedom, of common interest, of fervid loyalty to one Throne, have just as much right, at least, to do the same thing.

The British empire, as it stands to-day, is a league of free countries, the vastest in extent the world has ever seen. And it is the staunchest, for it is held together by the silken bonds of liberty, of mutual esteem and of self-respect. Not one of the independent units of this empire, least of all Canada, is so craven that she will fear to assume rights which less favoured nations have not hesitated to avail themselves of.

To those who contend that our weakness shall be our strength, I would apply the words of ex-President Roosevelt: 'There are people,' he said, 'who prefer that their country be too weak to avenge an insult and avoid all difficulties because of the disdainful pity it inspires in foreign nations.'

I believe, with ex-President Roosevelt, that there is more honour for a country to be the cause of fear than of pity. I think that a nation is more respected on account of its courage than of its weakness. The most illustrious and respected nations are those that have relied upon their swords.

It has been stated and published in the province of Quebec that there were some English Canadians who did not fear to proclaim that we should keep all our money for ourselves, for more useful and more practical objects than national defence. As if there was something more useful than the honour and safety of a country. But there has always been and there will always be men whose mentality differs from that of other people, whose hearts do not open to the noble notions of patriotism or loyalty. They are few, fortunately, and their opinions do not count.

Speaking in the name of the French Canadians, I have no hesitation in saying that they think and feel differently, that they will not be influenced by mean and selfish considerations and that they will not refuse to do what the interest and safety of the country require for fear that England might benefit by it.

Being happy and enjoying under the British flag all the rights, liberties and privileges of free citizens, they will do what their fathers did to prevent their country from passing under foreign rule. They know that they would not find elsewhere the protection which they enjoy as British subjects under sacred treaties entered into between France and England.

There was a time when French Canadians had reason to complain of England and especially of those who governed our country in her name; their grievances were serious. Well, even in those times of agitation and trouble, in 1776 and 1812, following the advice of their clergy and of their political leaders, they ran to the frontier and repulsed the enemy. History has chronicled the eloquent appeals made to the honour and loyalty of the French Canadians by their bishops and priests. And amongst those who then gave to their countrymen the example of loyalty we find the names of Joseph Papineau and of his illustrious son, Louis Joseph Papineau, who thought that the best means of serving the sacred cause for which they were fighting was to give undeniable evidence of their loyalty to the British constitution. It is an example and a lesson for those who to-day are fond of proclaiming to the world that they have in their veins the blood of these two great Canadians. If when they were persecuted the French Canadians did not hesitate to do their duty, and to fight in order to remain British subjects, how could they refuse now, when they are enjoying all constitutional liberties, to follow the example of their fathers and to take the means of helping England to defend their country?

No, they will take into consideration the position of the government, which, being placed between two extremes, between those who contend that it does not do enough and those who say that it does too much, has adopted a middle course which ought to satisfy reasonable people. They will realize that if they refuse to support the policy of the government, their motives would be attributed to feelings of hostility or of indifference towards England and the majority of the population of this country.

If we were asked to sacrifice a parcel of our religious or national rights, of our political autonomy, it would be quite different, and we would oppose any such scheme. But how can the establishment of a Canadian navy affect our national or political rights? On the contrary, the slight sacrifice which we are called upon to make to pay our share--a small share—of the cost of creating and maintaining a national navy will do us good, will arouse in our favour sympathies which we need in our present political situation. Let us be just towards England and our English fellow-citizens, and they will be just towards us. We must not forget that we are not the majority in Canada; we are the minority and those who have placed us in that position should be the last to forget it. I am always surprised to see the Conservatives, whose hand made confederation, forget so easily, under the influence of partisanship, the exigencies or necessities of that regime and the examples of conciliation which their venerated chiefs gave them. They forget that if Cartier was living, his policy, under the circumstances, would be that of Laurier; they forget that the establishment of a national navy is the sequence, the outcome of the political programme of Macdonald and Cartier. Cartier said in 1868: Three principal elements constitute a nation: population, territory and marine. And in the Militia Act of that year he provided for the organization of a naval militia. While the Conservatives repudiate the policy of their leaders, the Liberal party endeavours to have it adopted by the country and carried out. They forget also their violent denunciations against those who thought proper to oppose certain articles of their programme; they were denounced as traitors, annexationists. If we were as violently aggressive as they were, we would return them the compliment.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—Did the hon. gentleman say there was a Bill introduced in 1878 providing for the construction of a navy?

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I have cited the words of Sir George Etienne Cartier viz.: 'The three principal elements constituting a nation are population, territory and marine.' And in the Act which Cartier laid before parliament in the same year, there was a proposition made for the organization of a naval force. I cite that in order to show it is not a new question, and if the hon. members who have so much esteem and veneration for the fathers of confederation and for the old chiefs of their party, were faithful to their record they would vote for the Bill which is now before parliament, because it is the outcome of the programme and the policy adopted, and accepted by the Conservative party in the last thirty years.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE — Does the hon. gentleman remember that when Cartier proposed his Bill for the militia, that the government was defeated on the question?

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I speak of the Bill of 1868.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—The Bill was lost, and the government went out of power and Sandfield Macdonald took the place of the Prime Minister.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—That does not deprive me of the right to say that it was the policy of the leaders of the Conservative party, which the Conservatives repudiate now.

I move the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

MORNING SITTING.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Last night I made a motion for the sitting of the House this morning, but it only covered to-day, and I desire to make a similar motion for to-morrow. I move that when the House adjourns to-day, it stand adjourned to eleven o'clock to-morrow morning, the sitting to be from eleven to one, and there be a second sitting of the House at three o'clock in the afternoon.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned to 11 o'clock a.m. to-morrow.

THE SENATE.

FRIDAY, April 29, 1910.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Eleven a.m.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (No. 204) An Act to authorize the erection of certain wharfs and buildings in the harbour of St. John.—Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

Bill (No. 208) An Act to provide for the payment of bounties on crude petroleum.—Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

NAVIGABLE WATERS PROTECTION BILL.

ORDER OF THE DAY POSTPONED.

The order of the day being called:

Third reading (Bill 103), An Act to amend the Navigable Waters Protection Act.—Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I move that this order be discharged and that it be placed on the orders of the day for Monday, the first sitting.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask if the government is giving consideration to the representations made by the shipping interests of Montreal, the Montreal Board of Trade and other public bodies?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The right hon. leader of the House said he wanted a little time to examine the value of the representations made by the Board of Trade in Montreal.

The motion was agreed to.

MINERAL RESOURCES OF CANADA.

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT POSTPONED.

The order of the day being called:

Consideration of second and final report of the Special Committee on Mineral Resources.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—If there is no objection to this report I will move that it be adopted. It calls for the printing of two thousand copies of the evidence taken before the committee. In the absence of the chairman, I asked the clerk to obtain from the Printing Bureau an estimate of what the cost of the printing would be. I have not received it yet, but I understand it would not cost a great deal and the chairman assures me that the information will be very interesting to members of the Senate and House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I have been absent because of illness and I am not able to take charge of this report. There are a large number of applications in now for copies of the report, and I do not think the expense of printing it can be very much.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There are some points about this report as to which we should have a little more information. The committee recommends that the map of the coal areas in Saskatchewan and Alberta be printed in the report. Inasmuch as the Department of Mines deals with these things, is it not a fact that this map will be printed for distribution anyway?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—In regard to that I may say that it will not cost anything. The map has been printed, and it can be inserted in the report. However, this report may stand.

The order of the day was allowed to stand.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 25) An Act respecting the Water-carriage of Goods.—Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 101) An Act to provide for the investigation of Combines, Trusts and Mergers which may enhance prices or restrict competition to the detriment of consumers.—Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

Bill (No. 192) An Act to amend the Fisheries Act.—Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

Bill (No. 198) An Act to amend the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907.—Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I suppose it is understood that these Bills may be discussed in committee.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Yes, that is what I stated.

NAVAL BILL.

HON. MR. DAVID RESUMES.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Hon. gentlemen, before continuing my speech, which I will finish in a few minutes, I beg the hon. leader of the opposition to tell me if the amendment which he has moved means that the question of the Naval Bill or the establishment of a marine will be laid before the people immediately, or at the next election?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would say to my hon. friend that that would be within the judgment of the government.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—The judgment of the government; so that the government may do it when they like?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Oh yes, it cannot be done otherwise.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I would draw the attention of some hon. members of this House to the fact that the government may bring the question before the people as soon as they like, immediately, if they like, not in the usual general election, but immediately, and, in voting for the amendment which is moved there, they are exposing themselves to a situation they would not like, perhaps.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, certainly not; that is the reason we voted.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I shall now continue my speech of yesterday. When the debate was adjourned I was trying to show that in view of the feeling which existed in England, and of the attitude taken by the different colonies of the empire, Canada was bound to do something; it could not remain indifferent when all the empire had decided to endeavour to put England in the position of preserving its supremacy on the sea, which supremacy is essential to the greatness and conservation of the empire and of the different parts of the empire. I was trying to show that Sir Wilfrid Laurier, being placed in face of great difficulties and of great diversity of opinion, did what was proper under such circumstances, and that he decided to put before the country a scheme which gave satisfaction to England without imparing our national autonomy. Deplomacy, which is the characteristic of the political genius of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, served him well in this case, as in many others demanding sound statesmanship, and by introducing this Bill he was giving effect to the policy advocated by the Conservative party since confederation. The hon. gentleman from Stadacona speaks of contradictions, when everything they do and say is a flagrant contradiction of everything they had done and said previously, and the destruction of the policy of their old chieftains. In order to find a contradiction between the position which he thought I would take under these circumstances, and the views which I had expressed at another time, he quoted a speech which I made in 1890 in the local House at Quebec. Hon. members of this House must remember that in 1890 an imperial league was being organized, to have a commercial union between the colonies and the mother country, and to have a general system of defence for the different parts of the empire. The questions of general policy of war and trade were to be decided by a council where Canada would have been represented by a small minority. I regret that the hon. gentleman has not thought proper to recite the whole speech, because it would not have had the same bearing—after having repeated many times that we wanted to live under the British flag, after having said that we were happy to live as we were living under the protection of the British flag, I added that in view of the sentiment which prevailed at the time, it was dangerous to bring forward such a scheme, because the discussion of imperial federation, would bring up another scheme, the scheme of an American federation, and that there would be many probably who, on account of the progress and prosperity of our continent would prefer American federation to imperial federation. At that time, the national policy had not done what it has since accomplished, and there was a general feeling that we wanted the American market after all, and that our interests were to treat with the United States. It was for those two reasons—that that scheme deprived us of our national autonomy, and that it would endanger our relations with the United States—that I proposed the resolutions which were adopted unanimously by the House. To show what the feeling was at the time, when those resolutions were moved in the local House, the Conservative party who were then pretty strong, did not think it proper to vote either for or against them. As a pretext or excuse, they said the previous question having been put, they could not move an amendment, and they could not vote for or against the resolution.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Was it a question which came under the local jurisdiction?

Hon. Mr. DAVID—That is another question.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is another question, but unanswered.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—It is a question itself. I do not say whether it could be done constitutionally or not. Anyhow, I have a right to repeat, what I said yesterday, that the Conservative party and the leaders of that party are repudiating the policy of their old and venerated leaders, the fathers of confederation, and that, while they are repudiating the policy of their leaders, the chiefs of the Liberal party, very strange to say, are putting into execution that policy of the Conservative party.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—But we have always been fighting that programme.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I come now to another point which is raised, not very openly, but which may have some effect on the people. The national flag is hoisted in some quarters, and the scheme is fought on the ground of patriotism. I have been told by some people that they cannot understand how a man who is called a patriot could vote for such a Bill. My answer is this, and when I answer this question, I give a reply, not merely for myself, but for some of my friends who are in the same position. There are two ways of being a patriot.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There is a third question.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—The other question is not worth being considered. The question of doing nothing at all, of refusing to do anything, is an unpatriotic position. As a representative of the province of Quebec, I would be ashamed to take a position that would make the whole world believe that the province of Quebec had not the patriotism and courage to do what was necessary for the glory and the surety of the empire, and the preservation of the supremacy of Britain on the sea. It would be a shame for the province of Quebec to take such a position, and it is because I think I have patriotism, and because I have always tried to do what I thought proper for the honour and dignity of my nationality, and of my countrymen, that under these circumstances, in spite of the critics, and of the criticism which has been expressed with regard to my taking the position I took, I proclaim that, as a French Canadian, as a citizen of the province of Quebec, I am obliged to vote for such a Bill. That is my answer.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Does the hon. gentleman contend there are only two questions now?

Hon. Mr. DAVID—There are only two serious questions; the other is not serious.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is because it is serious, that the hon. gentleman is getting so warm.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I am getting warm because some of our adversaries are making a shameful abuse of patriotism in the present instance.

There are two ways of being a patriot and of practicing patriotism. The first consists in throwing the minds of the people into a ferment of discord and of anger, in preaching the holy war night and day, and in making people believe that we are hostile to everything which is English. The other system consists in respecting in others sentiments which we esteem in ourselves, in giving them what is just and reasonable and keeping our influence and energy for important matters and circumstances, in order that we may then have the support and sympathy of broad minded people. Along this last line we would be following the examples of Lafontaine and Cartier. The first method is full of dangers, of serious complications, of elements of friction which would bring us to a powerless isolation. The second plan is the only one which will allow us to occupy in the confederation, a place worthy of our ambition, of our aspirations. These are the views of our representatives in the government and in parliament, and of the majority, the great majority of our population. It would be, I am sure, the opinion of France at the present moment.

I would call the attention of my countrymen to an hypothesis which strikes me. If there were a war between England and Germany, on which side would France be? It is evident that we would see once more the Union Jack and the Tricolour united as they were so gloriously on the battlefields of the Crimea. And if we had a navy, we would see our vessels fighting by the side of the French warships. Would that be so great an evil? And if we had refused to make the necessary preparations in order to be able to assist our two great old mother countries, France would be the first to express her regret.

Our sailors, it seems to me, would be proud to show that the blood of Jean Bart, of Duguay Trouin, of Tourville and of Iberville is flowing in our veins, and that they have not lost the courage and valour which characterized their ancestors, who fought so heroically on land and sea.

Anyhow, all reasonable men in the province of Quebec will do their duty courageously; they will refuse to bear the heavy responsibility which certain men assume with so much levity. They will understand that there are alliances and sympathies which are worth more than millions of dollars, and that, as Catholics and French Canadians, they are even more interested than their English Canadian countrymen in remaining under British rule, in order to safeguard the rights which are guaranteed to them by solemn treaties and which independence or annexation would endanger. What are millions of dollars compared with the advantage of living and thriving under the protection of those treaties? And those millions, spent on Canada's navy, will be given back to us by the creation of an industry which will support thousands of people, by the opening of a career—a noble career— for our young men. I bow in advance to those naval schools, I applaud the noble characters which they will form, the brilliant and useful careers which they will produce. As to the compensation which we will receive in return of our monetary sacrifice let us remember what took place on the occasion of the South African war. Before the war was over, England had given back to us three or four times the money which we had spent. She bought our horses, our cattle and farm products and placed our funds on the list of trust funds. Now, if our parliament and our population had listened to the same weeping voices which we hear to-day, the province of Quebec would have been placed in an inglorious isolation.

And we cannot forget that we have to choose between two proposals, between the establishment of a national navy, which we must have sooner or later, and the gift of Dreadnoughts or of money contributions for the benefit of the imperial navy. Nobody imagines that a government could be formed and maintained upon the negative and socialistic policy of those who refuse to do anything either for England or Canada. It is useless to wander in the region of dreams, of suppositions; we must choose between these two proposals. Well, which is the best? Which is the most patriotic, the more in accord with Canadian interests, with our national autonomy, with our aspirations and the needs of future generations? I have no hesitation in saying that it is the scheme proposed by the government and now under consideration.

Now let us admit for a moment that some of the members of the government and of our public men generally, who are responsible for the welfare and the destinies of the country, are willing to do more than they were before, are they to be blamed for taking into account the changes which have taken place in the conditions of our country and the political requirements which have arisen since the federation of the various provinces? Could they refuse to listen to the appeal of the imperial government when they could comply with its wish by following a most patriotic policy and adopting a plan of naval organization which the authors of confederation and the leaders of the Conservative party considered as the necessary consequence of the establishment of a territorial army, and which they would have carried out if they had had the means which we now have of doing so? No, they could not refuse—and the ministers representing the province of Quebec less than the others—without incurring a serious responsibility, especially in view of the position taken by the leaders of the Conservative party.

In conclusion, I will sum up my views as follows:

Considering that the establishment of a Canadian navy is necessary for a country situated geographically as Canada is; that such a navy would be an element of moral force and energy; that it would increase our importance in the eyes of the whole world; that it would be the means of reconciling what we owe to England with the best interests of Canada; that it would create a national industry and open a noble career to our people; and that it would increase our confidence in the high destinies of our country and widen the horizon of our thoughts and aspirations, that an appeal to the people on this question could have no beneficial result. I have no hesitation in voting against the amendment moved by the hon. leader of the opposition.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I would have been very glad to deliver in English the few remarks I have to make on this question, but, as quotations are to be made to justify the position I am going to take on this important measure, I feel that I have to speak in French, because all those quotations are in French, and I have not time to translate them. I will only say one word, before resuming my speech in French, in answer to the question which has been put by my hon. friend who has just sat down, to the leader of the opposition. I think, in putting that question, he had in mind something that I told him yesterday, that I would rather favour an appeal to the people at the general election than a plebiscite. I will give you my reason for that. I will say in French why I would rather support the amendment, which is for an appeal to the people, but that it would go to the people at any rate at the next election. I would not be in favour of a plebiscite at once, because, if you put before the people the question of the naval service only, it might rouse feelings of race and nationality, whereas at the general election, the naval policy would be included in the platforms of the government and of the opposition, and the people would then be able to judge between the two policies on their merits. I will now continue my remarks in French.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE (speaking in French, of which the following is a synopsis):—As I stated at the beginning, I shall try to define the position the Liberal party has held on this question for a great number of years, and I shall quote speeches, letters, &c., by the leader of the government, the Hon. Messrs. Lemieux and Brodeur, articles from the ministerial papers such as 'Le Canada,' 'L'Electeur' and others. I do not pretend that the Liberal party must not change its attitude. Far from that, I say it is the duty of the party to change its attitude if the government thinks it better for the country; but I claim that we have no right to do so without giving good substantial reasons for the change, and that even these reasons should be submitted to the electorate in due time. That is the position the Liberal party has held since confederation, the position it took on the Canadian Pacific railway, on prohibition and other issues. I maintain that the leader of the government has greatly increased his popularity by always objecting to throwing Canada into the imperial turmoil, and at the last general election the Liberal party directly opposed the principle incorporated in the present Bill. The leader of the government said himself, in my presence, in Montmagny, when speaking in favour of the present member for that county, then the government candidate, that he had succeeded at the Colonial Conference of 1907 in preventing the passing of a resolution requiring the colonies to contribute to the establishment of a local naval defence. Referring to this I might specially put before the House the speeches and declarations of the Liberal leaders on this question by first citing what was said in 1896 by the Hon. Mr. Brodeur, who, by the irony of fate, is now the man in charge of this Bill. I may say, in passing, that I deeply regret the sickness which has compelled him to remain out of the House; but I am also glad to hear that he is improving in health and we all wish him a complete recovery that he may continue to retain the prominent position he holds in the government. Mr. Brodeur, speaking in the House of Commons on April, 1896, said:

> Mr. Speaker, I cannot allow the proposition before us to pass without protesting in the most energetic manner against its adoption. The government asks us for credit of a million dollars to purchase guns. They pretend that they need this million to pay a certain debt contracted towards the British government; a debt which has been contracted during the present session.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I regret to learn that under the circumstances the government has purchased guns from England not for one particular purpose, not for a particular company, but that it has purchased arms from the English government and that the government now asks us to reimburse them for the cost. Is that the protection promised by England to Canada? Is that the position in which we are placed as a colony? I believe that we shall have reason to look for all other things on the part of England.

Parliament is asked to spend this sum of a million dollars while our debt has increased to nearly three hundred millions. I believe that the debt is sufficiently heavy and that it is useless to enter upon a jingo policy and augment in that way the debt of the country by several millions without being able to justify in a serious manner that expense. I do not believe that that expense will be required under the circumstances, and for my part I am energetically opposed to voting any such sum as that which they demand of us now.

If it was a great mistake for the Tory government to spend a million on guns when our debt was three hundred millions, how much greater a mistake is it for this government to spend several millions on buying cruisers and munitions of war when our debt in round figures is $478,000,000? What did Sir Wilfrid Laurier say in the House of Commons in April, 1902:

It will be veritable suicide for the country to throw itself into the gulf of expenditure where the European nations, including England have been drawn by the need of formidable armaments.

The situation of Canada is quite otherwise. It is an immense country having a population of five millions and a third scattered over an extent of three thousand miles from the east to the west. What are the heaviest articles in its budget? Public works, colonization, construction of railways, the deepening of harbours and improvement of transportation routes. That is a field in which we ought to exercise our activities. It would be a crime to divert any portion of the money necessary for the construction of these works to buy cannons, guns and munitions of war.

The leader of the government was right. It was better for this country to spend our money in public works, colonization, railway construction, deepening of our harbours. &c., but then at that time the country had not undertaken the construction of the Northern Transcontinental railway which will certainly cost not less than $150,000,000. The government at that time had not in view the construction of the Georgian Bay canal and the Hudson Bay railway. Therefore, if in 1902 it was a crime and suicide to take our money for preparation for war, it is still more apparent to do so now, when our country requires three or four hundred millions more for public undertakings that were not contemplated at that time. What was the opinion of the Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux in 1902? He was not then a minister of the Crown, but he had a most important position in the ranks of the Liberal party, and was also a prominent figure in the House. He declared that the obligation for the colonies to participate in the wars of the empire was an absolutely false principle, and writing to Mr. Henri Bourassa on the 4th of August, 1903, he referred Mr. Bourassa to the above speech of Sir Wilfrid Laurier which I have quoted. What did 'Le Canada,' a government organ, say on the 5th of October, 1903? The statu quo, he said, was the salvation of the country:

It happened that certain exalted persons passed a resolution demanding intervention, because England had passed the word to Canada and said 'That is good, send your soldiers and your vessels.' And our brave Canadians will be obliged to go to fight for the happiness of the Macedonians and for the great joy of the Bashi Bazouks. Whilst had we remained as we were, nobody would have though of asking us to march. Let those who pass the resolutions go there if they please, but Canadians will not march. Ah, yes, let us continue to maintain the statu quo; that is our safety. Let us maintain firmly in power Sir Wilfrid Laurier who has given the Canadian people the assurance that he will not permit our country to be drawn into the vortex of militarism nor into the quarrels of others. We are doing well; let us remain as we are.

At the last Colonial Conference, Dr. Smart moved the following resolution:

That this conference, recognizing the vast importance of the services rendered by the navy to the defence of the empire and the protection of its trade, and the paramount importance of continuing to maintain the navy in the highest possible state of efficiency, considers it to be the duty of the dominions beyond the seas to make such contribution towards the upkeep of the navy as may be determined by their local legislatures—the contributions to take the form of a grant of money, the establishment of local naval defence, or such other services, in such manner as may be decided upon after consultation with the admiralty, and as would best accord with their varying circumstances.

To this resolution Sir Wilfrid Laurier made the following reply:

I am sorry to say, so far as Canada is concerned, we cannot agree to the resolution. We took the ground many years ago that we had enough to do in that respect in our country before committing ourselves to a general claim. The government of Canada has done a great deal in that respect. Our action was not understood, but I was glad to see the First Lord of the Admiralty admitted we had done much more than he was aware of. It is impossible, in my humble opinion, to have a uniform policy on this matter; the disproportion is too great between the mother country (you must remember they have no expenses to incur with regard to public works), whereas, in most of the colonies, certainly in Canada, we have to tax ourselves to the utmost of our resources in the development of our country, and we could not contribute, or undertake to do more than we are doing in that way. For my part, if the motion were pressed to a conclusion, I should have to vote against it.

So you see that since this government has been in power, the Liberal party has always stood against the very principle embodied in this Bill, which is contributing to the wars of the empire. I still stand for the same principle; my views may be wrong now, the government has a right to change its view. I am not going to say now, on the second reading of this Bill, that I am opposing the measure itself. I claim, however, that before adopting this Bill we should call a halt and wait until we ascertain the opinion of the electorate. If the government succeed in that appeal, so much the better for them, though I am not prepared to say so much the better for the people. Now, I may address just one word to those who claim that it would be disloyal for Canada, and especially for the province of Quebec to oppose this measure. I maintain that this word 'loyalty' has been used very often for selfish purposes. I do not take stock in those who are always raising the cry of loyalty. They do so very often to pass bad measures. I do not take stock in their cry any more than I do in the professions of those who have always on their lips the words religion and honesty; because loyalty, religion and honesty are natural in the hearts of all, and the best proof we have of a man's attitude on that point are his deeds, and it is not always necessary to make profession of having those virtues. But on this question the province of Quebec does not stand alone. When the vote was taken on Mr. Monk's amendment, many representatives from other provinces voted for it. I know that in Ontario the Grangers, a farmers' organization, are against the measure. All the leading weekly papers, Liberal and Conservative, are against it, and I have in my hand a declaration from Mr. James McEwing, local member for Wellington West—a good Liberal, I am told—who said, like myself, that he is not in sympathy with either party on this question, and he thinks that the people of the country should be consulted. If I were going to discuss the question of the enormous expense that this policy will entail, I might cite Sir George White, a member of the British parliament, who said, when the appropriations for the navy were brought in by the chancellor in the imperial parliament, that it was a terribly wicked and useless expenditure. And the 'Daily News' added that Germany and England are not only moving towards barbarism, but at the same time towards bankruptcy. I just cite these opinions in passing to show that even from a financial point of view I am in good company, as I am also in very good company in this country. I referred a minute ago to the question of loyalty, and to the fact that it would be said, if we objected to the Bill especially in Quebec, it would mean that we refused to contribute towards the protection and maintenance of England. It is well, in the consideration of this question, to bear in mind the fact that Canada is a population of between 7,000,000 and 8,000,000 sparsely settled in half a continent, with enormous public works in course of construction and to be undertaken, that with this sparse population we have to protect and defend our territory, while England, with a population of 40,000,000, has no great public undertakings such as ours, and can utilize its immense revenue for the protection of its coast and its trade routes without leaving any portion of the United Kingdom undeveloped. I believe that the large works we have constructed, including the Canadian Pacific railway, and what we are now doing for the National Transcontinental railway, are a hundred times more important for England than a few cruisers that we may build now, and we have done more in this country—and Quebec has done its share—to promote the welfare of the empire than any other colony. That is what 'Le Canada,' the government organ in Montreal, contended for on the 26th of November last. On that day, in a strong editorial, 'Le Canada' quoted from letters published by Sir Charles Tupper and Lord Strathcona and endorsed their views, in support of that contention. The following extract from an article by Sir Charles Tupper in the 'Canadian Magazine' for February, 1896, is reproduced by 'Le Canada' in its editorial:

'I deny that Canada owes a single dollar to England for any reason whatever, whether civil, military or naval; much less than she is a source of weakness and expense. I contend that if Canada were forced to enter the American Union, England would lose her best strategic harbours on the Atlantic and on the Pacific and would need, not a weaker, but a much stronger fleet than she possesses now.'

At a banquet in Quebec on the 31st of March, 1900, Sir Charles Tupper repeated the same sentiments:

'I have said and I say again that it is false to contend that Canada has done nothing for the unity of the empire. Canada has spent millions to create a national route on the Atlantic, to organize a militia, &c., and under these circumstances I feel that it would be a mistake to attempt to make the people of this country contribute to the maintenance of the army and of the navy of the empire. I contend that our conduct in the past should be a guarantee of our conduct in the future, but that it should be left entirely to the judgment of the Canadian people themselves.'

In a letter to the Montreal 'Star' in November last, Sir Charles Tupper said:

'Permit me to say—notwithstanding the representative of one of the principle Canadian newspapers has held Canada up to public misrepresentation—that Canada has done more than all other British possessions to assist in the defence of the empire. Your journal of the last November has accused me of using foolish language and endeavoured to depreciate the greatest efforts that have yet been made by a population of 5,000,000 souls.'

'Le Canada' also quotes the following from a speech delivered by Lord Strathcona at the University of Aberdeen:

'It is quite popular to contend that the colonies contribute nothing to the expense of the army and navy as well as to say that the army and navy exist for imperial ends. With the exception of Australia the colonies may not make direct contributions; but they have contracted and accumulated for the development of territories and for the construction of works as useful imperially as they are locally, debts that they alone had to support and for which they alone are responsible. And these debts represent railways, telegraphs, forts, communications by steamer and by cable and the establishment of their militia and their organization for defence. In the case of Canada, the construction of the I.C.R. and the C.P.R. constitutes an annual charge of more than a million pounds sterling. They forget to recall these facts in the discussion of the subject.

So I think from this point of view my case is proved irrefutably—and I am proud of the position I am taking now as a Liberal, because it is the position which the Liberal party by its leaders and its newspapers have always held. Once more I say I may be wrong and the government may be right. The leader of the government, in whom I have great confidence, may be acting wisely to do what he is doing, but I have still more confidence in the judgment of the people, and I beg the government which has changed its views on this question, to submit its policy to the people. In view of all I have cited in the way of expressions of opinion from 1896 to last fall, knowing what was coming up on this naval question, as a good Liberal I took the liberty to send an article for publication in the government organ 'Le Soleil' of Quebec under a nom de plume; but I gave the editor my name. A few days afterwards the question of the embargo having been discussed in the paper, I wrote a second article. Both were rejected. I suppose it was not considered friendly to the government, though it was written in the most friendly spirit. I then sent the first of these articles to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, on the 4th of November, 1909, telling him what had happened and I considered it my duty as a Liberal and a friend of the government to put my views before him. The following are the articles and Sir Wilfrid's reply to my letter:

Caveant Consules.

Are we menaced by a war? One would say nearly from reading the newspapers for some time past. The question is no less than naval defence. Dreadnoughts, millions spent for the construction of warships. That which is taking place, above all since the conference at London, has rejoiced the jingoes and insensiby we are thrown into the grind of imperialism.

The movement was commenced last session by forcing the adoption of a resolution which appeared gentle but which in reality opened the door to that which it is sure to produce. In fact, the government appeared decided to spend millions on the construction of warships. Why this expense, when we are peaceful and when no irritating question exists? At the same time, if we were menaced with war it is not the two or three warships that we are going to possess that would protect us against the fleet of an enemy. Now there is no ground for this expense. If we should ever be menaced, it will be the duty of England—if she intends to keep us as a colony—to protect us; if she does not do so, leaving us to our own resources, we shall be powerless to defend ourselves. Now of what use will the millions be to us that we are about to expend for the construction of warships?

To guild the pill, the ministers assure us that the government will keep control of these ships. All that is nothing but a trap; we see already the first indications of imperialism in the fact that England is sending us naval officers to take charge of these ships. Once they take possession they will be utilized for the purposes of England and not for ours. The end of the play will be, we shall be put to an expense of millions to aid in the defence of England. We may cry aloud and protest; we shall be simply running up against an accomplished fact.

No, we are of the opinion of the Hon. Mr. Murphy, the Secretary of State, who on his return from the West, said that the people wanted freight cars to transport grain and not Dreadnoughts. For a country like ours, in the course of development, we need to employ millions for the construction of railways, the establishment of experimental farms and directing immigration towards our unoccupied lands, which are so fertile, and to improve our agriculture.

It is enough to say that we are opposed to the expenditure by the government of money for the construction of war vessels which will be merely vessels destined to be used to carry officials that we may send to London. England does not ask us to make any such sacrifices; the demand is from our Canadian jingoes who have commenced this movement.

Let our ministers take care; they are entering upon a wave which may be carrying them further than any dream of at present. Once they admit that we are bound to contribute to the naval defence of England, if a war should occur it will be our soldiers that we will be sending to fight against enemies that we have never made. It will be but the first step that costs on the road to militarism, as in the case of crime and imperialism is a political crime. Now this step the government should hesitate to take, but they have taken it. Beware now of that which will arise later. Caveant Consules.

The second article is as follows:

'It is amusing to see all the jingo newspapers expending floods of ink to invite us to show our generosity towards England. But what more do they want us to do to show our loyalty; we have proved it on many occasions. Did not the French Canadians repulse the advance of Arnold who wanted them to range themselves with the Americans in order that they might remain faithful to England? During the Boer war, did not the children of Canada fly to Africa to defend the menaced flag of England? Has not the Canadian government taken over and maintained the ports of Halifax and Esquimalt? Now behold we are asked to spend millions to construct war vessels destined in case of need to defend England. At the same moment when the demand is made on us to sacrifice ourselves to England she maintains an embargo on our cattle. Why? It is not because they are infected with disease, because it has been proved that they are perfectly healthy; no it is simply to protect the farmers and the cattle raisers of England against the competition of our herds. When we are treated in that manner it is an unfavourable time they have chosen to ask us to show still greater generosity. It is not a time when we should be invited to lose the strings of our purse. Do ut des—Give in order to receive—is a great principle in business.

Before the Canadian government obtained the right of making treaties, our interests have invariably been sacrificed by England to please the United States, as witness the Ashburton treaty and the more recent Alaskan boundary settlement. Canada has always been in the estimation of the English ministers a negligible quantity. But since we have increased in population and in wealth they demand of us new sacrifices in defence of the empire, that nobody dreams of attacking since the achievement of the famous entente cordiale.

Canada is loyal to England and has proved it always, but she does not want to be overburdened. Before undertaking the construction of warships to defend our coasts, which no one menaces, would it not be better to enlarge our canals, to build others, to construct railways with a view to giving a greater expansion to our commerce, to establish other experimental farms, &c.? All that rises before one. Do you not see by the newspapers that the trades unions are disposed to rise against the commencement of militarism? D. J. O'Donohue, the parliamentary representative of the labour unions, said to a representative of the Toronto 'News': 'The workingmen's organizations of Canada and of all America are preparing to aid in the most vigorous manner possible the movement in favour of peace to have unchained itself recently; we contend that, as the capitalists are the cause of wars, they should do the fighting and pay for it. At the approaching congress in Quebec on the 20th of September, an energetic resolution will be proposed in opposition to the agitation for the gift of a warship and the increase of the military forces.'

Behold then the working class which utters a cry of alarm; the Ministry will do well to keep their eyes and their ears open. If they allow themselves to be dragged into the militarist movement, they will have good reason to repent it at the next election.

Let us not forget that the day when our sailors will fight on the sea for the benefit of England our soldiers will be obliged to go under fire on land. Are the people ready for that? To-day it is money that they demand of us, and later it will be the blood of our children. I repeat 'Caveant Consules.'

The following is the reply which I received from Sir Wilfrid Laurier when I sent him the above articles:

Ottawa, 6th Nov., 1909.

My dear Choquette,—I have your letter and your remarks on the question of the navy. You are wrong in saying that your opinion will neither make me hot nor cold; on the contrary I always like to have an expression of opinion from my friends. I may say nevertheless that I am not surprised at your attitude; but at least you might wait until our policy is brought before the public before condemning it.

Yours truly,
WILFRID LAURIER.

It seems to me that I then acted as a good Liberal and a good friend of the government. My advice has not been followed. I only now ask the government to let the people judge between the government and those who for the time being are opposed to their policy on this question of local naval defence. This Bill has passed the House of Commons by a strict party vote. In this House, I am glad to say that we are not discussing the question from a party point of view. Yesterday I heard Liberal senators speaking against the Bill, and one Tory senator spoke in favour of it. Moreover, I may add we are free to do as we like with a measure in this House, because, contrary to what my hon. friend from Mille Iles has said, the government are not going to be defeated if this House should reject it. I read in a good ministerial paper—a paper well fed by the government and the National Transcontinental railway, 'La Vigie,'—on the 14th of March last, that the Naval Bill was going to come before the Senate which has the right and the duty to scrutinize the measure, to modify it if necessary, and to block it if it is not considered to be a good measure. I do not go as far as saying that: I only ask that it be suspended until we have a general election. It was not submitted to the people at the last election; quite the contrary, it is just because of the position that Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his colleagues took at the Colonial Conference, and all occasions in the past, against throwing Canada into the vortex of militarism and contributing to the wars of the empire that he carried so great a victory; and I am bound to say that if the present measure had been submitted to the people at the last election without being studied more fully than it has been yet, and without being longer before the public than it has been, not five members from the Quebec district, which returned some twenty-five members, would have been elected to support that policy, and I dare say it would have met with the same fate at the hands of the farming districts of Ontario and the west. Even now, with all the explanations that have been offered, I think the Bill would be defeated. In fact, everybody is against it for one reason or the other. If you look at the 'Star' of the 26th of March—a rather independent paper, inclined to be friendly to the government, especially on this question—what did it say:

THE CANADIAN NAVY—PATRIOTISM VERSUS PARTYISM.

It must be toterably evident to all concerned that the Canadian Navy Bill has aroused no enthusiasm in Canada. It has satisfied nobody, and does not appear to be taken very seriously by its strongest advocates. The best thing that can be said for it is that the measure is not much worse than the alternative proposition put forward by the opposition. Both were compromises designed not so much to please everybody as to avoid displeasing anybody, and like most compromises of this character, both were failures.

So you see papers like the Montreal 'Star' which have always stood for imperialism and contributions to the empire, condemn the present Bill as a failure. The Liberal party is divided on the subject. The Tory party is perhaps still more divided, and I am not surprised, because the policy of the Tory party, as put before the other House by its leader, is worse than the policy of the Liberal party. On the whole I think this Bill is very unsatisfactory and the principle is especially bad. My hon. friend from Mille Iles has said that the Liberal party is now putting into operation the policy of the Conservative party. In support of that he has cited the views of former leaders of the Conservative party. I am astonished to hear, from the hon. member especially, that in order to maintain his position he is obliged to quote from Tory speeches to prove that he is now doing right. He knows that we have always been fighting this very policy that is now indicated, so it is better for me to stand on the ground I have always held, as a member of the Liberal party, and to quote as proof of the soundness of my position the speeches and declarations of my hon. leaders. The hon. gentleman has also said there was just a few agitators in Quebec who are opposing the Bill. I suppose he uses the word 'agitators' in a bad sense, but he is wrong. I do not approve of agitators whether they be Tories, Nationalists or anything else; but if a man is an agitator because he is opposing a measure which the Liberal party has always condemned, I am willing to be called an agitator. My hon. friend fought against confederation, we fought together against the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway, on the Manitoba school question and other issues as Liberals, asking that these important measures should be first submitted to the people, and when we were doing so the Tory government also called us agitators. Perhaps we were wrong; but at least we were agitators in a good sense of the word, and from a sense of duty. Our object was to prevent bad measures, as we conceived them to be, from becoming law. That is what I am doing now. To act as I am acting now is to be a good agitator in enlightening the people and showing them the dangerous position into which the government is drawing us by this Bill; the bad agitators are those who, like my hon. friends, though personally good men, are deceiving the people and imposing on them measures of this character without consulting their views.

I must add one word on the subject of the answer I got from the leader of the government when I sent him the articles which were refused publication by 'Le Soleil.' He told me he was not surprised at my attitude. At the time I was a little perplexed at that expression: I did not know exactly what he meant. I thought he meant that I was a kicker or something like that; but when I read the speech he delivered in 1902—I was not then in the House—I saw that he used in that speech the word 'crime' to describe imperialism. You will observe that in the article I have quoted I use that very word myself. That convinces me that he could not be surprised at my attitude, which was the one he had assumed himself some years before. In view of this Bill, and looking over its provisions and especially after the speech of the right hon. leader of the government, who said that when England is at war Canada is at war, I still more strongly believe that it is a crime and a suicide to enter upon that policy, and it is a crime against the people not to consult them.

In closing these remarks, I may say I am going to support the amendment of the hon. leader of the opposition. It is the very amendment that I would have moved myself if I had been a member of the House of Commons. I would have moved it here as a sub-amendment if the leader of the opposition had moved the same amendment that was moved in the other House, by Hon. Mr. Borden, But as the amendment here conveys my views with respect to submitting this policy to the people, I shall vote for it. I may add another word: Last winter, under certain circumstances, my letter to Sir Wilfrid was utilized against me, and Liberals were told that I was opposing Sir Wilfrid's policy and were advised not to support me when I was a candidate for a public office. In spite of that, I declared that I am not actuated in this instance by spite or discontent because of the action I refer to. The leader of the government, I think, has personally done what he promised me he would do—to be quite neutral, and I think he was. I was satisfied with the way he acted. He has done exactly what I asked him to do—remain neutral. He asked me at the time, as you will see by his letter, to wait until the Bill was introduced before condemning it. I did that, and refused frequently to give my views on the question, because I had promised that I would not express them. That is the first occasion on which I have made public my views and I give them publicly and frankly. I am sorry to disagree with my leader and my friends, but having a duty to perform, I shall perform it regardless of consequences.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I move that the debate be adjourned till the next sitting of the House, to be the first order after third readings.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned till three o'clock this afternoon.

SECOND SITTING.

REMOVAL OF QUEBEC BRIDGE RUINS.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I should like to inform the hon. gentleman from Stadacona that a copy of the contract with Koenig Bros. that he seems to be very much interested in, was laid on the table yesterday or the day before, when the hon. gentleman was absent.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I will inform the hon. member that I have almost finished reading the report. I took it into consideration immediately, and I thank my hon. friend for being so energetic as he has been while acting in place of the leader of the House.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I concerned myself to remind the right hon. gentleman of the demand of my hon. friend, and it was the right hon. leader himself who brought down the document.

SATURDAY'S SITTING.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—There is a motion on the order paper for a sitting tomorrow, but I should like to defer consideration of it until later on in the day, because if we make good progress with the order paper it may not be necessary to sit on Saturday. There is only one Bill on the order paper which may occupy the attention of the House for any length of time, the Anti-Combines Bill, and I thought, possibly, we might deal with that this evening. We may find there is a dispositon to accept the principle of the Bill, and if we can dispose of it to-night, we might adjourn until Monday.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What about the anti-race track Bill? I understand there is a desire to choke it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—On the contrary, I understand there is a desire on the part of many people interested that we should grapple with it, if that is a correct expression.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—As to the Anti-Combines Bill, I have just seen some of the parties opposed to the passage of the measure as it now stands; but I understand that their opposition to the Bill is not quite as strong as it was at first. Perhaps they did not exactly understand the purport of the measure. It was explained to them, and I have some hope they will accept the measure in its present form, in which case there will be no opposition.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I should like to have the race track Bill stand until Monday, because the Quebec Turf Association are very much interested. I am going back to-night to see about it, and perhaps they may accept the Bill as it is.

The motion was allowed to stand.

SUSPENSION OF RULES.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I beg to move that from to-day on to the end of the session, the following rules be suspended 30, 63, 117 and 119.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—As a matter of procedure—and it is one of our rules—that when a motion of this kind is made, the hon. member states what is desired to be accomplished by the suspension of the rules.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—They are the rules which have usually been suspended during the last few days of the sesison for the purpose of facilitating business.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—These are the rules which make it obligatory to give a day or two days notice before the first, second and third readings, and going into committee, and these being dispensed with, of course the Bills may go on from step to step without delay. I know the rule the hon. gentleman would cite, but I do not suppose that he would object to the form of this motion when he agrees with the result sought to be obtained.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The objection the hon. gentleman makes to it is, there is no reason why the rules should be suspended. Why does the hon. gentleman not add to his motion: 'For the purpose of enabling all Bills that may come up to the Senate to be passed regardless of any rules or regulations of the Senate'?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—If the hon. gentleman will allow the motion to be amended in those terms——

Hon. Sir MACKENIE BOWELL—I will as far as I am concerned.

The motion was agreed to.

NAVAL BILL.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The order of the day being called.

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the motion for the second reading (Bill 95), An Act respecting the Naval Service of Canada, and the motion of the Hon. Mr. Lougheed in amendment thereto:—That this House is not justified in giving consent to the said Bill until it has been submitted to the judgment of the country.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I should like to preface my remarks by saying that the hon. gentleman from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette) addressing me in French, spoke of me as if I represented in this Chamber somebody else than myself. It is unnecessary to state that I represent but myself in this House, and that the views I hold are my own.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I beg pardon, I never said that.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think the hon. gentleman does not understand French.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I said, speaking of the newspaper 'Le Canada,' there is somebody who has jurisdiction over 'Le Canada.'

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The spending of large sums of money upon army and navy represents for many people, among all nations, a most disagreeable necessity. It is an unproductive outlay which paralizes at the same time the human effort towards bread earning.

This thought needs no development; it is present in every mind. This fruitless expenditure is on a parity with money paid for police protection, which nobody desires to discard. But there is this considerable difference between foreign and domestic protection: the latter is necessary to guard against the crookedness of the depraved and low elements in the community, and against deformed and unbalanced brains; while the former is only needed to repel the assaults of nations governed by what is supposed to be the best elements in the community, the wisest and most cultured.

In the 20th century, after 1900 years of Christian teaching, the great European powers are still reluctant to accept the principle of arbitration for the settlement of all questions. They are ready to arbitrate upon all matters not affecting their honour or territory. With this door so widely opened upon fatal dissensions and conflicts humanity is at a standstill and armaments continue.

A tribunal has been created for the settlement of international disputes, to which all nations have adhered. It has already rendered good service. Public men from all countries have come together and have striven for better relations and better solutions of international difficulties than the resorting to the sword and gun. They have formed an interparliamentary union, which can boast of a certain measure of success. They claim the credit for the ratification, during the last ten years, of 67 treaties which contain the recognition of the principal of arbitration; but all this good work will be in vain if the first-class powers do not include in their treaties the obligation to arbitrate all their differences without reservation.

The men who want to abolish war by the best possible means would readily accept, as a first step, leading in that direction the recognition of the principle contained in our Industrial Disputes Investigation Act.

A resolution was passed at the interparliamentary congress held at Westminster in 1906—which I attended—on motion of Mr. Wm. J. Bryan, pressing all nations to agree to refer to the Hague Tribunal all matters of disagreement for investigation and report, in the hope that time would thus be gained and that the passions would cool down and that public opinion, better enlightened, would help towards pacification.

But whatever strides are made in the right direction the blunt reality of this day and of the morrow must be faced. Since the supposed-to-be civilized nations—dominating the world—still stand for the law of might, the obligation is thrown upon all of preparing for defence.

It is argued that our situation saves us from that obligation, that we are without any contact with the outside world, that our neighbour to the south is the sole possible enemy and that we need no navy to protect ourselves against him. It is added, in certain quarters, that we will never involve Great Britain in war—that we never did—and that it is untrue that Canada is at war when Great Britain is. We have never involved the metropolis in war, we may never do so; but how can we affirm it with certainty?

A riot in British Columbia where some foreigners are killed and the refusal by that province to help the federal authorities to redress a just grievance, thus caused to another power, could very possibly involve Great Britain in war.

But how can sensible men deny the fact that Canada is at war when Great Britain is? If not we would have our own flag; we would be an independent state. Did we not find, to our cost, that we were at war in 1812 because Great Britain was at war?

Those who want Canada to be immune from Great Britain's wars, dream of a status for this country which resembles very much independence. If their dream or their delusion was a reality, I would perhaps be found among those who would take the risk of adjourning for some years the creation of a navy, in order to devote all our energies and capital to developing our country and organizing for the reception and maintenance of the millions of people who are flocking to our shores; but, so long as the situation of the world is what it is, Canada would have some day to make a start in the defence of its coasts and ports.

But this postponement which I would perhaps accept, would be but adjourning the day when we must begin to build our own navy. I heard the hon. gentleman from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette) this morning read extracts of speeches and newspapers on events which took place in 1896, and try to put somebody in the position of contradicting himself as having taken a stand in 1896 which is not the stand which he takes to-day. In 1896 our income was $40,000,000; our income to-day is beyond one hundred millions. Responsibilities which we could not assume in 1896 we can well take up to-day. And responsibilities which we may undertake to-day, I am sure we can increase in the years to come.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—My quotations were from speeches and articles in 1896, 1902, 1905 and 1907.

Hon Mr. DANDURAND—Those quotations merely go to show that people remained in a certain state of mind until the cold reality dawned upon them, and they must open their eyes to a changed situation and condition. If policing the seas and defending our ports and coasts is a necessity, I do not believe in leaving others to do it for us. I want Canada to do it for herself. But that semi-independent state dreamed of by some people who would like to maintain the statu quo, as they say—and the hon. member from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) is one of them—is simply a delusion. We are not independent; we are tied up to Great Britain by articles of partnership which no one in Canada from south to north, from east to west, wants to abandon or modify.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Does the hon. gentleman contend that I want to weaken the ties that bind us to Great Britain?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—No, I said the hon. gentleman was in favour of the policy of statu quo. If I am wrong, the hon. gentleman can contradict me.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I said I wanted the policy of statu quo only until the people could be consulted.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Is the hon. gentleman himself personally in favour of the policy of statu quo?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Certainly I am, until the people are consulted.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Until there is a majority found against the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I contend that the only way to know the will of the people is to consult the people.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—But the hon. gentleman thinks the will of the people is his own will, and he is in favour of the statu quo, and it is because he is in favour of the statu quo that he believes there is a majority of the people in the country who share his opinion.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Quite the contrary, because I think the majority of the people do not want a change.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—So the hon gentleman has no opinion of his own.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I have that opinion

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—That he will follow the majority.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is what the hon. gentleman is doing every day.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I said the policy of the hon. gentleman is opposed to the policy of his own leader, favoured by the hon. member from Calgary (Hon. Mr. Lougheed) and against the present naval policy, and while the hon. member from Mille Iles (Hon. Mr. David) was speaking this morning and saying there were but those two questions, the hon. gentleman said there was a third, the statu quo. I cannot force the hon. gentleman to say what policy he is in favour of; but he is in favour of the statu quo, if he can convince the majority that the statu quo is the right thing.

Hon. Mr LANDRY—Certainly

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I am glad to know where the hon. gentleman stands. If he is in favour of the statu quo, I hope he will, at another stage, explain how he reconciles that with the last phrase of his speech the other day when he said Quebec was not against helping Great Britain in time of need, and if my hon. friend is not against helping Great Britain in time of need, I want to know what way we could help England in time of need if the hon. gentleman's policy were followed?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—When Great Britain asks our help, in case of an emergency, I said we would give it freely and cheerfully, but I say that England recognizes that she is not in need of our help. That is recognized by the fact that she accepts the policy of the present government, and if Great Britain is not in need I do not see why we should declare here that she is in need.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Does the hon. gentleman deny that Great Britain has asked the colonies to do something?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We are doing what she asks; we are always doing what she asks. If the hon. gentleman will look in the archives he will find the policy laid down by England for her colonies.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Does the hon. gentleman deny that at the last conference, Britain, through her ministers, asked that the colonies should begin doing something for their defence and the help of the empire?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I know that England has accepted the proposal made by the government, and the fact that England accepted that proposal proves that she is not in an emergency.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—And with very good grace the hon. gentleman answers the demand of Great Britain by saying 'No, we will do nothing.' I said that we were tied up to Great Britain by partnership articles which no one wanted to change, and my conviction is, and it is apparent to every one, that because of our connection with a European power, we are not as free to fix the date at which we shall begin the building of a navy as if we were a separate entity. The risk of war is greater, and our big partner is very much desirous that we should begin now. The other dominions beyond the seas have assented to this wish, and Canada, by its representatives, authorized by a unanimous mandate of the House of Commons, has done likewise.

The other dominions beyond the seas have willingly accepted the obligation of bearing their share of the defence by relieving the empire of the necessity of protecting them in time of war.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—What nations have consented, outside of Australia and New Zealand?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Outside Australia and New Zealand, there is the confederation of South Africa.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—They have not done anything yet.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—No, but their representatives have agreed to the scheme of defence which they will discuss when the first parliament of the confederation meets shortly.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—The hon. gentleman admits it is not done yet. Can he show me any other dominion which has done anything?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—If the hon gentleman reads the report of the conference, he will see that the representatives of South Africa agreed to the scheme of defence accepted by all the members of the British family, and will join in when they are able to bind themselves and act for themselves.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Where are the others?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I think I can safely affirm that all the other scattered colonies outside of Canada, have with alacrity, I will not say with pleasure, but with a real sense of their duty, and with a certain amount of satisfaction, at being able to do something for their motherland, agreed to enter into the scheme of defence.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—Name them?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—We had representatives there with a mandate from the whole people of Canada, after the resolution of the 29th of March was passed, and it is because of that resolution of the 29th March, that they went there and agreed to a certain scheme of defence. I have heard the leader of the dissentients (Mr. Monk) since say that he perhaps too hurriedly joined in that resolution and in that vote; but he, in conjunction with all the representatives of his province, by their actual presence, or by their silence, bound Canada to that resolution of the 29th March, and we must to-day implement the resolution which we did pass, and under which obligations were tentatively assumed —I say tentatively, because they had to be ratified by parliament. Now, what has taken place since the 29th March which would justify this Senate in saying that public opinion does not ratify that resolution? The Senate of Canada is asked to set at naught the vote which was taken in the other House, and reject this Bill, or postpone it on the resolution which the hon. gentleman has moved, in order that the question may be laid before the people. What has taken place since the 29th March to lead this Chamber to believe that the people's representatives did not truly represent the people? The majority in the other House has approved of this Bill—less than eight members dissenting. The minority in the other House have agreed upon an alternative policy which does not put in question the resolution of the 29th March, but which has simply the effect, in their view, of implementing it by adding a present of $20,000,000 to Great Britain. That is the state in which this Bill has left the House of Commons, and I claim that the House is practically unanimous in favour of starting now and doing something for naval defence. Did our representatives at the conference represent Canada as completely as the representatives of the other dominions beyond the seas? Perhaps not, if I can judge by the affirmation of Mr. Monk and Mr. Bourassa, the leaders of the dissentients, who are supported in this House so far as hon. members have spoken, by the hon. gentleman from Repentigny, and the hon. members from Grandville and Stadacona. How is that dissentient sentiment to justify the Senate in rejecting this Bill and appealing to the people for a decision? As I said a moment ago, there was unanimity on the 29th March, and this year there was practically unanimity amongst the eight provinces outside Quebec. It is true that 18 members voted for a plebiscite in the other House; but, as I said this morning, to the hon. member from Grandville, 10 out of the 18 turned round afterwards and voted for the amendment of Mr. Borden.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Which demanded also a plebiscite.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Which demanded a plebiscite on the building of a Canadian navy, but excepted from the plebiscite the $20,000,000 which Mr. Borden wanted to give Great Britain for the building of two Dreadnoughts. I stated that the House of Commons, representing the people, have acted in such a way up to this moment, as to preclude the right of the Senate to appeal to the electors to see if the members of parliament truly represented the public opinion of the country. It is true that there is a certain section in the province of Quebec represented by the gentlemen named who are against the public policy which is contained in this Bill, and against the policy which is contained in the amendment of Mr. Borden; but I claim that this section is but a minority and a small one of the province of Quebec, and I think I can affirm that the other eight provinces are practically a unit in favour of doing something now to relieve Great Britain by either building a Canadian navy or contributing to maintain the imperial navy. What are we asked to do? We are asked by the hon. leader of the opposition not to vote upon this Bill until it has been approved by the people. This is the Lansdowne amendment to the Lloyd-George budget. Is there a precedent which can be cited by any hon. gentleman here in favour of the action which he wants this House to take? He cannot cite the precedent of Lord Lansdowne upon the budget, because there that gentleman had the whole of the Concervative party against the budget, and he had, as well, the largest landed proprietors of Great Britain against it. The Lords, by a vote of 470 to 75, rejected the budget by appealing to the people. The Lords could appeal to a party that has dominated in Great Britain for years, and they could hope that their friends would follow them against the Lloyd George budget. They had most of the influential newspapers in London and throughout England in their favour. Have we the same condition here? We have a certain section, we have a certain element, practically all in one province, which I say does not represent the opinions of the majority of that province, which asks for a plebiscite on the assumption that there is a majority in favour of the statu quo. The hon. gentleman from Calgary stands up as representing his party and says this policy is not satisfactory, and we should submit it to the people; but he prefaces his declaration by saying that the people of the country should make a gift of two Dreadnoughts, or six, because he has not mentioned the number, to Great Britain, because of an emergency having arisen.

He is in favour of doing something. He does not side or sympathize with the 'do-nothing' party. He represents in that the whole Liberal-Conservative party of the eight other provinces; yet he has, to second his amendment, the hon. gentleman from Montarville (Hon. Mr. DeBoucherville), who, I think, by his behaviour, in some interruptions he has made, is with the hon. gentleman from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry), in favour of the statu quo and the 'do-nothing' policy. If I am stating his position incorrectly, he can challenge my statement now; but, although he seconds the amendment for an appeal to the people, he is at the antipodes of his leader. The hon. gentleman, with a certain group from the province of Quebec, want to do nothing. The hon. gentleman from Calgary wants to do more than there is in this Bill. He shares the views of Mr. Borden and represents the Conservative party at large. The hon. gentleman from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette) who spoke this morning, rested his case on newspaper clippings, and the statements of parliamentarians whom he accuses of changing their mind on this question. He neglected to take into consideration one important factor in the settlement of this question. It is the strong British sentiment which permeates through this land. This is not a question which can be settled by the rules of mathematics or even of logic. The opposants seem to fail to consider the fact that the sons of Britain want to do something for their mother country. They fail to take this racial sentiment into account. I have heard some of them; one of their leaders and perhaps the most brilliant, say that he does not want to isolate Quebec; yet he would have us take a plebiscite of the country to show that Quebec is on one side and the other provinces are on the other, if he really, truly gauges the sentiment of Quebec, which I think he does not. These gentlemen will rise after me and say they don't want to isolate Quebec; yet they are face to face with this situation, that there is but one member of the Commons, outside of Quebec, who expressed some sympathy with the 'do-nothing' policy. The measure is now before this Senate composed of eighty-seven members. I have yet to hear a member of this Senate hailing from another province than the province of Quebec declare that he favours the statu quo policy, be he on the Conservative side or on the Liberal side. The 'do-nothing' party is now facing the representatives of parliament with but one member of the Commons outside of Quebec—I think it is Mr. Clare—declaring in favour of the statu quo policy and not one from the other provinces in this Chamber, as far as I can learn the sentiments of those who surround me. Yet they hold the delusion that their 'do-nothing' policy would be sustained and endorsed by the majority of the people. I said that by many of us, it was thought but a question of time when we should begin; and I have no objection to repeat that if we were an independent state — as some opponents think we are—I would be quite ready to take the risk of Canada postponing for a time going into this heavy expenditure; but that is not the situation.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I rise to a question of explanation. The hon. gentleman has no right to impute to us an independence policy; he has no right at all to do so.

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman will please address himself to the question.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I did not say that. The hon. gentleman has not understood me. I said that those who affirm that Canada is not at war when Great Britain is, simply dream of a status for Canada which has had no parallel in history, and has none, at all events, at the present time. I say that the only divergence of opinion in this country outside of the group represented by the hon. gentlemen from Stadacona, from Montarville and from Grandville——

An. Hon. MEMBER—And Mr. Poirier, a small group.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The hon. gentleman says truly a small group. If they want to go to the best test when the election comes in three years, they will find whether they are not a small group. I think, and I hope that they are but a small group.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Is my hon. friend of the opinion himself that when England is at war Canada is at war?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I am surprised to hear my hon. friend put such a question. He has sat on the bench of this country, and is a lawyer. When I was a law student in the first year, I knew that when Great Britain was at war Canada was also.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I am asking the hon. gentleman's opinion. Then, has the King of England the right, in the case of any war, to come here and order the militia out to fight?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—No, we have been granted by the British North America Act the exclusive control of our militia. We have been graciously granted that power by Great Britain; and when I heard the hon. gentleman, or perhaps the hon. gentleman from Stadacona, say that our navy and our militia were under the command of the King, they stated what is legally true; but there is such a thing as the King represented in Canada by the Governor, advised by his council. This parliament has the same powers as the British parliament, not one whit less nor one whit more. The King, it is true, is in command of the navy and army, and he says: 'My navy' and 'my army'. But let him try and declare war without his parliament voting the necessary supply——

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is quite a different question.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—That is a different question. It is just because I know that we are not practically at war when England is at war, that we are not obliged to fight. I say that we are not then at war practically, and we should not stand the expense.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—My hon. friend says that practically we are not at war. Practically we do not bear the effects of war, because too far away from it, in most cases.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—That is a most important point, and I am just of the same opinion as the hon. gentleman. I am asking him to explain this, because we are not practically at war. The King is master of the situation. If we are at war, it is only when we please to be at war, and we send our men when we want to. It was so in the Boer war, and parliament declared that in sending our troops it was not to be regarded as a precedent, so we are at war only when we want to be at war, and, therefore, the hon. gentleman could suspend a decision on this question until we can have an appeal to the people.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—When war is declared, we are liable always to be attacked by the enemy, as we were in 1812. If Great Britain does not need our help, and fights its battles in some other corner of the world, we are still at war, though we do not feel the effects of it here. When Germany invades France, the people living near the Pyranées are at war as well as the people of the east, though the German armies are not upon them. When Great Britain was at war with our neighbour, we were the first to be attacked, and we quickly found we were at war. Among ninety per cent of the people of this country, there is no divergence of opinion except as to the form of help we should give to Great Britain. There is a difference of opinion as to whether that help should be in the form of a contribution, whether we should relieve Great Britain of the care of protecting our coasts and ports, and this is another form of help to Great Britain. The hon. gentleman from Grandville has spoken of the 'no precedent' clause in the order in council (not in an Act of parliament, as he said), when the first contingent went to South Africa. But even if parliament had passed it, there would have arisen a cry among the people of this country that would have destroyed the precedent clause and would have made for the creation of another precedent. That is what did really happen, because three other contingents were sent to South Africa after the 'no precedent' order in council was passed. We are a democratic country; the majority rules, and whenever Great Britain calls upon us, or even when Great Britain does not call upon us, if the sentiment of the majority is that we should go to her help, the will of the majority will prevail. It has been said that a contribution is a better form of help from Canada to Great Britain than building a navy ourselves. It is our view that Great Britain should be mistress of the sea. We are all agreed that Great Britain should be all-powerful at sea. Even the hon. member from Stadacona, representing the 'do-nothing' party, said that if Great Britain were in peril, Quebec would do its duty, and if that is the sentiment of all—and I am glad to be able to affirm that it is the sentiment of my province—we should all do what is necessary to maintain that supremacy. Those who affirm that we should contribute money, claim that an emergency has arisen, and that a money contribution should be given to relieve the situation. I will not discuss that point. I think it has been clearly proven that Great Britain is not in danger to-day. I am convinced that Great Britain will not be in danger for a decade or two, if she continues her ship building programme as explained by the naval authorities in parliament, and for which money has been provided. The British authorities are not alarmed in the least. They have said so officially in parliament, and I have another authority, whose voice I heard yesterday through the press, Lord Kitchener, who said Great Britain could take care of herself, and was afraid of no one at the present day. He went further and said that Australia was putting her defences in order, and he was glad to be able to think that Australia could take care of herself if any impending peril should loom up. If that statement can be made of Australia, it can well be made of Canada. We will put our house in order, begin our navy along our own lines, and cease to depend and rely upon Great Britain for the defence of our coasts and ports. Not only will we build our own navy, but I hope we will build it in our own shipyards, and that our ships will be manned by our own sailors. We owe it to our own dignity, not to allow others to do our fighting, and protect our own shores. But when Great Britain is in need, there will always be a strong sentiment throughout this land in favour of Canada going to her rescue. Many good reasons have been advanced why Canada should build and control its own navy. There is one which, if it stood alone, would win my preference for a Canadian navy.

For nearly one hundred years we have been blessed with absolute peace within our borders. Our people from one generation to another have come to disbelieve in the possibility of war and of bloodshed. They have lived in perfect happiness, side by side, as members of one family, although of different origin and creed, and their feelings of brotherhood have predominated to the point of obliterating the contingency of armed conflicts. They covet not their neighbour's land and riches. Their avocation has been mostly agricultural and the ancestral military spirit has long ago vanished. The average Canadian-born cannot conceive that human beings will shoot at each other because they fail to agree on a given question.

Not so with the European. He lives in an armed camp and he smells and sniffs powder incessantly. Individually he may be a very humane being, but when in authority as representative of the nation he is quite another man. In international relations he may be as much a barbarian as his ancestors who died 500 years ago. He it is who refuses to agree to a limitation of armaments and to submit all disputed questions to arbitration.

As war is repulsive to the majority of Canadians, they will look with favour upon a policy which may in a measurable future protect them against the European inclination to war when Canada becomes a factor to be reckoned with in the shaping of the policy of the empire; instead of passively taking the law from its European partner, it may, jointly with the other dominions beyond the seas, impose its own ethics on the metropolis and thus contribute to the maintenance of peace throughout the world. I cannot help thinking that we were most unlucky in our first participation in imperial wars. I would have wished that Canada should have been first called to arms for an unquestioned holy cause. Over ten years have elapsed since we were asked to draw the sword on South African territory. The historian has not yet analysed the causes which led to this conflict. I fear his conclusions.

Up to 1870 the law of England refused to admit that a British subject could ever renounce his allegiance to the Crown and his country. 'Once a British subject, always a British subject.' This principle was only abandoned when twice the number of British at home had passed under a foreign flag. If this was a tardy concession to the inevitable, we will behold the pendulum rapidly swinging to the other extreme. In 1899 a war broke out between Great Britain and the Transvaal republic, because the latter would not consent to modify its naturalization laws. The Bloomfontein conference was abortive because the Transvaal would only concede seven years as the time limit of residence, while Mr. Chamberlain's delegate wanted it reduced to five years. The British government started its mobilization, and Kruger followed suit by his ultimatum. Great Britain went apparently to war because the Transvaal would not make Britishers into aliens rapidly enough. I confess candidly that this dispute raised no enthusiasm in my breast, but we had nothing to say beforehand and when we were at war, time for discussion had passed, and it was only then that Canada was asked to help.

I have since met Europeans deeply interested in South African affairs, who affirmed that war was inevitable because it was a life and death struggle for the predominance of one race over another. So would a European think, but not a Canadian. If this question of Anglo-African relations had been handled by the colonial premiers instead of by Mr. Chamberlain, I have a profound conviction that the desolation and devastation of South Africa would never have been dreamt of. The predominance of a race over another should not be brought about among civilized nations through bloodshed, and it is because I feel that our whole moral and mental make-up is different from that of the average European, that I favour a Canadian naval policy.

Half a century is a small period in the life of nations, and I hope that within fifty years we may be strong enough to claim a voice in the diplomacy of the empire, so as to curb the spirit of those men who still worship brute force when they think they can wield it with success in the solution of international difficulties.

Towards attaining the goal of peace and good will we may naturally rely upon the men brought up in the Gladstonian school, who form the vast majority of the Liberal party of Great Britain.

If Canada, in later years, can help to keep in check the jingoes it will have done much for humanity.

Against this Canadian policy of navy building it has been urged that it was to be on so small a footing that it would be ridiculously impotent. This country is making a beginning in naval defence on a reasonable basis according to its population. It has already done considerably for the organization of its militia.

I claim that with this measure we are doing our full duty. We are spending seven million dollars on our militia, while we propose to spend three or four millions on the yearly up-keep of our navy.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Will it not be more than three million dollars? I understood the calculation was that the navy would cost about seven million dollars.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Four millions has been mentioned. Even if it were five millions, that would be twelve millions we would be spending on our army and navy, and I think that is a beginning of which we should not be ashamed.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—It is too much.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—We are to-day burdened with heavy responsibilities which we recognize. The hon. member from Grandville (Mr. Choquette) has spoken of the necessity of building the Georgian Bay canal and the Hudson Bay railway. I understand there is already enough money in the exchequer of Canada from the sale of lands to build the Hudson Bay railway. As for the Georgian Bay canal, I hope that in the next few years our resources will be sufficient to justify parliament in beginning the building of that waterway; but come what may, Canada will not go back upon its decision to build a navy for the protection of its ports and coasts. We have been asked by the metropolis to relieve her burden. All the other dominions beyond the seas are answering the call. I am convinced that the people of Canada will approve of the action this parliament is now taking.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middlesex)—A couple of days ago I had no intention of taking part in this debate. However, on the opening of the subject in the House by the hon. leader of the opposition, and after listening to the admirable speeches delivered in the House since the debate opened, my egotism prevailed over my feelings, and I thought I could, perhaps, profitably add a few ideas to this important discussion. I confess that in listening to the arguments advanced so far and in, shall I say, sizing up the standard of the debate, I am satisfied that not at least during my time in the Senate have we had a debate that has been conducted in such admirable temper and in which the Senate has considered the issues before it with such a full sense of its responsiblity.

In the remarks I am about to make I propose following more closely the line taken by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition than the line taken by other speakers, and I hope to be able in doing so to express myself with the same consideration for those who differ from me. My hon. friend said in his opening remarks that this is a very important Bill. I agree with him. He said it is one of the most important Bills presented in this parliament since confederation. It may be so. It is important not only as dealing with the question of Canadian policy, but also as dealing with a question of imperial policy. It is important because it crystallized what I believe is the almost unanimous opinion of the people of Canada. We are an important people, and therefore the Bill may justly, emanating from us and the parliament of Canada, be designated as important also. It is important in various ways. In the first place, we are assuming a burden on capital account of four or five millions, and an annual expenditure of three or four millions more. Expenditures usually grow as a project grows. It means the establishment of a large industry in this country, an industry in shipbuilding which has made Belfast, Glasgow, Liverpool, Newcastle-on-Tyne, and other centres in England the greatest centres of industry of the kind in the world. A start in a line of that kind is in itself important. It is important too, because it is an assumption in a degree never attempted by Canada before, of the insignia of manhood. We are ripe in years, we are increasing in wealth, we are receiving recognition as a nation, if not in fact a nation in theory, and any measure dealing with the future of a nation must necessarily be one of very great importance. I regard it as such. I rejoice that the Bill has been brought in, not as a menace to the peace of this continent, not as an indication that Canada is assuming proportions and responsibilities beyond what her circumstances and dignity would warrant, but as an evidence that we recognize that, if we are to take our place as a part of the empire, we must do our duty to ourselves and to the empire, and bear part of its burdens as well as share in its responsibilities, its protection and its honour. My hon. friend in referring to the way in which this Bill was presented in the House indulged in an implied censure with regard to the speech delivered by the leader of the House. My hon. friend has forgotten, or for the moment did not assume at least that this Bill had been before the other House for many months. I am told that eighty-four speeches were delivered in the other house on this Bill, that it was discussed during five weeks, and the members of this House, with the industry which usually characterizes them, must have read those speeches and must have been so well informed of the nature and purpose of the Bill that to repeat what was said in the other House would have been a work of supererogation. My right hon. friend, the leader of the House is never guilty of anything like that. My hon. friend opposite proceeded to discuss the purpose of the Bill. The position which he takes with regard to it is somewhat vague. The opposition have shifted their ground since the question first came before the parliament of Canada. To refresh the memory of hon. gentlemen who are not in sympathy with this Bill, I should like to quote the resolution of the 29th March, referred to by my hon. friend who preceded me, in order that we may see the position taken by the members of the opposition at that time. I rejoice, as I am sure every member of this House rejoices, that on March 29, 1909, when this question first came before the parliament of Canada, both parties recognized the duty and necessity of naval defence. It will be regarded in the future as a good omen that in all matters pertaining to the defence of the Dominion there is no division in Canada. We may divide on matters of tariff and administration, but it is a sign of national strength and spirit that when an enemy is at the gate, or war is apprehended, parliament, irrespective of party, should unite as one man in defence of their common country.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman is speaking of the resolution of 1909?

Hon. Mr. ROSS—Yes, of 1909. Let me read part of that resolution:

The House is of opinion that under the present constitutional relations between the mother country and the self-governing dominions, the payment of regular and periodical contributions to the imperial treasury for naval and military purposes would not, so far as Canada is concerned, be the most satisfactory solution of the question of defence.

Notwithstanding this resolution, those who were opposed to periodical contributions in 1909 now favour furnishing one or more Dreadnoughts. Now, were they right in 1909, or are they right now? Then the resolution goes on to say:

The House will cordially approve of any necessary expenditure deigned to promote the speedy organization of a Canadian naval service in co-operation with and in close relation to the imperial navy, along the lines suggested by the admiralty at the last imperial conference, and in full sympathy with the view that the naval supremacy of Britain is essential to the security of commerce, the safety of the empire and the peace of the world.

In 1909 they were in favour of a speedy organization of a Canadian naval service, and this year they are in favour of delay until there is a reference to the people, as a test of public opinion. What was so urgent last year is not urgent now. A year has already passed. Reference could not be had to public opinion for another year, and the action that was to be taken last year with expedition is now to be further delayed. Was the party right then, or is it right now? On the same subject the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden) said:

In so far as my right hon. friend the Prime Minister to-day outlined the lines of naval defence of this country I am entirely at one with him.

But he is not entirely with him now.

I am entirely of opinion, in the first place, that the proper line upon which we should proceed in that regard is the line of having a Canadian naval force of our own.

Now, we must send two Dreadnoughts. No naval force of our own now, or if at all not until after the reference to the public.

I entirely agree with that. The other experiment has been tried as between Australia and the mother country, and it has not worked satisfactorily in any respect.

Hon. gentlemen will remember that the proposal of Australia was to send one or two Dreadnoughts for the defence of the empire.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middlesex).

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE — What is it now?

Hon. Mr. ROSS—Now, I understand Australia is going to build a navy of its own, partially supplemented by a grant from the imperial treasury, for the protection of British interests in the Pacific ocean. At the same time, Mr. Foster, speaking on the same subject, said:

The first and greatest objection which I have to a fixed money contribution is that it bears the aspect of hiring somebody else to do what we ourselves ought to do; as though a man, the father of a family, in lusty health and strength, should pay his neighbour something per month for looking after the welfare and safety of his home instead of doing that duty himself. That seems to me, when you work it out, to be a basic objection to this form of aid.

From these quotations it will be seen that hon. gentlemen opposite have changed their course both as to the form of aid and the matter of urgency. I prefer to stand by the resolution of 1909. A general halting on the battlefield in the face of an enemy always fails. Hon. gentlemen are reforming their ranks now in the face of an emergency that is as great this year as it was last year; and this divided policy is but an indication that they have not yet made up their minds as to what policy is best for the Dominion of Canada. My hon. friend refers to the German scare. I never was much impressed with it myself. I do not think England need be much alarmed about Germany or anybody else She has stood the brunt of continental wars since the days of Cromwell, and has never failed, and what she did in those days with a population of about six or seven millions, surely she can do to-day with about 45 millions, supported as she will be by the 12 millions of Britons in her colonies over the seas. I agree that the present Emperor of Germany is a man of wide ambitions. He has the blood of the great William in his veins, who marched from the Rhine to Paris in 1870 almost without interruption, and perhaps, glorying in the victories of his ancestor, he thinks there are other worlds and other empires for him to conquer. That may be so. England is alive to the situation, and is prepared to meet Germany on her own ground. And while I am not much impressed with what is called the German scare, I think the duty of England is plain, and our duty is equally plain; for the conquest of England means the conquest of Canada. Let the British throne totter; let London be in possession of the enemy; let her ports be filled with foreign seamen, and foreign men-of-war, and Canada would be blotted from the map as an English dependency and her autonomy would be forever destroyed. And although I do not think the emergency is great, still I think it is sufficiently great for us to be guided by the judgment of the admiralty of England, to prepare ourselves for all possible contingencies.

My hon. friend also raises the point that the government of Canada is not in sympathy with the defence of the empire. I do not think that is a fair complaint to make. I do not think that charge can be sustained by the evidence. I remember the time when all our leading men took that ground, Sir Charles Tupper, Sir John Macdonald, Sir Alexander Campbell, whom I heard speak on the subject in England a few years ago—that because we were developing our resources and expending enormous sums of money in building our railways, populating our cities, and increasing our industrial wealth, that that was sufficient to warrant us in refusing military aid to Britain. But individual conditions have greatly changed in the last fifteen or so years. We are on a higher plane than we were then, and with the change of position the conditions and responsibilities have changed. But what has the Liberal party not done that lays us open to a charge that we are indifferent to imperial defence? Look at the increased expense of the Militia Department in the last 13 or 14 years. From a little under two million dollars it has risen to seven millions. Does that indicate indifference to the defence of the empire? When we defend ourselves, are we not defending the empire? We took over Esquimalt and the Halifax Citadel. Did not that relieve the empire of two or three millions per annum, and does it not indicate that we are in sympathy with the empire; and when Britain was grappling with the difficult problem of disposing of the Boers in South Africa, did not the people of Canada respond at once to the call to arms? We were not directly asked. We offered our services, and as an indication of the readiness with which that offer was made, although war was declared on the 19th October, by the 30th November, or inside of a month and ten days, a thousand Canadian volunteers were on their way to the seat of war. Did not that indicate sympathy with the defence of the empire? What ground has the hon. gentleman to say this government is not in sympathy with the empire? Does he not know that in every city or town, I should say in almost every village, armouries are being built for our protection? Does he not know that organizations of boy scouts under the Baden-Powell system are being formed, that in our high schools, military cadets are being drilled in Ontario and Nova Scotia, aided by the local government in each case? And while I do not believe in magnifying the glories of war, I do believe that for physical as well as military purposes, we should cultivate in the young men of Canada that sense of utility to the country, which means in the long run personal defence if war is undertaken. Then my hon. friend says we have not adopted the recommendation of the admiralty as to naval defence. Of course, when the question first came before the admiralty board, the idea was that a very large contribution should be made by the colonies, and that perhaps the colonies might undertake the construction of Dreadnoughts, and of the other large munitions of war which are only undertaken by a great nation. I have here a memorandum of the admiralty which was issued just before the conference of 1909, and in reading these few paragraphs, I want it to be understood that the British admiralty laid no obligations upon us. They assumed we were a self-governing colony. Their propositions were in every case tentative. They were dealing with a people who had secured for themselves by the British North America Act practical independence in the administration of their affairs, and in the management of their own militia, and their proposals were not made as from an arbitrary board. They did not issue as from the Palace of the Czar; but they came with that deference which the British government has lately shown towards Canada, and in that spirit I think we should accept them. The admiralty had said prior to the meeting of the conference:

It has, however, long been recognized that in defining the conditions under which the naval forces of the empire should be developed, other considerations than those of strategy alone must be taken into account. The various circumstances of the oversea dominions have to be borne in mind. Though all have in them the seeds of a great advance in population, wealth and power, they have at the present time attained to different stages in their growth. Their geographical position has subjected them to internal and external strains, varying in kind and intensity. Their history and physical invironment have given rise to individual national sentiment, for the expression of which room must be found. A simple contribution of money or material may be to one dominion the most acceptable form in which to assist in imperial defence. Another, while ready to provide local naval forces, and to place them at the disposal of the Crown in the event of war, may wish to lay the foundations upon which a future navy of its own could be raised.

That statement of the Lords of the Admiralty raises them very much in my opinion. They might want a contribution for an additional Dreadnought or two; that might be preferable to them, but they leave the matter to be finally determined by the colony concerned. A Dreadnought was given by New Zealand. That suits New Zealand. General Botha has indicated that probably a Dreadnought or two would be given by South Africa. That may suit them. The system in Australia is composite, partly a navy built at the expense of Australia, and partly an imperial contribution. If anything else is more suitable to those colonies than the others have adopted, let them work out their own policy, and the admiralty will be satisfied with anything they may recommend. Then they finally suggested to the conference:

The main duty of the forthcoming conference as regards naval defence will be, therefore, to determine the form in which the various Dominion governments can best participate in the burden of imperial defence with due regard to varying political and geographical conditions. Looking to the difficulties involved, it is not to be expected that the discussions with the several defence ministers will result in a complete and final scheme of naval defence, but it is hoped that it will be found possible to formulate the broad principles upon which the growth of colonial naval forces should be fostered.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middlesex).

While laying the foundations of the new Dominion navies to be maintained in different parts of the empire, these forces would contribute immediately and materially to the requirements of imperial defence.

There you have a statement by the admiralty that they do not want a Dreadnought, that they did not indicate exactly what they would require, but they did indicate that they wanted something to be done in the form of naval defence, leaving it to the various colonies to work out the problem to suit their own political conditions. What can be more fair? That is exactly what we are doing. My hon. friend would lead us to suppose that we were not complying with the wishes of the admiralty. The admiralty did not bind us by any hard and fast rules.

Contribute immediately they say. Just what was said in the House of Commons, a speedy contribution for the naval defence of the empire. The admiralty assumed that the parliament of Canada would comply with that resolution, and they did not bind us as to the exact form in which that policy should be carried out. And again in the House of Commons, when the policy of the admiralty was disclosed by Mr. Asquith, as you will remember from the reports at the time, Mr. Asquith, the Premier of England said:

As regards Canada, it was considered that her double seaboard rendered the provision of a fleet unit of the same kind as proposed for Australia, unsuitable for the present. It was proposed accordingly.

The original proposition was a fleet unit on the Atlantic and Pacific. We thought that was impossible for us as our ministers said, and what we thought was impossible was acceped by the admiralty, so that I cannot find in the reports of the conference, no matter how carefully I read them, that we are contravening the wishes of the admiralty. We are rather working in harmony. We are given sea-room. We are given the opportunity of formulating our own policy and that policy has been formulated. It has been before the country and before the people of England for many weeks, and we have not had a single remonstrance from the admiralty, nor do the English papers say in a single case, so far as I have seen, that the Canadian people are not complying with the wish of the highest naval authorities in England, or neglecting to do their duty. My hon. friend says the Canadian fleet would not be of any use in case of war with the United States. Who is going to war with the United States? If there is going to be a war with the United States, with a Canadian fleet, would we not be in a better position to defend ourselves than without a Canadian fleet? Only one of two conditions is possible. If we delay in this matter indefinitely, do nothing, refer the matter to the people, dally with the question, because if the United States people are going to war with us, as they may, but as nobody supposes they will, our position would be more helpless without a navy than with one, so that if my hon. friend dreads a war with the United States, I think the natural inference from such a suggestion would be that we should place ourselves immediately in the position of defence, and say that so far as we were concerned, and so far as it was possible for us to go, that defence would be as complete as we could make it; but nobody dreads war with the United States. It is an impossible supposition. Are we not of the same blood, animated by the same desire to develop democratic and popular institutions, and professing the same broad principles of christianity? Do we not believe that peace hath her victories not less renowned than war, that only under the flag of peace can a nation be properly developed? Is there human probability that Canada and the United States can ever go to war? I would much prefer that my hon. friend had omitted that suggestion, or supposition, from his speech. Then he says the navy could only be called out in case of an order in council. That is very true. In what other way would you call it out? Somebody must be above the commodore, the admiral of the navy, somebody must tell him when the navy is to be called out, somebody must put it under marching orders. How is it done in Great Britain? How is it done in the United States? In Great Britain the King theoretically declares war, but he declares war on the advice of his council. In the United States the president declares war on the advice of his congress.

Are we to change all the precedents and practices of other nations in the matter of the declaration of war? There can be no other way of declaring war that can be properly enforced, except by order in council--order in council in Canada as in Great Britain, subsequently supplementing it by calling the Canadian parliament together. The order in council is necessary. The Bill says so; that in the event of an emergency or of a danger of war, real or apprehended, the order can be issued. Clause 22 provides that:

He may place the naval force, or any part thereof, on active service at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of emergency, and emergency means war, invasion or insurrection, real or apprehended. You would not put them on active service unless there was a war, real or apprehended, or unless there was an invasion or insurrection. Then clause 23 reads:

> 23. In case of emergency the Governor in Council may place at the disposal of His Majesty, for general service in the royal navy, the naval service or any part thereof, any ships or vessels of the naval service, and the officers and seamen serving in such ships or vessels, or any officers or seamen belonging to the naval service.

See the comprehensive character of that; in case of emergency the Governor in Council places the whole naval service of Canada at the disposal of His Majesty. That is precisely the relation in which we stand towards the militia of Canada. If I am not wrongly informed, the militia of Canada may be placed at the disposal of His Majesty under somewhat similar circumstances. What more could be done? His Majesty, under ordinary circumstances, does not want our service. If the Governor in Council thinks—and it is for us to say—that the naval service should be placed at the disposal of His Majesty, it does so by order in council, and thereupon parliament may be called in fifteen days to approve of the action of the council. When the Boer war was declared, the British parliament was called. When it was intended by President McKinley the Spanish war should be entered upon, Congress was called, and we are in precisely the same position as the two great nations, and probably as the other great nations of Europe are, if I took time to examine the conditions under which they declare war. So that hon. gentlemen who proclaim that this naval force is not for the benefit of Canada are wrong. Its first duty is to defend Canada. No higher duty can be imposed upon it. Its second duty is, if there is an emergency and British interests require it, that the force should be put at the disposal of the imperial parliament and used for the defence of the whole empire. God forbid that such an occasion should arise, and at the same time, God forbid that Canada should ever be recreant to the duties which she owes to the empire when such an emergency arises, or that she should neglect to do her duty and place every man, every gun and every shilling at the disposal and for the maintenance of the greatest empire of the world. Let us hope that this is a government of the people by the people and through the people, and that the people are supreme, and without the consent of the people we can have no legislation whatsoever. If in minor matters, in the construction of a railway, or the extension of a subsidy, parliament is to have the final word, surely in major matters involving the lives of our citizens and the liberty of our country, parliament ought to be appealed to, and the theory that those who control the army or those who pay the bill, practically, are the people who control the army, is sustained by the Premier of Great Britain, the Hon. Arthur Balfour, when he says:

> It must be clear that under the constitutional theories which we all share in common, the minister of the parliament which raise, which equip, which pay, and which are responsible for the troops, is the minister which must control the movements of the troops and not some other minister.

Could there be anything more conclusive? You have the authority of the Hon. Arthur Balfour, who for many years was Prime Minister of England, in saying that those who pay must control. That is the fundamental principle of responsible government. It was for that our fathers fought. It was that which drove John Hampden to prison, and which raised the revolution which cost King Charles his head, and which made Cromwell protector of Great Britain. Those who pay must govern. We pay for this, and the Premier of England says we ought to govern. We agree with the Premier of England; we propose to govern, and we trust to the public opinion and good sense and loyalty of the people of Canada that when our troops are called we shall send them and they will be sent at our expense, and we share their burden or honour, whatever else may follow. And that view was supplemented by some of the addresses in the House of Commons which followed the remarks of the premier on that occasion. This was on the 19th April, just the other day. Sir Wilfrid Laurier then said:

> The Canadian people under all circumstances will gladly go into war when the supremacy of Great Britain is in peril. How is that to be determined?

There is only one way of determining these questions, and it is by the will of the government, the will of parliament, and the will of the people. No Czar will send our fleet to war; no Governor in Council will issue orders and say to them: 'You must assemble you fleet on the coast of France, or you must assemble your fleet on the Pacific ocean.' Only the parliament of Canada will decide. I am sorry that the leader of the opposition, who should be well schooled in the principles of responsible government, has so far departed from it. Here is what Mr. Fielding says:

> Let us suppose that that German scare, which has kept so many hon. gentlemen awake at night during the early part of this session, results in a war with Germany. I say that the people of Canada, who have built and paid for these ships, are the persons to determine, through their constitutional government and parliament, what part they shall take; and therefore I stand for the principle laid down in this clause, that the right of the people of Canada through their government to determine that question shall be maintained in this Act. But while I maintain that that right is necessary and proper, I have no doubt as to the manner in which that right would be exercised. I say that whenever the British nation shall become involved in a war with a great power. I do not stop to consider whether it is a just or an unjust war—so long as we are part of the British empire, I care not what government is in power in Canada, it will be its duty instantly to join and help the mother country; and I say the government in power in such a crisis, be it Liberal or be it Tory, which will fail to respond to that sentiment, will be swept out of existence, and will deserve to be.

That is what Mr. Fielding says. We have the opinion of the Premier of Great Britain and the opinion of the premier of this country, and of the Finance Minister, first, that when Britain is at war, Canada is at war; that the troops shall go for the defence of the empire only on the authority of the Canadian parliament, and I think they could go in no other way. Then my hon. friend says that the creation of a navy would mean the severance of Canada from Great Britain. This is a scare. This is not a Canadian scare, hon. gentlemen, this is a little local scare. He says it would make us more self-contained and independent in spirit and so on.

Let me take the first proposition: Does it mean severance from Great Britain. Is it not the very reverse? If we sat supinely and said 'no, we will do nothing'; if we withheld defence at the time of the Boer war when New Zealand and Australia sent over about 12,000 men for the defence of the empire; if we acted in this crisis, if you call it a crisis, with utter contempt for the situation as it is understood by the admiralty, then people might say: 'Oh, Canada is quite indifferent to the fate of the empire. Canada is prepared to let Britain sink or swim just as she can'. But in the face of this preparation for the defence of the empire, my hon. friend seems to think that this will mean an overt act which practically will cut the tie. Now, that is an old scare to some of us who are up in years. It was the scare in Canada before we got responsible government. Hon. gentlemen who have read the history of Canada will know that before the Constitutional Act of 1841 was passed, that whenever we proposed to the imperial government through the colonial office in Downing street, particularly under Lord Godrich, to ask the control of the patronage of the Crown to be put in the hands of the government, not in the hands of the Governor General they said, 'Oh, give control to the Canadian people and you will sever British connection, then you will cut all imperial ties. We must have that control. You will become independent, and then you will pull out for yourselves.' Then we wanted the collection of our own revenue through our own customs officers, the old practice being that the customs revenues were under the control of officers appointed by the imperial government. Then they replied: 'You cannot get that, for if we cannot collect the customs what would become of the revenue? You will cease to sustain the Civil Service'. Then we wanted that the collection of the revenue from our Crown lands should be placed at the disposal of the Canadian parliament, but that was opposed. Then the movement for responsible government was alleged to be an Act for the severance of empire. When Lord Elgin came to this country and said he would, acting on the suggestion of Lord John Russell, take the advice of responsible ministers, there was a greater alarm still, and we were thought to be on the eve of the dissolution of the colonial tie. What followed—and this fact ought to be known to every Canadian, that the greater the extension of independent self-government for Canada, the greater the loyalty that was shown by Canada towards the imperial government. Every advance made in our liberties; every concession to the principle of responsible and self-government; every act of confidence exhibited by the imperial government in the people of Canada, increased their loyalty; and today, instead of the cry of olden days that self-government would absolutely sever us from the empire, Canada is more loyal today because of those concessions than she ever was in any period of her history. And that is the true theory of Saxon government. Make a man free, and he shall exercise that freedom, with his British traditions, and in the British spirit, for the development of the country of which he is a citizen.

Then, there was the other objection made by my hon. friend that we would become more self-contained. And why not self-contained? Is there any reason why Canada should not be self-contained? What are we? Are we underlings? It is not in our stars, but in ourselves if we are underlings. Are we to crawl, to say that we are incapable of self-government? That we are unequal to the task of developing this country? That we have not grown up to that constitutional—or shall I say intellectual—advancement which would warrant the imperial government in giving us the control of our own institutions? Surely no? Take the history of England. Every step that England has taken, say since the time of Elizabeth, has been towards making her self-contained. Even before the time of Elizabeth, when the national industries of England were at a low ebb, what did she do? She imported weavers from Flanders. She imported skilled artisans from France and from the Netherlands, and built up her own industries, then by a protective system. Why? So that she would be independent of the industries of Europe. And suppose there were some effeminate Englishmen in those days who would say to the government: You are importing weavers and skilled workmen from the continent, that would make you self-contained, that will make you independent. What would the true born Englishman say? 'That is the goal to which we must aspire if we are ever going to be a country of any importance on the face of the globe.' And then when Von Tromp, about the time of Cromwell, nailed a broom at his masthead to indicate to the world that he had swept the British commerce from the sea, what did old Oliver do in those days? He laid the foundation of a navy; he began to build that navy which has been growing ever since. Why? To make England self-contained so that she could protect her own commerce, independent of the concert of Europe; independent of alliances holy and unholy, and the sires live in their sons, and they pay their father's debt, and the lion has left a whelp wherever his claw has set. Are we one of those whelps? And do we want to follow the same course and maintain the same independence? Look at the United States and you find practically the same history. Prior to the revolution they could not manufacture hats or caps, they could not establish any iron industry, they could not trade directly with any foreign port, they must trade directly with the ports of England. After the revolution, what did the United States do? Adopted, perhaps unwisely, the theory of protection, under Clay, and kept it up until to-day, and what is their position to-day? They have their navy, they have their army, they have their industries; you could blot the whole universe with the exception of the United States from the map of the world, and they would be self-contained. Is it not the ambition of every man to be self-contained. If you have a son, what do you do with him. You send him to the best schools. Why? That he shall crawl? That he shall be effeminate? No, you send him to the classical university for an education, so that when he attains the years of manhood he is self-reliant as you are, and perhaps more so. The joy of every father's heart is to see his sons, and daughters too, take care of themselves. And if there is one thing that Great Britain admires to-day more than any other in the history of Canada, I think it is the fact that every year we are becoming more and more self-contained. If there is anything remarkable in the history of the last decade or two, it is the other fact that the concessions made to the autonomy of Canada have been greater than in any fifty years of the previous history of this country. Just let me run over two or three facts. In 1871, Sir John A. Macdonald was on a commission to Washington—the first concession ever made to Canada as a self-governing colony. True, he was a commissioner for Great Britain, he was in a dual capacity, embarrassed by it, still he was there on the Canadian side, and no doubt his presence there was of immense importance to us, perhaps more than we fully realized. Then again in 1885, Sir Charles Tupper was at Washington on the Fisheries Commission, then we had a Canadian at Halifax to settle the indemnity which the United States should pay to Canada for the use of the in-shore fisheries, and we got three or four millions out of that, and a Canadian Commissioner helped us to get it. Then we had the Behring sea controversy, and the Alaska boundary, and within the memory of the latest file of our newspapers, we have the fact that two Canadians went to Paris and negotiated a treaty with France, a treaty which we believe to be in the interest of Canada, with the unanimous support of the British government. Would that have been done ten or fifteen years ago? No. There were ominous representations made away back in the early thirties or forties by Disraeli, when he hoped the colonies would be separated from the empire, that they were the millstone around the neck of the mother country. There was a declaration made to Lord Dufferin when he sailed for Canada in 1872, by W. E. Foster, that he hoped he would succeed in cutting the connection between the Dominion of Canada and the Imperial government. Things have changed. The forces that are at work for the unification of the empire have grown stronger and more important as that union has extended; and as our privileges have increased more and more does the loyalty of Canada continue. There is less cry for annexation than there was twenty years ago. I remember when my old and beloved chief, Sir Oliver Mowat, was Premier of Ontario, there was quite a movement about 1892 in favour of annexation. It was nipped in the bud. An officer of the government was discharged because he declared himself somewhat in favour of annexation. We know of the great movement that existed in 1849. There is not such a movement in existence now. We have no words so harsh as were expressed in those days, because we are more self-contained and have within ourselves more of the important resources of the empire. Then my hon. friend says that he would prefer a contribution to the policy which the government proposes. I will briefly read from a high authority as against the views of my hon. friend. One is the view expressed by Lord Selbourne, who was Governor, I think, for South Africa for some time, in which he dealt with the question of a contribution versus a naval force established by the colony itself. Lord Selbourne said:

> The Australian governments pay us a certain contribution; for this contribution we supply them with a certain article. Now, this is good so far as it goes, but it does not, to my mind, go far enough. It does not give our New Zealand and Australian fellow countrymen the sense of personal interest, of personal possession, in the British navy, which I most of all desiderate for the future, and I want, not only the colonial government to understand that on the naval protection of the empire, exercised through a wise naval strategy, depends our future existence as a united empire, but I want them to regard the navy as their own, at least, as much as ours, and with that object I wish to see in the navy more colonial officers and a contribution of colonial seamen. I want, in fact, if I may use such a term, to increase the maritime spirit of the empire. I want to bring Australasia, Canada, and South Africa to understand, in the sense that the average Englishman understands it, that the sea is the one material source of our greatness and our power; the main bond of union; the real source of our strength—if I may use such a mixed metaphor—that the sea is to the empire as the breath of life, but it cannot be done, I opine, so long as we are only receivers of money. I want to see from all parts of the empire a personal contribution to the navy, so that it may not only be an abstract admiralty to govern the navy but an admiralty that has won the confidence of the colonies, because the colonies understand its policy, and because in each colony there are officers and men belonging to the navy—an integral portion of the navy.

What Lord Selbourne—and he is a very sagacious statesman—indicates in that report is that the contribution, as was suggested by Mr. Foster, would be a dole to the British empire for the maintenance of the navy; but, if we start a navy of our own, then we would be interested in it, first through the Canadian parliament voting the supplies, secondly, our seamen would officer that navy, and, thirdly, the personal interest that we would have in the navy so situated would form a bond of interest and attachment to it that could not be got in other ways. I object to the principle of contribution, largely because it appears like a dole. England is not decadent. England is not in need of money. If she were able to give to Canada in the last five years $608,000,000, as she has given for Dominion purposes, provincial purposes, industrial and municipal purposes, surely she is not short of money. To give a contribution is, to my mind, like assisting a nation that has lost its own powers of recuperation, whose wealth has been squandered, and who is in a position practically of mendicancy. What does Lord Kitchener say upon that point? The hon. gentleman who preceded me referred to Lord Kitchener. In a published interview Lord Kitchener expressed himself in this way as to the charge of the decadence of England:

> England is not decadent, whatever anyone may say or think. Her sons are as good as ever, and as full of heart. She is quite able, under God, to determine her own destinies.

She is not in need of help, either from any of her children nor from any strangers. She is quite able to take care of herself, and she is yet in full youth of her days. I assure you that so far as my observation goes, she is in no sense decadent.

That is Lord Kitchener's opinion of England, and it is undoubtedly true. It is the judgment of one of England's great men. Instead of sending her a dole or a contribution as is proposed, let us emulate her spirit, because she is not decadent, and is doing something to protect herself. Let us imitate her example, and do something that is worthy of us, and lastly—and with that I must close. I want to notice another remark made by my hon. friend. He asks that this Bill be not now read a third time, but that a resolution be passed asking for a reference of the question to the whole people. Now, on the face of it, that is democratic, but it is not responsible government. A government that does not feel that its policy is controlled by parliament ought to retire. If this government does not represent the people, and does not voice the opinion of the people, then it should retire. The whole theory of responsible government is based on this principle —that the men in power have the confidence of the people. In the face of the result of the last general election, in the face of the very substantial majorities at the back of the government in the House why should you adopt that timid, halting policy of referring a matter which is evidently the wish of the people of the country, represented by responsible government, back to the people at all? In Switzerland, of course, they have the referendum; they have adopted it in some of the states of the republic to the south of us. It is not the British theory of government. It has something of the timid element in it. It may be necessary, and has been adopted in some cases in Canada; but on great questions of policy, show me an instance in the history of Canada, or in the history of England, where the government so far abdicated its own functions as to shirk its responsibility and refer a question to the people? When we entered into confederation the parliament of Canada assumed the responsibility of federation for the whole people—assumed it voluntarily, assumed it successfully. Some constitutional thinkers say that in the change of the constitution there should have been a reference to the people. I think there is a good deal to be said for that view; I think it would have been more strictly constitutional if parliament had referred that question to the people at the general election. Sir John Macdonald and those around him, in their wisdom took the other course. It was successful in Canada; it was not satisfactory in Nova Scotia or New Brunswick. In the evolution of events, however, it succeeded in all four provinces. But on questions of policy not affecting a constitutional change, there is no instance known to me of a reference to the people such as this amendment proposes. The building of the Canadian Pacific railway was not a constitutional question. The change of the franchise in 1885 was not a constitutional question, and yet it partakes of something of that element. The re-arrangement of the constituencies in 1882 was not a constitutional question, and yet it had some of the element of that in it. These are questions that come closely to what you may say is the danger line; yet parliament in its responsibility assumed to discharge its duty, and acted within its right, and carried these measures successfully through. The Militia Act was never referred to the people by a referendum, and that involves an expenditure of seven million dollars a year. That is a precedent in point. Now, if with those precedents before us, the government persued a certain policy, surely we are not acting unconstitutionally or violating a fundamental principle of government if we act on the same lines under similar circumstances. In view, then, of what I have said, and my convictions on the question, and in view of the most careful consideration, I concluded that if we had done less than we are doing now, it would be unworthy of us; if we endeavoured to do more, the burden might be too great. I think we have acted on the golden mean: Canada can afford to build a navy. It is due to her dignity, and her self-respect that she should be found upon the wide sea with her flag wherever duty or commerce may call, showing to the nations of the world that on this continent a new power has arisen that is to be reckoned with in the days to come. Do you think that the United States will respect us less if we have a navy? Do we respect them less because they have one? Do you think France, Germany or Spain, or any of the old kingdoms of Europe will respect us less because we have a navy than they respect us now? On the contrary, it will be to the whole world an evidence that there is growing up, as I said before, in this western continent a whelp of the old lion who not only has the resource and the manliness and the power to develop his own industries but who has the spirit of the Briton in his veins, and who is prepared to defend those industries and those resources at any cost. I believe in the individual independence of every man. I believe the man who is not prepared to work out his own destiny with his own right hand, no matter what the difficulties may be, is not of the same race, nor of the same blood that has made the British army puissant the world over; that has established the supremacy of Britain on every parallel of latitude, and that makes her the mistress of the sea, as well as the strongest power by land; and if we wish to represent the best forces which make for the growth of Canada, we shall endeavour to inspire young Canadians with the same spirit. No better example can be given us. There must be no craven fear within us of being a great nation. We are going to be a great nation. I heard a distinguished politician say a short time ago that in fifty years Canada would have a population of a hundred millions of people. A hundred millions of people with no navy! We would be the laughing-stock of the world. Fifty millions of people, and no navy, and other nations would point their finger of scorn at us for our indifference and our contempt of the common principles of self-defence. With five millions in the days of Queen Elizabeth, England swept the Spanish armada from the sea. Canada with eight millions can give an account of herself, even under the most modern conditions, although I believe there should be no menace in this movement, and although I deprecate war and the shedding of blood as much as any man can, yet the first duty of a man is to protect his home and his house, and the first duty of a nation and a people is to protect themselves and their industries from every enemy, no matter from what quarter of the globe that enemy may come.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not intend to follow the example set by those who have spoken on this question. I rise simply to put myself on record as opposed to the policy which has been laid before parliament and the country by the present government. Every one must have listened with a great deal of interest to the debate, and to many of the statements made with a great deal of pleasure. The hon. gentleman from De Lanaudière gave us a history of how the clergy had shown their loyalty in the province of Quebec, and many illustrations of what England had done in recognition of the services of the clergy in this country, and the liberality they had displayed. He also gave us a list of the contributions which had been made under the instructions and advice of the clergy of the province of Quebec. I would suggest that it would be well to print the first portions of the hon. gentleman's speech in an edition of a primer to be used in our schools of Ontario, to show what the French people had done in the past, not only to defend the country, but to aid in the maintenance of British supremacy on the northern part of this continent. Then I would suggest, that the latter portion of the speech should be utilized in a similar manner in the schools of Quebec, in order to show the good relations that have existed between the English and Protestant portion of Canada, and the French and Catholic people of the province of Quebec. It would enable the younger portions of the Canadian people to grow up with broad and liberal ideas of the relations that have existed between these two races in this country. I listened with no little degree of pleasure to the remarks made by the hon. gentleman from Mille Iles. It was a literary production quite worthy of the hon. gentleman. He laid down principles to which few of us would object; but there is one portion of his speech, and also of that of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, in which the whole of Canada must concur—that is, if the policy of the government is to be confirmed, either by the people, or by parliament, of having an independent navy for Canada, then it is proper that we should extend our means in order to establish it if we are to be an independent country. If, however, we are to be in the position of being at war the moment war is declared by England with any country, then the question arises as to how far the Canadian navy should be utilized in defence of the empire. Nearly every one who has spoken on the subject, both in this House, and in the other chamber, has admitted this important fact, that if England is at war with any nation of the world, Canada becomes automatically, at war with that nation. If so, then what is the use of this Canadian navy unless it forms part and parcel of the British navy? Let us suppose that war is declared between Britain and Japan, and we had one of these Bristols on the Pacific coast, and a Japanese warship should attempt to capture a Canadian vessel, what would be the position of the Bristol in that case? She would have no power or authority, in fact it would be a contravention of the principles admirably advocated by the hon. gentleman from Middlesex, if she dared to fire a shot in her own defence. Unless she violated the very principles on which this naval force is based, she would have to wait until she got, by some means, instructions from Canada, that Canada had declared, by order in council, confirmed by parliament, that we were taking part in the war. Let us consider the position assumed by the Premier of the country. He has declared openly and repeatedly on the floor of parliament during the present session that he was not in sympathy with the war which took place between England and France against Russia. What would our position have been under those circumstances? Let us suppose for a moment that war is declared by England and France against Russia, to enforce what they believe to be that which is in the interest not only of their own countries but in the interest of the peace of the world. Then we would have the Premier of Canada, if he acted upon the principles he has laid down, refusing to aid the empire. Take the Canadian navy without its being a unit of the British navy, and unless it is to become as is the navy of Australia, automatically a portion of the British navy, to say the least of it, it would be a gigantic farce. If the intention and policy of the government is, as I believe it to be, separation, then I can understand the object of this policy of establishing a totally independent navy. Much has been said, and a great deal of credit has been taken by every gentleman who has supported this Bill, not only here but elsewhere, as to the aid which Canada rendered to England in the Boer war. No one knows better than the hon. gentleman who has just spoken so eloquently and learnedly on that question, that no aid was volunteered in connection with that war until public opinion in Canada became so strong as to force the government to consent to send a contingent to South Africa. He also knows that the Premier, when interviewed by a correspondent of the Toronto 'Globe,' declared that it was against the policy of the country to send aid to South Africa until parliament met. If there is one man in Canada who more than any other deserves credit for having urged the government to come to the aid of the empire at that time, it is Sir Charles Tupper. While in Nova Scotia, he wired to the present Premier telling him that if he would consent to the organization of a military force in this country to be sent to South Africa to aid in the Boer war, that he would pledge the support of the whole Conservative party to it. Then, and not until then, and not until communication had passed between England and this country when it was well known that the then Governor General took very strong grounds on the question, did the government yield to the demands of the people? Yet we constantly hear supporters of the government, on every occasion, taking credit for having done that which they were compelled to do. But that is not all. When they did consent to the organization of the first contingent that left this country for South Africa what did they do? They passed an order in council declaring that it should not be considered as a precedent. What did they mean by that? They meant the adoption of the same policy which we now have proposed by the present government. Public opinion was so strong in this country that, notwithstanding the fact they had declared by order in council that the sending of the first contingent should not be considered as a precedent, other contingents were sent to take part in the Boer war. The credit claimed by the present government for what was done at that time in aid of the empire, has just as much foundation as the credit they are constantly taking for the prosperity of this country on account of their fiscal policy. That policy to a greater or less extent had been laid down by the former government, and under that policy the country prospered, and yet we are constantly being told that the prosperity of Canada arises from the fiscal policy of this government. I would not be surprised ere long to be told that they inaugurated the national policy, and to them belongs all the credit for the growth and prosperity of this country. True the country is prosperous. It has prospered under that policy and has prospered on account of the great success which has followed the adaptation of the people of the Northwest to the cultivation of the soil. That with the genial sun of the summer and the rain falls have brought great prosperity to the country, and to hundreds of thousands of people whose energy, industry and intelligence are the real causes of that prosperity. My principal reason for objecting to the naval policy of the government is this—and I may go farther probably than many of those with whom I am associated—that I am, consistent with the autonomy we enjoy to-day, an imperialist to the fullest possible extent of the word. I hope the time is not far distant when the wish of the hon. gentleman opposite (Hon. Mr. Dandurand), will be realized, when we will have an opportunity of being consulted and giving advice in connection with the general management of the navy as an intrigal part of the British empire.

And just as long as we are an integral part of the British empire, just so long should a navy that may be established in this country automatically take part in any war that may take place, without having to wait for an order in council or for the approval of parliament. I recognize that parliament should be called together afterwards to ratify anything that might have been done; but unless such is the case, the navy of Canada, whatever it may be, will be useless to a great extent, unless it is in such a position as to act immediately, as I have already pointed out. My hon. friend from Delorimer pointed out that the different independent nations in the world had their navy—even the smallest of them had their navy. That is quite true, but those are totally independent countries, and they are not called upon to take part in the war or troubles that may exist between any other two countries. Being independent themselves, they should have their navy, however weak it may be, if it is only for the defence of their own commerce and their own shores; and it is just so with Canada, and if Canada is to have a navy, and I am glad to know she is to have a navy, it should be part and parcel of the British navy, and not independent like Brazil or the smaller countries in the Pacific. I can appreciate the absurdity of having an independent navy, and I would like my hon. friend to tell us what would be the result or in what position would one of our 'Bristols' be in the Atlantic if England were at war with Austria or any other country? If the warships of the country with which they were at war were sailing in the Atlantic ocean for the purpose of capturing British vessels, and she met or overtook a Canadian vessel, I presume the Canadian vessel would fly the British flag, and so long as she would fly it, she would be subject to attack by the warships of the country with which England was at war, would she not? Or would she at once, until she received instructions from the government of Canada, hoist a white flag, and say they were neutral, or hoist some neutral flag that might be adopted by this country? The Austrian man of war would seize a commercial vessel flying the British flag, and if there was a 'Bristol' alongside of her, she would not dare take action without first having received instructions from the Canadian government.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I am surprised my hon. friend would put such a question, because I do not believe any set of men called Canadian sailors who would not get into action.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I quite concur in the remarks made by the hon. gentleman. I was speaking of the legal effect, if it might be so termed, of the relations which we hold towards England under the circumstances. Does the hon. gentleman pretend to say that the Canadian vessel, the 'Bristol,' would have any right to interfere in such a war? Take the Crimean war, for instance, which the premier of this country declared he would not be a party to, would a Canadian vessel have a right, under the policy adopted by nations, to enter into warlike relations with a Russian fleet until she got instructions to do so? I can understand well that a British vessel flying the British flag and that a 'Bristol' flying the British flag, if her officers partook for a moment of the character of their ancestors would fight whether they got instructions to do so or not, and I should be very much surprised if they did not do so and take the consequences as others have done in the past. That does not meet the point that I was endeavouring to impress upon the minds of the hon. gentlemen of this House. I am strongly in favour of the construction of vessels, or of rendering such aid as might be deemed proper and necessary in defence of the country. My own impression is that a contribution of money for the construction of vessels for the British navy, with the understanding that these vessels should be utilized as they were formerly in the protection of our own ports, Canada not only having a certain interest, but should take part in the maintenance of and the manning of those vessels.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—And in the building?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have no objection to that at all. They should be built here. On the contrary I would prefer to see them built here if it could be done at all at any reasonable expense, and I would go further and say that in order to encourage the shipbuilding interests in this country I would rather pay more for the construction of them in Canada than I would pay in any other port of the world. At the same time, in doing that, I would come back to the same point that they should be a part and parcel of the united force of the British empire. That is no new policy. Under the administration of which I had the honour to be a member, I know we were found fault with and very strongly because when Sir Charles Tupper was Minister of Railways and Canals he paid the difference between the tariff rates that were imposed upon engines for the Intercolonial railway to Canadian manufacturers for the purpose of encouraging the manufacture of those engines in Canada, but that principle was condemned by the Liberal party at that time. The same principle I would apply to the building of these warships. I should like to know what there is to prevent a mutual understanding as to the manner they should be built, under proper supervision and under the guidance of those who really understand and know what a war vessel should be. There would be no difficulty in making arrangements of that kind. In Esquimalt we had British ships. Canada contributed towards the building and maintenance of the dry dock there, and the construction and maintenance of the force which manned the fortification which was built in Esquimalt but not to the same extent as in Halifax. I concur in the necessity and duty of this country, so long as she is a part of the British empire, and I trust that will continue for all time to come, to pay a certain proportion of the maintenance of these dock yards, wherever they may be necessary, to be kept in a state of repair or to build them wherever they may be necessary, to be utilized in defence of the empire and particularly of Canada. I speak under correction when I say I am not sure whether we contributed anything towards the maintenance of the fortifications in Halifax, but the same principle could be applied to that as was applied to the case of Esquimalt. What has been the policy of the government in taking over Esquimalt under its own management, and allowing the British fleet to be taken from Esquimalt harbour and also from Halifax. Has this country been strengthened by that policy? It was reported only a short time ago—and I have no doubt my hon. friend read it—that those magnificent works constructed at Esquimalt are going into ruin and decay, that they have been utterly neglected, and if that is to be the policy pursued by this government in reference to the maintenance of dock yards and of fortifications, what position would we be in, in case of difficulty between Great Britain and any other country? What condition the fortifications at Halifax are in I am not prepared to say; but those are the reports which have been made officially of the state of the fortifications and the defence works on the Pacific coast. We all know that the policy between nations at the present time in declaring war is not that which prevailed a number of years ago. Not many years ago, before war was declared sufficient time was given for the subjects of any other country to leave it. Japan did not adopt that policy, nor has any other country. Japan prepared for attack upon the possessions of Russia, and she had her war vessels at the points to make the attacks before she declared war and before Russia had an opportunity of really knowing what Japan intended to do, and to the surprise of the world that country had taken possession of a portion of Russian territory before it was known generally that a state of war existed. That would be the case to-morrow with any great power that would be likely to declare war. Time would not be given to enable the other nation to prepare. The facilities for war, the means of carrying on war, the armaments of the present day, are entirely different from what they were fifty years ago; consequently the mode of carrying on hostilities between countries is altogether different; hence the necessity for being prepared for all contingencies.

My hon. friend drew attention to a reference made by an hon. gentleman as to the possibility of war with the United States. Any person living in this country and reflecting for a moment upon the consequences of a war between these two countries, could not help deploring it, and we trust it shall never take place. But let me ask this question; supposing difficulties did occur between the United States and Canada, what would be the good of the two or three Bristols that we are to have, or the other vessels which are to be built? Our danger would not be from the sea where the Bristols would be located, but on the inland waters, and that is the great reason why the Canadian government, to my mind, has been derelict in its duty, severely so, in not drawing the attention of the British government to the violation of the Rush-Bagot treaty, by the United States which has been going on for years. It is said that the United States authorities are building in the upper lakes vessels for commercial purposes. They are building vessels only to be kept in their harbours, but supposing difficulties occurred, these vessels having been built, could be equipped and manned in a very few days, and the whole of the western waters of the lakes would be flooded with men of war, and the whole of our frontier would be not only subjected to attack, but sure to be captured and taken possession of by the United States. I do not anticipate war between the United States and Canada, but as has been indicated, the safety of our country lies in being prepared for any difficulties that may arise. Does any one suppose, knowing the character of the population of the United States, and the government of that country that Canada would have been allowed to go on building war vessels on the north shore of Lake Superior, or of Lake Huron without their protesting violently against it? I have a distinct recollection when I had the honour of being a member of the cabinet of Mr. Blain requiring permission from us to allow war vessels which were then building in Chicago to pass through our canals ostensibly for the purpose of reaching the Atlantic ocean. It was possible that the request was then made honestly, and that they were building vessels for that purpose, because they were erecting docks and shipbuilding facilities in Chicago, but if permission was given to them to sail their vessels through our canals, and they were building them in the dock yards in the western states, they would be prepared at any moment in case of difficulty between the England and the United States to float them on the larger lakes, not to our advantage certainly, and it is unnecessary for me to predict for a moment what the result would be. So far as the reference made by my hon. friend to myself is concerned, it is not pertinent to the question. The war vessels being constructed in England are not being built so much on account of the fear that may exist of an attack, but to have them built and ready at any moment to repel attacks if made. Reference has been made to the declaration of Lord Kitchener. Does any one suppose that Lord Kitchener, with the reputation he has, would ever give expression to any other opinion than that to which he gave expression and to which the attention of the House has been called. Though a civilian, in the confidence I have in the British race, I have no fear whatever what the result might be ultimately, even if Germany did declare war against England. The result, to my mind, would be just what the result has been over and over again in former wars, and that would be that the British nation, and the navy particularly, with her soldiers would come out victorious. But that is not the qeustion we have to decide. I may be wrong, but I firmly believe that the premier of this country, from the declarations he has made over and over again, looks forward to the time when, as he himself expressed it, this country will fall from the empire as the fruit ripe from the tree. During the discussion which has taken place in the Commons, the question was repeatedly put to the premier as to whether he still entertains those opinions or not, and he has failed on every occasion to either deny or affirm the principle or to intimate that he had changed his mind.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There are one or two points to which I think it is well to draw the attention of the Senate. I noticed in the remarks made by the hon. member from Middlesex (Hon. Mr. Ross) that he ridiculed the idea of donations being given by the colonies in aid of the British navy; that England was sufficiently rich, that she did not need any aid in that particular direction. If my recollection serves me correctly, in all the correspondence that took place, the request of the admiralty and of the British government, it was held that the colonies, being portions of the empire, should contribute, in proportion to their wealth and ability, towards the maintenance of the imperial navy. They did not indicate in what manner that should be given. It was also intimated in the resolution that was passed in the House of Commons of March, 1909, read by my hon. friend, whether intentionally or not I am not prepared to say, but he certainly omitted the last sentence or two of that resolution, in which it is declared that while there was a unanimity on the part of the Commons, on both sides, that something should be done by Canada in aid of the navy of the empire, it wound up by stating—I am not quoting the exact words, because I have not them before me—that it should be in accordance with the request from the admiralty of England. Any one who has taken the trouble to read the correspondence which has taken place, and the proceedings of the conference held in England, cannot but come to one conclusion, and that is they desired that whatever was done by the colonies should be in accordance with the plans laid down by the admiralty, and that would be to create a unit. In fact, that whatever Canada would do under the circumstances should be in accordance with the rules and plans adopted in the construction of a naval force by the admiralty; that in case the ships whether they were built by this country, or by donations which might be made by Canada to aid in the construction of Dreadnoughts in England, that they should act in unison with the British fleet whenever circumstances required their aid in defence of the empire. Upon that principle, every member of the opposition both in the Commons and in this country, probably with one or two exceptions, agreed. It has been pointed out to us—and here in particular, and very eloquently by the hon. gentleman from Mille Iles (Mr. David), that the Conservative party were fearfully disrupted on this question, that no party had ever presented such a disunited front as they had upon this subject. That there may be differences of opinion in reference to the best mode of defence of this country, and a navy to defend the empire in case of necessity I would not be very much surprised. I would be very much surprised if the manner in which that should be accomplished would be concurred in by two or three hundred men, who, perhaps, take the same interest in the welfare of the empire, I was going to say, as I do. Although taking a lively interest in the defence of the empire, it seems somewhat strange to those who have paid attention to what has occurred lately to hear gentlemen who are supporting the government on this question talk about disruption amongst the members of the Conservative party.

I quesiton very much whether that disruption exists to the same extent as it does upon the ministerial benches, for if the ministerialists who have expressed their opinions on this subject upon various occasions were as honest as those of the Conservative party, or of the few of the Conservative party who have given utterance to their sentiments, there would be presented to this country a much greater divergence of opinion than exists in the Conservative party to-day. There is but one policy, to my mind, which actuates the Conservative party, and that is as liberal a policy as could possibly be adopted to aid in defence of the empire. There may be difference of opinion as to the best mode of accomplishing that. I would be surprised if it did not exist. My own view is that it would be infinitely better if Canada were to enter into an arrangement with the British government by which we should contribute a million or two every year in aid of the maintenance of the British navy, giving us certain rights in the management of it, and in the manning of it; than our spending the amount of money we are about to expend to create what has been called, and I think properly termed, a tin pot navy for this country which would be utterly useless in case of war unless it became a unit of the imperial force. Now, what of the financial position? To go back a little; at Confederation one of the conditions of the union of the four provinces was that Canada should expend so much per annum, I think about two millions a year, if my recollection serves me right, in the maintenance of a militia force. We have enlarged that amount, so that at the present time it is about seven millions a year, and to my mind we have not been so derelict in our duty in making preparations for the defence of the country as has been laid at our charge, even by English statesmen. I have always contended, and I think those who have watched the events of war in the different parts of the world will admit the fact, that transportation from one portion of the country to the other is as much an expenditure in aid of the success of an army as it is to give the money direct, or to give individuals to form and constitute the army. Only a short time ago, when the present government introduced a measure for the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, what was one of the strong reasons and arguments advanced in favour of that expenditure? It was that there should be a direct communication between the seaboard on the Atlantic, and the provinces of Manitoba and the Northwest and British Columbia, so that troops should be transported from England by a direct route, from the great depot at home, across the continent without touching the American border. Now, what I contend is that in the construction of the Intercolonial Railway, in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the Grand Trunk Pacific, the facilities they afford for the transportation of troops, constitute to a greater or less extent an expenditure in aid of the defence of our own country, and also of England. Supposing for a moment there was war with Russia; or with any of the Asiatic countries, would it not be in the interest of the Empire to have facilities by which troops could be conveyed from England direct across this continent to the Pacific coast, because it is there where the attacks would be, either by the Russian fleet in the Pacific ocean, or by the Japanese fleet, or by the Chinese fleet. To my mind, every transcontinental road which has been built is to a certain extent in aid of the empire, in case she should have to enter into a conflict with any of the nations on the eastern and western coasts of our country; so that, strongly as I feel in connection with the maintenance of the connection between this country and the mother country; strong as I feel it is our duty as Canadians and British subjects, as an integral part of the British empire, that we should render every assistance possible whenever it is necessary, I cannot overlook the fact that there has been created, and particularly as announced by the present government in connection with the transcontinental railway systems a material aid in defence of the empire in case of difficulties with foreign powers.

As I have already intimated, we are incurring an expenditure of about seven millions per annum in the maintenance of our land forces. We are establishing permanent corps. We have our volunteer force, and now we are to expend about seven millions a year, if my recollection serves me right, although some gentlemen said in the course of debate that the annual expenditure was supposed to be three or four millions of dollars on creating a navy. But bear in mind that is only a beginning; no one knows where it is going to extend. Gentlemen who have discussed this question have expressed not only disapprobation but they approached this subject with a great deal of fear, and almost horror, of giving a million or two a year as a contribution to the British navy.

What does the seven millions a year which we are to pay towards the establishment of the naval force proposed by the Bill now before us amount to, when capitalized at 3½ per cent? What debt shall we incur in doing that? Over two hundred millions of dollars. Supposing that we gave a couple of millions or three millions a year to England to aid in the construction of war vessels, with the understanding that I have already intimated, would it not be better financially for this country than to incur the expenditure that we are about to enter upon, unless, using the language of my hon. friend opposite, we are preparing for a separation between Canada and the mother country. It is sufficient for me to know that I am a British subject. I think that should be sufficient for any one, for the declaration that he is a British subject implies all the freedom, civil, political or religious, that any man can enjoy in this world; and as long as we have the protection of the Union Jack when difficulties arise; that we as a portion of the empire should have protection, it should be sufficient for every Canadian, whether he be of British or French origin. He is a British subject and he is a Canadian, and a Canadian British subject. To talk of Canada as a separate portion of the empire is heterodox; worse than that. When my father left England to come to this country, he simply moved from one portion of the empire to the other. He did as many of our citizens do. The father of a family who is born on a farm in one of the townships and raises a family there desires to change his location, buys a farm in another part of Canada and settles his family there. He does not become an alien because he goes to the Northwest, neither does he become any less a Canadian. The man who leaves England to come to this country, though he may call himself a Canadian is no less a British subject than when he lived in England—at least, that is the view I take of this matter. Looking at it from a financial standpoint, apart altogether from the sentiment of having a navy of our own, from a financial standpoint you would accomplish more with the taxation which is to be incurred for civil protection and our rights and privileges, by contributing to the British navy, with something to say in its management. I repeat again that I dislike this talk—the loyalty of this race and the disloyalty of the other. No one questioned the loyalty of the French Canadians, yet it has been heralded forth in almost every speech that has been made. We have had history quoted to us. Most of us know of the courage that was displayed in the time of need by our French Canadian fellow subjects, as well as by our English fellow-subjects in the west.

De Salaberry immortalized his name. The late Chief Justice Robinson of Toronto, an Upper Canada boy, immortalized himself when he fought with Brock at Queenston Heights. Let us forget for the moment if we possibly can where we were born, in England, Ireland or Scotland, or Lower or Upper Canada, or in the Northwest. Let us come to this conclusion, that we are British subjects, and as such an integral part of the empire our duty is, upon all occasions, to render whatever assistance we can, financially or otherwise in defence of that empire. Those are the views I hold upon that question. We have heard a good deal about the willingness, particularly from my friend who is smiling in front of me, of his particular race to spend any amount of money to establish, and I presume continue in existence, the naval force. We have not forgotten the elections of 1896, when the then government of this country proposed to spend a pretty large amount of money, considering our resources, some half a million in the purchase of armanents to place our volunteer force in a position that in case of necessity they would be prepared to take their own part. There was scarcely a church door, scarcely a rural settlement in the whole of the province of Quebec in which that policy was not denounced in the strongest possible language, and Sir Chas. Tupper was at the time held up as being prepared to squander a million of money to furnish volunteers with arms to go off if necessary to fight the negroes in the western and southwestern states. I am pleased to know that there is a change of sentiment in the minds of those that took that extreme view, and I will tell you how I account for it. I account for it from the fact that they are now in power, and that is one of the advantages of our system by which governments change; parties in opposition advocate extreme, I was going to say absurd theories, and propound policies that it is impossible for them to carry out when they get into power. The opinions of hon. gentlemen now on the treasury benches have marvelously changed, since they got the purse strings in their own hands. That is one of the advantages of a change of government, and a few more rapid changes would be beneficial. My hon. friend is inconsistent in the position he took. He told us first of all that the dockyards and manufacturing establishments in the old country were not sufficient to produce the Dreadnoughts that would have to be built in case we adopted the policy of contributions to the British navy; but before he closed his remarks he told us that they were building in England at the present moment sufficient Dreadnoughts and ships to maintain their independence and to protect the country against any possible invasion from any other country.

That being the case, my hon. friend might properly answer that time was of no consequence in this case; but he forgot to say that before ships can be built in Canada, dockyards must be constructed at great expense, and after they are constructed without the mechanical genius which characterizes the shipbuilders of the old country, it would be years before we could have a ship ready to put on the seas for the protection of our coasts in case it was necessary. The hon. gentleman from Middlesex says that no such thing as a plebiscite was ever heard of under our constitution. I agree with him that a direct plebiscite would be a controvention of the principles of responsible government; but when, as in the case of Gladstone's Home Rule Bill, an appeal is made to the country that is an indirect plebiscite. Gladstone had carried his Home Rule Bill in the House of Commons, it being one of the planks of his platform at that time; but it was thrown out by the House of Lords on the ground that the terms on which Home Rule was granted had never been submitted to the people. Gladstone went to the country and was defeated. Salisbury was returned to power with one of the largest majorities given to any government in a number of years. The House of Lords did precisely the same thing with Lloyd-George's budget. It was regarded by those who held large estates as a scheme to confiscate property and the Lords threw it out. The government went to the people; that is another indirect plebiscite. The people decided against the House of Lords and the result was Asquith remained in power; the budget was reintroduced and has been passed by both Houses.

Let us come now to our own country: plebiscites, even when affirmed by the people, are not always acted upon. The present government submitted the question of prohibition to the whole Dominion, and though a majority of over 15,000 voters decided in favour of prohibition, the government turned it down and said 'No.' Why? Because the province of Quebec had given a large majority against prohibition. When you look at the statistics of that province, you find that Quebec has less licensed houses and more indirect prohibition than any other province of the Dominion; yet the government did not consider the will of the people of sufficient importance to justify them in acting on the principle which they themselves had laid down, and which assisted materially in electing the Reform party in Ontario in the election which took place at the same tme.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Did more than one-third of the people go to the polls on that occasion?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That does not make it any less a plebiscite.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—But it justified the government in not acting.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I can give the hon. gentleman instances in which some of his own colleagues have gone to the poll, and though not one-fourth of the electors voted, they took their seats in the House and acted as though they had been elected by a majority of the voters in their constituency. As my hon. friend beside me points out, in the elections of 1896, as was the case in the province of Ontario on two or three occasions, the government held power with a minority of the votes cast; but the votes cast in the different localities were sufficient to elect enough representatives to keep the government in power.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The hon. gentleman speaks of the legislature.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have been speaking of the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The results were brought about after the gerrymander of 1882.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I will not be diverted into a discussion of the gerrymander just now. If I did, I could tell the hon. gentleman that his gerrymander in the province of Ontario at the last election had precisely the result that has been pointed out. I could tell him how he fixed my old county, but that is irrelevent. The government went to the country on the question of prohibition, and the Dominion cast over 15,000 of a majority of votes in favour of that principle, yet the government declined to give effect to the expressed will of the people.

Now as to the question of donations to the Imperial navy, it has been ridiculed by the hon. member from Middlesex in the truely eloquent style in which he can place his points before an audience. His words rolled from his tongue as sweet oil would flow from a bottle, but what are the facts? England did not refuse to take from New Zealand £20,000 per annum in aid of the naval force. Cape Colony, poor as it is, contributed £30,000, and raised it a short time afterwards to £50,000 per annum. Australia paid £200,000. Natal, small and insignificant as it appears on the map, had soul enough to contribute £12,000 and afterwards increased the amount to £35,000. Newfoundland, lying as she does at the very mouth of the St. Lawrence, with a small population and limited revenue, contributed for some little time £3,000 per annum, and then raised it to £4,800. When we were asked to give anything, the present premier declined to give consent. Referring again to the Boer war, when the demand was made upon England for the payment of everything connected with that contingent, even the furnishing of food and hay by this country, I said in this House that I thought Canada, although she had given her sons in defence of the empire in connection with that war, ought to have had magnanimity enough to pay the expenses of the contingent.. The then leader of the House asked me quietly, 'Would you recommend the payment of the expenditure in connection with that contingent by Canada.' I answered 'certainly', and that is what we should have done at the time, particularly when we knew what our fellow colonists in the different parts of the empire were doing. Let me add that Canada was the very last in the whole empire to render England assistance in that struggle. Even the smallest colony lying in the Pacific, commencing with New Zealand, every portion of the colonies—I have a list of them and the base upon which they tendered their services—but not until the last moment did the principal colony of the empire, looked upon as the wealthiest, strongest and most important, consent to send a contingent. If there was ever any portion of the empire that occupied a humiliating position in connection with that great struggle in South Africa, it was Canada, yet we find upon every stump, and in almost every speech that would be made, even of my hon. friend who addressed the House so eloquently, they boasted about what Canada under a Liberal government did in the Boer war. I admit she did her duty, but the party in power were not entitled to any credit for what was done. It was forced upon them by the public sentiment of the country, and then, they would not pay a red cent towards the expenditure. It is said that England has adopted the policy proposed by Canada. That is true. What else could they do? Taking the declaration of the Premier at the conference in England, and his declaration in the House of Commons, it was that or nothing, and it was better that they should acquiesce, conceding our right to deal with this question, this portion of the empire having its own legislature, recognizing to its fullest extent the autonomy of the country, they would certainly accept what was offered without any cavil. But what has been proposed is not in accordance with what should have been done, or what the admiralty intimated was required to be done. I notice in late press despatches that the 'Saturday Review,' a very important journal in England, published the following:

Referring to the separate nature of the Canadian Naval Bill, the 'Saturday Review' says: Sir Wilfrid Laurier's position is hopeless, even from a Canadian standpoint. If war occurred, a foreigner would assume what every Briton must assume, that England's war was Canada's war.'

Now, if that be the case, that England's war is Canada's war, then a Canadian navy, such as it is, should be a unit with that of the British navy, and should as soon as war was declared, become automatically a portion of that navy under the control of the empire. I do not say that they should take from her the command of her ships. They would go with it; but the Manchester 'Guardian' takes another view of the question, and we all know the important position the Manchester 'Guardian' holds towards political parties in England. I think I am safe in saying, and I think the hon. leader of the House will agree with me, that the Manchester 'Guardian' stands upon the same footing, in expressing the opinions of the people of England as does the 'Times,' and in some regards, so far as speaking for the Canadians, perhaps a little better.

The Manchester 'Guardian' supports Laurier's policy in connection with the naval Bill, and says incidentally, 'that it means Britain's course in 'ordinary wars' will be relieved of any responsibility for the defence of the colonies. They will have fleets to defend themselves if attacked, but so long as they remain neutral, the enemy will have more to lose than to gain by attacking.'

If that view is to be accepted as the opinion held by the public men, or by the government of England, in case we should by any misfortune get into difficulty with any country, and we declare ourselves in our defensive position as independent of England, and would not render to England any assistance unless parliament had so decided, or an order in council had so decided, England would say, 'Very well, if you want us, we are not under any obligation whatever to come to your aid.' I think that is the view every sensible Englishman would take under the circumstances. If you assume for yourselves the position of independence and will only render aid when you think in your wisdom that we are right in any trouble we may get into, in all common sense and fairness we should occupy the same position. According to the utterances of members of the government, some of them would not render their aid if we are to accept their declaration as being in favour of the separation of Canada from the empire. I take that from the remarks made by the Minister of Justice. In discussing that question in the Commons that gentleman said:

I only want to say that if I thought there was anything else which insidiously, secretly, and colourably was endeavouring to introduce the thin edge of the wedge of any division between Canada and Great Britain, to make for disloyalty towards Great Britain, or to make even for voluntary separation between Canada and Great Britain, I not only would not be supporting this measure, but I would not remain for one single hour in any government that would introduce it into the House.

That is good strong language—langauge which I would expect to fall from a Bay of Quinté man. The Bay of Quinté having been originally settled by the old United Empire Loyalists, who left their homes and property in the United States in order to maintain their connection with the mother country, and live under the flag which they believed would give them the greatest freedom that men can enjoy in Canada. I confess that I never use the word United Empire Loyalists without feeling a good deal of veneration. Men who will leave their homes and go into the wilderness for the sake of their fealty to their country and king, or to the institutions that they revere must be men who have some regard for their country, and its institutions, and Mr. Aylesworth being a descendent of those, I am not at all surprised that he should use that language, yet he is a member of a government, some of the members of which have openly announced as their desire, their wish and their day dream that Canada should separate from the mother country. The premier uttered such sentiments in the House of Commons. Anybody can read in the official report of the Commons the statement that he made when he openly declared that the day dream of his life was that Canada should become an independent nation. True, he said he hoped it would be through peaceful means. He never would advocate an attempt at separation by war; but it would come naturally, and it was the day dream of his life. Take the utterances of the Postmaster General. Take the utterances of the hon. gentleman who was sitting opposite some years ago. Take the evidence of the Liberal press of this country at the present moment. I have extracts that would fill columns if I wanted to take up the time of the Senate by reading them, showing that the whole policy of the party at the present time, is with the ultimate intention of establishing a navy, and secondly of having a permanent and volunteer force in Canada so as to prepare for the time when this country shall drop from the parent stem as the ripe fruit falls from a tree. The present Minister of Railways and Canals, only a month or two ago, expressed sentiments of a similar character at a public dinner in Montreal. It is true—and I give him credit for it—he says he was misreported. It is very strange. I have the report of the speech as published in the Montreal 'Gazette' and the Montreal 'Herald,' which paper certainly would not for a moment be considered a journal that would misrepresent the statement of a minister of the Crown.

I have an extract from the Montreal 'Witness,' much stronger than any of them and they all report that gentleman to have made certain statements that the time is not far distant when we would have no Governor General here from Britain. He may have been misrepresented—people are misrepresented occasionally in the press; of which represent the policy and opinions of the supporters of the government of the day publishing similar reports, you can scarcely believe for a moment that they deliberately misrepresented a cabinet minister on so important a question as that. My principal reason for taking the position I do against the present policy of the government is not that I object to the expenditure of any reasonable sum—I would say any unreasonable sum—in order to place Canada in a position in which she can be pointed to as an outlying portion of the empire that is ready to sacrifice her means and her sons for the defence of the empire. I care very little about the taunt that I have heard certain gentlemen make, in this House and privately, 'You gentlemen are always prating about your loyalty.'

Hon. Mr. POWER—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have only this to say to the gentleman who cried 'hear, hear.' I would like to know what he ever did personally, when difficulties presented themselves, in defence of the country? When it was invaded by a horde of scoundrels from the other side of the border, did he shoulder his musket and go to the front and risk his life in defence of Canada? He says, 'Hear, hear.' If talking will do it, my hon. friend no doubt can accomplish as much——

Hon. Mr. POWER—I did what I was expected to do; I turned out as a member of the military forces in Halifax to do my duty. There was no attack made there, and I did not have to risk my life, as it happened.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am glad to know that the hon. gentleman even went that far.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Why say 'even that far.'

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Even went that far, yes, I will put it that way if you like—even went that far. But I know that in my own experience in the country in which I live, I know the parties who were foremost in rushing to the front when their services were required. I know who they were who originally formed the volunteer forces in that portion of the country. I have a distinct recollection when the Liberals at that time sneered at the idea of a volunteer force. I remember also when the officers of the force to which I belonged used to go down the back street on their way to the drill hall so as not to have those of the Liberal party sneer at them as they went along. That time has passed away, and I am very glad to know that it is so; and I could give the reasons why it has passed away. But I am speaking of the parties as they existed in the past and as they exist to-day. The Conservative party and those that belong to it never have been backward when their services were required, while the party in opposition to the government at that time made constant complaint about the amount of money that we were expending in aid of the forces in this country, although it is nothing in comparison with what you are expending to-day. I am delighted to know that this is all changed, and I believe that to-day and for the reasons I have already given, the desire of Canada is to constitute a force, both naval and volunteer, not for Canadian defence alone, nor to keep out of any difficulties the empire may get into, but for the defence of the empire. I do not speak for the present government, because they have declared that they are not to be expected to join in any war in which England is engaged which those who for the moment rule Canada shall consider unjust; and yet, in the same breath, they give utterance to the sentiment that when England is at war Canada is at war. How they can reconcile the two statements is something that I leave to my hon. friend from Middlesex to do, for I confess my inability to reconcile the positions taken by the present government. Speaking for myself individually, a provision in the present Act similar to that contained in the Australian Act would have my warmest support, to the effect that when England was at war the Australian forces automatically became a portion of the force for the defence of the empire.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Unless I misunderstood the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, he does not take issue with the government so far as the building of a Canadian navy is concerned. He would be quite in accord also in having the Canadian navy built in Canadian ports, even if it was to cost something more than in being built out of this country; but he takes issue mainly on the present Bill and with the government, because of section 22 of the Bill, which provides that in case of emergency the Governor in Council shall declare as to whether this navy Bill will be placed at the disposal of the British admiralty. The hon. gentleman has drawn the attention of this House to the fact that the building of United States war vessels on the lakes was a threat against Canada, and that it might become a very serious danger. For my part, I do not share his apprehensions, but if they are well founded and the present Bill is not to be put in force for a year or five years, but is intended to be placed on our statutes to govern the future and to answer all circumstances which may arise, and if such dangers should arise as he apprehends, would it not be useful that Canada, represented by its government for the time being, should have a voice as to whether the whole Canadian navy, in case of emergency, should be placed at the disposal of the British government, or whether some ships should not be kept in Canadian ports for the purpose of meeting any danger which might be apprehended at the time? I think that the hon. gentleman and the country may safely rely upon the government of the day, whether it be Conservative or Liberal, to do its duty in all cases of emergency. There is no reason to apprehend that if need be the help which is due by Canada will not be given to the mother country. The hon. gentleman has, to my great surprise, insinuated that the Prime Minister, and possibly some of his colleagues, have ulterior motives in presenting this Bill; that it is intended to create a Canadian navy in view of the future independence of this country. I respectfully suggest that it is hardly becoming for an hon. gentleman occupying the position he occupies to make an insinuation of that kind.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I made no insinuation. I stated my firm belief that that was the ultimate object they had in view. I may be wrong, but that is my honest conviction, and I hesitate not to express it.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I accept the hon. gentleman's statement. In my humble opinion, however, much as I may respect the hon. gentleman, he is not warranted by the facts in expressing an opinion of that kind. I say without fear of contradiction, that the premier of this country is held in too high esteem from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and in England as well, as a Canadian and a true British subject to be suspected of any such ulterior motive. This measure is presented to the Canadian parliament by the present government as being in the interest of the country and nobody has any right to assert that there is any other object in view, and it is not making for the unity of the nation to throw out charges of that kind. It is in a way a repetition of the cry of disloyalty, which we so often hear, for the purpose of producing political effect. Whether we be French speaking British subjects, or Anglo Saxon British subjects, we are all of one mind in this country. We appreciate the British institutions which we possess, and I am not aware that anybody in this country has any thought of independence or of breaking the British tie.

My main object in rising to speak on this question, was to answer some of the remarks of the hon. member from Repentigny (Mr. Legris), the hon. member from Grandville (Mr. Choquette) and the hon. member from Victoria (Mr. Cloran). They have taken this position in saying that they would vote against the present measure, that it is a new policy, that the country had never had an opportunity to pronounce as to this new departure, and that it is in direct opposition to the opinions heretofore expressed by the premier and several leading liberals in the country. I desire to take issue with that statement, and after I have shown how groundless that statement is, I desire to point out that, even if it were so, the present circumstances would justify the Prime Minister and other gentlemen who have been alluded to in adopting the opinions which they now entertain on this Bill. I do not deny to any hon. gentleman whether they be members of the Liberal party or members of the nationalists or the Conservative party—because under two appelations they are the same thing—the right of voting as their conscience dictates. If they really believe that this measure is not in the interest of the country it is not only their right but it is their duty to vote accordingly; but what I would expect of them is that they give to the House and to the country their reasons why they cannot approve of this measure, and show how it is against the interest of the Dominion. That would be a manly position to take; but what I cannot understand is their coming before this honourable House and trying to justify the vote they propose to give by showing that it is not in accord with the declaration of the premier or of the hon. member from Mille Iles, or other members of the Liberal party made in 1890, 1896, or 1902. That is no reason, and it is liable to raise a doubt as to the motives by which they are actuated. For my part, I cannot suspect their motives; but it is important that no member of this House be suspected of being actuated by anything other than the true interst of the country. The hon. member from Repentigny referred to the colonial conference of 1902, and stated that the Prime Minister in England at that conference had taken a position which was not in harmony with the measure before us. He stated that in 1907, at the other conference, he likewise took a position which was not in accord with this measure. I shall not take much of the time of this honourable House by reading quotations, but will refer for a moment to the proceedings at the conferences of 1902 and 1907. On referring to the summary of the proceedings of the conference of 1902 made by the Hon. Mr. Foster in the other House, I find that after Lord Tweedmouth had stated what he had expected from the colonies, the Canadian government, represented by the premier, stated the position the Canadian government was willing to take, and intended to occupy. He said:

> At present Canadian expenditures for defence services are confined to the military side. The Canadian government are prepared to consider the naval system of defence as well. On the sea coast of Canada there is a large number of men admirably qualified to form a naval reserve, and it is hoped that at an early date a system may be devised which will lead to the training of these men and to the making of their services available for defence in time of need.
> In conclusion, the ministers repeat that, while the Canadian government are obliged to dissent from the measures proposed, they fully appreciate the obligation of the Dominion to make expenditures for the purpose of defence in proportion to the increasing population and wealth of the country. They are willing that these expenditures should be so directed as to relieve the taxpayer of the mother country from some of the burdens which she now bears; and have the strongest desire to carry out their defence schemes in co-operation with the imperial authorities, and under the advice of the experienced imperial officers, so far as this is consistent with the principle of local self-government, which has proved so great a factor in the promotion of imperial unity.

I ask is there anything in this which is in conflict with the present measure, or if the present measure is not exactly in accordance with the intention of the Canadian government as expressed at that conference by the Canadian Premier?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Come down later to the conference of 1907.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I am coming to that. The hon. gentleman from Repentigny (Mr. Legris), and Granville (Mr. Choquette), lost sight of that very important fact. The issue, at the conference of 1902, between Mr. Chamberlain and Sir Wilfred Laurier was not on what is the subject matter of the present measure, was not as to whether a Canadian navy should be built and placed at the disposal of the British authorities in case of emergency, but was as to whether an imperial council should be formed, composed of English and colonial statesmen, who would have the decision of all matters of that kind. The position taken by Sir Wilfrid Laurier was that the creation of a council of that kind would impair our autonomy, and he refused to be a consenting party. It would have meant, and it was so understood, that not only could war be declared with the assent of a majority of a council of that kind, but that expenditures of all kinds could be decided by the majority of that council, and that the colonial parliaments would have nothing to say. I have a perfect recollection that the movement was started by Mr. Chamberlain himself as far back as 1886 or 1887 and it was started by such men as Lord Roseberry and other leading men of England, but they were unable to devise any scheme which could seriously appeal to the good judgment of the country. After labouring for years they could make no progress, and the scheme remained to this day a dream. That was the issue in 1902 between Mr. Chamberlain and Sir Wilfrid Laurier; and it was because of the firm position which our Premier maintained at that time that he was received as he was by the Canadian people on his return from England. The hon. gentleman has invited me to refer to the proceedings of the conference of 1907. I have here also given in the summary of the Hon. Mr. Foster, the declaration made by Mr. Brodeur, who was at that time speaking for the Canadian government. What did he say?

> We are very glad to see that Lord Tweedmouth has recognized that in this matter it should be left almost entirely to the colony. I may say in conclusion that we will be very glad to work in co-operation with the imperial authorities under the advice of an imperial officer, so far as it is consistent with self-government.

These references have been given time and time again. The position taken by Sir Wilfrid was a reaffirmation of the stand which he had taken in 1902 and nothing more or less. There was a resolution presented at the conference which was intended to go further than the resolutions which had been adopted in 1902, and Sir Wilfrid Laurier declared that, as far as he was concerned, he would not be a party to such a resolution, but he remained of the opinion which he expressed in 1902, and he was not willing to go any further, although willing to do what he had stated the Canadian government was prepared to do at that time. The hon. member from De Lorimer has referred to and quoted the resolution passed unanimously by the House of Commons in March, 1909, and he has called the attention of this honourable House as to whether the terms of that resolution did not bear a mandate on the part of the Canadian government to go to the conference of 1909, and take the position suggested by that resolution. As the quotation is very short, and in order that my remarks may be more complete, I will give the text of the resolution. It is as follows:

> This House fully recognizes the duty of the people of Canada as they increase in numbers and wealth to assume in larger measure the responsibilities of national defence.
>
> The House is of opinion that under the present constitutional relations between the mother country and the self-governing dominions, the payment of regular and periodical contributions to the imperial treasury for naval and military purposes would not, so far as Canada is concerned, be the most satisfactory solution of the question of defence.
>
> The House will cordially approve of any necessary expenditure designed to promote the speedy organization of a Canadian naval service in co-operation with and in close relation to the imperial navy, along the lines suggested by the admiralty at the last imperial conference, and in full sympathy with the view that the naval supremacy of Britain is essential to the security of commerce, the safety of the empire and the peace of the world.
> The House expresses its firm conviction that whenever the need arises, the Canadian people will be found ready and willing to make any sacrifice that is required to give to the imperial authorities the most loyal and hearty co-operation in every movement for the maintenance of the integrity and honour of the empire.

I repeat, following the language of the hon. gentleman from De Lorimier, was that not a mandate to the government, and is there anything in this resolution which is not in perfect accord with the present Bill, and it is the surprise of the country, and will remain the surprise of the country, that His Majesty's opposition in this Canadian parliament, when this Bill was presented, was not found to be in accord with the resolution which had been voted unanimously in 1909.

I ask hon. gentlemen if these proceedings of 1902, the proceedings of 1907 and the resolution of 1909 are not all in accord? I therefore ask if any hon. gentleman in this House or outside of this House can say with any truth that Sir Wilfrid Laurier has not been consistent in the position that he has occupied throughout on this question at the several conferences, as well as in the measure that is now engaging the attention of this honourable House? But I say that even if the government had changed, if it were true that they had changed their position, and modified their opinion, what of it? It is only men of small minds that do not change their opinion. In England, Mr. Balfour took issue with Mr. Chamberlain when the latter tried to introduce his protective policy; and has not Mr. Balfour modified his views in the course of three or four years—because he acted as a statesman, and thought he should give expression to the desire of the people of England. What statesmen, either in this country, or England, or any other country have not modified to a certain extent, as conditions change their opinions? Happily, in the present instance, I am able to state without fear of contradiction that the position which was taken by the government throughout is the position which is taken to-day. The contention that this measure is a new departure is not correct, since it has been before the country from at least 1902, and it has received repeatedly the unanimous approval and sanction of both parties. If there have been any differences of opinion, it would have been made an issue in some of the constituencies at the general elections which took place in the meantime on two or three different occasions; but because the people were a unit on that question, it was not spoken of; and now it will be pretended that because it was not discussed before the electors in any of the general elections or by elections, that it should be made the subject of a plebiscite. Well, the hon. member from Hastings has given his own condemnation of his own party as to that. He admitted a few minutes ago that a plebiscite would not be in accordance with responsible government.

And here I desire to speak more particularly to the people of my own province, and to call their attention to the question whether it is in the best interests of the country, and especially of the province of Quebec, which is in the minority in this Dominion of ours, whether it is in the best interests of the community at large that questions of that kind should be referred to the people. I say no. I say that it is the duty of any statesman worthy of the name to present a policy which will commend itself to the country. It is admitted to be a question which might give rise to national feelings, and where would be the wisdom of presenting to the country an issue of that kind and thereby provoking in other provinces an expression of opinion contrary to that of the province of Quebec. Surely it would not be in the best interests of Canada, and it would certainly not be in the best interests of the province of Quebec, and I call the attention of the people of my own province to this, that they are short-sighted who suggest adopting a precedent of that kind. If it should be done in this case, it should have been done when the contingent was sent to South Africa. I ask whether the majority of the people would not be liable to be carried away on such occasions by questions of sentiment? I desire to add a few words on the merits of the measure itself. This measure, to my mind, is in the best interests of Canada. There are two groups in my own province, anyway, who are disposed to criticise the measure; one group take the position that Canada is not bound to do anything for the British empire; that the revenues of Canada should be confined to the development of Canada's resources; and another group takes the position, that in case of emergency we can depend upon being protected by England, and in case of necessity even by the United States. Well, hon. gentlemen, for my part, I do not think that is a position which is consonant with the true interests of Canada. I do not believe that it is a dignified position to take. We form part of the British empire, and, as such, it becomes not only our duty, but our interest to protect that empire, and to do our fair share for its maintenance. There is not a French Canadian in the province of Quebec who does not appreciate the institutions under which we live. There is not a French Canadian who would be willing to change his allegiance to the United States, and I do not know any who would be prepared to advocate independence. In the province of Quebec, as in other provinces, we are all satisfied because we are a free people protected by the best institutions known to the world, because we are enjoying the benefit of the prestige and of the strength of the British empire. But the British empire is not England. It is not Canada, nor Australia, nor South Africa, it is England and all her colonies, and what is in the interest of one is in the interest of all. It is therefore our duty, whether we be French Canadians or whether we be Anglo-Saxon, English-speaking people—it is the duty of every citizen of this country to do his fair share towards maintaining the integrity of the empire. The creation of this Canadian navy is in the interest of Canada, because it will be the means of developing and protecting our commerce. The hon. gentleman from Montarville (Mr. DeBoucherville) asks how it will develop or protect the commerce of the country? Let me tell him that there is no other country having so large a commerce which has not a navy to protect it in case of need, and let me remind him that if this country has deemed advisable to vote some fifteen million dollars for the purpose of fostering the iron industry, it is no wonder that the Canadian people should be prepared to make a sacrifice for fostering the ship-building industry which will be involved by the creation of this Canadian navy.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I was not asking in regard to the industry. I was asking how this navy would protect?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The navy would protect Canada. It is intended to protect Canada, and to protect the empire at large, because Canada forms part of it. If the empire were to be disrupted to-morrow is it denied that we would suffer from the disruption?

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I was asking how this great navy which is to be built will protect our merchant marine?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—If there was war, does the hon. gentleman not understand that our mercantile ships could be taken and destroyed by the enemy, and in that case would the Canadian navy not protect our commerce?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not unless the government had decided we should take part in it.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Is it seriously suggested bv the hon. member from Hastings that any government would hesitate if there was a case of emergency. to pass the necessary resolution?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not speaking of what the government would do; I am speaking of what the law provides.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The law makes it a duty for the government to consider and consider at an opportune time whether there is an emergency, and as to whether in the interest of Canada—and when I speak of the interest of Canada, I say that with the interest of Canada is involved that of the British empire,—as to whether the Canadian navy should be placed at the disposal of the British admiralty, and I say that it cannot be supposed that an instant would be lost in taking the proper action in that regard. I believe it is in the interest of Canada, because this navy will give to Canada a status becoming its importance and the rapid growth which is taking place. We are suffering in this country for want of real Canadian sentiment and nationality. I am happy to say that we of the province of Quebec 25 or 30 years ago were very much exercised as to what would be our future destiny. At that time we were afraid that confederation might prove to be a great danger to our cherished institutions, and we were discussing in private conversation, in clubs and elsewhere, the question as to what would be the future of this country, and especially of the province of Quebec, and I quite remember that at that time the opinions were somewhat divided; some thought that our inevitable destiny was to form part of the United States republic; others thought that in the near future it would be independent, and generally there was a strong feeling that we French Canadians were inevitably doomed to be absorbed, and see our institutions disappear. This feeling very soon gave way to another, that our institutions would survive; that they would survive provided we remained a part of the British empire, and what we had to do was to make of our country a great nation and try to build a Canadian sentiment. From that time—I am speaking of 25 or 30 years ago—the French Canadians of the province of Quebec set an example in building up that Canadian sentiment, the true nationality, because they had no other interest in any other country. English-speaking people came in a great measure from England, and they look upon this as their home, and they are liable to be carried away at times further than they otherwise would be. What we need in this country is to build up a Canadian sentiment which will look to the interest of Canada primarily.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Do I understand the hon. gentleman to desire a Canadian sentiment independent of British sentiment?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—No. Canada forms part of the British empire. Canada first, Canada as a part of the empire, because the Dominion cannot occupy the position it deserves without being a part of the British empire. Hon. gentlemen will remember that not more than fifteen or twenty years ago a true American sentiment did not prevail in the United States and people asked themselves what would be the outcome of the Republic. The country was divided into three or four sections. There was the south, the north, the eastern and the western states, all having different interests, and it was generaly believed that it would bring the destruction of the Republic; but within quite a recent date a sentiment of true American nationality has arisen which has had the effect of blending all those different interests and sentiments and creating a true American nation. What I expect in Canada, which in time will have not a population of six or seven millions merely, but a population of fifty millions, is that a like sentiment will be created consonant with British sentiment, and which will tend to truly unite all the different sections of this country into one nation. I am also in favour of this Bill for this additional reason to which I call the attention of this honourable House and of the people of my own province. Suppose that we did not do our duty as part of the British empire; suppose we should refuse, as is suggested by certain members of this House, to do anything at the present juncture—and those who take that position also take the position that we should not make any contribution for the building of British ships—suppose we do not do anything in the way of self defence and that in four or five years an emergency arises, would we not be ashamed of the position we would occupy, and would not the sentiment of this country lead strongly towards repairing the neglect of the past by voting a large sum of money towards helping the empire? That would happen, and what would be the consequence? We would have nothing. The ships which would be built would belong to England, and Canada would have to commence creating a navy some time or other. Hon. gentlemen opposite may suggest that it is premature to build a navy at present; but it has not been suggested that when we have a population of thirty or forty millions it would be becoming of Canada to have no navy at all. It is merely a question of time, and the question is whether we should commence now or later on. I say it is our duty to do our share as part of the empire by building a Canadian navy which will in cases of emergency protect our own coasts and the interest of the empire at large. It has been suggested that Sir Wilfrid Laurier is not by this policy promoting the best interests of Canada. I ask what greater ambition he can have than to crown his brilliant career by promoting the best interests of Canada and the empire at large.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—The question before us now is the motion made by the hon. leader of the opposition that this House is not justified in giving its consent to the Bill until it has received the sanction of the country. I have listened to almost all that has been said on this question. It must be remembered that the amendment before us is that an appeal should be made to the people on this Bill. The hon. member opposite said he was astonished at my seconding this motion. He would have good reason to be astonished if I did not favour it. Are we not taking a new and unexpected departure which will lead to enormous expense, without consulting the people. I do not think any one can say this is not a new turn. Had the country ever heard of this Bill until it was brought before us? I do not pretend to give my opinion for or against the measure; but I ask why are we taking this new departure without consulting the people? Under our Militia Act, the militia force cannot be sent out of the country. Is not that a new turn in our politics? The people did not know that they were to establish this navy, which the government intends to form, which it will form, on a different basis from that on which our militia is formed. Even our navy of 1812, when we had a few gunboats, were armed with small cannon. They certainly did not resemble Dreadnoughts, because those boats were designed merely for navigation in our inland waters. But even that little navy would never have been ordered out of Canada any more than our militia. The principle existed always in the minds of the authorities and in the law, that our militia could not be ordered out of the country. Under the provisions of this Bill, by a simple order in council, in what you call an emergency—war or any other thing—the government may put this navy immediately under the order of the nearest commander of the British navy, and this commander can send the ships to Japan or anywhere else beyond the limits of Canada. Is not that a new departure? In the last election it was not known that such legislation as this was contemplated. On the contrary, in my province I think everybody was glad, was happy, was even proud to know that the Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier insisted on preserving our autonomy, and by autonomy we mean the right to keep our navy and our militia under our own control. Therefore, I think that that is a sufficient reason to ask that this Bill should not come into force before there has been a consultation with the country. I expected that hon. members would speak to the question before us. Unfortunately, instead of doing that, some of them discussed matters that were not relevant to the Naval Service Bill. For example, my hon. friend, the member from De Lanaudière, made a capital speech I must admit; I will be proud to preserve it amongst my books; it is very interesting for the anecdotes he gives, but has nothing at all to do with the Bill, nothing at all, not a word about the Bill. Other hon. gentlemen spoke in the same way; they spoke of the French Canadians, lauding them. Well, I have no objection, for I am a French Canadian myself, but I don't think that had anything to do with the Bill either. Some, and a very few, the hon. member who spoke last, just said a few words about this Bill, the important question, because it is the question before the House. I don't think that he gave out all his reasons for the position he has taken, and if he would do so I would willingly sit down and give him my attention. Well, as I said just now, this is a new departure. The last elections were held with the idea that Sir Wilfrid Laurier was altogether in favour of autonomy, not this change. Therefore, he had reason to go to the people, and there are many ways of consulting the country. I would leave it to the government——

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Is the hon. gentleman speaking of the Bill now?

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I am speaking on the amendment to the Bill, and the amendment is the motion just now before the House. I am speaking of the proposal for a plebiscite of the people. A few of the hon. gentlemen who spoke on the question said, 'By a plebiscite you would rouse an objectionable racial feeling in the country.' Why say so? There is an immense majority of the members of the province of Quebec in the House of Commons in favour of this Bill. We have the hon. gentlemen in this House saying that there is no doubt that when explained to them, the people of Quebec will approve of this measure. Of course there are some characters you cannot control, who are always in opposition. Some of those may object, but the majority will be in favour of the Bill if it is as good as the hon. member says. Then what will follow? We shall have the opinion of the majority in all the provinces, even in the province of Quebec. These hon. gentlemen who are very numerous, members of the House of Commons, pretend to be sure of the opinion of their constituents. In the other provinces it seems—and it looks very much like it—that they are in favour of a navy also. Under such conditions, if there was a plebiscite taken there would be a decision in favour of this Bill. Everybody would be satisfied, even those they accuse of being disloyal, of always wishing to overthrow the government. Even those would say, 'It is all right, this is the Bill we approve of now.' But we cannot approve of it until it has been submitted to the country. Although I am not willing to discuss the Bill itself, I will make a few remarks as to part of it. When the conference of ministers of the different colonies was called in England to discuss this question, I think the birth of the panic was the news given that the Germans were building Dreadnoughts and big ships of war, and there was danger for England. I hardly believe that the higher and more intelligent classes in England were afraid of Germany. I dare say many of the poorer class did not understand this question and thought, 'Those Germans are big fellows, and they will be eating us up.' The result was that an order was given to concentrate the British navy as much as possible in the North Sea to be ready to meet the Germans if they did come. Well, they did begin to concentrate, taking their ships away from other parts of the empire. There are two British possessions, Australia and New Zealand, that are islands. Australia has nothing to fear and New Zealand is in about the same position, for the Maoris are friendly now, and even send members to the House of Assembly; but the people in Australia, and more particularly in New Zealand, are obliged to do all their business by sea.

I believe there is a railway crossing Australia; but the principal business is done at the sea ports along the coast. There is fear of pirates, of which there are a great number in China, who not only waylay commerce on the sea, but who have a good deal of money and can buy steamers, so that the British government have to keep armed vessels on those seas in view of possible attacks on her colonies, and difficulties that might arise. When New Zealand and Australia saw those British ships leaving on account of the order of concentration, of course they were alarmed. They were accustomed before that to pay a certain sum of money by way of subsidy for protection. Then they said, we will do this: 'We will build you a Dreadnought, and pay the expenses.' I thought they had offered more at first; but my latest information is that it was only one. It is understood that they will undertake to pay all expenses up to £200,000 for Australia, and £40,000 for New Zealand. That is only $1,200,000. It does not look as large as it did at first. The scare has diminished. I have read in the papers that this German menace has vanished entirely, and that eminent men in politics have declared that the British fleet is double in strength that of the German fleet, and that when the construction programme of Germany is finished, the British fleet will still have an immense preponderence over them. Well, as the scare has diminshed, as war is not imminent, as the government has not to build a navy immediately to meet an emergency, it will take four or five years before the docks, ships and aramament can be prepared. There is plenty of time. If it were an emergency, we should act promptly; but there is no emergency; it is not urgent, and as there is plenty of time, why not accept this proposal to submit the question to the judgment of the country? Why not? It is not such a difficult thing. The government would choose their own time. They might do it by a plebiscite or by postponing the Bill until next year or the year after, when there shall be a general election. It would depend upon them. The government had a plebiscite taken once. It did not cost much; it did not take a long time to do it. Nothing prevents it from being done now, and the result would be to settle an important question of public policy. For my own part, I have a little more doubt than these hon. gentlemen as to its wisdom. There is no doubt in their minds that the people will approve of the proposed navy; then we must say, 'We cannot object. We are willing to go on since the people have been consulted and the majority have given their assent.'

Hon. Mr. BOYER—The only point at issue before the House is the motion of the hon. leader of the opposition, asking that this Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be submitted to the judgment of the people. When this question of a national navy first came before the Dominion House of Commons, parliament had then been elected 5 months. The last general election took place on the 28th November, 1908, and on the 29th March the House of Commons unanimously decided that Canada should have a navy to co-operate with the navy of Great Britain in the protection of British and Canadian interests. We are now asked to submit this measure to the people. Only 12 months have elapsed since parliament has decided that Canada should have a navy, and it strikes me that the point has been forgotten that the people of Canada have had ample opportunity to signify their consent to the wishes of the House of Commons. We have had, in the course of the last year, eleven elections in Canada. Five went by acclamation, of which the government carried four, and six were contested, the government carried five. Two of them were held in the province of Quebec, and the first one was held in the county of Montcalm, where two Liberal candidates were contesting the seat, no opposition candidate having had the courage or pluck to come before the electors of an old Tory constituency, as Montcalm has been.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND. Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BOYER—The government candidate was opposed by another Liberal and no longer ago than to-day I was asking the candidate elected if the question of a navy had been discussed during the election, and he told me that in one of the parishes, speaking one day from a public platform, the mayor of the town of Rowdon had interrupted, and asked him to be kind enough to state what position he intended to take on the navy question, and he said: 'I told him I was running as a straight Liberal and as a supporter of Sir Wilrid Laurier, and, as such, I was bound to favour the navy in every way.' This constituency was rendered vacant by the appointment of Judge Dugas, and Mr. Lafortune, elected in January last, said that Judge Dugas carried the village by ten of a majority, and Lafortune carried it by 90. We had another election in the county of Lotbinière. If the country desires information, why did not the opponents of this national navy make their voice heard in Lotbinière? Again, no Conservative candidate dare show his face. Two Liberals joined issue, and the old candidate carried the day. But we have a later fact, a more significant fact; in the city of Ottawa, the capital of the Dominion, an election took place on the 29th January last. Three candidates were mentioned, two on the Conservative, and one on the Liberal side. All the forces of both parties joined issue. Twelve inch, ten inch, eight inch guns, down to toy pistols, joined in the fight in that constituency. One Tory got torpedoed and put out of the fight, so that both sides could meet in fair battle. What was the result? We were told that if the Conservative were elected it meant the end of the navy. Sir Wilfrid carried the constituency at the last election by a majority of 625 votes, and on the 29th January last Mr. Allard carried it by a majority of 658. Have the people not spoken on the navy Bill? This election was held in Ottawa on the question of the navy, not so much on the navy Bill, as creating a navy for Canada. Both sides joined issue on the naval policy, and the vote in the city of Ottawa was increased by over 40 votes over the number of votes obtained by the premier in the last general election. It strikes me the Dominion parliament has been informed that Canada wants a navy. The people have given their consent to Canada having a navy. The motion or amendment of the hon. leader of the opposition strikes me as coming with ill grace when the people of Canada have had such fair warning for the last twelve months that the intention of the government, backed by parliament and the electorate, was to create a navy for the defence of Canadian rights. The hon. gentleman from Montarville (Hon. Mr. DeBoucherville) spoke of Australia. That country is following exactly what we are dong to-day in Canada, and no later than Thursday the 10th day of February, the first ship of the new Australian navy was launched on the Clyde. Lady Asquith christened the vessel 'The Paramatta', and she said:

> First born of the Commonwealth Navy, I name you 'Paramatta. God bless you and those who sail in you, and may you uphold the glorious traditions of the British Navy in the Dominions over the sea.'

Capt. Collins, representing the government of Australia said:

> That the launch marked the beginning of a defined colonial, he might also say imperial naval policy. The colonies had never failed to recognize their debt to the mother country. The question as to the attitude of the colonies towards the empire on defence was regarded for some time merely from the point of view of their contributing to the imperial exchequer. A cash contribution without any control or voice in management was not in harmony with the spirit of nationalism, which was the most marked feature of colonial development. Last year, it would be remembered to the credit of the present government, that they in Mr. Haldane's conception of an imperial general staff, and in the naval conference, had helped people to cast from an era of talk to an era of action that would develop and consolidate the defences of the empire. In Australia they were heartily in sympathy with the forward movement. The Commonwealth government, backed by the strong public feeling, were pressing forward all practical measures to place their military and naval forces in such a position of efficient organization as to form valuable units of strength and assistance to the whole empire.

This is the answer of Australia to the hon. gentleman from Montarville. What is the government asking by this Bill? That we create a navy as an insurance effected upon vast and widespread interests; as a necessary precaution to be able to hold up our heads among the nations, and to be able to speak to the enemy, if any of them present themselves. We do not wish to rule the seas, but we desire to occupy a position commanding respect commensurate with our interest as a colony with our commerce. That is the object of the Canadian government. In speaking the other day, the leader of the opposition referred to the German scare. One important point he did not mention in that connection was that an enormous German fleet sails out of New York three times a week, vessels subsidized by the German government, and each one carrying, burried in their holds, from three to ten guns. What is our position? We have not for the defence on our coasts one single gunboat. My hon. friend said: 'Supposing hostilities should break out between England and Germany, on receipt of a telegram or cable in New York every one of these large boats would clear out of New York, and a few hours afterwards mounting their guns on the deck, would come to St. John or Halifax with every facility to bombard the town, come up the St. Lawrenrce, and we have nothing to stop them. Why, Sir, with a few 'paltry cruisers' never will an armed merchant vessel dare approach our coast. Her aim is mostly to destroy, and a merchant vessel, although armed with a few guns is no match for a third rate cruiser. We do not propose to master the seas; what we do propose to do is to imitate the mother country. No nation has ever been great without a navy. No nation can protect its commerce without a navy. When people out on the prairies pass resolutions that we do not want a navy, they should ask themselves this question: Supposing the St. Lawrence should be blocked, supposing Halifax and St. John should be blocked by an enemy, how will the produce of the west be sent to the markets of the mother country? They are our best markets, and unless we do something to protect our shores should danger come, then the people in the west who passed those resolutions will have time to see what a mistake they have made. We are accustomed to military service. We have in this country a force of which we are all proud. Why should we not become accustomed to a navy? Not longer ago than the other day an hon. member of parliament belonging to my city, the Hon. Colonel of a regiment from Montreal came to Ottawa specially to vote against the Navy Bill, and the next day he made the offer to his regiment that if they would complete their battallion and perfect their drill, he would take that regiment to England to show what kind of men we could produce in Canada. I will ask the Hon. Colonel would he not be proud to be able to take that regiment across the Atlantic in a Canadian bottom, and say: 'These are the men that are ready to defend Canada on land, and this is the ship with which we will defend our coast if an enemy attacks us.' Nothing that I say will change a vote. We are unanimous on the question. The only point at issue is as to consulting the people. They have already been consulted, eleven times last year, and ten times out of the eleven they said: 'We are in favour of a national navy.' Let us carry out the wishes of the people without waiting. In one year we can get our docks ready and in another year we can build our ships, and we will be proud of what we have done and we will have a navy a pride to those who created it in 1910.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—My hon. friend from Middlesex (Mr. Ross) spoke about England, but he had no words to say about Ireland or Scotland. That from a Scotchman himself is most unreasonable. When they had a rebellion in India, they had to send Scotchmen to quell it. He made another mistake in saying that New Brunswick was opposed to confederation. New Brunswick had two elections on the question and Sir Leonard Tilley carried the second election, and without carrying that election New Brunswick would not have entered into the confederation.

How different it was in Nova Scotia. Howe said to Adams Archibald, 'Give me your hand that you will put this question before the people, and I will never raise my voice against it.' The amount of bribery going on at that time was something awful. I was behind the scenes and knew it. They did not spend as much money as Castleragh spent in bringing Ireland into the union with Great Britain; but the means were exactly the same, and not only that, but Lieutenant Governor Fenwick Williams was daily using means to get people to support confederation. I will give you one illustration. There was a miserly man from King's county named Caleb Williams, and he sent for Caleb Williams, who was opposed to confederation, and he said, 'Mr. Williams, I have a message from Her Majesty the Queen to you? The Queen is not pleased to hear that you are opposed to confederation, and in order to relieve the grief of the Queen, plus a seat in the Senate, he changed his mind. I might dwell on this question further, but it is a little foreign to the subject under discussion. I was delighted the other night listening to the speech of the hon. gentleman from DeLanaudière (Mr. Casgrain). I sat alongside of him and listened with delight and attention to his fine speech. To me it was a piece of history of what the French Canadians had accomplished, and something that I never knew, the liberal subscriptions made in those days by men who were perhaps not overblessed with too much money. They sent their money through their priests and bishops, I was going to say extravagantly for those days. Among the names he mentioned was one De Boucherville, who gave ten pounds, and another De Boucherville who gave five pounds, and the thought occurred to my mind, could he have been the grandfather of the hon. gentleman who seconded the amendment now before the House? I do not suppose they were far removed from him in any case. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Casgrain) went further, and described the coaling stations that Great Britain had in every part of the world, and that if Germany should attempt to go to war, having no coaling stations abroad would be forced to stay at home. I do not think the Germans will ever cross the Atlantic to take Halifax, which is well fortified and torpedoed when necessary. Suppose war should be declared by Germany, France would be with Great Britain, and would seize the oportunity to reconquer the two provinces of Alsace and Loraine that she lost during the last war.

There is nothing in modern history more creditable to a nation than the way France paid the indemnity levied on her by Germany, without going outside of its own border to borrow the money. The loyalty of the French in the province of Quebec can never be doubted, and the history which my hon. friend gave the other night would be repeated if necessary. Some sneering remarks have been made in the other House, casting a doubt on the loyalty of the province of Quebec. I think the French Canadians are as loyal as the English, Irish and Scotch in Canada, and as ready to do their part if the occasion should arise. Some remarks were made about the Fenian raids, and I heard the senior member for Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) say that he was on duty as a volunteer at that time. I was at Halifax myself at that time. The raid was got up purposely, in order to influence the people to enter confederation. Not a Fenian came over from Boston or New York, but the people turned out, and guns were moved about, and for two or three days there was the utmost alarm. It was merely a plot contrived to influence the people to carry confederation. I was sorry to hear my hon. friend from Hastings stating very broadly that this navy is calculated to separate Canada from the empire, and make it an independent nation. I have a different view from that. I think it is calculated to unite Great Britain and the Dominion more firmly than ever. No one has reason to doubt the loyalty of our premier, and he would be the last man in Canada to suggest separation. If I thought that the tendency of building those ships would be to separate us from Britain, I would oppose it; but I repeat I regard the navy as making more for union than for separation. Suppose we should agree to give Great Britain twenty-five million dollars, what are we going to do? Are we going to remain idle ourselves? Are we going to be like the two boys who got upset in the river. One said to the other, 'Can you pray?' and the other replied, 'No.' 'Well,' said the first, 'something has got to be done, and that damn soon.' It would look childish, worse than childish, highly improper, if we were not prepared to do our part. I was sorry to hear my hon. friend from Hastings speak of this proposed navy as 'a tinpot navy.' Eleven ships, equipped with all modern improvements, may be a small navy, but we must not despise the day of small things. We must make a commencement, and with Canada's growth in population, prosperity and wealth, our navy will increase in a few years. Let us make a commencement. The hon. member from Hastings told us that Gladstone appealed to the people on the question of home rule for Ireland, and I was pleased that he approved of that method of doing things. He would have been pleased had the people of Nova Scotia been appealed to before confederation was carried in that province. I would remind the House that this Bill was carried in the Commons by a larger vote than any other question that came before that House. Six or seven members who were elected to oppose the government, supported this measure. We are going to build a navy, and here is where I agree again with the hon. gentleman from Hastings. He favours a building of the navy on this side of the Atlantic, even though it should cost more money than if it were built on the other side. Where should the ships be built? At Halifax, of course. We have there the harbour, the fortifications and the dockyard.

In preparing men for the naval course, the buildings there are of solid brick with slate covering, and would only need to be changed internally to fit them for the naval college. You would get sailors from Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Newfoundland. If you build the ships at Quebec or Montreal, they may be tied up in the winter at the very time an emergency would require them to be ready to go to sea. Halifax has been the naval station of Great Britain for over a hundred years, and the dockyard is there. I was rather amused at the sneering remarks of Sir Montagu Allan about the smallness of the drydock at Halifax. That drydock is 598 feet long, over 80 feet wide, and 30 feet deep on the sill. It is not very long since the United States had to send one of their largest war steamers, the Indiana, there to be cleaned and painted. At that time, the United States had not a dock large enough to admit that vessel. Our dock is large enough for any merchant ship that crosses the Atlantic, and should it be necessary to use it for war purposes, it could easily be extended twenty or thirty feet. There is no part of the Dominion so well fortified as Halifax is to-day, with all modern improvements. The magazine is built underground, so that there would be no danger in time of war. We are urged to appeal to the people on this question. Well, the representatives in the other House came from the people, and their constituents read the newspapers, yet we find the largest majority for any government measure of this session was given for this Bill—a larger vote than has been given on any question since the last election. I did not hear any one taking up the Bill and discussing the Bill itself, but it refers to an Admiralty. We have the Admiralty House in Halifax, a splendid building, with everything round about it all ready for the Admiral to enter into, whenever he will be here to take charge of the ships? I do not know that I would approve of Kingsmill being the Admiral.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He is a Canadian.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—There is many a Canadian not worth a great deal. There was a young man named Hackett from North Sydney who had charge of one of the ships under the Marine and Insurance Department in the Pacific, and His Excellency the Lieutenant Governor was sailed about wherever he wanted to go by Hackett, from Vancouver. When he got back he got his secretary to write Hackett. I read the letter myself—commending him for his kindness and his attention to him on the different trips to different places that the Lieutenant Governor went to. The Admiral took charge of Hackett's ship. He got Hackett to put the coal and provisions on board. Hackett obeyed him in everything. Then he sent him ashore and said His Excellency did not want him to be in command of his ship. Now, Hackett had the letter written by His Execellency praising him for his attention to him while sailing around the coast. Now in my opinion that man is not fit to be admiral of our navy. Then you want barracks. The barracks are there already built. You only want to get the men to go into them. I must say frankly that we are going to incur pretty large expenditure and we cannot calculate just now how much it is going to be. It is like the building of the National Transcontinental Railway. It cost double the calculation at the outset. I desire to correct the statement made by the hon. gentleman from Victoria. He states that France has no navy. He is mistaken. France's present navy is equal to that of the United States, and in case of any danger from Germany they would be hand in hand with the British navy. I do not think we need be in the least alarm about a German scare, or that we shall ever find German sailors or German troops setting their feet in British harbours or British shores with warlike intentions. In the dockyards there there are plenty of solid buildings which have been constructed by the British government where they have spent hundreds of thousands of dollars in putting the place in order, and that we would save money by having ships built in the port of Halifax where they would be near the coaling district and where they would be ready to go to sea if an emergency arose at any time.

The amendment was declared lost on division.

The motion was agreed to and the Bill was read a second time.

ANTI RACE TRACK GAMBLING BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into committee of the whole on Bill (6), An Aact to amend the Criminal Code.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—When this Bill had its second reading, we did not get much information from the hon. gentleman in charge of it Apparently, at that time, he was not able to give us the information we desired with reference to the different clauses of the measure, and for that reason we would like to have further explanation. I was just going to suggest that we should have a thorough explanation of each clause of the Bill from the hon. gentleman in charge of it. It is a very important measure, one that has received a great deal of attention in the country, and that occupied six or seven weeks in the House of Commons. Surely we have a right to a better explanation of the clauses of the Bill than we have received up to the present time.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—We had better put the clauses in when we have something to discuss.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—We were to have an explanation to cover the whole Bill. We were informed that when we came into the committee stage the mover of the Bill would explain fully its nature. We are now to proceed clause by clause, and the chairman will have a perfect right to prevent us from discussing the general principles of the Bill, and he will confine us to the clause under consideration. Now, I object to that. If we are to get a full explanation of this measure we certainly expect to get it now before we take it up clause by clause.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Before we proceed with this Bill any further, I might inform my hon. friend that some hon. gentlemen who have amendments to move with reference to this Bill have left the House, and they informed me that they had an understanding that the Bill was not to be brought into the committee stage until Monday.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—No, no such intimation was given.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I am just stating what they told me; that is all I know about it.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—They have no business to make any such statement. I suppose a dozen different members from the House of Commons approached me to-day, my name having been on this Bill, and asked me to let it stand over till Monday, and I said no, it was the order of the House to proceed with it as soon as the Naval Bill was disposed of, and we would proceed with it in the committee stage.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Has the hon. gentleman any objection to give us now the information we wanted, and which we understood we were to get when we moved into Committee of the Whole? The hon. gentleman had better do it now than on the third reading.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That was understood.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS. My hon. friend, the ex-leader of the opposition, informs me that it was understood we were to discuss the principles of this Bill when we went into Committee of the Whole. We allowed it to get a second reading without discussion on that account. I would like to make some remarks, however. If the hon. gentleman from Marquette has any explanation to make about the Bill, I would like to hear him, and would then reply to him.

Hon. Mr. WATSON. There is no objection to giving a short explanation of the whole Bill. I think hon. gentleman understand the object of the Bill very well. It is for the purpose of doing away with gambling or betting on race tracks. That is the whole object of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS. Will it accomplish that?

Hon. Mr. WATSON . Well, we expect it will. The first section, which has been read, is going to define the place where betting may take place. This Bill provides that the only place where bookmaking can be carried on is at the race track. For a number of years, the press have been condemning the system of gambling that has been carried on in different parts of Canada on the race track. We had an example last year in Vancouver, where races were conducted 43 days, in Victoria, 60 days, Windsor, 30 days, and the press, the pulpit, the judges on the bench, bank presidents, and bank managers condemned gambling practices that had taken place on those race tracks. Public sentiment has been aroused to such an extent that it has been found necessary to bring in a Bill for the purpose of restricting gambling on the race track. They have done so in this Bill. They have tried to do it without injuring the horsemen's idea of encouraging the breeding of horses. It is claimed by a number of men who are interested in fast horses that it is the best possible way to encourage the breeding of such stock by having those race meets, where tests of speed of endurance can be made. This Bill does not interfere in any way with horse racing. You can have horse races on any track in Canada, for three hundred days in the year if you wish; but it does interfere with the gambling that takes place on those race tracks. A question has been raised and has been discussed in another place, and I suppose will be discussed here, as to how far this Bill will interfere with racing on small tracks. Exception has been taken to the fact that if this Bill passes, a new track starting without a license, without incorporation or a race track association, will have to be within three miles of a town or city of 15,000 inhabitants. That is for the purpose of preventing Americans from coming over into Canada, along our border line and establishing race tracks where they might carry on a gambling process, that is prohibited practically in the United States to-day.

We know that those gentlemen who are called bookmakers have an organization which comes over to Canada and takes possession of the tracks of racing associations. They have to get license to do business, and they pay about a hundred dollars for the privilege of making books on those tracks. It is claimed—and I think claimed on good authority—that if there was not some provision inserted in this Bill to prevent such organizations from coming over and establishing race tracks all along the boundry line, there would be a system of gambling, by bookmaking carried on between here and the United States practically for six months of the year. That should be prevented, and what it is intended by this Bill. Stringent legislation has been passed on the other side, and those people are driven over to Canada. Now, we purpose that they shall not conduct in Canada those gambling operations. This Bill provides also for the closing of the pool rooms, and provides that pools cannot be sold any place now except on a race track. The doing away with the pool room is probably of much more importance even than the limiting of bookmakers privileges on the race tracks, because the pool room is the place that encourages gambling and nothing else. Few of the men who go to pool rooms and buy pools, as they have been conducted in Canada and the United States, ever see a horse race. They probably buy pools on a race a thousand miles away from where the pool room is situated. The man who wants to gamble, probably walking home from his work with two dollars in his pocket, walks into a pool room and puts a dollar on a long shot on a horse race. That is the end of the dollar; and I believe hundreds of thousands of dollars are filched from people of that class at the various pool rooms. The pool room feature will now be entirely done away with.

The time of racing is limited, because any one acquainted with horseracing knows that the extending of the time for the race meet is one of the great causes of the injury that is done by the bookmaker, because it is well known that any person who follows a circuit has got to get some money from some place occasionally; he has got to win a race, and after a time the bookmakers get acquainted with the horses, the horsemen, and the speed of the horses, and are able to frame up a race so as to give, not the best horse, but to give practically every horse in the circuit a race, so as to be able to win a little money to pay the expenses of keeping him in the ring. I am not much of a sport, but I have gone to horse races and have observed what takes place there, and I know that that is done. I believe that by shortening the racing meets period to seven days you will have a better class of racing and a better class of horses, for there will not be time for the bookmaker to frame up his books in such shape as to enable the poorer class of horses to win money. There is no question that the shorter the time, the less opportunity for the professional bookmaker to frame his books in such shape as to rob the public. Objection has been made to this Bill because it is claimed that it will interfere with the small race tracks of the agricultural fairs where they encourage the breeding of horses, and have contests of speed. Now, so far as the west is concerned, and that is the only place it can affect, I venture to say that the class of people living in the western country to-day, while they enjoy seeing a horse race, and enjoy and encourage speed contests, do not wish to introduce the gambling element into those agricultural societies. Ontario and Quebec will not be so affected, because practically every town or place that has a population large enough to have a race track, has one practically established to-day. In Manitoba, we have a model Bill for the incorporation of agricultural societies, and from the evidence we have through the press, and in other ways, I observe that they are satisfied with this Bill now before us as amended.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Do they prohibit horse-racing at the agricultural fairs in Manitoba?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—No. Exactly the contrary. I was just going to explain

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They do in Ontario, you know.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Yes, but they don't in Manitoba. As a matter of fact, in Manitoba they rather encourage a horse-race meet at the agricultural fairs. They do not have the fall fairs as you have in Ontario. We have the summer fair in the holiday season, and, as a rule, the fair is arranged so that the circuit horse race meet takes place at the same time as the fair. In several incorporation Acts that I have looked up and got information from about Manitoba, they have practically a model Bill there for the purpose, and in incorporating agricultural societies they provide for holding the agricultural fairs for the usual purposes, and in addition for contests of speed, for speeding horses, which of course will take in the races. I am sure that none of those agricultural societies will suffer on account of this Bill, even if in some places they wish to give a license to a bookmaker. As to this cry over the small agricultural society, where they may have race-meets, not ten per cent of the members of the agricultural societies would ask for the privilege of giving a bookmaker a license if they knew what his operations were. In those small places where an agricultural association might be deprived of having the right to grant a license to a bookmaker for making books at the races, if they knew the operations that were to be conducted under such licenses, they would not wish the bookmaker there at all. I do not know that there is any further explanation necessary. The general terms of this Bill are well known. It has only one object; that is, to prevent the bookmaker and the operation of gambling on the race track, not to interfere with horse racing at all. As I said when introducing this Bill a few days ago, the Bill is a compromise measure. It does not bind this House, but is in the nature of a treaty as between the opponents and the promoters of the Bill. It is not as drastic as the Bill was when introduced, known in the House of Commons as the Miller Bill; it is a compromise. I understand it is acceptable to the leaders who are in favour of the reform of stopping the bookmaking and stopping gambling. I understand it is also acceptable to nearly all the horsemen on the race track, men who are interested in racing horses. I hear very few objections from them. I know there are objections from some who are not in the association, men who have half-mile tracks, but are not in the circuit, and where they wish to have the bookmaker operate; and they claim they cannot get sufficient horses for a seven days' meet. I think there are only one or two complaints of that kind; there is one track in Ontario, and one in Quebec, and one in the city of Montreal. These people may suffer, and have to suffer on account of this Bill; but I do not think there is any question that the conditions of the measure must commend themselves to every well-thinking man in the Senate and in the country, because there is no question at all that the evils which have arisen from the encouragement of gamoling by the bookmaker and the poolseller must be apparent to every well-thinking man in the Senate and in the country, because there is no question that the encouragement of gambling by the bookmaker and the poolseller has done a great deal of injury to many young men of Canada. That has been demonstrated, I think, from the evidence we have had through the press and elsewhere; and that being the case, I don't think we can engage ourselves in better legislation than in passing this Bill as it is now before us.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I listened with a good deal of attention to the explanation given by the hon. gentleman who has charge of this Bill, but I think he has dodged all around the question and has not touched the vital points of the Bill. I have given my opinion before of this class of legislation, and I repeat that it is vicious legislation, that we should not pass. Surely in the 20th century, people have some rights. My hon. friend has given us an idea that we should stop gambling; but when I asked him whether this Bill will stop gambling, he cannot answer my question. I claim that this Bill does not stop gambling, for it allows a certain class of people, in certain portions of the country, to gamble as much as they please, while in other parts it does not permit them to gamble. I venture to say you could not find such a piece of legislation as this on the statute book of any civilized country in the world? You say that gambling is bad, that it should be stopped, and yet you are granting a certain class or associations of men in certain parts of the country a monopoly of the gambling business. Race track people are one hundred per cent better off now than before this Bill was brought in at all, for then you had free trade in gambling to a certain extent; but now these gentlemen, and only a few tracks in the country, have an actual monopoly. They can say to a man who wants to make a book, 'You will pay us $500 or $600 or $700—as the case may be—to get inside this fence to carry on this illegal business; if you don't do it you can't do business at all.' As it was before, the bookmaker could go outside the fence and do that sort of business. Now it is all confined to certain parties and those gentlemen are going to be the beneficiaries. If that is doing away with gambling, I would like to be informed on that subject.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—It is limiting it.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—My hon. friend tells about the class of men that came in from the other side of the line, gamblers, and disreputable characters, that were flooding the country; that they should not be allowed in the country, and all that sort of thing. If this Bill becomes law, he will find that very same class of gentlemen flourishing like a green bay tree. It appears to me to be the height of absurdity to say that inside an inch board fence it is not a crime to do a certain thing, but if another man does the same thing outside the inch board fence, he becomes a criminal and is liable to a year in jail and a thousand dollars fine. If this gambling that my hon. friend talks about is wrong, we should stop it entirely inside the racecourse as well as outside the racecourse. Why should a few people in the city of Toronto, and certain other parts of the country, enjoy privileges that are denied to their fellow citizens elsewhere? One of the clauses of this Bill provides that if there are fifteen thousand people in a town or city, one can commit all these criminal acts; he can gamble or bet; but if it is a place of only five thousand people one must not gamble. That is, they want to make the small towns good, by this Bill; but there can be freedom to gamble in the larger places. If that is good legislation, I would like to be informed on the subject. I have heard in this House and in the other House certain gentlemen always talking about provincial rights; but I don't see any of those gentlemen in evidence to-night. If provincial rights should come in any place they should come in here. It was not necessary for these gentlemen to come here for an amendment to the Criminal Code such as this; they should have gone to Mr. Whitney and to the legislatures of Quebec and Saskatchewan and got legislation with all these things in it. It would be just as logical for us to amend the Criminal Code and say that the people who run the Russell House, if they don't close their bar at twelve o'clock at night, would be liable to fine or imprisonment, or provide that if a pound-keeper did not close his pound at a certain hour, he would be liable to a year's imprisonment and a thousand dollar fine. You could load up the Criminal Code with matters of that kind. That is not the beginning. We had a sample of it in the Lord's Day Act, which is simply an Act of persecution. I know of a woman out west who had two or three diapers hung on a line, and a policeman who saw it was going to arrest her, because these gentlemen of the Lord's Day Alliance had instructed the policeman that work of every kind should be put a stop to on Sunday. In the city of Ottawa, an order has been issued that gum boxes shall be removed from the corners of stores and put inside the shops for fear some person might put a cent in the slot and get a piece of gum on Sunday. Where is this sort of legislation going to end? We are not likely to see the end of it till these gentlemen come down with legislation to make it a criminal offence to have a man stay away from church.

Hon Mr. YOUNG—That might be a good provision.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Then you have restrictions on the right of the press. There is one clause of this Bill which restricts the press, and they are not permitted to publish things in a paper that nobody considers a crime. Of course, it is wrong to publish obscene matter; but if a man publishes race-track news he is liable to a thousand dollar fine and a year in jail.. We manufacture crimes wholesale, and the end is not yet. You might just as well start in with the license system and say, 'We will enact certain provisions in regard to the license system creating certain crimes.' There would be just as much sense in that. I find in the first clause the word 'place' is inserted. My hon. friend mentioned the word, but did not give us the definition. What is the meaning of that word? If a man stands up on a soap box it is a place; or if he is under an umbrella it is a place. My bedroom is a place. If my hon. friend and I were to make a bet in my bedroom, we would become criminals and be liable to one year's imprisonment and a thousand dollar fine; and the charwoman that cleans up the room would be liable also, because anybody who takes care of a place where betting is done is guilty, although the poor woman would know nothing about it. If a friend hands me fifty dollars and says, 'Keep this for me,' he is liable. The word knowingly has not been inserted. By this Bill we grant a monopoly to gentlemen who are in this gambling business. I do not know how to reconcile the provision that it is a crime to do something on one side of the fence and not a crime on the other. A crime in the kitchen, but not in a woodshed. A crime to take a drink in the Windsor but not in the Russell House. If those people want to do away with gambling, why do they not go to the bazaars, where patrons are invited to put in a quarter and get a grab? If we stop gambling in one instance we should stop it all the way along the line. These gentlemen have advanced the idea that gambling was necessary on the race-track in the interest of horse-breeding: in other words, they want to get a larger revenue, and they have been granted a monopoly. I have been given to understand that the Toronto Racing Association have property at the Woodbine race track worth half a million, and producing an enormous revenue, and if this Bill goes through it will double their revenue. If this legislation had been carefully prepared we should have provided that a portion of the revenue that the association were taking out of the pockets of the people who attend the races, and a portion of the money received from the bookmakers would be set aside to promote this horse-breeding about which so much evidence was given in the other House.

If I had framed the Bill, I would have suggested that ten per cent of the earnings at these tracks should be handed over to the province to promote horse breeding, I do not see why the horse-racing associations should be given a monopoly and allow them to keep all the proceeds of it; some of it should be handed over to promote the breeding of high class horses in the province. Evidently the Bill was prepared for Toronto and Hamilton. In the district I represent, we have turf clubs, but they do not own the tracks; they belong to the agricultural society, and under this Bill if the association does not own the track they cannot use it. In the city of Saskatoon, with a population of about eleven thousand, they have a magnificent track belonging to the Agricultural Society, I have the poster in which they advertise the races for this year, and I find that the bill is out for the Saskatoon fair to be held in August under the auspices of the Agricultural Society. They own the track, and have gone to a large expense to put everything in shape, and whatever revenue they receive they have to use to pay off their indebtedness. They have been getting a certain amount of revenue from the bookmakers, which this Bill will prevent. If they had said, 'In the interest of the public and of morals, we will do away with the whole thing,' there would not have been so much objection. But here they say that an agricultural society in the west cannot have the same privileges as are granted to associations in Toronto and Hamilton. The people of the west will not take kindly to such a proposition. In Prince Albert, we have a driving club, but the track belongs to the society, and under the provisions of this Bill they could not allow bookmaking on the track. Why should not five thousand people have the same rights as 15,000 people?. Evidently the promoters of the Bill never looked beyond the four corners of Ontario. If each province were permitted to take up the question for themselves, we might have suitable legislation; but we are not allowed to do that. If the gentleman who promoted this Bill in the first place—I do not know whether this is the Miller Bill, the McCall Bill or the Dewart Bill—had consulted the people all over the country, if they were bound to load up the Criminal Code, they would have produced a better Bill than this kind of stuff. If each province had dealt with this question, as the provinces should have dealt with it, there would have been no trouble about it. If the people of Saskatchewan want betting on their tracks they should have it. How many people in this country look upon betting on a race track as an offence? Very few. Parliament has been stampeded into this legislation by a flood of petitions; but when you analyse the petitions you find that there are not many names on them, and most of those who do sign such petitions would as readily sign petitions on the other side. The members of the Lord's Day Alliance just handed down the petitions among their friends and got people to sign them in that way, but you never hear of any agitation in the country for legislation of this kind. A couple of gentlemen come down here at the beginning of the session to lobby for the legislation, and this Bill is the result of their work.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I suppose they are paid for it.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—No doubt they are. I have a lot of amendments to move to this Bill, but I suppose it will be impossible to get them. I claim that where an agricultural society owns a track that society is an association, and if you cut out racing they are denied the privileges granted to other people.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 3.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—This clause deals with betting, pool-selling and book-making. Sub-clauses F, G and H may interfere very materially with the press. Suppose there is a race in New York, and the Canadian press publish reports of it, as they usually do, the clause would make it an offence, subjecting the reporter or the newspaper to a penalty.

Hon. Mr. SPEAKER—That has nothing whatever to do with it. The person employed must be one who is connected with a common betting house.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Any place where you make a bet may be regarded as a betting house.

Hon. Mr. SPEAKER—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—If I secure somebody to report a betting transaction, I am liable, under this clause, to a fine. The clause is dangerous, and no newspaperman would feel safe in reporting a horse-race. With the doubts existing as to the probable effect of this Bill, I think we had better wait until we have an opportunity of looking over it.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The hon. gentleman will be interested to know that this is the existing law, and the clause merely applies the Act which is on the statute-book now to bookmaking.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Then what is the object of re-enacting the existing law here?

Hon. Mr. SPEAKER—The change is in subclause 2.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—If I want to make a bet while standing on a soap box, that can be regarded as 'a place.'

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The hon .gentleman cannot do an illegal act on a soap box or anywhere else. He cannot sell pools or make books, even when he is standing on a soap box.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It seems to me the clause is wide enough to prevent gambling in any place used for that purpose.

The subclauses were adopted.

On subclause 2.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—My hon. friend has just told us that you must not commit an offence against this Act even on a soap box. I should like to know why this Bill permits an act to be done on one side of the race track fence without infringing the law, when it would be an offence if done on the other side of the fence. Does the hon. gentleman think that is good legislation?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I do not think the hon. member from Prince Albert is serious in taking up the time of the House in this way. The Bill provides that certain things can be done in a certain place under this Act, and the House of Commons has so decided by passing the Bill,—and I trust the Senate will decide in the same way. People who are going into certain things that are perhaps a little shady and require a license to do them, must do them in certain places, and this Bill decides that the place shall be on a race track with an inch board around. They can stand on a soap box inside the place if they wish and do crime, but he cannot do it outside.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—You might as well legalize stealing, and say that a man can steal inside a fence, and it will not be a crime, but he cannoot do it outside.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The hon. gentleman knows that almost everything that requires a license has to be regulated in a certain way, and if bookmakers are going to be tolerated at all, they will only be tolerated on the track and not on the street. It is the same principle as that on which the liquor law is administered. A man gets a license to sell liquor.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Where does he get the license?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—From the provincial authorities.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Why not get this Bill from the provincial authorities?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The hon. gentleman is getting away from the question. You only obtain a license to keep a hotel in a certain place, and to sell in certain parts of that hotel during certain hours. This Bill regulates the betting in the same way. This is not a new matter. The English law known as the Page Act says that every one is guilty of an offence who frequents or loiters on a street on behalf of himself or any other person for the purpose of bookmaking wagering or agreeing to wager, or paying or receiving bets, and so on. The clause the hon. gentleman criticises has been on the statute-books for years. Parliament has seen fit in its wisdom to apply the Criminal Code to bookmakers, and to limit the time and place at which these gentlemen can make books. The hon. gentleman makes light of the petitions presented. I do not think the tens of thousands who signed those petitions did so for fun.

The CHAIRMAN—This is not discussing the clause.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—They say this law has been in existence for a long time; but we find that it starts out with the statement that this section is repealed. If repealed it cannot be in existence. The word 'place' is used in subsection two, and it includes any place whether inclosed or not, whether used permanently or temporarily. If two people get together and make a bet, the place is certainly being used as a betting place and they are violating the law. We are reviewing something which has been repealed, and I think it should be explained.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—My hon. friend mentioned the fact that people are restricted in the sale of liquor to certain places and buildings and certain rooms. That is very true; but I do not think that if my hon. friend searches the four corners of the Criminal Code he will find anything about confining the sale of liquor to certain rooms, or anything of that kind. He might as well place it in the Criminal Code also. That is regulated by the provincial law. I have not been able to get that word 'place' into my head. It might include a man's bedroom, and I do not think it wise. An Englishman's room is his castle.

The subclause was adopted.

On subclause (e) of clause 2,

(e) being the owner or other person in control of premises occupied or used as a disorderly house, knowingly allows any contrivance whatsoever upon the said premises for the purpose of preventing, obstructing or delaying the entry of any constable or officer authorized as aforesaid into any such disorderly house, or any part thereof.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I want an explanation. Do they mean bombshells or what? There is a provision in the Criminal Code, that any one who prevents an officer duly authorized from entering a disorderly house or any common gaming house by any contrivance of this kind is guilty of an offence. It seems to me that everything is covered by section 230 of the Criminal Code.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—If it is covered, there is no harm in it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Under the present Act, the placing of a contrivance to prevent the entrance of a constable is not provided for. The using of a contrivance is provided for. I suppose it never occurred to the fertile mind of parliament that it was necessary to enact the provision against the placing of such a contrivance.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 3.

3. Section 235 of the said Code is repealed and the following is substituted therefor:

235. Every one is guilty of an indictable offence, and liable to one year's imprisonment, and to a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, who—

Subsection (c),

(c) becomes the custodian or depository of any money, property or valuable thing staked, wagered or pledged in any case or transaction in which such staking, wagering or pledging is itself contrary to the provisions of this Act; or,

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I think we should insert the word 'knowingly' before the word 'becomes'. Any person who might receive fifty dollars from me and another gentleman would be liable to prosecution.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It would have to be done knowingly. That is the law as it is at present.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Does it not seem pretty clear that when a party is asked to receive a deposit for a wager, that he is told to whom he will have to pay it, and the event must be stated to the party so that he will know whether he has to pay it to A or B. That is the reason why the third party is asked to hold the money.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I want to ask the hon. leader of the opposition, supposing two gentlemen came along and said to me: 'Will you keep this fifty dollars for the week', and did not give me more information——

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That would not come under the Act.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—Subsection two shows that such private betting is not unlawful.

The subclause was adopted.

On subclause (d),

(d) records or registers any bet or wager, or sells any pool upon the results,—
(i) of any political or municipal election;
(ii) of any race;
(iii) of any contest or trial of skill or endurance of man or beast.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—It seems to me to be a very severe law. I am afraid I have violated the law several times. One year's imprisonment or a fine of a thousand dollars if a man bets on an election is rather drastic.

Hon. Mr. KERR—It is exactly the present law.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—The prisons are full of people put in for trifling offences. The Moral Reform Society have put them there. There are moral reform societies for the purpose of getting them out, and establishing homes in which they can be taken care of and started on the right track.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Which track does the hon. gentleman refer to?

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—There is a row between the Minister of Justice and one of the great newspapers, because of the exercise of some pardoning power which he has for offences of this kind for which the punishment is severe. I do not think we should continue that fine of a thousand dollars for betting on elections.

Hon. Mr. KERR—It has been added to the Criminal Code. It is one of the means for securing a pure election. It is a common way of bribing.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Would it not be well to make provision for municipal elections?

Hon. Mr. KERR—That is the old law—provincial or municipal elections.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I think it refers to pool-making or book-making on elections.

Hon. Mr. KERR—It is adding pool selling to the election law. Up to the present time, we are simply re-enacting the law and it is being re-enacted for the purpose of adding a subsection which does not deal with book-making.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend in charge of the Bill, states that this applies only to book-making.

The CHAIRMAN—That is a mistake.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is no question that it is a common way of influencing a man's vote in an election.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—In order to punish a crime of that kind, you may strike some one else.

The subclause was adopted.

On subclause (f),

(f) advertises, prints, publishes, exhibits, posts up, sells or supplies, or offers to sell or supply, any information intended to assist in, or intended for use in connection with, book-making, pool-selling, betting or wagering upon any horse-race or other race, fight, game or sport, whether at the time of advertising, printing, publishing, exhibiting, posting up or supplying such news or information, such horse-race or other race, fight, game or sport has or has not taken place; or,

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—That is the clause restricting the powers of the press, and it makes it a criminal offence for any person to advertise, post up, supply or sell, which means if any newspapers publish information about certain things they would come under provisions of this section of the Code. I would not like to see my friend the editor of the 'Toronto Globe' picked up in the patrol wagon and carted off to jail. Mr. Miller said it was not intended to apply the clause to newspapers, but I would ask any lawyer if it is not ambiguous. It might put people to a lot of trouble. Mr. Miller might be in Africa, and this amendment embalmed in the Criminal Code. I suggest the following amendment, by adding these words thereto:

The provisions of sections 2, 3 and 5 shall not apply to newspapers publishing as a matter of news anything regarding any horse or other race, fight or sport, or any political or municipal election.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It seems to me that that clause only applies to the advertising or publishing of any information that relates to pool-sellers.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—That is all.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If that be the case, I can see no possible objection to it, because a great deal of injury is done by filling the columns of the newspapers with advertisements which would be inducements to persons betting and engaging in this pool-making business. Plenty of money is roped in by the newspapers by publishing that kind of information. I do not understand that this clause prevents any newspaper from giving an account of a race, or publishing races or advertisements of races that are to take place at some future time, or to give any information relating to the races after they are run; it is simply for the purpose of preventing advertising which leads to gambling on races.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I think my hon. friend from Hastings is mistaken as to that clause. He will find that if any one in his office sent out information about races that have taken place, say to London or to some other part of the Dominion, he would be liable to a fine of $1,000 and be imprisoned. It is giving information upon which bets may be made or pools may be sold, and other information that my learned friend would advertise. We find that all over there are men who employ themselves in obtaining information about races from other parts.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Would my hon. friend approve of the press using information to assist in or intended for use in connection with book-making, pool-selling, betting or wagering? It must be expressly with the intention of assisting the book-making, pool-selling, betting or wagering upon horse-races, &c.; that is expressly stated.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—But who is to decide about the intent? The onus of proof is on whom? You may be pulled up and say that the intent was so and so.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The person laying the charge would have to establish the intent.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Suppose the book-making or printing took place in New York, and it was information sent from New York to a printer here, and my hon. friend would publish it. That publication would be utilized for information by the parties here, and if they are benefited by the information that had been published in my hon. friend's paper, for it would give them an advantage and enable them to gain a point, my hon. friend would find, perhaps, that he would be committed or fined $1,000.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I would draw attention to this, that while we ourselves may consider this does not interfere in any way with the papers, still we should make it quite plain. Evidently the newspaper people of the country are nervous on account of this clause, for they do not know just where they stand. Is there any reason why the Senate should not make the language so plain that an ordinary person could understand it?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—You understand it all right.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—No, I do not; nobody understands half the clauses of that Bill. One of the newspaper men from Toronto has written me speaking of the ambiguous wording of subclause (f) and he refers to pages 7425 and 7426 of the 'Hansard', where Mr. Miller, in replying to questions put by Mr. J. A. Currie, M.P., stated emphatically that this does not apply to the newspapers or to newspaper publishers or writers who may print the customary racing intelligence for the benefit of their readers. While Mr. Miller said the language used here is intended for bookmakers, the clause in question is very ambiguous and might give some overzealous parties an opportunity to harass an unfriendly newspaper publisher; therefore, this newspaper man who writes respectfully suggests that an amendment be introduced making the language perfectly clear. Is there anything wrong about making it perfectly clear?

Subclauses (g), (h) and (i) were adopted.

On subsection (2),

Hon. Mr. WILSON—If I am in my office and receive a telephone from persons who want to know the result of a race, would I be liable to a fine or imprisonment under this section? If my hon friend Sir Mackenzie Bowell should want to publish in his paper the incidents of a horse race, he could not get a telephone message or telegram, and, according to this clause, he would have to do without publishing the information.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—I would call attention to the two classes of horses mentioned in this Bill, saddle horses and carriage horses. It would be unfortunate if it should go out that parliament has not as great an interest in the harness horses as it has in the saddle horses. They are both almost indispensable to the country, but if there is any greater value in one than the other, I should say the greater value is in the harness horses, because 90 per cent of the horses of the country are harness horses, whereas not ten per cent of them are used for saddle. If it were not so late in the session, I am satisfied this Bill would not be allowed to go through in this form; and if it is found to militate against the harness horse, as I believe it will, there should be a very reasonable demand made at the next session of parliament to have this clause repealed and to place the harness horse on the same footing as the saddle horse in reference to racing. They have overlooked the point in regard to the breeding of harness horses in this country, and I hope that the two classes of horses will be put on an equal footing.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Where races are arranged for three days or seven days, it is necessary to get out programmes in order to secure the attendance of the people from a long distance, who will bring their horses for the purpose of racing. These people may come hundreds of miles. Supposing it should rain on one of the days fixed for the meet. You have the people and the horses there, but the track will not be in condition for the races, and those people, after having come, at an enormous expense, must go home because there is no provision in this Bill to allow them to complete their programme.

The CHAIRMAN—The clause says 'more than three days.'

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Continuous days.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, the days are to be 'in any one calendar week.'

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—When I was discussing this clause (2) ' any person. by reason of his becoming a custodian, &c., I was told that it provided that any one accepting money, not knowing what it was for, would be liable under this Act. I was told there was provision in section (2). Now, here is the provision and it does not apply to that at all. I do not think that is provided for at all.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The other provision is for an unlawful race.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—But suppose a man was holding money on an unlawful race—supposing I were standing on the street and somebody came and asked me to hold $50 for him?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It would have to be for a particular purpose.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I have already alluded to the fact, that in our part of Canada the agricultural societies own the race-track and the racing associations do not own race-tracks. I have had legal opinion that if a racing association does not own a track it cannot use a track.

Our agricultural societies are all incorporated. If you strike out the word 'racing', it would admit agricultural societies. There is no place in our province where we have enough people to avail ourselves of the privileges granted to large centres.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—For the time being, the agricultural societies track becomes the property of the racing association.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I have had the best legal opinion in the country on that point, and I am told that is not so. I therefore move that the word 'racing' be struck out of the clause.

The amendment was declared lost.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—If my amendment had carried, I would have been satisfied. I ask now to make another amendment. I move that the words 'fifteen thousand' be struck out, and that the words 'one thousand' be substituted. That would remove a very objectionable feature from the Bill, and make it more general in its application.

The amendment was declared lost.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—An argument has been used in favour of this Bill that it is absolutely necessary to allow book-making on the ground for the purpose of increasing the receipts, so that good prizes may be given, and in this way the breeding of race-horses encouraged. I have pointed out that this Bill gives a few people a monopoly. Under this legislation, they will have much larger receipts than they get now. As they have advanced the argument that book-making is necessary for the encouragement of horse-racing, I move the following as a proviso to be added at the end of the Bill:

Provided also that ten per cent of the total takings at any race-meeting be paid within thirty days after the holding of such race-meeting to the provincial treasurer of the province where such race-meeting shall be held, to be applied to the encouragement of horse-breeding within such province.

This is nothing new. It is done in other countries. Some of the money is used for charity, and some of it for encouraging horse-breeding. The racing associations in Toronto are making a large amount of money. They profess that one of their objects is to encourage horse-breeding, and I am sure that they would not object to this amendment.

The amendment was declared lost.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

Hon. Mr. WATSON moved the third reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS moved in amendment, that the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be amended by adding the following words at the end of subsection 2 of clause 3:

Provided also that ten per cent of the total takings at any race-meeting be paid within thirty days after the holding of such race-meeting to the provincial treasurer of the province where such race-meeting shall be held, to be applied to the encouragement of horse-breeding within such province.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I object to the Bill being read the third time now.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—All the rules have been suspended.

The House divided on the amendment, which was rejected by a standing vote.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

NAVAL SERVICE BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 95) an Act respecting the Naval Service of Canada.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 6,

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does this clause mean that a deputy head for this department will be appointed in addition to the deputy head of the Marine and Fisheries Department?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—That means another deputy head.

The clause was adopted

On clause 9,

9. There shall be appointed an officer, not lower in rank than Rear Admiral, to be called the Director of the Naval Service of Canada. If a suitable officer of such rank is not available then an officer of the rank of captain may be appointed, who shall have the rank of Commodore of the first class.

2. The Director of the Naval Service of Canada shall, subject to the regulations and under the instructions of the Minister, be charged with the direction of the Naval Service.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I should like to know what the intention of the government is as to the appointment of a Rear Admiral? Will it be obligatory that he shall have served a certain length of time in the British service, or what qualification will be required of him?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It was thought expedient, and I think my hon. friend will agree with me it is expedient, that in the initial stages, while creating our navy, the officers in chief command should be men of experience, and with a certain rank in the British service. We could hardly have an officer of much less rank than Rear Admiral. A commander might do.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Have any regulations been promulgated yet concerning the appointment of this officer?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—None other than that he should be an officer in the British service, of that rank. That is the only qualification known. Of course, we will consult with the admiralty with respect to the best officers to be appointed. Much as we have done, and as I believe our officers did with respect of the appointment of the Commandant of the Royal Military College, for instance, he, as my hon. friend knows, is usually an officer of considerable position in the British service. At first it is desirable, I think, as we have no officers in our service who could possibly be considered as experienced men in naval affairs, we should have officers from the British navy.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is it the intention of the government to appoint a Rear Admiral at once, or to await the building of the ships, or put him in charge of the ships already owned by Canada?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think it is probable he will be appointed within a reasonable space of time; but that is under consideration. We have at present only two ships, the 'Rainbow' and 'Niobe', at our disposal; but we shall shortly increase the number.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is it the intention of the government to appoint a special designer for this department, or get designs from England?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think the government will obtain designs from England. The British government, as hon. gentlemen probably know, have very elaborate designs for the several classes of vessels in the British service, which are quite numerous. It would be our interest and duty to see that the vessels we construct are in all respects made equal to vessels of the same class in the British service. There will be no difficulty at all about that if they are built in England; if they are built here we would certainly employ the designs used by the British admiralty.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 10,

10. The Governor in Council may appoint a Naval Board to advise the Minister on all matters relating to naval affairs which are referred to the Board by the Minister.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask my right hon. friend what the constitution of that board would be, or what are the views of the government as to who should constitute it? I suppose we shall have a first lord of the admiralty, and junior lords of the admiralty.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—No, I think that, anxious as we may be to rank as a sea power, we shall not go into the business of having first lords and second lords or third lords or fourth lords of the admiralty, for some little time to come.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—The Lord knows who we will have. We don't know.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—The less you have to do with lords the better; that is, lords temporal, I mean.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—This board will be constituted somewhat after the fashion of the Militia Council, or at least the Council for Defence, which is at present acting as adviser to the Minister of Militia. In various ways this Bill, as the hon. gentleman will see, is modelled on the Act which regulates our military affairs, and this will be made to a considerable extent on the same model.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I suppose the council will consist chiefly of naval officers?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Oh yes, that is the intention.

The clause was agreed to.

On clause 12,

12. The Governor in Council may authorize the engagement of officers and seamen in the naval service upon such terms and conditions as may be prescribed, and may from time to time fix the maximum number that may be so engaged.

2. Every officer and seaman shall take and subscribe the following oath upon engaging to serve in the naval service:—

'I, A.B., do sincerely promise and swear (or, solemnly declare) that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to His Majesty.'

3. Such oath may be administered by any commissioned officer in the naval service.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—I was going to remark on this item that it would be necessary that the wages given would be equal to what are given to-day in the United States, otherwise the seamen would be very apt to run away to where they would be better paid than with us.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Have a string on them.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—They do not run away very swiftly.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Due care will be taken, no doubt, to see that fair remuneration is given to the officers and seamen.

The clause was agreed to.

On clause 16,

16. Any person who has voluntarily engaged in the naval service shall be entitled to be discharged at the expiration of the time of service for which he engaged, unless such expiration occurs in time of emergency, in which case he shall be liable to serve for a further period of not more than twelve months, and for such further service he shall not be entitled to any increase of pay unless, in the opinion of the Governor in Council, the circumstances of the case and the conduct of the person concerned merits it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Can my hon. friend say what the conditions of service will be?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—In what respect?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Length of service for instance.

Rt Hon Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think that is prescribed a little further on. If the hon. gentleman looks at clause 21, he will see the general idea as to those engagements.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, that does not provide for the normal term of service.

Hon. Mr. KERR—Clause 29 provides for that.

Rt Hon Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Clause 29 provides as follows:

29. Every naval volunteer shall be engaged for a term of three years and, provided his conduct and qualifications are satisfactory, shall be eligible for re-engagement for further periods of three years up to the age of forty-five years; at the expiration of each term he shall be entitled to his discharge, save as hereinafter mentioned.

If I recollect right, in the British service, though some of the hon. gentlemen here may be better informed, they do not engage the crews of the ships for an indefinite period I think they are engaged but for a moderate term, and are paid off when the ship, after its cruise, returns to the port, in case of long voyages.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Clause 49 provides the time and also the pay, and clause 16 provides the continuance for a certain length of time in case of emergency.

On clause 18,

18. Officers of the naval service shall provide their own uniforms and equipment, with the exception of officers of torpedo vessels and of the submarine service, to whom special clothing may be issued as prescribed.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—I was going to remark that it was rather hard on the officers that at the outset they would have to provide their own uniforms. They might not be, like some of us, very flush in means, and after they were engaged they would have to pay for their uniforms themselves. I remember when, under the Militia Act of Nova Scotia, I had to provide my own uniform and saddle cloth, which was quite a large amount at that time.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The saddle cloth more particularly. The point which the hon. gentleman brings up should receive attention. I may remind him that we have not as yet provided for the uniforms of the officers, either of the permanent force or of the active militia, and we could not very well make an exception in the case of the naval officers, unless we are prepared to consider the other question, which is a pretty large one.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—How is it done in England? Are the officers compelled to provide their own uniforms?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (British Columbia)—Yes, that is so.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I have always regarded it as a pretty expensive tax, and, personally, I would be very glad to see much more liberal allowances made to the officers of the other permanent force, or the militia, in the matter of assisting them in the matter of uniforms; but that has not been the policy, as far as I know, of the British government in any case, and has not up to date been our policy at all.

Hon. Mr. KERR—The great difficulty is that the moment you open the door, the volunteer officers will want to be provided also.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Clause 17 makes provision for the uniform, under regulations to be issued by the department.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —In certain cases only; but it does not provide that they should buy them in the case of officers.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But the regulations provide for the supplying of them at the actual cost price.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —If hon. gentlemen will look at clause 18, they will see that officers of the naval service shall provide their own uniforms and equipment, with the exception of certain officers.

The clause was agreed to.

On clause 19,

19. The naval reserve force shall consist of such persons as join the said reserve after naval service or after undergoing such training as may be prescribed. All members of the said reserve shall be liable to active service upon an emergency.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Can my hon. friend tell us what the character of the naval reserve will be in contradistinction to that of the active service?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —What you may call the permanent force?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —It is expected to bear the same relations to that as our volunteer militia bears to the permanent force.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—How is it intended to train the reserve?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —We have proposed to make regulations for these. Training ships, I think, are expected to supply a reasonable amount of training to volunteers who will join the service if they see fit, and, as provided in section 21, these volunteers are not expected to serve for a longer term than one year.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What provision has already been made as to training ships? I understand the 'Rainbow' is a training ship?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —No. It must be used as a training ship, but I understand it is largely to act, in the first instance, as a sort of protective cruiser on the Pacific coast.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—And the 'Niobe'?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I understand exclusively as a training ship.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Has the government considered the question of naval schools or training ships for the younger portion of the community? In Australia they have training ships in which youngsters, the waifs, you might say, of the city, and those who have been brought before the police court for minor offences, are punished by being placed upon a training ship for the purpose of making sailors and seamen of them, and it has proved very successful in the Australian colonies, and particularly New South Wales. They have a large training ship in which they have fifty or one hundred or more of this class of boys picked up off the street and educated on board the vessel and taught whatever is necessary to teach and make good seamen of them. They are utilized afterwards sometimes on trading ships and other times on the war vessels.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I may say that, at present at any rate, whatever may afterwards be done, it is not likely we will adopt that plan. There is a good deal to be said for it from one point of view; but I think we can obtain, particularly in our maritime provinces, quite a sufficient number of youngsters and men of unblemished character without taking up the waifs and strays.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I quite agree with my hon. friend; but upon a moment's reflection he will see that it is a capital way of reforming the waifs. When they are young and commit minor depredations, who might otherwise probably be sent to prison, they are sentenced for a term on a training vessel, where they are taught the arts of seamanship and how to become useful citizens. It is principally confined to boys who have no parents, and who are thrown upon the public in large cities such as Melbourne and Sydney. It is a modified reformatory.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —That is just the reason why I should hesitate, and why I think the government should hesitate, about introducing such an institution in the first place. What may be done at a later period, I will reserve my own opinion upon; but I think in the first instance it would hurt the service materially if it could in any shape or sense be said that we are inviting such persons to join the service as a reformatory.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not advocating the adoption of the system; but I am saying that if any one studies the system and makes inquiries as to the result of the adoption of it, he will see that we could not have a better system on which to bring up that class of boys.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —That may be.

The clause was agreed to.

On clause 23,

23. In case of an emergency the Governor in Council may place at the disposal of His Majesty for general service in the royal navy, the naval service or any part thereof, any ships or vessels of the naval service, and the officers and seamen belonging to the naval service.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—I desire to explain that when the imperial steamers came from the West Indies to Halifax they would go out every fine day for target practice and return in the afternoon. I say every fine day, because equally with St. John, Halifax is sometimes afflicted with fog, and in foggy weather they would not be able to go out. I think if you have a navy in Halifax they would go out every fine day and come in in the afternoon without being impeded by tide or anything else, and that is one of the reasons why Halifax should be the port in which the navy would be fitted up.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I have no doubt its advantages will not be overlooked.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This is really the contentious clause of the whole Bill. That is, if England is at war we are not to engage in war until the government decides by an order in council that we shall go to war. I read a question and answer on this point between the premier of the country and the hon. leader of the opposition in the Commons, which is somewhat interesting, and to my mind—and I think any one who reads it will come to the same conclusion—an inconsistent position was taken by the government upon this question, that is in declaring that while Britain is at war as part of the empire, we must be also at war. That declaration was made a number of times during the debate in this House, and yet, while we are at war, we are not permitted to use guns on our ships until an order in council has been passed ordering us to fire them. It strikes me very forcibly as a condition such as is illustrated by a joke I read in the paper the other day. A little boy was given a diary and was told to keep a record. About the same time his grandmother presented him with a pea shooter. The diary subsequently fell into the hands of his mother, who found the following entry: 'Very fine,' and on the next day: 'Dark, could do nothing, shot grandmother.' This is about the same thing. A merchant ship may be chased by a war vessel belonging to a country with which we are at war, but a Canadian cruiser is not to interfere until an order in council is passed declaring that the Canadian war ships are to take part in the defence of the empire, and to become a party to that war. Fortunately, by the wireless system it is possible to communicate with ships at sea; otherwise a merchant vessel might fall into the hands of an enemy, and the Canadian vessel could not interfere without having first received authority from the government of Canada. If she did interfere, and any one was killed, I suppose the captain would be guilty of murder.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I think I may relieve my hon. friend's mind. If any Canadian cruiser sees a British merchant ship pursued by an enemy, I have not the slightest doubt she would clear for action quicker than the hon. gentleman could take his seat.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is quite unnecessary for the hon. gentleman to relieve my mind on that question. I have as high an opinion as he has of the British sailor, and I am satisfied if my hon. friend himself were placed in such a position he would take the course he points out; but the question I put is this: Would he have authority—I know he would assume the power—or would it be his duty, other than to defend himself if he were attacked, to take action under the circumstances? It would avoid all difficulties and discussions which have taken place on this Bill if there had been a clause in it similar to that in the Australian Navy Act, that when Great Britain is at war we are also at war. That is the position Canada ought to take unless we are to be considered a totally independent nation and will only take part, as a foreign country would do, as an ally, in Britain's wars.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —My hon. friend is raising phantoms which will never trouble any British sailor or officer. What I understand by this, and what I think is the fair construction to be put upon it, is not if the British government go to war we in Canada can escape being at war at the same time, but simply as to the disposition of the forces. The plan is to have two squadrons, one on the Pacific and one on the Atlantic coast, and it may possibly be the case that the Canadian government may deem it inexpedient to allow those forces to be detached on any other service than the service of protecting the two great coaling stations of Halifax and Esquimalt. The object is clear enough, I think, that the Canadian government desire to reserve in their hands, in the interest of the whole empire, the power of protecting and defending those coaling stations which, mark you, may be of enormous importance, and which the British government are aware are of enormous importance to the British service. As everybody knows now, the practical power of a steam fleet depends on its being able to renew its coal in convenient places. In the case of our Pacific squadron, the possession of a coaling station at Esquimalt, in British Columbia, may prove to be of incalculable value, and similarly on the Atlantic the possession of Halifax may prove also of incalculable value to the empire. We may deem it expedient to keep all the ships we have in a position to protect these coaling stations against the possible attack of an enemy's cruiser. That, I think, is the reason of the provision to which my hon. friend refers. I do not think the government have the slightest intention of debarring our seamen from taking a share in the protection of any ship flying the British flag which may be in danger of being captured by an enemy.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask my right hon. friend's view of this supposititious situation? When this clause was being discussed in the Commons, I understood from some of the premier's remarks that a discretion would be exercised by Canada in ordering this fleet into active service in view of a war between the empire and say some power with which Canada might not be directly in touch. That is to say the war might be so distant as to in no way excite interest in Canada, and the government of the day would therefore exercise its discretion as to whether the fleet should be placed in active service. It is utterly impossible to assume a position of that kind, for this reason: The enemy is not going to consider what Canada's attitude will be; the enemy, of course, will regard all the British possessions as at war.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —There is no doubt about that.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Therefore, an attack may come from any quarter. It will inevitably necessitate the Governor in Council placing the fleet in active service immediately war breaks out between England and any nation, no matter how distant we may be from the seat of war or how little interest we may have in it.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —That may be. The point I was endeavouring to make, and I think my hon. friend understands fully the importance of it, is this, that it may or may not be expedient to allow our squadrons, which are none too strong for the purpose, to be detached from their bases where they will be exercising a very useful function in defending the coal supply stored at the points named.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I appreciate that.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Information might reach us through a variety of channels which at the moment might not have reached the British government, and which might lead us to anticipate an attack. Our primary duty, and the interest of the empire also, would require us in such case to keep our force well in hand in order to protect these valuable coal bases.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—A question was put to the Prime Minister as to what the position of a Canadian ship would be in the event of meeting an enemy, and that enemy not attacking. I understand the Prime Minister, that instructions to that ship might possibly be that the officer in command was not to engage in action. I fail to see how any such orders can be given. The moment England is at war, the fleet must be in action. I am speaking of the possibility of meeting an enemy's ship, whether a merchant or war vessel.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The reasonably fair object is, that we should have in the first instance, and unless a very great emergency arose altering our views, the right to dispose of the force at our command in such a way as we thought most advantageous to the general interest.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—How about instructions to engage in action or not engage in action?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The hon. gentleman must believe that the government of Canada will not be absolutely and utterly devoid of common sense. In his position as leader of the opposition, I admit he is warranted in regarding us as a set of unregenerate idiots.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am dealing simply with the situation laid down by the Prime Minister, that instructions to engage in action could possibly be withheld though England were at war. I fail to see how that can be done.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—If the hon. gentleman will recall the history of the last hundred years, he will find that in nine engagements out of ten with an enemy there was no danger of a sea attack. Great Britain was tackling a land power with no vessels on the sea. There would be no necessity for the mobilization of the Canadian fleet in nine cases out of ten where there would be a rumpus somewhere on land, an occasion where no sea action would be possible.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am not talking about mobilization at all, or the disposition of the fleet. I am speaking of the bald instructions which will be issued by the Governor in Council, placing the fleet in active service. I can very well conceive of the fleet being in active service and yet protecting the coal bases; but the instructions which will be issued to the fleet must necessarily leave it to the officer in command as to when he shall or shall not engage. The government of the day cannot define to the officer of the ship when he shall engage in action if England is at war, no matter where he is placed.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I do not think he will need to have it defined.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It depends on the position of the enemy. It cannot be fixed in a Bill of this kind; it must be settled at the time. About defending the coal stations, should our small squadron be called to England, our coal bases could be protected by submarine mines, so that no ship would dare to come near our coast. The system is adopted by England and Germany. The British government have employed a number of dredgers to dredge German mines in the North Sea. Submarine mines are easily laid; they are inexpensive and vessels would not dare approach a coal base where they are laid.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the meaning of those clauses is reasonable enough. Clause 23 reads as follows:

> 23. In case of an emergency the Governor in Council may place at the disposal of His Majesty, for general service in the Royal navy, the naval service or any part thereof, any ships or vessels of the naval service, and the officers and seamen serving in such ships or vessels, or any officers or seamen belonging to the naval service.

Now take the case referred to by the right hon. gentleman who leads the House. In case of war, it might be possible that the Governor in Council would place the great majority of ships and sailors at the disposal of the British admiralty, but they would have the option to retain the services of two or three vessels for the purpose of protecting the coal stations, or any object of that kind, and that, it seems to me, is really all that is meant by the discretion which is given to the Governor in Council, and I think it is a reasonable and proper discretion. We know that in England and elsewhere, panic sometimes occurs, and the home government might be a little bit panic stricken—and they might denude Canada of all her naval defences, which might happen to be really required here, and not needed there. I think it is a perfectly right and proper thing that if Canada is paying for the ships, she should have the right to retain some of them at any rate, on service for Canadian defence.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, but my hon. friend fails to draw the distinction between clauses 22 and 23. I say there is marked distinction between the two. One deals with placing the naval forces only in active service. Now, that is the controversial question. The other is not subject to so much disputation, because that simply deals with the placing of the ships, the mobilization of the ships, permitting the admiralty of Great Britain to say where the ships shall be placed; but the all important point is that embraced in clause 22. Now, I fail to see how it will work out that Canada cannot possibly be at war when England is at war, thus necessitating the action of the Governor General in placing them in active service.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—But there are nine cases out of ten where there will be no necessity?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am not talking about necessity. My hon. friend must appreciate the fact that the element of necessity would not necessarily enter into it. It is the principle, it is the theory, it is the possibility, the remote possibility, that is to say, when England is at war, this fleet must necessarily be at war, notwithstanding——

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Theoretically.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Notwithstanding the absence of the order in council of the Governor in Council. Can my hon. friend point out a possibility by which this fleet belonging practically to Great Britain, or at least belonging to the overseas dominions of the British empire, is not in service, and is not at war, notwithstanding the Governor has not issued his order in council? The fleet would be subject to attack by the enemy.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—If the enemy had ships; but if the enemy had no ships—and that has been the case in the last hundred years, nine times out of ten——

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend surely does not presume that I am talking about the act of war happening, or referring to an enemy that has not the ships. If my hon. friend assumes that of course he is right; but in discussing this matter we are assuming that the enemy has ships, and an enemy that may be at war with Great Britain is not going to send a diplomatic note to Canada requesting the honour of knowing whether an order has been issued by the Governor General in Council placing this fleet in active service, so that under favourable circumstances they may attack. That is not going to be done. This is not going to be a five o'clock tea party in the event of Great Britain being at war; consequently there will be no diplomatic exchange of notes as to whether the order has been issued. I say that most decidedly when England is at war the Canadian fleet must necessarily be in active service, notwithstanding the absence of the order of the Governor in Council, and if my hon. friend can controvert that position——

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—If there is any danger on the high seas, there is no question that the position taken by my hon. friend is the correct one.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is not a question of danger at all.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—But we must credit the government of Canada with common sense to act in consequence.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the hon. gentleman will turn to the Militia Act, he will find that the language used there is almost identical with that used in clause 22. Section 69 of the Militia Act says:

The Governor in Council may place the militia, or any part thereof on active service anywhere in Canada, and also beyond Canada for the defence thereof at any time when it appears advisable to do so by reason of an emergency.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, but my hon. friend will appreciate the distinction. The militia is within our own boundaries, while the Canadian fleet is on the high seas.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes, but they can send the militia outside at any time—'Anywhere in Canada, and also beyond Canada.'

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Of course, they may, and that would be very reasonable. The militia must receive their marching orders from some particular source. Our fleet is on the high seas subject to being attacked momentarily by the enemy before the government of the day may know that there is war; and yet it is prescribed that the fleet shall not be in active service until the Governor in Council deliberately issues an order in council. Now, I say that that situation is impossible.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Although it may be in action?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, certainly the fleet must be on active service immediately war is declared between Great Britain and a foreign country.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—I believe that the government will have a very efficient admiral at the station. They must place confidence in him as to when to go to sea or when to remain in port; and the duties will not be confined to protecting the two coal stations, but they will also protect our merchant ships that would come in, say, to the port of Halifax. When the steamers in winter time come from St. John with the mail, and when they go away with their passengers, they would be engaged in the protection of those steamers of so much importance, to see that they would safely arrive at their proper destination, and at this day with telegraphic facilities in every direction, there would be no move of the enemy that would not be known by the government or by the admiral at the station at the time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The proposition stated by the right hon. leader of the House did not seem to me practicable or possible, because he laid down the principle that it was necessary for the Governor in Council in Canada to have control of the disposition of these ships. If they are to be of any value at all, they must act in unison with the orders of the admiralty. We can all understand the necessity for protecting the coal depots in different parts of Canada, as well as in other parts of the world. I take it for granted that that would be one of the first acts of the admiralty of England in order to obtain supplies necessary to propel their vessels; but supposing the government of Canada takes the responsibility of declaring how the Canadian ships shall be disposed of, and the admiralty plan might be of a different character altogether, then the one would come in conflict with the other. The proposition that has been laid down by my hon. friend, about issuing the order and stating where the ships should go and what they should do, is what is done by any independent nation. History teaches us that in the past, when allied forces come together, one joins the other which is at war and places not only its naval force, but its land force, at the disposal of that country. Are we to be in precisely the same position? It seems to me that the principle laid down by the right hon. the leader of the House tends to that end, and to that end only, because we may consider—and when I say we I mean the government of Canada—it necessary to place the Canadian naval force in certain ports of the Dominion to protect what we consider necessary to be protected. The admiralty may have other schemes, and other plans by which they would utilize their forces in making an attack on some other part of this continent, and they may require the aid and assistance of what Canadian forces we may have; but the Governor in Council steps in and says: 'You must remain in the harbour of Esquimalt, or in the harbour of Halifax, to protect the coal stores.' That is the position in which the proposition laid down by the right hon. the leader of the House would place us. It seems to me that if the force is to be of any practical value at all, whenever it acts it must act in unison and conjunction with the British force, otherwise we will be coming in contact with each other, and will not know what position we occupy with the empire or with ourselves either.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE—It seems to me the argument here is based upon the confounding of municipal law with the international law. All these matters with regard to becoming belligerents are laid down in Wheaton, and other authorities on international law, where the duties and obligations of belligerents, and how they are to become belligerents, are set forth in the regulations, with which we have nothing to do.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is quite true; but it does not meet the point.

The clause was agreed to.

On clause 25,

25. When the Governor in Council declares that an emergency has arisen in which it is expedient for the public service that His Majesty should have control of any dock, shipyard, pier, wharf, machine shop, repairing or salvage plant, factory, warehouse, store or other building the minister may, by warrant under his hand, empower any person named in such warrant to take possession thereof in the name and on behalf of His Majesty, and to use it for the service of His Majesty in such manner as the minister directs, and all persons, officers, servants and employees employed thereon shall obey the directions of the minister in connection with the management or operation thereof.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Can my hon. friend say what the government intends to do in connection with the building of shipyards in connection with the navy proposed to be built?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—These matters are all under consideration. I could hardly presume to give my hon. friend an outline of what may be done; a good deal will depend on whether it is found possible and within reasonable bounds to build ships in Canada, or whether they have to be constructed and purchased in England. I may say that it is proposed, as we will see by the resolutions laid on the table of the other House, to have facilities for the creation of dry docks and floating docks in various parts of the Dominion. That will be in connection with probable construction here.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The reason I ask the question, I notice the last few weeks that applications are being made for the incorporation of dry dock companies, and also applications to the government for subsidies for the building of such. I have not seen anything yet as to whether the government has committed itself to the policy of handing over the graving docks to private companies, or whether it is the intention to build them as government docks.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The resolutions to which the hon. gentleman refers have reference chiefly to the construction of these docks by private parties.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—A resolution has been laid on the table in the House of Commons in regard to increasing the subsidy for dry docks.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—The advantage of building in the port of Halifax would be that the steel plates could be manufactured down in Sydney, where they are now shipping cargo upon cargo of steel rails to Sydney, New South Wales, and also around the Horn to Puget Sound. There is no doubt that the decision of the government would be that the ships would be built in our country instead of on the other side. A good deal of the material required could be made by the steel industry in Sydney, C.B.

The clause was agreed to.

On clause 32,

32. There shall be an institution for the purpose of imparting a complete education in all branches of naval science, tactics and strategy.

2. Such institution shall be known as the Naval College of Canada, and shall be located at such place as the Governor in Council may determine.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—Assuming this is an economical government, although it has been accused of being extravagant, the buildings are there in Halifax dockyard, solid brick buildings, built by the imperial government, and there would be no necessity of going to the extravagance of building a naval college, because these buildings are ready to be occupied, and all that would be required would be some internal improvements. If the government want to save money, they need not build a naval college.

Hon Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL— It is not characteristic of the government to save money. Their policy is to spend it. Might I ask the right hon. leader if any calculations have been made as to the cost of the naval college? It would be about on the same basis as the Kingston college, I suppose.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —It would be mutatis mutadis very much on the same lines, and probably would cost in proportion to the number of cadets much the same as the Kingston college. As nearly as may be, I think that would supply the best guide to the possible expenditure.

The clause was agreed to.

On clause 44,

44. The Governor in Council may from time to time direct that the Government Vessels Discipline Act shall or shall not apply to any ship or vessel in the naval service, or to the officers, seamen or persons engaged for service thereon. Until otherwise provided the said Act shall continue to apply to all ships and vessels in the fisheries protection service and the officers and persons engaged for service thereon, and to all ships and vessels employed on the hydrographic survey and tidal survey and the officers and persons engaged for service thereon.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I notice that provision is made here for the fisheries protection. I suppose that includes fisheries protection in the great lakes to the west of us?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Yes, I understand it includes all the vessels now employed in what is known as the fisheries protective service, whether they be on the Atlantic or Pacific or Great Lakes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I hope the vessels to be placed on the Great Lakes will be able to overtake the poachers. Of late years our protective cruisers have been too slow and not as effective as they should be.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Before the chairman rises, may I ask what appropriation is being made during the present session for this particular service?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —There is a general appropriation, as my hon. friend will see, of about $2,000,000, under a very comprehensive clause which would enable the government to use it for any of these purposes, for the purchase of war vessels, or for the construction of war vessels. It is out of that vote that any expenses which may be incurred will be defrayed.

The clause was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was read the third time and passed.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 205) An Act to amend the Civil Service Act.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL— Would the hon. gentleman give us a general outline of the provisions of this Act?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I may say that one of the more important provisions, perhaps the most important provision in the whole Bill, has reference to the transfer of officers from the outside service to the inside service. That would necessarily dispense with the examination in certain cases. It is, however, provided that no such transfer shall be made unless the officer has served a very considerable period, not less than three years, in the outside service. It has been found that in certain branches of our service it is often expedient to transfer an officer of proved capacity to the inside, and while, of course, it is obvious that if this were allowed to be done without some restriction it might be abused to the detriment of the whole civil service competitive examination system, it is also equally clear, as I think my hon. friend's experience will enable him to corroborate me in saying, that it very often happens that ministers are better able to judge of the capacity and quality of men, particularly for special work in the department, after they have been employed for a reasonable space of time in the public service, than could be under any possible system of examination. Perhaps that is the only thing that may be said to be a departure in principle from the existing Civil Service Act. The greater part of it is taken up with amendments to the inland revenue, to the post office service, to the customs service, and some small details which have been thought desirable and necessary to promote the better working of the Act.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—How does it affect the standing of an officer in the outside service with respect to examination in view of promotion? Take, for instance, an officer in the outside service who would be promoted without submitting himself to examination under the present system.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —In a great many cases, not in all, but in a good many cases undoubtedly he would.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will it involve his submitting himself for examination for promotion in all cases?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Not when he is brought in. After he becomes a member of the inside service, then he would be subject to the same restrictions and regulations as his fellow officers; but at the point of entering the service, he would be free from competitive examination if recommended as provided herein by the head of the department and the deputy head apparently.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend means he is transferred to the inside service?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Not upon entry?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —He gets into the outside service in a great many cases without examination. The Civil Service Act has not been applied in the main to what we may call the outside service. It has not been made to extend, as my hon. friend is aware, to various branches of the outside service.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—As I understand, if an officer who has been in the employ of the government for three years is required in the inside service, he can be transferred without going before the Civil Service Board for examination. The department, being the judge of his qualification for a position, they may appoint him.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —That is the object, as I understand it myself.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Under the present Civil Service Act, it cannot be done.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Under the present law I think it could be done without any limitation as to time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Without examination?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I think so. An officer could be appointed to-day to the outside service, and he could be technically within the law brought into the inside service to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Special qualifications?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Special qualifications or anything else.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That Act can be interpreted pretty broadly.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —In that way, I think the Act could be surrounded, so to speak.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That has been the law. For special qualifications we can bring a clerk into the department either as first or second class. This Bill provides that he must have served for three years. I think it is a good provision, and will prevent improper promotions, such as have been made in the past.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Could the right hon. gentleman inform the committee whether the Bill has been submitted to the Civil Service Commission?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I understand it has, but I cannot speak positively. I think the Civil Service Commission have drawn the attention of the government to the precise matter that I have mentioned, that the civil service examination might be entirely dispensed with if the minister saw fit, by putting in a man and keeping him for a short time in the outside service, and then bringing him in. I understand they quite approve of this provision; but I was speaking from recollection without having seen them myself.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I cannot for the life of me see why it should be submitted to the Civil Service Commissioners. The government assume the responsibility, and I take it for granted they know what is required in the service as well as any one else. The commissioners have nothing to say as to what is required in the departments. It is all very well for them to examine a man's qualifications.

On clause 6,

6. Any officer or employee in the outside service may, by order in council, be transferred to any position in the inside service for a period not exceeding six months, but he shall, during such period, notwithstanding his duties in the inside service, remain subject to the law relating to the outside service.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Why is the limitation of six months made?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Sometimes it is convenient—it might be in the Department of Customs, over which my hon. friend used to preside—to bring a man here from the outside service for a few months in order to obtain special information which he alone may possess Similar cases occur in several other departments, the Interior for example.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not aware that there is anything in the law which prevents a minister from using the services of his employees where he wants them. I know it was a common practice in the past—in the statistical branch particularly—to bring a specially qualified man to Ottawa, and keep him here until the duties assigned to him were performed. This Bill gives authority by law to do that which has been constantly done in the past. Would that imply that the employee is to receive remuneration in proportion to that of clerks occupying similar positions in the department? I can see no other reason for making a provision of this kind, unless there is something in the Civil Service Act as it now exists preventing the government from doing so.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—That I understand to be the case, that they require this extra power.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 9, salaries of Inland Revenue officials.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In what respect do these salaries compare with the salaries paid under the law as it is to-day?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—In a general way we increase them, I should say in the case of the higher officers, by a matter of three or four hundred dollars. In the case of inferior officers not quite so much.

The clause was agreed to.

On clause 12,

12. When it has been determined by the Governor in Council that any post office not under the Civil Service Act is to be brought under the said Act, any clerk or other employee then employed in such office, and who has been continuously employed for a period of two years immediately preceding the date on which the office is brought under the said Act, shall be considered as eligible for appointment under this Act irrespective of age and without having to pass the civil service examination, and such clerk or employee may be paid the same salary as he had theretofore received in such office; provided that such salary shall not exceed the maximum salary of the class in the civil service to which he is appointed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I hope provision will be made for paying the clerks in town and city post offices much better than they are paid at present. I understand very well what the result will be where you have such a numerous staff, but the small pay given to post office clerks in towns of ten to fifteen thousand inhabitants leads to constant changes. A smart active boy goes into the service, but finds the pay so ridiculously small that when he reaches the age of sixteen or seventeen, after he has become really efficient, and knows his duty well, he leaves the service, and goes into some other employment. That has been the experience in the town where I live. No capable energetic man will remain long in the service with the rates paid him. I realize the enormous additional expenditure involved if public servants were to be remunerated as the employees of business concerns; still, if we desire to have an efficient staff in our post offices and retain the clerks who have learned their business, an increase of pay is absolutely necessary.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Pro tanto this will remedy it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I thought I would avail myself of this opportunity to call attention to the practical results of the principles on which our post offices are managed.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—The same thing occurs at Brockville.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—I can endorse all that has been said by the hon. gentleman from Hastings. Post office clerks are under paid. They receive less salary than is paid to bookkeepers in business offices throughout the country, and if defalcations occur occasionally, it is because the salaries of those men are not large enough to enable them to maintain themselves and their families. The Post Office Department has an increasing revenue. It is not like some other departments that are not able to square accounts at the end of the year, and, with a surplus revenue, the claims of the clerks of the inside and outside service should be liberally considered.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 21,

21. Section 38 of the said Act is repealed and the following is substituted therefor:—

38. In the absence of special authority of parliament no payment additional to the salary authorized by law shall be made to any deputy head, officer, clerk or employee permanently employed in the Civil Service, in respect of any service hereafter to be rendered by him, whether in the discharge of his ordinary duties of office or of any other duties which may be imposed upon him, or which he may undertake or volunteer to discharge or otherwise perform; and no vote expressed to be made generally, though qualified by the words 'notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act,' or words to the like effect, shall be deemed to authorize such a payment: Provided, however, that nothing in this section is intended to prohibit the payment to any officer, clerk or employee in the outside service of a separate annual salary from each of two or more departments or distinct branches of the public service in respect of separate duties performed in the outside service for each of such departments or branches respectively, if one of such salaries is not sufficient to compensate him for his whole time, and if the aggregate salaries do not exceed reasonable compensation for the discharge of all the duties so performed; and provided further that nothing in this section shall affect the operation of section 46 of this Act.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I take it that this clause is merely amplifying the others in order to prevent a minister from giving to a clerk payment for extra services. For instance, in the report of the Contingent Committee that is before the Senate at the present time, there is a recommendation for a payment of $400 to one of the officials for extra work. This would, I take it, prevent the possibility of the money of the Senate being appropriated for it unless it was specially voted for that purpose.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Unless it was specially voted.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Unless voted by parliament, exactly.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I propose to move an amendment to this Bill.

The CHAIRMAN—On the third reading?

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the committee decide to make the amendment, it will not be necessary to move at the third reading. I might briefly explain why I move this amendment. It will be in the memory of every hon. member of this House that within the last two sessions we have spent a considerable amount of time, and there has been a certain amount of servitude, if I may use the expression, developed in the usually tranquil and genial minds and hearts of the members of this House over the difficulty which arose between the Senate and the Anditor General. We passed an order the other day to the effect that cheques were to be paid for certain salaries, and I notice that the last report of the Internal Economy Committee recommends action of the same kind. Now, hon. gentlemen, whatever we may think of the wisdom of the action of the Auditor General, there is no doubt that apparently he has the law on his side. I happened to see the Anditor General a day or two ago, and he told me that instructions had been issued to the officers of the House of Commons, who were paid when our officers were not paid, to the effect that the sums paid to them should be refunded. I suppose the Commons have made some provision in the Supply Bill for making good that amount, and that the officers will not have to refund. I do not think it is a satisfactory thing that the payment of our officers should be continually coming up, and that differences should arise between the Houses and the Auditor General, and it occurred to me—possibly hon. gentlemen may not agree with me—that if we were to make an amendment to this Bill, such as that which I am about to propose, it would legalize, in the future at any rate, the payment to these officers who have not been paid their increases in the past. I may say that when I saw the Auditor General, I told him what the nature of this amendment was of which I would give a notice, and I asked him to consider the passing of that amendment to this Bill as a sufficient justification to him to pass these payments, so that if we can bring about this result, I think it is well worth amending the Bill. I move then this amendment:

The CHAIRMAN.

22. The following subsection is added to section 45 of the said Act:

It is the intent and meaning of the first subsection of this section that, notwithstanding the fact that certain officers and employees of the Senate and of the House of Commons do not appear to fall within the category of clerks or of messengers, such officers and employees may be paid salaries based on their salaries as existing or fixed on the first day of September, 1908, in the same manner as if they then fell within the category of clerks.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is that section 45 of the Revised Statutes?

Hon. Mr. POWER—No; section 45 of the Civil Service Amendment Act of 1908. It is chapter 15 of 1908. Section 45 of the Act of 1908 is the one which deals with the officers of parliament. I asked the Auditor General as to the difficulty that has arisen, and he explains it in this way: There are certain officers in the House of Commons and in this House who do not fall under the category of clerks. For instance, there is the doorkeeper, the housekeeper, the keeper of the newsroom, and so on. The Auditor General took the ground that an employee of the House, once you get below the higher grades, must be either a clerk or a messenger: he must come in the one class or the other, and those officers could not be called clerks. It could not be said that they came under the category of clerks, and he held that as they came in the category of messengers, their salaries could not be increased beyond a certain limit. They were entitled to get what they were receiving at the time the Act of 1908 came into operation, but they were not entitled to get any increase. It seems to me that when the Act of 1908 was being drafted, an omission was made by not making provision for officers of this stamp. There are various officers who are higher than messengers, and higher in some respects than some of the lower grade clerks, and this amendment is simply to provide for such cases. I therefore move that this clause be added to the Bill.

22. The following subsection is added to section 45 of the said Act:—

It is the intention and meaning of the first subsection of this section that, notwithstanding the fact that certain officers and employees of the Senate and of the House of Commons do not appear to fall within the category of clerks or of messengers, such officers and employees may be paid salaries based on their salaries as existing or fixed on the first day of September, 1908, in the same manner as if they then fell within the category of clerks.

That leaves it open for them to get the increase.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—I don't know that I fully appreciate the suggested amendment. Does this place them in the classification as officials of the Senate. It says, 'may be paid salaries based on their salaries as existing or fixed on the first day of September, 1908.'

Hon. Mr. POWER—Certainly it puts these officers of the Senate on exactly the same footing as if they had been on the first of September, 1908, clerks in the House.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Simply declares what their status should be.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—I do not read it that way. If they were paid more than a messenger at $900 a year, they would come in the classification, $900 to $1,200, or the classification $800 to $1,600. This does not say that they can get increases. It says that they shall be paid salaries based on the salaries they received—unless it means that they belong to the division which states the salaries and the several increases. As the hon. gentleman has suggested the amendment more for the purpose of giving the Auditor General a loophole or a door to get out of with respect to the action that the Senate may be disposed to take, possibly it would be well for us to consider it in that light. So far as relates to the payments that were ordered by the Senate last session, and were deferred and which on the action of the Senate have been since paid, I can hardly understand how the Auditor General will be able to make these employees refund the money. I understand that the employees in the House of Commons have not made any refund in respect to that. I do not know that I would object particularly to the amendment if it cuts out all the difficulty that we have had in respect to the Act, and the identification of the Auditor General and the Treasury Board with the Senate, and the right of the Senate to deal with these questions, as in their judgment they believe to be not only in the interest of the Senate, but also as to the fairness and justness to the employees.

Hon Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am fully in accord with the amendment proposed by the hon. gentleman. I think we have a right to do so. I do not know whether the government has considered the effect such an amendment would have, if it passed.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I may say to my hon friend in respect to this amendment, that I would be disposed to accept it tentatively on the understanding that the government would not hold themselves committed to it, that if they saw objection to it, it would be amended when it is returned to the lower House, as it must be. As far as I can see, I think it will solve the difficulty which we wish to solve, and get out of the dispute with the Auditor General, but my hon friend will understand that I cannot pledge the government definitely to accept it

Hon. Mr. POWER—Certainly.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understand that, but I hope they will accept it, and I was going to make a suggestion as to the right of the Senate to pass an amendment of this kind. If the lower House will accept it, it would get over the difficulty that presents itself to my mind. The passing of this resolution places an interpretation to the law which it does not legally bear at this moment, and consequently involves an additional payment of money from the public chest which we have no power to make. The point that suggests itself to my mind is whether, by putting an interpretation upon a clause of the law which it does not bear at the present moment—that interpretation increasing the expenditure from the public chest—whether the Senate has the power under the constitution to pass such an Act or to impose such an additional payment on the exchequer of the country. It may be considered perhaps only incidental, but it is beyond question increasing the expenditure of public money. Although the right hon. gentleman has protected himself by saying that he is not prepared to pledge himself that the government will accept it, I hope they will do so and if this interpretation be put upon the Act, I think the Senate, under the circumstances, would do well, from a constitutional standpoint, to pass it, and leave the responsibility with the government and the Commons to say whether it infringes their right.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—How about this date fixed for the salaries?

Hon. Mr. POWER—That was the date fixed by the Act of 1908? The salaries were based on the salaries as they existed on the 1st of September, 1908.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What about any intermediate action we have taken in increasing those salaries?

Hon. Mr. POWER—We have not increased them.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Classified them only.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I assume it would mean that the increases which have not been paid between September, 1908, and the present date, would be paid, because it is declaratory.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am not so much concerned about that as this: We fix the basis of salaries, and only authorize the Auditor General apparently to pay them on the basis of the salary as from that date. That is the only doubt in my mind about the meaning of the Act. I am heartily in favour of the amendment.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—While I am willing to except the amendment tentatively, I do not propose to press for the third reading of this Bill until Monday; in the meantime I have handed to the Minister of Finance a copy of the amendment and requested him to attend to it in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture who has special charge of this Bill. On Monday I will be able to speak definitely on the subject. Meantime, I think we can let it stand.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I was going to suggest to my hon. friend, in order to remove any doubt on the point I have mentioned, that it should provide that the salaries paid at the present time should be based on the salaries paid at the passage of this Act.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—The difficulty I have in understanding the amendment is that under the Act, section 37 is the only authorization for the increases to be made after the classification is once fixed, and that increase differs in the different divisions. The first division gets so much; the second division gets so much; the third so much, and so on. Now, if this is intended to give the Senate the right to increase salaries of the other officials of the Senate under section 37, it ought to be on classification that the salaries paid would entitle them to the increases that are covered by section 37, applying to the employees of the Senate whose salaries entitled them to the advantage of increase. But, in the absence of that, while I am not opposing the suggested amendment, the only difficulty I have had is to comprehend its application and meaning, to work out what is suggested.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think hon. gentlemen are, perhaps, likely to forget that this amendment is proposed to appear as if it were part of the Act of 1908. It is adding a subsection to section 45 of that Act, and provides that salaries may be paid based on the salaries of officers as they existed or were fixed on the first day of September, 1908. That was the way we did in the original Act of 1908, and I do not think there is any difficulty about it that way. With respect to the constitutional question raised by the hon. member from Hastings, I suppose there is no doubt that if the question were raised, and His honour the Speaker were called upon for a decision, he might be obliged to hold that this was, to a certain extent, a money Bill, although it is not voting any money directly. But if the Commons do not raise the question of our right, there is no reason why we should, and I think probably the Commons will not. It is a trifling matter, and there are certain officers of the Commons in a similar position and the Commons would not be likely to raise the constitutional question.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Bill was reported from committee as amended.

THE DEBATES OF THE SENATE.

Hon. Mr. COFFEE—I would ask leave to pass this next item, consideration of the report of the Standing Committee on Debates and Reporting.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I have an amendment to move to correct a clerical error in the report. The report is found at pages 879-880. The amendment is to strike out after the second line, the words 'When the Senate is sitting.' The first engagement of Mr. Cinq Mars was that he should only be paid when the Senate was sitting; and in the later years we have altered this report to read without this phrase.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This is going to involve some discussion.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I understand the French version of the report is correct, and the English version is wrong.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—That phrase must be struck out. I will move to that effect this afternoon.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The actual report, as I am informed, is correct in the French version, therefore it is merely a clerical error in the English edition.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—It does not require any amendment.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—If it has the consent of the House, the correction will be made.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But there are other matters in the report.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—There are other matters. Then it will stand over.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned to three o'clock.

SECOND SITTING.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

DEBATES AND REPORTING OF THE SENATE.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY moved the adoption of the second report of the Standing Committee on Debates and Reporting.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I move to correct a clerical error which appears in the English version of the report, but not in the French. The amendment is to strike out in the last line but one the words 'when the Senate is sitting'. When we first engaged Mr. Cinq Mars he was paid only during the time the Senate was sitting, but it was shown to the committee in the following session that it interfered very much with his work in the other House, and that he would require to be put on the same plane as Mr. Hannay as to his permanent remuneration. The Senate therefore decided to pay him, and have done so for the last two or three years.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But not during the recess between sessions of parliament?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the report were passed as printed, the reporter would not receive any remuneration during vacation. If we are to continue to have a reporter he must, of necessity, be here during the adjournments, so that under those circumstances, although he may have nothing to do and his time could not be utilized in the interest of the Senate and the country, still we have to pay him. I do not object to that, for the reason I have stated. But before adopting the report, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to what I consider a totally unnecessary expense. In what I say, I wish it to be distinctly understood that I am not complaining of the work performed by the reporter employed by the House to furnish the press report. I have upon a number of occasions gone to the clerk's office and examined the synopsis which has been prepared for publication by our reporter; and when I come to look at the newspapers I find that they scarcely ever utilize the whole of it, on many occasions taking no portion at all. When it is utilized it is very often mutilated in such a way that the senator who opened his mouth on the floor of the Senate really did not recognize his remarks as they appeared in the press. We have been in session about twenty-six weeks now, and are paying the reporter about $40 a week, and it is for the Senate to consider how far they are justified in paying $1,000 or $1,200 during a long session for really no return. The principal newspapers do not consider it of sufficient importance to publish reports furnished them by our press reporter at the public expense and why should the country continue to incur that expenditure? I remember that originally, I think probably when I was on that committee a good many years ago, I was the first to suggest the plan for furnishing a press report which is in existence at the present moment, and I did it for this reason: I thought it important that the proceedings of the Senate should be published in the principal newspapers in the country in order that the public should see that the senators were performing that service to the country which was expected of them; but year after year I have observed the newspapers pay no attention to it, and I have come to the conclusion that they do not appreciate that which they get for nothing. If they had to pay for the service, the probabilities are they would treat the Senate in the same manner as they do the House of Commons, and I cannot help thinking that we are not justified, for the reasons which I have advanced, in continuing the expenditure which has been incurred and which we now propose to continue. I wish to repeat that I am not to be understood as complaining of the manner in which the young gentleman who is employed on the staff performs his work. If the synopsis prepared by him were published daily in the papers, I think ample return would be given to justify the expenditure; but I cannot justify myself in continuing to support that expenditure of money under the circumstances I have laid before the House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY—There is much force in what the hon. gentleman from Hastings has said in regard to the reports of the proceedings of the Senate in the daily papers; but it might be well to remember that the House of Commons is treated almost in like manner. I have seen morning sittings, afternoon sittings and sittings far into the night in the House of Commons, and many of our principal daily papers in the country would next morning contain only a synopsis of a column or a column and a half or two columns. For my part, I should like to see a larger report of the proceedings of the Senate published in the press; those acquainted with newspaper work will realize the difficulty, particularly with the morning newspapers. At eleven or twelve o'clock at night important despatches come from all over the world at the time the proceedings of the Senate are received, and I suppose the editors consider the important news, such as wars and rumours of wars, of much more importance than the proceedings of the Senate. As a rule, many of the papers of the country are inclined to be fair to us, and give us such space as they can spare, considering the immense pressure on their space late into the night.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The chairman of the committee is quite right when he says that the newspapers give more attention to wars and rumours of wars than the proceedings of the Senate, because I have noticed in connection with the Senate itself that should the usual calm atmosphere of this House be disturbed by any friction between two members, the newspapers do not fail to give it a reasonable amount of publicity.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the hon. member thinks that a good reason for continuing the present expenditure, I have nothing to say.

Hon. Mr. ROY—I wish to suggest an amendment to this report. I may say that it was proposed by me in the committee and the chairman will bear me out in saying that it was viewed favourably by the committee. I propose to add after the words 'first rate experience' the following 'and reporting in both languages'. The reason for doing so is, I understand that in providing the sum of $10,000 for the reporters, they undertake to engage a new man at a salary of $2,100. I have inquired since if that amount of money will enable them to secure a first rate man who can report in both languages, and I understand that such a man can be secured at that figure.

Hon. Mr. POWER—My impression is that the senior reporter on the present staff is able to report in both languages; but he is not always in the Chamber when senators speak in French. I think the proposition is not an unreasonable one.

The SPEAKER—There is an amendment already before the House to the motion to adopt the report.

The amendment was adopted.

Hon. Mr. ROY—I now move my amendment.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Would not the hon. gentleman's object be attained as well by having a translation of the speeches made immediately afterwards. If it is made obligatory on the contractors to report both languages, it would necessitate the employment of another reporter who would have to sit at the table all the time in order to report gentlemen who addressed the House in French.

Hon. Mr. ROY—My amendment simply provides for the employment of a man who can report in both languages. It is only fair to those senators who wish to speak in French. I know for the price they will pay, $2,100, a first-class reporter able to report in both languages can be had.

Hon. Mr. COMEAU—I do not suppose it is necessary to say that the new man must report in both languages. All that is needed is that there shall be such a reporter on the staff.

Hon. Mr. ROY—My object is that a man capable of reporting in both languages shall be employed.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY—It is quite in order to attach the present amendment to the report. The other report of the committee, which will be taken up next week, deals with the present session's work.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—If the committee are making a contract with Messrs. Holland Bros. for another year, it must be a matter of conference between them and the committee. Would the agreement arrived at be affected by this amendment?

Hon. Mr. COFFEY—Not at all. The raising of the sum to $10,000 was with the understanding that another reporter would be added to the staff. It was considered that the staff, as at present organized, was rather weak, and our idea was to procure another first-class reporter, and one who can take speeches in both languages.

The amendment was adopted.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not intend to divide the House on the paragraph to which I have called attention; but if I should live to be here another year and we get no more return from the expenditure for the newspaper reports than we have had in the past, I give notice that I will test the opinion of the House upon the question of what I consider an unnecessary expenditure.

The motion was agreed to, and the report was adopted.

MINERAL RESOURCES OF CANADA.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. WATSON (in the absence of Hon. Mr. Domville) moved the adoption of the second and final report of the Special Committee on Mineral Resources. He said: The report has been edited by Mr. Dowling, of the Geological Bureau. I have made inquiries as to the estimated cost of printing 2,000 copies. The information I have received from the clerk, and the recent information obtained from the Printing Bureau, was that the cost would be in the neighbourhood of $700. The report will make a pamphlet of about 120 pages.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I see it is intended to print certain maps with the report. We know that the Department of the Interior have prepared maps covering almost every portion of the Northwest. Could not some of these maps be used and circulated with the pamphlet?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Maps are in existence, showing the coal areas of the west and the shale districts of New Brunswick. It is simply intended to utilize these and circulate them with the pamphlets. I ask to have the motion amended by striking out the word 'printed' and substituting the word 'annexed'.

The motion was agreed to, and the report as amended adopted.

CONTINGENT ACCOUNTS OF THE SENATE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON moved the adoption of the report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts of the Senate. He said: This report has been so long before the House, that no doubt hon. gentlemen are quite conversant with its contents. The first clause refers to providing stationery for the members of the Senate. Some new restrictions are recommended. The second and third paragraphs refer to an amount of $54 recommended to be paid Mr. Mullin, a stenographer who was employed in the Banking and Commerce Committee, when considering the Insurance Bill, and which your committee thought should have been provided by that committee by asking the Senate to permit them to make the expenditue. The chairman of the Banking and Commerce Committee expected to have been here and would have made some explanations on the subject. The stenographer was there at the suggestion of the committee, taking the evidence given as to the provisions of the Bill, which was subsequently printed and in reaching conclusions in respect to the Bill. I think possibly we are to be congratulated on that work, as I see the Commons have accepted the Insurance Bill as it left the Senate, with no important amendments.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—With some amendments.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—And we received some advantage from the reports of Mr. Mullin that were placed in our hands. The next section of the report is a recommendation that an allowance be made to Mr. Audet, special sessional messenger, for his services, his pay to be made the same as that paid to the person occupying a similar position in the House of Commons. That will increase his pay fifty cents a day. The clerk of the Senate has suggested, to make it more explainable, that in section 4 the words, 'during the present session,' be added. The fifth clause refers to an increase to be paid to W. G. Thompson, the electrician, for his services to the Senate, that it be the same as paid to the employee occupying a similar position in the House of Commons. That is an increase of 25 cents per day, and the same amendment has been suggested by the clerk, adding the words, 'during the present session.' The the House of Commons, and that Mr. Berubé be put in the same class as the person occupying a similar position in the House of Commons, and that Mr. Pelletier be appointed guardian of the wardrobe, and be placed in division C, subdivision 2, provided these two employees be entirely under the supervision of the Senate during and outside the session of the Senate. To this resolution, it has been suggested by the clerk that after the word Berubé, the words 'assistant to the curator of the reading room' be added. I might add that this position is, as far as as the employees of the Senate are concerned, somewhat in line with the disposition of the committee in dealing with the higher paid officers. The other day, by a vote off-hand, we added some $1,200 to the salaries of the higher paid officers, and I think the feeling of the Senate would be that the needs and requirements of other classes of employees in the Senate might be considered.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What change does this make with respect to those officers?

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—Fifty cents a day in the case of the first named, and twenty-five cents in the other cases.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I mean with reference to Berubé and Pelletier?

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—It is a new classification in respect to them. I don't know whether it makes any change; it does not recommend any; it recommends a classification which might permit the Senate, if it thought proper under that classification, to make additions to the salary.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If we put them on the same plane as the same officers in the Commons, then whatever their position is, would be the position of the Senate officers.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—It puts them on the same plane; but it does not state, as the previous recommendations do, the same salary for the same position. Whether this practically carries the salary that goes with the position, I do not know. These are the special features of the report of the committee, which I have the honour of asking shall be adopted.

Hon. Mr. POWER—With reference to this last paragraph, I submit that the Senate have not the power to adopt it, as it would be undertaking to deal with the salaries of our employees without regard to the Civil Service Act. If the amendment which the committee of this House adopted a little while ago should go into operation, then we would, perhaps, be in a position to pass resolutions of this kind; but at the present time I fear we cannot take one of our servants out of one class and put him into another, and provide that his salary shall be otherwise than the Civil Service Act prescribes. If the amendment which has been made is concurred in by the House of Commons, then these officers will get an increase of pay.

The SPEAKER—I would like to say something about this. I called the attention of the chairman of the committee to this matter. Is there any authority to place a messenger, or one of those who are in that class, in a subdivision at all, as the law now stands? Is it not quite clear, and was not that the rule that was adopted, and was not that the whole trouble with the Auditor General?

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—I might say with respect to the resolution that is moved, that hon. members of the Senate will notice it simply follows the practice of the House of Commons. In regard to the Act, the Speaker as the head of the department could better advise us as to our right to do this. I am simply bringing to the notice of the Senate the resolution that was moved by an hon. gentleman of the committee, and which was subsequently adopted by the committee. They ask to follow the practice of the House of Commons. Whether it comes strictly within the Act or not, it is a question that I am not discussing at all.

The SPEAKER—I think the chairman will bear me out that it was laid down with perfect clearness, that so far as the messenger class is concerned, there is no power under the Civil Service Act to place anybody in this position. Not only that, but promotions to this division can only proceed upon a certain recommendation, upon a report by the clerk, and a recommendation by the Speaker, and its adoption by the Senate either through its committee or otherwise. That is the procedure provided for in the transfer from one position to another, and this is a new departure which I think may lead to trouble.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—Perhaps his honour the Speaker will permit me to say that the classification presented last session to the Senate really confused the whole question, because these classifications were handed in to us without following the exact requirements of the Act. We were handed the classification in which several employees, who were not within the Act, were classified by the Senate. I am not going to say it was proper that it should be done in that way. I entirely agree with what the Speaker said. To read the Act, messengers and the lower grade of employees are excluded from the classification; but the resolution which the Senate is asked to consider is simply to follow the practice of the House of Commons. If there is a close adherence to the provisions of the Act, we should do nothing but what the Act says; if we do what the House of Commons has done, possibly we shall be exempted from the Act in that respect, or be permitted to do the same thing. That is the view entertained by the committee in making the report. I am merely bringing to the attention of the Senate a resolution which was passed and presented by the committee to approve or adopt.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think it is going to raise a new antagonism in which the Auditor General will certainly come out right, because he will point out that there is no power under the Civil Service Act for us to place people of a messenger class in the classification at all, and therefore, there will be trouble about the salary, and the Auditor General will be justified in refusing to pay, on the ground that we are adopting a provision which we had no power to adopt.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Would the recommendation of the Speaker not overcome the difficulty?

The SPEAKER—The procedure which the Civil Service Act provides is that the report shall be made by the clerk, whether it is made on the recommandation or otherwise of the Speaker, and the House adopts that.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Inasmuch as the sense of the House is that this increase shall be made, I suggest that the Speaker and the clerk make the recommendation in order to have it perfectly legal.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—I should like to ask if Mr. Berubé were designated assistant curator in the reading room, would he be regarded as a messenger under the resolution?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The resolution cannot change the law.

The SPEAKER—Where is the curator of the reading room classified at present?

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—He is not classified, but the resolution asks to have him classified as they have done in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. KERR—How is the curator at present classified in the report which has been adopted by the Senate? He has been classified in the messenger class, has he not?

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—Yes, but this report asks that the Senate reconsider the original classification. and take him out of the class of messenger and place him in the same classification as a similar employee in the House of Commons.

The SPEAKER—But this is the assistant curator?

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—Yes.

The SPEAKER—You would leave the curator out and put the assistant curator in?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The curator is in the proper place at the present time for receiving the money he is drawing.

Hon. Mr. Ross (Middlesex)—As the Senate has adopted that course we should not depart from it. The Civil Service Act says that these appointments shall be made on the recommendation of the clerk, approved of by the Speaker. I do not think this committee or the Senate can change the law.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is the objection raised by the Auditor General, and I think, as I said before, that if this House agreed to make an amendment to the Civil Service Act, and the Bill is accepted by the House of Commons, that will of itself place these men in their proper positions; but one of the strongest reasons for passing the Civil Service Act was that we should not be continually, without proper regard to all the circumstances, giving increases to different employees, and I think this last paragraph had better be omitted.

The motion was agreed to, and the report was adopted.

Bill (No. 25) An Act respecting the Water Carriage of Goods.—Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 192) An Act to amend the Fisheries Act.

(In the Committee.)

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The first subsection simply repeals the provision which prevents more than one trading vessel being employed at one factory. The Marine Department informs us that this is now considered inexpedient, and that it provides no more protection than if the trading companies used two boats at one factory.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (British Columbia)—The hon. gentleman knows as well as I do the great importance of the fisheries of the Dominion, and especially in British Columbia. A great deal has been done there to destroy the fisheries by the United States fishermen setting traps in the path of the salmon on the way from the ocean up to the rivers. How it is to be obviated I do not know. The Natural Resources Commission sit, I believe, this year, but whether they will be able to touch the matter of the conservation of our fisheries or not, I do not know. It is a serious injustice and a serious grievance now to the fishermen of Fraser river, who have conducted the greatest salmon industry of the Pacific coast for many years. Our people, trying to counteract the effect of the United States fishermen's traps, placed their traps further out. Of that the United States fishermen complained. Whether the international commission will try to obviate the difficulty, I do not know. The fisheries are of vast importance. In those traps the fishermen capture many thousands of salmon that they cannot use. They hold them in the traps and very few pass up to our rivers. Of course, the people of the state of Washington are not controlled very closely by their own laws, and they do not care what may happen to the fisheries so long as they get all the fish they want.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —This Bill does not affect that question at all.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This applies only to tidal waters, I believe?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —This refers simply to the question of whaling vessels. The existing law provides that the holder of any such licenses shall not operate more than one.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Has anything been done to settle the question of jurisdiction between the Dominion and British Columbia with respect to the fisheries?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I do not know much about the matter except this, that I understand both governments now issue licenses. I think each charges five dollars for a license, whereas before one charged ten dollars and divided it. I believe that a considerable sum is placed in the estimates of this session to reimburse the British Columbia government for sums alleged to be due to them; but as to the future, I cannot say. They are at present negotiating, I believe, with the Department of Marine.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will this Bill apply to all rivers under lease? This deals with fly fishing. What is the object of repealing section 22? Is it with the object of permitting fishing in other ways than those designated in the Act?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I am informed by the department that section 22 appears to take away from subsection 6 of section 47 much of its force. While the latter clause aims at the protection of all kinds of fish on their journey up stream to the spawning grounds, section 22 allows fly fishing for salmon in such places. It has been represented to the department that by taking advantage of this section, salmon are captured in large numbers at the foot of some of the rapids as they play around before making the ascent. As the clause, in this respect, conflicts with subsection 6 of section 47, they advise its repeal.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What jurisdiction does this government exercise in such streams as are leased, say, in New Brunswick and Quebeec?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The question is rather a moot one. As far as I can understand the position, it would be something like this: that we have the power of regulating the taking of the fish, the putting of restrictions thereon, but not of exacting fees, which are said to belong in most cases to the province.

The clause was agreed to.

On clause 7,

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What is the object of suspending the right to fish within those hours?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The change in subsection 14 of section 47 is to allow the effective closing of such fishing engines as pound nets and weirs during the close time, so that fish cannot enter them at all, instead of making an opening therein to allow the fish to pass out after they have entered. It has been pointed out that the closing of pound nets is the system adopted in the state of Washington, and such has also been found convenient and effective in New Brunswick weirs. That is the reason which has induced the department to ask for this change.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I thought the fish were insisting on the observance of the Lord's Day Act.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—No, I think it is simply with reference to the cultivation of fish.

The clause was agreed to.

On clause 14,

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask my right hon. friend what was the International Fisheries Commission? Who constituted it? I do not recollect for the moment. It refers to clause 14 being adopted under a treaty signed at Washington on the 11th April, 1908.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I have before me a copy of the treaty which was made upon the subject.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I have a copy of the return in my hand. Mr. Prince was the Canadian commissioner, and Mr. Jordan the American commissioner.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The treaty which regulates this was signed between Her Majesty's ambassador, and the president of the United States, in April, 1908. I have the various articles here. They are somewhat lengthy, though, and would probably not add very much to the information before the House.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—If my right hon. friend would permit me, though I do not know that it is absolutely germane; I should like to draw his attention to one portion of these international regulations which have been adopted, particularly to section 5 relating to the pollution of waters:

> No person shall place or pass, or allow to pass, into treaty waters any substance offensive to fishes, injurious to fish life or destructive to fish fry or to the food of fishes or of fish fry, unless permitted so to do under any law passed by the legislative authority having jurisdiction.

My right hon. friend might consider this regulation sufficient authority to suggest the appointment of an international commission in reference to the pollution of waters applicable to humanity.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I am afraid some governments take more care of fishes than of people.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I was hoping that there would have been in this Bill an amendment to the Fisheries Act providing for a case which has arisen in the province from which I come. The case arises from the fact that there is an old dam which prevents the fish from getting up the waters resorted to for spawning. A question has arisen as to the ownership of the mill, and I know that in one case at any rate, the action of the department would not allow the fish to go up to spawn on account of the fact that the officers did not know who owned the mill and the dam. I was hoping there would have been some clause in this Bill which would have provided for such a case. If the right hon. minister in charge has no objection, I would ask that the Bill be allowed to stand over until Monday, and we may be able to submit an amendment which will possibly commend itself to the good sense of the Senate.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I will do that, not guaranteeing, however, that it will commend itself to the bad sense of the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. WATSON, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES INVESTIGATION ACT.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 198) An Act to amend the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 2,

2. Subparagraph (b) of paragraph 2 of section 15 of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:—

(b) A statutory declaration setting forth that, failing an adjustment of the dispute or a reference thereof by the minister to a board, to the best of the knowledge and belief of the declarant a lockout or strike will be declared, and (except where the application is made by an employer in consequence of an intended change in wages or hours proposed by the said employer) that the necessary authority to declare such lockout or strike has been obtained; or, where a dispute directly affects employees in more than one province and such employees are members of a trade union having a general committee authorized to carry on negotiations in disputes between employers and employees and so recognized by the employer, a statutory declaration by the chairman or president and by the secretary of such committee setting forth that, failing an adjustment of the dispute or a reference thereof by the minister to a board, to the best of the knowledge and belief of the declarants a strike will be declared, that the dispute has been the subject of negotiations between the committee and the employer, that all efforts to obtain a satisfactory settlement have failed, and that there is no reasonable hope of securing a settlement by further negotiations.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would like to ask my right hon. friend what is the object of this amendment?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—This was asked for by the trades unions, alleging that the Act as it then stood put certain difficulties in their way with respect to dealing with these industrial disputes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I don't understand the exception there. It would almost look to me that this is not applicable where there is a trades union; that is to say, the setting in motion of the machinery of the Act.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Well, this is what they asked for. They may be unwise in asking for it, I cannot answer for that.

Hon. Mr. BAIRD, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was read the third time, and passed.

CIVIL SERVICE ADMINISTRTION COMMITTEE.

THIRD REPORT ADOPTED.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved the adoption of the report of the Standing Committee on the Civil Service Administration. He said: This report will be found at page 880 of the Minutes. It is a somewhat long report, but with the permission of the House I shall confine myself to just reading the paragraphs of the report, and not making an explanation, and hon. gentlemen may consider this my speech. The report is as follows:

The committee have had under consideration the subject of allowances to persons ceasing to be employed in the public service of the Dominion and to the dependents of such persons, and have agreed to report and do report thereon as follows:—

1. The first question to be considered is whether or not it is desirable that there should be a system of superannuation.

The reasons for an affirmative answer were given very clearly and tersely by Dr. Farr in his evidence before the Select Committee of the English House of Commons in 1856. He said:—

'Experience has shown that there are great advantages attending the present mode of remunerating public servants, partly by salaries and partly by superannuation. . .. .They are such as have led almost all the nations of Europe to adopt the system of paying partly by superannuation allowances. In the first place it is a guarantee of fidelity; in the second place, it encourages efficient service; in the third place, it retains good men in the service; in the fourth place, it induces men to retire when they have become old or inefficient from any cause; and in the fifth place, it prevents old public servants from falling into a state of disgraceful dependence, or of distressing destitution, which would be a public scandal, and might deter young men from becoming candidates for office. These advantages appear to me to be so great that I should very much regret to see the system of superannuation abolished.'

The like reasons are given at greater length in the report of the Royal Commission on superannuation, appointed in 1857, upon which the English Act of 1859, still in force with certain amendments, was based. They are repeated in the evidence before the select committee of the Commons in 1873.

The experience of Canada strengthens the impression created by that of England. To ignore every other aspect of the matter, the services of many most valuable servants of the public have been transferred to private employers and have been lost to the country, where they would probably have been retained had a satisfactory system of superannuation been in force.

We find too that the banks, the railway companies and other great business corporations have been obliged, in order to secure and retain the services of the competent and reliable men, to introduce retiring allowances coupled with provisions for the widows and children of their employees. The government is by far the largest employer of permanent hands in the country: and if it is to be faithfully, cheerfully and effectively served, must do as other great employers. This necessity is emphasized by the disinclination, which we learn from the last report of the existing Civil Service Commission, is shown by properly qualified young men,—their qualification being shown by passing a reasonable examination—to enter the public service.

Your committee, therefore, have no hesitation in declaring that a system of superannuation is, in the public interest, not only desirable but absolutely necessary.

I move the adoption of that paragraph.

The motion was agreed to.

Paragraph two of the report reads as follows:

2. Before undertaking to submit a scheme of their own, the committee think it well to state briefly the existing conditions under the Superannuation Act of 1880, which, with certain amendments, was in force until the first of July, 1898, . . . a deduction at first of two per cent and after the first of April, 1893, of three and a half was made from the yearly salary of every officer, which deduction was continued for thirty-five years if the officer remained so long in the service, and upon his retirement he received a superannuation allowance of one-fiftieth of his average salary received during the last three years of his service for each year thereof, such allowance in no case to exceed thirty-five-fiftieths of such salary. Upon his death the allowance ceased, and nothing was thereafter paid to his widow, children or personal representatives. The system was defective, because not more than fifteen per cent of the contributors lived to become beneficiaries; because there was nothing for the families either of those who survived to the pensionable period or of those who failed to so survive, and because the unexpended balance of the servant's contributions remained in the consolidated revenue fund. One man in six or seven might live to enjoy a pension for a few years; but if a servant died, whether in harness or after retirement, there was no provision whatever for his family. Of the objectionable results of this system we have had many melancholy instances.

With a view probably to remedy in some degree the defects of the superannuation law, the Act respecting Government Civil Service Insurance was passed in 1893. This Act was intended to provide for the widows and children of civil servants who availed themselves of its provisions. The number who have done so is exceedingly small, possibly owing to the fact that the largest amount for which insurance can be effected is two thousand dollars.

The Civil Service Retirement Act of 1898, which came into operation on the first of July in that year, provided that there should be a deduction of five per cent from the yearly salary of every person becoming a member of the Civil Service after that date; and that upon retirement from the service or death his contributions with interest at four per cent compounded half-yearly should be paid to himself or his legal representatives, as the case might be. Provision was also made for taking into account previous payments into the superannuation account. This Act while partially removing one defect in the then existing law, by giving the servant's contributions and interest thereon to himself or his dependents or heirs, made very insufficient provision for the contributor and his family. It did less than life insurance, and really amounted to a compulsory deposit of five per cent of salary in a savings bank. On the other hand, inasmuch as the contributor is allowed to withdraw his deposits with compound interest at any time, this enactment has had no effect in restraining civil servants from quitting the government employ. The existing laws with respect to the subject matter of this report are, as has been pointed out, defective in their operation. They are also unduly limited in their application. They apply only to what is known as the inside service and to certain members of the outside service who are employed in the Departments of Customs, Inland Revenue and Post Office. There does not seem to be any substantial reason why outside members of the staffs of the Public Works, Marine and Fisheries, Agriculture and other departments should be placed on a different and inferior footing to those of the three first mentioned: and in the opinion of the committee the benefits of any new system of providing for retired civil servants and the families of those deceased should extend to all bona fide permanent officers and employees of the public service of Canada.

I move that this paragraph be adopted.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I desire to say a few words on this clause. I do not think there is any person who has occupied a humble position in the House of Commons, who gave more care to the superannuation system, which was abolished some years ago, than I did. Our superannuation system, which was then in force, was prostituted to serve party ends. In the first place, there were men on the superannuation list who had served only two or three years, and were placed on that list, and for the balance of their lives drew handsome allowances. Other men, who contributed very small sums to the superannuation fund, were superannuated, and lived to old age drawing an immense amount of money. If a well regulated superannuation system were adopted, that would deal fairly with the service, and would not be abused as the old age system was, it might possibly accrue to the benefit of the entire service, both inside and outside, and do justice to many faithful servants who have been long in the employment of the country; but it should be a system very different to the one we have. We require a system that will be superintended by some Civil Service board who will see that when men enter the service they will be required to contribute a certain percentage of their allowance every year more than they contributed before, and the government should add something thereto; that the fund will be not absolutely separate, and then the enormous loss to which the country was subjected will not be repeated. Every year some $250,000 to $300,000 was paid out, over and above the receipts that were gathered from those who contributed to the superannuation fund. That kind of a system, in my humble judgment, the people of this country will not support. The Civil Service of Canada are well paid. There is no class of men in the country better paid for their services than the civil servants. Take teachers, ministers, and others, and if you add up the amounts paid to the Civil Service, you will find that, as a whole, the Civil Service receives remuneration equal or larger than any of the others. I admit that when an employee of the government serves until he is old, it is in the interest of the country that some provision should be made for him; that he should not be turned out and left to die of neglect. It is well that something should be provided, but I think they should be required out of the ample allowance they get to make a larger provision for themselves than they do. When they look forward to superannuation, they are very apt to squander what they have instead of putting something past to depend upon when they get up in years. We know that the civil servants of this city, in many cases are very extravagant people, living beyond their means. Many are induced to do so in the hope that they will be placed on the superannuation list. In many cases, I have no doubt it prevents men from prudently setting aside from month to month, and year to year, a portion of their salaries to rest upon when old age overtakes them, or on which their families could live.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—I remember two very glaring cases that took place on the Intercolonial railway. One was that of Alexander McNab, the chief engineer, who was retired about 1879 or 1880, on an allowance of $1,600 per year. He was retired at the age of 46, and lived in London for 25 years after. Another was Thomas Hood, who was retired about the same time, at the age of 44, on an allowance of $1,100 a year. He lived and died in the United States. I think these are two of the most glaring cases I ever heard of.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Clause 3 reads as follows:

It being clear then that a system of superannuation accompanied by allowances for the widows and young children of public servants should be introduced, the question naturally arises, should the beneficiaries contribute or should they not?

The contributory system reduces the drain on the public treasury to a comparatively low figure. It is the more manly, and best calculated to preserve the self respect of the civil servant. The fact that his own money is involved tends also to make him less likely to quit the service. On the other hand, where there is no contribution and the state bears the whole expense, while the cost to the public is much increased, the beneficiaries are not better satisfied than where they contribute, because they become convinced, as has been the case in England since 1859, that the retiring allowances are taken into consideration when their salaries are fixed, so that the pension is looked upon as being really deferred pay.

Dissatisfaction with the Act of 1859, the law which substituted a non-contributory for a contributory system, has often found expression in England. It may be well to make two short citations from the mass of evidence to this effect. We quote first from the report of a parliamentary committee appointed in 1885. The committee were—'of opinion that all persons hereafter appointed to the service of the Crown, whether civil or military whose service at present counts towards pension, should contribute towards that pension by a percentage deduction from salaries or pay. The steady and rapid growth of the pension list points to a proximate revision of the entire policy of burdening the public with the provision of pensions; the enterprise of private individuals and firms indicates the advantage of self-help as a condition of employment (which it might be proper to supplement with state help); and your committee recommend that not only in service counting under the present system towards pension, but also in the police and other unpensioned branches of the public service, contribution to a pension fund should be made obligatory.'

In his evidence before the Ridley Commission in 1886, Sir Algernon West said,—'I should be very much inclined, if you ask my opinion, to say that I think it would be a very fair thing to revert five per cent deduction from salaries for pensions, thereby reducing the charge of superannuation on the state, but with the distinct understanding that these deductions should be absolute property of the person who pays them.'

In an able report furnished by the Bureau of Labour at Washington, to the United States Senate in January last, Mr. Herbert D. Brown dealt with civil service retirement in Great Britain and in New Zealand. One conclusion which Mr. Brown draws from the history of English superannuation schemes is that,—'The logical plan is to adopt a contributory plan, since a pension system is certain to be treated as a contributory system, and since pension system is far more costly. It is better then, to adopt a contributory plan in the beginning, worked out on scientific lines, with a definite relationship between contributions and benefits to make it equitable between all classes of employees.'

He also says on page 157 of his report:—'Provision should be made for the refund of contributions in case of separation from the service, whatever the cause. The lack of this provision in the Act of 1834 was felt to be a hardship and an injustice. The forfeiture of contributions was especially resented when employees died while in the service.'

It may be said here that the Canadian Act of 1880 was substantially a copy of the English Act of 1834, and it may be added that private corporations in some cases forfeit the contributions of servants who quit their service for other employment.

Mr. Brown's account of New Zealand's experience shows that the newest Dominion began in 1858 with a straight pension system such as that introduced in England by the Act of 1859: that after thirteen years trial it was abandoned as involving too heavy a charge on the public treasury: that from 1871 to 1886 the colony 'contented itself with making gifts of lump sums to each employee retiring from the service, basing the amount of the gift on the length of service.' The Act of 1886, substantially identical with the Canadian Law of 1898, 'authorized deductions (of five per cent) from salaries, and was simply a scheme of compulsory savings established with the idea that the superannuated employee must be taken care of but at his own and not at the public expense.'

This Act continued in force until 1893 when it was succeeded by a Civil Service Insurance Act, like the Canadian Law of the same year, except that it was compulsory upon all persons entering the service and not above forty years of age.

Finally, in 1907, a contributory retirement plan with a subsidy from the government was adopted. This plan, permitting continuance of insurance in the Government Life Insurance Department if the employee so desires, affords adequate provision for every possible contingency in the life of the civil employee. Mr. Brown closes his observations on the existing New Zealand system as follows:—

Certain details of the plan are worthy of note by the student. There is no compulsory age of retirement, notwithstanding England's experience that the absence of such provision is inadvisable. Provision is made for the cash refund of contribution on separation from the service, but interest on them is forfeited—an offset to the liberality of the benefits provided for those who remain in the service. The retiring allowance is based on the salary during the last three years of service rather than on the average salary. These are features the wisdom of which can be determined only by experience.

New Zealand's experience in retiring its civil employees is especially instructive for two reasons, first, because of the variety of experiments made, and, second, because the final conclusion rests on theoretical principles generally acknowledged to be sound and yet in actual practice 'more honoured in the breach than in the observance.'

It may be added that the rate of deduction under the New Zealand Act of 1907 is four per cent.

The contributory system is that adopted by the banks and by the great majority of business corporations; it is that recommended by the Canadian Civil Service Commissions of 1892 and 1907; and it has been adopted and found to work satisfactorily in the cases of the permanent militia, the Northwest Mounted Police and the employees of the government railways. Contribution, too, has been a feature of every law heretofore passed by parliament with respect to the retirement of civil servants. If under the proposed new Act, contributions were abolished as to civil servants as a class, it would almost as a matter of course have to be discontinued as to militia, police and railway employees. The additional charge upon the public treasury, without any corresponding benefit, which would be involved in such discontinuance, furnish a substantial argument in favour of the retention of the contributory system.

Your committee have no hesitation in expressing the opinion that any system of superannuation should be based on the principle of contribution.

I move that that clause be adopted.

The motion was agreed to, and the clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Paragraph 4 of the report reads as follows:

4. Your committee do not feel warranted, nder all the circumstances, in discussing those provisions of the existing law in which they propose no change; and, even where alterations are deemed desirable, their observations must be brief.

The method indicated by the Bill submitted with this report, by which persons heretofore appointed to the service can, if they choose, become beneficiaries under its provisions are identical in principle with sections of the Militia Pensions Act and the Northwest Mounted Police Act, which have been regarded as fair and reasonable, and which are said to work satisfactorily.

I move the adoption of that paragraph.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Paragraph 5 reads as follows:

5. The age of seventy is fixed as the limit beyond which no servant can be retained. Under the existing law there is a discretion on the part of the government to superannuate a servant at the age of sixty but no maximum age upon the attainment of which retirement is absolutely prescribed. Sixty-five is usually the maximum elsewhere; but considering the healthfulness of the Canadian climate and the exceptional vigour shown by members of the service who have passed that age, your committee, while deeming it desirable that a period should be fixed at which an employee's official life should end, think that the public interests will be served if the government are allowed to retain his services up to the age of seventy. It must be borne in mind that the government may retire a civil servant at sixty, and that such servant may retire of his own motion at sixty-five.

I move the adoption of the paragraph.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Paragraph 6 reads as follows:

6. Your committee are of opinion that the employee whose years of service are added to should contribute to the treasury the amount which he would have paid had he actually served during the additional period.

That means that, if ten years' service be added, he must contribute as though he had served ten years.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I may remark for the information of the House that while the law continues to allow ten years to be granted, it has not been granted once, to the best of my recollection, during the last fourteen years. It has practically been allowed to lapse. I think there is but one case.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Would this recommendation carry with it compound interest on the amount, or simply the three, or four, or five per cent that he would have paid had he taken superannuation at the beginning, or is that a matter of arrangement? This makes the provision that, if an officer who has been in the service for some years, be placed upon the superannuation list, he should pay the amount that he would have paid had he been upon the superannuation list from the time of his appointment. Would that include interest?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I should say it would, because wherever there is any doubt as to the meaning of the Act, the Governor in Council is given power to solve the doubt, and under the Act of 1898, on the contribution of servants who had been under the Superannuation Act, interest was allowed and compound interest was allowed on the contribution under the Act of 1898. I move that this paragraph be adopted.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Paragraph 7 reads as follows:

7. Clause 16 of the Bill herewith submitted provides that time spent in the service as a temporary employee shall be allowed to count for a servant, on condition that he contributes for such time as though he had been during that time a permanent employee. This seems a reasonable concession.

This seems a reasonable concession, and I may say that the expression from the Civil Service Commission seemed to indicate that they considered it a reasonable provision too. I move that this paragraph be adopted.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Paragraph 8 reads as follows:

8. Clause 19 changes the existing law and provides that if a contributor dies before superannuation, leaving no widow nor any child under the age of eighteen surviving him, the amount of his contributions to the consolidated fund without interest, shall be paid to his heir or personal representative. In the cases of persons subject to the provisions of the Superannuation Act those contributions are now forfeited, while in the cases of those serving under the Retirement Act of 1898 the repayments are to be made with interest. It is submitted that, where there is no widow nor any children under eighteen, there is no obligation on the state, on the ground of humanity, to pay interest to full grown children or next to kin. The benefits accruing to public servants under this Bill are so considerable as to justify the state in any such case in witholding interest.

I move the adoption of this paragraph.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Paragraph 9 reads as follows:

9. The provisions made in the Bill for the widows and children of contributors are, in the opinion of your committee, fair and reasonable. They are not quite as liberal towards the children as those of some of our banks and other business corporations; but on the other hand, they are much more generous than those made by the New Zealand statute of 1907, and by certain business institutions.

There is no change in the Bill submitted by the Commission of 1907 in that respect. I move the adoption of this paragraph of the report.

The motion was agreed to.

On clause 10.

10. The deduction of five per cent is one per cent greater than that provided for in the New Zealand Act, but the benefits to the contributors are much greater than under that Act. The deduction is the same as that recommended in England by the Ridley Commission of 1886; and is also identical with that prescribed by the Canadian Retirement Act of 1898, and by the Militia Pensions Act and the Northwest Mounted Police Act. The balance of convenience is altogether in favour of the rate mentioned in the Bill; and it will also have the effect of increasing the sum payable in certain cases of death before superannuation.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The Minister of Finance makes good whatever the deficiency may be.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask my hon. friend how would those percentages work out with the annuity system which we have? If those percentages were applied in the purchase of an annuity, on the basis of the amount to which the officer would be entitled, would they approach the basis on which our annuity system is fixed?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—They would be a little more liberal if my memory serves me right.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—In that connection, it just occurred to me, why could not the annuity system be applied to the working out of the superannuation system, such as has been indicated in this report.

Hon. Mr. POWER—You mean a compulsory annuity system?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, instead of its being paid by way of superannuation, could not this percentage be paid into the annuity fund, and an annuity paid to the servant upon the expiration of his time, or to his family, as the case might be?

Hon. Mr. POWER—That would provide a pension for the widow.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, the annuity might be payable to the widow. We have a somewhat similar provision already under the Annuity Act.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—My hon. friend will notice that the Annuity Act is absolutely self-sustaining on the basis of the four per cent allowed to depositors. The only contribution allowed to it by the state is the undertaking to take charge of the administration of the annuities branch.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I understood from my hon. friend, in his explanation of the Bill, that the percentage imposed upon the civil servants would substantially make an allowance for him.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Not without some considerable contribution by the state.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But, it would not be of a substantial character, would it?—that is the amount contributed by the government?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think it would.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The annuity system would not give such liberal provision to the retired employee, nor to his widow and children as this Bill provides.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Might I just say in connection with that, that what suggested it to my mind was the statement made by my right hon. friend, either this session or last, that a number of companies, or large employers of labour, had considered the propriety of availing themselves of this annuity system instead of adopting a superannuation system such as obtains in many large corporations. Has that been carried out to any great extent?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Certain amendments have been made to the Act this very session for the purpose of enabling the employers to avail themselves of it. I am in hopes that a good many of them will do it, but the idea there, I may say to my hon. friend, is that, in the case of elderly employees, the employers might choose, and probably would choose, to contribute what they were able to put in. You see the leading idea of the annuity system that I introduced a couple of years ago was to induce men at a comparatively early age to avail themselves of it. Some of them are doing so—not as many as I would desire, but still a considerable number. But in the case of the elderly employee, say, over the age of 40, it would be generally desirable that his employer should assist him, and a good many of them have intimated their willingness to do so, with certain amendments to the Act which have just been made. I think you will be able to bring a good many of them under those amendments?

The clause was agreed to.

On clause 13.

13. Your committee are disposed to be of the opinion that the condition and importance of the civil service are realized by only a small proportion even of those concerned in the government of the country. There still lingers an impression, handed down from earlier days, that as a class civil servants are paid handsome salaries, that their work is little more than nominal, and that they have much leisure time on their hands which they do not always put to the best use. Whatever foundation there may have been thirty or forty years ago for this impression, the members of your honourable House know that the present time, with possibly a very few exceptions, it is altogether incorrect. If the public service were a lotus-eater's paradise there would not be such difficulty in securing young men to occupy it, nor would so many quit it for other fields of employment.

The administration of the laws of Canada is in the hands of her public servents; and whatever wisdom and pains parliament may devote to the framing of laws, both are largely wasted if the laws be not carried out by capable and devoted administrators. It is of the utmost consequence that the public service be made reasonably attractive, and your committee feel that some such measure as the Bill herewith submitted has become necessary in the interests of the country as well as in those of the civil servants.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would suggest to my hon. friend the impropriety of putting that clause in the report. What good object is it going to serve? It commits us to saying that we have not properly realized the value of the civil service, and it is in fact a reflection on the public men of Canada, almost every sentence of it.

Your committee are disposed to be of the opinion that the condition and importance of the civil service are realized by only a small proportion, even of those concerned in the government of the country.

And again:

There still lingers an impression, handed down from earlier days, that, as a class, civil servants are paid handsome salaries.

So they are in many cases, considering the work they do.

That their work is little more than nominal.

Well, I do not know that I have that idea. In many casses their work is only nominal; it is in many cases substantial. In fact it is an expression that we have not a proper appreciation of the civil service.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Go on; read on.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—(Reading):

And that they have much leisure time on their hands which they do not always put to the best use.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Read the next sentence.

Hon Mr LOUGHEED—(Reading).

Whatever foundation there may have been thirty or forty years ago for this impression the members of this House know that at the present time, with possibly a very few exceptions, it is altogether incorrect.

I am not prepared to subscribe to that.

Hon. Mr. POWER—With only a few exceptions.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes.

If the public service were a lotus-eater's paradise, there would not be such difficulty in securing young men to occupy it, nor would so many quit it for other fields of employment.

It is a reflection upon the civil service; it is a reflection upon the public men of the country in their not properly grappling with the question. It seems to me to be a reflection all round, and I fail to see any good purpose it is going to serve. For instance, if during the session I desired to express myself on the civil service, I find that I have subscribed to all these reflections, both on myself, and on the civil service, and I am handicapped thereby.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am not wedded to that particular expression. The first part of the paragraph is the one that contains the objectionable matter. The hon. leader of the opposition has no objection to the latter paragraph beginning, 'The administration of the laws of Canada.'

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—Cut out that first part of clause 13.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the hon. gentleman moves that the first part of clause 13 be struck out, I have no objection.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved that the first paragraph of clause 13 be struck out beginning, 'Your committee are disposed,' and ending 'other fields of employment.'

The amendment was adopted.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved the adoption of the report, and that the Bill submitted thereupon be recommended for the favourable consideration of the government.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I suppose that recommendation should come when we deal with the Bill on Thursday next.

The motion was agreed to.

ESCHEATS BILL.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (No. 206) An Act respecting Escheats. He said: The object of this Bill is as follows: At this present moment, in several of our provinces, notably Manitoba, Alberta, Saskatchewan, the Yukon, and Northwest Territories, the escheats go to the Dominion of Canada, and in the Yukon and Northwest Territories the personal property of those who die without leaving relatives likewise goes to the Crown. The object of the legislation proposed to be enacted is, as is done in England, and, by reason of statute is done in the province of Ontario, to give to the Crown the power to grant the whole or a portion of the property coming to the Crown to those who have a moral or natural claim on the deceased intestate, or rewards to those who may have happened to discover the property to the Crown. As an illustration of the need of some legislation of the kind, the Department of Justice has called our attention to the fact that a sum of over $47,000 was recently paid into the treasury, the proceeds of the estate of a man named Montgomery, who died at Regina. He was himself illegitimate and left no heirs. A number of claims have been made against the estate. These have been considered, but if any are to be entertained, the money could not be paid except by this legislation or by a special vote of parliament.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Where was the estate?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —In Regina.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Can my hon. friend say how it is that property escheats to the Crown, as represented by the provincial governments in certain provinces, and in those western provinces escheats to the Crown, represented by the federal authorities?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I merely give the statement, on the authority of the Department of Justice, that it is so.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The reason is that Canada owns the public lands in the western provinces.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I do not think that would make any difference.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It makes a difference in this way. The Dominion grants land to a man in the west. The grant comes from Canada, and, if that man dies, leaving no representative, then the land reverts to the party from whom it came, and that is the Crown in the right of Canada. In the eastern provinces, the land is granted in the first instance by the province, in the name of the Crown.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—My hon. friend is mistaken, as a matter of law. When once property passes out of the Crown, and becomes, as in this case, the property of an individual, it comes under provincial jurisdiction. The case in question was one, I take it, which occurred before the provinces were formed, at a time when they were still unorganized territories.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I think it will be seen, when we take up the Bill in committee, that it is purely permissive, and does not conflict in any way with any rights that the provinces may possess.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There is nothing objectionable in the Bill. The only difficulty that weighs in my mind is the assumption of escheats by the federal government without in any way stating where the property might territorially be.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I am not prepared to give the why and wherefore. It may be with reference to properties which accrued before the establishment of those provinces. When we come to consider it in committee I think the Bill will be found, as my hon. friend says, to be quite unobjectionable.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Bill.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT from the committee reported the Bill without amendment.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I move that the Bill be read a third time on Monday, at the first sitting.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask my right hon. friend to obtain on Monday additional information on that question as to how the federal parliament assumes authority to deal with escheats. There may be judicial authority for it. If there is, I am unfamiliar with it. The matter did come before the courts on one occasion; but I cannot imagine land escheating to the federal government within the provinces.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I will endeavour to obtain the information; but I may observe to my hon. friend, what he must have no doubt noticed, that this does not attempt to confer any authority on the government. It is merely in cases where it is found they did escheat to the Crown.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I can understand its arising in the unorganized territories and the Yukon district.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —It is merely intended to affect those, no doubt.

The motion was agreed to.

JUDGES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (No. 207) an Act to amend the Judges Act. He said: This Bill sufficiently explains itself. The legislatures of Manitoba and Quebec passed Acts requiring additions to their judiciaries. According to the British North America Act, the government accepts their decisions and, provides salaries.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What additions are there to the judges in Quebec?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Three additional judges.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What is the present salary of a Superior Court judge?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —$7,000.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does this not increase it?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Has there been any attempt on the part of the department to re-arrange the circuits in the province of Quebec?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I think that is absolutely controlled by the province. We have the right of appointment, and have to provide the salaries; but we have nothing to do with the distribution.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I remember it was discussed when one or two new judges were appointed for Quebec. A suggestion was made by the Attorney General, T. Chase Casgrain, that there should be some re-arrangements and change in the law as to the disposition of those judges, in order that in some districts, where there was really no work to do, they might be transferred to a place like the cities of Quebec or Montreal where the judges were overworked. I remember distinctly there were one or two cases given where the judge persisted in living in Quebec, while the law really provided he should live in Rimouski, and that, during the whole year, there had been but one case entered for trial, and, rather than go to the expense of travelling from Quebec to Rimouski, or Gaspe, he actually paid the claim himself because it was easier and more economical for him to do so than to travel down to the district where the court had to be held. That was brought under the notice of the local legislature at the time, and I remember it being discussed in the Senate; but the old disposition of the judges under the law declared that they should live in certain localities, and certain districts, and the prejudice was so great against any change, that even this system under which judges were paid for doing nothing the whole year round, was not changed. What I wanted to ask the hon. gentleman was, whether that subject had been considered by either of the local governments, or the Dominion government, when the demand for the appointment of new judges came to be made? I understand what the constitution provides; but it does not make it compulsory, on the part of the Dominion government, to make appointments or to furnish the salaries, even though the local governments may recommend additional appointments. That is my recollection of the law as it stands, and I am confirmed in that by the fact that, in some cases, the Dominion government had delayed for some years before providing for the salaries of new judges that had been demanded on the part of the local government.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —That is quite correct. The British North America Act is in some respects an extraordinary hodge-podge as, no doubt, lawyers have discovered in many ways, and that is one of the most extraordinary provisions in it, the provision to which the hon. gentleman has alluded, that, while the Dominion government has the appointment of the judges, and while it provides their salaries, it has no authority whatever, per se, to decide what kind of courts they will have, or even to fix their number, or distribute them. All I can say is that the present Attorney General has been urgent, whenever he thought it was required, with the local legislature, to endeavour to induce them to distribute the judges, so that they might do the most work in the most expeditious and cheapest way. But, while we can delay, and have delayed where we thought the demand was unnecessary, still it is a very difficult thing to refuse to carry out for a long time the wishes of the provincial legislature in this matter, more especially in such a case as probably is the one in hand. In the district of Montreal I am advised—probably hon. gentlemen know better than I how the fact is—that there has been a very great congestion of work, and great difficulty in dealing with the cases before the courts, and that it was really necessary to strengthen the bench in that particular quarter.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—While there are other judges in other districts who have nothing to do.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —That may be the case. I am not prepared to affirm or deny. I recollect there were complaints made and something approaching to scandals in one or two cases, such as the hon. gentleman has referred to. I think that the grosser cases have been amended, but I am not able to state authoritatively on that point.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What authority fixes the residences of the judges?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The local governments. It is a purely local question. It is one of those cases where jurisdiction crops up, and this is, perhaps, one of the most difficult matters to deal with.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I desire to endorse what has just been said by the right hon. leader of the House. I have had personal experience for many years with the congestion of work in the city of Montreal, and I can speak from personal knowledge and observation of the necessity there is for the appointment of additional judges so far as the Montreal courts are concerned. I may also say that I quite concur with a good deal that has been said by my hon. and venerable friend from Hastings. There are many districts in Quebec where the work is not sufficient to occupy the time of the judge, and I may say that the same condition prevails in the province of Ontario. A great many of our county court judges in both provinces have very little to do. I am one of those who have felt for a long time that there ought to be some measure found, by which the work should be better apportioned among the judiciary in the two most populous provinces of Canada. It is a pity that so many of our men are idle, or practically so, a pity for them and a pity for the people that have to pay the salaries, and a pity for the administration of justice, because these men are away from large centres and have no opportunities of consulting with their brothers on the bench. They get into a rut. They not only do not add to their knowledge, but they forget what they have known, and I hope the provinces will take up the question. As the right hon. gentleman says, it is to the provinces we must look for a remedy, and I hope that the provinces will devise some means by which the work of the bench will be better apportioned.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I know that this matter has been exercising the present Minister of Justice very much, and he is most anxious to bring about a better condition of affairs, and is doing all in his power to accomplish it. I need not tell him that the local legislatures are very sensitive about interference on our part with their jurisdiction.

The SPEAKER—I think a way has been found to readjust the work in Ontario. The jurisdiction of the County Court judges has been largely increased for the very purpose of extending their business. They have a great deal of other work connected with municipal institutions thrown on them from time to time, so that, although a few years ago a good deal might have been said about the time lost by County Court judges, all that has been changed, and the judges have now a fair amount of work.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (British Columbia)—Is there any way in which the federal government can control the applications of provinces for judges?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—No, we have no control. The British North America Act puts it in the hands of the local legislatures.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill passed through its final stages.

CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (No. 209) An Act to amend the Canada Temperance Act. He said: This simply assimilates the law as affecting British Columbia to the law that now exists throughout the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (British Columbia)—I suppose the intention is to allow districts in British Columbia to take advantage of the Scott Act?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—The Act deals with counties and cities. There are no counties in British Columbia, just districts.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—Up to this time have districts been able to put the Canada Temperance Act in force?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Apparently so.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill passed through its final stages.

PRISONS AND REFORMATORIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (No. 217) An Act to amend the Prisons and Reformatory Act.

He said: This is a Bill drafted and brought in at the instance of the Attorney General of Manitoba. The object appears to be that, as the reformatory for boys which is referred to in the sections now about to be repealed, has ceased practically to exist, and instead have established an institution called an industrial home, where there are suitable buildings, and a farm is being maintained at Portage la Prairie, they wish this institution to be used instead of the reformatory.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. POWER—The existing section 139 says that if a boy who appears to be under the age of 16, is convicted of any offence, he can be sentenced to imprisonment for three months or not more than five years. Suppose the boy is convicted of murder, you would not send him to a a reformatory. He could be imprisoned.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—His sentence might be commuted by the government to imprisonment for life.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am speaking of confinement in the reformatory; this clause allows a boy who has committed a serious offence to be sent to this institution.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read the third time, and passed.

ANTI-COMBINES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (No. 101) An Act to provide for the investigation of combines, monopolies, trusts and mergers.

He said: This is a measure of considerable interest no doubt, and very considerable importance, and one which may in the long result have very considerable consequences in dealing with matters of trade and commerce, and more particularly with the combines and trusts which have grown up with great rapidity both here and in the United States. The House will remember that by a clause of the Tariff Act, certain provisions were made against combines which appeared to avail themselves of the Tariff Act in order to unduly enhance the prices of commodities to consumers. That Act, which is still on our statute-book, was found not to work practically to any appreciable extent. I think in a number of years—about ten or twelve—there was, to the best of my recollection, only one prosecution under it. That had reference, if I remember correctly, to the manufacture of paper in some form or other. Now, various complaints have been made to the government and various deputations have waited upon us, urging that some convenient and easy method should be afforded to the public for dealing with these combinations which they allege, rightly or wrongly, prevail extensively, and have done a very considerable amount of injury to the general public. The Bill in question proposes to deal with these as far as such things can be dealt with. The modus operandi that is suggested by the hon. the Minister of Labour is somewhat as follows. Any six persons who believe themselves aggrieved, or think that they have reason to suppose that a combination has been formed which has resulted in unduly increasing the price of various commodities, on making certain declarations before a judge of one of the higher courts, not before an ordinary magistrate or before a county judge, but before a judge of one of the higher courts, if they establish to the satisfaction of such judge a prima facie case, they will then be allowed to have a tribunal appointed for the purpose of investigating their complaints, which tribunal, I undertsand, is to be composed of three persons, one appointed at the instance of the complainants, one at the instance of the parties who are complained of, and a third, who must be a judge, to act as umpire in the matter.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—By whom is the judge appointed, by the government?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The judge would be appointed in the first instance, I think, by the two parties; but if they did not agree, then the matter would rest with the Minister of Labour, apparently, to appoint. Subsequently to that, the board of investigation would be established, as I say, consisting of three persons, one nominated on behalf of the party preferring the complaint, another nominated on behalf of the persons concerned in the alleged combine, and a third, who must be a judge, chosen by the foregoing, or in default of agreement to choose one, to be chosen by the Minister of Labour, to whom the administration of the Act is entrusted. The reasonable expenses in a matter of this kind will be borne by the Crown. There is a special provision that where the Minister of Labour thinks that the public interest requires it, he can ask the Minister of Justice to instruct counsel to conduct the investigation before such board. After that, it would be in the power of the government, if they were convinced that an undue abuse existed, and that a combination did form, under the existing law to modify the tariff in such a way as they thought best to do away with the abuse. That power would remain undisturbed. But also pretty considerable powers are given in the case of it being proven, which we will deal with when we go into Committee of the Whole, to punish parties who have been convicted of having formed a combination in restraint of trade. The main object of the Bill is, of course, to make it easier for parties who are agreed to have a full examination made into the case, and to cause full publicity to be given to the operations of the so-called combine. That, of course, being a pretty inquisitorial power, must be exercised with some discretion; but it is believed that by requiring these parties to make out a good case before a judge of one of the Superior Courts, there is not much risk that any serious abuse will arise; and as both parties will be heard before the board of arbitration, and as the chairman must be a judicial officer, it is believed that, on the whole, no injury to legitimate business or legitimate trade can occur. Precautions will be taken, as will be seen in examining the Act in detail, to prevent any improper disclosure of the business carried on by the party. I think in certain cases—I have not the exact clause at my hand, but it will appear in going through the Bill in detail—the presiding judge may require that information be given to him; but it will be given to him, as it is sometimes given, I believe, in the court, under seal, so to speak; that is to say, it will be for his private information alone, and will not be divulged to the public. Those are the main provisions contained in the Bill. Of course, it will be elaborated in considerable detail in going through committee.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is there any provision as to what number it will require to constitute a combination? Would two be a combination?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I am not quite certain about that. I do not think there is any limited liability clause.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (145) An Act to amend the Railway Act.—Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

Bill (163) An Act to amend the Volunteer Bounty Act, 1908.—Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

The Senate adjourned until Monday next at 3 o'clock.

THE SENATE.

MONDAY, May 2, 1910.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

COST OF CONSTRUCTION OF MILITARY FORTS AT BEAUMONT.

INQUIRY POSTPONED.

The order of the day being called:

1. How much have the works of construction of the military forts situated at Beaumont, near Quebec, cost up to this date?
2. Are the works in question finished?
3. If not, at how much is their completion valued?
4. What is the number of men actually employed on these works?
5. How much did the armament of these forts cost?
6. Are there any guardians appointed for the care of these forts?
7. Who are they and their annual salary?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I suppose the right hon. leader of the House is prepared to answer these questions?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—No. The information has to be obtained from Quebec, and the department have written asking for an answer to these inquiries.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman might hurry them up by telegram, as the matter is urgent at this particular time.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—We might tell them that if they want their supplies put through, they had better furnish the information.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Not only their supplies but their ammunition.

The order of the day was allowed to stand.

DISTRIBUTION OF BOUND STATUTES.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved:

That an order of the Senate do issue for a return showing for each of the last ten years the date of the prorogation of parliament and the date on which the bound statutes of the session were distributed.

He said: I am sorry I am not fortified with certain documents which I had desired to submit. Every hon. gentleman knows that while parliament is sitting we must spend our time here and devote a good deal of labour to perfecting measures that come before us, and, as a rule, these measures go into operation from the date on which they receive the assent of the Governor General. But these laws are rendered practically of very little use until they have been brought before the public. It is true that a certain number of the statutes are printed in the official 'Gazette' within a comparatively short time after the rising of parliament; but the great bulk of the public statutes do not come before the public until the bound volumes are distributed, and the matter which I think is to be particularly complained of is, that the time which elapses between the prorogation of parliament and the distribution of the public statutes is unduly long, in some cases nearly six months. In one case, either this session or last session, the statutes of the previous session were distributed only just at the beginning of the then current session. That is a most objectionable condition of things. I suppose it was with a view to a certain extent of minimizing the effect of such delay it has been the practice to publish some of the laws in the 'Canada Gazette'.

That is very good as far as it goes, but it is not nearly as good as it might be, for these reasons: that these laws which are published in the 'Canada Gazette' are not in the same form—I am speaking from the printer's point of view—as that in which they appear in the bound volumes, and, consequently, the type which is used in connection with the distribution of those acts in the 'Gazette,' has to be broken up and reset for the bound volumes. In the province of Nova Scotia, the public statutes are distributed just as they are here, in the 'Royal Gazette' of the province; but they are printed in the same form in which they appear in the bound volume, and within about three weeks after the prorogation of the local legislature the public Acts for the session are distributed in pamphlet form. My suggestion is that we should follow that practice, that immediately after prorogation the publication of the general Acts should be set on foot, and that they should be printed. Those that are published in the 'Gazette' should be printed in the same form in which they afterwards appear in the bound volumes; and if, when all the public Acts have been so printed, they are distributed in pamphlet form, we should have the published statutes of each session in about six weeks after prorogation I should say, instead of having to wait from four to six months. The wisdom of this view will, I think, commend itself to hon. gentlemen, and with these observations I move the resolution of which I have given notice.

The motion was agreed to.

THIRD READING.

NAVIGABLE WATERS PROTECTION BILL.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the third reading of Bill (No. 103) An Act to amend the Navigable Waters Protection Act.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask my right hon. friend, what action the government is taking with reference to this Bill, in view of the representations or protests which have been made against the Bill by the shipping interests of Montreal, by the Board of Trade, and on the merits of it alone?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I called the attention, as I mentioned, of the Department of Justice to the remarks of my hon. friend, but they seem to consider that the wording of the Act would meet the case that he had put. I did not quite catch what he was referring to about the board of trade.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—With all due deference to the Department of Justice, I fail to appreciate what reason has yet been given for the proposed change, and the omission from the Act or from the Bill, of the language in the present Act, namely, that the navigation of the river is not to be interfered with. It practically eliminates from the law as it is proposed to pass it, the element of navigation. That is the primary thing which should be considered in connection with this Bill, namely, the navigation of the St. Lawrence. Now it is proposed that those words should be striken out of the Act, namely, non-interference, or what will affect the non-interference of navigation, and to vest in the Governor in Council the right to approve of all constructions that may be established in the river, entirely irrespective of the question of navigation. To that I am decidedly opposed, and as yet I have heard nothing to justify the amendment of the Act.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I received from the Board of Trade of Montreal an official communication drawing my attention to this Bill, and expressing the fear that in its present form it would, perhaps, destroy some of the safeguards which already exist in the law by giving power to the Governor in Council to do things which the Governor in Council heretofore had not the right to do. I have minutely examined the law as it stood, and have come to the conclusion that the Bill before us is restrictive and provides safeguards in favour of the public which did not exist under the old law. Now, what were the rights of the public under the old Act, and what was the right of control of the Governor in Council? It is found in chapter 115 of the Revised Statutes, clause 4, which is now replaced by the proposed amendment. I will read this Act as it stands on the statute-book:

> No bridge, boom, dam, or aboiteau, shall be constructed, so as to interfere with navigation, unless the site thereof has been approved by the Governor in Council, nor unless such bridge, boom, dam or aboiteau is built and maintained in accordance with plans approved by the Governor in Council.

An hon. GENTLEMAN—That is the old Act?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—That is the old Act. The old Act stated that if any bridge, boom, dam or aboiteau shall interfere with navigation then it has to obtain the approval of the Governor in Council. This means that it left some discretion to the public, and any one who thought that he was building a dam or aboiteau that did not interfere with navigation, could build that bridge, boom, dam, or aboiteau, feeling that he did not need to obtain permission or approval of the Governor in Council till the department interested interfered.

Now what is the amendment? Before answering this question, I may say that under the old Act as it stands to-day, the Governor in Council could approve of the building of a bridge, dam or aboiteau if it interferes with navigation; but no individual or corporation could build any bridge, boom, or dam or aboiteau if it did interfere, without obtaining the authorization or approval of the Governor in Council. I contend that the powers given the Governor in Council by this Bill are larger, and the public rights, in consequence, are more restricted than under the Act. What is the provision in the Bill before us? 'No bridge, boom, dam, aboiteau' and the following words are added, 'walk, dock, pier or other structure of other kind,' but no bridge, boom, dam or aboiteau shall be built or placed in or across any navigable water.' The words 'constructed so as to interfere with navigation' are struck out, 'unless the site thereof is approved by the Governor in Council, or unless such boom, bridge, dam, aboiteau or structure of other kind is built and maintained in accordance with plans approved by the Governor in Council.' This amendment will have the effect, that while under the present law any private individual or corporation had some discretion in deciding whether the work in question interfered or not, the Governor in Council takes the whole of the power into its hands, and says that no such works of any kind shall be built without the authority of an order in council. The hon. gentleman fears that there may be some back door by which the Governor in Council may be vested with larger powers by which our navigable waters could, perhaps, be interfered with and injured. It is true the Governor in Council are taking more power, but they had the right, under the old law, of allowing any kind of work mentioned in the Act; bridge, boom, dam or aboiteau, even if it did interfere with navigation. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, in the continuation of this amendment, he will see that it reads:

> The foregoing provisions in this section shall not apply to small wharfs not costing more than $1,000 or quoins or other banks or beach protection work or boathouses which do not interfere with navigation.

The hon. gentleman or, any one here familiar with navigable water who would think this was a dangerous provision, should move to strike it out; but up to the present, under the old law, any one could exercise his own discretion in building bridges, booms, dams or aboiteau which he thought did not interfere with navigation. There is now a limitation put upon the discretion of the private individual by saying that no such work that does not interfere with navigation at all events, shall cost more than $1,000, and it gives in a general way the exception to the general provisions; that the foregoing provisions of this section shall not apply to small wharfs not costing more than $1,000 and so on. If any hon. member thinks this is a dangerous power to give to the riparian owners he might place his views before this House. The next clause reads:

> Any work to which this part applies——

Clause 5 of the old Act says:

> Any bridge to which this part applies.

You will notice clause 4 states:

> No bridge, boom, dam or aboiteau shall be constructed so as to interfere with navigation, &c.

Clause 5 under the old Act states:

> Any bridge (stopping at the word bridge) to which this part applies which is built upon a site not approved by the Governor in Council, or which is not built in accordance with plans so approved or which having been so built is not maintained in accordance with such plans may—

And here are the words which are struck out:

> In so far as the same interferes with navigation.

The section continues:

> Be lawfully removed and destroyed under the authority of the Governor in Council.

The new clause 5 reads 'any work' instead of 'any bridge' to which this Act applies, which is much broader; 'which is built upon a site not approved by the Governor in Council or which is not built in accordance with plans so approved, or which is not built in accordance with such plans, may be destroyed and removed by order of the Governor in Council.' This takes away from the individual the discretion of deciding what may or may not interfere with navigation. I have minutely examined the amendment. It seems to me it gives much more protection to the public at large, and for that reason I think the alarm with which some parties were struck in Montreal and elsewhere, is absolutely without foundation.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—As I understand the general law to-day concerning navigable waters, no construction can be erected on navigable waters without being subject to abatement as a nuisance under the law.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Not under this Bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But this Bill proposes to amend the law as it stands to-day and vest absolutely in the Governor in Council the right to sanction and give approval to the erection of the class of undertaking or construction mentioned in the Bill. It is simply part of the policy which has been pursued for years, but which is to-day growing in proportions of vesting in the Governor in Council practically powers which should be exercised by parliament. In my judgment, any structure in navigable water that has been sanctioned and approved by the Governor in Council cannot be removed. The question of interference with navigation will have nothing to do with the matter. The present law will permit of any person erecting such a structure, subject, of course, to the approval of the Governor in Council; and it is entirely immaterial what interference there may be with navigation, after that approval has been obtained. This legislation is of a dangerous character, and, in my judgment, is calculated to give hydraulic power companies and other companies of that kind power to destroy the navigation of our navigable waters.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Surely my hon. friend will not say that this is not an improvement on the old Act? The old Act gives discretion to the public to construct some of those works if it felt that it was not interfering with navigation; now if it were interfering with navigation the parties interested obtain that authorization from the Governor in Council. In no case unless the work be under $1,000 can they now exercise their discretion without obtaining power from the Governor in Council.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (British Columbia)—It is difficult to make regulations or draft a Bill that will apply to all parts of the country; but so far as this Bill is concerned, I am very glad to see it brought in. It refers to British Columbia, where abuses have been carried out by encroaching on navigable waters. I will mention one case which came under my own notice a few days ago. In the harbour of Victoria, there is a uniform line of wharfs, no one wharf projecting beyond the other for about one thousand feet. But the Grand Trunk railway are building a wharf which they propose to extend 300 feet out beyond the ordinary line. In a small harbour, hon. gentlemen will see what that means. It will naturally block the whole navigation; but after the government here took up the matter, and the government over there, and the Canadian Pacific railway who have wharfs in the harbour, and the Hudson Bay Company, they discussed the whole matter and arranged to reduce their extension to 200 feet beyond the ordinary line. Hon. gentlemen will see what that means in a small harbour. In order to allow them to do this, it is going to cost the country one hundred thousand dollars. They have to widen the harbour across to give the company more room. It will not interfere with the harbour. The government have promised to deepen the harbour to a corresponding distance on the other side.

The Bill is very necessary and very useful.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the third reading of Bill (No. 205) An Act to amend the Civil Service Act.

He said: In the Inland Revenue Act, section 9, an error is made, whether clerical or not, I am not prepared to say. The salaries of excise men are placed at $1,500 instead of $1,300, and this should be amended.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think it would be more regular if some hon. member would move the amendment, the right hon. gentleman having moved the third reading. I move that in clause 9, line 4, page 3, that ' $1,300 ' be substituted for ' $1,500.'

The amendment was adopted.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I am afraid now that I must move that the amendment made to this Bill last week on the motion of the hon. gentleman from Halifax be not adhered to. The House will remember that I reserved that expressly for the consideration of the government, and after fully considering it they decided that they would not be at liberty to accept the amendment. I would therefore ask to allow the Bill to be amended and placed in the condition that it originally was. I refer to the amendment respecting salaries.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I must express my regret that the government do not see their way to accept the amendment, because it would remove the difficulty under which the two Houses have been labouring in their differences with the Auditor General. Technically this is a money Bill, but it was not a matter of sufficient consequence I thought to raise that question, and it was simply to clear up a doubt or difficulty which had arisen from the wording of the Act of 1908.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Does the right hon. gentleman refer to the amendment moved by the hon. gentleman from Halifax on Friday or Saturday?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That was accepted.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Provisionally. The right hon. gentleman said for the time being he was willing to accept it, but must submit it to his colleagues.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I move that the Bill be amended by omitting the last clause.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Does the hon. gentleman agree to accept that? I don't think it is the regular way of getting that out.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —It is regular enough to move that a Bill be not read a third time without striking out the last clause. It was expressly reserved at the time. I move the third reading of the Bill as amended.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before that motion is put, I call the attention of my right hon. friend to this fact of the case. We are put in a very singular position. The House in one place has concurred in the amendment made by the Senate or the House has pronounced itself in one way, and the next day we come and ask to reverse the decision of the House. I know that if it had been only passed in committee, the House not having pronounced itself upon the merits of the question, we would be at liberty to accept or refuse the amendment; but they concurred in it, and we are now asking this House to repeal to-day what was decided yesterday. I think the proper way would be to rescind the decision and come in with a new one. I think I was right just now, in saying we were not proceeding in the right way.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—As I understand, the right hon. leader of the government accepted the amendment on the understanding that if the government did not accept it, it would be dropped on the third reading.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That does not appear in our Minutes.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—Perhaps not. The point I would like understood is, whether the government objected to the amendment because it was a money Bill, or objected to it as being against the principle of the Bill.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It was chiefly on the ground that it was a money Bill.

The motion was agreed to.

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 192) An Act to amend the Fisheries Act.—Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

ESCHEATS BILL.

THIRD READING.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the third reading of Bill (No. 206) An Act respecting Escheats.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I have been looking over this Bill, and I should like to ask how it affects provincial rights. It seems to me that this is taking them away from the provinces in the case of estates that have been left by persons dying intestate.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—No, it is not interfering with any provincial rights.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—According to the French version, which is about the same as the English version, it states that where His Majesty the King is entitled to any land or other real or personal property by reason of the person last seized or entitled thereto, having died intestate and without lawful heirs, the Attorney General of Canada may cause possession thereof to be taken in the name of His Majesty. I think that that right should be exercised by the provinces.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—That is quite true. In the majority of cases the provinces have the full right to deal with it, but certain cases have arisen, especially in the Yukon and unorganized territories, and possibly in Alberta and Saskatchewan, in which, under the law, they must go to the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I know, but according to this Bill it covers the whole Dominion.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It can only possibly deal with those cases in which the provinces are held by the court to have no right.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—My attention has been called to it only now, but I would like to know what the hon. member from DeLorimier thinks of it, as to Quebec at least.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It does not touch Quebec or Ontario at all.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Supposing somebody dies intestate in Quebec now, leaving property there, then this Bill——

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—This would not interfere with it in any shape or way, at least so the Department of Justice advise.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My right hon. friend was to obtain some information for me if possible as to what the claim of the federal government is in escheats, say in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I sent a note over, but I have not received an answer.

The SPEAKER—If hon. gentlemen will look at the report of a debate in another place they will see the plain statement of the affair by the minister when the Bill was going through the House.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—But I am told that they inserted something in the Bill which amended it. I am told they had the word 'Canada' there, and that that word would be remediable, but I do not see how it can be remediable. If a man dies in Quebec and leaves property so that the province of Quebec can claim it, if we pass this Bill, Ottawa will have a right to say 'No.'

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I doubt if my hon. friend's construction in reference to this Bill would be correct. If he will read it closely, he will find that the King, as representing Canada, takes no right; it is simply an empowering Bill, which will allow him, where in his right as ruler of Canada, he is entitled to land, or real, or personal property, by reason of the person last seized or entitled thereto having died intestate, to claim it; if it was a party who had lived on the Hudson Bay or had his residence or domicile in the Ungava district, or in unorganized territory that belongs to Canada, in such a case this Bill would empower the federal Governor in Council to escheat the estate to the Crown.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middlesex)—Hon. gentlemen will notice that by a decision of the Privy Council under the British North America Act, the right of escheats belongs to the Crown of the province under the constitution. We can pass no law here that would take that power from the provinces; that is, we could not by any Act of parliament supersede the British North America Act.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Nor does this Bill pretend to.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—And this Bill does not pretend to do that. It simply gives the right of escheats to the Crown of Canada, where the Crown for Canada has jurisdiction, leaving the provinces to hold their constitutional rights, of which rights we could not deprive them if we wanted to.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—It is not very clear to me.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time, and pasesd.

HARBOUR OF ST. JOHN BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (No. 204) An Act to authorize the erection of certain wharfs and buildings in the harbour of St. John. He said: This Bill, as I understand from the explanation given by the minister, is intended to permit of a certain important factory to be erected in the harbour of St. John, which, I think, is set out in some detail in the Bill itself. Other than that it does not appear to have any special application. It is not for purchase, it is to permit the erection, as I understand, of a large sugar refinery in St. John, and this Bill permits of it being erected in a certain portion of the harbour.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I suppose this property is vested in the Crown as represented by the federal authorities?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—So I understand; otherwise this Bill would not be required.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Have negotiations been conducted between this government and the beneficiary or between the authorities in St. John and the party who is going to erect this factory?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I don't quite follow my hon. friend. What is he asking?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What I want to know is, if the federal government has been a party to the negotiations, or simply the Harbour Commissioners of St. John?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It has been submitted to them. I believe the city of St. John owns this property; but its title to it is acquired, as would be natural in such cases, for certain specific purposes, and without a special Act of parliament, it could not, apparently, make any conveyance to the gentleman referred to, a Mr. Frederic C. Durant. The whole thing is set out in some detail in the Bill. Of course, I am not proposing to take it into committee now. I am only taking a stage of it. If the House chooses we can go into committee immediately and read it over.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I call attention to this fact, that the city of St. John owned a certain lot of land, and owns it yet, I presume. A promoter came along, and offered to put up a building on the city land, put up a sugar refinery; and after some trading between him and the corporation, they finally gave him a lot of land on which to erect the sugar refinery, and in addition to that they gave him other considerations in the way of reduction of taxes, I think, and water charges, and so on. That was all right; that was in the power of the city to do, but in the meantime there has been some arrangement with the government, or with the city, or with somebody, with regard to the government property. Adjoining this lot of land which this man takes or is supposed to take, there is a lot of land belonging to the government—I think it is in the Department of Railways. The lot which the city proposes to give contains six and one-tenth acres of land. The lot which the government has contains 12¼ acres. So far as one can judge from this Bill, there has been an agreement on the part of the government to exchange the 12¼ acres for the six and one-tenth acres which belongs to the city, and which the city was giving to the promoter. Therefore, the promoter gets the 12¼ lot from the government, and the government gets the six and one-tenth acre lot from the city. You will notice that the title of the Bill is, 'An Act to authorize the erection of certain wharfs and buildings in the harbour of St. John'. I know of nobody who is a better master of English than the right hon. leader of the House, and I think if he were drawing this Bill he would say, 'the erection of uncertain wharfs and buildings.' I do not know what the transaction is.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I do not want to press anything at present that is contentious, and, therefore, if my hon. friend wants further information, we will pass this order and go on to the next. Let this Bill stand.

The SPEAKER—It is understood that the motion for the second reading of Bill (No. 204) is withdrawn.

BOUNTIES ON CRUDE PETROLEUM BILL.

SECOND READING.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (No. 208) An Act to provide for the payment of bounties on Crude Petroleum. He said: The object of this Bill is briefly this: As the House is aware, certain bounties have been paid to oil producers in certain sections of western Canada, notably in the county of Essex, and I think a part of Lambton. A considerable hardship has arisen from the circumstances that in the old deeds that were given a great many years ago, the rights to all mineral products and the right to quarry or mine for them were reserved to the original grantees. The companies have been, in many cases, subleasing these, and it has been found that, under pretext of searching for petroleum and one thing or another, they have inflicted very considerable hardship on a large number of the inhabitants of that region. The matter has been frequently brought up in the local legislature, and I believe proceedings about the matter at the expense of the local government are now going on.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—They were lands of the Canada Company.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Yes, they were Canada Company Lands chiefly, if not entirely, as my hon. friend remarked. Now, this bounty, which we grant, being purely out of grace on the part of the Dominion government, it is thought that a reasonable proportion of it may be given to the owners of the surface soil, when we are allowing the bounty. We do not propose to interfere with the legal rights of the parties at all, but in the distribution of our bounty we propose to give a reasonable proportion to the owners of the soil to compensate them for the disturbance and injury caused to them by the mining operations. I think the measure is equitable, and therefore, I recommend it to the consideration of the House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understand the right hon. gentleman to say that this difficulty has arisen on account of the reservation that was made when the Crown lands were sold some years ago.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —By the Canada Company.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It would reserve all minerals.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And timber, in the old time?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is that the difficulty that has arisen?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —That is the difficulty.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 2,

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Has this difficulty arisen in connection with lands other than the Canada Company lands?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Not that I have heard of.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—In what way would it apply to oil extracted from shale? Would there be a possibility of the same difficulty arising?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I think that it would be in exactly the same position as oil derived from ordinary mineral springs. If such a question arose, I think the Act is wide enough to cover it; but we have heard nothing of any difficulty except in that particular region. It is a matter of some standing. It has been more or less in agitation, both with us and the local legislatures, for some years.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It would seem to me there would be very little possibility of difficulty arising as to shale oil, because the shales would be vested in the owners of the surface rights.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I should think so; but I offer no opinion on that.

Hon. Mr. BOYER from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the third reading.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time, and passed.

DEBATES AND REPORTING OF THE SENATE.

THIRD REPORT ADOPTED.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY moved concurrence in the third report of the Committee on Debates and Reporting of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—It has been suggested that where orders of the day appear, the page of the Minutes might be attached to the order so that we could find the report easily.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY—The report recommends that the remuneration which the contractors for the reporting are to get for the present sesion be $7,300, based on the amount which they are to receive next session.

The motion was agreed to, and the report was concurred in.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Bill (OOO) An Act to correct an error in the Telegraphs Act.—Hon. Mr. Beique.

VOLUNTEER BOUNTY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (No. 163) An Act to amend the Volunteer Bounty Act, 1908. He said: This Bill practically extends for a year longer the time within which volunteers entitled to this bounty can locate their lands.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 1,

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—May I ask what is the occasion of this Bill? Are there any other provisions than that to provide for the extension of time in which volunteers can receive their scrip?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—None except the last clause, which allows residents on the land to apply therefor within six months of the entry thereof. As hon. gentlemen will see, that is practically involved in the extension for one year.

On clause 4,

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What is the meaning of these names in the schedule?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I am not absolutely certain as to that. I had overlooked that schedule, until my hon. friend called attention to it. But, speaking from recollection, I think there were certificates that had been lost. It states the time in which the right of location under bounty certificates mentioned in this Act shall be extended.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I know of one of those particular cases mentioned, a case of J. T. Franklin. His certificate was lost and another one was issued. Surely the holder of a substituted certificate ought to have the same right to locate as the original holder.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—We will not take the third reading today; and I will endeavour to obtain further information.

Hon. Mr. McKAY (Truro), from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

INSURANCE BILL.

COMMONS AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved concurrence in amendments made by House of Commons to Bill (A) An Act respecting Insurance. He said: The House will see the various amendments set out on pages 932 and 933 of our Minutes.

I received from the superintendent of insurance a copy of the Bill as amended by the House of Commons. The amendments are principally verbal. A few are intended to better express the intention of the subsection as originally drawn. In subsection 14, an amendment has been made to provide that the initial deposit required from foreign fire insurance companies shall hereafter be the same as they require from Canadian companies. The other amendment made in the section is merely a correction of an omission in the reprinting of the Bill. Slight amendments have been made also to sections 56, 60 and 139.

On clause 4,

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I notice that the superintendent does not intimate the manner in which the change has been made with reference to deposits.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I asked that the Bill stand over inasmuch as we cannot understand what the amendments are from the Bill before us.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The changes are so slight and unimportant that I cannot see any necessity for postponing consideration. The change referred to by the superintendent of insurance is simply this; under the old law the deposit made by Canadian companies was $50,000. With foreign companies the deposit was $100,000. It was intimated in the debate in the Commons that as long as this discrimination took place the probabilities were that the different states of the union would reciprocate by doubling the amount of the deposit by Canadian companies, and they thought it better to compromise and make it equal, so that the amount to be deposited now by Canadian companies is $75,000,and by foreign companies the same. The only possible reason for increasing the deposit for Canadian companies and the reduction of the deposit by foreign companies was to make it uniform so as to prevent a discrimination being adopted in the United States. The other changes are very slight. The word 'officer' occurred when it should be 'office', and then the change is made in reference to clause 139, and in clause 33 there is a change by striking out the words 'office of the superintendent' and substituting therefor the word 'department', which really means that question which was discussed in committee, and it was always understood that when you spoke of the office of the superintendent you spoke of the action of the department. In clause 139, there is somewhat of an important change made, I think in the right direction. It declares that in the case of a person insuring in a foreign company not licensed in Canada these words are added 'which has an insurable interest' so as to prevent as much as possible brokers carrying on business in this country who really have no interest in it; and the other proviso is simply providing against the sending in of circulars by foreign companies who do not take out a license. It may be a protection; but it seems to be an impracticable one. I remember the question was fully discussed in our committee. How you are going to prevent any one in the United States sending a circular to a manufacturing establishment in Canada, I do not know, but if it will have the effect the Commons desired it to have, it is all right. Those are the only amendments made, and I consider it quite unnecessary to delay the passage of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Quite right. There is not an important amendment except the one to clause 139, which adds a proviso; that we are allowing free insurance business to foreign unlicensed companies with the understanding that they are not to come into Canada to canvass.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Nor to send circulars.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The other proviso added by the Commons is on the lines of the decision of the Senate:

> And provided further that no such company, underwriters or persons shall within Canada advertise their business in any newspaper or other publication or by circular mailed in Canada or elsewhere, or maintain an office or agency therein for the receipt of applications or the transaction of any act, matter or thing relating in any way to their said business.

I think this is according to the spirit of the will of the Senate, because we have to give those unlicensed companies the right to send an inspector and an adjuster. Those are the privileges given to foreign countries, to come to Canadian soil, and I do not believe, if the hon. gentleman will look through the other amendments, that he will find them of any importance.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There was one amendment which I omitted to refer to, and that is the one which compels companies who invest in certain stocks that are not considered of a permanent character, to hold them only for a certain length of time. The proviso is:

> Provided that the amount of stocks so guaranteed is not in excess of fifty per cent of the amount of the preferred or common stocks, as the case may be, of the guaranteeing company.

It compels them to convert them within a certain time. It is a protection, I think, to the policy-holders and prevents the carrying on of speculative operations by the insurance companies.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I have also gone over the amendments which have been made by the Commons. It will be noticed that section 14 was passed as it came from the Commons, and they provided originally that Canadian companies would have to deposit $50,000, and that foreign companies would have to deposit $100,000. The Senate did not interfere with that section, as it was originally passed by the Commons, and the Commons have taken occasion, when considering the amendments made by the Senate to other provisions in the Bill, to go back on their decision and amend the Bill as they originally sent it to the Senate. Then the next section is 59, which is amended by adding the proviso which the hon. gentleman from Hastings mentioned, and in connection with the stock which the insurance company may hold in companies whose stock is guaranteed and limiting it to 50 per cent. The same section is further amended by providing that in case an insurance company purchases stocks which are not contemplated to be held by the Act as being guaranteed stock, or stocks on which dividends have been paid for a certain number of years, then it will be, according to the amendment made by the Commons, incumbent upon the company to sell or dispose of the stock within five years; or if they wish to hold it for another year, they must obtain the consent of the Treasury Board. That is of small consequence. Then the other amendment is in section 139. On reading the amendment carefully, and comparing it with section 70, it will be found that it is a repetition of section 70. It is mere surplusage and does not change anything in the Bill. The other amendments are merely clerical errors. The amendment to which the hon. gentleman from Hastings has referred, stating that to insure a property one must either own the property or otherwise have an insurable interest in it, does not change anything at all. According to my reading, it will not prevent me, if I have an insurable interest in a property, from insuring that property through an agent of mine.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman may be quite right in his deductions. I was speaking of the reasons advanced in the Commons for doing it.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The Commons are mistaken, in my opinion. It is well known that no property can be insured by a person unless he has an insurable interest, and the Commons have merely stated the law. It does not add anything to it. My main object in rising was to call the attention of this honourable House, and of the country, to this important fact: that here is a Bill which engaged the attention of the House of Commons for two consecutive sessions. It was supposed to have been examined very thoroughly in the House of Commons by a special committee. It was sent to this honourable House, and the committee of the Senate, after examination and after giving it full consideration, and hearing all parties concerned, made over one hundred amendments in it, and of those over twenty-five are most vital and important amendments. The Bill as amended was sent to the Commons, and every one of our amendments, I can say without hesitation, was adopted. I think it is the best evidence of the utility of this honourable House, and I hope it will alter the opinion of some members of the House of Commons who were members of the committee which examined this Bill so thoroughly, and who on previous occasions expressed the opinion that the Senate should be abolished. I hope it will be good evidence to them that the Senate may have some usefulness yet.

The motion was agreed to, and the amendments were concurred in.

ANTI-COMBINES BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 101) An Act to provide for the investigation of combines, monopolies, trusts and mergers which may enhance prices or restrict competition to the detriment of consumers.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 1,

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—How far would this definition extend to the ordinary transaction of business in the market? It defines what a combine is, and among other things it means any contract, agreement, or combination or agreement which is, or is inclined to have, the effect of increasing or fixing the price or rental of any article of trade or the cost of the storage and so on. Take what occurs almost every day in an ordinary market town of the country; the farmers come into market, and the first thing you find is that they go around and talk with each other about prices. Take butter or eggs, as an illustration. The farmers enter into a combination and agreement as to what the price should be. Any one who has attended market knows what takes place. A farmer drives in with his wife and family and gets out a basket of eggs. The first thing they do is to ascertain what is the prevailing price of eggs. The price is fixed at 35 or 40 cents, and if a buyer goes to any of them they will quote the price agreed upon by the whole of them. Is that not a combination, and would they not be subject to prosecution if a consumer made complaint? They certainly raise the price to the consumer. We know this kind of combination exists between market gardeners and others who sell produce of any kind on the local markets. Is this not a combine and agreement to raise the price to the consumer, and does it not come within the meaning of the Act? It may be said they are combines of small importance.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The words 'to the detriment of consumers and producers' might be held to mean the unreasonable injury of them, I should think, but it is quite clear that no combination of words can be devised which will meet the complaints that have been referred to us, and yet not under certain circumstances, be liable to cause inconvenience. I must admit that.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It strikes me that the weakness of this Bill—I am not prepared to say it does not cover the point to which I am about to refer, but I am inclined to think it does not—is that it is directed against fixed combinations. But combinations may be of varying character, from day to day, and they may be productive of as much mischief in the line indicated by the Bill as if they were fixed corporate entities. Take the case referred to by my hon. friend, parties engaging in such combinations as indicated by him, would be of a changeable character. It would be utterly impossible to reach a combination of that kind by this Bill. The Bill is directed not against the acts as specific acts, but against specific individuals doing a specific act. It seems to me it will be a comparatively easy matter to evade the liabilities or the penalties attached by the Bill to the changing personnel of the combinations against which it is aimed. It seems to me to lack having that definite end in view, namely, striking a blow at the act complained of rather than the individuals.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —That may be possible; but what does the hon. gentleman suggest?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Speaker)—I would call attention to the fact that although many things might come within the definition referred to, it will be seen that the question of whether there is to be any interference is one of judicial character, and the judge, when he hears the matter, has to be satisfied that what has been done was calculated to produce certain injurious effects, and if he is not satisfied he will not make the order, and indeed, under almost any circumstances, on hearing the whole matter, he can refuse to make the order.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We are referring to a case where an order has been made, and where a series of acts may constitute an infraction of the law, and yet, through a change of individuals who may be interested in one series and not interested in the others, the Act may be of no avail.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Speaker)—That will all be open to the judge.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—How will the penalties of the law reach those who may not be concerned in that particular act, although the series of acts may be continued?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—There is no question that the case of the farmers combining together to enhance and fix the price would fall under this Act, but it would fall as well under the criminal law as we have it. If it were established that in the country around eggs were five cents a dozen less than at a certain market where all the farmers had combined to enhance the price five cents, there is no doubt it would fall under the criminal law as well as under this Bill; but all these cases of combinations, although falling under this law, will not necessarily be investigated.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—It is satisfactory to know the meaning of combination. I never heard in Quebec that farmers have combined together to raise the prices. They are too honest for that.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Perhaps the hon. gentleman does not rise early enough in the morning to go to market.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Oh, yes; I have been living in a farming country. If four, or five, or ten farmers go into the market together, and they have eggs in their wagons on the market, and they consult with each other and say 'Eggs are very scarce; we will charge 25 cents a dozen this morning,' I think they have a right to do that; but according to my hon. friend's theory, they can be proceeded against. Take the proprietors of cheese factories; they are informed by Montreal dealers that their buyer will go out there on such a day. I have seen this myself. The proprietors of factories are informed that on auction days the buyer will be there to buy all the butter and cheese made during the month. They look up the prices and say, 'We will not depreciate our factory. We will quote cheese at 15 cents to-day and butter at 25 cents.' They have a right to do that. But according to the hon. gentleman from De Lorimier, that will be against the criminal law. I should like to get the statement from the government, because out of sheer malice and in order to injure a neighbour some person may work the law and take proceedings. As the point has been raised as to this very word agreement or arrangement, or accommodation, I think it would be well for the right hon. leader to state what the interpretation is, in order, if the question is raised in any court later on, the judge may refer to the interpretation given here, as is done in many cases under the criminal law.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I do not think the farming industry will be very much affected by this Bill. I think that some larger interests are more likely to be affected. I would like to know if the Bankers' Association will come under the purview of this Bill when it agrees not to pay over three per cent for money? That is a combine, surely.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—No, you have no right to attack the banks.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Speaking generally, I should be inclined to think that the good old law of supply and demand would have to regulate such matters as this.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Take another example. About a month ago, a court in Ontario, I do not remember the name of the judge, declared that the Grocers' Guild or Association was not a combine. Well, according to what I know of the regulations which I have read myself in my own office, it is a combination between the wholesale merchants to fix the price, and they get the retail merchants to sign a declaration by which they will not be entitled to sell at less than a price fixed by that wholesale association; if they do sell at a lower price they lose the benefit; whereas if they maintain the price fixed by the association they will get a refund of four or five per cent.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Speaker)—Is not this Bill intended to meet such a case as that?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I should like to know if the Bill is intended to include such a combine?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Speaker)—That is what it does; an agreement to enhance the price specially calls for the introduction of the law.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Under subsection 498 of the Criminal Code, provisions are to be found declaring that parties will be guilty of conspiracy if they agree together to unduly prevent competition or to unreasonably enhance the price of anything, or unduly restrain commerce. Of course, this definition as found in subsection (c) of section 2 goes further than that, because the word 'unduly' or 'unreasonably' is not to be found. It merely says that:

'Combine' means any contract, agreement, arrangement or combination which has, or is designed to have, the effect of increasing or fixing the price or rental of any article of trade or commerce or the cost of the storage or transportation thereof, or of the restricting competition in or of controlling the production, manufacture, transportation, storage, sale or supply thereof, to the detriment of consumers or producers of such article of trade or commerce.

Therefore, this Bill will have greater scope than the provision in the Criminal Code. On the other hand, the judge, the court, is substituted for the Governor in Council, which takes the question from the political sphere, and the judge will no doubt see that no interference or no persecution or no inquiry is made unless the circumstances justify an inquiry.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In order that we may better understand the purport of this word 'interpretation', and the extent to which it goes, before we look at the different clauses, on reference to clause 23, we can form some correct opinion as to what the word 'combine' includes. It strikes me it would include the very cases, unimportant though they may be, to which I referred. However, it is not my intention to delay the committee even in discussing these clauses. If it took the Minister of Labour three and a quarter hours to explain this Bill, I suppose it became our duty to read the whole of that speech in order to understand it; but while it may be necessary to expend three and a quarter hours in the Commons to explain this important measure, we are supposed to understand its full import in about that many minutes. To my mind the principle upon which the legislation of the present day is founded is going altogether too far. I hesitate not to say that we are pandering too much to a certain element in the country that demands the control of capital in almost every walk of life, and unless it is made satisfactory to their individual interests, then those who have the misfortune to be carrying on a business are punished, while they themselves have the fullest possible liberty to restrict trade, to stop manufacture, and to punish the whole community by combinations of labour. No one respects honest labour more than I do; but there are restrictions that should be put upon it just the same as upon people carrying on commercial business; and the principle is being extended not only in Canada, but in England in particular, and other parts of the world until the trade of a company and the investment of capital will have become so uncertain, that those who have means will be liable to be ruined by those combinations. If a combination of wealth is to be stopped—and I quite agree that such combinations ought to be punished if undue means are taken to enhance the price of an article so that it becomes an injury to the consumer—the same principle should apply to those who attempt to and do ruin business and trade.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask my hon. friend if it is intended that the word 'combine' should apply to a monopoly. Take for instance the word 'combine' according to the language employed in placing an interpretation upon it, I should say that two or more parties would have to engage to make a combine; that it would not reach, for instance, a corporation that had the monopoly of a food product, and chose to place any price it wished on the article in which it dealt. What are my right hon. friend's views on that subject?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Look at the last line of subsection (c).

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Well, that would not reach it. Let us assume for a moment that there was, say, such a company as the Armour Company doing business in Canada, and that they had a monopoly of the beef and provision business of the country; no matter what prices they would fix, no matter how they might limit trade, or monopolize trade, I submit that this interpretation would not cover such a monopoly.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—That might be; but would not the Criminal Code deal with such a case?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I do not think so.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Speaker)—This would do so surely.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Clause (c) would.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Would the hon. gentleman point out where, please?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Speaker)—Subsection (c) reads: 'and also includes what is known as a trust, monopoly, or merger.'

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—What is a trust, monopoly, or merger?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Speaker)—It is just such a case as my hon. friend suggests, where capitalists acquire control of the meat business of the country.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But that would not be a monopoly within clause (c), because this interpretation clause deals with combinations. We must not omit the word which we are defining, namely, 'combine.' Combine must necessarily mean the same, for instance, as conspiracy. We may use the word conspiracy. Combine is used very much as being tantamount to or synonymous with conspiracy. In law one party could not constitute a conspiracy.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Speaker)—I would draw my hon. friend's attention to the fact that the very section from which he is reading does provide for that. The clause distinctly says that it:

> Includes the acquisition, leasing or otherwise taking over, or obtaining by any person to the end aforesaid, of any control over or interest in the business, or any portion of the business, of any other person, and also includes what is known as a trust, monopoly or merger.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That does not touch the point.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Speaker)—Any one person acquiring it in that way would be, within the meaning of this section a combine.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Not at all.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—But if one individual bought up the business of other individuals, would that constitute a combine?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Speaker)—It might be.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—If that constitutes a combine, then we had better dissolve everything and have no business at all.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Speaker)—I say it might be; it depends on the way it was done and worked out.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I have no doubt this clause is meant to cover any organization, by which a corporation or an individual may succeed in obtaining an absolute control over a certain article, with a view to enhance the price to the detriment of the consumer.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—Take, for instance, this supposition: In Canada nickel is a very limited article, in the hands of a very few people. Are you going to suggest the price at which nickel shall be sold, and because it is a very scarce article, and very few people have it, that such a law as this has to exist to determine what should be done?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I am now more convinced than I was before this debate, that the clause is very indefinite as to what a combine is—an arrangement or combination—as the business men cannot themselves tell; and as I would like to protect the farmers a little, I beg to move that the following words be added after the word 'merger,' 'but this clause shall not apply to farmers.'

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—That is a joke.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Before the motion in amendment is put, I think there is very much in what the hon. senator has suggested. If this interpretation clause does not apply to farmers, what object can the hon. leader of the House have to make it applicable to the farmer? It is a common matter for the farmers, and farmers' wives, to come to market. They generally congregate on the market and have a talk about prices before they begin selling their produce, and they ask 'how much are you going to ask to-day for butter, and how much for eggs?' and then they go on and agree 'We will not sell at less than a certain figure,' and they insist on receiving that amount. Now, does not that increase the cost to the consumer? If the interpretation clause is of any value whatever, it certainly applies to the farmers and the farmer's wives. If you adopt any means or allow anything to occur whereby a farmer will be prevented from enhancing the value of his wares, you restrict the trade between the farmers and those who go to the market. It is very evident that this clause must and will apply to the farmers of the community: not only that but it will extend further, to the selling of various cereals, and everything else that farmers have to dispose of. Are you going to restrict the hard working farmer from getting a fair value for his produce? I think the law of demand and supply ought to be sufficient to protect the public. If the farmer has goods to sell, he wants to get a reasonable price for them. The buyer may combine, and he may escape the law, but the producer cannot do it and escape the law. The consumer can be protected, but how about the middleman? We are well aware that in towns and cities, the merchants do not go to the market in the morning; they wait until a later hour in the day when the farmers are anxious to get home to their work, and prices are lowered. In this way the retail merchants combine to prevent the producer from receiving the amount that he otherwise would. I think we ought to have this clause well interpreted so that there shall be no difficulty, and that the unsuspecting farmer may be left at liberty to get the best price he can for his eggs and butter. We should not protect the merchant of the town against the the labourer.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—A small grievance that is only felt locally will not induce six persons to swear out affidavits and go to a judge, in order that he may open an inquiry into it. This law is not made for a peanut grievance.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—I should like to have an explanation of the meaning of the words in line 16 of clause (c)—' or of controlling the production, manufacture, etc.' If a man controls a certain number of manufacturing establishments, and finds that the country cannot consume all his output, and he reduces the hours of work to five or six a day so as not to glut the market—if he wants to sustain prices, would that be considered a violation of this Act?

Hon. Mr. WILSON.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—The hon. gentleman means can he be forced to manufacture more than he wants to manufacture?

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Yes.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I should say off-hand, that he could not; but I do not pretend to offer an opinion on a matter which may come under the decision of judges by and by. Apparently, none of these things can be done unless it is clearly shown, after investigation, that they are to the detriment of the consumers or producers. I take it those words could not be construed to deal with such cases as the hon. gentleman refers to.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—Why not?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It would not be to the detriment of the consumer if a manufacturer took such a course. If the thing is the necessary consequence of conditions of trade, it could not fairly be said to be to the detriment of the consumer. It is where an artificial condition is produced, practically by a conspiracy, that this Bill would apply, as I understand it.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Speaker)—There are two things that have to be done. It is not merely a question if the business or manufacture is reduced to prevent prices going below a profitable figure. That is to be the subject of investigation by a judge who has to determine not that there is a combination, but whether there should be an investigation as to the effect and result if there is a prima facie case made out. Take, for instance, rubber—there are only a few places where rubber is manufactured in Canada. I might acquire those and yet not change prices. I might not change the position as it had stood before. The mere fact that I had acquired those factories would not expose me to a penalty.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Or even increase the price?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Speaker)—Or even increase it unduly, because the judge has to be satisfied and it is only if he reports an investigation should be held that there will be an investigation as to what the effect is, so there is protection both to the public and to the capitalist in that respect. It leaves it a fair ground on which to stand. He ascertains if there is a prima facie case made out for investigation. He finds not only that they have secured all the factories, but that they have raised and kept the price above what would be a fair price to the public.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—This is no new principle introduced into our legislation. We have had legislation for thirteen or fourteen years on our statute-books, which can be and has been made use of, and we are in the position to judge of the effect of that legislation in the future by the effect of similar legislation in the past. The Act of 1897 (chapter 11 in the Revised Statutes) contains a similar provision. It is enacted that whenever the Governor in Council deems it in the public interest, if a combination is alleged to exist among dealers in any article to unduly increase the price, the Governor in Council may commission or appoint a judge to hold an inquiry and report whether such a conspiracy or combination exists. If the judge reports to that effect, the Governor in Council may so reduce the duty on the article as to give the public the benefit of reasonable competition in the market. Under this very clause an inquiry was set in motion against the newspaper combination. I think Judge Taschereau was appointed to make the investigation, and he reported to the Governor in Council that there was a combination to unduly enhance the price of printing paper for newspapers. The Governor in Council acted upon the report, and reduced the duty ten per cent. Ten years afterwards another clause was added to this Act which provides that whenever, as the result of a judgment of court, it appears to the satisfaction of the Governor in Council that with regard to any article there is a combination or conspiracy to unduly enhance the price, the Governor in Council may admit the article free of duty or reduce the duty to give reasonable competition in the article.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Why is the word 'conspiracy' omitted from this Bill, while it is to be found in both of the statutes to which the hon. gentleman has referred? There should be uniform language as far as possible, inasmuch as there have been some legal decisions upon those Acts. The omission of the word 'conspiracy' may have a detrimental effect in the interpretation of the Act. It will lead to further difficulty any way.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It seems to me the Interpretation Act makes the meaning of the word 'combination' as wide as possible. What have we on the statute-book so far? We have the power vested in the Governor in Council to reduce or remit the duty. We have besides, a penalty clause in the Act, but it is found also in the Criminal Code. This is simply organizing a new mode by which an investigation may be had, without subjecting the combination of manufacturers or producers to prosecution under the Criminal Code by an individual. Under this Bill, there must be six individuals to begin a prosecution. Even then they will not get their investigation until a judge has examined into the general conditions as far as his own knowledge will go, and if he is satisfied that he should go more deeply into the matter, he may, as a grand jury would, examine witnesses and ask the complainants to state their case without calling on the defence to put in evidence, although of his own motion the judge may go and investigate the affair as deeply as he wants, and only then must he report that he has found there is a prima facie case against the parties complained of, and ask the government to make an investigation. Then the investigation proceeds by the machinery mentioned in this Act.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—A question has been asked as to the meaning of a certain clause, whether it would or would not apply to farmers upon the markets. The subleader of the House treated that matter very lightly. He said it was a peanut policy. I am sure the farmers in his part of the country would like to know what he meant by that remark. We have asked for an explanation, and the hon.

gentleman replies by saying it is a peanut policy. It is true, the farmers are dealing in small matters, but they are just as important questions to the farming community as large matters are to the people of big cities. I say that remark of the hon. gentleman should be expunged from the records of this House. The farmers have a right to protection the same as other citizens. What right has the hon. gentleman to speak of the operations of the farmers as a peanut policy? The hon. gentleman will find that the farmers of this country will resent the use of such language as applied to them. I hope we shall have an explanation of the application of this Bill—whether it will apply to the farmers, even if they do deal in peanuts, or whether they will receive any protection.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I object to the amendment, because if there is a class in the community which this Bill will protect it is the farmers. The object of this Bill is not merely to protect the consumer, though we know that the farmers are the large consumers of Canada and may need protection as consumers against the enhancing of prices of manufactured goods. But even as producers, this Bill has for its object the protection of the producers and there may well be combinations against the farmers to prevent them obtaining fair prices for their products. The hon. gentleman from St. Thomas, who speaks as if we were on the eve of a general election into which he would plunge as a candidate, will perhaps hear the opinion of some farmers who are in sympathy with this Bill. The master of the 'Dominion Grange' has written as follows to the minister:

> As you are perhaps aware, the farmers of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Ontario have united their forces. One of the first acts of their united executive, of whom I am the secretary, will be to take advantage of your Act, which meets with the most enthusiastic approval of our organization. Our organization numbers over 25,000 members and we are very much in earnest in this matter.

So that the hon. gentleman will see that the farmers of the west receive some protection and some advantage in this matter. When I spoke of the peanut question I said there would be no six intelligent parties swearing affidavits and going to a judge to redress a peanut grievance.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—As far as the farmers and members of the Grange are concerned, I can understand the matter quite well. They are not the peanut men at all. They are the ones that superintend the organization of grangers, and, therefore, they should not come under the stricture my hon. friend made. It would be easy to get a recommendation from the various farmers throughout the country, but I say that the general farming community is not in sympathy with the measure now before the House.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—This Bill is one of very considerable importance, and, in my opinion, cannot be dealt with intelligently in the short time parliament is supposed to remain in session. I have been advised by some of my friends not to speak upon this question, because I may be pointed at from the fact that I happen to be a stockholder and president of the Cement Company of Canada; but I want all my friends to know that so long as I am in parliament I will advocate the principles I believe in, no matter what I am president of.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—And when I take a hand in a discussion dealing with this subject, I want it understood that I do it in the interest of no company, but in the interests of the people of Canada. I am one of those who believe in the freedom of the people, and I do not believe in trammelling the operations of the people. I believe in the development of Canada and allowing Canada to develop, and I am not a believer in putting upon the statute-books enactments which hamper the operations of the people and then bring in a pretended cure such as this Bill is. What will be the effect of legislation of this kind? What has been the effect in the great republic south of us? The very parties who are fathers of the high protective system in the United States at a later period in the history of that country brought in similar legislation to this, and by the enforcement of that legislation brought about one of the most severe crisis that ever took place in any country. If it was not the immediate cause of it, there is no doubt the crisis was stimulated to a great extent by the legislation. What is the situation further in regard to that great country in so far as railways are concerned? They had a commission regulating the rates railways shall charge, just as we have in Canada, and what is the condition there? The result is that the great railway systems are all suffering. They are not able to make their ordinary repairs and betterments, from the fact that they are so hampered and controlled by the influences I have named, that the great railways are simply going to ruin. I believe in the law of supply and demand, and in that law regulating everything. I do not believe in legislation of this kind, no matter whence it emanates. True, this legislation comes from my own political friends, but I cannot help that. I have always opposed and will continue to oppose legislation of this kind, no matter whence it emanates. I think there can be nothing more unreasonable. I am utterly opposed to any combination which has the result of enhancing the products of this or any other country; but let us have proper legislation as far as our traffic is concerned, and nothing of this kind will ever be required. Suppose it is thought the price of any commodities are too high, as a consequence, it is suggested, of some combination. Such may be investigated and the conditions dealt with; but when there is a condition in this country where a large portion of the community produce everything they produce at a far higher price than that which they can sell it for, is there any legislation to compel the people of Canada to buy the commodities from them in order that they should not suffer? Am I clear on that point? Let us have legislation which deals fairly with both sides. If you are going to make it imperative that people shall only buy under certain conditions, make a condition that they shall be compelled to buy when the necessities of the producers require it. I want to express myself as absolutely opposed to all patch legislation, such as this. The principle underlying this Bill is as wrong as it is possible to be. Proceeding with such legislation as this will result in hindering the development of the country.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—It is a government Bill.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—You warn the people that they shall not enjoy the profit of their industry. If a man starts in a small way, and buys this business, and that business, and becomes a larger developer in that respect, he will be subject to the conditions which underlie this legislation. It means we shall not develop. I am opposed to that. I have never belonged to any combination for a reduction of prices. Lumber is my business. I would absolutely refuse to-morrow—although to-day we are selling lumber for less than it cost us—to join with any combination of lumber manufacturers for fixing the prices if I were asked to do so.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—But this is a government Bill.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—I do not care whether it is a government Bill or not.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I was abused because I would not accept a government Bill.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—I want to tell hon. gentlemen something that will surprise them all. I want to give an illustration that the price of not one single foot of lumber that is sold east of the Great Lakes is fixed in Canada. The price of lumber is fixed in North Carolina, and how? Simply by the law of supply and demand. We sell the surplus of our lumber in the United States. We meet the competition of South Carolina lumber, and there is where our price is fixed, and that is were the price of every foot of lumber east of the Great Lakes is fixed, and how? Simply by the law of supply and demand. If the lumbermen east of the Great Lakes wanted to make a combination, they could not do it, it is absolutely impossible. Let the law of supply and demand control. Let us legislate in a reasonable and rational way in the interests of the whole of the people of Canada, and do away with our protective system which is a curse to this country, and every country where it exists; then no one will ever think of such foolish legislation as is embodied in this Bill.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I wish to ask for information why there is different wording in some of the clauses. Clause (c) does not contain the word 'unduly.' The operation of this Act is brought into activity by clause 5, which reads:

> 5. Where six or more persons, British subjects resident in Canada and of full age, are of opinion that a combine exists, and that prices have been enhanced or competition restricted by reason of such combine, to the detriment of consumers or producers, such persons may make an application to a judge for an order directing an investigation into such alleged combine.

The appeal is to a judge for the appointment of a board. According to clause 7, you will notice the judge determines whether the board shall be granted or not. The wording is the same in seven as in five, and when you come to clause 18, you find that the board, after looking at the matter, have to determine whether or not the price or rental of any article has been unreasonably enhanced, and the supply thereof unduly restricted. The word 'unduly' comes in and also in 21, 22 and 23. I fail to see why, if that word is used there, it should not be used in subsection (c) of section 2 of the Bill before us.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I have not spoken on my motion. The remark I wish to make is that I endorse all that has been said by the hon. gentleman from St. Thomas about the farmers. It is a government Bill and I am not going to oppose it, except as to this clause, if we have not in this House a formal declaration from the government that it will not apply to farmers. The hon. gentleman is opposing a government Bill, and I must congratulate him. Perhaps he will receive a challenge in the newspapers. In this Senate an hon. member cannot say a word against a government Bill without being branded as a traitor to his party.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The hon. gentleman is bringing up a broad question. In this Chamber we should all be independent, and have but one master—our own conscience.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is a good doctrine if hon. members live up to it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I shall try and live up to it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I did not refer to the hon. member personally.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The hon. gentleman from Killarney (Hon. Mr. Young) has asked a question with regard to the word 'unduly.' That word is not found in clauses 2, 5 or 7. The answer which is given me is, that for the preliminary inquiry the setting in motion of this machinery, the expressions are broader, so as to give larger discretion to the judge to investigate if there is a complaint of the consumer; but when it comes to clause 18, when the complaint is made, the board will have to see if there is an undue restriction or enhancement of prices.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Do I understand the machinery may be set in motion on a lesser charge than the one which the board has to try the case on?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The words are 'in the public interest.'

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I have made a cursory examination of the Bill, and I may say the effect of it is this: Subsection 2 of section 2 is pretty large. It goes beyond what the law has been heretofore in using the word 'unduly' or 'unreasonably'; therefore it is wider so far as the setting in motion is concerned. But when you come to clause 7, you have embodied in section 7 a very much stronger guarantee:

> 7. If upon such hearing the judge is satisfied that there is reasonable ground for believing that a combine exists which is injurious to trade or which has operated to the detriment of consumers or producers, and that it is in the public interest that an investigation should be held, the judge shall direct an investigation under the provisions of this Act; or if not so satisfied, and the judge is of opinion that in the circumstances an adjournment should be ordered, the judge may adjourn such hearing until further evidence in support of the application is given, or he may refuse to make an order for an investigation.

So that you have three conditions which the judge must find before he orders an inquiry to be made. It is only by means of the inquiry that it will be found if the prices were unduly increased.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—It is not there.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—No, but in the course of the inquiry, if the inquiry is granted, it will be ascertained whether the prices were unduly or unreasonably enhanced, and the Act provides for two different remedies. Section 2, reads:

21. Whenever, from or as a result of an investigation under the provisions of this Act, or from or as a result of a judgment of the Supreme Court or Exchequer Court of Canada or of any superior court, or circuit, district or county court in Canada, it appears to the satisfaction of the Governor in Council that with regard to any article there exists any combine to promote unduly the advantage of the manufacturers or dealers at the expense of the consumers, and if it appears to the Governor in Council that such disadvantage to the consumer is facilitated by the duties of customs imposed on the article, or on any like article, the Governor in Council may direct either that such article be admitted into Canada free of duty or that the duty thereon be reduced to such amount or rate as will, in the opinion of the Governor in Council, give the public the benefit of reasonable competition.

Then we have section 23, which reads:

23. Any person reported by a board to have been guilty of unduly limiting the facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing or dealing in any article which may be a subject of trade or commerce; or of unduly restraining or injuring trade or commerce in relation to any such article; or of unduly preventing, limiting or lessening the manufacture or production of any such article; or of unreasonably enhancing the price thereof; or of unduly preventing or lessening competition in the production, manufacture, purchase, barter, sale, transportation, storage or supply of any such article, and who thereafter continues so to offend, is guilty of an indictable offence and shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding one thousand dollars and costs for each day after the expiration of ten days, or such further extension of time as in the opinion of the board may be necessary, from the date of the publication of the report of the board in the 'Canada Gazette' during which such person so continues to offend.

That section deals exclusively with the penal clause, and it is only in case the party not only has been found to do that, but continues to do it, and it is practically re-enacting what is to be found in the Criminal Code. It does not go any further than the Criminal Code.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does it not strike my hon. friend as rather extraordinary that a charge should be made, and that an investigating board should proceed to try a charge, and then consider one entirely different from what is alleged!

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—That is what I wanted an explanation of.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—You notice that under section 5 a statutory declaration must be given of the state of things as defined in section (c) of subsection 2.

It being six o'clock, the Chairman left the Chair.

After Recess.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Before resuming the debate on the merits of the Bill may I call attention to the fact that we are, as I understand, on subsection 3 of clause 2, which is merely defining the word 'combine.' If the hon. gentleman from Grandville intends to insist upon his amendment, surely he would not ask that this clause be amended, but would simply move that a clause be added at the end of the Bill that this measure should not apply to farmers. I suggest that the committee pass the subclause. For my part I think it is proper as it stands.

The amendment was declared lost.

The subclause was adopted.

On clause 5.

5. Where six or more persons, British subjects resident in Canada and of full age, are of opinion that a combine exists, and that prices have been enhanced or competition restricted by reason of such combine, to the detriment of consumers or producers, such persons may make an application to a judge for an order directing an investigation into such alleged combine.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—Might this not be a case where those six or more persons were all members of one firm, or would it mean six persons belonging to different firms? It might be six employees of the one man.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It does not go beyond the statement of six persons who could undoubtedly be under the same roof; but each has to make a distinct affidavit.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Would that be a combination, if those six persons each made affidavit to the same effect?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—It might be putting in the hands of one firm the power to injure another in business.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The six persons have to swear that they are themselves affected by the combine, and, of course, they would have to set out the ground on which they think it is in the public interest. I can very well understand that a leading spirit might gather around him a few followers; but it is an improvement on the old law where one individual could lay a charge.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 11,

11. Of the three members of the board one shall be appointed on the recommendation of the persons upon whose application the order has been granted, one on the recommendation of the persons named in the order as being concerned in the alleged combine, and the third on the recommendation of the two members so chosen.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As a general thing, one of the parties always appoint one of their own officers. The uniform practice with the workingmen is to appoint some officer of a trades union. I do not undertake to say that is wrong, but there is just this about it; the arbitrators who are appointed are supposed to be disinterested persons, and the result of this method of appointment is that in almost every case there is a failure to reach a unanimous decision. It seems to me questionable whether there should not be one of the parties who would be impartial.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Clause 15 provides for the appointment of a disinterested person.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 12, subclause 4,

4. The two members so appointed may, within seven days after their appointment, recommend the name of a judge of any court of record in Canada who is willing and ready to act as a third member of the board, and the minister shall appoint such judge as a member of the board, and if they fail or neglect to make a recommendation within the said period, or such extension thereof as the minister on cause shown grants, the minister shall, as soon thereafter as possible, select and appoint a judge of any court of record in Canada to be the third member of the board.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Looking at the Interpretation Act, I notice in the province of Quebec one of the higher judges would not act—a judge of the court of appeal.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Our system is, of course, different from that of the other provinces. Our judges are called superior court judges.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Why should not one of the higher judges of the courts in Quebec be authorized to act?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Because the court of appeal would thus be disorganized. We have six judges in the court of appeal, and the sixth one sits in the court of King's Bench, criminal side. There are four sessions in the district of Montreal, and as many in the district of Quebec, so those matters are generally left to the superior court, where we have quite a number of judges.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Do your judges in appeal occasionally go on circuit?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—They never go. They sit in Quebec or Montreal hearing appeals, with one detached for the criminal side.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—Why should it be confined to judges? Why not take somebody else?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—There are very large interests to be considered, and the judges are parties who have left the active life and commercial connections, who are in the serene atmosphere, and who have the judicial mind.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—Do they draw pensions as well?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—No, they are judges in active life.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Are all the judges in the serene atmosphere?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Of course, they remain human beings.

The subclause was adopted.

On clause 15,

15. Before entering upon the exercise of the functions of their office the members of the board shall take the following oath:—
I,... .. ..,do solemnly swear,—
That I will truly, faithfully and impartially perform my duties as a member of the board appointed to investigate.. .. ..
That I am a British subject.
That I have no direct pecuniary interest in the alleged combine that is to be the subject of investigation.
That I have not received nor will I accept either directly or indirectly any perquisite, gift, fee or gratuity from any person in any way interested in any matter or thing to be investigated by the board.
That I am not immediately connected in business with any of the parties applying for this investigation, and am not acting in collusion with any person herein.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would point out to the hon. member for Halifax that this will not meet the objection which he mentioned a few moments ago, and which the hon. member from DeLorimier thought would be met by this clause.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The last paragraph of the section covers it.

Hon Mr. POWER—Does the hon. gentleman suppose that the taking of this oath, together with the provision in clause 13, would prevent partiality?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I would say so—'immediately connected in business' would exclude the attorney of any party.

Hon Mr. LOUGHEED—It would not exclude one of the arbitrators who considered he had a grievance against a combine—that is to say it does not warrant the impartiality of the arbitrators who may be appointed.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The oath is that he will faithfully, truly and impartially exercise his functions.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The six or more gentlemen laying the charge could suggest an arbitrator quite as much interested and biased as themselves.

Hon Mr. DANDURAND—I readily recognize that if the public is directly interested it would be hard to find a consumer who would be absolutely disinterested.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am pointing out the fallacy of the view that is taken that the arbitrators are absolutely impartial.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Speaker)—It says there that they shall faithfully perform the duties.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—At any rate, I should imagine the last clause would exclude the attorneys of any of the parties.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 21,

21. Whenever, from or as a result of an investigation under the provisions of this Act, or from or as a result of a judgment of the Supreme Court or Exchequer Court of Canada or of any superior court, or circuit, district or county court in Canada, it appears to the satisfaction of the Governor in Council that with regard to any article there exists any combine to promote unduly the advantage of the manufacturers or dealers at the expense of the consumers, and if it appears to the Governor in Council that such disadvantage to the consumer is facilitated by the duties of customs imposed on the article, or on any like article, the Governor in Council may direct either that such article be admitted into Canada free of duty or that the duty thereon be reduced to such amount or rate as will, in the opinion of the Governor in Council, give the public the benefit of reasonable competition.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—This is a reproduction word for word of the Customs Act as passed in 1907, with one phrase added after the first word 'wherever,' the words 'from or as a result of an investigation under the provisions of this Act.'

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I suppose the clause of the former Act has been repealed?

The clause was adopted.

On clause 22,

22. In case the owner or holder of any patent issued under the Patent Act has made use of the exclusive rights and privileges which, as such owner or holder he controls, so as unduly to limit the facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing or dealing in any article which may be subject of trade or commerce, or so as unduly to restrain or injure trade or commerce in relation to any such article, or unduly to prevent, limit or lessen the manufacture or production of any article or unreasonably to enhance the price thereof, or unduly to prevent or lessen competition in the production, manufacture, purchase, barter, sale, transportation, storage or supply of any article, such patent shall be liable to be revoked. And, if a board reports that a patent has been so made use of, the Minister of Justice may exhibit an information in the Exchequer Court of Canada praying for a judgment revoking such patent, and the court shall thereupon have jurisdiction to hear and decide the matter and to give judgment revoking the patent or otherwise as the evidence before the court may require.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not suppose this interferes in any way with the conditions and provisions of the Customs Act regulating the price at which an article patented in the United States or any other country would be admitted to Canada. My hon. friend no doubt knows that the customs law provides that an article shall be entered for duty at the price at which it is sold in the county in which the patent is effected. In other words no deduction for royalty or anything else shall be made in the invoice price of the article imported.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—No. This would not interfere.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Has that been considered?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—That has been considered; but that would prevent the holder of the patent imposing conditions upon the users of the patent that they will only purchase such articles as will be sold or furnished by holders of the patent as in the case of the United Shoe Company, where the owner of the patent organized a combination or a combine by which he monopolizes the sale of a number of articles under his patent, and holds the user of his patent as his slave, so to speak, or his tributory for the purchase of quite a number of other articles under his patent.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Other articles from whom? What other articles?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Articles that are required in a particular business. A holder of a patent which is used in the making of a certain article, like a shoe for instance, may make contracts by which he will force the user of this patent who pays him a royalty and purchases from him quite a variety of articles outside of his patent, which the user of his patent absolutely needs, and makes him a willing or unwilling purchaser, but forces him to become a purchaser of a various number of articles which the owner of the patent, who has organized the combination, forces upon him.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I suppose that will settle some cases that have arisen lately in Quebec?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I mention it because it is a case in point.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I observe that the report of the Board of Investigation will not be conclusive, so far as any revocation of the patent is concerned; nor need it be accepted by the Exchequer Court as even throwing the onus on the patentee to make good the charges against him. It seems to me this question should have gone further than it has, and it should have provided that the onus would be upon the patentee to support his patent in the face of the finding of the Board of Investigation. It seems to be a work of supererogation, so to speak, for the Board of Investigation upon the hearing of counsel and upon the hearing of all the evidence, to make a report if that report is to have no effect upon the Court of Exchequer. It simply gives the Court of Exchequer jurisdiction apparently to consider the revocation of the patent.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It puts the onus on the government. This is a forward step which does not void the common law, nor does it do violence to private rights of individuals. It denounces to the government a certain abuse of a right, and it throws upon the government the obligation of proceeding in the Exchequer Court.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It seems to me superfluous to go about it in that way. If this were the finding of a court in the first instance, the onus would fall upon the appellant to set aside the judgment against him; but not so in this case.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—No, because this is simply an investigation.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is an investigation; but it has all the effect of a trial. In fact, I venture to say the investigation would be quite as elaborate, if not more elaborate, and certainly it should be as binding as the finding of the Court of Exchequer inasmuch as the board of investigation consists, or is constituted of three members, all represented by counsel—the party having the grievance, and the party against whom the grievance is, all appearing before the court, and what more elaborate machinery can be furnished by the Court of Exchequer to make further investigation?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—If my hon. friend will read the preceding clause he will find that the use of counsel, if I am not mistaken, is optional. The board is not required to compel both parties to appear before it by counsel.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I thought we had not yet reached the portion of the Act which dealt with that; possibly we may.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Probably that was the reason why some parties may appear and some parties shall not appear, and, while there is great force in what my hon friend is contending for, if there was what you might call a regular trial, where it was simply an ex parte decision, one party being heard by counsel, and the other without, he would not then desire to have it regarded as of equal value to the finding of the court, would he?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Well, that same remark might apply to the Exchequer Court. A party to a suit in court is not bound to secure counsel. Of course, if he does not, he takes it on his own risk.

Rt. hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—As a matter of fact, he always does.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But there have been cases where parties have appeared even before the higher courts without counsel. However, it seems to me that, once a report is made by the board of investigation, it should be obligatory upon the Minister of Justice, or the government, to set the proceedings in motion before the Exchequer Court. It seems to me it is obligatory to set machinery in motion for the revocation of a patent. How is the Minister of Justice to be set in motion? No provision is made in the Act for that? That is to say, immediately a report is made, and it is quite apparent from that report that a clear case has been established, it seems to me that it should be obligatory upon some representative of the government to test this matter in the Exchequer Court. It is proposed that a fiat is to be sought?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I should imagine that as a rule he would do so. Of course the word is, 'may'; but the hon. gentleman knows that that is practically translated 'shall.'

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Besides, the hon. gentleman will see that there is a clause in the Act which gives a chance to the offender to put himself right, so that in this case if there is such a report against the patentee, he will undoubtedly have the same advantage as any other offender, and if he sees that he is offending, then there is no reason to go any further.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What is the clause?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I read the clause.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—So far as proceeding further is concerned, it seems to me that is not an element in the matter at all. That is to say, if there has been established a case against the patentee, it is not for the board, nor yet for the government, nor yet for the Minister of Justice to consider whether the patentee is going to repeat the offence. It seems to me that, under the Act, he has forfeited his right, and all the privileges that surround his patent by the Crown, and the case then should be tried by the Court of Exchequer not to try whether he is going to repeat the offence, but to decide whether he has not forfeited the right which the Patent Act gives to him.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—But the hon. gentleman does not suggest that the patent would be revoked ipso facto, does he?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Oh, no; I do not.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Because other serious interests might be involved; therefore it is but proper that the tribunal in which is vested the protecting or cancelling of patents be made to intervene.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Oh, yes; I do not make any exception to that; I simply assert that the Court of Exchequer should be treated as a court of appeal, and that the patentee should be treated as an appellant appealing from the finding of the board.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I think a clause is provided to that effect.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It is this, that the Exchequer Court, in acting as a court of appeal, will not be precluded from hearing other evidence; but the Exchequer Court will, no doubt, accept the judgment as being a prima facie case against the person who had offended against the Act.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Without closing the door to further evidence?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Without closing the door to further evidence.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This clause can only affect people holding patents in Canada. It would not reach a patent held by a person in the United States who was selling to a person in Canada conditionally that he should only purchase that which was necessary to carry on a business, or any other article from him. That could not be reached under this clause, because the article is produced by a patentee outside the country, and he might make what disposition he pleased of it; so that this clause would only apply to the holder of a patent in Canada.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—But they are all on the same footing.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, they are not. I understand all the patents in Canada are; but I am talking of a foreign patent. That is, if you went to the United States, and purchased an article, this provision would not reach that case, even if the person who was selling it to the Canadian makes any stipulation he pleases as to purchasing from him other than what might be necessary to carry on business; so that it simply declares that an individual holding a patent forms a combine with himself and the person who purchases from him. Whether that is covered by the interpretation clause I do not know.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—But the hon. gentleman will see that section 22 deals with the holder of any patent issued under the Patent Act. Of course, it is not dealing with a patent issued in the United States—

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understand that.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Which cannot be reached; but which has no effect here. No foreign patent has any effect in this country unless it is issued under our Patent Act.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Supposing the hon. gentleman has a patent. Under that patent he sells goods to a third party. Where is the competition coming in? Where is the combine?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Speaker)—That is not touched. It is only where he sells an article, in which his patent is used, with other articles. The combination will be in exacting that the other articles which he manufactures, which are not subject to the patent, shall be used in connection with it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is, he forms a combination with himself?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Speaker)—Yes, or with the manufacturer of those other articles that are used in connection with his patent.

The clause was agreed to.

On clause 23,

23. Any person reported by a board to have been guilty of unduly limiting the facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing or dealing in any article which may be a subject of trade or commerce; or of unduly restraining or injuring trade or commerce in relation to any such article; or of unduly preventing, limiting or lessening the manufacture or production of any such article; or of unreasonably enhancing the price thereof; or of unduly preventing or lessening competition in the production, manufacture, purchase, barter, sale, transportation, storage or supply of any such article, and who therafter continues so to offend, is guilty of an indictable offence and shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding one thousand dollars and costs for each day after the expiration of ten days, or such further extension of time as in the opinion of the board may be necessary, from the date of the publication of the report of the board in 'The Canada Gazette' during which such person so continues to offend.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There is nothing here to cover the case of leasing or otherwise taking over.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Leasing would have the effect of unduly restraining trade. The hon. gentleman will find that the scope of this clause is not limited by the omission of the word 'leasing.'

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This is the clause to which I called attention when we discussed the meaning of the word 'combine' in the interpretation clause. If I understand this clause, it will have the effect which I pointed out when discussing the meaning of the word 'combine' in the interpretation clause.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND — Accurately speaking, the hon. gentleman is right.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman's reply does not cover the objection I took.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—If the effect of the leasing is not to restrain trade, then there is no objection or reason in punishing the leaser. It is only if trade has been restrained.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Speaker).—Leasing with such a result.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Clause No. 2 defining combines includes leasing and otherwise taking over; but when you provide for the punishment of the offence, you do not say anything about leasing and otherwise taking over.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The combine may take any of those various forms; but if the hon. gentleman will read clause 23 again he will see that it has the effect which is aimed at.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That effect might be arrived at quite as well by including the word 'leasing.' If production alone is sufficient, why do you put the other words 'manufacturing, supplying, purchasing, barter, sale, transportation, storage and supply?'

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The offence is lessening the production by any means you please. Leasing is simply a mode. There is no necessity of including that word.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If you prevent production by purchase, sale or manufacture, why do you not include leasing? That is a loop-hole.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I do not see that the adding of any of those words would strengthen the clause. They would simply be harmless.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If the clause means the same without the use of those words, well and good; but if you specify the manufacture and purchase, you should also specify leasing.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Why is section 498 not inserted instead of clause 23, or why not repeal section 498 and substitute clause 23? There should be uniformity between the Code and this clause. Section 498 defines almost precisely a similar offence; but there is a slight difference. There should not be any discrepancy between the two. Take, for instance, lines 18 and 19 'unduly restraining or injuring commerce.' That is not the Code. It need not be done unduly under the Code; but you use the word 'unduly' here. The criminal law now is that any injury or restriction of trade is an offence and punishable; here it must be unduly injuring or restraining trade. Why was not uniformity observed in drafting the clause?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I can readily understand that the provisions of this Bill being applied to conditions that are new and new developments of trade, should be wider in their terms than the terms of the Act itself. It would be felt by a number of people in the country, and it was so stated in this Chamber by the hon. gentleman from Ottawa, that this was an undue intervention in the various manifestations of trade. The Criminal Act is much more severe as it stands.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Because it does not say 'unduly.' It says to restrain or injure trade or commerce. Clause 23 says:

Of unduly restraining or injuring trade or commerce in relation to such article.

So that we will have three arbitrators who will be required to go into the whole aspect of the question, and after a thorough investigation decide whether it is an undue restraint of trade. That is why I say this clause is not so severe as the Criminal Act.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Quite the contrary. We have two offences. One under the Criminal Act which makes it an offence to restrain or injure trade or commerce. There need be no degree about it. That is an offence, consequently a contravention of the Criminal Code is very much more easily made than a contravention of the Bill now before us; because the Bill now before us involves a question of degree. Under the Bill, you might injure or restrain trade, and it would not be a violation of the law; but to do it unduly you have to go beyond the point of restraint or injury, and you have to do violence, so to speak, before it becomes a penalty under this Act. Under the Code it is an indictable offence, and liable to a penalty not exceeding $4,000, and under this the penalty is not exceeding $1,000 and costs for each day after the expiry of ten days. We have two offences before us. I object to that. I object to those two coming into conflict. Let us assume that a charge is made against the combination for injury and restraint of trade. That is an offence under the Code, but it would not be an offence under this Bill, because you would have to go further with this Bill.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The Criminal Act is more severe.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, it is less severe. It does not require any degree. So long as there is a restraint of trade, it is an offence under the Criminal Act. Under this Bill there must be a continuous restraint. It seems to me those two clauses should be brought into harmony.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I stated that the Criminal Law was more severe than this Bill. We agree on the premises, but not on the conclusion. The criminal law is, that if I restrain I am guilty; but under this Act I must do so unduly in order to be guilty. I say this is a milder form than the Criminal Act, and it seems to me that when we are trying to reach any combination by which the public may suffer, it is but just that we should remain somewhat within the Criminal Act. But the offender under this Act is given a chance to reform. He may reform within ten days after the report has been published, and go scott free, while under the Criminal Act, if he is brought before the magistrate and there is a condemnation, he is found guilty and punished. We are not now discussing a modification of the criminal law. Let the Criminal Act stand without emasculation, but we are stopping short of the severity of the Criminal Act.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Which law would prevail if that clause were not repealed? According to the statement made by my hon. friend on my left, the Criminal Code provides for punishment under certain conditions. The hon. gentleman tells us that this clause makes the offence of restriction of trade less criminal than the new law. Now, if they both stand upon the statute-book, under which law is the complainant to act or the judge to decide? Is the party who complains of an undue combination to enter the complaint under the Criminal Code or under the provisions of this Act? I have a distinct recollection of the discussion that took place at the time the Criminal Code was passed. Under the influence and suggestion of the late Sir John Abbott in this House the word 'unduly' was inserted in the Criminal Code. It was argued in the Commons that the word 'unduly' was of such an elastic character that the parties forming the combination could carry on their operations with less probability of being complained of or fined and punished under the law than if the words were out; and as my hon. friend says, the Commons struck out the word 'unduly,' in order to meet combinations no matter of what character or how limited they might be in their operations. I must confess that I am in favour of this clause as it stands. It is not so restrictive as the old law. There was a conflict of opinion between the Senate and the Commons. The Commons thought the word 'unduly' should not be in the Act. I notice the Commons have accepted the modification of the law, but would it not be well, in order to have a uniform Act or an Act under which when brought into force no conflict would arise, that clause should be repealed or this should be amended?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The hon. gentleman has asked under what law would a party offending be punished? It all depends upon the first step taken. If the information is laid before a magistrate, he will be punished under the Criminal Code.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The hon. gentleman admits they are separate offences.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then I point out this peculiar situation that arises in consequence. A man is prosecuted under the Bill we are now considering, and he is fined a thousand dollars a day during the continuance of the violation of the law. He is then brought up under the Criminal Code and fined $4,000, and a couple of years' imprisonment if they are separate offences. I think they should not be separate; they are practically identical, and consequently, to have a proper law upon our statute-book, these two should be brought in harmony.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—We are not now amending the criminal law.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We should.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It might be quite interesting to decide in regard to altering the criminal law when we come to it. I am not in favour of altering the criminal law on this point, and perhaps it would have been better to alter the two clauses, but I agree with the hon. gentleman from Hastings as to the advisability of amending the provision here in preference to the criminal law. I have in mind the case of a large merger recently organized, in which the production of the article has been considerably restricted, in order not to flood the market and depreciate the price of the article. Undoubtedly the article I have in mind has not depreciated in value because of the diminuation of production; but these are all questions which would fall under the purview of a tribunal, and although there may be a restraint of trade, there cannot be in the mind of the business men of Canada an undue restraint of trade.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Speaker)—If there is a restraint of trade under the Criminal Code it can be punished, although that restraint of trade may not be undue restraint. The case here is a case where undue restraint may be found, but there is no penalty unless the restraint is maintained and continued after the adjudication. There must be an undue exercise of the offence bringing about that effect, and it must continue for ten days, because the penalty only comes in after the ten days.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The fallacy is so manifest that I wonder at my hon. friend discussing it. Where an offence has been created under the Code, instead of prosecuting that offence, because the duty lies upon the government to see that the Criminal Code is enforced and the law observed, notwithstanding the violation of the Criminal Code this Board of Investigation will deliberately go on and investigate a case, going beyond the Criminal Code. The absurdity of it, so far as public policy is concerned, is quite apparent.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Speaker)—I am not finding fault with that, and I am not saying that at the proper time it may not be reasonable to repeal that section of the code, though it is not dealing with the offence here. The offence here is continuing it for ten days, after it has been ascertained that the offence was committed.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But my hon. friend forgets that the board of investigation cannot make a report against the offence complained of except there be an undue restraint, or injury.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Speaker)—Quite so, and there is no penalty unless that is persisted in.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will my hon. friend pardon me if I go further and say this: Although the board be apprised that there has been a contravention of the Criminal Code, a deliberate violation of the law, yet they are powerless. They have to go beyond that point, before they prepare the report and find that the ofence has been committed.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—And if the offending party conforms himself to the finding within ten days, he goes scott free, but not if a complaint is laid against him before a magistrate, and then he may be punished although he had already conformed to the law.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Will the hon. gentleman answer me this question: Suppose a person is complained of under the Criminal Code, could the party who is accused of offending under that law, invoke, in justification of what he is doing, the provision in this Bill?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—That would be two seperate and distinct tribunals.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is what I say. Two separate and distinct trials. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman in charge of this Bill, why there is so much objection raised to repealing that clause. My hon. friend says we are not dealing at the present moment with the Criminal Code. That is true; you are constituting under this law, an offence—a limited offence in comparison with that which is provided by the Criminal Code. Now, you have not hesitated to change the Customs Act. You have made provision here as to what should be done in case of these combinations restricting the trade and raising the price. A little has been added to the clause of the Customs Act, and in the latter part of this Bill a clause of the Customs Act is repealed. Why not apply the same principle to the Criminal Code.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—There is no question about it, this Act is creating another offence than that which is contemplated by the criminal law. It is for the obdurate, for the persistent offender for ten days after the 'Canada Gazette' published containing the finding of the board, so that this is a new offence which may leave intact the action of the criminal law.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If a new offence is committed, it is the same Act.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Speaker)—No, it is not the same at all.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The greater includes the less.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I cannot for the life of me see why these two clauses—one in one law, and one in another should continue in order to meet what is supposed to be a controversy on the true principles. The question of making two offences, in my opinion, has nothing whatever to do with it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Will the hon. gentleman allow me to say that the Code is made for the purpose of punishing offenders, while this Act is made for the purpose of relieving the restraints of trade?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The absurdity of it appeals to my mind to such an extent that it seems almost grotesque in this regard. This Board of Investigation proceeds to investigate the restraint of trade. It reaches a point that it is quite manifest there has been a violation of the Criminal Code, and that the person who has violated it is subject to a fine of about $4,000, and a couple of years in the penitentiary. They are not satisfied with that. They simply brush that offence to one side. They say: 'We cannot do anything; we are looking for something more serious than that; we are looking for something on which we can base a report, so that we will publish the report in the 'Canada Gazette'. Now, omitting for the moment the fine for the contumacy, so to speak, of repeating the offence for ten days after the report, they proceed beyond the point of the Criminal Code, for what purpose? Simply that they may prepare a report, and having prepared that report, and inserted it in the 'Gazette', there is nothing more done. Let us assume that the combine ceases at that point. They have deliberately violated the Criminal Code; they have deliberately subjected themselves to the pains and penalties embodied in the Criminal Code, yet the combine investigation does nothing; the Minister of Justice is not set in motion; the machinery of the criminal law stands still; nothing is done at all, while those three gentlemen go in pursuit of something very much more serious than a violation of the criminal law, the offence to be visited in what way? To have the pains and penalties of the criminal law visited upon the offenders? Not a bit of it, but simply that they may prepare a report and insert it in the 'Canada Gazette,' and there is the end of it.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Speaker)—I want to put myself right about this, because it seems to me there is a fuss kicked up about this section that ought not to be. So far as the Criminal Code is concerned, it deals with an offence, which is the restraint of trade, and the public can prosecute under the Criminal Code, and call for punishment under that Act. That is not the design here. This is a provision to prevent undue restraint of trade; and if on the investigation under this law it is found that there is not merely a restraint of trade that will be punishable under the Criminal Code, but that there is an undue restraint of trade, and that after that finding, there is a persistence in it, then there is a direct means applied of punishing that persistence itself as an offence against this Act.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Very good for the moment, as to the persistency of the parties. But why stop at the finding of the report?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Speaker)—The finding of the report is that there must be an undue restraint. It is not merely a restraint of trade, but an undue restraint.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We already have a law for the purpose of punishing for the restraint of trade, let alone the undue restraint.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Speaker)—Quite true. There is that law, but for the purpose of enabling this report here to be enforced, in order that the finding of this tribunal shall not all go to the winds, provision is made for enabling that disposition of the case to be enforced; therefore, if there is a finding of an undue restraint, and that undue restraint is persisted in for a period of ten days after the finding is published, there is a punishment attaching to it. They are two separate things—one a criminal case which is open to prosecution by anybody, and this other which is only open in case there is an investigation and inquiry under the provision of this Act, and a finding, and after that finding the offence if it is persisted in for ten days.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Suppose there is a finding of unduly restraining trade, and that offence is punished, could the offender be punished once more under the code?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—He would be punished, because he refused to abide by the finding of the court under this law, and not for having transgresed the law; and he may be punished under the Criminal Code for nothing but an offence in the past, while here he may be punished for disobeying the finding of the law, and ten days after the 'Canada Gazette' publishes the finding refuses to abide by it.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The trouble with me is this, that it provides that a man may be subject to indictment under the criminal law for having acted in restraint of trade, and that this restraint of trade might not be an undue restraint of trade.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Suppose I do anything that is an undue restraint of trade, I am punished for that. I could be punished again for that same offence under the Criminal Code.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—No court would punish a man more than once for the same offence.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The Department of Justice is responsible for the drafting of a Bill of this kind, and I would suggest that we go through the Bill with the understanding that the point will be further considered by the Minister of Justice before the third reading, because, as far as I am concerned, I think we should not have on our statute-book such a thing as a distinction between restraint of trade punishable under the Criminal Act which would not be considered an undue restraint of trade under this Act.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman says the Minister of Justice takes the responsibility of this. We have nothing to do with the Minister of Justice. If he is doing all the work there is no necessity of us sitting here to-night. Would the hon. gentleman take a note of the point and ascertain from the Department of Justice if there is likely to be any conflict between the two provisions?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I will.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that he will consider the advisability of preparing an amendment to bring these two clauses into harmony?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I propose to draw the attention of the Minister of Justice to this question and discuss it with him.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 41,

41. All expenses of the board, including expenses for transportation incurred by the members thereof or by persons under its order in making investigations under this Act, salaries of employees and agents, and fees and travelling expenses of witnesses, shall be allowed and paid upon the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor, approved and certified by the chairman of the board, which vouchers shall be forwarded by the chairman to the registrar. The chairman shall also forward to the registrar a certified and detailed statement of the sittings of the board, and of the members present at each of such sittings.

Hon. Mr. POWER—With respect to the costs of investigation before these boards, as far as I can make out, the expenses in every case are to be paid by the state. Take the case where frivolous charges of an undue combine are made against say the cement merger. If, on investigation, it is found there was no substantial foundation for the charge, it does seem to me that the party who fails, and who had not good and sufficient grounds for making the charge, should pay the costs. Why should the country be put to the expense of paying the costs and in that way encouraging frivolous charges? If the charge is made good, the parties against whom it is sustained should pay the cost. It does not seem fair or statesmanlike to make the country pay the costs in every case.

Hon. Mr. JAFFRAY—The Bill provides that in every case the prosecutor is entitled to have the costs paid, however frivolous the charge may be. No provision is made for the party against whom the charge is made, while every provision is made for the prosecutor. It is very unfair and one-sided.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—This machinery must be started in motion by a petition to a judge, backed by six affidavits. Now the judge examines this petition, and if he finds sufficient in it to warrant him going into an examination of the complaint he does so; otherwise he dismisses it. So far there is no cost upon the complaining parties. If he thinks the affidavits and the petition are sufficient for him to go one step further, he makes a preliminary investigation. The parties are obliged to make out a prima facie case. They are obliged to establish before the judge that there is an undue restraint of trade, to the satisfaction of the judge, and to the point of allowing him to report in favour of an arbitration. The judge does not need to call upon the respondents to appear before him or to join issue with the complainants. He investigates as far as he believes justice and equity should lead him to.

And up to the moment when he makes his report to the registrar of the court, there are no costs on the defendant. It is an exparte application. It is true that the judge may give the respondents a certain notice of what is going on before him if it pleases him, order him to produce books or some evidence which he needs, but he may go on investigating and allowing the complainants to make their case. It is for them to accumulate a sufficient number of facts to satisfy the judge that there should be an investigation by arbitration. So far there are no costs to the respondent, and if the judge decides there shall be an arbitration, the Minister of Labour will ask both parties to appoint their arbitrators and costs are incurred by both parties, and up to that moment there are no costs to the respondent.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think if my hon. friend will look at clause 7 he will see that his objection is met there. Under clause 5 complaint must be made under certain conditions, and the judge considers it, and if he considers there is no case, he will not go on with it.

Hon. Mr. JAFFRAY—Even in going before a judge, they are allowed to have experts and lawyers, and the defendant will be obliged to have his lawyers and witnesses in order to prove that there is not a case, and he will be at that expense, and the prosecutor is provided for. I am not opposed to the Bill, but when we are considering an important measure like this, we should take care that it is fair for both sides, and that the defendant is treated as fairly as the prosecutor.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I am informed that the hon. gentleman is in error when he speaks of the prosecuting attorney being paid by the country. It is the counsel who is there to assist the arbitrators is being paid, but not to act for one side or the other, and the parties suing or the parties defending can only appoint counsel with the authorization of the arbitrator in virtue of the clause in the Act which has been read.

Hon. Mr. POWER—While that may be true, practically, in important cases where there are large interests at stake, both parties will be represented by counsel.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It is the same rule as if the parties were prosecuted under section 498 of the Criminal Act. They would have to engage counsel to defend them; but they would have to pay their own counsel. In all matters dealing with criminal offences, or offences of a criminal nature, no provision is made as to costs.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Where is there any provision as to the sittings of the board?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The board may sit whenever they choose.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Clause 24.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The jurisdiction of the court shall be apparently according to the jurisdiction of the particular judge who has been appointed as to summoning witnesses and so on, and would be limited to the province in which he lives. I do not see any provision by which that jurisdiction should be exercised throughout any part of the Dominion, because the board will be peripatetic in a sense. They will travel from one end of the province to the other. There should be a clause giving them jurisdiction throughout the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It is true that a complaint may be lodged in British Columbia against a company whose head office is in Toronto.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Subsection 2 of section 7 it appears to me might be interpreted in a limited sense. It reads:

2. The judge shall have all the powers vested in the court of which he is a judge to summon before him and enforce the attendance of witnesses, to administer oaths, and to require witnesses to give evidence on oath or on solemn affirmation (if they are persons entitled to affirm, in civil matter), and to produce such books, papers or other documents or things as the judge deems requisite.

The judge that may be appointed would be a provincial judge. His jurisdiction would be of a provincial character, not extending beyond the province in which he exercises that jurisdiction, and it seems to me there should be a clause to make that workable.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Clause 7 applies to the judge before whom the petition is presented originally, and not to the judge appointed by the two arbitrators or appointed by the department, who will sit as a presiding officer in the arbitration. That will come under clause 32.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It seems to me that the clauses in the Act dealing with royal commissions should have been incorporated into this Bill instead of merely providing that the jurisdiction should have been the jurisdiction of say a court of record, because those are provincial courts, and they are very limited in their character.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I think so. I think the Minister of Justice should be consulted about this.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—Yes, and while you are consulting him, will you ascertain if anything would happen if this Bill did not get its third reading to-morrow; because I do not think it is a very good Bill. In my opinion it ought to be more carefully considered before it becomes law, because we will all get into trouble.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—A cheese combine, for instance.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I would take it for granted that a judge to be appointed would be selected with a view of his being near the office of any establishment which would be concerned, so as to have near at hand all the necessary data for the holding of the investigation.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But he may have to run away out of his jurisdiction.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS from the committee reported the Bill without amendment.

MORNING SITTING.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it do stand adjourned until to-morrow morning at eleven o'clock, to sit from eleven until one as a separate sitting, and another sitting at three o'clock in the afternoon.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (No. 145) An Act to amend the Railway Act.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Will the right hon. gentleman inform the House what is the purpose of this Bill, and what it proposes to amend?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It is an omnibus Bill.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The Bill appears to provide for certain appeals and certain other matters of that kind in connection with the Railway Act, and with the powers of the Board of Railway Commissioners. I am not prepared to expound the legal aspects of it, but as we go on in committee, I think we shall be able to find out.

The motion was adopted.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Bill.

On section 1,

1. Subsection 3 of section 56 of the Railway Act chapter 37 of the Revised Statutes, 1906 is repealed and the following subsections are substituted therefor:—

3. An appeal shall also lie from the board to such court upon any question which in the opinion of the board is a question of law, upon leave therefor having been first obtained from the board within one month after the making of the order or decision sought to be appealed from, or within such further time as the board under special circumstances shall allow, and after notice to the opposite party stating the grounds of appeal; and the granting of such leave shall be in the discretion of the board.

3a. No appeal, after leave therefor has been obtained under subsection 2 or 3 of this section, shall lie unless it is entered in the said court within thirty days from the making of the order granting leave to appeal.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Until this session, there was no time limit for the giving of leave to appeal. The Minister of Railways asked the father of this amendment, Mr. Lancaster, to explain that section, and he explained it as follows:

Until this session there was no time limit for making of application for leave to appeal. The board passed rules from time to time which, however, they found they could not enforce very well. The latest rule made a limitation of 14 days, but they found that they could not always hold people to that. Besides, we all agreed that it was necessary to have a statute fixing the time. So, it was made as here proposed that application shall be made within one month and the appeal must be prosecuted within thirty days after leave to appeal is granted. These limitations were thought reasonable so that an appeal cannot be kept forever hanging over either the railway company or any other party to a case before the board.

The section was adopted.

On section 7,

7. Section 276 of the said Act is amended by adding thereto the following subsection:—

2. The board, upon the application of any company or person, shall have power that this section shall not apply to any particular trains or classes of trains, or to trains running on any specified portions of the railway of the company: Provided that no such order shall be made with respect to trains engaged in shunting or switching, or in yard or terminal movements.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This is open to some doubt. A great many accidents happen in that way. Section 276 is as follows:

Whenever in any city, town or village, any train is passing over or along a highway at rail level, and is not headed by an engine moving forward in the ordinary manner, the company shall station on that part of the train, or of the tender if that is in front, which is then foremost, a person who shall warn persons standing on, or crossing, or about to cross the track of such railway.

It does seem to me that that is a salutary provision in the present law, and I have great doubts as to the wisdom and propriety of altering it.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—It does not apply to shunting or switching.

Hon. Mr. POWER—But where a train is moving backward with an engine in rear there should be some one on the car in the front.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—There is a positive clause for that.

Hon. Mr. POWER—When a train is not headed by an engine moving forward in the ordinary manner, then the company shall station a person on that end of the train to warn persons crossing or about to cross the tracks. A great many accidents happen under these conditions, and I doubt the wisdom of the board being allowed to make exceptions.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—In another place, when this section was under discussion, the Minister of Railways made the following explanation:—

Mr. GRAHAM. Brakesmen have been, and are compelled to stand on the rear of an engine that is running backwards. Cases do occur where light engines are sent twenty or thirty miles backwards.

Mr. LANCASTER. Why does the engine have to go backwards?

Mr. GRAHAM—It may be that there is no place to turn, or the engine may be ordered to go back to assist a freight or to render assistance at a wreck, and she is sent back twenty or thirty miles. Cases have been brought to my attention where men have almost frozen to death while standing on the rear of the tender. The idea of a man riding on the back of a tender is to protect the public at crossings where they are shunting. This caluse protects all that because, it requires the railway men to remain on the back of the tender when they are shunting. but it does relieve them from remaining on the back of the tender when they are on these long runs.

Mr. LANCASTER—The object of the Act is that people will naturally suppose that an engine is going the way it is headed, and, therefore, when they see an engine facing east, they will go west to get behind it. I do not want to oppose it if the minister thinks it is absolutely necessary to trust the board in this regard, when an engine is headed west people will naturally suppose that it is going west when it may be going east. It is natural for a man to assume that an engine is heading in the direction in which it is pointing, but when he drives up he may find that it is going the other way. I can understand that there may be exceptional cases, as where there is a wreck, and it is impossible to turn the engine round, and it must be run down the line twenty or thirty miles. If this provision is necessary, I will consent to it only with the understanding that the board see that the privilege is not extended or abused.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is quite true in running through a country district; but if hon. gentlemen will look at section 276, it applies to a city, town or village:

Whenever in any city, town or village, any trains passing, etc.

And I must say that I am in grave doubt as to the wisdom of a change in that.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—My hon. friend no doubt is right, too; at the same time, I think we have had pretty good experience that the Board of Railway Commissioners will be very cautious about granting these powers unless there is due cause shown. They have been exercising a very rigid supervision over most of these railway companies, and I am told that the severity of the supervision increases every day.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Speaker)—While that is so, it would be an unfortunate thing to relax the rule in reference to shunting trains. In cities and towns where there are large numbers of people—and I have in mind a place where thousands of people cross the track every hour——

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—It would not apply in towns.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Speaker)—Yes, cities, towns and villages.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—(Reading):

Providing that no such order will be made with respect to trains engaged in shunting or switching, or in yard or terminal movements.'

Hon. Mr. KERR (Speaker)—But there are trains that come in and go out, where there are forty or fifty trains a day passing a thoroughfare like that up till late hours at night. I have in mind a fearful accident that happened at one of those crossings, where one or two persons were killed within a short period last year, and there might have been a great many more people killed; it was a marvel there were not. After all the discussion we had about the subject of trains and so on last year, we left that matter to the discretion of the board, but I confess that while I think it is a dangerous power to give, it is just as well that we should not relax the rules in reference to it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Perhaps the right hon. gentleman will let that clause stand.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Any contentious clause I will let stand until to-morrow.

The clause allowed to stand.

On clause 8,

8. Subsection 4 of section 294 of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:—

4. When any horses, sheep, swine or other cattle at large, whether upon the highway or not, get upon the property of the company, and by reason thereof damage is caused to or by such animal, the party suffering such damage shall, except in the cases otherwise provided for by the next following section, be entitled to recover the amount of such damage against the company in any action in any court of competent jurisdiction, unless the company establishes that such animal got at large through the negligence or wilful act or omission of the owner or his agent, or of the custodian of such animal or his agent: Provided, however that nothing herein shall be taken or construed as relieving any person from the penalties imposed by section 407 of this Act.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What is the difference between that and the present Act?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I understand from the Minister of Justice that its purpose is to extend the liability of railway companies in the event of their own default. At the present time railway companies may default under any section of the Act. Section 427, in addition to imposing other liabilities, renders a railway company liable for any damages that may result by reason of its default under any section of the Railway Act, that is to say, if a company violates any section of the Act, and damage is caused thereby, under section 427 the railway company is ostensibly liable for that damage; but unfortunately it has been held, and held repeatedly, that notwithstanding the provisions of section 427, there are certain sections of the Act which the railway company may violate without being under the necessity of paying the damage apparently provided for by the wording of that section. The sections I refer to are 254 and 249, more particularly section 254. Reasoning back from these sections through their history in the older Acts, the courts have come to the conclusion that notwithstanding that a railway company may be in default under section 254, and may thus be liable for damage under section 249, the class of damage to which it is liable is not as general as that to which it is liable for violating any other section. Section 254 provides that the railway company shall fence its railway, and maintain gates and cattle guards. The limitation to which I call attention has the effect of restricting the violation of these provisions to such damages as result in the killing or injury of cattle by the company's negligence or wilful act or omission. Under the old law that was the only liability, and the courts have held, notwithstanding the provisions of section 427, that the company is still limited, in the case of a violation of section 254, to the same liability as it was formerly under; that is to say, it is only liable if by reason of its default animals are killed or injured through its negligence or wilful act or omission. A large class of damages may result and have resulted which do not come within that old limitation—damages occasioned by animals which have got on the track through the default of the company in failing to maintain fences, gates or cattle guards—damages to neighbours' crops or other damages which the company escapes. In a case with which I was connected animals got on the railway track through the absence of a fence, ran down the track and were injured so as to be useless by having their legs broken on a bridge, and the courts held that the railway company was not liable because no damage was done through their negligence or wilful act or omission. Many other cases occur. For instance a company is bound to fence its right of way so as to keep all cattle out, and the term cattle,' includes sheep. This the companies have refused to do in certain cases, and as a consequence the farmer who owns sheep has either to go out of the sheep busines or run grave risk of damage, because his sheep can get through the railway fences, and do injury to his neighbours' crops. Under the present amendment the railway company would be liable for all damage done by their default in these respects, the same as under any other provision of the Act. There is a provision added at the end of section 8 in the following words:

Provided, however, that nothing herein contained shall be taken or construed as overriding the provisions of section 407 of this Act.

Section 407 of the Act has the following language:

Every person who—
(b) except as authorized by this Act, without the consent of the companies, rides, leads, or drives any horse, or other animal, or suffers any such horse or animal to enter upon the railway, and within the fences and guards thereof; shall, on summary conviction, be liable to a penalty of $20 for each such offence.

He is also liable for various other offences, such as leaving gates open, taking down parts of a fence, or turning animals loose. When my original Bill was before the Railway Committee, just at the moment when it was accepted, this provision was placed before me for my approval.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK, from the committee, reported progress and asked leave to sit again.

SECOND READING.

Bill (204) An Act to authorize the erection of certain wharfs and buildings in the harbour of St. John.—(Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.)

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Before the Senate adjourns, I wish to raise a question of privilege, which may be a questionable question of privilege, and to draw the attention of the Chamber to a statement made by the hon. senator from Grandville, which I read in 'La Patrie' of this evening. The hon. gentleman, in a French speech in this House, a very eloquent speech, which most of the members unfortunately could not follow because it was not in their mother tongue, said that he was prepared to meet any one who would challenge him in single combat in any county in the province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What weapons were mentioned?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—As a candidate in any county. The next day the member for Montmagny, the old county of my hon. friend, sent a telegram to ' Le Soleil ' of Quebec, offering to resign his seat here and to contest the seat with him. This evening I see an interview in ' La Patrie ' where the hon. gentleman states that he would not condescend to meet this gentleman, but that he would be ready to meet either Senator Dandurand or Senator Beique if they would abandon their seats in the Senate and to contest with him any county in the province of Quebec. I should like to know from the hon. gentleman if that was his statement?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I am very glad to have an opportunity to give an explanation. When I was in Quebec on Saturday morning I was told there was a telegram sent to a Quebec paper from the member for Bellechasse and the member for Montmagny to the effect that they had said that I was willing to go on the hustings, and I have sent for the paper so that I can discuss the question. That is what I said in French, and I repeat it now, and I am willing to do it. I did not receive this telegram. It was not sent to me, but sent to the Liberal paper in Quebec, and the proprietor of the paper over the telephone told me about it, and I said: ' I have no objection to your publishing that ' and the telegram was published. I answered that I thought it was a bluff; that it was not serious and was not sent to me —simply joking. I said it was not my habit to fight children. The whole matter was laughed at. This morning I was shown a copy of ' Le Canada ' of Montreal, which reproduced this despatch from ' La Soleil.' I was asked about it. I saw the reporter of ' La Patrie ' and he put that question to me. ' Le Canada ' is under the tutorship of Senators Dandurand and Béique. I am willing to go on the hustings and discuss the naval question with them. I did not say anything to them about fighting children, because they are serious men. I said to the reporter of ' La Patrie,' ' They are serious men.' I did not say I would resign my seat. If they had made the same proposition as Mr. Talbot, I would have said, ' I am ready to go on the hustings with you and discuss the question.' I am still ready to do it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND. The hon. gentleman makes a distinction between going on the hustings and resigning his seat.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—If the hon. gentleman will send me a challenge in that regard he will get an answer to suit him. Here is a telegram from Mr. Talbot:

Senator Choquette, in his speech yesterday in the Senate against the Navy Bill, said he was prepared to defend his position on the hustings.

He said: ' If Senator Choquette will resign his seat in the Senate I will resign mine and we will go to Bellechasse '. I said I was willing to go on the platform and discuss the question. I did not intend to go further, because I said, to show my sincerity, that I was willing to go on the hustings and discuss the question, and this morning I said the same thing. My colleagues in the Senate, who are the guardians of ' Le Canada ' in Montreal, are serious men, and if they submit to me the same proposition as Mr. Talbot has submitted, I am willing to discuss that question and go on the hustings and defend what I said. I told them this morning I said that, and they took it as a joke—the same kind of a bluff as Mr. Talbot made.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—If the hon. gentleman declares that he did not, either in this House, or in ' La Patrie ' offer to resign his seat in the Senate providing Senator Béique or myself resigned our seat, of course the matter ends there. When I heard the hon. gentleman was serious about challenging some of his colleagues in Montreal, I went right away to the member for Hochelaga and asked him if he would not lend his seat, resign his seat in Montreal in order that I could invite my hon. friend to contest it with me. The hon. gentleman from Hochelaga has given me authority to do so, and I was ready to meet my hon. friend there, or perhaps in very many other counties; but I selected Hochelaga, because it is half English and half French, and then we would have a small plebiscite which would reflect the public opinion on the naval question.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I hope my hon. friend from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette) will not do anything quite so rash as to sacrifice himself in that manner. His presence in this House would be lost to the government and to this Chamber, and particularly to those of us on this side of the House, and I would further remind the hon. gentleman from Grandville that if he did anything so reckless as to resign his seat in this Chamber, though he should succeed in the country and my hon. friends from Delorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) and DeSalaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) should not succeed, they would find the gates ajar for them, while they certainly would be closed against my hon. friend from Grandville.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—The hon. gentleman naturally chooses ground where he is well known; but if he has a serious proposition to make to me, he knows where I live and I may tell him that I will consider his proposition and will satisfy him completely.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I am offering to take Hochelaga because the hon. gentleman would not take Montmagny.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I think a challenge should be sent to the hon. member from Rockland, who also differed from the government.

The Senate adjourned till 11 a.m. tomorrow.

THE SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 3, 1910.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Eleven o'clock, a.m.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

INSUFFICIENT ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS.

MOTION POSTPONED.

The order of the day being called.

By the Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE:

That he wishes to call the attention of the government to the fact that the answers which were, on March 17 last, given to the different questions asked by him to the government, and reported in 'Hansard' on pages 509 and following, are not sufficient answers to certain questions, and that the answers so given to a certain number of these questions are incorrect and such as to mislead this honourable House and the country.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—As there is nobody here representing the government, I shall let this motion stand.

The motion was allowed to stand until the next sitting of the House.

COST OF MILITARY FORTS AT QUEBEC.

INQUIRY POSTPONED.

The order of the day being called.

By the Hon. Mr. LANDRY:

1. How much have the works of construction of the military forts situated at Beaumont, near Quebec, cost up to this date?
2. Are the works in question finished?
3. If not, at how much is their completion valued?
4. What is the number of men actually employed on these works?
5. How much did the armament of these forts cost?
6. Are there any guardians appointed for the care of these forts?
7. Who are they and their annual salary?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I suppose the answer must come from the government, and we will let this stand until the next sitting of the House. If we receive an answer this afternoon we might prorogue to-morrow.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Before the orders of the day are called I wish to make a personal explanation. As this House knows, I expressed my views the other day on the Naval Bill. In return through the press I was challenged by members of the other House to resign my seat and contest an election with them, because of the fact that I stated that I was ready to discuss that question on the hustings of the province and elsewhere, and I am still ready. Yesterday morning I had an interview with a representative of a Montreal paper, who drew my attention to the fact of this challenge, reproduced in 'Le Canada' and I said to him that I had treated it as a joke, and continuing to discuss the matter in the same strain, I said that if serious gentlemen like the hon. member from De Lorimier. (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) or the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Beique) tutors to 'Le Canada,' would send me the same challenge, I would go to the hustings with them. Last night, before adjournment, without any notice, even when I was outside of the Chamber, the hon. gentleman from De Lorimier saw fit, though I am told it was rather as a matter of joke than otherwise, to issue a challenge to me to resign my seat and run an election in the county of Hochelaga. Well, I have been accustomed to stand by my guns, and on this question I am still more decided to stand by my guns. On the other hand, I wish to have a square deal and a square fight. The hon. gentleman from De Lorimier has chosen——

The SPEAKER—This seems to me to be really out of order.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Why?

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman was present when the statements were made last night, and made his explanation, and now, in the absence of the hon. gentleman from De Lorimier, he is making a further explanation. It seems to me to be out of order to bring it up now. These are not matters which affect the Senate so far as I can see at present—not public business.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—With all due respect to his honour the Speaker, it is a matter affecting my position as a member of this House, and I wish to explain in answer to the challenge, which I was not aware of at the time, that if my hon. friend is serious and wishes to test the feeling of the electorate on this question, and issues a challenge, and gives me a square deal to have a political duel as any other duel —but there must be conditions——

The SPEAKER—I am sorry to interrupt, but I must call the hon. gentleman's attention——

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Then I will move the adjournment of the House.

The SPEAKER—This is a vexing question. It is entirely out of order to issue a challenge across the floor of the House. It is a matter to be done outside the House.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Though not in order, I wish to add a word or two. I have not sent a challenge to the other hon. gentlemen; I have received one, and I wish to put the matter right, and I say that, under fair conditions, I am ready to accept the challenge, if the hon. gentleman will choose a county where we will have equal chances, but not to choose a constituency where the hon. gentleman has the organization in his hands, backed by the government and money, and more than that his seat kept open if he is beaten. If he will make a square deal with me, make conditions that it will be a county where we shall have equal advantages, I am ready. I am willing to concede that it may be a seat now in the possession of friends of the government. If the hon. gentleman will agree not to take back his seat if defeated, or not go to Paris as Mr. Fabre's successor, or take a seat now occupied by some member supporting the government, as the hon. gentleman will represent the government in the fight, and if the government is willing to take the stand, that if the hon. gentleman is defeated, the government should recall the Bill next session, I am prepared to accept the challenge.

Hon. MEMBERS—That is a fair proposition.

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman is entirely out of order.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—It may be; but here are my principal conditions for a square political fight, and my hon. friend may act on it.

THE NAVY BILL.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the orders of the day are called, I wish to direct attention to a remark of the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Beique) in a speech that he made in reply to a statement made by me. I would like to set myself right, and I fancy I will be in order. In the speech of my hon. friend, he used this language.

The hon. gentleman has, to my great surprise, insinuated that the Prime Minister, and possibly some of his colleagues, have ulterior motives in presenting this Bill; that it is intended to create a Canadian navy in view of the future independence of this country. I respectfully suggest that it is hardly becoming for an hon. gentleman occupying the position he occupies to make an insinuation of that kind.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I made no insinuation. I stated my firm belief that that was the ultimate object they had in view. I may be wrong, but that is my honest conviction, and I had a right to express it.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I accept the hon. gentleman's statement. In my humble opinion, however, much as I may respect the hon. gentleman, he is not warranted by the facts in expressing an opinion of that kind.

I desire to put upon record my reasons for making that statement and the views which I have upon this subject. If the hon. gentleman will refer to 'Hansard' of 1882, pages 1142, 1143, and 1144, he will find the following passage:

In the year 1889 I stated in the presence of the government what I stated in Boston, that in my estimation the conduct of Great Britain and the conduct of Canada had been unworthy of the civilization both of Great Britain and Canada. I hold out to my fellow countrymen the idea of independence, but whenever the day comes it must come by the consent of both countries, and we shall continue to keep the good-will and feeling of the motherland. If we are true to our record we will again exhibit to the world the unique and unprecedented example of a nation by slow degrees and as natural as the severing of the ripe fruit from the parent tree. Is there a Canadian anywhere who would not hail with joy the day when we would be deprived of the services of British diplomacy. The hon. gentleman opposite would no doubt prefer an English shilling to a Yankee dollar? But for my part I am differently constituted. I am ready any day whether I am charged with annexation or not to take a Yankee dollar in preference to an English shilling. I have again and again repeated that the goal of my aspirations is the independence of Canada, to see Canada an independent nation in course of time.

Had I any intimation that the premier had repudiated those sentiments, or that he had changed his opinion on that subject, or had he denied the accusations thrown at him across the floor during the debate on the Navy Bill in the House of Commons, I would never have made the statement that I did; and the very moment I can ascertain that he has changed his mind on that question, for my own satisfaction and for the honour of the position I hold, I am willing to withdraw any expressions or charges that I have made on that subject. These are the reasons I had for giving utterance to the remarks that I made; so that the charge of my hon. friend that I was not warranted in making such a statement, and that I had no justification for the opinion that I expressed, is one that I leave for the House to judge.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I know that the quotations which the hon. gentleman has now given were from a speech purporting to have been made by the Prime Minister many years ago—31 years ago, in fact—in another place; and when I made the remarks to which reference was made I was aware of that. There is no question that in the case of the Prime Minister, as in the case of all leading men in the House, reference may be made to opinions expressed many years ago which may not be the opinions held by them to-day. For instance, it is well known that speeches made by the late Sir John C. Abbott could be cited not only in favour of independence, but in favour of annexation to the United States, and like expressions from a number of public men in this country could be quoted.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middlesex)—Cartier, too.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I did not intend to criticize the hon. member for saying that the premier had a number of years ago expressed opinions of that kind. What I intended to say was, that when a measure of this kind is introduced by the Prime Minister of this country, and when he gives his reasons in support of the measure, as he did, and as he was bound to do, that it is not open to an hon. member in this House, or in any other place, to suggest that the Prime Minister is actuated by ulterior motives. That is the only remark that I make.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is just this difference between the case which my hon. friend has cited, and the case of Sir John C. Abbott, and Sir Alexander Galt: they both disavowed afterwards that they had any such intention after their opinions changed. The Prime Minister has not done so.

LIGHTING OF SENATE CHAMBER.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—Before the orders of the day are called, I would like to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this building is poorly lighted. I hope, if we are spared by Providence to come back again, that this Chamber will be lighted, so that we can all see at night as well as by day. A bright room has a cheerful appearance, makes people look better and feel happier, and I will very much regret, if spared by Providence to come back here next session, to find the Senate Chamber so unsatisfactorily lighted.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I hope the leader of the House will call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the fact. The other night when I was trying to read an extract here, it was utterly impossible, although my eyes are tolerably good, to read ordinary print.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I will call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the matter, and hope the lighting of the Chamber will be improved.

VOLUNTEER BOUNTY ACT.

THIRD READING.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the third reading of Bill (No. 163) An Act to amend the Volunteer Bounty Act. He said: With respect to the third reading of this Bill, it was understood that the particular clause which referred to the loss of certain bounty warrants would be explained. I think I mentioned yesterday to the House that the minister states that those particular warrants had been lost, and that on representation, he had allowed various parties enumerated in the schedule to take possession of the lands taking from them bonds to the amount of $3,000 apiece; that in the event of the scrip being found, and parties taking possession of land as owners of it, these people would indemnify the government. It is not desirable that that bond should be extended beyond the 31st of December of the present year.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The bond expires on that date?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Nor is it in the interests of the parties themselves that it should extend longer, as the bond lasts only till that time.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax).

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time, and passed.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION BILL.

THIRD READING.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the third reading of Bill (No. 101) An Act to provide for the investigation of Combines, Monopolies, Trusts and Mergers, which may enhance prices or restrict competition to the detriment of consumers.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—As was understood at the last sitting of this honourable House, I had a conversation with the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Labour in connection with the suggestion made by the hon. leader of the opposition as to striking out the word 'unduly' in clauses 22 and 23, and they both agree that the word should be struck out so that it will make these clauses conform with section 498 of the Criminal Code.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What about clause 18? The word 'unduly' is there also.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It should remain in that section. It has no connection with the restraint of trade in that clause. The Bill has been examined all through, and clauses 22 and 23 are the only two from which the word 'unduly' should be struck out. Attention was also called to clause 32, as to the powers given to the court, and although that clause might be sufficient, because the court is vested with all the powers of a court of record in civil cases and the Exchequer Court, which is a court of record and general jurisdiction throughout the Dominion, the Minister of Justice admits that it would be better to add a few words in order to remove any doubt there may be. I therefore suggest that the words 'from any part of Canada' be added in the fourth line of clause 32. It will read: 'Enforcing their attendance from any part of Canada'. That will remove any doubt which may exist. A further suggestion was made by the hon. member from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) that the word 'leasing' should be inserted in clause 23. The suggestion was considered, with the result that no such change should be made. It will be noticed that in subsection (c) of clause 2 of the Bill, where the word leasing is used, it is used in an accessory manner and merely for the purpose of better defining the interpretation or scope which is given to the words 'manufacture, production, exportation, selling or supplying thereof.' Clause 23 should, in my opinion, be left as it is. It does not require any amendment, and that is the view also of the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Labour.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If I understand my hon. friend, the definition the interpretation clause gives to the words 'competition of' controls the significance which could be exercised by leasing or otherwise taking over. It is only qualifying what the restraint is. Those words qualify what is meant by restriction, and when it comes in clause 23 it comes with the meaning given in the Interpretation Act.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—So really clause 23 comprises in the words used the signification put upon them by the interpretation clause?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Exactly. I propose now, with the leave of the House, to move that the amendments I have suggested be made.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman must see that that would establish an objectionable sort of precedent, because while the House might be willing to accept one or two amendments, they might not be willing to adopt the other, and the better way is to put them separately.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE moved that clause 22 be amended by striking out the word 'unduly' in the second line on page 7 of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The same word occurs in the third line.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It must remain there.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Why is the word 'unduly' struck out in one case and not in the other in the same clause?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The difference is this: the word 'unduly' where it is intended to strike it out, comes before the words 'to restrain or injure trade or commerce.' It is to make it conform to the Criminal Code, which does not use the word 'unduly.' If anything is done in restraint, or to the injury of trade or commerce, it being a criminal offence under the Criminal Code, it would not be right to require that it must be unduly, because it is treated as a criminal offence. The word 'unduly' later on in the clause, comes before the words 'to prevent and lessen competition.' There are a great many things which may have the effect of lessening competition, but it might not be done unduly. It might be unduly, but it is not treated as an offence by the Criminal Code, and there is no reason, to my mind, to strike out the word 'unduly' there. It is properly in its place, and the hon. gentleman will find that in the Criminal Code itself, section 498, it reads in the way I have mentioned.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It has to be in conformity with that.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Yes. You see there are four subsections, and in three of them the word 'unduly' is to be found, whereas in one of them relating to restraint of trade and commerce, the word 'unduly' is not to be found, and very properly so, and this clause is made to conform to the Criminal Code.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I understand from the hon. gentleman that he has submitted his amendments to the Minister of Justice and Minister of Labour, and that they approve of them?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Yes.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon Mr. BEIQUE moved that the word 'unduly' be struck from the fourth line in clause 23.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE moved that clause 23 be amended by adding after the word 'attending' in the fourth line thereof, 'from any part of Canada.'

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In clause 18 I find the following:

18. The board shall expeditiously, fully and carefully inquire into the matters referred to it and all matters affecting the merits thereof, including the question of whether or not the price or rental of any article concerned has been unreasonably enhanced, or competition in the supply thereof unduly restricted.

That, if I understand the clause, simply refers to the duty of the board appointed to consider this question, and how far those words 'unduly restricted' comport with the consequences of a combine. Would that restrict the board in the examination of these particular offences mentioned in the clause after the words unduly restricted? We have struck out the words unduly restricted in two cases for the purpose of bringing the different clauses into unison, so that there would be no conflict between the two. Would the word 'unduly' in the 18th clause not have the same effect in the legal sense?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I do not think so.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a third time and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

WITHDRAWN.

The order of the day being called:

Resuming the further debate on the motion for the second reading (Bill CCC) An Act to amend the Criminal Code.—Hon. Mr. Casgrain.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY—The hon. gentleman who moved the adjournment of the debate, the hon. gentleman from De Lorimier, not being present, I take the liberty of saying a few words on this subject. I know the closing hours of the session are precious, and I will govern myself accordingly.

Touching this subject, I ask the privilege of reading a couple of short letters I received a few days ago. I would direct particular attention to the one from the typographical unions, a body of men who take rank at the top amongst the industrial class, and this because their avocation brings them into close communion with the deliverances of the brightest minds in the world:

London, April 7, 1910

Mr. Thos. Coffey,
Senator.

Dear sir,

Local Union No. 289, journeymen plumbers and steamfitters of London, at their regular meeting, April 5, 1910, authorized me to convey to you our protest against the passing of Senator Belcourt's Bill, which received its first reading on March 17, 1910.

Trusting this will receive your earnest consideration.

I remain,
Yours truly,
G. F. AVERY,
Secy. Local Union 289.

189 Waterloo St.,
London, Ont.

London, Canada, April 5, 1910.

Senator Thos. Coffey,
Senate of Canada,
Ottawa, Canada.

Honourable sir,

The attention of London Typographical Union has been called to Senator Belcourt's Bill (CCC) which comes up for its second reading on the 7th inst., in the Senate of Canada.

We, as British subjects, and members of London local of the International Typographical Union, herewith vigorously protest against the passing of said Bill (CCC).

At the present time the Dominion of Canada is on the high tide of prosperity, and immigration is keeping pace with the march of progress. We, as loyal Canadians, are welcoming the foreigners into our local unions, as you, the government, are welcoming them into the country.

The passing of such a measure as said Bill (CCC) would practically place all free-born Canadians and British subjects in one class and the foreigners in another. This, honourable sir, is not the method of free-thinking Canadians and is to be deplored as such.

Trusting you will do all in your power to discourage the passing of such a measure, I have the honour to be, on behalf of the London Typographical Union,

Your humble servant,
WM. O. RUSE,
Cor.-Sec., I.T.U. No. 133.

14 Walnut St.,
West London, Canada.

This Bill of my hon. friend from Ottawa is in small, very small compass. It is the lineal descendant of a Bill placed before us a few years ago by the hon. member for North Wellington, an hon. gentleman whose motives no one will question. It has a spotless outer garment, pleasing to the eye, because it would fain bestow a privilege, or, rather, preserve a liberty of action for British subjects denied to others. But to me, hon. gentlemen, it possesses all the qualities of a dangerous explosive. It is a Bill of dwarfish proportions, but a destructive portion of the dynamite may be put in a tiny parcel. Its ostensible purpose is to give us, as British subjects, a wide and long field of action, but fellow-unionists among us who may have sworn fealty to the American republic are handicapped thereby. In the minds of many good men in the country—in the minds of many men of sterling mould in the Senate of Canada—there is a strong and sincere belief that emissaries from the states of the American republic come amongst us with the avowed purpose of sowing the seeds of discord—of sowing tares in Canadian wheat. True it is, that from across the border may come to us undesirable citizens. Equally correct would it be to state that in this phase of intercourse there is reciprocity. And I do not deny that Canadians, and Americans, too, should have, in this matter—if I may use the phrase of an hon. gentleman not in this House—'adequate protection.' But I fear we shall ever have the race of malcontents as long as human nature is what it is. We shall ever have a few disgruntled, mischief breeders who have a charred past and a bleared future. The aim of this Bill, it seems to me, is to deal a blow at international unionism. Its promoter, I doubt not, is possessed of the best of motives. He would be an angel of peace in the work-a-day kingdom. From my view point the opposite would be the result if his Bill becomes law. It would expand the volume of strife—it would force a new and aggravated form of bitterness into the industrial clash of arms—it would cast a flashlight of irritation into the camp of the warring forces of capital and labour. In the controversy between these two elements in our nationhood it will be, to the impartial observer, ever apparent that the fault is never wholly on one side. Detestable conditions at times may be formulated by workers. Equally detestable demands may be made by the holders of capital. We should treat each case as we find it, dealing out simple justice to all parties, and I am pleased that we have in our Canadian government a machinery for this purpose which is looked upon with equal favour by the working world and the employing world. Please permit me, hon. gentlemen, to impress one fact upon your minds: The American branch of international unionism has never, to my knowledge, sought to promote strikes in Canada. International officers will tell you that strikes are always the last resort, and, when they do occur—when there is much bitterness and much unreasonableness on both sides—there is at once a serious depletion of the international union money chest to keep up the battle. I know international officials who have prevented, by their intervention, many a strike. About a year ago, in the city of Toronto, the job printers and the employers were at loggerheads. For one cause or another it seemed as though settlement were impossible. The international officers were appealed to, and a delegate visited the city. He gave a decision in the case. The men were dissatisfied and refused to abide by the verdict, whereupon the delegate told them they could strike if so minded, but, if they did so, no strike pay would come to them. Thereupon peace was proclaimed. This was the work of a man upon whom this Bill would impose disabilities. It was the work of a man we would keep out of the country, and who would be treated as a criminal were he to come amongst us. The delegates of the international unions are peace makers, not strike makers. If there are cases that appear otherwise, the delegate is unworthy his trust. Too often are the flotsam and jetsam of the labour unions taken as their accredited representatives.

We may be told that the regrettable commotion in the coal industry of Nova Scotia was a case which would justify the passage of this amendment to the Criminal Code. I do not intend to offer an opinion at this time as to the rights or the wrongs of the parties engaged in that desperate struggle for supremacy. But if I were to admit, for the sake of argument, that the coal mine owners were wholly blameless, and the workers the great sinners against industrial peace, would it be just to disrupt the present relations of the members of all other Canadian unions with the international bodies with which they are affiliated, and to which they pay willing tribute to the common good? We have too many cases of recrimination. Capital blames labour, and labour blames capital, for the prevailing unrest. It is notable that movements for the control of organized capital are tardy in the extreme. Movements for the control of organized labour come to the front with a gentle regularity which betokens a desire to weaken organized labour unions. Be it our duty to take a grip of the reins and control both with equal vigour. Evidence that capital often needs guidance in the path of rectitude, is furnished daily in the news of the world.

But yesterday we heard of mergers, combines and trusts. Let us give them the same heroic treatment we give the workers in the shops.

Let me say, gentlemen, in conclusion, that I heartily desire a peaceful and satisfactory adjustment of the differences now existing between capital and labour. If we are to have an adjustment, we must approach the subject with a kindly spirit. Capitalists must meet their workers on a common platform, as man to man, as free and independent Canadians. The workingmen must meet their employers with becoming consideration for their interests. If we bring about conditions of this kind, and we all hope that such will be the outcome, we shall remove the prop of the detestable anarchistic spirit; we shall likewise remove the prop that is supporting the citadel of socialism.

I feel it my duty, therefore, hon. gentlemen, to move that Bill (CCC) be not now read a second time but, that it be read a second time this day six months.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I take great pleasure in seconding the motion of my hon. friend if he will permit, for reasons too numerous for me to recite to this honourable House at this late stage of the session. The question involved in the amendment of my hon. friend from Ottawa is pregnant with momentous consequences. The labour question is one which is, and of necessity, must be dealt with with delicacy and prudence. I do not for one moment contend that the labour organizations are at all times correct in the attitude they assume; but I have to admit that they have grievances against capital, grievances that bring us back to the remote ages of history. Capital and power have been in the past unjust to men of lower status in the community. Formerly, slavery existed, then serfage, then people were put in bondage, as it were. Then came the long weary hours for the labourer, ten and twelve hours a day—absolutely out of proportion to what other classes in the community give to the fulfilment of the law 'Thou shalt earn thy bread with the sweat of thy brow.'

The labouring classes have a long complaint, as I said before, against capital. They may now go too far. I believe in many instances they have gone too far; but, hon. gentlemen, that is the law of compensation. Where abuses have been great, and long continued, the reaction has always been excessive. The pendulum swings, and that is the law which prevails in matters of moral as well as of physical character. The pendulum has swung the other way further than it should or would have gone had it not been subjected to what I may call undue pressure. To make my remarks short, I hope that this Bill of my hon. friend from Ottawa, which is not without merit, but which it is too late for this or the other House to deal with this session, may be rejected. It may be taken up in a similar form next session, but for this session I trust that the motion of my hon. friend from London will be carried. Now, in substantiation of what I say, I shall read you a petition I have received from home, which is as follows:

Moncton, N.B., March 30, 1910.

Senator Poirier,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—The labour organizations of the city of Moncton desire to enter an emphatic protest against the proposed amendment (Bill CCC) to the Criminal Code, introduced by Senator Belcourt. If this Bill should become law, every trade unionist in Canada practically becomes guilty of conspiracy in restraint of trade, under S. 496, because there is hardly one local union in Canada whose members are all British subjects. So long as American corporations doing business in Canada know no such limitations, it is most unfair that international trades unions should be subject to any such restrictions.

Trusting that you will use your influence against this attempted injustice,

Yours very truly,

I will not say that my vote on this question is influenced entirely by this communication, but my opinion was confirmed, and it is one of the reasons why I take the liberty of insisting, so far as in my power lies, that this Bill be not passed to-day, but that it shall receive the six months' hoist.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—I understood that the promoter of the Bill asked permission to withdraw it, and I thought the House also understood so. In that case I hardly think a motion of this kind, in the absence of the promoter is fair to the hon. gentleman who introduced the measure. If it were done with his consent, it would be all right; but, in his absence, I think the House should permit the measure to be withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I understood that the hon. gentleman from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt) was going to drop the Bill this session. I stated at the time it was up before that I intended to speak against the Bill, and I am surprised at the motion made by my hon. friend. It would be better, I think, if he would withdraw his motion, and let the Bill die a natural death in the absence of the hon. gentleman from Ottawa. I rise at the request of the Hon. Mr. Verville, labour member from Montreal, and Mr. Draper, secretary of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, to correct an error which occurs in the reported speech of the hon. gentleman from Halifax. Mr. Verville drew my attention to the following paragraph in that speech:

I may inform honourable gentlemen who are not aware of the fact, that in the Springhill mine, a mine which has been completely in the hands during the past year or two of the United Mine Workers, the average wages amounted to $3.36 per day. Some miners were making as much as six dollars a day, I believe, but the average wages of the coal miners were $3.36 per day of not more than six hours. The men were very comfortably housed, and looked after, and really had no substantial complaint of any kind to make. The more important strike was, of course, down in Cape Breton. There there was some bloodshed, and if the troops had not been called out and despatched to Cape Breton immediately on the beginning of the trouble, there probably would have been very serious disturbances.

I am asked to correct this statement about the wages, and further to read the following telegram that has been put in my hands. As I said before, I am against the Bill, but there is no use in speaking against it, as the Bill is to be withdrawn:

Glace Bay, N.S., May 2.

P. M. Draper,
Trades and Labour Congress, Ottawa.

Statements of Hon. Mr. Power incorrect. 1,663 employees at Springhill, only 460 coal cutters, see page 214, August last 'Labour Gazette' for rate. All other employees paid day rate from 60 cents to $2. Last man trip lowered into mine 7 a.m., first raised at 3.30 p.m. Above conditions apply to 13,000 mine workers in Nova Scotia. Letter following. Communicate this to Cloran.

J. B. McLACHLAN.

I have read this letter, as I have been requested to do, to correct a misleading statement.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The statement that I made was, if I remember correctly, that there was a court held, under the Conciliation Act, at which evidence was taken as to the condition of things at Springhill, and notwithstanding this despatch which the hon. gentleman thought proper to read here, evidence was produced before that board showing that the average pay of the coal miners in Springhill was, as I stated, $3.35 or $3.36; and, further, I think it was made clear that the average amount of time spent in actual work in the mines by each miner in Springhill was only about six hours a day.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I know nothing about that. I leave the hon. gentleman to answer the labour organizations.

Hon. Mr. POWER—When the hon. gentleman proposed to contradict a statement I had made here, he should have let me know before doing so, and not take me by surprise.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I only had it just now, and I read it there. There is nothing in the telegram to say that it is wilfully incorrect. I have a right to put that telegram into 'Hansard'.

The SPEAKER—The motion is that the Bill be not read now, but that it be read this day six months.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would rather that the House would allow the Bill to be withdrawn, or let it drop.

The SPEAKER—Discharge the order.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, or discharge the order, as a matter of courtesy to the hon. gentleman who is in charge of the Bill. In introducing the Bill, the speech he made was very courteous. He said nothing that could offend any, no matter how strong their views might be. However, it is within the perfect right of my hon. friend who moved the six months' hoist to do so. I have no sympathy at all with the reasons advanced for moving the six months' hoist. The events that have occurred within eight or nine months in the coal mining district of Nova Scotia are sufficient to convince me that the time will soon come when it will be absolutely necessary for this country, in the interests of the business and trade of the Dominion, and in the interests of the unions and the men themselves, that some action should be taken by the legislature of this country to prevent Yankee interlopers from coming into this country and fomenting difficulties and troubles as they have done. Any one who has paid the slightest attention to the difficulties that have occurred in the coal mining districts of Nova Scotia, knows that the action that was taken by the union against what is to my mind the clap-trap about capital, was at the instance of the bosses in the United States. They come here very often in the interests of their own industry in the United States. I could give many instances, but I am not going to occupy the time, that transpired, and facts that came to light during the unfortunate strike, and I could show where the same things occurred in the states of New York and Pennsylvania. The bosses, or the heads of those unions, who control not only the unions in their own country, but the unions in this country, fail to put in force in the United States conditions which they demanded should be enforced in this country.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—Does the hon. gentleman make the statement that the union men come here very often at the request of the coal operators, the capitalists of the United States? Is that the statement?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, I do not make that statement. It may possibly be so; but that does not affect the point I am trying to make. I say that no foreigner should be permitted to come here and dictate to the labouring men of the Canadian unions what they should do, or what they should not do. That is the position I take. I simply enter my protest against that mode of conducting the affairs of the country. We have only to reflect for a moment that the strikers who are controlled and are being directed by foreigners, have been suffering almost starvation, many of them, during the last five months, and have at last been obliged to succumb and return to work. I deprecate that as much as any one. My honest convictions are that those labour unions, when controlled by foreigners, are more detrimental to the welfare of the labouring people of this country than otherwise. I do not use the word 'labouring class' with any disrespect, for every one labours, but to distinguish those who belong to the union. If my hon. friend persists in his motion, it has got to be carried on a division or by a vote. My view is that our own people should manage their own affairs without interference from foreigners. Let the hon. member withdraw the Bill, and let the order be discharged.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—When I rose to speak on the second reading of the Bill, I distinctly stated it was not my intention to move the second reading, so that I think my hon. friend from London has achieved a cheap victory in moving the six months' hoist. In the face of my statement, I think my hon. friend might have exempted himself from moving that motion. I had no intention of moving the second reading, so that there was no occasion for moving the six months' hoist. I do not think I can say anything more than I have said, except to express the hope that we shall soon settle a matter of very great importance, not only because of the present conditions, and facts which we know, but of the future, particularly the possibilities and probabilities which are involved in having labour unions in Canada organized and controlled wholly or partly from a foreign country. What we have now in the country has been on occasions deplorable enough; but when we consider what is possible and even probable in the future, what our children in the next generation have in store unless this troublous question is settled now, I believe we should seek at once a solution of the trouble. I introduced the Bill for the purpose of inviting a discussion first in parliament, and then throughout the country, in the hope that at some future time, with the assistance of the labour unions themselves—who are, I submit, just as much or more interested in the matter, and who have just as much at stake as capitalists, would give their very serious consideration to the whole question, and would help parliament and the rest of the country to devise some means to overcome this trouble. I have nothing more to add on the merits of the question, except to express the hope that between now and the next session, with the aid of the labour unions, parliament or the government will be able to devise some means to avoid the very great dangers that I believe are in store in the future. I shall have pleasure in moving with the Speaker's leave, that this order be discharged.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY—With the permission of my seconder I have no objection to withdraw the motion for the six months' hoist. I am not particular whether the Bill dies a natural death or a violent death, so long as it dies.

The SPEAKER—By the leave of the House, the motion is withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Chloroformed.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—I wish to put myself on record in connection with this Bill. I am opposed to the Bill in all its forms, and I am very glad that the mover of it said that the unions had as much right as capital. It is their only capital, and I cannot see why the unions of the United States and the unions of Canada have not as much right to amalgamate as the rubber trust, and the cement trust and all other trusts; and I am very glad to hear the father of this Bill admit that the unions have as much right to organize as the capitalists.

The motion was agreed to, and the order was discharged.

AID TO RAILWAYS BILL.

FIRST, SECOND AND TRIRD READINGS.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (No. 226) An Act to authorize the granting of subsidies in aid of the construction of the lines of railway therein mentioned.

The Bill was read the first time.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I was under the impression that the question of granting those subsidies so indiscriminately was to cease, but I suppose as the revenues increase so must these subsidies be increased in proportion. The proposition now before the Senate involves the sum of nine or ten million dollars, providing the subsidies are on the basis of $3,200 per mile. If, however, larger sums are to be paid per mile, it may involve an expenditure of $19,000,000 or $20,000,000. The worst feature in this proposition is that the subsidies which were granted four, five or six years ago are revived, yet no steps have been taken to show the bona fides of the parties to whom the subsidies were granted. In other words it leads one to the conclusion that the subsidies are to be given to people who have speculative charters. Had the subsidies been voted in aid of railways which have been chartered recently, they might be justified, but to revote them to projects which have been in existence for years, and with respect to which nothing has been done, is going a little too far. It is encouraging the speculator who secures his charter in the hope of inveigling somebody who has money into purchasing it. When the question was put to the Minister of Railways as to the probability of these roads being built, he could give but the slightest prospect that the projects would be carried out in good faith. He said:

> I imagine with respect to a great many of them that during the past two years or four years, as the case may be, they have not been able to get in a position to proceed with the work, but they think now that if the subsides are revoted—in fact they assure me that they think they will be able to proceed with the work.

That is not sufficient evidence to warrant the government in putting on the statute-books laws which may involve an expenditure of $20,000,000. However, the government have assumed the responsibility of doing that. I do not object to subsidizing any company which has a basis on which to carry on its work, but this constant renewal of subsidies to speculators who probably have not ten cents of their own to invest in the work, is carrying the thing a little too far. The sooner the government put a stop to these speculations which are going on and have been going on for years, the better for the country. I may not be in accord with others on this question, yet I object to the recklessness which we are displaying in granting money to aid speculators.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I am not in a position altogether to deny that there is force in the strictures which the hon. gentleman has passed on the Bill, and I myself individually have long been of the opinion that our practice of granting either subsidies or charters deserves revision, that neither this House nor the other House should allow charters to be granted to any parties unless there was clear evidence that they had behind them funds or men with capital to be able to proceed with the work. That is my individual opinion, I am bound to say. I have expressed it often, and have not altered it, and I shall certainly, as far as I can, advise that steps be taken to curb what the hon. gentleman rightly states has become an abuse, the indiscriminate granting of charters, and still more the pledging of public moneys to them. In this particular instance, the government, after looking into the matter, have thought they would run the risk of retarding a good many enterprises that are likely to go on and likely to benefit the country, and it may be, as is often the case, that along with the wheat tares have crept into the seed basket. That I cannot gainsay. He knows we are not in a position to amend these money Bills. We have to take them or reject them; and, under the circumstances, I think the House had better allow the Bill to pass and perhaps by next session I may be able to assure them that some measure is being devised to remedy the evils of which he complains.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman says that we have a right to accept this Bill in toto or reject it, but we cannot even accept it because it is not before us. I am not asking to have it in French, but I think at least we should have it in English.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think it has been sent to the members.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is just now arriving. I am ready to swallow it; but I want to know what I am swallowing. Is it ten or twenty millions?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It is very doubtful if any considerable amount of the subsidies granted will be earned or applied for within the next twelve months.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is only a sham Bill?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It is what these Bills have always been.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is that in view of a general election?

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—No, no election.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It may vary, if everything is applied for, from nine or ten millions to double that amount.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (No. 227) An Act to incorporate the Canadian Northern Alberta Railway Company and to aid in the construction of its railway.—Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

TELEGRAPH NEWS SERVICE BILL.

FIRST, SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (No. 228) An Act to assist in maintaining an independent and efficient service of telegraphic news from Great Britain for publication in the Canadian press.

The Bill was read a first time.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of the Bill. He said: This is a renewal of a subsidy formerly granted which is so arranged as to diminish from time to time.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—For how many years has it been running?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It has extended over five years, gradually diminishing.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What was the amount of the first?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—For the first twelve months it was $12,000, for the next $10,000, for the next $8,000, for the next $6,000, and for the last $5,000. As to the value of the service, the hon. gentlemen who are connected with the press can estimate it better than I can. The object is to have an independent service of telegraph news from Great Britain for publication in the Canadian press.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

The Senate adjourned till three o'clock this afternoon.

SECOND SITTING.

COST OF MILITARY FORTS AT BEAUMONT.

INQUIRY.

The order of the day being called:

1. How much have the works of construction of the military forts at Beaumont, near Quebec, cost up to this date?
2. Are the works in question finished?
3. If not, at how much is their completion valued?
4. What is the number of men actually employed on these works?
5. How much did the armament of these forts cost?
6. Are there any guardians appointed for the care of these forts?
7. Who are they and their annual salary?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Has my hon. friend the answer to this inquiry?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I might mention to the hon. gentleman that with regard to the cost of construction of the military forts at Beaumont, which the Department of Militia has under consideration, it is feared they will not be able to give the information, for certain strategic reasons, on two or three of the questions asked by my hon. friend.

CONTRACTS ON INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

INQUIRY.

The order of the day being called:

1. Were tenders asked for, in 1908 and 1909, for the purchase of railway sleepers for the use of the Intercolonial railway, and were contracts awarded to the lowest tenderer?
2. Who had these contracts, and what is the name of each tenderer, and also the amount of each tender?
3. Did the Department of Railways and Canals, in 1908 and 1909, award any contracts whatsoever for the purchases of the said sleepers, and what price was paid to each contractor, and who had these contracts?
4. In 1908 and 1909, did the Department of Railways and Canals ask for tenders for the purchase of sleepers made of spruce, white, gray and yellow, as well as of birch, ash, poplar, &c.?
5. What quantity of these sleepers, for each kind of wood, was accepted and paid for in 1908 and 1909, and does the department propose to continue the system of purchasing these kinds of wood?
6. Who bought these sleepers of spruce, birch, ash, poplar, &c., and who gave the orders to receive these kinds of sleepers, and who received them and stamped them for the Intercolonial railway?

7. In 1909 did the department ask for tenders for sleepers of cedar, cyprus and hemlock? If so, who had these contracts and were these contracts granted to the lowest bidders, and what quantities were actually furnished by each contractor?

8. What quantity of sleepers has been furnished up to this date—

(a) by the contractors for New Brunswick; and

(b) by the contractors for Nova Scotia and for the province of Quebec, respectively?

9. Did the government by order in council authorize Messrs. Pottinger, Burpee or Taylor, of Moncton, to purchase sleepers of spruce of all kinds and dimensions, and to cause these kinds of sleepers to be distributed in the district of Quebec, and notably in the district of River du Loup and Isle Verte?

10. What price did the department pay for the sleepers of spruce, hemlock, cedar, birch and poplar, &c.? Who is the contractor therefor? Who received and inspected the said sleepers?

11. Does the department know that these sleepers are absolutely unfit to be used in a railway, and that these sleepers are at the present time distributed along the Intercolonial railway to be used upon the main track?

12. How much a carload does the freight of sleepers sent from New Brunswick cost in the district of Quebec?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —With regard to these questions, I have applied for the answers, and the department has sent to Moncton for the information; but they inform me that it will take considerable time, as it is a long matter involving minute details, and it will be considerable time before they can hope to get it. They are endeavouring to obtain it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Under those circumstances, I would not want to keep the House in session until we get the answers. Perhaps we might make a compromise, and when the answer comes the department can send me a copy of it.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Certainly, I will do that.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—That will be beautiful. We will have them coming along all summer.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Oh no, I have stirred them up.

RAILWAYS SUBSIDIES BILL.

THIRD READING.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the third reading of Bill (No. 226) An Act to authorize the granting of subsidies in aid of the construction of the lines of railway therein mentioned.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I desire to ask a question in regard to this measure, but not to propose an amendment. I see that item 12 in the list of subsidies is for a line of railway from Grand Falls to St. John, New Brunswick, in lieu of the subsidies granted in chapter 40 of the statutes of 1907 and chapter 60 of the statutes of 1908, 228 miles. The point to which I desire to direct the attention of the right hon. gentleman is that there is already a railway from Grand Falls to St. John. It is controlled by the Canadian Pacific railway. That road is in operation, and I would ask by what line of argument the government were influenced to grant such a very large subsidy as this is for another road which will be simply running down the St. John river between the same points as the existing road?

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Does my hon. friend object to having a road down there?

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, I am not objecting.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—They have one to Halifax through a wilderness.

Hon. Mr. POWER—My point is, if the hon. gentleman listened to what I said, that there is already a road between these two points, running from Grand Falls down the St. John river to St. John, and I do not see why it should be duplicated.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—The question that my hon. friend has drawn to the attention of the leader of the government is one that perhaps interests the province of New Brunswick to a very large extent. It is significant that at the present moment the local provincial government has thought it advisable to subsidize a work of this character to the amount of $25,000 a mile. I do not understand that this is a new proposition or subsidy. It is simply a renewal of the subsidies that were recognized as being worthy to be made by parliament some years ago. The existing road to which my hon. friend refers, from Grand Falls to St. John, is a circuitous route, having grades that are difficult to negotiate, and the feeling in New Brunswick on that question is that the route from Grand Falls to St. John would be an outlet to the great western traffic. A road built upon the lines of the Grand Trunk Pacific, with four-tenths of one per cent grade would be a very great advantage, not to New Brunswick particularly, but to the transportation system, so much so that the legislature of New Brunswick has thought proper, in aid of the construction of such a work, to take upon themselves the responsibility of granting them $25,000 per mile.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—While we are anxious to see the whole Dominion opened up, we want to develop our own province, and we think this will make a direct line from St. John to Rivière du Loup, and divert a certain amount of trade from the Grand Trunk Pacific to St. John. The province of New Brunswick, even with their limited means, consider it sufficiently important to give $25,000 per mile towards the construction of that road, and I do not think the hon. gentleman can find much fault with the Dominion government for doing their portion to the extent of $3,200 per mile.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It will be a little more than $3,200 per mile.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passd.

CANADIAN NORTHERN ALBERTA RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the third reading of Bill (No. 227) to incorporate the Canadian Northern Alberta Railway Company and to aid in the construction of its railway. He said: This I may remark does not involve any addition to the charge now existing. It is the substitution of one company for another.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—When was this Bill sent to the committee?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Being a money Bill, it was not sent to a committee.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is it not a Bill of incorporation?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Yes, that is true.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It was read the second time this morning, but I thought it should have been sent to the proper committee. Is this a government Bill or is it a private Bill?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It is a government Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The title is to incorporate the Canadian Northern Alberta Railway Company and to aid in the construction of its railway.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It is not a purely private Bill, because it contains provisions for assisting the company in the construction of its railway.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It is to transfer a subsidy from one company to another.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But it is to incorporate a new company?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The first clause of the Bill is as follows:

> The Canadian Northern Railway Company having, by deed poll set out in the first schedule hereto, relinquished all its interest in the aid authorized by chapter 25 of the statutes of 1908, intituled 'An Act respecting aid for the extension of the Edmonton, Yukon and Pacific Railway' to be given by guarantee of certain securities of the Edmonton, Yukon and Pacific Railway Company, upon and after amalgamation of such company with the Canadian Northern Railway Company, the said Act is hereby repealed and the aid thereby granted is cancelled.

Then the third clause authorizes the Governor in Council to aid the construction of the railway.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If it is not an Act to incorporate the company, the title is wrong.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think the title is wrong.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It is certainly an Act to incorporate.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If so, is this the proper way to proceed?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I do not think it is.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is only fair to state that this Bill does not of itself directly incorporate the company; but it refers to two schedules, one of which is an Act of incorporation. On page 5 of the Bill you will find the usual Acts of incorporation, and it is the second schedule to this Bill. At this stage of the session, it would be rather awkward to attempt to incorporate by the usual methods.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —If my hon. friend requires it, we can go into Committee of the Whole on the Bill, and go through it clause by clause.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Would it not be well if the right hon. gentleman would tell us what the Bill means? It begins by saying that Mackenzie and Mann surrender certain rights which they possess. Do I understand that Mackenzie and Mann have a right to build the road mentioned here, and that they have surrendered the claim to subsidies granted them in the past, and that the government assume the responsibility of taking it off their hands and building the road themselves?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —As I understand, it is practically an exchange of securities. The former company have received certain guarantees from the government. Those guarantees amounted to not more than $15,000 per mile. They propose to exchange these, I understand; but for the purpose of exchanging them it was found expedient to create another company by whom a somewhat larger amount per mile might be expended, although the amount of the grant would not be increased. That, I understand from the minister, is the object of the Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then the old charter is repealed, and you organize under this law a new company?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is, William McKenzie, Donald D. Mann, David V. Hanna, and other officials of the road offer to carry on and build a road from Edmonton westward to the Yellow Head pass, and then a branch down to another section?

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—They had a charter in the first instance, granted some time ago, to the town of Edmonton, which McKenzie and Mann acquired, and that permitted them to go to Tête Jeune Cache, or Yellow Head pass, or whatever you call it, and then on from there to the Yukon, and they acquired this charter five or six years ago.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not to the Yukon?

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Yes, to the Yukon. This charter carries them to the Yukon.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It was the extension of the Edmonton, Yukon and Pacific railway.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I am now speaking of what I am aware of; and they got a subsidy from the government in the first instance for the fifty miles on the Broken Plains, or whatever you call it, and then they acquired the charter. They were not the original grantees of the charter.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then this is a surrender of all the rights they had under the old charter, and constituting a company to go on with the same work with a higher subsidy, is that it?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I understand from the minister that that is the object of it.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—The subsidy under the 1908 Act was the same as the subsidy under this Act.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —There is no increase of the public burden under this.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We passed the second reading of this Bill without having it in our possession at all, and now we have got to the third reading. I am not objecting to it.

Hon. Mr. LANRDY—I see in this Bill there are two parts, No. 1 and No. 2. Is No. 2 the charter of the new company?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I find it a very strange procedure at this time of the session to come in with a new charter incorporating that company, and rushing the Bill through, even without submitting it to Committee of the Whole.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —As I said, if the hon. gentleman objects—and he is within his right—I will move that this order be discharged, and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole upon it.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—Before that motion is put, I would like to ask the Speaker if the rule is being applied without a resolution?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—There is no rule at the close of session. It is made a public Bill. It is not a private Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is it decided that this is a public Bill?

The SPEAKER—It is a government Bill, not a private Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I suppose we may call it a hybrid Bill?

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole.

(In the Committee).

On clause 2,

2. The Canadian Northern Railway Company having, by deed poll set out in the first schedule hereto, relinquished all its interest in the aid authorized by chapter 25 of the statutes of 1908, intituled 'An Act respecting aid for the extension of the Edmonton, Yukon and Pacific railway' to be given by guarantee of certain securities of the Edmonton, Yukon and Pacific Railway Company, upon and after amalgamation of such company with the Canadian Northern Railway Company, the said Act is hereby repealed and the aid thereby granted is cancelled.

Hon. Sir MACKENIE BOWELL—May I ask what those words mean: 'Having by deed poll?'

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —It is the deed set out in the first schedule.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Yes, but what is a 'deed pole'? That has nothing to do with the North Pole?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —A deed poll, if I remember aright, is a deed signed by one party alone. I think that is the explanation of 'deed poll'.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I see it says: 'To whom these presents may concern, the Canadian Northern Railway Company, hereinafter called the company, sends greetings'. That is for us, I suppose.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT Yes, that is it.

On clause 5,

5. The kind of securities to be guaranteed as aforesaid, and the forms thereof, and the form and terms of the deed or deeds of trust securing them, and the times and manner of the issue of securities and the disposition of the moneys to be raised thereon, by sale, pledge or otherwise, pending the expenditure of such moneys for the purposes of the line of railway so aided, and the forms and manner of guarantee, shall be such as the Governor in Council approves, and such terms, provisions and conditions may be included in such deed or deeds of trust as the Governor in Council deems expedient or necessary.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—I would like to have an explanation on that. They have got $25,000 a mile for 150 miles.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—No, they get $13,000 a mile for the first fifty miles, and then for the remainder of the said line to the amount of $25,000 per mile, not exceeding in all, put together, 150 miles.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What does that amount to? That will be 150 miles of a grand total?

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—It is a hundred and fifty miles from Edmonton to the Tête Jeune Cache pass, and then they get into the mountains.

On clause 6,

6. The said guarantee shall be signed by the Minister of Finance or such officer as is designated by the Governor in Council to sign it; and upon being so signed the Dominion of Canada shall become liable as guarantor for the payment of the principal and interest of the securities so guaranteed, according to the tenor thereof, and the said payment shall form a charge upon the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As I understand it, this road, when built, will be a competitor with the Grand Trunk Pacific, the construction of which the government is aiding very largely, and it seems to me a questionable sort of policy to give large subsidies to competiting lines.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I do not think they will run very close to each other.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There is a precedent for that. The government is constructing a road competing with the Intercolonial railway in New Brunswick and Quebec.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—They are twenty miles apart, and I think that is justified.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Not twenty miles apart in Quebec.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—Yes, about that average.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Both roads have to take advantage of the Tête Jaune Cache Pass, and they converge after leaving the pass. I do not think they are competing railways, but they have to go through the mountains by that pass or the Pine Pass. There is no more competition except that.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—They diverge very widely seeking the coast.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the third reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I should like to have it understood that this Bill shall not be quoted in the future as a precedent. We are permitting it to pass; but I have grave doubts if we are following a wise course. Here are two Bills embodied in one document, one a public Bill and the other a private Bill. The public Bill is introduced by the government and the government uses its influence to carry the Bill through the House, and at the same time profit by the influence they have to attach a private Bill to that public Bill, and the private Bill is passed at the same time as the public Bill. The charter given to the new company should have been subject to the rules of the House. Notices should have been given and parties might have objected where the line crosses, and parties might have been heard in committee. All that procedure is put aside in passing this Bill. I do not want to object to the Bill itself; but I hope nobody will consider it a precedent for the future, and that when another Bill of this sort is introduced it will be early enough in the session to give plenty of time to follow the usual procedure and give to the interested parties the necessary time to appear before the committee.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE— My hon. friend does not wish to say that if I, or any other member, should bring in a Bill of a similar character next session that we are going to be held up? If it is good legislation now, it will be good next year.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I have no objection to let the Bill pass; but it is against our rules, and I hope this infringement will not be considered as a precedent.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Oh, it must be.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It must not be; so long as it goes through it does not make a difference.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I hold that it will be a precedent. There is a difference of opinion on that question, that is all.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not make any objection; but if the hon. gentleman wants to consider it as a precedent, I will make an objection.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—If it is going to be held as a precedent, it will do away with provincial rights, and everything of that sort.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time, and passed.

WHARFS AND BUILDINGS IN HARBOUR OF ST. JOHN BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 204) An Act to authorize the erection of certain wharfs and buildings in the harbour of St. John.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 1,

1. The city of Saint John is hereby authorized to convey to the said Frederick C. Durant, a certain tract of land and land covered with water situate in the said city, bounded as follows:—on the north by the prolongation westerly of the south line of Sheffield street, on the east by the westerly line of Charlotte street, on the south by the ballast wharf property of the government of Canada, and on the west by the harbour line of the said city.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is one point to which I wish to call the attention of the House. In the preamble of this Bill it is set forth that the city of St. John has been authorized to convey to Frederick C. Durant, of the city of Philadelphia, certain lands, and it is desirable that such conveyance should be authorized by an Act of the parliament of Canada. Is that a proper thing to do—to convey lands belonging to the city of St. John to a gentleman who is a citizen of a foreign country?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Our law does not prevent the conveyance of lands to aliens; but that would be under the control of the provincial authorities. The conveyance of land would be governed by their statute and not ours.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—In some way or other, there is an arrangement with this Mr. Durant to make this exchange. He takes six acres of land belonging to the city of St. John, and that is exchanged for twelve acres of land belonging to the government of Canada. If he was willing to take six acres belonging to the city of St. John and build his sugar refinery upon it, how does he come to get twelve acres of land from the government?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The reason seems to be that the Intercolonial railway, who were negotiating about this matter with the city of St. John and also with Mr. Durant, had come to the conclusion that it would be a very considerable advantage to the Intercolonial railway if they could secure the erection of a large sugar refinery for the purpose of obtaining freight for themselves. That appears, as far as I can find out, to be the only reason for the exchange of which the hon. gentleman speaks. Mr. Butler, who it will be remembered, was a deputy minister, and also the Railway Department in general, thought it would be of advantage not only to the city of St. John to secure the erection of a large sugar refinery with a capacity of several thousand barrels per day and employing several hundreds of hands, but being situated on the deep water terminals of the Intercolonial railway, the Intercolonial railway would get the benefit of the entire freight. The sugar would be forwarded by the Intercolonial railway as being the only railway connected with the refinery, and the opinion of Mr. Butler was that this would be the means of giving the Intercolonial railway a very large trade and very profitable freight. The property which it wishes to obtain is now owned by the city, and would, in Mr. Butler's opinion, offer good advantages to the Intercolonial as a terminus. That seems to be the only reason for the exchange. I cannot say how far these expectations would be realized. The hon. gentleman would know that better than I do.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—Whatever business the sugar refinery would bring to the Intercolonial railway would come to that railway if the original lot were retained. The two properties are joined, practically. However, not only the city but the government of Canada have come to the conclusion that it is a good thing to do and I shall say nothing more on the subject.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read the third time, and passed.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole the third reading of Bill (No. 145) An Act to amend the Railway Act.

On clause 7,

7. Section 276 of the said Act is amended by adding thereto the following subsection:
2. The board, upon the application of any company or person, shall have power to order that this section shall not apply to any particular trains or classes of trains, or to trains running on any specified portions of the railway of the company: Provided that no such order shall be made with respect to trains engaged in shunting or switching, or in yard or terminal movements.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—This is the only clause left over. The only reply I have received on the subject of this clause is that it is not intended to interfere with the present provisions in the cases of towns, or cities or places where switching is going on, as indeed is set forth in the proviso; but that the Board of Railway Commissioners desire to be allowed in certain cases, which would be special cases, to modify the present regulations. The reason was explained when the clause was under consideration, that as matters stand unless some power is given to somebody to modify the present law, men might be compelled to remain in the rear of the car in exposed positions for a very long space of time, exposed to great inclemency of the weather and divers other inconveniences, which led the board to ask for power to grant a dispensation, so to speak, in cases where they thought it was required.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This enactment recalls the discussions which we had during two or three sessions with respect to section 275 of the Railway Act. If hon. gentlemen look at section 276 of the Railway Act, they will find that it is confined to railways running through cities, towns and villages—'whenever in any city, town or village trains pass, &c.' Now, I submit that there should be no exception to that. Allowing a train to be run backwards through a city, town or village without any one stationed at the back of the train to give notice to people who may happen to be crossing the track, is really offering a sort of premium to endangering human life. I quite sympathize with the feeling of the board that there should be no undue hardship on the employees of the railway company; but when it is a question of the lives of the public, safety is a matter of more consequence even than the comfort of the employees of the railway, and I respectfully suggest that you should leave out the words 'to any particular trains, or classes of trains,' and have it read in this way:

The board, upon the application of any company or person, shall have power to order that this section shall not apply to trains running on any specified portion of the railway.

Such portions, of course, to be outside the cities, towns and villages; but I really do not think there is any necessity for this enactment at all.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—How do you propose to give notice from the rear?

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the engine is on the rear of the train—that is what section 276 deals with, and is backing the train, accidents are much more likely to occur than when the train is moving in the usual way, and section 276 provides that when a train is being backed that way there shall be some one on the rear car or on the tender, if there is only an engine and tender, to warn any one who is crossing the track or going on the track. I think the present law is perfectly fair and reasonable. It extends only to cities, towns and villages.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—The proviso covers that.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No. The proviso is—Provided that no such order shall be made with respect to trains engaged in shunting or switching or in yard or terminal movement.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—That covers it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Then what is the object of this enactment if the proviso covers the whole ground? As the law stands now, this provision is confined to cities, towns and villages, and I think it is a wholesome provision and we should not change it. I move that this clause be stricken out.

The amendment was declared lost.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read a third time, and passed.

BRANCH LINES INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY BILL

The order of the day being called:

Consideration of the message from the House of Commons disagreeing to the amendments made by the Senate to Bill (17) intituled: An Act to authorize the government of Canada to acquire, by lease, lines of railway connecting with the government railways.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —In reference to this message, I have reason to believe that if we can arrange a conference with our friends at the other end of the Chamber it may be satisfactorily done, but as a preliminary stage I suppose we must insist on our own amendments. Perhaps some hon. gentleman will move that we insist on our amendments. We propose then that they will ask for a conference.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I will move, that we insist on our amendments. When this measure was before the House on a previous occasion, it was discussed at some considerable length, but I dare say there are some hon. gentlemen present now who were not present then. This is a Bill to authorize the government of Canada to take over, by lease or otherwise——

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —By lease solely.

Hon. Mr. POWER—By lease, certain railways which connect with the Intercolonial railway. There was this proviso at the end of the original Bill: 'Provided that no such lease shall have any force or effect nor shall any such connecting railway be entered upon or operated on behalf of the government of Canada until the said managing board, and the said chief engineer shall have approved the terms and conditions of such lease having regard to the beneficial results therefrom to the government railways, and until the parliament of Canada has first ratified such lease.'

It was felt that, possibly, the interests of the public or the interests of Canada were not sufficiently protected by that proviso. I think there was an impression that at a critical time a strong Minister of Railways might be able to secure the recommendation of the Railway Board, and of the government engineer to an undertaking which would ultimately prove very unprofitable to the Dominion; and in order further to safeguard the interests of the public, this amendment was adopted to add to that Bill this clause:

4. No such lease shall be ratified by parliament, unless a return has been laid before both Houses for at least one month showing:
(a) The cost of the road proposed to be leased together with the amount of stock subscribed and all moneys received from sale of bonds or by way of bonuses or otherwise.
(b) Present equipment of road together with the average rate of freight and charges for passengers on the same and a statement showing approximately how above rates compare with those charged on the Intercolonial railway.
(c) Present condition of the road and the estimate of outlay required to put it in good running order.
(d) Total receipts and expenditures for three years last past.
(e) List of shareholders and bondholders.
(f) Other creditors of the road.
(g) Estimate of future receipts and expenditures in the event of the road being leased by the Intercolonial railway.

That was intended to place parliament and the government in possession of information which was really necessary to enable them to form an intelligent judgment as to whether or not it would be advantageous to the country to take over a branch, and in order to show the necessity of safeguards of that kind, the case of the Canada Eastern railway was taken up, and the House will pardon me if I again read a letter from Mr. Pottinger, for many years manager of the Intercolonial railway, with respect to this matter. This letter is dated at Moncton, New Brunswick, March 15, 1910, and is addressed to the secretary of the Department of Railways and Canals:

Intercolonial Railway of Canada—Prince Edward Island Railway.

Moncton, N.B., March 15, 1910.

Sir,—Replying to your telegram of the 12th instant asking information for the minister in regard to receipts, expenses, etc., of the Canada Eastern section of the Intercolonial.

I send you herewith a statement that has been prepared by Mr. Shannon showing that the amount expended in the years 1905 and 1908 for the purchase of the Canada Eastern railway was $819,000. In the year 1906 an amount of $300,000 was paid in connection with the Fredericton and St. Mary's bridge, making a total of $1,119,000. The amounts expended on capital account in the years 1904-05 to 1908-09, inclusive, amounted to $312,014.81. The statement shows the works on which these expenditures were made; they were almost all for improvements. The items for the strengthening of bridges are partly for improvements, as the wooden bridges with cedar foundations were replaced by steel bridges with concrete and masonry foundations.

The Blackville branch of the Canada Eastern railway extending from Blackville to Indiantown, and forming the connection between the Canada Eastern railway and the Indiantown branch of the Intercolonial railway was repaired and improved at a cost of $116,641.61 which was charged to capital account during the years 1906-07 to 1908-09, inclusive. The total expenditure on capital account has therefore been $1,547,656.42.

I send you a statement from Mr. T. C. Burpee, showing that he estimates the amount required to put the Canada Eastern division into good condition at $319,000. This statement shows the items on which the estimated expenditure is to be made. Some of these items seem high.

In regard to the receipts and expenses, I inclose a statement showing the approximate expenses charged to revenue by years, from October, 1904, to March 31, 1909, and the total amount is $849,341.32.

A statement of the approximate gross earnings, by years, to March 31, 1909, is also inclosed. They amount to $627,738.03.

I am, sir,

Your obedient servant,

D. POTTINGER.

Incl.

L. K. Jones, Esq., I.S.O., Secretary,
Department Railways and Canals,
Ottawa, Ont.

There is a balance of nearly $222,000 against the road as working; that the gross earnings are $22,500, or thereabouts, less than the working expenses. Then it may be well to read some of Mr. Burton's statements. The first statement for 1905, shows that the price originally paid was $1,119,000. The next portion of the statement shows the amount expended each year on capital account since the acquisition of the line from Fredericton to Chatham, from October 1, 1904, to March 31, 1909.

(Sgd.) W. H. ESTANO,
Traffic Auditor.

So that hon. gentlemen will see that the disparity between the earnings and working expenses continues right to the bitter end. With respect to the Canada Eastern road, it may be said that it was the most promising of all the roads connecting with the Intercolonial railway, and the authorities of the Intercolonial railway were of opinion that it would be a good thing as a matter of business that they should acquire this road, and hon. gentlemen can see what the result has been from a pecuniary point of view to the Dominion of Canada. The hon. gentleman from Fredericton (Mr. Wood) stated in a former discussion that before the road was taken over it served the purposes of the country very well, and that there was practically as much traffic over this road before the government took it over as there has been since. As we have taken this road over, we have to stand by our bargain; but when the proposition comes up, as we know the proposition has come up, that the government should take over a number of other branches of the railway which do not promise nearly as well as the Canada Eastern did, surely as a business people we should see that there is some guarantee that the country is not going to be mulcted in very large sums without any corresponding advantage to the public. I notice in reading the debate in the other House that the hon. Minister of Railways was at first disposed to concur in the amendments, and I think proposed to move concurrence, and then an hon. gentleman representing a constituency in New Brunswick rose and made rather a fierce onslaught on the action of the majority of the Senate and a very large majority too, and the conclusion that I drew from reading that hon. gentleman's speech in another place was that he did not wish to have the public protected, and, I suppose, relying upon his local knowledge, the Minister of Railways withdrew from the attitude which he had at first assumed, and the Commons decided not to agree to our amendment, and this is the message which the Commons sent up to us, that the House disagrees to the amendment of the Senate because the said amendment unnecessarily and ineffectually attempts to limit the power of future parliaments. I understand that there was some criticism of the Senate amendments in another place not long since; but if we were disposed to be critical, we might very easily riddle the reason. Hon. gentlemen can see that there is not much substance in the reason for disagreeing, because the third clause of the Bill as it passed the Commons contained a proviso intending to protect the public interest, to the effect that no such lease should have any force or effect until the government railway managing board and the chief engineer of the Department of Railways and Canals should have approved of the terms and conditions of said lease, and until the parliament of Canada had ratified such lease. The amendment further protected the public interest by enacting that further information to enable parliament to form an intelligent opinion should be submitted. The objection to the amendment made by the Senate providing for certain further restrictions appears to me to be ill-founded. I think it is due to our own dignity and self-respect that we should insist upon our amendment. We should send a message to the Commons, if the House adopts my view, that we insist upon our amendment. I understand that they are prepared to modify their decision, and they will ask for a conference and this House will appoint three managers who will meet the managers from the House of Commons, and I assume an agreement will be arrived at a sort of compromise arrangement, which I hope will provide that the substance of our amendment, at any rate, shall hold good.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—The hon. gentleman who made the motion has thought it proper to bring to the notice of the House again—I do not know whether to bolster up his argument or to put a duplicate of his speech in the debates—a statement about the Canada Eastern railway. I cannot understand his object, but it would have been better if in making his reference to that railway he had been fair enough to say——

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Order. You cannot say that. It is not parliamentary.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—In dealing with the subject he should have treated it on its merits. His statement with regard to the expense incurred in respect of the purchase and running of the Canada Eastern is not a proper exposition of the facts. The Blackville railway which is now united with the Canada Eastern, was built by the government of Canada in opposition to the thirty-five miles of the Canada Eastern at the instance of the gentleman who at that time represented Northumberland. At the same time, the influence of that gentleman was sufficient to take from the Canada Eastern the federal subsidy, so that the only subsidy to that line for thirty-five miles was the provincial subsidy. The government of Canada had constructed a bridge which they owned, and had to take care of in consequence of the party who had constructed it failing to pay the interest. It is not right, in referring to the purchase and maintenance of the Canada Eastern, that any expense in connection with that bridge should be charged against the Canada Eastern branch. Neither is the expenditure on the Blackville line fairly chargeable to the purchase of the Canada Eastern. The three works are now amalgamated, and the returns laid before the House show the cost of the three, and the maintenance of the three by the government of Canada. The Blackville line has never paid. For some time not a train passed over ten miles of the road, because the needs of that section apparently did not seem sufficient to warrant the government in going to the expense of running it, but now they have taken up, and are working it as one of the three works. The Canada Eastern is amalgamated with the Blackville road, and the bridge, and it is hardly fair to make the whole expenditure chargeable to the Canada Eastern. The Canada Eastern is one of the very best roads belonging to a private corporation in New Brunswick. The station houses that were built by the old company have never been renovated. They are there today, and the station house in Fredericton was constructed also before the purchase of the road by the government. The expenditures on the line are such as any well conducted railroad would require. They are betterments, which they were not actually forced to make unless it was to put the road in a better condition than before it was acquired by the government. Take any branch road in the maritime provinces. I am satisfied not one of them has as many improved conditions as are to be found on this Canada Eastern, yet they are being run and are accommodating the people. They are run in an economical way and the expenditures are kept as nearly within the earnings as possible. So far as I am personally concerned, I may add that, living as I do at Fredericton, this branch line in question can in no sense be of interest to that section of the province. Of the fifteen counties in New Brunswick, the Intercolonial railway does not touch seven. Eight of the counties enjoy all the advantages of the government railway, but I cannot think that the Senate would bring any great credit to itself by insisting upon its amendments to this Bill. As I understand the nature of this measure, it does not rest with the government to buy or lease any branch railway in the maritime provinces, nor can any road be purchased or leased without the sanction of parliament. If this legislation took the control out of the hands of parliament, and authorized the government to make purchases without consulting parliament, we could not follow and know if they carried out our instructions, or whether in making a purchase or lease they had protected the interests of Canada. Under this Bill, whatever the government may do in respect to the purchase or leasing of a line, has to come before parliament for our approval or disapproval. Under the circumstances, I cannot see that the amendments made by the Senate are important, and in amendment to the amendment I move that the Senate does not insist on its amendments to the Bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Does the hon. gentleman think there is any objection to parliament and the government having the information provided for by this amendment before taking action?

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—No, I would presume that the government in bringing to the notice of parliament a proposition of that character would furnish us with all the information necessary to reach a conclusion as to whether that lease or purchase should be accepted. We could move for further information before accepting it, so that practically we have absolute control of the action of the government with respect to the purchase or lease of the branch lines.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It would be desirable, looking at the very late period of the session, that we should get this matter brought to a conference as soon as possible, and I think the only possible way we can do so is by accepting the motion of the hon. member from Halifax, by which a conference can be had and a compromise arranged.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—If we recede from our amendments to this Bill, would we not get it quicker?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—You would get it settled quicker by a conference than by a long discussion in the Senate.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I am in accord with the advisability of obtaining the information mentioned in the amendment adopted by this honourable House. However, the point taken by the House of Commons may be well founded, and inasmuch as we cannot bind future parliaments, I would suggest to the hon. member, should a conference be held, to change the form of his amendment by making it incumbent on the government railway managing board, when making their recommendation, to furnish the information which is called for in the amendment. That would be much more effective, because if it goes in that form, parliament, next session, or in two or three years hence, might do away with that clause altogether, whereas if my suggestion is adopted, no recommendation can be made unless it is accompanied by the information.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middlesex)—The question is very simple. The complaint of the Commons is that we bind a future parliament, which I do not think we can do, not to ratify any legislation unless certain information is provided. If a conference is held, we can simply say that in submitting any such lease for the approval of parliament, a return shall be laid before both Houses at least one month in advance, containing such and such information. That does not restrain parliament from ratifying the lease, but it would give us the information which it is desirable we should have, and I concur in the suggestion of the right hon. leader of the Senate, that the matter be adjusted by a conference. There is no difference as to how it should be done.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The conference would come to some arrangement by which the two Houses would agree. The reasons given for rejecting the amendment seem childish. However, it is not necessary to discuss that question. As the leader of the government has accepted the proposition, there is no use of wasting time in discussing it. The suggestion of my hon. friend can be reached by a conference, and the suggestion he makes is a good one.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—I should like to have the opinion of the House on my amendment to the amendment.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—It has been well expressed, and understood by almost every one who has spoken on this Bill, even the right hon. leader of the House, that before anything can be done in the way of acquiring branch lines of the Intercolonial railway, information must be laid before the House. The Commons have sent us a Bill which we have amended, and they return it to us stating they cannot accept our amendments. We all agree it must come before us again, and to ask for a conference between the two Houses as to whether the government will place information before this House, is going pretty far in the way of obstructing the legislation which the other House puts through. I should like an expression of opinion from the House as to whether they would like to deal with this question in that way or not.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I rise to a point of order. The amendment to the amendment is a negative, and is out of order.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—All I ask the House to do is to express a definite opinion as to whether the Senate should insist on this amendment or not.

The House divided on the original amendment which was adopted by the following vote:

Hon. Mr. POWER—I move that under rule 66 a committee of three senators be appointed to prepare reasons for insisting on our amendment. I move that the committee consist of the Hon. Mr. Beique, Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell, and the mover.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—After we have just taken an expression of opinion on this matter of conference, I think at least one gentleman who voted on the opposite side ought to be on the committee. It seems to me it is like going with loaded dice to select three men for the conference who have just pronounced themselves in favour of insisting on these amendments. If we are going to have a conference, it would be better to mix up the committee, because some hon. gentlemen have very strong opinions averse to this opinion, as just expressed by their vote, and I certainly would suggest that some hon. gentlemen, who voted the other way, be placed on this committee, for all the wisdom is not locked up in the breasts of those who voted in the majority. I would move that Hon. Mr. Bostock be placed on the committee.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman is generally pretty astute and clear about things; but in the present instance is entirely astray. My motion was not for hon. gentlemen to go on a committee of conference, but to prepare a reason; and surely the members who voted in the majority are the persons to prepare the reason. When it comes to appointing a committee of conference, then, of course, there will be a representative from the opposition.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would prefer that the hon. gentleman would substitute Senator Lougheed's name for mine, as he is leader of this side of the House, and I am sure he is quite in accord with the majority of the House.

Hon. GENTLEMEN—He is not here.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He will be here at six o'clock.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The matter had better be dealt with right away.

Hon. Sir MACKENIE BOWELL—I have no objection.

The motion was agreed to, and the committee retired to frame the reasons.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I suppose that is done with the permission of the House, because no committee can sit while the House is in session.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—This is not a committee. It is a conference.

INTERNAL ECONOMY AND CONTINGENT ACCOUNTS.

SIXTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON moved the adoption of the sixth report of the Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the motion is adopted, I should like to call attention to the report itself. At page 942 of the Minutes, I find the report, which reads as follows:

> The committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts have the honour to make their fifth report, as follows:
> 1. Your committee recommend that the pay of the sessional messengers of the Senate be made uniform with the pay given to the sessional messengers of the House of Commons, and that this recommendation be made to apply to the pressent session from the 1st day of April.

That is putting it at the beginning of the financial year. A few days ago we adopted a similar report based on the same principle, and the principle which underlies this report, and adopted by the Senate, is that our officers should be placed on the same footing as the corresponding officers in the House of Commons. Will the report place a deputy head or messenger here on the same footing as a messenger in the House of Commons? Why is that? Because in the framing of our classification last year, we forgot an important point. We forgot to comply with the law. In the House of Commons they complied with the law. We took the salaries which our officers received at the time being as the basis of classification, and in doing that, we relied upon article 136 of the Civil Service Act of 1908, which says:

> Except as herein otherwise provided the salary of any person placed in the inside service by or under this Act, or to whom the provisions thereof are made applicable, shall be that which he is then receiving, and the said salary shall be in accordance with the classification.

I call attention of the hon. member to the fact that this clause applies only in the case where there is nothing in the law —except as herein otherwise provided. If there is something in the law that provides for the classification we are bound to take the classification made by the law. Our classification is determined by article 5, of the same Civil Service Act, which says:

> The inside service under the deputy heads, excluding messengers, porters, sorters and packers, etc., shall be divided into three divisions.

That is the law The first division shall be divided into first, subdivision (a). Who are the persons which the law obliges us to put in that division? They are named here: Subdivision (a) consisting of officers having the rank of deputy heads, but not being deputy-heads, administering departments, assistant deputy ministers, and the principal technical and administrative and executive officers. These are the persons who by law are entitled to come in division No. 1, subdivision (a). In our classification, some of these persons were put in that class. But some others, who appear to have salaries lower than those, are put in another class, on account of their salary. I contend that we cannot take the salary as a basis, only when nothing in the law obliges us to take the course that I am pointing out. Subdivision (b) of division 1, consisting of the lesser technical and administrative and executive officers, including chief clerk, now holding office, and not eligible for subdivision (a). By law we are obliged to put in the first division all the persons in the class which the law has just mentioned, and the second division shall consist of certain other clerks having technical, administrative, executive or other duties which are of the same character as, but of less importance and responsibility, than those of the first division. This division shall be divided into two subdivisions (a) and (b). Then comes the third division. The third division shall consist of other clerks in the service whose duties are copying and routine work, under direct supervision, of less importance than that of the second division, and this division is divided into classes (a) and (b). That is clause 5. The clerks are dealt with in clause 6, and what does it say: Clerks now holding the rank of first-class shall be placed in subdivision (a) of the second division. Clerks now holding the rank of senior second class shall be placed in subdivision (b) of the second division. Clerks now holding the rank of the junior class shall be placed in subdivision (a) of the third division. Clerks now holding the rank of third class, and temporary clerks paid out of civil government contingencies, shall be placed in subdivision (b) of the third division. You will see by these extracts that I have just refererd to that the law provides the place that each employee shall occupy in the classification of our civil servants inside of this House. I contend the Senate has the power to correct any error that has been made in the classification. We are often correcting errors. I think the thing should be done properly. If there are errors in our classification let us correct them according to law. Clause (a) says:

As soon as practicable after coming into force of the Act the head of each department——

In this case it is the Speaker of the Senate.

—shall cause the organization of his department to be determined and defined by order in council——

That is by the Senate.

—due regard being had to the status of each officer and clerk, as the case may be.

So the head of the department, in this case the Speaker of this House, is by law obliged, in order to frame a classification, to have due regard to the status of each officer and clerk as the case may be. The order in council—that is the regulation passed by the Senate, the decision come to by the Senate—shall give the names of the several branches of the department and the number and character of the officers and the duties and details and salaries thereof, &c. Then comes subclause 3; after being so determined and defined, the organization of the department shall not be changed except by order in council.

'By order in council' is determined by clause 45. All the enactments according to the last number, which are given, are governed by clause 45, which says that the Governor in Council means so and so, and the head of the department means so and so, and the deputy head means so and so. So I contend this House has the power to correct any error in the classification that it made last year, and we have only to base ourselves on the law. We have the right to base our classification on salaries when (and in that case only when) the law does not provide for the classification; but where the law says such and such employees you place in such and such a class, it is a law which is paramount, and you cannot do otherwise. I would ask the House, without taking any action immediately to confirm or to accept this declaration as an amendment to the report of the committee, to concur in the report of the committee, and declare that in its opinion the classification made last year of its employees failing to answer the enactment of the Civil Service Act should be corrected so as to make it conform to the law as a general principle. I am giving no names at all for the moment. I think that part of our function should be studied in a more particular way. I want the House to acknowledge the principle that we have a right in this House to correct, and it is our duty to correct, the list, so as to make our classification according to the enactments of the Civil Service Act, which is the law that governs us at the present. I move, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Roy, that the following words be added to the motion that the House concur in the report:

And declares that in its opinion the classification made last year of its employees failing to answer to the enactment of the Civil Service Act should be corrected so as to make it conform to the law.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—I do not think the amendment is germane to the subject we are dealing with in the report. I think it is a larger question. The report is merely acting on what has been the disposition of the Senate during the present sitting, the enlargement, somewhat, of the remuneration of the employees of the Senate; and this larger question as to how the Act applies to the Senate, and the classification or reclassification of it, ought to be taken separately if it is a question relating to apportioning. If there is a difference of opinion in respect of our classification, by the head of the department, it is a matter in itself that might be dealt with at the opening of the session, but could not be dealt with in the few remaining hours of the present session. This fifth report that we have made does not involve any question of classification; it is a matter that has been determined not only by the Senate, but by the Justice Department, that we are dealing with in the report, matters that belong to the committee, for the confirmation of the Senate, and I do not think the hon gentleman ought to press an amendment of this kind. That question should be taken up by itself, and be dealt with by the committee or the House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The principle underlying the report just made is that we should conform ourselves to the classification or salary as given by the House of Commons to the sessional clerks; that is the purport of the report.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—But the parties we are dealing with, the messengers, are outside the application of the Civil Service Act.

The amendment was rejected, and the report was adopted.

BRANCH LINES OF THE GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS BILL.

CONFERENCE ON COMMON'S REFUSAL ON SENATE AMENDMENTS.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE, as chairman of the Committee for Assigning Reasons to the House of Commons for refusing to agree to the amendments made to Bill (No. 17) presented their report.

The report was adopted.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—I would ask what is the modus operandi for the conference?

The SPEAKER—Section 66 of the rules provides that the Commons ask for a conference.

WINDING-UP ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST AND SECOND READINGS.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (No. 65) An Act to amend the Winding-up Act.

The Bill was read the first time.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What is the meaning of the Bill?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—It means the courts in the different provinces that would have the final decision in case of appeals. It is purely formal.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

INJURIES FROM MOTOR VEHICLES BILL.

FIRST, SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (No. 13) An Act to amend the Criminal Code respecting injuries to persons due to motor vehicles.

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT moved that the Bill be read the second time at length at the table.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This Bill seems to be imposing penalties for injuries done to persons by automobiles. What are the provisions?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—It adds a section to the Criminal Code to provide that injuries done to persons through horses being frightened by motor vehicles may be punished by imprisonment for two years. It often happens that when an automobile driver runs down and injures a person, he gets away as quickly as possible so as to conceal his identity.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—That is too drastic. I have not had time to look over this Bill. Of course, injuries will always be done by automobiles, but the causing of such injuries may not always be regarded as a wanton offence. The penalty should not be inflicted unless on very good reason. If the leader of the government insists on the Bill going through, I shall not oppose it, but we want to watch some of this sideshow legislation. I want to know where it is coming from. Possibly the Bill is necessary, but I want to know more about it.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—It was the Premier of Canada who suggested that this Bill and Bill (No. 75) should be put through this session.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—If the Premier of Canada wishes it, they shall go through as far as I am concerned, but I do not know why the Premier of Canada delegates his powers to the ex-leader instead of to the leader of this House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—These Bills are desirable, but it is inadvisable that the Senate should pass them, creating a new offence, without knowing what they are doing. I rise for the purpose of suggesting that the usual parliamentary course be taken—that the Bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole House for consideration.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 1,

1. Section 285 of the Criminal Code is amended by inserting the words 'motor vehicle, automobile, or other' before the word 'vehicle' in the third line.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—I presume that as the section of the Act will read now, any person who is guilty of furious driving with an automobile will be liable to two years' imprisonment if he does harm to any one. So many accidents have been caused by furious driving of automobiles, and the persons in charge of them have shown so little consideration for those they have injured, that I think the penalty is none too great for cases of the kind. With regard to the other clause, the penalty seems comparatively light.

The clause was agreed to.

On clause 2,

2. The said Code is amended by inserting the following section immediately after section 285:

285a. The owner and driver and person in charge, or owner or driver or person in charge, of any motor vehicle commonly called and known as an automobile, which causes a horse to run away or shy or bolt and thereby occasion bodily injury to any person, is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It seems to me the clause should go a little further. There are many cases where horses are frightened and injury is done through the furious driving of automobiles and very little attention is paid by the offender to those he has injured. Many cases have occurred where horses have been frightened and vehicles broken and their occupants injured. Perhaps some legal gentleman can tell me whether an action would lie under this clause against the party who caused the damage?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—This, I understand, would not exempt any driver or proprietor of an automobile from such penalties as they would be now liable to. This is an additional penalty.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This makes provision for punishment by fine and imprisonment, which is not now provided for in the criminal law.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—It is only if the person who is driving the automobile does not stop. Recently, in Montreal, an automobile which was driven at a furious rate across the bridge killed a young lady. The driver did not stop, and it was some time afterwards before he was discovered and arrested. Under this clause, the driver must stop, and give his card.

The clause was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. POWER, from the committee, reported Bill without amendment.

The Bill was read the third time, and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST, SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (No. 75) An Act to amend the Criminal Code.

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT moved the second reading of the Bill. He said: The object of this Bill is to punish any person who takes a motor car without the consent of the owner and uses it. Many accidents have been caused by the furious driving of persons who have taken automobiles out in this way without the consent of their owners.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 1,

1. The Criminal Code, chapter 146 of the Revised Statutes, 1906, is amended by inserting the following section immediately after section 285a:

258b. Every one who takes or causes to be taken from a garage, stable, stand, or other building or place, any automobile or motor car with intent to operate or drive or use or cause or permit the same to be operated or driven or used without the consent of the owner shall be liable, on summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding fifty dollars and costs or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding thirty days.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read a third time, and passed.

GOVERNMENT ANNUITIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST AND SECOND READINGS.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (No. 212) An Act to amend the Government Annuities Act, 1908.

The Bill was read a first time.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I move the second reading. This is purely a formal matter, to correct some trifling clerical error made in the original Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —This Bill is rendered necessary by the amendments which were made to the Annuities Act that we passed a few weeks ago. In the House of Commons, this had been struck out. The Minister of Finance informs me that by some error their intention was not carried out.

Hon. Mr. FORGET, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read a third time, and passed.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker lef the Chair.

After Recess.

A PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Would the House permit me to say a word in reply to the hon. member from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette), who, in my absence, said he was ready to go before the people——

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I was called to order this morning——

Hon. Mr. DANUDRAND—This morning the hon. gentleman said——

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not think the hon. member should re-open that question. The hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Choquette) was ruled out of order and prevented from making his statement.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—But did he not make a statement?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, he commenced to make a statement two or three times, but the Speaker ruled him out of order, and very properly, and I suggest he should exercise the same authority now.

Hon. Mr. DAUDURAND—I know it is out of order but——

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We do not want to know anything about the quarrels between the government and one of its supporters. The hon. gentleman has no right to know what the intention of the government is. If he does know he ought to become a member of the government.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I believe that party lines should not be drawn in this House, but while we have discussed the reform of the Senate, and the lines on which we should proceed in order to make this a very independent and impartial body, I have looked over the systems in every country throughout the world in order to ascertain whether such a body is to be found. I find that the upper house in all countries, whether elected or nominated, is composed of men who are separated on the same party lines as in the lower house, so that although the ideal is that there shall be no party lines in this Chamber it is an ideal that will never be attained, whether the House is to be elected or appointed. I simply wanted to tell the hon. gentleman that I did not seek him to ask him to run an election. I found he was mentioning my name, and it was because he took my name in vain in my absence, and said he was ready to meet me in my district that I spoke, but he had better remain in his own district——

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I have no objection to the hon. gentleman speaking, but I want the right to answer. I would hear him with pleasure——

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I suggest that the hon. gentlemen go out into the lobby and settle the matter there.

ASSOCIATED PRESS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill (No. 228) An Act to assist in maintaining an independent and efficient service of telegraphic news from Great Britain for publication in the Canadian press.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (British Columbia)—Can the hon. gentleman state how the money can be divided? This is a complicated Bill.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It is an old matter. A contract has been entered into with certain parties for the sum of $15,000, and that amount has been paid for some years for a certain cable telegraph service rendered to Canada. This Bill provides for a payment towards that service for a certain number of years, on a sliding scale, and in 1915 it is to terminate.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (British Columbia)—To whom is it payable? The cable company or the newspapers?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—To the Associated Press, and the service is open to all Canadian newspapers on the same terms.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill passed through its final stages.

DRY-DOCKS SUBSIDY BILL.

FIRST, SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (No. 229) An Act to encourage the construction of dry-docks.

The Bill was read a first and second time.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—As the English version of the Bill has not been distributed perhaps the hon. gentleman will explain it fully?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Certainly. The object of the measure is to aid and enlarge the subsidies now provided by statutes for the construction of docks. In certain cases, where docks are of the larger size the length of time will be extended to thirty-five years. The rate of interest has also been changed to 3½ per cent and to three in certain cases. Where the docks are of the smaller size, then the time limit is not so long; but it is reduced to 20 or 25 years. It does not materially alter the existing law, except in extending the amount, and extending the length of time. Dry-docks of the larger size will be allowed to go up to the figure of four million. Dry-docks of the second size will go to two and a half million, and dry-docks of the third class not more than one and a half million. There is a distinction made between permanent docks and floating docks. The floating docks do not receive as much as the permanent docks. It is expected that they will be made, in the case of the larger ones, large enough to receive any vessels in the English navy now existing, and probably any vessels likely to be constructed for a long time to come.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Do I understand from my right hon. friend that those docks are to be constructed by the government?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —No, they are to be constructed by a company on the faith of a subsidy not to exceed such and such an amount, and not to last for more than a certain number of years.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I was under the impression from a statement made by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons that those docks were to be constructed by the contractor who had the contract for the ships?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Not necessarily. They may or may not be.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—They will be a separate undertaking.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Yes. It is possible that the same parties will construct the docks, or offer to construct the docks, who will build the ships, but there is no connection between the contracts.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But the larger docks are to be built in England, and floated across the Atlantic, and placed in some port in Canada.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —That can be as may be decided. My hon. friend is referring to the possibility of a large floating dock.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —It is not decided whether the permanent or floating dock will be the best, and it might vary considerably according to the locality.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The same principle was adopted and carried out in reference to docks of this character that had been floated over to Bermuda some years ago; I understood the same principle was to be followed in the securing of these.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Does the hon. gentleman mean that we would prefer floating docks?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —As to that I am not able to say. Floating docks might be found to be the most expedient; but it is also possible that a permanent solid dock would be preferred. I think it would depend in a large measure on the place selected, and on the question of tide and so forth. Of course, I know that very large floating docks have been in use, and they have the advantage of being considerably cheaper than the permanent dock, and I dare say will last nearly as long.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Does the Bill contain any provision for the free dockage of government ships, or will that be a matter of contract afterwards? As the government is subsidizing the docks, perhaps provision will be made for free dockage of government ships.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —They may have a preference; but I do not know that they are made free. The government have the right of deciding on the tariff and the tolls, but I do not think any provision has been made for using the docks free.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.) — That would be a matter of contract afterwards.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —That would be made as might be.

The motion was agreed to, and the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 8 (a),

8. The subsidy payable in respect of dry-docks which have been constructed under this Act shall be—

(a) If of the first-class, a sum not exceeding three and one-half per cent of the cost of the work, as fixed and determined under subsection 2 of this section, each year during a period not exceeding thirty-five years from the time the Governor in Council has determined, under this Act, that the work has been completed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I feel that this particular clause is one that should not pass without at least some little notice. In the first instance, if my memory is correct, the government of Canada undertook to pay interest on one-third of the cost of the work for twenty years.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Was it not on a fixed sum?

Hon. Mr. POWER—A sum not exceeding so much. It was supposed to be one-third of the cost. That is what it worked out at any rate. There was one dry-dock built under that Act in Halifax. There was a natural desire expressed by gentlemen who were interested in other ports to have further dry-docks constructed. It was found that with the subsidies provided by the existing law it was impossible to secure persons who would be willing to undertake the construction of docks in these other places. As a result of that, the subsidy was increased, the proportion which the government was willing to pay was increased, and the length of time extended. In the first dry-dock, the interest on one-third of the cost was payable for only twenty years. Then the period was increased, but no serious proposition was made to construct other docks. We have this condition of things, that the government propose practically and substantially to build the docks. The first paragraph in clause 8 says that the government shall pay a sum not exceeding three and a half per cent of the cost of the work for a period not exceeding thirty-five years. The money can be got for three and a half per cent, and practically the country will pay for the building of the dock.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Not necessarily altogether.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Substantially. It is not limited as in the case of the original dry-dock to any sum.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Yes, to $4,000,000,

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not object to dry-docks being built in any place where business calls for them; but if the government are prepared to pay for the construction of a dry-dock, the result will be you will find dry-docks built in places where the business does not call for them.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Build at Quebec. There is business for them there.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If my hon. friend had not been so fast, I was about to say that the amount of shipping passing in and out of the St. Lawrence is so great that business demands would call for the construction of a dock somewhere in the neighbourhood of Quebec. But the difficulty about this enactment is that there is nothing whatever to limit the construction of these dry-docks at the public expense to places where there is no business demand for them. It is a very serious proposition for this House to entertain. We are very often particular about the small amounts paid to our own employees in the Senate. We try to save money in various ways, on stationery and so on, and here is a proposition which may involve the absolute throwing away of millions of dollars, and we are not really supposed to have any opinion about it.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I call my hon. friend's attention to subclause 2 of clause 3, by which a responsibility is placed on the government, that they must obtain evidence that the thing is needed in the public interest.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Based on the report of the chief engineer.

Hon. Mr. POWER—With respect to that, I can fancy that the chief engineer of the Department of Public Works and the minister would be likely to think that the public interest called for the construction of a dry-dock in a place where no business concern would ever think of locating it. I think this is an exceedingly extravagant and unbusinesslike proceeding, and I simply wish to make my protest.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It seems to me that the hon. gentleman has but a few places in his mind. He would not object to Halifax having a dry-dock.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is one there already.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Yes, and it needs to be enlarged, and I think the first provisions of the Act are just to meet such a case as Halifax. It seems to me there is enough shipping done, and the importance of that port is perhaps enough, to turn the scale in favour of a dry-dock at St. John. It is a question for the Governor in Council to decide. Levis, Quebec, although not a first-class port, because of the tonnage that goes there, and its situation needs a dry-dock for the ocean shipping, and the larger ships that will frequent the St. Lawrence and Montreal as well, because of its meeting the ocean navigation with the inland navigation. I do not see any other ports on the Atlantic but those four. There is no question about it that on the Pacific there will need to be a dry-dock, so that I cannot see any other places than four or five in Canada that may need dry-dock facilities.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—There would be dry-docks needed on the lakes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—There is one at Collingwood.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I must congratulate the government on the introduction of the measure to give the subsidies, and even if they were raising the amount to five million dollars, I would still congratulate them, because we absolutely require dry-docks. I am inclined to think that Quebec is the best place for a dry-dock from every point of view, and I am pretty sure one will be located there. We must have a dry-dock. What has happened at Quebec during the last year shows the necessity of a dry-dock to repair boats which have met with accidents. Not only the people of Quebec, but the whole country will be glad to see this measure become law.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 14,

14. The Governor in Council may at any time direct the redelivery of the said dock to the company.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Under what terms will the government hand a dock back to the company?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—That will be in case they have repaid any sums the government might have been obliged to advance under section 13. If they made default, and the government took possession, and had to pay money, the government would expect to be recouped.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In that case, if it had not been operated it might have fallen into disrepair, and a large amount of money would have to be expended by the government in repairing it. Under these circumstances——

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Under such circumstances, I would say that the government would retain the dock until they were compensated.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I call the attention of the Senate to clause 13. In the preceding section, there is no question of a dry-dock. It is any dock. I understand that there are three classes of docks, and that each is divided into two divisions. They are either dry-docks or floating docks.

Hon. Mr. POWER—A floating dock is a dry-dock.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think dry-dock includes all sorts of docks. Definition 2, says dock includes floating dry-docks. That covers the point raised.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I understand that the minister shall operate the said dock.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I should like to put a question to the right hon. leader about clause 5, which says the plans and specifications and estimates shall be approved by the Governor in Council. Do I understand the site is to be chosen by the company before presenting their plans to be approved of, that the site will be chosen on which the company will have to make their plans?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Clause 5 says it will be accompanied by an estimate of the cost, including the estimates of the cost of all necessary equipment, machinery, plant and site (provided the company is obliged to pay for the site in cash and does not obtain or has not obtained a site by way of bonus or gift), and such estimates of cost shall be in such detail as shall enable the chief engineer of the Department of Public Works to verify the same for the purposes of the report required to be made by him under section 8 of this Act. Are we to understand that the government will make the plans and ask the company to choose a site?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—The hon. gentleman must remember this is a commercial enterprise to be gone into by companies which will get financial aid from the government. The business itself is an entirely private commercial business. The parties who will erect dry-docks in Canada, either stationary or floating, will erect those docks where they think they will have the best chance of getting business. That is the first principle. After having decided where to erect one, say for example, near the city of Quebec, they would come to the government, and say we propose to erect a dock of such a lifting capacity, or, if a stationary dock, of such cubic contents, and then the government might say to them: 'We are not obliged to make an agreement with everybody.' The government can use its discretion. If every firm in England that build docks were to apply, the government might say we need one in Montreal or Three Rivers or Quebec. And then the promoters of this enterprise would come to the government and say we propose to erect a dock, say at Lévis, and this is the kind of dock we propose to erect.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—All that has been said is absolutely correct. We all understand that, but it does not answer my question. It seems to me, even according to my hon. friend's statement, that a private company before preparing plans at great cost would have to know where to put the dock.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The company selects the site.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I understand that too.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—If it pays for the site, then it enters into an estimate of the cost. If the site is a gift from a province or town, it is deducted from the cost on which the subsidy is paid.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Do the government prepare the plans before a site is found? If so, and the government should refuse to accept the site, it would put the company in a bad position.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Many plans have already been submitted to the government for dry-docks. It does not make much difference where floating docks are placed, but after a company decides to erect a dry-dock at a certain place, they would come to the government and say: 'We have a certain site for which we would like to have your approval.'

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—The estimate of the cost might depend very much on the site selected.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—For a floating dock?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—No, for a stationary dock. It seems to me the first step would be for the company to know where they were going to put the dry-dock, and then prepare the plans. In that case the government would compel them to accept their plans.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I would take it for granted that the first step any company would take would be to interview the government.

Hon. Mr. FORGET, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read the third time, and passed.

CITY OF OTTAWA IMPROVEMENT BILL

FIRST, SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (No. 230) An Act respecting the city of Ottawa.

The Bill was read the first time.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The Bill is not distributed, but it provides an annual grant of $100,000 for making Ottawa the Washington of the North. This amount is to be paid quarterly to the commission, and there is a further contribution of $15,000 to the city of Ottawa for fire protection.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think the hon. member from DeLanaudière (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) should explain the Bill. It was originally $60,000 a year, but it is now $100,000.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I understand the city of Ottawa has represented that if the government property in the city were taxed the amount of taxes would be larger than this grant. Any one who has driven over the beautiful drives of the Improvement Commission must admit that the money has been well expended. The work has been done most economically. It would be well if all public money were as prudently and carefully expended.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—How much has been spent by the Improvement Commission up to date?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—A mere trifle, something over a million dollars.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is the commission half through yet with its work?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Very little remains to complete the boulevard.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is the expenditure of the $100,000 per annum beginning with 1909?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—The idea was to spend $60,000 a year; but it was found it would take too long to make the improvements in that way, so the appropriation was discounted in order to prosecute the work more rapidly.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I thought the first grant to the city of Ottawa was $120,000, but as it was an election time, the amount was reduced to $60,000.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I was in the Commons at the time the Bill was introduced, and had a great deal to do with it at the time. The original Bill introduced in 1898 or 1899 was for $60,000 per year for ten years, but in 1903, in order to enable the Improvement Commission to carry out the works then in contemplation, they were authorized to capitalize the grant of $60,000, and the period of ten years was extended. This Bill provides that the grant shall be $100,000 a year for ten years from 1909.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—The appropriation is reasonable, taking into consideration the fact that the government do not pay taxes on their property. At the same time, I warn the government that in Quebec there is an immense amount of government property which is untaxed, and I understand the corporation of that city will ask for a grant similar to this, and I hope the government will accede to their request.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I may take this opportunity of congratulating the present party in power on their liberality and the progress they are making in spending money. These events revive one's memory. I remember distinctly, and so does my right hon. friend who sits opposite me, when the Conservative government took Major's Hill under their management and relieved the city of Ottawa of the responsibility of keeping that park in order, how we were jolly well abused by the Liberal party in the House of Commons. Although some years ago, they condemned the expenditure of a very small sum of money, they are now prepared to pay millions to beautify the city. I think the finances of Canada have developed sufficiently to justify to a great extent what has been done, but I cannot help contrasting the action of the Reform party of to-day with their conduct of a few years ago, when the attempt was made to put Major's Hill park in passable order.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is this amount provided in clause 17 for fire protection an additional sum to the $40,000?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Making $50,000?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The sum granted in consideration of fire protection was included in the $60,000 paid under the old Act. This provides for the increasing of that $60,000 grant to $100,000, and $15,000 in addition.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I speak from recollection, and the hon. gentleman from Ottawa can correct me, but I rather think that is held as a separate thing.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—It was taken into account; but there was no special amount paid for that particular service under the original agreement. It was one of the things urged upon the government in making the original grant, although no special provision was made.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. BOYER, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read the third time, and passed.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST AND SECOND READINGS.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (No. 32) An Act to amend the Government Railways Act.

The Bill was read the first time.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of the Bill.

He said: The object of this Bill is chiefly that if a loss has been sustained for which the government is liable, and it should prove that a considerable or any amount of insurance had existed on the property destroyed, that the claimant would be obliged to account for the insurance, or deduct it from the amount he would recover from the government. Apparently it would prevent the parties being paid twice over.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This only applies to government railways.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is there a like provision in the Railway Act governing cases of this kind with regard to railways which are not government railways?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—No, there is a limitation so far as government railways are concerned, that no larger verdict than $5,000, under any circumstances, shall be obtained, and that if the party sustaining the loss has his property insured, the amount paid him under his policy would be deducted.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is there a similar Act governing the Canadian Pacific railway or any other railway?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The government are not responsible at all by statute law.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—That would be matter of evidence. The defendant company would go into court and the jury would take that into consideration in awarding a verdict, but there is no statute defining that condition.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is a very good explanation; but if the jury would deduct the amount of insurance that was upon the property destroyed by the Intercolonial railway, why would the same principle not apply to a claim for damages by parties whose property was destroyed by sparks from locomotives of a company railway?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—While the statute defines that the government must get credit for the amount of money paid by the insurance company to the claimant, yet in a case against the Canadian Pacific railway or any other railway, if under the General Railway Act, of course the company would give evidence that the plaintiff's property was insured up to a certain sum, and no doubt any intelligent jury would take advantage of that in giving a verdict and take the sum already received for insurance into consideration.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman has repeated three times a presumption that the courts would do a certain thing. Would that not apply to a government railway just as well, and if it would, what reason is there for enacting a law like this as to government property when it does not apply to the property of individuals?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Because the statute limits the compensation for damages to $5,000. It does not limit the amount in the case of the Canadian Pacific railway, or any other railway.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is not the question.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—Does this Bill increase or decrease the amount?

Hon. Mr. POWER—It simply provides that the amount of insurance shall be deducted.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Of course the railways are governed by the common law. They do not get the benefit of any insurance, because the party who insures his property pays by way of premium for the insurance he is to receive. Therefore, any insurance on property which will be damaged by the Canadian Pacific railway will not be taken into consideration in fixing the indemnity; but the government, not being liable under the common law, seeks by this Bill to be relieved, to the extent of any insurance which might be taken on the property which might be insured. Did I understand the hon. gentleman to state that no action could be taken against the government for damages that might arise from sparks from a locomotive on the Intercolonial railway unless the party applied for a fiat to go into court? When they go into court the jury make the provision that the amount of insurance upon the property destroyed shall be deducted from the verdict that is given against them.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Yes, exactly.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It strikes me that this clause is useless unless there is some reason of this kind. Why it should not apply to the Canadian Pacific railway or other roads not government roads it is difficult to understand, unless, as my hon. friend states, the common law covers them, and if a verdict was rendered against a railway company and the property damaged was insured, then the amount of insurance would be deducted from the verdict for damages.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I should like to point out this phase of the Bill, which seems to me to be subject to very great abuse, that if a person should suffer a loss greater than $5,000 he might, keeping in view the fact that he could only recover a limited amount from the government, carry a policy of insurance to cover the balance of the loss which he might suffer. Let us assume that he suffered a total loss. He has calculated that he could recover a proportionate amount from the government and his policy of insurance will insure to him the recovery of the balance. Under the Bill he would fail to have that carried out. The government would have the right to come in and say, 'If you had not insured you had the right to recover from the government a certain proportion of the loss which you have suffered, but inasmuch as you placed a policy of insurance upon the property, the Crown is therefore exempt by that amount. Let us assume he suffers ten thousand dollars loss. He insures for five thousand, knowing that he has a right also to recover from the government or Crown for five thousand. Under this Bill the government can say: 'You have insured for five thousand, and consequently you cannot recover anything from the Crown.' That seems to me to be inequitable. It is not the common law as it stands to-day.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—That is a concession. We know the subject cannot sue the Crown.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But the whole trend of legislation in parliament with respect to government railways has been to place the claimant in as favourable a position with reference to accident actions for negligence, as he would have against private railway corporations, and it seems to me that this clause is manifestly inequitable. It certainly should receive further consideration. I can appreciate the Crown deducting a proportionate amount of damages, that is to say the damages should be reduced by the amount that may be covered by insurance, but not otherwise.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I am not prepared to say. The point which the hon. gentleman mentions struck me when I read over the Bill for the first time.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I do not think it is intended to meet the condition I have spoken of.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —In the history of the Intercolonial railway there have been a certain number of cases in which, practically speaking, the party who suffered the loss made the Crown pay and the insurance company also.

Hon. Mr LOUGHEED—They could not do it at common law.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —And there would be a good deal of difficulty on the part of the Crown, without some such provision, to defend themselves. It would not be my hon. friend's desire that the party suffering damage should receive the full amount from the insurance company and from the Crown also.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, but almost invariably, in fact one can say that invariably, every insurance policy provides that if the insured should recover damages for the property insured, the insurer shall in turn have the right to recover that amount—at least be placed in the same position as the insured. That is a well known principle of insurance, where damages are recoverable.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I am not prepared to argue the case against my hon. friend, other than to remind him of the fact that it is a concession in the right way, that the Crown should be held liable.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But the claimant, under the old law as we have it on the statute-book, would be entitled to recover from the Crown for damages sustained in such a case as this.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —These damages are very properly of a highly indirect nature, on the Intercolonial railway particularly.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, in a case of that kind, the claimant could not recover; that is with modern efficient appliances, and where there has been no negligence.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—In that case, he is limited to $5,000 damages as against the Crown.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Did we not last year amend the Act by which the insurance reverted to the railway company which paid the damage?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, that is the law to-day. We placed that law on the statute-book in 1908, but previous to that I do not think damages could be recovered in a case of this kind. I think the intention of the Crown is to be subrogated to the position practically occupied by the claimant, that is if the claimant's loss was satisfied with insurance therefor, he could not recover from the Crown. But assuming that the insurance only paid half the claim he should be entitled to recover from the Crown, surely he should be paid that half.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I think the Act provides that if the claimant receives a certain amount of the damage, in the way of insurance, he recovers the difference from the Crown.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am referring to a case where the insurance is in excess of $5,000. Let us assume that the insurance is $5,000, and that the loss is $10,000: surely the Crown will not take advantage of that portion which was not recovered. If he suffers a loss of $5,000 and is insured for $4,000, the government should be entitled to have the advantage of the $4,000 insurance, and only pay $1,000; but where the loss exceeds $5,000 the claimant should be paid as long as the payment does not exceed $5,000.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK from the Committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

BOUNTIES ON IRON AND STEEL BILL. FIRST, SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (No. 231) An Act respecting bounties on iron and steel made in Canada.

The Bill was read the first time.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of the Bill. He said: This Bill abolishes the bounty on the larger proportion and fixes a limit, which at present does not exist, to the bounty on wire rods. That is the sole purport of the Bill. At present no limitation exists: it might go on forever for all our statute says; but it is limited now to the 30th day of June, 1911. In the other case, the bounties will be abolished altogether.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—When?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I think on the 1st of January next.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill passed through its final stages.

THE DEPARTURE OF HIS EXCELLENCY THE GOVERNOR GENERAL.

MOTION.

The following message was received from the House of Commons:—

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Sir Albert Henry George, Earl Grey, Viscount Howick, Baron Grey of Howick, in the County of Northumberland, in the Peerage of the United Kingdom, One of His Majesty's Honourable Privy Council, and a Baronet; Knight Grand Cross of the Most Distinguished Order of St. Michael and St. George, Knight Grand Cross of the Royal Victorian Order, &c., &c., Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of the Dominion of Canada.

May it please Your Excellency:

We, His Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects the Commons of Canada in parliament assembled, beg leave to convey to Your Excellency an expression of the general feeling of regret with which all classes in this country have learned that your official connection with Canada is soon to cease.

It must be a source of gratification to Your Excellency, on your retirement from the high office of Governor General, to realize that the period of your administration has been characterized by general and increasing prosperity in every portion of the Dominion.

The zeal with which Your Excellency has sought, by personal observation, to gain an intimate knowledge of the character, possibilities and requirements of every section of the country, has been highly appreciated by the people of Canada.

The special interest which Your Excellency has taken in everything calculated to foster a high sense of public duty and responsibility, to stimulate intellectual development and to advance science and art, will long be gratefully remembered; while the success of your endeavours in cultivating the growth of a Canadian spirit has strengthened us in the belief that the full development of our national life is compatible with the closest and most loyal connection with the empire. The National Park established at Quebec on the Plains of Abraham will remain as an enduring monument to Your Excellency's wise and enlightened efforts to this end.

We beg that Your Excellency will express to the King our loyal attachment to His Majesty's Throne and Person, and our united resolve to accomplish our part in the maintenance and upbuilding of His Majesty's empire.

In saying farewell to Your Excellency and family, we cannot refrain from expressing our appreciation of the important and gracious part taken by Her Excellency the Countess Grey in the success which has marked the discharge of your high responsibilities and labours; the helpful, generous and sympathetic co-operation afforded by Her Excellency and by your daughters, Lady Sybil and Lady Evelyn, in the performance of our public and social duties has won for them an enduring place in the affection and respect of the Canadian people.

In conclusion, we beg to assure Your Excellency that you will always have our warmest wishes for the future hapiness of yourself and family.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The duty which falls to my lot to-night is partly pleasant and partly painful. It is a pleasure to me to join in the well-earned congratulations which the House of Commons are extending to His Excellency in respect to the manner in which he has discharged the duties of his high office during the period that he has been Governor General of Canada; and it is also with a source of regret to me, as I am sure it will be to all members in this Chamber and elsewhere, that we are obliged to bid farewell to one who has so well filled the duties of that important office as Lord Grey has done. Certainly, in Canada, we cannot complain that, whatever the British government may or may not have done, they have not failed to send us men of the most distinguished position amongst the British aristocracy. We have had an Argyle, a Derby, a Lansdowne, an Aberdeen and a Grey among our Governors General, and I am bound to say, and I think every one will agree, that Lord Grey has shown himself a worthy representative of the great statesman whose descendant he is. More than that, I believe that no man has ever been a Governor General in Canada who has been more anxious, as far as lay in his power, to promote the interests of the whole Dominion, and who has taken more pains than he has done to make himself acquainted thoroughly with every portion of this wide Dominion of ours. I doubt if there are half a dozen men in Canada who have explored Canada as it now stands so thoroughly as Lord Grey has done. In his personal relations also, I feel sure that I will be voicing the opinion of the Chamber when I say that he has been distinguished during the whole term of his incumbency in office by a genial courtesy and an earnest desire to obtain information on all points of interest in this Dominion, and I am certain that when he returns to England we shall have in his person a warm and a powerful advocate of all matters which we may desire to bring to the notice of the imperial parliament. I may say also, as this address indicates, that in all this Lord Grey has been admirably seconded by his accomplished wife and charming daughters. They have made everybody who had the honour of the entree of Government House thoroughly at home, and they have shown themselves in all respects desirous of extending the courtesies of Government House as widely as possible, and have been the means of making us acquainted in Canada with a great many distinguished visitors whom they have entertained from time to time. In all respects, therefore, I think that we may most justly congratulate Lord Grey on the way in which he has discharged his duties, and I trust that in other spheres of activity he will be equally successful, as I am sure he will be if the occasion presents itself, when serving the empire, of which for many years he has been a very distinguished public servant. I have the honour, seconded by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, to move that we join in the address presented to this House which I understand is being adopted by the House of Commons, to Lord and Lady Grey and their daughters. I move that it be taken into consideration now, and that the Senate agree with the House of Commons in the joint address to the Governor General, by filling up the blank space left therein with the words 'Senate and.'

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I regret that I have been unexpectedly called upon to give expression on the address which has just been read. Had I known this duty would have devolved upon me, I should have endeavoured to give more adequate expression than I now can in further contributing to the admirable sentiments to which we have listened. I concur in all that has been said with reference to His Excellency the Governor General. Canada has been extremely fortunate during the last five years in having His Excellency represent the Crown in this country, and I am sure the people of Canada join in the regrets which have been expressed in both Houses with reference to his early departure from the Dominion. We have been extremely fortunate in the official connection of His Excellency the Governor General with the Dominion, and the very close manner in which he has identified himself with Canadian life. I am not familiar with any public man possessed of such a high sense of public duty as that which has characterized the administration of His Excellency in Canada. I know of no phase of our national life with which he has not identified himself most sympathetically and actively. He has inculcated among our people a patriotic spirit which I am sure will go far to strengthen the ties of the empire between Canada and the motherland. His interest in Canadian affairs has been evinced by his visits and personal observation, in almost every part of the Dominion. I venture to say that there are very few Canadians throughout the Dominion with the same intimate knowledge of the various districts of Canada, their resources, their importance and their characteristics as that possessed by His Excellency. Every Canadian must be surprised at the intimate knowledge shown by His Excellency of every part of Canada. This likewise extends to all our social questions, our benevolent, and philanthropic institutions, and even our public amusements. In all these he has been almost an active participant. It will certainly be a very great advantage to Canada that upon His Excellency's return to England he will be able to speak with authority upon the vast resources of Canada, and the possibilities of Canada's future. We certainly have in our Governors General who have gone back from Canada to England, men of position, who have contributed in a marked degree towards assisting Canada in its march of progress and development, and I am satisfied that in His Excellency the present Governor General, we shall have one of the warmest champions of Canada's possibilities in the motherland. I also concur in the sentiments which have been expressed by my right hon. friend with reference to the co-operation and sympathy of Her Excellency and her daughters in the social life of Canada, and in all those spheres of influence which they have so adorned. We have appreciated their presence among us, and upon the departure of His Excellency and his family I am sure that the people of Canada will cherish pleasant memories for many years to come of His Excellency's tenure of office while representing the Crown in this part of His Majesty's dominions.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It is perhaps fitting that a voice should be raised from the province of Quebec to state that the feeling of the French Canadians is most warm for His Excellency and Her Excellency. Ever since this vice-regal couple have been in our midst we have felt that a large measure of sympathy was extended by them towards the French-speaking subjects of the King in Canada. His Excellency has been most pronounced in his desire and in his efforts to bring the two races together, to develop a greater knowledge on the part of one race for the other, and to bring them more in contact socially and otherwise. He has felt that the French Canadians were setting an example which perhaps should be followed by the majority, in speaking, to the best of their ability, the language of the majority, and he has done his best to develop a taste and a desire in the more cultured part of the English-speaking population for a knowledge of the French language. He has, with Her Excellency, helped to found clubs wherein the two races should meet together socially for the benefit of both and for the best advantage of Canada. He has throughout the land tried to disseminate a better knowledge among the English-speaking race of the French history of Canada. He has done his best to bring into relief the heroes and heroines of the history of Canada from the foundation of this colony up to the cession of 1763, and we all remember how enthusiastic he was in disseminating knowledge of those who have done something for the development of Canada under the French regime. All this effort has not been in vain, and the French population of Canada will long remember the good work Their Excellencies have done towards bringing the two races in closer contact. It has been well said by the right hon. gentleman who leads this House, and the leader of the opposition, that His Excellency has interested himself in all that was of interest to Canada and Canadians. He endeavoured always to bring what knowledge he possessed to forwarding all modern ideas towards the proper development and embellishment of cities, and on the last visit he made to Montreal he busied himself in promoting a movement which had for its object the securing of land around the city of Montreal in order that the city might prepare itself for its high destiny. He proposed that the city, or some other organization, should secure land all around Montreal, in order that there should be retained for the future some adequate space for the founding of homes for the labouring population so as to avoid the dangers of the slums, which exist in large cities such as London and New York, and I know that he interviewed the authorities in Montreal to induce them to prepare a plan of the island, on a large scale, by which the labouring population would in the future have the advantage of better lodgings, on lines similar to those followed in and around the city of London. This is one illustration among a thousand of the interest which His Excellency took in all that affected the welfare of Canada, and of the present and of its future generations. I join with very great pleasure in the eulogies uttered by the leaders of the Senate regarding Their Excellencies Lord and Lady Grey, and Lady Sybil and Lady Evelyn.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middlesex)—As a private member of the Senate, I may be permitted to say a word to accentuate what has been said so well by the right hon. leader of the House, the hon. leader of the opposition and the hon. member from Delormier. I have had the honour, although a comparatively young man, to have been personally acquainted with all the Governors General of Canada, with the exception of Lord Lisgar. I remember when I first entered parliament we had the honour, shall I call it the pleasure, of the presence of the Earl of Dufferin, who had then entered practically upon the beginning of his diplomatic career, and every successor of his down to the present Governor General seemed to be equally anxious, not only to adorn the position which they filled, but to be of service to the country they served. I often felt in conversation with these distinguished representatives of His Majesty that to a young country like Canada, undeveloped, the attitude of a Governor General was most important in many respects. In the first place, to a certain extent—for we have not all of us visited the old land and associated with statesmen who have made history for England and guided our destinies—many of us have formed opinions of British institutions and British statesmen, and more particularly of the aristocracy of England from the character of the men sent to represent the Crown in this country. As a Canadian, I think it is most important that we should have a due appreciation of the various elements that constitute the British nation. It is not enough that we should know a nation historically or that we should be acquainted with the development of her constitutional law; we should also have an idea of the part the aristocracy of Great Britain has played in the maintenance of its status as a nation and fulfilling the high duties which, from their education and training, they are best qualified to fill. Judging, by that alone, those who have been sent in a representative capacity to this country, there can be but one opinion among the people of Canada, that there are statesmen still in England, that the old blood of the men of days gone by who stood by British institutions and devoted the very best social, and personal influences to the development of the British nation, still survives in the presence of those whom we have the honour of seeing from time to time. The personal equation, and it is a most important one in the case of every Governor General during my experience, has been most gratifying to me as a Canadian, and has been so I think to every Canadian who came in contact with them, and to us as a young people that personal equation is a most important one because it is most difficult, I find in my own case personally, sometimes for us to place ourselves in our relation to the Governor General in a position which will enable us to see him at his best and which will enable him to see us at our best. Earl Grey has lent himself in those kindly, sociable affable relations to the people of Canada which have enabled us fully to appreciate him as a man and to regard him not only with respect but with affection as a Governor General. I emphasize that feature of his character, although in that respect he has only walked to a large extent in the footsteps of his predecessors, and he has shown that with a dignity of honour and respect which belongs to his position he has the same human qualities as other men and can take you by the hand with the same cordiality and kindness as one to the manner born. Another feature which happily has characterized all our Governors General, for I shall make no immediate distinction, is the anxiety and earnestness and zeal with which each and all of them endeavour to make themselves acquainted with the people they serve, or, shall I say with the people they govern, although I prefer the word 'serve,' for any man who is not willing to serve is incapable of governing well. Earl Grey, early in his history, even before he was Governor General, tried to make the acquaintance of the people of Canada, and tried to know the characteristics of the people and tried to forestall the future by making himself acquainted with the aspirations of the people. Any Governor General who can serve Canada well must do this. He not only impressed himself upon the people of Canada, which is a good thing, but he also enabled the people of Canada to impress themselves upon him, and while he, to a certain extent, reflects the qualities which he possesses, when he leaves us, I think he will reflect the qualities which we impressed upon him. He came to us as a Briton, the descendant of a distinguished statesman, and leaves us as much a Canadian as if born within the confines of the Dominion of Canada, and wherever he goes, to the last day, I think he can never forget the people who gave the respect which these people showed towards him, nor can he forget the great future which we have impressed upon him as the future which is in store for us. The hon. gentleman from Delorimier referred to one very interesting, and to my mind very gratifying feature of his career, and that was the close manner in which he identified himself with the best life of our people. There are spheres of usefulness, as Salisbury said in regard to the spheres of influence. There are other spheres. He seems to have chosen for himself those spheres which were, no doubt, genial to his own character, but which were beneficial to Canada. In the first place, he endeavoured to give us a higher idea of the value of human life by a close study of sanitary matters and by his attention and desire to develop hospital protection and relief for the people of Canada. The humane side of his career is one we cannot forget, and Her Excellency was also solicitous for our welfare in that regard. He also identified himself with the intellectual life of this country. There is not a university in Canada which has not been enlightened by his presence, and of the ten or fifteen thousand students, there are few who have not heard his voice. In that way, he has injected himself and the better qualities of his position into the young life of Canada, and if we are rising to a higher plane, as I think we are, we owe something to him and to his predecessors for inspiring us with higher ideals of character and with models of intellectual efficiency and literary pursuits, which is most important in a young country like this. We had his direct efforts to establish aids for dramatic life, to cleanse the theatres from impurities which I think sometimes find their way there, to give us higher ideals as to those who, on the stage, play such an important part in inspiring us with the standard of excellency in drama and music which will exercise an important influence upon this department of human interest and human recreation. He has also identified himself, as the hon. gentleman from Delorimier said, with the Canadian clubs and with all those influences which go to cutlivate a patriotic spirit. We cannot understand a Governor General that is not patriotic, and I do not know that we can appreciate to the full value the extent to which Earl Grey and some of his predecessors with him have enthused into us a higher degree of patriotism for our own land, and a higher degree of attachment to the land which he represented to a certain extent. These are qualities which we should not forget. My hon. friend referred to the endeavour which His Excellency made to establish cordial relations between the two dominant races in Canada. I sometimes dislike to speak of two races I do not know whether we are two races or not. We have become so thoroughly united now and entirely fused the one into the other, that I sometimes think it is but one race, and that Canadian; but assuming for the moment that there are two races—there may have been two when His Excellency came, but I think there is but one or practically only one when His Excellency leaves. Of all the individual efforts which His Excellency has made to unite these two races and to have them enthused, the tercentenary of Quebec stands out as one of the great efforts in his career. Just notice for a moment what it implied. It implied that all Canada should remember that this country was founded by a Frenchman, Champlain, and that under the long career of the French regime there were being built up industries here and an interest in this country which perhaps at that time could not be cultivated in any other way, and we came to that climax in our history, the taking of Quebec in 1859, the transfer from the French regime to the British form of government, or the transfer in which the better elements of the two races united, from that day till now to develop out of that union this great Dominion to which we belong. He had brought also to that great event the representatives of all the nations of the world. His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales came to tell Britain and her colonies that there was somewhere, if they would only look on the map over on this continent of America, a young Dominion that might be honoured by having as its governor the heir apparent to the throne. He brought Old France there with her traditions and her romance in Canada, to remind her that once this land was hers, and although it had passed from her possession it was still a glorious land, perhaps as prosperous as it would have been under her administration. He brought the warships of the United States to tell them that at the back of Canada and at the back of these nations of the world there was France and Germany and others prepared to do honour to the new scion of the British nation, showing the United States that we were appreciated by these nations. That was to Canada a great boon, and gave us a status we would not otherwise have, and then the scenes of that great event, spectacular though they were, brought before us and those who were present, the history of Canada for three hundred years, in a way that this event shall not be forgotten.

I am sure His Excellency will not forget it, and no Canadian will forget it as long as he lives. Another word on the efforts of His Excellency has made to maintain cordial relations between Canada and the United States. We have no quarrel with them, and are not concerned particularly with their attitude towards us, and yet the example of British statesmen and British diplomacy and the example of His Majesty the King means that in a conciliatory spirit lies the greatest effort of a nation. Conciliation on his part as far as it went has done a great deal to sweeten the pleasant relations between Canada and that country. Our hope is—speaking for myself and those on the back benches of the Senate—that when he returns to England he will return as his predecessor did, impressed with the importance of this new Dominion. We will have in him an able representative and an advocate at the seat of the Throne, and an advocate in the House of Lords, which he will, no doubt, enter upon his return, and like the Duke of Argyll, Lord Dufferin and Lord Lansdowne and his predecessor, he will be able to tell the people that they need have no fear for the loyalty of Canada or for the sturdy sons that left the old country years ago, who will build up on the western continent a country equal in wealth and perhaps greater in prosperity than the land they left, and perhaps the centre of the empire will not be the bank of the Thames as laid by the Romans two thousand years ago, but that the centre of the empire may gravitate to this side of the Atlantic.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Mlddlesex).

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until 10.30 tomorrow.

THE SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 4, 1910.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at 10.30 a.m.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

COST OF MILITARY FORTS AT BEAUMONT.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

1. How much have the works of construction of the military forts situated at Beaumont, near Quebec, cost up to this date?
2. Are the works in question finished?
3. If not, at how much is their completion valued?
4. What is the number of men actually employed on these works?
5. How much did the armament of these forts cost?
6. Are there any guardians appointed for the care of these forts?
7. Who are they and their annual salary?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I am prepared to answer these questions; but I do not know whether my hon. friend will regard the answer as satisfactory.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I think it is a memorable day when the departments are ahead of the desires of my hon. friend.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—With reference to this inquiry, the information asked for is confidential, and it would not be in the public interest to make it public. The hon. Mr. Landry will be given access to the information if he can make it convenient to call at the department.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I will not wait over a day for that.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—They will regard the communications of my hon. friend as confidential.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I might call on the department during the recess.

COMPLAINTS AGAINST IMMIGRANT RESTAURANT KEEPER AT QUEBEC.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

Has the government actually in its employment or does it permit Jacques Dery, the restaurant keeper, to have in his employment, as a superintendent in the dining room, a woman by the name of Poitras?

Does the government know that this woman, according to the report of its officer, Mr. Blair, has been accused, among other things, of insulting immigrants and of conducting herself towards them in an uncivil manner?

Has this woman, as a result of these accusations and of an inquiry held into them, not been forced to abandon her position, upon the recommendation of the Immigration Department and upon the positive order of the former immigrant agent at Quebec?

If she is actually in the employment of the government, is it with the authorization of the present agent and to the knowledge of the department?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows:

1. Madame Poitras is an employee of Mr. Dery; not of the government.

2. In one particular instance, some four years ago, she was so accused. There has been no other or subsequent complaint of her conduct.

3. No.

4. See answer to 1.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Then there is the question about the authorization.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The Department of Railways and Canals advise me that this would be extremely voluminous if answered as a question. They would be quite ready to give the information if it were asked for as a return.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Then I put it in the form of a return, with the understanding that as soon as it is ready it will be given. I know that they will not hasten too much.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—With the leave of the House change it to a return.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I have no objection.

The motion was agreed to accordingly.

CONTRACTS BETWEEN GOVERNMENT AND SHOE MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

What is the date of the contract signed by the government and Mr. Ernest Caron or the Shoe Manufacturing Company which occupies the former properties of the firm of Carrier & Lainé, of Levis?

For how many years has this property been leased?

At what yearly price?

Is the yearly price the same for the whole duration of the contract?

If not, in what is it variable and what is the variation?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows:

1. Signed 23rd April, 1909.

2. Thirty years, to be computed from May 1st, 1909.

3, 4 and 5. $4,000 for the first ten years and $6,000 for the balance of the lease.

I think that closes our account for the present.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There are a few more little matters, but I will write.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS BRANCH LINES BILL.

MOTION.

A message was received from the House of Commons requesting a conference to consider Bill (No. 17) An Act to authorize the government of Canada to acquire by lease lines of railway connecting with the government railways.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved that the Hon. Messrs. Béique, Watson and Power be appointed to represent the Senate at the conference, and that word be sent to the Commons that they are prepared to meet them.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The rule laid down in the books is that the gentlemen who are appointed to conduct the conference should be in sympathy with the view of the majority in the House. That would shut out the hon. gentleman from Portage la Prairie.

The name of Hon. Mr. Dandurand was substituted for that of Hon. Mr. Watson, and the motion was agreed to.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the third reading of Bill (No. 232) An Act to amend the Government Railways Act.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—This order was postponed until this morning, on account of the objection that was raised by the hon. leader of the opposition, as to whether, under the wording of this Bill, parties claiming damages against the government would be adequately protected. On reading the wording of the Bill more closely, it will be found that the Bill does meet the case mentioned by the hon. leader of the opposition. If there is, for instance, a loss of ten thousand dollars, and there is an insurance for five thousand dollars, ten thousand dollars being the amount of the total loss will be reduced to the extent of five thousand dollars, and there will remain a claim of five thousand dollars which the claimant can recover against the government. I was not in the House yesterday when the other Bill passed, but I understand that a like amendment was made to the Railway Act, in order to cover exactly the same point.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I must say, without desiring to prolong the discussion, that notwithstanding the lucid explanation of the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry, I am yet of the same opinion.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—If the hon. gentleman will read the Act closely, he will find that the deduction is made against the amount claimed and not against the amount allowed, so that the amount allowed remains at five thousand dollars without any impairment.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

INCORPORATION OF RAILWAY COMPANIES BILL.

ORDER DISCHARGED.

The order of the day being called:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion for the second reading (Bill D) an Act to provide for the incorporation of Railway Companies.—(Hon. Mr. Davis).

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think I am to a certain extent responsible for this measure being still on the orders of the day. I had it kept alive for my hon. friend from Prince Albert, and I now move that the order be discharged.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Although I am not exactly in sympathy with the measure as introduced by the hon. gentleman, some years ago I introduced in this House a Bill somewhat on the same lines, except that the Bill that I brought in was more explicit. It required people applying for railway charters to furnish plans and profiles. I remember that the present leader of the opposition changed the title of the Bill anl styled it a Bill to provide employment for the unemployed land surveyors and engineers. I really think that next session the government ought to amend the Railway Act in order to make it more in accordance with the Railway Acts of other countries. Our system is absolutely wrong. We should do either one thing or the other. Either let every one build railways according to the general law——

Hon. Mr. POWER—Is the hon. gentleman opposing the discharging of the order of the day?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—No, but I am in order. I think our system is absolutely wrong. No doubt, many of these charters are obtained from parliament for the purpose of preventing other promoters from actually building the lines. I feel very strongly on the subject. There is no doubt that many companies and many promoters come here for this very purpose. I have been in the Senate for many years, and I know that the same people are constantly applying for charters with a view to speculating in them. They are nothing else but charter mongers. Parliament should put a stop to the practice by changing the law so that, as in the state of New York, simply by filing plans and profiles in the office, the Commissioner of Public Works would allow a company to be incorporated, and go on and build. When they have that authority, they have powers of expropriation according to the General Railway Act, the same as other companies. If parliament will persist in giving these people charters, they should exact something in return, that they shall file plans or go to some expense before getting their charter. I am sure it would not be too much to ask, supposing an engineer was asked for a report saying that he simply walked over the route and knew it was feasible to build a railway there; but, as we know, there is nothing surer than the fact that people apply for these charters—for instance, if there is a large railway like the Canadian Pacific going in one direction, there are any number of charter mongers trying to get branch lines, and then they go and obtain subsidies on the branch lines from the local and federal governments, and, after they have obtained the subsidies they will say, 'We have had land subsidies, and we have had government guarantees granted to us.' Now, what will this big company do? We know how many times the Canadian Pacific railway have actually had to pay the charter mongers, not only for their charter, but also for the privilege to act, and for handing over to the Canadian Pacific railway the subsidies they had obtained just because they happened to be friends of the government at the time. All this can be remedied by having the Railway Act amended so that anybody could build a railway, provided he complies with certain regulations, the same as with letters patent, or that, before you grant a charter, which practically gives a monopoly to certain companies to build over certain territory, they supply the parliament with plans and a profile and a report, and let them demonstrate, as is required in England, that some financial concern will come and say that the promoters are, so far as they know, able to carry out their undertaking.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I am inclined to think that, if we followed the precedents laid down last night in passing a Bill, it would not be necessary even to apply for a charter for a railway because we had a Bill last night with respect to incorporating railway companies, and it was worked in as a government measure. So far as charter mongers are concerned, I think that the method which has been adopted for the last few years in both Houses, of giving charters to practically everybody who applies for them, has done away with the value of the charters, and, in fact, I am inclined to think it is because charters have become valueless that we have this legislation suggested at the present time.

Hon. Mr. BOYER—How would it do to apply prohibition to charters, and, instead of making the fee $200 for a charter make it $500? Everything is expensive in our days, including ink and paper, and, if we raise the fee to $500, or $1,000, that would remedy the evil.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—A good deal has been said about charter mongers, but we must bear in mind that we are living in a new country, and, if it had not been for what the hon. gentleman describes as charter mongers, many of our railways would not have been constructed. It was through the efforts of charter mongers that many schemes were placed before capitalists for a number of years, and they were ultimately taken up by responsible people, and the lines were constructed. A time may come when the government of this country will not vote subsidies to railways, and we may adopt the system which obtains in some other countries, but I do not think we have reached that time, and, if the suggestion were adopted now, it would open the door much wider to charter mongers than the present system does, because then we would see numbers of parties filing their papers, and securing prior rights, which they cannot do under the present system.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It would be highly interesting to this House and country if the hon. gentleman would point out how many independent roads there are in existence to-day, even in the older provinces, and particularly in the western provinces. I venture the statement that there is not one in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, or Alberta. Charters have been obtained in the way mentioned by the hon. gentleman who spoke first, and they have naturally, by purchase or otherwise, fallen into the possession of the Canadian Pacific railway, the Canadian Northern railway, and shortly will fall into the possession of the Grand Trunk Pacific. The parties come here, and obtain subsidies in the manner that has been described, and, when they get subsidies and land grants, they sell them to some of the larger corporations, and they are all absorbed. If this system did not prevail, there is no question that the larger corporations would initiate the construction of these branch lines. We have illustrations of that. The Canadian Pacific railway of late have obtained power to construct branch lines through the Northwest. The Grand Trunk Pacific have obtained authority from parliament for the construction of about one dozen branches, and have received aid from the local government, or this government, or in the shape of guarantees of interest on the bonds floated, to enable them to construct these lines. Before that was done they did not get possession of these subsidies until they had been levied upon for a certain amount of money in order to secure the charters. The sooner that is put an end to the better for the country. We have had this year nearly twenty renewals of charters by men who have never taken the first step towards constructing the chartered lines, and unfortunately, the government are renewing subsidies to such lines to an amount between ten and twenty million dollars, ostensibly to assist in the construction of these roads. Now, just as soon as some of these charter mongers can dispose of their charters to the great corporations, the lines will be built, but not before.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—No doubt most of those railways are ultimately absorbed by trunk lines, but I could name a number of subsidiary lines which have been absorbed by the Canadian Pacific railway or the Canadian Northern railway, which never would have been built if the charters had not been granted as they were. Take one of the lines, the St. Gabriel de Brandon, running from Joliet to St. Felix de Valois, which is serving an important section of the country; I say without hesitation that that road would never have been built if it had not been initiated by men who are designated as charter mongers. Take the St. Maurice River Valley railway, which has been absorbed by the Canadian Pacific railway. In that case the trunk line did not take the initiative. Other parties originated the project, and pressed it upon the Canadian Pacific railway company, until that railway company consented to take up the enterprise. Dozens and hundreds of cases of the kind might be cited in various parts of the country.

The motion was agreed to.

THE IMMIGRATION BUREAU AT QUEBEC.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved:

That in the opinion of the Senate the interests of immigration demand a reform in the organization and administration of the immigration officers.

He said: In making this motion I just wish to call the attention of the House to some facts which have not been sufficiently brought before the Senate during the present session, in relation to the immigration office at Quebec, now managed by the agent, Joseph Lavoie. He was called to that office as assistant agent on the 1st April, 1907. A position was created for him at the time at Quebec. Mr. Lavoie had lived some time in Quebec and had met with failure in running a patent medicine company which he organized, bringing ruin on many. He went to the United States and was naturalized there and was, at the time of his appointment to the office in Quebec, a citizen of the United States. He was brought to Quebec by one of his friends, Mr. Parent, who secured him a position in the immigration office at Quebec, through his influence with the government. The following year the chief agent was compelled to resign, and, naturally Mr. Lavoie being on hand, took his place and became chief agent of the immigration office at Quebec. That was on the 15th April, 1908. On the 1st April, 1909, he got a slight increase in salary, and it is now about $2,000. I do not complain of the gentleman personally; it does not matter to me who is there, but what I do complain of is the treatment which immigrants receive at his hands. A number of complaints have been made against him, but the department does not take these complaints into consideration. They are either turned down or laughed at in the most disgraceful way. I have here a complaint sent to Mr. W. D. Scott, Superintendent of Immigration at Ottawa. It reads as follows:

To Mr. W. D. Scott,
Superintendent of Immigration,
Ottawa.

Sir,—I have the honour to bring to the knowledge of the government, in an official manner, so that it may be taken into account, the following complaint that I formulate as follows:

Firstly.—I, Leonce Stein, during thirty-five years head clerk in the immigration office at Quebec, declare, firstly, that from the 1st January, 1909, to the 15th April, 1909, that Dr. Jos. Paradis Lavoie, Immigration Agent at Quebec, has given forty-three days of leave to the three officers at the immigration office at Quebec, viz.: J. J. O'Flaherty, John O'Connell, Gustave Beaulieu, and forty-seven days to the other three officers, viz.: J. P. Stafford, John Byrne and Sosthene Morisette, this without previously having obtained the necessary authorization to this end, and, what is more serious, of having made a false return to his chiefs in declaring under his signature that all these employed had been present at their office during these 47 days of absence; in consequence the six officers in question have received their full salary, i.e., collectively, a total amount of $694.29, to which they had not any right.

Secondly.—That the said Joseph Paradis Lavoie, Immigration Agent at Quebec, treats the immigrants in an illegal manner, treating them brutally; in support of such accusation and at present only citing a single case, but reserving to myself the right to make known several others, I declare that at the beginning or towards the beginning of the month of June, 1908, one morning towards six o'clock, I have seen with my own eyes Dr. Lavoie, Immigrant Agent at Quebec, in the immigration building, seize an immigrant woman, accompanied by her child, which was lying on the bench, and throwing her to the floor while pushing her violently to the outer door, saying 'Get out, go out.' I will prove this fact and several others by reputable witnesses.

Thirdly.—That the restaurant keeper of the immigration office at Quebec, to the knowledge of the said Jos. P. Lavoie, has set aside the instructions of the government to sell his produce to the immigrants at exorbitant prices.

Fourthly.—That the said Joseph P. Lavoie conducts the Immigration Department in a manner to favour certain persons furnishing supplies, among others, Mr. Jacques Dery, the restaurant keeper, at whose place he himself takes his own meals.

Fifthly.—That the said Joseph P. Lavoie permits the sale and the distribution to the immigrants and to (some?) employees of drinks prohibited by the department.

Sixthly.—That the said Joseph P. Lavoie has succeeded by partial conduct and by outraging preferences in discontenting the different companies which engage in the debarkation and transport of immigrants.

And to prove these accusations in an irrefutable manner, I have the honour to request that following the promise of this that was made by Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright to the Senate during the present session, the government will grant the inquiry which I solicit.

I have the honour to be,
Yours sincerely,
(sgd.) L. STEIN.

Quebec, 21st February, 1910.

This is the first accusation brought against Mr. Lavoie, that of making a false report to the government. This session I called for a return of the attendance and pay-lists of the employees in the Immigration office at Quebec, and requested to have them for the four months ending with April, 1909. I got a return from the department which shows the names of the parties who are complained of in the letter I have just read. I see that in the month of January, O'Flaherty and Stafford and the others are all marked present for the thiry-one days. There is a column for days absent for which pay should be deducted. In all these columns there is no entry. We find at the bottom that those who were permitted to be absent for that month were Mrs. E. Corneil, who had her leave of absence extended from the 8th of January to the 11th, with pay; Drouin had his time extended from the 11th to the 1st inclusive. For the month of February, no days of absence are marked for any of the parties I have mentioned but for Mrs. Corneil and Mr. Drouin there is a record that they were absent on leave for one cause or another. For March and April it is the same. So for those four months O'Flaherty, Stafford, Byrne and Morisette were all marked present. Mr. Stein was absent but sent a medical certificate to the department, and was absent from the 8th to the 30th of April with leave. So was Drouin, who sent a medical certificate to the department. If we turn to the pay-list for those four months, we find O'Flaherty, Stafford, Bolduc and Byrne—all those parties—received their full pay for the four months. All those lists are certified by Mr. Lavoie. We have his signature at the bottom of the page certifying to the accuracy of the information given by the Bureau to the department, though all those people were absent for the time mentioned every month in the four months. This is the subject of the complaint in the letter I have read; we see by the documents furnished by the department in this return that the accusation is sustained:

That the said Joseph Paradis, immigration agent at Quebec, treats the immigrants in an illegal and inhuman manner, treating them brutally; in support of such accusation and at present citing one case only, but reserving to myself the right to make known several others, I declare that at the beginning or towards the beginning of the month of June, 1908, one morning towards six o'clock, I have seen with my own eyes Dr. J. P. Lavoie, Immigration Agent at Quebec, in the immgration building, seize an immigrant woman, accompanied by her child, which was lying on a bench, and throwing her to the floor while pushing her violently to the outer door, saying, 'Get out, go out.'' I will prove this fact and several others by irrefutable witnesses.

This is the grave accusation made against an officer. We will see how it was met a little further on. Then the complaint proceeds:

Thirdly:—That the restaurant keeper of the Immigration Department at Quebec, to the knowledge of the said Joseph P. Lavoie, has set aside the instructions of the government to sell his produce to the immigrants at exorbitant prices.

Fourthly:—That the said Joseph P. Lavoie conducts the Immigration Department in a manner to favour certain persons furnishing supplies, among others, Mr. Jacques Dery, the restaurant keeper, at whose place he himself takes his own meals.

Fifthly:—That the said Joseph P. Lavoie permits the sale and the distribution to the immigrants and to (some) employees of drinks prohibited by the department.

Sixthly:—That the said Joseph P. Lavoie has succeeded by partial conduct and by outraging preferences in discontenting the different companies which engage in the debarkation and transport of immigrants.

We have here a report made a few years before, and an answer is given to one of my inquiries on the subject—a report by an officer of the department named Blair was made on the 28th of June, 1906. What does Mr. Blair say? He reports to Mr. Scott, his chief officer:

According to your instructions I visited Quebec on the 26th and 27th instants, to inquire into the charges and complaints made against Mr. Jacques Dery, the caterer at the immigration sheds there and I beg to report as follows:

I found it difficult to get the exact facts from the persons who had complaints because they stay in Quebec for but a few hours on their way westward. My information was gathered from the most reliable sources available, such as, the Dominion Immigration Agent, Mr. George Hayden, landing master, Mr. Anderson, interpreter, and from others of the staff in Quebec, from the interpreters of the Canadian Pacific railway, from a committee representing most of the churches and charitable organizations of the city also the Salvation Army, Young Men's Christian Association and the Daughters of the Empire.

The complaints are these:—1. That Mr. Dery overcharges for the common necessities. Bread which sells in the city for 18 cents retail delivered, is 20 cents here and in some instances as high as 25 and 30 cents has been paid. Sardines 10 cents, city prices 5 cents. Salmon, (canned) 15 cents, city prices 10 and 12 cents. Cups of tea that should cost 5 cents have been sold for 10 and 15 cents and in more than one case 25 cents was charged for a cup of tea and a slice of bread. This is said to have occurred in the case of a Mrs. Warren landing at Quebec on the 21st inst. These are but sample cases out of numbers reported.

2. Re the charge of incivility and refusal to supply wants of some passengers landing at Quebec per S.S. 'Tunisian' on the 9th inst. (This is the case brought up in the House by Mr. Hughes (Victoria). I learn from Mr. Chas. W. Thorn of the provincial police force who was on duty at the immigration sheds on the above date and was sent for by Madame Poitras, Mr. Dery's manageress in the dining room, that on reaching the dining room he found three or four English ladies who stated that they had come to buy six cups of tea and tendered a one dollar bill for the tea and also as a guarantee for the return of the cups. He says Madame Poitras refused to serve them telling them she did not want either them or their money and then ordered him to remove them which he refused to do, but finally asked them to go outside where he would try to do something for them. He found Rev. Mr. Williams, chairman of the committee of immigration workers, who took them back only to be refused again, which refusal was repeated before Mr. Doyle the immigration agent and Mr. Dery the caterer. the latter finally gave them the tea himself, taking $1 for the tea and the cups and returning 70 cents when the cups were given back.

3. Sometime ago Mr. Dery agreed to give a cup of tea and a sandwich for 5 cents and sell bread for 18 cents. The Dominion immigration agent had large cards posted showing these prices; but on or about the 22nd inst. Mr. Dery removed these cards and refused to agree to the prices or to let the agent have any say in his conduct of the business. Mr. Dery told me that he removed Mr. Doyle's cards and returned to his former prices on the advice of Mr. Arthur Lachance, M.P., for Quebec Centre. Mr. Jean who worked for Mr. Dery as clerk in the store for one season from May 4 to October, 1903, stated that Mr. Dery's prices were always from 10 to 50 per cent higher than city prices. A one pound loaf of bread sold regularly for 5 cents, biscuits 10 cents a pound while the same sort were sold regularly for 5 cents and many other things in proportion.

4. Hot water has for years been supplied free to persons making tea in the building, but I heard numerous complaints that this is not now being done in all cases; although Mr. Dery pays no rent, license, taxes, light or heat, and has his fuel provided for him by the government, yet he refuses to procure appliances to provide hot water at all times.

5. That dock labourers and others not connected with the immigration work are at all times allowed to eat at the building rather than have to go to regular boarding houses kept for such persons. On yesterday, the 27th inst. there were eight of these dock labourers having dinner in the immigration building.

6. That Mr. Dery does not secure, for his dining room help, persons who speak English. I visited the dining room for dinner on the 26th instant, and my order had to be translated into French before I was supplied; with the exception of one lady the help employed cannot speak English enough to conduct any conversation whatever. Of the immigrants arriving, probably not 5 per cent can speak French.

7. I beg to inclose two signed statements handed me by Mr. Doyle regarding the treatment of some passengers of last year.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

Your obedient servant,

(sgd.) F. C. BLAIR.

A CONFERENCE.

The SPEAKER—A message has been received from the House of Commons in the following words:

Wednesday, May 4th, 1910. Resolved that a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their Honours that this House has appointed the Hon. Messieurs Graham, Pugsley, and Taylor (Leeds), to act at a conference of both Houses on the Bill (No. 17) an Act to authorize the government of Canada to acquire by lease, lines of railway connected with the government railways.

According to the rules the House cannot remain in session while the conference is sitting, and I therefore declare the House adjourned during pleasure.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We are to have the Tariff Bill and there is no chance of our getting through by three o'clock. I fancy there are some senators who will discuss that, and there are some other important measures to come before us. It is true during yesterday and the day before we managed to go, without any trouble at all, through some 15 or 20 Bills, really without some of the Bills being before us, and it is adopting a new system. There is no use in keeping the Senate in existence if we are to take the last moment, when the Governor General is at the door, to discuss questions which affect millions of dollars, and the Speaker asks my hon. friend from Stadacona to stop speaking now. If parliament is to prorogue at three o'clock, there is no opportunity to discuss the other measures which are to my mind of some importance. That the utterances of those opposed to them will have little effect on the Senate is no reason why they should not have an opportunity of giving their views on questions which materially affect the interests of this country. I do not know what power or authority the Speaker has to assume the responsibility of saying he will adjourn the House. If the hon. gentleman says there is no quorum that is a different matter. I may not be acquainted with the rules but the course he is pursuing now is something unprecedented to me, as far as my experience goes.

The SPEAKER—The practice is laid down that when a conference begins, and during the sitting of the conference, the session of the House is suspended.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I thought all the rules we had were suspended. I thought we were declared to be the most unruly body on earth.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

After some time the House resumed.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—As manager on behalf of this honourable House in the conference with the House of Commons, I may say we have met the managers of the House of Commons and agreed on the following amendment to be substituted for the amendment made by the Senate to Bill (No. 17) to which exception was taken by the House of Commons. Add to section 3 the following as subsection 2:

2. The said Board shall in their report to the minister recommending the lease of any line of railway.
(a). Give their estimate of the cost of such line, and such information as they are able to give of the moneys received by the company holding the line from the sale of bonds, or by way of bonus or therwise.
(b). State the then present equipment of the road, together with the average rate of freight and charges for passengers on the same and a comparison of such rates with those charged on the Intercolonial railway.
(c). The total receipts and expenditure for three years last past.
(d). The estimates of receipts and expenses in the office of the road being leased as a branch of the Intercolonial railway.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—What is the difference between the two?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It is the same thing, only placed in another position in the Bill. I have the honour to move, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Power, that this report be now adopted.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is virtually the amendment carried by the Senate, only in a more modified language. Pretty nearly the same object will be attained.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It is exactly the same amendment. Instead of saying that parliament shall not hereafter ratify the lease, which may be presented for ratification, before being furnished with the best information, it is provided that the information be presented to parliament whenever any lease is recommended by the Railway Commission in connection with these lines. I think hon. gentlemen will see that the House of Commons are getting the shadow and we are keeping the substance.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—Do I understand that this report is to be presented to the minister instead of parliament. Is that the case?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It will have to be presented to parliament.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—I know it has to be later, but I understand it is presented to the minister in the first place?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Yes.

The motion was agreed to.

IMMIGRATION OFFICE, QUEBEC.

DISCUSSION RESUMED.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I was just about to read the letter sent by Mr. Stein, in answer to a letter from the Department, as follows:

Quebec, 19th April, 1910.

Mr. Dear Senator,—I inclose herewith the declaration of Capt. Geo. Le Bel, Provincial Immigration Agent at Quebec. He was indignant at the manner in which his evidence had been distorted. Would you be good enough to ask the department to change the evidence in that investigation. I inclose to you at once one of these re Byrne. You can judge from it what that investigation was worth. We have good reason to demand a commissioner who knows the French language to make the inquiry. Le Bel gave his evidence in French and it has been interpreted. Send it promptly this week, if Byrne will not execute it, as we embark at the end of the week.

Cordially,
(Sgd.) L. STEIN.

Mr. Fortier answered: 'To what date do you wish the inquiry adjourned?'

Mr. Stein answered: 'My letter will give you all explanations re adjournment.'

And then Mr. Fortier wrote:

In reply to your letter of the 5th inst. I beg to state that enough can be learned from inquiry before me to enable the minister to decide whether there is prima facie a case for a royal commission as your letter seems to suggest. The inquiry will therefore go on beginning at 10 a.m. on Tuesday next, the 15th inst.

The place was fixed and Mr. Fortier came down and Mr. Stein was absent, but he answered the letter on the 30th, as follows:

Your letter of the 9th received to-day, it is impossible for me to take part in the inquiry which it is desired to impose on me at a fixed date without giving me the time and the means of making my witnesses come from a distance without having further received the assurance that the inquiry commissioner will be a person capable of understanding and taking the testimonies in French, without having even given me your consent that the testimonies may be given under oath and without that before entering into the merit of the question what is the plea of the defendant, preliminary procedure imperative for preparing my proof. You are especially referred to my letter of 5th March, I stated that I will hold to the propositions that it contains and ask you again if they are accepted or refused.

(Sgd.) L. STEIN.

The inquiry went on. Fortier came to Quebec. It was entirely ex-parte. The employees of the department in Quebec were examined as witnesses, and under the eye of their officer, Mr. Lavoie, gave the evidence that Mr. Lavoie would like them to give, I suppose. I would call attention to this one fact: In the evidence given there was a witness named Lebel, and in the report of the inquiry he is represented as saying:

That he was always at hand on the landing of immigrants in the early morning, and if any such thing happened as the charges described he would know about it. It would cause scandal. It would be absolutely contrary to anything that one would expect of Dr. Lavoie. Witness did not believe the charge and would not believe it even if made on oath by Mr. Stein.

That is what Mr. Lebel is represented as having said before the government officer, who is making the inquiry in Quebec. Here is a declaration of LeBel. It is in French, but I shall endeavour to translate it:

I, the undersigned, declare that during the inquiry taken in Quebec in the month of March last in the immigration shed in Quebec, inquiring of certain accusations forwarded by Mr. Stein, first clerk of the immigration office at Quebec against Dr. Lavoie, the Federal Agent of Immigration at Quebec, I declare I never said at that inquiry that I would not believe Stein under oath.

So you see the employer or interpreter put in his mouth words that he claimed he never said, and this is testified before two witnesses, Mr. Paquette, the accountant of the department, and Mr. L., a clerk on the Intercolonial Railway. Then the declaration of LeBel shows what a farce the inquiry in Quebec was. No one could rely on what was said there. It was an ex-parte inquiry altogether. In the meantime another party, Mr. O'Flaherty, sent over to the department a complaint against the said Lavoie, in which he put forward his charges, and he winds up by saying that:

In the summer season of 1908-9 foreign immigrants, especially Galicians were drastically treated. The latter were allowed to be forced to go to work against their will and interest on the Transcontinental railway construction who were not eligible to land in the country for non-compliance with the immigration laws, inasmuch as they did not possess the necessary money that entitled them to land. This was an absolute contravention of the immigration laws, said to be aided and abetted in, by the government at Ottawa. Who allowed the presence of a contractor's agent named one Oscar Bliss to constantly attend and make his office in the immigration buildings, and even the freedom of the inpection rooms to conjole and engage these foreign immigrants to work on the Transcontinental railway construction, and thus unlawfully secure the otherwise unlawful entrance of the said foreign immigrants into the country.

That the said contractor's agent with the knowledge and consent of Dr. J. P. Lavoie, was permitted to collect the railroad tickets in possession of the said foreign immigrants, held by them to reach their Canadian destination in the west and northwest part of Canada, retain such tickets and likewise all the moneys in possession of the said foreign immigrants in trust. It is alleged that the said contractor's agent later had those tickets exchanged with the Canadian Pacific railway ticket agent for tickets that carried the foreign immigrants to La Tuque. Futhermore that said immigrants later on left this work, came to Quebec and were unable to regain their railway tickets or moneys they placed in trust with the contractor's agent.

Those are the grave facts, and I think under the circumstances, without saying that they are true, or taking any position against the Quebec agent, Dr. Lavoie, or for him, but taking into consideration the accusations brought against him, and against the way he keeps the agency at Quebec, the government in the public interest, and for the benefit of the immigrants, should have a royal commission and inquire into the matter. That is why I make the motion which is on the order paper.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I have no mandate whatever to defend Dr. Lavoie or any one else, against the accusation made out by my hon. friend. I know the gentlemen who are mentioned very well. They have had a little family quarrel at the Immigration Bureau. I am very sorry for it, so I am not going to defend any of those gentlemen, nor do I say whether the accusation is right or wrong, but I would not like to have it go abroad that immigrants at Quebec are illtreated, and especially that in a city so noted for gallantry, a woman should be ill-treated. O'Flaherty and the others are intelligent men and know what they are saying, and under the circumstances I should not be surprised if the government would feel obliged to have an investigation. I do not think the matter is very serious, and I am the more inclined to take this view from seeing the following editorial paragraph in the Quebec 'Chronicle,' an opposition organ at Quebec:

> The reports that are going the rounds about the treatment meted out last summer to immigrants landed down at the Quebec immigration sheds should be taken 'cum grano.' There is the closest supervision, and yet that closest supervision may possibly need to be improved upon. The first steamship with its cargo of new settlers will enter port in a few days, and in the meantime every precaution should be taken to stamp out any 'bossing' that may come in sight when the newcomers are being dealt with. Instant dismissal should be the fate of any of the officials who has in his demeanour too much of the discourteous.

I remember seeing another editorial article in the 'Chronicle,' or some opposition paper in Quebec, praising the manner in which the Immigration Bureau at Quebec is managed. So far as I know, everything is kept in perfect order at the immigration building. At the same time, it might satisfy the public and re-assure public opinion if an investigation were held.

The motion was declared lost.

THE WHITE STAR DOMINION LINE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Can the right hon. leader of the government tell the House if there is anything decided yet about the demand for a subsidy made by the White Star Dominion line? I know the application came to the government a second time. I think the matter comes under the purview of the department of which my right hon. friend is the head. Has the government arrived at any decision?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—No, the government has not. It would come, I think, if it is a question of the conveyance of mails, under the Post Office Department particularly.

SOILED BILLS.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I have just been reading a report of the discussion which took place in another chamber abount unclean dollar bills, and I should like to know if the government intend to withdraw such currency from circulation as soon as possible?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The government do, but that is a matter in which they have to rely very largely on the co-operation of the banks. If the banks would return to the government the worn out, soiled or defaced bills, the government are always ready to give out new bills, but the banks, unfortunately, have been rather careless about replacing the old with new bills.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—From what I know of the banks and business men in Quebec, I am sure if the government would issue a circular notifying the banks to withhold these soiled bills and that they would be replaced with new ones without delay, the banks would comply with pleasure.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think the Department of Finance has done so, but I shall call the attention of the officials of that department to the hon. gentleman's remarks. I agree with him that it is not to our credit that those dirty bills sould be kept in circulation. They are not issued directly by the government, but the banks of necessity.

The Senate adjourned until 2 p.m. today.

After Recess.

VACANCIES IN THE SENATE.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I should like to know if the vacancies in the Senate are to be filled during recess, and if it is the intention of the government to give us a French Minister in the Senate next session?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The hon. gentleman means a French-speaking minister.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Yes.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The vacancies I hope will be all filled before we meet again. In regard to the other matter I should be delighted to give my hon. friend any information if I had it.

CUSTOMS TARIFF BILL.

FIRST, SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (No. 233) an Act to amend the Customs Tariff, 1907.

The Bill was read the first time.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does the hon. leader of the House propose to give us any information as to the effect the changes will have upon the revenue?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Does my hon. friend mean with respect to the German tariff or the French tariff?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not know what the Bill is. Consequently I am unable to answer my hon. friend correctly. If it is for the purpose of reducing the tariff in conformity with the arrangement entered into with the United States, I can understand it. That is what I had reference to, not to the French tariff, because we are not dealing with that at the present moment, only by way of comparison.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—With respect to the United States, the effect of the change in the tariff will be but small. The greatest reduction, I think, is only 2½ per cent on a moderate variety of articles of which we do not consume any very great quantity, nor are we likely to import any very large amount from the United States. It is difficult to ascertain the exact amount, because we can hardly tell as yet to what extent the one importation will supplant the other, but I should think it would hardly exceed more than a couple of hundred thousand dollars, and that may be made up by increased importations.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In studying this question a little, if the right hon. gentleman had given any attention to it, he would find that it affects importations to this country to the extent of over $6,000,000. The total trade affected by this and the French tariff amounts to a little over $8,000,000, but when you deduct from that $8,000,000 the importations that may be entered into Canada as coming from France it reduces the dutiable articles that will be imported—that is speaking of last year's importation—to the extent of over $6,000,000, so that in the arrangements which were made with the United States the tariff will be affected to the extent of over $1,000,000.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Yes, but it would only be affected at the rate of about 2½ per cent as far as the revenue is concerned.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It would affect the revenue to the extent of between one and two million dollars. I do not propose to occupy much time in connection with this, further than to express the opinion that the government, in its intercourse with the United States, and between the Finance Minister and the President of the United States took a position that should not have been taken. When the Conservative government were in power, they were charged with taking such steps as led to the rejection of any overtures that were made towards extending or adopting the principle suggested here. It was distinctly declared by the present premier that if the Liberal party came into power in less than six months they would secure a reciprocity treaty with the United States. I am not complaining that a reciprocity treaty was not made, because I have not been, and am not now, in favour of such an arrangement, for reasons with which I do not propose to detain the House at the present moment explaining. We know also that the present government sent a deputation to Washington—and I think the hon. leader of the House was one of that deputation—to secure better trade relations between the two countries, and they received precisely the same treatment that those who represented the Conservative government had met with when they went to Washington. In plain language, they were snubbed, and snubbed to such an extent that the Liberal leader declared that they would never make any overtures to the United States again. They adhered to that policy until Mr. Taft became president, and Congress had passed an Act placing a tariff upon the statute-book, which, if it had been put in force against this country, would have been more injurious to the people of the United States than it would have been to Canadians who had articles to export. So thoroughly impressed was the President of the United States with this fact that he induced this government—I think I am safe in using that expression—to send a gentleman there to interview the President —I refer to the editor of the 'Globe.' I may be in error, but I am under the impression that he was sent to Washington by the Canadian government and the interview he had with the president resulted in the president asking the Canadian ministers to meet him to see if some arrangement could not be come to, by which he would not be compelled to put the Aldrich tariff in operation as against our tariff. We have the result in this Bill that we are now asked to ratify. Canada was in a position to teach the United States a lesson, and a very severe one. If the principle of free trade, or extension of trade, were not still strongly held by the present ministers and they were not determined if possible to secure an entry to the United States market at a lower tariff, they never would have yielded. They had the ball at their own feet, and should have kept it there. The bringing into force of the present tariff of the United States as against our tariff, would have tended more to affect the people of the United States than it would the people of Canada.

I frankly admit that some articles that we export to the United States would have been affected to a considearble extent, but not to the extent that it would have injured their own people. The Republican party, through their president, knew very well what the result of bringing a tariff of that kind into force in the United States would have been upon that party at the next election, and it accounts for the president's anxiety to find an excuse for not bringing the United States Tariff Act into force. They found the Canadian government too ready, in my opinion, to accede to his wishes, to the disadvantage of Canada, and to the advantage of the United States. I am not going to detail all the steps that were taken by the present government in order to meet the wishes and views of the president and the people of the United States. That is not necessary. All readers who study political events must know the humiliating position we placed ourselves in by bowing and submitting to the will of the President of the United States under the circumstances. I said last session that I should have been pleased to see Canada maintain the position that the premier had avowed to be their policy, of never seeking any further concessions from the United States. The repeal of the Reciprocity Treaty placed Canada in the position she occupies to-day. If we show a bold front towards our neighbour on the question of the tariff whenever it affects ourselves and affects them, we will be held in much greater respect by our neighbours. It would have been more to the honour of this country, than to have submitted to their demand. Probably my views are the result of the strong opinions I hold on trade questions, which are not like the views of the hon. gentleman who leads this House, though he has been compelled from circumstances to father a protectionist policy to some extent. Having reduced the tariff on some articles they fall back incorrectly upon the declaration that it is a revenue tariff exclusively. Another humiliating position in which I think it has placed us is this: under the French tariff certain articles therein enumerated could be brought into this country at a lower rate of duty than the same class of articles imported from the United States. That is what induced the statesmen of the United States to say to us: 'you have entered into a treaty with a foreign country by which you discriminate against us, and in retaliation, unless you make concessions to us, we will penalize the articles that you send to this country.' The United States having made these demands, we quietly yielded to them. Does not that put Canada in a position that if she dared to enter into any arrangement with any foreign country by which she admits the products of that country at a lower rate of duty than we impose upon similar articles coming from the United States, the United States may say to us: 'You must yield to our wishes or we will penalize your products.' That is the position the Canadian government have taken in connection with this treaty, and I can only say for myself that I regret it exceedingly. We should maintain the position that was assumed some time ago, by the premier of this country, and let the United States deal with their tariff just as they please, and we will deal with our tariff in accordance with the interests of this country. These are the views which, I am quite satisfied, are held in the province from which I come by 99 per cent of the people, and if an expression of opinion could have been secured in that province at least—I speak for no other—the result would have been an overwhelming majority in favour of rejecting the tariff arrangement with the United States.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I am sure my hon. friend will not quarrel with me if I say that while I would gladly enter into a detailed analysis, it is scarcely within my power to do so at the present moment. I may say to him with respect to the United States tariff, that I think on examination he will see that the concessions made to them are of an extremely small and unimportant character. Out of a total revenue of what I suppose, this year will come to sixty or seventy million dollars from customs, we will make a reduction as far as they are concerned, of one hundred and fifty, or at the outside, two hundred thousand dollars, if, indeed, we do reduce it to that extent, which I somewhat doubt. The broader question which underlies the whole, and which has justly, I think, had great influence with the country—I admit it has perhaps greater influence with myself than it may have with my hon. friend opposite— is this; wholly apart from the question whether or not we were in the position to gain a temporary advantage over the United States by standing pat, as it is called—which, probably was the case, I look at the matter from a larger standpoint. I think it is highly desirable, not merely in our own interest, but in the broadest sense, in the interest of the British empire, to cultivate, by all reasonable means in our power, friendly relations with the people of the United States. When the President of the United States made overtures to us—because I beg the hon. gentleman to understand that the overtures did not come from us in any shape or form, they came from the United States—it would have been churlish in the extreme to refuse to meet him, and to refuse to meet him half way. I do not think anybody, high or low, will be one fraction the poorer for the concessions that are made the United States, and the general consuming people will, pro tanto, be a little better off. It is impossible to pursue this matter further, but if the hon. gentleman will examine the matter in detail—and there is nobody better able than himself from his long experience in customs to do so—he will see that, on an average duty varying from 30 to 35 per cent, in a small number of cases comparatively speaking, we have made a reduction of 2½ per cent and no more. In doing that, we have avoided injury to several interests which it was our desire, and his desire, not to expose to serious injury. I think, on the whole, when he comes to reflect on the matter calmly, he will be disposed to agree with me, that we would be very ill advised to squabble with the United States over perfumery, or prunes or peanuts.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill passed through its final stages.

THE SUPPLY BILL.

FIRST, SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (No. 235) An Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1911.

The Bill was read the first time.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —In moving the second reading of this Bill for the very moderate sums which are required for the public service, hon. gentlemen will see that all that is required to be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund is $58,093,999.44, and the further sum of $5,197,781 is to be paid towards the several charges and expenses for the past year. A good deal of that, as hon. gentlemen know, is probably lapsed votes, or amounts which have been, to all intents and purposes, transferred from one section to another.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does the first amount include the supplementary estimates?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —It includes everything. We have passed certain previous votes which are not included in this sum of fifty-eight millions.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Can my hon. friend give us the amount voted on capital account.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The total amount voted on capital account is, as nearly as possible, thirty-six and a trifle millions. I suppose my hon friend is not particular about the odd hundred thousand.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Oh, no, of course not.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —In addition to that, as he well knows, there are considerable votes for the National Transcontinental railway, and other services of a like kind which will swell the total amount to something over $40,000,000 in addition.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does that include the navy estimates?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Yes. The navy estimates I may state have been placed, and I think very properly, in ordinary income. In former times it has been the habit to charge those to capital account, a practice which I have never particularly approved of. I may add, in the case of expenditures for military purposes, a change for the better has been made. They have been included in our ordinary income. If I could—I may say, however, that is no longer within my purview as a member of this House—I would be very much disposed to lay down the rule that everything we expend for specific purposes, ought to be placed in the same way, and our special account in that respect should be closed.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Do I understand the navy estimates are included in the fifty-eight millions?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Yes. Except what has already been voted. The whole will be included in what is chargeable to income, and, as I mentioned before, all our expenditure for military purposes is now included in the charges to income. Those swell the expenditure considerably more than would appear on a rough comparison, more particularly as the charges for Dominion lands, which heretofore have been put to capital, have now been charged to income. Practically, I think, nothing remains uncharged to income except the bounties, which will disappear after this year, and certain charges on account of public works of large degree, such as the deepening of the St. Lawrence channel, and I think the works at Port Arthur and Fort William. With that exception the account will now be found to include nearly everything except the loans for the National Transcontinental railway.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I notice the total of the Supply Bill will exceed $160,000,000.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Well, no, unless you are including the redemption of debt.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Would my right hon. friend say what is the estimated revenue for the year?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The estimated revenue, as nearly as can be ascertained, will be something in excess of one hundred millions. It may very likely exceed that by three or four million dollars. It is safer, of course, to estimate it at the round hundred millions. I need not say, large as these supply votes are, it is an uncommon thing for them all to be expended. I do not think, myself, the sum total will be reached at present, though it is only fair to say that we overtake our receipts pretty fast. The only thing to which I would specially call attention is the fact which I have mentioned, that in this statement for the first time a considerable number of items, which in former years were charged to capital account, are charged to income account, and very properly.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The estimates other than the capital account. will amount to about one hundred million dollars?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Very nearly. I should say the estimates, exclusive of capital account, would come to $96,500,000.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill passed through its final stages.

To these Bills the Royal Assent was pronounced by the Clerk of the Senate in the following words:—

In His Majesty's name, His Excellency the Governor General doth assent to these Bills.

Then the Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons addressed His Excellency the Governor General, as follows:—

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY:

The Commons of Canada have voted the supplies required to enable the government to defray the expenses of the public service.

In the name of the Commons, I present to Your Excellency the following Bill:

An Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial years ending respectively the 31st March, 1910, and the 31st March, 1911.

to which Bill I humbly request Your Excellency's assent.

To this Bill the Clerk of the Senate, by His Excellency's command, did thereupon say:—

In His Majesty's name, His Excellency the Governor General thanks his loyal subjects, accepts their benevolence, and assents to this Bill.

After which His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to close the Second Session of the Eleventh Parliament of the Dominion with the following

SPEECH:

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I am glad to relieve you from further attendance in parliament, after a session which has been marked by legislation of the most important character.

The measure for the establishment of a naval service, which has become of pressing necessity, in view of the extraordinary advance, within recent years, of Canada as a nation within the British empire, is the crowning development of a policy which was anticipated from the earliest days of confederation.

The Act to amend the law respecting the Aid to Dry Docks will, it is believed, lead to the early construction of docks capable of receiving the largest warships and thus assist the movement for naval defence.

The Act making provision for the lease of lines connecting with the Intercolonial railway, and for their operation as a part of the system of government railways, will enlarge the sphere of usefulness of the Intercolonial, and tend to increase the development and prosperity of an important section of the Dominion.

The appointment of a commission to inquire into the needs and present equipment of the Dominion as respects industrial training and technical education should prove an important contribution to the work of the provinces in advancing the industrial development of Canada and the welfare of its working classes.

The measure to revise and amend the Insurance Act, which engaged the attention of parliament in the previous session, has now been completed and is likely to prove an effective and satisfactory law.

The amendments made to the Currency Act, with special reference to the production of a Canadian gold coinage at the Ottawa branch of the Royal Mint, marks another step in the advance of Canada.

The arrangement lately made between the United States and Canada, averting a threatened tariff conflict and opening the way for negotiations which give promise of further improvement in the commercial relations of the two countries, has, I am glad to know, given much satisfaction to the people on both sides of the boundary line.

Equally gratifying is the termination of the long standing tariff dispute with Germany upon terms which fully recognize the important principle for which Canada contended, and which encourage the expectation of an extended and mutually beneficial trade, between the German empire and the Dominion.

The Act for the investigation of combines, monopolies, trusts and mergers, will, it is hoped, without injuriously interfering with commercial and industrial enterprises, effectively protect the public against attempts to restrain trade unduly.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I thank you for the liberal provision you have made for the public service.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

My official connection with Canada is drawing to a close. My interest in it, however, will not be severed. I shall continue to watch its progress and development, with the sincere hope and belief that under God's providence it will ever increasingly prosper.

The Speaker of the Senate then said:

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

It is His Excellency the Governor General's will and pleasure, that this parliament be prorogued until Monday, the 13th day of June next, to be here holden, and this parliament is accordingly prorogued until the 13th day of June next.
