THE
SENATE DEBATES

SECOND SESSION—ELEVENTH PARLIAMENT

THE SENATE.

THURSDAY, November 11, 1909.

The Senate met at 2.30 p.m.

PRAYERS.

NEW SENATORS.

Hon. Arthur Boyer, for the division of Rigaud, Que.

Hon. Benjamin Prince, of Battleford, for the Province of Saskatchewan.

THE SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

His Excellency the Governor General and Commander in Chief of the Dominion of Canada, being seated on the Throne.

The Honourable the Speaker commanded the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to proceed to the House of Commons and acquaint that House that,—'It is His Excellency's pleasure that they attend him immediately in the Senate.'

Who being come, with their Speaker.

His Excellency the Governor General was then pleased to open the Session with the following gracious Speech to both Houses:—

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

In again meeting you at a season most convenient for the despatch of business, it is with great pleasure that I congratulate you on the prosperous condition of the country.

The present year, which is now rapidly drawing to a close, has been a period of steady and progressive growth. Immigration has poured into the new settlements of the north and of the west, in a copious and well ordered stream, drawn from the best elements of the British Isles, the United States and Continental Europe. Trade and commerce have made rapid advances in all directions. The revenue has almost completely regained what it had lost in the recent period of depression. Most remarkable has been the rapid recovery from the financial embarrassment which for a short time was the cause of anxiety amongst business men. In nearly every branch of business there has been a revival of activity which gives assurance of continued progress and prosperity.

Two members of my government attended the Imperial Conference called by His Majesty's government, on the question of defence. A plan was adopted after consultation with the Admiralty, for the organization of a Canadian Naval Service, on the lines of the resolution of the House of Commons, of the 29th of March last. The papers will be immediately brought down and a Bill introduced accordingly.

The new convention between His Majesty and the President of the French Republic, respecting the commercial relations between France and Canada, having been approved by the French Legislative Chambers, you will also be asked to confirm it.

The construction of the Transcontinental railway has made substantial advance during the year. The western division has been extended 66 miles beyond Edmonton, completing a total distance of 861 miles west of Winnipeg. Contracts have been let for 399 miles in the Mountain division; good progress was made on this work. The eastern division is now open for traffic from Winnipeg to Lake Superior Junction and thence, by the Grank Trunk Pacific branch, to the lake itself. The whole of the work between Winnipeg and Moncton is now under contract.

The board of engineers entrusted with the preparation of plans for the reconstruction of the Quebec bridge has sufficiently advanced its work to permit of tenders being invited for the substructure.

The exploratory surveys for a railway from the western wheat fields to Hudson bay were pushed energetically during the whole of last summer. It is hoped that a report of the operations will be placed before you at an early date.

In order to improve the facilities already afforded the public by the government railways, and to enhance their value as part of the great transportation system of Canada, a Bill will be submitted to you for the purpose of enabling the Minister of Railways, on the recommendation of the Government Railways Managing Board, and subject to the approval of parliament, to lease any line or lines connecting with the Intercolonial railway.

A measure will be submitted to you for the purpose of rendering more effective the present legislation respecting combinations which unduly enhance prices.

Bills will also be introduced respecting banks and banking, insurance, navigable waters, and other matters.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

The accounts of the last year will be laid before you.

The estimates for the coming fiscal year will be submitted for your approval at an early date.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I pray the Almighty Lord that He may guide and bless your deliberations, and that they may bear fruit in a further increase of our country's prosperity and well-being.

His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire and the House of Commons withdrew.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday next.

THE SENATE.

TUESDAY, November 16, 1909.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Can my right hon. friend say why volume 2 of the Auditor General's report has not been published? I observe that volumes 1 and 3 are to hand, but not volume 2.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Some delay in the printing office is the only explanation I have received as to that. I trust they will be in the hon. gentleman's hands in time to refresh his memory as to the peccadilloes of the government.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would have to start in early to do that.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Perhaps volume 1 will suffice for the moment.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to call the attention of the House to a question of privilege, which effects not only myself, but every member of this chamber. On the 10th November the Montreal Herald published the following despatch from Quebec:

Senator Landry made a Scene.

The Irate Senator refused to sit at the Lieut-Governor's Table.

Quebec, Nov. 10.—(Special).—Senator Landry has figured in some spectacular and highly theatrical scenes before now. He always loved the lime-light and appreciated being bathed in the calcium glare. Even when it has gone to the length of personal chastisement being threatened upon him, he has still enjoyed the threat because of the notoriety it gave him.

Yesterday he crowned his achievements in the publicity line by creating a scene at Spencerwood which is without parallel in the history of that ancient and honourable edifice.

Sir Alphonse and Lady Pelletier, the Lieut.-Governor and his wife, were entertaining at their official residence in honour of the King's birthday. Senator Landry was among the invited guests. He duly arrived at Spencerwood and inspected the list of invited guests.

To his great disgust, he discovered that he, Senator Landry, of Ottawa, was inscribed to sit at table next to Hon. Sir F. Langelier, a judge of His Majesty's court in this province.

The senator for weeks past has been criticising the manner in which the Lieut.-Governor seated his guests and arranged them in order of precedence on official occasions.

He turned upon his host and indignantly protested against being placed after Sir François Langelier, on the ground that he, being a senator, had precedence over and before that gentleman, whom he declared to be only a simple judge, and not a chief justice.

After creating a scene which those who witnessed it described as disgraceful, and which attracted the attention of all the guests present, visibly embarrassing them, the irate senator turned on his heel and left the grounds of Spencerwood, protesting as he went against the shocking affront on his standing as a senator.

All Quebec is talking about his conduct

I do not want to discuss the article itself. I have given my lawyer the necessary orders to appear before the courts, but to disabuse the minds of those who think I did not behave on that occasion as a senator should and that I made a scene, I think it my duty to put the facts before the House. There had been an exchange of letters between the Lieutenant Governor's A.D.C. and myself. I received an invitation on the 23rd of October to a state function, and on that occasion wrote a letter. In order that the House may understand why I wrote it, I may explain that in the beginning of the present year a similar experience had presented itself on the occasion of the opening of the Quebec legislature. I had received a letter in answer to two letters written by myself, and which is signed by the Usher of the Black Rod of the Legislative Council. The reply to my letters was as follows:

'I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your two letters, first dated 24th February and the second 18th of March. In this last one you manifest your desire to know the decision arrived at—that is to say, does the Deputy Chief Justice, for the province of Quebec rank before senators. In reply, let me tell you: first, that I kept your letter of the 24th last month as a protest against the error imputed to me in giving precedence to the Deputy Chief Justice over senators at the opening of parliament on the 2nd of March. Secondly, that I will hand over that letter of protest of the 24th February last to the members of a committee to be formed at a very near date and which will comprise, I understand, the Hon. the Prime Minister of the province, the Speakers of the Legislative Council and of the Legislative Assembly, and members of both Houses, with the object of deciding some cases concerning precedence to be observed in these large gatherings, where etiquette should be observed. Thirdly, that as soon as I receive the report of that committee, I will send you a copy of the decision arrived at by those hon. gentlemen on the particular subject in which you are concerned.

Believe me, Mr. Senator,
Yours truly,
ARTHUR ST. JACQUES,
Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod.

Quebec, March 22, 1909.

The idea of forming a committee of a provincial character to amend the laws of precedence which we hold from the imperial government. The fact is this, they had decided to form a committee and that is the reason why, in my first letter, I asked a question which I should not have asked if those facts had not been known to me and to the Lieutenant Governor. On the day I received the invitation, I wrote to the A.D.C. of the Lieutenant Governor under date of 23rd of October:

(Translation.)

Quebec, 23rd October, 1909.

Mr. Victor Pelletier,
Aide de Camp to His Honour the Lieutenant Governor of the province of Quebec.

Sir, before answering you whether I can accept the invitation of His Honour the Lieutenant Governor of the province of Quebec to a state dinner to be given on the 9th day of next month, permit me to inquire whether the question of precedence which has been raised in the course of the present year between the Honourable Judge Langelier and myself has been settled authoritatively. If so, who rendered the decision and what is the nature of it?

If no decision has been asked for or obtained, what are the respective places reserved for senators and for the Honourable Judge Langelier?

Believe me, sir, your humble servant,
(Signed) P. LANDRY.

To this letter I received the following reply, dated October 26:

(Translation.)

Goverument House, Quebec
26th October, 1909.

Mr. Senator, I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter dated the 23rd instant and to inform you that His Honour the Lieutenant Governor does not intend to change the order of precedence which has always been followed at Spencerwood.

I have the honour to be, Mr. Senator, your obedient servant,
(Signed) Victor Pelletier,
Captain, A.D.C.

The Honourable P. Landry,
Senator, Quebec.

In reply I forwarded the following letter of October 27:

(Translation.)

Quebec, October 27, 1909.

Capt. Victor Pelletier,
Aide de Camp to His Honour the Lieutenant Governor of the province of Quebec.

Sir,—Your answer of yesterday does not give me the information which I asked for. You say indeed, in a general manner, that His Honour the Lieutenant Governor does not intend to change the order of precedence which has always been followed at Spencerwood, but you do not indicate to me in any way what is the order followed.

The last time I was present at a state dinner at Spencerwood was in the time of Sir Louis Jetté, when Judge Routhier was Chief Justice of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec, and, under this title Judge Routhier had precedence over senators. But I do not acknowledge that Judge Langelier has the title of Chief Justice of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec, since that position is actually filled by Judge Tait, and consequently I cannot admit that Judge Langelier has precedence over senators.

If his title of Deputy Chief Justice is invoked I would have you remark that such title has never existed. The Commission of the Honourable Magistrate, dated the 16th of June, 1906, purports simply that the Honourable Francois Langelier, Puisné Judge of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec, shall perform the duties of Chief Justice of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec in and for the district of Quebec, as it is comprised and defined for the Court of Review.

I would have you remark, moreover, that chapter 12 of 50 Victoria of the statutes of the province of Quebec having never been brought into force, the position which Sir François Langelier actually occupies is irregularly and illegally held by him to the detriment of the senior of the judges of the Superior Court in the district of Quebec, whom the law, still in force to-day, chapter 7 of 47 Victoria, statutes of the province of Quebec, designates as the legitimate holder of the title of that office.

In view of the respective situations in which senators and the Honourable Judge Langelier find themeslves, and having regard to the order of precedence established by the imperial government itself and enforced in this country, I beg of you to be good enough, leaving out any diplomatic answer, to tell me straight if I can have the place to which I have a right as senator, in other words, whether Mr. Justice Langelier, yes or no, has precedence over senators.

I take the liberty of adding to this letter a copy of an essay upon the same question which I published in April last. It may serve as a complement to the present letter.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your humble servant,
(Signed) P. LANDRY.

I received a reply from the A.D.C., which reads as follows:

(Translation.)

Government House, Quebec,
29th October, 1909.

Mr. Senator,

In reply to your letter dated the 27th of this month, I have the honour to inform you that His Honour the Lieutenant Governor does not think it his duty to discuss with any one whatsoever the order of precedence which he is to assign to each of the persons whom he has the honour to invite to his table. As in the past, he will give each one the place which he believes belongs to him.

I have the honour to be,
Mr. Senator,
Your obedient servant,
(Signed) VICTOR PELLETIER,
Captain, A.D.C.

The Honourable P. Landry,
Senator,
Quebec.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY.

There is no doubt that the Lieutenant Governor expected a refusal on my part, and that he thought if I refused, in face of those answers, that I would put myself in the wrong. Further, he might have said, 'Well, he refused himself, but if he had come, we would have given him the place to which he was entitled.' I replied as follows :

(Translation.)

Quebec, October 30, 1909.

Captain Victor Pelletier,
Aide de Camp to His Honour the Lieutenant Governor of the province of Quebec.

Sir,

Your letter of the 29th has been received, bringing to me the declaration:

1. That His Honour the Lieutenant Governor does not believe it his duty to discuss the order of precedence which he shall assign to each of his guests.

2. That he will give each one the place which he believes to belong to him.

What I have asked for, what I still ask for very respectfully, is precisely that I may be made aware what place His Honour believes he ought to give me.

As I am refused this preliminary information, which under the circumstances is even necessary, I have only one thing to do, for the moment, that is to accept the honour of the invitation which has been sent me.

It is, moreover, my duty.

I would only ask to be excused from it in case the Honourable the Lieutenant Governor had decided to give Sir Francois Langelier precedence over senators.

Believe me, sir,
Your humble servant,
(Signed) P. LANDRY.

To that letter I received no answer. That was written on the 30th of October. Receiving no answer, having forwarded my acceptance of the invitation tendered me by his Hon. the Lieutenant Governor, I had only one thing to do, and that was to proceed to Spencerwood. On my arrival, I proceeded to the anti-chamber, where the plan of the table was exhibited. I looked at the plan. I did not even see my name. In the meantime the A.D.C. came up to me, and I said, 'I see that according to the list I am not invited, but I thought I had received and accepted an invitation.' I said that in a very calm and pleasant way. He answered : 'Well, if you want to remain we will give you Judge Routhier's place.' He is an ex-Chief Judge of the Superior Court. According to the plan the first places were distributed as follows : The Lieutenant Governor was sitting at the table, having at his right Bishop Dunn, and at his left Judge Langelier, and then next to Bishop Dunn was Judge Routhier, who was thus occupying the third place of honour, though as an ex-Chief Justice he should have taken precedence over Judge Langelier. The A.D.C. told me : 'We will take Judge Routhier and put him on the other side, and you take Judge Routhier's place, because I understand you have an objection to sit beside Judge Langelier.' I said, 'I have not the least objection to sit beside Judge Langelier, I have no personal matter with him, but I want to know on what side I sit. It is not the fact of being at his side, but the question is as to being on hte right side. He said, 'You take Judge Routhier's place.' I said, 'That does not solve the difficulty. You are giving me a wrong place. I should have the third one and Judge Routhier the second one because Judge Routhier passes before me, and Judge Routhier also passes before Judge Langelier.' Anticipating what arose, I had prepared a letter, and without any fuss at all, I said, 'I cannot remain,' please hand this to the Lieutenant Governor, and this letter which I gave him reads as follows :

(Translation.)

Spencerwood, 9th Nov., 1909.

Captain Victor Pelletier,
A.D.C. in Waiting upon His Honour the Lieutenant Governor of the province of Quebec.

Sir,

In accepting the invitation of His Honour the Lieutenant Governor of the province of Quebec to a state dinner given this evening on the occasion of His Majesty's birthday, I had reason to believe, especially after my last two letters, that the order of precedence established in this country would be respected and that senators would have the place to which they have a right.

I have just assured myself to the contrary.

I see, in fact, by looking at the places assigned, on the plan of the dining room, to each of the guests that His Honour the Lieutenant Governor has given Sir Francois Langelier precedence over senators, although this gentleman is not Chief Justice, because Judge Tait occupies that position.

Foreseeing what is happening to-day, but wishing to avoid in public the scene of a protest, which is always disagreeable, I did, in my last letter, ask His Honour the Lieutenant Governor to excuse me from being present at his dinner in case it had really been decided to change the order of precedence in the manner which I find it has been this evening.

It has not been desired to grant my request. Still more, it is wished to force me to accept this evening an arrangement which would make me a party to an error voluntarily committed.

I refuse to do this.

And it is in order to protest against this injustice that I find myself forced to decline respectfully the invitation which has been given me. My protest comes at the last hour, but all the same in time, since I formulated it before ratifying by my acceptance the error of which it is sought to make me a victim.

Be kind enough to transmit to his Honour the reasoned refusal which I give you, and believe me, Sir,

Your humble servant,

(Signed) P. LANDRY.

That is all that took place. There was no fuss, no discussion, nothing to amuse the public. I see before me some of my hon. friends who were at the dinner, and they never knew what took place, because there was no fuss at all. I assure hon. gentlemen that in this particular instance it is not because my name is Phillipe Landry, it is because I am one of the members of this House, that I followed that course. It was my bounden duty, out of respect to the position I occupy, and in accordance with the views of all those who know something about precedence, to do what a gentleman should do, and in that respect I think I shall have the approval of all the senators of this House.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I suppose my hon. friend opposite would like some expression of opinion as to the very grave constitutional question which he has raised. As it is one of gravity, and importance, and I believe he has placed a notice on the Order Paper which will require a formal answer, I will only say a few words, and reserve the matter until I have had an opportunity of consulting with my colleagues on the important question of precedence. I am sure the whole House will join with me in regretting that, under any circumstances, the hon. gentleman would have lost his dinner. My recollections of the hospitality of Spencerwood are of so agreeable a character and the excellence of the dinners during the time that I had a more intimate acquaintance with them, was so great, that I feel a good deal of sympathy for him on that score. As to the question how far our tables of precedence apply to the local legislature and to the Lieutenant Governors, some serious issues may arise. I am under the impression that it is not obligatory on the part of Lieutenant Governors of provinces to ask anybody to their dinner table, except it be the provincial dignitaries, but that of course is a matter which may require investigation at the hands of the government. I will, however, just call the attention of my hon. friend to this point: that in the table of precedence which I have under my hand, there is considerable ambiguity. The Chief Justice of the Supreme Court unquestionably ranks before all senators, but the next words that are used are not the Chief Justices, but the Chief Judges of the Court of Law and Equity, according to seniority. I am not sufficiently familiar with the rules of the bar and the form of the commission granted to Sir Francis Langelier to speak with absolute authority on that point, but he will observe that the Chief Justices and the Chief Judges are not precisely synonymous terms, and the distinction, no doubt, was made with some reference to the possibility of there being several parties entitled to the position of Chief Judges of the several courts. However, we shall have the whole matter carefully considered by the time the hon. gentleman's question comes up, and I may give him a more satisfactory reply.

Hon Mr. LOUGHEED—Has the hon. member the original copy of the order of precedence? It seems to me there is a clerical error there There is no such term as Chief Judge.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I am reading from the Parliamentary Guide. Some of these orders I think were originally framed, if my memory is right, prior to confederation.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Oh, no, since that.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It may have been amended since, but I think too that the Governors General in one or two instances, but I am not sure about the Lieutenant Governors, have, with the consent of the imperial authorities, varied slightly the rules laid down in the table of precedence. For example, I think that they have received instructions to include on the same footing as archbishops and bishops the chief dignitaries of the various other denominations who have no archbishops and bishops, and, similarly, I think, one or two alterations were made as to the status of imperial privy councillors and the like. However, it may be, the question my hon friend has presented will receive attention when we reach it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I might add to what the hon. gentleman has said, that I have no recollection of any change in the order of precedence other than the one to which he refers. There was no place allotted for privy councillors not of the government until some years after confederation, and I remember distinctly that some of the privy councillors not of the government refused to attend the levee given by the Governor in this chamber until a place was allotted to them. And upon representations made by the Governor at that date, the order of precedence was changed, allotting to them a particular place in that order. There were a number of attempts made more particularly in reference to the representatives of the different religious bodies in the Dominion. But Mr. Chamberlain, when Secretary for the Colonies, intimated to the government of Canada at that period that any changes which the colonies desired to be made in the order of precedence would be granted by the imperial government. However, although these reports were made, no change took place. The late Secretary of State is aware of what did take place, and the changes suggested at the time. The only change I have any recollection of during the whole discussion, is the one to which the hon. gentleman refers.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not want to prolong the discussion, but I wish to say a word in reply to some observations of my hon. friend. He says it is a question of the constitution, but he took it afterwards as a question of my own constitution, because I refused the dinner. I think the constitution of the country is far more to be considered than mine; it should not be treated with such levity. I inquired of the Lieutenant Governor last year what was the order of precedence followed in the local legislatures, and I received an official answer sending me a copy of the order of precedence as followed here, and I had an official letter telling me that that was the order followed at Spencerwood. If there had been any other order, no discussion would have taken place.

THE ADDRESS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middlesex) moved:

That the following address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, to offer the humble thanks of this House to His Excellency for the gracious speech which he has been pleased to make to both Houses of parliament, namely:

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Sir Albert Henry George, Earl Grey, Viscount Howick, Baron Grey of Howick, in the county of Northumberland, in the Peerage of the United Kingdom, Baronet, Knight Grand Cross of The Most Distinguished Order of Saint Michael and Saint George, Knight Grand Cross of the Royal Victorian Order, etc., etc., Governor General and Commander in Chief in and over the Dominion of Canada. May it please Your Excellency:

We, His Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Senate of Canada in parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious speech which your Excellency has addressed to both Houses of parliament.

He said: His Excellency's speech is characterized by more than usual brevity. Nevertheless it summarizes matters of great importance to this House and to the people of Canada. We rejoice with him in the optimistic note which is expressed in the first and second paragraphs of the speech. The first paragraph says:

In again meeting you at a season most convenient for the despatch of business, it is with great pleasure that I congratulate you on the prosperous condition of the country.

Then, in the second paragraph, he refers to the various elements of that prosperity, such as the large immigration, the increase in trade and commerce, the relief from financial embarrassment, and the activity which prevails in every department of industry. We are to a certain extent dependent for our prosperity and for the development of our country upon immigration. It is gratifying to notice that in the last ten years, as His Excellency says, there has been a steady and progressive flow of immigration into Canada. From 1898 to 1908 we received 1,198,027 settlers. In the last twelve months we received 167,360, not quite as many as came to us annually a few years ago; still perhaps as many as, with our limited native population, we can properly assimilate. Of the total immigration into Canada in the last ten years, 560,000 were from the United States, and of that number 70,000 came within the last nine months. In the twelve months ending August 31, there came from Great Britain 80,094, and from continental Europe 22,550. There is certainly variety as well as abundance in these figures. It is gratifying to note that immigration from the United Kingdom keeps pace practically with the immigration from the United States. Both classes of settlers are desirable; those from Great Britain because they are in full sympathy with our institutions and our form of government, and those from the United States because they understand the peculiarities incident to prairie farming. Although not trained under the same government as we are, they are still thoroughly democratic and I believe thoroughly in sympathy with Canadian institutions. The number of immigrants is gratifying because, as I said at the outset, without this large immigration the development of Canada would necessarily be slow. The United States owes much of its progress and success, I may say also of its prosperity, to large immigration. For a few years following the close of the Civil War, immigration into the United States numbered half a million a year, and in the last decade nearly a million a year. The population of the United States to-day would perhaps be not more than thirty or forty millions were it not for the large immigration in the last thirty or forty years. If we should succeed, and we should not relax our efforts to succeed, that flow of immigration should in the next ten years add not less than 1,500,000 to our population, and this, with the natural increase in the country should, with reasonable certainty, give us within the next ten years a population of ten millions. The strength which population adds to a country cannot be estimated. Bigness is not necessarily strength, but population is necessary to develop the vast undeveloped resources of Canada, necessary to give us a status on the northern half of this continent, and to give us an impetus in all that pertains to national prosperity. Besides the numbers we have received, it is pleasant to know that the quality of the immigration is steadily improving. In fact, I think it is as high to-day as we could desire. Men and women of good physique come to our shores. People abundantly supplied, too, with the elements of prosperity. It is estimated, after a careful inquiry I believe by the United States authorities as well as by our own, that the 70,000 immigrants from the United States last year brought each of them $1,000 in cash, representing seventy millions in money. Assuming that the others brought a smaller amount, say two hundred and fifty to five hundred dollars each, we have got through immigration channels into this country one hundred million dollars during the last twelve months. The estimate may be high, but it is not made without good basis. This, added to the productive industry of the immigrants, must be a very material contribution to the wealth of Canada. Another evidence of its value is this, that the greater number of those immigrants went to the west, and that the west is unusually prosperous largely because of the quality of that immigration. When we find that the western provinces produced last year between one hundred and one hundred and twenty million bushels of wheat, one begins to inquire how it was done. It was done by those settlers, some from the older provinces, but many from the United States and from the United Kingdom. If you add to the one hundred million dollars they brought into the country the one hundred million bushels of wheat they produced, as well as the value of other crops raised by them, you have a contribution in one year from that source of probably $200,000,000 to the wealth of Canada. At that rate, one can simply by process of multiplication ascertain, if the process goes on at the same rate, how prosperous and wealthy the west must become, and as the west becomes prosperous, so will the whole of Canada prosper. It is to-day the great camping ground of some of our most enterprising young men, the great market for the manufacturing industries of the older provinces, the great loaning ground for our large corporations and banking institutions, and we can rejoice with His Excellency in the character of the immigration, its extent and the results which these immigrants have produced.

Another evidence of prosperity is the great increase in trade and commerce. In 1889 our whole trade was only $321,661,000. I remember when our trade was under the two hundred million mark. Last year our trade was $571,268,000, an increase of 100 per cent. That growth has been brought about partly through the enterprise of our own people, partly because of the acquisition of immense assistance in the shape of money from the mother country, and partly because there is a spirit of buoyancy and optimism prevailing in Canada. That that spirit will continue, no one will doubt. There is nothing to stop the impulse which our business has received, except the indifference of our own people, and that indifference is something not to be reckoned with at this stage of our development. His Excellency refers to the facility with which we overcame the industrial depression of a few years ago. That must be very gratifying to every hon. member of this House. While in the United States banks have failed and large commercial enterprises have become paralysed and large industries have had to dismiss thousands of their workmen, in Canada there was comparatively little distress, and although for a while our banking institutions restrained their loans and some of our larger industrial establishments went on short time, still the depression was of very small moment. Whatever depression existed three years ago has been entirely removed, and the labour market has not been overcrowded, wages have increased and there is prosperity and comfort among our labouring classes. The fact that we have fewer strikes than we had a few years ago is in itself a proof of prosperity and contentment, and without contentment there can be no real progress. The growth of trade is not confined to one department. For instance, the products of the mine have increased from $13,000,000 to $37,000,000, of fisheries from $9,000,000 to $13,000,000, of the forest from $28,000,000 to $39,000,000, and of agriculture from $37,000,000 to $82,000,000, and of manufactures from $12,000,000 to $32,000,000. These statistics are very expressive. They show that in every department of industry, particularly where the development of our natural resources is most concerned, there has been the same prosperity and success. We are finding markets abroad for much more of our produce than a few years ago. The fact that Canada was able to export $82,000,000 of our agricultural products is proof of the great development of our agricultural resources. In fact, last year we produced 24 bushels per head of our population, whereas in the United States, with their great prairies and immense resources, they produced only nine bushel per head. We export comparatively more than the United States. Our exports of wheat last year amounted to $50,000,000, besides exports of flour. This occurred at a time when the exports of agricultural products from the United States were declining, and we are in sight of what James J. Hill said of the United States, that before many years they will not be able to produce more food than their people will consume. We are producing far more than we can consume, and we are in sight of a time when Canada can be distinctly called the granary of the British empire. She may become more—she may some day be the granary of France and Germany. Our exports of grain to France have substantially increased. Our exports to Germany are limited. If we can supply Great Britain in competition with Argentina we should be satisfied, because the market is comparatively unlimited. The increase in exports in manufactured goods is significant, from twelve million dollars to thirty-two million dollars. Canada cannot be a great country without diversified industries. Our mines may not always be as productive as they are today, although the surface has only been scratched. We are producing more silver, copper and gold. But in the industries which employ labour, textile and manual industries, it is important to notice that there is a larger field. We have a wider market, and are giving employment now to a greater number of people than ever before. Hand in hand with the agricultural development of this country should go the development of our manufacturing industries, which furnish our home market and which at the same time consume the products of the soil. A very gratifying feature of our increase in trade is the fact that Canada to-day stands at the head of the countries of the world in the aggregate increase of its trade, with the exception of Argentina. The increase of Argentina from 1898 to 1908 was 161 per cent. Argentina is now in a state of unrest. It occupies the most favourable position in South America with its population of 6,000,000, with a very fertile soil, and a very enterprising people. That increase is remarkable. Next to Argentina comes Canada, with an increase of 88 per cent. Then comes Japan with an increase of 84 per cent, then New Zealand 78 per cent, then Germany 70 per cent, the United States 55 per cent, Great Britain 37 per cent, and France 33 per cent. So when you place the trade of Canada in comparison with the trade of other countries, you can gauge to a certain extent the energy and enterprise of our own people. One feature about the increase of trade is worthy of notice. We increased our imports 92 per cent, whereas we increased our exports only 82 per cent. I hope to live to see the time when our exports will have been increased at a greater ratio than our imports. The large quantity of goods represented now by the import tables of Canada should be replaced, or a great portion of them should be replaced, by goods manufactured in our own land. For instance, we import about $40,000,000 of iron and steel products. I hope to see the time when that will be reduced very rapidly, and the iron and steel required in the industries of Canada will be manufactured in the Dominion. In the same way, we import large quantities of textiles. These we can produce ourselves when the exports exceed the imports, without worrying about the balance of trade. I call attention to the fact that we are not as productive as we ought to be, and that we ought to counterbalance our exports by a large decrease in our imports. Still there is not such a disproportion between our imports and exports as there is between the imports and exports of New Zealand and Japan. In the case of New Zealand the imports increased 110 per cent and the exports increased 53 per cent. In the case of Japan the increase of imports was 56 per cent and of exports 130 per cent, showing that Japan markets are not overwhelmed with imports as ours are, and that her industries are growing in a more rapid ratio than those of Canada. One gratifying feature of the trade of Great Britain is the fact that while the imports increased only 26 per cent, the exports increased 61 per cent. That is a substantial increase of exports indicating the active manufacturing industries of Great Britain and her success in finding markets.

His Excellency makes reference in paragraph 3 of the address to our trade with France. I said a moment ago that our trade with France in grain had increased considerably. In other articles, our trade with France is not as satisfactory as it ought to be. We imported from France $8,000,000 worth and sold $2,341,000 worth. The trade is not as large as it should be, though we have had commercial agents in France for many years. We have been giving a large subsidy to vessels trading between Canada and France, yet the aggregate trade amounted to only about $10,000,000. There has been a very slight increase in the aggregate in the last five years. In 1905 it was $7,200,000, while last year it was $8,000,000, or an increase in our imports from France of $800,000 while our exports to France have increased in all about $800,000. Our exports to France consist mostly of three or four articles, breadstuffs, mostly wheat, $952,000; agricultural implements, $761,337; fish and products of fish, $1,019,000, and wood pulp, $83,590. Under this treaty we are making with France, it is possible we may have an easier entree to the French market, and that trade relations of a more cordial character will be opened. Forty millions of people ought to provide a considerable market for Canadian produce, and I would hope that the time is near at hand when our exports to France shall almost equal our imports from France. All we can do in the meantime, however, is to follow the course we are now pursuing. By maintaining trade commissioners in France, Great Britain and other countries we may open up such markets for Canadian products as may be available to us. The United States have about 189 consular agents in the Dominion of Canada alone. They have nearly as many in the United Kingdom. They have several in Mexico, and in nearly every republic of South America and in every part of the continent of Europe they have their agents, consular or trade agents. The Canadian Department of Trade and Commerce has been grappling with this question with a great deal of zeal, and, I am gratified to learn, with a great deal of success, and our increase of trade is greatly owing to the policy pursued by that department. Still we should not be afraid to spend more than we do in developing our trade. It is the very life of our agricultural success, and the more we can trade with foreign countries the more cordial will be our relations with them, and the more opportunity will our people have for finding useful employment.

Reference is made in the speech to a probable amendment in the Banking Act. The government of Canada has adopted, I believe, a very sound policy in regard to banking, and that is that only decennially should the Act be amended. The banking system of Canada has stood the test and met the approval of other countries. Not long ago a deputation from the United States visited Canada to inquire into our banking system, and in the Banking Act foreshadowed since their return some features of our system will be copied by the United States. Imitation is the highest form of flattery, and Canada will be flattered if we give suggestions which will improve the laws of the neighbouring republic. Under our banking system 22 banks have failed since confederation, and only two of them failed to pay the noteholders in full. This is good testimony as to the soundness of the organization of our banking system. Only five failed to pay the depositors in full. Under the present system it is practically impossible for a note holder to lose, and, as the depositor ranks next in precedence his position is almost as good. Whatever amendments can be made to the Bank Act to improve it, this House will carefully consider, as no doubt it will any amendment to be made to the Insurance Act which is coming before parliament for the fourth time.

There are other paragraphs of the address to which no doubt the seconder of the motion I have moved will refer, for instance paragraphs 5, 6, 7, and 8, which refer to our great systems of transportation. The fact that the system of transportation required four paragraphs in order to indicate its extent and importance shows what obligations they impose upon the people of Canada. The first reference is to the National Transcontinental railway. Already 861 miles of that road are completed west of Winnipeg. The division between Winnipeg and Lake Superior is now practically in running order, and grain has been carried over it to Port Arthur. The whole work between Winnipeg and Moncton is now under contract and the road will be completed, probably, in four years. With the growth of the west it will not be completed any too soon. It is one of those enterprises to which the people of Canada applied themselves with a courage worthy of any people, and certainly worthy of a population of seven millions. We look at the Panama canal as an enterprise of colossal proportions, a canal costing $500,000,000, but what is that to the enterprise of the people of Canada in grappling with another transcontinental railway, which will cost, so far as we know now, an indefinite sum, but which in any case will be worth to Canada all that it may cost. The sooner it is completed the better. Then we have a paragraph referring to the Quebec bridge, an essential part of the Transcontinental railway system. Reference is made also to the exploration of the Hudson Bay railway route. This will probably be a government undertaking, but when undertaken, if the reports as to the navigability of Hudson bay are correct, it will furnish an outlet for four or five months of the year, to the produce of the west, and a much shorter route to Liverpool than any other route we have had. Then we have improvements suggested in the Intercolonial railway, and the probability that some branches that are said to be feeders to the Intercolonial railway may be adopted by the government. These matters will come before us in a more formal way, and may be the subject of legislation and no doubt the subject of discussion. With the proposals of the government before us, we will be able to discuss them more intelligently than we can now. They are indications of natural growth. We should not fear to grapple with them, even if they are gigantic problems. We should cast away fear, and in all reasonable ways, economically to be sure, but without any failure of enterprise, strengthen the bonds which bind the east to the west, which give us easy access to the prairies and the people of the prairies easy transportation to the markets of the world. If during this session any additional measures are submitted for that purpose, I am confident they will receive the approval of this honourable body.

Another matter referred to in this address, one of great moment, which I shall discuss for a few minutes, is the policy of naval defence. This, to my mind, is one of the greatest questions submitted to us since confederation. To build the Canadian Pacific railway was a great undertaking, a great enterprise. No one regrets that it has been built. To build the National Transcontinental railway was looked upon as an enterprise involving great expense. We have accepted it. To begin to strike out in a new line and to adopt the policy of naval defence, which will, no matter how cautiously and prudently undertaken, involve us in a considerable expenditure, is one of the serious problems which this House will have to consider. I agree with the general theory that Canada has reached a stage in her national growth in which she is bound out of self-respect, if for no other reason, to adopt a policy of naval defence. We spend about five millions on our militia. I believe the Militia Department has been admirably administered for the last ten years or so. The militia service is better administered and more efficient than it has ever been. But no nation is content with a land force. We have a long coast line, longer perhaps than the coast line of the United States, if you regard the sinuosities of all our islands. We have a large commerce amounting now to nearly $600,000,000. We have trade routes to the Indies, to France, Great Britain and other places; we have trade routes to Mexico and South America, and all that commerce is growing. I do not see that it is in danger. We do not see any enemy in sight, nor did we see any enemy when we organized the militia. We are at peace with the whole world, and may a bountiful Heaven permit that our peace will long abide with us, between us and the neighbouring republic, and between us and all other nations. But there comes a period in the history of a nation, as with an individual, when the obligations of manhood follow as a matter of course. When we reach our majority we become citizens and must discharge our duties as citizens if we are true to the country to which we belong. We assume the responsibilities of the home and family, and we must maintain that family, we must provide for it, nay more, we must defend it by lock and key. All these things are incidental to national growth. What was required of us thirty years ago is very different from what is required of us now, and perhaps very different from what may be required of us forty or fifty years hence. There is a day of small things with all nations. Thirty years ago, the United States had no navy except that constructed in haste during the civil war. Now it has an important navy, and is expending this year $120,000,000 of money in adding to its efficiency. Every country in Europe of any importance has its navy. Spain, ancient, decrepid, subject to anarchy, and all the ills of a disunited people, still manages to maintain a navy of considerable efficiency. Portugal with five millions of people, Norway with two and a half millions, Sweden with five millions—I am speaking of countries with a smaller population than our—Netherlands, five million seven hundred thousand—all those countries have navies of considerable size, two or three or four battleships, cruisers, destroyers, torpedo boats and so on. The whole list of those armaments is supposed to be necessary for offence and defence. The question arises then, if it has been the policy of the old world, and nations have prospered under that policy, if it is in the air, if it is incident to nationhood that these countries shall have navies, we should naturally sit down and consider the situation, so far as we are concerned, and ask ourselves what is our duty. Are these precedents to be followed, or are they precedents to be avoided? If you come to this side of the water you will find that all the American Republics of South America, organized in the last thirty or forty years, have navies of their own. Argentina has two battleships, four armour-protected cruisers, and proposes to spend in the next five years seven millions upon the navy. Chili, with a population of 3,000,000, has a small navy. Brazil, 17,000,000 population, a very large navy; even the population of Mexico, a combination of Astec races and the Spaniard, has a navy of considerable importance. Not only have the great nations felt themselves to be under obligation either to maintain their dignity or to defend their trade, to follow in the footsteps of other nations, and arm themselves by sea as well as by land.

Following the same line, modern nations, such as the South American Republics, and Mexico and the United States, have taken the same line. Shall we pause now? Seeing that we have reached that degree of strength financially, that degree of strength in point of population, shall we pause, or shall we advance and finish, round off as it were that dignity and importance which we have attained, as a unit of the empire? I have said that nationhood necessarily involved proper means of defence. I may be told, however, that Canada is not a nation. Technically speaking it is not a nation, and yet we have all the attributes of a nation. We have for many years practically been consulted as to all treaty obligations which may influence our position as a Dominion. The Washington treaty, 1871, thirty-eight years ago, was submitted to parliament for ratification, such of it at least as effected Canada. The Fisheries treaty of 1885 was similarly treated, and in 1898, four representatives of Canada were on the Washington Commission that was asked to settle the question of fisheries, waterways and questions of trade, particularly with regard to the trade between Canada and the United States. Then with regard to the French treaty now before us, we may say, strictly speaking, although not technically, that treaty is a product of our Canadaian plenipotentiaries, if we may dignify them with that title. The assent of the Colonial office was practically given to the conclusions they arrived at. The treaty with Japan some sessions ago was subject to our ratification, as far as it affected Canada. In all these respects, Canada has attained not absolute independence—that we do not seek, we have not reached that stage, if we ever shall—but she has attained a practical independence so far as treaties are concerned, and so far as our relations with other countries are concerned. We were in a position to negotiate the treaty with the United States, if the United States were favourable. We have negotiated a treaty with France, ratified the treaty with Japan, and what more could we do if we were a nation? In that connection I would like to refer to a statement by President Taft at the Champlain celebration last summer. He said:

> We have been going ahead so rapidly in our own country that our heads have been somewhat swollen with the idea that we were carrying on our shoulders all the progress there was in the world. But that is not true, as you will realize when you think for a moment. We have not been as fully conscious as we ought to be, that there is to the north of us, with a border-line between it and us 5,000 miles long, a young country, a young nation that is looking forward, as well it may, to a great national future. They have 7,000,000 people, but the country is still hardly scratched ; it is still undeveloped. They have two great strains of blood in them, French and English. They are under a government abroad, to which both strains acknowledge full loyalty, which has exhibited great wisdom in its treatment of the Dominion and giving to the Dominion practical and almost complete autonomy.

He says ' practical autonomy ' and almost 'complete autonomy.' That is the estimate of the President of the United States as to our status. A young 'nation,' a young country, with practical and almost complete autonomy. We accept this compliment from the President of the United States. It is pleasing to our self-respect. It adds somewhat to our importance. It makes us feel that in the great galaxy of nations, as Sir Wilfrid Laurier once characterized the colonies, we bear no unimportant part. My argument leads to one conclusion: If it be true that we are a nation—and that was the goal of confederation—then we ought to accept the responsibilities of a nation. You will remember in the opening address of Lord Monk when the delegates assembled here to ratify the Quebec resolutions, he referred to the resolutions as the making of a new nation, and those of us who are familiar—no doubt hon. gentlemen all are—with the speeches delivered on that occasion, remember when the Hon. George Brown and Sir John A. Macdonald emphasized the point that in making confederation—and it was only then four provinces —that we were making a nation. If four provinces with three million population constituted a nation in their opinion, how much greater the truthfulness and applicability of that reference to a country now with a greater area than that of the United States and with a population of seven millions? If we are a nation, we must assume the responsibilities of a nation, and here let me quote a speech delivered by Sir John A. Macdonald, the last address delivered by him in England, on the 4th of January, 1886, reported in the London ' Times', where he says:

> The population of Canada was now five millions, but in twenty years — a mere speck of time in the history of a nation — they might calculate that it would be ten millions. With regard to the question of imperial federation, he fully believed that as the auxiliary nations of Australia, and Canada, and South Africa increased, the present relations, comfortable and pleasant as they were, could not remain permanently fixed. As those auxiliary nations must increase in wealth and in population, so they must increase in responsibilities.

He thought Canada was a nation then. He foresaw what would be the result of the inevitable increase in population and the development of our natural resources. He gives my argument: Speaking for the Dominion of Canada he could say they were ready to increase the responsibility. They were ready to join the mother country in her offensive and defensive league. He assumed then as a matter of course that with the growth of the country came increased responsibility, and that we must assume the responsibility also as a matter of course. A speech almost in similar terms was made by the present Minister of Militia at a banquet in London, from which I will not now quote, during the naval conference in England last year.

My argument is leading up to the next point, and a most important one in my judgment. Seeing that we have these responsibilities as a people, and what our responsibilities are, just as in Australia, New Zealand and United South African States, what was the action of the imperial government? They recognized exactly what I am endeavouring to enforce, what Sir John Macdonald endeavoured to enforce in 1886, twenty-three years ago. The action of the imperial government was to call a conference of the colonies for the question of defence. We had repeated conferences in England, but never before one called for the special purpose of considering how the empire could best be defended. No doubt England was alarmed and feared that Germany had sinister intentions against the empire, and in her arrogance, because of her increased prosperity, her vast military forces and with a population of 63,000,000 people, she might undertake an attack upon England which might prove fatal to the security of the British empire. There was alarm. I think it was unfounded. However, I can only speak as an outsider, and I must respect, as I do, the opinion that to a great extent prevailed in England, although that opinion might have been exaggerated in reaching us here. What was done? They called a conference of the Dominions over seas, for the purpose of military and naval defence. Now I want that circumstance to be regarded as a recognition of the solidarity of the British empire. It is the first time in the history of the empire that such a recognition has been so distinctly given. Great Britain had never before consulted the colonies in matters of defence. In 1867 she withdrew her troops from the colonies in the hope that they would provide means to defend themselves. She surrendered Esquimalt and Halifax to us, believing we were able to take care of them. But latterly the opinion has grown with British statesmen that the empire is one, and that only by a union of the colonies or of the Dominions over seas, which is now the proper term, could England be adequately defended. That conference was called. I have here the speech of Mr. Asquith dealing with the subject. The conference was called for the purpose of discussing the general question of the naval and military defence of the empire. It is somewhat remarkable, the attitude of Downing Street—that was a term of offence at one time—and of the imperial government towards the colonies. When we were held in a leash, with a tight rein, and driven in ways we did not want to go, there were complaints, and well founded complaints. Latterly Britain seems to have better understood how to manage her colonies, and she has given them such political liberty as they have desired. We have had it in confederation. We have had it by the union of 1841, and notably under the late Governor General, Lord Elgin, who established the government of Canada upon a firm basis. Certainly we have had it since confederation. But autonomy or self government is one thing, and a union of the autonomous colonies of the empire for defence is another thing. It is a pleasing feature. There is a good deal of romance about it. If I chose to be sentimental over the matter, I should find a good deal of sentiment in the idea of the old mother calling together her children from beyond the seas, to consult how the integrity of the empire could be best preserved; how the old flag could be most secure, not a matter of how England or Great Britain herself, could be saved, but how the colonies as part of the empire should be saved with her. It was not a question of defending England or Great Britain. It was a question for the general naval and military defence of the empire. That was the question to consider and it was very gratifying to us, very flattering indeed, to know that at the council board at which was discussed the defence of the greatest empire of ancient and modern times, there sat two Canadians to consult with the Premier of Great Britain the head of the Admirality Department and the other great officers of State, and be received by the government afterwards in consultation as to how that great empire could be made secure and how the tide of war could be beaten back, should war be threatened in any quarter. Well they consulted and what does Mr. Asquith say?

The result is a plan for so organizing the forces of the Crown, wherever they are, that while preserving the complete autonomy of each Dominion, should the Dominion desire to assist in the defence of the empire in a real emergency their forces could be rapidly combined into one homogeneous imperial army.

It is no more the thin red line that stood before Sebastapol. It is no more the mixed ranks that fought at Waterloo, taken from England, Ireland and Scotland, it is no more the Highland brigade, or Sir Henry Havelock's forces engaged in the relief of Lucknow. It is the imperial forces of the Empire, under the stimulus of the vigorous climate of the northern zone, under the southern cross or wherever they are being mobilized, being consolidated into a sympathetic force for the imperial army. That is the result of the conference, so far as Mr. Asquith's statement goes, for military purposes. But the conference went further he says, and did suggest an organization with a naval force with this proviso, which you will be kind enough to notice is of the utmost importance. He says notwithstanding what these organizations may be :

It follows that all resolutions come to and the proposals approved by the conference which has been held must be taken, so far as the delegates of the Dominion are concerned, to be ad referendum, and to have no binding force unless and until submitted to the various parliaments.

Whatever the conference had done is subject to the approval of parliament. We are delighted to know that Mr. Asquith recognizes fully our Canadian autonomy in that respect. The conference agreed as to some general scheme for naval defence. There would be a Pacific fleet in three sections, one to defend or surround Australia, another in the China seas and another in the East Indies. In regard to New Zealand's offer of a Dreadnought which is to cost £2,000,000, it has been accepted, and the peace of the Indian seas and the China seas will be preserved hereafter, not by the British fleet alone, but by the assistance of the colony of New Zealand. The Commonwealth of Australia is practically to provide for her own defence. That is to say, she is to be a unit in the Pacific ocean, and her complement is to consist of one armoured cruiser of the Indomitable class, three armoured cruisers of the Bristol class and six destroyers, with the necessary complement of submarines. For the time being officers and men are to be loaned by the imperial authorities, but the country aims at eventually furnishing its own crews. To this end training colleges will be established. Sydney probably will be the chief basis of the fleet's operations. Its annual cost is estimated at $3,750,000.

As regards Australia, the suggested arrangement is that, with some temporary assistance from imperial funds, the Commonwealth government should provide and maintain the Australian unit of the Pacific fleet. The contribution of the New Zealand government would be applied towards the maintenance of the China unit, of which some of the smaller vessels would have New Zealand waters as their headquarters. The New Zealand armoured cruisers would be stationed in China waters. As regards Canada, it was considered that her double sea-board rendered the provision of a fleet unit of the same kind unsuitable for the present. It was proposed, according to the amount of money that might be available, that Canada should make a start with cruisers of the Bristol class and destroyers of an improved river class, a part to be stationed on the Atlantic sea-board and a part on the Pacific.

That is the outline of the conference, so far as the Premier of Great Britain has given any expression to its conclusion. What conclusion the Dominion government may have come to will be known when the Bill is brought down. I refer to this as a sort of partial preparation for what may be expected when we go a little further. Let us not lose sight of the fact that this was a most important conference, that Canada was represented there, that a scheme of military defence for the empire has been approved by the conference, so far as Canada is concerned, subject to our approval, that a scheme of naval defence was approved subject to our approval, and that all of these matters, whatever they are no matter what they involve, should be subject to the approval of the Canadian parliament as they ought to be. If we have the right to negotiate our own treaties, we have a right to indicate how our money ought to be spent, we ought to have a right to indicate the amount of that expenditure. Then you may very properly ask me what, in my opinion, Canada should pay, if I am supposed to have knowledge enough to express an opinion, or to be asked to express an opinion on a question of that kind. I give no opinion but my own. It is not ex cathedra at all. It is not after consultation with the government or anybody else. I gather that opinion from some study I have given to the question, and from perhaps my own intuitions as a Canadian as to what Canada should do in the premises. If the policy of the government is to act, well and good, if it is sufficient, if it is in line with what I have outlined, then it will be the juxtaposition of two minds brought to bear on a very important question. First, Canada should build her own navy. That is among the propositions which I make as an hon. member of this House. Canada should have a navy of her own, built in Canadian shipyards, just as the British, French, United States and Japan navies are being built. I do not think we should import the battleships. I am assuming that we will have a navy, and I do not think we should import cruisers unless in an emergency. Brazil has bought her fleet in the British market, and I believe Spain has also. We may be driven to that course also if the emergency arises. My proposition is that we should make preparations at an early date for building our own ships, and building them by such skilled labour as we can supply, or such skilled labour as can be imported for the purpose. What would be the result of such a course? In the first place it would mean the influx of an enormous amount of capital. If any hon. gentlemen have passed through the Clyde or Newcastle-on-Tyne, or the great shipyards of Liverpool, they will have seen at a glance what the construction of large ships, either for merchant marine or for naval purposes, would require. As I have already said, it would mean the influx of much capital. We welcome capital, no matter from what source it comes.

It is gratifying to know that the Americans, in order to overcome the difficulties created by their own tariff, have invested a few millions of money in Canada. A few millions in shipping will be useful for the merchant marine as well as the navy. It would mean a new industry, the employment of thousands of people, and give an impulse to our steel and iron industry. We should make our own armour plate and everything else, except perhaps the armaments, in our country. It should be a great home industry, and a Canadian industry under the control of the best experts the admiralty could afford, and our vessels should conform to the best methods of ship building. It is said that if we build a navy it would become scrap iron in a short time, as some of the vessels built in Britain have. We have to take our chances on that. We must keep up with the procession if we can, and we have to take chances that the ships we build now, in twenty or thirty years may not be the best for the purposes for which they were intended, but they should be built now of the highest class and best modern equipment. They should be capable of substantial defence if required. I do not mean that we should have a navy all at once but it should be so substantial when completed, if ever completed, or when it has reached the point we think we should aim at, that it would render good service in defending our trade routes, and, if necessary, defending our coasts. It should be manned by Canadians, if possible. The policy of Australia is to borrow cruisers, we may have to do the same, but they look forward to the time when they will man their ships, and we must look forward to the time when we will man ours We have 71,000 fishermen, with a good many thousand boats, the best material to make such seamen as won victories for Britain in days of old. The fishermen of Gloucester manned the American fleet in the Spanish war. The fishermen of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia would man a fleet almost as large as the British. We could man such a fleet as we required from our own fishermen and have many to spare, and we would give them employment in the country and we would train them to seamanship, which would be necessary for defence purposes. Our navy should be under the control of Canada, at the same time it should be one of the units for the defence of the empire if required. What we do for Canada we do for the empire. What the empire does for itself it does for Canada. I believe that in any steps we may take for the preparation of a Canadian navy for our own defence we should also have in view the fact that the Canadian navy might be useful in an emergency for the business of the empire. Subsidiary to the navy, I think we should have a dry dock, training schools and training ships. The Americans have six training ships, contrary to the Rush-Bagot convention, on Lake Huron, in which they are training a thousand men. We should have a naval academy such as they have in England and in the United States. Some of you say it is a large proposition. I delight in it because it is large. I think the day of small things has gone by. I do not say that it should be built in a day, that we should incur all the expenditure in one, two, three, four, five, six or maybe ten years, but I do say we should make a beginning, and in the very beginning, we should have in our minds what the plan would be, that every stone laid in the foundation should have some regard to the superstructure. But is it too large a proposition for Canada? Everything will depend on the amount of money expended from time to time. We have already dealt in large propositions. You will remember what Tennyson said:

> Pray heaven your greatness may not fail
> Through craven fear of being great.

The building of the Canadian Pacific railway was a large proposition, the building of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the deepening of the canals, the construction of the Intercolonial railway and the settlement of our prairies were large propositions. We are the better because we dealt with them; we are the stronger because we have settled them. We are a nation and more confident of ourselves, and a greater credit to the race to which we belong because we have dealt with them. Then why say that a Canadian navy is not necessary, that the British fleet will take care of our defence? I think the time has come when we should not shelter ourselves behind the British fleet. At times we think that we have been sacrificed in the treaties framed between Britain and the United States, but Great Britain has tended us in our infancy, has guarded us in our development and watches over us to-day. Shall we always be dependent minors in the home of our fathers? Shall we never attain to that degree of citizenship and manhood in which we will be able to act for ourselves and also assist the motherland? Great Britain asked no aid from us in the Boer war. We sent our aid, which was acceptable, and did good service. I hope the time will never come when, should we have trouble in Canada, we will shelter ourselves behind British warships and allow the motherland to fight our battles while we sit on the shore singing 'Rule, Britannia; Britannia rules the waves.' That is a position which only a poltroon could take, and no self-respecting Canadian would countenance such an act of cowardice. The empire and the colonies are one. When the empire defends itself, it defends the colonies, and when the colonies defend themselves they defend the empire. But it is said that Great Britain may embroil us in continental wars for which we are not responsible, and of which we might not approve. This is a myth. This is the objection of a man who has not studied history, who has never looked at England's wars in the perspective in which we see them now, and which is not capable of being sustained by facts. If you go over the wars of the last century you will not find one that I can recall at this moment in which Great Britain was engaged, which was not in any respect and some in all respects a meritorious war. The war of 1812 was with the United States. In that war the United States was the aggressor. The declaration of war was issued by the United States and England only defended her ancient and undoubted right, she claimed, of following her deserting seamen into foreign vessels. The United States accepted that, because in the treaty which followed the war there was no objection raised and the principle remains to this day as it was in 1812. So also the great Peninsular War was a war for the defence of the empire. With Napoleon master of Europe, there was nothing for England to do but to fight, and she fought successfully and maintained her own autonomy and position among the nations of the world. Therefore we need not be afraid that England will embroil us in unnecessary wars. The position of Britain to-day is not aggressive. What she has she holds, but she seeks to take no nation's property or encroach on the commerce of any other people. She is content with her position and the people over whom she rules. Let us then not be misled from a strong position on this question by any fear that England will embroil us in war. Moreover, if we had a navy ever so powerful that navy could not be used except with the consent of the parliament of Canada. We never let go the rein; the control is in our hands and ought to remain in our hands, and from what Mr. Asquith has said it is intended so to remain. If a navy is necessary for us, we need not be prejudiced by fear of being embroiled in foreign wars.

Then we are told that a Canadian navy would be regarded as a menace by the United States. I decline to consider that as appropriate in any sense. The United States built her navy without any regard to Canada. She imposes a tariff wall against Canada as she has a right to do and has repealed treaties which affected us greatly without reference to the effect on Canada. We are in a friendly position now with the United States; let us pursue the even tenor of our way and do what is best for ourselves, knowing that if we do what is right we will gain the respect of the United States, as President Taft has said, and our country will prosper. I need not dwell on this further than to say it may be objected that Canada cannot maintain the burden of a navy. That burden should be made light; we should not proceed hastily. It was said that we could not bear the burden of the Canadian Pacific railway or the burden of confederation. We are told that we ought to feel the burden of the Grand Trunk Pacific. We are carrying burdens all the time. We are getting a million stronger, probably, every five years—a million more shoulders are placed under this burden. We must bear the burdens and responsibilities which belong to us. If the policy of the government is a reasonable one, and will not impose upon us heavy obligations, the burden need not alarm us. As I said at the outset, I have given some views on the question of naval defence which are entirely my own. They may be extravagant in the opinion of some hon. gentlemen, and in the opinion of others may not be adequate for the occasion. I do not speak as an expert, but as one who has given some thought to the question, and I feel as a Canadian in no case should we allow ourselves to take an inferior position in the galaxy of nations which circle around the British throne. If New Zealand with a million people can spend $10,000,000 on a Dreadnought, and Australia with four and a half millions can spend a large amount in naval defence, surely Canada with a population of seven millions can do her part in this great work of national defence. It would be to our everlasting reproach if we shirked our responsibility, and it would not be, I think consistent with the public opinion of Canada if at this session an advance movement were not made. I must apologize to the House for the great length of my remarks on this and other questions, and have great pleasure in moving the motion placed in Mr. Speaker's hands.

Hon. Mr. BOYER (in French)—While I highly appreciate the honour of having been chosen to second the address, I had hoped to prevail upon hon. gentlemen, being the Benjamin of this body, to grant your indulgences, nay more, all your indulgences, but death, which has struck with such violence among the members of the Senate since last session has, since my appointment, claimed new victims. I am sure I interpret correctly the feelings of all my colleagues here in offering to the families of the departed our most sincere and lively sympathy. Permit me to refer specially to one of our departed colleagues, whose successor here I have the honour to be, and who was to me for more than thirty years, I shall not say a friend but a father. A man of wise council, a devoted friend, he left throughout his life traces of his kindliness, and his decease has caused universal regret. I cannot better eulogize our departed colleagues than in quoting the words of a great poet:

Pleurons sur les trésors qu'emporte le cercueil.
Pleurons avec ceux dont les espoirs s'éteignent.

Pleurons avec ceux dont le cœur blessé saigne,
Et qui restent dans cette nuit d'exil et dans cette nuit de deuil.

His Excellency, in welcoming us, rejoices with all of us over the prosperity which the country enjoys. As a matter of fact, the harvest with which God has blessed Canada this year is more than abundant. Everywhere prosperity has returned, and, in proof of what I say, permit me to quote to you some figures:

His Excellency announces that, guided by the resolution adopted unanimously by the House of Commons on the 29th of March last, two members of the government passed all last season in England to discuss with the imperial authorities the creation of a Canadian navy. Is it not true that in creating a national navy Canada takes at one step a more influential position in the empire, and, instead of lowering herself, does she not raise herself in her own estimation, and in the estimation of other nations? Last year Canada celebrated by magnificent fetes in the old city of Quebec the tercentenary anniversary of its foundation. We invited there England, France and our neighbors the United States. England and France sent magnificent warships. The United States, not to be behind these friendly nations, sent their newest and most powerful of their warships. Canada marvelled at the magnificent spectacle presented by that unrivalled fleet, in the great port of Quebec; but we must acknowledge with regret that Canada was nowhere represented in the fleet. This year the United States celebrated the tercentenary anniversary of the discovery of the great river which flows into the port of New York, and which bears the name of the man who discovered it. The United States invited to that festival all the nations of the world. France, England, Germany, Russia, Japan, and they were all represented there by some of their war vessels. Little countries with considerably less population than ours, such as Holland and Belgium, contributed to the display, and we saw their flags floating in the breezes of a free country, the United States. Again no nation failed to respond to the invitation except Canada. We sent no representative to that family festival, because we were not able to enter into the procession or show ourselves on the Hudson. We could have well been spared the shame of having to make the painful reply that we were obliged to decline the invitation because we had no warship. Picture to yourselves, hon. gentlemen, what would happen if to-morrow our people residing along the Gulf of the St. Lawrence, were to announce that an unknown fleet of sailing vessels, such as existed a century and a half ago, were to ascend the St. Lawrence river, and what if we were to learn that this fleet, of which no one had heard, and no one knew, was no other than the fleet of Wolfe conveying his army. How would we oppose a fleet manned by such heroes as we all know they were, warriors who never flinched before anything to assure the triumph of their country, if they arrived before Quebec without any other equipment than such as was in use a century and a half ago, what would prevent them taking Quebec? We desire to remain members of the British empire, and like them to have full control of our political institutions. We desire to become a nation and assume equally with them all the responsabilities which fall upon them. We have hoped that this question of the creation of a Canadian navy would remain truly a national question, above the warfare of parties. We have hoped that the peoples' representatives, united as they were last March, would adopt without discussion the project of creating a Canadian navy. Unhappily. politics has been mingled with it and the question promises to become one most difficult to settle. Let us hope that the Canadian people will understand their interests, and the responsibilities encumbent upon them, and as one people face the situation with honour because one cannot avoid difficulties by simply ignoring them nor relieve himself of responsibilities by turning his back to them. A contribution of money has been spoken of. The time has gone by when it would be considered legitimate to have recourse to a stranger to defend us. So long as we are a source of weakness, whether on land or on sea, to the empire, so long shall we feel that we are only a colony, that our national will lacks force and that our voice is feeble in the discussion of the affairs of the empire; that we have not the strength of a nation ready to defend itself, and which pays its share to be safeguarded in its autonomy and its dignity. Let me state, honourable gentlemen, how we should, in my opinion, approch the question of the creation of a Canadian navy. The policy of a country while respecting personal sentiment, should only be guided by the great interests of the people. Statesmen should remember that they are not the judges but simply the representatives of the people who have no great comprehension of theories of peace at any price. They understand the old classical expression "si vis pacem para bellum," and they prefer in this hard world to be the hammer rather than the anvil.

I do not wish to prolong the discussion on this question. My hon. colleague who has already addressed the House has described very clearly to you the situation. We shall have future occasions to discuss this important problem.

Passing to the other question in the speech from the Throne, which treats of the progress accomplished in the construction of the National Transcontinental railway, a despatch published yesterday in a newspaper announces from an official source—that is to say the Grand Trunk Pacific office—the happy news of the opening of the section of the National Transcontinental railway from Port Arthur to Edmonton for passenger as well as for freight traffic. This is pleasant news, because if this railway should be constructed, the sooner it is completed the better it will be for the development of our great country. The sooner it is in operation the sooner we shall receive the revenues which will reduce the expenditure which weighs on the country, for the sooner the construction is ended the sooner will the Grand Trunk Railway Company which will operate it, become responsible for the interest on the sums advanced by the government.

I shall not speak any longer. My colleague who preceded me dealt with the other questions and it is useless for me to add anything. I believe I interpret the sentiment of every one present in seconding with very great pleasure the motion of my honourable colleague to the effect that a message of thanks be sent to His Excellency the Governor General for his speech at the opening of the second session of the eleventh parliament of the Dominion of Canada.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I move that the debate be adjourned until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

DECEASED SENATORS.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I propose to move the adjournment of the House, but before doing so I should like to say a few words as to the loss this House has sustained since we last met by the death of three hon. members well known to all of us, one on the government side and two on the side of my hon. friend. The late Senator Thibaudeau was one of the oldest members of this House, and while I am not aware that he took a very active part in our debates, I believe I am perfectly within the knowledge of all these hon. gentlemen who have had the pleasure of his acquaintance in saying that Senator Thibeaudeau was a man whom we all respected and liked. He had occupied at one time a very prominent position in mercantile life, and after that a position of importance in the city of Montreal. He was, I think, within three or four of being the oldest member of this House. His appointment was almost the last act of my lamented friend Alexander Mackenzie, and I think I am quite justified in saying that his appointment was one which, in his own province in particular, was extremely well received by his political opponents. We have also had to regret the loss of one of the pioneers of the Northwest in the person of the late Senator Perley. He was a man who took his full share in the early struggles, and they were very severe struggles, which marked the development of that country, and I believe he was one of those who contributed in his own person very considerably, by his energy and enterprise, to the development of that particular section which he represented. I can testify that wherever the interests of his former constituents were concerned, Mr. Perley was always active and anxious to do everything he could for the people he represented. The last gentleman whose loss we regret was one who has occupied a very prominent and important position in this House, the late Mr. Ferguson. Everybody who had the pleasure of that hon. gentleman's acquaintance will bear testimony to the zeal and assiduity with which he discharged his duty. He was a man of indefatigable industry, and I am bound to say that on many occasions, listening to him, I have been surprised at the pains and trouble which he had taken to make himself thoroughly familiar with the questions which came before us. In him the House has sustained a serious loss, and I only hope that we will be able to replace him in due time with some gentleman who will be as useful and as distinguished a member of this House as Mr. Ferguson had been. I need say no more. We all extremely regret that these gentlemen should have been taken away from us, and there is this consolation, that they all departed in the fullness of years and honours, and that they carried with them our sincere regrets and their families will have the sincere sympathy of all the hon. gentlemen of this House.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I join in the tribute of respect and regret which has been so feelingly expressed by my right hon. friend with reference to the death of our lamented colleagues Senators Thibaudeau, Perley and Ferguson. Although those hon. gentlemen had passed the allotted span of life, yet as they passed to and fro in this chamber and participated in our discussions and deliberations, I venture to say that it seemed to all of us that they had scarcely reached the meridian of their powers. The Senate will unquestionably suffer a very great loss in the departure of those three hon. gentlemen. The late Senator Thibaudeau was not so well known to me as the other two gentlemen; but he has been a member of this House for I think thirty years or more. He had occupied a high position in his own province commercially and politically. So far as I can learn he enjoyed the highest favours and offices of his party and was undoubtedly highly esteemed in his native province. The late Senator Ferguson was a man who was more intimately associated with me than Senator Thibaudeau. I had the honour of his acquaintance ever since his advent to this House. He was a gentleman of keenest intellect, of the most untiring industry and of the most unflagging zeal in whatever his hand found to do. He attained a very high position of distinction in his native province, having been a member of the government of Prince Edward Island for many years. He was a member of the late Conservative administration, and unquestionably contributed to a great extent in the promotion of the best interests of agriculture in connection with that government. He was highly respected by this chamber, and contributed in no small degree to the valuable legislation which from time to time has been placed upon the statute-book by the Senate. The late Senator Perley was a gentleman with whom I was more intimately associated than almost any other member of this House. He went into the Northwest Territories in the early days when I went there, and from that time down to his death was a more or less close colleague of my own. He was a gentleman held in the very highest esteem, and he enjoyed the sympathy and the popularity of the district from which he came. He was for many years a member of the old Northwest council, and was responsible for much of the legislation placed upon the statute-book in connection with the development of the agricultural interests of what is now the province of Saskatchewan. He was also a valued member of this chamber. There was no hon. member on either side of the House more independent in his views, and more ready to express that independence of view and judgment than the late Senator Perley, and for that we all admired him. This House extends its sympathy and condolence to the families of our late colleagues in the great loss they have thus sustained.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I may be permitted to add one word, it is merely to say that I entirely agree with the remarks which have been made by the right hon. leader of the government in this House and by the hon. leader of the opposition. I entirely agree in the special references which have been made to Senator Ferguson. I am sure that every hon. member feels that his death was a great loss to this House and to the country. As was very properly stated, he was a most industrious member of this House, keeping himself thoroughly posted and following every question that was considered by the House. It will be very difficult to replace him. I desire also to say a word in connection with the late Senator Thibaudeau. I had been associated with him for a great many years, and, as was stated by the right hon. leader of the government, he was at one time not only financially a leader in the community in the city of Montreal, but his energy and his influence in the community and his efficiency were recognized and acknowledged through the whole Dominion. I am sure that there are a number of hon. members of this House that knew him in his best days, and the words that have been said in connection with the late Senator Thibaudeau. by the hon. leader of the government and the hon. gentleman's successor are no exaggeration.

THE INSURANCE BILL.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is the hon. gentleman in a position to notify the House when the Insurance Bill will be introduced here, and is the Bill to be introduced as it was presented before prorogation last session? I have received three or four copies of the Bill as it came from the Commons, and I presume from what I have heard that the government has not made or suggested any amendments to the Bill as it was presented to us last year. If that be the case, those who have to consider its provisions will know better what course to adopt than if a number of further amendments are to be incorporated in the Bill. I frankly acknowledge that I am perhaps asking questions not usually answered, but under the circumstances, considering the importance of the subject to which I have referred, probably the hon. gentleman could give me some information.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I may say to my hon. friend that the Bill is now before me, and I propose to introduce it as soon as the debate on the address is concluded. With reference to the other question which he put, I understand the Bill is in all important respects exactly as it left the Commons, but that there are some very minor amendments suggested by the Finance Department. Of course I will specially call the attention of the House to those when we come to debate the measure. They are I believe of very slight importance.

The Senate adjourned until three o'clock to-morrow.

THE SENATE.

OTTAWA, Wednesday, Nov. 17, 1909.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

RESIGNATION OF SENATOR MERNER.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Can my right hon. friend tell me if there is any truth in the report which appeared some few weeks ago, that the late Senator Merner before his death had sent in his resignation as a member of this Chamber. It so appeared in the press. I am not aware of the attention of the House being directed to that fact. Possibly my hon. friend may have some information upon it. If not, I may possibly put a notice upon the Order Paper.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I am not sure, speaking from memory, whether the late Senator Merner did or did not send in his resignation, but I will have inquiry made.

THE ADDRESS.

DEBATE RESUMED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech on the opening of the second session of the eleventh parliament, and the resolution for an address in reply thereto.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is usual on occasions like the present to congratulate the mover and seconder of the address, who are generally new members. It would be a work of supererogation for me to congratulate the hon. member for Middlesex, a war-scarred veteran, who is becoming one of the older members of this House and whose reputation as an orator is almost continental. I might as well try to paint the lily white, or give an artificial fragrance to the rose as to make any remarks with reference to the ability of the hon. gentleman from Middlesex to perform a duty of that kind, not only most eloquently but with very great acceptance to this House. I have much pleasure in extending my congratulations to the hon. gentleman from Rigaud, who so gracefully seconded the address, and to express the hope that he may be an active member of this Senate by being a participant in the debates and our deliberations to a greater extent than many hon. gentlemen in this House, who, through excessive modesty, do not take that active interest in the Senate which I think they should. The government is to be congratulated with regard to the drafting of this particular address, which is certainly a piece of word painting of very artistic design and expression. To one who is not possessed of a slight degree of doubt and suspicion as to the statements emanating from the government, this address would appear to be proof against criticism, but to those of us on this side of the House whose duty it is not to permit the government to comfort itself by the happy phraseology embodied in the address, it is very natural that we should fall into the habit of scrutinizing the statements made from time to time in the address in reply to the speech from the Throne. This address, I think should not be exempt from criticism. The first paragraph is as follows:

The present year, which is now rapidly drawing to a close, has been a period of steady and progressive growth. Immigration has poured into the new settlements of the north and of the west, in a copious and well ordered stream, drawn from the best elements of the British Isles, the United States and Continental Europe.

I observed also during the speech of my hon. friend from Middlesex (Mr. Ross) that he expressed his satisfaction at the character of the immigration which has recently come to our shores. It is gratifying that we are receiving the volume of immigration which is coming to us at present, and it is no doubt of better quality than the immigration of previous years, but the stream of national life in Canada is yet subject to very considerable pollution by reason of much of the immigration which comes from the south of Europe. It is to be observed in the last report of the Department of Justice upon the population of penitentiaries in Canada that the inmates of those institutions have increased within the last year no less than within a fraction of 15 per cent. To hon. gentlemen who are familiar with the enforcement of criminal law throughout our western country, it is unquestionable that our criminal statistics are growing to an alarming degree, largely owing to the fact that the government is not making that careful selection of immigrants which the interest of the country demands. There is not a municipality, I venture to say, west of the Great Lakes that has not been called upon to very substantially increase its expenditures for policing the community within its boundaries, and the dockets of the criminal courts are largely surcharged as time goes on by the many crimes committed by that element of the population to which I have referred. I am, however, gratified to find that we are receiving a very highly desirable class of immigrants from the great country to the south of us. My hon. friend from Middlesex made reference to the splendid character of the immigrants who come to us from the United States. I can very heartily concur in that statement. It is to be observed also, from the statistics furnished by the government, that the Americans who are coming into Canada are giving very much closer attention to the settlement of the lands than any other nationality within our boundaries. I find that 21 per cent. of the English immigrants have taken homesteads, 22 per cent of the Scotch, 24 per cent of the Irish, 30 per cent of the continental Europeans, and no less than 43 per cent of the Americans. I can say of my own knowledge that this latter percentage can be very considerably increased by reason of this fact, that a great number of Americans purchased their lands outright, and, therefore, are not entered in the statistics as being homesteaders. It is safe to say that 75 per cent of the American immigrants are settlers upon our western lands. Some degree of apprehension has been expressed from time to time as to the ability of a country with such a small population as Canada to digest an immigration of that character, such immigrants being predisposed towards the very liberal institutions which they have left on the other side of the line. I say without hesitation that those Americans who have come within our boundaries have shown a disposition to assimilate themselves with our institutions to an extent greater than those of any other nationality, and I am justified in saying that in the course of a very few years they will rank equal with our own people in loyalty to our Canadian institutions. There is one phase of this question which, I submit, has not received that attention which it merits at the hands of the government, namely the ethnology, so to speak, of the question of immigration. During the late sittings of the British Association at Winnipeg this question was discussed from a scientific standpoint. Attention was directed to the fact that we legislate in Canada with a great degree of anxiety upon almost all subjects relating to the land, soil, climate, wheat, cattle, food, and so on, but without paying much attention to the ethnology of the races that come within our borders. This is particularly noticeable upon the question of naturalization. Our naturalization laws are certainly very defective in this respect. They are less progressive and insure to Canada very much less security than the naturalization laws of the United States. When we extend British citizenship to immigrants who have lived within the boundaries of our country during three years, we extend to them the franchise, we give to them all the rights and privileges of British subjects, and of all the institutions within our land. I think it is one of the most humilating spectacles which can present itself to the mind of any intelligent man, particularly during elections in that western country, when great public questions are to be dealt with, when the intelligence and the education of our people are brought into demand, to find thousands upon thousands of illiterates who are not superior to the coolies of Asia or the serfs of Russia, not knowing anything about our language, or our institutions, not knowing whether they are going to the polls for election purposes or for the purpose of baptism, charged with all the responsibilities of British citizenship, and for the purpose of exercising their franchise upon the important questions which from time to time come before the people of Canada. I say this is something which demands the best attention of the government, and we regret to see that there is a latitude, a license, an unbridled freedom, obtaining upon this very important question. Although a residence of three years is required, yet I am safe to say that the absolute ignorance of many of these people is such that they are induced to make affidavits stating their term of residence, without having any knowledge of the affidavit which they are making, and thus at the instance of political parties securing naturalization shortly after they reach our shores. I hold it as a fundamental principle that if our national foundations are to be sound and broad, it can only be through a selection of races and types, possessing the best physical, mental and moral qualities of the human race.

There is another question which has been dealt with in the address, coming after that of immigration, and that is the question of finance. My hon. friend from Middlesex referred to the buoyancy of the revenue. It is a matter for congratulation that our revenues are increasing, that we are rapidly recovering from the financial depression which marked our revenues of a year or so ago; yet, coincident with this, we find a buoyancy on the part of the government on the question of expenditure, in increasing the public debt, and in fact upon all other questions involving financial consideration, notwithstanding the guarantees which were given last session by my right hon. friend, in view of the then depressed state of the revenue, that great economy would be practised by the government in the future. It is noteworthy to find that our public debt for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1909, increased $46,000,000. Will hon. gentlemen take into consideration the enormous increase of this debt within the last fiscal year, and then take into consideration the demands which are being made by the country upon the government for the carrying out of great public works. Will they also consider the increase of debt that must necessarily follow for the completion of the works upon which the government have now entered and upon which they must enter in the near future? I venture to say that within the term of the present parliament the public debt will reach a sum of not less than five hundred million. May I point out some of the public works which the government has impliedly promised to carry out, and which are at the present time dangling before the electors. There is the completion of the National Transcontinental railway to which, of course, we are absolutely committed. I find notwithstanding the fact that the debt has been increased during the past year by $46,000,000, not more than $25,000,000 increase of debt went into the National Transcontinental railway. Upon that road, up to the present time, excluding the Quebec bridge, we have spent only about $52,000,000. Before the completion of that enterprise we shall, I venture to predict, spend no less than $150,000,000 more. My hon. friend from Middlesex yesterday, in referring to the gigantic character of the undertaking and to the financial responsibility which was on our shoulders to complete it, made use of the happy expression that it would of course have to be completed by the government, although with an indefinite expenditure of money. The government has promised to the people of Canada the Georgian Bay ship canal, which will involve an expenditure of one hundred millions of money.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—When?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My right hon. friend very properly asks when? I should say, just anterior to the last and will also say just previous to the next general election.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Take care. Prophets are in danger when they fix dates.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend's party received a very loyal support from that northern section of Canada at the last election on the strength of building the canal. However, I fancy that undertaking will wait until immediately previous to the next general election when I would not be surprised at all to see the government commit itself to the then immediate building of the canal, which, as I have said before will involve the expenditure of one hundred million dollars. During the present session we are to be committed to the building of a Canadian navy, and if it is to be as effective as my hon. friend from Middlesex indicates, so effective as to become a very important unit in the imperial fleet, calculated not only to defend our own shores, but to be of material assistance in defending the empire, I presume that the twenty million dollars which has been indicated in the government press as the limit of expenditure, will certainly be the minimum not taking into consideration the cost of maintenance. Then we have another public work which is dangling before the people of the northwest, namely the Hudson Bay railway. That is a road which will involve probably the expenditure of another twenty million; but this public work has been doing service for so long, and with such very good results so far as securing the support of the west on behalf of the Liberal party, that I fancy the government will not be reckless in entering upon the building of it before, say six months, or twelve months anterior to the next general election. I then look for an appropriation in this direction.

Then I notice also that the Minister of Public Works did us the honour of a visit in the recess through the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, and his attention being directed to our magnificent water stretches in the north, suggested to the people living in those constituencies along the bank of the Saskatchewan river, that the deepening or canalizing of the Saskatchewan river from Edmonton to Winnipeg was certainly an undertaking which should appeal to the sympathies of this government. The Minister of Public Works produced an excellent feeling in that country when assuring the public of those three provinces that he would be only too happy to recommend to the government their entering upon this gigantic undertaking, which, of course, would not cost less than another $20,000,000. I place that as the minimum expenditure of any of those great public works upon which this government promises to enter from time to time. I notice also in the address that it is the intention of the government to secure all the branch feeders to the Intercolonial railway through the maritime provinces.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Hear, hear. That is good.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Or what will prove to be branch lines; but of that I shall speak a little later. I might say that the acquisition of those roads must necessarily involve a very substantial sum, because when this government deals with the Intercolonial railway it showers its gifts with a lavish hand. These are some of the works which the government has indicated will be carried out in the near future, or that they have already entered upon. To carry these out we have a revenue, which in the last fiscal year was in round figures $85,000,000. Hon. gentlemen can therefore very well appreciate how this debt is going to grow in the near future if the government insists upon carrying out the immense undertakings which it has already indicated its willingness to enter upon. We must not overlook the fact that the fixed charges upon this debt must necessarily, in the near future, make a very severe incursion upon our revenue. It seems to me that this government has arrived at a stage when it has such a solid support from the Dominion at large, that it can safely, without loss of support, exercise a vigilance and an anxiety in protecting the public revenue to a greater extent that it has done. I am safe in saying that the people of Canada do not receive value for the moneys expended. I feel that there is a great deal of truth in the statement which was made by one of the members of the late royal commission, that no less than ten million dollars are squandered annually in the Dominion of Canada by reason of the graft which is practised by contractors, camp followers and the free-booters who are living upon the public exchequer. If hon. gentlemen will consider the investigations which have taken place before the Public Accounts Committee during the last three or four sessions, it will be admitted that it has been proved beyond all controversy that contractors have been drawing from ten per cent up to fifty per cent in advance of the value of the goods which have been furnished to this government. I am not prepared to say for a moment that this statement which was made by a gentleman high in the financial circles of this Dominion, and a friend of the Liberal party, was in the slightest degree exaggerated. This would absorb about ten per cent of the revenue of the country. It has often occurred to me whether the time will arrive when the present Prime Minister of this Dominion will do as one of his predecessors, the late Hon. Alex. Mackenzie did, sit down with his arms loaded to guard the public chest from the free-booters who would rifle it—the free-booters being, as Mr. Mackenzie placed the interpretation upon this class of persons himself, the friends of the government. There is another matter to which attention is directed in the address, namely, the adoption of the French treaty. I am not one who is in any way alarmed by reason of the American tariff of the present year threatening to subject Canadian goods to the maximum tariff. But the adoption of the French treaty at the present moment by the parliament of Canada would certainly intensify the feeling which prevails in some circles in the United States as to that government enforcing against Canada the 25 per cent maximum clause in the tariff. In view of the fact that we are purchasing from France practically four times more than they are purchasing from us, I am not prepared to say that before this treaty is ratified it may be peculiarly a case for the exercise of diplomacy and statesmanship by this government so that we should not suffer more than may be necessary from a tariff war. I certainly resent the spirit which apparently underlies the passage of that tariff clause by the United States Congress. It is calculated to interfere with that freedom which Canada has long exercised in entering into treaties with other nations, and to prevent England from entering into mutual preferential trade relations with us. That was directly indicated by the Tariff Bill, when it passed the House of Representatives before going to the Senate. I say that this should be resented by the Dominion of Canada. We have been able, since the repeal of the old reciprocity treaty, down to the present time to build up an enormous trade within and beyond our boundaries irrespective of the hostile feelings which have been expressed through the United States tariff from time to time. There is this, however, to be said about their attitude that since the repeal of the old reciprocity treaty, over forty years ago, down to the present, the United States has never receded from any position to which it committed itself upon tariff questions. Therefore we need not expect, no matter what our trade relations may be, that having placed that tariff upon their statute-book they will recede from it. The problem is one for this government to work out, but I hope that Canada, under no consideration will show any self abnegation or want of dignity in approaching that country to give us the treatment provided by their minimum tariff. It reminds me that the opportunity is one on which this government might renew that question of old, namely of ' looking to Washington ' and by the exercise of proper statesmanship endeavour to prevent a dislocation and disturbance of the present friendly trade relations between the two countries.

Reference is made in the address to the progress which has been made upon the National Transcontinental railway. This recalls to my mind that during the late annual meeting of the Grand Trunk railway, in London, the late president of that railway made a speech before his directors and shareholders in which he indicated that this government had been very remiss in not completing that section of the line between Lake Superior junction and Winnipeg. I do not know whether it was by reason of those remarks that the progress of that section of the road was considerably accelerated. Suffice it to say that contemporaneously with the opening of parliament we found that the first train had been run over that section of the road.

The late president of the Grand Trunk railway also indicated that the delay on the part of this government, a delay which, in his judgment, amounted to negligence, could only be compensated by this government paying very substantial damages to the company. I almost expected to see in this address a mild intimation that legislation would be brought down dealing with a further grant to the Grand Trunk Pacific, and it is with profound relief that I fail to observe anything in it to show that further difficulties are not being assuaged by further subsidies. Attention should be drawn to the fact that substantial estimates will have to be voted this session for the further construction of the National Transcontinental. As I said a few minutes ago, only about $52,000,000 have been expended upon it. The road will involve an expenditure, I venture to say, of another $150,000,000, and yet when we take into consideration the fact that Canada is committed to the extent of adding practically $200,000,000 to its public debt for the construction of the National Transcontinental railway, we at the same time find other railways building alongside of the National Transcontinental railway and the Grand Trunk Pacific more mileage than this road is constructing without receiving any such assistance from the federal government. We find the Canadian Northern has already made financial provisions to build its road from Edmonton through to the Pacific coast without any assistance from this government, and recent press despatches state that this railway company has already made provision to put fleets of ships upon the Pacific, running to Australia and oriental ports. We find that the Canadian Northern has built even a greater mileage than the National Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific together, without any unusual aid from this government, and that the Canadian Pacific railway have practically paralleled this road west of Winnipeg without any assistance from the Dominion. If these roads can build transcontinental systems without exceptional assistance from the Dominion, why should Canada have been committed to an expenditure for the National Transcontinental railway of about $200,000,000? Why is Canada burdened with debt for a road from Winnipeg to Moncton which even the Grand Trunk protested against and is in no way calculated to open up required country. This is a monument of one man's autocracy, binding the country hand and foot without the consent of parliament. Government supporters afterwards being dragooned to ratify it by the lash of the party whip. I find also in the address a reference to the Hudson Bay road. I made a few observations on that subject a few minutes ago. I simply add to them by asking my hon. friends to remember the promises they made in 1896 to build this road immediately after getting into office. By reason of those promises they have practically carried the city of Winnipeg down to the last general election. They have carried three general elections upon the promises which were made from time to time as to the building of the Hudson Bay road. I ask if the government could enter upon the building of the National Transcontinental without the knowledge of parliament until after the contract had been signed, sealed and delivered, why should they hesitate about building this road to which they have already committed themselves, why should they exercise such excessive caution and not put the people of the Northwest in possession of a shorter route by several days to Liverpool and which would thus enable them to transport their products cheaply and rapidly across the Atlantic? Mark my prediction, hon. gentlemen, that at the next general election this undertaking will be the price of western party allegiance, and until that time I venture to say that no substantial aid will be granted by this government towards the building of the Hudson Bay road.

I find a reference made to the Intercolonial railway acquiring certain lines in the maritime provinces. That leads one naturally to ask what has the Intercolonial Railway been doing during the past year? Has it been operated at a profit or at a loss? I find that during the year ending the 31st of March last, the income of the Intercolonial railway was $8,527,000, and the expenditure $9,328,000, leaving a deficit of no less than $801,000. Then I find that they have added to the capital expenditure $3,874,480, nearly four million dollars, and I find further that this deficit of $800,000, should be surcharged with approximately $2,000,000 more, because in this capital expenditure of $4,000,000 there have been supplies obtained which should be chargeable to revenue that would amount to about $2,000,000. We, therefore, have a total dificit of capital and revenue for the past year amounting to $4,675,480. I notice in the press that there has been a movement for some time past in Nova Scotia to have the Intercolonial railway taken over by private parties. Even the friends of the government in Nova Scotia are beginning to ask themselves how long shall this continue, and they have advanced a policy of their own by which they propose that the Intercolonial railway should be placed in the hands of private parties in order that it may be operated to the advantage, I presume, first of themselves, and secondly of Canada. Yet in view of the fact that we have a deficit of more than four and a half million dollars in the past year, it is proposed to acquire certain additional lines, so that the deficit may be increased proportionately with the mileage of the newly acquired roads. Surely this cannot be done with the concurrence of my right hon. friend who must view this reckless expenditure of public money with the greatest disapproval. Consider that we are dropping $13,000 a day—$91,000 a week on the Intercolonial railway. Since 1895 we have spent on the Intercolonial railway $33,113,000, not counting the deficits in revenue which have occurred from year to year, and which would amount to several million dollars more. It does not require a mathematical mind to estimate what the additional loss will be if these new lines are acquired. The time has arrived when the people of Canada should protest most vigorously against any continuance of this reckless expenditure upon the Intercolonial railway, and particularly during a period when other railways are being profitably operated and are declaring very large dividends, and thus showing every evidence of prosperity. Why should we sit idly by and vote money session after session to keep up this carnival of extravagance by which we are paying $13,000 every day to cover the deficits of a road which, if put on a business basis, would prove more satisfactory to the people of the maritime provinces in the carriage of their freight and in the reputation of the provinces through which it runs.

I should like very much to make some observations upon the naval defence policy of the government, but I observe from what has taken place in the Commons that a Bill on the subject will be brought down in a few days, and without having any knowledge as to its contents except the broad policy outlined by my hon. friend from Middlesex yesterday, I do not propose to discuss the subject but shall leave it in abeyance, until that Bill is placed on the table.

In conclusion, permit me to say that I regret that only one minister yet sits upon the other side of the House. I think there has been no parallel to this condition since confederation. The amount of legislation which we have been favoured with in this House has been in the ratio of the number of cabinet ministers who from time to time occupy seats here. I do not say this in depreciation in the slightest degree of my right hon. friend, because I quite accord to him the ability of a combination of cabinet ministers. I would not for a moment suggest that the business of the House languishes by the absence of more cabinet ministers, but it is evident if we had more cabinet ministers, the legislation of their departments would be introduced in the Senate and our standing before the public would be in proportion to the representation of the government on the floor and the importance of the legislation introduced. I had some hopes that the hon. member from DeLorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) would in the recess have been clothed with the mantle of official authority, and appear as a minister during the present session, but it apparently has not been deemed wise by my hon. friend to accept that position or for the government to confer it. Allow me to express the hope that this session may be fruitful in wise legislation, and an anxiety on the part of the government to give every facility to ventilate and stamp out the corrupt dealings which have so long marked certain features of this administration, and in a word to show that sense of patriotism and duty which should at all times be exercised in the best interests of the country.

Right Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I am sure we all concur in desiring that the pious hope expressed by my hon. friend that we shall do well and better in the future than we have done in the past may be realized. My recollection of public affairs is perhaps a little longer than my hon. friend's, and I think if I were disposed to enter on a review of the graft and corruption which have marked, unhappily, the history of Canada on some occasions, that it is not the Liberal party that would have cause to shirk the comparison. At the same time, I am bound to say that it is under all circumstances our duty, and the duty of the other Chamber too, when anything is fairly brought before them to deal with it, and the government have shown in the punishment they have inflicted on those who have been clearly proved to have been guilty of improper practices, that they are not disposed to overlook any offences of that kind when once the evidence is brought before them. As to the numerous matters to which my hon. friend has called attention, while I have no fault to find with the mode in which he has criticised our proceedings, I would say to him that he has perhaps hardly done justice to the precautions that have been adopted, as occasionally required, to prevent the introduction of undesirable immigrants into this country. The gentleman who is at present charged with that matter has introduced a considerable number of important regulations, all tending to greatly improve the quality of immigration into Canada. He has been very successful in that, and has also added largely to the powers which the department possessed, and which he is no way indisposed to exercise, of deporting undesirable immigrants. I hold myself that quality is quite as important as quantity in the case of a country like Canada, but it may be that in former times we, like the people of the United States, have been altogether too prodigal in bestowing the high gift of Canadian citizenship on persons who have not yet acquired a proper knowledge of our institutions, or been trained to exercise the rights which our people have been accustomed to exercise for so many years. So far as it is desirable, I think that we should endeavour to limit immigration, particularly from those countries that are not in as advanced a stage as our own, and if the hon. gentleman will compare the class of immigrants who have come to Canada within the last five years with the class of immigrants who have gone to the United States, he will see that, judging from the countries from which they come and from the general character of the immigrants, Canada has received a vastly superior class since this government came into power, to those that have entered the United States.

As to the possible cost of the National Transcontinental railway, I had occasion last session to point out to my hon. friend what I must now repeat, that while it is perfectly true that the cost of that road has very largely exceeded the estimates the government had formed and submitted to parliament, it is equally true—a fact which my hon. friend has possibly overlooked—that that railway is being constructed in a fashion and with grades infinitely superior to that which was found expedient or necessary in the construction say, for instance, of either the Canadian Northern or the Canadian Pacific railway. There are, I may repeat, two methods which may fairly be adopted under different circumstances for the construction of a railroad. You can either rush it through at a comparatively small cost and afterwards at your leisure build it up to the standard now required for the transmission of heavy goods, or build it in the first instance in a superior way, up to the standard now required for the transmission of heavy goods. In the case of such a road as the National Transcontinental railway which for the part that lies west of Winnipeg passes through a very fertile country, a country that almost immediately will furnish very large quantities of freight and produce to be transported to the sea-board, it is not unreasonable to say that in all probability the latter method of constructing the road of the highest quality and of the best grades possible is likely to give better results. My hon. friend knows—nobody better—that in earlier times only a very small amount of freight could be conveyed over the Canadian Pacific railway in its first stages, that it was not until a great number of years had elapsed it became capable of conveying, as it now does, very large quantities of freight upon a single train. While on the other hand, in the case of the National Transcontinental railway, as now constructed, I believe I am justified in saying that almost from the inception of it that road will be able to convey produce to market in as large quantities, and what is equally important, at as cheap rates as any other road on this continent. That the road is costing a great deal more than we expected it would, this end of it, is undoubtedly true, but the circumstances to which I have alluded go far to justify the wisdom of the persons who are chiefly concerned in constructing that road in deciding that having in view the enormous resources of the Northwest it was probably wise for them to construct this road of the highest standard from the first. Whether my hon. friend's estimate of the total cost may prove correct or not, I am hardly in a position to say. I think he has exaggerated it ; but I freely admit it will cost a great deal more than was originally estimated. I may, however, relieve his mind with reference to the immediate construction of the Georgian Bay canal. That is a work that would require a great deal of consideration, and I do not think, until we have completed the task of putting through the National Transcontinental railway, that we will be in a position to engage in any other work of equal magnitude. As to the numerous points to which he has called attention, the probable cost of our engagements for the construction of a naval service, our Hudson Bay route and other things of that kind, I must say to my hon. friend that I feel like himself indisposed to enter into any minute consideration of the programme that the government will presently submit to parliament until the papers are in the hands of hon. members, and an opportunity is given them to consider for themselves how far the government have met the wishes of the country, and how far the government will be likely to call upon us for a contribution to that end. I think he will find, however, that his apprehensions there also are a good deal in advance of what we will find it necessary to call upon the country for at present.

My hon. friend commented on remarks which may have been made by the Minister of Public Works in the course of his recent tour through the west, touching projected canals, etc. I may remark to him that the canals are not under the control of the Minister of Public Works, but under the control of the Minister of Railways and Canals, and that, therefore, my colleague's remarks may be taken as simply an intimation that he was very greatly impressed, as everybody who has lately travelled through the northwest has been impressed, with the very remarkable development of that country and the great importance of further developing it at the earliest possible moment, and the great natural facilities which they possess in almost every shape and way of making the northwest the home of many more millions and prosperous millions than they have at present. My hon. friend talked of our having for all these purposes a revenue of $85,000,000. No doubt he had reference to the revenue of last year. It is my pleasing duty to inform him that the revenue at present is expanding, I might almost say by leaps and bounds—at all events in a fashion which in all human probability will allow us to close this year with a total revenue from ordinary sources very much closer to $100,000,000 than $85,000,000. It may relieve his apprehension to know that in a statement put into my hands a very few hours ago from the Department of Customs—what is known as a ten days' statement—I find that in those ten days the customs revenue for this year exceeds the revenue for the corresponding period last year by $600,000.

It is about equivalent, roughly, to an increase in customs alone of a good deal more than a million and a half per month. I do not mean to say that will necessarily be continued ; but it will give my hon. friend some idea of the correctness of the statement made in the speech, that we had fully repaired the temporary loss of revenue which had occurred last year, and that there was every probability that this would continue at any rate to the end of the present fiscal year. I noted my hon. friend's remarks, and there was a great deal of force in them, with respect to the operation of the French treaty. I must, however, remind him of this, that that treaty was agreed to last year or the year before, I am not sure which, by the parliament of Canada; that it would not be in our power, and I am sure neither my hon. friend nor any other hon. gentleman who regards the honour of Canada, would desire that we should under any circumstances break our word with the French people or the French government. That treaty, I think we must regard as a fixed fact, and if our United States friends take umbrage at it, they can do so, and they must exercise their own discretion in the matter; but I would point out to him and to the House also, that under all the decisions and all the statements made heretofore by United States diplomatists, that they steadfastly maintained, and I think maintained correctly, that treaties of this kind, treaties of reciprocity in which each party gives and takes and receives certain mutual benefit, do not in any way come under the term of unjust discrimination as regards other nations. That point has been very well stated by United States jurists of the very highest rank, and I do not think the American people will feel themselves called upon to interfere with their former decision in a case of this kind. If, indeed, they were to offer the people of Canada similar privileges to those that the French have offered, another question might arise, but I do not think there is any very great likelihood that that would occur. Touching the relations between ourselves and the people of the United States, I might remind the House that we buy from the United States people a great deal more than they buy from us. They had made their tariff in former years in such a fashion that they have to a very great extent diverted the current of trade which formerly used to go into the United States to Europe—largely to Great Britain and largely to other countries. With the exception of one or two articles, to tell the truth, there is very little that they could deprive us of under existing circumstances, and in any case, I think you will agree with me, the policy of the people of Canada ought to be to regulate their own affairs as matters stand with reference to their own interests, and without very particular regard to what may be done by other countries. I say that more particularly because every hon. gentleman who has paid any attention to discussions of this subject knows that I have a very high opinion of the great mutual advantages which would result to Canada and the United States if we could resume friendly relations in a commercial sense under a good reciprocity treaty between the two countries. I continue to hold that opinion but no matter how strongly I may hold the opinion of our national advantages, I am entirely in accord with the statement made by the First Minister of this Dominion, that the time has passed when we need go any longer as suppliants to Washington. We are able to stand on our own feet, and the very means which our neighbors took in former years to deprive us of their trade, have had, in a great many cases, simply this effect: they drove us to British and European markets, and it practically resulted in depriving themselves of a considerable amount of trade which they had formerly enjoyed, and which fell to our share after they refused to trade with us, a point that I had much pleasure in bringing before the attention of the Joint High Commission some years ago, when I had the honour of being one of the members of that body at Washington.

My hon. friend complained a little, in a way that I thought was hardly quite fair, of the slowness of the progress of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway in reaching the junction with the branch at Fort William. On the other hand, if he was aware of the great difficulty which the contractors had to encounter there, I think he would say that the problem had been grappled with and fairly well put through, and, as he is aware, within a few days after a complaint made by the late president of the Grand Trunk railway, I believe trains actually passed through to Fort William. My hon. friend from Manitoba will correct me if I am wrong, when I say that trains passed through from Winnipeg to Port Arthur over this identical piece of road.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Open for traffic.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Now, as regards the question which my hon. friend has raised, that when other railway companies have been operating in that country and have succeeded in building large sections of railroad without any loans from the government or without any subsidies, whether the Transcontinental Railway could not be constructed in the same way, I take leave to doubt. In point of fact, I think that unless the Transcontinental had been constructed with government aid, you would not have seen the Canadian Pacific railway or Canadian Northern railway exerting themselves to build roads parallel or otherwise, and the government may fairly claim that the aid which they gave to the Transcontinental road, and the example which it has set of giving the northwest the advantage of a third great line of railway through that country, has so stimulated the other parties who were on the ground, that the northwest is now in possession, through that project, of many thousands of miles of railway that it would not otherwise have obtained for a good many years to come. I may remind him also that in the construction of the National Transcontinental railway, the Canadian Pacific railway, for example, obtained indirectly an extremely important benefit, because it made a vast area of their lands which would otherwise not have been brought into the market, accessible to settlers, and greatly aided the resources and greatly benefited the development of the Canadian Pacific Railway. They received no bonus directly, I grant you, but they received very considerable and substantial aid, I think, by the construction of the National Transcontinental railway, thereby opening up the land they possessed. With respect to the Intercolonial railway, I can only say to my hon. friend, everybody regrets the extraordinary deficit that occurred last year; but he will remember, and the House will remember, that the government took the opportunity of placing that road under the control of a board of management for the express purpose of diminishing, as far as they could, the undue pressure which might, and probably was in certain cases, exercised upon that road while it was directly under the control of the minister, and I am advised by these gentlemen that that saving would amount to many hundreds of thousands of dollars even already effected in the working of that road. It has, of course, led to various dismissals and reductions of staff and so forth; but at the same time, while it is quite true that there was a very heavy deficit, which by the way was shared more or less by other roads during the year that he has referred to, that that deficit has already been very largely reduced, I believe nearly practically wiped out altogether, and I trust that in the future management of the road we will be able to show very considerably better results than those that have heretofore been attained. I was glad to hear my hon. friend advise us that in his opinion many members of the maritime provinces have come to the conclusion that it might be better to place that road in the hands of private parties or corporations. I do not know. I have not access to all his sources of information. I do not know how far he is correct in assuming that the majority of these gentlemen are of that opinion, but very possibly they may have seen, as he has seen, that their interests would be better served by transferring it to some other hand than government management, which, under any circumstances, is apt to be rather costly, and certainly has not always proved an unlimited success. But these are questions which, of course, will necessarily be debated in another place, and it would be scarcely worth our while to enter into any prolonged discussion of them here. On the whole, I think my hon. friend and the House are aware that whatever shortcomings may have occurred in certain directions, that after all said and done the progress of Canada during the last year and previously to it, has been eminently satisfactory. I do not think that in spite of all that has come and gone, he can point to any other country on the face of the earth which has gone through a period of depression so serious as that which overspread the United States a couple of years ago, with less loss, less inconvenience, less trouble or less danger to the financial institutions of the country than Canada has done of late. I doubt whether he will find, certainly not by comparison with the United States, any country in North or South America in which the population has increased more rapidly than it has in Canada, and more especially in the northwestern portions of Canada within the last year or two. There is every reason to believe the progress will continue and that the wealth of Canada which my learned friend from Middlesex referred to has been increasing at a most rapid ratio, and it is a very significant fact indeed that a large proportion of those who are throwing in their lot with us, bring us not only their stout hearts and their strong arms, but bring likewise a very large amount indeed of actual available capital, wherewith to aid and assist in the development of the country. Coming nearer home, I congratulate my hon. friend, and the House, I have no doubt, will join in my congratulations on his being the representative of a section in which that has been peculiarly illustrated. I believe lately its assessment was raised in the city in which he resides, the good city of Calgary, and if the statements which I have seen in the papers are to be believed, Calgary alone, which is not I believe the largest town of the northwest as yet, had increased its assessment by a matter of ten million dollars within the past year. My hon. friend will correct me if I am wrong. That is the statement made, and I presume, as my hon. friend does not correct me, that it may be relied upon. All these things put together go far to show that, while the expenditures are heavy, and while there is room for prudence and reasonable economy in the administration of our affairs, we have entered upon and are continuing to enjoy a remarkable period of expansion and progress. Of course, under those circumstances, there is justification for a very much larger expenditure and for incurring larger obligations than might otherwise have been prudent. I am not yet in a position to state how far the increase of population has gone, but unless I am very seriously in error, I think my hon. friend will find that when the next census is taken, Canada will have increased from a population of a little over five million to a population close if not equal to fully eight millions of people, and that that increase has been of character and kind which has probably more than doubled the genuine, actual producing capacity and the general value of the Dominion of Canada. These are things which you must not overlook, and although I agree with him that they do not justify extravagance, that while they do not in the slightest degree justify graft or any attempt to plunder the public treasury, still they are a justification for a very considerable expenditure on engagements which are likely to increase the productiveness of the special regions which my hon. friend represents. I admit that if we had not before us the probabilities that the great northwest would increase, and that the population and the productiveness would increase in ratio equal if not greater than has been the case during the last few years, that there would be serious grounds for hesitation as regards some of these engagements; but I think the past has shown that, all things considered, whatever the government have done they have been reasonably successful at any rate in promoting the general prosperity of this country, and that there is no reasonable ground for apprehension at the present moment, no reasonable ground for believing that we will not be able fully to meet all the engagements which we have undertaken, and that the result of them will not be conducive to the general prosperity of Canada in the future as it has unquestionably been in the past.

COMMITTEE ON SELECTION.

MOTION.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved:

That pursuant to rule 77, the following senators: the Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell, the Hon. Messieurs Gibson, Tougheed, Béique, Miller, Power, Watson, Casgrain and Bostock, be appointed a Committee on Selection to nominate senators to serve on the several Standing Committees during the present session, and to report with all convenient speed the names of the senators so nominated.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—During the last session of parliament, and I might say the previous sessions, when this matter was brought before the Senate it was discussed at some length. We from the western provinces took the ground that there should be general representation given to every province on the principal committee of this House, which is the Striking Committee, because that is the committee which selects all the committees, and we therefore thought we were entitled to be represented on that committee. There have been very few changes made in that committee since I have been in the Chamber. It is not like the laws of the Medes and Persians, and I do not see why some changes could not be made. I have no objection whatever to any of the hon. gentlemen whose names appear on the committee; at the same time, in all fairness, I think there should be a fair distribution of representation from all the provinces. Prince Edward Island has no representation at all if the motion before the House is adopted. New Brunswick is not represented, nor is the province of Saskatchewan, which is a very large and important province of this Dominion, judging from what we are doing.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—In all fairness, the leader of this House should have given us some representation on that committee. Last year when the committee was moved, I protested against the resolution and gave notice that when the question was brought up this year I would move in amendment that as we had nine provinces in the Dominion, and as there were nine senators appointed to serve on the committee that one should be selected from each province. The hon. gentlemen named in this motion have been on that committee a long time, and I am sure it is no great pleasure to many of them to have to do this work, and I feel confident that some of them would not feel offended if their names were left off, and some members from the provinces which have no representation substituted. I do not think it is a fair proposition that Nova Scotia should have two members on the Striking Committee while her sister province New Brunswick and the province of Saskatchewan have none at all. I throw out the suggestion to the hon. leader of the House, and I would suggest that the following gentlemen be nominated for that committee :

Prince Edward Island, Hon. Mr. Yeo.
New Brunswick, Hon Mr. Ellis.
Nova Scotia, Hon. Mr. Miller.
Quebec, Hon. Mr. Casgrain.
Ontario, Hon. Mr Bowell.
Manitoba, Hon. Mr. Watson.
Saskatchewan, Hon Mr. Douglas.
Alberta, Hon. Mr. Lougheed.
British Columbia, Hon. Mr. Bostock.

I am sure that such a committee would do credit to themselves and to this House if they were appointed, and I think it would give general satisfaction to every one. I would move in amendment that all the words after 77 be struck out and the following words be inserted in lieu thereof :

Nine senators to be appointed a Committee on Selection to nominate the senators to serve on the several Standing Committees during the present session, to be so chosen that each one of the nine provinces of Canada shall be represented thereon by one of the senators, and that the following be the names of such senators.

The names I give are merely a suggestion.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—While I would like to see my hon. friend's wishes so far complied with that the various provinces should have a vote, I should say that in view of our rules, which I believe limit the number to nine, I do not see very well how he can press his motion unless he had previously enlarged the number. I may point out to him that at this present moment, as far as the west is concerned, they have three members in the persons of Hon. Messrs. Lougheed, Watson and Bostock. The west have three members out of nine on this committee, which is not an unfair recognition of their importance and value. He will observe too that take the four western provinces the representation in this chamber is 15 or 14.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Yes, but we should have more.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The result of this motion would be that four provinces having fifteen representatives on the floor of this House would have exactly twice as many members on this important committee as the forty-eight members who belong to Quebec and Ontario. That does strike me as being a little disproportionate. Without unduly pressing the claims of the larger provinces, as they have forty-eight members, which is more than half of the entire representation of the Senate, I think we can hardly limit them to less than two members apiece. Moreover, I think this practice has prevailed, if I am correctly informed, for a very long time, I do not know how many years, but I think we have not recognized the principle of having a representative from each province at all, and I point out to him that there would be decided inconvenience if the feeling of the Senate was that every province should have a representative, as we would require to alter our rules and enlarge that committee. If that were done, I do not know that I should raise any particular objection; but as matters stand, I imagine that it is impossible for us to enlarge the committee at present, and therefore I am reluctantly obliged to decline to accept the proposal.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Having seconded the motion, I must say a word. As a matter of principle, I think it is only fair that every province should be represented on this committee, and that is the reason I seconded the motion. British Columbia is a small province, but perhaps in fifty years she will have double the representation of some other province, and they will claim, on the principle laid down by the leader of the government, to have more members than, say, Quebec. So that as a general principle, I think that every province, great or small, should have a representative on this important committee. I considered the proposition before consenting to second the motion, because while losing a member from Quebec—and I do not think it is of much moment whether Quebec has one or two—I am in favour of the general principle. If we can enlarge the committee, I have not the least objection to add a few more. I think it is usual to have only nine members on the Striking Committee. I have endorsed the motion for the sake of the principle that on committees, each province, great or small, should be represented. Sometimes precedents are bad, and we have to do away with them, and I will have to ask the House to remedy any injustice which is done to Quebec, as I desire that full justice shall be done to every province.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think the principle advocated by my hon. friend is a just one. Every year since I have been in this Chamber hon. gentlemen will remember that I have protested against the way the committees were formed, and I always advocated that we should be governed by the principle that each province should be represented on the Striking Committee. That principle was recognized so far that every time one of the members for Ontario declined to accept nomination, his place was given to another member from another province. That was done every year. The hon. leader of this House has stated that in the past we have followed another practice. We have followed another practice, but under protest, and on this occasion I think we should accept the amendment of my hon. friend from Prince Albert and adopt his proposal. I think it is the only way to be fair to all the provinces. As my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Choquette) has said, every province is entitled to representation on the committee, and there is only one committee which will not be strong enough to allow all the provinces to be represented, and that is the committee on the restaurant. All the other committees have a sufficient number of members to give at least one member for each province.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENY—I quite agree with what has been said by the hon. members who have spoken. I do not think New Brunswick has had a representative on the Striking Committee since I have occupied a seat in this Chamber, some ten years. The place on the committee occupied by the late Senator Ferguson is now filled by the Hon. Mr. Bostock. I have no objection to any of the members nominated by the right hon the leader of the government, but I certainly think that the minority should have representation on that committee.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—In answer to the statement made by the hon. leader of the House about the representation of the northwest provinces in the Senate, I would point out that the people of the northwest do not think they have sufficient representation in this House. They have not as much representation to-day as the smaller division of the maritime provinces, and I am certain that everybody will agree with me that the four great provinces of the west should have as much representation in the Senate as either Ontario or Quebec. It is not our fault that we have not. However, what representatives we have here try to look after the interests of the people they represent. With reference to the argument that it would be unfair to give us representation on the committee, I should like to draw my hon. friend's attention to the fact that Nova Scotia has two representatives on that committee. Does my hon. friend think it is fair that Nova Scotia should have two while Saskatchewan has none? If my hon. friend thinks Ontario should have two representatives on that committee, could he not very well drop one of the Nova Scotia members and name Dr. Douglas in his place? I am asking nothing unfair. He may be following the custom of the past, but it is not like the laws of the Medes and Persians; these things can be changed and should be changed.

The Senate divided on the amendment which was rejected, contents 10, non-contents 33.

INSURANCE BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT introduced Bill (A) An Act respecting Insurance.

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved that the Bill be read the second time on Friday. He said: I have here a short memorandum explaining the changes that have been made in the Bill since it passed the House of Commons. They are as follow:

Memorandum showing changes which have been made in the Insurance Bill since approved by the House of Commons, May 17, 1909.

The changes made in the Bill since approved by the Commons last session are very few and no change in principle has been made in any section. With the exception of a few unimportant alterations, the Bill is identical with that which passed the Commons last session. The following are the changes:—

1. The second proviso to subsection 1 of section 8 of last year's Bill has been struck out. This proviso permitted the Phœnix Assurance Co., Ltd., to carry on both fire and life insurance business, and was introduced at a late stage of the session when there was insufficient time to proceed by way of a private bill. The Insurance Bill having failed to become law last session, it is the intention of the company to seek the necessary authority by means of a private bill at the coming session of parliament. Notice of application for said Act has been published in the 'Canada Gazette' and a draft thereof has been submitted to the superintendent.

2. Subsections 2 and 5 of section 42 have been changed by submitting the British Offies' Life Tables, 1893, Om(5), for the Healthy Males (Hm) Mortality Table of the Institute of Actuaries of Great Britain, as the basis of valuation of life insurance companies' policies. Last year's Bill contained a section, 111, providing for this substitution after January 1, 1910, the last mentioned table to be used in the meantime. Since the Bill will now not come into force until the above date, the change has been made in section 42, and section 111 has been replaced by an unimportant section, merely to avoid a change in the numbers of the succeeding sections.

3. To subsection 2 of section 95, the words 'nor to policies of industrial insurance' have been added. This is a correction of a typographical omission in last year's Bill.

4. A new subsection 14, regarding proxies, has been added to section 98, but as the provisions of this subsection were contained in subsections 6 and 7 of the section in last year's Bill, the change is one of form only.

5. Section 165 of last year's Bill has been incorporated in section 166 and a new section 165, inadvertently omitted last year, has been introduced. The new section is practically identical with section 154 of the Companies Act.

REPORTING FRENCH SPEECHES.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—moved that the House do now adjourn.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Before the House adjourns, I wish to call the attention of the right hon. leader of the Senate to an incident which is not only a breach of the rules, but a breach of the constitution. Just a moment ago I advocated the principle that every province ought to be represented on the Committee of Selection. On the same line of argument, I maintain that every province ought to have fair play in the reporting of the debates of the House. I have in my hand the report of yesterday's debate, and I do not see a word there of the speech made by the seconder of the address. I cannot let that go without entering my protest. I dislike very much to bring before this House and the public any question which may be considered racial, sectional or religious, but in this matter it is my bounden duty to call the attention of the House to the omission from our debates. Under the constitution, every member of the Senate has a right to speak in French and should be reported in French. He should not be obliged when he speaks in French to hand the manuscript of it to the reporters. I was asked last night by some representatives of the press for a copy of the speeches made by the mover and the seconder of the address, and I was anxious myself to read the entire report; but on looking at the official report of yesterday's debate I find there is a blank where the speech of the seconder should appear. I am told that it has been omitted because the manuscript of the speech was not supplied. Since when have we been obliged, when we speak in French in this House, to furnish copies of our speeches to the reporters? It is unfair, and I protest against it. I have overlooked the fact that we do not hear our prayers read in French. I said nothing about it last year, but I thought this session our Speaker would be able to read the prayers in French. He has not done so, but I hope he will be able to do so by next year. However, when French representatives speak in this House we have a right to be reported in French, and we have a right to demand that both of the official languages shall be reported. I feel it my duty to protest, and I do protest strongly against the way the speech of the seconder of the address has been omitted. In a matter affecting the constitution, I am in duty bound to enter my protest and say we must have on the floor of this House a French reporter in order that when any of us wish to speak in French we may have our speeches reported. I was asked by some journalists in Quebec to send them copies of Mr. Boyer's speech and I am ashamed, as a member of this House, to have to say that I cannot do so because it has not been reported. It is the duty of the leader of the House to make provision for the reporting of the French speeches at any time. I do not say we must always have a French reporter here, but on a moment's notice, when necessary, a French reporter should be available, especially when it is the speech of the seconder of the motion to adopt the address that in the official report of our debates that is to be reported. It is really a shame there is a blank where there should be a full report of one of the most magnificent speeches delivered in French that we have heard in the Senate.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—My hon. friend would not wax so indignant if he knew the facts. If he had merely inquired why the speech of the hon. member from Rigaud did not appear in the Debates to-day, he would have easily discovered the reason. I myself suggested to the hon. member from Rigaud that if his speech was not all written beforehand he could get a French reporter to take it down, but that if he had written it he could hand his manuscript to the reporter. He told me that he would write it and dispense with a French reporter at the table. As he was leaving last evening I asked him if he had done that, and he replied that he had not written his speech fully, that he had simply notes and he hesitated about leaving them, although from what one of the reporters told me, he had promised to do so. He did not furnish the manuscript, and at the instance of the reporter I wrote to the hon. gentleman from Rigaud last evening urging him before leaving for Europe to-morrow to kindly send his manuscript to the official reporter. I think that should be a satisfactory answer to my hon. friend, explaining why there is a blank in the official report. I was told by the hon. member from Rigaud that he would furnish his manuscript, and that should settle that point. The hon. gentleman raises another point of a larger scope when he refers to having a French reporter always ready to report French speeches in this Chamber. He has asked the right hon. leader of this House to take note of his demand, and seems to hold him responsible for the fact that we have not a French reporter. I may inform my hon. friend that it is the Senate Debates Committee that should settle that question. We have had so very few French speeches in this Chamber that whenever I have been told that a colleague wanted to address the Senate in French, I have myself offered to see that a French reporter was here. It is a question which might well occupy the attention of the Debates Committee next week.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—It is a great comfort and blessing that there is so little French spoken in this House. It is a comfort that the senators from Quebec are able to speak such good English. I am gratified at the great improvement they have made in that direction. I remember the time when in the other House a great deal of French was spoken. Some representatives from Quebec at that time could not speak a word of English. What I rose specially for was to complain that the mover of the address in the other House is reported in French, and that we have not the benefit of reading his speech in English. I should like to be able to read that speech myself, because I have no doubt it is very pleasing and interesting if I could only master it, but in my ignorance I did not learn French, although I learned another language that I love very much better.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If the hon. gentleman complains that he had not the pleasure of reading an English translation of French speeches delivered in the House of Commons, we may complain in this House that we have not the pleasure of reading such speeches in either language. Our position is still worse than his. My hon. friend (Mr. Choquette) has put before this House a question that must be solved one way or the other. I understood last year that arrangements had been proposed to have a kind of staff for the translation and reporting of the Debates. In that project, a French translator was to be added. I do not know if the government has abandoned that idea.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—That is for the Debates Committee to settle.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think we can find the reason of all those inconveniences: it is because we have not a French minister in the Senate. A French minister here would have something to do. It would be his undoubted duty to look after the interests of his compatriots, and if he was up to the mark we would not have any ground for complaint. I called the attention of the leader of the House to the fact that Providence has given him all he wanted. He desired to reform the Senate by the action of Providence; that reform he has obtained. I suppose that he may crave Providence once more to carry the reform further and give us a French minister to share with him the duties and responsibilities of the Senate. If he does that, Providence, that always yields to his wishes, will come once more to the fore and heal all the sores we may complain of in this House. If the principle is right, the hon. member for de Lorimier (Mr Dandurand) is willing to do more than his duty, because some minutes ago he said if the leader of this House could not speak to the Auditor General he would speak himself. If the leader of this House does not want to speak to the Prime Minister to have a French minister in the Senate, I think the hon. member on his right (Mr. Dandurand) should step up—I do not say for himself—and voice our opinions, and ask the Prime Minister to name a French minister in the Senate. We have had representation in the past, why should we depart from what has been done in by gone days? The last year the Conservative government was in power we had here the Hon. Mr. Angers who represented the French element in the Senate, together with the other ministers. When the hon. gentlemen opposite came into power they had three and at one time four ministers in the Senate, all of them English. I do not see why a French minister would not be as good as an English minister, especially if he can speak both languages and attend to his duties. Is it a bar to his success to be of French descent that he cannot reach the summit so easily attained by the English speaking ministers? I do not see why that justice should not be done to this House. We are suffering from lack of ministers. The evil is easily cured and there is only one thing to do. May I suggest to the government if they will do that they shall have our hearty approval and all the French members of this House will unite in a vote of thanks to the Prime Minister.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—The explanation given by the hon. gentleman from de Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) is just the worst condemnation of what took place yesterday. The hon. gentleman says he ran after Senator Boyer yesterday, praying him to send his manuscript to the reporter before leaving for Europe. Supposing he hadn't it, or it did not please him to do it, the Debates would be short of that speech? I do not see that I am raising a sectional question; I dislike to do anything of the kind, but under the circumstances, after the very poor explanation we have heard, I may say the worst explanation that could be given, I have a right to protest as I have done. When was the constitution amended in such a way that when I wished to speak in French I have to ask as a matter of grace the hon. genlteman to send a French reporter to the table? It is sufficient to put these facts before the House, and I appeal to hon. gentlemen to say if to justify my position I am not within my right in making a strong protest. I hope it will be the last time I shall be obliged to make a simialar one.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

THE SENATE.

THURSDAY, November 18, 1909.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

EXECUTION OF JOHN DILLON.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I desire to bring before this honourable House a very serious, important and solemn matter, which I would not have done had I received the information to which I was entitled in the Department of Justice. It is a matter of very urgent moment, and there is no time to be lost. I endeavoured before his hon. the Speaker took the Chair to ascertain from the hon. leader of the House the information I desired but I could not obtain it. My only alternative is to bring the matter before the Chamber and before the country. I see by the official organ of the government in Montreal, 'Le Canada,' a special despatch relating to the matter which I wish to bring under the notice of the Senate. It is in reference to the hanging of one John Dillon, in the city of Montreal, to-morrow morning at eight or half past eight o'clock. The Assistant Secretary of State wrote to the assistant sheriff to the following effect:

> Ottawa, 16th Nov., 1909, re John Dillon condemned to be hanged on Friday 19th, it is impossible for the Governor General to intervene in any manner in this matter.

That was on the 16th of this month. Last night, between one and two o'clock, the correspondent of this paper wired as follows :

> The last despatches received from Ottawa in the night seem to bring a little hope, a faint hope for John Dillon. In fact petitions have been circulated in the capital which all ask that the head of Dillon be spared. Very important steps will be taken between now and to-morrow before the government.

I went to the Department of Justice to ascertain if there was any foundation for this rumor. I was unable to obtain the information. I may say that the statement that petitions or protests were sent to the government is correct.

I understand that the Governor General himself has transmitted to the Department of Justice petitions or protests against the hanging of John Dillon. What I wish to know is whether that matter has been laid properly, and in time, before the government of the day. I was unable to get the information from the department and I now respectfully ask the right hon. leader of the House if he is in a position to state whether it has been dealt with since the 16th of November? The man is to be hanged to-morrow morning. It is true that up to the present very little effort has been made to secure a reprieve for the condemned man. He is in Montreal without a home or friends, but he has rendered valuable services to the Crown as a soldier and a police officer. There is not a stain against his character while acting in that capacity. He has lived twenty-five years in Montreal, and I have known him since a boy as being a gentleman under all circumstances—remarked by everybody on the streets of Montreal as a gentleman under all circumstances. Unfortunately, last year he happened to meet with one of those events which turn a small matter into a crime. He was to be ejected by his landlady and a bailiff came to serve a writ. Dillon did not like the way it was done and the bailiff brought a policeman and fireman to turn a hose on him. Dillon drew his revolver and fired half a dozen shots, one of them striking and killing policeman Shea.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The hon. gentleman has made a mistake. It was not when the crowd and the firemen gathered that Dillon fired. It was in the afternoon when the bailiff could not get access and went for a policeman. The door was open a little and Dillon refused to let them enter, and when the policeman advanced, Dillon shot him. The other scene was when the policeman, hearing that a man had been shot, tried to capture Dillon.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The hon. gentleman's statement may be correct, but it does not destroy the fact that the bailiff instead of going to the courts and securing permission to arrest Dillon, brought a policeman to arrest him without a warrant. That point was not raised in the trial. Judge Drummond, in the case of an accused person, who shot a police officer at the time of the Fenian raid, or the St. Alban's bank robbery, held that he was perfectly justified in shooting, because the policeman had at the time no warrant to make the arrest. I do not want to go into the merits of the case; I am simply stating the facts. Dillon has lived twenty-five years in Montreal and has been known as the most conspicuous gentleman on the streets of the city—a dandy the learned judge had the poor tact to declare him in his judgment and in his recommendation to the department. Supposing he was a dandy, it was all to his credit. Dillon is a man who for twenty long years was a servant of the Queen and for a quarter of a century a citizen of Montreal, without a stain against his character until, under trying circumstances, he drew a revolver and killed a policeman. He might have killed a dozen, but it was not a premeditated attempt to commit murder. He thought, like all Irishmen, that he was king in his own castle, and should not be disturbed without due process of law. When the bailiff was refused admission, he should have gone to the court and proceeded in a regular manner, but instead of that he brought a policeman. If John Dillon were a common, infamous murderer he would be better treated. Under the circumstances, if this matter has not been brought to the attention of the government up to the present moment, of course there is very little time now—if not, in the name of legality, at least in the name of humanity the case ought to be considered before the cord is put around Dilllon's neck.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—This is a very painful matter, but while I fully appreciate the kindness of heart that has induced my hon. friend to bring it up, I think the House will agree with me that it is not possible for either Houses of parliament to review a judicial decision. I regret to say that I can hold out no hope to the hon. gentleman that the course of justice will be interferred with.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I wish to point out that I am not seeking to have either House of Parliament review the judicial decision, all I am asking is whether the government has considered the late petitions since the 16th of November?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The 16th is only two days ago. I can only say to the hon. gentleman that in all these capital cases every possible effort is made on the part of the government, and especially on the part of the Department of Justice to obtain full information before a decision is arrived at. This unfortunate man's case was very fully considered, and I can hold out no hope of a reprieve.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I hope they will hang next time anybody is killed.

PETITIONS FOR CANADIAN MARINE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government :

1. Apart from the adoption, during the last session by the members of the House of Commons, of the resolution concerning the creation of a Canadian fleet for the defence of the country and the empire, have the people of Canada ever asked, by way of petition to parliament, before, during, or since last session, for the organization of a Canadian marine on the basis of the resolution in question?
2. How many petitions have so been sent to parliament?
3. How many signatures are attached to these petitions?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—No petitions to parliament were referred to the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

9. Besides his actual salary, does he receive, by way of remuneration, or otherwise, any additional allowances, fees whatsoever, or compensations of any kind?
10. What is the nature and extent of these additional allowances, or of such compensations?

RESIGNATION OF SENATOR MERNER.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask the right hon. minister if he has been able to obtain any information respecting the reported resignation of the late Senator Merner?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I have not as yet been able to obtain the information my hon. friend has asked for.

The Senate adjourned till three o'clock to-morrow.

INSURANCE BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The order of the day being called:

Second reading (Bill A) An Act respecting Insurance.

Right Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I have been requested by several hon. members, who cannot conveniently be here to-day and who wish to speak on the second reading of this Bill, to defer its consideration until next week, and I, therefore, move that this order of the day be discharged, and that it be placed on the orders of the day for Tuesday next, to be the first order.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I think it is unfortunate that this application for postponement has been made, or that the intimation has been given that several members who desire to speak upon this question are not prepared to do so to-day. I have reason to believe that certain hon. members, who are not in their places at the present moment, with a view to catching the train to take them to Montreal and other points, have simply delayed the public business of his House, solely because of their own pleasure, until some day next week. While I have no desire to interfere personally with the movements of hon. gentlemen, particularly those who wish to catch the train between three and four o'clock on Friday, yet there is no good reason why the business of this House should be postponed from time to time, to meet their convenience. That has been exemplified over and over again, until it has become a standing reproach to this House. I have never stood in the way of an adjournment of the Senate from Friday until Tuesday; but when that privilege is abused to the extent of Friday practically becoming a dies non, and business suspended from Thursday evening until Tuesday, it becomes an abuse and a grievance to which attention should be called and which should not be tolerated by the House. There is no reason why the second reading of the Insurance Bill should not be disposed of to-day. If these hon. gentlemen are not in their places to speak upon the motion, then the Senate should proceed with the business of the country, entirely irrespective of their absence. I speak with knowledge upon the subject, that it is merely to meet the convenience of these hon. gentlemen, and I hope my hon. friend will not insist upon this Bill standing over until next week. Another thing I might point out is that this is the only business before the House to-day. It is very well known that, until the committee becomes seized of this Bill, there will be no other public business to transact, and it, therefore, means a suspension of the entire public business in this House to suit the convenience of the members to whom I have referred, and it, therefore, means that all the other members of this Chamber must attend from day to day, to wait the convenience of hon. gentlemen who wish to make observations upon a Bill of this character.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The hon. leader of the opposition is hardly justified in holding the members from Montreal responsible for the suspension of business to which he has referred. For my part, and I think I can speak for a number of senators from Montreal, I am not in the habit of asking any postponement on Friday or any other day of the week. I am in my place on Friday or any other day when I wish to speak on a measure. Up to this date, when any member has asked for a postponement of the consideration of any question, his request has been granted.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I had no reference to my hon. friend in any way. I had reference to other gentlemen from Montreal who are not in their places, and who I know wish to speak on the Bill, and on whose behalf, I believe, the postponement of this measure has been asked.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—My hon. friend will observe that the Bill is very long and complicated; it is really not before the House yet, and it did not appear unreasonable that longer time should be granted to those who wish to study the subject.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I call attention to the fact that the Bill has not been distributed, and therefore cannot be proceeded with today.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understand that the Bill as amended in the direction indicated by the leader of the House has not yet been printed. Am I correct?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It is not marked as printed on our orders of the day.

The motion was agreed to on a division.

WEEK END ADJOURNMENTS.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—moved that the House adjourn until Tuesday next at three o'clock in the afternoon, and that hereafter, unless differently ordered by the Senate, it shall stand so adjourned on all future Fridays.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I quite concur in observations which have been made with regard to the effect of adjourning from Friday until Tuesday. When I first came to this House we met practically every day, including Monday. Then, by a sort of common consent, for the benefit of members who lived in the west, we agreed passively not to meet on Monday, so that gentlemen who had a long distance to go to their homes would be able to be here for the opening of the House on Tuesday. The way it works now is that practically no public business is done on Friday afternoon. The House meets on Friday, but all the orders are postponed until the following Tuesday. I agree with the hon. member from Calgary, that Friday should be made a business day, in view of conditions which have arisen, and that the public business should not go over every Friday as a matter of course until the following Tuesday, which is the practice now.

RESIGNATION OF SENATOR MERNER.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—A question was asked the other day whether the late Senator Merner had resigned before his decease. I have made inquiry, and as far as I can discover, he had not forwarded his resignation prior to his decease. I find that Mr. Ratz was appointed by order in council, not on the resignation of Senator Merner, but on his death.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate adjourned until Tuesday next at three p.m.

THE SENATE.

TUESDAY, November 23, 1909.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEES OF THE SENATE.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the report of any committee is presented, I should like to call the attention of the House to the fact that there are no committees. All that has been done by the Senate was to adopt the recommendation made by the Select Committee appointed to nominate the Standing Committees. I observe, in referring back to the procedure of some years ago, that after the report of the committee on selection had been made for the Standing Committees, the leader of the House moved the adoption, after due notice had been given, of each committee separately. The Senate will readily understand, why that course was adopted, and why it should be continued, because objections might be taken to certain members on a particular committee, or it might be the desire of the Senate to change one member for another, or to add an additional member. I observe, in looking at the procedure during the time that Sir Alexander Campbell was leading the House, a motion was made for each separate committee. After the recommendation of the special committee had been approved by the Senate it was—Moved by the Hon. Mr. Campbell, and seconded by the Hon. Mr. Aikens, that the Hon. Messieurs (naming the members) be a Committee on Banking and Commerce.

And I find also that these words were added to each motion in moving the adoption of the report of the committee.

To whom shall be referred all Bills on these subjects.

That is, all Bills referring to banking and commerce, for instance, are referred by this resolution to this committee, without any further motion.

Coming to a later date, when I had the honour of leading the House, I find that the same procedure was followed. Under similar circumstances, it was moved by myself seconded by Hon. Mr. Angers 'that the following be appointed a committee on the library,' and also a similar motion for each and every other committee. I notice however, that at that time the additional words to which I have called attention were not used, so that under the circumstances, when a motion was made during the period to which I am now referring, each measure had to be referred to the appropriate committee by a special order of the Senate. Under the motion made by the late Sir Alexander Campbell, when he was leading the House, it will be observed that it was not necessary to make these special motions, because every measure introduced in the Senate was referred to the proper committee by that resolution. The Senate finds itself in this position to-day: It appointed a committee on selection, the committee made its report and that report was adopted but no action was taken upon it. Hence it will be necessary for the leader of the House either to make separate and special motions for the adoption of the report as it refers to each committee, or probably, to simplify it, a resolution which would include the whole of them adopting the suggestions made by the committee. I think we have of late years fallen into a rather loose mode of transacting our business. I do not think this is the first time that the omission to which I have called attention has occurred; but it is well we should continue the old practice, a practice which is absolutely necessary to give the committee full authority. I will call the attention of the Senate to an instance: it will be remembered that the Committee on Contingencies made certain recommendations in reference to the supply of stationery. They recommended that each member should be entitled to receive a certain amount of stationery over and above that supplied to him in a small trunk. The Senate concured in the report of the committee, but never passed the order which was recommended to be passed in order to limit the supply. That case is analogous to the one which I have just mentioned. I dare say the attention of the leader of the House may have been directed to this fact, and probably he is prepared to take such action as will empower the different committees to discharge their particular duties.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—When my hon. friend rose I was about to propose the following motion, which I now move:

That the senators mentioned in the report of the Committee on Selection as having been chosen to serve on the several Standing Committees during the present session, be and they are hereby appointed to form part of and constitute the several committees with which their respective names appear in said report, to inquire into and report upon such matters as may be referred to them from time to time, and the Committee on Standing Orders is authorized to send for persons, papers and records when required.

The motion was agreed to.

ABOLITION OF OFFICE OF FIRST CLERK IN THE IMMIGRATION OFFICE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

1. Has the Department of the Interior been occupied with the question of, and with the expediency of, abolishing the offices of subagent and first clerk in the Immigration Office at Quebec in order to replace them by the new Private Secretary to the Immigration Agent?
2. Who made such suggestion, and when was it made?
3. Has the department accepted it or refused it, and for what reasons?
4. Has Doctor Jos. P. Lavoie, Immigration Agent, actually or ever asked for a private secretary?
5. What was the reply of the government?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows :

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. The answer will also be involved in the reply to No. 1.
4. No.
5. Answered by No. 4.

GRANTING OF CHARTERS TO POWER COMPANIES.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. DAVID moved:

That an order of the Senate do issue for a copy of each charter granted since the 1st June, 1909, by the Secretary of State, by letletters patent under the Companies Act, chapter 79 of the Revised Statutes, 1906.

(a) Incorporating any company with powers for the development, production, distribution or use of water-power for any purposes; or with powers for the production, distribution and use of electricity in any form by any means, whether directly or by the transformation thereof into heat, light, power or any other kind of energy or

(b) conferring such powers upon any company previously incorporated.

He said: I have found in the last number of the 'Canada Gazette' two charters which will perhaps sufficiently illustrate the point I desire to make. I wish to show that letters patent have been issued in many cases, especially at a recent date, published in the last number of the 'Canada Gazette,' incorporating companies to do what we refuse permission to do when companies appear before this House with Bills containing similar clauses. There are many letters patent in the same terms as these two in the last number of the 'Gazette.' One of them reads as follows :

Public notice is hereby given that under the first part of chapter 79 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, known as 'The Companies Act,' letters patent have been issued under the Seal of the Secretary of State of Canada, bearing date the 17th day of November, 1909, incorporating Charles Class Greenshields and Edgar Reginald Parkins, advocates, Thomas Emilien Gadbois, Ralph Erskine Allan, and John Horton Montle, law students, all of the city of Montreal, in the province of Quebec, for the following purposes, viz.:—

(a) To produce, manufacture, supply, acquire, lease, sell and dispose of electricity and electric current for light, heat and power, and for any other purposes for which the same may be used; provided, however, that any supply, lease, sale or other disposition of electricity and electric current shall be subject to local and municipal regulations in that behalf.

(b) To acquire, manufacture, construct, lay, erect, maintain, complete, and operate all works, structures, apparatus, motors, poles, wires, appliances, and connections, materials, supplies, machinery, as are or may in any way be used in connection with the business of the production, manufacturing, acquiring, leasing, selling and supplying electric current or electricity for any purpose, and to lease, sell or otherwise deal with or dispose of the same.

And hon. gentlemen will please listen to this part—

To acquire by purchase, license, lease, or otherwise and to use, develop, equip, lease, or otherwise dispose of any water or other power in connection with the production or supplying of electricity or electric current for heat, light, power, or for any other purpose for which the same may be used.

In the other letters patent, it is perhaps even more striking.

To provide, purchase, lease, or otherwise acquire, and to construct, lay down, erect, establish, operate, maintain and carry out all necessary work, stations, engines, machinery, plant, cables, wires, lines, generators, accumulators, lamps, meters, transformers, apparatus, appurtenances and appliances connected with the generation, accumulation, distribution, transmission, supply, sale, use and employment of electricity, and to generate, accumulate, transmit, distribute, supply and sell electricity, for the purpose of electric lighting, heating, traction and motive power, and for industrial and other purposes; and to undertake and to enter into contracts and agreements for the lighting of cities, towns, streets, buildings and other places, and for the supply of electric light, heat and motive power for any or all public or private purposes.

I think it is clear enough, and it is not necessary for me to speak at length to show hon. gentlemen that those letters patent give powers which we have refused many times, and which our right to grant has been contested by all the provincial governments. I am surprised that provincial governments which are so jealous of their rights in connection with water-powers and distribution of electricity, and which have protested with so much force against the action of the House of Commons and of the Senate in similar cases, and which have contented that the provincial parliaments alone had the right to organize such companies and to grant such powers, do not pay more attention to these letters patent which are an open violation of provincial rights according to their own contention. I do not know that hon. members will be of the same opinion as myself in regard to this question, but if I am encouraged a little and if the views expressed on the floor of the Senate coincide with mine, I intend to give effect to my remarks by introducing a Bill to provide that parties asking for such powers in connection with the distribution of hydro-electric power be obliged to do what we have at times compelled them to do when they have presented Bills to us of the same nature. And then, when they have been notified in that way, if they do not do what is right, they will have nobody to blame but themselves.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—To what part of these letters patent in particular does the hon. gentleman object? I have listened very carefully to what he has read, and the powers given there appear to be altogether within the right of any private individual to exercise. There is no right of expropriation granted. If it is on the provincial question, these water-power companies are distributing electric power in many cases in more than one province, and in that case, I suppose, they will have to come here for authority. If they obtained letters patent in the province of Quebec, for instance, I daresay they could only do business in that province. Is it on Provincial rights that the hon. gentleman bases his argument?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Would it not be better to delay answering the question which the hon. gentleman has put until we have the letters patent which have been issued presented to the House?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—The hon. gentleman has withdrawn the request.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—No, I have not withdrawn the request. I said that the hon. gentleman might be satisfied with the last copy of the 'Canada Gazette,' which contains letters patent of that nature, and I said they were good illustrations of many others of the same character which had been issued.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the motion should be granted, and the orders in council to which he has referred are laid before the House; then we will all be able to judge how far they infringe upon provincial rights.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Then I maintain my motion, asking for the last ten numbers of the 'Canada Gazette.' I suppose that the production of the last number of the 'Canada Gazette' will be sufficient. In answer to the hon. member, my contention is that the provincial governments have claimed that they alone have the right to incorporate such companies. That is the point.

The motion was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPENSES OF SOSTHENE MORISETTE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

1. Has a person named Sosthene Morisette, employed as a clerk in the Immigration Office at Quebec, ever rendered to the Department of the Interior, during the fiscal year 1907-08, an account for his personal expenses to the amount of $131.35?
2. Who certified the accuracy of the account in question?
3. Was the account accompanied by vouchers giving the nature and proving the payments of the sums of which repayment was asked?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The answers are as follows:

1. No.
2. See answer to 1.
3. See answer to 1.

TREATMENT OF IMMIGRANTS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

1. Have the steamship or railway companies, or other persons, complained to the Minister of the Interior or the Suprintendent of Immigration, of the manner in which immigrants were treated at Quebec?
2. When were such complaints made, and against whom were they brought?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Yes, several such complaints have been made. They were, in 1909: June 26, medical inspectors; June 29, medical inspectors; July 5, hospital; July 6, hospital; August 14, Polish interpreter; September 28, United States inspectors.

DEPORTATION OF OTTO RITTENEN.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

1. That a person named Otto Rittenen, who arrived at Quebec on the 5th of November, 1908, by the 'Empress of Ireland,' was afflicted with leprosy?
2. That the leper in question was placed in the Immigration Hospital at Quebec and left in contact with the ordinary patients?
3. That on the 25th November, 1908, the said Otto Rittenen was re-embarked on board one of the vessels of the Pacific Company, the 'Montreal,' going to Anvers?
4. That the journey from the Immigration Hospital to the vessel was made by the leper in the ordinary vehicle of the hospital in company with two other immigrants?
5. That at the time of his arrival in Quebec, this Otto Rittenen had been declared afflicted with leprosy by Dr. Baily, of the American Commission?
6. That the certificate given by Dr. Pagé, of Quebec, for the forced repatriation of this immigrant attests that he was suffering from leprosy?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The answers are:

1. The person referred to was suspected of having leprosy, but this was finally disproved by the medical inquiry.
2. See answer to question 1.
3. Yes.
4. See answer to question 1.
5. Yes. That was the first declaration.
6. No.

CONDITION OF LEVIS FORTS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

1. Is it the case that the Lévis forts, numbers 1, 2 and 3, have become uninhabitable for their caretakers, and that the government has been obliged to rent, outside of their line of fortification, dwelling-houses to lodge the caretakers of these forts?
2. Where are these lodgings situated? At what distance from their respective forts are the caretakers in question lodged?
3. What is the amount of rent paid by the government for the lodging of each of these caretakers?
4. To whom are these rents paid?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The casemates in these forts have been found too damp for use as quarters and are being gradually improved in this respect as funds permit. No. 1 fort is now ready for occupation, and instructions have been issued to the caretaker to reoccupy it. The caretakers are themselves providing their present temporary lodging, the department allowing each of them a lodging allowance of 30 cents per diem in lieu of quarters.

The caretakers are residing in houses situated at distances varying from half to three-quarters of a mile from the forts.

Inquiries 3 and 4 are answered by No. 1.

THE ST. LAWRENCE CHANNEL.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

1. What is the length of the channel known under the name of the Banc de Beaujeu channel, in the River St. Lawrence?
2. What is its width?
3. What is its depth at high and at low tide—
   (a) at the time of the highest tides?
   (b) at the time of the ordinary tides?
4. Has the work of excavation of the said channel been finished?
5. In what respect and how may the work which remains to be done change the figures given in the answers to the first, second and third questions?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The answers are:

1. One mile.
2. 1,000 feet.
3. (a) Spring tides, 48 feet high and 30 feet low; (b) Neap tides, 43 feet high and 32 feet low.
4. Yes; completed autumn, 1909.
5. Answered by No. 4.

INSURANCE BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (A) an Act respecting Insurance:

He said: This measure which is about to be submitted for your consideration, has been already, as probably the Senate is aware, very fully discussed at great length in the House of Commons, where the various interested parties have appeared and have been very fully heard. At the close of last session it was decided that in view of the short time at our disposal it was impossible to properly consider it in the Senate, and it was therefore agreed that the Bill should be introduced at the commencement of this session, and duly discussed in this body and then returned to the House of Commons. There are, as the House will probably be aware, a very large number of amendments, many of which, however, deal with questions of detail which it is not very necessary or desirable to describe or dilate upon at the second reading. I have had a memorandum prepared for me giving the principal points of difference between the existing law and the Bill which has just been presented to the Senate. These I will go through in detail, and I may observe that if this Bill receives the second reading now, I propose to have it referred as soon as that committee is properly constituted, to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, where parties who desire to present their views will, I make no doubt, receive a hearing. One of the most important points with which the measure is concerned, is that with respect to investments. As hon. gentlemen are aware, the law as it at present stands gives very large powers to insurance companies to invest their funds in any direction they see fit. This Bill in some respects enlarges that power and permits them to invest in securities guaranteed by the Dominion or any province, the principle being that a security bearing a government guarantee should be as good a security as one issued by the government direct. It also permits investments to be made in municipal and school securities in Canada, and it will permit such investments to be made in Canada or elsewhere the company is carrying on business. With respect to investments in industrial bonds and securities of that kind, a considerable number of restrictions have been placed upon them. In the case of investments in stocks, the Bill would recognize preferred stocks on which dividends have been paid for not less than five years preceding the date of purchase, and it would recognize the common stock of any company, which has paid a dividend of at least 4 per cent for seven years preceding the date of purchase. They limit, however, the amount which can be purchased of the stock of any corporation that any life company may secure to 20 per cent of a total issue, the object of that being, I presume, to prevent the company obtaining control of other industrial corporations. That is a summary of the chief points of the powers given to companies for investments. In the matter of rebating, considerable precaution has been taken to avoid certain abuses which were alleged to have occurred in connection with that practice. The commission which considered this question, which the House will remember sat for a considerable time, and prepared a very elaborate Bill, provided that a penalty of $1,000 should be imposed on the manager of every life company whose agent should grant a rebate to a policyholder. After full consideration, it was thought this was rather unfair to the managers, because it appeared that in certain cases agents granted or might have granted these rebates without the connivance of the manager, and, therefore, the penalty provides that the agent offering and the person accepting the rebate shall be equally penalized, the amount of such penalty being $100, for the first offence, and $250 for the second offence, the manager of the company being liable only when he had personally consented to the violation of this provision. The Commission on Insurance also recommended that a sort of standard insurance policy should be adopted. This principle has been adopted in the Bill, and provision has been made that as far as the House of Commons can see, will give security to the policy-holder in that direction. As regards another important matter, the distribution of profits, the Bill provides that when a company hereafter issues policies providing for the distribution of the surplus less frequently than once in every five years, it shall carry the amount to the surplus accruing to such policies as a liability in the same manner as the reserve fund. It is thought this would prevent the illegitimate use of the surplus, and would secure the payment to the policy-holders that they are properly entitled to. It further provides for the protection of the policy-holder that, in the future, boards of directors of life insurance companies, should be made up of representatives of policy-holders as well as of the shareholders. This provision has been altered a little from the Bill which was introduced last session, which provided that the board should consist of sixteen members, eight from each class. It was thought that was not entirely fair to the shareholders and, accordingly, it has been altered to provide that the number of policyholder directors shall be two-fifths of the number of shareholder directors. The policy-holder directors must be holders of a participating policy of not less than $4,000. The provision in last session's Bill which provided for similar rights to the policyholders of a company doing only non-participating business, was struck out. With respect to fire insurance, the present Insurance Act provides that all fire insurance companies soliciting business in Canada without first obtaining a license from the Insurance Department, are liable to certain penalties; nevertheless there is nothing in the Act to prevent contracts of insurance with unlicensed companies being effected by mail or otherwise, and representatives of such companies entering Canada to inspect the risk and to adjust it. In connection with this, a provision has been made, that will require considerable attention, which is known as the 15 per cent.

That appears to have been a little error. It is not proposed that they should pay to the government a tax of 15 per cent of the net cost of their insurance in all cases. There is a most important provision, that that particular tax should not exceed 15 cents on every one hundred dollars of insurance. The House will observe that in the case of heavy policies that will very materially reduce the amount. For example, where the insured was paying 15 cents on one hundred dollars the increased cost would amount to $100.15. Where he is paying it on one dollar, the cost would be $1.15 but in cases where he is paying on say $4, the increase would not be $4.60, but $4.15, thus making the net increase not equivalent to 15 per cent, but to 3¾ per cent. I call the attention of the House to that because a good deal of misunderstanding has arisen, and I find that it was supposed that this imposed a general tax of 15 per cent, which would undoubtedly be very heavy. These are the chief points apparently of difference between the existing law and the present Bill. There are some minor points which will be taken into consideration when we deal with the Bill in committee. They have reference to the basis of valuation, which was changed from what is known as the H. M. table of actuaries to a modern table called the O. M. table, also to the powers of the superintendent, who is now given rather larger powers, and to the amount of salaries which may be paid, and to the reports which may be issued. It is scarcely worth while to detain the House with these at the present moment. The Bill contains a model Bill for future acts of incorporation of Insurance companies, which is provided in one of the schedules attached to the Bill. One of the sections provides that such a Bill will be regarded as conferring on the company all the powers included in this Bill applicable to it. As far as I know, that covers the main features of the measure now laid before us, but as I have said, the whole Bill, with the numerous minor alterations, had better I think be considered in the Committee on Banking and Commerce, to whom, if the House grants a second reading, I propose to refer it. It will afterwards be discussed in a Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—Will it be understood tnat when the Bill is reported from the Banking and Commerce Committee, we can deal with the details here in a committee of the whole House?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middlesex)—I was going to ask the hon. minister, before we proceed with the discussion, if he did not make a slight mistake in his statement to the House. He stated that a participating policy-holder to be on the board of directors should hold a policy of $4,000. The Bill says $2,000.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Policy-holder directors must be holders of participating policies of at least $4,000.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—The Bill says $2,000.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—But they are to be elected—which is perhaps what my hon. friend from Middlesex had in his mind—by the participating policy-holders of the company, holding policies of $2,000 or over.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—Yes, that is all right.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Are we to understand that when the Bill is given a second reading—which no doubt will be done, without much opposition—that it is to be referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Many of us have not a seat on that committee, and many of us may not be in a position to attend every day because other committees may be sitting, and we shall therefore be placed at a disadvantage by not becoming informed in regard to the details of the measure. Further, if I understand the rules correctly, we have no rights, without a notice being given, or obtaining the unanimous consent of the House, to refer this Bill to the committee on Banking and Commerce. I have every confidence in every member of the Banking and Commerce Committee. I believe they will do ample justice to the Bill, and that it will be much improved after coming from their hands; but I desire that after the Bill is reported from that committee to the House we shall then have an opportunity of going into a committee of the whole so that we may discuss it thoroughly. Am I to understand that the right hon. gentleman will allow the Bill to go into a committee of the whole after it has been dealt with by the Banking and Commerce Committee?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Yes. I may say to my hon. friend that in a measure of this consequence, in which I know a great many hon. members are interested, I think that would be the course to be adopted, and I propose to do that anyway.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—With that promise. I certainly would have no objection to the Bill going to the Banking and Commerce committee, but I might say in reference to giving the policy-holders holding $2,000 or more a right to elect certain members of the company, that I think is hardly a fair thing. We know that the stockholders organize the company, they have to take the responsibility of getting the company in shape, and if there are losses in the matter they are the ones who will have to bear the burden of these losses. Why should the policy-holders have that right? If I want to insure my life I assume no risk, I accept one company in preference to other companies, and I feel confidence in the company or I would not allow my life to be insured with them. Why should the policy-holders if they have a certain amount of insurance with the company, be given the right to elect two-fifths of the directors, while those who organize the company, have to assume the responsibility and if there be any losses have to bear the burden of them. I think that provision should be amended. Would it not be an unreasonable thing for those who have money deposited in a chartered bank to be given an opportunity of electing a certain representation on the board of directors of that bank? When the Bill comes back to us we can consider those things and remove any cause of complaint. With these slight objections I have certainly an open mind in reference to the Insurance Bill. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will agree with me that I do not fully understand insurance matters. It is not a subject that I have given as much attention to as I should and with the understanding that the Bill is to be submitted to a committee of the whole House before the third reading, I have nothing further to say at the present time.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I had hoped that some other hon. gentlemen would have taken part in the discussion before I made my remarks. As a public Bill, this important measure should be referred to the Committee of the Whole House, but its reference to the Standing Committee, deprives a large number of senators of the opportunity of taking part in its discussion as hon. gentlement do not, as a rule, take a very active interest when a measure is being discussed before a committee of which they are not members. I do not believe that any body of men could be selected in Canada better qualified to deal with the preparation of an Insurance Bill than the hon. members of this Chamber. I believe that if a committee were formed of the best men from the various provinces, a large number of those who occupy seats in this House would be the very men selected. It has been stated, and repeated very often in this House, notably by the hon. gentleman from Mille Isles, that there is not enough work for us to do in the Senate. I remember that a session or two ago the hon. gentleman submitted a resolution suggesting that more legislation should be initiated in this House. I tell him, as well as every other member of this House, that there is plenty of work for all of us if we apply ourselves to the consideration of this Bill and give the country a good Insurance law. I should like to have heard the government explain more fully the purposes of the new Bill and why there should be a change from the law that has been in force until now. I said we are in a better position here to deal with this Bill than the other Chamber. We all know that in the House of Commons, no matter how impartial or independent some of the members may be, every one of them has in his county one, two or three insurance men, who, are gifted with very glib tongues, and should the member for a county make an enemy of the insurance agents in his constituency he would have much opposition when he presented himself for re-election. His political career might in that way be cut very short. Therefore, it may be that in the other House members cannot with as much independence and impartiality deal with a measure of this kind as the Senate can. I have a purpose in speaking now. I wish to apply my remarks more particularly to life insurance. I consider the question of life insurance to be of very great importance, and one which should, in my humble opinion, occupy the attention of this House particularly. There is a vast difference between it and fire insurance. Marine insurance, accident and all such insurance, outside of life insurance, are generally dealt with and disposed of by business men, who can always make a good bargain. We must remember that a fire policy, for instance, is terminable every year that it can be changed at any time, and the balance of the unearned premium is returned. The marine insurance is settled at every trip of the ship in many instances. Therefore, although we may devote a great deal of attention to those matters, I do not think they demand as much of our care and attention as life insurance. When a man insures his life, it is an act of generosity, thinking of others. Instead of insuring his own welfare and comfort in life, he actually, in many instances, deprives himself of many little luxuries, for the love and affection he bears his wife and children or some other beneficiary. It is the widow and the orphan who are the special objects of his solicitude, and they are the ones whose interests should receive the greatest attention from this honourable House. I understand it is the desire of the House to send the Bill to committee immediately, but the committees are not even organized. Why such haste? I should like to have had the debate adjourned, but owing to some remarks made by the hon. leader of the opposition in regard to some members who were not here on Friday last, I did not dare to ask a further postponement. I observe that none but licensed companies will be authorized to do business in this country. I may say that there are many forms of insurance which, as I understand, do not require license. Take Lloyds, for instance; that is a very famous insurance union throughout the world. What is Lloyds? It was originally nothing but a small tavern in the city of London. Years and years ago it was the great rendezvous for all the sailors and captains, sea-faring men and skippers. They came there to get news of their ships, inquiring from this captain and the other if their ships had been met. There were in those days, no telegraphs, much less wireless systems, and, therefore, this was the only means of ascertaining whether a ship in the Antipodes was still afloat. From these gatherings at Lloyds, marine insurance began. There is no special company organized at Lloyds. Lloyds simply means that in a large room, the brokers have several desks and if a man wishes to insure a ship for say fifty thousand pounds he will go to the first broker with whom he is in the habit of dealing, and who is probably acquainted with the sea worthiness of the ship, how ship is managed and who, probably, will be likely to take the largest amount of risk. The man says to him, 'I am sending a ship to Buenos Ayres or I am sending a ship to South Africa. Will you take part of this risk? I desire to place fifty thousand pounds on the ship.' The broker will simply say 'leave your form of application, I will look it over'. He has at hand the means of getting the necessary information. After due time, perhaps the same afternoon—things have to be done in a hurry when a ship is waiting—he will give his answer and say that he will take ten thousand pounds on the ship. Then the man goes to the next desk and asks the broker whether he will take a share of the risk. After the first two have assumed part of the risk, the other brokers will generally follow, and the fifty thousand pounds will be covered. You may, perhaps, ask a 'how will these people be able to pay the fifty thousand pounds? You know marine risks are very high.' These brokers do not carry those risks themselves. They are personally responsible, and Lloyds' association is responsible also, but they will immediately place themselves in communication with their clients in London and perhaps throughout the world and place this fifty thousand pounds, and the next day they are ready to take risks on another ship. Now, according to the Bill and according to what I hear from the insurance companies in this country, Lloyds will be prohibited from doing business in future in Canada because they have no Canadian license. This system has obtained in England, and has proved very satisfactory for a great number of years, and I do not know why we should deprive our shippers of the very great advantage of placing insurance with Lloyds. It is well known that in London you can insure almost anything. For instance, theatres starting out with a new play, not knowing whether it will prove a success, can insure with Lloyds against loss. People can insure against the death of a member of the Royal family. Fire insurance is more in the nature of a gamble. The insurance company bets that your place will not burn, and you bet that it will burn, and we know that a certain class in the community generally win the bet; and if at the end of the year there has been no accident, then the insurance company have taken your money. You have had protection for the year, it is true, but you have no return. In the case of life insurance it is different. Death is absolutely certain; and, moreover, by the system by which the tables of expectation of life are prepared, the insurers are able to calculate within the fraction of a year the length of a life, and it evens up so that there is absolutely no risk in life insurance. We can, therefore, realize that in a well managed life insurance company there is no risk whatever. The account is balanced every year, and in every well regulated company the amount of money paid in in premiums equals the amount paid out in indemnity or in casualties that may have happened during the year, and the loading is what makes the profits of the insurance company. Now this loading is considerable but there is absolutely no risk. I must say that it is with a great deal of diffidence I approach this subject because I am not as familiar with this as I am with other subjects; at the same time I have had so many people coming to my office in Montreal to speak to me about insurance, that I promised I would bring the matter before the Senate, even at the risk of wearying the House a little. Surely we should not begrudge a few minutes discussion to a measure of this kind. If we go back to the history of insurance, we find that it is rather a modern institution. We find no trace of insurance, at any rate I could find none, and I have inquired in the limited time at my disposal, either in Greece or in Rome. Throughout the middle ages there were hardly any insurance societies. There were simply association guilds, and at the death of one of the members, every one contributed a small sum,—a sort of mutual insurance, which did not amount to very much. The first insurance we have any trace of in the history of England is a sort of marine insurance for sailors, providing a ransom when the sailors were taken by pirates. Then they had a system which might be termed the reverse of insurance. We all know that marine insurance is paid when an accident has taken place and there has been a loss. For many years a system the reverse of insurance prevailed. If a ship came back with all hands on board, then the skipper would receive three times the amount of premium that he had placed in the hands of a committee. That was an inducement and encouragement to carefulness at sea, and that practice prevailed a long time where an indemnity, if I may call it so, was actually paid after a successful voyage. The first insurance charter that was ever granted in England was granted by Queen Elizabeth in 1574 to Richard Chandler, who formed the Chamber of Assurances. That Bill had been drafted similar to one which had existed in Barcelona in the thirteenth century, and also similar to one which had existed at Bruges, Belgium, in 1310, but very little came of it. The insurance that first amounted to anything was what is called the Tontine insurance and that is one that I would personally like to guard against and to guard the people of this country against. I think it is a vicious system. The name Tontine comes from Lorenzo Tonti, of Naples, and the object of the system was to enable states to borrow large sums of money by paying so much a year. Life pensions would be granted by the state to people after a certain period of years and to the survivors of the contributors. This Lorenzo Tonti went to France, to the Minister of Finance, about the middle of the seventeenth century, and submitted this plan. A loan was to be floated on that, but was not successful. He proposed to give as interest one shilling in the pound, or five per cent. Later on, Louis XIV., when everything seemed to go against him, started a Tontine system in France, and actually borrowed money at the enormous rate of ten per cent. I wonder what we would think if our Minister of Finance were borrowing money at ten per cent. People were induced to put up their money, which was three hundred livres a year. This system went on for quite a while, but the great benefit of the system was for the survivors. The money of those who died accumulated for the benefit of the survivors after a certain period. That is the vicious part of the system. This system of Tonti's, introduced by Louis XIV. lasted until 1726, and a widow who died at the age of 96 was then receiving seventy-three thousand and some hundred livres. This Tontine system may be briefly described as paying money into a common fund for the benefit of those who survive after a certain period. That system existed a long time before regular insurance, and was exactly the reverse of life insurance. In life insurance, a man thinks of those who shall survive him, while in the Tontine system, a man makes provision for himself without regard to any one else, and hoping to benefit by the death of others so that an insurance policy on the Tontine system is simply manipulating the funds of other people. It has been practically abandoned in England, and I hope it will be abandoned in Canada when this Bill comes into force. We now have another system which is not called Tontine, but which must be a cousin germane to it. That system is known as the accumulation system, and it prevails extensively throughout America. It provides for a quinquennial distribution of money, and amounts to very much the same thing as the Tontine system. All such systems are very much like lotteries, and I hope that the hon. member from de Lorimier, who is opposed to lotteries, will lend his aid in putting down this form of lottery business. Mutual insurance also partakes very much of the same nature. The only form of insurance which is supposed to be about perfect is the straight life premium. It is the best of all. In 1698, the Society of Merchants was founded on the life policy system, but not until 1760 were the first mortality tables prepared. Prior to 1760, money was distributed without regard to age; but in that year mortality tables were prepared in London by Stuart, Hodgson, Stonehouse, Brakenridge and others, and later by Dr. Price, of Northampton. These tables are in existence to-day and are also almost correct to this date. If they err at all, they err on the safe side for the insurance companies. In 1762, the first insurance company under the mutual system, called the Equitable, was established. In 1806 we have the first real insurance with participation. It was called the Rock. Although it obtained its charter, and although the best jurists of England said it was not founded on safe or sound principles, because, they contended, it was not right that shareholders should share in the profits without sharing the losses, notwithstanding that, the Rock became immensely popular. The straight companies doing life business with a fixed premium found themselves deserted. Their agents could secure no more applications, and they were obliged to adopt this system of distribution of profits. It is against that system that I want to raise an objection. I am not sure that my views on this subject will prevail, but I feel that I am simply doing my duty in putting them before the House. When insurance was first taken, it was probably on one's own life—that is to say one paid so much money in order to receive after a certain lapse of years during old age or infirmity a certain pension or a lump sum. It was an insurance to be paid in case of his survival. I may say the system prevails extensively in Europe where parents are anxious to make provision for starting their children in life. If a man has a daughter to whom he wants to give a dower at say the age of twenty, he makes an agreement with an insurance company to pay a small premium on her life. If she dies before reaching the age of twenty the company pays nothing ; if she lives to that age she gets a considerable sum. The premium is very light. The same thing applies where a man wishes to start his son in business. He does not mind economizing here and there to meet the premiums, and if his son lives he will have something to start him in business. I do not know that that system prevails in this country. There is also a system by which a bachelor, or a government employee receiving a small salary and knowing that he must sometime have to depend on a small government pension, insures his life in order to receive an annuity at a certain age so that that annuity added to the pension paid by the government will be about equal to his ordinary salary. Without exercising any great economy he can easily manage that. I may say that the best companies in this country—and I have spoken to many insurance men—would be delighted to see that system of participation abandoned. They are compelled to resort to it in order to secure business. The other companies that are not quite as solvent may be sincere, but very often are unscrupulous when their agents go to the people who can least afford it and show them the enormous profits their companies have been making in the last few years and promising them if they insure their lives that they will have a share in those profits. These agents represent that in a few years those who insure will have very little to pay. The promises are seldom fulfilled and when a man's earning powers decrease with advancing years and he finds himself unable to meet his premiums, it is useless for him to remind the company of its promises that his premums would be reduced one-third or one-half. The company points to the written contract which binds the insured as long as he lives to keep up his payments. Now, if the Senate could possibly do away with participation I think we would do something more in the interest of the people than anything we have done for many years.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—What would you do with the profits? Pay them as salaries? Who would have a right to the profit?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The law provides for that.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—The hon. gentleman is opposed to any division of profits. At present ninety per cent of the profits go every five years to the people who have paid in more than the premiums required. So long as the premiums are as high as they are at present, you must divide the profits.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—That is a point that I want to make. When you have a straight insurance policy, you pay so much per year; but with participation you pay so much more every year than is required to carry the insurance. Now the difference between your premium on a straight life policy and your premium on a participation policy goes to the insurance company. The insured would expect that they would give him back that, and when a distribution is made he thinks he is getting it back, but he does not get it back.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon, but they do get it back.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I will show in a minute that the policy-holder does not get it back. I was nearly forgetting that point, but it is a most important matter. When you pay insurance in America, you pay actually four premiums for yourself and one premium for the insurance company. In Europe you pay eight premiums for yourself and one for the insurance company. The insurance companies in America charge for administering this fund, for, after all, an insurance company is nothing but a stakeholder for a bet. The insurance company bets that you will not die before a certain time; you bet that you are going to die, and all the insurance company does is simply to hold the stake, and for holding that stake they charge you in America—I do not know exactly the amount the Canadian companies charge, but I know in the United States it is generally about eighteen to twenty-three per cent. The average is about twenty per cent and it follows that when you pay five premiums you pay four for yourself and one to have somebody hold the money for you. That is the position. In Europe, as I have said, when you pay nine premiums you pay eight for yourself and one for the company, or ten to eleven per cent for administration. Every one knows that of the first premium paid on a policy seventy-five per cent goes to the agent. In fire insurance fifteen per cent of the premium goes to the agent, and that applies to every premium paid. Of one hundred dollars paid, eighty-five dollars covers the risk; the balance goes to the company. I have no objection to agents making money, but what I am objecting to is that under the participation system you do not get back as much as you should. The company must make a profit out of the premiums charged to you. When a young man insures, his chances of life are good, and as he pays a uniform premium during his life, he must at the start pay more than is necessary to cover the risk. The insurance company in keeping their books, only charge up what he should actually pay according to his chances of life, and the difference between what he pays and what is absolutely necessary to cover him goes to the reserve, and that is how the reserve is made up. As the policy-holder advances in life, his chances of death increase, and towards the last years of his life, the amount he pays is not sufficient. Therefore, an average is struck, and it is struck high in order to cover the company.

Hon. Mr. DAVID. I have been paying premiums for the last thirty-five years. Up to about ten years ago, I paid a certain amount and since then I have been paying only half as much. What conclusion do you draw? Have I been paying the same rate from the beginning?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—The hon. gentleman must have a participation policy; but to get that participation in profits the hon. gentleman pays every year more than he would have paid on a straight life policy. If he will take the trouble to figure it out, he will find that he would have more money in his pocket now if he had paid a straight life premium on his life and put the difference between that and the premium he has been paying in a savings bank at three and a half per cent. The hon. gentleman would have more money coming to him had he done so.

Hon. Mr. OWENS—Let me give an illustration on that point. Many years ago the ex-Secretary of State and myself took out policies in a Canadian insurance company. I insured upon the straight cash principle which my hon. friend is advocating here to-day. My hon. friend (Mr. Scott), on the contrary, insured on the participation principle, the very policy which the hon. gentleman opposite is depreciating. What has been the result? I am still paying my straight premiums. The ex-Secretary of State, on the contrary, has for some time been receiving a bonus. His policy has not only been self-supporting, but he is receiving a bonus from the company. Those two policies were taken out in the Canada Life Insurance Company. Have I stated it correctly?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Yes. I am receiving a three per cent dividend on the insurance, so the hon. gentleman's philosophy will not work out.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think I can give you as good an illustration. I have been paying on the principle which the hon. gentleman has been advocating since 1860, and I have already paid a great deal more than my family will receive when I die.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Certainly. I know a gentleman in the city of Quebec who is insured for only six thousand dollars, and if he had put his premiums out at six per cent compound interest, he would have had four years ago over ninety thousand dollars. He has paid fifty-five or fifty-six premiums. If the hon. gentleman from Ottawa would be good enough to give me the amounts of the premiums he has paid, I will figure out and show that he has paid a great deal more than the hon. gentleman from Inkerman (Mr. Owens). The hon. gentleman has been fortunate in having a very long life. We all rejoice that he has, but if he will just mention the amount of his premium, and see what that would represent to-day, he will come to the conclusion that he will not get as large a proportion of what he has paid as he thinks he is getting. The first premium amounts to a very large sum. The second and third are the same—more than three or four times the amount that should be paid.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—It was the best investment I made in my life.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Let me give an illustration. I took an insurance policy on my life when I was twenty-four years old. The amount was twenty-five thousand dollars, and the term was for fifteen years. I do not remember how much I paid, but I am sure it is not half of that amount. My life was insured, and I paid premiums for fifteen years, and to-day I have a paid-up policy of twenty-five thousand dollars, and every five years I have received five per cent, except the last five years, when the company did not pay any.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—Was the hon. gentleman insured on the deferred premium plan?

Hon. Mr. FORGET—No. I paid a certain premium for fifteen years, and at the end of that time I was given a paid-up policy for twenty-five thousand dollars. I have not paid anything since, but all the profits have been added to my policy ever since.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—Suppose you had died at the end of fourteen years, what would have happened?

Hon. Mr. FORGET—I cannot say.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—His heirs would have got the twenty-five thousand dollars.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—The insurance company in which he was insured would have been very badly managed if they gave him more than he paid them.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not necessarily.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—You may be sure they give the hon. gentleman less money than he paid them. Since the cost of administration is twenty per cent, all that the hon. gentleman can possibly get back is his money less twenty per cent.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—The hon. gentleman omits the very important factor that there are lapsed policies. A very large number of people insure their lives to cover a loan or something of that kind, and when they drop the insurance the premiums they have paid go to the company. It is a large source of profit to an insurance company.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—The best form of insurance policy known is the form which obtains in some countries by which life pensions are paid and also straight insurance at death—when the two are combined in the one policy. Under that system if losses are sustained through death, certain amounts are gained by people dying before they get the benefit of the pension. Under these policies, a man at the age of fifty or fifty-five years begins to draw an annuity, if he lives. If there are a certain number of such policies held by the company and there is a certain amount of straight life, then one balancing the other furnishes the safest and best insurance. I have to thank the hon. members for the attention they have given me. I have had very little time to prepare for this discussion, but I have tried to get all the information I could gather. The French version of the Bill was only delivered to us this afternoon, and the English version I could only get on Friday. I had a glimpse of it some time ago when an insurance agent allowed me to see his copy, so I have laboured under great difficulty.

Hon. Mr. JONES—It is not my wish or intention to discuss this Bill at any considerable length at this stage, but I desire to direct the attention of the House, and the leader of the government especially, to clause 139 of the Bill relating to insurance with unlicensed fire insurance companies. That particular clause affects especially, if not exclusively, people in Canada who have sprinkled risks—probably exclusively that class of insurance. The Bill provides that people in Canada are permitted to go out of Canada and get insurance, if they find it to their advantage to do so, provided they pay the government of Canada 15 per cent on the net cost of the insurance. I am speaking altogether for myself in the remarks I am about to make; I am not authorized to speak for any one else. I do not object to the government of Canada exacting from citizens of this country who find it desirable or necessary in their own belief to go out of Canada for insurance, such sum for that insurance as will pay a fair proportion of the cost of the Insurance Department of the government. As a citizen, I think it is my duty to pay my proportion of the cost of that department, managed as it is for the general benefit of Canada. Whether I am an insurer or not, I do not object to that, and when I pay that proportion of taxation I believe I am paying practically one and a half per cent. I think it will be found if the total taxation of the insurance companies of Canada, Dominion, provincial and municipal, are added together, they will amount to about one and six tenths per cent on the net premiums collected from insurance within the Dominion. If I am correct in that, I should be wiling to pay such a sum as would be proportionate to that. Then I would be paying my proportion of what is admittedly a reasonable and fair charge. But when I am asked to pay 15 per cent of the net amount of premiums I think it is exorbitant and ought not to be exacted, because I think it will be accepted by every member of the Senate that practically every insurer in Canada who goes out of the Dominion for insurance, does so because it is to his advantage and necessary to get outside insurance. The companies in which I am interested do not go out of Canada for all their insurance; but they do go out of Canada for the insurance that covers their manufacturing plants, as do a number of other manufacturers in Canada. Up to this time there has been no mutual insurance company in Canada specially formed for the taking and handling of sprinkled risks. Some efforts have been made in that direction within the last two or three years, and with some success. One company for such purpose is, I believe, about to be established, and, doubtless, if the situation is not disturbed by legislation, we will have within a year or two one or two companies in this country dealing exclusively in that class of insurance. But it would only be possible, even with those companies, to take a very small percentage of the insurance that would offer in Canada, probably two and a half to five per cent, because there are plants in Canada where the total insurance covering the plant would exceed two million dollars, and in a number of cases at least one million dollars. Therefore, any new company would only be prepared to take a small percentage of the hundred million dollars of insurance that there is placed in Canada at the present time. Whatever proportion these men, gathered together to help each other in case of fires, could take safely they would only be able to do business if associated with companies outside of Canada. As manufacturing and other sprinkled risks grow, so would the Canadian end of such company or companies grow, and later on it would be hoped that here as in some of the older countries, there would be a considerable portion if not all of that class of insurance carried within the country. Meantime the country is too new. The risks are too few to enable a series of companies to be formed to take care of such insurance safely. The companies so insured are largely—and I am speaking specially with reference to the company known as the Senior Mutuals—in the United States. Speaking for my own companies, they insure exclusively in these American companies. Of the hundred million of insurance of that kind in Canada, my own companies had in round figures five millions of that class of insurance. It would be absolutely impossible to get that insurance in Canada at anything approaching the cost that it is at present to these companies. It would be impossible to get it in Canada without a very large cost, and with less safety than I believe surrounds it as it is.

Hon. Mr. MCMILLAN—Are you not taking a certain amount of risk yourself?

Hon. Mr. JONES—Certainly. No mutual company can be otherwise placed than as taking equal risks with others that others take with them. The whole principle is that you are rated for a certain rate on your premises, dependent upon this condition. The rate may be one half of one per cent and it may be, as it is in my own case—and I am alluding to that for the sake of illustration and nothing else—it may be two to two and a half because of certain portions of your risk which are more hazardous than others, and upon that you make your deposit and the deposit is security for the payment of any loss that occurs during the year and at the end of the year you are refunded such sum as is not required to pay losses and expenses. That is the whole principle. The Eastern Mutuals have in Canada, largely in the seniors, to some extent in the juniors say one hundred millions; but they have in round figures, I believe, about ten billions insurance. I am speaking of the eastern seniors only. They have ten billions insurance in round figures. In that lies the security that we seek for in Canada. They have been doing business for many years. They have grown from very small companies to very large companies, with very wide areas, covering the whole of the United States, part of Canada and to some extent some insurance elsewhere, but not largely. The Bill makes it possible for me to go out of Canada. How far an Act of this kind should go to prevent a man from going over to the other side of the boundary line to do some business, I do not know, but it is intended to prevent that, I do not think it is practical to carry it out, because it requires that within thirty days after taking insurance you are to advise the department. Now with large plant to cover with those policies, with instructions to the superintendents of your different plants to keep up your insurance dependent upon the stock you carry, and the fact that there are changes every month and sometimes every week —in fact there are changes every week in the year in some Canadian companies who are insured in these companies, it might not be practicable always to make returns along the lines the Bill makes it necessary, and if you do not make these returns in accordance with the Act, I suppose you would be liable to whatever penalty there is attached to it? Whatever that may be I do not know. Beyond that, the Bill further makes it necessary that each and every such unlicensed company—that is these foreign companies—shall furnish to the superintendent at the request of the superintendent, and not later than a certain named day, a statement duly verified in such manner as the Superintendent of Insurance directs, showing at the end of the last financial year of such insurer the total assets and total liabilities of such insurer, the total amount at risk and also the liabilities and amount of risk in Canada, the total income, total expenses and total amount paid for losses during its last preceding financial year, etc.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—They would not conform to that.

Hon. Mr. JONES—No, they would not conform to that. They will not conform to such laws from any state in the Union. It is well known to those who seek insurance in that class that they have absolutely refused always to conform to that, and every state in the Union knows that if they pass laws exacting from these companies just such a restriction as this would place upon such companies, such companies will not go there for insurance, and the manufacturer in that state are just in the position we would be under this legislation. We would be outside the range of that class of insurance. I do not think it was the intention of the government to put it beyond our reach, but to bring it within the reach of the subject. It would destroy the possibility of carrying out this insurance if the provision as drawn here were adopted. It would be impossible for those companies to comply. There are to many companies; they are too big, and it would not pay them to undertake to do it. An amount not exceeding three and a half or four per cent of the total business of these insurance companies is done in Canada, and our business is not important to them. I have discussed the question with them many times, and they say frankly 'We will be glad to have that insurance if it comes to us, but we would not turn our hand over to bring it to us, and we would not turn our hand to get it from any state in the Union that legislates against this class of insurance.' It has been so tremendously beneficial to the great manufacturing interests of the United States, the insurance that comes to them is so ample and the cost of insurance so cheap, that they will not change their plans to adapt themselves to any condition that may arise outside of the business as they are conducting it, and so meantime while anticipating that this feature of the Bill will receive that careful consideration —and I know it will—in the committee, and then having the assurance from the hon. leader of the House that when it comes back to the House we will have an opportunity to discuss it in committee if we desire, I do not wish to take up the further time of the House by illustrating the position in which this Bill would place the large manufacturing and business interests in Canada. The responsibility of asking that these details be furnished by foreign companies, with whom Canadian interests have obtained insurance is, I presume, by the department, for the purpose of deciding whether we are warranted in going out of the country to get this insurance and whether we are safe. There are conditions in which the safety of the companies is important, but I think the government could agree that with the class of insurers who go out, representing principally the larger companies and individuals with large business, that it would be reasonably safe to leave such corporations and individuals to manage their own business in their own way, and that probably we would get along with reasonable success if they do not burden us with conditions and contingencies beyond what it would be fair that we as Canadians should bear. Speaking for myself, I want no advantage over any other Canadian in regard to insurance or in any other regard. I want to be left alone to manage my own business in my own way, so long as I am not doing it against the best interests of the country in which I live, and everything being equal I desire to get within the country what I want; but if it is necessary, in order to be successful, to go out of the country to get what I want, I hope that privilege will be granted also, and that I will not be unduly taxed for the privilege.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I had not intended to speak at this stage of the Bill. It was announced that the Bill would be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, and that it would afterwards come before this House and be discussed in Committee of the Whole. I should have thought the more opportune time would be to wait until the Bill is in Committee of the Whole, or before the Banking and Commerce Committee. However, as the hon. gentleman from de Lanaudiere (Mr. Casgrain) has offered some remarks on the measure with which I cannot agree, I am bound to say a word or two. He first took exception to the fact that the Lloyds system of insurance was not acknowledged by government. He is mistaken in that, because if he refers to clause 12 of the Bill he will find that it will be permissible to effect insurance with Lloyds as has been done heretofore. That clause reads in this way:

12. Except as in this section provided, no license shall be granted to any individual underwriter or underwriters to carry on any kind of insurance business: Provided that associations of individuals formed upon the plan known as Lloyds, whereby each associate underwriter becomes liable for a proportionate part of the whole amount insured by a policy, may be authorized to transact insurance other than life insurance in Canada in like manner and upon the same terms and conditions as insurance companies; such associations to be in all respects subject to the provisions of this Act, except that the statements required by this Act to be filed in the office of the superintendent may be verified in such manner as the superintendent shall direct and prescribe.

We see, therefore, that under clause 12 it is intended to allow the insurance to be effected with Lloyds or all partnerships or associations of underwriters organized under the Lloyds system; and if we turn to the definition as found in clause 2, subclause c, we find that the word 'company,' as defined, means any corporation or any society or association, incorporated or unincorporated, or any corporation carrying on the business of insurance. It is in order to admit it. Therefore, we may take it for granted that the purpose of the Bill, as framed, is to permit the continuation of insurance under Lloyds system. However, as far as I am at present informed—which is not stating a great deal—I am under the impression that clause 12 of the Bill is a very crude way of introducing Lloyd's system into our country. No doubt the Superintendent of Insurance, who is an expert in the matter and will probably be heard before the committee, will enlighten me on the subject. It seems to me at present that it is a system which had rendered good service in Great Britain because of their usages and customs, but of late years a number of underwriters' associations have been formed by United States people even in England under that system, and if I am properly informed it does not offer the proper guarantee that insurers should provide for the public, and one suggestion that I propose to make, is as to whether additional safeguards should not be introduced as regards this system of insurance; not that I am against the system, but I think it should be accomplished with the proper guarantee.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—With regard to Lloyds, they would have to come under the Bill; they would have to make a deposit and be under the control of the department.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Oh, no. If my hon. friend will look at the Bill he will find that they are not called upon to make any deposit, and the system itself is against that. It is simply the underwriting of the risk. It is done by the broker, and it is divided amongst a number of persons who are individually responsible each for their share alone. If there is a loss, every member of the association participates in the loss, but only to the extent to which he has agreed to participate.

Hon. Mr. JONES—Is the hon. gentleman referring to clause 12 or 139?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Clause 12. Clause 139 does not refer to that at all. It is referring to the industrial mutuals. Lloyds are subject to this Bill, but they are not called upon to make a deposit.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Oh, yes, they are.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I speak subject to correction. The hon. gentleman has taken exception to the Tontine system, and the deferred premium system, and the participation in profits. For my part I cannot agree with him, and I find he is much more radical than the extreme radicals themselves. I hold in my hand the report of the Joint Committee of the Senate and Assembly of the State of New York, a well known committee, the Armstrong Committee, and I find on referring to page 357 the remedial legislation which that committee suggested, and I do not find that they attempted to criticise at all in any shape or form that system of insurance.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—In the state of New York is a company, under the Armstrong Bill, allowed to do participation business and straight policy business also?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I think so.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Read the Bill.

Hon. Mr. SWEENEY—I do not think the hon. gentleman will find it in the Armstrong Bill.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The Armstrong Commission attempted to criticise all the abuses which have crept into the United States insurance companies, and I find a number of subjects enumerated, as follows. Control or the rights of policy-holders in he election of directors. Retirement of stock. Investments, including syndicate participations, limitation of new business, political contributions, lobbying, limitation of expenses, valuation of policies, rebates, surrender values, ascertainment and distribution of surplus, remedies of policyholders or right to resort to the courts, forms of policies, publicity and state supervision, penalties. But I find, although they have attempted to exhaust the cases where abuses have crept in, no reference at all to that system, no exception taken to that system of policy, and it is well known hat that system of policy is intended to be mainly a way of investing one's money. Of course with the additional risk in case of death portion of the profits will inure to the survivor; but I do not see that it has anything to do with lotteries, which have been alluded to by the hon. gentleman, and I do not think, for my part, that that system of insurance deserves condemnation. At any rate, the present Bill does not deal with that at all. The only remark I desire to add is in connection with what has been very properly stated by the hon. gentleman from Toronto, the Industrial Mutuals. I notice that the Bill as presented to the Senate, and as passed by the House of Commons last session, did not go as far at all as was originally intended when the measure was presented in the House of Commons last session as regards these companies. It was first intended to prevent any business being transacted with them. The Bill was amended, and it is coming to us that any Canadian will be allowed to effect insurance with them provided he pays a certain tax on the amount of premium which he shall have paid. For my part I believe that Canadian companies should be given an advantage. I believe that we should try to keep our money in the country as much as possible; but we must be reasonable. We must not go too far. From the knowledge I have of these Industrial Mutuals they have rendered a very great service to industries in Canada; they have been the means of protecting property and preventing the destruction of property to a very large extent. They were organized at the outset under a system of proper supervision, which exacts that the property insured shall be fully protected by sprinklers and in other ways, and they have estblished a first class inspection staff, which watches the insured all the time and insists on the insured keeping his property fully protected. It has been the means of decreasing immensely the loss of property by fire; to that extent these mutual companies are public benefactors, and they should be treated accordingly. They have shown an example to the straight life insurance companies. Those companies have had to adopt their system to a certain extent within the last five years, and have succeeded in reducing the premiums very considerably. I understand that one can now effect insurance at as low a rate as fifteen cents. That is not in Canada I understand.

Hon. Mr. JONES—Will the hon. gentleman say upon what the insurance would be taken at fifteen cents? Would it be water or dirt, or on something that could burn up?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I am speaking from the evidence. I have glanced over the evidence which was adduced before the Committee of the House of Commons last year, and in that evidence I read the statement of the manager of some insurance company who stated that they were taking a risk at that rate, but I think it was admitted that all the risks could not be placed at that rate. For instance, it was stated by Mr. Greenshields, of Montreal, that a large amount of insurance that they were unable to place with Canadian companies, had to go to the United States, and one very striking example was given. A very large fire occurred. The evening before they had to place three hundred thousand dollars insurance, and they had to place it with those companies, and if they had not been able to place it very quickly, they would have lost the amount. I agree with the remarks made by the hon. gentleman from de Lanaudière, that the present Bill in regard to this point and also many other points should receive close attention from this honourable House.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I had the pleasure of putting a question to the hon. gentleman, and I have the book before me now. This is the report of the Joint Committee of the Senate and Assembly of the State of New York appointed to investigate insurance matters. At page 29 we find the following:

Non-participating Policies.

The committee believes that mutual companies and stock companies chartered to transact business on the mutual plan or holding themselves out as transacting business upon this basis, should be forbidden from writing non-participating policies.

The writing of non-participating policies by these companies must almost necessarily result in an injustice. If premiums are charged at a rate lower than the actual cost of carrying the insurance, including a fair share of expenses, it is an imposition upon the other policy-holders who must contribute to pay the difference. If, on the other hand, the premiums are at a rate higher than that demanded by the cost of carrying the insurance, the excess is without excuse and those who take the policies are overcharged and are deprived of the returns to which they are entitled. In short, the non-participating policy issued by a company doing business upon the mutual plan can be justified only upon the supposition that the exact results of the business can be foreseen and the premium adjusted accordingly. This, of course, is an impossibility. The business of companies conducted upon the mutual plan should be exclusively mutual.

I know of a large insurance company in Canada, which, on account of the Armstrong Bill, was not permitted to transact both straight policy and participating policy business, has therefore withdrawn altogether from doing business in the State of New York. That is one of the oldest insurance companies doing business in Canada.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The hon. gentleman spoke altogether outside of the question that was put to me. The question put to me was, if an insurance company was allowed to do a Tontine business, and I said yes. Now he is referring to a passage which says that mutual insurance companies will not be allowed to do that kind of insurance. That is another question altogether.

Hon. Mr. JONES—Is it the intention of the Bill that insurance companies reinsuring in companies not registered in Canada shall be prevented from effecting such reinsurance, or will that class of insurance be permitted under the Bill?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I cannot speak positively on that point. I think the intention is to permit them to do so.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understood from remarks made by the leader of the House when introducing this Bill, that the clause in reference to charges, to which the hon. gentleman has taken very serious objection, has been a good deal modified, that in fact the amount to be paid by either the insured or the foreign insurance companies is on a graduated scale.

Hon. Mr. JONES—The modification is set out in the clause of the Bill to which he refers.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The fifteen per cent is not applicable under the circumstances. The question is whether foreign insurance companies who take fire risks should be allowed to do business in Canada without any of the restrictions that are imposed upon local companies. That is the point that I think parliament has to decide, and the only point which we in Canada ought properly to consider. I can understand very well that the hon. gentleman should say 'I have a right to secure insurance wherever I can obtain it cheapest, and where I believe I will be most secure.' That is a proposition which, on the face of it, is very reasonable. The same principle would apply in dealing in any article—one should be allowed to apply the free trade principle, and buy the article where he thinks he can get it cheapest and most to his advantage. The question may be put in this way: If a duty is imposed upon an article manufactured in another country, not for protective purposes, but for the purposes of revenue, why should not the foreign insurance company be subject to the same imposition for revenue purposes as home companies which have to pay a license and make a deposit before they can carry on their business, besides being subject to municipal and provincial taxation? I see no difference between the two cases. Whether the imposition is too large or not is a question to be considered. If I understand the leader of the House when he introduced this Bill, the leader of the Senate pointed out that the intention was to so modify that clause as not to make it too onerous on those who desired the large insurance to which my hon. friend calls attention. The hon. member from St. Thomas (Mr. Wilson) objects to the Bill providing for representation of the policy-holders of a company on the directorate. There is a strong argument in favour of that policy. The policy-holders who pay a larger sum for their insurance than those who take a straight life policy, should have something to say about the manner in which the profits are to be distributed. We know that the law provides for the distribution of ninety per cent of the profits among the policy-holders. Only ten per cent can be divided among the shareholders of the company. The policy-holders may desire to have representation on the board to see that the profits of the company are not squandered in the way of salaries or otherwise. That is one reason why the policy-holders should have some claim to representation. I may say, however, that the clause as it stands would hardly be practicable. I do not propose to discuss the point just now. That can be done in committee. The restrictions placed upon the voters who have the power to elect and constitute the board of directors, are of such a character when applied to the policy-holders as to make it almost impracticable, and the proportion of the policy-holders on the board is unnecessarily large. The open question to which my hon. friend has called attention, as to whether a certain class of policies should be abolished, is one which I do not propose to discuss just now. I may say, however, that if the participating policy principle be abolished it would be infinitely better for the shareholders. They would have a greater proportion of the profits put in their pockets. However, I must confess I do not quite agree with the hon. gentleman on that point. The hon. gentleman rather cast a reflection on the leader of the opposition when he called attention to the proposition to adjourn this question until to-day. The hon. member was uncharitable. He forgets that a moment before, he had informed my hon .friend who complained that we had not business enough, that if the House would attend to business and give it due consideration there would be enough to do. Now, my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Casgrain) has enlightened the House with a long and very interesting discussion on the origin of life insurance companies. I want to call his attention to this fact that this measure has been before parliament for three years and yet my hon. friend who now takes so much interest in it, requires another year or two before he can decide what legislation should take place. I was led to this conclusion that if the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Casgrain) in the few minutes that he had coming up on the train, could prepare such an elaborate address, there is no telling what he might do if he had time to prepare himself. There are many clauses in this Bill which require careful consideration. I admit that no measure of greater importance has come before parliament for many years. It affects a very large number of people and many millions of money, and the more perfect the measure we place upon the statute-book to secure the policy-holders the better it will be for the country.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN moved that the debate be adjourned until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

THE SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, November 24, 1909.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

BANKING AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE.

FIRST REPORT ADOPTED.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON, from the Committee on Banking and Commerce, presented their first report, recommending that their quorum be reduced to nine members, and moved concurrence in the report.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I should like to know why we should suspend our rules and concur in that in that report to-day?

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—It is simply a question of reducing the quorum, and it is desirable to adopt the report in order to facilitate proceedings and enable the committee to get to work.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is merely a formal report.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—It is desired to press the Insurance Bill, and it is proposed to refer it to that committee. The feeling in the country is that we should proceed slowly with that measure and the only object in adopting this report now is to enable the committee to deal with the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The Insurance Bill will be in the hands of the House, and it will not be referred to the committee until it has been sufficiently discussed.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There is no reason why we should rush this matter through.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is not rushing it. It is purely a formal motion.

The SPEAKER—As it is a formal motion I think it might be concurred in.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not know whether it is a formal matter. It refers to the reduction of the quorum. It does not say who is to be chairman, etc., I do not see that it is quite so formal as some hon. gentlemen seem to think.

The SPEAKER—It appears to me that it is really after all a formal report as far as it goes, and, therefore, it is open to the House to deal with it without further notice.

The motion was agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY AND CONTINGENT ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

FIRST REPORT ADOPTED.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON presented the first report of the Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts, recommending that the quorum be reduced to nine members, and moved concurrence therein.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Some hon. members may have an objection to these reports, and I think we should have time to study them before they receive the sanction of the House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Paragraph (s) of rule 25, referring to motions in regard to which notice may be dispensed with, reads:

> Other motions of a merely formal or non-contentious character, etc.

It has never been contended that these motions were anything else but formal matters.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is a report from the committee and it may be contentious, but in its present form nobody can say whether it is contentious or is not contentious.

Hon. Mr. POWER—To the ordinary mortal, the adoption of these reports is a non-contentious matter.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If I wanted to amend the report, would be contentious?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Certainly it would.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I have a right to make a motion to amend it, and I have a right to say that this report shall not be received now because it does not relate to what took place in that committee. There was a motion made to elect a chairman. Nothing of the kind is reported to this House. A second motion was made to reduce the quorum to a certain number, and that has been reported to the House, but the first step is not mentioned. I say that this report is a subject of contention as it is brought before us, and nobody can say that it is not.

The SPEAKER—I think this is really a formal matter, and not a matter which is contentious. It has been the practice of the House to adopt such reports. On looking through the reports I have not found a single instance where there has been any difficulty or any reference back on this point. It seems to me, therefore, that the consistent way is to consider it and treat it as not contentious.

The CHAIRMAN—I asked for a ruling.

The SPEAKER—I have given a ruling—that it is not contentious.

The motion was agreed to.

FRENCH EDITION OF THE RULES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the orders of the day are called, I should like to inquire if any progress has been made in the translation or publication of the French edition of the rules of this House? For nearly three years I have been asking for these rules; perhaps before we die the French edition may be supplied to members.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The translation and printing are complete, and the manuals are now being bound and will shortly be delivered.

DEFECTIVE LIGHT IN THE CHAMBER.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—Before the orders of the day are called, I should like to direct your attention to the defective lighting of this building. I am an old man, but I can read very well if I have proper light. Younger men than myself are complaining of the defective lighting of this chamber.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I hope the chairman of the new Committee on Public Buildings will give immediate attention to this question. The light in the chamber is very defective, and the chairman of that committee would do well if he would endeavour to have better light supplied.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I promise the hon. gentlemen that I shall take the matter into my serious consideration.

INSURANCE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The order of the day being called.

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion for the second reading of Bill (a) An Act respecting Insurance.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN said: When I moved the adjournment of the debate yesterday, it was more for the purpose of giving members who were detained by the storm on their way from Toronto to Ottawa an opportunity to be present and take part in this discussion than with the object of making a speech myself. I am not in a position to be able to discuss this Bill at any length. I know it is one of the most important measures that could be possibly brought before us. It has been in the House of Commons for two years, and it could not be recognized in its present shape as the Bill originally introduced, it has been so frequently recast. I have not been able to study its provisions carefully, but I wish to take exception to one clause which, in my judgment, requires very serious consideration. That clause provides for representation of the policy-holders on the Board of Directors. The amended Bill proposes that two-fifths of the board shall represent the policy-holders, and three-fifths the stockholders. I think it is also the intention of the Bill that the policy-holders shall have a right to attend the annual meeting and take part in the business of that meeting and vote upon the motion to adopt the report submitted, and generally take part in all the proceedings. If that is the case, I fear that very serious complications may arise. There are cranks in all organizations, and policy-holders may, if they choose, and if they are put up to it by some that are disposed to take exception to what the board proposes to do, be able to get a sufficient number of proxies along with those held by the policy-holders attending the meeting personally, to upset the whole proceedings as recommended by the board, to recast the report, to reduce perhaps the interest allowed to stock-holders and generally to deal with the matters that are included in the annual report.

Take, for instance, a company with a million dollars stock subscribed and paid up. That would be ten thousand shares of $100 each. Then suppose that company has fifteen or twenty thousand policies upon which a sufficient sum has been paid to enable the policy-holder either to appear personally at the annual meeting or to give a proxy to some policy-holder to appear for him, you can easily see how such a volume of policy-holders could be secured by personal attendance or by proxy as would completely swamp the stockholders and subvert any proceeding or matter submitted to the annual meeting. Is that the object of the Bill? I cannot think that it is, but from my simple reading of its provisions, that condition might possibly be brought about. Those who were present and took part in the investigation that was held by a committee of this House, with regard to the New York Mutual Reserve Life Company will remember that the destruction of that company was brought about by securing proxies. Mr. Burnham, the president, held some 40,000 proxies, by which he was able to elect whoever he chose as directors of that company, and he elected, no doubt, those who were in sympathy with himself, and they elected him as president of the company. Mr. Eldridge, his co-partner in that institution, was also the holder of proxies, and he was hand in glove with Mr. Burnham. The company was ruined by that simple fact of allowing proxies to be handled by those who were interested to their own personal advantage. Now, we should guard against such a vicious principle. If policy-holders are permitted to take part in the annual meeting and to vote for the adoption of the report, I certainly think they should be required to do so personally, and not by proxy; proxies should not be permitted, because it opens the way for schemers who are prepared to precipitate the destruction of a company to take advantage, if they are so disposed, and are willing to do the work necessary to enable them to do so. That is a provision of the Bill that I hope full consideration will be given to when it comes before the committee, and that some necessary amendments will be made. I do not know whether I am correct in my opinion that such a condition might arise under the Bill as it stands, but I am under the impression that it could. If that is the case, this provision should certainly be amended.

With regard to fire insurance, I listened with great interest to the remarks made by the hon. gentleman from Toronto last evening. He made a very strong and pointed argument on behalf of large manufacturing institutions in this country, which, of course, are quite anxious, and justly so, to secure the very best insurance they can get, and at the lowest possible price. I sympathize with that view to some extent; but if we have insurance companies doing business under license in Canada which are prepared to give those institutions the security and the insurance they require, and if they have the financial strength that would justify those seeking insurance to put their confidence and their risk in their hands, our Canadian companies should get the business. They live in our country, and pay rent, perhaps, or they pay taxes. They are citizens here, and we should see that they get a fair chance of living as against foreign competition. The other insurance companies outside do not contribute anything to the revenue of the country or to the revenue of the town, or city or anything else. It would certainly be a hardship if our manufacturing institutions could not get the class and character of insurance they want, that would be at the same time reliable, and that such companies should be, beyond all question, financially strong. If manufacturers cannot obtain such insurance in Canada, they should not be crippled by being prevented from going outside. We should, however, give our home companies the first opportunity of transacting the business if they are in a position to do it. Let us, when we get the Bill before the committee, give the matter our best and most serious consideration, and if it is to become law, let us try and have as perfect a Bill as the business men of this Senate and the other Chamber can place upon the statute books of the country. It is very desirable because it affects two of the most vital interests, life and fire insurance. They are exceedingly important. The whole country is interested, and therefore we should see that our legislation is based on sound principles of justice.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middlesex)—I concur in the view expressed by the hon. gentleman from Montreal with regard to the propriety of the Senate devoting considerable attention to this question before the Bill is referred to the committee. The expression of opinion from members of the Senate may be useful in guiding the deliberations of the committee, and although as a member of that committee I might properly keep silent, because I will hear what is to be said on both sides of the question later, yet I think it proper at the present time to offer a few observations. In the first place, I think we are indebted to the superintendent of insurance and to the member of the government who had this Bill in charge, for the evident care and solicitude exercised by them in ascertaining what were the views of the insurance companies, insurance experts and the public generally, as to legislation such as is now proposed, and I think it is very desirable, when we have settled the provisions of the Bill in this House that the understanding should be, as in the case of the Banking Act, that for some years the law should remain without further amendments, and the care and attention which has been given to this Bill is to some extent a guarantee that once it is settled, it will be settled for some considerable time at least. I do not know myself that the occasion for such legislation was very urgent, yet I suppose it is well that we should consolidate or codify the legislation on such an important question. The Bill naturally arose out of the investigations of the commission which was held a few years ago, said commission having been granted in response to a general feeling of insecurity and unrest in Canada in regard to insurance matters. That insecurity was largely owing to disclosures before what was known as the Armstrong Commission in New York. It is very gratifying to the people of Canada to know that there were no disclosures before the commission issued in this country which to any perceptible extent discredited the insurance companies of Canada. A few irregularities, of course, occurred, as I think would have been disclosed in any inquisitorial investigation in regard to any corporation or number of corporations, had an investigation similar to that been held with regard to them. I am not reflecting on other corporations when I say that. I doubt if there are any corporations in Canada or series of corporations that would have gone through a better test than the insurance companies went through during the course of that prolonged investigation. Another gratifying circumstance in connection with our insurance companies is, that when the record was found to be on the whole very good, their financial standing has never been called in question. Although, as I stated in the House some days ago, since confederation 22 banks failed, not one insurance company has failed, and that shows that the directorate of those insurance companies as well as the legislation by which they are hedged and surrounded have contributed to their security and their financial status.

One objection which, in general terms, I may take to this Bill is its paternal character. We may meddle too much with corporations, as we may meddle too much with the liberty of individuals. In England, there is far less legislation with regard to companies and particularly with regard to their investments. The companies are held responsible for their investments. The investments they are authorized to make are not particularized as they are in this Bill. The same way with regard to the limitation of directors, and reports to be made annually and semi-annually, and a number of details. It ought to be assumed, and the history of insurance companies would justify the assumption, that the directors of an insurance company are worthy of considerable trust. They have shown themselves worthy of that trust in days gone by, and I would deprecate what would appear to be unnecessary interference or restriction in the way of legislation which might hamper their operations and probably interfere with their success. The insurance companies of Canada carry liabilities to the amount of seven hundred million dollars. For these liabilities the directorate is responsible. Our banks carry very large liabilities, about same amounts in deposits, with investments on capital account of about ninety odd millions, and yet banks are not hampered by as many restrictions as are the insurance companies. Banks are entrusted with greater liberty, and, as the records show, banks have not been more successful in their administration than the insurance companies have been. I mention these facts to indicate that while I favour legislation with regard to insurance companies I should like that legislation to be made reasonable, and not too exacting. Boards of directors are men of standing, and the presidents of our insurance companies, as a whole, rank about as high as the presidents of our banks. The managers of insurance companies are men of well tried capacity and ability, and a little confidence should be placed in the judgment, discretion, honour and standing of those officers. Another objection I have to that Bill is its mixed character. I was hoping that in the various amendments to the Bill, before it reached the Senate, there would be a subdivision of responsibility. Now this Bill is a curious combination of responsibility and trust. It not only deals with life insurance companies, but it deals with all sorts of companies, with fire insurance, guarantee, accident, plate glass, steam boiler, inland transportation, insurance, sickness, sprinkler leakage insurance, bond insurance, automobile insurance, and industrial insurance. In our legislation it is well to differentiate as far as possible between subjects that are cognate and those that are not. I would very much favour, if the committee of the Senate would so agree, and it could be easily carried out, that this Bill instead of being one should be two, or so divided into parts that each part would be distinct in itself. I would divide the Bill into two classes of insurance, those that deal with life, and those that deal with property. In life insurance I would include accident policies, and with fire insurance I would classify in a general way all other kinds of insurance mentioned in this Bill. Now why do I make such a suggestion? Because it would simplify very much comprehension of the measure. Life insurance has its own field, entirely distinct from fire and property insurance. In this Bill, there are provisions for reports which life insurance companies must make, and a different kind of reports for fire insurance companies. In running through the Bill, you find in almost every alternate clause matters pertaining to life mixed with matters pertaining to fire. In the matter of life insurance, it is most important that the agents should be informed as to the provisions in this Act. If this were an Act distinct in itself, agents could be supplied with a simple copy of the law pertaining to life insurance alone. In the interpretation of the law, there would be greater simplicity, fewer interpretation clauses, and there would not be that mixing and confusion necessarily arising from the cause I have indicated. That is a suggestion for the Committee on Banking and Commerce, the adoption of which, I think, would not involve a great deal of trouble. It would greatly simplify the Bill, and would be of great value to companies both life and fire, and valuable also to agents of those companies as enabling them to better understand what the law is, and in presenting the law to those with whom they may try to negotiate business. Nobody can be an efficient agent who has not a full knowledge of the law affecting insurance. These agents are laymen, and we should simplify the law so that they would understand it almost as well as a lawyer. We have a law dealing entirely with railways, a law dealing with public health, a law dealing with customs. We have municipal laws in Ontario, laws relating to boards of health, &c. These statutes are in themselves complete, as a rule, just as the Criminal Code is complete in itself, and every layman and lawyer will appreciate the great value to Canada of a criminal code such as we have to-day. Our insurance law is as important as the Criminal Code. We are dealing with an immense amount of property. It would not involve very material expense to greatly simplify the law, and it is a matter to which we might properly call the attention of the committee. That is my first suggestion. I would call attention to two or three peculiarities of the Bill which are worthy of consideration. In the first place, take clause 32, which deals with returns from Canada and foreign companies. A Canadian company has to make a return to the government of any foreign state in which it does business, and unless the representatives of that state are permitted to examine the books of the Canadian company not only as to business done in that state, but as to all its business, a Canadian company is liable to forfeit its license. We should exact a similar condition in dealing with foreign companies doing business in Canada. They are only required to report in detail as to the business they do in Canada. Their other business may be of such an unsafe and shakey character as to discredit their whole financial standing. Whatever duty or obligation is imposed by a foreign country on Canadian companies should be similarly imposed on foreign companies doing business in Canada. Our companies should not be placed at any disadvantage. Many Canadian companies are reaching out to the United States, Great Britain, and countries beyond the sea; why place our companies at a disadvantage in competing with British or foreign companies doing business in Canada? As one of the paternal obligations imposed on our companies, they are required to make annual returns of the business done, and semi-annual returns with regard to all their investments. Now that is quite unnecessary. An annual return, coupled with an annual inspection by the superintendent of insurance, ought to be sufficient. Why do I make this objection? For this reason. That it involves an immense amount of labour and expense on the part of the company. One of the objects of this Bill is to reduce the cost of insurance so that the profits of the participating policy-holders and of the company may be enhanced. Every obligation imposed on a company that is not necessary—and I think this is one that is not necessary—increases the expense, and consequently decreases the profits in which the shareholders participate. I know a case where an insurance company required three or four clerks to be almost fully occupied for five or six weeks in preparing a return somewhat similar to that involved in this Bill. This is an expense which, if necessary, should be assumed and if unnecessary should be abolished. Another objection is that in the case of rebates while the agents and directors of the life insurance companies are penalized for rebates which they may grant, there is no penalty imposed on agents of the fire insurance companies for rebating. This restriction with regard to rebates is on the principle already indicated, that is, to reduce the expenses of the company and avoid unreasonable and unjustifiable competition between companies. I think it is fair in the case of life insurance companies to penalize rebating, and a similar course should be pursued with regard to fire insurance companies. Then I come to a very perplexing question, the quinquennial distribution of profits. Participating policy-holders now receive such proportion of the profits as may be arranged in the contract. Here it is proposed that the profits shall be distributed to the policy-holders quinquennially. The reason I suppose for that provision is that, in the United States, when there was no quinquennial distribution of profits they accumulated, and then there was a large sum in the hands of the directors with which they speculated, and in some cases they lost, to the great injury of the company. The quinquennial distribution of profits is supposed to get over that difficulty. But a new difficulty is created; you have companies that issue participating policies, and companies that do not. The difficulty here is how to distribute the expenses of a company of one class, say with the expenses of one that issues policies to which no profits are attached. What system of bookkeeping can be devised by which this may be fairly and honestly done, is something I cannot understand. Perhaps we will have more light on it in committee. Then we have deferred profits. This is not such a difficult problem as the other; but in the case of deferred profits a company is supposed to be liable for those profits at the option of the policy-holder, and here a difficulty arises. A company has a surplus. That surplus is disposed of quinquennially. At the end of the first quinquennial period, a company may have done a large amount of business and have a considerable surplus. That surplus becomes a liability. But during the following quinquennial term, suppose there is a loss, what is the company to do? In regard to the quinquennial distribution of the surplus, you find the company in this position; whereas in one period it may have a surplus and have to distribute the money, it is not able to keep a margin to protect the company against a quinquennial period in which there may be no surplus. In large banks and other companies, where profits are distributed, the practice is not to distribute all the surplus, but to carry something over for profit and loss account, so that they can make up for a lean year by drawing something from the surplus of a prosperous year. If some such provision could be made in our Insurance Bill, I think it would be only just to the directors and the policy-holders, These are two or three points which occurred to me in looking over the Bill up to clause 98 to which my friend from Wellington has referred so pointedly, that is the clauses which provide for the election of policy-holders to the board. I have very strong objections to that provision of the Bill. In the first place, I do not think it is demanded by anybody. It is a sop to Cerberus, if there be a Cerberus. It is a surrender to what is supposed to be a demand on the part of the policy-holders that they may be represented on the board. The hon. member from Hastings (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell), struck the nail very pointedly on the head, as he usually does, when he referred to this matter yesterday. There is no adverse interest between the policy-holder and the shareholder. If the shareholder makes ten dollars for himself he makes ninety dollars for the policy-holder. That is, if there is any profit he shares to that extent. If the shareholder has any profits to distribute, he can only take ten per cent and give ninety per cent to the policy-holder. Whether the policy-holder is provided for in the Bill or not, he is absolutely protected by that mode of distribution, and it is not necessary that he should be represented on the board for the purpose of protection. It has been said that if he is not on the board there may be increases of salaries, bad investments, &c.; but the shareholder, who is primarily interested, will see, and is perhaps most interested in seeing that there shall be no undue increase of salaries, and that the expenses shall not be run up to such a point that he cannot have a dividend. The policy-holder is safe in any case; his interests are protected. If the company fails, the shareholder loses all his investment; but, as the law now stands, the policy-holder is fully protected. The shareholder has to run his risk. There is no necessity for representation of the policy-holders on the board. Their interests are guarded by the reserve under the law, and by the fact that they stand on the same plane as the shareholder in the distribution of profits. The shareholder who has put his money into the business is more interested in the success of the company than the policy-holder who has no investment. This is my general objection to the proposition. My second objection is that it is forcing on the companies that for which the policy-holders of the company might not apply themselves. I would have no objection to a provision in the law whereby on the petition of a certain percentage of the policy-holders, say 25 per cent of those holding $2,000 or upwards, the board of directors should be required to pass a by-law giving them certain representation. That is if the policy-holders of any company felt uneasy as to the status of the company and thought there was mismanagement, or that their securities were not adequate, they could petition the directorate and require the directorate to give them certain representation. Two-fifths is too high; twenty per cent would be better than the proposition in the Bill, but if there is no demand for it, why provide a course of procedure for a company in regard to which every policy-holder appears to be satisfied—a course of procedure which may upset to a certain extent the whole policy of the company and perhaps interfere with its usefulness? I am not saying that a policy-holder might not be as well qualified to sit on the board as a shareholder; but you are introducing a new principle, and you are doing that, not at the request of the company or the shareholders, for I know of no company that wants it, or a policy-holder who has asked it. You are thus forcing on perhaps an unwilling constituency legislation for which there is no demand. The policy of parliament is on petition to remove a grievance. You are assuming there is a grievance or inadequate representation. Notwithstanding the successful management of our companies, and the fact that companies pay dividends and policy-holders are secured by law—you are forcing on them a condition of things for which there is no demand. Any company can place a representative of the policy-holders on its board if it chooses, and I know of cases where it is done. Give them some liberty; do not force legislation on them which may not be agreeable to them, and which may be distasteful to them. But if you think it is absolutely necessary to protect the policy-holders in that way, let the party who is to be protected make the first move himself and say 'I know that my interests in such and such a company are not secure,' and I am asking my fellow policy-holders to the extent of twenty-five per cent to join with me and get representation.' That is one way of meeting the difficulty. Another way would be to require that the shareholders should, of their own motion, appoint a certain proportion of the directors without election by the policy-holders. That would be a simple and inexpensive system. If you are to elect policy-holders by vote, you have to go to the expense of sending out proxies, which would be a considerable expense, for some companies have shareholders in every part of the world, and you would have to send for proxies to all the ends of the earth. This would involve delay and considerable expense; but if the shareholders elect say nine members to the board—taking that as a basis, they might in addition to the nine members of their own class, elect also three policy-holders. They would decide which policy-holders would be best qualified to sit on the board, and you would get a better board in that way probably than by a proxy election of policy-holders. Again, election by proxies would enable agents to form a combination which might not be in the interests of the company. Discontented agents might say 'we will get control of these proxies and elect A. to the board. He will be a thorn in the flesh and general handyman at the board to see that things go wrong.' You may in that way introduce an element of contention which will be injurious to the work of the insurance companies, without doing any good. That is my general objection to that clause regarding policy-holders acting as directors, but there is another objection which I wish to raise, and that is, there is a restriction on the officers of the board who may be directors. The clause says that the manager may be a director, but that no agent or paid officer of the company may be a director. Now, who is wiser and more capable to judge as to how a board should be directed than men who have their money invested in it and manage the business? Are they better qualified, or is this hon. House which is sitting in judgment on a mode of procedure with which no substantial fault has ever been found? I would leave it to the board to say whether a doctor, for instance, who is under a salary as medical officer should be on the board or not. I know a company in which the doctor, who is a very large shareholder and also a director, whose assistance, I confess and acknowledge, is invaluable to that company. You say you could get his assistance outside the board. Why place him under a ban? He has his money invested in the stock of the company, and as a medical adviser his position is doubly important, first to guard his own investments, second to guard the applicants or the standing of the applicants who may submit themselves for the acceptance of the board. You disqualify him from that position for no reason. No evidence has been submitted to show that such an officer has been derelict in his duty. I cannot understand why you disqualify a doctor and would not disqualify a manager. Has he any more interest in the success of the board? He may not hold a dollar's worth of stock in the company. Has he any more interest in its success than the doctor or lawyer or some other paid officer? If you are going to disqualify one, disqualify all. Why tie up companies in matters which are purely of detail—as to which, of course, they are quite as able, or probably better able to judge than those of us who have no experience in these institutions? The next point to which I want to refer is to the restrictions upon investments. I can quite understand that it is wise that companies who hold such large amounts in trust for widows and orphans as is usually carried, should not be allowed too great liberty in their investment. As I said at the outset, directors of British companies are under no restriction whatever. There is no evidence that British companies are better managed than Canadian. I think the rates are higher, but the security of the policy-holder is no better in Great Britain than in Canada. Should there be too many restrictions upon investments? Companies may invest in Dominion securities, consols, municipal securities, and municipal debentures. They are also permitted other investments, such as the preferred and common stocks of joint stock companies in which you may have your money, but it must be shown that such a company has not been in default of interest and dividends in three years in one case and seven years in another case. There you impose upon a company a most difficult duty, if a good investment is offered. You have placed yourself in communication with the officers of the company where debentures or stock are offered as an investment, and you have to ascertain whether that stock has paid a dividend each year for three years in one case or seven years in the other case, and are not quite sure whether your investigations are conclusive or not. If by any mistake you have made default in your investigations, and made an investment which was contrary to law, the directors would be liable for the consequences. I think that restriction is one which may be sometimes irritating, and may lead to results which might not be at all satisfactory. In my judgment, it would almost entirely close out that class of investment, and interfere with such rates of interest as an insurance company must make if it is going to keep faith with its policy-holders. Another restriction placed upon the company is in regard to underwriting. Underwriting is usually speculative, but not necessarily so. Banks are allowed to underwrite, I think. Whether they are allowed to do it or not, I know that it is done, and I know a case where a large industry was floated by the underwritings of banks and insurance companies, that is a large and prosperous industry in Ontario to-day. Why should insurance companies be prohibited from making reasonable and just profits from underwriting an industry, which in their judgment, and in the judgment of capable financial men, is considered a proper industrial enterprise. Insurance companies have contributed more to the financial development of this country than appears at first sight. A large amount of money that is going into the Northwest to-day comes from insurance companies. They collect from all classes of subscribers the premiums which are paid into them on their insurance policies, and these they solidify and lend out, sometimes on mortgage, generally on mortgage or municipal debentures, and in this way they keep floating and moving in the country the money which they collect. By this system they are contributors to the industry of Canada. Fifteen or sixteen million a year passes from the treasury of our insurance companies, all or nearly all, to be invested. It is a constant shower of gold. Some years they will have three or four or five hundred thousand dollars to be invested, sometimes sixty or seventy thousand dollars a month to be invested, and many industries are helped by the liberality of the company and the wisdom and care of the company in regard to its investments. Why tie them up? If some industrial enterprise is offered to them, they should be allowed to take such reasonable risks as a bank takes in such investments, and they should not be restricted too closely. Now I come to the question discussed by the hon. gentleman from Wellington (Mr. McMullen) the fire insurance. I agree with his view, firstly, that the Canadian companies should have the preference if that is possible. I say if it is possible, for I am not perfectly clear on this question myself, and I want to hear what can be said on both sides. This much, however, seems to be clear: I have a list of about eighty companies licensed to do business in Canada. These companies have deposited $13,922,986 with the Dominion government to do business in Canada.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Not dollars—securities. They take from their own vaults certain securities and deposit them with the government and they draw interest on the securities.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—But they pay for the securities before they got them.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Yes, of course, they had to do that.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—Depositing the securities is another form of doing it instead of depositing the money itself. They could deposit the money instead of the securities they acquire, but they put them in in lieu of the money, and the securities are as good as gold.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—And they get three per cent for them, which is a very small rate of interest.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—No, they draw the interest on the investment. The character of the investment does not change, the only difference is that it is in the government vaults instead of in the companies' vaults.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—They are in the vaults of the government, and draw such interest as they bear, but if the companies were not required to deposit them, they could take the money which the securities represent and invest it at a higher rate of interest.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—No, these are their ordinary investments.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—The hon. gentleman does not understand me. I know the process, because I have gone through it. We are required to deposit certain securities with the government, and they will only accept certain securities. We have to invest our money in these securities in order to have the only deposit the government will take.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—The government will take anything which the company are authorized to invest in. It does not make the slightest difference.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—The government would not take real estate securities. They will take government or provincial debentures, or debentures guaranteed by the state. If these securities had not to be put up, the money which the securities represent could be invested at a high rate of interest, and, therefore, bring larger profits to the insurance companies.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—They do not lose one penny by it, because they can substitute one security for another at any time.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—The law requires that they shall put up a security. If they want to invest in mortgages on real estate, could they deposit with the government those mortgages on real estate?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Yes, if you like.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—Could we put up the stock of a bank?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Any stock authorized to be taken by the law as portion of their assets.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—Then supposing the hon. gentleman is right, it must be quite clear that the restriction we are placing on those securities, whether we make them for the purposes of the company or for the purposes of deposit with the government, may prevent an insurance company from realizing as high a rate of interest as they could otherwise realize. I am not opposed to some restriction in the matter of investment, but I am opposed to such restriction as would hamper unnecessarily the financial operations of a company. Coming back to where I was, I state that securities—and I will allow the right hon. gentleman the use of the term—that are deposited with the Dominion government amount to $13,922,980. That money is there in payment of the deposits required under the Act of parliament, and on the payment of that money these companies are allowed or licensed to do business in Canada. Some of them have put up as high as a million and over. The Liverpool, London and Globe deposited over a million; the North British and Mercantile has also deposited a large sum, and other companies have deposited sums varying from $60,000 upwards, There are a number of companies which do not put up any security, which are not licensed, and they do business in Canada to a large extent. My difficulty is this: here are companies, some eighty of them, who are able to do a large amount of insurance. I do not know what the tariff is as compared with the tariff of other companies, but they have complied with the law. The other companies have no interest in Canada, except what they can get outside the law. Is there another way—and here is my difficulty—of doing justice to large Canadian companies which are licensed and have put up their deposit, without doing an injustice to large property holders and owners of large industrial concerns which must have a larger insurance than the Canadian companies which are licensed could take. That is my difficulty. The Bill proposes to get over it in one way. I am sorry to say I cannot offer any solution, but I mention it in order that other members of the House who may have their difficulties may consider whether the remedy proposed is the best way. It would never do to say to the industrial concerns 'You must take such rates as the Canadian companies propose,' for they might then form a combination.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—They have one now.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—And they might exact an exorbitant rate. That would never do. There is a law now against combinations in restraint of trade. Could we so provide that they should have the refusal of all the business they could take—that is that they should be allowed to take all they could handle, and then provide some legislation whereby a combination would be prevented; so that they could not force up the rates of insurance to industrial concerns? If that could be done, it would be another way out of the difficulty. I admit, as I said before it is a difficult problem. The industries of this country must be protected. In point of tariff they are liberally protected. The insurance companies are protected also in some ways, and yet you go to an insurance company, and you are not satisfied with its rates, or you go to a group of them and are not satisfied with the rates, and then you go to another country where you get a better rate. That is not quite in harmony with the general policy of the country in matters of trade, and yet it seems to be, as far as we have gone at present, the only solution of the difficulty. On this question, I suppose, hon.

gentlemen like myself will have an open mind. The problems are very large and very vital, and as I said before, I hope that whatever conclusion is reached will be one by which we will stand for many years, that the committee will give it the consideration which it usually does to matters which come before us, and will with the same patience that was exercised by the committee in the House of Commons, hear what is to be said, and having heard it, give such decisions as will inure to the continued prosperity of our companies, both fire and life, and at the same time protect the financial concerns which are doing a great deal for the country and that are endeavouring in every particular to comply with the obligations imposed upon them by the Insurance Department.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I interrupted my hon. friend from Middlesex to correct what I thought was rather a misunderstanding on his part in reference to one or two points. Perhaps it would be easier if I just say a word or two on the Bill generally before I come to the point to which I shall advert. The raison d'etre of this Bill being before us is due, as my hon. friend stated, to frauds that were practised in the United States, some five or six years ago. We had some evidence of it in this Chamber a few years ago, in connection with the inquiry into the Mutual Reserve Company. The large insurance companies of the United States were found to be, not only attaching excessive salaries to particular officers, from fifty thousand to one hundred thousand and upwards, but it was also found that they were contributing to the political fund. That inquiry illicited the fact that very serious frauds had been committed. The feeling in Canada became one of unrest in consequence, and as a fact, strange to say, that although the insurance up to 1905 had been increasing by leaps and bounds, in that year it dropped, or rather the insurance was less by about a million and a half than it had been in the preceding year. I have the figures under my hand to show it. This refers to life insurance. In the year 1904, premiums were paid to the amount of $15,640,000. In the next year it was $18,000,000, an increase of three millions. The following year it only increased between four and five hundred thousand, showing a drop of two and a half millions as compared with the previous year. People in Canada became alarmed at the disclosures in the United States, so it was proposed that we should have a commission. Hon. gentlemen who have followed the proceedings of that commission, know very well that one of the guiding spirits in it was the party who had attended the inquiry in the state of New York, and he came here with his mind surcharged with all the evil that could be suspected in Canadian companies, such as had existed in the United States companies. The result of the inquiry was, as stated by my hon. friend, no improprieties of any consequence had been discovered, far less than in other companies which had been organized and incorporated for various purposes. The business of insurance in Canada had been specially fortunate, and especially well managed, and the fact that the insurance companies had from the year 1879 to 1908 paid to the policy-holders in premiums over one hundred million dollars, shows that there must have been an extreme degree of prosperity in the management of life insurance. They had found the field in Canada too small, and they spread themselves into all parts of the world, becoming a very beneficial advertisement for Canada. The Canadian Life has established agencies in the principal states of the union, in Great Britain, Newfoundland, Bahama and other countries. The Confederation Life established agencies in Ireland, Great Britain, Mexico, Trinidad and other countries. The Imperial Life has gone abroad for its investments, and has taken risks in other countries. The Manufacturers Life Insurance Company has established offices in Great Britain, Ireland, Egypt, South Africa, India, Ceylon, Siam, Burmah, Straits Settlement, Hong Kong, Philippine Isles, Japan, Jamaica, West Indian Islands, and a number of places. The North American Life is in a large number of outside countries also. The Sun Life does business in Great Britain, Newfoundland, Bermuda, West India Islands, Ceylon, Straits Settlements, through the United States, Belgium, Chili, Mexico, Central America, and a number of other countries. There is the best evidence that the companies in Canada must have been successful. During the time they were establishing offices in outside countries, several English companies had gone to the wall. As my hon. friend stated, there were very few if any losses sustained by Canadian companies. An honoured member of the Senate, who is now no more, the late James Skead, after he came into this Chamber admitted to me that life policies which he had been keeping up for considerably over a quarter of a century and on which he expected twenty-five to thirty thousand dollars, were then valueless because of the company becoming insolvent. But the record of Canadian companies as a whole, had been far in advance of the record of companies not only in the British Isles but also in the United States. No sort of fraud has ever been charged against them, and therefore there was no substantial reason for the introduction of this Bill. Nobody had asked for it. The commission reported a number of stringent provisions that they thought ought to be introduced, and hon. gentlemen who have given attention to this subject will remember when the first Bill was introduced in 1906 or 1907, that it was met with a spirit of opposition, I may say not only by the insurance companies but by the people generally. The management of these companies was practically taken out of their hands. Everything they might do was to be defined in an Act of parliament. Liberty of action was practically withdrawn from them, and, consequently, the Bill made no progress whatever in the House of Commons. The Bill was introduced the following session considerably amplified and liberalized, and although even then many changes were made, it got through at the very end of the session and came up here. The principal point in regard to the mode in which this Bill affects the insurance companies is in regard to investment. I never heard that there was any serious charge made of mismanagement by the companies of the powers they exercised under the Act. The Act I hold in my hand is one under which the insurance companies have been governed for many years. Very few amendments have been made to it in recent years, and no complaints have been made. I will take one instance. In purchasing stock, whether guaranteed or common stock, they were allowed to purchase it if the company had paid the dividend during the preceding two years. In the present Bill the time is extended. They must have been paying dividends for five years. If a company's stock pays dividends for five years, it would probably be up so much above par that it could hardly be made a profitable investment. The history of companies in Canada is one of continued prosperity. I have drawn attention to the fact that since the year 1878 over one hundred millions have been paid to policy-holders. Nearly all the policies in Canada are issued on what is called the participating plan, in which the profits made by the company are distributed, as a rule, quinquennially.

I have never heard any objection to the period of five years. If I am correctly advised, the companies have made this division. They were not bound to divide all the profits. They could create a reserve if it were thought prudent to do so. I agree with my hon. friend that we have unnecessarily restricted the investments of the company, because it has not been shown that a wrong has been done in the last fifty years or that any very serious mistakes have been made. The Canada Life was established about sixty-two years ago, I think, and at that time the rates of interest were very high. Companies could get eight, nine, ten and even twelve per cent interest on their money, and would be furnished with substantial security. So that they were able to accumulate a very considerable sum which the policy-holders naturally got the benefit of. As time went on, no severe criticism which I have ever heard was made with reference to the management of the companies, and the whole raison d'etre of the Bill is, as I said before, the disclosures made in the State of New York. In that state very stringent regulations were at once adopted, crippling the companies practically, and yet two years afterwards the legislature authorized an investigation to be commenced at once for the purpose of relieving the companies of the restrictions which, in times of excitement, they had imposed upon them. It became practically impossible to successfully administer a company's business, if the restrictions that were originally recommended by the commission in the State of New York were to be enforced. My hon. friend referred to the clause prohibiting the companies doing business in other countries insuring in Canada. The law as it always stood prevented those companies doing business here. The law is positive in that respect. I hold in my hand the Act respecting insurance, which has been the law for a great many years, and one of the clauses is that no outside company shall be permitted to come into Canada to do business, unless they hold a license. A great deal has been said that on account of the Canadian companies paying taxes and having investments in Canada, they ought to be so far protected that all companies other than provincial or British companies should be excluded unless they chose to take out a license and pay the required amount.

Now, so far as the amounts are concerned, I have stated that all companies, it is quite apparent, must have a very large number of securities—securities defined in the Act, debentures, provincial bonds, securities of one kind or another authorized. The security they give the government comprises securities the companies acquire in the management of the business and which they deposit in the vault of the Receiver General, drawing the interest on the securities themselves. I am merely pointing that out because it has been magnified that the companies that have licenses are contributing so much to the prosperity of the country by investing large sums, and they are entitled to extra consideration. In addition to that, they contribute to what are called the expenses of the Insurance Department. I find that twenty-one Canadian companies are assessed for the sum of $1,750 towards the running expenses of that branch of the Finance Department. That would be an average of eighty-four dollars a year for each company. It was proposed that this fifteen cents on the hundred dollars to be imposed on foreign companies doing business in Canada was to be equivalent to the tax imposed on the local companies, but you can quite see, when the average paid by the Canadian companies is eighty-four dollars, that the 15 cent rate is a small sum.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Would not that depend on the amount of insurance done?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I have a letter from Mr. Fitzgerald which I will read:

Ottawa, November 24, 1909.

Hon. Sir Richard Scott,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir Richard Scott,—Replying to your inquiry I have the honour to say that the fire insurance companies contributed the sum of $7,662.42 towards the expenses of this office for the year ending March 31, 1908, of which amount the Canadian fire companies contributed the sum of $1,750.47.

Faithfully yours,
W. FITZGERALD,
Superintendent of Insurance.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The insurance could not have been much.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—The point I wanted to make was this, that the tax of fifteen cents on the hundred dollars imposed on people insuring in outside companies, was intended to be equal to the assesment on Canadian companies that are paying their proportion of the expenses of the Insurance Department. I should like to see all the insurance in Canada taken by Canadian companies; but any man who has had large experience must know that there are times and circumstances under which it is impossible to effect insurance in Canada. Nearly ninety per cent of all the insurance effected in Canada is given to companies that hold licenses. A party who finds that he is unable to obtain a policy from a Canadian company on anything like a fair and reasonable basis is forced to go outside. I know of one instance of that kind that occurred when I was president of a company. There was water in the building and it was on the shore of Lake Erie, yet we could not effect an insurance with a Canadian company for less than seven per cent. We were obliged to go outside. The banks would not discount our paper if we did not insure. We applied to a syndicate outside of Canada. The probability is if the insurance was effected in New York, some of it was not worth much, and if a fire had occurred we would have lost heavily. No man in Canada will go outside for insurance if he can obtain a reasonable policy in the Dominion; but where companies have a fixed understanding s to rates, they are just as much underwriters as Llovd's, practically. They have the same rate all round and you cannot move them. That is undoubted. It is not a combination in this sense, that each company is working for itself. Each company is, of course, receiving the profits of its own business. But what I do say is this, and I have not heard it contradicted, that the rate on the buildings in the various cities and towns of Canada is practically fixed by a combination. Where I have myself had occasion to find fault with insurance companies is that in risks outside of towns and cities, where they have no agent and where, probably, there are no fire companies, they prefer not taking a risk. What are you to do in a case of that kind? Surely one ought to be at liberty to go outside. No one will go outside of Canadian companies if it is possible to secure insurance within the country. We all know there is greater security in Canada, and in case of accident we can get fairer consideration; but there are times and circumstances in which it is practically impossible to secure at reasonable rates insurance in Canada. There are other points which I should like to have discussed, but probably it is better they should come up before the committee. I will just say a word with reference to representation on the board. I quite recognize that the policy-holders ought not to interfere directly with the company.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middlesex)—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—At the same time, I think it is in the interests of all parties that there should be representation of the policy-holders on the board. I do not for a moment say that a policy-holder should attend general meetings of shareholders and discuss the policy of the company, because I quite see that a large number of policy-holders might combine and defeat what otherwise would be a sound principle that the directors may have adopted, and, therefore, I would not give them that latitude; but so far as representation on the board is concerned, I think the policy-holders are entitled to some representation—not however the representation defined in the Bill. My own view is that on a board consisting of five members, one should be a policy-holder, and for a larger board, up to fifteen, there should be two policy-holders. It is a matter of satisfaction to the policy-holders who practically make the company. They are the bone and sinew of the company and they get ninety per cent of the profits. The profits paid in Canada since the year I have mentioned, were over one hundred million, and the amount paid to the shareholders was less than three million dollars, so that you can quite see that the policy-holders have a very deep interest in the companies and their being on the board may increase the protection against any attempt to unduly increase salaries. I think it is quite in the interests of the company itself that the policy-holders should be satisfied. If the policy-holders do not want to be represented, they will not send any one there. It is not absolutely necessary that they should elect a representative. They are not an element that need form part of the board; it is purely permissive and it is limited to persons who hold at least two thousand dollars, while their representative must hold, I think, four thousand dollars. There are a good many points in the Bill which will have to be discussed before the committee. I myself think, with my hon. friend from Middlesex, that the Bill is too restrictive. Unless it could be shown that in the last fifty years improvident investments had been made, the board of directors ought to be allowed a wider latitude. The Bill as it stands requires that securities that the companies now hold and that are not within the provisions of this Bill must be actually sold within a period of five years. That seems an unreasonable and absurd proposition. A company may have held stocks for twenty-five years, stocks paying a reasonable interest, six or seven per cent, and yet because they do not come within the purview of this Bill they are obliged to sell them. Unless it could be shown that those stocks were liable to be confiscated, or the companies that issued them were likely to fail, the insurance company ought not to be obliged to part with them.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middlesex)—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—If they are good paying stocks, why sacrifice them? It seems an unreasonable proposition. However, the Bill is full of details, and there are many clauses which require careful discussion.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—Is the right hon. gentleman in favour of making two Bills of this.?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—No, I do not see anything in that. As it is now, we have one Bill, and I have yet to learn that any inconvenience has arisen as the law now stands. It does not occupy many pages, and it has been a success. No one can point out where it has been a failure. A few changes have been made in it. The clause to which my hon. friend from Middlesex drew attention has been the law for the last twenty-five years and no one has objected to it. The first objection I have heard was that raised by the hon. gentleman himself. He evidently forgot that it was in the original law. The reason for the introduction of this Bill is that the people of Canada got excited and the insurance that was being effected in Canada dropped about two and a half millions in one year. Parties dropped their policies but they at once, I have no doubt, reinsured, because the figures show that the premiums have been increasing year by year. In 1879 the premiums paid amounted to only $919,000; last year they amounted to twenty-one million dollars. In the last ten years the figures have been increasing steadily.

1902	12,000,000
1903	13,000,000
1904	15,000,000
1905	18,400,000
1906	18,900,000

That is the year in which the drop took place.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—What was paid to the policy-holders during that time?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—The policy-holders were paid in that year seven million dollars.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—What were the premiums that year?

Hon. SIR RICHARD SCOTT—In 1905 they were $18,400,000, and in 1906, $18,900,000. The income was only half a million at the time of this excitement. It did not last long, because the very next year it jumped to twenty millions, and in 1908 it jumped to twenty-one millions. While this Bill was before parliament, the business of the companies was rapidly increasing. The revival took place in a few months. That shows there was no absolute necessity for the legislation. Nobody has asked for it. It was purely the outcome of the commission that sat, and the commission was largely stimulated and guided by the gentlemen who took part in the inquiry into the insurance in the State of New York, where the conditions were altogether different. There was no question whatever of fraud or that millions had been squandered by Canadian companies, placed in improper securities, or given away to political parties. It is idle to talk of conditions in the State of New York being the same as in Canada. In this country the insurance business has never been in serious question. This Bill assumes that the insurance business was not on a sound basis, but the facts are entirely the opposite. The figures show that it has been uniformly successful. Our companies have gone abroad and established offices all over Europe and are capturing the business. There is the best evidence that the management and the principle on which the Canadian law was founded, were sound, progressive, just and reasonable, and that the policy-holders were receiving very large and extraordinary benefits. I do not hesitate to say that you will not find a parallel to it in any part of the world—you will not find anywhere policy-holders receiving in the same period so large a proportion of the profits as Canadian policy-holders have received during the last thirty years. It is because our industries in Canada are conducted on a fair and honest basis, and, as a rule, pay large dividends which they do not pay in other countries, that Canadian companies are able to compete in Belgium, Austria, France, and England, with outside companies. Of course one would not expect China and Japan to be far advanced yet in insurance matters. The present agitation, therefore, had no honest foundation. There was not the slightest necessity for it. The country would not accept the Bill that was prepared at first based on the disclosures made in the United States and on the proposal to prevent Canada committing a similar error. Canada had never committed such an error, there was no charge of dishonesty. The matter of rebating and minor matters of that sort did not affect the stability of companies or materially affect their large receipts. This rebating was undoubtedly a strong temptation for the agents to increase the insurance, and I presume that Canada, in proportion to its population, would show a larger proportion of persons insured than any other country, not excepting the United States. That is largely due to the enterprise, the assiduity and the good standing of the agents. No doubt they got the lion's share of the first year's premium, but they secured a risk, and the business in Canada has been a success from the beginning. Therefore, in considering this Bill, we ought to be careful not to load companies unduly with conditions that will in any way weaken their ability to carry on their business in as successful a way in the future as they have done in the past.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I desire to say a word or two with regard to the main objects of the Bill, which is not only to strengthen the position of business men who administer the affairs of insurance companies, but also to secure for policy-holders as adequate protection as any parliament could give them. I do not know whether I could agree with my hon. friend from Middlesex, that the piling up of millions of money by insurance companies is an unmixed blessing. These millions can come from only one source, from the policy-holders, from the orphan and the widow. It is their money that goes into investments. The right hon. the ex-Secretary of State has told us that last year the amount of premiums received by life insurance companies in this country was twenty-one million dollars. I did not hear him state what part of that large amount went back to widows and orphans. I saw a statement that the insurance companies did a business last year not of twenty-one million dollars but of twenty-eight million dollars, which is a tremendous amount for the small population of this country. I suppose that is apart from the business done by the mutual societies such as the Catholic Mutual Benefit Association, the Foresters and others.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—The hon. gentleman means premiums collected.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The official return quoted by the hon. member from Ottawa is twenty one million dollars. The state ment sent to the public by the Insurance Department was that out of the twenty-eight millions, only nine or ten millions went to the policy-holders; that ten millions more went to the salaried officers and seven or eight millions were carried to the reserve. It is very easy to build up a business by keeping other people's money in the treasury. It does not take a very smart business administration to accomplish that. Only forty per cent of the premiums collected last year went to the policy-holders, over 30 per cent to expenses and a large amount was carried into the reserve to be invested by the company. I ask the hon. member from Middlesex is that an unmixed blessing? Is it well to call upon the people of Canada to contribute so large an amount to the insurance companies, out of which they only get forty per cent when misfortune strikes them? This Bill is good so far as it goes, but it should look not only to the interests of the companies but also the interests of the policy-holders and the widows and orphans who need the money when the policy-holders drop out. That should be the main object of the Bill. The insurance companies are strong—too strong. We had an illustration of their strength in New York, where, after taking from the policy-holders millions of dollars, they were able to go into the financial markets and control large concerns, railroads, telegraph companies and other trusts, so that the accumulation of wealth in the hands of any company is not an unmixed blessing for the community, especially when deserving poor people are deprived of the legitimate profits of that business. I hope there will be men on the Banking and Commerce Committee when this Bill is referred to them, who will try to secure a larger share of the profits of these companies for the policy-holders. I venture to say that companies would not be at a disadvantage if the policy-holders were represented on the board, to prevent extravagance; to see that excessive salaries are not paid to managers, many of whom receive four or five times the amount paid to our Prime Minister, who is doing five times as much work and has ten times greater responsibility. The representation of the policy-holders on the board might be useful to check such extravagance and protect the interests of the poor people who are policy-holders. How to accomplish that is a difficult question. It is impossible to have a vote taken of all the policy-holders who may be scattered over the earth. There is no way of getting at them. The ordinary policy-holder in a company is not much interested in the administration of that company. It is a case of what is everybody's business is nobody's business. To secure a fair and intelligent representation on the board of a company, representation that would have something to say in the management of a company, let the largest policy-holders be selected to serve on the board. Then you would not have to travel all over the world to look for votes? The list of policy-holders would soon disclose the men who hold the largest policies and it would be easy to pick one or more of them to represent the policy-holders on the board. I will not go so far as to say that they should direct all the transactions of the company, but they would be there to see that the profits of the policy-holders are not squandered by extravagance—I will not say by dishonesty—by favouritism or by the payment of excessively high salaries to people who could not get such remuneration otherwise. I would not ask or urge that the policy-holders on the outside who are not in touch with the plans of the directors should have a say in that matter; but they could be there to see that no undue advantage is taken of the policy-holders, who are the backbone of the company. It has been said that the shareholders alone are interested. We know—we have had experience of it here—how policy-holders are victimized by close corporations. Take the case of the Mutual Reserve Life, which was investigated in the Senate some five or six years ago, and which led to the investigation in New York state where it was proved that the president of the company had paid the state inspector forty thousand dollars as a bribe to change his report.

His original report denounced it as a fraudulent one, and we have that evidence here. Thereupon the New York state legislature instituted the Armstrong Commission, and probed to the bottom, not only the Mutual Reserve, but many insurance companies. What was the result? The most rotten, to use the right word, were the companies with the largest capital, composed of men who are a danger to the state, and to the public, by reason of the vast amount of wealth they had at their command. It was stated that they could not have built up their business without good management, A-1 management, but is that an unmixed blessing? No. Therefore, I hope that in considering this Bill, the rights of the public at large will receive more conscientious and more careful consideration than the interest of the institution itself. The institutions will stand. The ex-Secretary of State has shown us that the insurance companies of Canada, as a body of financial concerns, have been healthy and strong—healthy and strong for themselves, but not strong enough for the policy-holders. Let us turn our attention to this point, and we will be rendering a service to the country and the people at large.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I desire to make an explanation in regard to a statement I made yesterday, to which the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry took exception. I reaffirmed my statement afterwards, and gave an instance, and he said he thought it was not so. I hold in my hand the Consolidated Laws of New York state, 1909, and I refer to clause 102. The statement that I made was that in the state of New York companies were given the choice of either doing a participating business, or doing a straight life business, but were not allowed to carry on the two systems concurrently. They had to select one or the other.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I do not dispute that.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I am glad to hear the hon. gentleman say that, but I understood that he did. Section 102 of the Consolidated Laws of New York reads as follows:

Companies issuing participating policies not to do a non-participating business. No domestic mutual life insurance corporation, and no domestic stock life insurance corporation hereafter issuing or professing to issue any participating policies, shall issue any policies, except annuities which do not by their terms give to the holders thereof the full right to participate in the accumulations of said corporation as provided in this chapter. This section shall not apply to paid up or temporary and pure endowment insurance issued or granted in exchange for lapsed or surrendered policies.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I would remind the hon. gentleman from Montreal, referring to the proportion paid to the policy-holders and stockholders, that in the last year I quoted, the policy-holders received $9,747,000 and the stockholders received $285,000.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—That is interest on their capital, and does not affect the situtation at all.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—It shows that the bulk of the money was given to the policy-holders.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The bulk of it did not go to them—not half.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

REVISED EDITION OF DEBATES.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Could the Rt. Hon. minister inform us why we are not yet favoured with a copy of the revised edition of our Debates? We have been here ten days, and we have not received a single revise.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I must refer my hon. friend to the committee which has the subject in charge.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Perhaps there is some member in the House who would favour us with an answer.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Where there has been a delay in the printing of the revised edition, my experience has been that some hon. member has been blocking the way, revising his speech, and delaying the printing of the revised edition. That is the usual cause of delay. The printer cannot print the speeches without the copy. Probably the copy has not been sent to the printer.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am informed that all that has been sent to the printers, and it is still at the Bureau. It has not come up to us.

The Senate adjourned until three o'clock to-morrow.

THE SENATE.

CONSTITUTION OF SUPERIOR COURT OF QUEBEC.

INQUIRY.

Hon Mr. LANDRY rose to call the attention of the Senate to the following facts:

The constitution of the superior court of the province of Quebec is regulated by the laws of that province.

The Revised Statutes of the province of Quebec, as in force to-day, enact as follows:—

2315. The superior court, which is a court of record, consists of forty judges, that is to say, of a chief justice and thirty-nine puisne judges.

In view of the considerable extent of the province of Quebec and in order to facilitate therein the more speedy administration of justice, especially from the point of view of the appointment, at each term of the court of review, of the judges who are to compose that court, the legislature of Quebec passed, in 1884, the following enactment which forms chapter 7, 47th Victoria:—

1. The following section is added after section 9 of chapter 78 of the Consolidated Statutes for Lower Canada, as amended by the Act 46 Victoria, chapter 13, section 1:—

9a. Whenever the chief justice shall reside in the city of Quebec, the senior of the judges residing in the city of Montreal shall perform the duties of the chief justice of the said superior court in the district of Montreal as it is comprised and defined for the purposes of the court of review; and

Whenever the chief justice shall reside in the city of Montreal, the senior of the judges residing in the city of Quebec shall perform the duties of the chief justice of the said superior court in the district of Quebec as it is comprised and defined for the purposes of the court of review;

Provided always that nothing in this section shall be interpreted so as in any manner to diminish the rights and powers now possessed by the chief justice of the superior court, or so as to interfere therewith.

2. This Act shall come into force on the day of its sanction.

As a matter of fact this Act was assented to on the 10th June, 1884.

Three years later, on the 18th May, 1887, the Lieutenant Governor of the province of Quebec assented to the following Bill, which is chapter 12 of 50 Victoria, and reads as follows:—

CHAPTER XII.

An Act to amend the law respecting the constitution of the Superior Court.

(Assented to 18th May, 1887.)

Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the legislature of Quebec, enacts as follows:—

1. Section 9a, added by the Act, Victoria, chapter 7 after section 9 of chapter 78 of the Consolidated Statutes for Lower Canada, is replaced by the following:—

9a. Whenever the chief justice shall reside in the city of Quebec, the judge, appointed by competent authority to perform the duties of the chief justice of the said Superior Court, shall perform such duties in the district of Montreal, as it is comprised and defined for the court of review, and he shall reside in the city of Montreal.

Whenever the chief justice shall reside in the city of Montreal, the judge, appointed by competent authority to perform the duties of the chief justice of the said Superior Court, shall perform such duties in the district of Quebec, as is comprised and defined for the court of review, and he shall reside in the city of Quebec.

Nothing, however, in the preceding provisions shall be interpreted so as to diminish or affect in any manner the present rights of the chief justice of the Superior Court.

2. This Act shall not affect the rights and powers, under the Act 47 Victoria, chapter 7, of the senior judge now in office and shall apply only to his successor in that office.

3. This Act shall come into force upon proclamation of the Lieutenant Governor in Council.

The legislation of 1884 (47 Vic., chap. 7) limited the choice which the federal government might make in the matter of the senior only of the judges of Quebec or of Montreal, according to the case; the legislation of 1887 (50 Vic. chap. 12) left the executive power perfectly free in its choice.

But the latter legislation according to its tenor, could only come into force by proclamation of the Lieutenant Governor in Council.

Now, such proclamation never having been issued by the Lieutenant Governor in Council, and never having taken place, the legislation of 1887 (50 Vic. chap. 12) has not yet come into force.

And that he will inquire:—

1. When did Sir François Langelier receive from the federal government his appointment as assistant chief justice with instructions to fulfil the duties of chief justice of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec in and for the district of Quebec, as it is comprised and defined for the court of review?

2. When Sir François Langelier was thus called upon to fulfil these determinate functions, who was then and who is still to-day the chief justice of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec?

3. Has sir François Langelier been, at any time before, at, or since his appointment on the 6th June, 1906, the senior of the judges of the district of Quebec?

4. Why has the senior of the judges of the Superior Court of the district of Quebec not been appointed to the place in preference to Judge Langelier in conformity with the requirements of the law?

5. Is it the intention of the government to make that appointment regularly and legally, either by appointing the senior of the judges who has a right thereto, or by causing the Lieutenant Governor in Council of the province of Quebec to issue the proclamation necessary for putting in force the legislation of 1887?

I hold in my hand the statutes of the province of Quebec, and I find that by section 2315, the Superior Court consists of thirty judges, that is to say, a chief justice and twenty-nine puisne judges. The law now reads forty judges. The only difference is in the number of judges that have been added at different dates since 1888. In the past, when special appointments were to be made, the law pointed out to the competent authority and gave liberty to the competent authority to make the choice themselves, so that the federal authority were empowered to choose any judge they liked to fill that position. But the last clause of the proposed amending law says this Act shall come into force upon proclamation of the Lieutenant Governor in Council. As this proclamation was never issued nor published in the 'Gazette,' the proper channel, the proposed amendments to the law were never put in force. This new law having never came into force, the ancient law of 1884, 47 Victoria, is still in force, and by that law the competent authority is obliged to take as a matter of legality the senior judge either in the district of Quebec or in the district of Montreal according to the fact that the chief justice is in one or the other of those districts. I may add that the law has always been interpreted that way except by the appointment of Sir François Langelier, on the 16th July, 1906, which was made according to chap 12 of 50 Victoria, i.e. the law which is not yet in force. According to the existing law, it was the duty of the government to appoint the senior judge of the district of Quebec. And mark that, the law does not state that the judge shall be taken in the city of Quebec or in the city of Montreal, but provides that as soon as he is nominated he must maintain his residence either in Quebec or Montreal, according to the position occupied by the chief justice, and this system has always been followed out by our authorities here. If you look at the Auditor General's account at the page relating to the judges, you will find in the last report that in the province of Quebec, there are two chief justices, one on the King's Bench, who was the late H. E. Taschereau and the other, the chief justice of the Supreme Court, Sir Melbourne L. Tate. If you refer to Judge F. Langelier, you will find that he his called the senior judge. Looking at the estimates brought down this year, an Act of the federal government, I find the following: Province of Quebec, Court of King's Bench, salary of chief justice $8,000, five judges $7,000. Superior Court, salary of chief justice $8,000, senior judge of Quebec $8,000. So you find in those documents the proofs that they were guided by the law and they just take the appellation convenient in the case, because the senior judge has always been termed, and should be, the senior judge, if the law were complied with.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The answers to these questions are as follows:

1. Sir F. Langelier was appointed to perfrom the duties of chief justice in the district of Quebec on 6th June, 1906.

2. The Honourable Sir Melbourne Tait.

3. Sir F. Langelier was at the time of his appointment on the 6th June, 1906, the senior judge of the district of Quebec. It is true that the Honourable Mr. Justice Pelletier is senior in date of appointment, and that at the time he resided and still resides at the city of Quebec; but he is not a judge of the district of Quebec, as the districts of Montmagny and Beauce are assigned to him.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What about Judge Caron?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Judge Caron resigned five years ago.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—And Judge Lemieux?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—He was in Sherbrooke when he was appointed.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The law says 'residing at Quebec' and Judge Lemieux resided at Sherbrooke.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The law says nothing of the kind. What is the reply to question 4?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—This question is answered pro tanto in the reply to question 3, but is completed as follows: Sir Francis Langelier was the senior judge for the district of Quebec residing in the city of Quebec, but he could have been appointed as well if only a puisne judge according to the law as interpreted and applied by the Minister of Justice on October 26, 1894, when Mr. Justice Tait was appointed to perform the duties of chief justice for the district of Montreal, although but a puisne judge. This appointment was made under Federal Statute R.S. C. Ch. 138, sec. 8. The answer to question 4 is a reply to question 5.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The law does not say that it is necessary that the appointee should reside in Quebec at the time of his nomination, but he must reside there afterwards. The section is as follows:

9a. Whenever the chief justice shall reside in the city of Quebec, the judge, appointed by competent authority to perform the duties of the chief justice of the said Superior Court, shall perform such duties in the district of Montreal, as it is comprised and defined for the Court of Review, and he shall reside in the city of Montreal.

When Sir François Langelier was appointed to reside in the city of Quebec, is it not a fact that he was at the time a judge in the city of Montreal.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Not when he was appointed assistant chief justice.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—He had been transferred to Quebec at that time.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Many years before.

Mr. LANDRY—Not many years.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Well, three or four years.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Will the hon. gentleman answer this point: is the government obliged to select a man in the city of Montreal or in the city of Quebec? Not at all. They are obliged to select a man in the district of Montreal or the district of Quebec, and when appointed he must reside in the city of Quebec or in the city of Montreal as the case may be.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Read the balance of the section.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is as follows:

Whenever the chief justice shall reside in the city of Montreal, the judge, appointed by competent authority to perform the duties of the chief justice of the said Superior Court, shall perform such duties in the district of Quebec, as is comprised and defined for the Court of Review, and he shall reside in the city of Quebec.

That is the obligation; but the obligation on the part of the government to see that he resides in the city does not appear by the law. Nevertheless, the law is there. Why not comply with it? By that law it was not Justice Langelier that should have been appointed, but Justice Cimon.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—There is nothing there about 'senior.'

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The proclamation mentioned in the Act not having been issued, that law is not in force.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—We have only the statement of the hon. gentleman that the law has not been proclaimed. In 1894, Sir Melbourne Tait was appointed under a law which the hon. gentleman says was non-existent.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Two blacks do not make one white.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Does the hon. gentleman say that Sir Melbourne Tait was wrongly appointed—that he had not a right to act as chief justice?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not know the particulars of that case.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—He was appointed by that very law, and Sir François Langelier succeeded him according to that same law.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That may be, but was he at that time a senior judge?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—He was a puisne judge.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Necessarily, but was he a senior judge?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—He was not the senior judge of the district of Montreal when he was appointed in October, 1894, to perform the duties of chief justice in the district of Montreal for the Court of Review.

Hon Mr CHOQUETTE—He was appointed by Sir John Thompson.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The chief justice may be taken from any of the judges, not necessarily the senior judge.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—If you say that the proclamation has not been issued, then he must be the senior judge.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The law does not apply to the choice of the chief justice.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I am not speaking of the chief justice. Sir Napoleon Casault was appointed chief justice, residing in the city of Quebec. The judge appointed to perform the duties of chief justice was Sir Melbourne Tait, in 1894, by virtue of article 2316 of the statutes of Quebec, although he was not the senior judge of the province of Quebec for the district of Montreal.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What statute?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The statute which my hon. friend claims was not put in force. It contains a paragraph that it shall come into force upon proclamation of the Lieutenant Governor in Council, but that Act was passed in 1888. I have only the hon. gentleman's statement that the law was never proclaimed; but against that statement I have the action of the Minister of Justice in 1894 making an appointment under that law, and I must assume that the law was proclaimed.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is assuming that the Minister of Justice is infallible.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I have the fact that the two Ministers of Justice acted under the law

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Here is the pretended law; will the hon. gentleman say that it is in force?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The presumption is that it was proclaimed, because it has been acted upon by two Ministers of Justice.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—By two Ministers of Justice who had no right to put it in force.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—It has been in force for twenty-two years.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I find in the Consolidated Statutes, a marginal note down the page as follows : 'These provisions come into force only when the Act 50 Vict. Chap. 12 takes effect.' So in the Consolidated Statutes of the province of Quebec you have a note saying that these provisions are not in force, and can only be in force by virtue of a proclamation of the Lieutenant Governor in Council. The law is there, and if the law was not complied with in 1894, does it make it law in 1906?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—No, but I have only the declaration of the hon. gentleman that the law has not been proclaimed.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman has more than that. He must have consulted the authorities in Quebec. I left that question purposely more than a week on our motion paper to give the hon gentleman time to consult in Quebec, but I have a telegram from Mr. Lanctot who says he cannot find that proclamation.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I received a telegram from Mr. Gouin yesterday, saying he was making search through the 'Official Gazette' to see if that law had been proclaimed.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I received a telegram in February last, saying he could not find the proclamation, and they have had since the month of February to the present time to find if there was such a proclamation, and they are still looking for it. They cannot find it. It has not been published. I looked through the 'Quebec Gazette' for it myself but could find no such proclamation. I wrote to the department in Quebec. I have their answer. The law is not in force. I am not a lawyer. I know that I am fighting under a great disadvantage against my hon friends, who are well known lawyers, but I know that the law has not been proclaimed. This is not a question of law; it is a question of searching the proper documents to see if a proclamation had been issued, and had it been issued, does the hon. gentlemen pretend to say that they would not have the proof of it, and that they would not try to close my mouth by producing the proclamation?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I have two parchments from Montreal, one confirming the appointment of Sir Melbourne Tait, the acting chief justice, and one with regard to Sir François Langelier. Is that not good enough?

The SPEAKER—I call attention to the fact that there is nothing before the Chair.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I beg pardon. When I call attention to certain facts on notice it opens a discussion.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I ask the hon. gentleman from Stadacona to allow me to make a suggestion which will put an end to this discussion. The hon. gentleman has made a statement of fact which is disputed, not by decisive authority, but by presumptive authority. Now the question is which hon. gentleman is right. I would suggest that the discussion be closed, and both parties ascertain if the proclamation was ever made.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is a funny settlement.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Yes, it is a final settlement only for the present.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I said funny settlement.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Why did the hon. gentleman not bring the matter before the House when Sir Melbourne Tait was occupying the same position under the same law as Sir François Langelier?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Because I only came to consider that question lately; but the hon. gentleman knows why. I am not a lawyer. I do not spend all my nights with the Statutes of Quebec studying law, but it was a question to my mind——

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Of a dinner lost.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It might be a question of dinner for those who feel hungry, or for those whose stomachs speak louder than their reason. I do not suppose that will be the case with me.

MINERAL RESOURCES COMMITTEE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE moved:

That a Special Committee of the Senate on the Mineral Resources of Canada, be appointed, to be composed of the Honourable Messieurs Lougheed, Bostock, Davis, Watson, Ross (Middlesex), Landry, Wood, Comeau and the mover, and that the evidence given before the said committee be printed from time to time.

I may explain that this is the very same committee we had last year—same component parts. The matter was taken up very late in the session, and could not be completed, and it is desired now to proceed with the programme we had before us last year when parliament prorogued.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I have no objection to my hon. friend having his committee, but apprehend that it involves a certain amount of expenditure. I would like to know what sum he proposes to limit his expenditure to?

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—There will be no expenditure at all except for the services of a shorthand writer. We have no other in our minds at present. We are not proposing to call any witnesses except such as come before us in a voluntary way. We do not desire to put the country to any expense.

The motion was agreed to.

LICENSING OF INSURANCE COMPANIES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE inquired:

Have all insurance companies, fire insurance companies as well as life insurance companies, before taking risks and issuing policies of assurance in Canada—

1. Obtained from the government a license to carry on business, either throughout the Dominion of Canada or in one or more of the provinces of the Dominion?
2. Made a deposit in money and given the guarantee necessary to protect the interests of policy-holders?
3. Made an annual report of their operations?

If not, what companies have not fulfilled the conditions mentioned in the above questions or required by virtue of the law concerning insurance companies?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows:

1. The licenses issued under the Insurance Act cover the whole Dominion. No authority exists at present for the issue of a license restricted to one or more of the provinces thereof.

2. All companies licensed under said Act have made the deposits which said Act requires to be made; such deposits have been made in securities approved by the Treasury Board and not in money.

3. All companies so licensed have made the annual reports of their operations called for by the statute.

Certain companies have, however, taken risks in Canada without having obtained a license therefor. These companies, so far as we are aware, are fire insurance companies operating on the mutual insurance system, a large number of which are collectively known as the New England Mutuals. These companies have made no deposit with the government and make no report of their operations.

WORK OF COMMITTEES.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved:

That the following Standing Committees of this Honourable House, namely: Agriculture and Forestry, Immigration and Labour, Commerce and Trade Relations of Canada, Civil Service Administration, Public Health and Inspection of Foods, and Public Buildings and Grounds, be instructed to take the initiative towards collecting information on the several matters coming within their respective spheres of action, no expenditure, however, to be incurred without the previous authority of this honourable House.

APPENDIX TO DEBATES.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE moved:

That that part of the report of the Joint Committee of the Senate and Assembly of the state of New York, appointed to investigate the affairs of Life Insurance Companies, bearing on remedial legislation, being from page 357 to end of Assembly Document No. 41, be printed as appendix to the Senate debates.

He said: The motion which I propose will be found on page 72 of the 'Minutes,' and it is for the purpose of having printed as an appendix to the 'Debates' of this honourable House a short portion of the report of what was known as the Armstrong Committee made to the Senate and House of Assembly of the state of New York in 1906. The first portion of the report deals with the findings of the commission as regards some seventeen different insurance companies doing business in the state of New York. With these we are not much concerned, and the motion does not deal with that part of the report at all; but after making their findings the commission proceeded to suggest the line upon which remedial legislation should be enacted for the purpose of guarding against the abuses which had crept into the operation of the several insurance companies whose acts had been the subject of the inquiry, and this is, to my mind, exceedingly instructive and applicable not only to the United States but to every part of the world. That portion of the report was admirably made, and although it may be considered and was considered as being rather radical, I think it will be instructive for all the hon. members of this House to have this information where it will be easy of access. It will not cover more than forty pages of our 'Debates.'

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I presume the hon. gentleman has been looking into this subject. He is aware, I have no doubt, that the first report was modified the second and third year after it was adopted, so we should not take that as the law of New York.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It does not purport to give the law of the State of New York; it merely purports to suggest on what lines the law of the state should be framed. It was followed by a draft Bill prepared by the commission. That draft Bill is not included in the report of the commission, and when that Bill came before the United States Senate and the House of Assembly it was not adopted as introduced. It was modified, and, after being modified, it was still further modified in the following year. It is merely for the purpose of giving valuable information on these several subjects which are of universal application that I make this suggestion.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Would my hon. friend feel inclined to add to his motion the evidence taken in this House on the Mutual Reserve Life Insurance Company and also the evidence taken in New York with regard to the same company? I think it would be very instructive, because that actually took place within our own realms, and it unearthed scandals that should never have existed, but we never thought fit to make a record of it here. I think we should attach the evidence taken here.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—It is already printed.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—It is already printed, but if my hon. friend will turn back to our journals, he will see it was not adopted. I am not sure whether he made the motion for its rejection or not; at any rate it was laid on the table in the dying hours of the session and was not adopted. It was printed. There is more reason why it should be attached with this New York report, showing the state of affairs which existed in New York. This will also show the state of affairs that existed under our own noses, without anybody interfering in any way to remedy it, and if that were added now I am sure it would assist the hon. gentlemen of the committee in arriving at a conclusion as to what the Bill now before the House should be, and whether it requires any alteration.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—It is printed in the blue book.

The SPEAKER—Might I ask when it is proposed to have it printed? When the book comes out?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—In the report of the day's Debates.

The SPEAKER—Would it not be well to add the words: 'Senate Debates' of this date?

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—Is the report in the possession of the House?

The SPEAKER—It is supposed to be read by the Speaker.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I was going to ask the same question; not that I object to the report being printed in our Debates, because I believe it will furnish very useful information to members of the House; but in adopting this motion we are going to establish a precedent. If, for instance, I want to incorporate a speech of John E. Redmond, on Home Rule, would I be allowed to do so? If I made such a motion on St. Patrick's day would it be opposed? I have no objection to the report being printed in our Debates. I think it would be very salutary reading, but I want to know if it will be the privilege of any hon. gentleman to place on the records of this House documents which he is in need of?

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—If it is in the public interest.

Hon. Mr BEIQUE—As far as the question raised by the hon. gentleman from St. John is concerned, it will be noticed that the motion refers to Assembly document number 41, which is here.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Read it all.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It had better be taken as read. I have the document here.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Might I ask the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry what is the object of having a committee on the printing of parliament? I always understood that when we wanted anything printed, that was the committee to refer to. There is a joint committee on the printing of parliament.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND — For convenience sake, you send documents to a committee to decide which are the documents which shall be printed, but if we decide this document is important enough to be printed, we can do so without sending it to them.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Precisely, but could we not have it printed by that committee without loading our Debates? I was a member of that committee one session, and we would receive requests from members to have certain papers printed, and the committee would consider the requests. I am not objecting. If the committee on the printing of parliament is not for that purpose, I would like the hon. assistant leader of the House to inform me what it is for.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman has forgotten. He has made a motion to declare that a certain portion of the report which he holds in his hand shall be printed as part of the proceedings of the Senate. Supposing the hon. gentleman reads his motion, it then becomes a part of the debate and goes on the record. He simply asks to have that done, without putting himself to the trouble of reading 30 pages.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I am not an old parliamentarian like my hon. friend, but I thought there was a rule in parliament prohibiting lengthy readings in discussion.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No rule to prevent the reading of extracts, but there is a rule which prevents the reading of a speech.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—And I stated that the object of the motion was to have this information published in our Debates where it would be easy of access, in view of the Bill which was referred yesterday to a committee of this House. It is an important document, which will enable members of this honourable House to deal more intelligently with that Bill.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—It appears to me that this is an objectionable way of bringing the matter before the House. As I understand it, the Insurance Bill is a government Bill, and any extracts or documents that may be of assistance to this House, or to the committee, in considering this Bill, would be printed by the government, and a copy placed in the hands of every member of the Senate. That would be a very much better way of getting the information before the members of the Senate than to have it incorporated in our Debates, and as other members have suggested, it seems to me an unwise precedent to establish.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Before the motion is put, we ought to have some information in reference to this resolution. It is a very peculiar one. It reads:

That that part of the report of the joint committee of the Senate and assembly of the state of New York, appointed to investigate the affairs of life insurance companies, bearing on remedial legislation, being from page 357 to the end of the document No. 41, be printed as an appendix to the Senate debates.

How do we know what amount of printing may be required? While I am opposed to the principle of endorsing any of the legislation that may take place in the state of New York or the United States, I think we ought to have some information, and, further, I should like to know who is to set apart the portion that should be printed or the portion that should not be printed? What authority has any individual to select portions and say which is necessary or which is not? It seems to me that we are not only establishing a very dangerous precedent, but we are certainly moving in the dark in not having proper information by which we are enabled to act, and I would call the attention of the right hon. leader of the House to the fact that he has objected just now to having any information printed and sent by the various committees of this House to the country, lest it might in some way be an expense. Can he or the mover of the resolution tell the House how much expense this printing will involve? I agree with some of those who have said that it might be very important information. It might or might not. Would the mover of the resolution tell us what he wants? It would be necessary to have some such information as this before we adopt this very strange motion to publish in our Debates the actions of a committee of investigation on insurance matters in the United States. We have had commissions and investigations here. We have been told by parties that certain legislation was absolutely essential, and that certain advantage would result from proceeding with an investigation. We proceeded with it. Have we to-day any advantage from it? This may have a similar result. We may find that we will not be in any better position after this information is given to us, than we were when we had the report of a committee here, to consider a certain Bill. Will this be another New York Mutual Reserve affair? I do not know, and the mover has not told us. I suppose we have to take it on faith. I am decidedly opposed to a resolution of this kind, and I really do not think it will be of any benefit. The mover of the resolution should let us know where the benefit lies.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I beg to move, seconded by the hon. gentleman from Victoria division, that the conclusion reached by the committee on the evidence taken before the Select Committee of the Senate on the Mutual Reserve Life Insurance Company be added to the motion of the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Is it the conclusion of the committee the hon. gentleman refers to—because there was no report of the committee?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The report from the committee which was tabled under adverse circumstances.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE.—Yes, it is on the 'Journals' of the House. In moving the amendment, I suppose I am entitled to say something. I hear an hon. gentleman say that this motion is ridiculous. An hon. member of the Senate said in regard to the Mutual Reserve Committee that it was a degraded committee. It was a committee appointed by this House. Where was the degradation? That was the opinion of one hon. gentleman, but there are other hon. gentlemen in the Senate who have opinions, and one man cannot constitute the whole Chamber. When the matter was threshed out before that committee, they reported and the revelations that were made astonished the world. The evidence taken before our committee was used in New York, and I am told that the Armstrong Commission was the outcome of it. There must have been something up or we would not have been passing legislation with regard to insurance to-day. It is due to the country that the conclusions come to by that committee, and recorded in the 'Journals' of the House, should be incorporated with the findings of the New York commission referred to in the motion. Why ignore the evidence taken before the Senate committee and introduce the conclusions reached in the state of New York, especially as it is applicable to the legislation which parliament is now invited to pass? I therefore move, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Cloran, that the findings of the committee on the evidence taken before the Select Committee of the Senate appointed to investigate the affairs of the Mutual Reserve Life Association, be added to the document referred to in the motion.

The SPEAKER—This is not an amendment to the motion, and cannot be received. It is a substantive motion, and cannot be put until after the House has dealt with the other.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The statement made by the hon. senator from Rothesay should not go unchallenged, or it should be vindicated. Very often the unexpected happens in life. I had no intention to speak on this question, but since it has been raised, I am more than pleased to have an opportunity to vindicate an honourable body of men who for many a long day and many a long week, were denounced in this Chamber by the then leader of the House as a degraded committee, as a committee that was doing injustice to a well established and honest concern. We had to put up with that for many a long week and month in 1903, 1904 and 1905. I always have confidence in a man who has the courage of his convictions, and is conscientious in the discharge of his dutes. The members of that committee investigated life insurance as conducted in Canada. We did our best to secure the facts, yet day after day we were obstructed in our search for the truth.

We were publicly denounced—officially denounced.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—By whom?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—By the then leader of the government in this House. And I remember stating one day on this floor that Providence would give me days long enough to vindicate my position and the position of the committee. Thank God he has given it to me unexpectedly. I bore the brunt of that fight and was not carrying it on for myself. I was not the direct or indirect attorney of any insurance company. I was not a policy-holder, a shareholder or a director in any company. On the floor of this House I stood by the man who had risked his official head—who had stated that if he could not prove that the Mutual Reserve Life Insurance Company, which was doing a very large business in Canada, was a corrupt, dishonest and rotten institution, he would resign his seat in the Senate. He was challenged by men who are still here, and by some who are gone, but there are enough of us here to vindicate the position taken by the hon. member from Rothesay (Mr. Domville) when he staked his official head that he would prove to the hilt that the Mutual Life was depriving the policyholder, the widow and the orphan of their just dues. Through that committee, he proved that the company, by fraud and dishonesty, was increasing the rates at a tremendous pace. We had great difficulty in getting the facts. We had lawyers from Toronto, two or three of them, some in very high positions to-day in the government of Canada. We had to fight them and firms of lawyers from New York, from Montreal, and from Ottawa. Every obstacle, legal and otherwise, was put in the way of that investigating committee. A very different attitude was assumed by the Armstrong Committee at Albany in 1905 and 1906. I had the honour to sit for two or three days with Judge Armstrong on that committee, when a young, promising lawyer had before him the greatest masters of finance, because the greatest masters of finance in New York city were the heads of insurance companies. He had before him these men, and he plied them with questions that went to the very root of the evil. I turned to the chairman and asked, 'Why do you allow those questions to be put to the witnesses; they have no defence, no lawyers to defend them?' He said, 'Senator, we are here to find out the truth, and not to block it.' Mr. Hughes, young Hughes at that time, had brought out the facts without any interference on the part of the committee, and the result of his work was the legislation which was passed a year or two afterwards. The people were grateful to him and made him governor of the state of New York two years afterwards, because he exposed the evils that were at the root of these insurance companies. There is an illustration of what the people of the United States think of a man who does his duty. When I and my colleagues on the Senate committee here were doing our duty, we were denounced, we were outraged in our honour and sentiments. Never a word did I say only this—'Providence will grant me life long enough to vindicate my character against those assertions,' and it has come to-day, unexpectedly, without my seeking it. There is the difference between the two investigations,—one free and open, the other clogged and kept secret, so much so that the press of the country did not publish one word out of every ten thousand of the evidence taken. Blocked in the press, and blocked in the committee, fortunately not always blocked in the Senate—we had a slight majority on one or two questions raised here—at the last minute the findings of that committee were laid on the table by a tie vote and by a snap decision of the Senate at the time. These are facts within the memory of all of us.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—The hon. gentleman has omitted telling this House that in the New York investigation it was stated that it cost $37,000 to get through at Ottawa. Although we moved in the House afterwards and got an order to produce those papers to find out where this sum was paid, they have never been produced. Who got the $37,000?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Mr. Hughes, for that investigation got $25,000. His colleague was paid the same amount, though he did not do much work, and his two assistants were paid $10,000 each, besides the stenographers and other fees.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I am calling my hon. friend's attention to the fact that an order was issued by this House to procure a copy of the evidence taken in the New York investigation to find out who got the money. A large amount was paid for it, several thousand dollars.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—That is an item that was proved here, and the resolutions before our committee were the cause of the investigations which took place in New York State and elsewhere into the administration of insurance companies. Our committee proved clearly that the Mutual Reserve Life, doing business in the Dominion, was not fulfilling its obligations towards its policy-holders. We proved fully that they were defrauding the policy-holders and through them the orphan and the widow. In the investigation which took place at Albany, it was shown that the men at the head of the company were paying anywhere from $40,000 to $100,000 to insurance inspectors to change their reports and make them more favourable to the company. We proved the same facts here, and proved further, that the directors were paying enormous salaries to themselves as high as $40,000, and even $75,000.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I rise to a question of order. The motion before the House is the motion made by the hon member from De Salaberry. In amendment to that, the hon. gentleman from Rothesay undertook to move a resolution which his hon. the Speaker has decided to be out of order. Now the speech of the hon. member from Victoria has no reference whatever to the motion which is before the Chair. It is utterly irrelevant, and I ask the decision of the Chair.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Will the hon gentleman tell us what the resolution which the House is asked to endorse covers?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am not making a speech, and I am not under cross-examination. I simply raise a question of order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The point raised by the hon. member from Halifax is not in order.

The SPEAKER—The motion is:

That that part of the report of the Joint Committee of the Senate and Assembly of the state of New York, appointed to investigate the affairs of Life Insurance Companies, bearing on remedial legislation, being from page 357 to end of Assembly, Document No. 41, be printed as appendix to the Senate debates.

I have not before me the documents indicated, but I apprehend they do have reference to, amongst others, the affairs of the life insurance company which has been named by the hon. gentleman from Victoria.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Not that part of it.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—We do not know; we have not that before us.

The SPEAKER—It opens a very wide range to the discussion. The hon. mover of the motion has called my attention to the fact that it refers not to the proceedings of any particular company but to suggested amendments in the way of legislation. If so, of course the discussion of the affairs of that particular company would not be in order. Without having an opportunity to examine this question more fully, I do not see how that could be. From a hasty glance over the report I do not see that it refers to any company at all, but simply to remedial legislation, and, therefore, the hon. gentleman's remarks would not have any bearing upon the question before us, which is, shall this document be printed. Of course the whole subject could be brought up on another motion if the hon. gentleman would give notice.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Do I understand that his honour the Speaker rules that a member of this House is debarred from expressing his opinion on a motion of which he has not the substance? The substance of that motion is that a report of some 20 or 30 pages be incorporated in the Debates. Do I understand that the Speaker takes upon himself to decide that that matter cannot be discussed?

The SPEAKER—I have not decided that. The motion relates to suggested legislation —that is the form of legislation which should take place with reference to insurance companies, and that is what is suggested should be printed. All I say is, that a discussion of the particular company or companies that were investigated before a committee of this House is foreign to the present motion.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I bow to the decision of the Chair. It is not necessary to put the situation before the House and the country; in the absence of the document which is now in the hands of his honour the Speaker, I shall discuss it from what I think the Armstrong Committee did recommend their remedial legislation. I shall certainly, to be in order with the ruling of the Chair, not confine myself to the merits or demerits of any one institution. Every one knows that many of our insurance companies are good, solid institutions which are doing good and noble work for the benefit of the people. There was no intention, when the investigation was undertaken by a committee of this House, to attack the Insurance Commission for the good work they were doing. This investigating committee of Armstrong's, like our own committee, was instituted to find out the cancer that was eating into the vitals of those concerns. On their face, they were all innocence, all humanity, all goodness and godliness. That was the position of the insurance companies five or six years ago, not only in Canada but in the United States. But they were found to be whited sepulchres, and when the spade of investigation was driven through the cover, what was revealed? A state that bordered on danger, not only to the policy-holders, but to the state and to the nation. It was found that these companies which controlled such enormous funds, were using them to build up colossal fortunes for themselves, to control public utilities all over the continent and to control legislative influence not only at Albany, but even at Washington. That is what Mr. Hughes, the present Governor of New York, found out; that is what he delved into, and what he exposed and uprooted, and it is on that evidence that the report to which my hon. friend from De Salaberry alludes, and which he wants printed in the Debates, was based. It was not based upon the revelations of corruption by one particular company; it was based on facts more broad and far-reaching, and that is why I stated in the beginning of this debate that I was not opposed to the publication of the finding of the Armstrong Committee in our Debates. As I said before, it will be salutary reading for the men who upbraided us two years ago on the floor of this House, and it will be salutary reading for the new members coming into the Senate that they may brace themselves for the fight about to take place in the Banking and Commerce Committee. I am no enemy of capital, but I detest capital acquired at the expense of the poor and humble, who are not represented here and who have no voice in the administration of the affairs of the country. Capital is as necessary as labour, but capital acquired by the sweat and tears of poor people should not be encouraged to the extent of receiving the sanction and support of parliamentary laws. I am prepared to stand before the people of this country and ask them to endorse the position I take, and I know the people will stand by me, or by any man who will express these sentiments in any part of the community. The amendment of the hon. member from Rothesay may be out of order; but it would be such a true echo to the findings of the Armstrong Committee that the people would say no wonder the Armstrong Committee reported the conclusions which we are asked to incorporate in our Debates. I, therefore, think that the findings of our own committee should also be included. That is not demanding anything extravagant. It is true they are in our records, but in an inconvenient form. I am proud to stand by the hon. member from Rothesay in this matter. He did noble service to this country and to the United States when he staked his reputation on the accusations made against the insurance business of this country and of the neighbouring republic. I stand by him now and in the day of his vindication, and I am proud to be one of the men who helped him, and who declined to betray him as I was asked to do.

These remarks I make with full confidence. I declined, then as a young member of the Senate, without any experience, to betray him, and deliver his accusations into the hands of authorities or people who would not have done the work as it was done by himself and his attorney. I make that statement here after six long years of silence. Is it any wonder I feel strongly in this matter. I dealt with it manfully although for the last five years I have been under a cloud? That cloud is now being dispelled, and the records of both countries, the United States and Canada, show that we did good work. The government admits that a new law is required. I am quite willing to concede, as the ex-Secretary of State says, that our laws must have been good ones to keep the companies in Canada as solid as they have been. But what we want is an addition to the laws, whereby not only the shareholders, but presidents and vice-presidents and directors and officers shall not be paid salaries any where from $25,000 to $50,000 a year. We want to put a stop to that. We want fair administration, not extravagant administration, and I hope the members on the Banking and Commerce Committee will consider these points. Out of the $28,000,000 that were taken by the life insurance companies last year, not taking into account the millions paid by all the mutual and fraternal societies throughout the country, not taking into account the vast sums paid by the ordinary members of these societies, but taking into consideration the report of the Insurance Department that the insurance companies did a business of $28,000,000, only nine or ten million went to the widows and orphans. We want something better than that. We desire that the workingmen shall receive more than 33 per cent of that $28,000,000, to provide for the helpless and starving families. We do not want a man to pay out a dollar and receive back only 33 cents. We do not want luxurious palaces for the officials, who receive $28,000,000, and only pay out 33 per cent to the heirs of the insured. Let the officers be given fair salaries, so that they can live in proper style; but I ask, in the name of the people who contribute the 28 million of premiums, that a fair share of the money be paid to the widow and children of these policy-holders. The ex-Secretary of State in explanation said: 'But the shareholders are so poorly paid. The policy-holders are getting nine million, and the shareholders are only getting $265,000. I did not like to answer the hon. gentleman at the time. I thought the blow would be too hard. Why throw dust in the eyes of the people of this country? Why try to blind us? The very fact that only $265,000 was paid to the shareholders of these companies, is a sign that they are doing business on very small capital. They are doing business on a capital which is sometimes swelled by wind and by water. Companies are doing business in this country with $100,000 or $200,000 of capital, not paid up, and who have assets anywhere from ten to a hundred million. Where did that money come from? Where has that twenty, that fifty or hundred millions come from during the past ten, twenty, or thirty, or forty years? It was not from the small capital they invested as shareholders; the one hundred thousand capital or one million capital, and the thousand shares or ten thousand shares at one hundred dollars a share. It was not that capital that produced the assets of the company rising up to the hundred and over the hundred million mark. That money has come from the poor policy-holder, from his heirs, the widow and the orphan, who did not get their fair share of the profits of that business. This is the condition of things, and the Senate and the House of Commons will be much mistaken if they imagine for one moment that the eyes of the people of Canada are not being opened to the questionable methods of financing outside schemes with insurance funds. This country will not hold parliament guiltless if it fails to protect the unfortunate policy-holders and their heirs. Those are my sentiments and I think I have voiced the sentiments of the vast mass of the people of this country, and I therefore ask for no favour or protection. I care not for denunciation nor did I five or six years ago. All I care for is the approbation of my own conscience, that I am doing what is right irrespective of financial interests.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I would suggest to my hon. friend from De Salaberry, as a matter of convenience, that having reference to the precedent that would be established—although I do not wish in the slightest degree to interfere with giving all possible information in regard to this matter—that it might be more expedient to refer the subject to the Committee on Printing. I do not think it would delay the proceedings at all. The volume of our Debates might be very largely swollen if we were to adopt such a precedent. I was not aware that it has ever been adopted before. However, I merely make the suggestion, and do not want to press it on my hon. friend.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I have no objection to adopt the suggestion of the right hon. gentleman. I made the motion merely because in my estimation it is a document of considerable importance, and it would add to the importance of our Debates if it were printed as an appendix. It will be a document which will be consulted five or ten years hence as well as to-day. As far as I am concerned, I am familiar with the document. I have read it, and do not require it any more. My suggestion is merely for the convenience of hon. gentlemen in dealing with the Bill which is before the House.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED. May I be permitted to point out to my right hon. friend that as the Committee on Printing is a joint committee, and as the apparent wish of this House is that an extract from the report be published, inasmuch as the joint committee is made up of representatives from the House of Commons and from the Senate, there is no assurance that we would have the documents printed in the manner suggested by my hon. friend.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—As a matter of courtesy between the two Houses, anything that is sent to the committee with the recommendation of this House would, I think, be printed almost as a matter of course.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Not necessarily.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I would like to point out to the House that in my experience, in the House of Commons and the Senate, on the Printing Committee, nothing that was ever asked by either House to be printed, was refused by that committee.

Hon. Mr CHOQUETTE—Why not refer it to the Debates Committee. They could look over that pamphlet and if they considered it important they could report in favour of printing it and we could deal with their report.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Hon. gentlemen must remember that we are not seized with a knowledge of what is in that report, and we are asked to confirm it and place it on our debates.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—If it were referred to the Debates Committee, it would be longer delayed than if it were referred to the Printing Committee.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I do not think so. There are fewer members on the Debates Committee and it could be dealt with more quickly.

The SPEAKER—The suggestion by the hon. gentleman now is that the motion be amended and made to read as follows:

That that part of the report of the Joint Committee of the Senate and Assembly of the state of New York, appointed to investigate the affairs of Life Insurance Companies, bearing on remedial legislation, being from page 357 to end of Assembly Document No. 41, be referred to the Committee on Printing with the recommendation that the same be printed for the use of parliament.

With the assent of the House the motion will go in that form.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—My hon. friend, in moving the amendment, was out of order. The Speaker had not yet given a decision whether the motion was in order or not. I could not vote for either the original motion or the amendment. I believe we have not adequate information to form an opinion as to whether this resolution should be carried. I do not think the Printing Committee have a right to commit this Senate to the fact that they favour and are going to endorse a report that we know nothing of. What right has that committee to commit this Chamber to having the proceedings in regard to legislation at New York or any other place attached to and become part and parcel of a record of the Senate, thereby receiving the endorsation of the Senate? I do not think they have. This is virtually endorsing a resolution although I do not know what the resolution may cover. The hon. member has not explained satisfactorily the object he has in view. He may have some ulterior object or he may be sincere. In the absence of a full explanation, I think we had better adjourn the debate and later on, when we obtain the information, we may reject or endorse it. If the amendment to the resolution should be submitted to this House, I should have to vote against it, because I do not believe it is in the interest of the country.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I want to know what is before the Chair?

The SPEAKER—The motion to which the hon. gentleman from St. Thomas has been speaking has been declared carried. I gave sufficient time before I declared the motion carried.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Are both motions withdrawn?

The SPEAKER—No. Only one motion has been put as yet, and that has been declared carried.

Hon. Mr. WILSON. I do not think you can dispose of the original motion and amendment of the motion by a motion to refer it to the committee. I do not think the Printing Committee has any right to say whether a document should be printed until the House has expressed its opinion on it. I cannot understand the rules of parliament if they give the right to submit a resolution before the House to a committee. Therefore I raise a point of order and I ask His Honour to decide it.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—The amendment is very simple and involves nothing, and I ask leave of the House to permit it to be put. Hon. gentlemen in their wisdom may vote against it. It only involves putting a notice on for the next meeting of the House, and having another debate sprung upon the Chamber, whereas if this is allowed to be put by the hon. leader of the House it ends the matter. My resolution reads:

That the finding of the committee on the evidence before the Select Committee of the Senate on the Mutual Reserve Company be added to the motion of the Hon. Senator Béique.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—The hon. gentleman can simply move to have that finding printed, without referring to the hon. gentleman's motion at all.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—No, I cannot, because I have not yet given notice.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—He simply adds it to the main motion, which has been carried.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You cannot move an amendment to a motion which has been carried.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—When an amendment is proposed to add words to a motion, it must be voted on before the motion is put to the House, and this motion has already been declared carried.

The SPEAKER—I suppose the motion would be that this report be printed for the use of the members of the House. Is it the wish of the House that the motion be put now?

An hon. MEMBER—No.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Then I will give it as a notice of motion.

THE INSURANCE BILL.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Before the House adjourns, I should like to ask the government a question; it affects the Insurance Bill which will be considered by the Banking and Commerce Committee to-morrow morning, and if the government will be in a position to let us have the information by that time it might perhaps be of great value and assistance to us. I propose to put the following question:

Is it the opinion of the government that the Committee on Banking and Commerce, to which has been referred Bill (A) intituled 'An Act relating to Insurance,' should consider the propriety of recommending that the said Bill be divided into two Bills, one dealing with life insurance, and the other with fire, marine and other kinds of insurance.

2. If in the affirmative, is it the intention of the government to instruct the Superintendent of Insurance to sort out of this Bill the clauses which apply to each class, and to prepare two draft Bills for the convenience of the committee, and to enable the Committee to deal with each separately?

If I cannot get an answer to-day, I will give this as a notice of motion.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I am afraid I can hardly promise my hon. friend an answer to-day, but I will bring the question up as soon as possible.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (B) An Act to amend the Act respecting the protection of navigable waters. —Hon. Mr. Belcourt.

The Senate adjourned till three o'clock to-morrow.

THE SENATE.

FRIDAY, November 26, 1909.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT introduced Bill (C) An Act to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

The Bill was read a first time.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I move that the Bill be read a second time on Wednesday next.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Could the hon. gentleman tell us in what way he proposes to amend that Act?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Briefly as follows: Section 20 of the Exchequer Court Act provides that there shall be a remedy on behalf of the subject, amongst other things, in subsection (c):

(c) For every claim against the Crown arising out of death or injury to the person or to property on any public work, resulting from the negligence of any officer or servant of the Crown, while acting in the scope of his duties or employment.

I propose to amend the section by adding after the word 'on' immediately before 'any public work' the following words:

Or arising on or in connection with any public work.

There has recently been a conflict of decisions in the Exchequer Court and in the Supreme Court on this point. In the last case, which was heard quite recently, in which judgment was rendered a few days ago, there is a strong intimation on the part of the hon. judges of the Supreme Court that parliament ought to be moved or might be moved so as to get over this difficulty. The learned judges of the Supreme Court have construed the word 'on' in the section which I have just quoted as debarring a suppliant from recovery for injury to person or property where the injury did not occur actually on the public work. For instance, in a case recently on the Intercolonial railway, Chamberlain vs. the King where it was shown that the injury was caused clearly by sparks emitted from an engine of the Intercolonial railway, and property immediately adjoining the railway was destroyed by these sparks, the suppliant was declared to be debarred from recovery because of the word 'on' in the section. The injury, according to the Supreme Court, must actually occur on the public work to the person or property, and where the injury does not so occur, there is no remedy. In order to overcome this difficulty I have introduced this Bill.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (D) An Act to provide for the incorporation of Railway Companies.—Hon. Mr. Davis.

TREATMENT OF IMMIGRANTS AT QUEBEC.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Moved:

That an order of the Senate do issue for the production of a copy of the several complaints which in 1908 and 1909 have been made by different parties to the Minister of the Interior or to the superintendent of immigration of the manner in which immigrants are treated at Quebec.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—There is no objection to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPENSES OF SOSTHENE MORISETTE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

1. Has a person named Sosthène Morisette, employed as a clerk in the immigration office at Quebec, ever filed to the Department of the Interior, during the fiscal year 1907-8, an account to the amount of $131.35?
2. Who certified the accuracy of the account in question?
3. Was the account accompanied by vouchers giving the nature and proving the payments of the sums of which repayment was asked?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I am under the impression that that question has been put and answered. However, I have no objection to repeat the answer. No such account appears to have been filed.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I will explain why the question has been put the second time. The first time it was not corectly translated. It was put 'had given an account,' instead of 'filed an account.' I thought the two words did not mean the same thing, and that is why I have repeated the question.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I understand that no such account has been filed.

DIVISION OF THE INSURANCE BILL.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG, in the absence of Mr. Casgrain, inquired:

1. Is it the opinion of the government that the Committee on Banking and Commerce, to which has been referred the Bill (A) intituled: An Act relating to insurance, should consider the propriety of recommending that the said Bill be divided into two Bills, one dealing with life insurance and the other with fire, marine and other kinds of insurance.
2. If in the affirmative, is it the intention of the government to instruct the superintendent of insurance to sort out from this Bill the clauses which belong to each class, and to prepare two draft Bills for the convenience of the committee, and to enable the committee to deal with each measure separately?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—In the opinion of the government, the division of the Bill into two parts at the present stage would be exceedingly difficult, occupying much time and probably preventing the presentation of the Bill until a late period in the session. It does not appear that the advantages to be gained from the division of the Bill would be of sufficient importance to call for such a course.

THE SENATE DEBATES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I should like to know when we are to have the revised edition of the Senate Debates of the first day's debate of this session The debate took place nine or ten days ago, and we have not received the revised edition yet.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY—I am sorry I cannot give the hon. gentleman any explanation on it. I will inquire of the Bureau.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I am familiar with the routine and can give the explanation. A member who should have sent in his speech revised some days ago failed to do so, and his failure to send the revise has blocked the way.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It did not block the speech before it.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—There was only one speech before it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Then we must suspect the hon. member from Middlesex of blocking the report.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I said there was one speech before. It is the second speech that has blocked the report.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middlesex)—The first speech could not have blocked the way because I returned the revised proof of my speech promptly.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If the hon gentleman refers to the speech of one of the new members introduced this session, I may tell him that the revised copy of that speech was sent to the Bureau three or four days ago.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I understand it is now being printed.

IMPERIAL CONFERENCE ON THE NAVY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I would suggest that French members of this House should be supplied with a translation of the correspondence concerning the Imperial Conference on the navy question.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I shall endeavor to obtain that. I suppose it is at the Bureau now.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I hope when we have a French Minister in this House it will relieve the hon gentleman of all the obsessions of which he is now the victim on my account. I shall address myself to the French Minister when we have one.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—That is a great temptation, and I shall endeavour to expedite the matter.

A PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to ask the government whether they have come to any decision as to when and for what length of time, the Senate will adjourn? There is a good deal of talk on the subject around the lobby, and some definite information on the subject might influence the decisions and work of the committees. It is well if the government have come to any conclusion on that point that the House should know it.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I am not in a position to fix the date. There is an important measure now before the House of Commons which I hope to be able to submit to the Senate by the middle of next week, and, until that is disposed of, I cannot consider the question of adjournment.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does the hon. gentleman refer to the French treaty?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Yes

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday next at three o'clock.

THE SENATE.

TUESDAY, November 30, 1909.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock

Prayers and routine proceedings.

SALE OF WATER LOTS, QUEBEC HARBOUR.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

Has the Governor in Council been requested, in conformity with subsection 2 of section 20 of chapter 34 of 62 and 63 Victoria, to sanction the sale, made in 1908 or 1909, of certain deep-water lots on the River St. Charles, in the harbour of Quebec?

When did the government sanction or refuse to sanction such sale?

If such sanction was given upon what date, upon whose request, in favour of whom, was this consent given?

Which are the deep-water lots that have thus been disposed of by the government or with its consent?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The answer to the hon. gentleman's question is as follows: The Department of Marine and Fisheries is not aware that the Governor in Council has been requested to sanction the sale of deep-water lots on the St. Charles river in the harbour of Quebec.

That answers the several questions.

APPOINTMENT OF JOS. P. LAVOIE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

When Mr. Jos. P. Lavoie was appointed, at Quebec, assistant immigrant agent in the Department of Immigration, was he then a British subject or an American citizen?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—A British subject, so far as the government is aware.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—He is or was?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I can only give the answer I have received, that, so far as the government knows, he is a British subject. Once a British subject, always a British subject.

SUCCESSOR TO JOS. P. LAVOIE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

Who replaced Mr. Jos. P. Lavoie as assistant immigration agent at Quebec, and what is the salary of the new assistant?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—J. J. O'Flaherty, appointed at $1,500 per annum, not now in the service.

FRENCH REPRESENTATION IN THE SENATE.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

INQUIRY.

Is it the intention of the government to add to the prestige, the usefulness and efficiency of the Senate by appointing soon, among the members who compose the Upper Chamber, persons who would represent there more extensively and more equitably the interests of the federal executive, and in such case does the government intend to grant to the French element of this country at least one of the representatives of the executive in the Upper Chamber?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—This is a question which requires serious consideration. I would be glad to know, supposing the government were to decide on that, that they could rely on the services of my hon. friend.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is a question of policy.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—A question of conversion.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I have not had the opportunity to refuse yet.

EMPLOYMENT OF LEONCE STEIN.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

1. Has Mr. Leonce Stein been within recent years in the employ of the government in the Immigration Office at Quebec?
2. What position did he occupy and what was his salary?
3. Has he been replaced, and by whom?
4. Did he resign or was he retired?
5. Upon whose recommendation?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follow:

1. Yes.
2. Chief clerk $1,500.
3. No.
4. Was superannuated, 1st July, 1909.
5. Minister of the Interior.

THE LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY rose to draw the attention of the government and of the House to the fact that:

The library of parliament, formerly the joy of the studious class and the pride of the Capital, has become, by reason of an excessive encumbrance of volumes of all sorts, and by the disgraceful arrangement that has been made of them, an inconceivable horror, an unnameable lumber room, where the statue of Queen Victoria and the objects of art are disappearing, little by little, under the rising tide of daily journals; where the joint librarians, backed into their little rooms, are constantly menaced with isolation from their families by the ever increasing wall of impenetrable sessional documents, where all the employees, visible and invisible, await suffocation with wonderful resignation, and where, worse than the white plague, the yellow peril or the German danger, death watches for all the subjects of the British empire of the upper chamber or members of the House of Commons, whom the love of the sciences or the way of duty draws into the fatal passage.

And inquired of the government:

Is it the intention of the government to put in the estimates a sufficient sum for the enlargement of the present library or the erection of a new library of greater dimensions and better fitted for the wants of our epoch?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—I should like to know if this question is in order? It seems to me that under rule 27, which provides that no motion prefaced by a written preamble is received by the Senate; it cannot be received. The motion is prefaced by a preamble.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—This is not a notice of motion, but an inquiry. I draw the attention of the House to certain facts and make an inquiry.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Is the hon. gentleman sure of the facts?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Yes, I went over there and saw what I state.

The SPEAKER—In 1908 objection was taken to a somewhat similar motion, and my predecessor in the Chair ruled that the motion was undoubtedly out of order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But this is not a motion.

The SPEAKER—This is an inquiry, and inquiry of the same character.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We have a rule which says that when the Speaker gives his decision on any objection raised, he must point out the rule which governs his decision.

Hon. Mr. POWER—While I do not approve of the notice which the hon. gentleman has given, and while the language used in the notice is somewhat exaggerated, still I do not think that the notice is open to the objection taken by the hon. gentleman from British Columbia. As the hon. member for Stadacona has pointed out, this is not a motion. No motion prefaced by a preamble is allowed, but this is not a motion. The hon. member from Stadacona calls attention to a certain state of things and ends with an inquiry. Where that particular mode of procedure is adopted, a preamble is permissible; otherwise the question would not be altogether intelligible. While I am prepared to bow to the decision of his honour the Speaker, I doubt if any precedent will be found for ruling this inquiry out of order on the ground that it is prefaced by a preamble.

The SPEAKER—This is a question which has been already decided, and the Senate has acquiesced in the ruling. On a question put by the Hon. Mr. Landry on the 13th of May, 1908, objection was taken by Mr. Power, who said 'To my mind the last of the three questions in this inquiry is the only one which is regular.' The matter was discussed, and the hon. gentleman referred in that case to Bourinot, page 434. The quotation was as follows:

It (the question) should be simply and severely accurate in its allegations. If it is hypothetical it is objectionable, and as a rule, should not be answered. It should not be ironical or convey an imputation.

Then he referred to May, page 243, and quoted as follows:

As the notice paper is published by authority of the House, a notice of a motion or of a question to be put to a member containing unbecoming expressions, infringing its rule, or otherwise irregular, may, under the Speaker's authority, be corrected by the clerks at the table.

And again on page 249:

The purpose of a question is to obtain information and not to supply it to the House.

A question may not contain statements of facts unless they be necessary to make the question intelligible, and can be authenticated, nor should a question contain arguments, inferences, imputations, epithets, or controversial or ironical expressions.

All this was quoted by the hon. member who raised the objection. He made other references to authorities and the Hon. Mr. Landry answered. Other hon. gentlemen spoke, and then I find the Hon. Speaker ruled as follows:

Rule 27 states—No motion prefaced by a written preamble is received by the Senate. I take it that this applies as well, by the authorities Bourinot and May, to questions put, which must still be more pointed and cover but the necessary matter which is to be answered. My opinion being asked, I would say that the motion is irregular, because the two first clauses are but disguised preambles to the question asked.

Then later he says:

I would say in addition, that there are other reasons why these two clauses should be ruled out of order, because their tone does not come up to the rules of the House.

Then, later on, the Speaker again being asked by the Hon. Mr. Lougheed if a notice of inquiry is to be treated as a motion, adds:

No. I stated that a motion, by virtue of rule 27, cannot be prefaced by a preamble, and that likewise a question cannot be prefaced by a preamble, and I take it for granted that the two questions put in this case can only be a disguised preamble to the inquiry that is put, and also, besides the fact that the two questions—at all events the second question—offended against the rule, which says that there shall be no ironical qualification in a question.

It seems to me, therefore, I am deciding in conformity with a former ruling.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What was the nature of the inquiry on which this decision was rendered?

The SPEAKER—I will read the question as put by Mr. Landry:

That he will inquire of the government—Does the government know whether Mr. George Tanguay, of Quebec, merchant, was for several years and until the recent municipal elections held in February last, one of the aldermen of the city of Quebec, and one of the most devoted partisans of a civic administration of which Mr. Parent, the present President of the Transcontinental Railway Commission, had been the head?

Does it likewise know whether in the course of the month of May, 1900, this same Mr. Tanguay—at a special meeting of the city council which had been secretly called, and to which the Mayor had not been summoned, in order not to offend his proverbial modesty, so it was said—caused to be voted at the expense of the taxpayers, a bonus of $5,000, which had or had not found its way to the bottom of the pocket of His Honor?

How much has this same Mr. Geo. Tanguay recieved yearly from the Commissioners of the Transcontinental Railway of which Mr. Parent became president, for goods and merchandise, during each of the years 1904-5, 1905-6, 1906-7, and 1907-8.

The hon. the Speaker held the first two of these questions contained practically a preamble, and, as such, containing a preamble, they were objectionable and could not be received. He cited rule 27, and added.

Likewise a question cannot be prefaced by a preamble, and I take for granted that the two questions put in this case can only be a disguised preamble to the inquiry that is put, and also besides the fact that the two questions—at all events the second question—offend against the rule which says that there shall be no ironical qualification in a question.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Was the third question put?

The SPEAKER—No it was not put.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think I consented to drop the first two.

The SPEAKER—No. To give notice for another day. That is my recollection. I have not looked at it, and I am speaking subject to correction.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am speaking from memory also.

The SPEAKER—I made a memorandum of the question in my own book here, that the preamble of the first question stood as a preamble to the other, so that I was prepared for it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—In that case there were three questions.

The SPEAKER—And it was held the first two were preambles.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But these are not subject to the same rules. I ask if the government has decided to place in the estimates the necessary sum.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have no interest in this matter, except that I should like to see the procedure of the Senate kept harmonious with previous decisions. You cannot make a motion in this House prefaced by a preamble. If the hon. gentleman asks a question, and merely asks a question, there can be no preamble; but we have a procedure which is peculiar to this House and the House of Lords, under which an hon. member calls attention to a certain condition of things, and then asks a question. The two cases are altogether different. There can be no discussion on a question. When the member of the government of whom the question is asked gives an answer, there can be no discussion, and no other member of the House has a right to interfere between the hon. member who asks the question and the member of whom the question is asked. But if an hon. gentleman takes the precaution to call attention to any circumstances, then there can be a general discussion. Every hon. member in the House has a right to join in; so that I think the Speaker will find on further consideration that the rule which applied in the case which he has cited does not apply to the present case, because it is a totally different procedure. The procedure adopted by the hon. gentleman in the present case has been adopted on various occasions in this House, and, as I said at the outset, unless there is something in the nature of a preamble which calls attention to the circumstances you cannot have a discussion. Perhaps his hon. the Speaker might take a little further time to consider his decision from that point of view.

Hon. Mr LANDRY—Perhaps the hon. the Speaker might give his decision to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—After the holidays.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There is no hurry, we are going to sit all week.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Why did the hon. gentleman not give a notice of motion?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No notice of motion is required. I am making an inquiry and calling the attention of the government to certain facts, and my question arises out of those facts. That has always been done in this House.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I am inclined to think the rule does not apply; but it ought to apply, so that the hon. gentleman would not have the privilege of lumbering up our records with such documents. The hon. gentleman states that such conditions prevail in our library; they do not exist, and I do not think we should advertise as facts things that do not exist. I think it is a disgrace to our records to have such a document placed on them by any hon. gentleman in this House.

The SPEAKER—The points were all covered by the same answers given in the precedent I quoted. It seems to me I cannot distinguish any difference between them at all. There is undoubtedly a preamble to the question; it is distinctly a preamble, whereas the one which was before the former Speaker was only a preamble by inference. By inference it was declared that although in the form of a question it was in reality a preamble, and if the ruling applies in such a case as that, it must apply to the present case, and I cannot see my way to change my ruling.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But we have a rule which declares that when we want to discuss a question we must call the attention of the House to certain facts, and how can we call attention to certain facts if we are precluded from putting them as a preface to the question?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I would call the attention of the hon. Speaker to rule 40.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Rule 40 states:

> When it is intended to make a statement or raise a discussion on asking a question, the senator having such intention, as part of the notice under rule 21, gives notice that he will call attention to the matter inquired into.

This rule is in my favour, and yet am I precluded by another decision which applies only to motions and not to inquiries. from giving notice that I shall call the attention of the House to certain facts, and that I will make an inquiry.

Hon. MEMBERS—Chair.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The Chair has ruled.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I would ask the hon. Speaker if his mind is quite settled on the question?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—His mind is settled.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I understand my hon. friend's mind is settled.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—So is the Speaker's.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am calling attention to rule 40.

The SPEAKER—I think it is only due to any hon. member of this Chamber, if he asks me to further consider a matter, that I should do so; therefore, I shall of course, be very glad to comply with his request. I have not any idea of changing my mind; at the same time I will look into it to see if I am right or not.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Then the matter stands.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Stand.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—We will have another row next week.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Perhaps his hon. the Speaker, when he takes the question which has been raised into consideration, would also take into consideration the language of this motion, which, to my mind, would be altogether unbecoming in our records.

PROCLAMATION RE APPOINTMENT OF JUDGES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

Has the proclamation by the Governor in Council, which is required by section 3 of chapter 12 of 50 Victoria to bring the said chapter into force and to allow the federal government to avail itself thereof in the appointing of certain judges, ever been issued and published?

When and by whom?

Has the government ever been notified of the existence of such a proclamation, and by whom?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The answer to the hon. gentleman's first and second question is, 'not so far as the government is aware.' The answer to the third question is 'No.'

PRINTING OF FINDING OF MUTUAL RESERVE COMMITTEE

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE moved:

That the finding on the evidence adduced before the Special Committee of the Senate, held in the fourth session of the 10th parliament, on the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association be laid upon the Table, together with the report of the Joint Committee of the Senate and Assembly of the state of New York appointed to investigate the affairs of Life Insurance Companies, bearing on remedial legislation, being from page 357 to end of Assembly Document No. 41, the same to be placed before the Joint Committee on Printing with the recommendation that it be printed, together with and following said last report.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would like to ask whether the Senate is in possession of the reports asked for in this motion?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If my memory serves me right, the committee made some reports, but they were never received by the Senate. Then where will they be found to be placed on the table? If they had been laid on the table of the Senate, and action taken upon them, they would then be in the possession of the Senate. My object in rising is to ask whether any one knows where that report is, and where it is to be obtained, if the motion is carried?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—If I remember distinctly, the findings of that committee were placed on the table on a tie vote of the Senate, and the hon. Speaker at the time declared the motion lost without a favourable opportunity to those interested in the matter to go further. At any rate, the motion was lost; but if the hon. gentleman from Hastings wants to find the entire document it should be found in the Debates of the Senate, because that document was read by myself verbatim, and was also discussed. I think, by the hon. gentleman from Rothesay, by the hon. gentleman from Moncton, and by many other hon. members of that committee, who were sincerely conscientious in their decisions, that the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association was a fraudulent corporation. Although the findings were not accepted officially by the House, the country could ascertain what these findings were in the columns of the Debates; but I was astounded to-day to learn from one or two senators that the Debates had been mangled. I never took the trouble to find out whether the expressions of opinion which were made at that time were entered in the Debates. I know they were published in the unrevised edition; but I was astounded to-day to learn from hon. members that many expressions of opinion uttered on the floor of this House and many documents quoted from do not appear in the revised edition of the Debates. I do not make that statement of my personal knowledge. I will make it my business to find out if it is true, and then we will probably come back to the Mutual Reserve Life affairs. In answer to the hon. gentleman from Hastings, I say that the findings of that committee are, or ought to be, on the records of this House. They were alluded to in debate and read by myself and other hon. members, and naturally taken down by the official reporters of this House, and if they are not in the Debates, then this House will have reason to ask why they were eliminated. I would be surprised beyond measure to think that documents of that importance would not be found in the official records of the House. Under the circumstances, I fail to see that the hon. gentleman from Hastings has made his point, that the document is not in the possession of the House because it is not in the revised Debates. I am not prepared to contradict him. If ever I am compelled to contradict the statement, we will have to see a little more hair fly than there is at the present moment.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think there is another point the hon. gentleman might have taken. He said there was a tie vote. If there was a tie vote, on what question was it put?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—On the adoption of the report.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Was that report brought in as an amendment?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—No, as a straight report, the report of the committee with the findings.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If it was brought in as a motion, we shall find it in the journals of the House.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—It does not appear to be.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Speaking from recollection, I think the following will be found to be the facts: The committee made its report, merely returning the evidence, and then I made a motion embodying what I considered to be the result of the evidence adduced before the committee.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—What right had the hon. gentleman to do that?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—And when this motion was made, the committee, or a majority of the committee then held a meeting and prepared a finding which was brought before this honourable House, and when their report was presented a question of order was raised on the ground that the committee had become functus officio, and, therefore, no report could be received from the committee and the point of order was sustained, therefore the report was never before the House.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I am astonished at the facts related by the hon. gentleman. I am beginning to see a little more clearly now. The hon. gentleman tells this honourable House that he undertook to bring before this House his opinion of what the committee did, and that the majority of the committee held a meeting afterwards and brought in a report which was held to be out of order. How? By a vote of this House, 20 to 20. These are the facts. Am I to understand that what we have been told is true, that statements of hon. members on the floor of this House have been expunged from the official record? That the debates of this House have been mangled?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I know nothing of that.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—So much the better; but we have to find out if these are the facts, and, if so, we will have to go to the bottom and probe and ascertain who is responsible for the expunging of remarks of hon. members and suppressing official documents. The hon. gentleman went on to say it was a majority of the committee who met and made findings. What is the committee if not a majority? The majority brought in their findings and the report was set aside on a point of order, but a tie vote was taken and before the chairman of the committee had a chance to move another motion the Chair declared it carried and we had no recourse. We accepted the condition of things, but, accepting that condition of things does not destroy the fact that the documents ought to have been printed, in fact were printed in the unrevised edition of our debates. Now, we are informed that all this has been eliminated. By the authority of whom? By the authority of the Mutual Reserve Fund Association of New York, which is defunct, the president in jail and others dead. We do not want to trample on their corpses, but we want our own bodies, which survive, respected. In conjunction with other members of that committee I shall endeavour to ascertain how much of our debates were eliminated from the record and by order of whom. This is in reply to the hon. gentleman from Hastings, who says that there is nothing official before the House. If his contention is true, I say it is a deplorable state of things, and I hope it is not so, and that a fair examination of our debates will prove that nothing has been suppressed or expunged or mangled in the interests of the corporation, and against the interests of the people of this country.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—Would it not be better to assume the report is correct, and that it has not been mangled, till we have proof that such is not the case.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman from Victoria misunderstood or misinterpreted my object in asking the question. There would be no use whatever in passing that resolution if these documents are not in possession of the authorities of the House so as to enable them to lay them on the Table and refer them to the committee. That was my only object. I must confess I see no good object to be attained by going to the expense of printing the report.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Not the report—the finding of the committee.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE. The report is all printed and distributed.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—It is only the findings that are wiped out.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What suggests itself to my mind is this: if that motion be carried and referred to the clerk would he be expected to search the Debates of the Senate to find the document that is required?

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Why should he not do so?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Such a thing would never be thought of. If the document was laid on the Table of the House and was defeated, it ought to be in the possession of the House somewhere and should form part of the record. As to the serious charge made by the hon. gentleman, that the debates and proceedings of this House have been mutilated, that is too serious to be allowed to pass without further investigation.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If it has been done in this case, it may be done in other cases of equal importance, whatever the proceedings might be. The hon. gentleman intimated that if certain things are not done, some hair is to fly. I have not too much hair left, and I do not propose that he shall interfere with it in any way. He can deal with those who have better hair than I have; but such threats are unbecoming any member of the Senate, and I think the less we have of them, and this mode of making charges—

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I made no charge. I hope the accusation is not true. Instead of making a charge I denied it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman informed the House that he had been told by senators that the record of the proceedings of the House had been mangled and mutilated. If that be true, the senators who have that information and conveyed it to the hon. gentleman, should be called upon to sustain the charge, and we should ascertain who is responsible for that wrong, because, to my mind, it is a very serious wrong. If such a thing is to be tolerated and continued, no senator will know whether the utterances or opinions he may express here, if they are at all in opposition to the opinions held by others, might be eliminated. For my part, I question very much the accuracy of the information that the hon. gentleman has received, for I cannot conceive it possible that any official of the Senate or any member of the Senate would deliberately mutilate our records. I am quite sure the official reporters of this House would never be guilty of such a thing.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—They are not in question in this matter.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—It would probably be well to end the dispute, and I will read the action of the House taken on the final report.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—What is the hon. gentleman quoting from?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—The Journals of the Senate of the session of 1904, page 286:

Senate Committee Room number 8, Thursday July 29, 1904. The Select Committee appointed to investigate the position in Canada of the Mutual Reserve Life Association, New York, beg leave to make their 9th and final report.

And so on. Then—

On a point of order being raised as to whether the committee had not ceased to exist, and the ruling of His Honour the Speaker having been asked thereon, the same was, on his request, postponed till Monday next.

Then the Monday following:

On the point of order raised on Friday the 29th July last, as to whether the Select Committee appointed to investigate the position in Canada of the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association of New York had not ceased to exist before submitting for adoption their ninth report presented to the Senate on Friday, His Honeur the Speaker gave his ruling that the point of order was well taken.

And he decided that that portion should not appear in the Journals of the Senate. The Hon. Mr. Landry appealed from the ruling, and the House divided, the vote being contents 10, non-contents 20. I say that no possible good can be attained by carrying this motion, and ordering a report made in the state of New York, some four or five years ago, to be printed.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—That is carried already.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Not to print. Simply for their consideration, I understood.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—And recommendation to print.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I did not so understand it or I certainly would have objected to it most decidedly, because it can serve no possible object, and is just a piece of wasteful extravagance, reviewing circumstances that long since should have been forgotten.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—My hon. friend left the Chamber while the matter was under discussion, and therefore did not hear it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think this motion is objectionable; first on the point of order that this information does not appear on the records of the House, and I do not see how the House can order something which is not in its possession to be printed. Then as regards the information to be conveyed to the members of the Committee on Banking and Commerce with respect to what took place in the case of the Mutual Reserve, that can all be found in the Debates of the Senate. It is all set out there, and there is no necessity or justification for attempting to take it out of the Debates of the House and have it printed in pamphlet form. The printing ordered the other day is being done for the information of the Senate at large, and more particularly the Committee on Banking and Commerce, to whom the Bill respecting insurance has been referred. I appeal to my hon. friend, and I ask him does he think that the printing or publication in any way of what took place in connection with the New York Mutual Reserve Company will be of value to the Banking and Commerce Committee in dealing with a general measure such as the Insurance Bill? There was a great deal of very interesting matter brought before the House in connection with the New York Mutual Reserve Company, but I do not think there was anything which would be very valuable to the Committee on Banking and Commerce in considering the general question of life insurance, and my hon. friend will see that there is really no special object to be gained by persisting.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I ventured to state the other afternoon that there would possibly be a discussion if that motion was allowed to go through. I did not want to precipitate any debate. I agree with the hon. ex-Secretary of State that the report from the United States should not have been accepted here. We did not know anything about it. I do not know what it is to-day, and yet this honourable House agreed to put on the Journals of the House extracts from a report that they were not in possession of. This House in that way might have all sorts of matter loaded on to our records. We should know what we are doing. Hon. members know nothing of what was done in New York, yet in the wisdom of the House the report of the Armstrong Commission was sent to the Printing Committee. I do not propose to place my judgment against the judgment of the whole House. I will assert for myself such common sense and reason as I have been endowed with, and when the House undertook to place on the Journals of the House the report from the New York Commission then I remonstrated with the Senate on throwing overboard the finding of the committee of this House, and not being willing to hear what they had to say. I care not whether the majority was one or ten or twenty. The committee made that report and as my hon. friend knows, the record of it is to be found somewhere. The committee found certain facts. Now I do not want to inflict pain upon any one in connection with this matter, but I do want to have the country seized with the fact that the findings of that committee were correct. Everything that was asserted on the floor of this House was established. It has been stated that the report was not adopted by the House. Why not? When the committee rose, the motion was that the committee do now rise. I added the words 'and report.' The minutes of the shorthand writer contained those words, but it was argued in the House that because they did not appear in the Minutes, the motion was simply that the committee rise, and we all know that according to parliamentary practice it means that the work and the functions of the committee end. If, after careful investigation, the committee had arrived at a correct conclusion, why was that short cut taken to throw out their report? Subsequent events justified the finding of the committee, and I want to bring that fact before the country. I want to have the report of our committee published with the report of the New York investigation. Although I cannot go as far as my hon. friend from Victoria division (Mr. Cloran) has gone, I am somewhat of his opinion. Although a good deal of attention was called to points in the report when matters were discussed in the House, I find no report of it here. I suppose that is what my hon. friend means by mutilating the record; but I can give the House the report because I took the precaution to have it recorded in the Minutes and Proceedings where it must stand for ever. The majority could vote us down, but it could not expunge that report from the Minutes. It will be found in the proceedings of the 9th August, 1904. Now, the original of that report must be somewhere. When it was rejected by this House, it must have gone into the archives. But we are told that the report was voted down. A vote only proves that so many voted one way and so many another way; it does not in any way influence the position, and I only ask that the finding of that committee go before the Banking and Commerce Committee. I am not making any attack on the Insurance Bill, but I want, in the consideration of that Bill, to have the two reports before the committee.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Will the hon. gentleman allow me to call his attention to the fact that he will find at page 955 of the Debates of 1904 the findings of the committee in full. The hon. member was addressing the House on the 3rd of August, and said:

> There may be some hon. members who have not heard this, and my hon. friend has put me out a little by his interruption. My motion will read in this way: That in the opinion of this House the following irregularities have been found in the management of the affairs in Canada of the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association of New York, at the pages indicated and referred to in the evidence taken before the Select Committee, &c.

And then follows the report which occupies two or three pages of the Debates. So we have it in the Minutes and in the Debates.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—My hon. friend is absolutely correct as to the page, and the particulars. We have the findings of the committee both in the Minutes and in the Debates, and it is not worth while reading it all again. I introduced the question by giving notice of a motion that the clerk of the House be instructed to preserve copies of the reports of the committee. When I gave that notice the Hon. Mr. Scott rose and said:

I beg to rise to a question of order; we must have some respect for the dignity of the House. This is not an ordinary notice of motion. The hon. gentleman is reading a public document, or some reference of the committee. I appeal to him not to degrade the House in the way it has been degraded by this committee.

Now that is very strong language. I was degrading the House because I gave notice of a motion. I do not know how I degraded myself or the committee degraded itself. I wish I had a list of the members of that committee to show who they were. But I take all that to be—what shall I say to be in order in a parliamentary sense—heated remarks, not well founded, with a desire to prejudice me and the committee and the whole subject. Of course the hon. gentleman at the time was all-powerful, and many would vote with him thinking he was right, and not wishing to offend him. Perhaps some were influenced in that way against their better judgment; but how did things turn out? The Senate is in the humiliating position of having refused to accept the report of their own committee. If they were not satisfied, they could have appointed another committee, but instead of that they branded some of the members of their own House as a degraded committee. Who was right and who was wrong? That is what is to be analysed as if it were judge and jury before the country. We must look into the bona fides of the members who formed that committee. It was not my intention to have said anything on this subject, as two or three hon. members in this House know; my desire was simply that when the report of Judge Armstrong, of the state of New York, was being printed, the report of a committee of this House on the same subject should be printed with it, in order that that committee might get credit for the work they had done. Is there any reason why the two reports should not be published together? The New York Mutual Reserve Company is not now on trial. Some of its officers gave evidence before the New York Commission that they had paid so much money to fix things up here. We passed a resolution in this House calling upon the government to make a report of who received the sum mentioned, I think $37,000. Although the House passed that order, the return has never been brought down. I trust that whoever got the money has invested it to the best advantage—compound interest at six per cent. I have nothing more to ask, but simply that the motion be carried.

The motion was declared lost on a division.

THE ASSISTANT JUDGE AT QUEBEC.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

On which of the two statutes, chapter 7 of 47 Victoria, or chapter 12 of 50 Victoria did the government base its authority for the appointment of Mr. François Langelier as assistant judge at Quebec, of the chief justice of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—On neither of the said statutes.

SUPERIOR COURT JUDICIARY OF QUEBEC.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

Who were, by order of seniority, on the 1st of June, 1906, the judges of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec, belonging to the district of Quebec, as comprised and defined for the purposes of the Court of Review, according to the exact wording of the law.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Hon. A. B. Routhier, Chief Justice, Hon. Sir F. Langelier, and Hon. Sir C. A. P. Pelletier.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I shall be obliged to repeat this question. The hon. gentleman's reply does not cover it. I call his attention to the fact now, in order that he may bring it to the notice of the department. For the Court of Review the province is divided into two districts, the district of Quebec, and the district of Montreal. The answer gives the names of only three judges, whereas there are several more judges, at least a dozen.

THE FRENCH TREATY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Before the orders of the day are called, I would ask the leader of the House if he is in a position to inform the Senate with any degree of accuracy as to the time when the supplementary French Treaty will be submitted for our consideration?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—That instrument, I believe, is under consideration in the House of Commons this very afternoon. Of course it will depend upon what action they take when it will be submitted to us.

INSURANCE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON moved the adoption of the report of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce with respect to Bill (A), An Act respecting Insurance.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The question which I had the honour to ask the right hon. leader of the House was asked really because I think that the action of the House upon this report should depend to a certain extent upon the position of the French treaty. If there is no reasonable assurance that the French treaty will reach the Senate to-morrow, then I think we should refer this report back to the Banking and Commerce Committee. The report recommends that the consideration of the Insurance Bill by the committee should be postponed until after the adjournment; but if this House is liable to sit until the middle or latter part of next week, the committee should go on with the Bill and make some progress. The hon. chairman of the committee spoke of a number of insurance officers who would like to be heard before the committee. I observe that the first 82 clauses of the Bill do not deal specially with life insurance. They are general clauses, or clauses as to which there probably will be very little discussion by the representatives of the insurance companies. The next 42 clauses deal with life insurance, and it does seem to me that if the Senate is obliged to remain here for another week waiting for the French treaty, we had better make use of our time in making some progress with the Insurance Bill. I do not know what the sentiment of the House is, but if the general feeling is the same as my own, instead of receiving this report we should adopt a resolution somewhat to this effect—that all the words after that be struck out and the following substituted therefore: 'The Committe on Banking and Commerce have leave to withdraw their second report.' That will leave them free to sit on the Bill.

The motion was agreed to.

DELAY IN PRINTING.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the adjournment of the House, I should like to know if any progress has been made with the second volume of the Auditor General's report? I am not speaking of the French edition. We will have that next year I suppose. I am speaking of the English version, and we should have that very soon now.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The government are very anxious to bring it down themselves, in order to expedite their business in both Houses, and are using every exertion to get it through. They are very voluminous documents, as no doubt my hon. friend is well aware, and we can hardly manage, do what we please, to get the whole of the printing through for all the volumes when the House meets, as it now does pretty early; but I shall call the attention of the Auditor General and also the Printing Bureau to the desire of the House to have that volume.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If the hon. gentleman goes to the Printing Bureau, perhaps, while on the same voyage, he could press a little for the printing of our revised edition of the Senate Debates.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I shall have their attention called to that also.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

THE SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 1, 1909.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

LIGHTING OF IMMIGRATION OFFICES AT QUEBEC.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

How much does it cost the government to light that part of the immigration building at Quebec occupied by Mr. Jacques Dery, the restaurant keeper, and set apart as a restaurant, buffet, dining room and kitchen?
How much does the lighting of the same departments cost?
Is it the government or the restaurant keeper who pays in whole or in part (if in part in what proportion) these expenses of lighting and heating?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The answer to the hon. gentleman's questions is as follows: The immigration building at Quebec is lighted and heated at the expense of the government. Lighting and heating accounts of the quarters occupied by the restaurant keeper are not kept separate from that of the remainder of the building.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE OF IMMIGRATION EMPLOYEES OF QUEBEC.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

1. Does the government know that from the 1st January, 1909, to the 15th April of the same year, that the employees of the immigration office at Quebec obtained three days' leave of absence each week?
2. Who gave these leaves of absence?
3. Was it the Superintendent of Immigration at Quebec?
4. Did he do it on his own responsibility or had he previously obtained the authority of the Superintendent General of Immigration at Ottawa?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The answer to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. Answered by No. 1.
4. Answered by No. 1.

PROTECTION OF NAVIGABLE WATERS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

The order of the day being called.

Second reading (Bill B) An Act to amend the Act respecting the protection of Navigable Waters.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—This Bill is one of very considerable importance, and several hon. members have expressed the desire to speak on the second reading. One of these gentlemen at least, I do not see in his place to-day, and, possibly, it would be better to allow the second reading to stand.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—My hon. friend might as well explain to the House what the general scope of the Bill is.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—The scope of the Bill is to secure an amendment to chap. 115 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, the Act which is entitled in the Statutes as, 'an Act for the protection of navigable waters.' In that Act there are various provisions, some of them relative to protection to navigation and others with reference to protection of public health. Some of the provisions of the Act are to the effect that no one shall place in navigable streams anything which is in the nature of an obstruction or impediment to navigation. Wherever anything of that kind is contemplated, permission of the Minister of Public Works is to be required before the work is done. The applicant has to file a plan with the minister, showing what the work is going to consist of, and the minister may or may not grant permission under the statute. Other provisions of the Act are with reference to public health. It is made a criminal offence, under the Act, for any person to deposit or cause to be deposited in any navigable stream rubbish, sawdust, refuse and other things which I forget for the moment. For some time past there has been a feeling in the public mind that the time has come when the health of the people of Canada requires that something should be done to prevent the contamination of our sources of water supply. Everybody recognizes that of all the natural elements there is none which is of more consequence, and the more necessary to the general public health, than water. The matter was last year the subject of investigation by the Public Health Committee of this House. It was my good fortune very recently to read the report—which has not yet been printed—of that committee, which is presided over by one of our colleagues, the Hon. Mr. DeVeber. That report is full of instruction, and also full of warning. Upon reading that report, it occurred to me that one of the things which required to be done, and ought to be done at once, was action by this parliament, in so far as this parliament has jurisdiction over the matter. The depositing of sewage, offal, and vegetable and animal matter in our streams, constitutes a menace to the public health of Canada. We have not yet gone so far in the matter that remedies are of no consequence. Now is the time to apply the remedy. The difficulty in the way arises principally from the division of jurisdiction between this parliament and the provincial legislatures. That is one of the difficulties to which the committee that I have mentioned drew attention last session. I hope it will not be considered presumption on my part, as one of the young members of this House, to say that the work done by that committee is most admirably performed. Information of the greatest value and importance was collected by that committee last year, and I should like to extend my congratulations to the members of it on what they have accomplished. It is one of the ways in which the great importance of this House ought to commend itself to the public, when it is shown that senators give their attention to such vital questions as the preservation of the public health, and do it in a thorough and efficient manner. The question of jurisdiction was dealt with by that committee, and some hon. gentlemen seemed to think there was no way in which definite steps could be taken at this stage, because the provinces claim that in matters of health they alone have jurisdiction, with the exception of quarantine, which has been specially placed under federal jurisdiction by the British North America Act. On reading the report of the committee, it occurred to me that there is one way at least in which this parliament can deal with the matter, and deal with it effectively and promptly. If we have—as unquestionably we have—jurisdiction over every navigable stream and can prevent people depositing matter which is injurious or not injurious therein, surely we have jurisdiction to deal with navigable waters in the way I propose. My proposition is this: a provision will be added to that chapter of our revised statutes making it a criminal offence for any person—and I need not remind the House that the word person means corporation, municipal as well as any other kind—to deposit sewage, offal, vegetable or animal matter refuse in a navigable stream. That, I think, will be effective. The objection may occur to some people that this is a very radical measure, that it will place our municipal corporations in a difficult position, in fact, perhaps, a position that they cannot cope with. I do not think it will have that effect, and hon. gentlemen will agree with me when they remember that that statute contains a provision by which, on application, any person intending to do anything prohibited under this Act may apply to the Governor General in Council, and the Governor General in Council is empowered by proclamation to suspend from time to time the operation of any provision of the Act. The position I take is this, that if we can restrain all persons and corporations who come under our jurisdiction—and I submit all persons and corporations living along the banks of navigable waters are for the purposes of this Bill under the jurisdiction of parliament—from depositing sewage until such time at all events as they are in a position to show that the depositing of such sewage in the rivers is not a menace to the public health, we will have taken a very long step towards preventing the pollution of the natural sources of water supply. Take the case of the city of Ottawa; the newspapers and public of Ottawa have been greatly agitated on this question. Seven or eight miles above Ottawa, the town of Aylmer has constructed a sewer for the purpose of discharging the sewage of that town into the Ottawa river. The citizens of Ottawa were immediately up in arms and protested vigorously against this being done, although they are doing fifty times worse than the town of Aylmer themselves. If the citizens of Ottawa object to the town of Aylmer depositing their sewage in the Ottawa river, the citizens living along the banks of the Ottawa between here and Montreal, and the city of Montreal also, have very good ground to object to what we are doing ourselves. The problem is a very serious one, and one which needs to be grappled with at once. If we can prevent people living along the navigable rivers from polluting the streams, we shall soon have given a good example to the legislative authorities of the different provinces. We shall soon have awakened the public to the necessity of doing something and applying to their own forum for the remedial legislation necessary.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—Is Aylmer the only town above Ottawa that is discharging sewage into the river?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Oh, no, all the villages and towns on the Ottawa river, for hundreds of miles above the city, are discharging sewage into the river. The matter may be complicated further by a system of international jurisdiction. We know that the St. Lawrence is for a great portion of its length an international stream, and whilst we in Canada take steps to prevent the pollution of the waters of that river, so far as we are concerned, it may be objected, why should we do that if our neighbours are allowed to deposit their sewage along their own shores? I think there is now a law, passed by the federal House at Washington, to prevent the pollution of navigable streams, and all that would be required in any case, I am satisfied, is for this government and the government of the United States to get together, and I have no doubt whatever that an arrangement could be arrived at by which the pollution of the water would be stopped on both sides of the river.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Does my hon. friend provide only for municipalities? Is his Bill broad enough to cover villages that are not incorporated?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Yes. The word 'person' as defined by the Interpretation Act wil include any person, or corporation or company incorporated or unincorporated.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—Does it include navigable lakes as well as rivers?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Take a navigable stream in New Brunswick, for argument's sake; there may be municipalities, but not incorporated towns where it runs. Where there are hamlets with no municipal incorporation—does it include those?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Yes. The provision I want inserted consists of four lines only. It is an addition to paragraph 19, and reads as follows:

> 19a. No person shall throw or deposit, or cause or permit to be thrown or deposited, any sewage, offal, or refuse, animal or vegetable matter of any kind whatsoever, into any river, stream or other water, any part of which is navigable or which flows into any navigable water.

The word 'person' there as defined by the Interpretation Act applies to persons incorporated or unincorporated.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Does the Bill apply to streams or rivers situate entirely in the provinces?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Of course that is a legal question. My object is to reach every navigable stream, or tributary of a navigable stream, which is under the jurisdiction of this parliament. Of course, as to rivers and streams which are under the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces, I think is not quite clear if we have authority to so legislate.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Take the instance of Montreal and Quebec; could we complain in Quebec against Montreal?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I do not know. My hon. friend can surely answer the question better than I can.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not know the scope of the Bill. I want to know if by this proposed amendment to the Act a person in the city of Quebec could complain against Montreal?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. JONES—May I ask the hon. gentleman the effect it would have on the city of Toronto, as an illustration, where the sewage is discharged into Lake Ontario. There are no plans in the meantime by which drainage could be provided otherwise, and if such a Bill were passed, Toronto would, if necessary, to take care of such a situation as that, require that before the Act came into force sufficient time should be allowed to make other provisions; otherwise it would create an impossible situation.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Possibly I did not make myself quite clear on that point. I stated that the very Act which I am now proposing to amend contains a provision, the last provision of the statute, that upon application to the Governor General in Council, the Governor General in Council may from time to time, and for such time as he may think proper, suspend the operation of the Act if he deems that course to be in the public interest. So that the corporation of Toronto, like the corporation of Ottawa, are fully protected. All they will have to do will be to appeal to the government and say 'we want three years,' or 'we want ten years in order to install a system of purification, and when we have done that we are quite willing to submit to the Act.' So that no grave injustice or inconvenience will be created.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Does the hon. gentleman contend that the federal parliament has jurisdiction over rivers and streams in matters not connected with navigation?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—There are rivers in Canada which are exclusively under the control of this parliament. The St. Lawrence, the Ottawa, St. Clair and other rivers I could mention. There are other rivers which are not under the control of this parliament.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—But as regards navigation?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Yes, in every respect.

Hon. Mr DAVID—As regards navigation?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I am not dealing with navigation just now.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—May I ask if any provision is made whereby the hon. gentleman would protect one incorporated city or town from the water flowing from another incorporated city or town, on any stream, or is it simply on navigable streams? Has he adopted any means in his Bill whereby septic tanks might be so constructed as to protect the citizens and then continue the drainage to the stream?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—No.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—If the hon. gentleman has no provision of that kind, I am afraid that his Bill will cause more harm than good. If he prevents the drainage from septic tanks entering the river it will do the municipality or the people living in the locality more harm than good.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I have anticipated that, and I think I have taken the proper course. I do not propose that any particular method of purification of sewage should be adopted, for the simple reason that what may be a perfectly feasible method in one case would be utterly unfeasible and impracticable in another case. The question is left altogether open. We make it an offence to deposit sewage in the river. We simply affirm the principle. If any person wishes to deposit injurious substances in the river, he must show that he shall deposit it in a way not injurious to public health whether it is by a septic tank or by ozonation or percolation. I do not propose to discuss that phase of the question now, and I do not think we should be bothered with it here.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—The hon. gentleman is creating a criminal offence, and making no provision whereby people can escape punishment under the criminal law.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Yes, I have; the hon. gentleman did not understand me. If the city of Ottawa wishes to continue to deposit sewage in the river, it must apply to the Governor General in Council for permission to do so, and it is in the power of the Governor in Council to give that permission for one or three years, or until such time as Ottawa puts itself in a position to comply with the law.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This is a very important measure which the hon. gentleman from Ottawa proposes to have read a second time; but, as I understand, he simply rose for the purpose of asking that the order of the day be postponed, and at the request of the hon. leader of the House he gave a very clear and succinct explanation of the effect of the measure, in order that the members of this House should be able to deal with it more intelligently when the Bill comes to be read a second time. I think it is altogether irregular to have a general discussion on the matter now; that will be in order on the second reading, and the hon. gentleman should move that the order be discharged, and that it be placed on the orders of the day for a future sitting.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I move that the order of the day be discharged, and that it be placed on the orders of the day for Tuesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF REVISED EDITION OF DEBATES.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I should like to inquire from the right hon. leader of the House if there is any progress being made in the printing of the revised edition of our debates.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I inquired, but have not yet received a reply from the Printing Bureau.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—They do not reply very promptly there. Perhaps we shall have a better chance if we inquire where the second volume of the Auditor General's report is.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—As I mentioned to my hon. friend yesterday, I hope to receive that report in a few days.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We cannot take a holiday without having that report. We will be obliged to remain here. Is there any news of the French treaty?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It is standing for third reading and I am in some hope that it will be read a third time before the House rises to-day.

The Senate adjourned until three o'clock to-morrow.

THE SENATE.

(2) Of the correspondence on this subject exchanged between the agent of the Canadian Pacific railway, Mr. Jules Hone, and Messrs. Lavoie and Stein of the Immigration Office at Quebec, and the Superintendent General of Immigration at Ottawa, Mr. W. D. Scott, in November and in December, 1908.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—There is no objection to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

SENIORITY OF QUEBEC JUDGES.

INQUIRY POSTPONED.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

Who were, by order of seniority, on the 1st of June, 1906, the judges of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec, belonging to the district of Quebec, as comprised and defined for the purposes of the Court of Review, according to the exact wording of the law?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The Department of Justice advised me that they would require a little time to prepare an answer to the question of the hon. gentleman, and I would ask him to let it stand.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Stands until Tuesday next, and that means January.

SALARY OF MR. J. J. O'FLAHERTY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

1. Does the person who replaced Mr. Stein in the Immigration Office at Quebec, Mr. J. J. O'Flaherty, appointed chief clerk at a salary of $1,500 a year, occupy the same position at present?
2. If the position became vacant, by whom was it filled?
3. What is the salary of the new officer?
4. When was the latter appointed?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follow:—

1. Mr. J. J. O'Flaherty is not now in the service.
2. The position has not been filled.
3. See answer to No. 2.
4. See answer to No. 2.

NATIONALITY OF MR. JOS. P. LAVOIE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

1. How and since when does the government know that Mr. Jos. P. Lavoie, immigration agent at Quebec, is a British subject?
2. Was he such at the time of his appointment as assistant immigration agent at Quebec on 1st April, 1907?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follow:

1. The government has no advice except that Dr. J. P. Lavoie was born in Quebec and gave his nationality in his establishment form as French Canadian.
2. See answer to No. 1.

COMPLAINTS AGAINST SOSTHENE MORISSET.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

1. Has the Department of the Interior been informed, that at the opening of navigation in April, 1907, the Superintendent of Immigration, Mr. W. D. Scott, assembled at Quebec in the Immigration Offices all the principal officers of that office to communicate to them the complaints which he had received against certain employees, and notably against Mr. Sosthène Morisset, who was accused of constantly divulging in public secrets of office, and that he threatened the said Morisset with immediate suspension after the first indiscretion committed by that officer?
2. Was the department notified that the accused officer continued to divulge the secrets of the office?
3. If the department was not notified, was the Superintendent General of Immigration at least made aware of similar indiscretions and what means was taken to cause them to cease?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The answer to the hon. gentleman's questions is 'No.'

ALLEGED OVERCHARGING AT IMMIGRATION BUILDINGS AT QUEBEC.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY rose to direct the attention of the government to the following article published by the 'Morning Chronicle,' at Quebec, on the 27th June, 1906:

An Investigation.

Regarding complaints of alleged overcharging at the Immigration Buildings.

An investigation into alleged overcharging, &c., to immigrants at the immigration buildings in this city, was opened here yesterday. Mr. Blair, of the Interior Department, came from Ottawa to conduct the inquiry. A number of witnesses were heard, with regard to the charges. These were taken down in writing and will form the basis of a report which Mr. Blair will submit to the government in a few days. This gentleman, in conversation with a 'Chronicle' representative, said that in a rush of immigration work, such as there was this season, some of the cogs in the machinery may have slipped, but he said that all complaints concerning immigration matters would be fully investigated and the department would see that no injustice will be permitted. In the present case the complaints will be probed to the bottom, and if they are proven, justice will be done.

At the inquiry Rev. Mr. Williams, of the Methodist church, insisted that city retail prices prevail in the immigration building, and that lists containing these prices be posted in prominent positions throughout the building. The reverend gentleman and Mr. J. C. Thompson, who were present at the inquiry, expressed their satisfaction with the proceedings so far. Mr. Blair will make further inquiries to-day.

It was suggested to the 'Chronicle' representative, by a prominent clergyman that the catering at the immigration buildings be put up for public competition yearly. All would then have a chance of competing and the successful tenderer would always do his best to please his patrons, so as to secure the business for the next year.

And inquired of the government:

1. Is it true that at the end of the spring of 1906, a Mr. Blair, of the Department of the Interior, went to Quebec to hold an investigation concerning certain charges as to the manner in which the Immigration Office at Quebec was being administered?
2. Did this officer conducting the inquiry make a report to the government upon the object of his mission and of the conclusions to which he came after holding his inquiry?
3. What action did the government take in the matter?
4. Were the suggestions, which it is stated that the Rev. Mr. Williams made at the time of the inquiry, accepted, and was the retail prices of goods needed by immigrants posted up for the information of the latter?
5. Does the government now require that the contract for catering for immigrants or for the sale of goods for their use, shall be given after tenders have been asked for through the newspapers and regularly submitted?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The answer to the first question is yes; to the second question, yes; to the third question, they have adopted the suggestions as far as practicable; to the fourth question, yes; to the fifth question, no.

THE AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT.

The SPEAKER laid on the Table a copy of the letter received from the Auditor General on the subject of the indemnity paid to Senators for the last session of parliament.

The letter was read at the Table.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Will this letter appear in our 'Minutes?'

The SPEAKER—It will, now that it has been read.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—How does it happen that this letter refers to a letter of the month of September last?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—September, 1908.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There was one in September, 1908, and also one in September, 1909. How does it happen that the latter appears in the Auditor General's report which was supposed to have been closed on the 31st of March last? I do not understand it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Since this explanatory letter of the Auditor General has been read, I think it is opportune that some one should express the views of the Senate on the subject of the letter, the discrepancy between the reported attendance of senators and the reports made by the clerk, based on the solemn declaration of the senators. The Senate has no objection to the Auditor General asking a question and getting an explanation as to those discrepancies, but it is decidedly objectionable, when the discrepancies are explained, that the name of the senator to whom it relates should appear in the report of the Auditor General, because then the incident is seized upon by newspaper correspondents and bandied about from the Atlantic to the Pacific, putting the senator in a very awkward position before the country. It seems to me that when the inquiry of the Auditor General is satisfied, the matter should end there, and the Auditor should not take it upon himself to cast a doubt on the declaration of that senator by the publication of the correspondence in his annual report.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—When this question was before the Senate a few days ago, I pointed out what I considered the partiality of the Auditor General in mentioning some senators' names and not mentioning others. Apart from that, I cannot understand how it happens, as intimated by the hon. gentleman from Stadacona, that correspondence of a month or two ago should appear in the report of the Auditor General, which was supposed to have been closed on the 31st of March last, unless it was for the purpose of discrediting some members of the Senate. That is the only interpretation I can put upon it. I quite agree that it is the duty of the Auditor General, if he thinks accounts laid before him are not correct, to make the fullest possible inquiry. I had myself great admiration for the late Auditor General, who took such trouble to ferret out what he thought were improper payments, or what he thought were improper recommendations for payment. I could not find fault, as a member of the Senate, with the present Auditor General, had he followed the same line; but why should he include the correspondence of September last in a report which was closed months before? After making inquiry as to the correctness of accounts received from the Clerk, if he considered the explanation of the Clerk sufficient to justify the action which had been taken, or if the irregularity had been corrected, why should he publish the correspondence in a matter which is certainly not of public interest? As I understand the case, it is this: one senator believed, as most of us did, that parliament was to be prorogued on the 18th of May, and, under that impression, he made his declaration to the clerk; but some unforeseen circumstances prevented parliament proroguing until the 19th, and, consequently, one day should have been deducted from the number mentioned in his declaration. In that case, the senator acted in good faith, and the moment his attention was called to the error he refunded the amount overcharged. He placed himself right at once; yet, in the face of that fact, the Auditor General calls attention in his report to this innocent error. I notice also in the correspondence that he speaks of an opinion given by the clerk as 'frivolous.' That is his personal opinion, but a great many others share the opinion of the clerk as to the real meaning of the Indemnity Act. They may not be so astute and learned as the Auditor General, but it seems to me his duty was, instead of publishing that correspondence, to have called the attention of the Minister of Justice to the fact and to have asked him what the legal interpretation of the Act was. I have already pointed out what has occurred under the Act, but the Act has been interpreted in different ways, and the clerk has taken the only course which, to my mind, under the circumstances, he could take. The Auditor General should be informed at least by those who have any control over him—that is the parliament of Canada and not the government—that if he exceeded his duty, parliament, whichever branch it may be, will give their opinion on it, and try and teach him what his duties are.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I should like to add one word to what has been said by the hon. member from Hastings. I do not think it is proper for the Auditor General to insert in his report such communications as took place between himself and the clerk, reflecting upon several hon. members of this House. I may say frankly, as I said before, when the matter was under discussion the other day, that he should not hold the clerk of the Senate responsible for the declaration of any hon. gentleman. When a mistake of this kind occurs in a declaration made by an hon. member of this House, then it is, in my judgment, the duty of the Auditor General to put himself into communication, not with the clerk, who knows nothing about it, but with the senator himself, and I venture to say that there is not a man on either side of this Chamber who would not at once rectify any mistake he may have made in his declaration. The declaration solemnly taken by hon. members of this House should not be mutilated by any one in this Chamber or out of it. The Auditor General should accept the declaration of an hon. gentleman except in case of a palpable mistake, and in such a case he should call it to the attention of the gentleman who made the mistake. The mistake would in that way be at once rectified without giving publicity to it through the various newspapers who are placarding with great big headlines the fact that senator so-and-so had taken from the country money that did not belong to him, a most infamous thing for a newspaper to do, discrediting that hon. gentleman in his own locality. They did not stop in this case to see whether it was a penny or one hundred pounds, but at once seized upon the correspondence in the Auditor General's report and made an accusation against an innocent person. It has been well said by the hon. gentleman from Hastings, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, that the Auditor General is the servant of parliament, and they alone should direct the Auditor General as to how he should conduct himself, it should not be done through the clerk of the House at all. If I understand parliamentary procedure aright, he is an appointee of both Houses, and can only be removed by a vote of both Houses of parliament. We should not be considered his inferiors, which is practically the position he places us in. If we are responsible in a certain measure for his position, he should be very careful in accusing any hon. gentleman in this House of taking money from the country which he is not entitled to take.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Part of the trouble has arisen, I understand, through the want of a little precaution. The officers of our House are very careful to get the names of members in attendance and keep the record; but every now and then some one who is in attendance has not been placed on the record as being present on a particular day. The Auditor General takes the 'Minutes,' and not the corrected record. If a member sees his name is not in the 'Minutes,' he immediately calls the attention of the proper officers to the fact that he was here the day previous, or a few days as the case may be, and an amended record is kept in the clerk's office. It is not sent to the Auditor General, who compares the member's attendance, as it appears on the unrevised record with his declaration. I think it would be well, when an error is detected in the record and corrected, that the Auditor General should be advised of it.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—I quite agree with what has been stated by the hon. gentleman from Killarney. I should like to ask the hon. leader of the government in this House, or hon. members of this House, if the Auditor General is supposed to take the record of this unrevised, if you like, or revised 'Minutes,' or is he supposed to take the declaration of the senator? There must be some way or other of getting at it. Our declarations are absolutely unnecessary if the Auditor General is going to be guided by the unrevised edition of the records of this House.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I understood from the Auditor General, and I understand from the letter which has just been read here, that in future he proposes to accept without reserve the declarations of senators. The mistake has arisen, no doubt, through our habit of printing every day in our proceedings the record of the gentlemen who have entered the Chamber, and, until it has been explained to him, he might naturally suppose that those daily minutes are a sort of official document, which they are not, as I understand it. I do not think there is the slightest fear that in future any such publication as has taken place will ever be repeated.

AUTHORITY OF CLERK OF THE SENATE.

The SPEAKER—I beg to inform the House that I have received the following letter from the clerk of the Senate:

I have the honour to request that the accompanying memorandum be laid on the table for the information of the Senate.

Memorandum referring to the authority vested in the clerk of the Senate under the title Chief of Staff, such as recommended by the report of the Committee on Internal Economy, on the 9th May, 1902, and adopted by the Senate on the 12th of that month. The undersigned would respectfully request to be informed if the instructions issued by him to the staff in connection with the discharge of their duty can be countermanded by any individual member of the House, without authority to do so by the Senate.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is that in the nature of an inquiry? I suppose it will stand as a notice of inquiry. We are not able to answer that question now.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I think it would be advisable to refer this matter to the Committee on Internal Economy, who made the report, to deal with.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Would it not be advisable that the committee should have the opinion of some hon. members of the House before they decide on it?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Certainly we shall not decide in the dark.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It seems to me there can be only one answer to the question asked by the clerk. The committee on Internal Economy adopted certain recommendations with respect to the duties and powers of the officers of the House. They embodied these recommendations in a report which was adopted by the Senate.

Hon. Mr LANDRY—That was in 1902.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes, and has never been repealed or revoked. In that case, the question is simply whether the action of the Senate as a House can be reversed by a single senator, and it seems to me there is only one answer to that, that the action of the House must hold good.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—If it really means that, the hon. gentleman is correct; but does it mean that?

Hon Mr. DANDURAND—Inasmuch as we are now discussing an academic question, it is perhaps as well that the matter should be deferred until Tuesday next, because we may not have time to-morrow to discuss it. When we are apprised of the fact, and have a concrete case before us, we shall be in a better position to discuss it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Better say Tuesday, 11th January.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Very well.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Does the hon. gentleman give notice that he will move that this be taken into consideration when the House meets in January?

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—A matter of this kind, brought before the House without a specific declaration of any particular interference with the clerk is not sufficient. The interference should be specified, so that whoever may be at fault should have a chance to be heard in the matter; and there is only one place in which it can be heard. If these regulations, affecting the rules of the House and the duties of the officers, were promulgated by the Committee on Internal Economy, it would seem to me that they are the only committee to whom this letter of the clerk should be referred.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We have before us a letter which has been deposited on the table. I suppose we will take that into consideration at the next meeting, and if there is a motion to refer it to a committee, it will be the proper way to deal with it.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I move, seconded by the hon. gentleman from De Lorimier, that the question be taken into consideration when we meet in January.

The motion was agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (9) An Act to amend the Inland Revenue Act—Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

FRENCH TREATY BILL.

FIRST READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (12) An Act respecting certain supplementary conventions between His Majesty and the President of the French Republic.

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—With the concurrence of the House, I would move that the second reading be proceeded with forthwith, and I move the suspension of rule 23 F.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Would the hon. gentleman not prefer to move that it be the first order of the day?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I would rather, looking at the short time at our disposal, of course it is a matter wholly and entirely in the pleasure of the House—take the second reading now. The Bill is extremely short, and all that has been done in it is simply to provide that certain classes of animals therein specified, to wit, oxen, cows, bullocks, steers and heifers, shall be admitted under the treaty, but not those that are in fat condition for butchering. That is the whole purport of the Bill, one single emendation to the treaty which has been already ratified by both Houses of parliament.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman misunderstood me. I suggested that it be made the first order on to-day's paper.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Then I move the suspension of rule 23 F, and I also move that this shall be made the first order of the day.

The motion was agreed to.

CORRECTION OF MINUTES.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the orders of the day are called, I should like to draw the attention of the proper authorities to the fact that there has been omitted from yesterday's 'Minutes' (No. 10), the fact that I drew the attention of the House to certain matters with regard to the library, and, after drawing attention to those facts, a member of the House rose and made an objection on a point of order, and that has been suspended, pending the decision of the Chair. I desire that in the 'Minutes and Proceedings' of this House, of Tuesday, November 13th, it should be stated that I drew attention to certain facts, that the objection was taken, and that decision on that objection was reserved. At page 82 of the 'Minutes,' hon. gentlemen will see that I called the attention of the Senate to certain facts, and the facts that were contained in my motion were recited in the 'Minutes." I ask that a similar course be followed in regard to the 'Minutes' at page 106. It is the same class of motion.

FRENCH TREATY BILL.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (No. 12) An Act respecting a certain supplementary convention between His Majesty and the President of the French Republic. He said: As I have already mentioned to the House, this is a very short Bill. It contains but one clause, whereby animals in a condition for butchering, chiefly cows and bulls, shall not participate in the benefits of the tariff. That is the whole intent and purport of the Bill. If there is any further information hon. gentlemen desire to have on the subject, I shall be happy to give it; but, practically, that is the whole scope of the measure.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Although we all seem to be of one mind as to the propriety of ratifying the slight amendment made to this treaty, I crave permission to add a few words to the explanation already given by my right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I should like to mention the circumstances under which this amendment came to light, so as to put on record my appreciation of the correct attitude of the French government and the very great cordiality which was shown throughout the latter part of the negotiation. Last year, at this date, I was in Paris with Hon. Mr. Fielding, the Minister of Finance. The treaty had been voted upon during the preceding winter by the House of Assembly, and the Senate had referred it to its Customs Commission, whose report had been expected since the spring. It was then a matter of public notoriety that the treaty would not find favour either with the commission or with the Senate. The principal obstacle which it encountered came from the concessions made to our agriculture and to the fear that the French market would be invaded by our cattle under the minimum tariff. The news had spread throughout France that the Americans had just bought some land in the neighbourhood of Paris and Havre, for the establishment of abattoirs, and the protectionist group of the Senate, presided over by Mr. Meline, had been urgently summoned for the purpose of requesting the government to prevent any municipality from granting a franchise to the American trust. The resolution voted at that largely attended meeting of senators denounced frankly the Canadian treaty, as a source of danger because of the advantages given to our herds. It was under these very unfavourable conditions that we met the then Minister of Commerce, M. Cruppi. He did not conceal his alarm. He asked us to study the situation with him in order to see if we could not help him to a certain extent, but he added at the same time that whatever might be the result of our conference he would back the treaty before the Senate with all his authority and that of his colleagues of the cabinet.

We had occasion to meet Messrs. Meline, Viger, Touillot, Noel and other senators belonging to the Customs Commission of the Senate, and we found that the French herds were the object of the most serious solicitude on the part of these gentlemen. Very soon we realized that if our lean cattle could occasionally, under the very special conditions of the French market, find a market there, it was next to impossible to ever think of sending fat cattle ready for the butcher. The attempt had already been made by some of our cattle shippers with disastrous results. Cattle sent to Europe for immediate consumption lose something of their weight and of their normal condition in transit. This, joined to the fact that they are stamped as being foreign, reduces their value by at least ten per cent, whereas if they are sent to graze for a few weeks they regain their condition, and, being absorbed into the French herds, they command the current prices for French beef. We also soon realized that the day when the French market would be threatened with an invasion of our fat cattle, the French cattle raisers would find an easy way to protect themselves through the public laws on hygiene and quarantine as the British cattle raisers do. It was in view of these facts that Mr. Fielding offered to strike from the minimum tariff cattle in condition for the butcher. The Minister of Commerce, Mr. Cruppi, and the Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Ruau, both of whom had defended the treaty before the Senate Commission, assured us that with this modification the treaty had a very good chance of passing the Upper House, and as a matter of fact the Senate did ratify the treaty practically unanimously. It is true that it was not as well received when it returned to the Chamber of Deputies for the ratification of the amendment made by the Senate. Some 150 members voted against it. It is always easy to indicate the weak points in any commercial convention, for the advantages must necessarily be divided; but if one examines the beneficial effect which the limited convention of 1893 had upon our exchanges, it must become apparent that our commerce with France can only continue to grow under the much wider convention now before the House.

We have only words of gratification for the very cordial and sympathetic reception we met with at the hands of Messrs. Cruppi and Ruau, and the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Mr. Pichon, who had constantly shown us an earnest desire to carry the treaty. I cannot overlook the cordial support given to us by Mr. Siegfried, who had charge of the report of the Customs Committee in the House of Assembly, and of the help given us by the indefatigable friend of Canada, Mr. Herbette, Councillor of State.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman will remember no doubt that three years ago negotiations took place between the French Ambassador at Washington, and Secretary Root, in reference to the admission of meats from the United States into the French market. Can the hon. gentleman tell us whether the point he had raised in regard to fat cattle applies to the United States?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—There is no question but that to-day United States cattle, fat or lean, are under the maximum list.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is not my recollection of it. My recollection is that the arrangement entered into at that time is still in force. I notice in the Commons ' Hansard ' that the attention of the other House was called to the fact that while the Minister of Agriculture was pointing out the advantages which would accrue to Canada from this treaty, he forgot to mention the fact to which I have directed attention here. I will read the statement appearing in the report of the debate in the Commons, so that the House will understand more clearly what it means:

About three years ago Secretary Root, and the ambassador from France, who was in Washington, had made a provisional arrangement of a reciprocal character wherein France agreed to afford to the United States several advantages; first, the admission of American meats under a guarantee of their purity and soundness made in compliance with the meat inspection laws; secondly, the admission of American cattle for slaughter within ten days after their arrival; thirdly, authority to transport American cattle through French territory, more considerate treatment of the American salt meat imports and greater leniency in the regulations for the entry of American imports generally. This arrangement still holds good between France and the United States, so it means that, without any treaty, Secretary Root and the French ambassador have agreed that the Americans should have just as good if not better terms for their farmers and their producers than the Canadian government have procured for our farmers by this much vaunted treaty.

The question asked was whether that privilege is extended to fat cattle. There is nothing in this declaration to show that it does not, and I might point out this important fact, that when the attention of the Minister of Agriculture was called to this arrangement made between Secretary Root and the French Ambassador in Washington, no contradiction was made. I therefore came to the conclusion that it must be still in force, and that is why I asked the hon. gentleman whether the Americans were to enjoy the advantages which would accrue under this arrangement, that are now granted to us under this treaty.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I am not familiar with the arrangements spoken of as having taken place between Secretary Root and the French Ambassador; but I do know that one of the principal objections that the French Senate had to adopting the Canadian treaty was the admission of that principle, which the United States would, perhaps, try to avail themselves of in the negotiations that have been carried on for some time, without success to this date. It is a fact that there was an advantage given to Canada which would have to be denied to the United States, and I am quite clear as to the fact that the advantages obtained by Canada, under this convention, in favour of our lean cattle, are not enjoyed by the United States, and still less by the fat cattle of the United States.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This interview between Secretary Root and the French Ambassador, it is quite evident, arose out of the fact that a treaty had been entered into between France and Canada. Secretary Root called their attention to the effect it would have upon exportations from the United States. The hon. gentleman knows that the difference between the maximum and the minimum tariff is very great, and if we enjoy privileges under this treaty from which the United States is debarred, the arrangement is entirely in our favour. It was for this reason, I doubt not, that Secretary Root, acting on behalf of his government, had the interview with the French Ambassador. According to the statement made in the House of Commons, which was not contradicted, the arrangement made at the time, we must infer, is still in force. I understand the policy of the protectionists in France. I believe protection, under certain circumstances, is the best policy that can be adopted; but if lean cattle are admitted at the minimum rate while fat cattle are debarred, the agriculturists of France would profit by the consumption of feed supplied to the cattle. It would furnish to that extent a market for the sale of their farm produce, and at the same time protect them against the competition of foreign fat cattle. It seems to me that the Canadian negotiators—I do not desire to say it offensively—did not know what they were doing when they got into the hands of the astute French statesmen, who evidently understood the question much better than they did. It will be remembered that when this subject was under discussion some time ago, I called the attention of the then leader of the House to the statement which had been cabled from England as to the effect the treaty would have upon the different countries enjoying the favoured-nation clause. I remember distinctly that the Secretary of State looked upon it as mere newspaper gossip, and that the government knew nothing at all about it. Now it transpires that this treaty does apply to all the countries enjoying the favoured-nation clause, and we receive no compensation or consideration from those countries for the concession made to them. We are told now that the nations which would profit are the Argentine Republic, Austria-Hungary, Bolivia, Colombia, Denmark, Japan, Russia, Sweden, Venezuela, Norway and Switzerland. I do not desire to pursue the subject at any great length; but those who have given any attention to the trade between Canada and France must come to the conclusion that this treaty is a very harmless one. If there are any advantages, they will go to the French Republic rather than to Canada. I notice also that the Minister of Agriculture laughed at the idea that it would affect our cattle exportation to any very great extent.

The statistics of the last ten or fifteen years show that the exportation of cattle from Canada have increased enormously, some 500 per cent, and we may look forward in a short time, when our western country is better settled, and transportation facilities have increased, to the production of cattle, horses and other animals in this country as great as that of the United States, and we shall have to seek markets somewhere for our output. For that reason, the greatest care should be taken in entering into negotiation with any country which would affect markets for the future enormous output of our western country. Our exports to France are a very small part of our total export of cattle. Out of about $50,000,000 they reach only one and three-quarter million, of which very nearly eight hundred thousand represent exports of foreign products. These figures show how little trade we have hitherto done with France. How far this treaty will increase that trade can only be revealed in the future. We must subsidize steamers to the extent of $200,000 to carry on this small trade. The products of France, which are included in this treaty, are of sufficient extent to fill vessels coming to this country, but it is the reverse the other way. If you except grain and cattle, it is questionable how far, unless it is done from the manufacturing industries of this country, we shall be able to supply cargoes for vessels plying between the two countries. We know how it is with the trade between Australia and Canada. It is just the reverse of our French trade. We fill every vessel that sails from Canada to Australia, but in Australia they have not freight for return cargoes to Canada. Consequently, in order to continue that trade, we are justified in paying a pretty large subsidy to keep it in existence. Then there is another point. Nearly all the farm products that are produced in this country are also grown in France. I have noticed that the government boasted of a very large market in France for eggs and butter, but when we look at the other side of the question we find that France exports double the quantity she imports, consequently it is evident there is little or no market there for the products of the farm. I think the facts as they appear in the Trade and Navigation returns will show that this provision will have little effect. On the other hand, while the Trade and Navigation returns do not indicate any increase in that respect, I frankly admit that some industries will be materially benefited under this treaty, and that is one gratification that, as a protectionist, I have in the treaty being placed on the statute-book. In looking at the returns you will find there are many manufactured articles, particularly agricultural machinery, such as threshers, reapers, etc., on which the manufacturers in this country will have an advantage that they have not had in the past. While I am convinced of that fact, I am satisfied there will be no general benefit of any great amount, otherwise, except to those who breed and raise lean cattle. That trade may increase, but if the agreement said to have been made with the United States remains in force, with their great output they will be competitors with Canadians in the market.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The hon. gentleman is undoubtedly aware that there is no agreement that can be had between the Ambassador of France and Mr. Root, or could be made, without the sanction of the parliaments of the two countries. I can understand that regulations of some kind could be adopted, which would have no effect on the tariff.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am well aware of that; but the statement that I have read, which has not been contradicted, shows there were regulations entered into. Whether they have been approved by congress and the French parliament, to make it a statutory enactment, I am not prepared to say. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that if these regulations have been made and approved by the governments of the two countries without legislative sanction, it would act in France,

I presume, as an order in council acts in this country.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It may be regulations as to quarantine.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It may be in that respect, because it says so. In one respect it says the cattle can be exported to the United States under the quarantine regulations, so far as their health is concerned. I had prepared a somewhat elaborate statement on the subject, but I do not think that any good will result from occupying the time of the House, for the reason that the passage of the treaty is a foregone conclusion. I have given in the very few remarks I have made, the views I hold on the treaty. I can readily understand that there is a great deal of sentiment connected with treaties of this kind. I can understand that my hon. friend, because of his nationality and the ancestral feeling that still prevails and properly so in his heart, would have strong sympathy with any proposal to increase trade and closer connection with the country of his ancestors. A large number of us had the same feeling when preferential trade was extended to Britain. I frankly confess that it actuated me to a very great extent, although there are conditions in the preferential that I am not particularly in favour of, because they interfere with certain industries which I thought would be affected by it; but, notwithstanding that, the sentimental feeling probably would prevail, although it would have been much stronger if the preferential had been enacted for a sentimental purpose alone. We all remember that one or two of the ministers at that time—I am not so sure but my hon. friend who leads the House was one of them—when boasting of the preference they were giving to the mother country, said its provisions were open to any country that will come down to a certain minimum tariff, to the same privileges in our markets that England enjoys to-day. So that it was not altogether sentiment but rather a movement in the direction my hon. friend from Ottawa would like to see carried out, that is a policy of free trade with which I have no sympathy whatever. Let us hope that this treaty, opening our market as it does to the countries to which I have called attention, may not have the effect that some of us anticipate it will have. I repeat again that when the preference policy was introduced the government were aware of the effect it would have on our market by letting in the products of other countries. You will remember distinctly that when the preferential trade was before parliament I called the attention of the then leader of the government, the late Hon. Mr. Mowat, to the fact that it was in contravention of the German-Belgium treaty. I will say this for the hon. gentleman that he never contradicted me, nor could an opinion be extracted from him on that subject; but he studiously, with the astuteness characteristic of that hon. gentleman, evaded the question. One of the ministers of the other House, it will be remembered, stated boldly that any child would know that the law which we were then putting on the statute book would not interfere with the German-Belgium treaty, yet when that gentleman went before the law lords of the Privy Council in England, they would not hear him, they simply told him that the matter was so plain that it was not worth his while wasting the time of the court or those who were listening to him with it. It appears to be precisely the same with this French treaty until the facts came out, that the different countries to which I have called attention are to share in the same advantages that France will in our markets. Whether this is going to have the same effect upon Canada that the denunciation of the German treaty had with England I am not prepared to say. The course adopted by Germany no doubt injured the trade of Canada to an enormous extent. It has been thought by many that the action of the present government in imposing the surtax should not have been taken. I am not in accord with that sentiment, although I think retaliation in tariff legislation should be avoided to as great an extent as possible. Germany took a certain course, that placed us in a disadvantageous position. They would have done it regardless of its effect on Canada, and the only manner in which we could meet it was by pursuing the policy that our government adopted. A retaliatory measure, under these circumstances, was, I think, quite justifiable. This Bill is an amendment to the treaty which we affirmed two or three years ago, simply adding a few words to it to regulate the importation of cattle. I hope I may be mistaken as to the effect of this treaty. I know that under the original treaty no great results followed, and when I moved in this House for a return showing the effect of that treaty during the number of years it has been on the statute book, it was shown that it really amounted to nothing, or comparatively nothing. The trade had not increased to any great extent.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—No harm in that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is great harm in it, if we gave them advantages and we got none in return. If my hon. friend can get an advantage over another, and the other fellow gets nothing, it may be all right as far as my hon. friend is concerned, but not so with the man with whom he is dealing. I hope I may be disappointed in regard to the effect the treaty may have upon the trade of this country. I do not expect that it will be as advantageous as its negotiators have anticipated.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I think this Bill should not be allowed to pass without recording in the debates a little private history in regard to the connection of one member of this House with the treaty. We all remember that our plenipotentiaries, when they negotiated that treaty two or three years ago, came back to Canada under the impression that they had entered into a treaty with France, signed, sealed and delivered, and that it was to be immediately sanctioned by the French parliament. It went to the House of Assembly and passed. But when it got to the Senate, which body the eloquence or the persuasiveness of our plenipotentiaries had not reached, or perhaps they had forgotten the visit of our plenipotentiaries, the treaty was shelved and very little was heard of it, although every two or three months the papers would announce that the Franco-Canadian treaty was making progress. That state of affairs continued for some time, until another Canadian, who was not a plenipotentiary, who though not leader of this House, but sometimes acts as leader, went over to France. I refer to the hon. gentleman from De Lorimier. He there interviewed one after the other, those senators who were high protectionists and were opposed to the ratification of this treaty, and if he displayed there the same amount of activity and persuasion that he does here, he must certainly have convinced these senators and converted them to the treaty. I remember that in the city of Montreal, when they were doubtful as to whether the treaty would be ratified or not, I mentioned the fact that the hon. gentleman from De Lorimier had reached the capital of France, and what our plenipotentiaries had not been successful in finally completing—and I do not wish to detract in any way from the credit due to them—I thought we could safely leave in his hands. He could talk to the French people in their own language, as if he had been born in Paris. His patriotic appeals almost convinced the French legislators that the hon. gentleman was a son of France.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Surely the hon. gentleman would not have a colleague go to France under false pretenses?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Not at all. Since I am forced to say it, my hon. friend from De Lorimier, speaks French so much like a real Parisian that he could easily be taken for a citizen of the gay capital. He took the opponents of the treaty by storm with the burning enthusiasm of a 'Meridional.' It is a matter of pride to this House that if we have a treaty at all it it due largely to a member of the Senate.

As to the export cattle clause I have been informed that there is not very much profit in exporting lean cattle. The profit is in the fat cattle, and remains exactly as it was before the ratification of the treaty. But I should like to ask the hon. gentleman who has referred to an agreement between ex-secretary Elihu Root and the French Ambassador Jusserand, in what way that comes into this discussion, or any converstion these two gentlemen may have had between themselves? If it were not followed up by further negotiations, it could not possibly affect by one cent the duties paid in either country. Perhaps one of the most important industries we have in this country is the manufacture of agricultural implements. There are forty millions of people in France who were provided, until recently, with crude farming machinery. They have found in Canada the very best kind of agricultural implements. They now use the Canadian harvesting machines largely. I have this information from gentlemen who have actually made sales, and, with the help of this treaty, Canadian agricultural implements will be placed on a more favourable footing than those of the United States. On a binder alone I think the difference in the duty is $8.75, and, with an advantage like that, we may expect to see the great manufacturing establishments of Ontario supplying the whole of the French market, thereby furnishing more employment to the people of that great province. To attain such a result, I think the treaty is well worth passing—and the good people of Ontario who will see their wages and trade increased will thank the hon. gentleman from De Lorimier.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The government should reward him by making him a minister.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—I wanted to ask the hon. gentleman from De Lorimier if French goods bought in London and shipped to a Canadian port come under the minimum or intermediate tariff?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The question has been discussed lately. It has been my belief that if the goods are sent from France, and bulk is broken in Liverpool or London, and there re-shipped to Canada, that they do not come under the minimum tariff.

Hon. Mr. JONES—I desire to say a few words with reference to this Treaty in so far as it affects Canadian manufacturers, as I believe it will affect them very favourably indeed. It will put Canadian manufacturers who ship goods to France in better condition to compete for business there than the United States manufacturers. The manufacturers across the line recognize that, and are already manufacturing goods in Canada to be exported to France, such as have been previously manufactured in and shipped from their own country to the French market. I think I would be within the limit if I were to say that there will this year be manufactured in Canada, by United States capital, and shipped to France not less than one million dollars in one particular line of goods, which would not have been made in Canada to any considerable extent had it not been for the expectation that this treaty would be adopted by the Dominion and become operative. This indicates that there are very material advantages coming to Canadians (who are manufacturing special lines) through the effect of the Treaty.

Canadians have been doing business in France for many years. Various kinds of farm implements have been going there for twenty years from manufacturing industries here in Canada, and the words 'made in Canada' which have been written upon each implement going, have become household words throughout the farming districts of France, where they are most favourably known.

Canadian manufacturers obtain a higher price for their goods than any maker in France receives for manufactures in similar lines of implements used for similar purposes. That is an indication that the goods shipped from here are of a high class and that, with this Treaty in force, business may reasonably be expected to materially increase and become more successful than could have been hoped for against the competition of the United States under conditions such as have heretofore existed. Canadian manufacturers have found it difficult, under the disadvantages incident to a new country, to compete in foreign markets. Most of the raw material that goes into these implements is imported, either from the United States or Great Britain, and freight rates are a considerable handicap to Canadian manufacturers. Notwithstanding that, they have been able to build up a large business in France in various lines of implements. The Treaty, I hope, will have the effect of establishing other manufacturers and will give to our railways the advantage of what we may term 'the long haul,' because the shipments must go out by Canadian routes in order to obtain the preference.

Heretofore Canada has not been credited with the exports to France, or other foreign countries, to the extent they have really been exported, because a considerable proportion of the goods that have been shipped in the past to France, and to other foreign countries, have been shipped by United States ports—principally New York and Boston—and they are credited largely in the official returns as being exported by the United States. Going out now, as they must do, by Canadian ports, in order to obtain the minimum tariff, they will be credited to Canada and it will be shown in the returns in future years that the business from Canada is materially larger than is now shown.

It has been frequently stated, and I think it is by many believed to be correct, that Canadian implements are sold in foreign countries for less money than they are sold in Canada. I have intimate knowledge of the price at which implements are sold in all countries where wheat is grown—except in the United States, where Canadians do little, if any business, and where I am not in such close touch with the costs as I am in other countries. Possibly the cost of goods similar to those used by the farmers of Canada, made in the Eastern States—perhaps in all the States of the Union—may be less than in Canada, I am not prepared to say as to that. They cost less because they are not of as good quality as those made in Canada. Canadian farmers enjoy the use of the highest class of implements made in the world. That is a very definite statement and it is absolutely correct and Canadian implements command a higher price in every grain growing country (outside of the United States) than any implement made in such country or any other implement exported to it. Canadian manufacturers of farm machinery have a larger business in England in harvesting machinery than any maker in England has and our goods command materially higher prices than those of any of the home makers.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Who manufactures the best implements?

Hon. Mr. JONES—Canadians.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Which firms?

Hon. Mr. JONES—I want it put on record that Canadian firms make the best harvesting machinery made in the world and the statement that farmers in foreign countries purchase them for less money than do the farmers in Canada is entirely incorrect and it is unfair to Canadian manufacturers that such statement should be made. In England, France, Germany, Russia, in fact in all the European countries where wheat and other grains are grown, Canadians are enjoying a substantial proportion of the business. In North Africa, South Africa, South America, the Argentine Republic, New Zealand and Australia, Canadians have a large business, some manufacturers in Canada getting one-half of their total business in these foreign countries, and in no one of the countries named are Canadian implements sold (not even in England) at as low a price as they are sold in Canada. I maintain that implements made in Canada are of higher class than those made in any other country. Under these conditions, if we Canadians look closely after business in France in future, and with our advantage over the United States manufacturers—who are our principal competitors there, as everywhere—and with a difference in our favour in the duty of 60 as against 100, we will be enabled to secure a much larger proportion of the business there than we would otherwise be able to do.

It is important that Canadian manufacturers ship to foreign countries only the highest class of implements, and see that they are carefully erected and looked after when placed in the hands of the users so that we may not be placed at a disadvantage.

I am greatly pleased that this Treaty has been consummated and personally I am selfish enough to hope that it will be some time before a like Treaty will be concluded between France and the United States.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We have had a very interesting discussion on the question of the treaty with France, and a great deal of information of a valuable character with respect to the probable effect of the treaty; but that is not the question before the House. The question before the House is simply shall we adopt this supplementary treaty, which deals only with the matter of fat cattle going to France? I do not know very much about the cattle business, but I am aware that there are certain gentlemen in Canada who, for a number of years, devoted their energies to the exportation of fat cattle, and they found that it was a losing business. There is nothing in the fat cattle business for Canada. The hon. gentleman from De Lorimier made that clear enough, but he did not indicate what the experience of the gentlemen who have tried the experiment on a large scale was. The fact that we shall not be able to send fat cattle to France really does not involve any loss to Canada. On the other hand, there is no doubt that the shipping of what they call 'stockers' to France, landing them there and having them fattened in France, is a good thing for us; and the hon. members of this House will naturally wish that England gave us the same privilege which France proposes to give under the treaty. If we could send stockers to England and have them fattened there our farmers would reap a very fine harvest indeed; and I feel no qualms of conscience at all about giving my most cordial support to this little treaty.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS—I am sorry that my experience and judgment do not coincide with the views which have been expressed, especially in connection with the cattle question. I listened with a great deal of interest to the manufacturing feature of the treaty, and rejoiced that it will greatly strengthen the hands of our manufacturers and bring France nearer to Canada and Canada nearer to France; but I am sorry to say that from my own knowledge of the live stock trade—and I speak from experience—the treaty holds out no inducement to the trade of the Northwest, and I am surprised that hon. gentlemen of this House should make the statement that the cattle trade is not affected by this treaty, and that the proposition now made, or the change that is about to be made, in the treaty will not seriously affect the cattle trade. I have a very different opinion. It is not the number of stockers we can sell that is going to benefit the cattle trade of Canada. The sooner we disabuse our minds of that delusion the better. Every carload of immatured cattle we send out of the country is a loss of money to ourselves. We are giving our business away to the foreigner. It is only the man who is struggling with adverse circumstances, and beginning, perhaps, to make a home, that can be induced to dispose of young cattle or stockers. When he is driven to do so, he is parting with his opportunity to make money. If he has the ability, the facilities and the feed necessary to develop his stock to the highest state of perfection, he should adopt that policy. The fact that the best of our stock is shut out of the French market is, to my mind, an argument against the treaty. We ought not to encourage anything looking in the direction of giving away our raw material for people in other countries to complete. It is simply giving away our own opportunities to make money and secure a reputation abroad. We have in Canada grand opportunities in the cattle trade. There is perhaps no country in the world that has such a supply of pure water and cheap feed, and none that can compete with our great western country.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The Argentine.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS—The Argentine may be our greatest competitor; but we are second to none in the facilities we possess to mature stock. The best breeders in Great Britain, the men who are at the head of the trade to-day, recognize the advantages we possess in Canada in the raising, in the improvement and in the maturing of stock, and that we are second to none in that respect. I think France is wise in the stand she is taking. If I were a citizen of France to-day, that beautiful country which I have seen from end to end, I would advocate protection under these conditions, though I believe a good deal in free trade and interchange. At the same time, I would be chary about opening the door to receiving all the matured beef that could be sent from America and other quarters into that country. We have at our disposal an unlimited supply of feed which costs us next to nothing. If we can mature our own stock and find a market in which to dispose of them, that is the line of business to cultivate, and that is a business we should endeavour to secure in any treaty with a foreign country. I am disposed to support the treaty, but I do not see that much is secured for the cattle trade of the great west by this change. A large trade in cattle is springing up in the west, in Alberta especially. Only the other day, I was in communication with a company that is seeking to develop the dead meat trade by slaughtering the animals in the west and shipping them as chilled beef. There is a large business to be developed in the great Northwest which must be helpful to the general prosperity of the Dominion, and we should hesitate before doing anything which would retard it. The trade is so far developed and so well understood in the Northwest that our stock raisers are not likely to send many stockers all the way to France to find a market. The more experience and knowledge we acquire of the necessities of the trade, the greater the desire will be to keep our cattle at home until they are matured, and then put them as beef on the market and get the largest amount of profit.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed under a suspension of the rules.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC HEALTH REPORT.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN moved:

That the report of the Standing Committee on Public Health Inspection of Food, together with the appendix thereto, be laid on the table of the Senate with the recommendation that the same be printed in pamphlet form, and that fifteen thousand copies be so printed for distribution.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am sorry that the hon. gentleman from Alexandria did not give the Senate some idea as to what the printing and distribution of this pamphlet will cost. I have not seen the report myself; I do not know what it contains, or what the cost of printing is likely to be. Before we decide to print it, we should know what expense we are incurring.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Not the cost of a bolt in a Dreadnought.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I am not in a position to give an idea as to the length of the report, but I can speak of its value, and as this matter is likely to come before the people of Canada in the near future, when cities, towns and villages will have to look after their refuse and sewage, money cannot be better spent than in disseminating this important report. I was a member of the committee, and can speak of the value and importance of the information and of the advisability of having it distributed as widely as possible; but I cannot give an idea of what the cost of printing will be.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS—As a member of the committee, I would urge the importance of publishing this report. It contains testimony on a live question, and one of the greatest importance to the whole Dominion. Men of experience and decided ability came before us and gave information which was intensely interesting and most important in the highest and best interests of the Canadian people. We endeavoured to bring it within the bounds of the sum we expected to receive, which was very moderate indeed. Since it has been prepared, and is in form to be submitted to the printer, gentlemen who have examined the report have expressed a strong desire to put it in pamphlet form so as to give the public the benefit of up to date information on a very important question.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I am not a member of the committee, but I attended two of its sittings and can testify to the correctness of what has been stated by both gentlemen who have spoken on the subject. The report is valuable, and should be distributed. I am reliably informed that it will not cover more than 40 or 50 pages of printed matter.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I am, perhaps, one of the very few members of the Senate who has had an opportunity of looking at this report. I read it hurriedly the other day, and I can corroborate everything that has been said in favour of its being printed. I was very much struck with the valuable —I might say invaluable—information which that report contains. You have there information from men of the very widest knowledge and experience in matters of public health, and more particularly in regard to the subject involved in the Bill which I introduced a few days ago with reference to the pollution of natural sources of water supply. I think it is almost a necessity that the members of both Houses should have this report before them in order to appreciate fully the great necessity for legislation in the direction indicated by the Bill which I have introduced. Having read the report myself, I am perfectly satisfied there is not a member of this House who will not agree with me, once he reads it, that it is most desirable and opportune to have it printed and distributed.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I know that the chairman of the committee was very enthusiastic about the appointment and work of the committee, and he secured expert testimony on sanitation and all such matters as were referred to that committee. The chairman took the report home with him, carefully edited it during the summer months, and eliminated matters which might not be of value for publication. I know he is anxious to have it printed, and we could not do better than to vote whatever sum may be necessary for the purpose. Cities, towns, and rural municipalities have been spending large sums of money in experimenting on how to attain the object which the report of this committee points out the best means to accomplish. That information having been collected and put in good shape for publication, should be printed for free distribution throughout the country.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am second to none in this House in the interest I take in the public health. I simply ask for information which I think the House should have before adopting the report.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I should have added on that point, that if I remember correctly, the report contains about 35 or 40 pages of typewritten matter.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The statement of the hon. member from De Salaberry, that the report will probably not extend beyond 50 pages was perfectly satisfactory to me. I was afraid that it might make a large sized book. I want it to be understood that I have not the slightest objection to the printing of the report.

The motion was agreed to

IMMIGRATION EMPLOYEES AT QUEBEC.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

Is it the intention of the government to assure itself by addressing itself to the immigration agent at Quebec, whether it is true—

1. That, from the first of January, 1909, to the 15th of April of the same year, a certain number of employees in the Immigration Office at Quebec obtained three days of leave every week?

2. That, notwithstanding this absence of forty to forty-two days, the same employees were carried on the pay-roll as having been continually and regularly at their posts?

9. That these leaves of absence were given by the immigration agent at Quebec on his own responsibility, without having previously obtained the authority of the Superintendent General of Immigration.

4. That the pay-list attesting the uninterrupted presence of these employees was certified as true by the immigration agent at Quebec?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The answer to each of the hon. gentleman's four questions is 'Yes.'

PAY-LIST OF IMMIGRATION EMPLOYEES AT QUEBEC.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved:

That an order of this House do issue that there be laid before this House a copy of the attendance and pay-lists of the employees in the Immigration Office at Quebec, for the first four months of the present year.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—There is no objection to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

COMPLAINTS AGAINST RESTAURANT KEEPER, IMMIGRATION BUILDING, QUEBEC.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

It is within the knowledge of the government, of the Department of the Interior, or at least of the Superintendent General of Immigration, that serious complaints have been brought against Jacques Déry, the restaurant keeper, employed as such in the immigration building at Quebec, and that one of these complaints mentions the extraordinary overcharges and criminal exactions of which immigrants have been and are the victims?

Do they know, for instance, that the said Jacques Déry was selling to immigrants at the price of 50 cents for the 6-pound loaf, when the market price of that loaf was 14 cents, and that he retailed to immigrants at the price of 40 cents a pound Bologna sausage, which was selling elsewhere at the price of 15 cents?

Who is responsible for such exactions?

Is it the Superintendent General or the restaurant keeper's immediate superior, the immigration at Quebec?

If the government is not yet aware of these outrageous exactions, does it intend to grant a serious inquiry so as to verify all these accusations, establish the responsibility therefor and punish the guilty persons?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to direct the attention of His Honour the Speaker to the fact that the first two paragraphs of this inquiry are decidedly out of order, being preambles and assertions of fact, which may or may not be the fact.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is the hon. gentleman serious?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—This is an inquiry, and there is no preamble at all. I am asking if it is within the knowledge of the government that serious complaints have been made. I am asking a second question, do they know, for instance, that such and such a thing has taken place in Quebec.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is an assertion of fact. The hon. gentleman asserts that as a fact.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is not a preamble. It is an inquiry. I am asking if such a fact has come to the knowledge of the government. If they say 'yes' that ends the matter.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This is exactly on all fours with the case ruled on by the Hon. Ex-Speaker Dandurand, a few years ago.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am not stating that these things were done. I am asking if the government are aware that they were done. The government will say that they know or that they do not know, and that it has been done I have proof under oath.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Lay it on the Table.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am not asserting that these things are facts, or that they are true. I am asking if the government know. If they do not know, we shall find it out in another way.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Probably the hon. Speaker will decide whether the objection raised by the hon. gentleman from Halifax has any foundation. These objections come too often without any argument to substantiate them. I should like the hon. Speaker to decide whether the point of order raised by the hon. gentleman from Halifax has any bearing upon the subject, or has any basis at all.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I wish to make a suggestion, that, inasmuch as a case now pending before the Speaker is similar to this, as has been remarked by the hon. gentleman from Halifax, we should allow this question to stand, and we will obtain the decision of the Speaker in the previous case, and in this one as well. It will enable His Honour the Speaker, after due deliberation, to decide upon a correct ruling.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I have no objection to that at all; but I know that the government is ready to answer.

The inquiry was allowed to stand.

A CORRECTION IN THE MINUTES.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am credited in the 'Minutes' with moving that an order be made, on the 11th January, and I call attention to the fact that an order of the Senate did issue that there be laid before the House a copy of the medical certificate, &c. This was carried yesterday, but so as not to make any change in the 'Minutes' we might say that it was called to-day and accepted as passed to-day. It was carried, but by mistake was not entered in the 'Minutes.'

The SPEAKER—The motion appears on page 128 of the 'Minutes,' No. 5, and the hon. gentleman moves that it be entered on the 'Minutes' of to-day as carried.

The motion was agreed to.

SENATE DEBATES.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I desire to direct attention—I do not know who is the proper authority in this House—to the fact that there are six forms of our revised statutes stuck in the Printing Bureau, and they cannot be gotten out. The House of Commons have the reports of their revised edition nearly up to date. Our revised edition is prepared, five or six forms, and they cannot get them out. They said they wanted an order from the chairman of the committee, and the chairman of the committee happens to be my hon. friend from London (Hon. Mr. Coffey). He is not here, and the whole business of the Senate is arrested on that account. Surely the old routine should be there. We should not require an order each time to get a copy of our debates from the Bureau. When the wheel commences to turn around, it should continue revolving for the session. Our printing service is degenerating into a farce. Is there any authority, or have we any authority to get what is printed in that Bureau for the Senate? I suppose it is a case of being everybody's business and, consequently, the business of nobody—no responsible party. Would the hon. leader of this House, who is our supreme officer here, give us some information.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—In the absence of the hon. gentleman from London, I am sorry to say I can give no information.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If he does not return to the Senate until next year, what shall we do?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I imagine that the committee would have it in their power to appoint a chairman instanter.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Have the committee not power to do something in his absence? We should have some one to replace the chairman for the time being.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I can do nothing more than draw attention to the matter, which my hon. friend has already done.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Attention is called every day. It is not attention we want, it is the document.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—When a committee is specially appointed to look after that matter, it is to be hoped they will do it.

AN ADJOURNMENT.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Wednesday, the 12th January next.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned till Wednesday, 12th January, 1910, at three o'clock.

THE SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 12, 1910.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Bill (No. 42) An Act respecting the Edmonton and Slave Lake Railway Company.—Mr. Young.

ORDER OF SENIORITY OF JUDGES IN QUEBEC.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

Who were, by order of seniority, on the 1st of June, 1906, the judges of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec, belonging to the district of Quebec, as comprised and defined for the purposes of the Court of Review according to the exact wording of the law

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—On the first day of June, 1906, the judges of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec to whom the city of Quebec was assigned as the district and county within which their ordinary judicial functions should be exercised, were Mr. Justice Routhier, discharging the duties of juge en chef; Sir F. Langelier and Sir C. A. P. Pelletier.

On the same date the judges of the Superior Court for the districts of Quebec, Three Rivers, Saguenay and Chicoutimi, Gaspé, Rimouski, Kamouraska, Montmagny and Beauce, and Arthabaska—the judgments rendered in which districts were taken in review at the city of Quebec—were the three judges above named and, (in the order of their appointment), the following:

Hon. M. H. E. Cimon, Kamouraska.
" J. E. Larue, Rimouski.
" H. C. Pelletier, Montmagny and Beauce.
" J. A. Gagné, Saguenay and Chicoutimi.
" H. G. Carroll, Gaspé.
" R. S. Cooke, Three Rivers.
" A. Malouin, Arthabaska.
" L. J. Cannon, Three Rivers.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The answer given by the hon. minister, which is, I suppose, prepared by the department, is not a reply to my question. They are very cute in that department.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It is the reply with which I was supplied by the Department of Justice.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—My inquiry was, who were, by order of seniority, the judges of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec, belonging to the district of Quebec and comprised and defined for the purposes of the Court of Review? That is a question which could be very readily answered by the department; but they make a division, picking out the city of Quebec on one side and taking a district on the other side, and they say the order of the first is so and so, and the order of the second is so and so. That is not a reply to my question. The hon. leader of the government understands the question very well. The province of Quebec is divided, for the purposes of review, into two great districts, the district of Montreal and the district of Quebec. The district of Quebec comprises the city of Quebec and surrounding districts in the province, which together form one district for the purposes of review. I am asking what is the order of seniority for the purposes of review.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—If my hon. friend will repeat the question, I shall endeavour to get further information. I take it that part of the information he wants is contained in the answer that has been furnished.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But it is all mixed up. I want to know the order of seniority, but that is not given.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—As regards a portion of it, the order of seniority is defined. If my hon. friend will repeat the question I shall call the attention of the department to it.

DIVERSION OF THE ALLAGASH RIVER.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. COSTIGAN moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate copies of all papers, despatches and letters connected with the diversion of the waters of the Allagash river, one of the largest tributaries of the St. John river.

He said: I desire to call attention to some points in connection with this matter, of which there is no record here, and of which the government has no record. I have already stated on this subject, that the history of this transaction, which I think is contrary to all international law, contrary to the treaty of 1842, the Ashburton treaty, and especially detrimental to the lumbering interests of the eastern portion of Quebec, the lumbering interests of St. John, New Brunswick, and contrary to the interests of a portion of the people of the state of Maine. The history of the diversion of these waters began in 1841. A man whose name, I think, was Rufus Dwinel, applied with others to the state legislature of Maine for a charter to construct a canal from the head waters of the Penobscot river to the head waters of the Allagash, so as to bring the waters of the Allagash down the Penobscot and increase the flow of that stream. This was in 1841, and must have been before the Ashburton treaty was passed. The state legislature, at that time, refused to grant such a charter, I understand, on the ground that they had no power to grant it; that it was contrary to all international law to divert the waters of a stream from its natural flow. Notwithstanding the fact that these men were refused authority to excavate the canal and build the dam, they proceeded without authority and constructed a canal, drawing the water away from the lakes of the Allagash down the Penobscot river. They built a dam across one of the lakes, tributary to the Allagash, high enough to divert the water through this canal into the Penobscot. After that, the war commenced between the lumbering interests on the Allagash river proper and the lumbering interests of the Penobscot river, all in the state of Maine. New Brunswick and Quebec were not heard in that contention at all. The legislature ordered an inquiry. Evidence was taken. I understand there is only one copy of that evidence in existence to-day. I know where it can be obtained, and I trust that it will yet be procured. After the inquiry, a Bill was passed by the legislature of Maine giving such authority as it could give to the existing diversion of the waters; that is the dam and the canal so built. Between 1846 and 1892, several Bills were introduced by different interests in the legislature of the state of Maine and passed by that legislature, all professing to give authority to these works that had been illegally commenced, illegally constructed and illegally maintained. At one time, the trouble became so serious that the party controlling the canal and dam sent an army of men there to protect their works. The opposing party, believing that there was no legal authority to construct the dam and divert the water from its natural outlet, undertook to destroy the dam, believing they could do so without rendering themselves liable to any penalty. The party that undertook to destroy the works succeeded by some means in blowing away a portion of the dam and allowing the water to flow down the Allagash. A reinforcement of men was sent at once by the Penobscot interests and the dam was repaired, and what was called a standing army was kept there—over one hundred men armed with rifles—to protect the work against any similar incident in the future. In 1903, the Improvement Company of the Penobscot river applied again to the state legislature of Maine for power to raise the dam still higher, which meant, of course, to increase the flow of water down the Penobscot river. That was refused, because of the opposition that was raised against it; but the result of it all is that the head waters of the Allagash river, which is one of the principal tributaries of the River St. John, are all turned down the Penobscot. It has reduced the flow of water, not only in the Allagash, but in the St. John river very materially, and the lumbering interests on the St. John suffer accordingly. When I say the lumbering interests on the St. John river, I may explain that the eastern portion of Quebec is also largely interested. The whole of the St. John river district is interested in it. A portion of the state of Maine is interested. The land-holders on the Allagash river below the dam have no water to float their timber down, and, of course, they cannot haul it above the dam to turn it into the Penobscot river. A large amount of the lumber that should naturally come down the Allagash and the St. John rivers has been turned down the Penobscot. These dams and other works have diverted the waters of about six of the lakes, large and small, including the Chamberlain, Churchill, and some smaller lakes from their natural outlet, the St. John river.

It is felt generally that a great wrong has been perpetrated in diverting that water, and there is a strong feeling of dissatisfaction in the province from which I come and amongst the lumbering interests in the eastern portion of Quebec, and I may say it is shared largely by the people of Maine also, who are interested in the Allagash river proper. There is no conflict between the citizens of Canada and the citizens of the United States. The only people benefited by this diversion are the Penobscot Improvement Company who are diverting this water for their own selfish purpose to the detriment of greater interests, and in violation of all international law. I earnestly hope that the government will take some action in this matter. We had hoped that the commission appointed to look into these matters would have dealt with it. The first commission appointed was the Waterways Commission. We were informed then that the United States government took the ground that that commission had no right to go into the question, but that the United States authorities would be quite willing to appoint another commission to deal with that and similar questions. Another commission has been appointed and is now looking into the fisheries question. We all hoped that they would take up this matter of the diversion of the waters from the Allagash river, but it appears that the latter commission has no jurisdiction over it either. They have not touched it at any rate. We do not want to create friction between the people to the south of us and ourselves. I share the feeling that prevails in Canada, that we wish to live in harmony with our neighbours, but we wish also that those people shall show a disposition to live in harmony with us, and that if it should be found that this water has been diverted contrary to law, one of the best evidences of good faith on their part would be a restoration of the flow of water to its proper channel.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—There is no objection to the motion. I am not prepared to discuss some of the points the hon. gentleman has taken up.

The motion was agreed to.

HEATING AND LIGHTING OF GOVERNMENT OFFICES AT QUEBEC.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY:

How much did the heating of the buildings used for immigrants at Quebec, and for the immigration office at the same place, cost for the fiscal year ended on the 31st March last?
How much did it cost for the lighting of the same buildings and the same office during the same period?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The answer is:

Louise Embankment:

Heating	$1,100 94
Lighting	909 00
Four arc lights, lighting path to building on embankment	390 00
	$2,399 94

Detention Hospital:

Heating	$1,648 35
Lighting	361 48
	$2,000 83

As the office is located entirely within the shed, this department has no means of distinguishing the cost of heating and lighting from that of the whole building.

OVERCHARGING IMMIGRANTS AT QUEBEC.

INQUIRY POSTPONED.

The notice of motion being called:

By Hon. Mr. LANDRY:

Is it within the knowledge of the government, of the Department of the Interior, or at least of the Superintendent General of Immigration, that serious complaints have been brought against Jacques Déry, the restaurant keeper, employed as such in the immigration buildings at Quebec, and that one of these complaints mentions the extraordinary over charges and criminal exactions of which immigrants have been and are the victims?

Do they know, for instance, that the said Jacques Déry was selling to immigrants at the price of 50 cents for the 6-pound loaf, when the market price of that loaf was 14 cents, and that he retailed to immigrants at the price of 40 cents a pound Bologna sausage, which was selling elsewhere at the price of 15 cents?

Who is responsible for such exactions?

Is it the Superintendent General or the restaurant keeper's immediate superior, the Immigrant Agent at Quebec?

If the government is not yet aware of these outrageous exactions, does it intend to grant a serious inquiry so as to verify all these accusations, establish the responsibility therefor, and punish the guilty persons?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I would request the hon. gentleman to let this inquiry stand.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I may remark that the inquiry is out of order. It is open to the objection that it contains a preamble One paragraph is as follows:

Do they know, for instance, that the said Jacques Déry was selling to immigrants at the price of 50 cents for the 6-pound loaf, when the market price of that loaf was 14 cents, and that he retailed to immigrants at the price of 40 cents a pound Bologna sausage, which was selling elsewhere at the price of 15 cents.

That is clearly a preamble, and it is stating as a matter of fact what, I suppose, the hon. gentleman's inquiry is intended to ascertain. It is clearly irregular to assume that a state of facts like that exists.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman must know that it is not a preamble. I am asking a question; how can I ask a question without putting it on the paper. I am asking if the government know such and such a thing and the government must reply, yes or no. There is no preamble in that.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I hope His Honour the Speaker will consider the point before the inquiry comes up again.

The order was allowed to stand.

THE IMMIGRATION OFFICE AT QUEBEC.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved:

That an order of this House do issue that there be laid upon the table of this House the report made in 1906 to he Department of the Interior by Mr. Blair, upon the inquiry held by him at Quebec, at the Immigration Office, on the subject of certain complaints concerning the administration of the said office.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—There is no objection to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

THE SENATE DEBATES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the orders of the day are called I should like to know when we are to receive the revised edition of the debates of this House—the English copy? I am not speaking of the French copy. I do not want to ask for too much at a time. We have now reached the 12th day of January, and we have not received a single copy of the revised edition of the debates yet. In the House of Commons they are getting the revised edition from day to day, while here we are far behind. If we do not want the Senate to be held up to the public as an institution that is going back instead of advancing, I think it is time for us to have the revised edition of our debates. I suppose it is a case where everybody's business is nobody's business.

THE AUTHORITY OF THE CLERK OF THE SENATE.

The order of the day being called:

Consideration of the memo. referring to the authority vested in the Clerk of the Senate under the title of 'Chief of Staff.'

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—In the absence of the Hon. Mr. Casgrain, I would call attention to the character of the memorandum. It is as follows:

Referring to the authority vested in the Clerk of the Senate under the title of Chief of Staff, such as recommended by a report of the Committee on Internal Economy on the 9th of May, 1902, and adopted by the Senate on the 12th of that month, the undersigned would respectfully request to be informed if the instructions issued by him to the staff in connection with the discharge of their duties can be countermanded by any individual member of the House without authority to do so by the Senate?

SAML. E. ST. O. CHALPEAU,
Clerk of the Senate.

As this is a matter that the clerk wishes to have explained, the authority having been given to him by the Internal Economy Committee, the reasonable course to pursue would be to refer this memorandum to that committee, where the clerk originally got his instructions and authority. I therefore move that the memorandum be referred to the Committee on Internal Economy for consideration.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am surprised that no objection is taken to this procedure. 'Referring to the authority vested in the Clerk of the Senate'—that is an assertion of a fact, and yet my hon. friend from Halifax is mute.

Hon. Mr. POWER—A memorandum is not a motion.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But there is a motion to refer that memorandum to the Internal Economy Committee.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—There is no preable to the motion.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—In my case, I was not making a motion; I was making an inquiry. If I ask a man 'How do you do?' I am inquiring about his health, I am not making a motion about his health. If this memorandum is referred to the Internal Economy Committee, no doubt they will say that the authority exists. We know nothing of the facts; we are in the dark. What are we referring back to the Internal Economy Committee?

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—We are referring back this memorandum, because the clerk wants to be informed if instructions issued to him can be countermanded by any individual member of the House without the authority of the Senate. We cannot try this thing here. Both sides must be heard, and I respectfully submit that my motion is quite in order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Supposing the clerk had asserted that his authority has been countermanded by an individual member. This is purely a clerical question. We do not need to refer it to a committee for an answer. We know that if an instruction is given to the clerk it must be followed. We do not require the committee to say it should be followed. But if the clerk has a complaint to make against the intervention of any member of this House, let him state the complaint, and it may be sent to the committee to have the whole question ventilated there. But this is merely a clerical question. Any one could answer it without taking the trouble to send it to the committee.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—My hon. friend will pardon me for insisting on the motion, from the very fact that we may all plead guilty. There is nobody named in this memorandum. It is simply some conflict between a member of this Senate and the clerk, and the clerk claims that his authority is vested in him by the power of that committee, and surely the House cannot deal with the subject without having the doors closed. I am sure the proper parliamentary practice in all matters of this kind is to refer it to the proper committee, and the Committee of Internal Economy is the proper one. I am astonished that my hon. friend objects to that. The member referred to may be myself; I do not know. If so, I am willing to be reprimanded by the committee or anybody else. I am willing to take my share of the blame. This is merely an insinuation.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It might be an insinuation.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—And it is only fair that it should be removed from the journals of the House, if there is no ground for it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman misunderstood me. The memorandum says:

> Referring to the authority vested in the Clerk of the Senate, under the title of Chief of Staff, such as recommended by a report of the Committee on Internal Economy on the 9th May, 1902, and adopted by the Senate, on the 12th of that month, the undersigned would respectfully request to be informed if the instructions issued by him to the staff in connection with the discharge of their duties can be countermanded by any individual member of the House, without authority to do so by the Senate.

If he had added 'as has been done.' I could understand how it could be referred to the committee to investigate the whole matter. But I contend there is no accusation in that memorandum. We are asked to decide if such a thing can be done.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—What are those instructions? We do not know. We have not seen them. They have not been placed before the House. It is not stated in black and white that instructions were given. I think that this insinuation could be more effectually cleared up in the committee than in the Chamber.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I contend that the memorandum should not come before this House.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—The hon. gentleman is right, but it is here.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is not a statement of fact. We are called upon to give an opinion, but what opinion can we give?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—That is, without adopting the report.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Yes, without adopting the report. The motion is to consider the memorandum. There is no motion to refer it.

The SPEAKER—A motion has been moved just now.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It must come as an amendment.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I made the motion in that way, to refer it to the committee.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is the hon. gentleman moving that as an amendment? If it is in the form of an amendment, who moved the main motion?

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—It is a consideration of the same question.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—It is the consideration of the motion. It is not the amendment.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The consideration of the motion is supposed to have been moved by an absent member; and in amendment the hon. gentleman moves that it be referred to a certain committee.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—As I was not present when the matter was brought up, may I inquire how it has come about that we have seriously considered, trying on the floor of this chamber so to speak, a conflict between an officer of this House and a member of the House? Are we in all seriousness about to try whether an hon. member of this chamber has been guilty of some allegation brought against him by the Clerk of the Senate or what are we going to do? It seems to me to be beneath the dignity of the Senate to consider a petty conflict between the Clerk of this House and a member of the Senate. We depart very much from the dignity of the Senate to consider on the floor of this Chamber whether an honourable gentleman of this House is in the right or in the wrong. I certainly, with all due deference to the attitude taken by His Honour the Speaker cannot appreciate the circumstances which lead him to submit a matter of this kind to the House. It seems to me it should have gone to the committee, and the dignity of this House should have been upheld, instead of referring it in all seriousness to this Chamber.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Well it goes to the committee.

The SPEAKER—If this motion is dealt with, it would go to the committee.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It goes to the committee because it is sent there by us, and I refuse to be a party to sending it.

The motion was agreed to on division.

A QUESTION OF PROCEDURE.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I desire to call attention of the House to the procedure at the opening of the session to-day, and I should not like it to be considered as a precedent. I may be wrong, but I desire to bring the matter before hon. members. I refer to the message from His Excellency the Governor General which was read to us by the right hon. leader of the House. I think it should have been communicated to us through the Speaker as a communication between His Excellency and the House. Bourinot provides that if a Speaker receives a communication from the Governor General's secretary relative to the opening of the session, he rises and says: 'I have the honour to inform this House,' and the same with regard to prorogation, it is the Speaker who delivers the message to the House. I am not saying that I am right.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—My hon. friend will see that there is a distinction. Messages signed by His Excellency are usually communicated by one of His Excellency's ministers. The messages to which he refers I think are messages from the Governor General's secretary addressed to the Speaker direct. Those would be, as a matter of course, read by the Speaker; but in the other chamber—and I think the practice here has been the same—whenever His Excellency sends a message signed by his own hand, it is read by the minister in either House. I think that has been the usual practice.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am not quite sure of that. Bourinot, at page 388, says 'These messages are either written or verbal.' He says in one place, 'A verbal message will be given in such case by the minister.' He does not say that a written one is given by the minister. He makes the distinction, that a verbal message is communicated by the minister.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think, a fortiori, a written message signed by his own hand should be delivered through the minister, one of his responsible advisers, as far as that goes, and I can speak from a knowledge of the practice in the House of Commons extending over forty-six years, that it has invariably been done in that way in that chamber. My hon. friend on my left, (Sir Richard Scott) can speak from a long experience here, and I think his recollection is the same as mine, the answer is sent back through a minister who is a member of the Privy Council.

Hon. Mr. POWER—And the address is presented to His Excellency by a minister who is a member of the Privy Council, and the answer is sent back through a minister who is a member of the Privy Council.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is not the same; that is done by an order of the Chamber. It is this Chamber which names the person who is to carry the message to His Excellency.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Does my hon. friend contend that the practice is not correct?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No, I am ready to accept the explanation of my hon. friend. His experience is greater than mine. I just mentioned the incident and stated that I did not think it should be made a precedent.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

THE SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 13, 1910.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (E) An Act respecting the St. Clair and Erie Ship Canal.—Mr. Lougheed.

Bill (F) An Act to incorporate the Congregational Union of Canada.—Mr. Gillmor.

Bill (G) An Act to incorporate the Merchants Bank of Canada Pension Fund.—Mr. Beique.

REVISED EDITION OF THE SENATE DEBATES.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the orders of the day are called, as I observe my hon. friend from London (Mr. Coffey) is in his place to-day, I desire to ask him if he will kindly tell me when we are to have the revised edition of our debates before us. We have been here more than a month and we have not yet received a single copy.

Hon. Mr. POWER—One copy was distributed to-day.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I did not receive it.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY—I must apologize to the hon. gentleman for not being in my place to answer his question the other day. I am glad now to be in a position to give him the required information. I will take the liberty of reading a letter I received to-day from the King's Printer in regard to this matter. It reads as follows:

Dear Senator Coffey,—I have inquired into Senator Landry's mild and not unreasonable complaint of delay in distributing the Senate 'Revised Hansard.' I find that no great attempt was made to get the 'Revised Hansard' out with despatch because some of my officers were under the impression that your Debates Committee contemplated an early change in the distribution of the 'Hansard.' They had understood that you were on the point of following the Commons example and getting out a comparatively large number of the daily 'Hansard' for general distribution and a smaller number of the 'Revised Hansard' for distribution to the senators and for the purpose of binding after the session. As that change has not taken place, and as it may not ever take place at all, I am having the revised edition brought up to date just as rapidly as possible. I am having sent to the Senate this afternoon the 'Revised Hansard' to the 2nd of December, making in all about 120 pages. The balance will follow as soon as possible.

In this connection I wish to draw the attention of the House to the fact that oftentimes the members of the Senate complain about delay in the Printing Bureau. At this moment I have not in my mind a single instance where the Bureau was to blame. In conversation with the King's Printer some time ago, he said to me 'Senator, it is not the fault of the Bureau. We have all the men we require; we have all the presses we need; we have all the type that we can use, and there is not excuse for delay on the part of the Bureau. The delay is usually caused in one of two ways. The first is that the Bureau does not receive the copy, and the second is that there is sometimes delay in returning the proof.' One instance came under the observation of the King's Printer where a member of this House entered protest against the delay in the Printing Bureau. I would rather not mention the hon. gentleman's name; but it so happened that at that very moment a certain piece of work was being held up in the Bureau because an hon. gentleman had not returned the revised proofs of his speech. I say once for all, that wherever there is any well grounded complaint in regard to delay in the Bureau I shall do my utmost to search it out and give the House satisfaction; but I would impress upon all the absolute necessity of, in every instance, returning revised proofs to the Printing Bureau as soon as possible. Do not ask the reporters or the Prining Bureau when they require proofs returned; anybody who understands the printing business would say, do not ask such a question, but return them as soon as you can. Frequently the habit of postponement, which one or more members may have contracted, will hold up the printing of a whole issue. Therefore, I hope that in future the proofs will be returned as soon as possible, and there will be no delay at the Printing Bureau.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is a regretable thing that our idols are always being shattered. The government of the day have educated the House for some years past up to the idea that the Printing Bureau was ever at fault. I am pleased to find, from my hon. friend from London to-day, that the Printing Bureau is the embodiment of all virtue, and that the representations made by the ex-leader of the House in this Chamber for some years past as to the volume of work in the Printing Bureau being accountable for the delay, and our failure to obtain reports promptly, should be further considered. No later than yesterday a question came before us in regard to the very great inconvenience in the transportation of members by the delay in issuing certificates, and the fault was laid entirely on the Bureau; but hereafter, since my hon. friend has been appointed chairman of the Debates Committee, I have no doubt the Printing Bureau will be no longer in fault.

ORDER OF SENIORITY OF JUDGES IN QUEBEC.

INQUIRY OPSTPONED.

The notice of motion being called.

By the Hon. Mr. LANDRY:

That he will inquire of the government:

Who were, by order of seniority, on the 1st of June, 1906, the judges of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec, belonging to the district of Quebec, as comprised and defined for the purposes of the court of review, according to the exact wording of the law.

Right Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I have called the attention of the Department of Justice to the matter, but have not yet received a reply.

The motion was allowed to stand.

OVERCHARGING IMMIGRANTS AT QUEBEC.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

Is it within the knowledge of the government, of the Department of the Interior, or at least Superintendent General of Immigration, that serious complaints have been brought against Jacques Déry, the restaurant keeper, employed as such in the Immigration buildings at Quebec, and that one of these complaints mentions the extraordinary overcharges and criminel exactions of which immigrants have been and are the victims?

Do they know, for instance, that the said Jacques Déry was selling to immigrants at the price of 50 cents for the 6-pound loaf, when the market price of that loaf was 14 cents, and that he retailed to immigrants at the price of 40 cents a pound Bologna sausage, which was selling elsewhere at the price of 15 cents?

Who is responsible for such exactions?

Is it the superintendent general or the restaurant keeper's immediate superior, the immigration agent at Quebec?

If the government is not yet aware of these outrageous exactions, does it intend to grant a serious inquiry so as verify all these accusations, establish the responsibility therefor, and punish the guilty persons?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Probably a good deal of the information my hon. friend desires has just been laid on the table, in a return which I have presented, but I have the following replies to the hon. gentleman's questions:

1. No complaints since 1906, which were investigated at the time.
2. No.
3. Answered by No. 2.
4. Answered by No. 2.
5. Any formal complaints made will at once be investigated.

INLAND REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (9) An Act to amend the Inland Revenue Act.

He said: This Bill consists mainly of two provisions. The first raises the rate or fee for bonding warehouses from $20, as at present, to $50. The reason given by the department for that is that the granting of these licenses for small bonding warehouses involves a considerable expense, very much in excess of the fee to the department. They think $20 is altogether too small a sum, and that in future they must charge at least $50, particularly as it is not expedient in the pubic interest to multiply excessively the number of these bonding licenses.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does that fee extend to additional warehouses in each case? As my hon. friend knows, under the existing law there is a provision by which additional warehouses are licensed for reduced amounts.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think it does not extend to those. This is intended to apply to applications which are being constantly made for new warehouses, but I am not absolutely certain about that. I will get positive information from the department before we go into Committee of the Whole on the Bill. I think this is intended to rather prevent the undue multiplication of these small bonded warehouses, which my hon. friend will understand involve a considerable charge on the public funds. The second paragraph makes certain alterations with respect to packages of imported cigarettes. This is asked for by the trade, and I believe all parties are agreed to it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Why is the provision as to snuff changed? I see no change between this paragraph and the existing section of the Act, except that the fraction of one-sixth is introduced in this paragraph.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It is a small alteration asked for by the trade. That is all the information I have about it. It is one of those comparatively minute details involved in the working of the Act which the parties concerned are desirous of having amended. The third paragraph is simply giving power to determine the rates of duties.

The motion was agreed to and the Bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three p.m.

SENIORITY OF QUEBEC JUDGES.

INQUIRY POSTPONED.

The order of the day being called.

By the Hon. Mr. LANDRY:

That he will inquire of the government—

Who were, by order of seniority, on the 1st of June, 1906, the judges of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec, belonging to the district of Quebec, as comprised and defined for the purposes of the Court of Review, according to the exact wording of the law?

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—In the absence of the hon. gentleman from Stadacona, I beg to make this inquiry.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—This question has been answered, but the hon. gentleman who moved it appeared to consider the answers given as insufficient; I have, therefore, called the attention of the Department of Justice to his remarks. I have not yet received a reply. The hon. gentleman had better let it stand.

The inquiry was allowed to stand until Tuesday.

EMPLOYMENT OF PERSONS IN CONSTRUCTION OF GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC (in the absence of Mr. Landry) moved:

That an order of this House be made for the production of a statement comprising, in so many distinct columns, the names, dates of appointment, nature of employment, salary, travelling expenses, and indication of the section where the persons were employed, of all persons in the service of the commission for the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway between Moncton and Winnipeg.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—There is no objection to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

REMOVAL OF RUINS OF QUEBEC BRIDGE.

INQUIRY POSTPONED.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC (in the absence of Mr. Landry) inquired of the government:

Has the government granted the contract for removing the ruins of the Quebec bridge?
To whom has this contract been given?
For what amount?
What is the date fixed for the completion of the work of clearing away?
Before granting this contract did the government ask for tenders?
Who tendered, and what was the price asked by each tenderer?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I would ask my hon. friend to let this inquiry stand. The department will have the answer ready on Tuesday or Wednesday next.

The inquiry was allowed to stand until Wednesday next.

INLAND REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 9) An Act to amend the Inland Revenue Act.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—This Bill does not involve any change in the law. The first paragraph has reference entirely to the fee, which is increased from $30 to $50. The other changes are also verbal, and are introduced at the instance of members of the trade. For instance, paragraph (d) of section 1, simply provides for snuff in packages of one-sixth of a pound. Provision had been made for packages of 1-12th, 1-8th and 1-4th, but the provision in regard to packages of 1-6th had been omitted. Similarly provision is made with regard to the number of cigars in a package.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If I understand it, the fee is increased from $30 to $50.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—This is imposing a tax on the people.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—It is imposed by the House of Commons. It is a Commons Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No money Bill should pass here without a declaration that a message has been received from the Governor General recommending its passage.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—This Bill has come up from the House of Commons in the ordinary way, like all other public Bills. It has been read the first and second time, and now is in the Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I have the right to raise an objection at any stage of the Bill. I have not done so; I am asking has any message been presented introducing this Bill?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—It was introduced in the House of Commons in the ordinary way; but it does not follow that all money Bills are presented by message to this Chamber. We are not making any change in the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There is a rule in the House which says that a message from the Governor General must accompany the introduction of a money Bill in this House before we proceed with it.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I am quite sure that any necessary formality has already been observed. It goes through as a matter of course.

Hon. Mr LANDRY—It should go as a matter of rule.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—The Governor General gives his assent to all these measures.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Strictly speaking, the hon. member is right; but the practice is not that way. We assume that things have been done regularly in the House of Commons, and a Bill of this kind cannot be introduced in the other House unless that House has been informed that a message has been received from His Excellency the Governor General. I do not mean to deny that, strictly speaking, the minister in charge of the Bill in this House must be in a position to inform the House that a message from the Governor General had come down; but I think we are justified in assuming that such a message was presented. Further, the committee stage is not the proper stage at which to raise the question. It should have been raised at the second reading. It might be raised at the third reading, but not when the House is in the Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I have not made any objection; I have merely asked if the rules of this House had been observed in connection with this Bill? I am willing to let it pass, even if the rules have not been strictly complied with, but I am asking for information.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I am quite safe in making the statement that I did a few moments ago—that everything has been done in a regular way. These are matters of form, and the Governor General gives his assent to the introduction of the Bill. At all events, this is not the proper stage at which to raise an objection.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This is another illustration of the laxity which has prevailed in this House for a long time. If my recollection serves me correctly, the rule is distinct and requires that the same practice shall prevail in the Senate as obtains in the House of Commons. It does not matter at which stage the objection is taken, if a message has not been received that the Governor General has assented to the introduction of the Bill, the whole of the proceedings would have to be repeated. I do not rise to prevent the passage of the Bill, but we ought to adhere to our own rules, and also the practice of the House of Lords. The 70th rule of this House is as follows:

> The Senate will not proceed upon a Bill appropriating public money that shall not, within the knowledge of the Senate, have been recommended by the King's representative.

I do not think there is any misunderstanding that rule.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I am not going to discuss the question. This is not an appropriation of money. It is rather a collection of money. However, if the hon. member insists upon the point, I shall simply have to ask the committee to rise; but I do not think the rule applies to this case.

The first clause was adopted.

On clause 2.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—In the existing Act, provision is made with regard to packages of 1-16th, 1-12th, 1-8th, 1-4th and half a pound. It is found that packages of one-sixth of a pound have been imported into the country, and provision is made to cover such packages.

Paragraph (e) is exactly on the same lines. It was found that packages came in containing 25 cigarettes, and no provision existed in the Act for packages containing that number, and the words 25 are inserted, to suit the convenience of the trade.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 3.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—The only change in this clause is the introduction of the words 'other materials.' At present foreign raw leaf tobacco taken for use in any tobacco or cigar manufactory is subject to duty, but it is found that there are other materials used also which ought to pay duty, and it is for the purpose of imposing a duty on these other materials this amendment is provided.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What kind of material would it be?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I cannot say.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It would appear to me as if it were giving assistance to some artificial material that will supercede tobacco. It seems to me an unwise provision. It is practically a recognition of some substitute for tobacco which is not tobacco.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is always some foreign matter in tobacco.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, no. This means material that is not tobacco. It may be the by-products of tobacco.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—It may be oil or other substance. It can do no harm.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This refers to material which is not tobacco, and it would give a statutory recognition to adulteration of manufactured tobacco. The whole trend of legislation has been against adulteration of products entering into consumption by the people. It would seem to me that this is flying in the very face of the policy of the legislation of to-day.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—The explanation given by the department is that there is other material used to a limited extent, say ten per cent, and it is important that where that is the case it should be subject to duty. Probably at the third reading we may obtain the explanation.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, I should like to know what it is.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

REMOVAL OF QUEBEC BRIDGE RUINS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

1. Has the government granted the contract for removing the ruins of the Quebec bridge?
2. To whom has this contract been given?
3. For what amount?
4. What is the date fixed for the completion of the work of clearing away?
5. Before granting this contract did the government ask for tenders?
6. Who tendered, and what was the price asked by each tenderer?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follow:

1. Yes.
2. To Messrs. Koenig and Company.
3. For the bulk sum of $45,000.
4. The anchor pier to be ready for the contractor by April 1, 1910, and the main pier by May 15, 1910.
5. Yes, tenders were invited by newspaper advertisement. Leopold Stern, Cobalt, offered to remove material, approximately 10,600 tons at $12.50 a ton, $132,500; material to remain the property of the government. L. A. Beauchemin, Chatillon, Quebec, offered to remove for the price of 1 cent per pound and the material; no time given for completion. The Linde British Refrigerator Company, Montreal, offered to remove for the actual cost of the labour, plant and material, plus 10 per cent, the government to retain the material; no time stated for completion. The Hamilton Bridge Works, offered to remove the material, the government to pay them $50,000 in addition to the steel and wrecked plant, tools, &c., to become their property. The Chaudiere Machine Foundry Company, Ottawa, offers $1,000 for the scrap; no offer made to remove the same. Subsequently two more offers were received as follows: Messrs. Frankel Bros., of Toronto, Ontario, sent an offer by wire, to remove the wreckage for the sum of $40,000, but could not undertake the work this winter. Messrs. Koenig and Company, offered to remove wreckage for the sum of $45,000, to clear the anchor pier 50 feet therefrom towards the river, and the main pier 50 feet back towards the south shore. They agreed to commence the work immediately.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—Has the hon. gentleman answered the question whether the persons who obtained the contract get the material also?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The first part of the answer gave that.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Koenig and Company offer to remove the wreckage for the sum of $45,000. It is not stated whether they become the owners of the scrap or not.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think they are to retain it; at all events I intend to make a few more inquiries on the subject, and it had better stand.

The inquiry was allowed to stand until Tuesday next.

SENIORITY OF QUEBEC JUDGES.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

Who were, by order of seniority, on the 1st of June, 1906, the judges of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec, belonging to the district of Quebec, as comprised and defined for the purposes of the Court of Review, according to the exact wording of the law.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I have not the answer before me; so that the inquiry had better stand.

PAY LIST OF IMMIGRATION OFFICE, QUEBEC.

INCOMPLETE RETURNS.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the orders of the day are called, I should like to draw the attention of the hon. leader of this House to the fact that a few days ago I received a return to an order made by this House on the 3rd day of December last. The order reads as follows:

That an order of this House do issue that there be laid before this House a copy of the attendance and pay-lists of the employees in the Immigration office at Quebec, for the first four months of the present year.

Probably my motion was not well framed, or there must have been some misunderstanding, because I got only the four months commencing the 1st of April. They probably thought I wanted a return for the first four months of the fiscal year, instead of the first four months of the calendar year. I would, therefore, ask leave to amend the motion in order to get the first three months. I have the month of April, but I should like to have also the return to cover January, February and March. I would ask that this be considered as a notice of motion.

COMPANY NO. 1, SIXTH REGIMENT, LEVIS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC (in absence of Hon. Mr. Landry) inquired of the government:

1. Has a person named J. B. Aubert laid a complaint against the commander of company number 1 of the 6th regiment of Lévis?
2. What is the nature of such complaint?
3. Has this complaint been acceded to?
4. Has the commander in question been dismissed?
5. Has he been put on the reserve list or upon the retired list? And what grade does he occupy therein?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follow:

1. Yes.
2. That the regulations relating to the payment of men of No. 1 company, 6th regiment, had not been carried out.
3. Yes.
4. No.
5. Retired list, with rank of Major.

GUARDIANS OF THE MILITARY FORTS AT LEVIS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC in absence of Hon. Mr. Landry inquired:

1. What are the names of the guardians of the military forts at Lévis designated by the numbers 1, 2, and 3?
2. Do these guardians give all their time to the care of these forts?
3. Do they all, or some of them, occupy other positions at Lévis in the service of the municipal corporation?
4. If the government does not know, can it assure itself whether the same guardians are or are not in the service of the town of Lévis every evening and every Sunday?
5. And in case there is an accumulation of functions is it the intention of the government to put an end thereto?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follow:

1. No. 1 Fort, A. Bilodeau; No. 2 Fort, F. Martineau; No. 3 Fort, M. C. Lemieux.

2 and 3. On receipt of a complaint on the 30th August, last, with reference to Caretakers Bilodeau and Martineau doing duty as constables at the market and at Notre Dame hall at Lévis, inquiry was made and a report received from the district commanding officer at Quebec to the effect that the caretakers of the Lévis Forts did not, as a rule, act as constables at the places mentioned.

They have been sworn in as constables for the municipality of Notre Dame de Lévis to assist the constables of that municipality when needed, providing it does not interfere with their duties as caretakers of the forts. In return they apply, by telephone or otherwise, to get the assistance of the constables of the municipality when needed.

4. Yes, steps will be at once taken to do so.

5. No statement can be made until the facts of the case have been ascertained.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill. (L) An Act respecting the Bay of Quinte Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Power.

INLAND REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND (in the absence of Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) moved the third reading of Bill (No. 9) an Act to amend the Inland Revenue Act.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Has the hon. gentleman from Ottawa obtained the information which he promised to obtain before the third reading?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—On the inquiry made by my hon. friend, I addressed a letter to the deputy minister, whose reply is as follows:

The 'other materials' referred to in section 3 of Bill (No. 9), 'An Act to amend the Inland Revenue Act' are liquorice, sugar, gum, flavourings, &c.

When the duty on manufactured tobacco was reduced from twenty-five (25) cents to five (5) cents per pound it was necesary to provide for a duty of sixteen (16) cents per pound on these materials when used in factories under specified conditions. The amendment referred to has no bearing on the question of this duty beyond giving the necessary authority to enable the department to collect it, as in the case of raw leaf, upon the 10th 20th and last days of each month.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

BAY OF QUINTE RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved the second reading of Bill (L) An Act respecting the Bay of Quinte Railway Company. He said: This Bill is in my hands, to a certain extent, accidently. It simply appears in my name because the hon. gentleman who was to have taken charge of it was not present. It appears there were two Bay of Quinte companies, one of which was a railway company and the other a railway and navigation company. These two companies were consolidated in 1896. Certain amendments were made in the legislation of 1900, 1902, and 1905. The Act had provided for a railway from Deseronto to Picton, and a further Act was passed authorizing the construction of a branch from Bridgewater in the county of Hastings to a point at or near Actinolite Mines, in the township of Kaladar, Addington. The first clause of this Bill is simply re-enacting the first section of the Act of 1905, but dating the two years and five years from the present time, instead of from the year 1905. The second clause further extends the time for the completion of the other lines of railway which the company has been authorized to construct, and the third clause repeals the Act of 1905 which contained an extension of time limited to this year.

The Motion was agreed to and the Bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 p. m.

PREVENTION OF RACE TRACK GAMBLING.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (British Columbia) presented a petition from residents of the city of Victoria, praying that steps be taken to prevent the evils of race-track gambling. He said: I know that it is not customary to speak on the presentation of a petition, but in this case I claim the indulgence of the House for a moment. We have experienced so severely the evil effects of gambling and horse-racing in British Columbia this last year that I call the attention of the government to these petitions, and urge that they shall not be thrown aside as waste paper, but that they shall be acted upon and stringent laws passed. Last year, many a young man, and woman and families were ruined in Victoria by gambling. Over one hundred race-horses were brought from California, with the usual accompaniment of sharpers, rascals, thieves, and a low class of people, who remained in Victoria for two months racing in the park, gambling and cheating our citizens. I hope the governement will take prompt action in the matter.

SALE OF SCHOOL LANDS IN NORTH-WEST PROVINCES.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS moved:

That an order of the Senate do issue for a return showing the total amount of lands set apart for school purposes in Rupert's Land or what now comprises the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

The amount of said lands sold for school purposes yearly before the formation of the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, and the average price realized per acre for same.

The amount sold yearly in all the said provinces up to the year 1910, and the average price realized for same.

The total amount of acres of school lands yet remaining unsold in the said provinces.

He said: I require this information in order to intelligently discuss the other resolution which I have placed on the Order Paper, in relation to school lands.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—There is no objection whatever.

The Motion was agreed to.

SERVICES OF BRIGADIER-GENERAL BUCHAN.

MOTION WITHDRAWN.

The order of the day being called:

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE rose to:

Call the attention of the Senate to the military services of the late Brigadier-General Buchan, and will move that an order of the Senate do issue for an official copy of the record in the Department of Militia and Defence.

He said: It does not require a great stretch of the imagination, nor much time on my part, to explain this matter to the House. I have before me the answer to an official communication I wrote to the department, dated 2nd December, signed by Col. Lessard, giving me a statement of the services generally, of the late General Buchan, and I have in my hand his war services as recorded in the Militia lists. Wherever a gallant officer in the old country had rendered good service to the Crown and to his country, that service was always recognized in some tangible way. They did not let him go abroad to fight and win for the nation credit and renown, and then, when compelled by age and infirmities to retire, leave him or his family to starve. Nelson, three generations ago, and Wolesley, who did great service, received money grants. Kitchener and others were also rewarded; the country appreciated their services; the matter was brought before parliament and a vote of thanks was passed and a sum of money was awarded, as a present if you choose to call it so, from the nation, in recognition of the services of these officers. General Buchan went to South Africa. As far as I can learn, he was one of the most gallant, if not the most gallant officer Canada sent to the Boer war. In England, I met some very distinguished officers whom I need not name. They referred to Buchan, as they called him, because he was not a general then, and said his services were grand; that Canada never had a better exemplification of a gallant and brave officer. He was always found in the front in the fighting line. He got his reward in some respects. That was a recognition of service, which every officer gets. I will read his record of war services:

Buchan, Lawrence, Northwest Rebellion, 1885, actions at Fish Creek, 24th April, horse shot, and Batoche 9-12 May; operations against Chief Big Bear's band June-July, despatches 'Canada Gazette" July 11, 1885, medal with clasp. South Africa war, 1899-1900. Operations in Orange Free State, February to May, 1900, including operations at Paardeberg, 17-27 February, actions at Poplar Grove March 9, Driefontein, March 10. Hout Nek, May 1 and Zand River May 10. Operations in the Transvaal in May and June, including actions near Johannesburg, May 29, and Pretoria June 4. Commanded 2nd (special services) Battalion Royal Canadian Regiment, April 26, May 25, 1900, inclusive. Commanded Convalescent Depot Elandsfontein from July 30 to November 7, 1900. Despatches London 'Gazette' February 8 and April 16, 1901. 'Canada Gazette' Brevet of Col. C.M.G. Queen's medal with four clasps.

He was gazetted in the 'Canada Gazette,' Brevet of Colonel, and the Order of Companion of St. Michael and St. George. He did not win this title by walking around and being pleasant as some have. He got it by fighting and risking his life. He got the Queen's medal with four clasps. I have been reading from what is called his record of war services, not compiled by himself, but prepared in the department. I have received the following letter from the Militia Department, with the list of his qualifications:

Ottawa, December 2, 1909.

Dear Sir,—I have much pleasure in inclosing herewith the record of the services of the late Brigadier General Buchan, which you have asked for.

Yours faithfully,
F. L. LESSARD.
Colonel,

The Hon. James Domville,
The Senate.

P. E. THACKER, Major,

A. A. G.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE.

It is admitted in England that Canada did great work in South Africa. Canadians stood to the front, and Buchan was considered a good officer, none better. He went through many engagements and was mentioned in special despatches as in the case where an officer has done excellent work. I think he is a D. S. O. I am not sure. He may have some decorations that are not recorded in the list I have submitted. I know that it would be out of order for an hon. gentleman in this House to ask for a grant or to move such a motion as some of us might wish, that a payment should be made to his family; all we can do or all that I can do on his behalf, is to direct the attention of the House to his services, and the position of his family to-day, left without any recognition or compensation from the Crown. I think it would be a very considerate thing if the government should feel inclined to follow the example of the imperial parliament, and on the merits of the services of General Buchan, make a new departure. Canada never before took an active part in a war beyond our own borders as she did on that occasion, and I think the government might very fairly follow the precedent of England in giving some substantial recognition of the services by granting some allowance to the family of this gallant soldier, who has left nothing for them but the record of his duty to his country. I might refer to the fact that we are going to have a navy. It is not a pleasant prospect for those who may serve in a man of war, whether a Dreadnought or a Bristol, to feel that no recognition of their services will be given because we are Canadians. That will be the argument advanced—that Buchan being a Canadian, parliament will not recognize his services. That is a poor proposition to place before the world, with regard to men who risk their lives for their country. Buchan had no compensation for the great risks he ran except an elegant funeral in Montreal. I have placed the record of his services before the Senate and they will be recorded here for ever, if the books are not destroyed. Recognizing the fact that the Senate cannot vote money, I think it would be a nice tribute to his family if the government could make some kindly recognition of the services of General Buchan. I do not think it is necessary to make a motion. I placed the notice on the paper in order to call the attention of the Senate to the matter, and as one who has served in the militia and served the country in a more humble way, I have only done my duty in placing the matter before parliament.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Does the hon. gentleman withdraw the motion?

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Yes, I withdraw it.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I shall have pleasure in calling the attention of the government to the remarks the hon. gentleman has made. I am aware that the late General Buchan was an officer of great merit, and did very good service, I believe, not merely in Canada, but while he was detached on special service in South Africa. Of course it is entirely beyond our power in this House to meddle with money grants. My hon. friend is aware that the late General Buchan belonged to the permanent force, and in the case of his widow and children some provision is made in the Pension Act. However, I will call the attention of the government to my hon. friend's remarks.

The motion was withdrawn.

SENIORITY OF QUEBEC JUDGES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

Who were, by order of seniority, on the 1st of June, 1906, the judges of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec, belonging to the district of Quebec, as comprised and defined for the purposes of the Court of Review, according to the exact wording of the law.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I have conferred with the Department of Justice on the subject, and I shall be pleased to read to my hon. friend the reply of the Minister of Justice and a memorandum therewith attached. It is as follows:

Ottawa, January 26, 1910.

Dear Sir Richard Cartwright,—I have read, as you asked, the 'Hansard' report of what took place in the Senate on the 12th inst., upon your reading the answer to the question of Hon. Mr. Landry relating to the seniority of Superior Court judges at Quebec, and I am not able to see how any other answer could have been given to the question as framed.

The question demands an answer according to the exact wording of the law, and the answer follows the exact wording of the provincial statutes, constituting the court referred to. I do not know what further information it is possible to give, unless by stating the dates of first appointments to the bench of each one of the judges mentioned in the answer, and I herewith inclose a list of those judges with the date of first appointment of each to the bench.

I remain,

The list is as follows:

Mr. Justice Routhier, September 1, 1873; Mr. Justice Langelier, November 12, 1903; Mr Justice C. A. P. Pelletier, September 30, 1904; Mr. Justice Cimon, July 22, 1882; Mr. Justice Larue, April 12, 1886; Mr. Justice H. C. Pelletier, April 12, 1886; Mr. Justice Gagne, December 10, 1889; Mr. Justice Carroll, January, 29, 1904; Mr. Justice Cooke, November 16, 1904; Mr. Justice Malouin, January 7, 1905; Mr. Justice Cannon, July 29, 1905.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I suppose the list gives the dates?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It contains the list of appointments I believe.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT moved the second reading of Bill (C) An Act to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

He said: On a previous occasion I explained at some length the object of this Bill. It is for the purpose of amending one of the provisions of the Exchequer Court Act by which a remedy is created in favour of the subject for injury to the person or to property being the result of negligence of an officer of the Crown on a public work. The provision which I am seeking to amend is subsection (c) of section 20 of the Exchequer Court Act, and I may say at once that I have been impelled to introduce a Bill seeking this amendment, by a suggestion which is contained in a recent judgment of the Supreme Court, in which the subsection was being construed. Subsection (c) of section 20, reads as follows:

(c) Every claim against the Crown arising out of any death or injury to the person or to property on any public work.

The provision was taken from the old Act concerning the official arbitrators, chapter 40, of the Revised Statutes of 1886. The wording in the old Official Arbitrators Act is practically the same as in this section. Prior to the Act concerning the official arbitrators, there was no remedy whatever in favour of the subject for any claim of this kind being one for Tort against the Crown. A great many hon. gentlemen are familiar with a number of cases which were tried, and in which an attempt was made to recover for injuries of that kind. Hon. gentlemen will remember, for instance, the case of McLeod, who had his legs cut off on the Intercolonial railway, by what was proven to be a clear case of negligence on the part of the officers of the railway; but because there was no provision of the kind suggested in this Bill, the suppliant failed. It was in order to get over that difficulty that the minister was authorized by the official Arbitration Act to refer such matters to the then Board of Official Arbitrators. The provision contained in the Act of the Revised Statutes was in 1887 embodied in the Act which is now under consideration, that is the Exchequer Court Act. I submit that the object of the enactment was to give a remedy in every case where the injury was the direct result of negligence of an officer of the Crown whilst performing his duties on a public work, the proximate cause or reason of the remedy being the negligence of an officer of the Crown on a public work. That interpretation was given to the provision up to the judgment in the case to whch I propose to refer in a moment, Chamberlain vs. the King. I would like to make that point clear, and for that purpose I desire to read from the book on the Exchequer Court Cases, second edition, compiled by Mr. Audette. On page 116, dealing with this very subsection, Mr. Audette says:

Claim against the Crown. On public work, negligence. With respect to the place where the injury to property on the public work occurs it is sufficient to bring the case within the statute if the cause of the injury is or arises on the public work. It would be no answer to those entitled to bring an action for the death of any one on the public work to say that the death did not occur there, if the injury causing death was received on the work, and so it seems that the intention of the statute is to give a remedy to persons whose property is injured by the negligence of the Crown's officer in the discharge of their duties or employment on public works, whether such property is actually on the public work.

I draw special attention to those words, because that is really where the whole difficulty lies.

Whether such property is actually on the public work, or being near enough thereto to be injured by such negligence is actually injured thereby. The foregoing is a view expressed by Judge Burbidge, in re Latourneux vs. the Queen, seven Exchequer Court reports 7, which however he thought he could not hold in view of the contrary opinion of four learned judges in re the city of Quebec vs. the Queen, (24 S.C.R. 420.) However, on appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, Chief Justice Taschereau, who gave the judgment of the court at P. 339 (33 S.C.R.) said that 'the court did not see anything in the case of the city of Quebec vs. the Queen that militated against the right to recover damages under the circumstances, restoring thus the view of Judge Burbidge as above set forth. But in the case of Price vs. the King, it was distinctly held that it is sufficient to bring a case within the statute if the cause of the injury is or arises on a public work.

The case of Price vs. the King, is an exactly similar case to the one which has caused this amendment to be made. In that case, as in the case of Chamberlain vs. the King, which is under discussion, the damages were damages caused by the emission of sparks from an engine on the Intercolonial railway. In Price and the King, the Exchequer Court gave judgment for some thirty or forty thousand dollars, and the Crown paid it without an appeal. The point subsequently raised in Chamberlain vs. the King, was not raised in the case of Price vs. the King, but the jurisdiction of the court was not questioned. He says:

It was distinctly held that it was sufficient to bring a case within the statute if the cause of the injury is or arises on the public work.

I draw special attention to those words: 'If the cause of the injury is or arises on the public work.' That is the interpretation put on that section up to the decision of Chamberlain vs. the King, and the interpretation which I am seeking to have placed on the section by the Bill which I have introduced. I should like to refer to this case. The suppliant was the owner of property along the right of way of the Intercolonial railway. I think his farm was crossed by the Intercolonial railway. The right of way was taken from him for the railway, and sparks emitted from a passing engine started a fire and his barns and property were destroyed. In rendering judgment the Chief Justice said:

In this case the property destroyed by fire previous to and at the time of its destruction was upon the land of the suppliant, some distance from the right of way of the I.C.R., and was not property on a public work.

Then Mr. Justice Davies says:

This was an action brought in the Exchequer Court on a claim for damages arising out of the destruction of the property of the suppliants claimed to have been caused by the sparks from a smoke stack of an Intercolonial railway engine. The property destroyed was previous to and at the time of its destruction upon the land of the suppliant some distance from the right-of-way of the railway, and was not property on a public work.

The learned judge found as a fair conclusion to be drawn from the evidence that the fire originated from a spark or sparks emitted from an engine.

On this appeal the jurisdiction of the Court of Exchequer over the claim in question was challenged and denied by Mr. Chrysler, his contention being that such jurisdiction was limited to claims against the Crown arising out of injuries to the person or property on a public work, and did not extend to injuries happening away from a public work, although caused by the operations of the Crown's officers or servants.

Further on he states:

Claims for injuries not within these words of the section and occurring not on but away from the public work, although arising out of operations wheresoever carried on were held not to be within the jurisdiction conferred by this section. With the policy of parliament we have nothing to do. Our duty is simply to construe the language used, and if that construction does not fully carry out the intention of parliament and if a wider and broader justification is required to be given the Exchequer Court, the Act can easily be amended. Under these circumstances, we must, without expressing any opinion on the conclusion of the facts reached by the learned judge dismiss this appeal with costs.

I have no desire to question, criticise, or discuss the judgment of the Exchequer Court. It might, perhaps, be not unfairly said that it is a very fine distinction, and that the court carried technicality a very long way in arriving at a decision. However, it is there and binding, and no amount of criticism, even if it were proper, would help the situation. The remedy, if there is to be a remedy, lies with parliament alone. The Act must be amended, if I succeed in convincing hon. gentlemen that the Act has not been given the interpretation that parliament intended it should have. I submit that, when parliament made the enactment that a remedy should be given for injuries caused to persons or property by the negligence of some officer on a public work, it did not intend such a conclusion as that arrived at by the court. Reducing the question to an absurdity, to show I am right, assume that one man standing one inch from the line of division between the public work and the private work, or the public property and private property; another man is standing one inch inside the line and by the gross negligence of an officer of the Crown both are killed. Damages are recovered for the man who is one inch in on the government property, and damages for the man who is one inch outside the property cannot be recovered. That is the meaning of the judgment. It seems to me an illustration of that kind is sufficient to show that it never was intended there should be a remedy in one case and no remedy in the other. If you admit there is to be liability for negligence which arises on a public work, you must carry that negligence as far as it operates. For instance, you cannot say there is negligence in allowing a spark to emit from a smokestack, and that that negligence continues only so long as the spark is on the public work, and that the moment it crosses the right of way of the railway on to private property, the negligence ceases. There can be no question whatever that the intention of parliament was to give a remedy in cases such as I have mentioned. I therefore, propose to ask this House to place on the statute the interpretation I think it was intended it should have had from the beginning, and I want to give a remedy to the party, who, though not on the public work at the moment, suffers injury in his person, or to his property, by reason of negligence such as mentioned in the statute. I had at first proposed to amend the Act as the Bill is now printed. Since it has been printed I have discussed the matter with some hon. gentlemen, and I think I may be in a position to suggest, when we go into committee, some language which perhaps will more clearly define the jurisdiction. In committee I will therefore move that the Bill should read as follows:

Subsection (c) of section 20 of the Exchequer Court Act, chapter 140, Revised Statutes, 1906, is repealed, and the following substituted therefor: Every claim against the Crown arising out of any death, injury or loss to the person or property, when such death, injury or loss is due to any cause arising on or connected with any public work, and resulting from the negligence of any officer or servant of the Crown, while acting within the scope of his duties of employment.

There is another provision of the Bill to which I think I should refer, and that is section 2, the effect of which is to make the Bill retroactive. It reads:

This Act shall be held to have come in force on the 28th day of June, 1887.

My reason for doing that is because I think it was the intention of parliament that the Act should have that meaning at the time it was passed. The Exchequer Court Act was passed in 1887, and I think the House would only be doing what is right in providing that the amendment we are now making shall be retroactive, and relate back to the passing of the Act itself. I expect there will be some objection to that, and I am prepared, perhaps, to hear the objection—that we might be resurrecting a number of cases, perhaps issues that may have been adjudicated upon, and that by making a retroactive provision of this kind, we would be reopening the door for further litigation in those cases. I confess the objection is, perhaps, a serious one, and I would be prepared, after discussion, if hon. gentlemen are of the opinion that that provision goes too far, to amend it. I think the provision should go far enough to provide a remedy to those persons who have availed themselves of the provision of the Act, and that it should apply to cases which are now in the Exchequer Court, or before the Department of Justice, for a fiat on a petition of right, in order that they might not be defeated by a provision which was not in the statutes at the time they brought their claims against the Crown. In any case, I contend it should go that far.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I have listened with great attention to the remarks of my hon. friend, and there is no doubt they are weighty and deserve our consideration. I have not, however, been able to confer with the Department of Justice as to the provisions of this Bill, and clause 2, at any rate, appears to me to require very serious consideration before we open the door to actions dating back 23 or 24 years. If my hon. friend has no objection, I should like to confer with the Department of Justice before expressing any opinion on the merits of the proposition he has submitted, and if it meets the concurrence of hon. gentlemen here—unless some of them wish to offer further remarks—I should like to have the debate adjourned until Tuesday next, in order that the Department may be able to give some attention to the hon. gentleman's remarks, and to advise me, so that I may advise the House, as to the view they take of the whole situation.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I certainly quite agree with the suggestion. I realize that I am very largely in the hands of the Department of Justice in a matter of this kind and they have to be fully satisfied that the Bill is a proper one. I shall certainly do everything in my power to facilitate the consideration and passage of the Bill.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Then I move that the debate be adjourned until Tuesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

CONDITION OF PARLIAMENTARY LIBRARY.

INQUIRY.

The order of the day being called:

By the Hon. Mr. LANDRY:—

That he will draw the attention of the government and of this House to the fact that the library of parliament, formerly the joy of the studious class and the pride of the capital, has become, by reason of an excessive encumbrance of volumes of all sorts, and by the disgraceful arrangement that has been made of them, an inconceivable horror, an unnameable lumber room, where the statue of Queen Victoria and the objects of art are disappearing, little by little, under the rising tide of daily journals; where the joint librarians, backed into their little rooms, are constantly menaced with isolation from their families by the ever increasing wall of impenetrable sessional documents; where all the employees, visible and invisible, await suffocation with wonderful resignation, and where, worse than the white plague, the yellow peril or the German danger, death watches for all the subjects of the British empire, members of the Upper Chamber or members of the House of Commons, when the love of the sciences or the way of duty draws into the fatal passage.

And that he will inquire of the government—

Is it the intention of the government to put in the estimates a sufficient sum for the enlargement of the present library or the erection of a new library of greater dimensions and better fitted for the wants of our epoch?

The SPEAKER—This question was proposed and objection was taken to it, and, after the fullest consideration I have been able to give the matter, I have concluded that the hon. gentleman is within his right and that the question is in order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Then I will put the question to the government. I need not add any words to my inquiry. Every one who has been in the library of this parliament will observe, as I have myself, the unsatisfactory conditions that exist. Steps should be taken to remove unnecessary obstacles and to make our library, as it was in the past, an object of pride to the Canadian people. As it is now, it is really a disgrace to parliament, and I think the government should take prompt measures to remove everything that is actually in the way. Under the present crowded condition, books cannot be placed so as to be found readily, and anybody can take a book and go away with it without being observed even by the employees in charge. Proper supervision cannot prevail under existing conditions, because so many journals and books are crowded in the middle of the Chamber.

Hon. Mr. POWER—On the whole, I think that the hon. gentleman's question is a very reasonable and proper one—I mean the substance of it. The language in which it has appeared on our minutes for a very considerable period is perhaps open to criticism; but I concur with the hon. gentleman in hoping that something will be soon done in order that the library may be, if not restored to what it was formerly, relieved of the mass of bound volumes, newspapers and other documents which now encumber the floor. When it was proposed to erect the large addition to the House of Commons end of the parliament buildings, I thought there was an understanding that better accommodation was to be provided for the books, newspapers and pamphlets in the library, and I must confess to a very keen sense of disappointment when I found that although something over half a million dollars had been spent in extending the Commons end of the buildings, nothing had been done in the way of improving the condition of the library, and that things are only getting worse as the mass of books, newspapers and pamphlets accumulates. If we are to follow the example of the Washington of the South, one of the next things we should do is to provide suitable accommodation for the books, papers and documents in the library.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—This is an important question. I wanted to get from the library a very emiment work, only two copies of which are known to exist in the world. We have it mentioned in the catalogue, but it cannot be found. It has got astray somewhere, and you cannot get it for love or money. It is largely due, no doubt, to overcrowding in the library.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—As regards the question put by the hon. member from Stadacona, that could only be answered when the estimates come down. The fact, however, remains that the condition of the library is, without any question, not very creditable to the administration of that department, and I am in hopes that some means will be found to put the main body of the library, at any rate, in a more desirable condition than it is in now. The library itself is a beautiful building, but is horribly disfigured by the accumulation, I was going to say of rubbish of miscellaneous documents that now occupy a great portion of the floorage. The attention of the Minister of Public Works has been called to the matter, I believe, and I understand he is in hopes that he may devise some means of obviating the difficulty.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That has been proposed for about five years now.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I dare say, but great bodies move slowly, and I hope all parties will agree with me that whatever is done the library as it is, which is a really beautiful room and a credit to the country, will not be interfered with.

INUNDATION IN FRANCE.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Before the orders of the day are called, I crave the indulgence of the House for a moment, in order to bring to its attention, and to the attention of the government, the terrible calamity which has befallen the French Republic, and more particularly the loss to Paris. I have just read in one of the morning papers an account of the disaster which has befallen the great French capital. I shall not trouble the House to read all the despatches, but I would like to make a few extracts.

The article is entitled: 'The Floods in France.' It is in French, and I will translate some portions of it. The first despatch is dated Paris, 26th, and is as follows:

The snow storm has ceased but the level of the Seine rises steadily, and the city of Paris is struck with a dark and profound terror. Half the city is plunged in darkness. Staff officers galloped through the dark streets carrying despatches, which cannot be sent by telegraph or phone. The danger is increasing and every moment the inundation extends. The quays crumble and immense cracks appear in the streets and public places. The water has invaded all the labyrinth of underground Paris. Everything is menaced with destruction and ruin. Nobody can predict what new disaster will befall the city before the level of the Seine lowers. The damage is officially stated at two hundred million dollars, and every hour increases the formidable figures by other millions. The catastrophe threatens to assume proportions not merely of a national calamity but of an international disaster. The list of deaths extends in a melancholy manner, and should an epidemic occur, which appears inevitable, the victims will number tens of thousands. Scarlet fever has already made its appearance among the sad misfortunes at Ivry. The list of public subscriptions opened by the newspapers already reaches one hundred thousand dollars. The Red Cross and other societies have valiantly undertaken the work of relief.

Another despatch says:

At present the water is within an inch and a half of the parapet of the Quai du Louvre. The inundation threatens to invade the gallery of sculpture where the Venus de Milo stands.

Then later on at midnight, the water was only an inch and a half from the floor of the Louvre. The flood is now invading the gallery of sculpture where the Venus of Milo is to be found. All the latest dispatches announce that the walls of La Gare D'Orsay have crumbled into an enormous mass, and water is pouring in along the railway and carrying everything in its wake, as if they were mere straws. The whole of that quarter is now completely inundated, and the water has reached a depth of at least two feet over that part of the city.

The article goes on recording the terrible calamity, which I think is properly described, not only as a national calamity, but an international disaster. I wish to draw the attention of the House and of the government to this terrible disaster, and to respectfully but earnestly urge that it would be only proper and right for the government of Canada to show its appreciation of the friendly, cordial and sympathetic relations which exist to-day between the French republic and the empire of Great Britain. The terrible loss of life and property, and of the priceless art treasures which are gathered in the city of Paris, the accumulation of centuries, in which the whole civilized world has properly taken the greatest interest, and which are now being destroyed, it seems to me cannot leave this country, any more than the rest of the world, unsympathetic. The opportunity is an admirable one to give tangible effect to the entente cordiale, and I would respectfully suggest to the government the propriety of showing, as soon as possible, our sympathy with the French republic in words and in deeds. This despatch, from which I have quoted, states that a subscription list has already been opened, and I would respectfully suggest that the government of Canada might very properly contribute to that subscription. Perhaps it is not necessary to say that there are many precedents for such a course. I need only remind the House of what was done on a recent occasion when the city of San Francisco was visited in a manner somewhat similar; but the disaster on that occasion did not assume the tremendous proportions of the present calamity. If my suggestion appears to the right hon. leader of the House to be a reasonable one, I would ask him to convey the sense and feeling of the Senate that the government of Canada might in propriety show its sympathy to France in the manner I have indicated.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middlesex)—If I am in order, I should like to emphasise the view expresed by the hon. member for Ottawa. This is a terrible disaster, and, as he said, an international disaster, and it appeals with particular force to the people of Canada. Our relations with France have been of the most cordial character for a great many years. France assisted in founding Canada. We celebrated that great event last year at the tercentenary at Quebec, when France was represented by one of her leading men, and brought to that celebration a battleship as an evidence of goodwill, not of hostility. We have grown up amongst us a large French population which has taken a full share in the government of Canada and its development, in filling places of honour and trust, and the bonds which bind us to that race have become stronger and stronger by the lapse of years. There is a tie of kinship between us and France such as does not exist between us and any other country in the world except the motherland. That tie can give expression to itself at this moment in a manner that I am sure would be appreciated by the French citizens of Canada and by the great republic. Recently we have been drawing these ties more closely together in a commercial sense. We will probably have before us this session the ratification of a treaty with France by which we hope the commerce of Canada will flow into her ports, and by which her trade will find reciprocal advantages here. We have established a line of shipping between this country and France in order that commerce may be extended. In one hundred ways our interests and our reputation and our sympathies are woven and interwoven with the history and the international relations between Canada and the republic of France. I remember a few years ago when a great disaster overtook the University of Toronto that the first response that came to us in the way of relief from that disaster, was a contribution of $10,000 from the government of Quebec. It was a contribution practically from the French population of that province to the English people of Ontario, in order that they might recover, as far as money could assist in that way, from the effects of that great disaster. That was a provincial contribution. Now we are on a larger plane, and we can look across the sea and feel what suffering there must be amongst the thousands of those who are deprived of their homes as well as their gorgeous public institutions which are suffering loss, and the citizens who are deprived of their habitations. I cordially agree with what the hon. gentleman has said, that we ought to do something now. He gives twice who gives quickly, and a message to France from the people of Canada just now would strengthen our relations and would sweeten the atmosphere, if it would add to that cordial feeling which would need sweetening; at all events it has sprung up and which we hope may long remain. We have a common interest in the trade of the world, and we have a kinship which I think we should not overlook. I should be delighted if the government could see its way to do this and do it now. To delay a day would be to deprive this gift of a part of its merits. It is the moment of particular distress you feel really the most, and it blesseth him that gives as well as him that takes. We know it will be received, and we know we can afford to give it, for we know that the French people of Canada have contributed their full share of labour, enterprise and skill to the wealth of Canada.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Subscriptions have already been opened in New York, as I observe by to-day's despatches, and I think it is very apropos that Canada should act quickly with the other countries in coming, I will not say to the rescue, but in extending her sympathies in a tangible manner to France, which is the mother country of about one-third of the population of this Dominion. Therefore, I endorse as far as in my power the remarks that have been made by the two hon. gentlemen who have preceded me.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think we all agree in the sentiments of the hon. gentleman from Ottawa with respect to the expression of our regret for the calamity which has befallen Paris and other portions of France; but I do not see eye to eye with him on the other point, that we should immediately tender pecuniary assistance. In the first place, I do not think the Senate is the place where tenders of pecuniary assistance should originate.

Hon. Mr. OWENS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the Commons is the proper place for that. There is also the fact that France is probably the richest country in the world. France is also a proud country and my own impression is that, as happened some years ago in the case where government help was tendered in connection with the earthquake and fire at San Francisco, the government of the other country might decline to accept the assistance if tendered. I think it is a perfectly proper and seemly thing to express our sympathy and regret, but I think it would be well to ascertain whether the French government would be prepared to accept any pecuniary help before we undertake to tender it.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I intended to say nothing on the subject, as it has been sufficiently developed by the previous speakers, but I really cannot concur in the position that the hon. senator from Halifax would wish this House and parliament to assume. He has no ground for saying that a pecuniary contribution would not be accepted by France. The hon. member from Ottawa made a proposal, which is merely a suggestion and not a motion, and the hon. senator from New Brunswick has given the true expression of the feeling in this matter, both as to the matter of regret and the question of contribution. I regret very much that the hon. gentleman from Halifax, with his vast experience in this House, should throw a note of discord into this discussion. If the government of France will not accept, or does not need our money, there are charitable societies there which are doing the work of humanity. There is the Red Cross Society, which will take money from all sources, so as to assist in its good work in relieving the distress which has overtaken Paris, and I for one as well as the vast majority of hon. senators of this House are prepared to endorse the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman from Ottawa, and to urge the government of the day to make this offer, if not directly to the government of France, at least to the Red Cross Society, which is looking after the maimed, wounded and dying.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I think the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman from Ottawa is a very proper one. It is quite possible the government of France may do as the government of the United States did, refuse the pecuniary assistance which would be tendered by this country; but the compliment would be paid, and it would be a proper expression of sympathy under the circumstances; therefore I cannot agree with the hon. member from Halifax. As was stated, Paris is a great city from many points of view. Most of us know Paris in its gaiety, but few really know the wealth of that city as far as science is concerned. Those who know Paris better, are aware that there are in that city thousands and thousands of people who have devoted the whole of their lives to scientific study and research of all kinds, without any idea of pecuniary reward for the discoveries they made; but in the interest of humanity at large. The disaster which has been brought to the attention of this honourable House is a disaster without precedent, and I think it would be but proper on the part of Canada to show its sympathy in the manner indicated. It is perfectly true that Bills or resolutions involving payment of money from the public exchequer cannot originate in the Senate; but I think this honourable Chamber should not be closed to an expression of sympathy on such an occasion as this.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—There can be no doubt that the whole civilized world will agree in feeling sympathy for the extraordinary disaster that appears at the present time to have overwhelmed a portion of the city of Paris. Every one in this House, probably every one in America, I might almost say, knows that Paris is in every sense of the word a cosmopolitan city, and every one who has had the advantage of paying a visit to Paris must regret that there is the slightest danger to any of those beautiful works of art and those beautiful edifices which adorn its streets and parks, being imperiled by the present disaster. The government, beyond all question, entirely endorses the expressions of sympathy which have been stated, in the disaster which has overtaken the city. As to what else may be done, I think, bearing in mind that the present Premier of Canada is a gentleman of French origin, the House may very well leave the matter in his hands, and in the hands of the House of Commons, if they see fit to take further action. My hon. friend will pardon me for saying that the hon. gentleman from Halifax is right in reminding the House that it has nothing to do with the question of money contributions, and I do not think it would be a good precedent for this House to advise the government in any form or shape to make a money contribution. That should be left to those who are charged with the task of administering the funds belonging to the people of Canada. I have not the slightest doubt that if, on consideration, the occasion appears to them to require aid, they will be found fully equal to the duty imposed upon them.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT.

FIRST REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY moved the adoption of the first report of the Joint Committee of both Houses on the Printing of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (British Columbia)—May I ask the hon. gentleman if the committee to which he belongs is taking any notice of the great expenditure and waste in publishing and printing documents. We know that a large number of blue books are sent broadcast all over the country, and I question very much if the members ever look at any of these publications. I think there is a great chance for curtailing expense in this regard. Tons of blue books have been distributed through Canada, overloading the mails, and crowding the houses; so much so that at times they have been burned. In my experience I know that tons of blue books have been thrown in the fire where people could not find room for them. I would suggest that not more than one copy of a blue book be sent to each member. That would effect a saving to the country.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—The committee cannot be blamed in the least for the surplus of printed matter. If any hon. member will read carefully the report of the committee he will see that they have turned down almost every document which came before them. The difficulty is not with the committee, but it is with the system which has made the committee rather a supernumerary. A great deal of printing is done before the committee meets. It is in the hands of the department and of various officials to have documents printed if they wish, and all those documents are published as 'printed by order of parliament.' The system requires revision. I would say off-hand that it is a very bad system. The committee ordered very few of the papers submitted to them to be printed. Whether the committee could deal with the vast mass of public documents which are printed by order of other officials, I am not prepared to say; but I do say that there are a great many blue books printed which are quite unnecessary. The quantity is enormous and the weight of them something tremendous.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY—I am very glad the hon. gentleman from British Columbia has referred to this matter, because it affords me an opportunity of stating that since I have been honoured with the chairmanship of the Joint Committee, it has engaged my attention to a very considerable extent. As you all know, there is a tremendous amount of printed matter going through the Bureau that may be termed a criminal waste. A few days ago the secretary of the Joint Committee showed me on the third story of the new building a mass of printing concerning, I think, the lobster industry. A large number of books in reference to this matter were distributed in places where they would do some good, but over and above that, at present, we find stored away in one of the rooms of the new building printing that must have cost at least twelve or fifteen hundred dollars, which is absolutely waste. As you all know, we have a great amount of blue books that find their way to what is called 'the dump.' I believe that a gentleman has a contract with the government by which he receives one thousand dollars a month for receiving the dump of the Printing Bureau. As you all know, every bit of the printed matter we receive here appears on paper that costs at least five cents a pound. From day to day and week to week we have reams upon reams of paper, costing a large amount of money, passing through the printing office of the Bureau. It then goes to the bindery, and later on the post office handles it. It overloads the mail bags going to distant parts of the country in large bundles to the different members of the two Houses; and we suppose this is a scheme merely to get rid of it, because I have not yet found a member who could properly utilize a bundle of that kind received through the post office. I am in communication with the secretary of the Printing Committee, and will do my best to find some means of curtailing this waste. Some means should be found to stop what is really a criminal waste. I do not desire that parliament should in any way be penurious in this matter, that we should cut and carve every thing to the lowest possible cost. Wherever it is necessary to have documents printed they should be printed, but in such quantities as will be properly utilized. If we have, for instance, a mass of printing for the Department of Agriculture in regard to the Experimental farms, or anything of that kind, it is better not to send such printed matter to the members of the two Houses. It should be distributed to the agricultural societies all over the country, if it is intended that it should produce any good. The same holds good with the other departments; but as the hon. member from St. John has said, it is a difficult thing for the Senate to deal with a matter of this kind, because so much power has been placed within the hands of the ministers of the departments; they govern things and the Printing Committee often find it impossible to interfere. But so far as they can interfere, I can assure hon. gentlemen that during my term of office I shall do all I can to put a stop to this waste which has been going on for a number of years.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not altogether in accord with the sentiments expressed by those who have preceded me on this question. When returns are moved for in either House it is for the purpose of obtaining information relating to the public service. My hon. friend from Victoria has little to complain of in reference to this particular report, because I notice that only three of the papers in the list are recommended to be printed. No doubt there is a good deal of waste of the character mentioned by the chairman of the committee, and anything the committee can do to economize in that direction would be welcomed by the House; but I notice in this report that every paper which has been laid before parliament referring to expenditures in connection with the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the difficulties which have arisen in reference to overcharging and improper classifiation of work, are not to be printed. There are no less than seven or eight papers of that character. I do not know of any question which has agitated the public mind to a greater extent than that of the management and construction of the National Transcontinental railway, and the alleged improprieties that have occurred in connection therewith. When the committee recommend that documents upon that subject be not printed they are withholding information which the public should possess. It is impossible for me, not being a member of the committee, to see what reasons the Printing Committee have for recommending that these documents be not printed. There may be some good reason for it. There may be other means of obtaining that information, and possibly the chairman of the committee could explain it in that way; but, I repeat, the documents which are not to be printed contain information on a subject which the public generally are interested in, and that information should be at their disposal. The members of both Houses also should possess that information in order that they may reach a correct conclusion as to the course to be pursued when those questions are brought before parliament. I do not say that these documents should all be printed and included in the journals, but for general distribution among the members of both Houses of parliament; they should be printed in order that we may know for ourselves how these works are being constructed. Probably the committee is going a little too far in recommending that these documents should not be printed, if only for circulation among the members of both Houses. Apart from that, I agree to a great extent with the remarks made by the hon. chairman of the committee. There is plenty of room for economy; but there is such a thing as economizing to the detriment of the public interest.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY—The hon. gentleman is quite right in stating that some very important documents appear in the list of subjects which we should have printed. These were gone over very carefully by the members of both Houses, and it often happens, in fact invariably happens, that an important document, or a number of important documents, will be up for consideration as to whether they will be printed or not printed. The reason in this case why they are not printed is because they will appear in the Auditor General's report or in the annual report of the department to which they belong. If they were not to appear in those reports, the committee would certainly have ordered them printed on their own account; but as they will appear in another form it was thought quite unnecessary to print them by order of the committee.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The Auditor General's report does not give the information contained in those returns. The Auditor General gives the details of expenditure and the correspondence connected with it.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY—These reports will appear in the annual report of the different departments.

The motion was agreed to.

PATENTS OF HENRY ALEXANDER WISE WOOD—BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT moved the second reading of Bill (H) An Act respecting certain patents of Alexander Wise Wood.

Hon. Mr. JONES—I was not in the House when this Bill was read the first time, and I do not know whether at that stage the explanations which would reasonably be expected when a Bill of this nature is introduced, were made, and that accounts for this formal motion that the Bill be read the second time. To me it seems rather an extraordinary Bill. I have only had an opportunity of looking at it since taking my seat. It is a Bill dealing with six different patents, patents apparently taken out by one Alexander Wise Wood, of New York. The first of these patents was taken out in the year 1900, the second in 1902, the third in 1905, the fourth in 1907, and the fifth and sixth in 1908. It is proposed by this Bill to reinstate, in so far as needs be, these several patents and make them legal in Canada without reference to whether they are in existence or otherwise, or whether they have been dead for some considerable time. In the first clause of the Bill, we are asked to say that notwithstanding the non-payment of fees, especially as I read the Bill on the second patent taken out in 1902, the patents are reinstated. I understand that the fees have not been paid, and that the patent, for this reason at least, has been dead for two years, without reference to other conditions which may surround it. The patent may have been dead for four or five years for other causes; but from the fact that the fees have not been paid, it has not been effective for two years or more. Whether the fees have been paid for the first one I do not understand from the Bill. We are asked also in the second clause to say that when these patents were taken out in Canada, there were none of them taken out under what is known as the licensing clause of the Act. They have been in existence now from two to ten years, and the patentee has decided that, under the circumstances, if he can have them reinstated, he desires to have the privilege of placing them under the licensing Act. We are empowering him in this Bill to transfer them to such clause in the Patent Act as will enable him to do this, if he should so desire. In the third clause we are asked further to grant an extension of time not exceeding twelve months within which to import the said inventions into Canada. Under the law, if I recollect it correctly, any inventor taking out a patent in Canada may for the first twelve months after that patent is issued import the article covered by the patent into Canada without interfering with his patent rights. Whether importations have been made during all this period or not I do not know; but now, ten years or so after some of these patents are out, we are asked by this Bill to say that notwithstanding what has transpired within this period either by the patentee or other foreigner, that he may have another twelve months to import these goods without affecting the validity of any of the several patents which we are validating by this Bill. Further the fourth clause says that:

4. Notwithstanding anything in the Patent Act aforesaid or in the patents mentioned in the preamble, the said patents are declared not to have become null and void nor to have ceased and determined under paragraphs (a) and (b) of section 38 of the said Act, and shall not become null and void nor cease and determine for six months after the passing of this Act, if within such period of six months, application for further relief is made to the Commissioner of Patents.

And, further, the fifth clause provides that if any person in Canada has been making any of these articles and doing so within the period previous to the 28th of November, 1909, he may be privileged to go on and manufacture. That would be providing for legislation that in the meantime is not in existence, and would be retroactive legislation to prevent a Canadian who may have been using features that are covered by these patents, which are clearly null and void, and have been so for two years or more, if any of the articles have been imported, from continuing to manufacture them after the 28th of November last. It does appeal to me that that clause is objectionable because it is retroactive, and then it says further—

But this provision shall not extend to any person who, without the consent of the holder of the said patents, commenced the construction or manufacture of any of the said inventions before the expiry of the patent relating thereto, or before the date at which default under the said section 38 may have occurred with respect thereto.

That, as I understand it, means this: supposing some Canadian, believing that these patents were void, commenced to manufacture in Canada five or ten years ago, and has been doing so all this time, and desires to continue manufacturing them in Canada, if it is shown that he began within the period named here, although for the past four or five years clearly he had the absolute right to manufacture in Canada, notwithstanding that, he shall be obliged to cease to manufacture and come under the law as it will apply to the resurrected patents which have been clearly void and of no effect for all these years. Such legislation ought to receive the most careful consideration of this House before it goes through. Like most legislation of the kind, I submit that it is not in the best interests of Canada, and would not be considered for a moment in the country from which most if not all of these patents come. The people for whom these patents are resurrected and brought into force should not receive so much consideration. It is not in the interest of Canada that they should.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—The Bill was handed to me by a firm of solicitors in the city of Ottawa, who told me that the only reason why patents were void or voidable or ineffective, was the default or delay in paying the fees mentioned in clause (1), that otherwise the patents are in full force and effect, and that the non-payment of the fees was due to the negligence of some person in Canada who had been charged with the duty of making the payments on behalf of the holder of the patents. There are two kinds of Bills which come before parliament that are absolutely dependent on facts; they are Bills for divorce and Bills of this kind under the patent laws. I do not suppose that this House would think it proper to go into the merits of a Bill of this sort before the facts are laid before a committee and fully investigated. It would be practically the case of a court giving judgment before hearing the evidence. After the facts have been inquired into, and the Bill is reported by the committee, the points to which my hon. friend has called attention, I have no doubt, will receive full consideration, as he evidently wishes they should.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Before giving this Bill a second reading, we should have a clear and distinct statement from the member who has charge of it why parliament should revive those patents. We should have such a statement instead of a general statement with regard to the Act. This kind of legislation is becoming altogether too common. I can remember when we had no such legislation. I contend that we should not permit Bills of this character not merely reviving a single patent, but reviving five or six at a time, as in this case, to pass this House. These patents are dead and buried, and should never be resurrected. I entirely endorse the views of the hon. gentleman from Toronto with regard to this class of legislation. I would suggest to my hon. friend from Ottawa that he should suspend the second reading of the Bill and get a clear and distinct explanation of the measure before asking the House to give it a second reading. By giving it a second reading now, we are virtually endorsing the principle of the Bill. We cannot afford to do that on the very meagre explanation that is given regarding it. I hope that my hon. friend will see that it is his duty to suspend the further consideration of the Bill until he is ready to explain every clause of it. For my own part, I am opposed to the second reading without such an explanation.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—My hon. friend evidently did not understand me. I stated that I had been told by the gentleman who asked me to take charge of the Bill that the only reason why the patents had become ineffective was owing to the neglect of those who had been instructed to pay the fee.

Hon. Mr. JONES—Does not the Bill say on the face of it in the plainest way, that that is not the reason? That can be seen at a glance.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—The Bill simply asks that the petition of the holder of the patents for the receipt of these fees may be entertained. I can only repeat what I have stated, that that is the only reason for the Bill.

Hon. Mr. JONES—Read the second clause.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—The second clause is as follows:

2. Notwithstanding anything in the Patent Act aforesaid, or in the patents mentioned in the preamble, the Commissioner of Patents may, within six months of the passing of this Act, receive from the holder of the said patents applications asking that the said patents, instead of being subject to the conditions with respect to the construction and manufacture of the patented inventions as set out in 38 of the said Act, shall be subject to the conditions as to licenses set forth in paragraphs (a) (b) (c) and (d) of section 44 of said Act, and upon any such application duly made the commissioner may make any such order as he might make under the said section 44.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I confess that I have not looked at the Act recently. I cannot say what it means.

Hon. Mr. JONES—It means to transfer it to a different clause. Give the House clauses 3, 4, and 5.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I am not prepared to say that my hon. friend's objections are not good. The only reason I am advancing is this, that in a case of this sort, as in cases for divorce, this House, or the committee of the House, is not in a position to judge without having the facts before it. If these provisions are not such as commend themselves to the committee, or to this House, they can be thrown out; but to throw out the Bill, or to prevent its second reading on the ground that some of the provisions of the measure are objectionable, in the absence of the merits on which this Bill must rest, would seem to me illogical. It would be deciding a case which depends on initiative fact without ascertaining the fact. I do not think that in adopting the second reading the House sanctions the principle of the Bill at all. It only sanctions the Bill so far as may be justified later on, by the facts that may be adduced before the committee. I do not think the second reading of the Bill has any other meaning. I do not think, if it is postponed for a week or two, that I will be in any better position to enlighten the House, and if I had all the facts to be submitted to the House today we would not be in a better position to judge. The committee would have to sift the facts and hear the evidence. It has to go to the committee in any case, and it would be time enough for the committee not to report it if the facts did not justify them in reporting. In what better position would this House be if I were able to give in detail every bit of evidence which is going to be submitted to the committee, or which has to be investigated there? It seems to me there is no reason for refusing the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL.- The analogy given by the hon. gentleman in asking us to proceed with this Bill without knowing the reasons, comparing it with a divorce Bill, is not applicable at all.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I said the evidence—

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understand what the hon. gentleman said. Before this House is asked to pronounce upon a divorce Bill, as to whether they shall pass it or not, all the evidence that is given before the committee is printed and sent to each member of the House so that he is in full possession of the reasons which lead the Divorce Committee to recommend the adoption of whatever they may report. It is quite different with the Private Bills Committee. These Bills are referred to that committee, and all this Senate knows afterwards is the fact that the committee recommend the passage of the Bill. They never give the reasons unless some member asks for information and puts categorical questions, and then the House is placed in possession of the reasons which led the committee to recommend the granting of the petition. There is the difference in dealing with the two subjects to which the hon gentleman has referred. There are clauses in this Bill that I have never seen in any other Bill asking for the renewal of a patent. The common reason given is that which my hon. friend has given; that is for nine or ten years during which these parties have had this patent, they have failed to comply with the provisions of the law. Surely they knew when they obtained the patent that they either had to continue paying the fees for an extension of time and to commence the manufacture of the article in the Dominion within a certain period. They allow it to drop. They do not pay the fees, for the simple reason that at the time they sent to the patent office, and for years and years afterwards, they saw no probability of making a success of the invention in the country in which they obtained the patent. In this case, the rapid growth of the stereotyping process in all the newspapers throughout the Dominion, and the profits likely to accrue under stereotyping by this new process, for which they are asking a renewal of their patent, may have induced them at last, after having failed to comply with the law, to seek a renewal of their patent. It is a direct violation of the principle upon which patent rights, in any part of the world, are granted. Go to the United States and ask for the renewal of a patent there under similar circumstances, and they would no more grant it to you than they would give you permission to be elected president. In England, the practice had become so prevalent in reference to lapsing of patents and the applying for renewals, and the non-fulfilment of the conditions of the patent, one principle of which is to commence the manufacture of the article in the country, that the English parliament placed upon record an Act forbidding, in almost every case, the renewal of a lapsed patent. What has been the result? The experience of those who have watched the position taken by the imperial parliament, is that it has caused the parties holding patents for the manufacture of those certain patents, either to drop the rights they held or to bring tens of thousands of pounds into the country in the establishment of new industries. Patentees find fault with that, because they cannot secure for all time to come—I might say that—for twenty or thirty years, the right to manufacture without doing so, notwithstanding the fact that they failed to comply with the condition of the law. My sympathy goes with the inventor who has the brains to invent the article. There is nothing to show that the applicant in this matter is the inventor. He is the owner of the invention. It is too often the case that some man's money will buy from the man who invented the article, whatever rights he has, and he obtains the patent. The very articles themselves which this patent covers, would indicate to my mind that they are the result of the work of practical men who have studied the question of stereotyping in the various newspaper offices of the country. These rights have been purchased by somebody who is now trying to retain for the next ten or fifteen years the exclusive right to manufacture in this country. The position my learned friend takes that we should not judge until we know the facts, is just what my hon. friend from Toronto and others, who hold the same views on the question, desire. On the second reading of a Bill of this character the fullest explanations should be given in order that the House may be in a position to judge whether it is proper or improper to allow it to go to the committee. For my part, I would vote against this Bill and all others of a similar character, unless the gentleman introducing it can give much better reasons than have been given for the introduction of this Bill. It is too much the practice to introduce Bills in this Chamber without making the slightest declaration of the purport of the measure or the effect it would have if it became law. I have never undertaken the responsibility of introducing a Bill unless I knew precisely what the effect would be, no matter whether I was in the government or out of it, and the sooner we put a stop to this practice of renewing patents unless we have the fullest possible information as to why the conditions in the law have not been complied with, the better. Unless the hon. gentleman is prepared to give us sufficient reasons to justify us in passing it I would feel inclined to move the six months hoist; but out of respect to my hon. friend I will not do that. Last session I intimated that I would test the opinion of the Senate upon the question of renewal of these charters in the indiscriminate manner in which it is done, without having the slightest information as to why the conditions of the Act had not been complied with.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The House has been, perhaps, rather loose in its way of dealing with Bills relating to renewal of patents, but it strikes me that after the speeches which have been made by the hon. gentlemen from Toronto, Wellington and Hastings, the committee must be seized of the fact that there is a serious question as to the desirability of passing this particular Bill. I am glad, however, that the hon. gentleman from Hastings does not propose to move the six months hoist. That would be dealing out a measure of severity in this case which I think is rarely ever dealt out to a private Bill. It is not a fact that the House approves of the principle of a private Bill when it gives it a second reading. There is not really any principle involved in a private Bill. The House does not know whether it is one which should pass or not until it has heard the evidence which is adduced before the committee for and against the Bill. The hon. gentleman from Toronto, or any other hon. gentleman, if he is not a member of the committee, has a perfect right to appear before the committee to whom the Bill is referred and to cross examine the witnesses and to propound objections, and then if the report of the committee should happen to be favourable to the Bill —and, as a rule, unless the Bill does not deserve to pass, the committee report favourably—if the report of the committee should happen to be favourable to the Bill and any hon. gentleman thinks the report is not justified by the circumstances, he has a right to move against the report here in the House, and the House is always willing to give a patient hearing to any objection of that kind. Sometimes the committees are too easy about passing measures; but I trust the House will allow this Bill to go to the committee on Miscellaneous and Private Bills, and allow the facts to be brought before that committee. Whether we should renew these patents at all is another question; but it has been the practice for a great many years, and I should not like to see a different treatment dealt out to the hon. gentleman from Ottawa from that which has been dealt to other members.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Might I ask the hon. leader of the government in the House whether they have decided upon any policy on this question? If my recollection serves me, when this question was before the Senate last year the leader of the House intimated his intention to bring the question before the Minister of Agriculture and to decide upon some policy as to the propriety or impropriety of renewing patents in the indiscriminate manner we have been doing.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The hon. gentleman is quite correct. I did bring the question to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture. I understood from him that he proposed to assign one or more of his officers especially to examine into all these Bills and to report to him and to the various committees of the House. What he has done in this instance I am not in a position to say. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that, under the circumstances, my hon. friend might have his Bill sent to the committee, who will, no doubt, investigate the matter fully, and I on my part, as the matter has been brought to my attention, will direct the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to it.

The House divided on the motion, which was carried on a standing vote, by the following division:

Yeas, 24; nays, 13.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to ask why the yeas and nays were taken under the circumstances, when there was no motion other than that to refer it to the committee, and no objection made to it?

The SPEAKER—It was the motion for the second reading.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No one asked for a vote. I understood, after the remark made by the leader of the government, there was to be no objection taken, but to allow it to go to the committee.

The SPEAKER—I declare the second reading carried.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I move that the Bill be referred to the Committee on Private Bills.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—It is all very well for my hon. friend to say he is going to move the Bill to the Private Bills Committee, there to thresh out the matter and obtain any information possible in connection with it. It appears to me the right of the people of New York to have this Bill brought to life again is equivalent to saying that they neglected to remit the fee for registration. Such cannot be the case. If this Bill is referred to the Private Bills Committee, do hon. gentlemen suppose they are going to give any information as to why the fees were not originally paid? That will not be done. What information will you get?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Where does the hon. gentleman wish to send it?

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I want to bury that Bill and all Bills of the same character which come before the Senate. I say it is a mistake to renew these patents. We are not here for that purpose, unless sufficient reason is given.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I rise to a question of order. The merits of the Bill cannot be discussed at this stage. If the hon. gentleman wants to move in amendment that the Bill be referred to another committee, he can make that motion.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—If my hon. friend will confine his imagination to himself and not impute motives to me, it will be much better for him. I am able to think for myself without the aid of the hon. gentleman. I am objecting to this Bill and objecting to its being referred to the Private Bills Committee, and if I could move a second motion that this Bill be not sent there I would be justified in doing it. We have a resolution. The hon. ex-Speaker must know that I have a right to move in amendment that this Bill be not now referred to that committee, but that it be sent there at some future time.

And why should he interfere with the course I am pursuing? I contend that this Bill ought not to have been brought to this House under existing circumstances, and my hon. friend, in moving the Bill, gave us no reason why, further than the statement made by him that the fees had not been paid when they ought to have been paid and a certain time had elapsed. How long? We are not in a position to know. The Bill before us says that on account of the patent having expired they are desirous of a renewal. If the Bill is sent to the Private Bills Committee and they report it back to the Senate, we shall be told that we endorsed the principle of the Bill when we gave it the second reading, and if they report favourably we will be told that we have no right to discusss the principle of a Bill that was affirmed by the second reading. I am strongly opposed to the Bill. If there be any benefit to the people of the country in his patent, why should we be asked by a person in New York to have the patent renewed? We are prevented from getting any benefit from it. We are not being treated fairly, and I claim the right, when the Bill comes up for third reading, to move the six months' hoist.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think the hon. gentleman was quite in order in giving reasons why he thought the motion should not carry referring it to a committee. It is usual to refer a Bill to a committee the moment it passed the second reading, but it is not against the rules of the House for an hon. gentleman to object to sending it to a committee, and make some other suggestion. I was not going to oppose the reference to a committee, but in order that the House may be placed in a position to judge of the Bill, I would suggest that what evidence is taken before the committee be taken under oath and reported by one of the official reporters, and that that report be presented to the House with the committee's report, then at the third reading the House would be in a position to judge whether the Bill should become law. I know that this is an unusual proceeding, but from the fact that we are asked to make these concessions almost every session, without really knowing the reasons why we grant them, it is well that the evidence should be taken under oath and presented in the House. If my hon. friend has no objection, I would move that the Bill be referred to a committee and that evidence be taken on oath.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Are the facts not generally ascertained and established before the Private Bills Committee by affidavits?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not know. I have never been there. If so, let us know what they are. The facts have never been laid before us in the past.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I have no objection to the suggestion of my hon friend. It is not a new suggestion, except in one respect; the evidence is always given under oath, sometimes orally, but if not orally by affidavit in both Houses.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—But is not reported.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I think it is a suggestion which might apply to every Bill of this kind.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would point out that there is a very substantial difference between Bills of this nature and other private Bills which go through this House. Parliament, under the Patent Act, has given an extraordinary power or right to patentees to permit them to exercise certain rights against the public at large, and they preserve those rights to the patentee for a number of years. The difficulty that I see when a matter of this kind goes before the Private Bills Committee is this: they take evidence upon the subject and the House is not seized with knowledge as to the manner in which the committee have exercised their discretion. They determine what the public policy is, entirely irrespective of this House. Consequently the House should be in possession of the evidence which is placed before that committee so that we as well as the committee may exercise our discretion on a very important question of public policy, as to whether extraordinary rights of this nature should be continued in view of the default of the patentee.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—There is a mistaken impression in regard to the procedure before the Private Bills Committee. I have been in charge of that committee for several years, and during that time there was never any evidence taken under oath. The only evidence would be an explanation by the attorney for the parties promoting the Bill.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Affidavits are put in.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I remember very few, if any of them, and the only evidence brought before the committee would be the explanations of the company or of the individual applying for the extension or renewal of the patent. The suggestion made by the hon. gentleman from Hastings in regard to obtaining the evidence in this matter is worthy of consideration, if practicable. The committee could not employ a stenographer or secretary. I suppose it would have power to administer the oath, but, under the circumstances, the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman from Hastings is a proper one, and I thoroughly agree with one point of his argument, and it is a most serious one. We grant patents to foreigners just the same as foreigners grant patents to our people, with this distinction, that when we grant a patent to a foreigner he manufactures say in Buffalo or New York. He does not need to manufacture in Canada. He imports the products of his invention into Canada, and by his patent he has the right for five or six years to prevent anybody else manufacturing that article; but when the patent lapses in Canada the policy of the government should be that foreigners shall have no renewal. The suggestion made by the hon. gentleman from Hastings should receive serious consideration by the government, and especially by the Department of Agriculture. If a man holds a right under a patent for five or six years, that is enough. If he does not want to manufacture in Canada, let some one else do it.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I do not propose to contradict the statement made by the hon. member from Victoria division. I know that he has been chairman of the committee for several years, and I do not know what has been the practice of the committee. Last year I was a member of the committee, and I know that it was very critical of all Bills of that kind, and that the committee invariably exacted not only evidence in writing and under oath, but the confirmation of that evidence by the Department of Agriculture. The deputy minister of Agriculture was invariably present, and the inquiry made by the committee was most critical in every respect. I must say that as far as I have been able to ascertain, the committee was of opinion, as I gathered from the expression of members, that this remedial legislation was being abused. Such legislation should be curtailed considerably, and for my part I am very glad to hear an expression of opinion in that sense at this sitting of the House. I see no objection to the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman from Belleville. It will give an additional opportunity for this honourable House to pronounce itself on the question of principle whether legislation of that kind should be continued, and to what extent.

The motion was agreed to.

MONTREAL, OTTAWA AND GEORGIAN BAY CANAL COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT (in the absence of Hon. Mr. Casgrain) moved the 2nd reading of Bill (No. 58) An Act respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company. He said: The purpose of the present Bill is to keep alive the charter of the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company. It extends the time for making a commencement up to the first of May, 1912. In moving the second reading of this Bill, I cannot but express my regret that the prospects for this important work are no better now than they were sixty years ago. At that time there was a very general agitation, not only locally but throughout a large portion of this country, that that work was one of the first importance in the interests of Canada. I had the honour of attending a banquet, I think, in 1851 or 1852, at which several members of the government of the day were present. The banquet was held under canvas in the city of Ottawa, then Bytown, and assurances were received that the work was one which was likely to obtain public support. If my memory is correct, Sir Francis Hincks, who was the Finance Minister of the day, attended that banquet, as did also the Hon. John Young, Minister of Public Works at that time, and the Hon. Lewis P. Drummond, then Attorney General for the province of Quebec. The moving spirit at that time in his efforts to bring the work before the public was John Egan, who represented the county of Ottawa at that date, and subsequently the county of Pontiac. As an evidence of the interest the government of that day took in it, a sum of money was placed in the estimates some little time afterwards for the commencement of the work, and a contract was given to A. P. McDonald for the construction of a portion of the work at the Chats, which would connect two considerable links of the proposed canal. That work was continued for some years, but in 1858, I think it was, I have a distinct recollection of Mr. McDonald coming to Toronto and showing the members generally that with the explosives then in use, it was impossible to make any advance with the construction of the work except at very large cost, and he asked that the contract be taken off his hands. In proof of that, I remember his bringing up some very hard stone to show that the ordinary powder—because at that time the high explosives that we use to-day had not been invented—made no real impression on the work. That contract having been given up, other public works engaged the attention of Canada down to a comparatively recent period, and this canal project was allowed to fall into oblivion. It was revived in 1894, and has now been in existence for fourteen years. Some evidence of its value, and of the character of the work has been obtained by the surveys which have been made, and all who have given it any thought or attention, are perfectly convinced that the work would be one of very general value inasmuch as it cheapens the cost of transporting the wheat of the Northwest very perceptably in reaching tide-water. It is a route that would defy competition by any other. Under the circumstances, I have much pleasure in moving the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I regret personally that the House of Commons have seen fit to pass this Bill and send it to the Senate. I do not think such an Act should be put on the statute-books of Canada. This company has had considerable time to mature its scheme for the construction of the canal, and it virtually has done nothing. By an expenditure of $50,000, I presume, in surveys and office expenses, and some work, they are authorized to hold up the project for another ten years until 1918, unless, in the meantime, the government take it over; and if that were done they would have to take it over at arbitrated value for whatever these people might have spent upon it. If that canal is ever built —and I earnestly hope it will be, because I endorse the statement made by the hon. member from Ottawa that it is an exceedingly important work—it will have to be built by the government of Canada, the same as they are building the National Transcontinental railway. We are only burdening the country with increased cost by extending the time to build for another ten years. We are certainly not furthering the prospects of getting the canal built. I am opposed to the Bill, simply because it will fetter the government in proceeding with the work. If the finances of the country would warrant their doing so, and I earnestly hope they will before many years, I should like to see them take up that work because it is an exceedingly important one. This Bill will only tend to increase the amount that will have to be paid to this company. I do not think that the company have any hope whatever of building the canal. There is no prospect that they will be able to carry it through, and the result will be what I have indicated.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I cannot quite understand the attitude of the hon. gentleman from Wellington. He says he is in favour of the construction of this work. If so, why should he try to kill this measure? If this Bill is defeated, then there is no means in the hands of the country by which the work can be undertaken. If the Senate passes this Bill, it does not give any exclusive rights to the members of this company. The hon. gentleman can come the day after to-morrow, if the requisite notice is given, and have another company incorporated for the construction of the canal; and the Act which this Bill proposes to amend contains a provision that the government can take the work over at any stage of progress. The hon. gentleman seems to think that the government would be made to pay more than they should. That position is inconsistent with the position which he had taken a little earlier, that there is no probability that these people will do anything. It does not matter which way, he does not like it: it is a case of, 'I do not like you, Dr. Fell.' The hon. gentleman from Ottawa has referred to the history of this undertaking, and has expressed his regret that it does not seem to be any more forward than it did sixty years ago. Sixty years ago it was a thing which was really almost in the clouds. The people of Bytown were very optimistic at that time, but there are many reasons why the people along the Ottawa should be more optimistic now. Then no products were coming from the west, or almost none, to use this canal. Now there are products valued at over a hundred million dollars coming down from our western country which may be helped by the building of this canal. The country has spent a good deal of money in having accurate surveys made, and when a company, of which Sir Robert Perks is a very prominent member, are apparently prepared to take hold of this undertaking, if what they consider sufficiently favourable terms are obtained, I do not see why we should try to stop them. When hon. gentlemen bring in Bills here, as we all do, proposing to build railways in various parts of the country, the hon. gentleman does not say, 'I think these roads should be built by the government.' Now, why should a canal be built by the government more than a railway? I think it is desirable that canals as well as railways should be built by private capital, with the assistance of the government, and as a citizen of Canada I do not wish to see the government operating any of these public works. They operate one or two transportation works now, and I should rather see these public works in the hands of companies. I hope that the government will not undertake the building of this canal as a public work, and certainly that they will not undertake the operating of it as a public work. Further, this work will cost anywhere from one hundred to one hundred and fifty million dollars. If the government build that canal, I suppose the same objectionable step will be taken with regard to it as was taken with the other canals, of making them free. Why should we undertake to spend this immense sum of money, and then spend a large sum yearly for the purpose of carrying freight through that canal free? We do not do that with the Intercolonial railway. How would gentlemen from the West look if the people from the lower provinces were claiming that no tolls should be collected on the Intercolonial railway?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Instead of half rate.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Perhaps they are two-third rates. Hon. gentlemen will understand that the little sarcasm of the right hon. gentleman does not hurt me, because I am not advocating that goods shall be carried free either on canals or railways. If these works are operated by the government there is a continual pressure to abolish the tolls on freight or to carry it for less than cost, which I think is highly objectionable. That sort of business is not proper work for the government. I hope that this company, with reasonable assistance from the government, will be able to build this canal and charge reasonable tolls. The government can control the tolls through the railway commission. If they have not that power now, they can be given power to control the tolls. I can see no objection to passing this measure.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—The hon. gentleman from Wellington objects to this Bill being read the second time on the ground that this company has done nothing, and they are holding up the canal project. My hon. friend is entirely mistaken in his facts, that this company has done nothing. This company has done a great deal, and has submitted to the government of Canada a proposition to build this canal. That proposition is now under consideration by the government of Canada. The company is ready to commence work to-morrow if the government will say 'go on with the work.'

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—What subsidy do they expect.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—The hon. gentleman says they are not doing anything. I am showing that they have done something, and are prepared to proceed with the work. The fact of the company having presented a proposition to the government does not prevent the government from building the canal. All they have to say is, 'We do not adopt your proposition. We will build it ourselves.' Surely this company having prepared plans, and having made a proposition to the government, should have its rights preserved. I know my hon. friend from Toronto is opposed to the project, and no arguments of mine would convince him, and I am not addressing my remarks to him.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—I have not expressed my views yet.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—The hon. gentleman did last year, and I have no hope of convincing him. The other objection which my hon. friend from Wellington has is, that this company is going to incur more expense. They are not incurring more expense. They have done everything they can do, and their proposition is before the government. There is no expense being now incurred, so that the burden on the country is not being increased. It would be absolute injustice to prevent this company holding the rights it has acquired. They should have their charter extended to enable them to go on and build this canal which they are prepared to do if the government of Canada deems proper that they shall. There is nothing more or less involved in this Bill.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—I wish to say a word in reply to the remarks of my hon. friend from Halifax. I disapprove entirely of this country owning the railways. I think they should be in the hands of private enterprise; but I do not think that the time has come in Canada when private enterprise can build such works without government aid. There is this great differences between railways and canals: If a canal goes into the hands of a private corporation, I do not think the same competition would exist that prevails in the case of railways. The canal is a public highway, open for the use of numerous navigation companies, and I think the government of Canada made a good move when it gave free canals in order to encourage transportation. The canals must, after all, be our regulators of rates in so far as transportation is concerned.

Hon. Mr. POWER—So are railways.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—They are regulators for themselves. I have been criticised sometimes pretty severely as a resident of the Ottawa district because I have not joined so spontaneously as some of my friends in promoting the construction of this canal. I think it is a great work for Canada and a work which should be carried out as soon as the resources of the country would permit. I do not think private enterprise will build a canal to-day without government assistance. This question was dismissed last year in this Chamber and it was somewhat dealt with as to its merits as compared with Welland canal. We need not discuss that question to-day. I then expressed some doubts as to the desirability of making this a ship canal believing the St. Lawrence route was more favourable in that respect. Possibly both of them should be dealt with in due time and just as soon as the resources of Canada will permit of such being done.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The Welland first.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—So far as canals are concerned, I am a citizen of Canada, not merely a citizen of the Ottawa valley. If it is in the best interests of Canada that the Welland should be dealt with first, let it be undertaken first. My reason for supporting that idea at all is that I have believed, and believe now, that the Ottawa canal, even if thirty feet deep, is not a route which will be used to any great extent by the large freighters which cross the ocean to-day. I do not believe they will go inland so far for cargoes. The Welland canal is the route for that class of vessel. At the same time, there is a very decided place in the interests of the people of Canada for the construction of the Georgian Bay canal, and I hope it will be undertaken at as early a date as our resources will permit. Any opposition to this idea, because the work has not been gone on with as rapidly as some would desire, should not be entertained for a moment. These large undertakings involve very large capital, and it is not as easy to get the means as some of our friends may possibly think. This canal project, it is true, has been agitated for many years. Forty years ago it was a live question in the Ottawa valley. The introduction of railways caused a cessation of the agitation for canals for some time, but the agitation has been revived of late years, surveys have been made, and let us hope that in the early future this great work will be carried out.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—The hon. gentleman from Ottawa says that a proposition has been laid before the government. When such statements are made, it is usual to explain what the proposition is. I have still an open mind.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—This company, headed by Sir Robert Perks, has made an offer to the government of Canada to build this canal from end to end. I cannot give the House the details of the proposition. I only know it in a general way; but there is, I assure the House, a proposition of that kind under consideration.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—The House should be seized with this proposition before proceeding with the Bill.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—The hon. gentleman should ask the government. I cannot give him the details.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

NATIONAL PARKS OF CANADA.

MOTION POSTPONED.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved:

Resolved, that the regulations of the 21st day of June, 1909, intituled: 'regulations of the National Parks of Canada,' which were passed on the date above-mentioned by His Excellency the Governor in Council, under authority of section 4 of the Rocky Mountains Park Act, being chapter 60, R.S.C., 1906, copies of which regulations, as well as the necessary order in council, have been laid before this House, are, in so far as they relate to the Rocky Mountains Park of Canada, approved by this House, in accordance with the provisions of subsection 3 of section 5 of the said chapter 60.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask the right hon. leader of the House if these regulations are printed?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—They were laid on the table yesterday. Did my hon. friend not see them?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I overlooked the statement by my right hon. friend in regard to them, if they were laid on the table. Are they lengthy?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—If the hon. gentleman wishes the motion deferred, it may stand until Tuesday.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If it would not be inconvenient to the government, I should like to look them over.

The motion was allowed to stand.

BANKING AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I should like to call the attention of the House, and of the Committee on Banking and Commerce particularly, to a request that has been made by the Fire Underwriters since the committee adjourned, that they would like to have the sitting of the committee postponed from next Tuesday until the following Tuesday. They state that they would hardly be ready until next week. I think the request a reasonable one, and the committee will meet a week from next Tuesday.

Hon. Mr. JONES—I should like to suggest, if this course is adopted, that publicity be given to the fact that the committee are going to meet at that time, and I hope that the chairman and committee will see their way to sit from day to day, and probably in the evening when the House is not in session, so that a number of business men, who are anxious to present their views upon this very important question, will not be detained.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—The assurance has been given to me by the representatives of the fire insurance companies that they will confine themselves to one or two representatives, who will present their cases, and that three, or at most four, sittings will finish their side of the case. With regard to notification, that is one reason why they wanted the delay, so that everybody would know when the committee would meet.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—It seems to be taken for granted by some members of this House that only the fire insurance companies are to be represented before this committee. I can assure hon. members of the committee and chairman that there are two sides to this question, and that a great many people will desire to be heard in regard to the measure, gentlemen who are not representing the fire insurance companies, but representing the assured, and I hope they will receive such consideration at the hands of the committee as the gentlemen who have been referred to as representing the fire insurance companies.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I can assure the House that no one has been refused a hearing, and no one will be refused, as far as the committee is concerned. In fact, on the last occasion, I asked the question time and again if any one wished to be heard before the committee, and the same opportunity will be given to all who appear before the committee.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—In that connection, it might be determined whether the House will sit on Ash Wednesday. If the House will not sit on Ash Wednesday it will be inconvenient for some hon. gentlemen to attend on Tuesday.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I had that in view. We might obtain leave on Tuesday to sit on the following day.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I would like to ask this one question of the hon. gentleman. I assume from his observations that the committee have got through with hearing the representatives of the life insurance companies?

Hon. Mr. JONES.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Not altogether.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Then why should the work not go on, even if the fire insurance representatives are not ready?

The SPEAKER—I call attention of the House to the fact that this discussion is entirely irregular. I understood the committee met to-day and adjourned until next Tuesday. However, that matter is in the hands of the chairman.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday at three p.m.

SENIORITY OF QUEBEC JUDGES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY called the attention of the House to the following letter of the Honourable Minister of Justice:

Ottawa, January 26, 1910.

Dear Sir Richard Cartwright,—I have read, as you asked, the 'Hansard' report of what took place in the Senate on the 12th instant, then your reading the answer to the question of Hon. Mr. Landry, relating to the seniority of Superior Court judges at Quebec, and I am not able to see how any other answer could have been given to the question as framed.

The question demands an answer 'according to the exact wording of the law,' and the answer follows the exact wording of the provincial statute constituting the court referred to. I do not know what further information it is possible to give unless by stating the dates of the first appointment to the bench of each one of the judges mentioned in the answer, and I inclose herewith a list of those judges with the date of first appointment of each to the bench.

I remain, yours faithfully,
A. B. AYLESWORTH.

The Rt. Honourable
Sir Richard Cartwright,
Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Justice Routhier—1st September, 1873.
" Langelier—12th November, 1903.
" C. A. P. Pelletier—30th September, 1904.
" Cimon—22nd July, 1882.
" Larue—12th April, 1886.

Mr. Justice H. C. Pelletier—12th April, 1886.
" Gagné—10th December, 1889.
" Carroll—29th January, 1904.
" Cooke—16th November, 1904.
" Malouin—7th January, 1905.
" Cannon—29th July, 1905.

And asked:

If the rank of seniority of the judges of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec, belonging to the district of Quebec, as comprised and defined for the purposes of the Court of Review, was on the 1st of June, 1906, the following one:—

1. Mr. Justice Routhier—1st September. 1873.
2. " Cimon—22nd July, 1882.
3. " Larue—12th April, 1886.
4. " H. C. Pelletier—12th April, 1886.
5. " Gagné—10th December, 1889.
6. " Langelier—12th November, 1903.
7. " Carroll—29th January, 1904.
8. " C. A. P. Pelletier—30th September, 1904.
9. " Cooke—16th November, 1904.
10. " Malouin—7th January, 1905.
11. " Cannon—29th July, 1905.

He said: I think the Minister of Justice misunderstood my question. I did not ask to have the question answered according to the words of the law; I asked to have an answer to this question: 'Who were the judges of the Court of Review, as defined by the law.' In our 'Court Procedure,' part second, book first, section 2, I find the following:

494. A review may be had.
1. Upon every final judgment from which an appeal lies, excepting the case of article 343 J., mentioned in article 5889 of the Revised Statutes of Quebec.

The next section reads:

495. The review takes place before three judges of the Superior Court, and the judge who has rendered the judgment complained of cannot be one of them. (Id., art. 5907.)

And the next article reads as follows:

496. The review of judgments rendered in the districts of Montreal, Ottawa, Terrebonne, Joliette, Richelieu, St. Francis, Bedford, St. Hyacinthe, Iberville and Beauharnois, takes place at the city of Montreal; that of judgments rendered in the district of Quebec, Three Rivers, Saguenay, Chicoutimi, Gaspé, Rimouski, Kamouraska, Montmagny, Beauce, and Arthabaska, at the city of Quebec.

So that the province is divided into two districts for the purpose of reviewing judgments rendered in all those other districts. We have the district of Montreal, and the district of Quebec, and in answer to that question, the hon. gentleman gives me the list which was inclosed with his letter giving the names of the judges, Langelier, Pelletier, and so on, with the dates of their nomination, but they are all mixed up, and it is for that reason that I ask if the rank of seniority of the judges of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec, belonging to the district of Quebec, as comprised and defined for the purposes of the Court of Review, was on the 1st of June, 1906, as follows: I am taking the order of seniority according to the date of nomination, Judge Routhier, first, September, 1873; Judge Cimon, 12th April, 1886, and so on. Those are all the districts that form the district of Quebec for the purposes of review.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The reply that I have received from the Department of Justice is as follows: On the date mentioned, the several judges of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec, who are named in the question, ranked as among themselves in seniority of appointment in the order stated.

ARCTIC POSSESSION OF CANADA.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER inquired:

Whether it is the intention of the government to appoint a commissioner charged with the superintendence of the Arctic lands and islands upon which the Canadian flag has recently been planted?

He said: I do not know what the answer of the government to this inquiry will be, but whether favourable or unfavourable I ask permission to make a few remarks before it is given. I for one—and I am not alone—attach great importance to the absolute, uncontradicted and uncontradictable possession of the lands that lie to the north of Canada proper. If there are overseas possessions to which England can claim undisputed right, it is the northern portion of Canada—the arctic lands between Hudson bay and the newly discovered pole. A representative of England was the first to set his foot on the continent of America; John Cabot discovered the continent of America even before Columbus. He was a genius apparently as great as Columbus was. He did not himself realize his ultimate object, but it was later on realized for him. He showed to King Henry the seventh that there must needs be a northern passage through the northern lands of the still undiscovered continent to the kingdom of the great Khan. Following up his idea,—it is not known where he got his information—he started in 1496, came back and reported that he had seen land. He returned the next year with a fleet and articles of barter, and, from all appearances, he lost his life in the recesses of Hudson bay, taking possession of the northern hemisphere of America in the name of England and of Venice, but more particularly of England, by which country he was employed. Therefore, that part of America was from 1496 incontestably a possession of England, by right of discovery and that possession was confirmed later on by treaties. Bitter fights were waged on Hudson bay in the far past, and some brilliant military exploits occurred between England and France up to half a century before Canada proper was ceded to England for the possession of those regions. Hudson bay and all the circumjacent lands and islands were, by treaty of Utrecht, ceded to England, and, therefore, Britain has undoubted possession of those parts of America, both by discovery and by treaty rights. No one imagines that those lands, though covered with perpetual snow, are not valuable. They were worth fighting for two hundred years ago; who knows that they may not again be worth fighting for. It is to prevent contention over those regions that I desire the government should assert in the name of the mother country and of Canada, our undisputed rights. Their resources are not without value. In a report made by Dr. Tyrell, a few years ago, I find that in the region extending from Hudson bay northward and from Ungava to the western limit of Canada, there is to be found the following list of the chief economic resources of the district, with their localities:

MAMMALS.

Moose.—Not found to the east of Hudson bay, but south and southwest they are commonly met with as far north as about latitude fifty-seven degrees; valuable for flesh and hide.

Woodland Caribou.—Common throughout the districts south and southwest of Hudson bay. Reported to be about exterminated in Labrador. Valuable for flesh and hide.

Barren Ground Caribou.—Very abundant in the barrens both east and west of Hudson bay. The chief source of both food and clothing for the native population, and the great local source of food for future explorers and prospectors.

Musk oxen.—Common north of Chesterfield inlet, and the valley of the Thelan river. Flesh may be used as food and hides for valuable robes.

Fox (red, cross, silver and black).—Common throughout the district. Fur of silver and black varieties very valuable.

Arctic fox.—This species is abundant throughout the barren grounds. Fur not so valuable as other varieties.

Gray wolf.—Becoming scarce in southern districts; more common in the semi-barrens.

Arctic wolf.—Common, though not very numerous, throughout the barrens.

Wolverine or cafcajou.—Very common throughout the barrens. Skins are valuable as furs.

Canadian lynx.—Abundant in some places in wooded country. Fur very fine and warm for rugs or clothing.

Sable or pine marten.—Common below north limit of semi-barrens. Fur valuable.

Fisher.—Abundant in some of more southern districts.

Mink.—Very common in southern portions.

Weasel.—Common throughout the wooded country.

Ermine.—Common in wooded as well as in barren lands.

Otter.—Common in more southern districts. Very abundant in parts of Labrador.

Beaver.—Common in more remote wooded districts. Very abundant along some of the rivers emptying into the east coast of James bay.

Muskrat—Very common everywhere throughout southern wooded region.

Black bear.—Not uncommon throughout wooded districts.

Barren ground bear.—Rare, but met with occasionally in the barrens. Skins valuable.

Polar bear.—Abundant about the shores of Hudson bay in some localities, and found for a considerable distance inland.

Walruses.—Very abundant in several localities in Hudson bay for hides and ivory tusks.

Bearded or square-flipper seal.—A large species, common in Hudson straits and bay. Valuable for oil.

Gray seal.—Not common.

Hooded seal.—Not very abundant.

Harp seal.—Common along the whole Labrador coast. Valuable for oil and hide.

Ringed seal. Most common species in Hudson bay and straits and quite numerous. Valuable for oil and hide.

Harbour or fresh water seal.—Common about the coast of bay and in some lakes, both in Labrador and the western barrens. The skin of the thoetis of this species, contrary to the usual rule, is black and glossy and makes a beautiful soft, rich fur.

White whale.—Very abundant in both Hudson and James bay, and especially about the mouths of large rivers, where they resort to feed upon the small fish. Valuable chiefly for oil.

Narwhale or sea unicorn.—Found in Hudson straits and other waters to the west and northwest. This peculiar creature, whose body is only eighteen or twenty feet in length, possesses a single spiral ivory horn, not uncommonly eight feet in length, and of great weight. This horn, or tusk, which extends from the end of the nose in line with the body of the animal, is composed of a very fine grade of ivory and is therefore very valuable.

Right whale or bow-head.—This is the most valuable and one of the largest of the several species of whales, and furthermore, is nowhere so common as in the water of the northern part of the Hudson bay district. Although the value of an average right whale is in the neighbourhood of ten thousand dollars ($10,000) it is a most regretable fact, that to the best of my knowledge, there has never been a Canadian whaler in the bay, whilst our neighbours to the south have habitually for years had a number of vessels hunting and carrying away these prizes to the ports of New Zealand. Indeed, this foreign wholesale destruction has been carried on for so many years and to such an extent that the whales have become comparatively scarce.

FISHES.

Sturgeon.—Common throughout southern portion of district. A small species, plentiful in many rivers of Labrador.

Salmon (common sea.)—Found in abundance in Ungava bay.

Cod.—Found in Ungava bay.

Heran's salmon.—Common along the coast of Hudson bay.

Great Lake trout.—Abundant throughout lakes and rivers. Twenty-five pounds is not an uncommon weight for this fish.

Brook trout.—Abundant in many streams.

Whitefish.—Very abundant in lakes and rivers. Ordinary size from six to ten pounds; fourteen pound whitefish caught in Lake Mistassini.

Herring whitefish.—Abundant about the mouths of most of the rivers flowing into Hudson bay.

Halibut.—Reported to occur in Hudson bay.

Pike or jackfish.—Very abundant throughout district in lakes and more sluggish streams.

Pickerel.—Reported common. Many other less important species may also be found, but the above list will be sufficient.

Without attempting to present a full list of the birds of the Hudson bay district, I will merely call attention to the existence of great numbers of water and land fowls such as geese, ducks, grouse and ptarmigan.

Fires are of such frequent occurrence, entirely destroying large areas of timber from year to year, which may have been a century or more in attaining its growth.

MINERALS.

From the third and last great division of natural resources we may expect, in course of time, the greatest results. There is every reason to believe that many parts of this great district will prove to be rich in the possession of minerals. As yet neither the prospector nor the miner has operated to any appreciable extent within the circumference of this vast district, but from what preliminary exploratory work has been carried on it is abundantly proved that many large mineral areas exist, and only await means of access for development. The following is at least a partial list of those already reported:—

Iron (hematite and magnetite).—Extensive deposits in various localities in Labrador, on the Albany river, near the east end of Lake Athabaska and on Artillery lake.

Copper.—Occurs extensively on west coast of Hudson bay, also southwest of Lake Mistassini on East Main river and elsewhere.

Silver.—Found associated with lead in the limestone of Cambrian areas of east coast of Hudson bay, where it occurs in quantities sufficient to be of economic value. It has been traced for a distance of twelve miles, and has given assays of from 5·104 to 12·3 ounces silver in the ton.

Gold.—Discoveries of this most coveted metal have been reported from the Lonely lake region, the west coast of Hudson bay and the shores of Repulse bay.

Mica.—Large specimens have been obtained from the north shore of Hudson straits, also from near Lake Manouan, in Labrador. From the Ison-Glass river, where a quarry was opened as long ago as 1685, from Lake Winokapaw and elsewhere.

Graphite.—Found on north shores of Hudson straits, etc.

Asbestos.—Found on J. Gordon island, on east coast of Hudson bay.

Coal.—Lignite coal reported to exist on Coal river, a tributary joining the Moose river, at about 114 miles from tidewater.

Anthraxolite.—This mineral has been found at Lake Mistassini, at Petitsikapaw and Menihek lakes in Labrador, and on Long island in Hudson bay, from which latter locality an analysis of some samples gave 94·91 per cent of carbon.

Jasper.—Is found in large masses in several places in Labrador, whence it is easily obtainable. On the Koksoak river there is a thick band of applegreen jasper, brecciated with small angular fragments of the red variety, which might be used for panels, etc.

Agates.—Found on east coast of Hudson bay.

Labradorite.—Large and beautiful crystals of this mineral are found in great abundance on the northeast side of Lake Michikamau for a distance of ten miles or more, besides other places in Labrador.

The existence of these riches has been lately confirmed to us by our own Captain Bernier, who brought down with him samples of economic minerals, showing conclusively that that part of the Dominion is worth looking after. The deposits of coal alone would give it a very considerable value, because the supply in many countries is rapidly being exhausted. If we have, as I believe we have, immense coal measures in our northern territories, they are worth looking after. But, apart from the mineral and other wealth of that region, we possess there an already existing channel between the Atlantic and the Pacific. We are ahead of the Panama canal. We have the very canals to which Cabot referred when he pleaded with the English king for ships and men to cross over to Asia. The hardy mariners of England for two centuries have plunged into the depths of our northern seas, and many of them lost their lives reaching for it, until McClure, in the latter half of last century, found the northwest passage dreamed of by Cabot.

The existence of that canal or passage, was confirmed several times since, and, no later than last year, Captain Bernier spent part of the winter along it. In the month of August he found it perfectly open, and took soundings. The water is very deep. The length of the passage is about 100 miles, and he says he got the confirmation from whalers that that canal is, as a rule, open for several months in the year. That canal will enable our fishermen and navigators to cross over from Lancaster sound through Barrow strait, Melville sound and McClure's strait into the great Beaufort sea, and on to Behring's strait. That is a most important question. Our northern possessions have not been sufficiently studied. What we have to-day is worth while holding, but we must not forget that no later than 700 years ago parts of this northern district were settled. You all know the geographical term Greenland. Whence Greenland? Because at one time the land was green. The name Greenland was given to that country about one thousand years ago. We know that up to 600 or 700 years ago there were prosperous villages in Greenland. There were bishoprics in Ungava, and flourishing parishes on the Melville land. Who knows but that there may be a recurrence of similar climatic conditions that existed when these localities were inhabited. We are moving in cycles. The old theory of the heat all emanating from the sun has been shaken since the discovery of radium. We do not know but in 700 years more those latitudes may be again habitable. Our duty is, as we know, to build not merely for to-day, but as the Romans of old, build for eternity or earthly eternity. This is the time to take absolute possession of these lands and that absolute possession we have not now. An important United States newspaper gives the following summary of the situation from the point of view of the republic:

By a treaty concluded in 1783 the people of the United States obtained certain fishing rights in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and on the Newfoundland banks, and also in 'all other places in the sea where the inhabitants of both countries used at any time heretofore to fish.' The treaty of Ghent, which closed the war of 1812, established the fishing rights of Great Britain and her colonies in the territorial waters of British North America. But this did not fully determine the limits of those territorial waters. The convention of 1818 is more definite, and upon this the Canadians have rested more than one claim regarding their fishing rights. This convention established the 'three-mile limit' over certain areas, but gave to American fishermen equal rights with British and Canadian fishermen in certain other areas whose northern limits were only vaguely defined beyond the fact that the rights were to be 'without prejudice to any of the rights of the Hudson Bay Company.'

That is how those lands and islands stand from a historical point of view. I will only quote from one paper. The New York 'Sun' states as follows:

The rights secured to American fishermen by the convention of 1818 remain. Under that convention, they were at liberty to fish along the coast of Labrador and 'northward indefinitely.' For many years they have fished and maintained whaling stations 'northward indefinitely,' past Cape Chudleigh, along Baffin Land, through Hudson strait and in Hudson bay. The Canadians have done no business there. The Americans have done much. Canada is now considering the establishment of a barrier from Cape Chudleigh to Baffin Land, at the entrance of Hudson strait, on the ground of sovereignty over these waters, as an inland sea, and under the old British 'headland theory,' which the United States government has never officially recognized.

The paper further writes:

The wisest policy for Canada, so far as the water area is concerned, would seem to be an 'open door' for many years to come. Such a policy might do much toward building up the vast waste places of Keewatin and Ungava and constitute a highly valuable source of national wealth. It may be found difficult, as well as impolitic, to close a door 100 miles wide at the end of a 500-mile channel leading into a 600,000-mile expanse of ocean water.

This conclusively shows that the absolute ultimate right of possession of those parts is not yet settled: The United States has not subscribed to the British headland to headland doctrine, by which all the waters within a line drawn from headland to headland are held to be embayed, and to constitute the mare clausum of diplomatists. Uncle Sam has, on the contrary, contended for the three-mile limit following the sinuosities of the sea-board. As strengthening the pretensions of the United States, it is contended that for the last 50 years, few Canadians did fish in those regions; that, on the contrary, the New Bedford and Massachusetts whalers were there every year, and performing acts that were tantamount to acts of possession. This is the time when we should, I think, assert our undisputed rights over these regions; rights that are further supplemented by the Dominion buying those unlimited regions from the Hudson Bay Company for a million and a half dollars, as we all know. An ounce of prevention is better than a pound of cure, I have heard said. We have had experiences of delimitation of frontiers as between us and the United States, which have not always proven very satisfactory. Very few of them were brilliant. The experience we have had from Maine to British Columbia has hardly resulted favourably to our view of the question, and the Alaskan boundary matter was hardly more satisfactory. Here is an instance to the point which I believe should make us look into this question seriously and act without any further delay. We all know of Russian Alaska. It has been found of late that England was cheated out of the whole of Alaska, that it ought by right to have remained an English possession, as it was from the discovery, as I have mentioned; but that by fraud Russia got possession of Alaska, which was sold afterwards to the United States. I will read to the House a confession lately made by a Russian diplomatist. It is headed in this way:

Most Gigantic Theft ever Known—How Russia Stole the whole Pacific Coast—A Strange Story.

It is told by Leo Nabokoff, as published in a despatch from Winnipeg.

Winnipeg, Man., Sept. 13.—Leo Nabokoff, a friend of Count Leo Tolstoi, who is armed with a mission from his chief to the wandering Doukhobors, is in Winnipeg, and has opened an office at 901 Main street, has unearthed some ancient Russian documents in Alaska, which materially affect Canada's position in the Alaska boundary question, showing how Russia forged evidence of early occupation of the Pacific coast. Nabokoff formerly resided at Sitka, Alaska, where he was at the time of the transfer of that territory from Russia to the United States. Later he was sent by his government to Sitka to put in order the archives kept by Russian authorities who had not taken the trouble to receive them. In doing this he found the documents kept in old Russia, which is not generally understood by those who knew the modern language but which Nabokoff had studied.

The purport of the records is that Russia stole the whole of the Pacific coast. The document referred to as translated by Nabokoff, and of which a copy was forwarded to the Governor General, is dated at St. Petersburg in 1836, and is marked 'strictly private.' The translation reads as follows:

'To the Governor of Russian American territory, Sitka (now Archangel).

And here is how the trick was perpetrated. The article continues:

'We are sending you ten tables representing the Russian coat of arms, securely packed, which package you are to open privately. Next summer you are to organize an expedition of several men under a navy officer so secretely that neither Russians nor Indians will see them start to cross the continent, taking with them those tables and marching as far as possible in a southeasterly direction, without danger of being observed even by the natives. Then these tables will have to be buried, separately at considerable distances one from other in holes about an arshine or an arshine and a half deep, due north by south.

'These places of concealment must be marked on a map (astronomical) and so accurately and locally described that there should be no difficulty in finding them long afterwards in case a dispute on priority of occupation will arise between Russia and Canada.

'The same great caution must be observed in marching back to the new archangels and officers and men who took part in the above transaction must be taken on board immediately and sent to Russia. Please see that this is done as directed.'

Earl Grey has referred the documents to his ministers for consideration.

It was apparently done as directed. Russia through that fraud was able to show priority of discovery over an area which Britain had discovered, somewhat like the map that was shown at the Ashburton treaty, and through this device Russia got possession of the whole territory of Alaska, which was subsequently sold to the United States, and the United States is the sole possessor of that wealthy country to-day, a country which Canada should have and hold. In the face of all this trickery; in the face of the importance that attaches to the possession of the Arctic land; in the face of the United States people, who are dangerously in a certain way, our neighbours to the west; from the fact that whalers on the eastern waters come from New Bedford and Massachusetts, and, whalers visiting those parts on the western side, come from San Francisco, that the United States people encompass us, as it were, it is time that the government should take possession, in a formal manner, of the undisputed territory, and parts of the territory that may be disputed. I acknowledge that the Liberal government have done much towards securing that possession, but something more should be done. It is not sufficient, according to international law, that a new country should be discovered, or that navigators should plant a flag over it to insure its possession; there must be continuous occupation, or, possession renewed at certain intervals. By the appointment of a commissioner, who would patrol those waters every summer, levying some tribute; who would keep the aborigines, the Esquimaux, who are very favourable to Canada, under control, we would, by that means, assert our undisputed right, and possibly, save our descendants trouble in the future. It is our duty, now that everything is peaceful, and favourable, to avert trouble for future generations. I hope, therefore, that the answer of the government will be favourable, and that they will appoint a permanent commissioner, to patrol that district, and assert the undoubted jurisdiction of Canada over all these Arctic lands, on which the Canadian flag has been planted, and, further north, over those islands which have been sighted but not yet explored and mapped.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I am sure the House is obliged to my hon. friend for the interesting information he has been at such pains to gather together with respect to those somewhat distant and unknown regions. The government are not blind to the possible importance of asserting the jurisdiction of Canada over these islands and waters, and they have, as he is probably aware, twice despatched expeditions in that direction, and are now about to send forth a third one. They have also, as he probably knows, established, one or two posts of the Northwest Mounted Police on the mainland to exercise jurisdiction in these waters. As for the question the hon. gentleman puts, the government have the matter under their consideration, but have as yet come to no decision on the point.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Might I say in this connection, without any desire to prolong the debate, but touching upon the question that has just been mentioned by my hon. friend, it is very regrettable that officials appointed by the government to carry out very important commissions, such for instance as that with which Captain Bernier has been entrusted, should emblazon to the world by indiscreet interviews and otherwise, the designs of the Canadian government in acquiring territory in those northern waters. No longer ago than the last few days we find it mentioned in the United States press, and also circulated through the Canadian press, that Captain Bernier is at the present time in New York with the intention of attending the Arctic dinner in that city, and that he proposes asking Sir Wilfrid Laurier to authorize representatives of Russia, of the United States, of Norway and Sweden, and of Denmark, to accompany him on a polar expedition, and thus to distribute the whole of the Arctic territories between the respective nations. In fact, I might say that the government seems to have found it difficult in many cases to send officials north without its designs having been frustrated through the publicity given to their movements through the press, which, I need not say, at once destroys the objects which the government has in view. Officials of this character certainly should be charged with secrecy as to the purpose for which they are sent. It is well for the government to submit to parliament the necessary estimates to fit out expeditions of this character; but surely it is not an impossible task to expect of the government to muzzle its representatives so that important state secrets may be kept, and the world at large shall not be apprised of what Canada's designs may be in regard to the assertion and exercise of its territorial jurisdiction.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—My hon. friend is correct. He may have observed that this question was alluded to in another place, and that the Prime Minister took occasion to comment somewhat severely on the statements that are alleged to have been made. Of course, it is quite possible that what Captain Bernier said may have been greatly exaggerated by newspaper reporters, whose talents in that respect both my hon. friend and myself have had occasion to know, are very great indeed; but I agree with him that officers of the government entrusted with such expeditions, owe it to the country and to themselves, not to speak without due warrant and authority from the government that employs them, and care will be taken that any such indiscretion as that which has occurred, shall not be repeated.

REGULATIONS OF NATIONAL PARKS.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved:

That the regulations of the 21st day of June, 1909, intituled: 'Regulations of the National Parks of Canada,' which were passed on the date above-mentioned by His Excellency the Governor in Council, under authority of section 4 of the Rocky Mountains Park Act, being chapter 60, R.S.C., 1906, copies of which regulations, as well as the necessary order in council, have been laid before this House, are, in so far as they relate to the Rocky Mountains Park of Canada, approved by this House, in accordance with the provisions of subsection 3 of section 5 of the said chapter 60.

The motion was agreed to.

THE IMMIGRATION OFFICE AT QUEBEC

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved:

That an order of the House do issue that there be laid before this House a copy of the accounts sent by the restaurant keeper, Jacques Déry, to the Immigration Department, for meals furnished the employees of the Immigration Office at Quebec, from 1st January, 1906, until 1st January, 1910, specifying separately for each employee, the date of each meal and the sum asked, and also a copy of all the accounts sent, from time to time, by the same restaurant keeper during the same period, for meals given and provisions furnished in connection with the Immigration Office at Quebec.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (No. 51) An Act respecting the Montmagny Mutual Fire Insurance Company, and to change its name to 'Factories Insurance Company.'—Hon. Mr. Choquette.

Bill (No. 55) An Act to amend the Seed Control Act.—Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

Bill (No. 62) An Act respecting the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Riley.

Bill (No. 63) An Act respecting the Manitoba and Northwestern Railway Company of Canada.—Hon. Mr. Watson.

Bill (No. 93) An Act respecting the Vancouver and Coast-Kootenay Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Bostock.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS BRANCH LINES BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The order of the day being called.

Second reading (Bill 17) An Act to authorize the government of Canada to acquire, by lease, lines of railway connecting with the government railways.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I have received communications from several hon. gentlemen who are disabled from attendance here by illness or otherwise, asking me to postpone the second reading of this Bill, and there can be no objection, at this stage of the session, for doing so. I therefore move that the order of the day be discharged, and that it be set down for Tuesday next.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It would be very desirable, when the Bill is brought up again for the second reading, to have information before the House as to the various branch lines that will be probably taken over by the government. I do not know whether it is possible to give information on that point or not.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I do not know that it is possible, because my hon. friend must see that no specific line is indicated, and conditions are attached which may render it impossible to take over any line at all.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I presume my hon. friend will be able to say how many of those branch lines have been importuning the government to take them over, or shall we assume that all the lines in the maritime provinces want to be taken over?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I dare say they would all be desirous of making a good thing out of the government. I will mention the matter to the Minister of Railways, and see what information he has. I have none at present, as to any specific line.

The motion was agreed to.

INCORPORATION OF RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The order of the day being called:

Second reading Bill (D) An Act to provide for the incorporation of Railway Companies. —Hon. Mr. Davis.

Hon. Mr. WILSON moved that the order be discharged and that the second reading take place to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The greater part of last session, and I think I am justified in saying the whole of the present session up to this date, this Bill has stood on our order paper, and applications have been made from time to time for its postponement. That is a very unsatisfactory way of transacting the public business. I make no reflection on the hon. gentleman who has charge of the Bill; possibly his engagements are of such a pressing character as to render it inconvenient for him to proceed with the Bill to-day; but an important measure like this should not be allowed to appear day after day on the orders for two sessions without action being taken.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—There is a good deal in what my hon. friend says, but I hope he will understand that I have not charge of the Bill. I hope he will be considerate enough to allow the gentleman who has charge of the Bill an opportunity to be present, and he could offer his criticism then, and with that consideration, and forbearance generally exercised in matters of this kind, an amicable arrangemnt may be reached as to when the discussion shall take place.

The motion was agreed to.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 29) An Act respecting the Columbia and Western Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Bostock.

Bill (No. 33) An Act to incorporate the Northern Mortgage Company of Canada.—Hon. Mr. Chevrier.

Bill (N) An Act for the relief of Hope Eileen Moreland Drinkle.—Hon. Mr. Douglas.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

ORDER POSTPONED.

The order of the day being called:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion for the second reading (Bill C) An Act to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—With respect to this measure, I have been in conference with the Minister of Justice, and that gentleman is of opinion that the Bill is of a very much more far reaching character than might appear in the first instance, and he has requested, in order that he may give it full consideration, to have the debate adjourned until Thursday next. I move, therefore, that this order be discharged, and that the debate be continued on Thursday next.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three p.m.

THE SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 2, 1910.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THE LATE SIR GEORGE DRUMMOND.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Before the orders of the day are proceeded with, I desire to say a few words with respect to the loss which this body has sustained by the very recent decease of Sir George Drummond. He was, as every body is aware, for many years a member of this body, occupying a very influential position as chairman of one of their most important committees, but wholly and entirely independent of that he was, as every one who has any acquaintance with banking and commercial affairs is aware, one of the most prominent and distinguished commercial magnates of Canada, and I am bound to say that I have always understood that in addition to his business capacity, Sir George quietly and unostentatiously was always found a most liberal promoter of all liberal and charitable movements which took place in the community where he lived. He was a man not merely of very considerable natural ability, but in addition to his remarkable success in commerce, he was a gentleman of very considerable culture and a liberal patron of the arts. Unless I am greatly mistaken, the collection of paintings which he brought together is one of the finest, if not the very finest in Canada—in fact I am not sure, but I can say the finest in all North America, although, of course, he was not in a position to rival some of the multi-millionaires on the other side of the border in the matter of expenditure. In the matter of good taste, however, and of judicious selection, he was very fully their peer. I need not say that the House regrets extremely the loss it has sustained, but, no doubt, at his time of life it was not likely that he could have remained very long with us. I sincerely regret, as every one does, that he should have been taken from us, and I have no doubt the House will agree with me in desiring His Honour the Speaker to extend to the bereaved family the sympathy of his colleagues in the Senate.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I quite concur in everything that my right hon. friend has said with reference to our late colleague. The Senate has been called upon of late years to mourn the loss of many who have filled a very large space in the public eye of Canada, and who have rendered valuable official and public services to this country. To-day we have been apprised of the death of one who has pre-eminently bulked very largely in the public affairs of the Dominion of Canada, one who has been associated with its larger and more varied interests to probably a greater extent than any other hon. gentleman in this Chamber. Since 1888, he had been an active member of the Senate, performing his duties most actively on the floor of this Chamber, but, of late years, owing to increasing infirmities, he was not so actively engaged in the transaction of public business. As chairman of the Banking and Commerce Committee, in the performance of his duties, his wide knowledge, experience, and high sense of honour, furnished a guarantee to the people of Canada that the highest talents would be brought to bear in the transaction of the public business over which he presided. As my right hon. friend has already stated, he was a man of varied attainments. Probably no citizen of Canada has been of late years more largely identified with the financial affairs of the Dominion than our late colleague. For many years he was associated with Canada's leading banking institution, and which latterly had the advantage of his ripe experience, knowledge and reputation as its president. For many years he was closely identified with the development of the great manufacturing interests of the Dominion. In fact, I doubt if any other name has been more closely linked with the industrial life of Canada during the early part of the present generation than that of the late Sir George Drummond. Not only has be been associated with the material development of Canadian resources, but he has been equally prominent in connection with the arts and sciences, and the great sociological questions of this progressive age. In 1903, he was the recipient of very distinguished honours at the hands of his sovereign on account of the eminent public services which he had rendered to the Dominion. I need not say that his memory will be long revered in the great city of Montreal, where his name has always been identified with the great commercial, educational and philanthropic institutions of that progressive city. To-day the members of this Chamber unite with his family, with the community in which he lived, and the country at large in mourning the loss of a citizen of whom Canada was justly proud.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Allow me to add a few words to the just tribute to our lamented friend paid by the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce and the leader of the opposition. Reference has been made to his work in this House, and especially in the committee on Banking and Commerce. I may mention an incident showing how conscientiously our good friend looked upon his work and on his responsible position as chairman of that committee. In the last two years that he presided over that important committee, finding that he could not be here to follow that work because of his ill health he had one of his attorneys from Montreal attend the whole of those last two sessions to keep him posted on the progress of Bills that were moving towards the Banking and Commerce Committee, which he would have to review and pass judgment upon. This one incident shows how thorough he was in everything that he undertook. One of the many reasons which explain the esteem in which he was held by his fellow citizens in Montreal was his liberal mindedness and his large spirit of tolerance. He did his utmost in every way to bring about and maintain a good understanding between the two main races that compose the population of Montreal. He always showed an earnest desire to promote harmony in that great city by bringing all its component parts in contact, socially and otherwise. He was a benefactor of all institutions that needed private help, and he will be immensely missed by the community at large. He was whole-souled and kindhearted, and played a most important role in all the affairs of the city of Montreal, private and public. There is no position in the gift of the citizens of the commercial metropolis, on the board of trade, on the board of our premier banking institution and in the diverse philanthropic institutions which he was not called upon to fill and over which he was not asked to preside. His departure is a very serious loss to the city of Montreal and to the country at large. Our sympathies go fully to his gifted and most public spirited widow and to all the members of his family.

THIRD READING.

Bill (G) An Act to incorporate the Merchants Bank of Canada Pension Fund—Hon. Mr. Beique.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL. SECOND READING.

Hon. R. W. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (85) An Act to amend the Criminal Code. He said: A year ago the attention of the government was drawn to the necessity for legislation of this kind in consequence of the large amount of valuable ores that were being stolen by men working in the mines at Cobalt. These ores were sold to the blind pigs, or illicit grog shops in Cobalt, and by the owners of those places transferred to other parties and sold to receivers knowing that the ore was stolen.

The government was impressed with the importance of the measure and introduced some amendments to the Criminal Code. The Bill came down at the end of the session, although it should have been presented at an earlier period, and exception was taken to it because it threw on the possessor of the ore the necessity of proving where he had obtained it. As there was considerable opposition, the Bill was withdrawn. It comes now in improved shape, modifying the objections that were then taken to it, and I have no doubt it will now commend itself to this chamber. The necessity is manifest. Any gentleman who has been following the reports in the newspapers will notice that enormous sums have been lost by Cobalt alone, amounting, according to some calculations, to a quarter of a million dollars. I notice that fourteen or fifteen men have been arrested at Toronto for having obtained ore from miners who were stealing it and disposing of it in a certain quarter there. We all know that the practice of the mine men is to send the ore away to smelters in quantities, generally in car lots. The ore is not disposed of by men carrying it about in carpet bags. Any one who obtains a quantity of ore from a neighbour, or a man who is not a mine owner, is certainly warned of the probable theft of that ore, and should be exceedingly careful, before purchasing, as to the ownership of the ore. I will read an extract to the House from the Toronto 'News'. It is as follows:

> Could make three thousand pounds a week. Startling evidence given by the detectives in the ore case.
> Here are no less than fifteen men arrested, thirteen against whom the Crown places the responsibility for the most gigantic theft in the history of Canada: may be a quarter of a million of dollars of ore from the Cobalt mines.

I need not read the account of it, but in many cases it was shown that as much as ten, fifteen and twenty thousand dollars had been stolen by the men who were charged. They have not been tried yet. The only way to stop the theft of ore is to get at the receiver. As the law stands at present, the receiver is absolutely free, because it is quite impossible to prove the identity of the ore taken from the different mines. No one can say: 'That particular ore was taken from my mine'. You must throw on the receiver the onus of proving where he obtained the ore. Hon. gentlemen were somewhat sensitive on that point last session. They said it was contrary to the principles of justice that a man should be called upon to convict himself; that the mere possession of ore should throw the responsibility of proving where it came from on the person who has possession of it. There is no possibility of that arising, because we know that where a quantity of ore is lodged, and the suspicions are strong, that no question would arise as to the possession of the ore. It has been found necessary in other countries to enact such a law. I have here the different Acts in force in South Africa, Australia, and other mining countries, on this subject. Taking Western Australia the law reads as follows:

Any person who is charged before any resident or police magistrate with having on his person, or on any animal, or in any cart or other vehicle, or in his possession on any premises, of which he is the tenant or occupier, or reputed tenant or occupier, any gold, reasonably suspected of being stolen, or unlawfully obtained, and does not prove to the satisfaction of the magistrate that the gold was lawfully obtained, is subject on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding fifty pounds, or to imprisonment with or without hard labour for any term not exceeding six months.

— In Cape Colony the Act reads as follows:

It shall not be lawful for any person, save as in this ordinance is excepted, to have in his possession any rough or uncut diamond, and any such person as aforesaid who shall be found in the possession of any rough or uncut diamond, and who shall be unable to account satisfactorily for or prove his right to the possession of such rough and uncut diamond, or to produce his proper permit for the same in accordance with the provisions of this ordinance, shall, on conviction, be liable to the penalties provided by the next succeeding section.

Another section reads:

It shall not be lawful for any person, save as in this ordinance excepted, to buy, deal in, or receive by way of barter, pledge or otherwise, either as principal or agent, any rough or uncut diamond, or to be accessory to such buying, dealing in or receiving, unless such person so buying, dealing in or receiving as aforesaid, shall be duly licensed or authorized under this ordinance. Penalty, one thousand pounds or fifteen years imprisonment, or both.

6. Persons competent to purchase, not to buy from persons incompetent to sell.

9. Accused person, &c., being unauthorized, unless it is proved to the contrary.

Here is the law in force in the Transvaal:

No person shall carry on any trade whatsoever in unwrought precious metal under which is included the buying or selling, the bartering or exchanging of such unwrought precious metal, unless he has a special license to do so, for which he shall pay £25 per annum, provided that the individual digger or the company need not take out a license for the sale of the unwrought precious metal dug out or found by him or it personally or on his or its instructions.

Any person who deals in unwrought precious metals without having a special license for the purpose, or who is found in possession thereof, and cannot give any proof that he came into possession thereof in a lawful manner, shall be punished with a fine not exceeding £500, or imprisonment with or without hard labour for not more than two years.

That is the law in other countries. We have a law on our own statute-books so far as the individual miner is concerned—the labourer. I will read an extract from the Criminal Code as amended in 1909. Section 424 reads as follows:

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years imprisonment who—

(b) Not being the owner or agent of the owner of mining claims then being worked, and not being thereunto authorized in writing by the proper officer in that behalf named in any Act relating to mines in force in the province in which the offence is alleged to have been committed, sells or purchases, except to or from such owner or authorized person, any rock or mineral, stone, quartz or other substance containing gold or silver or any unsmelted or untreated, or manufactured, or partly smelted, partly treated, or partly manufactured gold or silver, or

(c) Purchases any rock or mineral, stone, quartz or other substance containing gold or silver, or any unsmelted, or untreated, or unmanufactured, or partly smelted, partly treated, or partly manufactured gold or silver, except from such owner or authorized person, and does not at the same time execute in triplicate an instrument in writing stating the place and time of purchase, and the quantity, quality, &c.

Hon. gentlemen quite recognize that as far as the individual miner is concerned, it is simply impossible to enforce the law, as long as the receiver cannot be got at. It is the receiver who keeps up the traffic in the ore. The receiver must know that the ore coming from a man who does not own a mine, who is probably a vendor of liquor, or in some business of that sort, must have been obtained improperly, and therefore, it is necessary to get at the receiver. I desire to read a few extracts from a speech delivered by the Minister of Justice in the other House, (Mr. Aylesworth) which meets some of the objections raised in this Chamber. I refer to the debates in the House of Commons on January 19, 1907, where Mr. Aylesworth states:

It seems absolutely necessary if any check is to be given to the evil which has been described that legislation of this nature should be passed. This House was of that opinion last session and in passing the legislation in question did so simply from the conviction, as I understood the action of the House, that it would be impossible without it to afford any effective redress in cases of this description. The evil seems certainly serious. It is a crime in respect to which there ought to be prosecution and conviction where there is guilt, and it is practically impossible to secure a conviction, no matter how plain a case, according to ordinary ideas, the evidence may show, simply because it is impossible to identify the particular piece of ore, or any quantity of ore, which may be found in the possession of the person accused, as ore which has come from a particular mine.

In another place he says:

It is an unknown thing in the course of either a civil case or a criminal prosecution that the burden of proof should rest upon the person who is charged with either responsibility for the payment of damages or responsibility upon a criminal charge. There are many instances of it perfectly well known to petitioners in the courts, and apart altogether from instances in which the burden or presumption is at once upon or against the person charged with any particular course of action. It is an every day occurrence in trials that the burden shifts from the one side to the other side according to the special evidence which may from minute to minute or hour to hour in the course of the proceedings be given.

In another part of his speech he says:

Legislation of this character, as the hon. gentleman has stated, has been found necessary in mining communities. We have the example of legislation, not only of South Africa, but also of different states of the Australian commonwealth upon this very subject, at least as severe as anything which is proposed in this legislation. But in our own Criminal Code there are plenty of instances where such a presumption is already created by the existing law and where no evil has come from it. Take any one found in possession of naval or military stores bearing the broad arrow or marked otherwise as being public property, and at once the burden is put on that person of accounting for it satisfactorily. It is but common sense that it should be so, and in the sections of the Criminal Code dealing with evidence at trials many instances of the same sort of thing are to be found. The presence of cards, dice, counters, tables or other implements of gaming affords prima facie evidence that gaming is carried on in the place where they are found. It is but a statutory statement of the deduction and inference which any man exercising ordinary common sense would make in his own mind on finding such a condition of affairs. The finding in an unlicensed house of an unusually large quantity of intoxicating liquor at once affords the presumption that it is there for an unlawful purpose, that it is kept for sale instead of for private consumption. Things of that sort found in legislative enactment, as I have pointed out, simply state in words and by Act of parliament that which is the ordinary inference that any jury would draw from such circumstances if proved before them in evidence.

Then he goes on:

We have already upon our Criminal Code a provision of that character with regard to workmen and labourers. Section 98 of the Criminal Code provides that in any prosecution, proceeding or trial for stealing ores or minerals, the possession, contrary to the provision of any law in that behalf, of any smelted gold or silver or any gold-bearnig quartz or any unmelted or unmanufactured gold or silver by any operator, workman or labourer actively engaged in or upon any mine shall be prima facie evidence that the same has been stolen by him. That has been our law for ten years or more. I do not know that any one has ever found any difficulty from it or been wrongfully prosecuted under it. This legislation is on the same lines and I cannot but think if its effect and the reason for its introduction had been appreciated in the other House, the Bill would not have met with the fate which befel it last year.

I may say that this Act passed in the House of Commons. Mr. Borden voted in favour of it, and not a single voice was raised against it. It was an absolute necessity, under the circumstances. The present Bill has been modified in some respects. Last year the proposed Bill read as follows:

44a. Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who, having in his possession or on his premises with his knowledge any rock, ore, mineral, stone, quartz or other substance containing gold or silver, or any unsmelted, or untreated, or unmanufactured, or partly smelted, partly treated or partly manufactured gold or silver, is unable to prove that he came lawfully by the same.

Those words have been struck out and the following substituted:

And is unable to account satisfactorily for, or his right to the possession of the same.

It does not apply to the Yukon Territory, because there they have no other circulating medium than the gold nuggets or washed ore. I think the objections to this legislation have been largely removed, and I therefore move the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Would the hon. gentleman repeat the explanation he gave for exempting the Yukon Territory from the operation of the Bill?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—In the Yukon, they use the gold dust instead of coin. It has come into general use as currency, and it is thought wise that it should not apply there, as they appear to have no silver or gold coin, and the mode of making change is entirely by the ounce or half ounce of gold.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not propose to move the six months hoist, but I think that a few observations should be made on the Bill. The hon. gentleman on my right, who introduced the Bill was, I think, a little astray as to his history. I have not looked at the journals of the House, but my impression is that the Bill we dealt with last year was a Bill containing several amendments to the Criminal Code.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—This was one of the amendments.

Hon. Mr. POWER—In that Bill certain amendments were accepted by the House, and certain others were not; this particular amendment was not accepted. I wish to call attention to the wording of the laws of other countries, to which the hon. gentleman has referred. I find that in the case of Western Australia the law says, if a party is reasonably suspected, and so on. That is a very different thing from a law which contains nothing about reasonable grounds for suspicion against the party who is charged. Then in South Africa, if I am not incorrect, no person is allowed to deal in the precious metals unless he has a license. I think it would be a very reasonable and proper thing for the province of Ontario to pass legislation to the effect that no person should be allowed to deal in unwrought gold or silver without having a license for the purpose, and the legislation with respect to the license would naturally contain provision that a registry was to be kept and proper entries made, so that there would be no difficulty, say, if an improper purchase had been made by the dealer, in finding out whence he got his ore, or to whom he sold it. The provisions in the Criminal Code at the present time, I think, are nearly sufficient for all reasonable purposes. I noticed in the speech which the hon. gentleman quoted as having been made in another place, two cases were given as being on all fours with the legislation now proposed. One was that in the case of military or naval equipment which bore the broad arrow, bearing the broad arrow was considered to be prima facie evidence that the goods were wrongfully in the possession of the person who held them. That is plain on the face of it. If a man buys an article that bears the government stamp, the broad arrow, that is prima facie evidence that he has improperly acquired it, and in the same way the possession of dice and cards being prima facie evidence that gambling has taken place; but crude ore is in a totally different position from these articles. There is nothing about the possession of crude silver, or of quartz containing gold or silver to put any one on his guard with respect to the ownership. I have not looked up the debates of last session, but it was pointed out that the proprietor of museum who collected samples of ore for his own information, or for the purpose of making use of them afterwards, possibly for statistical or literary purposes, would, under the wording of the Bill as it came before us last year, be liable to prosecution. I think it is only fair to say that the amendment which was made in the other House would remove one of the most serious objections to this Bill, but I think that it is susceptible of still further improvement, and when we go into the Committee of the Whole, we shall try to make it more workable.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I must express my unequivocal opposition to this legislation. It seems to me that a very dangerous principle is being imported into the large body of our criminal laws of late years, namely, the making of crime, owing to certain artificial conditions which have nothing whatever to do with morality or immorality. Almost every session of parliament we find some artificial crime being incorporated into the Criminal Code, with which moral questions have nothing to do. There was a time when we thought the fundamental basis of crime was immorality; but almost every session now we find that owing to some local conditions existing which are not approved of by the people of that locality, or of a certain school of thought, they must at once have an amendment to the criminal law in order to repress those conditions or compel the public to view conditions as they do themselves. We are here asked to amend the criminal law and establish a new crime, all because of what? Because certain local conditions exist in the district of Cobalt, under which certain mine owners have been unable to protect themselves against some of their employees stealing ore of a very valuable character. I doubt if these local conditions can be paralleled in any part of Canada, yet we are asked to practically brand the people of Canada as criminals if they happen to have ores in their possession, because, forsooth, some few Cobalt mine owners think they are not in a position to protect themselves from petty thefts in their mines. Now, Cobalt is not the only district in Canada in which ore is to be found. Just consider the application of this law: In British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and a portion of Manitoba, where low grade quartz is to be found containing gold and silver, I venture to say that in almost any office you enter in any of those four provinces you cannot fail to find samples of quartz for which the owners would find it impossible to account Mining is one of the greatest industries in British Columbia. There are thousands of explorers in the mountains of the western country, and in all those provinces low grade ores are to be found. Periodically the miners come in with large sacks full of ore and distribute specimens among their friends and others whose help they wish to obtain in carrying out mining enterprises. If quartz should be found averaging $20 to the ton, it would be considered fairly rich and worth developing. Now we are asked, because the mine owners at Cobalt find themselves unable or unwilling to go to the expense of protecting themselves by a proper system of inspection from their employees, that this great prospecting industry carried on in the western provinces should be suppressed, and that every person found with a specimen of ore should be stamped as a criminal.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I say yes, stamped as a criminal until he accounts before a court for having possession of the ore. We are asked, in fact, to disturb one of the best established principles, one of the fundamental principles of the criminal law, as old as the criminal law itself, namely, that the onus of proof is on the person who alleges the commission of a crime; or the principle which is well recognized in the whole body of our criminal law, that the accused is in law presumed to be innocent until his guilt is established. Now we are asked to reverse that and to say, if a man is found in possession of ore, even if it has no value whatever, that the whole machinery of the law may be set in motion, a warrant may be issued, and he may be hauled before a criminal court and compelled to assume all the responsibility and opprobrium of a criminal proceeding and then attempt to account before the court as to how he got possession of the ore which admittedly may be of no value whatever. Possibly he could never satisfactorily account for it. We know that in the western provinces there have been accumulations of ore specimens for many years, going back to the establishment of transportation facilities in those western provinces. It would be utterly impossible in many cases for the owners of those ores to account for their possession of them. Why should this Act be confined to ores? Why should it not be extended to other articles of commerce, clothing or anything else? My hon. friend has referred to the existence of this law in South Africa, Australia and other countries. None of the laws the hon. gentleman refers to are as drastic as this Bill. The hon. member from Halifax has referred to the law in Western Australia, in which the words are used, that there must be a reasonable suspicion. He has also referred to the law in South Africa which is different from this. This Bill is no better than the one which we rejected last session; in my opinion it is worse. If enacted it will require the holder of mineral specimens to prove before a court of criminal law how they came into his possession. In very many cases it would be utterly impossible for him to do so. The illustration cited by my hon. friend as to the naval stores seems absurd. The possession of naval stores is prima facie evidence of stolen property, because the broad arrow is stamped on such articles, and it is at once apparent that they have been stolen from the Crown. I object to this Bill very strongly. It is legislation arising from local conditions, changing the whole body of our criminal law. If our friends in Ontario want this legislation, I have no objection to supporting it if it is made applicable to the province of Ontario only. The Yukon Territory is exempt, though there is greater reason for exempting the other western provinces. There is very little quartz mined in the Yukon, nothing like as much as in the four western provinces. Why should the people of these provinces have placed on them the responsibility of having to appear before a court to prove how quartz specimens came into their possession, if they have any? I am opposed to the principle of the Bill. It is a mischievous principle. The criminal law should not be amended to meet local conditions, and to create artificial crimes. Speaking in a broad sense unless immorality enters into an act it should not, in my judgment, be made a crime. It is not contended for a moment that the great majority of the people who are in possession of samples of ores throughout the Dominion have not come justly and honestly by those ores to be used for flotation and development purposes. I, therefore, object to the Bill and shall vote against it.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middlesex)—I remember distinctly when this Bill was before us last session as part of an amendment to the Criminal Code, that a brief discussion ensued, in which I did not take part, and I hesitated as to whether I should support this clause. As a result of the discussion, the clause was rejected, as well as a few other clauses of the Bill to which the Senate could not agree. It would appear that there is a call for some legislation, and, from the precedents of Australia and South Africa, that the proposed legislation is the only remedy to meet the evil complained of. I agree with my hon. friend from Calgary, that we should not change the fundamental principles of the common law, or at all events should not give a different phase to criminal legislation unless there is a pressing necessity for it. I do not agree however, with the hon. gentleman that innocent persons are very likely to be involved in serious difficulty, even if this amendment were made to the Criminal Code. Let us see: Here is a mine broker who has in his window samples of ore on exhibition, and which he uses perhaps to tempt hungry speculators to invest in those particular mines. He will have no difficulty in accounting for his possession of that ore. If he could not account for it, the ore would be of no use to him. It represents the Coniagas, the La Rose, or some other mine, and he would say, 'I got these samples for the purpose of showing the character of the ore in those mines.' He could explain how that ore came into his possession; he had it for a specific purpose, just as a sample of goods that a merchant wishes to sell. Take another case—a person who likes to make a collection of ores as a matter of curiosity, to show to his friends. He has samples from Cariboo, from the Porcupine and other mines. The value of these samples is in the fact that he is able to associate them with the mines from which he got them. Now, suppose I visited the hon. member from Calgary and found in his office a cabinet of ore; he would tell me that some came from Cariboo, some from the Yukon, and would ask me to look at these beautiful samples of ore, including samples from Cobalt. He did not gather those samples as a labourer would gather stones to pile up in the field—he got them for a specific purpose. I cannot conceive how an honest man can have in his possession any considerable quantity of ore for which he could not account.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Would the hon. gentleman be satisfied to have to go to a court of law and satisfactority account for the possession of specimens of ore?

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middlesex)—It follows from what I have said, that such a person would not be suspected. No one would suspect my hon. friend or any one who keeps such samples; but there are people who would naturally be suspected. Take a case in point: A man may have a considerable quantity of liquor in his house for domestic use; but if he is found with an extraordinary quantity in his house it is prima facie evidence, and has been taken as prima facie evidence, that he has it for an improper purpose. It depends on the quantity of ore he has in his possession and the reputation of the one who has it in possession. In Australia there must be reasonable suspicion, but who would proceed against any man without reasonable suspicion. There is no danger to any man who is known to have ore in his possession for a special purpose, and with good reputation, being proceeded against. We want to proceed against men who traffic in ore for improper purposes. As the law stands, a workman having ore in his possession is considered to be prima facie guilty of theft from the fact of having it in his possession without being able to account for it. Section 988 of the Criminal Code provides that

> In any prosecution, proceeding or trial for stealing ore, or minerals, the possession contrary to the provisions of any law in that behalf of unsmelted gold or silver, or any gold-bearing quartz, or unmanufactured gold or silver, by any operator, workman or labourer actively engaged in or on any mine, shall be prima facie evidence that the same has been stolen by him.

That is the Criminal Code as it now stands. We propose to extend that beyond workmen, operators and labourers to any person who may have a considerable quantity of ore in his possession.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—The hon. gentleman has just used the words 'considerable quantity.' If the legislation can be made to cover only a considerable quantity, I for one feel disposed to support it; but under the Bill as it stands, if I have a small piece of ore in my possession I am liable to be brought before a court to prove how I got possession of it.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middlesex)—That is supposing almost an impossible case. The information that comes to us is that considerable quantities of silver ore at Cobalt have been taken——

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—A quarter of a million.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middlesex)—And in another case $100,000. That was stolen by miners and sold to purchase liquor and for other purposes. We want to get at that evil. The hon. gentleman says you might by inspection of the workmen check that evil. Perhaps you could do that; I do not know but it could be done, yet in South Africa where they have diamond mines there is a very stringent law against the holding of uncut diamonds by unlicensed individuals. My hon. friend has dwelt a good deal on what would happen to any person having a specimen of quartz in his possession. You are not going to carry away any considerable quantity of quartz. It is too burdensome, too cumbrous to do so; but in Cobalt you find native silver which is worth over $5 a pound. A man very easily, by secreting rich ore from time to time, may take a considerable quantity away in his pockets from day to day, and in the aggregate the loss to the owner of the mine would be very considerable. Why can we not get at such individuals? My hon. friend says if we make this Bill apply to Ontario alone he will be satisfied. It is in Ontario it is needed. The hon. gentleman says there is no such evil to correct in British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan or Manitoba. If there is no evil, then it will not apply.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What I said was that the Bill would have a mischievous effect there because of the amount of quartz handled in those western provinces, exceeding infinitely the amount handled in Ontario. This strikes at quartz.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middlesex)—The stealing of quartz is not the trouble; it is the stealing of silver in such quantities as to be a source of loss to mine owners. The western silver mines are of a very different character from the silver mines of Cobalt.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If you confine the Bill to native silver, there is no objection to it. What I object to is its application to quartz.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middlesex)—The difficulty would be to prove it was actually silver. It would apply to quartz, I have no doubt, but we have no evidence that there has been any wrong-doing in connection with quartz. The trouble is in connection with high grade ores, where theft is easy. You cannot carry off a log of wood, but you can carry off a small piece of wood if it is worth taking. It is because the silver ore is so valuable, and in such small compass, that it is easy to carry away, and that is why the Bill is required. The burden of proof in this Bill is put upon the person found in possession of these articles. Take the case of South Africa; what is the law there?—

Any person who deals in unwrought precious metals, as laid down in article 141, without having special license for the purpose, or who is found in possession thereof and cannot give any proof that he came into possession thereof in a lawful manner, shall be punished with a fine not exceeding $500.

Then in the case of Western Australia:

Any person who does not prove to the satisfaction of the magistrate that such gold was lawfully obtained, is liable on summary conviction, &c.

The onus of proof is on the individual in whose possession the article is found. I am sure this House might go as far as the Minister of Justice believed the other House should go, and let the person who is found with the goods on him, unless he can explain how he got them, suffer the consequences. I have no fear of any honest person having such specimens in his possession without being able to account for them. It does not follow that everybody will be suspected. There are people who are suspected because of their relations with miners, and these are the people to be prosecuted. If they cannot satisfactorily account for having possession of ore, they should be prosecuted. It has always been a crime to steal, but we should pass this Bill and put the onus of proof on the defendant.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK. I object to this Bill as far as the province of British Columbia is concerned. It deals with ore and not with the metal in the ore. It does not necessarily apply to very rich ore. As the hon. member from Calgary has said, there is a large amount of ore in the hands of various people in the western provinces. They are not simply brokers, but peoeple in all walks of life who get possession of ores and very often have forgotten how they got them. If we pass legislation of this kind, it leaves it in the power of an irresponsible person to make a charge against such persons and force them to prove where they got the ore. I know of many people in British Columbia who have considerable quantities of ore in their possession, and I think we should be very careful about passing legislation of this kind without looking at the possible consequences which may follow its adoption. If we are to apply this principle why confine it to ores? We have in British Columbia at the present time a good deal of trouble from horse stealing. Why not include in this Bill a clause making a man who is found in possession of a horse prove where he got the horse? The same thing would apply to a considerable extent to the lumber trade. I know of instances where logs are stolen, and it would be very handy for the mill owners if they could compel suspected people to prove where they got their logs. I think the principle of this Bill is very objectionable. Possibly, if it could be confined to those particular cases which, I understand, it is desired to deal with, it might not be so bad; but I certainly am not in favour of the Bill as it is now before us.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I agree with the remarks made by the last speaker and also by the hon. leader of the opposition with reference to this measure. If hon. gentlemen in Ontario want legislation of this kind, and would accept the suggestion of the leader of the opposition, that it be confined to Ontario, where the people appear to be a little light fingered, we in the west would not object. I do not think our people in North Saskatchewan would agree to a Bill of this character. There is a lot of ore in the possession of people in that part of Canada. They have been collecting it for 20 years. There is not a board of trade room in northern Saskatchewan without a considerable quantity of such ores, and as the officers change frequently, I do not think there is one secretary who could tell you where any single piece of that ore came from.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—They would not be called to show where it came from.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say they would not be called under this Bill to prove where it came from?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—No, they could not be called on.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—One cannot tell. Somebody said a while ago that the hon. leader of the opposition would not be suspected; but under this Bill any person who is found with ore in his possession is liable to be haled before a magistrate and made to prove how it came into his possession. It is vicious class legislation in the interest of a few people in a part of Ontario. As the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Bostock) asks, why not extend it to other things? Why not apply it to cigars and one hundred other things. We should consider what we are doing. We have a a law for the punishment of stealing, which applies to the theft of gold and silver just as much as it applies to anything else, therefore this legislation is unreasonable and unnecessary. We showed very good sense last year when we threw it out, and I think we should reject this Bill in the same way. I might give a case in point. A very respectable man, the inspector of Indian agencies in my district, Mr. Chisholm, had in his possession a piece of quartz. He gave the specimen to somebody who had it assayed, and it showed over $15,000 to the ton; but when they asked him where he got it, he said he could not say. He had been perambulating the north country for some six or seven years attending his duty, picking up pieces of rock where he could find them, and he came across this piece. If this proposed Bill became law, and Chisholm was brought into court, his statement that he found it in some place that he could not remember would be considered a cock and bull story, and he would have difficulty in proving he was not a criminal, and then the penalty—two years—just think of it. If the people of Ontario wish to pass legislation of this kind to punish a particular class of thieves, as far as I am concerned I have no objection; but I certainly object to extending it to Saskatchewan.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I confess I am under considerable difficulty as to whether I should vote for or against the second reading of the Bill. On reflection, I think I shall vote for the second reading, in the hope that it may be amended in committee to meet my particular objection. This Bill, to my mind, does not differ very materially from section 988 of the Criminal Code which says that in any prosecution, proceeding or trial for stealing ore or mineral, the possession contrary to the provisions of any law on that behalf of unsmelted gold or silver, or any gold bearing quartz, or any gold or silver, by any operator, workman or labourer actively engaged in or on any mine, shall be prima facie evidence that the same has been stolen by him. I think that was quite a proper provision to make—that the possession by any operator, workman or labourer actively engaged in or upon any mine shall be prima facie evidence of guilt on his part, and I assume, if I correctly interpret the meaning of the present law, that it would have the same effect, it would be applied to the whole community.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—So it would.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I do not see any difference between the present Bill and section 988. I take it that the wording of the present law is no stronger it it said that the possession of ore under those circumstances by people outside of any company—operators, workmen or labourers—shall be considered as evidence of the ore having been stolen. To my mind, the present law is as strong as this Bill. You want to apply to the community at large the same law which is applicable to labourers and workmen who are engaged on mines. I do not know that I am quite right, but I believe I am interpreting the law to that effect. I take it, in this city which has been largely interested in operations in Cobalt, that there is hardly a broker's office or a financial agent's office where you will not find large quantities of samples varying in size and value.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—They are not trafficking in them. They are not buying and selling ore.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—But they have it in their possession.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This Bill says nothing about trafficking.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I do not think my hon. friend is going to gain anything by asking the House to read the language in other than the ordinary way in which the section would be read. The section reads:

> Every one is guilty of an indictable offence, and liable to two years imprisonment, who having in his possession, or on his premises, with his knowledge, any rock, ore, mineral, stone, quartz, or other substance containing gold or silver, and so on.

The offence is, having it in his possession or on his premises. He may not be trafficking in it. He may have no intention to traffic in it; still he has it in his possession, and that is the offence. While there may be some reason for legislation of this kind, I see in it a very great danger to the liberty of the people, in that it is placing in the hands of persons who would be inclined to use it, a very dangerous weapon. Suppose some one has a grudge against me. He comes to my office, and sees samples of this ore. It is quite true, that when I go down to the police court, and am charged with an offence, I will be able to show I came into possession of the ore honestly and fairly, and did not intend to evade the law or any thing of that kind, but I am bound to go to the police court to account for having the few samples of ore in my possession.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If the hon. gentleman is not aware by what process he became possessed of it, what then?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Some one left it on his desk.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—There are to-day in my office samples from Cobalt, the region this is intended to cover, which I cannot account for at all. I do not know from whom I obtained them. If some one chose to go to the police court to-morrow morning, and charge that I have unsmelted ore in my office, I have to go to the police court to explain how I came by that ore. In any case, I have to account for it. Unless some safeguard such as I have indicated, when my hon. friend was speaking—the quantity is limited, or the place where the ore is kept will on its face show it is intended for illegal purposes, I am going to vote against the Bill. If my hon. friend submits some amendments to get over the difficulty, I shall vote for the Bill, but if not I shall vote against it.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—If we are to keep on multiplying the occasions of tripping into mortal sin or into the Criminal Code, this country of ours will soon be rather dangerous to live in. The idea of enacting general legislation because in some locality certain abuses have occurred, I think, is not wholesome. It is not good for the country to have too much legislation, and stamp petty acts as criminal acts. It familiarizes the people with acts which are stamped by law as criminal, and which do not rise to what are considered in civilized countries as acts of immorality. We should confine criminal provisions to acts clearly deserving imprisonment, and prosecutions to acts that are really within the realm of moral or social criminality, and not multiply them. A great thinker once said that a country is judged by its criminal law to a great extent; that a sound healthy country does not require to stamp petty acts as criminal acts. It has a bad signification. These small offences should, of course, be guarded against, and the general law for protection should apply, but we should not be educated to consider a petty theft in the same light as a burglary or hideous crimes. Such a lack of discrimination is not good for any country. This law places the possessor of any ore in a worse position that the thief who steals a horse, or the hotel man who may be privy to an act of highway robbery. I have to-day in my possession, as many others have, collections of ores of different varieties. I could not possibly justify my possession of these samples before a magistrate in the face of this legislation, if some spiteful person or enemy were to bring me before a criminal court. Is that proper? Should the citizens of Canada be made to stand on such grounds that they could hardly move to the right or to the left without being amenable to the criminal law? I say not. I say that this is too much legislation. Some of those people from Cobalt have lost money, and others have made some. Is it proper that because some of them, through possible negligence, or perhaps through economy in not making proper provision for guarding the ores, or not storing them securely, have had ores stolen, the whole community of Canada to-day should walk under the sword of Damocles? If I went prospecting, and perchance, not knowing that I was passing through an area owned and staked by another prospector, picked up a piece of ore innocently, possibly not belonging to me, but without any intent of doing a criminal act, is it right that I should be brought before the police court? In my humble opinion that is too much criminal law. Such legislation is unwholesome, making trivial misdemeanours criminal offences, and particularly placing upon me, and upon any and all the citizens of the Dominion the onus of proving that we are not thieves or public robbers because we have perchance in our possession some valuable piece of ore. It is certainly legislation that is too far reaching. I shall on the present occasion, and on any future occasion when any similar measure comes before the House, vote against it.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—If I understood the hon. leader of the opposition, and the hon. member from Ottawa properly, their construction of the Bill is to this effect: That it would be open to anybody to indict any person found in possession of ore, and that then, after that person had been indicted, it would be incumbent upon that person to prove his right to possession of the ore. I doubt very much if this is a proper construction of the Bill. It seems to me that the offence is not merely being in possession of the ore, but is having in his possession or on his premises a piece of ore, and being unable to prove the lawful possession of the same. Before anybody can be indicted, I suggest that it should be incumbent upon the party who desires to indict that person to himself call upon him, or direct some other person to do so, and give him an opportunity of justifying his possession of the ore.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will the hon. gentleman pardon me? Let us assume that I have ore in my possession, and my hon. friend alleges it is a class of ore referred to here, and I state to him how I came into possession of it, and he says: 'No, I won't accept your explanation.' The criminal law must be set in motion before I can establish within the meaning of the law my rightful possession of the ore.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—If the hon. gentleman reads the Bill as it is now suggested, then we agree that it would be encumbent upon any person, before making the complaint, to give the party who is in possession of the ore an opportunity to prove how he came to possess it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But he is not bound to accept the explanation.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—There is considerable difference between one construction and the other; but it would be very dangerous if it were open to any one, before the party had an opportunity to prove his rightful possession, to lodge a complaint without being liable for damages.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Would my hon. friend say that prosecution under this law would not be possible, or would not be proceeded with unless the prosecutor were in a position to prove that he went to the accused before and gave him an opportunity of explaining? Does he undertake to say that would be a condition precedent, or a step necessary to be taken on the part of the prosecution?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I am inclined to think that that would be the effect of it. My reading of the clause is that it would have to be alleged not only that the party is in possession, but that he is unable to satisfactorily account, or refuses to satisfactorily account for his being in possession of the ore.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is my hon. friend prepared to say that justification of possession can be made before any other forum than that of the court?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It would then be open to the party, and it would be encumbent upon the party who had refused, to justify his possession before the court. It seems to me there is quite a difference between making it an offence to have ore in possession of a person, or making it an offence to have ore in a person's possession, and being unable or refusing to satisfactorily account for the possession of the same I think the two things are quite different. I make the suggestion with some diffidence, that the proper construction requires two things, not only being in possession, but also being unable or refusing to satisfactorily account for the possession of the same.

My main object in rising was to call the attention of the Department of Justice and the House to this point. It seems to me that this Bill may be retroactive, and in that way may be very dangerous in its effect. It is not now a crime to be in possession of ore, and this Bill will have the effect of making it a crime, to have acquired possession of ore three or four or five years ago. Should the Bill not be so amended that the accused person may be able to prove that he came lawfully into possession of the ore obtained after the passing of the present Act.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It would be going very far to make it an offence to have acquired possession, although it might not be a lawful possession, three or four or five years before the passing of the Act. I merely call attention to this point in order that the minister may consider it.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think the House would do well to remember that this measure twice passed without opposition through the lower chamber, and that the minister, who is usually tolerably acute in these matters, took upon himself the responsibility of declaring that it was absolutely necessary, if any check was to be given to the evil described—that is to say the pilfering of ore, which has been going on, on a very considerable scale in certain mines in Canada—that some legislation of this kind should be passed. There can be no possible objection I think to this House very carefully considering the phraseology of any such measure, and inserting such safeguard as may avoid those particular dangers that the hon. member from Ottawa, and my hon. friend the leader of the opposition have alluded to. I may say, however, there is no intention of creating a new crime. As I understand the Bill, the intention is simply to reach parties who act as receivers of stolen goods in the case of certain of these minerals, and to a very large extent. I believe there is no sort of doubt that in many of these mines in Cobalt, and presumably elsewhere, that parties have been in league with the miners in the theft of ore to an extent that seems almost inconceivable unless people have perused the evidence which has been brought before the Department of Justice; and before certain magistrates. I would suggest to my hon. friend that this is pre-eminently a case in which the House might very well under the circumstances, allow my hon. friend's Bill to go to a second reading, and there consider what reasonable amendments could be introduced. As I understand my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition is not particularly opposed to the thing itself, but he thinks it would be entirely inapplicable to certain sections of the country. That idea is recognized to some extent in the Bill itself, for I see it excepts the Yukon district. Perhaps my hon. friend would, before the matter comes up again, read the somewhat careful remarks made on the 19th January by the Minister of Justice with respect to this very important matter. There is no sort of intention—and the government would be very sorry indeed if the Act could be so construed, of interfering with collectors of specimens of precious metals, or of ordinary parties who may come into possession of samples of ore, whether gold or silver or anything else. They wish to deal with a specific evil which had attained very considerable proportions, which I imagine, from the experience of other mining countries, is always likely to occur where there are miners employed by corporations, where diamonds or precious metals occur in sufficient quantity and sufficient purity to enable them to be collected and transported in small parcels, which I understand is the case in some of these Cobalt mines. I would,therefore, suggest that my hon. friends who object to the details of the Bill shall consider what amendment should be introduced when we go into committee, and in the meantime that the second reading be permitted to pass.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED. In view of what my hon. friend has said, I might remind him with reference to his remarks about the Minister of Justice, that the Minister of Justice became responsible at the last session of parliament for the introduction of the same measure. Consequently, there is no reason to suppose that he was more sound in his judgment then than during the present session; but what I wanted to point out was this: I understand from the promoters of this legislation, who simply represent private parties, and who have been industriously at work during the last week or ten days within the precincts of the Senate, that the so-called abuse has been very largely confined to a district within easy reach of Cobalt. That admittedly is the case. I did suggest to the gentleman in charge of the legislation that it should simply be made applicable say to the province in which the abuse exists, or the Act might be brought into force and made applicable to certain districts in Canada on proclamation of the Governor in Council; but with reference to the greater part of Canada, and particularly that section where the low grade ores prevail to a large extent, as I have mentioned, the Act should not be made applicable. I received no reply from him with reference to that, and I simply throw out the suggestion, in order that my hon. friend who has charge of the Bill may give consideration to that part of the proposition, as to whether it is wise to include in the Bill such a very large scope which is admittedly of no importance, because he will appreciate, upon my pointing it out, that the abuse complained of would possibly not exist in the western provinces or in the provinces by the sea. It must necessarily be of a local character. It must be confined to the locality where the abuse exists.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I want to ask the hon. gentleman a question. As I understand, he is willing enough to see some such Act as this passed, if it is either localized in the present instance, or if power is placed in the hands of the government in the case of localities arising in which similar conditions prevail, of issuing a proclamation to bring them under the Act.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, I suggested that as a solution some time ago. That is only my individual opinion. I am not prepared to speak on behalf of other hon. gentlemen who have criticised the Bill.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I shall take care to have that suggestion considered.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But my individual opinion is that the Act may be made possibly an acceptable measure, leaving it to the Governor in Council to apply it on proclamation to the districts where the abuses obtain.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The objection to this Bill seems to me to be more of an imaginary character than one of reality. I must confess I was not a little amused and surprised at my hon. friend to my left and the hon. gentleman who spoke previously who were willing to confine the operations of the Bill which they considered of such an iniquitous character to the province of Ontario. I have yet to learn that a measure which is wrong in principle is properly applicable to any portion of the Dominion. The principle involved in this Bill has been objected to on the ground that it obliges a man to prove his own innocence. It may be objectionable I admit, but there are circumstances under which the principle must be applicable in the administration of the Customs and Inland Revenue Departments. It would be absolutely impossible without it to trace smuggling offences. Where a smuggler is continually cheating the revenue, the law provides that if an importer is suspected of importing goods illegally, the customs official may enter his premises and demand evidence from his books and invoices and his bank account, to show that he is not smuggling those goods. The onus of proof rests on the importer. I could occupy your time for an hour giving illustrations of frauds that have occurred, which could never have been traced unless such authority had been given to the Customs officials. If I understand this Bill, its object is to meet the cases of a similar character and not the cases which have been instanced by the hon. gentlemen from Ottawa and Calgary. The danger in working it out practically is more imaginery than real. We have learned that there are establishments in the city of Toronto and other places where valuable specimens of ore are bought when the purchaser had every reason to believe they have been stolen. Why the operation of the Bill should be confined to Cobalt, I am not prepared to say. There may be some reason why it should not be applicable to the Yukon, but if you go to the Yukon and show a piece of gold quartz or gold from the placer mines, any miner could tell you at a glance from what locality it comes. It is unnecessary to argue that point, because the law is not intended to apply to the Yukon. It must be evident to all who have studied the question that those who deal in these ores, purchasing them continually and exporting them by the ton, collecting them from men coming from Cobalt and other mining districts must know that they are stolen ores. It has been mooted that these people intended to establish a small smelter for the purpose of refining these ores, which they know must have been stolen, not having been procured from the owners of the mines. There ought to be some means by which that can be met. I am not prepared to say that the wording of this Bill meets my approval, though I am strongly in favour of the principle of the measure. Amendments have been suggested which might be accepted by the Senate. It would be well to let the Bill be read the second time and carefully considered and amended in committee to meet the objections which have been raised. No one in the Senate desires to have the principle of the Bill apply to individuals who merely have samples of ores in their possession. I have read of cases in Nova Scotia, where mines have been developed to a considerable depth and the foremen, when they would find very rich pieces of ore containing a quantity of gold, would hide them somewhere until an opportunity offered to carry them off. When at the Waverley mines on one occasion, I was told that the owners of the mines got nothing because the ore must have been stolen—that the foreman or manager when he left the country was able to buy a very good estate and live in comfort for the balance of his life. I was told that he was a very pious man who had been brought out from England. When he was coming up from the mine, he was always singing some pious hymn, and in one instance he was caught paraphrasing one.

> Rock of ages cleft for thee,
> Let me hide thyself in me.

And he would hide the gold until he could take it away. The thieves in Cobalt and other mining districts manage to get possession of very rich specimens and hide them until they can take them to some collector who sells them and gets wealthy at the expense of the mine owners. That is why this legislation is sought. It is the duty of parliament to enact a law to meet such cases, but not to place the people of the country in a position to be treated in the manner indicated by the hon. gentlemen who oppose the Bill. I must confess that until experience leads me to another conclusion, the idea that a man should be compelled to prove his own innocence is abhorrent to my mind; but there are circumstances under which you cannot possibly reach the evil-doer unless the onus of proof is thrown on him to establish his innocence. It has been pointed out that this Bill is not dissimilar to the South African legislation to which the ex-Secretary of State called the attention of the House. That is quite true; but the circumstances are different here. In the Transvaal they deal largely in diamonds as well as in gold. In British Columbia the mining is totally different in character from the mining at Cobalt. That is why a special measure is required to deal with the peculiar conditions in Cobalt. The strong point in this legislation is to reach the receiver of the stolen goods. With that accomplished, every precaution should be taken to prevent innocent people being harassed. Someone has said to me: You have specimens in your House, and you may be called upon to show how they came into your possession. I have no objection to that. I can show where I got them. Wherever I have gone I have tried to collect specimens to take home with me, and I am not at all afraid, if this Bill is passed, of ever being accused of having stolen them.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I am very glad to accept the suggestion of my hon. friend opposite. If the Bill is allowed to go to the second reading, I shall not consider any one bound to the principle of the measure. If we cannot agree on a satisfactory amendment in committee, the Bill will have to be withdrawn. I am a very innocent mover inasmuch as I have not been spoken to about the Bill. It came to us last week, and, after having been introduced, nobody seemed disposed to take charge of it. It seemed to me a very worthy proposition. The papers have been full of accounts of thefts committed in the mining country of Northern Ontario and they seemed to me to be of such a serious character that some legislation should be adopted to meet the case. My whole motive in taking up the Bill was to endeavour to ascertain whether some legislation could not be had to check this evil which has been prevalent for some time. I therefore ask that the Bill be allowed to go to the second reading, and if we cannot agree on proper amendments in committee, the Bill will be withdrawn.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—As I understand, in giving the Bill a second reading we accept the principle of the measure?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Not in this case.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I do not want to be put on record as accepting the principle of this Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 o'clock.

CIVIL SERVICE ADMINISTRATION COMMITTEE.

SECOND REPORT ADOPTED.

Hon. Mr. POWER presented the second report of the Committee on the Civil Service Administration. He said: This is a purely formal report. At the first meeting the committee neglected to include a recommendation that the quorum be reduced. It is a committee of nine, and we had to have five to constitute a quorum, so to-day we recommend that the same reduction be made as in the case of the other committees containing the same number of members. The other is to remove any possible question as to whether the committee had the right to consider these matters. These matters realy constitute the sphere of action of the committee and the general feeling was that there was no necessity for putting the clause in the report; but in order to remove any possible doubt, the committee decided to include it. I therefore move that paragraph 8 of rule 34 be suspended insofar as the same relates to this Bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved concurrence in the report.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (P) An Act for the relief of Jessie Maud Mary Maxwell.—Hon. Mr. Edwards.

Bill (Q) An Act respecting the Kingston, Smith Falls and Ottawa Railway Company. —Hon. Mr. Derbyshire.

ATTACKS ON THE SENATE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN moved:

That an order of the Senate do issue for the production of all correspondence between the Hon. George E. Foster, M.P., and the government of Canada, or any of their members, since the year 1878, in relation to appointment of judges to the judicial bench and of members to the Senate of Canada.

He said: In presenting this motion, which I was urged earnestly by several of my colleagues to put on the orders of the day, I wish to explain why I have done so. This body is accustomed to attacks, both public and private, in the press and on the platform, and in other places. Sometimes these attacks are taken into serious consideration owing to the source from which they come. No doubt, some of my colleagues have noticed in the public prints of this country, the daily press especially, an onslaught on the Senate, not as a part of the constitution, or an element in the government of the country, but on the character, the ability, and the dignity of the members who constitute this body. Had the attack been made on the Senate as a governing body, criticising it for lack of judgment, we would have nothing to say; but when the attack is personal in its character I consider it my duty to repel that attack and to deny to any one the right to disparage our personal qualifications or criticise our physical ailments; and especially do I deny that right to any one who holds an important position in this country. Especially do I deny it to a man who ought to know better than to descend to the level of a political hoodlum or demagogue and use his powers of invective and vituperation against an honourable body of men. He has attacked us, not as a Senate, but as individuals, and that is what I condemn. I take issue with any man who will speak of his fellow countrymen composing this body as 'old, decayed and powdered material,' and as 'a body of incapables and incurables.' I take issue with him for several reasons; in the first place because these statements are not true, and in the second place because he is not in a position to throw stones at the character of any member of the Senate. I take issue with him, not because he is worthy of attention, but because every one may not know him as we do. Some of my colleagues said to me, 'Senator, pay no attention to him.' I was prepared in the first place to act upon that advice, but on further consideration, and consultation with some of my colleagues, I came to the conclusion that the man is unknown to a large number of the rising generation. We who have known him for the past thirty years can weigh him in the balance and pay no attention to what he says, but his words may have some effect on the rising generation who know nothing of the man called George E. Foster.

There are hundreds and thousands of Americans going into our Northwest, and thousands upon thousands coming from European countries. They know nothing of our institutions until they get here, and learn it either by active participation in our public affairs, or on our school benches, and they and our children will read that a man high in the councils of the nation, who held a high position in the government of his country, denounces you and me as a set of incapables and incurables, men who are ready to kiss the shoe of another man. What will the young generation think of this body? Here is a statement which went unrebuked, I am sorry to say—a denunciation, as intemperate as it was unjustifiable, that went unrebuked in the other branch of parliament, and has gone forth to the country. It is in the annals of the press of Canada, open to inspection to all people who read. There are people who do not know the individual, Hon. Geo. E. Foster, who had the courage or rather the treachery one day to say that he was led by an imbecile. That is the man that calls you and me incapable and incurable. How many of the new voters in this country know that fifteen years ago that gentleman declared on the floor of the House that the Prime Minister of this country, his own leader, was an imbecile? How many of the young generation know it? None. But they will know that the ex-Minister of Finance and the ex-Minister of Marine (Mr. Foster), the would-be leader of the present opposition, denounces us as an 'old, powdered, decayed body,' 'incurables and incapables.' That is what the young generation will learn, and that is why I rise to-day to vindicate my character, not being an incapable or an incurable; not one upon whom Foster can cast reproach. If I wanted to, I could charge him with dereliction of duty, but I have no use for such arguments; yet he is the man who comes to me and says, 'the Senate should be composed of men leading an irreproachable life.' Oh, I pardon him, because in his lifetime he has had moments of weakness, when he was a paid orator in the interests of the temperance cause down in New Brunswick and through the country, and there is nobody who knows him better than the 'old decayed material,' in the person of Senator Domville, who drove him out of New Brunswick. He had his moments of weakness; he preached that sacred and holy cause through the country, and when the time came to give substance to his words, to embody the principles he had advocated in the statute books at the demand of the men and women whom he had led to believe that temperance was necessary for the country, what was his reply? 'Oh, I cannot do it. I proclaimed these things from the platform and in churches in a moment of weakness.' When the temperance people asked for water he gave them good old Scotch. This is the man who dared to stand before the people of the country and denounce this Senate as an unworthy body, as humble creatures who kissed the shoe of another man. That language is vulgar, and the idea behind it is more vulgar still; but he was too cautious to express himself more clearly. Kiss his shoe! What nice language to hand down to our children, that the senators of our country are creatures who can stoop to kiss the shoe of another man. Are we to stand idle and remain silent in the face of such charges? I would say, 'yes, if these charges had not gone abroad.' But the man reeking with intellect, no doubt about it as his young life in the temperance cause reeked with virtue, allowed his temperance principles to collapse when he was a minister in the government, and I am sorry for it. Though endowed with a bright, and keen intellect, he does not use it to the best advantage always. Too often he allows it to run into the gutter. His invective, his vituperation, his vulgarity, can be discounted by men like ourselves, and men who know him; but the rising generation, hundreds of thousands of voters throughout the Dominion, never heard of Geo. E. Foster as a wrecker of temperance, a dabbler in and manipulator of trust funds, as the chief conspirator in the famous 'nest of traitors' against Sir Mackenzie Bowell, leader of the government of that day. This man dares to go before the people of Canada, and tell them that we of the Upper House should be men of irreproachable lives. He tells the country that I am incapable and incurable, and he states before parliament that I kiss the shoe of a man. I deny him the right to make these charges. 'Oh,' he said, 'if only we had the Roman Senate,' the Senate of paganism, what an ideal it would be. It was his ideal when he passed through the schools and universities of this country. He looked for a Senate with men of experience, irreproachable life and wisdom, and all that, and that was his ideal; but when he got into the public life of the country, all he could find to direct the destinies of Canada was a body of incapables and incurables, and he says, hon. gentlemen, that you are to blame. That is the man who wants to become the director of the purse, of the confidence and the future of the country. I deny him that right. I know not whether I speak the sentiments of my colleagues, but I know I speak the sentiments of those who have urged me to take this stand, and to denounce the man who dared impugn the honour and dignity of the Senate. He ought to be ashamed of himself when he appeals to the people of this country on the ground that the men of this Senate are old and decayed. What a compliment to pay to the late senator whose loss we deplored yesterday, a master of finance, a generous donor of gifts, a patriot in every sense of the word, a man who, since he arrived in the country in 1854, worked for its development along social, commercial, artistic and charitable lines; that was the compliment which was sent over the wires to a dying man, that he was 'old and decayed.' Sir George Drummond has gone to his grave under that reflection. Have we not in this House men who have grown old and gray in the service of their country; have we not Bowells, Cartwrights, and Rosses, eminent as statesmen, men who have given their lives and all their strength to the development of this country, and are they to be told in the face of the rising generation that they are old, incapable, and incurable! To my mind it is a crime against the best traditions of this country. We have men who hold high and eminent positions in this Senate in all branches of human endeavour and human effort, men who have made a mark for themselves in science, in literature, in journalism, in finance; men who have made a mark for themselves in every walk in life. We have men amongst us who have risen from the place wherein they used the pick and shovel, to command vast enterprises. Yet they are denounced by this gentleman, Geo. E. Foster, as incapables and incurables. We have men in this Chamber like the Talbots, the Davises, the Watsons, the Lougheeds and Perleys and the Youngs, who have been pioneers in the country; who have gone west with the Rileys and others to open up our vast territories, and they are denounced before the people of Canada as incapables and incurables. Look at the men who opened up our forests, the McLarens and others. Look at Senator Ross of Halifax who, years ago, before Mr. Foster was born, was devoting his life to the development of Canada. I am not going over the whole list. Take political veterans like Senator Landry and others; take our friend who is 'decayed and incurable,' the man who drove him (Geo. E. Foster) from New Brunswick, Senator Domville, who gave his young days and young life to the service of his Queen in the army of the empire. I could go over the entire list of senators here, and point out what they have done, both in charity, science, literature, journalism, commerce and in all the walks of life, and yet we have to tolerate denunciation, vituperation, and vulgarity from Hon. Geo. E. Foster. I say that this Chamber owes it to itself—I am not going to say by what means—but at least by an expression of opinion, that such charges cannot go unchallenged and unrebuked in the country.

They are unfair, unworthy, untruthful and vulgar. I have done my duty. Probably others, more competent and more authorized to speak should have taken action. I hesitated long before giving expression to these views. Up to an hour ago, I had almost made up my mind to leave him to the extravagance of his own language—to leave him there to brood over his own thoughts of the past, not wishing to involve the government, to make public the correspondence that I would like to have, I should like to know whether that man was an applicant for a position in this honourable House, or if they have from him any written document recommending the appointment of 'decayed, incapable, incurable persons' to the Senate. If such correspondence exists, the government might render a public service by producing it. Probably when he left office such correspondence disappeared; but one thing is sure, the members of the Senate to-day compare favourably with Geo. E. Foster—Oh, I will not use the comparison; it would be odious, because there is no man in the Senate who has a serpent's tongue and an empty heart.

The motion was agreed to.

CHIEF ENGINEER OF STEAMBOAT MONTCALM.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

1. Who is chief engineer on board the steamboat 'Montcalm'?
2. When was he appointed?
3. Does he possess a first-class engineer's certificate?
4. Has any other engineer possessing a first-class certificate asked for the position of chief engineer on board the 'Montcalm'?
5. If so, why has he not obtained it?

6. Is it because the law requires that the position of chief engineer shall be given only to an engineer having a first-class certificate?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The answers to the questions the hon gentleman has put are as follow:

1. Joseph Cantin.

2. Joined service April, 1907. Appointed acting chief engineer November, 1908. Confirmed in position of chief engineer on April 1, 1909.

3. Second class certificate.

4. Yes.

5. The position was not vacant.

6. The law requires that the chief engineer of a vessel such as the 'Montcalm' should possess a second class certificate.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The order of the day being called

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion for the second reading Bill (C) An Act to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The Department of Justice have requested me to postpone the discussion of this Bill for a day or two. They were to have given a formal opinion upon it, but they are not quite prepared to do so. I therefore move that the order of the day be discharged and that the debate be postponed until Tuesday next.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In referring this Bill to the Department of Justice, has my right hon. friend asked them to consider the retroactive effect it will have in some disputed cases?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I would prefer not to discuss the matter on its merits until I receive their report; but I may say generally that the department consider the measure is of a very far reaching character and, as drawn, would involve consequences of so important a nature that they desire to have very full consideration of it. That particular clause to which the hon. gentleman refers as to carrying the effect of the Bill back for I think twenty years, would be, I presume, especially objectionable in their eyes.

The motion was agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (T) An Act for the relief of Archibald Laurie.—Hon. Mr. Gillmor.

AN ADJOURNMENT.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL moved that when the Senate adjourns to-day, it stand adjourned until Thursday next, the 10th instant, at three o'clock in the afternoon. He said: My object in making this motion is—because of Wednesday being a holiday. The state of our business is such that we can easily conclude our work without meeting on Tuesday, and I thought it would suit the convenience of hon. members if we did not bring them back until Thursday. There is nothing for Tuesday except the meeting of the Committee of Banking and Commerce. I think if notice is given that the Senate has adjourned until Thursday no inconvenience would arise.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—I cannot quite appreciate the remarks of the hon. senator in respect to the business before the House. The Insurance Bill is an important matter. The rumour in the other Chamber is that parliament will prorogue early in April. The committee arranged to hear the representatives of the fire insurance companies on Tuesday, and I think the House should make good their promise by meeting on Tuesday. The hon. gentleman states they would probably see the notice in the newspapers if the Senate adjourns. The chairman of the committee is not here to announce that they could hold the meeting on Thursday, and in that case the Bill would go over until the following week, and notices would have to be sent out again to the fire insurance representatives. In that case it would be ten days before the committee could be got together. I think there are sufficient members of that committee in attendance to form a quorum. We are under an obligation to be here on Tuesday. The members who desire to go away might take the holiday, and the members who made the pledge to the insurance companies, in my opinion, should keep it.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It appears to me there is a great deal of force in what my hon. friend has just stated. So far as the government are concerned, if the Senate desire, they would have no objection to the adjournment over Tuesday on condition that the business of the Insurance Committee is not interferred with; but I think that is a condition precedent. There was an adjournment of the committee for the whole of the present week, and notice having been given that it will meet on Tuesday next, it appears to me that unless provision can be made for that meeting as agreed, we shall have to sit on Tuesday. However, the matter is for my hon. friends to decide.

The motion was declared lost.

THE NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY—SECTION B.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

1. Into how many districts is the country traversed by the Transcontinental railway divided, and what are these districts?
2. What is the length of the line of the railway in district B?

3. Into how many divisions is district B subdivided?

4. What are the boundaries of each of these divisions?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The answers are as follow:

1. The country traversed by the National Transcontinental railway, eastern division, is divided into six districts, viz: districts A, B, C, D, E and F.

2. The length of the line in district 'B' is 507·22 miles, of which 107 miles was transferred from district 'C' and added to district 'B.'

3. District 'B' is subdivided into nine divisions with 80 miles as yet not all located.

4. The boundaries of these divisions are as follows: Division 1, boundary between New Brunswick and Quebec, 44 miles westerly to near St. Alexandre. Division 2, from west end of division 1, 58 miles westerly to near Lake Therrien. Division 2a, from west end of division 2, 34 miles westerly to near Otter Creek. CLASSIFICATION OF SENATE EMPLOYEES.

MOTION.

The order of the day being called:

Consideration of the correspondence between the Clerk of the Senate and the Auditor General, &c.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I move that this correspondence be referred to the Committee on Internal Economy, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Power.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not object to the motion. I rise more for the purpose of asking some questions. I notice that there has been a conflict of opinion between those members of the Senate who took part in the discussion when this classification was dealt with, and the Department of Justice. There were similar differences of opinion in reference to the appointment of the Clerk of Committees, I think he was called. I mean Mr. Nicholson. I remember at the time the matter was before the Senate, I objected to the appointment on the ground that the law was not complied with, that the report made to the Speaker by the Clerk of the Senate did not cover the provision of the law, and that the Speaker's report based on that letter was not sufficient to justify the appointment. I would like to ask whether the difficulty has arisen in connection with that appointment between the Department of Justice and the Senate, or the Auditor General, and the Senate, and if so could the Speaker, or any one in the House, inform us as to the position that gentleman occupies at the present moment, and whether the Auditor General has taken any steps towards withholding his salary—in fact whether any difficulty has arisen at all.

The SPEAKER—I have to state to the Senate that the question was raised by the Auditor General in regard to the classification and bonuses. The whole subject is under discussion at the present time, and no final conclusion has been arrived at. In the course of a few days I hope I will be able to announce a satisfactory arrangement.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday next at three o'clock.

TREATIES BETWEEN BRITAIN AND FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

ORDER OF THE DAY POSTPONED.

The order of the day being called:

By the Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middlesex):

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the difficulty in obtaining the full text of treaties made by the government of the United Kingdom and foreign countries affecting the Dominion of Canada, and will move that steps be taken at an early day to compile such treaties or such portions of them as effect Canada into a volume for the use of members of parliament, with a reasonable number for distribution among the public libraries of Canada, and in the same connection to compile the various constitutional Acts passed by the parliament of Great Britain since 1759, relating to any of the provinces now forming part of the Dominion of Canada.

The SPEAKER—As the hon. gentleman from Middlesex is absent to-day, I presume this order will stand.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to call attention to the fact that this notice is not in proper form. The hon. gentleman has given notice that he will call the attention of the Senate to a matter, but he does not conclude with an inquiry, and that is necessary if the hon. gentleman wishes to discuss it.

The order of the day was allowed to stand until Tuesday next.

SUSPENSION OF RULES.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER—In the absence of the hon. gentleman from Victoria (Mr. Cloran) moved:

That Rules 112 and 110 be suspended in so far as they relate to a petition presented by R. B. Masson and others, praying to be incorporated as the Gatineau and Ungava Railway Company.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I desire to ask why the presentation of these petitions is left for two or three months after the meeting of parliament? Surely the gentlemen who desire to introduce Bills, or to amend Bills, must know what the rules of the House are. The practice in the past has been such as to render the rules governing the presentation of petitions and the introduction of Bills almost useless. The committee has usually recommended an extension of the time for presenting petitions, and this has been done very often because of the long and numerous adjournments which take place before the time limit has expired. I do not know the character of this Bill. It seems to be free from anything objectionable, but I desire to call the attention of the House particularly to the practice which prevails here of paying no attention to the rules which have governed us in the past, and which were adopted for the protection of the public. I have heard of other instances in which petitions may be presented for Bills which are likely to cause a good deal of discussion. If there is nothing objectionable about this Bill, why has not the committee recommended an extension of time? I would suggest that if this practice is to be permitted, it would be far better to abolish the rules altogether.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—My hon. friend is right in saying that when our rules are dispensed with in a matter of this kind it ought to be on the recommendation of the Committee on Standing Orders. Anything of this kind should come from that committee.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The difficulty is this, that unless there is a petition, the Standing Orders Committee cannot take cognizance of the Bill, and I suppose the hon. gentleman who is acting for the hon. member from Victoria division wishes to get this petition before the committee. But apart from that, I quite concur in what has been said by the hon. member from Hastings. The hon. gentleman who makes this motion should be in a position to show clearly why the parties asking for incorporation have not presented their petition in due time, and unless the reasons are entirely satisfactory to the House, the rules should not be suspended. The practice, up to the present date, was that the party who was behind time presented a petition asking to be allowed to present a petition. That was sent to the Committee on Standing Orders, and, if a good case was made out, they reported in favour of suspending the rule and allowing the original petition to be presented; but when the rule is suspended in this way, the committee really have not the same latitude in dealing with the case that they ought to have.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER—I am not in a position to give the reason.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Then let the matter stand.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER—Two days ago, in a similar case, the request was granted without objection from anybody. This is simply a petition for a Bill to incorporate a railway company, and I do not see how harm can be done to anybody. I have no objection to letting it be understood that the petitioners must be prepared to give satisfactory explanations to the Committee on Standing Orders, and if the committee are not satisfied with the reasons advanced, they can deal with the petition as they please. There are exceptions to all rules, and I do not see why the same favourable consideration which has been extended in similar cases to this in the past should not be extended in this case.

The SPEAKER—I would suggest that it would be better to let the motion stand for a couple of days until the hon. member is prepared with an explanation of why he wants to have the rules suspended. He might imperil the passage of the motion if he were to press it now, whereas if he allows it to stand for a couple of days he may be able to present an explanation which will satisfy the House.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER—I have not the slightest objection to let the motion stand until Thursday.

The motion was allowed to stand.

MEETINGS OF BANKING AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Before the House adjourns, I should like to direct the attention of hon gentlemen to a notice given last Wednesday with regard to the calling together of the representatives of the different fire insurance companies. The notice was given with the leave of the House that we should sit on Wednesday. I would therefore ask leave of the House that the committee sit to-morrow. There are many people from a distance—some from the far west, and it would be in the interest of legislation to have the committee sit to-morrow and every day this week, and probaly in that way we might be able to conclude the consideration of the Insurance Bill. There was some doubt expressed, and I want to remove the doubt. It was distinctly understood that notice should be given to the fire insurance companies that the committee would meet on Tuesday at eleven o'clock, and as there was no sitting of the Railway Committee this week, that the Banking and Commerce Committee should sit every day until the work was completed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—To-morrow is a statutory holiday, and there is a proviso at the end of rule 85 to the effect that where a committee purposes to sit during a short adjournment, notice shall be given to the members. The hon. gentleman has already notified the members verbally, as I understand, that the committee will meet to-morrow. and I think the better way is to let it go at that and waive the written notice. If the members of the committee are satisfied, the House need not worry.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Without a motion?

Hon. Mr. POWER—As I understand, the hon. gentleman has already given notice to the members of the committee that there will be a meeting to-morrow. It is not in writing, but the committee would naturally be disposed to waive the formality of a written notice.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I do not know whether a meeting of the committee which would be a reasonably complete committee can be held to-morrow, because, as I understand, some members have religious scruples about sitting on Ash Wednesday.

Hon. MEMBERS—No.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I am very glad to know that. However, there is no objection to that.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—As long as we fast to-morrow it is all right.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is a misapprehension on the part of some hon. gentlemen in regard to Ash Wednesday It is not a holiday in the church to which I belong.

The SPEAKER—It appears to me that rule 85 covers it, if it is understood they are going to meet. That rule reads:

A select committee may adjourn from time to time, and by order of the Senate, from place to place, and where the Senate adjourns for less than a week, may sit on those days over which the Senate has adjourned, provided that in the last case, notice of the intention to meet during the adjournment of the Senate has been given to the members of the committee one day before such adjournment.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman has given that notice.

Hon. Mr YOUNG—No, that is not the notice spoken of.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Yes, that is the notice I refer to.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I call attention to the fact that a notice to a committee is a written notice to the members of that committee. That is what we understand by a notice.

The SPEAKER—I will put the motion.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—There is no motion.

The SPEAKER—Yes, the hon. gentleman from Grimsby (Mr. Gibson) has made a motion.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, he gave a notice.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I gave the notice last Wednesday.

Hon. Mr. POWER—What motion can the hon. gentleman make?

The SPEAKER—That the committee sit to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We cannot contravene the rules of the House. I do not agree with the hon. member from Killarney (Mr. Young) because the parties who are interested are members of the committee, and if they are willing to accept a verbal notice from the chairman instead of requiring a written notice, I do not see why the other motion should be made.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They will accept it.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Permit me to call attention to the fact that a verbal notice is only a notice to those present, while a written notice is a notice served in the usual way.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There can be no possible objection. The committee will not to-morrow deal with any of the clauses of the Insurance Bill. They will simply sit and listen to the insurance representatives talking.

The SPEAKER—I call attention also to the fact that this House met to-day in order that the Banking and Commerce Committee could meet to-day and to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I reached the committee a little late to-day, but I was surprised to find that people from afar have given place to an Ottawa gentleman, who is to occupy the whole day.

WATER TRANSPORTATION IN THE NORTHWEST.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS moved:

That an order of the Senate do issue for a return of all surveys, plans, reports and other documents connected with the improvements of the Saskatchewan river, with a view to facilitate transportation by water of passengers and freight from the foot of the Rocky Mountains to the city of Winnipeg, Manitoba.

He said: I might say in connection with this motion that up to the present time very little is known of the water transportation facilities of the western country. I suppose one of the reasons for it is that until recent years the provinces have not been thickly populated, and there has not been any demand for the improvement of waterways; but in the last few years conditions have changed. The country, and I am now alluding particularly to my own province, Saskatchewan—has developed very rapidly. We are getting a very large population there. What was fifteen years ago a wilderness along the banks of the Saskatchewan river is occupied to-day by thrifty farmers; in fact the banks of the river from one end of the Saskatchewan to the other—that is from the city of Edmonton to Prince Albert, where I live—are very nearly all settled, and the interior of the province is in the same condition. Fifteen years ago, when I had the honour of representing the whole of that province, we were producing something less than a million bushels of wheat in Saskatchewan. This year, our product is something like eighty-six million bushels, and, naturally, the people are looking for the cheapest transportation routes available.

In eastern Canada, the policy of the government has always been to provide water transportation, and every available stream has been converted into a navigable waterway at very large expense. I am bound to say that the money has been well spent. Water transportation has a tendency to regulate freight rates, and in that way are valuable to the people even though they are not utilized to a great extent. There is no question that in eastern Canada the waterways have a tendency to keep down freight rates on railways, and I am satisfied that the improving of the waterways in the Northwest will have the same effect there. The Trent canal and other canals in the east are improvements on small streams, but when you come to the Saskatchewan you have a river which compares with the Ottawa, and it can be made navigable for something like 1,200 miles. The length of the North Saskatchewan from the head of navigation at Edmonton to the Forks, is 500 miles. The length of the South Saskatchewan, from Medicine Hat to the Forks, is 370 miles. The length of the Main river from the Forks, which is near the city of Prince Albert, to the head of the Grand Rapids, is 350 miles; and the total fall at the Grand Rapids is 71 feet. We have in connection with the Saskatchewan river, lakes Winnipeg, Winnipegosis and Manitoba. Taking the river route from Edmonton to Grand Rapids, the distance is something in the neighbourhood of 1,000 miles of navigable water. All that is needed is to construct wing dams at the sand bars, and you have a navigable stream for a 1,000 miles at small expense. Near Grand Rapids, by making a short canal, you get into Lake Winnipegosis. No lock is needed, because the level of the water is the same as in Cedar lake. All that is required is a ditch, and you have access to a navigable lake 160 miles long running into the heart of Manitoba. Another little canal at Mossey portage would give communication to Lake Manitoba which extends south nearly to Portage La Prairie, in the very heart of Manitoba, 100 miles. At Grand Rapids, a small canal of about two and one-half miles will continue navigation into Lake Winnipeg. We are building locks now on the Red river at St. Andrews and they are about completed, and, with the improvements of which I have spoken, you would have navigation all the way from Winnipeg to Edmonton, and besides on lakes Winnipegosis and Manitoba. One result of this would be to give us cheaper wood and coal. At Grand Rapids, we have the finest water-power in Saskatchewan or in fact in all that northern country. I have the authority of the minister for saying that he had an engineer examine it, and he reports that 80,000 horse-power can be developed there at small expense in connection with building the canal; and he told me that he was going to ask the government to reserve that water-power for the country. It is only a question of time, if we are going to build the Hudson Bay road, when large mills will be established at Grand Rapids to grind the wheat coming down the Saskatchewan from the prairie country. From Grand Rapids the flour can be shipped to eastern markets by way of Hudson bay. As every one knows, we have in Alberta vast fields of lignite coal. As a matter of fact good domestic coal underlies the whole province. We have in the western country room for a population of 50,000,000 people. The climate is cold in winter, and the supply of fuel is an important question. The coal of Alberta can be carried down the Saskatchewan and is sufficient in quantity to supply the population in the Saskatchewan valley and all the way through to Manitoba. In Saskatchewan we have no coal, and our farmers have to pay a high price for their fuel. Coal can be put on barges at Edmonton for $1 a ton. The freight to Prince Albert where I live is $3.40 per ton. That is a high tax on the farmer for fuel. It may not appear much to people who dwell in cities, but to the man who has to make his living by working on a farm it is a serious tax.

In Manitoba to-day most of the coal used is imported from the United States. That can be replaced by coal from the province of Alberta if we have cheap transportation, and the only way we can get it is by improving our waterways. I observe that the Minister of Public Works has taken the matter up. He was up there this summer, and saw the river for himself, and started some surveys of the river. I hope he will go on with this work, because I know that it is an absolute necessity. It will not cost very much. There is any amount of water in the river. Like the Mississippi, it has widened out in certain places. and there are too many blind channels. By putting in certain dams as they do in the Mississippi, you can throw all the water into one channel, and the moment you do that, the water will scour the channel clear, and there will be no trouble. In the 1,000 miles there are only two small rapids to be dredged out, and the construction of this canal I mention at Grand Rapids, which would not cost a great deal of money. That would give us a continuous waterway from the foot of the Rockies to the city of Winnipeg. The other channels into Lake Winnipegosis and Lake Manitoba might come later on. I think the time is now ripe for this development, and I would suggest to the consideration of the government the fact that the people of our province are contributing largely to the public treasury. Not figuring on the customs duties we pay at Toronto and Montreal—because some of the cities in the west pay their customs duties in Toronto and Montreal—but looking up the figures I find that we paid something over eleven million dollars into the treasury in excise duties collected at home, and I think the total expenditure paid on our account out of the treasury is something like $1,900,000. We get less than ten per cent of what we pay in, while some other provinces receive forty or fifty per cent. However, I am not grumbling about it. We are having a larger revenue. The amount of money it would take to commence the improvement of the Saskatchewan would be very small. Forty or fifty thousand dollars would do a lot towards making it navigable. We have six or seven steamboats at Prince Albert plying up and down the river. I do hope the minister and the government will see their way clear to take this matter up and push it to a successful conclusion.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—There is no objection to the motion. Until the papers are brought down I think further discussion of the matter would not be useful.

The motion was agreed to.

SUSPENSION OF RULES.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN moved:

That rules 112 and 110 be suspended in so far as they relate to a petition proposed to be presented by R. B. Masson and others, praying to be incorporated as the Gatineau and Ungava Railway Company.

He said: The notice of motion that stands in my name was placed on the orders of the day by courtesy, to oblige a member of the lower House. I am in no way connected with this measure, and know nothing of it except what is contained in the document which has been just placed in my hands. I was surprised to see that in my absence on Tuesday some slight objection was taken to the motion being adopted, especially on the ground that no reason was given for it. At the time when I asked my hon. friend from De La Durantaye (Mr. Tessier) to put the motion before the House in case I was absent, I was then unable to give any explanation of it, as the paper had only been placed in my hand as I came into the House. I must thank the hon. gentleman from De La Durantaye for his kindness in the matter in having saved it from a sudden death. On my return, I forwarded it to the member for Wright (Mr. Devlin), who is in charge of the Bill in the lower House, with a copy of the Debates, asking him if he had any reason to give to this honourable House why the motion, which is really his, should pass. I have just received the following note from the hon. gentleman:

February 10, 1910.

Dear Senator,—I fear the Bill is doomed in your chamber. I do not know what reasons I can give. Death in the family caused my absence for the last week of presenting Bills. All the notices had not been fully published.

Consequently, the only reason I can give this honourable House on behalf of the hon. gentleman from the lower House is that death in the family prevented him from attending to his public business. Mr. Devlin is one of the gentlemen who is asking for this incorporation. The Bill, as I understand it, is for the construction of a road in a certain part of this country where it will interfere with the rights of nobody. It will probably interfere with the moose and cariboo. Certain gentlemen are asking to build a railway away up in the wilds of Pontiac and the northern country. Arthur T. Genest, civil engineer, of Ottawa, Mr. S. Tanner Green, of Quebec, gentleman, Mr. Roderick B. M. Masson, of Terrebonne, P.Q., gentleman; Frederick K. Rous, Montreal, gentleman, and Emmanuel B. Devlin, City of Ottawa, barrister. The Bill is an application in the following form:

That it is proposed that application be made to the parliament of Canada, at its present session, for an Act to incorporate a company to be named the Gatineau and Ungava Railway Company, with power to construct, equip and operate, for the general advantage of Canada, a line of railroad from a point on the National Transcontinental Railway, at the head of the Gatineau river, northwest branch, in the province of Quebec, north-easterly, following, adjoining to, or in the vicinity of the 'Height of Land,' to Lake Chibougamau, a distance of about 140 miles; thence to Lake Mistassini, the east side, a further distance of 60 miles; thence to the northern boundary of the province of Quebec, at Homani or Summit lake, a distance from the starting point of about 450 miles; thence turning round the sources of Big river to Lake Kaniapiskau, near the intersection of the 70th meridian and the 54th parallel of latitude; thence north-westerly, crossing the source of Stillwater river, to a point on Lake Minto or Leaf river, or in a generally northern direction to a point in Koksoak river, and from either point north-easterly, to Leaf lake on Ungava bay— a total distance of about nine hundred miles. Also possibly, from Lake Minto, a main branch line stretching approximately two hundred miles to Payne lake.

To construct, acquire, and operate steam and other vessels for the transportation of freight and passengers on all navigable waters along or touched by its railroad; and to construct and maintain canals, docks, warehouses, offices, wharfs, dry docks, piers and other structures; to construct and operate any telegraph or telephone lines or any lines for the purpose of distributing electricity for lighting, heating, compressing air or motors of any kind, and to collect tolls for the transmission of messages and power thereon; to acquire electric, mechanical horse power or other power, and to dispose of and distribute the surplus thereof; to acquire timber and mineral lands, lumbering and mining rights, and develop, operate and turn to account the same; and to acquire patent rights and franchises for the purpose of the new work hereby authorized and dispose of the same; to build and construct branch railways and manage the same, and for that purpose exercise all the powers, privileges and authority necessary therefor in as full and ample a manner as for the railway; to connect with, and make traffic or other arrangements with railway or other companies, and to purchase, take over, lease or otherwise acquire the property, rights and franchises of any other company or companies, and to lease or sell to any other company or companies the property, rights and franchises of this company, the whole subject to the laws and regulations of the province governing these matters.

Wherefore your petitioners humbly pray that your honourable House may be pleased to pass an Act for the purposes above mentioned.

This honourable House can see that the proposition contained in this Bill does not interfere with any existing railway project. It simply asks parliament to give these gentlemen an opportunity to start this work. They ask for certain powers with regard to building canals, docks, &c.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman has given us notice of what the Bill contains, but has not touched the point raised as to the continual practice of setting the rules of the Senate aside, when ample time has been given under the rules of parliament for presenting petitions. I pointed out yesterday that the Committee on Standing Orders had, as a rule, extended the time for the presentation of petitions by reason of the adjournments which had taken place; but parliament has been in session now for over two months, and, as far as we know, no steps have been taken towards complying with the rules of the House when presenting petitions asking for the incorporation of a railway or for any other purpose. No reason has been assigned why two months has been allowed to elapse without complying with the rules of parliament. That is the reason why I have objected to the continual violation of the rules of the House, pointing out that we had better rescind these rules than continually violate them by motions for a suspension. In the other House there is, under their rules, a very heavy penalty imposed for the non-presentation of Bills or petitions in the proper form if they are intended to be presented. While the hon. gentleman has given us a very full description of what is intended to be done if the Bill becomes law, he has given us no reason why the parties interested in this project had not presented the petition within the proper time. For that reason, I have taken objection to the constant evasion of the rules, moving their suspension in order to enable parties to do that which the rules of the House say they shall not do.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I thought I gave a very substantial reason, and a very sad one. The gentleman who is in charge of this Bill in the lower House was prevented from performing his duty owing to death in his family, and I think we certainly should respect his position under the circumstances.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the motion is carried, I would call the attention of the House to rule 112, the suspension of which was asked. It reads as follows:

> No motion for the suspension of the rules upon any petition for a Private Bill is in order, unless such suspension has been recommended by the Committee on Standing Orders.

I do not know that in this case the Standing Orders Committee has made a recommendation to suspend the rule, and it is for that reason the suspension of rule 112 is asked. If that rule were suspended, in what position would we be? The petition would be presented.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—If rule 112 were suspended, then the hon. gentleman's way would be quite clear to present the petition, if the time had not expired. That is all. Then a petition, in natural course, would have to go before the Standing Orders Committee.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Because the committee has just passed a resolution declining to take any petition into consideration that would be presented after such a date.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—No. The committee recommended from time to time the extension of time for presenting petitions. On a report of the committee which was read in the House here, hon. gentlemen will find that the committee decided to recommend no further extension of time in so far as petitions were concerned. They did not, nor could they, go so far as to say that they would not consider a petition which they received in regular order, which can be presented any time by a suspension of the rule.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think the regular way would be to bring in a petition asking leave to present a petition.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—That is what they did. I consulted the clerk of the House, and I am following the procedure, which he is well acquainted with, and also made inquiries from the chairman of the Standing Orders Committee, and he told me this was the procedure I had to adopt. I am in the hands of the House. I am prepared to follow the regular procedure, and have been advised by authorities in regard to procedure that this is the proper method of dealing with the matter.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—If my hon. friend will permit me, when he asked me the question what course was open to him, I pointed out that this course was open, and I thought I made myself clear that a petition for leave to present a petition was also a course open. In this matter, he is, of course, at the mercy of the House. In the other alternative, his petition asking for leave to present a petition would be considered by the Standing Orders Committee, as my hon. friend has just pointed out. This is what I might call a short cut.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is short and irregular.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG.

THE LATE SENATOR BAKER.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It is my painful duty to call to the notice of the House the loss which we have sustained recently by the death of Senator Baker. Under the circumstances, and particularly in view of the recent death of Sir George Drummond, it is doubly painful to us to have to record the loss of another hon. gentleman from the same province, occurring as this has, so suddenly after. It is but a few days, I might almost say a few hours, since we had the pleasure of having Senator Baker with us, and, to all outward appearance at the time, few of us could have expected or had a better prospect of living a few years more of honourable usefulness than the departed gentleman. For many years he was a member of the House of Commons on the opposite side of politics from myself; but I remember particularly that on every occasion when we came in contact, I had every reason to form a very high opinion of the honesty and uprightness of the late senator. I believe that in this House, for some considerable time, he occupied a very important position as chairman of one of our principal committees, and I think that the whole House will unite with me in saying that in every possible form and way the departed senator was one of those men who had no enemies, and who inspired all who came in contact with him with a very high opinion of his ability, and of his impartiality. Not having had the advantage of being intimately acquainted with him, I can say little more, except to express the regret, which I know every hon. gentleman here will feel, at the very sudden death of our lamented colleague.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In the absence of the hon. leader of the opposition, it falls to my lot to say a few words in reference to the departed senator. I can fully endorse every word which has been uttered by the leader of the House in reference to the late Senator George Baker. He was a gentleman with whom I was intimately acquainted and had very close associations, personal and political, for a great many years, and I know of very few men whom the public generally, and those with whom he has been connected, holds in higher esteem. Personally, he was one of those men with whom one could associate, no matter what political views we might hold, and, the more intimate the acquaintance, the higher opinion you would have of that hon. gentleman. He was in his day what we might call one of the stalwarts of the party to which I belong. He held a very prominent position in that section of the Dominion in which he resided. The best evidence that his ability and his qualities were appreciated in that section of the country is the fact that he was elected to parliament, following in the footsteps of his father, who represented that constituency in the old parliament of Canada. He was a member of the legislative assembly in the province of Quebec. and had the honour of serving as Solicitor-General in the cabinet of our present colleague, the Hon. Mr. DeBoucherville, and after having left that branch of the legislature, he was re-elected to the House of Commons, and, as has been very properly stated by the hon. leader of the House, his position there was always that of a courteous gentleman, always ready to give advice, and to assist in the work of the House. Without making any disparaging comment on those who followed him as chairmen of the Railway Committee of this House, I think I shall be borne out by every one who was a member of that committee in saying that they never had a better chairman than our late friend. If there is any one who can sympathise more readily and earnestly with those who are bereft, it is myself, for the reasons that I have already intimated—by close association with our late colleague, socially, personally and in many other ways. I always looked upon him as a man of the strictest integrity. Though he has not for some three or four years past given so much attention to public business, he occupied a position second to none in the legislative halls of this country in the past. I think the Senate has lost a very valuable member, and the country, the services of one whose ability and talent in his younger days were of great service to the Dominion.

PATENTS OF HENRY A. W. WISE WOOD BILL.

REFERRED BACK TO COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH moved concurrence in the:

Report of the Standing Committee on miscellaneous private Bills, to whom was referred (Bill H) An Act respecting certain patents of Henry Alexander Wise Wood.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT moved in amendment:

That the report be not now concurred in, but that it be recommitted to the Committee on Private Bills.

He said: The report of the committee is simply to the effect that the preamble of the Bill has not been proved. The reasons which led the committee to that conclusion are not stated in the report. Now rule 126 provides as follows:

When the committee on any private Bill report to the Senate that the preamble of such Bill has not been proved to their satisfaction, they must also state the grounds on which they have arrived at such decision; and no Bill so reported on shall be placed on the orders of the day unless by special order of the Senate.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—When the debate took place on the second reading of that Bill, and its reference to the committee, it was then understood, although no motion was made, that the reasons for reporting the Bill should be given, provided the report was in favour of granting the petition.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—There can be no mistake about the rule; they must state the grounds on which they arrived at their decision.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then the report is not in order—is that it?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—That is the position the report is in, and the easiest way out of the difficulty is to refer the report back to the committee.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman should state the reason why the report is referred back.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—There is a motion before the chair for concurrence in a report which, on the face of it, is not in accordance with rule 126. I have moved in amendment that the report be not now concurred in, but that the Bill be recommitted to the committee from which it came. I do not say for what purpose; the committee will deal with it in any way they may think proper.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Would it not be well to state in the amendment that it is referred back because it is not in accordance with the rule of the House?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—No; but there is nothing to prevent my hon. friend moving an amendment to the amendment to that effect.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The report is either in order or not in order. If it is in order, let it go; if it is not in order it can be ruled out.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—This is the easiest way to deal with it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It would involve considerable delay to have to replace it on the orders of the day.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I suppose we can let it go, with the understanding that it will not be a precedent.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (U) An Act to incorporate the Northern Quebec Colonization Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Tessier.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG.

Bill (V) An Act to amend the Dominion Lands Act.—Hon. Mr. Davis.

Bill (No. 67) An Act respecting the Improved Paper Machinery Company.—Hon. Mr. Kirchhoffer.

DELAYED RETURNS.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I should like to know when may I expect to get the return respecting the amount of school lands sold in the Northwest. I moved for it some time ago. I have a motion before the House, and cannot go on with it until I get the return.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I have not heard anything further about it; but I shall call the special attention of the Minister of the Interior to that return.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I should like to know what progress is being made with the preparation of a return I asked for some weeks ago relating to an inquiry that took place in Quebec in connection with immigration affairs?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I laid certain papers on the table of the House yesterday with respect to that.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is not the return that I asked for. I am speaking of a return that was ordered shortly after we reassembled in January. It relates to an inquiry that took place in consequence of complaints published in the Quebec 'Chronicle.'

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—If the hon. gentleman will send me a memorandum of the return he wants, I shall have an inquiry made about it.

SENATE DEBATES.

Hon. Mr. JONES—Before the orders of the day are called, I should like to know when we may expect to receive the revised copy of the debates of this House. I was looking for a revised copy of the debate which took place early in December with reference to the French treaty, and I am advised that it is not yet available.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—If my hon. friend will call the attention of the chairman of the Debates Committee to the subject, he will probably ascertain the cause of the delay.

Hon. Mr. JONES—The chairman of the Debates Committee is not here to-day, and I thought if I made the inquiry in this way I might get information on the subject. There are many people who are anxious to get copies of that report.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I will try and get hold of the proper authority and call his attention to the delay.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—We have the revised version up to the 2nd of December, but not later.

COST OF NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY RIGHT OF WAY.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

How much has the right of way for the Transcontinental railway cost in the counties of Lévis, Dorchester, Bellechasse, Montmagny, L'Islet, Kamouraska and Témiscouata, respectively?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The following information is supplied by the Transcontinental Railway Commission:

Lévis	$ 47,893 00
Dorchester	60,859 50
Bellechasse	28,329 78
Montmagny	27,110 26
L'Islet	21,593 72
Kamouraska	28,897 62
Témiscouata	23,152 33
Total	$237,836 21

The above amounts include the land, wood, removal of buildings and damages.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY DISMISSALS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved:

That an order of this House do issue for a statement showing, in so many distinct columns—

1. The names of all the employees of the Intercolonial railway who have been dismissed or who have resigned since the Intercolonial railway was put under the direction of the commission of that road.
2. The respective salaries of such employees.
3. The date of their appointment.
4. The date of their dismissal.
5. The number of the division or of the section of the railway where they were employed.
6. The domicile of such employees at the time of their dismissal?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—There is no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

THE INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA BILL.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN moved:

That rules 112 and 110 be suspended in so far as they relate to a petition proposed to be presented by John Boyd and others, of the city of Montreal, praying to be incorporated as The Insurance Company of Canada.

He said: I have a letter from the attorneys for the applicants for this Bill, which I should like to read to the Senate:

Re Insurance Co. of Canada.

Dear Senator Casgrain,—We have consulted our clients in regard to the objection made by Senator Cox to the proposed name of this company, and are authorized by them to consent, if necessary, to another name being substituted in committee, the name suggested by our clients being 'Laurentian Insurance Company.'

We would point out at the same time, that we are anxious to retain the name 'Insurance Company of Canada if possible, and would prefer that the change should not be made unless it should appear advisable in the interests of the Bill.

We may point out that, as this company is not asking for permission to do a life business, Senator Cox's objection is not well taken, and that moreover, as the Bill has been printed, and the other petitions signed under this name, a change at the present time would prove very inconvenient.

Yours very truly,
DAVIDSON & WAINWRIGHT.

The SPEAKER—One of the reasons why this motion was opposed was that the House expected some reason should be given for the delay in presenting the petition in due time.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I understood that would be discussed before the Standing Orders Committee, and if the applicants did not show good reason for delay, the committee would so report.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The motion made by my hon. friend is to suspend the rules in order that he may present a petition asking for leave to introduce the Bill. I do not see how a discussion on that point could take place here now. How does it come to us if there is opposition to the Bill?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—The senator from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Cox) rose in his seat the other day and asked that the name 'The Insurance Company of Canada' should not be used, because it might conflict with the name of the Canada Life.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This is another case of violation of the rules. Two or three months have elapsed since the opening of the session, and not the first step has been taken towards the introduction of the Bill under discussion. I doubt if the notices have been published. If a notice has appeared in the 'Canada Gazette,' it must have been in the last issue, and in that case, some three weeks must elapse before even the rule can be complied with and the Bill introduced. If the Bill reaches the Banking and Commerce Committee, however, it will be time enough to discuss that point. I make the same objection in this case that I did in a similar case two or three weeks ago. We should either adhere to our rules, or dispense with them altogether. The sooner we put a stop to these requests to suspend the rules, the sooner will we get our business done in a businesslike manner; I am opposed to the motion.

The motion was agreed to on a division.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

THE SPANISH RIVER RAILWAY WRECK.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Before the orders of the day are called, I should like to draw the attention of the House to a matter which is occupying the attention of the government, and which, I think, a great many people of this country would like the Senate to supplement or duplicate. The attention of the government has been called to the heroic conduct of one of the employees of the Canadian Pacific railway in the discharge of his duties in the lamentable wreck of the passenger train at Spanish river two or three weeks ago. I understand that the Prime Minister has accepted the invitation of the leader of the opposition in another place to bring the matter to the notice of the imperial authorities, and, if possible, secure for him imperial recognition in the way of obtaining a medal which is granted by His Majesty King Edward, for such heroic services. The members of this Chamber are just as appreciative of heroic and noble conduct as are the members of the other branch of parliament. When that conductor did his duty he did it as an officer of the company in charge of human life, and his bravery deserves recognition; but, while he was saving life, a lady from the Northwest, Mrs. H. A. Linall, of Winnipeg, a daughter of Mr. David Ward, of Toronto, showed remarkable self-sacrifice, devotion, coolness and bravery, unexampled in the history of our country, and probably in the history of any other country. The testimony comes, not from myself, because I did not see her acts of courage and devotion, but from the men with whom she laboured in the cause of humanity. When the wreck occurred, Mrs. Linall was in the Pullman car with her little child, a boy three or four years of age. When the car left the track and was rolling down the bank, she wrapped him between two cushions, and that was the means of saving his life. She was knocked senseless herself by a blow from a car fixture. After several minutes she came to her senses, and instead of crying for help or some one to relieve her pain, without even waiting to know if her child was safe—she only found him ten minutes afterwards—she devoted all her energy to the care of the wounded and dying. According to Irwin, the Pullman car conductor, who is equally worthy of recognition with conductor Reynolds in this matter, Mrs. Linall, instead of running away, took charge of the maimed, wounded and dying in the Pullman car, which was turned into a hospital for the time being. He tells how she took a little boy in her arms and cared for him. He had been badly wounded, his head almost smashed beyond recognition. He was so badly injured and so covered with blood that the conductor had to cut the clothes from him. She put him with her own boy on the seat, told them to be good, and passed the whole afternoon until dark in binding up the wounds and caring for those who had been injured in the accident. According to the conductor, Irwin, she used every shred of linen, blankets and mattresses in the car to bandage wounds, and, finally, when he brought one or two of the last victims, and there was no more linen in the car, she said, 'excuse me,' and when a few seconds later he looked around, he found her bandaging the wounded with her own apparel. There is enough gallantry in the Senate to recognize the heroic work of this woman, and I am sure the gallant knight who leads the House will join her name with those of the conductors and see that she secures recognition that will be imperial, because she is not only a woman of Canada, but has proved herself to be a valuable daughter of the empire.

Right Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I shall mention the matter that my hon. friend has brought up when the question is discussed in council.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 89) An Act respecting the Calgary and Edmonton Railway Company—Hon. Mr. Lougheed.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

NOTICE OF AMENDMENTS.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 85) An Act to amend the Criminal Code.

He said: I have drafted amendments to meet the objections which have been raised to this Bill. I wish to move the House into committee and submit the amendments, and if any objection should be raised to either of them, the committee can rise and sit at some future day; in the meantime the amendments will appear in the 'Minutes.'

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—It was understood that this Bill was to stand over until the hon. member from Calgary could be present.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I am not aware that there was any such understanding. The Bill has been on the orders for a fortnight, and, I think, with the amendments I am about to submit, there will be no objection to the measure.

The motion was agreed to, and the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—The amendments I propose are as follow:—

424c. No prosecution shall be entertained under section 424a unless it has been initiated and proceeded with by the manager or agent of a mining company, or by the owner of a mine claiming to have been defrauded of similar rock, ore or other substances to some one of those defined in said section 424a.

The other amendment is:

424d. This Act shall have no force or effect unless or until brought into operation by proclamation issued under the authority of the Governor in Council, and will then only apply to those provinces, or parts of a province, specifically defined in the said proclamation.

The object of the first amendment is that the prosecution may not be commenced by any individual informer, but only by the company officially itself. Then there was considerable objection to the Act going into force over the whole Dominion. The second amendment therefore is to limit the operation of the Act so that it will only go into effect on a proclamation issued by the Governor in Council, and then only in those provinces or parts of provinces that may be defined in the proclamation.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I would rather have the province of Saskatchewan cut out entirely. Yukon is outside of the application of the measure, and I do not see why Saskatchewan cannot be put in the same position.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—These amendments would give the Governor in Council very large and unusual powers.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY, from the committee, reported that some progress had been made with the Bill, and asked leave to sit again on Tuesday next.

LAURIE DIVORCE BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

Hon. Mr. GILLMOR moved the second reading of Bill (T) An Act for the relief of Archibald Laurie.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The Bill, as it reads, names the co-respondent, which is something new. If you look at the legislation of past years you will find no precedent for this Bill. For instance, in the session of 1906, you will find several Acts, in all of which, though the fact of the offence being committed is mentioned, the name of the co-respondent is not mentioned. You will find the same thing in the statutes of each year.

Right Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It was understood—and on the understanding some Bills have been allowed to stand over—the non-contentious business would be taken up this afternoon. I would therefore ask the hon. member in charge of this Bill to let it stand over until to-morrow.

The order was discharged and placed on the orders of the day for to-morrow.

MOND NICKEL COMPANY PATENT BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT moved the second reading of Bill (No. 92) An Act respecting the patent of the Mond Nickel Company (Limited). He said: The occasion of the Bill is the negligence of the agent of the company, which is an English corporation, to pay the fee to the Department of Agriculture for the extension of the patent. The Bill, when considered by the Committee of the House of Commons, was not objected to by the Minister of Agriculture or his deputy, who were present. It is merely for the purpose of allowing the applicants to pay the fee in order that they may get the extension which they would have been granted had not the party who was charged with paying the fee neglected to do so.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—In view of the fact that the Minister of Agriculture and the deputy minister of his department are opposed on principle to bills of this character, I think it would be better to let it stand until to-morrow.

The order of the day was discharged, and the second reading was fixed for to-morrow.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (W) An Act respecting the Ottawa, Brockville and St. Lawrence Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. McHugh.

Bill (X) An Act to incorporate the Protectorate Life Assurance Company of Canada.—Hon. Mr. McHugh.

Bill (Y) An Act to amend the Government Annuities Act of 1908.—Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

TRADE RELATIONS WITH GERMANY.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—Before the orders of the day are called, could the right hon. gentleman make a statement with regard to the reported arrangement of new trade relations with Germany?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I have laid several copies of the agreement on the table in order that hon. gentlemen might advise themselves more particularly of the details. I may say generally that the object of the agreement which is provisionally entered into between the Finance Minister and the Consul General of Germany, representing their respective governments, is to abolish the surtax which has been imposed up to the present time on German goods. In return therefor, the German government places a number of articles exported from Canada under their minimum tariff. The list of articles will be found in the papers I have submitted, and they comprise, I think, most of those which are of any considerable interest to Canada. They include many agricultural products, wheat, barley, oats, grass seed, fruits of various kinds, fresh and dried, &c., and certain other articles, which will be found more in detail in the papers that I have submitted. As hon. gentlemen are aware, that surtax was imposed in consequence of the German government penalizing Canada, or refusing to give Canada the consideration which it had formerly enjoyed in consequence of our granting a preference to the mother country. The effect of the present agreement, if carried out, will be, I think, to give us access to the German market for the various classes of articles we are likely to export to them in any quantity, and on the whole it will be found to be mutually beneficial.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I intended to put a somewhat similar question to that asked by my hon. friend from St. John, to the right honourable gentleman. Since I took my seat, a copy of the document has been laid on my desk. I have not had time or opportunity to examine the correspondence or the list of articles mentioned in the treaty which has been signed, I understand, by the Finance Minister of Canada and the Consul General of Germany in Montreal. But, looking at it, I notice there are very few, outside of footwear, of the manufactured articles of Canada included in this list. There may be others, but I have not had time to examine the document to ascertain. Might I ask whether the concessions, which have been made in this treaty, are confined entirely to the articles mentioned in the schedule accompanying this document, or whether we are to receive the benefits derived under the favoured nations clause that England enjoys in entering into the German market? Looking at the list of articles, the products of orchards and fields are included in this list; but I fail to see many important concessions to the manufacturing interests of this country. I can understand, knowing the protective policy of Germany, that manufactured articles which come at all in competition with articles manufactured in Germany would be excluded under this treaty; but if the same concessions are made to us outside of the articles mentioned, it would be a decided advantage to this country. I am sure that every one interested in the trade of Canada will be pleased to know that Germany has consented to make certain concessions, but they are in consideration, as I understand it, of the removal of the surtax from every article imported into Canada from Germany. I would ask the right hon. gentleman whether the view I have taken of the treaty and the documents before us is correct?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think the hon. gentleman is correct, and that the articles specified are the only ones that will benefit under the minimum tariff.

THE SPANISH RIVER WRECK.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Before the orders of the day are called, I would ask the indulgence of the House to say a word or two in reply to the question which was put to me yesterday by the hon.

gentleman from Victoria division (Hon. Mr. Cloran). He called the attention of the House to a recent act of gallantry performed by Mr. Reynolds, a conductor on the Canadian Pacific railway train recently wrecked at Spanish river, and inquired what the government were disposed to do in reference to that matter, and also with respect to the case of a certain lady, whose conduct on that occasion appeared to him, very justly, to have deserved high commendation. With respect to Mr. Reynolds, I am happy to inform him that several days ago—in fact within a very short time of the occurrence of the accident—my colleague, Mr. Murphy, Secretary of State, had forwarded to the imperial authorities full details of Mr. Reynold's gallant conduct, and I have no doubt in due time that we shall hear from the imperial authorities on the subject. As respects the lady in question, while I entirely appreciate the coolness and courage which she displayed on the occasion, and also the manner in which she devoted herself to the assistance of her less fortunate fellow passengers, I am doubtful whether it is one of those cases which, under the regulations, would come within the scope of the distribution of either the Albert or the Edward medals; but that matter can be further inquired into later on. In the meantime, he will be glad to know that everything we can do to ensure recognition of Mr. Reynold's conduct, has already been done by the Secretary of State.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I have simply to say on behalf of Mr. Reynolds, that I knew his case was safe in the hands of the lower House, and I expected that the lady, Mrs. Linall, under the circumstances, would, if it were possible, receive the same recognition, because her work on that occasion was, as has been stated, most extraordinary in the way of devotion and self-sacrifice, and I trust that the hope of the gallant knight who leads this House will be realized and that her merits, if not recognized by the imperial authorities, will be recognized by associations formed to do what they can to encourage those who risk their own health and their lives to save others.

Right Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

DELAYED RETURNS.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Before the orders of the day are called, I should like to ask the right hon. leader of the government in this House whether anything has been done in connection with a motion I made, and an order which was granted, for copies of letters patent issued?

Rt. Hon Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—If the hon. gentleman will give me a memorandum of the date, I will cause inquiries to be made.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS BRANCH LINES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (No. 17) An Act to authorize the government of Canada to acquire by lease, lines of railway connecting with the government railways. He said: The Bill, although one of importance, is one which does not require any long explanation. In fact, the title almost explains the object that the government had in view. The leader of the opposition inquired of me some time ago as to whether any, or what branch railroads, had made application or were being considered by the government. I am informed by the Department of Railways that this is a purely permissive Bill, and that no railroads have as yet applied for leave to come in under its terms, and, of course, it is not likely that anything will be done for some considerable time in any case. The House will note that the Bill does not propose to purchase, but simply to lease on payment of a certain percentage to be fixed on examination of the gross receipts which may accrue on any one of these railroads, and considerable precautions are being taken to prevent this feature being abused. In the first place, the proposition must emanate from the board of management of the railway, who must satisfy themselves that it would be to the advantage of the Intercolonial Railway system to lease any one of these subsidiary lines. It must then pass the ordeal of the Council, and, finally, the ordeal of both Houses of parliament. When we go into committee, of course, the question can be more fully discussed. In the meantime, I may add that the Bill appears to have passed the lower House unanimously. There is but little to add to the explanation I have made. As I have said, it is purely a permissive Bill, and is only intended to take effect where it is seen to be clearly to the advantage of the Intercolonial railway to acquire possession of some subsidiary line.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The proposition made by this Bill is to my mind of a serious character. I listened with considerable attention to the remarks of the right hon. gentleman in moving the second reading, where he pointed out what he conceives to be the safeguards in the acquiring of these branch lines, and the principal reason given for the belief that no lines would be purchased except those which would be feeders to the Intercolonial railway is based upon the presumption that the commission which manages the railway at the time would not recommend to the government the purchase of any lines other than those which would prove to be profitable feeders to the Intercolonial railway. My impression is that if the title of this Bill, and the preamble were changed a little, it would meet the views that I have upon the subject, and the results which I believe will follow from the acquisition of those branch lines. I notice the preamble says that the lines to be acquired by the government of Canada are 'lines of railway connecting with the government railways as feeders thereto and in connection therewith.' If that were changed to read as 'feeders on the revenue of the country at the expense of the people', I think it would be a more accurate statement than to say that they are to be feeders of the Intercolonial railway. The country has not yet been able to ascertain the financial results of acquiring certain roads in the maritime provinces and in Quebec on the expenditure and revenue of the Intercolonial railway. The only information I could secure on that point was that they have been an additional expense in the operation of the Intercolonial railway. I have tried on one or two occasions to ascertain the effect of acquiring that portion of the Grand Trunk railway from St. Rosalie to Montreal upon the earnings and expenditures of the Intercolonial railway, but have never been able to obtain the slightest information upon the question. On inquiry I was told that the officials were unable to lay a statement before parliament in compliance with the order of this House, because there was no separate account kept of the earnings or expenditures of that particular branch of the line. In acknowledging receipts and in charging expenditures, the accounts of the main line and branches were all lumped together, and they said it was impossible to furnish the information that I sought. If we could get details showing the results of the purchase of what is called the Canada Eastern railroad, we would be able to judge what the effect has been upon the earnings and expenditures of the Intercolonial railway. Every one knows that when the government acquired that road it was in a state of bankruptcy, that it was not safe to be operated by the individual who controlled it, and that a very large amount had to be expended on it in order to put it in condition for traffic. That is information which, I think, the country is entitled to, and if there is any probability of getting it, a motion should be made and an order issued for the return. We would then be in a better position to judge the effect of acquiring these branch lines. We all know that the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals has been a constant advocate of the acquisition of all these branch lines in the maritime provinces. Whether it is from a desire to extend government ownership to all public utilities I do not venture to say, but I believe if every branch line in the maritime provinces were acquired, the revenues would not equal the expenditures. My own view has been for a number of years, and more particularly since I spent three or four months in the Department of Railways while I was a member of the old government, and my conviction deepens with increasing years, that the sooner the government disposes of that road or places it under management independent altogether of political influences, the sooner will the receipts cover the expenditures. I have reason to know that since this government came into power offers have been made by private companies to acquire that road and pay a good handsome annual rental for it, pledging themselves at the same time not to increase the freight rates beyond what should be legitimately imposed. There is not a senator from the maritime provinces who has paid attention to the operation of that road that does not know it has been managed for political purposes. On the verge of an election contest in that part of the country hundreds of voters have been put on the pay-lists, and after the elections have been discharged. Under the circumstances, is it not time that those who have to pay the extra amount of debt incurred, in addition to the interest, should demand that steps be taken by which the Intercolonial railway should be made to pay at least running expenses? The result of placing the management of the railways of Australia under a young Canadian, who had experience of railway management in this country, has been attended with the best results. The roads having been removed from political influences dominating the governments of these colonies, are now so managed as to pay interest on the investment, and contribute to the revenue of the country. Until some such system is adopted in the management of our government roads they will continue to be an incubus on the revenue of the country.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Perhaps the hon. gentleman would be kind enough to read the summary which he has before him of the results of independent management in Australia.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The memorandum which I have before me is as follows:

The report of the Victorian (Australia) Railway Commissioners, of which Mr. Thomas Tait, formerly of the Canadian Pacific Railway staff, is chairman, continues to reflect the executive ability of the man from Canada. The blue-book giving details of operation, which is just to hand, is for the year ended June 30, 1909.

A noticeable feature of the report is the reduction which has been accomplished in the ratio of working expenses to gross revenue. For six years up to 1903 this was 59·83 per cent, while for the following six years this was reduced to 54·41 per cent. It is but natural that this ratio should be lower than Canadian railways can show, in view of the fact that they have no such winter climatic conditions to contend against or snow-fighting apparatus to maintain.

During the past fiscal year the Victorian railways earned $20,332,840, while the working expenses, including a special payment of $340,519 to railway accident and fire insurance fund, were $11,725,535, giving a net revenue of $8,607,305. After the payment of interest charges, pensions, gratuities, &c., there was a surplus of $143,837 creditable to consolidated revenue. For the past six years the amount placed to credit of consolidated revenue was $3,779,047, while for the preceding six years, that is from 1897 to 1903, there was a deficit of $7,767,537 paid out of that fund.

The gross revenue for the past six years showed an increase of $22,4443,685, compared with the previous six years, with an increase for the corresponding period of $7,394,866 in working expenses. The balance of net revenue in six years likewise showed an advance of $12,431,810.

A noticeable feature of the portion of the report which compares the two periods of six years in the operation of the system is the increase in the number of passengers carried. The commission now operates 3,414·91 miles of track, which is but a comparatively small increase over the past few years and for the past six years there was an increase in the number of passengers carried of 99,974,678, the total handled in that period being 405,170,581. There was also a large increase in the number of tons of goods carried.

This is a synopsis of the official document laid before the Australian parliament. It is an illustration of what might, I believe, to a certain extent, if not the fullest extent, be attained if the Intercolonial railway and its feeders were placed under the independent management of a gentleman well versed in railway management, instead of remaining under the guidance of a commission which must to a greater or lesser extent be dominated by politicians and the government of the day. I was somewhat surprised at the remarks of the Minister of Railways, reported recently in Montreal, in which he used this expression:

The chief drawback to the Intercolonial is that the details of all expenditures are made public. Every little tender is made public, and the contractors get a chance to force up the price. In Germany these details are not given, and the management is able to get an advantage in buying. Give us less publicity and we can make the Intercolonial pay, and pay handsomely.

What does that mean? Does he want to prevent the prices paid under contract from being made public? That would only occur after the contracts are given out. The terms of the contract are not published to the world until after they are received by the government officials. Why, then, should the Minister of Railways ask for secrecy in the management of a public work like the Intercolonial railway? That is something I cannot understand. Looking at this whole question as it is presented to us to-day by the leader of this House, we have a proposition made to give the government power, through the commission, to acquire all the—shall I say useless—branch railways that exist in the maritime provinces. Why should the maritime provinces have their roads owned by the government and run at a cost much greater than the receipts, while other lines in the Dominion are operated by private companies, and the people, for all the advantage they receive, have to pay the highest passenger and freight rates, regulated, of course, by the Railway Commission? I have had very little experience in the management of the Railway Department, only three or four months, but I began to get an inkling of the working of the Intercolonial some years ago, and I hesitate not to say that even then—and it has been intensified ever since—there were actions, particularly in the matter of contracts, where they were dealt with only by the minister and his officials, which would not bear the light of day, and when they did come to light the political effect which followed was of an extraordinary character. I will give one illustration. It came under my notice—I am not going to say on what part of the Intercolonial railway this occurred—that a foreman had been accused and proved guilty of stealing ties, lumber and hardware. He was suspended and ultimately dismissed. A deputation waited on me and demanded his reinstatement. I positively declined. The answer was: 'If this man is not restored to his former position the Conservatives will lose the county.' I said: 'If the Conservative party could not retain power without condoning a theft, they had better lose the county,' and they did lose the county. I give that as an illustration of how the management of the Intercolonial railway is attempted to be swayed. This has been going on continually, until we find a great public work which has cost us some eighty or ninety million dollars going behind every year to the extent of thousands, yes, millions of dollars. A surplus is claimed for last year of $6,000. That was done three or four years ago, but unless I am much mistaken, before another couple of years roll around you will find deficits occurring again. I would not give the power to any government to acquire branch lines to be used as feeders to the Intercolonial railway, and which would prove a source of loss instead of a source of revenue. My impression is that if a proposition of that kind were made by other than those in power, we would hear the stentorian voice of my hon. friend opposite denouncing it in stronger terms than I could use. But political influences are exercised to such an extent at the present time that scarcely any government has the courage to grapple with the question as I think it ought to be.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—The object which the government may have in view in introducing this measure as it is presented to the House, does not appear very clear. I can hardly understand why it is necessary by Act of parliament to give the government and the Minister of Railways authority to enter into negotiations for acquiring or leasing the branch lines of the Intercolonial railway. They have undoubtedly this power at the present time without any special Act of parliament for that purpose.

The other provisions of the Bill which are intended to operate as safeguards in any transactions of this kind that may be entered into, provides that the chief engineer of the Department of Railways and Canals shall first certify that the roads are in good and safe condition for operation, and the managing board and said engineer shall operate any such line or lines of railway as a part of the government railways. These are preliminary precautions which I imagine any prudent minister, under any circumstances, would be sure to take before entering into any arrangement for either the purchase or lease of a railway, and it is rather difficult to understand why, in this instance, it is necessary to surround the Minister of Railways with these unusual safeguards by Act of parliament. The hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House suggested some change in the wording of the Bill. It occurred to me that if this Bill had been called, 'an Act to limit the powers of the government, and the Minister of Railways with regard to the acquisition of branch lines', it would have been a more suitable title than the one which it has at the present time.

The preamble states as a reason for the introduction of this measure, that it is desirable that the traffic of the Intercolonial railway should be increased, and it proposes to accomplish that end by the acquisition of these branch lines. There is no question as to the first proposition, that the traffic should be increased. The second one may be more debatable in its nature. The branch lines of the Intercolonial railway at the present time are feeders to that railway. I can understand how in any country where there were two rival lines of railway, that each of those rival lines would consider it to their advantage to build or purchase branch lines, or acquire control of them in order that they might secure for their own line the transportation of any traffic originating in the adjacent country, and prevent it being diverted to their rivals; but it must be borne in mind that the position of the Intercolonial railway is very different from that of competing lines in other sections of the country. It has an actual monopoly of the railway traffic of the country through which it runs, and the branch lines of railway connecting with it are obliged to transfer all the freight they have which is not purely local traffic to and from that railway. I am glad to be able to refer to a valuable report which was made by the commission appointed by the province of New Brunswick to examine the branch lines of the province and report to the government with regard to them. This commission confirms what I have just said. It is dated December 18, 1907, and deals with nine branch lines.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—Who are the commissioners?

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Mr. T. M. Burns, and Mr. Gillmor Brown. In this report it is stated that from 1901 to 1906 inclusive there were 419,893 passengers carried on these 9 branches. During the same period there were 1,097,218 tons of freight carried by these branches. They then remarked that:

> When we consider that nearly all this freight, amounting to more than a million tons in six years, and a large percentage of the 419,893 passengers were hauled over the Intercolonial railway in going to and from these branch lines, and when we further consider that in nearly all cases the Intercolonial gets a long haul for all this traffic, we begin to realize the value of the business that these branch lines as feeders give to the Intercolonial Railway.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—What was the mileage of the 9 branch lines?

Hon. Mr. WOOD—The total mileage was 301,410. In view of this report it does not appear to me very apparent what advantage would be gained by transferring the ownership from the companies that now operate them to the government.

There is another part of this report, however, which may have influenced the government in adopting this policy. The report upon the operation of the roads gives these figures: In 1901 six out of the nine branch railways showed deficits, and three showed surpluses. In 1906 this condition was exactly reversed. Six out of the nine showed a surplus and three showed a deficit. I should remark that two of these three last mentioned roads were very short lines, only 8 and 10 miles respectively, and had a very small and unimportant traffic, so there is really only one branch line of any importance which showed a deficit in 1906. In 1901 the operation of the nine branch lines, that is taking the aggregate, showed a deficit of $3,764. In 1906 this deficit was wiped out and a surplus of $10,650 earned, which is certainly a gratifying result, and shows a prosperous condition of affairs.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—That would be merely the running expenses? It did not take the bonds into consideration, I suppose?

Hon. Mr. WOOD—No, I should think not. Looking at this report, we might naturally infer that the acquisition of these lines would be desirable from the government point of view, in order that the deficits that the Intercolonial railway has shown for the same period might be, to a small extent at least, lessened. As a business proposition it would occur to me that a Bill which would authorize the branch lines to acquire the Intercolonial railway would have very much to commend it.

Hon. GENTLEMEN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—For I think I am safe in saying if the same care had been exercised in the management of the Intercolonial railway, instead of showing deficits, it would show a gratifying surplus during the period which this report covers.

There are, however, reasons which might be brought forward in support of this measure, and they are the reasons which are generally referred to in the press of the maritime provinces by those who favour the adoption of this policy generally. It is claimed that if the branch lines of the Intercolonial railway were acquired by the government, they would be put in better condition, that money would be spent in raising the road bed, to a higher standard, that various improvements would be made along the lines, such as increased siding accommodation, and matters of that kind, that through railway rates would be established, avoiding the double local rates which are now sometimes charged, and thus the cost of transportation would be lessened, and in a general way the rolling stock would be improved, and a better service rendered. That is no doubt true. Public opinion under government ownership would demand changes of this kind, and expenditures of this character, and I have not the least doubt, whatever government is in power, sufficient political influence will be brought to bear to secure these results, and for this reason I have no hesitation in saying that the change in ownership proposed in this Bill will be welcomed, not only by the owners of the roads, but by the population which they serve; but I must at the same time express my fears that the change of ownership, instead of decreasing the deficits of the Intercolonial railway, would involve some additions to the capital account, and probably in their operation they would contribute their quota to the annual deficits. These branch lines have done a useful work in the province of New Brunswick. They have been subjected to criticism at times in the press, and by some of the patrons who think that the condition of the roads is not in all respects what it should be, and that the service is not as good as should be given by them. This is very liable to result when they compare the services of the branch lines with the services on the Intercolonial railway. We cannot give as good service on the branch lines in a province like New Brunswick as is given on the Intercolonial railway. It cannot be expected. These lines have been built very largely with the aid of Dominion and provincial subsidies. The capital invested in them has been invested rather by those who have an interest in the country and desire to see railway communication established in remote parts, which would help to develop the resources and contribute to the prosperity of the people; and while they have not been, and are not able, and cannot be expected to give as good a service as is given on the Intercolonial railway, they have at the same time given the best service their circumstances have permitted, and the best service that the volume and character of the traffic would warrant. I am very glad that I am sustained in this view also by a paragraph in the report to which I have already referred, and with the permission of the House I will read it. This is the closing paragraph of the report:

> Apart from their value to the Intercolonial as feeders these lines of railway have been of incalculable benefit to the localities which they serve and to the province at large. What the country would do without them is best illustrated by the consternation that prevails when one of them closes down for a day or two. Their successful operation is of a great benefit to the people of the province and any money which has been put into them by the government in the way of subsidies has been much more than repaid in the increased value of property in the districts which they serve and in the increased business and prosperity of the country at large; due in a great measure to their existence.

The hon. gentleman from Hastings (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell) referred to a change of policy with regard to the management of the Intercolonial railway, and I should like to say a few words on that subject. I think it arises from a consideration of the Bill before us. To those who have been in the Senate for the last few years, it is well known that I have never favoured the extension of the Intercolonial railway. I have held the opinion for many years that it was impossible to conduct the management of a government railway like the Intercolonial railway on business principles. The last speaker referred to political influences which had been brought to bear upon him, when acting as Minister of Railways, I believe that it is utterly impossible to prevent political influence being brought to bear and political power from being exercised upon the management of a government railway, and such exercise of power undoubtedly leads to extravagance and loss, very often, I regret to say, the result of dishonesty, corruption and fraud; but a loss which to a certain extent paralyses the management of the railway and utterly destroys the relations which should exist, and under other circumstances, would exist between the income and expenditure.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Is my hon. friend referring to the Intercolonial railway now?

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Yes.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—During the term of the present government or of the late government?

Hon. Mr. WOOD—My remarks would apply to the Intercolonial railway from its first construction.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—It is very bad that such a state of affairs should have existed.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I am aware of it, and regret it very much. To confirm what I have said, I shall merely refer to the experience of the last few years. In 1898-9 the Drummond County railway was purchased and the Intercolonial railway was extended to the city of Montreal. It was claimed by the Minister of Railways at that time, and by those who supported that measure, that the advantages to be gained from that extension would be so great that it would place the road upon a paying basis, that the era of deficits would be at end, and the Minister of Railways, in the first proposition which he presented to parliament, estimated that the profitable results from that extension would be so great that he would be not only able to equalize all expenditures and receipts, but that he would have a surplus which, in the course of time, would pay the whole cost of that extension, and he proposed to form a sinking fund from the surplus for that purpose. I do not question for one moment the sincerity of the Minister of Railways, or any one else who supported that proposition, at that time. He was supported by the opinion of men who should be in a position to express opinions of value upon that subject. It was supported by a statement that was presented in the House over the signature of the chief engineer of railways at the time, Mr. Collingwood Schreiber, and in that statement he estimated that the earnings of the Intercolonial railway, as the result of that extension, would be increased by something like a million dollars annually. He estimated that for the first year after they had the extension completed to Montreal, there would be an additional traffic of upwards of $900,000, and after making what he considered a liberal allowance for operating expenses and additional cost for this extension, he estimated there would be a net profit of half a million dollars. This was regarded at the time, no doubt, by almost every person acquainted with such matters, as a reasonable statement, and I so regard it even to-day. I believe that any private railway, under similar circumstances, that had obtained access to a great commercial centre like Montreal, would in their operations have realized the results which the chief engineer predicted would follow that extension. Every person acquainted with business matters, although he is not a railway expert, knows the very great advantages which must result to any railway system to have access to a great commercial centre like the city of Montreal. It brings the management in contact with the leading business men of the country. It places them in a better position to secure their fair share of the traffic which originates in that great city, and more than that, it places them in a position where they can exert their energies usefully and successfully in creating new traffic, if they chose to do so. These results, in the case of a private company, should have followed, and I believed would have followed an extension of that character. Now that estimate of results, and the actual results, bear a very striking contrast. It is gratifying to know that the increase of business which Mr. Schreiber anticipated has been realized. There has been a very rapid growth of business on the Intercolonial railway during the time that has intervened between the acquisition of the Drummond County railway and the present time. I find, from the report of the Minister of Railways for the present year, that the traffic receipts previous to the acquisition of the Drummond County railway were about $3,000,000. They increased, until in 1908-9, they amounted to about $9,000,000. Unfortunately, in the case of the Intercolonial, the working expenses have increased in the same ratio as the increase of traffic receipts. The working expenses in 1896-7 were practically $3,000,000—a few dollars less. In 1908-9 they exceeded nine million dollars. These figures show that the Intercolonial railway, in common with other railways, and in common even with the branch lines in the province of New Brunswick, have had an increased traffic resulting from the increased population and business, and the general growth and prosperity of the country. In this respect, their experience has been similar to that of other railways, but it is in this respect alone. The results of their operations during this period, instead of showing a profit, as they should have shown, showed an aggregate deficit amounting to something over three and a half million dollars.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENY—During what time?

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Since 1898—about eleven years. But in addition to this, there have been during that time enormous expenditures on the Intercolonial railway on capital account. A reference to the report shows that during the period the expenditures on capital account have exceeded $35,000,000. This is more than one-third of the whole cost of the railway, the construction cost amounting up to the present time to a little more than ninety million dollars. This expenditure is said to have been necessary in order to raise the condition of the road up to a high standard, in order to acquire new and improved modern rolling stock, in order to equip the road in every respect, to enable it to handle its traffic quickly and economically, and yet with all this expenditure, and with a road equipped as well, I believe, as any road of the Dominion, and with every facility for doing business, we have the unfortunate results to which I have just referred. These are cold facts taken from the report of the Minister of Railways, and in view of those facts I am rather confirmed in my opinion—I certainly do not feel I have any reason to revise my opinion in regard to the desirability of having our railways run as government railways. I am at a loss to see how any reasonable person can by any sophistry of argument convince himself that the management of the government railways has been in this case a conspicuous success.

There is one other feature of this question to which I wish to allude before I take my seat, and that is a feature in regard to which the opinions that I may express will, I presume, be opposed to the public opinion generally entertained throughout this country. It is my opinion that the Intercolonial railway as a government owned railway has not exerted the influence which a railway under company management could and would have exerted upon the business life and activities of the country. From the very fact that it is a government railway, it is hampered in its operations, and the scope of its activities is limited. From the fact that the management are government employees, they cannot identify themselves as they otherwise might with the business life of the country. To illustrate what I mean by this reference, let me draw your attention to the matter of tourist travel. We know that along the Atlantic coast from Maine to Florida there are numbers of seaside resorts, that many of these have been established by the railway companies, more of them have been made popular through the influence of the railway companies, and that hundreds of thousands of tourists throng these resorts every year during the summer season. Railway companies also have built and own and manage some of the best hotels in the principal cities. They have also built hotels in the mountains, by the lakes, and in other places where people desire to resort for pleasure or health. These are of such a character that they do not yield sufficient profit to induce any private persons to invest their capital in such underakings. The railway companies are able and willing to invest capital in such enterprises because, although they bring but a small return directly for the capital invested, they give to the railways themselves a good return in a very profitable class of traffic which they create. I noticed in one of the papers only this week an article calling attention to the action of the New York Central railway in this connection. It was stated in that article that the railway corporation had purchased a number of old worn out and abandoned farms along their line. Their object in purchasing these was, as we all know, not because they wished to go into the farming business either for profit or pleasure, but it was stated they had looked carefully into the matter, and the management had decided that they could purchase these farms, and invest sufficient money to restore their fertility, and that they expected after this was done to sell them to a class of prosperous farmers who would afterwards become valuable patrons of the railway. The Canadian Pacific railway, I am informed, is doing something similar to this in the Northwest. I understand they are building cottages and breaking up the land, and sowing seed in certain places with a view of having properties of this character to offer to intending settlers that may come from Europe or the United States, or from the eastern provinces of the Dominion, so that they could find a home ready for them, and the very first year they settled in the country obtain from the crops the soil would yield them a profit on their investments. That same railway by a system of irrigation which it has established, is converting millions of acres of waste land in the Northwest into valuable farms. They have in addition to this placed their steamers on the lakes, and contributed to a very large extent in building up such places as Fort William, Owen Sound, Depot Harbour, and other cities on the lakes. They have also their lines of ocean steamers which have developed to a large extent an important traffic with European and Asiatic ports, and which have exerted a very important influence in adding to the commercial importance as a seaport of the city of Vancouver, and they have also, I am glad to say, made our city of St. John in the province of New Brunswick, the winter port of the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—I thought Halifax was the winter port?

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I will make that one before I get through. Now, while the government railway may be in every respect a first-class road, it cannot go outside its limited sphere of action to enter into business transactions of this kind. It is obliged to confine its work to the business of transportation, and it is impossible for the management of a government railway, from the very nature of the case, to identify themselves to the same extent as the management of the company railway can with the agricultural, commercial and manufacturing interests of the country. The very fact that they are employees of the government, and paid by the government prohibits this.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—Does the hon. gentleman think that the Canadian Pacific railway will build hotels in Scott Act counties? They would not waste their money. They could not keep a hotel 25 hours in a Scott Act county, and in New Brunswick, twelve out of the fourteen counties are under the Scott Act.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I am not able to give the hon. gentleman the views of the Canadian Pacific railway on the Scott Act. I do not know whether they support that measure or not; but if they have objections to Scott Act counties, there are places in the maritime provinces where they might conduct a hotel business which would permit of selling refreshments of the kind the Scott Act prohibits. However, I merely wish to say we will never get the full benefit of the natural advantages we have in the maritime provinces. We will never have the full development of our resources. Never have that keen life infused into our business centres which characterizes the business life of the present day, we will not have out interprovincial trade developed to the extent that it otherwise might be, and I feel confident that we can never get our legitimate share of the export and import trade until these great railway systems, which extend across this continent, and control to so large an extent the whole traffic of this Dominion, have extended their operations, and their influence, to the city of Halifax and to our other important seaports, and chief business centres.

The practical question which arises in connection with this subject is how this can be best accomplished. The last speaker suggested that something might be done by placing the railway in the hands of an independent commission. That, however, in my opinion would be largely open to the objections which I have urged, or the limitations which I have just complained of, and which apply to railways operated directly by the government. It would be subject to the same limitations if it was operated by means of a commission. I have suggested on other occasions when this subject was under consideration, that the Intercolonial railway should be used for the purpose of extending these other railway systems through the maritime provinces. I have advocated that the other railways of the country—the larger lines, and the smaller too if they wish it, should be given running rights over the Intercolonial on equal terms, and I believe that these terms should be very liberal and generous in their character. Consider for a moment the advantages that such a proposition would afford. The importance of reducing the cost of transportation, especially in the maritime provinces, that is for through traffic to the maritime provinces. must be at once admitted. I believe it can be accomplished in this way—that it can be reduced to a minimum. We must not forget, in the zeal which most of us have for the construction of new railways, that, where one railway is sufficient to accommodate the traffic between two different points, the construction of a second line will not lessen, but practically double, the cost of transportation. When the National Transcontinental railway is completed, and open for traffic between Quebec and Moncton, it must be obvious to any one that, if the traffic, which would otherwise go over the Intercolonial railway, is divided between the two, the cost of transportation must be very considerably increased, and, if you build another line, the cost of transportation will be further increased in like proportion. Unless the Intercolonial railway can be used as a common highway for these other roads, I see no alternative, if we are to have the larger railway systems extended to the maritime provinces at all, by which it can be accomplished, but by the construction of independent lines. Now, what does that involve? These lines must necessarily depend largely upon Dominion subsidies for their construction, and that would involve very considerable capital expenditure. There would be a certain amount of private capital invested, and this would have the effect of creating fixed charges, either in the shape of interest on bonds, or dividends on stock. Then you would have two or more lines of railway to maintain instead of one, and the cost of the equipment, and the cost of operating staff would be increased in the same proportion. This can be all avoided if the proposition which I venture to submit to the House could be adopted. I would suggest, and I intend my remarks to convey that impression to the House, that the terms of any arrangements made for this purpose should be generous towards the company lines; that interest on the capital expenditure, which has been made on account of the Intercolonial railway, should not be taken into consideration; that no fixed charges of that character should be created; and that the terms upon which traffic arrangements should be conducted would be with a view only to preserve an equilibrium between the revenue and the expenditure, and maintain in a first-class condition the road itself. This would not only do away with the deficits we have been talking about, but it would at the same time give the very minimum cost of transportation. I believe that the proposition is in some respects a novel one. I am not aware that the same conditions exist elsewhere in this country, or in any other country. They could not exist here, if it were not for the fact that the country built and owned the railroad, and we have it as a government railroad, and are therefore in a position to enter into an arrangement of this kind.

There are one or two matters to which I wish to refer for a moment. It may be urged by some that the building of independent lines through the different sections of the province would tend to develop other parts of the country which would not otherwise have railway accommodations. That, if true at all, is true in this case only to a very limited extent. Any other lines of railway connecting Montreal or Quebec with the maritime provinces, must traverse practically the same territory as those now existing or in course of construction, and there is no necessity under any circumstances, in my opinion, of burdening through traffic with the cost of the development of new territory. This can be very much more easily and economically accomplished in the maritime provinces by the construction of branch lines, and no one can doubt that branch lines would be built to any section of the country remote from the main line where there were natural resources worth developing, or where there was a population or traffic that would warrant the outlay. It may also be said that the traffic in the future might be greatly increased, and that one railway would not be sufficient to accommodate it. I do not propose to discuss that now. It will be time enough to meet that difficulty when it comes. The Intercolonial railway is not at the present time overburdened with through traffic. It has scarcely any traffic of that class at all. We have the Canadian Pacific railway which touches the Intercolonial at St. John, and in a few years we will have the National Transcontinental railway, which will connect with the Intercolonial at Moncton. These with the Intercolonial railway itself will be sufficient for many years to come to accommodate all the traffic of the country as far as that section of the country is concerned. With regard to the remainder of the distance, I believe any increased traffic which we may expect in the near future, can be provided for by double tracking the Intercolonial, where it is required, and make such other improvements as may be found necessary. It is not improbable that it would be prudent to build in some sections a cut-off for the purpose of improving the grade, or possibly shortening the distance. These, however, are all questions of detail, and there are several others, such as the policy that should be adopted with regard to handling of local traffic. I consider it would not be wise to enter into any discussion of these details now. I do not see any questions that could not be solved. I do not see any difficulties in the way which could not be overcome, and I believe that this is a simple and sane solution of the transportation problem in the eastern provinces of the Dominion. I only wish on the present occasion to press this matter on the attention of the government, and I hope they will consider it worthy of their consideration. I would like to impress upon them the great importance which I believe it to be that the great railway companies should be induced to extend their systems to the seaports, and the business centres of the maritime provinces. I believe there is no way by which it can be done so easily and economically as the way I have suggested, and I should like to ask the government to give it serious attention, and to consider the small outlay it will involve, and the very great economy that will be effected in the cost of transportation. I believe the result would be to greatly increase the volume of business and general prosperity of the people of the maritime provinces.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I was very much pleased to hear the eloquent speech delivered by my hon. friend from Westmorland. He always speaks to the point. He sets out what he has to say, and speaks, I have no doubt, in the very best interest of his country and of his province. It has always been his history. We must all entirely agree with him. It is rather a rambling discussion. It starts from a little Bill to assist the government in acquiring branch lines of railways connecting with the Intercolonial railway. My hon. friend from Hastings took a very serious line, and I hardly think that he considered what he was saying, because he started with an attack on the Intercolonial railway. I do not think he intended that. He said it was conducted with waste, dishonesty, corruption and fraud, which are very strong words to use. To whom does he attach those charges? He calls on the government, at the last moment, to adopt his remarks and suggestions; but at the same time he accuses them of corruption and fraud. What confidence can we have in an administration that will admit waste, dishonesty, corruption and fraud? And, as my hon. friend says, this proposition increases their area of operation in that direction. I hardly think my hon. friend considered the import of his words when he used them. Does he apply these remarks to Mr. Pottinger, a life long servant of the government? Does he attach them to the new commission, only lately established and to the late Minister of Railways or the Minister of Railways when the Conservatives were in power in another place, whom he had the honour and pleasure to serve under? Who has been dishonest? If my hon. friend knew of these doings during all this time was it not his place to have called attention to them in this House, and followed the matter up? When we are considering a Bill which is going to be for the benefit of New Brunswick, is he going to draw a herring across the trail? I should like my hon. friend to tell me who were the dishonest party corruptionists and those who committed the frauds. It is a broad statement to make. It is made before the country in a place where men cannot defend themselves, the members of the late administration, of the present administration and the commission, because the fraud, if practised in the past, is still being practised.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If my hon. friend will read the report of the investigation at Halifax and Quebec before Judge Cassels he will obtain all the information he wants.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—The hon. gentleman will find that all those gentlemen were Conservatives, appointed by the late government.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Was that the time my hon. friend was a Conservative?

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I was a Conservative up to 1882. The country knows it. I did not leave the Conservative party when they were down in the ditch, and had but thirty men to support them. I stood by them when they were down, and I was with them when they came back with a majority of sixty or ninety or whatever it was, and it was then I had a difference with Sir Charles Tupper and with the administration. I left them 28 years ago. That would be a long enough time for repentance, if repentance were necessary. I could point to hon. members in this House who were in the same position. I do not think my hon. friend can say I did not bear true allegiance to the Conservative party when I served them. I was there to fight for them when they required me. When they were returned to power with a large majority they did not have me so bound that I could not hold an opinion of my own, and could not speak for the country as the country required to be spoken for according to my views. I do not think my record requires any apology, and I am proud to make the explanation. I am proud to say that since the present government came into power, if I ever had any misgivings—which I did not have—their efforts in the development of Canada have justified my conversion. I did not join the Liberal party in power but when they were struggling in opposition. I do not think anybody will gainsay the fact that the administration of Sir Wilfrid Laurier has been a perfect success and has been carried out to the best advantage of Canada; and, under such circumstances, I do not think any gentleman should be ashamed of ranking as one of his supporters. In this attack on the Intercolonial railway, what does my hon. friend suggest? I want to talk with frankness. He says the management of the road should be practically independent. Perhaps he is right. Things are advancing very rapidly, with the great west country being built up, and St. John being a winter port terminus. I do not desire to place my opinion against the opinion of everybody. It may possibly be that it would be the best thing for the country if the railway should be run in some way that would give equal privileges to everybody from Moncton to Halifax and St. John; that is to say, that the road would be common to all railways to both these ports. The people have not made up their minds that they would like it. They have to be educated up to it; but if they could be assured that the government had put such safeguards around it that they would not be imposed upon in regard to freight, that there would be a saving to the country, and that from a practical standpoint, the road would be administered in a better way than it is to-day—in fact that all they would have to face would be the question as to who would manage it, the problem would soon be solved. Few are interested in who manages the road. They are interested in having it a good road, which will serve the public. My hon. friend said that, transportation had to be built up and encouraged. I entirely agree with him. I do not think his comparison between the Canadian Pacific railway and the Intercolonial railway is a good one, because the Canadian Pacific railway passes through a new country. Every wheat field they opened up, and every line they constructed, as the country developed, brought in feeders to the main arteries. That condition could not exist with us. The question is how we are going to make those branch roads not only remunerative as feeders of the Intercolonial railway, but also so safe and comfortable that the public can travel over them. Aside from the question of the administration of the Intercolonial on party lines, there is this consideration; a man shall be able to travel on any of these railways as safely, expeditiously and with as great comfort as on the main line, and why? The country pays for those lines. The federal government gave a grant, and the local government also gave a grant. In those days, in their judgment they did not think it was well to make them part of the Intercolonial railway; but they saw that those branch lines had to be assisted, in order to open up the territory. We have a fine road in the Intercolonial railway. Who will deny that it is a good road. It is hardly worth while to discuss the main line of the Intercolonial railway because it is not now before us. If the government should determine that a different policy has to be inaugurated in regard to the great traffic from the west down to the seaports of the east; that all these roads should meet in Moncton, and from there to St. John or Halifax, the Intercolonial should be common to them all without injury to those who lived along the line of railway or who are now employed, it will no doubt meet with favourable consideration. That is the question that will come up. I am not prepared to say it would not be the best course; but there would have to be ample guarantee given to the public that that line constructed as a part of the terms of confederation, should be properly safeguarded. With that proposition before them, the public generally would say that it would be probably the best policy to adopt. When such a proposition comes before us we shall be in a position to discuss it. Nova Scotians can take their own view, but I contend that those branch roads should be taken over by the government. The Bill says:

> Whereas it is expedient that the traffic of the government railways be developed and increased to the fullest capacity of the system's operation; and whereas it is deemed that such traffic, development and increase can be facilitated and advanced by the acquisition, by the government of Canada, of lines of railway connecting with the government railways, as feeders thereto and in connection therewith: therefore His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:—

There is the idea of developing the country. If you have a road that is only running half the time, or if you have engines that cannot give accommodation to millmen, the road is ineffective and practically useless to everybody. This Bill would obviate that. It further says that the road must be in a good safe condition. That is right. Speculators own some of these roads, and these gentlemen might want to sell them to the government. Under the clause I have read, the road must be in proper order. One of the roads owned by gentlemen in New York was sold for some $75,000. I refer to the Harvey and Salisbury branch. Some people will not travel on that road, because it is not safe. It was sold at a sheriff's sale. According to the return, it is some 43 or 45 miles long. Is the government to be asked to take that over at $10,000 a mile, which would be $450,000, when it was sold for $75,000? The government says to these gentlemen: We are prepared to relieve you of that road on a proper basis. If that road will pay three per cent per annum on a limited amount of bonds, we are prepared to guarantee the interest at three or three and one-half per cent, or to give you a percentage of the gross earnings; but before we undertake any such proposition as that, you must put your road in good safe condition for operation not leave it to us to do. I think that might apply to a good many railways. There may be gentlemen with speculative ideas who think that this Bill would open the door for them to get rid of these roads. Whether the Bill has to be amended or not, the government have in mind what we all want, that the people in the outlying districts, on the hundreds of miles of branch railways, should have proper transportation, that their lives should be just as safe on these roads as a man's life is safe on other roads, and when the government granted them so much a mile—not the present government—and when the local government granted them so much money, it was a guarantee to the people who bought bonds and debentures that the government considered them good roads, or they would not have invested their money in them. The engines on the Intercolonial to-day are not the engines they had a few years ago. The objectionable curves and grades have been got rid of. These branch lines are not suitable for the large mogul engines, and heavy tonnage. We must consider what shape these roads are now in, and what shape they will be put in. I think that covers the argument of my hon. friend in regard to the branch roads. I know he is as anxious as I am that the people should have good accommodation. The fact that a man lives on a certain branch down there, is no reason why he should not be treated in the same way as the people who reside along the main line. What are we considering? Not an attack on the Intercolonial railway, when there is nobody here to defend it. I do not suppose the government would consider themselves called upon to defend the road in 1896, or previously. They can only point out that the people of the maritime provinces have just as much right to be considered as the people in the west, and I am satisfied, when the time comes, and it is pointed out that those roads are to be taken over by the Intercolonial railway and put in proper shape, that the passenger and freight rates will be greater over them than at present, and that they would not be imposed upon because the roads have been taken out of the hands of the companies, and handled in a practical manner, the well thinking people of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia on both sides of politics will gladly fall into line, in regard to such a course as the government may inaugurate in that direction.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I regret very much that the government have considered it their duty to bring in this Bill at all. For my part, during the seventeen or eighteen years during which I held a seat in the House of Commons, I voted continuously against the taking in of branch lines of the Intercolonial railway and further additions by the construction of new branches. We had quite an experience, for instance, with the St. Charles branch out from Point Levis. We know that that was a cesspool of iniquity from the beginning to the end. There was evidence before the Committee of the House that the grossest frauds had been practised by parties at Point Levis in the purchase of terminal accommodations, and in the matter of settling claims for damages caused by flooding lands along the line. Then take that new branch that was built from Oxford to New Glasgow. Sir Charles Tupper introduced the Bill for the construction of that branch with an amount of eloquence and forcible argument, such as he was capable of using, and persuaded the House, and his followers especially, that it would virtually vitalize the whole system. He pointed out that the grades from New Glasgow to Stellarton were so steep that an engine could only draw ten or eleven cars on that particular section, and that by the construction of the Oxford and New Glasgow branch the line would be shortened by twenty miles, while the grades would be the minimum grades on any road. It would open up a very large coal trade between Quebec, Montreal and New Glasgow, and would virtually put the Intercolonial railway upon its feet. What was the result? When that branch was built, in place of being twenty miles it was only four and a half miles shorter, and instead of the grades being lower than they were between New Glasgow and Stellarton, they were actually as steep, if not steeper, grades, as proven by the engineers on the investigation that was held with regard to the line. We have evidence that the Intercolonial railway has been prostituted from time to time to serve party ends. I should like remarkably well to have the whole line put under an absolutely independent management, to be appointed with such autocratic powers as those assigned to the Auditor General, beyond the reach of any Minister of Railways, beyond the reach of any government, a man who would handle that road on business principles, with power to dismiss men that are not necessary, and spend the money of the country properly and prudently. I believe if that were done the road could be made to pay, and would yield to this Dominion a respectable return for the enormous amount of money that is sunk in it. We have, as the hon. gentleman from Westminister admits, about ninety millions of money sunk in the Intercolonial railway. The country is paying interest upon that money, which virtually amounts to no less than $3,000,000 a year. That is 50 cents a head of the population of this country, to pay the interest on the money sunk in the Intercolonial railway. What position is the Ontario farmer placed in? The province of Ontario voted money to construct their own roads. They voted subsidies, not only as a province, but by municipalities, cities and towns. Large amounts were thus voted to give the railway accommodation that they required. The Intercolonial railway, a public work, gives Nova Scotia and New Brunswick the accommodation that they enjoy, although they never voted a dollar, locally, as compared with the money that was voted in western Canada to construct the roads that they have. The worst feature, however, is that the Intercolonial railway is rendering services to-day to the farmers and people who ship goods over it at the rate of 62 to 65 cents on the dollar of what it is costing the Ontario and western farmer, and for which he has to pay a dollar to the Grand Trund railway or the Canadian Pacific railway. The provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick are getting their accommodation over the Intercolonial railway, as clearly proven by the statement of the Minister of Railways, for about 65 cents for the same service as the farmer of Ontario and the western provinces pays a dollar to the Grand Trunk railway or Canadian Pacific railway.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—The country built all the canals. What do they pay in return to the lower provinces that helped to build them?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—The foundation for all the canals was laid before confederation. They laid the foundations and spent millions upon millions in extending them. They have been widened and expanded. The canals benefited the maritime provinces as well as the western provinces, and the Intercolonial contributes to the shippers of western Canada when flour and oatmeal have to be shipped that way. It has produced a competition in freight rates which is no doubt an advantage, but I say the road has never been properly administered. It was badly managed under the old government, and I am not going to defend the way it is managed at the present time. It may be better than it was, but it is not as perfect as it ought to be, and I would like to see it placed in such a position that this country would get some return for the very large amount of money they have sunk in it. What does this Bill propose to do? It is an invitation to any railway company in the maritime provinces to put their road in order, so that it will pass muster with the chief engineer of railways, and then have it transferred to the government and made part of the Intercolonial railway system. We do not want that. We have had too much of that already. For my part, I was educated under the Hon. Edward Blake as my leader, and under Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier as my present leader to vote against extensions and branches, and now I am asked to turn around and swallow myself and vote in favour of what I opposed previously. Conditions may have changed; but I have to confess that I do not like this Bill. I would rather the government had not introduced it. I believe the western people will not like it. I do not know how Ontario and western members can go on the public platform and defend their course in having passed the Bill in the House of Commons and sent it to the Senate. I should like to know how they are going to do it. I should not care to be a member of the House of Commons and have to perform such a task, because I confess that in my opinion it is an injustice to the western provinces and to Ontario, to ask them to consent to the extension of the Intercolonial railway while it continues to be operated and managed at a loss year after year. I remember riding with Sir Wm. Van Horne in his private car from Toronto to Montreal. The question of the Intercolonial railway was brought up. Col. Tisdale, a member of the House, was also present. Sir Wm. Van Horne told us that if the government would agree to hand over the Intercolonial railway to the Canadian Pacific railway they would agree to pay the government a million dollars a year rental for it, and that they would give the country as good a service as they were then getting. Sir William was then at the head of the Canadian Pacific railway. That proposition would have been a grand thing for the country. In place of getting a revenue from it of a million dollars a year we have been spending half a million to keep it running. We propose now to add more branches, which will be in some cases feeders, and in some cases they may be suckers. We do not know what they will be, we cannot tell. They may draw the wrong way, and I have no doubt in some cases they will. I suppose the Bill will become law, but I earnestly hope the government will see that the country is not defrauded, and that useless branch lines are not loaded on to us in addition to what we have now. Under the old government, matters were in a bad state, no doubt about it. Things were rotten. Investigation after investigation was held, and men were proved to be guilty. At one time Sir Charles Tupper employed lady detectives to see if he could find out where the leakage was, and at last a party was caught red-handed in wrong doing; but he was a relative of an important man with whom they could not afford to quarrel, and he was permitted to go, and nothing more was said about it. That was the manner in which the Intercolonial railway was handled under the management of hon. gentlemen opposite from 1882 to 1896. I long for the time when the Intercolonial railway will be placed upon a proper basis, and when this country will receive something in return for the enormous amount of money that is sunk in that road.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved the adjournment of the debate until to-morrow.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I desire to add to the statement I made, with the permission of the House, with reference to the cost and earnings of railways in Australia, a statement of the result of the year's earnings in New Zealand. Although New Zealand is one of the group of the Australian colonies, still its management of government railways is somewhat different from that of the Commonwealth of Australia. The figures are as follows:

The New Zealand government reports assert that the state roads earned a net profit of £814,711 last year, returning 3·13 per cent on the capital of £29,000,000 invested in them. The total earnings in 1909 were £2,929,526, and the total expenditure was £2,114,815.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Will the hon. gentleman state whether those net profits are made after deducting interest on the cost of the railway or not?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not sure; but I should suppose from the fact that it states that a certain percentage was paid out of the gross earnings, leaving the net earnings the amount I have stated, that these are the net profits.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—On investigation I think the hon. gentleman will find that is not so.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That may be, but from the fact of giving that percentage one would come to that conclusion. I desire to add that to show the results of the operations in the Australian colonies. Beyond that I do not desire to say anything without further investigation so as to be able to answer intelligently the question put by the hon. minister. There was one remark made by my hon. friend from Sackville (Hon. Mr. Wood) with which I am in full accord, that the acquisition of these branch lines would be hailed with delight by the people of the maritime provinces and the owners. All I have to say is that if the owners of these lines and the people of the maritime provinces are not now grateful, they are a very selfish and ungrateful people.

The Motion was agreed to.

Bill (55) An Act to amend the Seed Control Act.—Right Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

Bill (U) An Act to incorporate the Northern Quebec Colonization Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Tessier.

IMPROVED PAPER MACHINERY COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER moved the second reading of Bill (No. 67) 'An Act respecting the Improved Paper Machinery Company.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The question comes up as to the renewal of patents. Formerly there used to be a reason given in the preamble why they ask for these extensions, and if my hon. friend will allow this Bill to stand until to-morrow we could consider it. This patent has been in existence since 1903, and for seven years of that period no fees have been paid, and they are asking for a renewal of it under certain conditions. I notice also the same provision in that Act, but not quite so bad as that to which I objected the other day. It gives the right to continue the manufacture of the article which they want patented, up to a certain period last year, so that if any person had taken advantage of the lapse of this patent since last November they are cut out and they would lose all the investments they had made. If these Bills are going to become law and these patents extended, they certainly ought not to take effect until they are sanctioned by the Governor General. There is nothing in this Bill to show what the merits of the case are, and for that reason I would ask my hon. friend to let it stand.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—It may stand until to-morrow.

The order of the day was discharged and placed on the orders of the day for to-morrow.

LAURIE DIVORCE BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON (in the absence of Hon. Mr. Gillmor) moved the second reading of Bill (T) An Act for the relief of Archibald Laurie.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I would ask the hon. gentleman to strike out the words 'with George H. Parke, doctor of medicine' in the ninth line of the Bill. This request is not made by the guilty party, but by the wife of Dr. Parke, who desires it for the sake of her children.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—I do not object to that.

The SPEAKER—Then it will be a motion by way of amendment that the Bill be not now read a second time, but that it be amended by striking out the words mentioned.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—I think this motion is out of order. If the hon. gentleman will refer to the petition for divorce, he will see that the allegation is specifically made in regard to Dr. Geo. H. Parke, and under our rules we are bound to give that detail. It was stated yesterday that it was not usual to mention the name of the co-respondent. I have taken the trouble to look through the Acts passed in recent years, and I find several Bills in the past in which the names were not given, and it is easy to understand the reason why the names are not furnished, because in many cases the woman was not able to give the name of the co-respondent. The hon. gentleman from Stadacona is very much opposed to the whole question of divorce. I am a member of the Divorce Committee, but I quite admit that the fewer divorce cases we have in this country the better for the Dominion as a whole. I think one of the strongest expedients to prevent divorce proceedings is the fact of the name of the co-respondent going before the country. I think this motion would be objectionable and improper.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Better let the matter stand.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I have a right to propose an amendment. There is nothing which compels the committee to name any person.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—No notice has been given of this amendment.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I think my hon. friend who has just resumed his seat is perfectly correct in saying that there is nothing in the law which compels us to give the name of the co-respondent. But our acts may be called in question by gentlemen in this House or in the other Chamber, those members who do not approve of divorce; therefore, we have decided to make a definite charge on which the divorce is based. We do it to protect ourselves when parties rise in the other House and say that the Divorce Committee in the Senate is in the habit of granting a divorce on evidence that they would not hang a cat on, that we are able to show evidence that points to distinct acts of adultery upon which we have based our finding. I think it is a protection to ourselves, and I should not like to see it withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—Then I move that the order of the day be discharged, and that it be placed on the orders of the day for to-morrow.

MOND NICKEL COMPANY PATENT BILL.

Second reading postponed.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT moved the second reading of Bill (No. 92), an Act respecting a patent of the Mond Nickel Company, Limited. He said: I explained yesterday that the reason for this Bill was that the agent of the company—a British company —living in Montreal had neglected to make payment of the fee for a renewal of the patent. The Bill is merely for the purpose of authorizing the payment of the fee, so that the patent may be extended, as the patentee has a right to have it extended, and as it would have been extended had his agent made the payment, as directed, at the proper time.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—In giving my support to the Bill, as I did yesterday, I do not wish it understood that I am taking a position antagonistic to that which I held last week in reference to patent matters. I wish to say that the reason given by my learned confrere is correct; the agent of the parties who are seeking a renewal of the patent is, I may say, one of the largest financial institutions in the country. It is very important that this measure should be passed, because it was the fault of the financial institution to which I refer, that the Patent Act was not complied with. The patentee himself engaged the services of a very responsible institution to have this done, and therefore he was not to blame. If he had been, I would not have supported the measure, but it is due to the patentee, and to the agent, that the Bill should be sent to the committee to be investigated and passed upon. I may say that the agent in this matter would be liable to an action for damages for neglecting to pay the necessary fee. I would suggest to the leader of the government in this House that the Patent Act might be revised, or that its provisions should be enforced and protected by the government. I learn, from a recent judgment of the courts in Toronto, that certain patentees are using the Patent Act irregularly, illegally, and fraudulently. The Gillette Razor Company have taken action against a very large firm doing business in the principal cities of Canada to prevent them selling goods at a less price than that marked on their packages.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Does the hon. gentleman make a charge against the Minister of Agriculture?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—No.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—He distinctly says that the Patent Office are using their authority to permit irregular, illegal and fraudulent transactions.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The hon. gentleman misunderstands me completely. I want to defend the Patent Office and the Patent Act, and prevent any individual, or company, using the Patent Act to perpetrate a fraud upon the public. They claim they have a right under the Patent Act to do certain things, which the courts in this country have decided they have no right to do. What I am asking is that the attention of the Patent Bureau be called to this fact, so that when they find that the Patent Act is infringed in this way, they may take action to prevent it.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—If my hon. friend has any objections to the manner in which the Patent Act is being used, why does he not lay a charge and say he wants an investigation?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not know whether the hon. gentleman wants to press this question to a vote to-day. I would like to have it stand until to-morrow, because I have some remarks to make upon the Bill. I think my hon. friend has misunderstood the character of the measure. It is not the patentee himself who is asking this extension. I find the preamble of the Bill says: 'the holder and owner of patents,' so and so. It does not say the patentee desires this, and as the owner has purchased the patent rights from the inventor, he is the one who desires the extension. I wish to discuss the Bill, and I, therefore, move that the debate be adjourned until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

TRADE RELATIONS WITH GERMANY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the orders of the day are called, if the right hon. leader of the House has no objection, I should like to ask him some questions about the treaty recently made with Germany.

Right Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—If the hon. gentleman will put the questions I shall answer them if I can; if not I will get the information for him.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have read the correspondence relating to this treaty with a good deal of attention, and I find that the arrangement which has been entered into between the two countries provides for the repealing of the surtax imposed on articles imported from Germany into Canada in consideration of Germany admitting exports from Canada of certain articles which are scheduled in this return, at what is termed the conventional tariff. Could my hon. friend tell me in the first place what the difference is in the amount of duty on articles exported from Canada to Germany under the conventional tariff and their general tariff? If we had those figures before us, we would be in a better position to judge of the advantages which are likely to accure to Canada by the adoption of this treaty, in discussing the question. I find that it extends, if I read it correctly to what is termed in this correspondence 'the penal clause,' which was enacted by the German government, to all articles exported from Canada into Germany. The next question I would like to ask is, does that penal clause continue to apply to all articles exported from Canada into Germany except those which are enumerated in the schedule of the new treaty? I find no provision, either in the correspondence or in the schedule itself which gives any information on that point. The right hon. gentleman readily understands that if the penal clause, as it is described in this agreement, is removed only so far as it applies to the articles therein enumerated, then the certainty is that it will continue to operate as against all other manufactures and articles exported from Canada to Germany. That, to my mind, is a somewhat important point. There may be some other arrangement not contained in the paper before us, which provides for the question I have raised. I think it somewhat important, however, that the country should know, and that all manufacturers should know whether the penalty imposed upon articles imported from Canada into Germany is still enforced on such articles as are not included in the schedule. If my interpretation of this clause be correct, then we have repealed the surtax imposed on imports from Germany entirely. It seems to me that it is a partial and one-sided arrangement and that no such treaty should have been concluded. I noticed in the morning papers that some of the London daily journals have come to the conclusion that the adoption of this treaty by Canada will militate against the imports from Great Britain. Whether that is so or not, I am not prepared to discuss. I notice also that a telegram from Berlin states that there is great rejoicing there at the removal of the surtax by Canada. That I can readily understand; but the other point to which I have called my right hon. friend's attention is a very important one.

Right Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I would suggest to my right hon. friend, as this is a matter which may affect many manufacturers and exporters, that although I shall answer his questions in an informal way he will do well to place his questions explicitly and in detail on the order paper, so that I may get absolutely authoritative information. I think myself the hon. gentleman is quite correct in supposing that the concessions made by Germany apply only to the particular articles enumerated in the schedule. The Germans did not impose a surtax, as we did. They merely removed Canada from the favoured nations clause to the general tariff. We are putting the Germans not on our favoured nations clause, but on our general tariff only. With respect to the extent to which we receive benefit by being placed under the favoured nations clause in their tariff by Germany, it varies very considerably, and I would have to get the matter made out by my officers in detail, which I will be happy to do, only it may take possibly a little time—probably a day or two, to get it perfectly, as it embraces a large number of articles. I will get that done for my hon. friend. In a general way, I think the difference ranges from ten to twenty-five per cent, being the difference between their minimum and maximum tariff; but it is not a uniform reduction. It varies with different articles. For instance, in some cases, their minimum and their maximum tariff is the same. I might take the opportunity of observing that a mistake appears to have occurred in the minds of some parties as to the extent of loss of revenue that will result under this treaty. They place the loss of revenue at two millions a year. That is a mistake. We do not lose two millions a year by this concession. The loss will be one-third of two millions, because the tax now imposed on the imports from Germany is really only one-third more than the general tariff, and $600,000 therefore would be the measure of our loss of revenue rather than two millions. Under what is called the surtax, we calculated a revenue of two millions or thereabouts on four and a half million dollars worth of German goods. Only one third of that is composed of the surtax. The balance—two-thirds—of our general tariff, so that we shall only lose about $600,000, provided always the imports do not increase. If my hon. friend will put these questions categorically, I will have them answered in due course, so that there may be no misunderstanding.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My interpretation of the Act is on precisely the same lines as the right hon. gentleman as to its effect on goods not enumerated in this schedule, exported to Germany—that they would not have the advantage of any concession which has been made by that country as a set-off to our repeal of the surtax. Might I ask as we have two tariffs, there being the general tariff and an intermediate tariff, whether the other articles come under the general tariff, and not the intermediate.

Right Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—That is my understanding, that the imports from Germany will come under the general and not the intermediate tariff.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—What falling off of imports from Germany has taken place while the surtax was in force?

Right Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The principal falling off occurred in the article of beet-root sugar, which we used to import from Germany in large quantities. Beyond that, I do not think the reduction has been very great; but if my hon. friend will put the question I will get the details. I would not undertake to give him an off-hand answer. The imports were very largely reduced, but it was almost entirely in that one article. The effect of it was virtually to transfer the trade in sugar to our West India Islands.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 36) An Act respecting the Union Life Assurance Company.—Hon. Mr. Jones.

Bill (No. 82) An Act to incorporate the Merchants and General Insurance Company.—Hon. Mr. Casgrain.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. WATSON moved the second reading of Bill (No. 96) An Act respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I notice that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company ask for power to build a number of lines, and, amongst others, some lines in the pretty far west. It strikes me that the company have already undertaken to build certain lines in that region which they have failed to construct although the time fixed in the original charters has expired. I have some doubt as to the wisdom of our empowering the company to go on building large stretches of railway where they have failed to build in other portions of the same general district, without any really sufficient reason so far as parliament knows.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—If the hon. gentleman refers to the map, he will find that his statement is not quite correct. Without looking at the map I know the direction which some of the lines referred to will take. Of course, if satisfactory reasons are not given for the failure of the company to build the other lines referred to when the Bill is before the committee, the hon. gentleman can deal with the matter then. The company are railway builders, and are not looking for a charter for any other purpose.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

CENTRAL ONTARIO RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middlesex) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 96) An Act respecting the Central Ontario Railway.

He said: This is a Bill to give authority to the Central Ontario Railway to enter into an agreement, under the Railway Act, with several other railway companies.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

ALGOMA CENTRAL AND HUDSON BAY RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middlesex) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 110) An Act respecting the Algoma Central and Hudson Bay Railway Company.

He said: This Bill proposes two things: First, to extend the time for the commencement and completion of this road, which runs from the Sault, and was projected towards Hudson bay. One hundred miles of the line has been completed, and another hundred miles are under contract. It will cross the Grand Trunk Pacific and the National Transcontinental railway north of the Sault. Then the company ask to be allowed a bonding power of $40,000 per mile for the construction of the road.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

TRANSPORTATION OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The order of the day being called: 'Second reading Bill (N) An Act to regulate the transportation of intoxicating liquors.'

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT moved that the order of the day be discharged, and that the Bill be placed on the orders for Tuesday next.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The Senate is pretty well filled. Would it not be an opportune time to discuss this matter?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I am receiving correspondence constantly with reference to the Bill. I have just received some which I have not had time to read.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I have just read the Bill and tried to dissect it, and the sooner it is off the orders of the day the better. It is the most grotesque Bill I have ever read.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Before his motion is carried, we should have some assurance that the hon. gentleman will proceed with the Bill on Tuesday next. There are a good many people interested in it and they cannot be watching for it all the time. It is hardly fair to keep it dangling before the eyes of the public, leading people generally to think that we are serious in this matter. If we are not serious, we should drop it; if we are serious we should proceed with the Bill at the earliest date possible.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I seconded this motion, and I do not think the reasons given by the hon. gentleman for proceeding with the Bill to-day, are justified. They suggest that we should proceed now with the Bill because we have a full House.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Little jokes like that cannot carry the Bill. Such jokes do not go with the public.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Not by a jug full.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Although the hon. member from Marquette (Mr. Watson) seconds the measure, I deny him the right to ask for a postponement of the Bill on such a joke as that. It is unworthy of him and of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS BRANCH LINES BILL.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The order of the day being called.

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion for the second reading (Bill 17) An Act to authorize the government of Canada to acquire, by lease, lines of railway connecting with the government railways.—Hon. Mr. Power.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The measure before the House is one of a great deal of importance, and it might be expected that I should dilate upon it at considerable length; but I wish to assure the House that I do not propose to detain hon. gentlemen very long. The truth is that the hon. gentleman from Westmorland (Mr. Wood) and to a certain extent the hon. gentleman from Hastings (Sir Mackenzie Bowell), in their speeches yesterday, anticipated the greater part of what I had proposed to say. Attention should be particularly directed to the speech of the hon. gentleman from Westmorland, for the reason that he showed in his remarks an amount of public spirit which is not always shown even in this honourable body. As I understand it, that hon. gentleman is the largest owner of one of those railways, which, if this Bill went into active operation, would be taken over by the Intercolonial Railway.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is to be hoped so.

Hon. Mr. POWER—And naturally, in the province from which the hon. gentleman comes, there is a general sympathy with the object of the Bill before the House. This Bill is a very short one, and it appears to have been passed through another place with very little discussion or consideration. I can only assume that overwhelmed as that body is with the amount of business before it, the members have not been able to devote that care and consideration to this measure which it really deserves. When we come to look carefully at the Bill, and see what it proposes to do, I think we shall realize how serious it is. It proposes that, subject to certain conditions of which I shall say something later on, it enables the government to lease any roads connecting with the Intercolonial railway. There is no limitation to the length of the line, so that practically the Bill empowers the government, under certain conditions, to acquire all the lines in the maritime provinces and elsewhere which connect with the Intercolonial railway. Now, I have not gone farther than the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, in the volume of railway statistics; and I find that in New Brunswick there are nearly five hundred and fifteen miles of railway which might be taken over under this Bill; that in the province of Nova Scotia there are nearly 869 miles of railway which the government are authorized to take over under its provisions. Now, that is a very serious matter. It really means that the government, by this little measure, are authorized to take over existing roads which are of greater mileage than the main line of the Intercolonial Railway in the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. That, hon. gentlemen will see, is a very serious proposition for this House to face. I may mention, in order to show how serious it is, two roads which, under the terms of this Bill, the government might take over in the province of Nova Scotia. They might take over the Dominion Atlantic railway with a mileage of 247·40 miles. They might take over the Halifax and Southwestern road, the mileage of which is about 370 miles. I might say with respect to the Halifax and Southwestern, that I think it not at all improbable if this measure went into operation, very strong pressure would be brought to bear on the government to take over that road, because it is an important road, and is not a profitable road. There are several counties interested in it, the electors in which would be only too anxious to see the railway taken over by the government.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Could the hon. gentleman say if there are any branch lines in the province of Quebec, and what they are?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I refrain from saying anything about the province of Quebec. I am speaking now of the two provinces with which I am most familiar. In Quebec there is the Temiscouata railway and part of the Quebec Central. There is no doubt that the feeling of most people in both provinces is in favour of the government assuming the ownership of these roads. I do not think it at all likely that the roads would be taken over immediately; but on the eve of a general election, one can understand that if it was felt that the taking over of, say, the Halifax and Southwestern railway would mean the carrying of two or three counties, there is no knowing what the virtue of the government would do when submitted to that strain. Possibly the present government might be able to resist the temptation, but perhaps another government might be weak. It is our duty not to put temptation in the way of the government. In the prayer which his hon. the Speaker reads every day, we are asked not to be led into temptation; and we should not deliberately plunge into temptation. Now, suppose that these things happened, that the pressure was brought to bear, and that the pressure was yielded to, the upshot would be that within a comparatively short time we should have the government taking over all the railways in the maritime provinces, and, as the hon. gentleman from Hastings (Hon. Mr. Bowell) indicated, if that were done the probabilities are that that condition of things could not be limited to the maritime provinces, and that we should have the people of the upper provinces insisting that the government should take over all the railways. I think there are very few members of this House or, I presume, of the other House, who would look upon it as a desirable thing that the government should assume the ownership and operation of all the railways of the country. In the first place, it would increase the national debt by about one and a half billions of dollars. There is no necessity for it. Railways can be better operated under private ownership. I am pointing out what would be the logical result of our going into this undertaking. Suppose we confine ourselves at present to the proposition narrowed down to the lower provinces. What are we asked to do? We are asked to take over, under certain conditions, the branch railways in the maritime provinces. It strikes me, looking at it as a business proposition, that that would not be a good investment. I do not care to trouble the House with statistics, but if one refers to the Railway Statistics for the last financial year, they will find at pages 69 and the following pages, and again, on page 170 and the following pages, statistics which show that those railways in the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick are not at the present time paying investments. There is no reason to think that they would be better investments if placed in the hands of the government.

The reasons why these branch lines would not pay if taken over by the government were stated very clearly by the hon. gentleman from Westmorland (Hon. Mr. Wood) in his speech yesterday, and I do not think it is necessary for me to repeat what he said then. The ground was taken in another place that the management of the Intercolonial railway should follow the example of the governing bodies of the great company railways—that all these great company railways had built branches; but the hon. gentleman who made that statement in another place left out of sight the fact that the branches had already been built in the lower provinces. The building of a railway into the virgin country of the Northwest is a different matter. The railway company finding that there is a large tract of fertile land to which settlers would flock if it were understood that a branch line was to be built there, in order to give employment to the main lines the company builds branches into these fertile districts. The fact that the country is benefited by being settled up, and the railway is benefited by the traffic which the population that flows in affords to a railway is a justification for the building of branches. But that is not the case in the lower provinces. These provinces have been long settled. There is no hope of any large influx of population there. These railways which it is proposed to take over are roads which were built to accommodate various places of certain importance in the lower provinces. They do accommodate them, and the taking over of such roads by the government will not increase the population along these branches, and really will not confer any very great benefit on the settlements because the existing roads do the work, on the whole, in a fairly satisfactory way. As the hon. gentleman from Westmorland pointed out, during the last few years, these roads have been paying their way with one or two trifling exceptions, so there is no excuse at all for the government for taking them over. It is not necessary to read what the hon. gentleman from Westmorland said as to what the result, in a pecuniary sense, would be of the government taking over these roads. But it may be well to give one illustration. It is a kind of example to deter us from going into this business. Of all the branch railways, or what are called branch railways, in the maritime provinces, I suppose the Canada Eastern would be looked upon as the one most likely to be a profitable investment. That road runs from Fredericton, the capital of New Brunswick, where it has connection with two or three lines controlled by the Canadian Pacific railway, to the port of Chatham. It goes to Chatham at any rate. These are the two termini, and Chatham is, on the whole, the most important shipping port on the northern shore of New Brunswick. The intervening country is largely fertile and well settled. The portions of it which are not fit for settlement are well timbered, although the major part of the timber has been cut. Still there is a great deal of timber left in the neighbourhood. This was looked upon as a good road. It was a road which had been built to meet the business wants of that part of New Brunswick.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does not that road connect with the Intercolonial railway at Newcastle?

Hon. Mr. POWER—It crosses the Intercolonial railway at Newcastle, and is supposed to run on down to Chatham, about nine miles below Newcastle. I find that during last session an inquiry was made in another place as to the result of the taking over of that road. In the first place, the country paid for it $819,000. That was the first cost. Inasmuch as the line is about 125 miles long, that does not seem to be a high figure; but when we come to look at what has occurred since, we will see that the price was rather high. I do not mean to say that the owners of the road received more than they should have got, but I want to point out that the country did not make a particularly good bargain. In this same return—I shall not take the trouble to read the whole of it—it appears this road was taken over on the 1st of October, 1904. During the remainder of that calendar year, the government spent $36,428 on capital account, in the year 1905-06 the government spent $331,779. In 1906-07 the government spent $36,089; in 1907-08 they spent $150,778; in 1908-09 they spent $42,833, and in the next year $34,125. Down to 1909—that is in less than five years—the country spent on capital account on that road $597,929. They spent $34,125 last year, and there are in the estimates for the coming year sums in excess of $150,000 to provide terminal facilities in Chatham and in that neighbourhood. It appears that the first cost was $819,000. Then, in addition to that, there were practically $600,000. That is $1,417,000 and $150,000 in the estimates for this year makes well on for $1,600,000 on capital account alone.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—Does that include the cost of the railway?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes; and I understand that this amount of $150,000 which is in the estimates for the coming year is not a final payment. I understand that these terminal facilities are to cost ultimately about $400,000.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—That is not on the road they purchased from the Canada Eastern Railway Company, it is on a new line.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is to connect this road with Chatham.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—It is changing the road entirely and building a new construction. It is not part of the purchase.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is part of the railway scheme from Fredericton to Chatham, so that you have fully $2,000,000 spent on capital account for the acquisition of this road, and what has been the result? Of course the road has been improved; but in this return, which was submitted to the House of Commons last session, hon. gentlemen will find it at column 2580 of the Commons ' Hansard ' of last year, volume 2, the approximate operating expenses of the Canada Eastern from October, 1904, to March, 1908, as follows: 1904-5, $105,790; 1905-6, $152,850; 1906-7, $141,243 ; 1907-8, $198,054. Altogether during those four years, $597,938. Those are the operating expenses, practically $600,000. During the same period, the receipts were less than the operating expenses.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—How much difference was there?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I cannot tell how much, because in the one case we have calendar years, and in the other case fiscal years, but if the hon. gentlemen will take the summary of receipts, column 2584 of ' Hansard,' and strike off the last year and one-half he will find the receipts were less than the operating expenses.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Hear! hear!

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think that is a warning to parliament at least to go very slowly in proceeding with this measure. I do not think there is any object in emphasizing further what was said by the hon. gentleman from Sackville; but there are one or two observations suggested by the remarks made by hon. gentlemen yesterday. One was with respect to the railways in Australia and New Zealand. It was suggested by the hon. gentleman from Hastings (Sir Mackenzie Bowell), that the Intercolonial railway might be placed under an independent and non-political commission, and the hon. gentleman instanced the good results which had followed from the adoption of that course in the Australian colonies; but he left out of sight this very important circumstance, that in the Australian colonies the railways were substantially all owned and operated by the government. That is not the case here. In Canada, fortunately, the great bulk of our railways are owned and operated by private companies, and the argument which might apply in Australia would not apply so well here. I may say with respect to the commission under whom the Intercolonial railway is being operated now, that I think they are doing their duty honestly and effectually, and the result of their first years' operations has been very satisfactory. Where there had usually been deficits, there is now a reasonable surplus, I think over $600,000. I know there are a great many hon. gentlemen who feel that the Intercolonial railway ought to subserve their own convenience and desires more than it does; but the road has been operated on the whole satisfactorily to the public. The trains are run, I think, with greater regularity now than in former years, and, on the whole, the public have no reason to complain. No company would put on more trains, or cater more to the convenience of the travelling public; at the same time, I quite realize the force of the argument used by the hon. gentleman from Sackville, that in the nature of things a government owned railway cannot do business in the same way as a road owned by a private company.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear! hear!

Hon. Mr. POWER—And it will not build up the country through which it runs and build up its terminals in the same way as a private company can. I am satisfied that if ten years ago the Intercolonial railway had been, as a great many people thought it ought to have been then—I was not one of them myself—leased to the Canadian Pacific Railway, speaking as a citizen of Halifax, I believe that the benefit that would have accrued to that city would have been very great indeed, and much greater than has accrued as a matter of fact under the government operations. The government have dealt very generously with Halifax, and have spent a great deal of money there, but, for the reasons given by the hon. gentleman from Sackville, they cannot develop business in the way a great company like the Canadian Pacific or Grand Trunk can. So, hon. gentleman, I have come to the same conclusion substantially as the hon. gentleman from Saskville. I do not see the hon. gentleman from Rothesay (Mr. Domville) here. In the early part of his speech he seemed to dissent very strongly from the views of the hon. gentleman from Sackville (Mr. Wood), but I noticed that towards the end of his observations he was not so very far away. His conclusions were apparently not so remote from those of the hon. gentleman from Saskville; and my feeling is that the sentiment in favour of a change of this kind is growing fast. My own humble opinion is that the wisest way to dispose of the Intercolonial railway, always supposing that that can be done, will be to lease the road west of Moncton to one of the great companies, preferably not the Canadian Pacific railway, because the Canadian Pacific railway have the road to St. John now, and it is better to have competition. Then improve the grades between Moncton and Truro, and lease, as I say, the portion of the road north and west of Moncton. I think the government might very well retain the part of the road, south and east of Moncton, and give running powers over that portion of the road on the most liberal terms to the Canadian Pacific railway, Grand Trunk Pacific and Canadian Northern. I understand the Canadian Northern railway company are anxious to get down to the Atlantic, and if they are willing to take over this northern portion of the Intercolonial railway I think it good policy to let them have it on very reasonable terms. That has been my view for years. Now there is one objection to the Bill before the House, which is suggested by my last observation. One of the misfortunes, I think, of adopting the policy set forth in this measure is that if the government acquire a number of these branches which are non-paying branches, and which can never pay in the hands of the government, and which are of doubtful paying qualities in any hand, the fact will be that a company which might be willing to take over the main line will not be willing to take it over when loaded down with a number of non-paying branches.

Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Hear! hear!

Hon. Mr. POWER—If hon. gentlemen feel that it may be, at perhaps some early date, an acceptable policy to lease the greater portion of the Intercolonial railway to some big company, the prospect of doing that on anything like favourable terms will be very much diminished by the government taking over the non-paying branches. There are safeguards in the Bill. I have not dealt with the details. That would naturally come up when the Bill goes into committee; but there are two or three observations which I think may not be out of place now. In the third clause of the Bill it is provided that the Minister of Railways and Canals is authorized and empowered upon the recommendation of the Government Railways Managing Board, and subject to the authority of the Governor in Council, to lease in whole or in part any line or lines of railway connecting with government railways. It will be observed that there is no limitation to the power of leasing. It is not confined to those lines which may be strictly called branches of the Intercolonial railway. It applies to all railways which connect with the Intercolonial railway, and, as a matter of fact, substantially all the railways in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia do so connect; and the leases may be for 999 years, or they may be for 99 years. The lease of the Drummond County railway was for 99 years; so that hon. gentlemen will see that while the Bill professes to allow the government only to lease, substantially it would mean that the government would acquire permanently. I do not deny that there are safeguards provided in the Bill, but the question is whether at the critical moment those safeguards would be effectual. The condition is:

If such line or lines are reported by the chief engineer of the Department of Railways and Canals to be in a good and safe condition for operation.

I assume that in the case of the Canada Eastern it was reported by the chief engineer that that road was in good and safe condition for operation, and I daresay that the engineer might take the same view of any of these other branches. To tell the truth I have not the same absolute faith that the government has in the recommendations and reports of engineers, not always. As my hon. friend says, one requires to be very well acquainted with the facts. There was the case of the Drummond County railway which was recommended by a most upright and capable engineer, Collingwood Schreiber. He thought that road was going to pay, but as a matter of fact it did not pay. It turned out to be a non-paying investment. This proviso is a very good one as far as it goes:

Provided that no such lease shall have any force or effect nor shall any such connecting railway be entered upon or operated on behalf of the government of Canada until the said managing board, and the said chief engineer shall have approved the terms and conditions of such lease having regard to the beneficial results therefrom to the government railways, and until the parliament of Canada has first ratified such lease.

I think it is safe to assume that if the Managing Board thought that, on the whole, it would be in the public interest to take over any given branch of the Intercolonial railway, and they directed their engineer in all probability be in favour of the proposition. I do not say that just now, under existing conditions, the Managing Board would report in favour of taking over a road which was really not a desirable piece of property. But, in the case I put a little while ago, if on the eve of an election, a very resolute and determined minister was anxious that a certain railway should be taken over because he thought it was going to result in the government carrying two or three counties, is it to be expected that the Governing Board of the Intercolonial railway would resist firmly and persistently the influence of that minister to bring about the desired result. I am afraid it would not, and I wish to repeat that this is a measure which might have very important and unforeseen results. It is a measure which needs to be dealt with very carefully, and, if adopted at all, I trust that certain further safeguards will be placed in it, so as to render more improbable the danger of its provisions being abused.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (British Columbia)—The discussion of this Bill has taken a very wide range, and the remarks of the hon. gentlemen from Sackville, Halifax and Wellington are worthy of every consideration. It is to be hoped that they will be brought to the attention of the Minister of Railways and those associated with him. I am not going to vote against the Bill or for it. I do not know what the effect of it on the Intercolonial railway will be. If it should bring additional commerce and trade to that railway, I should vote for it. We are labouring at present in the dark, and the names of the lines to be taken over are not even given to us. This Bill contains one concession, it is a concession I think, because it says that no contract or lease shall be ratified before it comes before parliament.

At all events, that gives both sides in parliament an opportunity of discussing it. Though eventually the government party would carry it, yet those opposed to it would have a chance to point out all the defects. Hon. gentlemen know that in former years contracts were first made and ratified by the government, and then submitted to parliament, a perfectly useless proceeding. Now, whatever the opinions of parliament are, they are of some benefit and even from most crude opinions the government should gain some information that would be of benefit to them. On this Bill, we should have some more information before proceeding further with it. Perhaps the right hon. leader of the House who has charge of this Bill would furnish some of the information we require. That is to say, did the proposal to lease certain lines of railway come in the first instance from the Intercolonial Railway Commissioners, and the traffic manager, or did the owners of the lines to be leased make the first suggestion, and offer to have them leased by the government, and taken off their hands. These are very important questions. If the commissioners and traffic manager see that these lines are necessary, it alters the case; but if they have been offered by the owners to the government, the supposition is that they have not been paying lines. Those who have been members of this House for the last thirteen or fourteen years are inclined to look upon such measures with a great deal of suspicion. I hope nothing will be done under this Bill of a wrong character to favour any body. If any branch line is a paying concern, by all means lease it; but if it is not paying then we should have nothing to do with it. Another question on which I should like to get information is, whether the government possess any data as to the condition of such lines, and their earnings for the last years. Is there an approximate estimate, or are there reasonable expectations of increased traffic being brought to the Intercolonial railway by the lines to be leased? When the Bill is in Committee of the Whole House, perhaps the right hon. leader will give us information on these points.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—I have looked over this Bill and I do not see that we need have very much fear in giving the government authority to lease lines connecting with the government railways. I can speak particularly of the branch lines in New Brunswick. I do not think there is one of the nine that can or will fulfil the conditions. It would take from five to fifteen thousands dollars a mile to put these lines in such shape that the Department of Railways and Canals will feel warranted in taking hold of them. The Bill provides:

> That no such lease shall have any force or effect nor shall any such connecting railway be entered upon or operated on behalf of the government of Canada until the said managing board, and the said chief engineer shall have approved the terms and conditions of such lease.

Now, I have here a copy of the report of 'the commissioners appointed by the government to inquire into, examine and report upon the branch lines of railways connecting with the Intercolonial railway; also a copy of the 'report of the commissioners appointed by the government of the province of New Brunswick to inquire into, examine and report upon the branch lines of railway within said province, and connecting with said Intercolonial railway.' This was quoted from by the hon. member from Westmorland (Mr. Wood) yesterday. The first road referred to is the Caraquet & Gulf Shore Railway. It is bonded to the amount of $500,000.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—How much is that per mile?

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—The length of the road is 69 miles. That road has never paid interest on the bonds or running expenses. No commission connected with the Intercolonial railway would touch that road until it is put in shape, and the bondholders will not do that. The next road would be the Bearville railway. That is a one-horse road with which it could not do any thing. No government would buy or lease it. Out of nine roads there are about three that pay their interest —in fact, only one pays interest on the bonds, and that is the road owned by the hon. gentleman from Westmorland. That road pays interest, and there is a small balance left. The other roads do not pay running expenses, so that I am not at all afraid that the commission will take these roads over—not in my day anyway. What I am particularly interested in is the future of the Intercolonial railway. I come from the centre of the system there, and know something about it. I have seen it managed and operated, and it has not been run by either government in a way to satisfy me. Up to a year ago, I was not any more satisfied under the Liberal government than I was with the management under the Conservatives, but I am satisfied after hearing the remarks of the Minister of Railways the other night in the House that there is now an improvement. The commissioners took hold of the road about the 1st of July, and the returns up the the 31st of December, show a profit of $662,000, while the expenses have been lessened by $750,000.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—What has been the expenditure on capital account?

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—Small, only about $1,500,000. The preceding year it had been three million dollars. They have been able to purchase out of revenue about $400,000 worth of rolling stock. In olden times engines and cars were bought on capital account. The idea of the hon. gentleman from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) was an independent commission. The present commission is as independent as any you can get.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The hon. gentleman is in favour of leasing the road west of Moncton?

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—The hon. gentleman from Halifax spoke of an independent commission.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I was then quoting the hon. gentleman from Hastings.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—The hon. member rather praised these gentlemen, and he was right. We have as members of that commission Mr. Pottinger, who has been on the road forty years, and who has had great experience. We have Mr. Tiffin, a first class traffic manager, and Mr. Brady, one of the best operating men in the country. If these gentlemen can make as good a showing in the future as they have made in the past twelve months, there is no need of leasing or selling the main line of the Intercolonial railway. I agree with the hon. member from Halifax that it might be well to lease that portion from Moncton north. Under the present Act, the National Transcontinental railway will have running rights over the Intercolonial railway, and the other roads, the Canadian Northern and the Canadian Pacific railway, if they want running rights, could get them on reasonable terms. I would not give any one of these railways the whole of the local traffic. There is no trouble arranging it. Running rights can be had for a certain amount. The Canadian Pacific railway has running rights over another line from Hamilton to Toronto on payment of $1,000 a mile; but to expect the Canadian Pacific railway to take very much interest in Halifax is a mistake, because their interests are bound up in St. John. When the National Transcontinental railway is opened to Halifax, it will have a chance to ship western produce over that route, providing that the rail route is not too long. When that road is completed, with a four-tenths of one per cent grade, they can ship through freight over that route. With respect to the Drummond County railway, I think that the hon. member from Halifax rather disagreed with the hon. member from Westmorland. I think he said that portion, the Drummond County road, was paying.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I did not say it paid; I said the very opposite. I said it was estimated that it would have a very large earning power, and yield a very considerable surplus; but I called attention to the fact that under government management, the very reverse had been the case. Instead of giving a surplus, there was a deficit.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—If the receipts of the Intercolonial have increased, it shows that the extension increased the traffic. We have had some experience of railroads managed by government commissions in other countries, and the case of Australia has been cited. The railroads there have proved successful under one man management. That is my idea. A man of the stamp of Thomas Tait is worth four men. Still, under the present management, though the commission are not doing everything as I would like to see it done, they are doing good work on the Intercolonial railway. For instance, I think they should employ more men on repairs in Moncton, and not buy so much on capital account. I remember under the old government there were 345 men employed in Moncton. They dismissed 125 of those men. Most of them went to the United States, and the management of the Intercolonial that year bought on capital account $450,000 worth of rolling stock, of which one-third was purchased in the United States. The very men that were dismissed, worked on engines that were bought at Portland, and on cars that were made at Worcester, and sold to the Intercolonial railway. After dismissing these men, and sending them out of the country, these same men did the work for which the Intercolonial railway paid $150,000, but that work was done in the United States. I do not call that a business proposition, but it was done all the same. I think we have in Mr. Graham, the Minister of Railways, a man who takes an interest in the railway, and will do his very best to make it pay its way. I do not think he is at all anxious to lease the road; but if we do not get results under the present management, if the commission do not make a good showing, I shall not object—I could not object to let the road be hitched on to one of the big companies. It would be for the benefit of the maritime provinces and of the Dominion. We cannot go on for ever squandering money as we have been doing in the past. It will be to our interest to await the result of the management by the present commission. They are doing their very best. Out of some eight thousand men, they dismissed 503. It was pretty hard lines in many cases, but they used their best judgment. If they cannot make the road pay now, I cannot object to one of the big companies taking it over, but the best thing to do would be to lease the line from Moncton to Montreal. The main line from Halifax to Moncton, and from Moncton to St. John covers one of the best territories in Canada, and should be retained by the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I do not intend to enter into an argument on this question, but rather to express a personal opinion. My hon. friend who has just addressed the House, in referring to what the result may be if we pass this Bill, points out that there are three roads in New Brunswick which are not paying, but he has such confidence in the government, or the engineering profession, that he concludes no engineer would recommend the government to take over the Caraquet road. Any one who remembers the origin of the Caraquet road and of all the facts which were presented in the House of Commons with regard to that road when it was projected will recall its history. The reasons why the road should not be built from a paying point of view were just as clear then as they are now after experience has shown that it was a fact, that the road would not pay. But gentlemen who were then in the House of Commons and heard the debates on the question, know that there were engineers' reports strongly favouring the construction of the road, so I concur with the hon. member from Halifax, who did not exactly say, but his remarks led up to that, that you can get an engineer to report anything—if you get the right kind of engineer. The objection which the hon. member from Halifax makes I think is sustained, notwithstanding what my hon. friend from Moncton says in answer to him. You can always get somebody to justify a thing if you desire to have it justified. I am sorry to make that statement; but I feel confident that will occur in respect of the roads which the government may desire to have taken. The House of Commons have always been persuaded to the fullest extent that the thing suggested to be done by a powerful ministry was absolutely necessary. When the ministers go down to the House of Commons and give reasons why any particular road should be taken over by the government, the reasons will be considered sufficient. I am rather opposed to giving the government the power at all. I have a belief that the government can now do all that the Bill allows without the Bill. They can come to parliament with a proposition to take over a particular road, say the Caraquet road. If the government submits such a proposition, it is sure to be supported. If I were one of the government supporters in the House of Commons I should probably be able to see reasons why on the whole I could justify the vote.

The hon. member from Halifax (Mr. Power) has covered ground I was going to take. I was about to make an illustration of the Canada Eastern railroad. The reasons for building that line were probably justifiable. It was perfectly natural that the people of Fredericton should desire to have a railway to the Miramichi river, and that the peole of Miramachi should desire to have an easy way to get to Fredericton. The road was built through a fairly good part of the country, but some how the people who owned it never made any money out of it. The road under pressure of one kind or another has passed over to the government. My hon. friend states that the road cost $819,000, but I observe in the statement of the Minister of Railways that the capital is put down at $1,284,495, which is the price we paid for that road before any of the improvements to which my hon. friend refers were made, and I presume that in that the accountant has taken in not only the $819,000, but also the subsidies which the government paid originally on the road. The company was largely subsidized in the first instance by the Dominion government and also by the provincial government. Then the expenditure has gone on in addition to which my hon. friend refers, amounting to five or six hundred thousand dollars. The department has now entered on further works, and it is impossible to say what the expenditure will be. I should think it will be at least $750,000 before the deep water terminus at the Miramichi river is made fit for the purposes for which it is intended. So we have gone on with an enormous expenditure on that road, a road which is one of the best subsidiary roads we have. It is easy to get a subsidy for a railway if you set yourself right about it. There is a road in our province which runs from Harvey into the county of Albert. That road was pressed for by some influential people. It is called the Albert Southern railway. There is attached to it the Harvey branch, and they are practically the same road, about twenty odd miles in length. The Dominion government put $65,000 in that road, and the province of New Brunswick $57,000. The total amount of public money expended on that road was $122,693. Here is a newspaper paragraph with regard to its present condition. It is under date of January 31, last:

The Albert Southern railway is being dismantled, and the rails are being shipped to the States. Already two or three schooner loads have been taken away, and soon there will be nothing left to mark the route of the railway, in which the province and Dominion invested in subsidies between $100,000 and $200,000. There is considerable speculation in Albert county over the rights of the present owners of the property, whoever they may be, to tear up and cart away this property, and it is said representations have been made to Ottawa on the subject. The Albert Southern is a line about twenty miles in length from Albert to Alma, and joined the Harvey and Albert, formerly the Harvey and Salisbury, at the Shepody river. The bridge there has been down for many years, and no trains have run over the road.

The explanation of this is that there was a judgment against the railway for debt, the railway was sold at public auction, these people bought it, and had all their arrangements made, and before any body could intervene, the rails were taken up, and shipped to the United States. It clearly shows that there was no business reason for the construction of that road. At the Harvey branch there was a shipyard. At the crucial time a delegation came to Ottawa or to Fredericton. They had very powerful political influence, and the government yielded to the demands made upon it, and perhaps the government may itself, by the ingenuity of argument be persuaded that a road is necessary. I am not putting this forward as a type of all the roads in the maritime provinces. But it was a political railway. There are some which have a revenue, but none of them is paying all its expenses, and a substantial interest to the stockholders. Therefore, if the government is invested with power such as this Bill gives them, it should be guarded and restricted to such an extent that it shall have some substantial directions as to what it should do, and how it shall be limited in each case as it arises. I do not wish to say anything more on that point. On the whole I should prefer to vote against the legislation altogether, as I say, the government have the power now.

As regards the larger question of the Intercolonial railway itself, let me make an observation or two. I always feel hurt when my hon. friend from Wellington (Mr. McMullen) rises to speak in regard to the maritime provinces, because he seems to carry in his mind—and I think he ought to try and rid himself of it—a feeling that in some way or other inasmuch as the Intercolonial railway exists a great benefit has been conferred by the people of Ontario on those maritime provinces. Let me say, in the first instance, there ought to be a generous feeling with regard to that matter. Long before confederation was projected, the people of the maritime provinces, and more particularly the people of Nova Scotia, were anxious beyond measure to have association, friendship and trade with the people of western Canada. There was a very strong feeling that we ought to know more about the people of western Canada, that we ought to be sociable and friendly with them, and so, before confederation, the legislatures of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia passed legislation guaranteeing large sums of money to build a railway, and they agreed among themselves as to how the money should be apportioned. They made an arrangement with the then province of Canada to bring this about, but the negotiations failed in some way. It is not necessary to explain how they did. Then confederation came on, and it was the most natural thing in the world for the people of the maritime provinces to seek to have this railway built, and they required it to be part of the compact of confederation. My hon. friend seems to have overlooked that part of the question altogether, and he further overlooks the fact that if there is any concession in the way of the cost of carrying trade to the people of the maritime provinces the people of Ontario share in the benefit of that; that if they get their goods taken to the maritime provinces at a lower rate, they have an advantage. He ought also to remember that there is a tax upon flour, which we do not produce in the maritime provinces, which I am sure is to the interest of Ontario, and not at all to our interests. So I trust my hon. friend in some happy mood will so frame his mind that when this question again comes up he will present it in a way, not calculated to shock the sensibilities, and jar the nerves of the people of the maritime provinces. That brings me to a greater question—what shall be done with the Intercolonial railway? I am heartily of the opinion, without any reservation, that the whole road should pass out of the control of the government of Canada entirely, and that the management should be entirely independent of politics, looking to its own ends and trying to achieve such results as have been suggested by the hon. member from Westmorland. We constantly hear in parliament suggestions that this year has been much better than last year, and the present management much better than the past management, and so on, as time rolls by. Well, there are good times even in railroad management, but on the whole the management is not good in view of the fact that it is contrary to the genius of railway management on this continent to have a road controlled by the government, and it is useless for us to try to carry out in one part of our country a scheme of railway management different from that which generally prevails in America.

My hon. friend referred to political influences. It is impossible to avoid them. Whatever may be the success in Australia, I think that the answer is complete, that the government there own all the railways. The people are aware of the whole situation and can control not only a particular railway, but all the railways of the country. Whether we could do so satisfactorily or not, I do not state absolutely; but I have seen many questions raised as to whether the Australian system works out in actual practice as satisfactorily as it is assumed to work out by the friends of that system. But whether it works out well or not in Australia, it would be a great deal better for the maritime provinces to have the road pass out from government management. I have repeatedly urged this. I have favoured handing the road over to the Canadian Pacific railway; but I am indifferent as to who has possession of the road provided the government will divest itself of the control of it entirely. I believe it would do more towards the development of that part of the province through which it passes, and that it would give better satisfaction to the people than it does now. If you read the maritime province newspapers, you will find constant complaints about the doings of the road. I think they are partially undeserved; but the fact that complaints are made shows that there is a rent somewhere, and people think there might be something better. I make no charge against the management. I am willing that all past sins should be forgotten. Years ago I thought there were many things the railway ought to have done and others that it should not have done, but I think we might seal all that up and start on a new career with the road by giving it different management. If I were for one month Minister of Railways I would put my own scheme in operation, and we would rid the country of this troublesome burden, and be free of the danger in the presence of which we now stand by reason of the large number of these private roads which there is such a desire to place under the control of the government. The hon. member from Halifax showed that the mileage of these branches was equal to or more—I think a great deal more—than the mileage of the Intercolonial railway, in the maritime provinces. You are only extending a bad system if you add these on to a system that has served its purpose. The road is built. It is there. The old desire of people in that district to come to Ontario has increased, but we can now get there by more ways than one. Communication has been opened up in a variety of ways. We do not concern ourselves now about what particular route we travel to get to this part of the country. The trade steadily increases, and it is impossible to conceive of any plan that would block it. I hold the belief that we have a very good Minister of Railways, and the recent commission has handled the government road very well, but considering all things I concur in the view that the road should absolutely and entirely pass out of the hands of the government, every mile of it, and so free it from the political restrictions which hamper it.

Hon. Mr. KING—I have not heard the views expressed by other hon. members; but I have views of my own on this question, and I shall take the opportunity of placing them before the House. I purpose first to refer to the building of the Intercolonial railway. In doing so I am aware that I am going back forty or fifty years. After I deal with that, I desire to say something in regard to the branch lines. I think it is a well known fact that the Intercolonial railway was, and the maritime provinces people claim it was, a part and parcel of the terms of confederation, and as a representative from the maritime provinces I contend that if conditions now were the same as they were then, I would be the last one to rise to my feet and ask to make any change of ownership of the road other than it has at persent, that is that the government of Canada should continue to operate it, whether it paid or not. But I am reminded —and the House will pardon me if I refer to a well known fact—that circumstances have changed materially since the Intercolonial railway was built. I am not going now to refer, as I have on many occasions, to the mistake made in the location of the road. The road is there. It has served a good purpose. It has traffic to take care of for all time on the north shore of the province. But since that road was built, the government of Canada have arranged for the construction of another road from Montreal to St. John, New Brunswick, and, if I am not mistaken, for the last twenty years they have been paying the company operating that road a subsidy of $180,000 a year. That gives the people of the lower provinces two lines to Quebec and Montreal. In addition to that, we are to-day building a third line through the centre of the province of New Brunswick, starting at Winnipeg and terminating at Moncton. I do not think it is fair for us in New Brunswick to contend that we have been sacrificed by either party in Canada. We have been well looked after, and in the near future we will have, I hope, at least two transcontinental lines using a portion of the Intercolonial railway. Now with regard to the distribution that ought to be made of the road proper, I will simply give my own view for what it is worth. If a company owning one of the transcontinental roads can be induced to take over that portion of the Intercolonial railway between Moncton and Montreal and operate it, and bring to it transcontinental business, I would say let them have it. It is not necessary for me to state to whom they might give it. I have heard it stated that the Canadian Northern is anxious to secure an outlet to Halifax and St. John. I would say that in the hands of that company it would be perfectly safe. In a very short time the Grand Trunk Pacific will be completed to Moncton; and as it is generally believed and supposed in this House that the Grand Trunk railway proper dominates to a large extent the building of the Grand Trunk Pacific, they will no doubt contribute something towards the running of that road, between Montreal and Moncton when it is once ready for operation. The Intercolonial railway gets to-day from Montreal almost everything, excepting what originates in Montreal, all its traffic is handed to it directly by the Grand Trunk railway. So soon as the Grand Trunk Pacific operate the road to Moncton you can rest assured that the Grand Trunk railway are no longer going to hand over any freight to the Intercolonial railway. It must of necessity suffer loss. The point I make is this: that now is the time, or in the early future, when some provision should be made to counteract the loss in traffic on the operation of that road from Quebec to Moncton by the Grand Trunk railway. Who is in a better position to supply the traffic than some company operating a transcontinental line, let it be the Canadian Northern or some other line. I know of no road but the Canadian Northern. If these gentlemen want to take that road and operate it on fair terms, looking carefully after the rights of the people along the north shore of New Brunswick from a local standpoint, I do not think the people of the north shore could have any right to complain. During the discussion on both sides of this question it is generally conceded that the people of New Brunswick are all interested in the operation of the Intercolonial railway. I want to point out that one-half of the people of New Brunswick receive no benefit whatever from the operation of the Intercolonial railway. One-half are entirely dependent on the Canadian Pacific railway. How far they are satisfied with that I do not know. Now, to go a little farther. We have to-day, starting from St. John and landing in Halifax, I believe, one of the best paying pieces of railway in all Canada. I know that the people of St. John and all along that line of railway are very sensitive on this question. They do not want to let that road go. They are to-day, it is generally admitted, getting better terms in the matter of rates, but not in regard to passengers, than they are getting on some of the roads in New Brunswick. Admitting that is true, I see no reason why the government could not devise some scheme by which the road from St. John to Halifax should be handed over, not to one company, but to the three transcontinental railway companies, if Mackenzie and Mann are going to extend their railway down there, and I believe they are. Let these companies operate it jointly from St. John to Halifax, and let them pay a good, fair, round rental to the government of Canada. I am not well enough versed in these matters to know what they ought to pay, but I venture to say that if the government were to get a good rental for the section from St. John to Halifax, to be run jointly by the three transcontinental companies, that they will be able, without costing Canada a dollar, to double track the road from St. John to Halifax.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—Do you mean to give them running rights?

Hon. Mr. KING—To give them full control, and let them manage it themselves. Perhaps it cannot be done, but I think it can. When they strike Moncton, they come to one common point. No injustice can be done to the local traffic. They might make the arrangement so as to satisfy the maritime provinces that the present tariff for freight and passengers should remain as a basis, and if it was increased, that it should be dealt with by the Railway Commission and not by the government. I do not think that any one in St. John or Halifax would have the slightest right to complain, and if there is a man in the maritime provinces who does not see the advantages it would be to the provinces to have three transcontinental lines transporting goods from Moncton to Halifax, and Moncton to St. John, I do not think he should be in business. There is enough for them all now. There is just this about it; if you arrange it in that way, traffic will not go to Portland, Maine.

Get the three companies interested. The Canadian Pacific railway is doing a great deal for St. John. They have been the salvation of that city. Halifax people are jealous because they have done so much for St. John. I believe the time is coming, in the near future, when St. John and Halfax can have all the business they can take care of if this proposal I am submitting is carried out. There may be some difficulties, and if there are, I should like some hon. gentleman who knows more about it than I do to point them out. I have carefully considered the matter, and I do not think there can be the slightest difficulty in having the three companies get together and operating that road. I am quite aware that my remarks will be criticised in the province from which I come.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—What about the branch lines?

Hon. Mr. KING—What I propose, settles the question of the branch lines. There is not a branch line in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, or in Quebec, which will not be sought after by one of those rival companies. It means a great deal to a through line crossing from the Atlantic to the Pacific to obtain control of a branch line, even if the traffic be small on it. When a person is going to the northwest he does not buy a ticket for the distance he travels on the Intercolonial, he buys a through ticket, and I venture to say that the gentlemen interested in the branch lines there will not have the slightest difficulty in leasing their lines if this plan be carried out. In regard to the Canadian Eastern, I venture also to say that there would be competition at once between the Grand Trunk Pacific and the company operating the Intercolonial railway to acquire that line. I think that it can be sold to either one of the companies for more than the owners paid for it, because it would mean to one, or perhaps both, a great feeder. The branch lines are numerous, and one or other of the companies would want to have them for the reasons which I have just stated, because when you start on a branch line, you can go, as a through passenger, clear across the continent. Suppose you haul a man twenty miles on a branch line for 60 cents, and you get a further sum of $60 for carrying him to Vancouver, you make money out of him. There is no danger to the branch lines in that event. I think the matter is well worth consideration, and I should like to hear expressions from others who are quite as much interested as myself in this important matter.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Fortunately or unfortunately I was a member of the House of Commons at the time many of these branch lines were under discussion. I then took a certain course. I felt at that time that many things were being done for the benefit of the Intercolonial railway which were not in the best interests either of the road or of the country at large, and I feel to-day that we ought to be very guarded and understand exactly what we are doing. and I ask the right hon. leader of the House if there is now an agitation in the maritime provinces demanding that this legislation should be enacted? We have not got such information. When the hon. gentleman from Westmorland was addressing the House, I waited very patiently during the delivery of his eloquent speech, to ascertain if I could from that hon. gentleman—and he is generally correct in his view of the proper course to pursue—what his views were, and he gave me no information as to whether he would vote for or against the Bill. I listened to the hon. gentleman from Halifax, who always has an idea, and has the courage of his opinions and is ready to state them, and I failed to find what course he was going to pursue. The hon. gentleman lives in Nova Scotia and knows thoroughly the wishes and desires of the people, and I thought he would be able to give me some idea why the agitation was brought on, and why the government was asked to submit a Bill to lease these branch lines. Have we any evidence that it is in the interests of the Intercolonial railway or of that section of the country that these branch lines should be absorbed by the government? I do not know what lines they are going to absorb or desire to take over. It would have been better, perhaps, if we knew the course they intended to pursue in this respect before we were asked to pass a blanket Bill whereby they might cover all these branches. I recall to mind that the Intercolonial railway was built because of a compact entered into at confederation, whereby the maritime provinces might be brought into the union and be part and parcel of the Dominion, as they had at that time had an objection to coming in. It was not then considered that the Intercolonial railway was to be a commercial road. It was supposed to be a public work in the interests of the country at large. I therefore feel that the large amount of money we expended on the construction of that road was expended under the compact entered into between the people of the maritime provinces and the people of the upper provinces to induce the maritime provinces to become part of the union. If that be so, what right have we to deal with it as a commercial road? Or to say that it should be made a profitable road in the hands of the government of the day? I am not in a position to know that these branch lines are important to the safety and welfare of the Intercolonial railway. If the Intercolonial railway was built on account of the compact entered into, we know that the branch lines would not be a part of that compact, and, therefore, there is no reason why we should take them into account. My hon. friend from Westmorland, of all the men down there, ought to understand the position in reference to these branch lines; but he did not convince me that it was in the interest of commerce and the interest of the provinces by the sea that the branch lines should be absorbed by the Intercolonial. I think the House fully understands that as a commercial road it has never been a success. Some people say that is on account of extravagance in management. Others contend it is caused by mismanagement. However that may be, different ministers have had control of it, and different governments have been in power, and the result has been the same; there is always a certain amount of loss in the operating of the road. Has it been shown that by taking the branch lines over we will get rid of that difficulty?

The senior member from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) states that they are asking for power to take over 400 miles of branch lines. If the government are unable to run the road economically now, will the taking over of 400 miles of branch lines accomplish that object? The whole thing appears to me to be very unreasonable. Then the hon. member from St. John (Hon. Mr. Ellis) states distinctly he could understand that if a certain thing were done the road might possibly pay. Then another member from New Brunswick says that if they could make an arrangement with the National Transcontinental railway to run through to Halifax it would be a good thing in the interest of the people there. I have no doubt it would be an advantage, and would lessen the expenditure, but would the people there be satisfied with such a policy? Do those who entered into confederation in the various provinces desire that such should be the case? Shall we merely for the dollars and cents in it violate a compact? I was very much surprised to hear the hon. member from Wellington (Hon. Mr. McMullen) denounce the road, and every thing in it. He looked upon it as a commercial enterprise; but I cannot make myself believe that it is a matter merely of dollars and cents. It is the duty of the government of Canada to do all in their power to enhance the traffic of that road. If that can be done by absorbing branch lines, then that is the policy to adopt, but before doing so, let them come down, as Sir Charles Tupper did, and say what they expect will be the result. Sir Charles predicted that if the road were extended from Richmond to Montreal it would prove a gold mine, and the government could lay aside a certain amount out of the earnings every year to pay for the construction of the whole road. If the government would now tell us what they expect to gain by acquiring these branches, there might be good reason for granting this legislation. I must congratulate my hon. friend from Westmorland that he does not hold the same opinions to-day that he did five or six years ago. He then said that there was so little traffic on the Intercolonial railway, that they could hardly load a single freight car. Lest I should be suspected of misquoting him, I shall read what he said with reference to the Intercolonial railway in reply to some remarks of mine. He said:

> The hon. gentleman does not understand me yet. I said that the export trade had decreased in St. John. I endorse what my hon. friend said, there has been a stisfactory increase in the trade of the port of St. John, but it was due to the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway, and the extension of their system to St. John, but that nothing came over the Intercolonial railway.

Does my hon. friend feel that way now, that there is nothing coming over the Intercolonial railway whereby the traffic is increased?

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I endorse what the hon. gentleman has read, every word and sentence of it. In the years that have elapsed since that time, a considerable amount of money has been spent on the harbour of St. John by the government, to afford facilities for export traffic, and the late Minister of Railways built an elevator there, in order that grain might be shipped by that route, yet there has never been a cargo carried over the Intercolonial railway for shipment at St. John, that is, from the western provinces. The Canadian Pacific railway has created a very valuable export business there, which is increasing rapidly every year. The increase is due altogether to the business management and enterprise of the Canadian Pacific railway.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—My hon. friend feels that it is not the Intercolonial railway that is doing good in New Brunswick. What I said before I say now. The hon. gentleman further said at the foot of the same page:

> The hon. gentleman entirely misunderstands me. I said there had not been sufficient grain over the Intercolonial railway to load a vessel.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—That is just what I say now, and there has not been since.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—What does the hon. member from Westmorland now contend? That we should acquire some of those unfortunate branch lines, for what? To increase the traffic and trade. But he says it is the Canadian Pacific railway that has increased the traffic at St. John? I think I am perfectly justified in holding the opinion that whatever my hon. friend may or may not have been at that time, he is to-day and ought to be adverse to the extension either by acquiring branch lines or building new lines through that section of the country. He knows perfectly well why the Intercolonial railway was built, that it was built to carry out the compact between the provinces of the Dominion. The hon. member from Halifax knows perfectly well that the absorption of 400 miles of branch lines is not in the interest of the Dominion, but let him be patriotic and reply forcibly to the charges made that we have been paying higher freight rates in other parts of the Dominion than are paid in the province of New Brunswick. We are satisfied to let them have the advantage and the benefit. We partially forced them into the Dominion, and we have no right to hold them now responsible for the railroad not being a commercial enterprise. While the road has been a heavy burden on the people of Canada, I feel that I would rather support half a dozen Intercolonial railways than not have the Dominion of Canada extend from ocean to ocean. It was a grand enterprise entered into by the early statesmen of Canada. They conceived the idea of building the Intercolonial railway as a military, and not as a commercial road, and we ought to feel grateful to them for the great work they accomplished to carry out their views. While I say that, I condemn those who to-day and previously have complained and opposed the construction of the National Transcontinental railway. If the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway has developed an immense traffic, may we not expect that when the National Transcontinental railway is running through from ocean to ocean a stream of freight will be pouring down to the sea, and our friends on the Atlantic coast will feel the impetus given to them by the trade of the west. Our duty is to build up this new country, and we want its progress to be permanent and substantial. If a few million dollars are necessary to hold together the bonds existing between the various provinces it is our duty to grant it, and I for one am not going to haggle over it. Like my hon. friend from British Columbia (Mr. Macdonald) while voting for the Bill, I feel that we ought to have more information as to why it has been brought in, and why the government could not have waited until there was an absolute necessity to come down with a scheme to absorb certain branches. I have confidence in my own political friends and know that while they are in power they will do what is right, but I can remember a time not long ago when others were in power their action and conduct I did not hold in as great estimation. I know from a certain thing which they did that their promises were not realized, and feeling that they might through some unfortunate accident come back to power, I am going to support the motion for the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—We have heard expressions of opinion which are valuable from the maritime provinces, and from the west. We ought also to hear opinions from the far west and from the province of Quebec, and I therefore move that the debate be adjourned until Tuesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

IMPROVED PAPER MACHINERY COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY (in the absence of Hon. Mr. Kirchhoffer) moved the second reading of (Bill 67), An Act respecting the Improved Paper Machinery Company.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There may be circumstances which justify the renewal of a patent which has been allowed to lapse, and if the suggestion which I made a few days ago were acted upon, that is, if the reasons why the company ask for a renewal of the patent were embodied in the preamble to this Bill, it would save a great deal of discussion. In many cases, such a course would remove many of the objections which are taken, on general principles, to the passing of measures of this kind. I find that this Bill is not of the same character as others to which I have taken objection. I am informed on good authority that the parties interested in this patent have spent a very large amount of money in the Eastern Townships in order to carry on their work under the patent; but that through the negligence of one of their agents or attorneys entrusted with the looking after the interests of the company, their patent has been allowed to lapse. If that be the case, to my mind, it removes the objections which I should otherwise have taken to the Bill. Under the circumstances, I have no objection to the passing of this measure.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

MOND NICKEL COMPANY PATENT BILL.

The order of the day being called:

Resuming adjourned debate on motion for second reading (Bill 92) An Act respecting a patent of the Mond Nickel Company, Limited.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This is just one of these objectionable Bills that ought to be rejected. When I brought up this question a few days ago, the leader of the House acquiesced in the objections I had taken on general principles, and he promised to call the attention of the Department of Agriculture to the matter. I understood also that Mr. O'Halloran, the Deputy Minister of Agriculture, appeared before the committee upon the Bill which was reported a short time ago, that the preamble was not proven. If the government have a policy upon this question, it is singular they do not enforce it, unless we are to understand it has been objected to by this House. We find the deputy minister informing the committee that the department, and I presume the government, are opposed to the renewal of these patents, under most circumstances, unless they are of the character of the one to which I have just called the attention of the Senate. It is also a fact that the Minister of Agriculture was present in the Commons when the Bill was passed, and the leader of this House indicated the policy of the government and confirmed the statement made by Mr. O'Halloran before the committee. If that be the case, why does not the government take a positive stand upon this question, and ask the House to reject such Bills unless good reason is shown for making an exception? It seems to me an abdication of their functions. The government ought to have a policy and try to enforce it. If it is opposed by a majority in this House, it will not affect their position, but in the other House they should take the consequences of adhering to their policy. In this case, the patent is not asked to be renewed by the inventor, but by speculators who have bought it, and who control it. This patent was originally taken out in 1896. The House is asked to renew the lapsed patent, and grant an extension to the 16th March, 1914. In order to protect those who may have commenced operations under the system to which this patent applies, they are to be protected up to the 16th October last. Is it possible that this date is fixed because some person or company has commenced operations to use this patent?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—That was probably the date of the first notice that appeared in the Official Gazette.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Very likely it is; but this protection should be extended until the time that the Bill has been sanctioned by the Governor General. I am not objecting to this from any personal reason, but for years I have been objecting to the renewal of patents except under peculiar and justifiable circumstances. It is fourteen years since the patent was taken out. Will any one say that these people did not know what the effect would be of their violation of the provisions of the Patent Act? It is altogether too absurd. The industrial development of this country, particularly in the mining business, has become so important that these people think they can make some money out of the patent now, and they are asking to have it renewed.

Right Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I am not sufficiently acquainted with the details of the matter to which the hon. gentleman has alluded to make any definite statement. I think when it goes before the committee, it will be found that it is not precisely as he supposed it to be. I brought the whole matter, as I told the hon. gentleman I would, to the attention of the Department of Agriculture, and I understand from them that the policy, at any rate for the future, for that department, is that they would oppose these applications for the renewals of patents unless it appeared that the patentee had not been to blame, but that the failure to comply with the terms of the law had arisen through the fault of his agent. That, I understand, was the statement made by Mr. O'Halloran, and confirmed by Mr. Fisher.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—This Bill is just such a measure as has been described by the right hon. gentleman. The fault in this case is not that of the patentee, or the holder of the patents, but of the agent in Montreal.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The proposition made by the hon. member from Hastings, in regard to the effect of the renewal only coming into operation when the Bill is sanctioned, would not be fair. The notice of renewal is given in the Official Gazette, and if anybody wanted to take advantage of that notice he could establish a little factory without any real intention of manufacturing, but simply for the purpose of blackmailing the holder of the patent. The time should date from the notice in the Official Gazette. That has been the policy of the Private Bills Committee for some time past.

The motion was agreed to on a division, and the Bill was read a second time.

COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC HEALTH.

THIRD REPORT.

Hon. Mr. DE VEBER, from the Committee on Public Health and the Adulteration of Food, presented their third report, and moved that it be taken into consideration on Thursday next. He said: I am putting off the consideration of this report until Thursday for a definite purpose. We have no power to pass legislation in reference to these matters. Our efforts must therefore be merely suggestive, and educational. The work of the committee of last session is now before you in printed form, and I am allowing a certain number of days to pass between the presenting of the report and consideration of the same, in order that the members of the Senate may become familiar with the evidence in that report, and in the hope that it will lead to a full, free, and open discussion. The freer the discussion the more apparent must it be that Canada is suffering from the pollution of her streams, and the fuller the discussion, the more widespread will the evidence be disseminated. If any hon. gentlemen have not yet received copies of the report, and wish to obtain a few to send them to their friends, I shall be pleased to supply them.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I do not wish to discuss the report, only to say that I do not agree with the hon. gentleman that we have not the jurisdiction to deal with the matter fully. I intend when the second reading of the Bill that stands in my name on the order paper, for Wednesday next, is moved, to offer to the House an argument which I hope will be found sufficient to convince hon. gentlemen that we have ample jurisdiction to deal with the whole matter, and that it is not at all necessary to ask the provinces to co-operate with us in enacting such legislation as we may find desirable. I wish to put myself on record as not agreeing with the conclusion of the report.

The motion was agreed to.

LOCATIONS UNDER SCRIP AND MILITARY WARRANTS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. TALBOT moved:

That an order of the Senate do issue for a statement showing the number of homestead entries, pre-emptions, scrip locations and military warrant locations in townships 35, 36, 37, 38 and 39, in ranges 1 to 19, inclusive, of 4th meridian and in townships 32, 33 and 34, in ranges 1 to 8, inclusive, west of 4th meridian.

The motion was agreed to.

IMMIGRATION OFFICE AT QUEBEC.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved:

That an order of the Senate do issue for the production of a copy of the inquiry made in 1906, by Mr. Blair, an officer of the Department of the Interior, concerning certain charges as to the manner in which the immigration office at Quebec was then administered, and of the report made to the government by said officer.

The motion was agreed to.

MANITOULIN AND NORTH SHORE RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middlesex) moved the seond reading of Bill (No. 113) An Act respecting the Manitoulin and North Shore Railway. He said: This Bill asks for two things, first, an extension of time, and, second, that it be declared a work for the general advantage of Canada. I am satisfied that the Bill is one that should be passed, but I do not want to hold myself responsible for the declaration in the fifth clause. I move the second reading, however, and clause five can be considered in committee, when the Bill is sent there.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

TREATIES AFFECTING CANADA.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middlesex) rose to:

Call the attention of the Senate to the difficulty in obtaining the full text of treaties made by the government of the United Kingdom and foreign countries affecting the Dominion of Canada, and will move that steps be taken at an early day to compile such treaties or such portions of them as affect Canada into a volume for the use of members of parliament, with a reasonable number for distribution among the public libraries of Canada, and in the same connection to compile the various constitutional Acts passed by the parliament of Great Britain since 1759, relating to any of the provinces now forming part of the Dominion of Canada.

He said: This motion has been before the Senate for some time. A very few words of explanation will make clear what I mean by it. Hon. gentlemen are aware of the difficulty there is in getting access to treaties affecting Canada. They are scattered through various volumes of statutes and other public documents, and, if one wishes to be informed in regard to them, the amount of research required is out of all proportion to what one would expect in a well organized public library. A similar difficulty presented itself in the United States, and in 1904, the following resolution was adopted by the United States Senate:

Resolved that a revised edition of the compilation of treaties in force be prepared under the direction of the committee on foreign relations, and that there be inserted in said revised edition, all treaties proclaimed and in force at the end of the present session; and that there shall be printed 500 copies of said revised edition for the use of the Senate.

The volume I have here is the result of that resolution. In the preface I find the following:

The following revised edition of treaties in force was prepared, under the direction of the committee on foreign relations, by Mr. William M. Malloy, and contains treaties and conventions, important international acts, agreements and protocols (except claim protocols) to which the United States is a party, in force on April 28, 1904, at the end of the second session of the fifty-eighth congress, as provided in the foregoing resolution. A supplement is added (page 948) containing treaties ratified during the last session of congress, but not proclaimed, and in force until after the adjournment of congress on April 28, 1904.

This compilation contains all the treaties affecting the United States since the revolution. It is easy of access; it is to a certain extent, I may assume, practically authentic, and enables one who has to discuss a treaty, or the relations of the United States by treaty to another country to get access to the information without trouble. In 1807, pursuant to the action of the British government, there was compiled also a similar volume of treaties, not so comprehensive in some respects as that compiled at the instance of the United States Senate, but equally useful, the title of which reads as follows:

> Handbook of treaties, etc., relating to commerce and navigation between Great Britain and foreign powers, wholly or partially in force.

In the note at the beginning it says:

> Although assistance is given towards this compilation from public funds on the ground of its general utility, it must be understood that it is not an official publication, and that the editor is responsible for its contents.

Although the editor was responsible for its contents, still it was considered of sufficient value to be aided out of the public treasury. These two instances are quite suggestive. Our treaty relations are very extensive, some of them ancient history. We know that from year to year some of our oldest treaties require consideration. We often refer to the treaty of Paris, 1763, as the basis of the compact made between our compatriots of the province of Quebec at the time of the capitulation in 1759, and it is very interesting to see the precise terms of the agreement between the two powers concerned. We have the treaty of 1783, made with the United States, by which our boundaries were determined, and which led subsequently to many arbitrations such as the Ashburton treaty of 1842 and the Oregon treaty of 1846, and it is interesting to go back, and it may be necessary to go back, to the original text in order to understand its precise terms. Then we have the treaty of 1818, after the war of 1812, in which certain agreements were made with the United States with regard to the fisheries, which are understood to abrogate certain rights claimed by the United States to fishing in British waters. That is to be argued shortly before the Hague tribunal. It would be interesting to go back to the original treaty and see the terms in which it was expressed. Then we have the treaty of 1854, a reciprocity treaty based upon certain conditions; should we ever require to negotiate another reciprocity treaty it would be useful to have that for reference. We have the treaty of 1871, which affected us in many material respects, and the treaty of 1885, which was not ratified by the United States Senate. I am running over a few of the most important treaties. Others may be required for reference at any time. At all events, I think this House would be doing a public service if they placed before our students of history these important documents. I do not think they can be found outside of the city of Toronto, unless it be in the public library here. There is no doubt there are some at McGill university, and probably at Laval university; but they are not documents as widely diffused as they might be.

The second part of the resolution deals with an equally important and comprehensive subject. No one can tell what may arise in a debate, and we may have to refer to the original basis on which these British North American colonies became parts of the empire and under what conditions. Take the history of Prince Edward Island; I know it would require considerable research to find the original constitution of that province, under what terms it became incorporated as a separate colony, and on what conditions responsible government was granted to Prince Edward Island. The same remark applies to Ontario and Quebec. These are very important historical events in the history of Canada, to which it might be very desirable and useful to refer. Then we have, besides, the Quebec Act of 1774, an Act of the utmost importance to any student who wants to thoroughly understand the foundations of Canadian history. There is embodied in an Act of the British parliament the conditions on which our French compatriots were allowed the free exercise of their religion, the use of their language, and the terms of settlement as to the original estates of the seigneurs and the relations of the Seigneurs with the Censitaires. We have the Constitutional Act of 1841, which gave us responsible government. The British North America Act of 1867, happily, is easy of access; but there is behind these, or intermingled with them, several other documents of great importance. It may be necessary for us to go back to the original concessions given to the Hudson Bay Company, or the Northwest Trading Company, or the charter under which Prince Rupert's land was handed over to a small incorporated body. Then we would like to see the terms upon which the transfer was made from this original company to the Dominion of Canada about 1868 or 1869. You can find it in a statute, but the statutes are not always easy of access, and we should have them embodied in a compilation of this kind. Then there is the constitution by which Manitoba became a province, as well as the Act of parliament by which British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan were incorporated in the Dominion. There is another important document which is not a treaty, but which for many years was construed as a treaty, the convention of 1818 between Canada and the United States in the matter of keeping armed vessels on the lakes. That agreement has been violated, it is assumed, by the United States. Although it was not a treaty, the conditions were embodied in letters or notes as, they are called, between the governments of Great Britain and the United States, and have been regarded to all intents and purposes by both parties as having the full force and effect of a treaty. We have to refer to that occasionally to understand our true position.

The expense of this compilation would be a trifle. It would make a good-sized blue-book, and that is all. If the Senate would agree to the resolution, I think, the Speaker might assume that he was instructed to communicate with the office of the Secretary of State and have steps taken at once for the preparation of such a volume. We have a Department of External Affairs now specially charged with those matters of treaties and foreign conventions and so on, and it would be a legitimate occupation for the officers of that department, and would enable them, perhaps, under stress of preparing such a volume, to become better acquainted with the relations of Canada to other countries. We are growing steadily, and the more we know of our past history and the obligations and responsibilities imposed upon us under treaties and conventions and Acts of the imperial, as well as of our own parliament, the better will we understand our relation to Great Britain and the other powers which that relation brings us in contact with, as well as our relations with the various provinces of the Dominion.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I quite agree with the hon. gentleman from Middlesex, that it is very desirable that some such compilation as he speaks of should be made or obtained as soon as possible, and placed in the hands of members of parliament and others who may desire to acquaint themselves with our relations with foreign countries, and the early history of this community. I have received a letter from the under Secretary of State for External Affairs in reference to this matter, in which he informs me that the Prime Minister last summer had been discussing this question with him, and that instructions had been issued to Mr. Pope to prepare just such a compilation as my hon. friend speaks of. As yet, of course, he has not been able to do a great deal with it for the reason that the full text of some of these earlier treaties has not been found easy to procure; but he has begun work and informs me that he hopes to produce such a volume as my hon. friend desires before long. He adds that in case Mr. Ross or any other gentleman desired it, he had a pretty good collection of the treaties, in various volumes, however, which he would be very happy to submit for the inspection of any who desired to see them. Of course, the resolution of the Senate will be a useful spur to Mr. Pope to proceed with this and I see no objection whatever to passing the motion.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—A compilation of the character indicated by the hon. mover will be of great value to those who desire to ascertain what has been done and what have been our privileges and restrictions in the past. I would suggest that while the compiler is at work great care should be taken to indicate those treaties or agreements or Acts of parliament which are referred to by the hon. gentleman and a note should be made as to how far they are in force at the present moment. The compilation to which the hon. gentleman has referred will be more of a historical character than anything which has been produced for a number of years. For the last twenty years I am not aware of any treaty into which Great Britain has entered with foreign countries which includes Canada. The practice was formerly—and I presume it has been continued by the present government—when any treaty was entered into by England with a foreign country, it was submitted to Canada, asking whether Canada would be prepared to become a party to the treaty.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middlesex)—There have been five or six such treaties within the last few years.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I know there were a great many more during the existence of the late government, because in all cases they were referred to the department over which I had the honour to preside, and in all cases, with the exception of one or two of a very minor character, Canada declined to become a party to such treaties, and for the reason I suppose that actuates the present government, that Canada never knew what moment it might be necessary to deal with foreign governments, as the present government have been dealing with Germany and France, how these treaties might restrict their rights in any agreement into which they might enter. It is unnecessary to call attention to the difficulties which arose when the late government demanded—and the demand was continued by the present government, and the concession was made—that those treaties should be denounced which prevented Canada from dealing with her tariff in favour of England, without giving the same rights and privileges to those countries with which England had treaties in which the favoured nation clause was included. My principal object in rising was merely to point out the necessity, in the production of a volume of that kind, which would be exceedingly valuable to all who are interested in such matters, that notes should be made as to the effect, at the present day, of the treaties into which Great Britain entered and which affect this part of the British Dominions, so that one in reading it might not be misled, or led to the conclusion that certain provisions in the treaties which existed a century or half a century ago, are still in existence, or, if they are still in existence, they have the same force that was intended when the treaties were entered into. That would be of great benefit to us in considering any legislation coming before parliament. I am asking the leader of the government whether the policy which I have indicated, and which actuated the late government in declining to become parties to treaties entered into by Great Britain with foreign countries in which Canada was included and would become a party unless she declined within twelve months, is still observed?

Right Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—As a general rule, we have not thought it expedient to allow Canada to become affected by any treaties made by the home government.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is the same policy then. Because we had a very striking illustration of that in the treaty with Japan, where Canada declined under, the late government, to become a party to the provisions with respect to immigration. Afterwards, the present government made Canada a party to that treaty and led to the difficulties and dissensions which occurred on the Pacific coast. My own view of this matter is that there are certain treaties into which Great Britain may enter, and in which Canada would become a full partner unless she declined, which would not be to the advantage of this country to adopt. We can always accept such a treaty afterwards, if necessary, and I am glad to know that the present government have adopted the principle on which the former government acted in relation to treaties negotiated by Britain.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—If this is to be done, it should be in a thorough way and I do not believe it can be done unless our Secretary of State gets from the Foreign Office all the treaties between Great Britain and the other countries of the world. Because if we have not all those treaties the Foreign Office may feel that some of them do not affect Canada, but which later on may be found to affect this dominion to a certain extent. We are all aware that twenty-five years ago Canada got from the foreign office a list of treaties affecting us, and from that list Switzerland was omitted. Later on, when Canada asked the Foreign Office if Switzerland was not comprised among the nations that had the favoured nation treatment in the British colonies, it seemed to be very difficult to get a reply from the British authorities, and I am not sure the answer was that it was doubtful if Switzerland had favoured nation treatment in Canada. The result was that for a number of years Canada published in its customs legislation a list of nations having favoured nation treatment, from which list Switzerland was omitted, and this caused some difficulty in the Franco-Canada convention signed last year. So that if our Secretary of State is to prepare a complete and interesting work which we can study with advantage, he should see that all the treaties Great Britain has made within the last hundred years, and perhaps before that, are still in force with the outside world. It would be interesting to Canada, inasmuch as we are now expanding, and I hope our business horizon will expand to the four corners of the world. It will be interesting to see if we are not unduly bound by some of those treaties, and if at various stages we should not ask Great Britain to modify such treaties so that Canada may not be further hampered.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It was the difficulty to which my hon. friend has referred that led to the misconception of the real effect of the treaty with France. It was not apparently known at the time by Canadian negotiators that the treaty with Switzerland existed, and, consequently, no provision was made to exclude Switzerland from the effect of the French treaty. I called the attention of this House to the fact that the Swiss ambassador in London was overjoyed when he saw the terms of that treaty. The then Secretary of State poop-poohed the whole idea, saying that it was only a newspaper report. However, our reply to that was, the representatives of Switzerland in England calling attention to the fact that it gave them the same or nearly the same concessions as under former treaties, since they were not exempted from it, and that is one of the principal arguments in favour of the adoption of my hon. friend's motion. Had that been known to our negotiators at the time it was passed, it is very questionable whether they would not have taken precautions to prevent another country taking advantage of our treaty with France without giving any consideration therefor.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—They were working on old information, erroneous information I may say, which came from the Foreign Office.

The Motion was agreed to.

IMPORTATION OF PETROLEUM OIL INTO CANADA.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE moved:

That an order of the Senate do issue for a comparative statement for the years 1907, 1908 and 1909, of crude petroleum oil imported into Canada, and values.

He said: The oil industry in Canada is one of very great importance, and the production in Ontario has, so far as we know to-day, somewhat reached its limit. The great west will, no doubt, in time produce this oil, and it will be all wanted where it can compete successfully with coal, more especially steam coal, in the outlying districts. In other words crude oil at two cents a gallon is equal to steam coal at three dollars a ton, and has in its favour the saving in the waste of the fire bars, labour, &c. If I am advised correctly, a locomotive can be run eleven hundred miles on the oil it can hold, and will carry it with very much less weight than the coal fuel supplied to-day and much cleaner. I want to bring before the public what Canada is doing with crude oil. I have not the information in definite shape; but there were sixty to eighty million gallons of oil consumed in Canada last year, and the year before, the consumption increasing all the time, and that of that amount from thirty-three to forty millions of gallons of crude oil were imported from the United States. An hon. gentleman told me that in their works in Toronto they used 30,000 gallons a month, throwing out the coal entirely, and the supply of oil fuel is likely to become a large question. If we place before this House and the country generally, and people coming over from Europe, and people that are in Europe looking for what we have to sell, what our natural resources are, they will have evidence before them which they would not otherwise get in any other shape. I have in my hand an extract from a London paper of February 14. The 'Daily Express' asserts that the British Admiralty had decided to adopt oil fuel as a substitute for coal in the navy, and has ordered fifty thousand tons of liquid fuel; that means 12,500,000 gallons of oil—one-third what is imported from the United States into Canada. I do not want at present to go into discussion of the navy; but later on I will have a chance to do so. However, we are going to have a navy, and it will require oil. It must not be behind the British system. We must have oil for our ships from Halifax, and other places. We cannot build these ships, and send them on long cruises without oil. Our relations with the United States are, happily, to-day first-class, and I hope they will remain so; but if there should be any embargo on oil we must look for oil fields in Canada where we can get it cheaply and of good quality. The maritime provinces, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, are in a position to produce oil. Some of them get it from the natural formation, and some of them out of oil shale rock, by destructive distillation, and it will be an incentive to capital abroad to come into this country to develop an industry which has not yet been developed, and which is now being looked into, if they could see the position Canada was in, with regard to crude oil. I refer to fuel oil. That is my reason for bringing the matter before the House.

The motion was agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (112) An Act to incorporate the Independent Order of Rechabites.—Hon. Mr. McHugh.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (W) An Act respecting the Ottawa, Brockville and St. Lawrence Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Derbyshire.

Bill (X) An Act to incorporate the Protectorate Life Insurance Company of Canada.—Hon. Mr. Derbyshire.

GOVERNMENT ANNUITIES ACT—AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Right Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (Y) An Act to amend the Government Annuities Act, 1908.

He said: The object of this amendment which I am about to propose in this Bill is chiefly to remove some doubt which has been raised as to the power of the government to grant annuities on certain conditions. The first proposal is to give a somewhat better definition of the word 'purchaser,' as to which some legal doubts were expressed. The next, which is of a little more importance, is to allow parties who so desire to bargain for it, to obtain annuities which will be paid during their lives. and for a certain fixed period in any case either to themselves or their heirs. I need hardly say that anybody taking an annuity on these conditions would not receive as large a sum as if he took an annuity pure and simple. It is a mere matter of notarial calculation as to what rate can be granted to him, if he wishes to have a fixed sum paid to himself and to his heirs for ten years, in addition to having the annuity for the term of his natural life. No additional charge, therefore, would be in any shape or way caused by making this concession, which some parties applying for annuities appear to attach a considerable amount of importance to. Subsections 4 and 5 would necessarily be amended to conform to the definition of the word 'purchaser' in section 42. In the case of the fifth section, a somewhat more important alteration is made at the request of a number of employers. These gentlemen desire to assist their employees; but they desire also that in the case of employees leaving their services at short notice, as they might do for various purposes, bettering their conditions, or moving to other parts of the country, that they should be allowed, as would be the case in the event of a purchaser of an annuity dying before the annuity became due, to receive back the amount they had so contributed, which, under the present wording of the statute, it appears they could not do. This appears to be a reasonable enough provision, and I think it will likely extend to a considerable degree the scope of the Act. The next provision is intended in the first place to allow contracts for annuities to be made up to the age of eighty-five years. For some reason or other not known to me the term of eighty years has been put in. I do not exactly know why, and two or three old gentlemen who desire to purchase annuities were considerably aggrieved by being unable, under the Act as it at present stands, to receive a larger annuity at eighty-two or eighty-three than they would have if they had entered at eighty. It is expedient that there should be a limit fixed about eighty-five. Under existing circumstances, that would answer our purposes better than eighty.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is that under section 5?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —That is under section 6.

Hon. Mr. POWER—A very good advertisement of the healthy climate of Canada.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I see no reason why the request of these parties should not be complied with. There is also a provision which the House will approve of, which permits a man who has become entitled to an annuity to divide the annuity, if he pleases, with his wife. As I said, no additional charge will be imposed upon the country. If the lady was younger than himself, she would not be entitled to receive as much for the moiety as he himself would. That is purely a question of actuarial calculation. The other clauses are the ones suggested by the Department of Justice to remove any doubts that might accrue in the case of a party dying, and there being some question as to whether his legal representatives would be entitled to the amount which might be standing to his credit. I do not think there could have been much doubt, but the department has seen fit to suggest these amendments, and I submit them, therefore, to the consideration of the House. There are none of them that in any shape or way impose an additional charge on the public chest, or interfere with the principles already laid down in the Bill, with which the House, I presume, is sufficiently familiar.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

SEED CONTROL ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 55), An Act to amend the Seed Control Act.

(In the Committee).

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I may state that the object of this Bill, as proposed by the Department of Agriculture, is to amend and extend the portion of the Seed Control Act intended to guard against the diffusion of noxious weeds, and provide for a better and purer seed grain.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Perhaps it would be as well if the right hon. gentleman would explain how it will affect the farmer who may have some seed in his possession, raised by himself, which he desired to sell privately to some of the farmers in his neighbourhood. As I understand this Bill, it would prevent one farmer, although his seed may be as pure as any seedsman's could be, from disposing of that seed to a neighbouring farmer. I do not pretend to know just how it might affect the farming community, but farmers have a perfect right to be guarded in this particular. Many farmers raise just as good a quality of seed as can be produced. They can have it inspected, perhaps. They are subjected, under this Bill, to a penalty if they should sell it without having it inspected and declared to be free from seeds of noxious weeds. I call the attention of the committee to the fact that we should be extremely guarded in our restrictions. No doubt it would be a benefit to the farmer if there were a careful inspection, but the farmer might get into trouble if there were not some protection afforded him. We should therefore, have some reason why this clause should be in force.

Right Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think that the precaution taken is not an unreasonable one. In the case of seed that is exposed for sale, it is only necessary that a certain percentage of it should be pure. If a farmer has in his possession seed of two-thirds of the percentage only, I think it is fair that when he proposes to sell it he should be obliged to state what probable percentage of the seed was fit for germination. The matter was very fully discussed in the Lower House, where there are also a considerable number of practical farmers, and none of them seem to have taken objection to this particular section.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Might I point out for the information of the hon. gentleman from St. Thomas that under the Seed Control Act, there is already a provision of limited extent protecting the farmer under such conditions as have been stated. Take section 5 of the Act:

It is provided that the provisions contained in the next following section shall not apply to the sale of seed that is grown, sold and delivered by any farmer on his own premises for seeding by the purchaser himself, unless the purchaser obtains from the seller at the time of the sale thereof a certificate that the said sale is subject to the provisions of this Act.

Evidently that provision has been inserted for the protection of neighbouring farmers who may grow seed and sell it between themselves. That section would not apply to all the sections with which we are dealing to-day.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The present Bill adds to section 8 of that Act. Unless that portion is repealed, would it not have the effect indicated by the hon. gentleman from St. Thomas (Mr. Wilson)? May I ask the right hon. minister whether this is to have a retroactive effect, and if not would it affect the numerous samples of seed that are now being sold in the different drug stores and other shops throughout the country? My right hon. friend knows that at the present moment there are hundreds of thousands of packages of different kinds of seed on sale. If this Bill should pass, would it affect these packages that are now in stores, which do not contain the certificate provided for?

Right Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It would not be retroactive, I believe, but it would affect any seeds exposed for sale after this Act became law.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—It may be that the explanation covers all I desire to ask in reference to this matter. The clause reads as follows:

8a. No person shall sell, or offer, expose or have in his possession for sale, for seeding, any seeds or cereals, grasses, clovers, forage plants, field roots or garden vegetable crops which are not capable of germinating in the proportion of two-thirds of the percentage standard of vitality for good seed of the kind, unless every receptacle, package, sack or bag containing such seed, or a label securely attached thereto, is marked in a plain and indelible manner with the name of the kind of seed and the percentage of the seeds that are capable of germination.

How will a farmer or gardener be able to satisfy or comply with that law if he has not some one in the neighbourhood who can inspect the seeds and declare them to be equal to or within the standard prescribed by the law? The original Act was, perhaps, too restrictive, and this may lessen that restriction, at all events to a certain extent; yet I am inclined to the opinion that even this amendment will act rather harshly upon the farmers. However, we can try it in the meantime. I am not personally interested, but if we find complaints from the farmer another session, we will have to amend the law. I think it will prove objectionable, as it is, to the farmers and the market gardeners.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not see why the clause should be objectionable to any honest farmer. There are standards provided, fixed under the original Act, and this clause provides for at least two-thirds of the seed—that is two-thirds of the number fixed by the standard—something like 90 per cent. But supposing it is 90 per cent, this clause provides that unless 60 per cent of the seed which the farmer sells is capable of germinating, he is doing what is wrong. Surely my hon. friend from St. Thomas does not think that a farmer should be allowed to sell seed unless something more than one-half of the seed are capable of germinating? Then the last few lines of this clause provide that, even in that case, where two-thirds, or 60 per cent of the seed are not capable of germinating, they can still be sold if a label is attached to the bottle or box, or parcel in which they are placed. If I have any complaint to make of this clause it is that it goes too far in favour of the person selling inferior seed.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS—I call attention to the fact that it simply imposes upon the seed grower the necessity of having an inspection.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Not necessarily.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS—It must be inspected by some person in authority. The individual farmer should make his own inspection, which is often done, and determine how far the seed will germinate, what proportion will grow. We have a department in Ottawa for that very purpose, and it enforces upon the individual farmer, if he has seed grain or seeds of any kind to sell, before he puts it on the market, he must prove that it is capable of germinating up to a certain percentage. That is all I see in the Bill, and it need not be a very great difficulty to any farmer. It might be greatly to his benefit. For example, last year we had personally a good supply of improved French oats that we thought were first class quality, and when it got down to the lakes we were cut very much in price and lost considerable by the judgment of the party at Port Arthur. We took the trouble of sending the same oats down to the department here, and they went to a very high percentage in value, as far as the germination power was concerned, even to ninety-seven; yet we were imposed upon by individual dealers at the lakes, and lost considerably by the car loads that were sent. I am sure it would have been better if we had secured an inspection by the government officer here in Ottawa before we had put those oats upon the market. It would have been money in our pockets.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—This Bill is not too strong. There is nothing of more importance to agriculture than clean seed. Our fields under present conditions are being filled with noxious weeds, and we cannot be too particular with regard to the seed grain that is exposed for sale. The Act is not at all too stringent.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—The hon. gentleman from St. Thomas seems to object to this Bill on behalf of the farmer. This legislation, as I understand, is brought in for the benefit of the farmer. The idea is to create a standard of germination for seed. On account of the difference there is in the germinating power of some seeds as compared with others, the matter is left in the hands of the government to fix the standard. When the standard is fixed, whoever is offering seed for sale is required, under this legislation, that it shall have a germinating power of at least two-thirds per cent. Surely that is low enough even for the farmers, for whom the hon. member from St. Thomas is so solicitous. The Act, even as it stands, has greatly benefited the farmers all over the country. I understand that last year a large number of samples were tested by the Agricultural Department. Of these samples about 5,000 came from merchants or seedsmen, and 8,000 from farmers. That gives some idea of the benefit it is to the country to have this Act in force, for the benefit of the farmers, as well as those who sell seeds.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not think there can be a doubt as to the propriety of enacting a law of this character. If it were confined exclusively to dealers in seeds, &c., nobody could find fault with it. The hon. gentlemen who have spoken have misunderstood the objection raised by the hon. member from St. Thomas. This clause applies to every one who offers to sell seeds. The hon. member from St. Thomas asks whether if a farmer desires to obtain a few bushels of oats or other grain from a neighbouring farmer, the sale could not take place unless this provision of the Act were complied with. I did not understand him to find fault with the application of the Act to the general dealer in seeds. If you read that clause, you will find it goes a long way:

8a. No person shall sell, or offer, expose or have in his possession for sale, for seeding, any seeds of cereals, grasses, clovers, forage plants, field roots or garden vegetable crops which are not capable of germinating in the proportion of two-thirds of the percentage standard of vitality for good seed of the kind, unless every receptacle, package, sack or bag containing such seed, or a label securely attached thereto, is marked in a plain and indelible manner with the name of the kind of seed and the percentage of the seeds that are capable of germination

The deduction I should draw from that clause would be that not one farmer out of five hundred who is applied to by his neighbour for a few bushels of grain to complete his sowing would be able to comply with the provisions of this Bill.

Right Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Does not my hon. friend think that most farmers would be able to tell whether a half or two-thirds of the seed they offer for that purpose would germinate?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am quite satisfied the farmer would be able to give the information; but he would not have a bag or sack labeled to put it in.

Right Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—He could only be fined if he were selling an article which was a good deal under the standard of germination.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He would subject himself, as I understand the provision of this section, to certain penalties unless the seed is put in a sack marked as described.

Right Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—He would escape the penalty if he chose to take that precaution, and he need only take that precaution in cases where less than 60 per cent of the seed is fit for use.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is no such exemption in the clause.

Right Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Oh, yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If he were going to sell 15 or 20 bushels of grain, he could afford to comply with the provisions of the Act.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This prohibition does not extend to the farmer. The Act, as we have it, provides that it shall not apply to grain or seed sold by a farmer. It permits the farmer to sell seed grown by himself to a neighbour, or anybody else. The only thing about it is, he cannot sell it subject to a certificate. If he issues a certificate, it comes within the Act. My own judgment is that if a farmer wants to go into the seed business and issues a certificate as to the seed he is selling being of a particular class or grade, he certainly should come within the Act, and be in the same position as the seed dealer in cities; but it seems to me that the provisions of sections 5 and 6 of the Act we are amending, are sufficiently broad to permit the sales we are now discussing. Under section 6, the farmer has the right to sell, offer and expose for sale, various kinds of seeds, giving a very broad classification of those seeds which farmers are permitted to sell to each other. The only proviso is that they are not allowed to issue a certificate that the seeds are of a particular character.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The amendment comes as an addition to section 8.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is a good thing anyway.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—It is a mistake to suppose that the farmers do not know what they are selling. In our county, the farmers test their seeds by germinating samples of them before the sowing. Any one of them can show his neighbour who wants seeds the result of the test. There it is growing in the boxes.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—It requires to be inspected. It may be that the farmers in the hon. gentleman's section know all about what they are doing, and understand the germinating properties of their seeds; but we require more than that. We require that the seed shall be labeled with a certificate as to the germinating properties. Take Indian corn; it may be of full germinating quality in the fall of the year; but expose it to frost, and the germinating qualities are impaired. A farmer who has tested his corn in the fall of the year may be willing to certify that it is of a certain standard; but in the spring, after a severe winter, the purchaser finds that it does not possess the germinating qualities that had been represented. The leader of the opposition tries to make us believe that the repealing clause here would relieve the farmer from the objectionable features of the Bill. I do not think it would. It is simply repealing a certain section and substituting another therefor. The preceding section will govern the new clause as it does the old section. I doubt if the amended Act will be quite satisfactory to the farming community. However intelligent and careful a farmer may be, under this Act he is liable to get himself into difficulties.

Hon. Mr. WOOD, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

TRANSPORTATION OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (M) An Act to regulate the transportation of intoxicating liquors. He said: The object of the proposed legislation is to protect those parts of Canada that may be under prohibition from having liquor sent in by law-breakers to be sold in opposition to the existing law. I think it may be laid down as a sound principle, that where parliament authorizes the electors to vote on whether prohibition shall prevail over certain areas, if they vote, yea, then it is the duty of parliament to lend the necessary assistance to have the will of the people carried out. That is in accordance with common sense, and I believe the members of the Senate will quite recognize that principle. The principle laid down in the Bill is not new. Parliament has already passed a law on exactly the same lines. Unfortunately, it came in as an amendment to the Canada Temperance Act, and, in consequence, it was not applicable to any other sections of Canada than those which were at the time under the Act. The law on the statute-book was passed in 1908. It passed at the instance of Nova Scotia. The legislature of that province, in 1907, passed the following resolutions unanimously:

That whereas in twelve counties of the province of Nova Scotia the electors have by popular vote brought the Canada Temperance Act into force;

And whereas in the remaining six counties of the province the Nova Scotia Liquor License Act is in force;

And whereas under this legislation evils have arisen from the fact that liquor is being imported from other counties and provinces into counties in which the Canada Temperance Act is in force, and into counties in which no licenses are issued;

Therefore, resolve that this House in so far as it is within its powers should enact such legislation as will prohibit the sending of liquor into counties in which the Canada Temperance Act is in force, and into counties in which no licenses are issued;

And further resolved that this House do place on record its desire that the Parliament of Canada should enact such amendments to the Canada Temperance Act as will prohibit the importation of liquors into counties in which the Canada Temperance Act is in force.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—How many counties in Nova Scotia are under the Canada Temperance Act?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Six, it says here.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—And how many in New Brunswick?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—The resolution says there had been twelve, and they reduced the number to eight. In accordance with that request coming from Nova Scotia, this House has adopted the law now on the statute-book in 1908, and adopted it without a division. Certain suggestions were made, but practically the Bill as presented to this Chamber was adopted unanimously, and afterwards adopted by the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—What year was the Canada Temperance Act first adopted in New Brunswick?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I do not remember. I am not sure whether it was introduced first in New Brunswick or in Prince Edward Island. I think it was New Brunswick; but the law has been in force in parts of Prince Edward Island for over twenty years.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—With what effect?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I will show the effect later on.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I have seen the effect.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Nova Scotia and New Brunswick favoured the adoption of the law in 1908. This Bill is drafted exactly on the same lines as that Act. Prince Edward Island is in this same position: being an island, it is accessible from all quarters, and liquor has been smuggled in by law-breakers contrary to the law existing on the island. Prince Edward Island first adopted the Canada Temperance Act seriatim. It was from time to time voted on, in counties, and finally people were so well satisfied with the working of the Act that they adopted prohibition for the whole island. That Act, of course, had no control over parties who, from the outside, were sending in liquor in defiance of the law, and it is to counteract the opportunity given to law-breakers to bring liquor into the island that this legislation is sought. At a meeting of the legislature last year, the following resolution was passed unanimously: I am reading from the Journal of the Legislative assembly for Prince Edward Island, for the year 1909, page 85:

On motion of Mr. Cox, seconded by Mr. Laird,

Whereas, the province of Prince Edward Island has adopted the Prohibition Act, 1909, and amendments thereto, in all parts of the said province;

And whereas, it is desirable to prohibit the importation for sale of any intoxicating liquor, except through the official vendors under such prohibition Act, and except to any person or persons for his or their personal or family use;

Be it therefore resolved, that this legislature memorialize the Dominion government to pass such restrictive legislation in the traffic in intoxicating liquors as will prevent the importation into this province of any intoxicating liquor as aforesaid, to the end that, as regards the importation and exportation of such intoxicating liquors, this province may be put in the same position as counties in the Dominion of Canada which have adopted the Canada Temperance Act, and especially having regard to 'An Act to amend the Canada Temperance Act,' assented to on July 20, 1908, 7-8 Edward VIII, chap. 71, paragraphs (c) and (d) of subsection 1.

And the question being proposed thereon. It was carried in the affirmative.

It does not appear that it was subject to any vote. It was carried unanimously. This House having enacted the law at the instance of Nova Scotia, there should be no hesitation in applying the principles laid down in that Act to other parts of Canada which desire this protection. The present Bill, therefore, is copied from the Act to which I have referred. An hon. gentleman has challenged my statement as to the benefit the Canada Temperance Act has been to Prince Edward Island. The representatives of that island here to-day can say whether the Act has been a success, and whether the feeling of the island is in favour of this legislation. Some hon. gentlemen are sceptical about making men sober by Act of parliament. I have most conclusive evidence, not only in regard to Prince Edward Island, but in regard to other parts of the world, that restrictive legislation has had the most marked effect, not only on the consumption of liquor, but on the prevalence of crime, where crime has fallen one-half to two-thirds under the influence of temperance. It becomes, therefore, the moral duty of the parliament of Canada to follow the example of other countries and favour this restriction of the liquor trade, where the beneficial results of temperance have been so extraordinary. I am about to read some statistics from the Appendix of the Report of the Minister of Agriculture for the year 1908, giving the criminal statistics for the year ending September 30, 1908. The following figures show the ratio of convictions for larcency per ten thousand inhabitants for the year 1908:

Prince Edward Island	1·09
Nova Scotia	4·14
New Brunswick	3·10
Province of Quebec	7·79
Ontario	12·38
Manitoba	10·82
Saskatchewan	10·96
Alberta	14·79
British Columbia	11·71

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—Would the hon. gentleman read a little further on? He might give us the proportion of convictions. He will find in respect that the province of Quebec stands at the very head.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that there is only one thief or violator of the criminal law in proportion to the population in Prince Edward Island, to the ten or eleven such offenders in other parts of the Dominion?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Then they must keep sober for the purpose of committing theft. I have seen drunkenness there myself. You never see a bank manager committing a crime while he is drunk. He robs others when he is sober.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—The figures I have given are from the departmental statistics, and are authoritative, and confirm the statement I have made. Take the summary convictions for the years 1899 and 1908. Compare the rate of increase per cent during the decade, and you find it to be as follows:

Manitoba	516·1
Northwest	300·9
British Columbia	185·3
Nova Scotia	127·1
Ontario	111·9
Quebec	89·4
New Brunswick	27·2

Prince Edward Island is the only province showing a decrease in the number of summary convictions during the decade. The high rate of increase in the western provinces is explained by the rapid increase in population in late years. The hon. gentleman from Moncton (Mr. McSweeney) asked me for the summary convictions according to population. On the ratio of 1,000 inhabitants. It was:

Prince Edward Island	2·75
Nova Scotia	9·73
New Brunswick	8·03
Quebec	9·06
Ontario	13·36
Manitoba	18·45
Saskatchewan	11·62
Alberta	20·51
British Columbia	20·60

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—What I asked for was a statement of the arrests and convictions for drunkenness. You can get the figures in the Canadian Year-book.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I am reading from a better authority—the departmental returns.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I have been in the police court of this country, and I know as a matter of fact that out of 25 or 30 cases tried in the courts there are not three cases of drunkenness.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—The ratio of drunkenness to one thousand inhabitants is as follows:

Prince Edward Island	1·82
Nova Scotia	6·0
New Brunswick	5·56
Quebec	3·85
Ontario	4·22
Manitoba	8·62
Saskatchewan	3·38
Alberta	7·39
British Columbia	10·51

Is the hon. gentleman satisfied now? I will give him the statistics of all the indictable offences, the higher class of crime. The following table shows the proportion of crime and population compared by provinces:

Prince Edward Island—The percentage was 1·59, which is only ·33 of one per cent.

Nova Scotia—7·34 per cent.

New Brunswick—5·33 per cent.

Quebec—27·97 per cent, and so on.

This is pretty good evidence that the temperance law in Prince Edward Island has had a very marked effect. We find the same effect all over the world where temperance legislation has been adopted. I could give statistics of other countries if time permitted, which would simply confirm the facts I have read. You hear it every day from the judges on the bench. They say that eighty per cent of the crimes of this and all other countries is due to the readiness with which intoxicating liquors can be obtained, driving men into a frenzy.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—But you can take five gallons into your house to your wife and children.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—We will discuss that when we get further on. I do not approve of that part of it. I would rather adhere to the uniform law. In all the provinces they do not interfere with private use, but allow a certain proportion of liquor in a family. It is regulated by the law of the province. In the legislation adopted three years ago, the clause was there, but it did not fix any number of gallons. It said any person could purchase for his own individual use, assuming it was not bought for sale. This Senate, I think, stands very high in the estimation of the people of Canada for the legislation they have initiated from time to time in the last thirty odd years in support of the temperance movement. The first step taken by the parliament of Canada was in 1878, when what is known as the Canada Temperance Act was passed, I myself having charge of the Act, introduced it in this Chamber, where it was discussed for at least a month. The whole question was new, and although I had as member of the government a very small following, there were gentlemen on the opposite side of the House who lent their assistance, and through their aid it was carried by a reasonable majority. There are only four of us at present who were members of the Senate at that time. There are, however, I am happy to say, ten gentlemen who were then members of the House of Commons who gave their assistance, particularly one I might single out, without creating any envy on the part of the others, who rendered substantial aid to the passing of that Bill was the hon. gentleman from Middlesex, who took up the subject there very earnestly in 1878 and succeeded in incorporating some very important suggestions. I am sure he has no regrets for the action he then took, nor do I believe the other nine gentlemen who assisted him, ever for one moment regret the support they gave the Bill at that time. When it was adopted, its influence was marked, except in the particular counties where no action was taken to put it in operation. The people carried it by large majorities, but they left the Act to take care of itself, Of course, it only brought the law into contempt when it was not enforced, and consequently they said it was a failure, necessarily. In the province of Ontario they, therefore, took up the question of local option, and at present the local option requires a three-fifths vote—larger than a majority. The Canada Temperance Act only required a majority. I have here a recent report showing the progress that has been made in Ontario, and I am happy to say also in parts of the province where it was not looked for. Perhaps the hon. gentlemen may not have had their attention directed to an important part of the programme submitted to the electors of British Columbia at the recent election. The question of local option was one of the matters submitted, and, to the great surprise of every one, the people responded with an extraordinary degree of confidence in the benefits which would follow local option.

An influential newspaper commenting on the fact says:

> A majority of 3,695 of those voting on local option in British Columbia expressed their approval of the measure, but the government required that it should be approved by a majority of the ballots cast for all the candidates at the elections, irrespective of the local option issues. The question submitted to the people was as to whether a local option law should be enacted giving the people the power to outlaw the liquor traffic in any municipality. All the municipalities voted upon that question, whether advanced in temperance sentiment or not, with the result that it was carried by a vote of 22,779 for, and 19,084 against. Victoria gave a majority for the measure of 597, Vancouver 774, New Westminster 504, Chiliwack 448, Skeena 401, In no case where the measure was defeated was the majority as much as one hundred, except in Nanaimo, where it was 164. The total of majorities for was 4,200, and of majorities against 505, but the total majority fell short by about 500 of being more than half of the total votes passed.

That shows the enormous development of temperance sentiment in a province where it was not expected, because, naturally, in a mining district the enforcement of a temperance law and the prohibition of liquor would be attended with very great difficulty. In Ontario, at the recent municipal elections, the questions was up with this result: In the past year 250 licenses have been voted out in Ontario; 299 municipalities remaining under license, while 108 supported reduction, and 405 are now under prohibition. There are now less than 2,000 licenses remaining in Ontario, of which 397 have been saved by the three-fifths clause. I merely quote the figures to confirm the statement I have made of the development of the sentiment for curtailing the liquor traffic. The Canada Temperance Act was somewhat of a novelty at the time it was introduced, but it was copied, particularly in the United States. Many states adopted it and dropped it, and took up a similar law of their own, and carried it in many instances. Hon. gentlemen had their attention called to what was recently called the temperance wave in the southern states. Thirteen of those states carried prohibition by extraordinary majorities. Not alone in the southern United States, but all over the states, and all over the world, this prohibition sentiment is growing. Canada no longer occupies the lead. Sweden and Norway have overtaken her, and some other countries have gone in advance. About 18,000,000 of the 20,000,000 people of the southern states have already outlawed the saloons. In New York city, there are one thousand more saloons than in all the fourteen southern states. In Indiana, of the 36,300 square miles of territory, 26,170 have been made dry, and about 1,600,000 of the population out of 2,600,000 were living in dry territory. In Ohio, the saloon had been removed from five entire counties under the previous laws; but since last September 63 counties have voted on the subject, 58 of which have abolished the saloon, and only 9 counties have licensed it, so that of the 88 entire counties of the state, 63 have gone dry and 9 have gone wet. In Michigan, local option elections were held in 27 counties, 20 of which went dry, closing at one stroke 600 saloons and 10 breweries. In New England, recent elections in Connecticut have abolished the liquor traffic from 3,000 square miles of territory, closing 300 saloons during the year. In Norway, local option prohibition prevails over a great deal of the kingdom. Fifty years ago Norway consumed twenty litres of strong drink per capita. To-day the consumption has fallen to two litres per capita. A remarkable advance in the health of the military recruits is one significant evidence of the beneficial result. Sweden has made great progress in the suppression of the liquor traffic under the local option plan, as well as repressing it by the Gottenburg system. Sweden is now in the forefront of nations in the battle against intemperance and the liquor traffic. In the present Swedish parliament there are 138 teetotalers, of whom 136 are in the second Chamber, and two in the first. Thirty-six of these are good templars. I need not continue to read evidence of this kind, but as I have already said, temperance sentiment is spreading rapidly over the world, and cannot be poo-pooed, or cast aside. The old argument that you cannot make men temperate by Act of parliament has been completely upset. The facts are against such a contention. There is the result—the expression of judges on the bench. You rarely read the report for any assize where reference is not made by the judge to crime and drink. One is the barometer of the other. The prevalence of drink is the prevalence of crime. We have had recently an extraordinary instance in Ontario; a young man shooting his mother; we have had several cases of husbands killing their wives under the frenzy of drink, not from other causes, although sometimes it would arise from jealousy. Not more than ten days ago, an Italian shot two of his friends, and when he was brought to the hospital where the men were dying he threw himself on the body of his dying friend completely overcome, and no doubt he himself wished he was dead. He had no enmity against the men he had killed, but just the terrible frenzy into which he got himself through excessive drink. The churches are all preaching temperance, asking for the abolition of the saloons. Two days ago the Bishop of St. John, in his Lenten Pastoral, devoted a whole column to the subject of temperance, begging his people to come out against the saloon and give up alcoholic drink. The Archbishop of Montreal has taken part with the clergymen of other denominations, and is doing his best to curtail that traffic. In the report made by the judge who recently investigated the conduct of the municipal council of the city of Montreal, reference was made particularly to the connection between the saloon and the police. The police drew a stipend from the saloons, and let them keep open at all hours, and permitted them to sell to minors. I observed that 114 men were marked down as having sold to minors. The boys got confused in giving their testimony, and the case was dismissed. The law there is very much on the same basis, I presume, as in other places; but public opinion, until very recently, has not been aroused against it. I am happy to say, now that my hon. friend to my right (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) and others cooperating with him, have helped to bring about the marked change which has taken place in Montreal, and a very great reform, not only in connection with the liquor traffic, but in regard to crime, and the punishment of offences generally, has been accomplished. When the Bill goes to committee I shall be glad to go over the different clauses and point out that they are quite similar to principles which the House has unanimously agreed to in the existing law.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Would my hon. friend favour us with some information which I did not obtain from his speech in introducing the Bill. Do I understand that this legislation is to be in any sense supplementary to the Canada Temperance Act, or is it simply in addition, to give greater effect to any local legislation that may be introduced in Canada?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is it necessary to the more effective carrying out of the Canada Temperance Act that this legislation should be enacted?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is being passed simply in the interest of such provincial legislation as may be passed by the provinces?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Yes. When the Act was passed here, it was introduced as an amendment to the Canadian Temperance Act. The effect was to limit it to the districts where the Canada Temperance Act was in force, and it had not a general application. I have no doubt this House will just as readily pass the larger measure—instead of making an amendment to the Canada Temperance Act to pass this Bill as an Act of the parliament of Canada.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If the Canada Temperance Act provides the machinery which is mentioned in this Bill, why reenact it?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—It was thought it would be made more clear not to refer at all to the Canada Temperance Act, and to copy only such clauses as were necessary, because the machinery in the different provinces may not correspond. They are not uniform. The legislative assembly have provided machinery to carry the Act into effect.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Are the provisions in the Canada Temperance Act effective for the purpose of enforcing the provincial legislation which we are discussing?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then this goes further than the Canada Temperance Act?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—No, the Canada Temperance Act is exclusively confined to counties which adopt it, but in other parts of the Dominion, where they have provincial legislation, they find there is a certain class they cannot reach at all. That is where parties in adjoining counties send in liquor under fictitious names. As hon. gentlemen know, that is the traffic that goes on. Every week or two there are reports of seizures of liquor sent into Cobalt, perhaps in bags of oats, or labelled potatoes or something else. This Act would reach all those cases if the Provincial Act failed to do so. Prince Edward Island being an island, any man owning a saloon could readily smuggle in a lot of whisky, and, getting it in, he would try and make a sale of it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Have you considered the constitutional aspect of this? We propose passing legislation to enforce a provincial law?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is what it comes to. My hon. friend states that the provinces, while legislating upon this question, have not sufficient power to make their legislation effective, and consequently we are to pass legislation here to give effect to the legislation of the provinces.

Hon. R. W. SCOTT—We are passing this law quite independently. Take subclause (c), which reads as follows:

1. No person shall, except as in this Act specially provided, by himself, his clerk or agent,—

(c) Ship, bring, carry, or cause to be sent, shipped, brought or carried to or into any such province, county, municipality, city or town as aforesaid, any intoxicating liquor under any other name, or in packages bearing any other label than that of the liquor contained therein, or in packages not having the name of the liquor contained therein plainly labelled and marked on the outside.

It is quite independent.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I should like to ask the hon. gentleman if I am correct in assuming that this Act imposes penalties not only on the person who ships or sends the liquor into a Scott Act county or into Prince Edward Island, where it is prohibited by provincial statute, but also imposes a penalty upon the transportation companies that take it there?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not so read it.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I certainly thought the wording of the clause would make it apply to any person, which would, I should presume, cover any company who shipped, brought or carried it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The same words were used two years ago.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I am aware that they were used two years ago, and that is the reason why I refer to it now. I think it would be a great mistake to introduce those words into the Act, and if the words do include common carriers such as express companies and transportation companies, railway companies or steamship companies, the legislation should be changed in such a way as not to include them. The reason for this to my mind is very clear. I entirely endorse the idea that a shipper, no matter what part of the Dominion he may reside in, should be liable to a fine, and the penalties which are imposed here if he ships liquor into a Scott Act county or into a province where by law it is prohibited.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Supposing he is in England, Scotland or France?

Hon. Mr. WOOD—You would have hard work to find him. I wish to put out that, while it would be quite in order to fine a person who shipped the liquor for the reason that he would be knowingly and wilfully a violator of the law, the transportation companies are not in that position. As the right hon. gentleman in introducing the Bill has said, the parties who ship the liquor into such places as Prince Edward Island use various means to conceal the fact, that the packages they ship do contain liquors, and they resort to all sorts of strategems to conceal what the packages in which this liquor is put up contain, and the transportation companies or any person handling them has no means of ascertaining unless they break the packages open, which they would not legally be entitled to do. If that is made clear, that is all I want, and I should like to call the minister's attention to it at the present time, so that when the Bill is in committee the phraseology can be changed in such a way that it can be made perfectly clear. I may say in addition, that I think the suggestion I am making—and I make it with the full belief that it is a suggestion which will favour the enforcement of the law—it is a mistake if we in our legislation go to extremes of that character. It will make the law obnoxious to the best class of people in the community, and the result is that it will not be enforced. There will be no attempt to enforce it. The general sentiment of the community is that under such a law an injustice is being done to innocent parties, and it will create a general feeling of dissatisfaction that will interfere with its enforcement. The suggestion I am making is not with a view to rendering the legislation inefficient, but I believe if it were made clear that the companies who innocently handle parcels containing liquor, should not be liable under the Act, it would improve the measure and assist in its enforcement.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I am quite willing to adopt my hon. friend's suggestion. I am in favour of putting it on a sound basis. There is no intention of following the railway or express company. It would be the consignee or consignor. But it is not brought in by express companies, or transportation companies as a rule. There is a clause in the Act which provides that any individual on his own account, not being in trade, who wants to buy for his own use, can do so. The quantity is limited to five gallons. I propose striking that out. Whatever a family require they have a right to purchase. If they attempt to sell it to other individuals, they become liable. It is very well known in a community when a particular area is brought under prohibitory law. Prince Edward Island is wholly under prohibitory law. It has for many years been so. I think any suggestion which would assist in carrying out the law should be accepted in committee.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—There are quite a few matters involved in this Bill and I do not think it is worth while to discuss them seriously. My hon. friend talks about Ontario being so anxious in regard to this question. They have an anti-Horse-Racing Bill under way now. They have a Sunday Observance law, and what next are we to have? Another petition about immoral conduct in Ontario, and immoral practices. Where are we going to land. We are not to travel on Sunday, nor to have our boots blacked. There is a time in the life of the people when they have seen so much of the world, and of the frivolities that occupied so much of their attention in their youth, that they now stand on the apex of a pyramid looking down at the people and saying: 'All right, go ahead, we ordain that you shall not do so and so before you attempt to do it.' It is stated that this measure will save the people of Prince Edward Island from going headlong to destruction. What about the people who wink at this traffic all the time? Not very long ago at a large religious gathering in the city of St. John, a gentleman made a statement about the moral observance in the Commons and Senate, and that there were no bar-rooms and no drinking, and that even in the restaurant in the House of Commons no liquor was consumed. Supposing that gentleman passed the Commons restaurant every day, would he be blind to the fact of the drinking which is going on, properly of course, not improperly. If that is so, what is the good of this House laying down the moral law against drinking while the people say: 'Right under the nose of parliament here liquor is sold and consumed.' If people want to drink liquor, let them drink it, and if not, they need not drink it, but do not tell them that the moral instincts of the people are so strong that everything of that kind is to be frowned down. If I were making the statement in regard to some gentlemen outside of either chamber I would say hypocrisy—that people were being led astray by hyprocrisy. Then take another feature of the question; excise and customs returns provide a large amount of our revenue. Why not attack the producer; go to the fountain head and attack the men who are producing whisky. They are members of powerful corporations or mergers, and are therefore not attacked. They are sometimes called murderers; but they are too important interests there to control or repress. Why not go for them—shut them out. That would be the correct, manly and straightforward thing to do. I suppose it would go unanimously here if it were felt that it was being done with good intent and would be likely to bring about good results. Prohibit is the word used. Where is the sale and consumption of liquor prohibited? It is said that all these places quoted have gone dry. They have not gone dry. Openly they may have gone dry. Take New Brunswick as an instance. There is as much liquor sold there surreptitiously as ever, sold behind doors or in the barn. Talk about crime; it is an incentive to crime if you make sumptuary laws such as cannot or will not be obeyed, and you are putting on the statute books an Act which will encourage crime. I should like if my hon. friend could rise in his place and state that during the thirty years the Canada Temperance Act has been in force that drinking has lessened perceptibly.

We are not here simply to set an example in experimental legislation to the rest of the world. Nor are we here rather to follow their best example in the government of our own country. If my hon. friend could have pointed out where, as the result of legislation, liquor had ceased to be consumed, that is the sort of evidence I should like to have heard. I do not say the hon. gentleman was not sincere, nor would I like to be thought disrespectful to him, but he is forcing on the people something which I doubt if they really want. If I may be pardoned for having been involuntarily an eavesdropper, I may say that while I was in the reading room I saw a slim gentleman—he looked as if he was a following shadow—and heard him say that this Bill was brought in to catch New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. Now I could not help hearing that. I could give the whole interview if it was worth while, but the object. he said, was to bother the people of the maritime provinces.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I pledge my honour I heard it.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—In Nova Scotia and New Brunswick they already have an Act of which this is a copy.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I heard that in the reading room, and my hon. friend has made special reference to the maritime provinces. The hon. gentleman from Westmorland very properly asks what will be the result of this enactment on transhipment. My hon. friend cannot tell me whether liquor imported from abroad will not be stopped in transit under this legislation. What they are trying to accomplish is this. If a merchant in Montreal wants to ship liquor by the Intercolonial railway to St. John, they cannot take it through the counties of Kings or Westmorland, because they are presumably dry. Can that be carried out? Apply it all round. Will a man be obliged to drive all round the borders of a county to deliver a quantity of liquor because it is dry, if he wants to get it to another county that is still wet? I have had the advice of one of the ablest lawyers in Canada to-day that this Bill is ultra vires. Have the government considered that question yet? This attempt to force legislation on the maritime provinces to prevent people from drinking is supported by men who keep wine in their houses, men that the outside world think are the strongest apostles of temperance. Why do they not come out straight and show their hand? I can readily understand that people should be educated not to use liquors to excess, but Scripture does not say we shall not drink anything. On the contrary, it advocates the moderate use of liquor. Are we, in this Chamber, superior to the great lawgiver of nineteen centuries ago? If we followed up his teaching, we would not have any use for this Bill. Those who have tried to make Christians by such methods have generally failed. The proper way to accomplish their object is to educate the people. You can prepare them, bit by bit, and then expunge that provision allowing five gallons to your family. I would look nice visiting a friend in a dry county, and taking with me five gallons of whisky. If I were asked why I brought so much when a bottle would be enough, I would be obliged to reply that under the Canada Temperance Act I must take five gallons.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—That is the maximum at any one time.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Take some of our French Canadian families where there are twenty-four children with both parents alive; how many gallons would you allow them?

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I cannot tell. I have not been blessed with such a family. I hope hon. gentlemen will not take this measure seriously. I heard one hon. gentleman describe it as freak legislation. Now, I would not say freak, even if I thought it was a freak. I am indifferent what becomes of it, more than to place on record in the debates my opinion that this hypocrisy should be checked. As, in my judgment, this Bill is ultra vires, we have one or two courses to follow. We can postpone the second reading until we have the opinion of the government on that point, or in the absence of the leader of the House, move as I do now, seconded by my hon. friend from Moncton (Mr. McSweeney), who comes from a dry town, that the Bill be not now read the second time, but that it be read the second time six months hence.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—As the hon. gentleman has said, I come from a dry town. We have been a dry town for thirty-three years, and when you compare the results of prohibition in Moncton with the record of license towns, you see how little good it has accomplished. Berlin, Ontario, is about the size of Moncton, and the convictions in one year amounted to only sixty persons. Ottawa is a license town, with six times the poulation of Moncton, and the convictions are ten per 1,000, while in Moncton under strict enforcement of the prohibitory law, we have twenty arrests per thousand, twice as many as Ottawa, and four times as many as Berlin. Speaking about prohibition, I happened to be in Macon, Georgia, three years ago, when the state went dry, and the morning after, every saloon had a placard, which read this way, 'Little baby, don't you cry, this will be a drug store bye and bye.' That is the case in Moncton, and the drug stores do a very thriving business. I suppose there must be blind pigs, and holes in the wall, 25 or 30 of them. I will give you an idea of the state of affairs in Moncton by calling your attention to something that happened not later than February 14, as described in a Moncton paper:

February 14, 1910.

Drank Gin in a Church Door.
Three Moncton men finishing bottle when arrested.

Not very often does one drink whisky in the shadow of a place of worship, nor could one think to venture within its doors carrying anything of an intoxicating nature. But this is what Jack Vanbuskirk and Fred. McFarlane did on Saturday afternoon, when they stood in the porch door of a leading church and drank from a square face of gin.

As they stood within the doors of the church, Chief Rideout happened along and promptly placed the two men under arrest. They were taken to the police station and remained until this morning; when they were fined ten dollars or ten days, and not having the amount they will spend the time in jail. The two said they had been in Campbellton and that they got their liquor in the north shore town.

Edward Armstrong was another who imbibed too freely on Saturday night, and as he staggered along Queen st., at twelve o'clock Saturday night he ran into the arms of officer Crossman. He also will have to serve the ten days as the money did not appear to be forthcoming.

Then, three days later, some thieves broke into the Riverside Hotel warehouse, and stole a barrel of whisky. Here is the statement published at the time in the press:

Apparently not being able to get any intoxicating liquor in any other way, thieves broke into the warehouse of the Riverside hotel, either on Monday or Tuesday night, and stole a barrel of whisky and also made away with a quantity of fowl.

Entrance was made to the warehouse by breaking the lock on the door. The thieves evidently knew where the liquor was kept as no signs of rumaging about could be found when the burglary was discovered yesterday. The police were notified and after working on the case a few hours learned of some men whom they believe are the guilty ones.

Still we have a law, supposed to be enforced, under which they can bring in ten gallons. They bring it in on every side, but some of the people apparently not knowing where to get liquor, broke into the Riverside hotel warehouse, and stole a barrel of whisky. We have statistics quoted to show that the people of Prince Edward Island are more sober than the people of Ontario and the west. Any man who would stand at Point Deschene wharf when the harvesters are coming in would have a very different opinion, and would see for himself that prohibition does not prohibit. You can get more whisky, and worse whisky, in Prince Edward Island than anywhere else I know of. In Moncton, within a short time we have had two deaths caused by people using wood alcohol when they could not get whisky. There was another case where an Indian and his squaw got drunk on bay rum, died from the effects with the result that there was a murder and a suicide. I have seen boys ten and twelve years of age going around drunk, and I can give you many other instances. That has occured in a dry town. The law formerly allowed a man to bring in ten gallons; but that quantity has been decreased to five gallons, and the penalties are increased on a summary conviction. They have diminished the quantity of whisky, and doubled the penalties, but it has not stopped drinking, since twenty people out of every one thousand are convicted. It will never stop it. We have had experience, not only there but in 12 counties of New Brunswick under the Canada Temperance Act. There are three times as many convictions for drunkenness in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick as in Ontario and Quebec. I am opposed to this five gallon clause.

Hon. Mr. McMULLIN moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC HEALTH AND INSPECTION OF FOODS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. DE VEBER moved the adoption of the second report of the Standing Committee on Pubic Health and the Inspection of Foods. He said: We have decided to take up the investigation of milk, and we ask for the usual powers to cite persons and things, and also ask that the same amount of money we had last session be granted to us this session. Last year we had an appropriation of $500, of which we spent only $100, so the House can without any fear grant us the money.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

THE SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 23, 1910.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (No. 86) An Act respecting the Western Canada Power Company, Limited.—Hon. Mr. Bostock.

Bill (No. 91) An Act to incorporate the London and Lake Erie Railway and Transportation Company.—Hon. Mr. Coffey.

Bill (No. 114) An Act respecting the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company.—Hon. Mr. Casgrain.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 55) An Act to amend the Seed Control Act.—Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

Bill (Z) An Act for the relief of Bernard Shea.—Hon. Mr. Frost.

LAURIE DIVORCE BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. GILLMOR moved the third reading of Bill (T) An Act for the relief of Archibald Laurie.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved in amendment:

That the said Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be amended by leaving out the last seven words in the ninth line of the preamble to the said Bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—What would the effect of that be?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is to strike out the name of the co-respondent.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—If we were to adopt the motion of the hon. member from Stadacona it would leave us in a very sorry position. This matter was up the other day when the notice of motion was given. If the amendment were carried, it would make a statement that the respondent had committed adultery without mentioning that there was a co-respondent. Our practice has been to give the name of the co-respondent when it was possible to do so. There have been cases where the name of the co-respondent could not be ascertained, and in such cases the statement is that the respondent committed adultery with some person or persons unknown. I find on looking at the statutes of 1906, to which my hon. friend referred on a former occasion, that out of twelve Bills passed by this House, in seven of them no name was given, while in five, names were given. If we could refer to the evidence we would find good reasons why those names were not mentioned. In 1907 there were eight Bills reported to this House and placed on the statute-book, and cut of this number the names of the co-respondents were given in six cases; in only two were the names left out. In those cases the adultery was committed with some person or persons unknown. If the Senate holds that we should adopt a different rule, and that the name of the co-respondent should be given in each case, it would be better to make a rule to that effect instead of amending the Bill, as is proposed in this case.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I refer to VI, Edward VII, chap. 117, where I find the following:

Whereas, Minnie Florence Irvine, of the city of Calgary, in the province of Alberta, wife of James Irvine, formerly of the said city of Calgary, presently of the city of Detroit, in the state of Michigan, one of the United States of America, baker, has by her petition alleged, in effect, that on the fifteenth day of October, A.D. 1896, she was lawfully married to him; that he was then domiciled in Canada; that in July, A.D. 1898, he deserted her and has not since then resided with her; that since such desertion he has resided in the United States of America; that, subsequently and during the year 1900, at the city of Rochester, in the state of New York, one of the United States of America, he committed adultery, and since that time and until May, A.D. 1905, did live in adultery in the said city of Rochester; and whereas, she has humbly prayed that the said marriage may be dissolved. And so on.

In that case it would have been easy to find the guilty party. Then I refer to VI, Edward VII, chap. 143, An Act for the relief of Mary Emeline Preston:

Whereas, Mary Emeline Preston, of the township of South Crosby, in the county of Leeds, in the province of Ontario, seamstress, wife of Francis Preston, of Thessalon, in the district of Algoma, in the province of Ontario, liveryman, hath by her petition set forth that on the twenty-sixth day of December, A.D. 1888, she was lawfully married to him; that in A.D. 1890 he deserted her and has not since then resided with her; that subsequently, and during A.D. 1891, he, at the township of Elizabethtown, in the county of Leeds, in the province of Ontario, committed adultery; and whereas she has humbly prayed that the said marriage may be dissolved. And so on.

I would refer also to VI, Edward VII, chap. 153, where I find the following:

Whereas, Asenath Ramsey, of the city of Toronto, in the county of York, in the province of Ontario, has by her petition humbly set forth that on the fifteenth day of January, A.D. 1891, she, then Asenath Fowler, was married to William Everett Ramsey, of the said city of Toronto, at the said city of Toronto; that they cohabited until the month of September, A.D. 1900, when he deserted her; that they have not cohabited since the said month of September, A.D. 1900; and that he has since the last mentioned date committed adultery at the city of Baltimore, in the state of Maryland, one of the United States of America, and whereas she has humbly prayed that the said marriage may be dissolved. And so on.

There are seven cases in the statutes of 1906, and in all those cases the party has been found guilty, but the name of the co-respondent is not mentioned. I ask that in this case the name be struck out, not for the sake of the guilty party, but for the benefit of the wife, the children and the relations of the guilty party.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—While on this question, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee, or the hon. gentleman who represents the chairman, if they have taken into consideration the demand of the religious authorities of Canada, and if they have been impressed in any way by the views of religious authorities to the south of us, in England, and throughout the civilized world in regard to the question of giving the right to the guilty party in a divorce suit to remarry. The divorce question is one, of course, that is now spread broadcast over society in all countries. The duty of the legislature is to limit the evils connected with divorce. Canada will not be the first, but could well follow the lead of English judges, and I am glad to say of United States judges on questions of divorce, and that lead is, that when an English judge finds—

The SPEAKER—I do not like to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but the question under discussion is a motion, by way of amendment to the resolution for the adoption of the report, and that amendment is not with reference to a matter which goes to the question of divorce.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Following the decision of his honour the Speaker, I ask if the committee has taken into consideration the question whether the parliament of Canada should give to the guilty party, the co-respondent, whom we are asked not to mention in the Bill, the right to remarry? Has the committee considered the demand of the society at large that the guilty party shall be debarred from remarrying.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—He is married already.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The guilty party in this divorce should not have the right to remarry. The plaintiff is obtaining a divorce from a guilty party. Does parliament still persist in granting to the guilty party the right to remarry? I have said the jurisprudence in England and the United States for the past twelve or eighteen months is growing in the direction I have indicated. It is a remarkable change in things, especially in the United States. It is not so remarkable in England, where judges have on many occasions granted divorce to the applicant whether man or woman, but refusing to the guilty party the right to remarry, and that law is now being followed in the United States. It is, therefore, time for Canada to enact a statute similar to that and provide where a divorce is granted by the parliament of Canada it shall be solely for the innocent party. That parliament shall not give the right to a man or woman who has been unfaithful, who has violated the laws of this country and the laws of society, the right to perpetuate the same evil doings. I have brought the matter up in the form of a Bill once or twice in the past. I refrain from doing it this year to see whether the feelings of the senators of this country will undergo any change in regard to this matter, or whether the opinion of parliament will follow in any measure the demand of people who are responsible for the morals of the country and the well-being of our families. I fail as yet to see an echo in parliament that it is prepared to do so, but I hope the time is fast coming that parliament will not be called upon to condone the most atrocious crimes against society and give the criminal the right to repeat his crime under sanction of law.

Hon. Mr DAVID—I intend to vote for this amendment. I think it is neither useful nor necessary to mention in a divorce Bill the name of the person with whom the adultery has been committed. There may be cases where it is necessary; but I think generally, in the interests of the family, in order not to throw discredit or shame on honourable families, it should not be done.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—I brought up the question several times, whether the parliament of Canada was the proper tribunal to grant divorces, and suggested that we should imitate the example of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick where all such cases are tried by a judge of the Supreme Court who gets $500 added to his salary for trying divorce cases. There is nothing published. The divorce is granted or refused, and it is a better tribunal than the one we have here. I noticed recently where the King ordered a commission to inquire into the system of granting divorces in Great Britain, and it is my intention to ask Lord Strathcona for a copy of the decision of that committee when it is completed. and then we shall see how far it differs from the tribunal we have in Canada, a rotten, antiquated system—I do not refer to the men who are on the committee, because I have the highest respect for them, but I have the greatest, I was going to say enmity of the system, and hope the day is not far distant when it will be condemned.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to say a few words to show why I do not feel in a position to vote for the amendment moved by the hon. gentleman from Stadacona. That amendment is one which does credit to the hon. gentleman's heart; but, after all, we are here not to be influenced altogether by our sentiments. I understand that one reason why the Committee on Divorce adopted the practice which has prevailed for some time, was that in another place objections were raised and questions asked because the names of the guilty parties were not mentioned. In another place, the members wished to know with whom the offence had been committed. They do not go into the evidence in the careful way our committee does, and I think it is a pity that we should depart now from that practice. There is another circumstance in this case, that the co-respondent is a medical man. Every hon. gentleman knows that medical men have much greater opportunities to do wrong in this particular direction than any other class of the community; and I think it is very much to the credit of the medical profession that they do not. The cases where medical men take advantage of their position are very rare indeed. This is a case where a medical man has apparently taken advantage of his position; and I think the Senate should stamp its disapproval of that conduct, and hold him up as an example for the future, so as to discourage any of his brethren who might be disposed to weaken on the moral side. That is one special reason in this case, and there is another, which is a general reason. It should be, and I have no doubt it is the desire of every hon. gentleman that every possible difficulty should be placed in the way of committing the offence of which this man is guilty. If the man who proposes to invade his neighbour's home, and perpetuate the greatest wrong that can be perpetrated by one man upon another, can feel that he will not go scot free, but that his name will be given to the public, and the public will know of his iniquity, it will act as a restraint. For that reason I feel that I cannot, although I should like to, vote for the amendment.

The amendment was rejected, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

BARTHELMES DIVORCE CASE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. Wood (in the absence of Hon. Mr. Kirchhoffer) moved the adoption of the tenth report of the Standing Committee on Divorce, to whom was referred the petition of Alexander Augustus Barthelmes, together with the evidence.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As a general rule, we do not raise questions about these divorce Bills which have been before the committee, and carefully considered; but once in a while the House has found reason for thinking that committee was in error. As one member of the Senate, I do not feel satisfied that the case of the petitioner has been made out. There is one circumstance in connection with this case which is unusual; the only direct evidence of the commission of the offence charged is that of the men who, in an English court, would be called co-respondents. Now, I do not remember any case coming before this House where a divorce was granted on such evidence, and on such evidence alone. There are two persons mentioned in this case as being co-respondents in a way. The evidence of one of these, David Foster, which has been accepted because it was not contradicted, was that the actual offence had not been committed. He did not claim any serious credit for that because the circumstances rendered it impracticable. I do not think we should be justified in granting a divorce because the parties were willing, as long as the offence had not been actually committed. Then, there is the other case, a witness named Adair. The circumstances detailed by this witness seem to me to be on the whole hard to reconcile with one's ideas of what is probable. He apparently did not know the respondent, and saw her from the rear of his stable. He testified that he did commit adultery with this woman on three occasions.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—About the time he was married.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If his evidence is to be credited, apparently a case has been made out, but it does seem to me that we should be slow in accepting this evidence.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Is there any corroboration of that testimony?

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, there is just the statement of Adair himself. The evidence of Foster might have been corroborated, but it does not go far enough. Foster's wife was not present. With respect to Adair, it seems to me exceedingly improbable that a young man of twenty-seven who had done what he said he did would allow himself to be persuaded by the husband to come into court, and swear to his own guilt, and the guilt of the applicant's wife. There is a circumstance which has just been adverted to by the hon. gentleman from Victoria (Mr. Cloran), which tends still further to discredit the evidence of this man, Adair. He was asked when this adultery took place and he said, 'Somewhere in June, 1909.' The three offences took place within a very short time. Then, in reply to a question from the hon. member from Wellington (Mr. McMullen), the witness, just before he left the stand, testified in this way:

Q. You are not married.—A. Yes, I am married.
Q. How long is it since you got married?—A. 9th June.
Q. Last?—A. Yes.

That is June, 1909. It seems to me incredible that a young man of twenty-six, who has just married a girl with whom he presumably was in love, should at the same time, have committed adultery with a woman he did not know.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—And in the back yard.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The whole thing strikes me as improbable. The report should be sent back to the committee for a further consideration. We should either have more evidence, or throw out the Bill.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I feel elated. I did not think my method of examining divorce reports would so soon be vindicated. I thought I should have to wait another ten or twelve years before the method I have put before the House and the country of granting divorce would be advocated. I am exceedingly grateful on behalf of a large community of Canadian people for the remarks that the hon. member from Halifax has just made, and I can tell him that he will have the support and approbation of all good thinking people. He has undertaken with his experience, his prestige with his old acquaintance in the Senate to break from his rule of silence and the community will be thankful to him in this matter. He has not tackled a more serious question in this House since he has been in it, because it underlies all our prosperity, all our happiness, and all our respect for moral living as a God fearing people. The hon. member from Halifax, probably not weighing it, has rendered a service to-day on the floor of the Senate. that will not be forgotten. He has brought before the country the fact that divorces are granted on evidence that would not hang a cat, as stated on the floor of this House seven years ago, and again two years ago on the floor of the House of Commons. There is no court in the British Dominions, or even in the courts of the United States that would grant a divorce on the evidence in this case. The evidence is insufficient; it is not corroborated. The evidence smells of the slums, and as the hon. member from Halifax has remarked, the man upon whose testimony this divorce is granted was married in June last, and who had the vile courage to come before an honourable committee of this House and state that he committed adultery with the respondent in a dirty lane behind his own house, while his bride was next door. The hon. member from Halifax is right in assuming that human nature is traduced unless the man is a perfect brute, and there is no proof that he is a brute. The proof is that he was married in June, and according to his own testimony, he committed the acts of adultery that same month. What reason has the committee to grant the divorce on such evidence? We are prostituting the law of divorce, making divorce too easy, and, although for years I have been opposed to the policy enunciated here by the venerable senator from Halifax (Mr. Ross) of relegating divorce to the courts, it would be better to do so than to grant divorces on such evidence as we have in this case. If the subject were referred to the courts it would open too many doors. All the courts would have a right to hear divorce cases. I thought if the evil were restricted in this House it would be restricted everywhere throughout the Dominion; but if the parliament of Canada is going to grant divorces on such grounds as are set forth in the evidence before us, then it is better to refer such cases to judges, who will not take the word of a stableman under such circumstances without corroboration. If such evidence is to be admitted here, I shall join with the hon. member from Halifax (Mr. Ross) and say: 'Take divorce out of the hands of parliament, and give it over to the hands of men competent to sift evidence.' It is not along the line of our dignity, and self-respect that we should, on such a flimsy pretext grant divorces which are becoming the shame of the United States. In the great republic, there are tens of thousands of divorces, and it is a shame not pronounced by me, but echoed by me from the mouths of the highest authorities who have the moral, social and religious welfare of the people at heart. These are the men who condemn the crime of divorce from pulpit, from editorial chair, and from the platform, who regard it as a crime more detestable in the sight of God than drunkenness, a crime which reeks with filth and the breaking up of homes, a crime which leaves young, defenceless children without aid, and without honour. Let us not follow the United States in that path. Let us keep as close as possible to what we accept here in parliament as the only basis for divorce, the one crime of adultery. Once more I lay down the principle that when the man is the guilty person, and he is the one who rules the family, the parliament of Canada should not by the sanction of its laws give him the right to break up another family? If he wants to sin, let him sin outside the law, not within the law. These are my principles, and I know and feel that within my heart, this honourable House, and parliament as a whole, will endorse the views I have been expressing here for seven years. I know hon. gentlemen have moss-covered ideas on this matter. They should wake up to modern conditions, and help to preserve the welfare, spiritual as well as material of the nation. I feel in my soul that in the near future these principles will gain recognition, and I thank the hon. gentleman from Halifax for being one of the pioneers in this movement.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—The members of the Senate who have spoken on this matter seem to think that the divorce is recommended on the evidence of Adair; but if they will read the preamble of the Bill they will see that the act of adultery is with one David Foster. When the matter was before the committee, they realized that the evidence of Adair was not corroborated, and that he was giving evidence against the woman, when he was as guilty as she was. The evidence of Foster was to the effect that he was with this woman the night she came around to his house, and though he would not admit that he had actually committed the act of adultery, we have the evidence of the wife to this effect:

Q. In what position did you find your husband? Was he on top of her when you saw them?—A. She was.

This act occurred in a room on the opposite side of the hall from where his wife was sleeping. The respondent had gone to bed with Mrs. Foster. Mrs. Foster states she woke up and found Mrs. Barthelmes had left her bed, and she crossed the room, and found her husband in a compromising position with this woman.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I omitted one point to which I had proposed to call attention. I give it now for the information of hon. members. I do not think I suppressed anything of consequence in the evidence of Mr. Foster. At the close of the examination, the petitioner was recalled and examined, and the House will allow me to read a dozen lines from his evidence:

By Mr. Culbert, of counsel for the petitioner:

Q. How did you come to find out your wife's infidelity?—A. I found out through my servant in the first place.

Q. When was that?—A. That was September 17, 1909. She telephoned down to my factory and said, 'I would like you to come home early for supper to-night; there is something doing.'

Q. Who said that?—A. My servant, Mrs. E. Alversted. I came home that evening, and had my tea, and she told me that there was an appointment made, that Mrs. Barthelmes had made an appointment over the telephone.

Q. Who made the appointment?—A. Mrs. Alversted. Mr. Foster made an appointment with her over the phone, thinking it was Mrs. Barthelmes. The appointment was supposed to be at half-past seven that evening.

I just call attention to that as one very singular feature of this case; and I am prepared to say that if this divorce is granted, you will find that Mrs. Alversted will be Mrs. Barthelmes.

The Senate divided on the motion, which was adopted, contents 23; non-contents, 18.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—We are getting converted.

SECOND READING.

Bill (AA) An Act for the relief of Clara Louise Holden.—Hon. Mr. Derbyshire.

NIPIGON-ALBANY CANAL AND TRANSPORTATION COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. WATSON moved the second reading of Bill (CC) An Act to incorporate the Nipigon-Albany Canal and Transportation Company.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I think we should have some explanation in reference to this Bill. They are engaging in a canal enterprise, and they may also assume the right to exploit the water-powers in that locality. It says 'The Nipigon-Albany Canal and Transportation Company.' What does that mean? What is the canal for? Are they intending to generate power there and interfere with the rights of the citizens, if they do not interfere with the rights of the provinces? We should know the position in which we are. I am not desirous of interfering with the Bill, but we are entitled to an explanation that we may know fully what we are about. I have no knowledge whether in this locality they may be using water-power, or whether the water-powers belong to the province or to the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The explanation is fully conveyed in section 7 of the Bill. The company purpose to construct a canal from Lake Superior to James bay, by route of the Nipigon river, Nipigon lake and the Albany river. That is the object of the Bill; I suppose any further explanations can be made in committee.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If it does not affect the provincial rights of Ontario, why is the clause inserted declaring it to be an undertaking for the general advantage of Canada?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—It is all in one province.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—No, it goes into the territory, near James bay.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is the terminus in Ontario?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—It is in the Keewatin district at the present time.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The Provincial Secretary of Ontario was notified, and there was no protest as far as they were concerned.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG moved that the Bill be referred to the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I ask an explanation as to the powers of this company. This is a very important Bill indeed. The company are asking for extraordinary powers. They desire to be permitted to amalgamate with other companies, and we hardly know from the explanation that has been given whether it is a proper Bill for parliament or not. As the Senate seems to be very anxious to pass the measure without knowing the wishes and desires of the various provinces, and whether they know or do not know what rights and powers may be claimed under this Bill, I withdraw my opposition and hope that when it goes to the Railway Committee any objectionable clause may be eliminated. Should it come back to the House, and I have no doubt it will, perhaps it will be shorn of some of its objectionable features, and the company will not be permitted to encroach upon rights and privileges of others.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I point out to my hon. friend that there is a policy embodied in this Bill which is manifestly very adverse to the policy lately adopted by this government with reference to the conservation of the natural resources of Canada. This is a Bill, as will be seen from the most casual observation or inspection, to have in view the control practically of all the water-powers upon the various waters mentioned in section 7 of the Bill. This, to me, looks like an old friend in a new garb. I fancy that I can trace very close resemblance in this Bill to several other Bills that have been dealt with, and some adversely, by the Railway Committee of this Chamber. I think I can trace the genius of our friend Mr. Conmee in this Bill.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The hon. gentleman is mistaken.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I find that the Nipigon bay, and those waters in the vicinity of Port Arthur and Fort William, figure very prominently in this Bill. The Conservation Commission has been brought into existence by this government, and a policy which appeals very strongly to the people of this country has been recommended by that committee as to the conservation of our public resources, and particularly of the water-powers of the Dominion. I think I can say advisedly that all the provinces of the Dominion have expressed the desire to co-operate with the Dominion government, in the conservation of these very valuable reserves which undoubtedly are of the greatest possible value to the people of Canada. It seems to me that before we approve of the principle of the Bill, which we are asked to do at the present time upon its second reading, the attention of the government should be directed to the policy embodied in it, and that policy should be approved of by the government before this Chamber assents to its further progress.

The motion was agreed to and the Bill was read the second time.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 85) An Act to amend the Criminal Code.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Several hon. gentlemen criticised the Bill on the occasion when it was last before the House, and I am advised that they have accepted the amendments suggested from time to time by the members who took part in the debate. I would therefore suggest that it be allowed to go into committee and the clauses carried before it goes to the third reading. It will be reprinted, and the final stage taken later.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I would respectfully suggest that it would be much better to have those amendments printed before we go into committee, because the discussion on them may be in committee.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I have copies here of the proposed amendments. The main clause of the Bill will be superseded by the one I am about to read: It is as follows:

424a. Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who, having in his possession, or upon his premises, with his knowledge any rock, ore, mineral, stone, or quartz of a value of not less than twenty-five cents per pound——

The object of that was to place it at a figure well beyond the value of the common ores produced in British Columbia. Another hon. gentleman desired that mica should be placed in the same category, but at a different valuation. The clause proceeds:

——or in the case of mica of a value of not less than seven cents per pound, or any partly smelted, partly treated, or partly manufactured gold or silver which there is reasonable ground to suspect has been stolen or has been dealt with contrary to the provisions of paragraphs (b) or (c) of section 424, is, unable or refuses to account satisfactorily for or prove his right to the possession of the same.

Perhaps I had better read the other clause which qualifies this to a considerable extent. The second clause reads as follows:

2. If in any proceeding under this section, any question arises as to the value of any rock, ore, mineral, stone or quartz, the judge, magistrate, justice or other officer before whom the proceeding is pending may order such assay or assays, test or tests to be made as may be deemed requisite for determining such value.

The third clause will read as follows:

3. No action or prosecution for a violation of this section shall be commenced or undertaken in any part of Canada unless or until an order has been passed by the Governor General in Council declaring this section to be in force in such part of Canada.

That is the qualifying clause which makes the Act futile until its ratification by a minute of council. Then there is a further qualification which is exceedingly important which reads as follows:

4. No prosecution shall be had under this section unless it has been initiated by or on the information or complaint of a manager or director of a mining company, or by or on the information or complaint of some one thereunto authorized by a mining company or a manager or director thereof, or by or with the authority of the attorney general of the province in which the offence is alleged to have been committed, or by the owner or part owner of a mine who claims that rock, ore, or other substance similar to some of those mentioned in this section has been stolen or wrongfully taken from the mine.

No informer can lay information. That was the apprehension some of the hon. gentlemen expressed, that they might be annoyed or persecuted by an informer who, for the purpose of getting the penalty out of the party accused, might lay information.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I would submit that the words 'by or' be stricken out. The idea was to make it necessary that no prosecution should be taken except by the manager or director. If you leave these words in it may be instituted by anybody.

Hon. Mr. POWER—My hon. friend may be right, but I have some doubt about it. There should be a comma after the word 'by.'

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I do not want any comma.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman proposes to strike out these words 'by or.' Supposing a manager or director is not in a position to lay any information, it may be laid on the complaint of 'some one thereunto authorized,' &c. I think perhaps it means that in every case the prosecution is to be initiated by the manager or director.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—That is what I want.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not see any objection to leaving it in. I suppose it cannot do any harm to strike it out.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—In discussing the matter with the solicitor who has charge of the Bill, I pointed out to him that a prosecution of that kind should not be instituted by any one except a responsible party in the company, and for that reason I suggested that it should be on the information of the manager or director. If you introduce the words 'by or' it makes it possible that the prosecution may be instituted by anybody, provided he is connected with the company. or is under the direction of the officer or manager. I want the information to be laid by the manager or officer of the company. Then at the end of the clause it states 'in which the offence is alleged to have been committed or by the owner or part owner of a mine who claims that rock.' I would suggest that the words 'who deposes under oath that he believes the rock has been stolen' instead of the word 'claim.'

The first clause was adopted.

On the third sub-clause.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—In view of the fact that these extensive amendments are being put in without an opportunity of reading them over, before adopting the amended Bill, I think, the committee should rise and have the amendments printed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I understand the hon. gentleman in charge of the Bill proposes that we shall do the best we can on this measure now, that we shall not report the Bill, but that we shall report progress, and that meanwhile, before the committee sits again, the Bill as agreed to now will be reprinted and it will come back to the committee in that form and the committee can amend it just as they please.

Hon. Mr. McGREGOR—In regard to the 3rd section, would that apply to one province or to all the provinces, or how would that be?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—It might apply to the whole of a province or to part of it.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I object. We are going to have the Bill reprinted, before it passes the Committee of the Whole. We can accomplish the same result by having the amendments printed in the minutes.

The CHAIRMAN—This is a Bill from the House of Commons, and we cannot reprint it. We can only amend it in committee.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Can this House not reprint a Bill?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—We can make an order for the reprinting.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—If amendments have been adopted, but not before.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Surely the House can order the reprinting of any document which it is considering?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—As there seems to be an objection to proceeding, I will move the committee rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again, and I shall give notice of the amendments.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—What about my proposed amendment?

The CHAIRMAN—I did not pass clause 3.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I should like to know definitely whether I am to have the privilege of suggesting an amendment to this Bill?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Then I suggest that clause 4 be amended by striking out 'by or', and the word 'claims' in the second or third from last line be struck out, and the words 'deposes under oath' be struck out and replaced by the words: 'that he believes'.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—From the committee, reported that they had made some progress with the Bill, and asked leave to sit again.

TRANSPORTATION OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The order of the day being called:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion for the second reading (Bill M) An Act to regulate the transportation of intoxicating liquors, and the motion of the Hon. Mr. Domville, in amendment thereto:—'That the said Bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read a second time this day six months.'

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I did not move the adjournment of this debate with the intention of opposing the principle of the Bill, but for the purpose of pointing out what I consider encroachments upon the powers of the local legislatures. We are treading upon very dangerous ground in undertaking to pass clauses contained in this Bill. In the first place, the Bill ought to clearly provide that railways and express companies cannot under any circumstances be held responsible for carrying liquor into a Scott Act or a local option county, when the liquor is not labeled clearly and distinctly. I do not think it possible to pass a law preventing railways or express companies, chartered by parliament, from carrying liquor to any portion of the Dominion. We would have confusion of the worst kind if we attempted to interfere with our carrying trade in that way. The Bill should be amended so as to clearly show that that is not the intention. The hon. gentleman pointed out that the wording of the Bill is exactly the wording of the old Act. If so, it is likely to produce very serious confusion. It is well that it has not produced that effect up to the present time, and we should now clearly enact that it is not the intention of the Bill to interfere with the carrying trade of our railways and express companies. Then my hon. friend proposes by this Bill to permit individuals to bring in quantities of liquors not exceeding five gallons for their own private use. He makes no exception to that provision.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I distinctly said I was opposed to the five gallon clause.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—The Ontario Act provides that a hotel-keeper—and a hotel-keeper is a person—may not keep liquor on his premises, whether for his own private use or otherwise, where local option prevails. If it is found on his premises by the inspector, he is liable to a fine of $100. Now my hon. friend's law proposes that he can bring in five gallons, or he may reduce it to three gallons for his own private use. Now which of those laws is going to prevail in the province of Ontario?

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—How often would you be allowed to take in three gallons?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—The point is, will the Ontario law or this Bill prevail? There is a conflict between them.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I said I was not in favour of the clause; that I was leaving that entirely to the provinces.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—That is the right thing to do, and if you relegate the whole Bill to the provinces, you will only be doing what is proper. It will be found that you are interfering with provincial jurisdiction when you attempt to deal with the question as you do in this Bill. It is said that the exercise of local option, or the adoption of the Scott Act, removes the bar and restricts drinking. For my own part, I have no sympathy with the bar or with its business. I would be glad if our country could be run without a bar within its limits. Bars are a curse and do a lot of harm; but if you aim at removing the bar, you must do it by an amendment of the local license law. Every hotel must have a license now, even in a constituency where local option prevails. They must have an inspector and a board of license commissioners, and hotels are looked after and inspected just the same as they are in constituencies where licenses are granted. Under these circumstances, the license law should be amended to abolish the bar, especially in constituencies where local option prevails. If there was an amendment to the law in that direction, I would hope for some good from it, but as long as you have the bar remaining, presumably for the sale of temperance drinks, so long will you have evasion of the law, and liquor sold. Ginger ale, ginger beer, lemon sour and other temperance drinks are very desirable mixtures with a little whisky. They make a good drink.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—You recommend it?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—The hotel-keepers know what their customers want when they ask for temperance drinks, and serve them with a little stick; the result is that by permitting the sale of those temperance drinks, liquor reaches the stomachs of those who want it. Abolish the bar absolutely, and if people want temperance drinks, let them get them without having to enter a bar. Then you will have temperance. People living at home do not keep ginger ale and lemon sour, but go to the well for water to quench their thirst. Why can they not do the same when they are away from home? We must educate our people in the direction of abolishing the bar. We had the Scott Act in force in the town where I live, for three years, and while it was in force we had a very demoralized condition of things. I was on the bench myself during that time, associated with another man, and we did everything we could to prevent the abuse of liquor. At the end of the three years a vote was taken to rescind the law, and out of seven or eight hundred voters only fifty or sixty went to the polls to vote for a renewal of the law. People got disgusted with the abuses that prevailed in the way of false swearing under the Act. It was awful. Men that you could trust with anything and everything in the ordinary business transactions of life could not be trusted in connection with the Scott Act or local option. They would twist and squirm in every possible way to prevent anybody getting fined. The people got disgusted with it. For my part, I greatly deplore the abuse of liquor. It would be a great blessing if we could get it under control so that it could be banished. I give the temperance people credit for every effort they are making in opposition to it, but it will never be stopped by the Scott Act or by local option. You have to do it by an amendment to the license law, and keep encroaching steadily, inch by inch and foot by foot, until at last you cut it out. After hearing the speech of my esteemed friend from Westmorland (Hon. Mr. Wood), who spoke very intelligently on the subject, I can add very little to what I have said, but I would urge upon my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Scott) to very seriously think this Bill over. Perhaps he has had the advice of the Minister of Justice and is proceeding along lines indicated by the Department of Justice. I hope he is. I should like to know if he is. I am not a lawyer, but I confess I see very great danger of clashing with the local legislatures if we pass a Bill of this kind, especially with regard to permitting the bringing in three or five gallons of liquor. My hon. friend says he is willing to strike that clause out of the Bill. It may be as well perhaps to do that, but the whole Bill requires a very great deal of consideration, and I hope it will receive that consideration at our hands. Let us move cautiously. Let us see to it that we are within our rights and not trampling upon the rights and powers of the provinces in dealing with this question.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I am entirely in accord with the object of the Bill, but cannot appreciate the necessity for this legislation. It seems to me that this Bill deals with the very same matter as is contained in chapter 71 of the statutes of 1908. In fact, the hon. gentleman called our attention to that. If this Bill deals with the same subject, it will, if passed, have the effect of repealing chapter 71 of the statutes of 1908.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Oh, no. It applies exclusively to Canada Temperance Act counties.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It is a copy, to a very great extent, of the former Act, and whether the title of the Bill is temperance or otherwise makes no difference. The subject being dealt with de novo by parliament, in a new Bill, surely it would prevail and have the effect of repealing any portion of chapter 71, which comes in conflict with this Bill. I call attention to this fact first, that the Bill is not as complete as chapter 71 of the statutes of 1908. For instance, at the end of the first clause, it provides:

> Provided always that nothing in this Act shall prohibit the vendors who are legally appointed by the provincial government from importing for medicinal purposes.

Our attention has already been called to the fact that this is rather vague. It would open the door to almost any importation of liquor under the guise of being brought in for medicinal purposes. In the Canada Temperance Act we had a much better provision for controlling that trade. A second point to which I desire to call attention is the fact that the Bill does not provide for the sale of liquors for sacramental purposes, and the passing of this enactment would have the effect of preventing the sale of wine for such purpose.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I have that on my proposals.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—My objection goes further than that. Not only does it deal by an independent Act with a matter that forms part of the Temperance Act, and should form part of that Act, but it goes to the extent of dealing with provincial laws, and sanctions by this parliament penalties imposed for infractions of provincial law. Now that is not within our jurisdiction. Provincial legislatures have power to enact a penal clause, and we are not to say in what way provincial Acts shall be enforced. That is going outside of our province, and I do not think the measure would be constitutional in that respect. I suspect that is the main object of the Bill, because otherwise chapter 71 of the statutes of 1908 goes as far as we can possibly go in that direction. Anyway, if the hon. gentleman deems it advisable to improve upon that law, it should be done by way of amending it, and not by introducing an independent measure dealing with the matter independently of the Temperance Act. This parliament is given jurisdiction in matters relating to temperance. Provided we deal with it as a matter of temperance, we have jurisdiction and may enact penal clauses. The provincial legislatures have power to enact penal clauses in connection with their own legislation, and we should not interfere with their jurisdiction. For these reasons, I cannot see my way to support this Bill. I do not believe it is an improvement on the statute of 1908.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I was asked by a deputation to take charge of a Bill which they handed me, the present Bill. I understood from them that they had seen the Department of Justice. I did not verify that. I did not feel at liberty, under the circumstances, to make any change in the Bill. It was left to me on a particular day. I understood the Bill had been drawn in Prince Edward Island. It was a gentleman from the island who came up specially charged to obtain the legislation. I explained fully in my address that Prince Edward Island is not now under the Canada Temperance Act, and therefore they could not avail themselves of the clauses of the original Act of 1878. It is under a provincial law, and the object of this Bill is to attack the transportation of liquor into the island. The position of Prince Edward Island, of course, affords great facilities for the importation of liquor. It is taken there in boats and sloops of all kinds, and sold surreptitiously. The authorities cannot follow those who send in the liquor and the object of the Bill is to meet cases of that kind.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I have examined the Canada Temperance Act exactly for the purpose of seeing if any provinces were excluded; but I fail to find any exclusion, and therefore, it applies over the whole Dominion.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I do not think it applies except in Canada Temperance Act localities. I recognize several defects in the Bill myself. For instance, there is the clause with reference to the quantity of liquor which an individual may bring in for his own purpose. There is also the collision with express and railway companies. I did not feel at liberty, as the Bill had been handed to me in the shape in which it appears, to make any changes. If parliament approve the principle of the Bill, changes can be made in Committee of the Whole. It seems a reasonable proposition that we should meet the wishes of the people of Prince Edward Island, and it is also supported by correspondence which has been pouring in on me from other parts of Canada.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I think we may consider this Bill an extension of the Scott Act.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—It does honour to its author, but I think the extension goes too far. I want to call attention especially of gentlemen who are interested in the temperance question, to clause 3, which provides:

> 3. Paragraphs (a) and (b) of section 1 of this Act shall not apply to any intoxicating liquor not exceeding five gallons sent, shipped, brought or carried to any person or persons for his or their personal or family use in their own homes, unless it be so sent, shipped, bought or carried to be paid for in such province, county, municipality, city or town—
> (a) to the person delivering the same, his clerk or agent; or—
> (b) to a person who within a term of five years has been convicted of the violation of the Dominion or Provincial statute regarding the sale of liquor; or—
> (c) during the thirty days immediately preceding a Dominion or Provincial election.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I intend to ask to have that paragraph struck out.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—If you strike out that paragraph and the paragraph relating to shipping companies, perhaps I would vote for the Bill; but I cannot vote for it as it is now. I wanted to show it is a private contract which takes place under section 3. I call the attention of hon. members to this argument; that when a man buys five or six, or seven gallons of wine he makes a private contract. It is a question of private contract where civil law applies, which is within the jurisdiction of provincial law; therefore, I consider section 3 is unconstitutional.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—This Bill deals with probably the most vexed question that has occupied the attention of civilized people for the past forty or fifty years. It is a Bill that gets opinion on one side in its favour, and on the other side against it. The Bill has a deeper meaning than its phraseology would indicate. The subject is one which not only requires the attention of the legislators of this country, but the Bill itself requires the attention of the government and of its principal department. The Department of Justice will have to pronounce upon its legality, its soundness and its sense. The Department of Justice must pass on this measure before it goes into committee, or even before it is accepted on the second reading. The Bill also requires the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, whom very fortunately we have in this House, and I would direct his attention specially to the measure. I would like his department, especially, to say whether the treaties entered into between this country and Germany and France lately are going to be foiled, stunted or made unworkable. We know that the trade and commerce of Canada with France is largely based on the material which is mentioned in this Bill, intoxicating liquors. We know the great object of France, and largely also of Germany, in establishing commercial relations with Canada, is to push the trade of their wines and liquors as much as the trade in their silks, and I want to know from the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he is prepared to have France understand that the parliament of Canada is taking action to prevent one of its staple products from being imported into this country. He may tell me that this Bill does not apply to all Canada, that there are still some civilized parts of Canada where they wish trade with France, but that is no answer to the principle which is at stake. If the French producers of wine wish to export their goods to Canada through Charlottetown, through Yarmouth, through Georgetown, Souris and all the other great national ports along the coast of Prince Edward Island and the maritime provinces, what is going to happen? Not one quart of wine can be exported from France into Canada through these ports if the shippers undertake to ship their goods to Quebec or Montreal. It is a question of principle that is at stake, and it is the duty of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to see that the benefits of the treaty with France are not stunted by any legislation on our part in regard to that matter. Then there is the question for the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Excise and Customs. Where are they going to obtain their revenue? Where is the Minister of Inland Revenue going to get his revenue if the principle of this Bill be maintained and put into force in all parts of Canada, because if it is good for the little island of Prince Edward Island, it is equally good for the other portions of the country, and it would be the duty of parliament to have it enforced throughout Ontario, Quebec and the western provinces. The efforts of all the departments of the government should be to extend the benefits which accrue from this Bill to the other provinces. Is there any gentleman on the floor of this House, or outside of it, who will attempt to do such a thing? By no means. Then why force parliament to do what the government itself will not do? The government are the advisers of parliament and the administrators of the affairs of the people of this country, and if the government say they cannot do it, and will not do it, why should any body of men outside of this parliament, and through any exponent of their opinions, ask parliament to enact such a measure?

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—The hon. member did not hear the remark, that they were anxious to save Prince Edward Island from drinking.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—If it is good for Prince Edward Island, it is good for all the provinces.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It does not apply to Prince Edward Island only. It applies to every county under prohibition.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—That is the reason I call attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to the fact that if by chance the seaport towns of Canada should pass a local option law, the treaty with France would be no benefit for the other provinces. The minister would have let France into a transaction with no benefit to that country, because we know that the vast bulk of French exports to this country is wine. This Bill affects, from a commercial point of view, the question not of temperance —because I deny the right of exponents of prohibition, no matter how honourable they may be, either in church or state, to assume the title of temperance. Let them call themselves prohibitionists; the title temperance does not belong to a man who says he is a prohibitionist. It belongs to the man who says he is moderate in the use of what nature or providence places at his disposal, and prohibition puts many people at a disadvantage. These platform orators in the pulpit or in public places call themselves temperance people—

Hon. Mr. BAIRD—What about the man who does not drink any liquor at all?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—He is a teetotaler.

Hon. Mr. BAIRD—Then he is not a temperance man.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—He is an extremist; but you must know that virtue does not reside in the extremist. If you know anything about religion, if you know anything about philosophy, or about human affairs, you will know the truth of the expression in medio stat virtus. The total abstainer is not a man that the Spanish gentleman can imitate. The total abstainer is not a man that a French gentleman or peasant can imitate. He is not a man that an Italian gentleman can imitate, or whose example the Italian can follow, and why? Because Providence did not give to these countries water which they could drink with safety. Providence gave them water, but it is full of germs of the worst kind—undrinkable water. The result is that nearly the half of Europe is obliged to use wine as a beverage. France could not get along and its peasants, farmers and working classes would not be able to fulfil the destinies that God has given to them to fill unless they had wine to drink.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—What about the grape juice?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—That is for people with tender stomachs, who live on vegetables. Spain could not get along without its consumption of wine. I have been in Italy myself, and when I was a young boy not knowing the taste of liquor we could not get along without drinking two quarts of wine, and very good wine at that, per day. If you take a glass of water in Rome in the hot months of July and August—August particularly—your own life would be carried away by disease germs.

Hon. Mr. BAIRD—There is just as good water in Rome as there is in any part of the world.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I am talking of the principles of temperance. There are four cardinal virtues which are, I think, applicable to all sects and creeds—in fact to the human race. They do not belong to any school. They spring from the natural and divine law, which is simply in the soul of man. They are justice, prudence, temperance and fortitude. The just man is not a severe man and he is not a lax man—neither one nor the other. His virtue consists, when he wants to exercise it, in justice in maintaining perfect fairness between two opposite interests—not the man who jumps on one side or the other. The prudent man will take a little risk himself and will safeguard those whom God has given him to safeguard, and so on with all these four virtues. Temperance does not lie in total abstinence, and I was rather surprised yesterday to hear the hon. gentleman from Ottawa quote the church as an authority for prohibition. Why, the church cannot accept the principle of prohibition. I am not talking of all churches now, but at least of the Episcopal church, the High English church and the Catholic church, and I say that prohibition is a principle which they cannot for one moment accept. Why? In the first place, in their own interests, because prohibition would wipe out the essential act of their religion. They would deprive themselves of the sacramental wine, a fact to which the hon. gentleman from De Salabery very properly called the attention of the House, and it is not provided for in the Bill. It shows how dangerous it is to place the public in the hands of people well-intentioned, all working for the glory of God, but who have no sense, who take no stock in human experience, who are always on the extreme side. It is a dangerous proposition to have to deal with such people, and this Bill shows it. Not only did they not take into consideration the rights of religion in this country, but they did not even take into consideration the rights of industries, the rights of mechanical enterprise. There is nothing in this Bill which allows a manufacturer to secure alcohol for manufacturing purposes. I admit that the Bill has been drawn up by people who are well-intentioned, but who are not in touch with the requirements of civilization, who are not in deep touch with the requirements of religion or the requirements of humanity. I am not going to say that they are advocating a bad cause—by no means. All I ask from these prohibitionists is to act and talk temperately, to be temperate in placing their views before the public, and in asking parliament to pass laws. I have a right to ask that without leaving myself open to the charge of being in favour of intemperance. I am by no means in favour of the intemperate consumption of alcoholic liquors, any more than I am in favour of intemperance in eating too much beef steak or plum pudding, or drinking too much ginger ale, which is enough to make a man sick, or the other temperance drinks which are of the vilest material that can be put on the market. Unless you have a cast-iron stomach, one or two bottles will make you ill for the remainder of the season.

Hon. Mr. BAIRD—Did you drink it?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Yes, and I was sick for a week. That is the result of the extreme views of the temperance people.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—What is the best thing to drink?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—What will suit your taste and stomach, and head, and if you cannot drink liquor, leave it alone. The total abstainer is often constitutionally obliged to abstain from using liquor. With regard to liquor, there is nothing to compel a man to take more than is requisite for him, and there is no sense in throwing at a man the insinuation that he is a law-breaker because he, in his own home, like the King of England, takes his wine at dinner. You cannot say that he desires the ruination of the younger generation and desires to bring disgrace, discredit and crime to the state. What the King can do in his own home and palace, why not the poor man, not with such wealth of wine or wealth of circumstances——

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middlesex)—Kings have done lax things.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—But it was not the wine.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—I do not know about that.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—They have committed deeds in cold blood.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—Hot blood.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Henry VIII, who killed, excommunicated and divorced his wives, did it in cold blood, and all great crimes have been committed in cold blood, because no man who is drunk can commit a great crime. He might hit a man or draw a revolver, but all the great conspiracies against human liberty and against the welfare of the community have been concocted by men who never taste liquor, because they can't afford to do it.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Because their time was given to conspiracy and conspiracy won't work where liquor is. That argument will not prevail. Who are the people who come to parliament to seek divorce? They do not come here drunk; they are all sober.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—They have become sober.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—And when they get sober they ask for a divorce.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—They should keep drunk all the time and not ask for a divorce. That is a nice argument. Another principle laid down is that the human race can be made sober by Act of parliament. I have a great deal of respect for the senator who gave such unctuous utterance to that proposition, but I would remind him that he is asking from parliament and from the laws of his country more than the Creator could obtain. Parliament is not any more powerful in enforcing virtue and having it practiced than the Creator, who gave our first parents every opportunity to be virtuous. There were no saloons in those days to make them commit crime. He simply gave them one little commandent; he said, 'of that tree you shall not eat,' and simply because He made it a matter of prohibition, Eve and Adam ate of the forbidden fruit. That is why I stated that these prohibition people do not take into consideration the needs of humanity, the interests of the human race, when they desire to enforce their views by prohibition and abolishing personal liberty. The Creator has given us personal liberty and I do not know but it was the greatest blessing He ever gave us. I often say to myself, why, with this faculty of freedom which God has given us, are we inclined more often to go on the wrong road than on the right road? That is the experience of the human race. He has given us the faculty to think and to act freely, and we are told that by Act of parliament that freedom must be taken away, and we must be made virtuous by the enforcement of law. The principle is against divine institutions. All that human legislation can do is to regulate the conduct of man, and when human legislation goes beyond that it is bound to meet defeat. And when legislators try to improve on the plan adopted by the Creator, the legislation is bound to meet with failure. Therefore, it is, that the Scott Act for the past thirty or forty years has met with failure all along the line from one end of the Dominion to the other. From its infancy it began to be crippled throughout the different provinces and counties in which it was endorsed and accepted. To-day we hear one of our oldest members of parliament, one of the longest in public life, a gentleman who has held a seat on the judicial bench of this country and who was member of parliament for a number of years, who to-day is an honoured and valuable senator, Hon. Mr. McMullen, declaring that the Scott Act was worse than a failure, a blunder on the statute-books of Canada, and his experience is not the only one in that respect. Take the province of Prince Edward Island, of which we heard so much to-day; what is the condition of things in that island, which has improved on the Scott Act and established prohibition by Provincial Act, and has been under the Scott Act and under temperance interests I think for the past thirty years? In that little garden in the sea, one of the most beautiful places that Providence has placed within the confines of the confederation of Canada, the condition is one of decrease, after forty years experience of temperance. Instead of numbering half a million, the population is less now than it was twenty-five years ago. There are only between ninety-five and one hundred thousand—I think less than one hundred thousand, and that island is capable of feeding and capable of making happy and prosperous at least a million people. The soil is fertile; still the people are leaving it under the benign influence of prohibition. I have been there for two summers past, and I regret very much to say that notwithstanding all the natural advantages which that island possesses, there was much consumption of liquor, I have seen more drunkenness on one train and in one day in Prince Edward Island than we could meet in the city of Montreal during a whole day, or a week for that matter. That is no disgrace to the people who do not use intoxicating liquor; but it goes to show that this system of prohibition fails in its effort to establish temperance. It is something we would never experience here in a licensed community. Going on a drive seven or eight miles into the country in licensed communities we would never think of taking a valise with bottles in it.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middlesex)—How did you know what was in the bottles?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—We could tell by the labels. It was not ginger ale. You could also tell by the result.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Was this in Prince Edward Island?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Yes.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Were there ladies in the party?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Yes.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—I rise to a point of order. I utterly deny the statements of the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Which statement does the hon. gentleman deny?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—The statements which the hon. gentleman has been making for the last few minutes are entirely incorrect.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Is that a point of order? I will move the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

IMMIGRATION HOSPITAL AT QUEBEC.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

1. Was Dr. Jos. D. Pagé, medical superintendent of the Immigrant's hospital at Quebec, ordered to assist or aid Dr. J. P. Lavoie during the first year or during the first months after the appointment of the latter to the post of immigration agent at Quebec, in order thus to supplement his inexperience?
2. From whom did he receive such order?
3. Did he in consequence take an active part in the administration of the Immigration Office at Quebec?
4. Does this intervention, asked for or ordered, authorized or tolerated, still last?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I am informed by the department that he was not directed to assist. That answer, of course, covers questions 2, 3 and 4, as well as No. 1.

THIRD READING.

Bill (AA) An Act for the relief of Clara Louise Holden.—Hon. Mr. Derbyshire.

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS BILL.

DEBATE RESUMED.

The order of the day being called:

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the motion for the second reading (Bill M) An Act to regulate the transportation of Intoxicating Liquors, and the motion of the Hon. Mr. Domville, in amendment thereto:—'That the said Bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read a second time this day six months.'

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I have but a few more remarks to place before the House and the country before concluding. In closing my remarks yesterday I felt that I was about to tread on the toes of some of the hon. representatives from Prince Edward Island. Notwithstanding that circumstance I felt it my duty to myself, to this House and to the country to let the facts be known, as the facts exist, and which are not according to statements compiled and printed in blue books.

I knew it was an arduous duty for a representative of the people to say anything that would appear unkind of a particular section of the country; but what I stated and the facts that I related were not said in any sense that would indicate or mean unkindness. I simply stated the facts for the sake of argument and for the sake of truth, and I took full precaution before giving expression to those facts by saying that Canada contained no more prosperous and hospitable people than the population of Prince Edward Island, and that the island was the garden of Canada. But when, for the sake of having this Bill adopted, the hon. ex-Secretary of State put Prince Edward Island up before the rest of the Dominion as an example of what prohibition—not temperance—had done along the lines of virtue, morality and common decency, I thought it was my duty, having ascertained the facts by personal observation, to place them before the public as fully as the hon. ex-Secretary of State had submitted his statistics to sustain his case. What I stated yesterday was contradicted by an hon. representative from that province. I suppose he was within his right in the course he took. I at first thought that his contradiction meant more than a contradiction. I understood him to say that my statement of facts was false. If he had made such a statement I would now give him an opportunity to prove his contradiction along that line, and I would take no advantage of him in regard to the matter. I would give him ample opportunity to prove that my statements were false and at very great risk, if necessary.. If there is anything I appreciate and hold dear it is my reputation for truthfulness and honour. I hold it more dear than the honour of a seat in this honourable House, and never in my lifetime on the public platform, the editorial chair, or under any other conditions have I knowingly or willingly uttered a word that I knew to be false. When, therefore, a statement of mine is challenged on the floor of this honourable House, I am prepared to stand or fall by that statement, and if the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island (Hon. Mr. Robertson) thinks that my representation of the condition of things in his province is false, he has only to say the word. He can ask for a committee and bring on his witnesses, high or low. I will not go into the slums for witnesses to prove my statements. I will get them in the highest circles; religious, social, political, legal, mercantile and all other branches of life in Prince Edward Island. I want this honourable House to understand that when I made these statements it was not with a view of belittling Prince Edward Island, which province I love. I made the statements to disprove other statements which were placed before us as arguments why we should support this Bill—the most fantastic and the most grotesque legislation that could be placed in the statute book. Fantastic in every shape, grotesque in its measure—admittedly so by the hon. gentleman who introduced it here; so that I have done with that question in regard to Prince Edward Island. I have made these statements in the interests of truth and of fairness to the other portions of the Dominion, and as an argument to prove that where this liquor trade is licensed and regulated, conditions are better than where you enact prohibition and try to enforce it. That is the experience of all men. This trade of selling and buying intoxicating liquors is an essential element of human life. You cannot put it down, and you have no right to put it down; what you can do and what it is your duty to do, is to regulate it, to enforce restrictive measures in regard to it, just the same as the powers that be enforce and restrict the sale of poisonous drugs, and deadly arms. I am not going to say that liquor should be sold in every store in every line of mercantile life. By no means. Liquor is one of those things that the state has to regulate in regard to its sale and consumption. There is no doubt about that, and the man who does that and the government who do that will do more to promote temperance, more for the social and moral welfare of society than the man who goes on the housetop and cries out 'We will have none of it.' I have characterized this Bill as being fantastic. The first clause says: 'No act done in violation of this Act shall be rendered lawful by the reason of any license of any description.' All hon. gentlemen are not educated along legal lines, and their minds have not been cultivated along the line of legal technicalities, but they should ask what does this clause mean? Does parliament mean to tell the provinces of Ontario, Quebec and the other provinces that their license laws are of no avail? Parliament is asked by this Bill to tell the province of Quebec, Ontario, and the other provinces, where a license exists, that their statutes shall be of no avail if they conflict with this Bill, now before parliament. We are asked deliberately, calmly and coolly to pass such a measure as that.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Parliament has already passed a law on exactly similar lines.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The fact that we have once committed a mortal sin is no reason for again committing the same sin. It is a poor argument to advance that because something foolish was done in the past that, therefore, it should be repeated now. That argument will not appeal to the public at large. I am stating here—and I cannot be contradicted—that in this Bill there is a clause which violates provincial rights, which will impede provincal rights in the application of the license laws, which annuls all that a provincial legislature can enact in regard to the liquor traffic, because it says: 'No act done in violation of this Act shall be rendered lawful by any license or by any disposition whatever.' I speak from personal knowledge, because it has been my duty and privilege for the past fifteen years to enforce and have respected the license law of Quebec. This Bill, if for no other reason, should be withdrawn without the necessity of carrying the motion for a six months hoist. If this parliament is to be asked to pass a measure covering the object, or meeting the object of the Bill, let the hon. gentleman introduce one that will be constitutional to start with, that will be sensible so that we shall understand it, and that will be fair, and that will respect provincial rights, then we can discuss it. The hon. gentleman who introduced the Bill fathers it, although he says it is not his own child, and I am very glad it is not; but he has fathered the poor orphan and is trying to bring it into life through this honourable body. I hope it will be still born. The people behind this Bill are kind and generous enough to grant to every family the right to purchase and to keep in their domiciles five gallons of whisky. What right has anybody to limit the supply of intoxicating liquors any more than to limit the supply of beef or tea or coffee? Who are they behind this Bill that say to the 1,500,000 families in Canada: You can buy five gallons of whisky but no more?

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS—Is that not enough?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—It is enough for those who take it on the sly behind the door; but when you have visitors and want to entertain them, it may not be enough. We have no more right to limit the quantity of this material for private use than to limit the supply of any other material. But we have been informed by the hon. gentleman who introduced the Bill that he is going to eliminate that clause and prevent the keeping of any liquor. What right have we to tell the families of this country that they cannot have what they want? What business has parliament to interfere with the personal liberty of anybody? The Bill, on the face of it, is absurd. We are asked coolly and deliberately by men who ought to know better to adopt the principle of this Bill by voting for its second reading. How many men in the Dominion are able to buy five gallons or three gallons, or even one gallon of whisky at a time? Not one in ten thousand. They may be able to order half a dozen or a dozen of ale, costing seventy-five or eighty cents at the fag end of the week for use in their homes, and that is all they can afford. They may be able to purchase half a pint or a quart of spirits, but not any more. How is any poor man in one of the dry counties of the maritime provinces going to order half a dozen beer from Montreal? The express and freight rates would be twice the cost of the beer, and the beer would be sour before he got it.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—He should not drink it at all.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—If the hon. gentleman means that seriously, he should address his remarks to the King of England, and the bishops of the country.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I have drunk with the King of England before to-day.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I know the hon. gentleman is not serious in putting the question. It is simply to show the absurdity of the clause. Now, if there is one in ten thousand who can buy five gallons of whisky, there are probably ten in ten thousand who are able, by their wealth, to do as polite and gentle families do throughout the civilized world, stock their wine cellars. He who does so acts prudently and economically, because the liquor improves with age. Are you going to limit these heads of families who are obliged by their standing in the community to entertain largely, to purchasing five gallons of liquor when they require casks of liquor of all kinds? I see around me here hon. gentlemen who have well stocked cellars. I do not blame them for it; but if they vote for this Bill I do blame them. I say that the man who keeps a well stocked wine cellar and votes for this Bill is not true to himself, to parliament or to the people. It is no crime to have a cellar well stocked. It comes in well. I know in one very sad episode of my life if I had had what the doctor ordered in the house, or could have got it anywhere near, the life of one dear and near to me would have been spared; but I was minus the champagne, and life ebbed away for the want of it. According to this clause, nearly every man of standing in the community who opens his house and extends hospitality to friend or stranger shall be barred from society. The first common, low, spiteful character may come to his domicile, and with a document (here printed schedule A and schedule B) can walk into his home, destroy the locks of that home, search every room from attic to cellar, and the hen coops, if he has a suspicion that there is more than five gallons of liquor on the premises. Is not that nice legislation that we are asked to put on the statute book? I need not go over the other clauses. I call the attention of the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce to the fact that this Bill would interfere with traffic rights of all transportation companies. It puts responsibility on them that they should not have to bear. How is a transportation company, whether on water or on land, to know what is in a bale or case of goods? This Bill would force them to open every case, and ascertain the nature of its contents. That is absurd on the face of it. As far as I understand, the Department of Justice agrees with me that this Bill is ultra vires, and unconstitutional. I have no hesitation in saying that if we have the opinion of the Minister of Justice he would declare that this Bill is not within our jurisdiction, and we are violating provincial rights. It is not fair or just to the people of Canada, to its commercial or industrial institutions, and its citizens. How silly and incomplete this Bill is. The hon. member from DeSalaberry (Hon. Mr. Beique) has laid before us an argument which is conclusive, that this Bill is a violation of religious liberty. It is a hard word to say, but it is true. It prevents any religious body from having liquor of any kind for sacramental purposes. Some say, but the wine that is used for religious ceremony need not be intoxicating. Men who talk that way do not know anything about the theology of the question. No other wine can be used. I speak for the Catholic church, and I think, although I am not prepared to say openly, for the high church and the English church. However, I can say on behalf of the Catholic church that the purest wine must be obtained for sacramental purposes, and no unfermented grape juice about it, no dilution or adulteration; otherwise the sacrament will be invalid. This law not only does not provide for that, but makes provision against it. It does not provide for our industrial needs and necessities. It will prevent all manufacturers who are obliged to use alcohol in the manufacture of their goods from obtaining the necessary material to construct or to produce the goods which they wish to place on the market. As far as the shipping or the carrying, making everybody responsible is concerned, article 4 says:

> Every one who by himself, his clerk, servant or agent, in violation of section 1 of this Act, sends, ships, &c., shall be guilty.

Is there any legal authority in this House who will tell me whether that is applicable only to a male person? It says every one who by himself, &c. Does that take in the wife? It does not say 'by herself or her maid' it is incomplete. The law does not cover her. In other words she is uncovered. That leaves the situation open. It applies to all persons except the woman. The wife, the maid, or the housekeeper can import liquor, even under the provisions of this Bill. Another thing in regard to this importation or bringing in five gallons, it only can be bought on condition that it is paid for where it is purchased. Is this honourable House, and, through this honourable parliament, going to reverse our trade conditions? Is parliament not aware that the principle which undtrlies the vast bulk of our trade is the C. O. D. principle, cash on delivery. Are you going to force people to pay for goods before they get them? If you order goods in France, as many of our householders do, are you going to send over your draft or cheque before the goods arrive? The law provides that every person who sends or ships, C.O.D. shall be liable to a fine or imprisonment with or without hard labour. How are you going to enforce that against the exporter from England, Scotland, Ireland or France? How are you going to find them. The law is absurd, fantastic and grotesque. Then it provides that you cannot buy liquor during thirty days immediately preceding a Dominion election. That is a very nice clause to insert, but see the result of it? We never know when a Dominion election is going to take place, and it does not say a by-election. It says a Dominion or provincial election. A by-election can come off within sixteen days, but you cannot purchase within thirty days before an election. If you happen to make a purchase and an election is immediately proclaimed, you are liable to arrest, fine and imprisonment. There is no sense in that. Then clause 5 provides:

Every one who in violation of this Act in the employment or on the premises of another so sends or ships liquor is liable to arrest or imprisonment.

Just imagine the poor charwoman who is on the premises being liable under the law to arrest. Imagine the poor carter who does not know the nature of the goods being put into his wagon, being liable to imprisonment. He is told to bring them to a private house or to a store. He would be liable under this clause. I cannot understand how people can ask for legislation of this kind, and much less can I understand how hon. gentlemen with long experience in drafting and passing laws for the benefit of this country can ask an honourable body like this to pass such a law. It is absurd in every line of it. It is ultra vires and it has within it all that can make a law obnoxious and ineffective. Furthermore, legislation of this kind tends to cultivate a condition of things that is lamentable in a moral and civilized country. Legislation of this kind tends to cultivate hypocrisy, perjury, lying, making false statements, not only among the poor but among the higher classes, unfortunately, the professional men. How often are doctors called upon by friends to sign certificates for wine and whisky, although aware that they are no more for medicinal purposes than the water in the pump. Still the doctors do sign such certificates. It is false and untrue to their oath of office, and untrue to the condition of things that the state wants, but they do it. Take the druggists, a very respectable class of men. What is their trade? Their trade is selling wines of all kinds under medicinal names; wine that is as intoxicating as any liquor sold in a hotel, or in a bar or restaurant. We all know that druggists in dry towns and provinces are the men who are reaping vast wealth from the sale of intoxicating liquors, without paying a license. The effect of prohibition in places such as our dear old Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, is to take the revenue from the provinces and from the municipalities, which, up to the passing of laws of this kind, had swelled the municipal treasury, and the city treasury. These licenses are no longer recorded and the money for the licenses no longer collected. Who gets the benefit of it? The druggist. Right in Charlottetown the thing that struck my view, and was an object of consternation for me for a while, was the number of druggists. Why, I ask? Are the people all sick on the island. Every third or fourth store was a drug store.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—What about Peruna?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I will give that later. I eventually found out that their business was not so much the selling of drugs; their money was not made altogether in that way, but they were making enough to live on and keep up a respectable appearance, pay their taxes and store rent by selling liquor. I appeal to the hon. gentleman from Moncton (Hon. Mr. McSweeney) if it is not true right in his own district! Can the hon. gentleman from Moncton deny it?

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—They only sell Peruna there.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The hon. gentleman does not deny it. I could appeal to many others, but I thought the hon. gentleman would have the courage of his convictions and say that it was true.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—He says they do not sell it all the time.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Only when asked for it. I have in my pocket—I do not know why I brought them, bills of sale for large amounts of liquor sold in Charlottetown. It was not for medicinal purposes at all, and all these sales were made under prohibition law. We have to come back to the argument that prohibition is not the proper weapon with which to fight the evils of intemperance, or with which to put down the exaggerated consumption of intoxicating liquor. It is a weapon that beats the man that uses it, because he is foiled in his attempt to make another man do it, and when he is not foiled he makes the other man commit abominable crimes of treachery to his neighbour, of perjury before the bench, or illegality in his transactions with other people. That is the result of prohibition. What the country wants is a regulation of the traffic, such regulations as are enforced by law for the sale of drugs and deadly weapons. That is what the people of Canada will accept. But the people, whether by a two-thirds or three-fifths vote, will not be put down in the legitimate use of what they consider their wants either physical or otherwise, whether they be for health or pleasure, and this parliament cannot do any worse service than to back up the principle set forth in this measure, in all good will, all good intention, all for the love of God. They do not take the right way to cultivate the love of God and the love of temperance in their hearts. They are no wiser than the Creator himself, and I for one will never be a party to legislation which will counteract the works of Providence and which will entail the defeat of the measure itself. This question is one which vexes public opinion, entails a lot of misery on both sides, leaves public men open to challenge. If they happen to talk against a prohibitory measure they are put down as law-breakers, as men unworthy the confidence of their fellow-citizens. All virtue goes to one side—the prohibitive side. The moderate and temperance people are put down as criminals by the preachers, the platform orators; as we have had them in the past. I stand here fully determined to vindicate the rights of men who hold contrary views to them. To express these views without their honesty being challenged, without their motives being attacked, and to tell them we are as anxious for the uplifting of humanity, as anxious for the culture of love of God and our neighbour as they are—probably more so; but we differ in our methods of attaining that end, and as this Bill is one of the methods which, to my mind, will lead to evil results, I shall vote against it, and vote for the six months hoist.

Hon. Mr. YEO—I very seldom attempt to address the House, and I regret the circumstances which oblige me to make a few remarks on this present occasion. The hon. senator from Victoria division, in discussing the measure before the Senate, referred to Prince Edward Island. It is true he was frank enough in his opening remarks to say that it was a pleasant place to visit, and spoke kindly of it in that way; but when he came to speak of the people there, he spoke in a different strain. If Prince Edward Island were, as he represents it to be, I think the Senate would be quite justified in passing this measure or one much more strict. They would require it there; but I do not think the province is in the condition referred to by the hon. member. He made a wholesale onslaught on the people yesterday, and to-day he repeats the charge, and he challenges my hon. colleague to characterize his statements as false. If the rules of parliament permitted I should have no hesitation in doing so. I must emphatically deny the statement which he made. I have lived long in Prince Edward Island. I know the people and every section of the island, and have never yet witnessed anything like what the hon. gentleman has described as having seen in a few short visits. Human nature is the same in Prince Edward Island as it is in other parts of the Dominion; some drink and some do not. I feel that it would be quite unnecessary for me to refute the charges the hon. gentleman has made, if it were not for the fact that his remarks are recorded in the Senate 'Debates' and will be there for all time to come. I think it is an unjustifiable thing for him to make such an onslaught as he did on the people of that province. I have no hesitation in saying that for many years the people of Prince Edward Island are temperate. We have had the Scott Act, and at present we have prohibition. We have many earnest, good workers in the temperance cause, and temperance societies in all sections of the province. From my knowledge of the people there, and living there constantly, I am in a position to say that it is a very rare thing to see a man the worse for liquor, at all events in the country parts of the island. It is true that, perhaps in the sea-ports, during open navigation, there may be some drunkenness, and I do not pretend to say that every man in Prince Edward Island is a temperance man. We have during the summer season, a great many visitors there, and they have generally gone away giving Prince Edward Island a good name. The island has a good reputation wherever it is known. Its people are supposed to be fairly good. We have descendants of all races, and we live together happily. I do not wish to disparage any part of Canada, but I think, taking them man for man, the people of Prince Edward island will compare favourably with the same number of people in any other part of the Dominion. They are intelligent, industrious and honest, and it comes with a very bad grace from any member of this House who has made two short visits to the island to rise and make the statements to which we have listened from the hon. member from Victoria division. I have been in all parts of the island in all seasons of the year, and have never witnessed anything like what the hon. gentleman has described. I have no idea where he could have gone to see these things, and I know it will be a matter of surprise to the people of Prince Edward Island if the hon. gentleman's remarks should reach that part of the Dominion. The Scott Act worked very well indeed, and prohibition, while it does not prohibit altogether, is also working well. Every year the temperance cause seems to be getting stronger there. I will say for the people of Prince Edward Island: wherever they have gone—and they are scattered all over the world—rarely has the island had cause to be ashamed of any of them. They have a good education, have good habits, and, wherever they go, they generally make their mark, leading in whatever profession they may take up. This speaks well for the island, and for the temperate habits of its people. I believe the success which they have achieved, wherever they have gone, has been largely due to the good training they have received in their youth. I have been in this House some few years and have never heard the people of any province assailed as the people of Prince Edward Island have been by the hon. member opposite. If the hon. gentleman is opposed to this Bill, he has a perfect right to condemn it; but he might have brought forward other arguments than those he has used.

The hon. member from Moncton (Hon. Mr. McSweeney) spoke of his town as being a dry one. I would imagine from the general tenor of his remarks that it is not very dry. He can say what he wishes of his own city; that is a matter between himself and his people; but when he speaks of Prince Edward Island he should be more guarded. He says that at Point Deschene, which is the landing place from Prince Edward Island to New Brunswick if you see the harvesters coming from Prince Edward Island, they will give you some idea of the temperance habits of the people. For a few years back, some six or seven hundred young people of Prince Edward Island have gone to the Northwest harvest fields. Perhaps when they landed on the New Brunswick shore they found it much easier to get liquor there than at home, and some few of them may have indulged, but I venture to say that of the young men who go to the Northwest, three-fourths of them have never tasted liquor. Some few of them, no doubt, drink. We know that even in the churches all the members are not temperate. I know well that our young people are temperate. They are trained that way, and drinking is an exceptional thing. In the country places of Prince Edward Island, the sight of an intoxicated man causes surprise. I hope this Bill will receive the second reading and go to the committee, where defects can be remedied. There are some things in it which may not be approved, but they can be eliminated and the Bill can be made a workable measure.

Hon. Mr. BAIRD—I am glad to hear the remarks of my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island, because I have visited the island on two occasions myself, and have found the people there very law-abiding and prosperous. I found it as prosperous a place for the size of it as any place I have visited in Canada. Most of us will agree that what the hon. gentleman from Prince (Hon. Mr. Yeo) has told us may be accepted, because he knows whereof he speaks. I have had considerable to do with the people of Prince Edward Island, and have always found them very temperate. At the colleges they excel in athletics and educational advancement. At McGill College, they generally take the highest marks. To what do you attribute their success? As the hon. gentleman has told us, it is due to the temperate habits of the young men. Those who are addicted to drinking rarely get high marks at college. The hon. gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran) went out of his way to make a very severe attack on Prince Edward Island. It may be looked at in two ways. Perhaps the hon. gentleman objects to the manner in which prohibition is enforced in Prince Edward Island. I am satisfied prohibition is working well in that province. The Scott Act also worked well, and I am very glad to see the hon. gentleman who was the father of that Act still able to sit in parliament, and help the cause of temperance. He has been fighting for temperance for many years, and I hope he will live long enough to see prohibition prevail throughout Canada. It has been in force in the State of Maine for fifty years, and the people of Maine would not have it repealed on any condition. In New Brunswick, the Scott Act has been in force in a good many counties. At first it did not work very well; but it must be remembered that when the law was enacted we had in parliament some who were opposed to prohibition and did their best to kill the Act. When they failed in the attempt, they introduced amendments into the Act which, to some extent, made the law unworkable. Since then the Scott Act has been amended and improved, and it is working successfully in the maritime provinces. I think I shall be borne out by members from New Brunswick when I say that the Scott Act has worked well in the country districts of that province. It has completely stopped the sale of liquor in the country districts. There comes to my mind one section of some fifty miles through which I used to travel. In the old days there were fourteen places where you could buy liquor in that fifty miles. Most of the passengers, although closed up in the sleigh, could tell when they arrived near those saloons, and of course they had to get out and have a drink. We found in those places the farmers and their sons waiting around for the stage to come in, and perhaps get a drink or two. Now you can travel through that same fifty miles of country and I am told on the very best authority—I get it from the people who drink—there is not a place where liquor can be bought legally or illegally. There are other country districts in New Brunswick which are equally free from the sale of liquor. Of course there are violations of the law. It is impossible to completely prevent drinking; but the same remark applies to other laws. We have laws against murder and theft; will anybody say that we should repeal those laws because there are occasional murders and thefts? The laws on the statute-book are stringent, and yet people will sometimes murder and steal, but that is no reason why we should repeal those laws. The same thing applies to prohibition. Because some people will sell liquor in violation of the law, that is no reason why prohibition should not be enforced. The Scott Act has been a great educator. The time is not far distant when all Canada will have prohibition, and the Scott Act has done more than any other measure to prepare the people for such legislation. I have always voted for any measure in favour of temperance, and I am not going against my record to-day. I have listened for two hours to the hon. gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran) talking upon law and religion, and I am sure if the hon. gentleman would devote himself to trying to improve the Bill from a legal point of view, I have faith enough in the hon. gentleman who introduced the Bill that he will act upon any reasonable suggestion. He has no doubt looked into this matter, and knows that the Bill is constitutional and will prove to be a workable measure. I hope the Bill will not be put through this House in such a shape that it will conflict with local laws. I trust that the legal fraternity will make it work as well as possible. I shall be happy to support the Bill.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—After the speeches made by the hon. members from Prince county and from New Brunswick, there is little left for me to say. I have listened also to the speech made by the ex-Secretary of State when introducing this Bill, and the statistics which he quoted in reference to the Scott Act and prohibition in Prince Edward Island. We have the Scott Act for 20 years there, and local option in Charlottetown. The Scott Act worked well in the country districts, and just as the hon. member from New Brunswick has told you in reference to his province, the Scott Act in Prince Edward Island wiped out all these old taverns that were strung along every road, and wiped out also a great portion of the drinking in Prince Edward Island. It was a great step in the right direction, in the direction of temperance. The city of Charlottetown had local option, but the people were not satisfied with local option. They tried several schemes, and were dissatisfied with the whole of them, and latterly they enacted a prohibitory law. Then the counties, in order to be in line with the city of Charlottetown, repealed the Scott Act, and enacted a prohibitory law for the whole island. That law is working well. I do not intend to contradict the hon. member from Victoria in his wild and rash statements; the hon. gentleman from Prince county has done that very well, and has shown that the prohibitory law is working well in Prince Edward Island. However, they find it defective in reference to the importation of liquors. Liquor of the very worst kind is imported. It is brought in largely by druggists and sold ad libitum. Druggists can sell there under prescription from a doctor; but they do not always wait for a prescription. They sell without a prescription, and by this means keep a little drinking going on, but nothing at all like what it was—not one tenth of what it used to be. The Scott Act did away with that, and the prohibition law is in advance of the Scott Act, and is giving great satisfaction. We are asked to enact this law by the Temperance Alliance of Prince Edward Island for the purpose of preventing the importation of this bad liquor. They leave it free to any individual to import liquor for his own use; and for mechanical and medicinal purposes, vendors are appointed under the Prohibitory Act. The whole island is up on this question and the Temperance Alliance has taken strong action in reference to it, as the following which I shall read from the Charlottetown 'Examiner', the organ of the Conservative party, will show:

As officers of the Temperance Alliance of this province, we earnestly request every elector interested in the work of temperance to write at once to the senators and members of parliament representing their respective constituencies asking their hearty support to the Bill prohibiting the importation of liquors except for private or personal use lately introduced in the Senate by Senator Scott. We make this request because of information we have received that there is likely to be considerable opposition to the measure, and a post card at this period may count for a great deal. Kindly believe us that the need of this action is very great and please write at once.

This appeal to the electors of Prince Edward Island is signed by the president, H. E. Thomas, the leader of the Methodist body in Prince Edward Island, and A. G. Fraser, the secretary-treasurer.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Is there any Church of England clergymen in that?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—This is signed by the president of the Temperance Alliance. It is my great pleasure to say that the Church of England people are temperate, and are as urgent on this question as the clergy of any other denomination, as I might also say is the Roman Catholic bishop and the Roman Catholic people generally. I find also in the 'Patriot', a report of a meeting that was held in Zion church, one of the largest churches in Charlottetown, which meeting was presided over by the Rev. George E. Ross. The report is as follows:

Just before the sermon, Mr. Ross referred to the request of the Temperance Alliance, which appeared in the 'Patriot' Saturday evening, to the effect that every elector write to our representatives at Ottawa, asking that they support the Bill soon to come before the House re the prohibition of the importation of liquors except for personal and private use. As a means to strengthening the hands of our representatives, he thought it well to frame a resolution and submit it to the whole congregation. This was done and the resolution was then read. All in favour of it were asked to rise, and every person in the vast audience stood without hesitation. A copy of this resolution will be forwarded by Mr. Ross to our representatives to-day, in the name of Zion church congregation. The resolution is as follows:—'The congregation of Zion Presbyterian church, Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, hereby places on record its unalterable enmity to the liquor traffic, endorses in toto the Bill prohibiting the importation of liquors except for private or personal use, lately introduced in the Senate of Canada by Senator Scott, believing that the passage of this Bill will materially aid in the better enforcement of the provisions of the Provincial Prohibition Act now in force in this province, and respectfully requests that you as one of the representatives of the people, the large majority of whom are strongly in favour of the total extinction of the liquor traffic will support the Bill when it comes before you.

These are only two instances indicating the interest that the people of Prince Edward Island are taking in this question. All over the island they are holding meetings such as the one reported here. That is what the Scott Act and the Prohibitory Act have done for Prince Edward Island. If the hon. member for Victoria had been in Charlottetown on some occasions when the people were meeting in large numbers, he might have come to a different conclusion from that which he has announced to the House. Take, for instance, the exhibition at Charlottetown last fall, where thousands of people came in from the country districts. It was a rare thing to see any person under the influence of liquor. In fact there was really none; the exhibition was conducted in the most orderly manner. While there were thousands of people from all parts of the island, and representing all classes of the community, there was no drunkenness. The exhibition at Georgetown, not so large as that which I have referred to at Charlottetown, but still a large exhibition, was equally orderly. There was not a drunken man, and not a sign of drinking that day. If the hon. member had been at either of these gatherings, he would have had a different impression from that which he announced. For the last two years, the hon. member has been stopping at a hotel on the north side of the island, at a summer resort called the Cliff hotel, and I suppose that on a few occasions some young bloods drove out with their girls from Charlottetown and carried liquor in their satchels. How did the hon. member know what was in these satchels? He must have seen, and probably smelt the bottles. That, however, is no indication that the people of Prince Edward Island are such dreadful drunkards as he stated yesterday. I was not so much surprised at the hon. member from Victoria, but I was surprised at the hon. member from Moncton when he stated in his speech that you can get more whisky and worse whisky in Prince Edward Island than any place he knows of.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Did he say worse liquor?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—Yes. How does the hon. member know that? I have been a citizen of Prince Edward Island all my life, and I cannot tell you the quantity or the quality of the whisky you will find there. Those expressions are not worthy of serious consideration. I hope the hon. members of this House will look at this Bill in a rational way, seeing it is requested by the province of Prince Edward Island to advance the cause of temperance. If those hon. gentlemen are so very desirous of helping the temperance cause as they profess to be, they ought to vote for this Bill. I hope the Senate will look upon it favourably and give it a second reading, and amendments may be made, if necessary, when it goes to committee.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—When this Bill was introduced, I approached it with an open mind, feeling rather in favour of it, knowing well the sincerity and long efforts of the hon. member from Ottawa to obtain temperance legislation. Since it was introduced, we have had a very spectacular debate on it to which I have listened with interest, curiosity, and at certain times emotion. If what has been alleged by parties who ought to know what they are speaking about as to the effect of this Bill is correct, it should be carefully scrutinized. I refer more particularly to the speeches of my hon. friends from Rothesay (Hon. Mr. Domville), Westmorland (Hon. Mr. Wood), and Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran). If their statements are correct, then the effect of the Scott Act has not been beneficial. If I were to add my own experience, and malign my own little native town, I would say to-day that there are more taverns in Shediac and more liquor is sold—I would not vouch as my colleagues have done for the quality of the liquor—than there could possibly be, if we had a license law.

Hon. Mr. BAIRD—If there is more liquor sold without a license law, why do the liquor dealers advocate a license law?

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I am not representing the liquor dealers. I am taking the facts as they appear to me. There of course must be a cause for it. The cause probably is that sumptuary laws are to-day, as they have always been from the time of Greece and Rome, and England under the Stuarts, a failure. To make sumptuary laws effective, you must needs have the almost universal approval of the people. Very many people, I know myself, when a vote is taken on the Scott Act vote openly for the Act. I do not say that they are hypocrites, but they have to pose in a certain way for the gallery. The Scott Act has been voted for in my county very many times. Many people who voted for the Act would be very sorry indeed, if liquor could not be got in the county of Westmorland. Referring to the island, we are all very sorry to find it in the pitiful state it has been described to be plunged in, from the effects of the Scott Act. I know the island well. I love the island. I love its boys, and I love its people generally.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—You do not say anything about its girls.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I do not wish to be too precise: the girls are all right. I have travelled all around the island, and I do not think there is a locality in it I have not seen. I have crossed it about 20 times. That was some 35 years ago. At that time I did not touch strong liquor. I associated with the young people of the island. I even tried, in order to stand well with some of them, to learn Gaelic for a purpose which I need not detail here. There was very little liquor consumed then either of a good quality as my hon. friend to my right affirms, or of a bad quality as my hon. friend from Westmorland asserts.

Of course I did not frequent very much places where liquor was sold; I was a young man, and associated with young men. There was very little liquor sold on the island at that time, to my knowledge. To-day the hon. gentleman from Victoria division who has been there on several occasions—I do not think in the capacity of a detective—came before us with an array of figures that is deplorable. We have to take his word as granted. If the island, with the Scott Act in force, has gone down to the pit wherein it is to-day, and if the rapid fall is at all to be attributed to the Scott Act, that Scott Act, notwithstanding the laudable intentions of its author and promoter has not been working well and has not accomplished desirable results. In Westmorland, where the Scott Act has been voted three or four times, there has never been—and I know whereof I speak—more or as much liquor sold as there is to-day—and again I know whereof I speak—good and bad liquor. So much for the Scott Act in the past. On reading this Bill first it startled me when I found clause 3 which reads as follows:

> This Act shall not apply to any intoxicating liquor not exceeding five gallons sent, shipped, bought or carried to any person or persons for his or their personal or family use in their own house, unless it be so shipped, sent, bought or carried to be paid for in such province, county, municipality, city or town, &c.

We are opening here a door which may—and I think will—lead to very deplorable results. To-day, and at all times, the heads of families, even older brothers that drink try—because there is always a good impulse in men—not to lead others into temptation. How many fathers there are all through the land that love—and it is no wrong with some of them, although with those who drink to excess it is wrong—to take a drink, but absolutely prohibit the entrance of any liquor within the precincts of their households. I know my father would never allow any liquor to be brought into the house, except on the order of the doctor. There are many paterfamilias like mine. What will be the effect of the Bill? That liquor, eau de feu, will, under the protection of law, come within the home, as much as five gallons at a time. When this liquor is within the house, the wife, the daughter even is likely or liable to taste of it. You perhaps are aware of the ravages of gin in old England. I have seen it lately stated in the public press that gin has become a plague in the neighbouring city of Hull, among boys and some girls. I know the plague exists in parts of Ontario, because I have been there too and that it is almost as bad, but not quite as it is alleged to exist in Prince Edward Island, where liquor is introduced in houses as a consequence of prohibition. In my estimation, that is more fatal to temperate living than treating at the bar. Let the men who drink continue to drink if they have a mind to, but let us not encourage the introduction of liquor into the privacy of households. If we allow the law to protect that practice, it will do more harm than all the good that restrictive legislation against liquor can possibly effect. For that reason alone to decide my course to-day, I would vote against the Bill. Let me be well understood. I have been here for very many years. I am not a teetotaler. I respect the opinions of others, but I do not believe in being bound by vows and pledges to do what I should. I believe in maintaining my liberty. I am a temperate man, temperate in language and life, and I believe in temperance. I am just as sincere as the promoters of the Bill. I am convinced if this Bill is passed, and it is allowed by it to introduce liquor into the household, it will work more mischief than can be conceived.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—The Bill allows five gallons to be brought in for domestic use. Will one man out of fifty order spruce beer or will he order lager beer or wine? No, he will order what is more energetic, that of which he can get the most of the alcoholic principle in a five gallon barrel, gin, whisky, rum, strong liquor. Strong liquor will be in the house, and when the old man is away and when the girls and boys are at home having a jolly time, they will probably find the means to get to the liquor, and intemperance will be brought home to the sacred hearth of every one's family. I for one cannot feel myself in duty bound to countenance such legislation. I shall not refer to the legal point. It has been taken up, as legal points are always taken up, very well by my leader here and other men of legal authority. I simply want to justify my vote on this occasion before my people at home and before my country, and before my own conscience, or at least give some reason wherein that vote will, according to my own views of it, be justifiable, and that I may not be accused of taking the position of favouring intemperance in this Canada of ours.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middlesex)—I am not going to discuss the principle of prohibition. That has been settled so far as Canada is concerned by the Act of 1878 by the parliament of Canada assembled in that year—and I had the honour of a seat in parliament then. Parliament accepted the principle of prohibition as a remedy for the evil of intemperance. Parliament may have been right, or may have been wrong. That question is not before us now. The province of Manitoba accepted the principle of prohibition a few years ago. Prince Edward Island has accepted it and is acting upon it now. We have, in Ontario, a local option law, and out of 418 municipalities, 405 have accepted the principle of prohibition, or nearly half the municipalities of Ontario. The old Dunkin Act of 1864, which was passed prior to confederation, was accepted immediately on its passing, or very soon thereafter, and has been in operation in some municipalities from that time to now; so that as far as the people of Canada are concerned they are already on record, and I do not know that much is to be gained by discussing the principle of prohibition. It is alleged that it is not a success. There are just two alternatives before us as between prohibition and license. If the license does not prevent drunkenness, nobody will say that license is a success. So we are driven to prohibition. It is alleged that it does not prohibit. What are we to do? We have tried the license system for over a hundred years. Perhaps it has been in force in England for over 1,000 years, still there is an enormous amount of drunkenness. Humanely disposed people want to find a remedy for the evil; jails are filled with drunkards, asylums are crowded with tottering, gibbering idiots, brought to that condition through the effect of drink. What is to be done? Is the world to drift to ruin; are we to stand still and say that this great procession of death and the grave, and worse than a living existence here is to go on and we are to stay our hands? I do not believe that prohibition is a failure where it is given a chance. Where it gets a chance it has to fight its way to success like every thing else. Do you mean to say that Christianity is a failure because two-thirds of the population of the world to-day are worshippers of idols, or have some form of religion of which we do not approve? Do you mean to say that the Christian religion in Canada is a failure because we still have vice, drunkenness, adultery and all the crimes in the decalogue? Do you mean to say that our pulpits are a failure because a large number of people who take part in religious exercises do not comply with the injunctions of the pulpit? Do you mean to say that our schools are a failure because there are still numbers of illiterates in the community? Do you mean to say that our election laws are a failure because we have corrupt practices in elections? The law of existence, under any form of government, is prohibition. There is no other law. The law of the universe is prohibition. The law of our first parents was prohibitory. My hon. friend from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran) suggested that if the law were not prohibitory, perhaps our first parents, in their desire for liberty, would not have eaten the forbidden fruit. He meant to imply that if the Supreme being instead of interdicting the eating of that apple had allowed them the generous use of as many apples as they desired, that probably they would not have sinned. That is the only inference from his speech. The law of every legislature in the world is prohibition. That is the first condition. Thou shalt not do this; thou shalt not steal, thou shalt honour thy father and mother, and so on, without going through the whole decalogue. A grievance has arisen. Prince Edward Island has a little more drinking than it ought to have. There is a little more gin taken on church steps than the hon. gentleman from Moncton thinks ought to have been consumed there. It is not the fault of the people of Prince Edward Island, nor is it the fault of the people of Moncton. Let them be judges of the matter. This Bill is designed particularly to correct that evil. If liquor is consumed in Prince Edward Island, it is not the liquor that is made there. It is the liquor that is brought there, and my hon. friend from Ottawa wants to regulate the importation into Prince Edward Island, and into dry cities like Moncton, of liquors from the outside. This is the question we have to consider. Prince Edward Island says: 'We want to live under prohibition; we cannot have prohibition such as is now in force unless you do something to prevent liquor being brought in there. Men with suit cases will bring it in. They will smuggle it in from the fishing boats. Are you going to allow us to suffer what we consider is a great evil by refusing legislation which would correct it?' In the Bill of my hon. friend—and he deserves all praise for it, because it is in harmony with his life—the proposition is to ask this House by legislation to help the people of Prince Edward Island to do what they want to do, to make their prohibitory liquor law effective, to keep the suit cases out, to prevent friends so honest in their interest in the temperance cause like my hon. friend from Victoria, from seeing the amount of drunks, for it must have been painful to him; to prevent men violating the liquor law in Moncton, that beautiful and prosperous town. That is all that is proposed. We need not debate the principle of prohibition; it is settled. We are not asking to repeal the Scott Act; it is settled. It is there to stay. It has been accepted by eight out of twelve counties in New Brunswick. It prevails in about half of the province of Quebec, which is a testimonial to its efficiency. It prevails in principle all over Prince Edward Island. That means something. If Ontario is dry it is on the same principle. That means something, and in the northwest the same movement is on foot. It prevails amongst thirty-eight million of people in the United States. The same principle has prevailed in Maine for over 50 years. There are millions of people to-day who recognize the principle of prohibition, and it is our duty to see if we cannot help those who are practically helpless in a matter of this kind. The constitutional question naturally arises: can Prince Edward Island of its own motion prohibit the importation of liquor? If it is quite clear that Prince Edward Island can prohibit the importation of liquor, then I think it would be a proper amendment to the law of Prince Edward Island to give that protection. I have before me the last decision of the Privy Council on the liquor law. It was in the case of the liquor law passed in Manitoba, in 1900, in which they confirmed the right of the province of Manitoba to pass a prohibitory law. Up to that time, that question was in dispute. It was admitted that we had the right as a Dominion to pass a prohibitory law, subject to the ratification of the people. It was admitted the province could pass a local option law which met the approval of the people; but it had never been proven anywhere that the province could take itself out of the whole circle of the Dominion and pass a prohibitory liquor law for itself, and in reviewing the question, the committee of the Privy Council said:

> On the one hand, according to Russell vs. Regina, (2) it is competent for the Dominion Legislature to pass at Act for the suppression of intemperance applicable to all parts of the Dominion, and when duly brought into operation in any particular district deriving its efficacy from the general authority vested in the Dominion parliament to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada.

Now, whether prohibition is a good or bad thing it is competent for us to pass it. The decision proceeds:

> On the other hand, according to the decision in Attorney General for Ontario vs. Attorney General for the Dominion (1) it is not incompetent for a provincial legislature to pass a measure for the suppression, or even for the total abolition, of the liquor traffic within the province, provided the subject is dealt with as a matter 'of a merely local nature' in the province, and the Act itself is not repugnant to any Act of the parliament of Canada.

So the question of prohibition, as a legal question, is settled, and it is settled by the people of the province of Prince Edward Island. The decision proceeds:

> This board held that a provincial legislature has jurisdiction to restrict the sale within the province of intoxicating liquors so long as its legislation does not conflict with any legislative provision which may be competently made by the parliament of Canada, and which may be in force within the province or any district thereof.

It has been said across the floor of the House that this Bill is ultra vires. The highest court in the realm has said that it is not, that prohibition is not ultra vires.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Would the hon. gentleman be kind enough to name the authority he cites?

Hon. Mr. ROSS—It is the decisions of the House of Lords and Privy Council, rendered in 1902.

The judgment further says:

> It is held further that there might be circumstances (2) in which a provincial legislature might have jurisdiction to prohibit the manufacture within the province of intoxicating liquors and the importation of such liquors into the province.

I had no idea we could go that far until I read the decision. That would seem to warrant the conclusion that Prince Edward Island might pass a law prohibiting the importation of liquor into the province. The judgment continues:

> For the purposes of the present question it is immaterial to inquire what those circumstances might be. The judgment therefore as it stands, and the report to Her late Majesty consequent thereon, show that in the opinion of this tribunal matters which are 'substantially of local or of private interest' in a province—matters which are of a local or private nature 'from a provincial point of view' to use expressions to be found in the judgment—are—not excluded from the category of 'matters of a merely local or private nature,' because legislation dealing with them, however carefully it may be framed, may or must have an effect outside the limits of the province, and may or must interfere with the sources of Dominion revenue and the industrial pursuits of persons licensed under Dominion statutes to carry on particular trades.

My hon. friend from Victoria became alarmed lest our treaty with Germany or our treaty with France might be affected by this Bill, but we have the power to pass the measure. Germany and France accepted that treaty whilst this power was in force, and it was a condition precedent to the treaty and such an objection could not be raised now. That judgment I have quoted goes so far as to say that a province may prohibit the manufacture; that is its right; and may also prohibit its importation under certain circumstances, the circumstances never having been explained, so that it is quite clear that the Bill which my hon friend proposes, as to its principle —and that is all we have a right to discuss on its second reading—is a Bill intra vires, and when it comes to be further considered it is for the House to say whether we shall amend the power of parliament to enable the province of Prince Edward Island to do what it wants to have done, what it believes to be in the interest of the people of Prince Edward Island to have done, what they have committed themselves to twenty years ago by the Scott Act, and what they have reiterated in stronger language by a prohibitory law the other day. Their position is this: you have a residence in the heart of the city, you clean your yard front and rear, sweep your whole premises, and there is nothing to be considered a nuisance on your premises; but, presto, there comes a neighbour who dumps garbage into your yard, and you claim from the municipality the protection of your property and person. This is your position. Prince Edward Island has cleansed itself of the suit cases and an abominable traffic; but there come into the island people who dump their garbage, whisky, rum, gin and other intoxicating drinks into Prince Edward Island to corrupt and degrade her youth, contrary to the judgment and wishes of the people of the island, and they come to us and ask us to stop that importation, to abate the nuisance, which we perhaps alone can effectually abate, and to protect the province not against their neighbours from New Brunswick, simply, or their neighbours from Nova Scotia, but raiders from all parts of the country, some of whom may have an object in discrediting prohibition by the measures they pursue.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—Could they not enact such a law themselves?

Hon. Mr. ROSS—The decision would indicate that it is quite possible for them to do so, because they say that under certain circumstances it will be possible for a provincial legislature to pass legislation enforcing prohibition. It is a sort of obiter dictum in the judgment I have read rather than a part of the judgment, for they do not indicate the circumstances under which that portion of the law would be effective. I am supporting the principle of the Bill. I do not pay attention to the five gallon clause at this stage, nor do I pay attention to the point raised by my hon. friend who spoke last as to whether the facility to get five gallons into a home is liable to degrade that home. That question is not before us. I am not raising any question as to whether we are imposing obligations upon shippers or express agents in bringing liquor into a province, or into the home which would be subversive of their rights as common carriers. I am not discussing that. One principle before us is, shall we enact a provision, not perhaps in this form, but shall we support a principle whereby Prince Edward Island shall be protected more fully than it can be under existing circumstances? It is a simple proposition worthy of consideration. If prohibition is good for the whole of Canada, it is for a certain part of Canada, and vice versa; and if a part of this province comes to us with an appeal on such high grounds as this appeal is made, and an honest appeal, and an appeal that not only reaches our sympathies, many of us, all of us, I am sure, but an appeal which affects their constitutional liberty, effects what they may call their prerogative under our constitution, then I think that appeal should not be wantonly or hastily cast aside. I understand this question is coming before the government in a somewhat practical form by a deputation from Prince Edward Island, next week, and that the memorial which the legislature sent to the government is to be then considered, and as the debate could not be properly closed at this stage without knowing perhaps what action the government may take, or whether this Bill might not be set aside and another substituted for it, or whether this House might not be in possession of further information which would be useful in dealing with the measure, I will move that the debate be adjourned until the 8th of March next.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The order of the day being called:

Second reading of Bill (D) An Act to provide for the incorporation of Railway Companies.—Hon. Mr. Davis.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—I move that this order of the day be discharged and that it be placed on the orders of the day for Wednesday next.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I suggest the propriety of discharging the order and allowing it to remain discharged until its promoter can bring it before the House. I would direct attention to the fact that for the greater part of last session, and nearly the whole of this session, this order has occupied a prominent place on the order paper. It is quite evident that the promoter does not intend to go on at present with the Bill, and I think the order should remain discharged until he is ready to proceed.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—On a previous occasion, I raised an objection to the course suggested by the hon. leader of the opposition, but on this occasion I think he is quite right. This Bill has been on the order paper for a long time, and if the promoter is anxious to proceed with it he can renew his application on some future occasion. In the meantime it should be discharged.

Hon. Mr. DERBYSHIRE—Senator Davis is ill and unable to attend his official duties, and if he does not appear on Wednesday next there will be no objection to the suggestion of the hon. leader of the opposition.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the House adjourns, I would call the attention of the right hon. leader to the fact that on the 1st of February the House ordered a return of the accounts sent by the restaurant keeper, Jacques Déry, to the Immigration Department. I suppose we may entertain the hope that it will be brought down pretty soon.

Right Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I will call the attention of the Department of the Interior to the matter again.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

EMPLOYEES OF IMMIGRATION OFFICE, QUEBEC.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr LANDRY inquired:

Has the government assured itself whether it is true—

1. That, from the 1st of January, 1909, to the 15th of April, of the same year, a certain number of employees in the Immigration office at Quebec obtained three days of leave every week?
2. That, notwithstanding this absence of forty-two days, the same employees were carried on the pay-roll as having been continually and regularly at their posts?
3. That these leaves of absence were given by the immigration agent at Quebec, on his own responsibility, without having previously obtained the authority of the superintendent general of immigration?
4. That the pay-list attesting the uninterrupted presence of these employees was certified as true by the immigration agent at Quebec?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The answers to the four questions are: Yes, with the following note added from the department: It may be added that the agent reported fully in the matter to the Superintendent of Immigration, who approved his action, having regard to all the circumstances.

IMMIGRATION OFFICE AT QUEBEC.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

1. Has the immigration agent at Quebec applied to the Department of Public Works to obtain the installation of electric fans and lights in his office and in the immigrants' dining room?
2. Has the Department of Public Works refused?
3. In spite of this refusal have the appliances in question been installed in the places above mentioned?
4. By whom and upon whose recommendation?
5. At what cost?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follow:

On May 1, 1909, the Superintendent of Immigration made application for a fan to be placed in the dining room in connection with the restaurant, which was supplied by the resident architect of the Department of Public Works at Quebec, at a cost of $40.

The Department of Public Works has received no application for the installation of electric lights in the immigration agent's office, or in the immigrants' dining room.

RESTAURANT KEEPER AT QUEBEC. INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

1. How much does the restaurant keeper, Jacques Dery, pay the government for the rent of the rooms in which he keeps his restaurant, his refreshment room and kitchen?
2. How much for the heating of such apartments?
3. How much for lighting?
4. How much for fuel for culinary purposes?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The answers to the hon. gentleman's are as follows:

1. Nothing.
2. Nothing.
3. Nothing.
4. Nothing.

LIST OF SENATORS.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Before the orders of the day are called, I should like to ask the hon. leader of the Senate when we are to have printed the list of senators from confederation to date, with dates when they ceased to occupy their positions in the Senate? It was considered that it would be valuable as a reference, and the House passed an order for it. Probably the printing office overlooked it.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I am not aware of the matter, but I will call it to the attention of the Secretary of State.

JURISDICTION OF DOMINION AND PROVINCES ON INSURANCE.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the other orders of the day are called, I should like to call the attention of the leader of the House to a case now pending in the courts of Ontario in reference to the constitutionality of parliament undertaking to deal with the question of insurance. I notice both in the 'Globe' and 'Mail and Empire' that Mr. Laidlaw, of Toronto, has filed an amended statement of his claim in connection with his suit, which sets forth the fact that the Minister of Justice of Ottawa and the Attorney General of Ontario have been legally notified that the plaintiff, and other policy-holders suing with him, are applying for a trial at bar or a court of three judges, of the question of the constitutionality of the Insurance Bill now before parliament; also the Act of 1909, and preceding legislation affecting the rights of policy-holders, &c.

I notice also that the Ontario government has appointed king's counsel in Toronto to look after the interests of the province of Ontario. Considering the importance of this question, affecting as it does the constitutionality of insurance legislation passed by this parliament, I should like to ask the right hon. leader of the House whether any action has been taken by this government to instruct any legal gentleman to watch the proceedings to which I have referred? My hon. friend will readily understand the importance of a question of this kind, affecting as it does the interests of a large portion of our people. One judge in Quebec has already given the opinion that parliament has no right to deal with the question of insurance. The country would, therefore, like to know what action the Dominion government has taken to test the question in the highest courts of the realm. In a matter of such vital importance, a test case should be submitted for a final decision by the Privy Council in England. If it should be found that we have been interfering with the rights of the provinces, it will be hard to say what the effects may be as to the rights of people who have taken out policies under Dominion statutes dealing with insurance. I should like to know what steps the Dominion government has taken to obtain a final settlement of this very important question by the highest courts of the realm?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—As the matter is one of gravity, my hon. friend should give notice of a formal question, and I will obtain an answer for him. At present I am not in a position to give him information of any value on the subject.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 85) An Act to amend the Criminal Code.

(In the Committee).

On sub-clause 3:

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have an amendment to propose to this sub-clause which I understand the hon. gentleman in charge of the Bill is willing to accept. It is to add the following words:

Any such order may be amended, revoked or renewed from time to time in whole or in part by any subsequent order in council.

This amendment was suggested to me by the hon. gentleman from Prince Albert, who is not now in his place. It is intended to provide for a case where it is discovered by experience that it is not desirable that this Act should be enforced in a particular district, and it gives the Governor General in Council the power—which I think he ought to have—to revoke the order if it is found not to work satisfactorily.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That leads me to ask the question, cannot an order in council be rescinded at any time?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—It can, of course, but this would be an indication that it was in contemplation at the time the Bill was passed.

The amendment was agreed to, and the clause as amended was adopted.

On sub-clause 4:

Hon. Mr. WILSON—It strikes me that this clause leaves the Bill open to the same objection that was taken before it was amended. There are no circumstances under which this mineral may be found that does not admit of proceedings being taken against the individual. It does not protect the individual, as far as I am capable of comprehending it. In the first part it provides that no prosecution shall be had under this section unless it has been initiated on the information or complaint of a manager or director of a mining company, and so on. Then, in the second provision it gives any one and every one the right to prosecute. Under this clause proceedings may be taken by anybody against any individual who is found with the material mentioned in his possession. It is hardly fair that people should be placed in such a position that if the friend of a manager enters a complaint against some individual having in his possession certain ore, that he can, therefore, be proceeded against. If parties in Cobalt desire to have protection, let them take the proper course, and protect themselves as other companies do. We have no right to make special criminal laws to apply to the mining business in Cobalt or any other place. If we make special provision for that crime in any particular locality, why not make provision for other crimes that are peculiar to some other locality? No doubt if the law is made applicable to a certain section it can be removed by an order in council; but we know that these orders in council come very very slowly; that while the government may feel a disposition to comply, yet it is hard to get the government to move in the matter; therefore, an innocent man is liable to be subjected to injustice and have charges brought against him, under which he will be held to be partially a criminal. No one seems to be exempt, and I, therefore, think we should give this matter further consideration before finally dealing with it.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—My hon. friend is considering the first clause, which was amended to meet the objection that there must be reasonable ground to suspect that the ore has been stolen or dealt with contrary to the Act, and that the party accused is unable, or refuses to account for it. Surely no better protection could be devised than the clause in the shape it now is. It has been so amended that I am afraid it will not be workable.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I suppose the hon. senator having charge of the Bill will agree with me that it is a broad clause, capable of any amount of explanation. No prosecution shall be had under the section unless it has been initiated on the information or complaint of a manager or director of a mining company. That is the first branch. Then 'On the information or complaint of some one hereunto authorized by a mining company or manager thereof.' That mining company can order any one to institute proceedings, and a director can also authorize proceedings, and the unfortunate individual holding specimens of these minerals in his possession is liable to have action taken against him. Then it says, 'Or with the authority of the Attorney General of the province in which the offence is alleged to be committed, or by the owner or part owner of a mine, who deposes under oath that he believes that rock ore, or other substance, similar to those mentioned in this section, has been stolen or wrongfully taken from the mine.' An owner of a mine can do it, or a part owner of a mine has a perfect right to enter an action, and the party can be proceeded against and regarded as a criminal with mineral in his possession that may not have been stolen. It is hardly fair that this should become part and parcel of the statute law of the Dominion. If the mining companies desire more protection than they are getting, why do they not take the same means as other corporations to protect their property? Is it because it costs too much? Are they not bound to protect themselves the same as other people? They would find no more difficulty in taking care of their property than other companies do. They could employ men who could be relied upon to look after their interests. According to this clause, a man who has any of this mineral in his possession is forced to prove that he obtained it honestly; otherwise we may make him a criminal.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is one point to which I would direct the attention of the hon. gentleman from Ottawa. The owner, or part owner, is to depose under oath that he believes that rock, ore, or other similar substance to some of these mentioned in this section, has been stolen or wrongfully taken from the mine. The section enumerates the things the stealing of which constitutes an offence. I think that the words 'similar to some of those' should not be there. These words should be stricken out, and the clause should read 'that he believes that rock, ore or other substance mentioned in this section has been stolen or taken from the mine. We have enumerated the substances, the taking of which constitutes the offence, and I do not see why we should have the words 'similar to some of those.'

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—For the reason that it helps to identify the property. No one would accuse another of stealing unless he had ore similar to what he had lost.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The first clause reads as follows:

424a. Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who, having in his possession or on his premises with his knowledge any rock, ore, mineral, stone, quartz or other substance containing gold or silver, or and unsmelted, or untreated, or unmanufactured, or partly smelted, partly treated or partly manufactured gold or silver, is unable to account satisfactorily for, or prove his right to the possession of, the same.

Why should you say similar to some of those. I move to strike out the words 'similar to some of those':

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That would rather open the door to possibly useless prosecution.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—It would facilitate a prosecution.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The insertion of the word 'similar' qualifies the character of the rock or the material which may be found in the possession of the accused, and it limits it to rock of a particular value. It is a question if these words were struck out, whether it would not admit of a prosecution for having possession of any rock such as is mentioned.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Mentioned in this section.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Some qualifying words would have to be inserted, because it is not intended that proceedings should lie against a person who may be found in possession of rock, or the substance mentioned in this question.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I desire to add the following clause: 'This Act shall come into force on the 1st day of July, 1910.'

It is suggested that it is better to have some delay in order that everybody will have notice of it. That will be section 5 of 424a.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We insert this as section 424a, and we simply wish to say that this section shall not go into effect until a certain date—not the Act, because the Act covers the whole code.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—It is the section. Section 424a will come into force on the 1st day of July, 1910.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Why not allow the Act to come into operation upon the royal assent being given, the same as any other Act; then the Governor General in Council need not issue his order proclaiming the districts until the first of July. It seems to me it will lead to a misunderstanding if it is put in the way proposed. If you make it come into effect by the 1st July, it does not imply that the order in council will issue naming the districts at that date. It seems to me that it will be better to leave it as it is.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Then we will let it stand as it is. I will draw the attention of the department to it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY, from the committee, reported the Bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

MORRISBURG FERRY AND DOCK COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. BEITH moved the second reading of Bill (GG) An Act to incorporate the Morrisburg Ferry and Dock Company.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I have neglected to look into this Bill carefully, but it seems to me that it gives this company authority to enter into a power business, and to expropriate the necessary territorial rights which might be required for that purpose. I fail to see why section 8 has been inserted in the Bill giving express powers of expropriation to this company. Why should not the company rely upon the general provisions of the Railway Act for the acquisition of those powers? Possibly my hon. friend who has charge of the Bill can tell us the object of inserting clause 8 in the Bill. If the object be to expropriate water-powers, grave exception should be taken to the vesting of a company with such powers in view of the policy recommended by the Conservation Commission regarding the preservation of our public resources. I understand that the commission has made a very strong recommendation to the government that the water-powers of the country should be conserved and practically retained by the Crown, and that power should not be given to private companies to absorb these natural resources of Canada in this way. I therefore, at this stage of the Bill, wish to express my objection, so that it may not be understood that the principle of the Bill is now assented to. I should like to direct the attention of my right hon. friend as I did the other day in the case of another Bill, to the disposition of railway companies to ask for these powers, and of this Chamber practically to approve of their asking for them notwithstanding the recommendations which have been made by the Conservation Commission. I directed the attention of the Chamber the other day to a very glaring instance of a demand along the same lines, to which certainly exception should be taken, and particularly by the government. It would be very much more desirable that my right hon. friend should make some declaration in this Chamber as to the attitude of the government on this subject.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—To what particular Act did my hon. friend refer?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I referred the other day to a Bill which is intended to grant territorial rights in the way of ex-propriating water powers in the Thunder Bay district. It is a Bill that contemplates acquiring practically all the water-powers in that part of the country. We know there are very valuable water-powers in that district.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —In what position is that Bill now?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is before the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours; but inasmuch as the Senate on the second reading commits itself to the principle of a Bill—

Hon. Mr. POWER—Not in the case of private Bills.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is the theory which is repeatedly quoted, but I have no doubt when the Bill goes to the Railway Committee they will be told that the Senate had accepted the principle of the Bill, and there is no reason why it should not pass. As these Bills are coming up day after day, this is particularly a matter in which my right hon. friend should be in a position to make some declaration on behalf of the government.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Did the particular Bill to which the hon. gentleman refers, asking for such extensive powers of expropriation, originate in the Senate or the House of Commons?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It originated in this House, and there is, therefore, a greater reason why the Senate should take steps to consider the question which I brought before the right hon. gentleman's attention to-day.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The matter is of importance. I shall make inquiries into the position of the question and advise my hon. friend. I may say, however, in a general way, that unless very special cause is shown, the government would desire that these railway Bills should be confined to the purpose of building railways, and that alone.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would think so. I may point out that the Railway Act is sufficiently comprehensive in its general provisions to give all the necessary powers to railway companies, and all that is really necessary is that a railway company should make an application to be incorporated and rely on the Railway Act for its general provisions; whereas the disposition is to set out a lot of special matter in a Bill asking extraordinary powers which requires members in both Houses to be constantly on the alert and to thoroughly scrutinize those Bills on behalf of the public interest.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —My hon. friend has touched a weak spot in our practice, and also in the practice of the other Chamber. My recollection is that in the old times the junior officer of the Crown was specially charged to report on these Bills. The Solicitor General was expected to advise the government of the day, and also the House, if any unusual powers were set forth in private Bills. I think that good old practice ought to be revived and made effective. I shall bring the whole matter to the notice of the Department of Justice, and will advise my hon. friend a little later with respect to it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I hope I do not yield to any member of the House in my desire to see provisions of the constitution maintained; but looking at this Bill I really do not see that it is open to the objection that has been taken by the hon. leader of the opposition. Clause 7 sets out the objects of the company, and is as follows:

7. The company may, subject to the provisions of the Railway Act,—

(a) Construct, acquire, equip, own, maintain, control and operate, a ferry, for railway cars, engines and trains, across the river St. Lawrence between any point within or near the municipality of the village of Morrisburg, in the county of Dundas, on the north side of the said river, and any point on the said river in the state of New York on the south side of the said river.

(b) Do a railway ferry business across the said river at any point within the said limits.

(c) Acquire, own and operate boats for the carriage for hire of passengers and goods between any points within the said limits.

(d) For such purposes, construct, purchase, or otherwise acquire, and maintain and operate ships, locomotives and cars propelled by steam or otherwise.

(e) Build, acquire and maintain wharfs, docks, warehouses, blocks, slips, piers and viaducts, and railway tracks not exceeding five miles in length in any one case, to carry out its undertaking, and specially to reach deep water in the said river.

(f) Connect such railway tracks with the railway of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada and with any other railway within the municipality of the village of Morrisburg.

I do not see that the company ask for any powers except those which might reasonably be granted for the operation of ferries across the St. Lawrence. Then clause 8 provides:

8. The company may purchase or otherwise acquire and shall have the power to expropriate, subject to the provisions of the Railway Act, such land and other property as may be requisite for the purposes of the company.

The hon. gentleman's contention was that the company should be made subject to the provisions of the Railway Act, and this clause says expressly that it shall be so subject. Then the last clause of the Bill provides as follows:

The Railway Act shall apply to the company, and to its railway undertaking.

Honestly, I cannot see any objection to the measure; but when it goes before the committee, if we can discover anything objectionable in the Bill, I have no doubt it will be removed.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS BRANCHES BILL.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The order of the day being called:

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the motion for the second reading (Bill 17) An Act to authorize the government of Canada to acquire, by lease, lines of railway connecting with the government railways.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—One of the objects I had in view in moving the adjournment of the debate on this very important Bill was to give members from the west and from Quebec an opportunity to more thoroughly discuss it. The last time the debate was adjourned, the House was very thin, and that was one of the main reasons why I moved the adjournment. Since then I have looked into the matter a little myself, and I find that, although agreeing largely with the views that have been expressed on this subject by several hon. members, I still have to differ from them in some matters more of detail than of principle. The view has been expressed that the Dominion has expended a very large amount of money for the construction of this national railway. That is true. The figures given here are $95,000,000, which covers the construction of some 1,530 miles of road in the maritime provinces, and in Quebec. Notwithstanding the severe criticisms which have been made on this expenditure, I have come to the conclusion that not only the $95,000,000 capital, but the interest on the capital for over forty years has been spent for a good object, and I am prepared to coincide in the judgment rendered recently in an important case, that if the motive is good, mistakes may be pardoned. The governments of the past have done things which might come under the category of being not a crime, not illegal, but improper, but all this was done in good faith. Why do I say so? Because the men who were at the head of this department of our government have been men of honour and ability, men who have rendered great services to this young country. The spending of this ninety-five millions of dollars which, if we include the interest, now amounts to $200,000,000, has been in the hands of men of ability. Ninety-five millions of dollars at 3½ per cent will give you the annual outlay on capital which is not covered by the revenue of the road, about $3,500,000. Taking the average of that during the past 43 years, you will find that you have spent nearly another $100,000,000. The expenditure of that vast amount of money was in the hands of men who were promoting the progress of Canada and rendered good service to the country. By reference to the Parliamentary Companion, I find that the first head of the Railway Department was not a minister, because at that time it was not a separate department. The railways were then constructed and administered by the Public Works Department. The Ministers of Public Works in the first administration of Sir John Macdonald were Hon. Wm. McDougall and Sir Hector Langevin. For six long years these two gentlemen were at the head of the construction of that road, and had partial administration of it as it was being built. In the Mackenzie regime there was still no Department of Railways. The management of the road continued under the Department of Public Works, which had to give its attention to everything in the nature of construction throughout the Dominion. Who were the men in the Mackenzie government who controlled the national purse in regard to the maintenance and construction of that road from 1873 to 1878? While the Liberals were in power it was administered by no less a man than Hon. Alex. Mackenzie. Are there in this House or outside of it, men who are prepared to say that the money under his administration was not faithfully, honestly and efficiently expended? When Sir John Macdonald returned to power in 1878 he remained in power until his death, which occurred in 1891, an event which was regretted by all the people of Canada. He had the control of the Intercolonial railway. Up to 1878 that branch of the administration had been under the guidance of men who had to give their attention elsewhere, and Sir John Macdonald found it necessary to establish a Department of Railways. Now, who were the ministers of railways from 1878 until the year of his death in 1891? They were Sir Charles Tupper, Hon. J. H. Pope, and the Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald himself, three names which are emblazoned on the pages of Canadian history. Sir Charles Tupper is still alive to enjoy the esteem and consideration of his fellow countrymen for what he has done for them in the past. He had the administration of these roads in his hands up to 1885. He was followed by John H. Pope, who remained in the ministry until his death in 1889. Then Sir John Macdonald took hold of the Railway Department and remained its head until his death. It was then taken by Mr. Haggart and by our colleague in this House, Sir Mackenzie Bowell. So, in Sir John Macdonald's second ministry we have had Sir Charles Tupper, and J. H. Pope, the latter famous throughout the province of Quebec and all the Dominion as one of the ablest administrators and we had Sir John Macdonald. Who can say that in the hands of these men, any portion of the $95,000,000 they spent in the construction, maintenance and administration of that road was dishonestly expended? No man in either party will say that these men who held in their hands the honour of Canada so many years, and under whom Canada was prosperous and made progress as far as the time and circumstances would permit, were guilty of any improper expenditure of the money entrusted to their care. I am free to admit that the men who administered the affairs of Canada did as well as they could at the time, and with the means at their disposal.

Of course, the work of the past, is overshadowed to-day by the immense development which has covered Canada with prosperity and with abundance, with new avenues for the development of national life; but because we have developed so marvelously for the past ten or fifteen years, there is no reason to deny the men of the past credit for the work they did when the country was young and still in swaddling clothes. And I for one am proud to admit that these men, under the circumstances, accomplished a great thing for Canada in the works that they constructed. Then we come to 1896, and to whom was the administration and supervision of this road given? It was given to one of the ablest men of his day, the ex-prime minister of New Brunswick, a man with a grasp of affairs that could not be surpassed in or out of parliament; a man who saw far into the future, who a year or two before his death on the shores of the Pacific in British Columbia, declared that before ten or fifteen years had elapsed, Canada would not only require one transcontinental road over and above what she had then, but that she would require four or more. I refer to the Hon. Mr. Blair.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—But he opposed the Transcontinental at the time.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I am told by the hon. gentleman from Halifax that he opposed the Transcontinental railway project. He did not oppose the building of the road, because he declared at the Pacific coast that not only one, but four roads were necessary. He opposed the method by which the government proposed to do it; but he was not opposed to the policy of constructing the work. At any rate, the administration of the road was in his hands for quite a number of years until he resigned, and then he was replaced by another gentleman who is still in parliamentary life, Mr. Emmerson, whose only thought was to build up the Intercolonial railway, at no matter what expense, and there I may have to differ from him. His idea is to make the Intercolonial a road capable of competing with other roads in Canada. Nobody can say that Mr. Emmerson neglected the welfare of that road. His whole heart and soul are bound up in its development, progress and prosperity. The reins of power that he held were transmitted to another and younger man, a man of genius, although young, and inexperienced in railroad matters; but a man who has been able to grapple with the situation in its most sensitive and delicate parts, who has not been afraid to tackle the problem of getting a dollar's worth for every dollar that he spent. I refer here to Mr. Graham. These are the men whose records are in the building, in the construction, in the maintenance and in the administration of that great national enterprise. It was a national enterprise, and that is the reason that I say the money was well spent. But, unfortunately, the enterprise was not a business proposition. It was proposed in the first place for the purpose of consolidating the provinces which now constitute confederation. The object was to create a friendlier feeling between the provinces by the sea and the provinces of the west, and have that feeling run along steel rails, through forest, wildernesses, and through parts of the country that could not afford traffic enough to pay for the grease to keep the wheels oiled. It was not a business proposition, it was a sentimental and noble one, and I am not here to-day to say that money should not have been spent for the development of that sentiment. I go further and say that the provinces in the west have not only gained by the construction of that road in the consolidating of national sentiment and bringing in closer touch the different sections of the Dominion, but I contend that the maritime provinces sacrificed much in joining the confederation, and I know whereof I speak. Who can tell me that not later than twenty-five years ago there was any national sentiment in the maritime provinces, as far as the rest of Canada was concerned? We all remember the time when public opinion there was quite favourable to annexation with the United States, not that they detested this part of the country, or that they disliked their fellow subjects, or that they did not want to trade with us; but simply that they could not trade. The natural channels of their trade and commerce were not along this road at the time. The people of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, some of whom are in high positions to-day, who favoured separation from Canada, did so not because of any ill-will to the empire or hatred to the other provinces of Canada. They talked annexation because the needs and necessities of their people demanded that the situation should be made more easy and more comfortable, and that they should not be made to pay so much tribute to the west. That was the reason for the attitude of these men at that time. What had Prince Edward Island to gain by joining confederation? Before confederation that island had grown and prospered to an enormous extent. Its people were the wealthiest on the American continent. Every one was prosperous, and farm products of the island commanded the highest prices, not in Canada but in Europe. They traded with England. They imported all their industrial and agricultural implements free. They were buying in the cheapest markets in the world, and selling in the dearest markets in the world, and every farmer in Prince Edward Island was wealthy, comparatively speaking; but the day they entered confederation the chief markets of the world were closed to them. They had to pay 25, 30 and 40 per cent more for everything they consumed on the island. We know that Prince Edward Island is not a manufacturing centre and never can be. It is purely and solely an agricultural centre, a garden centre. These people had their channels of trade cut, and what was the result? At the end of fifteen or twenty years there was scarcely a farmer on the island who was not head over heels in debt, with mortgages on his land. There may have been some in a better position, but the majority were in debt. I have that from the bankers themselves on the island; but to-day there is scarcely a farm in the island of Prince Edward which owes a dollar to the bank. After fourteen years of rule under this government the farmers had been enabled to pay off their mortgages and the banks were obliged to establish branches in nearly every small town in the island. Charlottetown itself, which fifteen years ago had one or two, has now six or seven of the principal banks of Canada doing business there to-day. The banks are rolling with the money earned by the farmers, according to the statements of the bank managers. And why? Because the farmer of Prince Edward Island got back his channel of trade and commerce, the facility of buying a little cheaper—not as cheaply as I would like to see him buy, but cheaper than he used to purchase fifteen or eighteen years ago, and he has been able to get back the markets of England and elsewhere for his products. So that when I say that the maritime provinces sacrificed a great deal for confederation, I am corroborated by the circumstances in which these provinces have found themselves at different stages of provincial or national life. The natural routes of the maritime provinces were with the eastern states. There is not the slightest doubt about that. Unless nature is backed up by government and popular aid to cut off the drawbacks which nature places in the way of trade and commerce, trade will flow in the natural channel; but the strength of the government is sometimes able to make it flow in channels which are not natural. I remember one of the Prime Ministers of Manitoba telling me in the year 1889, when the channels of trade and commerce were not easy between the east and west, when they were open between the north and south, that if the government of the day did not see to it, before a very few years Manitoba would be forced by industrial and agricultural conditions to trade with the United States, not only along commercial, but along political lines, and become part of the republic. That was the expression of a Prime Minister of that day to me in his own office. Fortunately, the government of the day became alive to the situation, and they did a lot to open up channels of trade which would allow the products of the west to come east instead of going south. So that this condition of affairs, as it affects the maritime provinces, is not local. It is of general application, and I hold that the maritime provinces, having consented under the difficult circumstances which I have pointed out, to come into confederation, we have no right now, that the money has been spent on the Intercolonial, to regret it. There may have been some extravagance and waste in the expending of this money. I am not going to deny facts of that kind, and I am not going to contend that a sentimental road can be run on the same lines as a business line or money-making line. We have no stones to throw at the Intercolonial railway. There is another road to-day whch holds a high position in the railway world in this country, that is, the Grand Trunk railway. For how many years did the Grand Trunk Railway Company sink millions upon millions of pounds sterling, without receiving a cent in return? I need not mention the figures. They run up into the hundreds of millions. The English bondholders, and capitalists who put up the money, have never received a cent of interest in any shape or form on the money they put up in the first place, and millions upon millions have been sunk in the construction of that road. That was a private company, but they were like the Intercolonial railway. They were building through the wilderness and encountering difficulties at that time, which railway construction does not meet to-day. The Grand Trund railway at that time was also much of a sentimental road, if not in construction at least in administration.

The bondholders who put their money into it thought that nobody could run the road except a man appointed from England. The result was that the administration was sentimental along the best part of its line. Its head officers were brought from across the water to meet the conditions of which they knew nothing. It took them from 25 to 30 years to find out what was required to make their road a paying institution, one that would give returns for the money invested for its construction, maintenance and administration. It took them years and years to find out, until ten, twelve or fifteen years ago a happy thought came over the administration and they gave up the idea of sending out what I call sentimental managers, simply because they were from the old country. They engaged a railroad expert, a man of broad experience, who knew the conditions of the continent, and the wants of the people, who was able to meet the conditions and wants of the people, and what was the result? Chas. M. Hays, after ten or fifteen years administration of that road, has brought it up to the standard of the finest of railroad engineering, construction and administration, on the continent, and today it is a flourishig enterprise, paying good returns to some at least of the men who invested in it. There is a condition of things which must be apparent to everybody. Why did the Canadian Pacific railway not have the same record? The Canadian Pacific railway was originated and constructed under different methods and different inspirations and influence. It was engineered by men who intended that the road should pay, and they intended to make it pay. They had no sentiment as to the location, and they had no sentiment in the administration and maintenance of the road. They went abroad and they sought for the best man they could find, in the person of Sir William Van Horne, and put him at the head of the construction and maintenance of that road, and at the end of seven or eight years he was able to retire, honoured by his adopted country and by his Queen for the work he had done in putting the Canadian Pacific railway at the head of all roads on this or any other continent. That is the work of business men, not sentiment. Dollars will not follow sentiment. Dollars cannot take a stand on sentiment, and the sooner we get rid of sentiment on the Intercolonial railway, as the Grand Trunk railway has done, the better for the country. If the government of the day want to treat the Intercolonial as the Canadian Pacific railway and Grand Trunk railway treated their lines, and put at the head of that road a man of the capacity of a Shaughnessy or Hays, I venture to say that inside of five or ten years the road will not only be a paying one, but will be able to compete with the best transcontinental roadway we have in the Dominion of Canada. I would not wrangle over the matter of salary. These men are paid salaries which they are worth. I understand that the president of the Grand Trunk railway is receiving $40,000 to $50,000. He would be worth to Canada $100,000 a year for five years. I understand Shaughnessy is receiving from $50,000 to $60,000. He is worth the same amount. It would pay the government to employ men of that kind. If private companies have confidence in such men and deliver over to them a concern, not merely of the value of ninety-five million dollars, but of hundreds of millions and say to them: 'Here Shaughnessy you run this road to make it pay', the government will be able to find men of the same stamp to run the Intercolonial. They cannot be the only two in Canada, or out of Canada who are able to undertake a duty of that kind, and bring it to a successful issue, and if it were necessary, why would not the government obtain the services of one of these two men, and put them at the head of the Intercolonial railway? I venture to say that the government would never regret such an action. We have an example of what I am saying in the conduct of the Australian government. The railways there were going to smash, no revenues to amount to anything, expenses increasing, A young Canadian with comparatively little experience in the management of railways, but a man determined to do his duty, and knowing railroad conditions, was engaged by the Australian government. Mr. Tait took over the management of the Australian railroads and they are now on a paying basis, and on a satisfactory basis to the public and giving good service. I would say to the government to-day that it would be a fair proposition to engage the services of a man of this class and put him at the head of the Intercolonial railway. To my mind, this commission business is not effective. You do not find big concerns running their business by commissions. You do not find the Bank of Montreal running its affairs by commission. These hydro-headed propositions only end in disputes and wrangles. One solid man at the head of the institution with the genius for administration is better than four heads, because there will be no dispute and no wrangling. There will be one idea of what is to be accomplished. If you have a commission of four or five gentlemen you have different interests, and different results to attain. I know that this proposition, coming from such a humble authority as myself, will have no effect, but I throw it out as a seed that in time may germinate and produce fruit. Such a proposition would be worth while. Does the country know what amount of railroad is in the hands of the Minister of Railways, under his direct control? We have from Montreal to Halifax siding some 1,279 miles, according to their own official mileage, and on Prince Edward Island we have 259 miles. That gives a total of 1,538 miles of railway, which is already a very fair proposition for any one to tackle, and carry through—well worth the while of the biggest railroad man in the country—and apart from that we have the so-called branch lines. Has the country any idea of the mileage of these different branches? They are almost as great. The ex-Minister of Railways remarked to me the other day that I did not seem to be very friendly to taking them in. He asked: What is the matter? I replied: Don't you think we have enough main line without adding branches, that have no sap in them? He said it was a new light in which to look at it. I am not opposed to the government, under given conditions, undertaking to run all the railways in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, or Quebec. They have been doing so in Prince Edward Island. I feel that the government ought to be able to administer the affairs of a railway as effectively as efficiently, and as honestly as they administer the affairs of the post office. I do not see any difference. The only thing required is determination on the part of the men at the head of affairs, to make his colleagues stand up and say, 'This must be done.' It only takes one man to do it, and the man who does it will do an immense service to Canada. In this proposition we have, perhaps, 1,538 miles of main line. The branches are Metapedia to Gaspé, over 300 miles, when finished, or close thereto. That is in Quebec. Then we have the Temiscouata and Edmondston railway, another 150 miles. You have in Nova Scotia 300 miles. You have in the province of Nova Scotia much more, naturally the branch lines from Halifax. First the Halifax and South Western from Halifax to Yarmoutth and southwest, which runs from Halifax to Yarmouth, nearly half way around the southern portion of the island. Then you have the branch from Lunenburg to Middleton, the MacKenzie and Mann road. Then you have the Dominion Atlantic from Truro to Yarmouth, which is owned by an English Company, about 150 miles. I am not able to give the exact mileage, because I have not the timetables. Then we have the lines from Hawkesbury to Inverness, another McKenzie and Mann line. Then you have the Springhill and Parrsborough road, and the Joggins Mines railway, over 150 miles, and so on. These roads, if they are paying institutions to-day, certainly would not sell out, unless they got a very large price or a fair return for their money. If there is any sale of these roads to be made, it is because the owners want to get out of a hole. My advice to the government is to be very careful in purchasing any of these branches which have not a little life in them anyhow, and not to load on to the main line charges of which we will hear complaint in the future. I am prepared to pass the sponge over all that has been spent, but, as a Canadian, I would certainly ask the government to spend no more money than is necessary in purchasing the branch lines under present conditions. If we had a man like Sir Thomas Shaughnessy, or Sir Charles Hays, at the head of the system I would rely solely on his judgment in acquiring branch lines, but I certainly would have very little faith in railways which would probably be influenced by local financial interests. The government has to be very careful. We are passing legislation which may be used by other governments to come, just as has been done in the past. While on this subject, I would urge that the government be very careful in the first place, because you cannot strengthen the parent tree by grafting on it branches that are dead and useless. As a matter of law, the Bill is innocuous and practically unnecessary because the government have power to-day to buy branches.

The danger is that this Bill may be used as an authorization to buy roads that will be of no value to the Intercolonial railway at a large expense to the country. There are other things that the Department of Railways and the government should direct their attention to. Prince Edward Island has grievances to submit. It is bound down by monopolies created by men, and by obstacles created by nature. Those obstacles spring forth in the good old winter time. Communication with the main land is cut off almost entirely, with the exception of one or two ferries, and these are run at great risk. That is due to nature and cannot be overcome; but the inconvenience can be remedied by the act of man. I think the government should grant the legitimate demands of the people of that province for as strong and effective service in the winter months as possible. I do not go with them in their demands for a tunnel at present. I would be in favour of a tunnel if there were one or two millions of people on the island, but they admit themselves—and I have spoken to numbers of them—that the demand made upon the Dominion government to construct a tunnel is one that would not be justified by the results, because it would be a difficult and expensive thing to build and maintain, and the amount of freight that would have to go through that tunnel would probably all go through in one month, and passengers would not travel seven or eight miles under water in the season of navigation when they could have a fine beautiful sail over the strait. Not one in a hundred would do it unless he was travelling on business and in a hurry. There would be no trade to pay expenses of the tunnel or even interest on its cost.

That being the case—and it is admitted by a large number of people in Prince Edward Island—the demand for the tunnel decreased. If the island had been increasing its population rapidly, and traffic had increased in proportion, it would have been otherwise. But that is no reason why the people of the island should be left to themselves. They are in the grip of a very strong monopoly, but that is not the fault of the Dominion; it is their own fault. Before confedeation, some fifty years ago, Prince Edward Island tied itself up in the hands of the Anglo-American Cable Telegraph Company, which gives them a very unsatisfactory telegraph service. I do not think it is adequate, because I know from experience that in cases where it has been absolutely necessary to send a telegram to the outside world on a Sunday, the company would not send it. A mother or father might die and the absent children could not be telegraphed for. That monopoly should be stopped, but there will be difficulty in doing it, because the island has placed itself completely in the hands of the company. Not only is the service inadequate, but it is expensive, the rates being almost double. The monopoly goes further than that. It does not allow telephone communication with the mainland. Cannot this parliament come to the relief of the people of that province, who are cut off by a monopoly from what is admitted to-day to be a human necessity, the telephone? I have been informed that the people of Prince Edward Island can not get telephone communication with the mainland because the Anglo-American Company, who hold the monopoly, have a clause in their agreement with the province to prevent any wire being laid under water to the island. The result is, telephone wires cannot be laid, and the island is at the mercy of this company. Would it not be proper for the government of the day to ascertain if the company would not part with its abnormal rights. If this monopoly can be done away with, I think it should. Then there is another thing the Department of Railways could look into. The people of the island complain that shippers have to pay triple rates before they can get their goods placed on the market for sale. First, they have to pay freight on the Prince Edward Island railway, then to the ferry, and then on the main line of the Intercolonial railway.

They cannot do business with much success while they are subject to such excessive charges. There is a way in which the people of the island can be benefited by wise legislation. If they had open competition in the service, between the island and the mainland they would be better served. That could be looked into by the department. Of course, private enterprise cannot compete with the government ferries.

Although the Bill does not appeal to me in some of its features, finding it is only a confirmation of power already existing in the hands of the department, I shall vote for it, hoping that in the carrying out of this law due attention will be given to the best interests not only of the Intercolonial itself, but of the country. Knowing that the country, as a whole, does not regret the money spent on this national enterprise, and that its hope now is that large sums may in the future be spent with all due care, I am prepared to support the Bill, believing that the effect of it will be to promote economy as well as efficiency in the running of the road.

Hon. Mr. LEGRIS—The proposition contained in this Bill is of a serious character. It would allow the government to make arrangements to take charge of the railway lines connecting with the Intercolonial railway. We were told last week that the aggregate length of those lines was fifteen or sixteen hundred miles. That is a big scheme. The right hon. leader of this House said the other day that this Bill is purely permissive. To my mind this permission should neither be asked for by the government nor granted by this House. The experience of long years past that we had with the administration of the Intercolonial railway, is more than sufficient to show that no government is qualified to manage railways in this country. Should this Bill become law, within a few years the government will have charge of and be operating some of these branch lines, perhaps most of them, and with what result? The result will be the swallowing up of further millions of dollars to improve those roads, which instead of being new feeders for the Intercolonial railway, will be suckers on the public treasury. The right hon. gentleman remembers very well, no doubt, when the Liberal party was in opposition in the House of Commons. We fought time and again on the floor of the House, on public platforms and throughout the country against the administration of the Intercolonial railway by the government, which was far from being satisfactory to the country. I regret to say that since 1896, though we have spent the enormous sum of $35,000,000 to improve that road, and in spite of the country having enjoyed a period of unparalleled commercial activity, the result has been to increase the annual deficits on that railway. For this reason, I hope the time has come when the government will see its way to lease or sell that road to some responsible company, which would no doubt make it a success for itself and for the country. If this Bill becomes law, I sincerely believe that within a few years the government will have taken charge of and operated some, perhaps most of those lines, connecting with the Intercolonial railway. It will result in increased burdens upon the public treasury, and will be a serious obstacle thrown in the way of the desirable leasing or selling of that expensive state property.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I think the hon. gentleman who has just spoken sees more in this Bill than it really contains. The only proposition I see here is to allow the management of the Intercolonial railway to enter into negotiations not to buy, but simply to lease branch lines.

Hon. Mr. LEGRIS—That is all the same.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I do not know that. Moreover, after having entered upon these negotiations, they would have to submit to parliament the results of their labours. If the arrangement was not one which my hon. friend would consider in the public interest, he could oppose it; but at present this Bill, if it is worth anything is only a step in the right direction. It is merely to authorize the management of the Intercolonial railway to negotiate with the proprietors of the branch lines. What has been the policy of the great company railways? The hon. member from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran) has spoken of the successful policy of the Canadian Pacific railway. What has been the policy of that road? Simply to acquire every branch line within its reach. That has been the policy also of the Grand Trunk railway. Until it was adopted, the Grand Trunk railway was not paying anything to its shareholders because it operated only a trunk line; but when it commenced to acquire branch lines throughout Ontario and other parts of the country, wherever they could be had under favourable conditions, the company evened up the total mileage of the system, because every mile you add to a railway system helps to cheapen the operating of that system. Therefore, I believe this Bill is a step in the right direction. Look at what Mackenzie and Mann are doing in the west, in Ontario and in Quebec. They are acquiring every branch line they can get. These branch lines, before they became parts of a big railway system, were not paying. When they were merged in the trunk system they not only paid for themselves, but gave additional value to the whole system. I believe this Bill to be a good one, and I shall have great pleasure in voting for it. It simply gives permission to acquire branch lines, and then only when these roads will have been reported to be in good, safe condition with a fair promise to be operated successfully. When such a report of the engineer is before the board, the management of the Intercolonial railway will have the right to approach the proprietors of the various branch lines. There are many such lines enumerated here, which I do not consider would become parts of the system. I do not think such lines are contemplated by the Bill. The only branches contemplated are those which have no other outlet except the Intercolonial railway, and which should be connected with that road. A railway system without branches cannot prosper any more than a tree which has only a trunk and no branches. There must be branches to every trunk line in order that the local traffic may be secured.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The branch lines are there now and doing business.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Yes, but under different systems. Every successful railway man in Canada, who has charge of any of our great systems has adopted the policy of acquiring branch lines. The government in this case should follow the example set them by such men as have been mentioned just now—Sir Thos. Shaughnessy, Sir William Van Horne, William Mackenzie and Mr. Mann. The government should follow their example.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH moved the adjournment of the debate until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

The order of the day being called:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion for the second reading (Bill C) An Act to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I do not wish to prevent my hon. friend taking this Bill into committee, but I may state that the Department of Justice have grave doubts as to the extent to which the Bill, as originally proposed, would go. The mover has given notice of his intention to introduce another clause involving some cosiderable alteration, and I may add that I myself have an amendment from the Department of Justice, which I shall propose to introduce when the House is in committee. I do not want it understood that anybody is committed to the principle of the measure by allowing the Bill to take the second reading. I think we may as well let it have the second reading and have it go into committee at a convenient day, say Thursday next.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Under the circumstances, I do not think I should trouble the House with any remarks at this stage. Since the Bill is going to the Committee of the Whole, I shall reserve anything I have to say until then.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

GOVERNMENT ANNUITIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (Y) An Act to amend the Government Annuities Act, 1908.

(In the Committee).

On clause 6, sub clause two:

2. Any contract providing for an annuity to commence to be payable at any greater age than eighty-five years shall, as to purchase price, be subject to the same terms as if the age were exactly eighty-five years.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I should like the right hon. gentleman to explain this clause.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—A curious circumstance occurred. In the original draft, not as I prepared it, but as it was primarily amended in the House of Commons, they fixed a term of eighty years as the maximum term at which we would grant annuities. That is to say, we would not give a man anything more if he was 83 or 84 than we would give if he was 80. Of course, in all cases, after a man reaches eighty, he gets special advantages. Two or three old men who wanted to come under our system complained bitterly that we were giving them worse terms than an ordinary company, which is true enough. To meet that we raised the term to 85 years.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

Hon. Mr. FROST—I have here a document which only came into my hands this morning. It is a petition of the ladies of the National Council of Women, signed by Lady Edgar, as president, and by other officers of that society, asking that some amendments be made to this Bill. I therefore give notice that I shall move that these amendments be taken into consideration to-morrow at their third reading. The petition is as follows;

RE GOVERNMENT ANNUITIES FOR WOMEN.

To the Honourable
The Senate of Canada,
In Parliament assembled.

The petition of the National Council of Women of Canada, respecfully represents as follows:—

Whereas the Parliament of Canada has enacted laws for the promotion of thrift, and for the protection of old age;

And whereas in the Annuities Scheme then adopted the scale of payment is on a higher basis for women than for men, on account of the fact that the longevity of women is said to be higher than that of men;

And whereas the figures upon which the calculations as to the longevity of women are based are said to be those of Great Britain, and not of Canada;

And Whereas the longevity of women in Canada may not be greater than that of men;

And whereas the earning power of women is usually less than that of men, and they are therefore less able to make adequate provision for old age, while, when old age comes they are less able than men to supplement their income in any way;

And wheras the Parliament of Canada, in beauring the expense attending the working of the Annuities Scheme, has demonstrated a desire to help the people of Canada to make proper provision for old age;

Therefore the National Council of Women of Canada, on behalf of the women of the Dominion, do humbly pray your Honourable Body to so amend the Annuities Act, as to make the payment for Annuities for women on the same basis as is now in force for men;

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

M. EDGAR, President.
MARGARET TAYLOR, Vice-President.
SOPHIE SANFORD, Vice-President.
MARIA E. FROST, Treasurer.
EMILY CUMMINGS, Cor. Secretary.

That reached me this morning and I now hand it in on their behalf.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What does the hon. gentleman propose? Does he propose to give notice of an amendment to the Act on the third reading?

Hon. Mr. FROST—Yes.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think that is a matter which the right hon. minister in charge of the Bill should require any lengthened period to consider. I think the right hon. gentleman must be in a position to deal with it now.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I prefer to take it up to-morrow. Some hon. gentlemen may wish to express their views, and the ladies are a body we all desire to respect.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—The hon. gentleman must put before the House a definite resolution.

Hon. Mr. FROST—I make that motion.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—It is to put men and women on the same plane.

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman can give a notice of motion in writing.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the hon. gentleman desires to comply with the terms of that petition, his notice would simply be that on the third reading of the Bill he will move that clauses of the Bill shall apply to women as well as men.

The SPEAKER—A notice of motion can be drawn up and handed in.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If I understand the Bill, it applies to women now. Is it the intention to lower the rates of annuities purchased by women?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Evidently the intention is that we should sell annuities to women at the same rate as we sell to men. At present we charge the ladies a little more, under the usual actuarial scale.

The motion was agreed to.

OTTAWA AND MONTREAL TRANSMISSION COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—(In the absence of Hon. Mr. Beique) moved the second reading of Bill (II) an Act to incorporate the Ottawa and Montreal Transmission Company, Limited.—Hon. Mr. Beique.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I might direct attention to this Bill, which is very much in the same line as the measure to which I referred the other day. This is a Bill proposing to incorporate a transmission company. Under section 8 of the Bill it will be observed that the company ask the right to acquire a strip 30 feet in width over the territory outlined, which would cover a very large section of Quebec and Ontario. It also asks power to acquire water-powers, and so on; but insidiously, in section 16, the provisions of the Railway Act are made applicable to it, although not a railway, giving power to expropriate for the purposes of the company, which I apprehend would cover water-powers, as well as other territory which they might require.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Perhaps in that case, we had better let it stand.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes. I think it should stand until my right hon. friend can make some explanation as to the attitude of the government in regard to the matter.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I move that the order of the day be discharged, and that the Bill be placed on the order paper for Thursday next.

The SPEAKER—Then the original motion is withdrawn, and the question is on the motion of the hon. gentleman from Halifax.

The motion was agreed to.

PROMOTION AND DISMISSAL OF IMMIGRATION OFFICERS AT QUEBEC.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved:

That an order of this House do issue for the production of all correspondence between the present immigration agent at Quebec and his superiors in the Department of the Interior, on the subject of the retirement, dismissal or promotion of officers under his control, or of the increase or decrease of their salaries or remuneration.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —There is no objection to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

ESCAPES FROM IMMIGRATION HOSPITAL AT QUEBEC.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

1. How many sick persons, or persons detained therein, have escaped from the immigrants' hospital at Quebec since Dr. Pagé has been the superintendent thereof?
2. What are the names of the fugitives, and what is the date of each escape?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The answer to the hon. gentleman's question is as follows:

IMMIGRANTS WHO ESCAPED FROM QUEBEC IMMIGRATION HOSPITAL SINCE 1905 WHEN DR. PAGE ASSUMED CHARGE.

The cause of detention was trachoma in the majority of cases, and in certain other cases, lack of funds.

IMMIGRATION AGENT AT QUEBEC.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

1. Has any report whatsoever been made to the Immigration Department, by the immigration agent at Quebec, against Mr. E. W. Brewster, immigration agent in the Eastern Townships?
2. When was this report made?
3. What is the nature thereof?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —No report has been made. That answers all three questions.

IMMIGRATION AGENT AT QUEBEC.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

Outside of his capacity as agent of the Immigration Office at Quebec, has Dr. Jos. P. Lavoie authority to act as inspecting physician, and has he the right to make the medical inspection of the immigrants who land at Quebec?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Yes, if necessity arises for his so doing.

THIRD READING.

Bill (JJ) An Act for the relief of James Albert Greene.—Hon. Mr. Frost.

PROTECTION OF NAVIGABLE WATERS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT moved the second reading of Bill (B) An Act to amend the Act respecting the protection of navigable waters.

He said: In moving the second reading of this Bill, I trust I may be permitted to indulge the hope and belief that it will be considered one of great importance, and that hon. gentlemen who will do me the honour to listen to my remarks will share that belief. I have been impelled to introduce this measure because it seemed to me to be in strict accordance with strong and frequently expressed manifestations of public opinion, and because it deals with what appears to be a very serious evil, and one which is daily assuming very grave proportions. Hon. gentlemen may have noticed during the last year that the press of Canada in many quarters has drawn attention to the great danger resulting, and is to result to a greater extent in the future from the pollution of our navigable streams. In the capital of Canada, which ought to set an example to the rest of the country, there has been quite a lively discussion in the press on the subject, and strong protests have been urged during the last year against the pollution of the Ottawa river by a little town not many miles above the capital, whilst this city itself has been discharging sewage in immense quantities into the Ottawa river. The newspapers of Ottawa have found fault with this little town of Aylmer for doing in a much less degree what the capital itself is doing. It seemed to me that the only way in which this evil could be met, was by such legislation as I have endeavoured to embody in the Bill now before the House. After I had introduced the Bill, I was very glad to find that the Senate Committee on public health had dealt with the matter last session. That committee, of which the hon. Mr. De Veber is the energetic and well informed chairman, had last year devoted a great deal of attention to the subject. At the time of the introduction of my Bill, the report of that committee had not been prepared, but shortly afterwards a manuscript copy of the report was handed to the clerk, and with the help of my hon. friend Dr. McMillan, we succeeded, though it was during recess, in having that report printed and distributed. I feel that that report will materially help us in the discussion of this Bill, and the enactment which I hope will follow. I lay down as a truth which no one I think will contradict, that water pure and undefiled, and unpolluted, is one of the prime necessities of life. It is necessary to the whole of creation—as necessary as the light, and warmth of the sun, and as necessary as God's pure fresh air. It is the right of every individual to have for his own purposes, and domestic purposes, pure water, and it is as well the right of the public as against the individual to have unpolluted water.

And why? Because as I have said, water is a prime necessity to life and to his health. It is as necessary as any element of food. In fact, water is food. It is, I submit the principal and most elementary and essential kind of food; it is one of the great commodities provided by nature itself, placed at the disposal of all creation, man and beast. Under the old Roman law it was put in the category of things which belonged to no one. That is a thing which belongs to everybody. Such was the water, the light of the sun, the air, atmosphere, the beasts of the forests, the fish of the ocean, and the birds of the air. It is a natural commodity provided by the law of creation for the use of man. Consequently, the individual, and the public as well, have an inalienable and indefeasible right to pure water. In these days, we have commissions organized for what is properly called the conservation and protection of natural resources. It is, perhaps, a little bit strange that health of the race, which, after all, is the greatest of all natural resources, should not have received a little more attention. It is more than passing strange that in all legislation which has been enacted since confederation, so little attention has been paid to the public health. It is more than passing strange that the British North America Act itself has been almost completely silent on this most grave subject, public health. We are taking steps to protect and preserve the forests, and our water-powers, and I repeat that, up to the present, little or no steps have been taken for the purpose of protecting public health. We are doing worse than that. We are not only taking no steps to protect the health of the people, but we are deliberately daily destroying that which is absolutely essential to human life. I am afraid we have been living in a fool's paradise. We have been protecting everything, the animals, vegetation, and, most of all, in all creation, man has been neglected. I submit that the depositing of sewage in our natural streams constitutes a far greater danger than the adulteration of food or drugs. Not many years ago this parliament passed a law to prevent the adulteration of foods and drugs. If I am permitted, I should like to draw the attention of the House to some of the conclusions in the report of the Committee of this House on the public health which has been recently printed. I am quoting from page 5, where I find the following:

> Although the subject deals with the academic side of the question, illustrating how nature maintains pure the waters of the streams, and how it is only as settlement takes place and men and animals congregate in settled communities, thereby resulting in accumulations of organic wastes, domestic and agricultural, thereby causing pollution of streams, yet the evidence and discussions show that the problem becomes an urgent one demanding legislative interference. Hence, its consideration was naturally taken up first.
> It was clearly pointed out by different gentlemen that the idea that the problem of the pollution of streams was one having a practical interest for only old settled countries and thickly settled communities, as of England or Germany, was wholly wrong. That it has for many years been a serious matter affecting the health and influencing the typhoid death rate of dwellers along the shores of the Great Lakes was indicated in the following diagram (page 6).

The diagram follows on the next page. The report proceeds:

> The statistics show that the death rate of Chicago from typhoid, at a time when she was polluting her own water supply by pouring the sewage into Lake Michigan, was four times as great as that of Detroit, whose sewage, fortunately, was delivered below while the water was taken above the city. At the same period Toronto had a high death rate from typhoid because her water pipe, laid across the bay into which she poured the sewage, was broken and leaky.

On page 91 I find the following:

> To-day, with the intrusion of matters affecting the public health into every condition of life; into federal departments, whether dealing with the health of men or animals in matters of foods and drinks; whether providing for the admission of healthy immigrants, or caring for their health after their admission, or for the health of Indian bands; whether investigating the pollution of streams between Canada and the United States or between provinces, or the sanitary control of railway trains; whether providing for the protection against pollution of the waters wherein food fishes and crustaceans are cultivated; whether investigating the character of the lighting, ventilation or overcrowding of passenger vessels on the high seas or inland waters, and the means of safety of vessels and engines; or whether preventing injury through legislating for the health of the employees on public works and of the people who may be engaged on government contracts, or against sweat-shop work, and it is abundantly plain that in a remarkable manner the British North America Act leaves the extent to which federal action may be pushed in protecting and promoting the public health to be limited only by the degree to which public sentiment and public needs shall, from time to time, call for the exercise of the almost unlimited powers possessed under our constitution by the federal authority.

Then at page 12 the report proceeds:

> (a) Turning Crude Sewage into large Bodies of Water.
> This, with an almost unanimous voice, is condemned in the evidence; one gentleman, however, stating that this method has hitherto prevailed in most of the cities and towns of North America, and he seems to think, when we consider the purifying effects of oxidation, sedimentation and dilution, that it may be safely carried out in large bodies of water, providing the municipality does not procure its water for domestic supply in too close proximity to the sewage outfall, and it would be advisable, in the case of large cities and towns, to have the sewage screened and settled in sedimentation basins. This gentleman does not, however, explain how the neighbouring towns are to be protected, and his views were combatted by the following opinion from other evidence, 'It is quite true that a surface water, whether river, stream or lake will dispose of a certain amount of organic matter, but this takes no account of microbes, these are not testable by chemical means, but by their environments, and we know in the light of modern knowledge that they can thrive or exist long after all trace of their habitat or surroundings has been lost to chemical tests.' . . . 'As in the case of a large river. . . . I had occasion to test the water, and within about a distance of half a mile I lost all trace of the pollution chemically, but for twenty-three miles down the stream I follow the bacteria. They will lie there on the ice and live, and then when the ice melts it all goes down into the water underneath.' As a further illustration of the vitality of germs, the history of the Plymouth, Pennsylvania, outbreak of typhoid is given. Quite recently a sample of lake water from Newfoundland showed excellent results chemically; but bacteriologically it was most suspicious. I condemned it, pending further information concerning its source and surroundings, and well it was that I did so; the water was conveying disease to the consumers thereof. In my opinion, it is these lesser, or non-detectable, by ordinary senses, pollutions which are the most dangerous.'—Starkey.
> The point of the argument is coming. In my opinion this is precisely the stage at which we have arrived in Canada at the present day. Most of our water courses are so great that it would take a large volume of sewage to be perceptible to the ordinary senses, volumes which we do not as yet furnish, but it is only a question of time to get such a pitch. The St. Lawrence is a case in point: In my time the growth or gradual increase of pollution has been quite perceptible. When I first commenced to make analyses of these waters I found that the average number of bacteria per cubic centimetre ranged about fifty or sixty, and every year after that it got more and more, until now the average is 180. Even healthy human beings and animals carry the causative agents of disease, notably, typhoid, cholera, dysentery and many of the pus organisms, and perhaps those of other diseases also. Unfortunately, we have the sick, as well, to deal with. From these the danger is greater in that the organisms are more numerous and more active. Fortunately, these pathogenic organisms do not live very long in this medium (sewage); but, unfortunately, also they do live so long that they may be carried very far. . . . They may be washed down into our streams and lakes, so that none of these, in inhabited districts are safe sources of water supply. This is especially so where the population is thick and where sewers carry the stuff in large quantities into these streams and lakes. Sewage being collodial does not mix well in the water into which it is cast; often it is in masses, which take some time to break up; it is warm and floats on the surface; the salts in it do not help much in its diffusion.—(Starkey.)

These several quotations make it abundantly plain that the dictum is true: That whatever and whenever a stream of water which is the receptacle of sewage which can reach the intake pipe, becomes the source of a water supply for domestic purposes, sooner or later typhoid fever and diarrhœal disease will follow its use.

You will remember the report of the Royal Commission in Great Britain on the purification of rivers. There they found by direct experiment on rivers that there was not one in Great Britain long enough to purify itself from germs when they once got in. They had two that were two hundred and fifty miles long, and they could not get any farther than that, and they proved most conclusively that the germs could go down two hundred and fifty miles.—(Starkey.)

Assuming the necessity for sewage purification, the methods to be adopted are discussed in length in the evidence. It is stated, 'we can "devise" a scheme to get rid of them all (microbes).' This is a statement of extreme moment, and of such importance that we cannot over-estimate it. Translated into plain language it reads: 'A good sewage effluent possesses such chemical characteristics as to make it indistinguishable, by ordinary sense, from a common drinking water.' 'This is the standard (chemical) called for by the local government board in England, and to my knowledge, in the case of some sewage plants emptying their effluents into the Thames, this standard of purity is even exceeded. . . . Furthermore it means that a volume of fresh water receiving such an effluent will not have its character altered from those of an ordinary water, and if precautions are taken to rid it of germs, there is no reason why it should not be used as a drinking water.'

I am quoting at length from this report, because I think it is most illuminative. Then at page 21, I find the following:

Experience has shown that even the St. Lawrence, the Ottawa and Niagara, the Mississippi and Ohio, are not large enough to ensure safety at all times and under all circumstances against pollution, while epidemic after epidemic has proved that, given the pollution of a drinking water with the specific disease germs of typhoid or cholera, and no matter how great the seeming dilution, an outbreak of the particular disease will sooner or later result. Experience has further shown that ordinary animal matters from the surface of manured fields and the streets of towns become at least the medium through which disease is carried.

Again on the same page we find the following:

As regards the freedom from pollution, it is stated, 'given an area of land where water trickles down from it and goes into a stream, and I will defy anybody to guard that stream from pollution.' . . . I hold this idea, that where you have water exposed, as such water would be, to chance pollution, it may not be constant, it may be there one day and not another.' . . . 'I have seen it often, engineers coming along and showing to me most conclusively that currents go here and go there, that they must go there because they cannot go anywhere else. I have seen them go elsewhere, and I have seen the results of their going elsewhere; so that if you ask me to guarantee that, if you put a pipe in the middle of a lake it would be impossible for polluting material to get from the edge of that pipe, I should say 'No.'—(Starkey.)

The proof of these conclusions is contained in the report and everybody can find proof of them in the daily press. Not long ago, the press of Montreal asserted—I cannot say anything as to the truth of the authority, but I should think the local newspapers would not be likely to exaggerate the state of things there, that there were last fall 5,000 cases of typhoid in the city at the time. There has been an outbreak of typhoid lately in the vicinity of Ottawa. Let me, for the purpose of substantiating my statements, refer to one or two newspaper articles. On the 17th of last month the Ottawa 'Free Press' contained the following:

One Child Dead, Five more Ill from Fever—Serious Outbreak of Typhoid at Deschenes blamed on Impure Water in Ottawa River.

With one daughter dead and five other children critically ill from typhoid fever, Mr. and Mrs. Gravelle, Deschenes, Quebec, are well-nigh distracted with grief. Two of the young victims are not expected to recover.

The cause of the outbreak is attributed solely to the contaminated state of the water of the Ottawa river, the family having their only source of supply at Lake Deschenes. The town of Aylmer is about two miles further up the river, and the impurity of the water from that source is aggravated by a sewage discharge about half a mile from the village of Deschenes.

Series of Illness.

Mr. Gravelle is a mechanic employed with the Ottawa and Hull Power Company. He has a family of 12 children. Disease first broke out in the house in December last, in the shape of scarlet fever and diphtheria. On February 11 typhoid fever developed in two children and they were removed in Brady & Harris' ambulance to the Ottawa general hospital.

Yesterday, three others of the family, the youngest of whom is a baby of three years, were likewise rushed to the hospital. The seven year old child, Ellen, died yesterday afternoon at her home. The ages of the victims range from 17 years old down.

The 'Free Press' was informed at the general hospital this morning that two of the sick children could hardly hope to survive, and that all five are in a very serious condition.

Mrs. Gravelle's complaint.

'Surely I have good cause to complain of the conditions in this village,' said Mrs. Gravelle, when spoken to this morning by the 'Free Press' on the cause of the illness of her children. 'I have five in the hospital now, and one other dead. I lay the whole blame on two things. The sewage from the Fraser mills and the bad water generally.'

'Do you find any indications of pollution in the water?' queried the reporter.

'We find the funniest kind of little creatures in the water,' answered Mrs. Gravelle. 'Some of them are as large as small crawfish, while others are like worms. There must be thousands of them in the water. At night when we take a drink we always hold a light above the cup to see that we are not drinking any of them. The water is brought to us by a man who sells it at ten cents a barrel, but he just fills the barrels with a bucket and never strains it.'

I am told that since then the condition in the village has been intensified and cases have increased in number. 'Le Canada' published a few days ago the following:

La pureté de l'Eau—Le chef du département de l'hygiène d'Albany déclare que la question de la pureté de l'eau est la plus importante à règler dans l'état de New-York.

Albany, N.-Y., 15.—La récente épidémie de fièvre typhoïde à Montréal, fait l'objet d'une étude sérieuse dans le rapport mensuel du département de l'hygiène de cette ville. Le commissaire M. Porter déclare que la pureté de l'eau est une question d'une importance vital pour l'état de New-York. "Pourquoi faut-il, dit-il, que chaque fois qu'une personne porte à ses lèvres un verre d'eau fournie par les municipalités, elle doive se dire, que peut-être avant que six semaines se soient écoulées, elle sera un des 1,300 qui succombent annuellement dans cet état à la typhoïde, causée par l'eau qui n'est pas assez protégée contre la contamination, ou qui, lorsqu'elle est contaminée, n'est pas suffisamment purifiée?"

Here is an article which appeared in one of the Toronto papers just a few days ago:

Toronto endangered by sewage sand.

Toronto, Feb. 23.—That a sewage laden sand bar has been formed at the mouth of the intake pipe off the island was the surprising statement made by Mayor Geary at the board of control meeting yesterday. He stated briefly that soundings taken by the city engineer had proved this to be the case.

'There is a possible dange' of the sewage laden sand finding its way into the intake pipe and not only contaminating the water, but possibly choking up the whole intake at the elbow. The city engineer is taking measures to prevent anything of the kind happening.'

Then four days after there is a despatch from Toronto headed:

Typhoid spreading in Toronto.

Toronto, Feb. 26.—One hundred and two cases of typhoid fever have been reported so far this month to Dr. Sheard, city medical health officer. In February, 1909, there were only ten cases for the whole month. In February, 1908, there were fourteen cases, as against twenty-three in February, 1907.

The typhoid fever record this present month is the highest in February since 1893, when the contamination of the water by sewage in consequence of the pipe rising to the surface of the bay resulted in 111 typhoid fever cases in the city. The pipe rose in the bay on Christmas Day, 1902.

The total number of cases of typhoid fever reported last year was 331. In 1908 there were 201 cases; in 1907 there were only 186 cases.

I quote also from a part of an article which appeared in the 'Free Press' on the 23rd of last month under the heading of 'Massacre of Infants in Ottawa, Probably Due to Impure Water'. The Free Press' says:

And now comes the startling report of the Ontario Milk Commission.

That commission reports that Ottawa has 'the most complete and effective system for the protection of the milk supply to be found in the province.'

Yet the same commission also finds that the vital statistics show that 'Ottawa has a greater percentage of deaths under one year of age than any other point in Ontario, or 216·94 in every thousand.'

The other cities follow in order: Fort William, 202·76; Port Arthur, 186·99; Niagara Falls, 177·34; London, 171·83; Belleville, 169·42; Toronto, 155·67; Guelph, 151·82; Hamilton, 151·02; St. Thomas, 147·69; Chatham, 144·74; Kingston, 144·74; Peterborough, 134·01; Windsor, 130·21; Brantford, 124·15; Stratford, 119·60; St. Catharines, 117·86, and Woodstock, 79·60.

On the face of it this appallingly high infantile rate is not due to the milk supply.

* * * * * * *

The water from the Ottawa river supplied to the people of this city has been found to contain disease germs frequently that may cause typhoid fever, it is known to contain all the time, and to a very large exent during the period from May to October, germs that set up intestinal troubles in the human body. The examination of a drop of the water under a microscope will reveal these germs at any time in large numbers.

And the mortality in infants is almost entirely caused by intestinal troubles.

The people of Toronto have been suffering for months from an epidemic of 'intestinal grip'; they are now suffering from an epidemic of typhoid. Both are attributed to the contamination of the water supply.

Knowing that our water is not always pure, knowing that the authorities have frequently found it necessary to warn us to boil the water before drinking, is there not good reason for believing that the great infant mortality with which Ottawa is declared to be afflicted is due, not to milk, but to the water?

The 'Free Press' declares, with all the emphasis possible, that the alarming report of the Ontario Milk Commission in regard to the situation in Ottawa makes it imperative that the present investigation into the city's water supply be of the most thorough kind—no matter what the expense—and after that investigation something must be done, either by purification of the present supply or by obtaining a new source of supply—also no matter what the expense—to protect our people.

Shall Ottawa, the capital of the Dominion, priding itself on being one of the most enlightened cities in Canada, permit this awful massacre of the infants to continue?

As is pointed out in this article, there is the possibility of danger in every glass of water. Every time we go to the tap here and take a drink, we do it in fear and trembling. I have seen gentleman after gentleman go to the tap and hesitate, and have seen some kindly messenger warn them not to use that water. That is the case all over the city. Hon. gentlemen of this House, and a portion of the public, can guard themselves against the danger by using mineral waters. That is all right enough for the rich, but what about the poor who have no other means of satisfying their domestic requirements than the water that comes down our streams. I say without hesitation, and I can give authority for it, that sewage has caused more deaths than the white plague. We have of late awakened to the great havoc caused by the spread of the white plague amongst the people, and the governments of the provinces have taken steps to prevent the spread of the disease by looking after those who are so afflicted, yet nothing has been done to provide for protection against contamination from sewage. I believe there is all through Canada to-day a very strong and determined feeling that this evil must be stopped, and now is the time to do it, not when Canada will have increased in population, and when the cost of it will be infinitely larger than it would be to-day. I do not think the question is really a debatable one. If hon. gentlemen will consult the many books and publications on the subject, they will find that in Europe and the United States there is a universal belief that water pollution constitutes one of the greatest dangers to the human race, and it must be stopped. There is also perfect agreement as to the efficacy of the means that can and ought to be employed for the purpose of preventing this evil. The methods suggested have already been tested all over Europe, and probably no where more thoroughly than in Great Britain—especially so in Scotland. The means of treating sewage, and even utilizing it in an economical manner has been proven time and time again in many places. There are to-day in the neighbourhood of Glasgow and Edinburgh large farms that utilize all the sewage which they can procure from these large cities, and they are doing so at a profit. The committee of this House which dealt with the subject of the public health last session is also on record in this respect. I have already quoted part of their report. Let me read their conclusion on that point:

It is practicable to purify the sewage of towns to any degree required, either by land treatment or by artificial filters, and there is no essential difference between the two processes. The main questions, therefore, to be considered in the case of a town proposing to adopt a system of sewage purification are: first, what degree of purification is required in the circumstances of that town, and of the river or stream into which its liquid refuse is to be discharged; and secondly, how the degree of purification required can, in the particular case, be most economically obtained.

I have here before me also one or two articles which very recently appeared in the 'Sanitary Review.' An article in the number for February 11, headed 'Selecting a scheme for sewage treatment,' which illustrates the adoption of a plant of that kind by the city of Vernon, British Columbia. That small place is setting a very good example to the supposedly more enlightened eastern communities of Canada. Dealing with this very Bill, on the 10th September last, the 'Sanitary Review,' after quoting in full it goes on to say:

> The above is the wording of a clause in the Bill which recently received its second reading in the Senate at Ottawa.
> If the Bill becomes law it will be the first acceptance by the Dominion of Canada of state responsibility in guarding the purity of Canadian waters.
> The provincial government have in part shown some awakening to the necessity of prevention of stream pollution, but it is felt on every hand that the recognition of the principle by the Dominion government will go a long way to strengthen the hands of the provincial governments in local legislation.

Then the article goes on to analyse the Ontario Act, and finds that the provincial legislation is wholly inadequate for the purposes in view:

> Where the principle of the Act proposed by the Senate appears to us to be far and away more efficient than the Ontario Act is in the recognition of the board principle of guarding from pollution all rivers, streams or other waters, either navigable or flowing into navigable waters.
>
> We wish every success to the proposal of the Senate. The adoption of the principle as a dominion law that it must be held illegal to pollute nature's water supply will in the future save this country great expenditures of money in rectifying negligence, as is so well illustrated in the older countries at the present time, when they are at their wit's ends in devising methods and facing enormous monetary outlays in attempts to reclaim waters from the open sewer conditions into which they have been allowed to drift.
> Saskatchewan is at the present time putting a Bill through legislative routine to guard and keep pure their water supply sources. The government will be encouraged by the progressive action of the Dominion Senate. The recognition by law of the conservation of natural resources is always slow, and there will be plenty of kickers of the purely utilitarian school, who cannot recognize either 'Godliness' or 'cleanliness' when placed in the balance with the 'almighty dollar.'

It might not be amiss to review briefly the legislation of various countries on this subject. I have gone to very considerable trouble to find and to analyse the legislation in Europe and on this continent, and I have prepared a statement which I shall submit to the House. In Germany and Prussia, the Act of 1894 forbids contamination of rivers, streams or underground waters, with (1) such matters as can be the means of spreading infectious disease; (2) matter of such nature or in such quantities as is dangerous to health, or constitutes a distinct annoyance to the public. The Oberpresident of each province is to decide whether matter placed in streams or rivers is of such a nature as to violate this law. The law can be extended, by royal decree, to bays and harbours. The other provinces of the German empire have more or less stringent provisions on the subject.

In France, the penal code severely punishes the offence of throwing sewage, etc., in rivers. The law of 1902 gives to the communes the right to protect their sources of water supply. This law also forbids the pollution of sources of public drinking water and of fountains, conduits, aqueducts, etc., with excrement or other matter injurious to health.

In Belgium, in 1877, there was a very stringent law enacted to prevent the pollution of non-navigable streams. They have done a great deal more than that. They have given the best example of what might be done in this matter, seeing the vital importance of the question, by aiding municipalities to instal purification plants contributing one-third of the cost of such installation.

Austria has a very complete law. No deposit of sewage is allowed without authority of the government.

Russia prohibits all contamination by deposit of noxious matter of any kind. Legislation for the protection of rivers from pollution is practically universal throughout Europe.

In the United States there is no provision in the federal constitution giving Congress authority to deal with this matter. The reason for the omission is probably the same reason which caused the same omission from our own constitution. At that time the necessity and importance of dealing with the subject of public health, especially from the interstate and interprovincial point of view had not received the attention it has received since. There is no provision, therefore, in the United States constitution on the subject, just as there is none, or a very inadequate one, in the British North America Act.

But the various states of the union have adopted more or less stringent provisions. I have taken the trouble to go through the laws of every state of the union, and each of them contains some provision upon this subject.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Are those laws enacted by the state or by the federal authority?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—By the state. The federal authority of the United States has no power to legislate with respect to public health.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—I have a letter here from the city clerk of Moncton protesting against this Bill. The sewage of Moncton enters into the Petitcodiac, which is a tidal river emptying twice in 24 hours. At high water it is forty feet in depth, and at low water you can walk across the stream. The city is very much afraid that under this Bill they will be subject to great expense. Moncton is about thirty miles from the Bay of Fundy; but the sewage of the city is swept into the Bay of Fundy, and from the bay into the ocean. I do not think this Bill will affect Moncton; but I put the question for the purpose of getting an answer to-day.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I think the question is proper and I am prepared to answer. I was going to deal with it later on; but I may say at once that there is a clause in the Bill, under which the city of Moncton or any other city similarly situated can apply to the Governor General in Council and obtain the suspension indefinitely of this provision. I will deal at length with that later on. I shall not trouble the House with quoting the various enactments passed by the several states of the union. I have taken the trouble to analyse this legislation, and I have made five classes of states. I have grouped them in accordance with the degree of stringency by which they have legislated on this subject. In the first class will be found these states which have adopted the less stringent legislation or legal enactment, and in the fifth class will be found those states which have adopted the most modern or most strict.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Will my hon. friend inform me where any of those enactments apply to the St. Lawrence?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Yes. New York state has passed such laws, and some of the most stringent Acts that have been passed in the United States. In the first class, as I have said, are mentioned those states which have adopted the less stringent laws, but all those enactments forbid the poisoning of wells, springs and reservoirs, and in this class I have placed Georgia and Rhode Island. In the second class, legislation which seeks to prevent the pollution of water by certain specific agencies. This is clearly the next step in river pollution, and in this class belong Wisconsin, California, Idaho, Oklahoma and Indiana. In the third class, I have mentioned the states which endeavour to protect water supplies, and in this class are to be found Michigan and the District of Colombia. The fourth class forbids the pollution of all waters used for public supplies. This shows a great advance on the other class, and in this class are to be found the states of Maine, Kansas, Delaware, Montana, Minnesota, New York, Connecticut, Arizona, Virginia, Wyoming, Alaska, Oregon, Mississippi, and Pennsylvania, and the most complete and effective legislation on the subject is in the state of New York—and my hon. friend will see that it affects the St. Lawrence—Connecticut, Maine and Virginia. The remaining states—that is the fifth class are those states where the legislation is of the most advanced character and those are Massachusetts, North Carolina, Utah and New Jersey. The effect of the pollution of natural streams has only recently received a very great deal of public attention. In fact, most of the legislation which I have analysed hardly dates back further than 1905, and all the advanced legislation which I have referred to in the United States has been enacted since 1905. We are, therefore driven to the conclusion that both in the United States and Canada that subject has not been dealt with effectively until recently. I desire to refer to the law of Great Britain. The first legislation on the subject was passed in the year 1866, and it was called the Thames Navigation Act; then we had in the following year another Act called the Thames Conservancy Act, and followed by the Public Health Act of 1875, which made stringent provisions against the pollution of all streams. Then we have the present law, which was enacted as far back as 1876, and I may say I was at once very favourably impressed with it, and I read the Act with a great deal of pleasure, because I find that practically the English Act of 1876 is to all intents and purposes similar to the provision which I am now introducing, and that it has worked in England just exactly in the same way as we should expect our Act to work in this country. For that reason I may be allowed to read the provision. It is as follows:

Laws as to Sewage Pollution.

Every person who causes to fall or flow, or knowingly permits to fall or flow, or to be carried into any stream any solid or liquid sewage matter shall, subject as in this Act mentioned, be deemed to have committed an offence against this Act.

Where any sewage matter falls or flows, or is carried into any streams along a channel used, constructed, or in process of construction at the date of the passing of this Act for the purpose of conveying such sewage matter, the person causing or knowingly permitting the sewage matter so to fall or flow, or to be carried, shall not be deemed to have committed an offence against this Act if he shows to the satisfaction of the court having cognizance of the case that he is using the best practicable and available means to render harmless the sewage matter so falling or flowing or carried into the stream.

Where the Local Government Board are satisfied, after local inquiry, that further time ought to be granted to any sanitary authority, which at the date of the passing of this Act is discharging sewage matter into any stream, or permitting it to be so discharged by any such channel as aforesaid for the purpose of enabling such authority to adopt the best practicable and available means for rendering harmless such sewage matter the Local Government Board may by order declare that this section shall not, so far as regards the discharge of sewage matter by such channel, be in operation until the expiration of a period to be limited in the order.

I said the provision I am now introducing was framed on the same line as the English Act, and will work out just as this Act has worked in England. Under chapter 115 which I am seeking to amend by introducing the clauses now under consideration, there is a provision which enables the Governor General in Council to suspend the operation of the Act until such time as may be in the interest of the public, just as there is in the English Act which I have read. The section proceeds:

Any order made under this section may be from time to time renewed by the local government board subject to such conditions if any as they may see fit.

If any one needs a strong precedent as a justification for the legislation I am now proposing, I do not think he could find a better one than the British Act which I have just cited. I have already said that under the operations of that Act, methods of all sorts have been introduced and put in practice in the British Isles, all with a great deal of satisfaction. I have here two volumes on the subject, but I shall not trouble the House by reading any extract from them. I shall give hon. gentlemen the name in case they should like to see what methods of prevention of pollution and of the utilization of sewage can be adopted. It is a French book by Mr. Imbeaux, which can be found in the library. It is beautifully illustrated, and all the methods which can be adopted are there fully described. Now I come to the section which my hon. friend has just alluded to, the question of jurisdiction. It is perhaps a bold proposition to make, but I make it without hesitation. I submit that the jurisdiction in this matter is wholly in this House, not partly, not concurrently, not co-existently with the province. but exclusively in this parliament. As I have already said, the British North America Act is almost silent on the question of public health. The only two provisions are to be found in sections 91 and 92. Section 91, paragraph 11, reads:

Quarantine and the establishment and maintenance of marine hospitals.

The Dominion government is to have jurisdiction in matters concerning quarantine and the establishment and maintenance of marine hospitals. Then among the powers exclusively given to the legislatures with reference to this subject we find in paragraph 7, of section 92, the following:

The establishment, maintenance and management of hospitals, asylums, charities, elemosynary institutions in and for the province other than marine hospitals.

Outside of these provisions, the British North America Act could be searched in vain for any word dealing with public health. Under our constitution, as I have already said, power is vested in the Dominion. The provinces can only exercise powers in matters which are exclusively assigned to them, and those powers must, in the language of subsection 16 of section 91, be of a local and private character. That is, in all subjects exclusively assigned to the provinces, and which are of a local and private character, the provinces may legislate. Any power which is not exclusively given to the provinces is in the Dominion, and I say—and I have a great number of authorities in support of it—that the moment provision incidental to any of the powers granted to the Dominion becomes of a general character, the presumption is at once raised that that matter falls within the jurisdiction of the Dominion. Of course as I have said, it is different entirely with the American union. I am quite clear that there the federal congress has no jurisdiction to legislate on public health; but the very reason which deprived the federal congress of jurisdiction is the reason which gave this parliament jurisdiction in matters of public health. I might with profit, perhaps discuss the decisions of the Privy Council. I might go back to the action of the Bank of Toronto vs. Lamb, where the principle was clearly laid down. I shall not trouble the House with it.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I may say I am in favour of the Bill to begin with. But my hon. friend knows very well that municipal institutions are under the jurisdiction of the provincial government. How are you going to prevent municipalities from committing infractions of the provisions of this Bill should it become law?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I was going to deal with that later if my hon. friend will allow me to continue in the way I have prepared my notes. The Dominion parliament has jurisdiction to deal with, and to enact laws for peace, order and good government on all subjects not exclusively assigned to the provinces. If you look at the matters exclusively assigned to the provinces, you will not find that of 'public health.' It is true you will not find it in the powers reserved to the federal authority, but if you bear in mind that the federal authority can and should legislate on all subjects which are not exclusively assigned to the provinces, the mere omission of the words 'public health' in the powers assigned to the Dominion does not mean that the Dominion has no power to legislate on the subject. So that the moment you make it clear that the provinces have not been assigned exclusively the right to legislate on matters of public health, then you must of necessity conclude that the Dominion alone has power to legislate on that subject, though it is not mentioned in section 91. There are matters reserved to the provinces under section 91. As I have said, they are purely and simply local in their nature, hospitals, charitable institutions, elemosynary institutions and so on. I may, I think, quite properly describe the jurisdiction of the provinces in matters of public health as one confined and limited to the taking care of persons afflicted with disease, whereas the jurisdiction of the federal parliament is to prevent infectious diseases from being brought into the country and spreading. How could the provinces legislate on the prevention of disease? That is not a local and private subject. It is not one which is embraced, comprised, or comes within the class of institutions such as are mentioned in section 92, hospitals and elemosynary institutions. My hon. friend from Glengarry asked me how are you going to prevent municipalities from enacting by-laws concerning the public health in their locality? I do not think there is any conflict of that kind at all. I do not pretend for one moment that the municipalities have not the right to enforce by by-law any measure which they think is in the interest of public health. There is absolutely nothing in my contention which would deprive them of that power. I can quite understand the legislature of the province, just like the municipalities to which the legislature has delegated certain powers, could legislate on matters affecting public health, but always when these matters are of a local and private character. There is to-day before the Ontario House, amongst other measures, a Bill to regulate slaughter houses. I would not for one moment contend that that Bill is not within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislature; on the contrary, I think you have there a matter of a local and private character affecting public health.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—What I have reference to more particularly is the sewage of these small towns that are adjacent to small streams in the interior of the country, and into which sewage is allowed to go unless prevented by a municipal by-law. How is an infraction of the law such as presented to this House going to be enforced by the federal authorities?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—If, as has been done, the Federal authorities elsewhere make it an offence to deposit sewage in the streams to which my hon. friend refers, the remedy is easily enforceable, because it would be a criminal offence to do it under the statutes, and you can punish the individuals in the interior just as you can along the St. Lawrence. I cannot see any difficulty there. There is no question that the municipalities have the right to regulate their streets and public places, and their markets with a view to guarding against danger concerning public health. I cannot see that there is any conflict in that at all, and it may be that on certain subjects both the Dominion and provincial governments have concurrent jurisdiction. Take the question of immigration; under the British North America Act both the province and the Dominion are authorized to legislate on the question of immigration; but any provincial enactment would only be of a local and private character with reference to immigration in the provinces. It could not be with reference to immigration elsewhere, and in these cases where concurrent jurisdiction has been given to the provinces and to the Dominion, the concurrent jurisdiction so far as the province is concerned, can only be exercised within the territorial limits of the province and cannot go outside. I may say, dealing with that subject, that I have had communication and interviews with Dr. Lachapelle, who is in charge of the Public Health Board for the province of Quebec, and he most heartily endorsed this Bill. The province is not opposed to it, as far as I know. I have not heard from the other provinces, but so far as Quebec is concerned, the health authorities are in entire accord with this measure, and wish it every success. I say that it is a mere tradition, based on false grounds, that parliament has no jurisdiction with regard to public health. There is absolutely nothing to justify that in the British North America Act. But if our statutes are searched, we find that time and again parliament has exercised its power to legislate on matters of public health, and I desire to refer to some of the statutes. First of all, chap 75 of the Revised Statutes, entitled 'An Act Respecting Infectious and Contagious Diseases Affecting Animals.' I want to refer to section 3, which reads as follows:

> Every owner of animals and every breeder of or dealer in animals, and every one bringing animals into Canada shall, on perceiving the appearance of infectious or contagious disease among the animals owned by him or under his special care, give immediate notice to the minister and to the nearest veterinary inspector of the Department of Agriculture of the facts discovered by him as aforesaid.

Section 4 reads:

> Every owner of such diseased animals who neglects to comply with the provisions of the last preceding section shall forfeit his claim to compensation for any animal slaughtered in accordance with the provisions of this Act, and no such compensation shall be granted to him.

Section 5 reads:

> The minister may from time to time cause to be slaughtered animals suffering from infectious or contagious disease, or suspected of being so affected, or animals which are or have been in contact with or in close proximity to a diseased animal, or an animal suspected of being infected by or with infectious diseases.

It cannot be contended that the exercise of this power is created under the British North America Act by the provision that we have a right to legislate on matters affecting trade and commerce. This is not a matter of trade and commerce at all. Under this provision an officer of the Department of Agriculture may walk into my stable and take the horse I am using for riding purposes, and remove it, and say that it has glanders and therefore must be killed. That is not justified by trade and commerce. Section 12 reads:

Any inspector or other officer appointed as aforesaid may at any time for the purpose of carrying into effect any of the provisions of this Act enter any place or premises or any steamship, vessel or boat or any carriage, car, truck, horse box or other vehicle used for the carriage of animals, but shall if required, state in writing the grounds on which he has so entered.

Then a provision very much similar, with reference to infected places, is to be found in section 15. Then section 26 reads:

All yards, stables, sheds, or other premises used by railway or steamship companies, or other persons for the accommodation of animals shall be maintained in a clean, comfortable, and sanitary condition, and shall be subject at all time to inspection by inspectors acting under the authority of the minister, who when they deem such action necessary may order the cleansing and disinfection in a satisfactory manner, of the said yards, stables, sheds or other premises.

Not in harbours under the jurisdiction of this government, not in places clearly under our control, but in private stables or anywhere. Then a number of regulations are contained in the Act, and offences are created and penalties are imposed for the violation of these provisions, all making a criminal offence of the infraction of these provisions. I should like to direct the attention of the House to section 39 of this very Act, which reads as follows:

Every person who throws or places or causes or suffers to be thrown or placed in any river, stream, canal, navigable or other water, or in the sea, within ten miles of shore, the carcass of an animal which has died of disease, or which has been slaughtered as diseased or as suspected of disease, shall for every such offence incur a penalty not exceeding $200.

What is the difference between that enactment, as far as jurisdiction goes, and the one which I am now proposing? There is absolutely no difference whatever. This makes a criminal offence of throwing the carcass of a diseased animal or animal suspected of disease into a river or stream.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (B.C.)—That is the English Act.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—No, our own Act. Section 40 reads.

Every person who without lawful authority or excuse digs up or causes or allows to be dug up and buried the carcass of an animal which has died or is suspected of having died from infectious or contagious disease, or which has been slaughtered as diseased, or as suspected of disease shall for every such offence incur a penalty not exceeding $200.

It may be asserted that this provision would be justified because we have a right to legislate in relation to trade and commerce. There is no shadow of pretension that this pertains to trade and commerce, and if the parliament of Canada had jurisdiction to enact this law, why has it not the power to enact the provision which I now propose? Another very remarkable thing in connection with this Act is that the officer who is charged principally with the administration of the law is not termed Director of Quarantine, he is called Director General of Public Health. Dr. Montizambert, who is the officer charged with the enforcement of this law, is the Director General of Public Health in Canada. I say this is a clear assumption of jurisdiction by the Dominion parliament in matters of public health. I might refer also to chapter 133. This Act prohibits the adulteration of drugs, liquors, milk, &c., and amongst other provisions contains the following subsections of section 2:

Food includes every article used for food or drink by man or cattle, and every ingredient intended for mixing the food or drink of men or cattle for any purpose whatsoever.

Then section 3 provides:

Food shall be deemed to be adulterated within the meaning of this Act—

(e) If it consists wholly or in part of a diseased, or decomposed, or putrid, or rotten animal, or vegetable substance, whether manufactured or not;

(f) If it contains any added poisonous ingredient, or any ingredient which may render such an article injurious to the health of persons or cattle consuming it.

Then section 20:

Except as hereinafter provided, no person shall manufacture, sell, expose, or offer for sale, any foods, drugs, or horticultural fertilizer which is adulterated within the meaning of this Act.

I think it can be fairly claimed that water is one of the articles described by the Act under the word food. There is here jurisdiction exercised by the Dominion parliament to prevent what can be nothing else but an interference with the public health.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Does not my hon. friend see that these subjects come naturally within the scope of trade and commerce?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I am willing to admit there may be some difference, but I am quoting provisions which go to show that the Act applies not only to commercial commodities, but also to a great many things which are in public use, that are not commercial commodities. Any legislation affecting these things can only be made for the purpose of preventing disease. Otherwise, there is no reason for the legislation. It might be open to argument that under the very provisions which I have quoted, municipalities which sell water containing sewage might be open to the penalties provided in this Act. Take the city of Ottawa. Every inhabitant has to pay the corporation for the water he gets from the water mains. In other words, the corporation of Ottawa is in the business of selling water. If the corporation sells me contaminated water, under the provisions of the Act I have just cited I think I would have a remedy against the city. Under the Criminal Code, there is a remedy and also an assumption by inference of jurisdiction on the part of this parliament. I will cite sections 221 and 222 of the Criminal Code on the subject of public nuisances. I shall not enter into a discussion of what a public nuisance is. I content myself by saying that the pollution of streams, in many cases amounts to public nuisances. The Act provides:

221. A common nuisance is an unlawful act or omission to discharge a legal duty, which act or omission endangers the lives, safety, health, property or comfort of the public, by which the public are obstructed in the exercise or enjoyment of any right, common to all His Majesty's subjects.

222. Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment or a fine who commits any common nuisance which endangers the lives, safety or health of the public, or which occasion injury to the person of any individual.

In cases of that kind, as is well known by legal gentlemen, there are two remedies, by injunction and by indictment, remedies difficult to invoke. If every citizen is bound to proceed by injunction or indictment against the various municipalities which sell or distribute polluted water, it would be placing on the individual a very heavy and costly burden. This, I think, must lead the parliament of Canada to the conclusion that there is only one way of stopping the pollution of rivers. It cannot be left to the provinces, because the provinces cannot legislate on the subject. It cannot be left to the municipalities, for the same reason. It must be legislation on the part of this parliament. How could a law of this kind be enforced except by the central authority? You cannot prevent the pollution of navigable streams unless you prevent at the same time the pollution of the streams flowing into them. Where the subject is of general interest, where it becomes of interprovincial interest, there is no way of enforcing it, except by Dominion legislation. How are you going to prevent the carrying of infectious disease or the spread of diseases by polluted water unless you do so through the central authority? The legislation which I propose is no new departure. I am not seeking to make new legislation. I am simply seeking to improve and implement legislation which has been on the statute-book for forty years. I am simply trying to amend chapter 115 of our revised statutes. Under section 19 of that Act it is provided that:

No owner or tenant of any saw-mill, or any workman therein, or other person, shall throw, or cause to be thrown, or suffer, or permit to be thrown, any sawdust, edgings, slabs, bark or rubbish, of any description whatsoever, in any river stream, or other water, any part of which is navigable, or which flows into any navigable water.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (British Columbia)—When was that Act passed?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—It is taken from 60-1 Vict. I have not traced the original Act, but I am satisfied it is forty years old. I propose to add a subsection to section 19, and ask this parliament to say that not only shall it be an offence to throw sawdust edgings, bark, or other rubbish into a stream, but it will be an offence to throw sewage, garbage, offal, carcases of dead animals, &c. Surely if this parliament had jurisdiction years ago to say that sawdust shall not be thrown into the Ottawa river, it has power to say that sewage shall not be deposited in streams.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—The sawdust did not involve the question of public health.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—True, but if parliament had the power to prevent if for one cause it should have the power to do so in the interest of public health.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The saw-dust was considered a nuisance.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—If that is the ground on which it was prohibited, what would you call the depositing of sewage in streams? If saw-dust is a nuisance, I should think sewage is an aggravated nuisance.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It may have been because of its being an obstruction to navigation.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—It is doubtful if it was merely for that purpose, because it affects not only navigable streams, but all streams. In order to show clearly that we are not contemplating any trespass on the provincial power, I should like to call the attention of the hon. gentlemen to the remarks of Dr. Hodgetts, who is the officer for the province of Ontario charged with the administration of all matters relating to public health. His remarks will be found on page 27 of the report of the Senate Committee from which I have already quoted. He says:

> I desire to refer to one very important matter in connection with these questions, viz., the need which exists for an expansion of the department of the federal government now under the Director General of Public Health. This department requires to be placed in as efficient a condition as that of the Veterinary Director General of this Dominion is, to maintain that standard of public health now prevailing in other countries. We feel, as provincial health authorities, the want of some co-ordinating power, which could be secured by the provincial authorities meeting at certain times in conference with a central federal authority as, for instance, a federal board composed of three members, of which the Director General would be chairman. Such a board with a well-equipped laboratory at Ottawa, would be able to accomplish much in experimental research and practical work, all of which could be set forth in departmental bulletins. Nothing but some such scheme can bring about the advance we desire in all things sanitary.
> The CHAIRMAN.—Don't you think it would be advisable, if possible, to have the regulations of health, instead of being under the supervision of the province, controlled by the Dominion?
> Dr. HODGETTS.—I, personally, think it would be far better. The Dominion government has to-day taken over the control of contagious diseases in animals for all Canada. The laws as they stand to-day in this matter in every province of the Dominion are in abeyance, in view of the fact that the contagious diseases are handled by the department under the control of the Veterinary Director General. . . I think the health of our citizens generally is far more important than the matter of the diseases of cattle. Speaking personally, since coming into office some years ago, I feel that, as provinces, there are so many things we have in common interest, it would be better if we could meet here and talk them over with the Director General; while we could, in some cases, get legislative enactments by the House of Commons, the results of which would be beneficial to all the provinces.

This is the opinion of the principal officer charged with the administration of public health in Ontario. He appeared before this committee and said that the provincial authorities are very desirous and anxious that some such power shall be exercised at Ottawa, and that it shall be placed under the administration of the director of public health.

It has been said there is an international question involved in this legislation, and that it may be useless or partially so for us to adopt legislation of this kind until similar legislation has been enacted by the neighbouring states of the American union. I do not think there is any difficulty there at all. Most of these states have already adopted stringent legislation on the subject, and if any states have failed to do so, all our government has to do is to invite the federal government to ask in turn the border states to pass legislation of this character. It cannot for a moment be supposed that these states will refuse to do what all the other states of the union have already done. In that respect, let me point out to the hon. gentlemen what has been accomplished very recently in what I believe to be a matter of very secondary importance to this one, the protection of fish in international waters. A commission was appointed by the two governments for the purpose of dealing with the protection of fish, and that commission has made a report recommending certain regulations to be enacted by the respective governments.

I have the report here before me of this commission upon which Professor French, of the Department of Marine, represented Canada. Among other things, they have adopted regulations such as these:

The following regulations, prepared by the International Fisheries Commission pursuant to and under the authority of a convention concluded by and between His Majesty Edward the Seventh, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, and the United States of America, dated the 11th day of April, 1908, shall constitute a system of uniform and common international regulations for the protection and preservation of the food fishes in each of the waters prescribed in article IV. of said convention, to wit: (1) The territorial waters of Passamaquoddy bay; (2) the St. John and St. Croix rivers; (3) Lake Memphramagog; (4) Lake Champlain; (5 the St. Lawrence river, where the said river constitutes the international boundary; (6) Lake Ontario; (7) the Niagara river; (8) Lake Erie; (9) the waters connecting Lake Erie and Lake Huron, including Lake St. Clair; (10) Lake Huron, excluding Georgian bay, but including North Channel; (11) St. Mary's river and Lake Superior; (12) Rainy river and Rainy lake; (13) Lake of the Woods; (14) the Strait of Juan de Fuca, those parts of Washington Sound, the Gulf of Georgia and Puget Sound lying between the parallels of 48° 10′ and 49° 20′; (15) and such other contiguous waters as may be recommended by the International Commission and approved by the two governments.

These regulations are to be applied within and throughout the above-named waters, hereinafter called treaty waters, provided that certain regulations are to be applied only within certain of said waters, as hereinafter specifically indicated, and provided also that no regulation shall apply to the St. John river unless such river is specially mentioned in such regulation. It is understood by the International Fisheries Commission that all statutes and laws relating to the protection and preservation of the fisheries in the treaty waters lawfully passed, or that hereafter may be lawfully passed, in the United States or in the Dominion of Canada, shall have full validity in so far as the said statutes and laws are not in conflict with these regulations, and that these regulations shall not be construed as permitting fishing at any times or places or by any methods or appliances prohibited by such laws.

Then the recommendations follow. What do we find among them? In number 5? We find:

5. Pollution of Waters.

No person shall place or pass, or allow to pass into treaty waters any substance offensive to fishes, injurious to fish life or destructive to fish fry or to the food of fishes or of fish fry, unless permitted so to do under any law passed by the legislative authority having jurisdiction.

And again:

No person shall deposit dead fish, fish offal, or gurry in treaty waters, or on ice formed thereon, except in gurry grounds established by the duly constituted authorities.

If the protection of the fish in these streams warrants the appointment of a commission, and enactment of regulations of this kind, how much more does the life and health, the very existence of the human race, demand and require the appointment of a commission of that kind in order to frame regulations of uniform character, applicable not only to Canada, but to the United States, on such waters as are of an international character. I see no difficulty there whatever. I think there is to-day ample legislation in the states which border on Canadian territory on the subject. We in Canada have been far behind, and are to-day far behind these various states in enacting legislation which the circumstances of the case demand. It is our duty at once to take up this question. Another objection is the cost. It has been stated in the press and elsewhere that the cost that will be thrown upon the various municipalities for the purpose of establishing these purification plants will be immense. I do not think so. A study of the systems adopted in Europe has convinced me that not only can the purification of sewage be accomplished at very low cost, but in many instances can be done at a profit. There is to-day within ten miles of Montreal, a farm which is using as a fertilizer, sewage from that city, and that farm is being profitably worked. There are to-day in various parts of the British islands numerous farms, such as this one that I have referred to, which are profitably worked. I was sent not long ago an illustrated pamphlet which comes from Brussels, Belgium, in which these various methods are fully described. Hon. gentlemen will be astounded, I am sure, when I quote to them the cost of the installation and maintenance of a plant of that kind. Hon. gentlemen will remember that, as previously stated, the Belgian government contributes one-third of the cost of establishing a purification plant. That would naturally make the cost to the municipality considerably less. Also, it is possible that in Belgium the cost of labour and management would be considerably less than here; but taking all that into consideration, hon. gentlemen will be astounded to hear that a plant of that kind can be established to-day at a cost in cities of 50,000 people of—I hardly dare mention the figures, I know hon. gentlemen will hardly believe them—a cost of seven cents per head of the population. I have here in this prospectus of the company complete illustrations and figures of what I state. There are illustrations of the appearance of the water before and after purification. In the first bottle, the water is almost as dark as ink. The next shows it very much clearer, and in the third bottle it is so clear that you can read print through the bottle. If they can do that in Belgium, even assuming the cost would be a great deal more here, the objection of cost is not one which could be weighed for a moment against the strong arguments advanced in favour of the purification of our streams.

I now come to another objection, which is the last I shall deal with. My hon. friend from New Brunswick (Hon. Mr. McSweeney) and my hon. friend from Glengarry (Hon. Mr. McMillan) thought that possibly the provisions here proposed are too drastic, inasmuch as it attempts to put in force at once a law which would have the effect of stopping all depositing of sewage in the rivers. The law would not have that effect, because under section 23 of chapter 115, of which my provision is an amendment it is provided that:

> The Governor in Council, when it is shown to his satisfaction that the public interest would not be injuriously affected thereby, may from time to time, by proclamation published in the 'Canada Gazette,' declare any of such rivers, streams or waters, or parts thereof, exempted in whole or in part, from the operation of the said three sections, and may from time to time revoke such proclamation.

What does this mean? Take the city of Ottawa as an illustration. This city is to-day emptying its sewage in the Ottawa river. There are various methods for disposing of that sewage in a way that it will not be injurious to the public health; and I may say, as it will be obvious to everybody, that what may be a good system for the city of Ottawa, may not be a good system for Montreal, and what may not be costly here, might be costly elsewhere. But there are dozens and dozens of ways of treating sewage dependent upon local conditions, etc. If this Bill becomes law, it will go into operation immediately after it receives the Royal assent; but it does not mean that the city of Ottawa must immediately cease depositing sewage in the Ottawa river. The city would at once represent to the Governor in Council that it will take two or three years to install a plant to dispose of the sewage, and under order in council, almost automatically, permission is granted to continue depositing sewage in the river until the time has arrived when the city corporation can adopt measures to prevent it. There is nothing drastic about that. What I am aiming at is to proclaim and have sanctioned by parliament the principle that the time has come when our noble rivers shall no longer be made the receptacles of the raw sewage of the country, and it is high time it should be done. I do not demand that the municipalities must at once cease doing what they have been doing for years. I know it will take time; but unless parliament solemnly gives its sanction to this principle, when is the evil going to stop, when is this danger to end? It is not by leaving it to the local legislatures. They have no power to legislate on the subject. It is not by leaving it to the municipalities; they will not act unless they are forced to do so.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (British Columbia)—Can the Dominion authority compel municipalities to do things? Can parliament jump over the provincial authorities?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I think there is no question about that. Not only can the federal power compel municipalities to do certain things, but they can compel individuals by determining that a certain Act is a nuisance or a criminal offence. Parliament can reach municipalities and individuals. There are many offences in the Criminal Code to-day under which a municipality can be indicted—that is the mayor and his officers.

As I said in opening my remarks, this subject is one of very great importance and of immediate urgency. The more we consider it and think over it, the more we must realize how negligent we have been on this subject of the public health. Perhaps we have been living in a fool's paradise. We have been enacting laws for the protection of fish, cattle, horses, sheep and swine, but the lord of creation himself has been neglected. There is absolutely nothing in all our legislation to protect the public health. It is a crime against nature and civilization to see the St. Lawrence, which I might not inaptly describe as the holy river of Canada, and the Ottawa river polluted day after day. Every thing that is deleterious and infectious is poured into these magnificent streams. The time has come when we must put a stop to it. We cannot stop it in a day; but we can fix a time when that sort of thing must cease. I hope the Senate will give this Bill serious and earnest consideration.

It is by initiating and perfecting legislation of this kind that the Senate will deserve probably more than any other way the recognition to which it is entitled and which, unfortunately, and unjustly, the Senate does not always receive.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I wish to point out that this Bill ought to be taken into consideration jointly with a report by the Committee on Hygiene and Public Health, for the following reasons: I express, I am sure, the feeling of all the members of this House when I say that the hon. gentleman who has just spoken has submitted a great many facts to the Senate. I am proud to say also that the Committee on Public Health have made a report which has been well appreciated by all the members of this House and by the press of the country. The Bill proposed by the hon. gentleman raises two questions, one of constitutionality and the other of expediency. As to the question of constitutionality, I will be very brief and will not enter into details. Nobody will deny that the question is a serious one. The question of jurisdiction in such matters has been brought before the courts of justice in Canada at different times, and I must say in this matter, as in many others, there has been a good deal of discrepancy in argument, and contradictory judgment. In certain cases, the courts have decided that legislation on such matters belong to the province.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—To what cases does the hon. gentleman refer? Questions of public health?

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Yes. I cannot cite the authorities just now, but I will furnish my hon. friend with them. In other cases, it has been decided that when the legislation is of a general character that it is within the jurisdiction of the federal parliament, and I am inclined to think, although I have some doubt, that this measure is within the jurisdiction of the federal parliament, for this reason—and I will specially call the attention of the hon. member to it—that there is a close connection between all the rivers of this country, and if one stream is polluted, that pollution may spread and pollute many other rivers. Take the St. Lawrence as an example. If the waters of that river are polluted in Ontario, the St. Lawrence flows though many provinces, and the pollution of the water will be the same in all the provinces through which it flows. If the waters are polluted in Ontario, they would be polluted in Quebec, and consequently in the maritime provinces, to a certain extent. That is the reason why I say that the federal parliament has jurisdiction in this matter, even if there were no other reason. But I think the hon. member should have introduced his Bill as a separate measure, and not as an amendment to chapter 115 of the Revised Statutes. That statute was passed in order to protect navigation. It was passed under section 10 of the Federal Act, which gives to the federal parliament power to legislate on shipping and navigation, and clauses 19, 20 and 21, which have been quoted by the hon. gentleman, have only one object, which is to prevent people from throwing into the rivers matters which may impede navigation; it has no other purpose. It is not for the purpose of protecting the public health. What does the title in the interpretation clause say? If you read clause 19, you will see the only object is to prevent people throwing in saw-dust, edgings and bark, and clause 20 refers to stone, gravel, dirt or other rubbish liable to sink to the bottom in any navigable stream in Canada where there are not at least twelve fathoms of water at low tide. So that there is no doubt that this Act was passed only to protect navigation, and the object of the Bill proposed by the hon. gentleman is not at all for shipping or navigation purposes —not to prevent throwing into the river substances that would impede navigation. His sole object is to protect the public health. Therefore, his Bill should not have come as an amendment to this Act.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Why?

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Suppose that the Bill which the hon. gentleman proposes now is declared to be unconstitutional it would be an injury to the Act itself.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—But the hon. gentleman says it is constitutional.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I said I was not sure, and it is because I have a doubt that I suggest the hon. gentleman should not place in this Bill clauses which may spoil the whole Act.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—How would it be more constitutional if it were by a separate Act? That would not make it any more or any less constitutional.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—But it is not proper to introduce into a law like this a Bill which should come as an amendment to the Criminal Code or perhaps as an amendment to the Act which the hon. gentleman has cited, chapter 75 of the Revised Statutes. In order to meet the objection of some hon. gentlemen, I think it should be made a criminal offence and submit the measure as an amendment to the Criminal Code. I will not discuss the constitutionality of the Bill further, but I shall take up the question of expediency, and say that suppose the Bill be constitutional, I think it is not expedient to pass it in its present form, because it would entail works which the municipalities are not prepared to execute immediately. There is a suspensory clause, but I think if you suspend the law in one case, you will be obliged to suspend it as regards almost all the municipalities interested. Take Montreal and Quebec, and all the cities and towns situated on the St. Lawrence river, how could they act in accordance with this Bill and do what is required?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I pointed out that, under the Act, if the city of Montreal wants one or five years to construct a purification plant, they may apply for time and get it.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I think it would be proper in order to meet all those objections to refer the Bill to the Commission on the Conservation of Natural Resources. A report was prepared and submitted to this House by the Committee on Public Health, on the 18th February, which reads as follows:

The Standing Committee on Public Health and Inspection of Foods have the honour to make their third report.

Your committee have the honour to call the attention of the House to the exceedingly valuable evidence given before them and contained in the printed report now issued to the public.

After hearing and carefully considering the evidence your committee cannot fail to see that the public health of Canada is being considerably imperilled by the present custom of disposing of sewage, garbage, &c., into the lakes, rivers and streams of the country.

Your committee is of the opinion that the only remedy and the only safeguard lies in the passage of legislation to control it. The legislation to the effect must be uniform throughout the whole Dominion and can only be brought about by co-operation between the Dominion and Provincial governments.

It is therefore recommended that the Commission of Conservation, representing as it does all the governments in Canada, be requested to call together the health authorities of each province to meet them in conference at an early date and endeavour to devise means whereby this end may be attained.

I would move an amendment, that the Bill, together with the report of the Public Health Committee, be referred to the Conservation Commission in order that the whole question may be considered as it deserves to be considered, and then the questions of constitutionality and expediency could be determined. This question cannot be settled without a conference of the provinces, and possibly representatives of states in the neighbouring republic, which are interested in international streams, especially the St. Lawrence river. So that to give effect to the opinions which have been expressed and the different propositions which have been made, that is the only way in which we could arrive at a practical result. The hon. gentleman has been obliged to admit that there are perhaps a dozen systems of sewage purification which have been applied.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—The Conservation Commission will not report on that.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Why not?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Because they would have to go and examine every locality. They are not going to report on that.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—They have the right to consider the question and summon witnesses if they wish to do so. The hon. gentleman from New Brunswick (Hon. Mr. McSweeney) has made an observation with regard to a certain town within his own province. There may be difficulties as to twenty towns, and I think the commission would be in a position to make a report, then the House would be able to legislate in the proper way.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (British Columbia)—The hon. gentleman from Ottawa could not have brought forward a more important question than the one he has introduced. Because it means life and it means death. We have here a lamentable condition of things, in the Ottawa river and valley. All the filth from stables and everywhere goes into the Ottawa river, and thousands of people living along the river banks drink the water without any attempt at filtration. What do we find? Every day there is chronicled in the papers reports of death from typhoid or scarlet fever. Some body should move quickly, because the people are dying day after day from the evil effects of impure water caused by sewage going into the river. Some years ago, in driving over the river on the ice, I observed an avenue of refuse of water closets all along the river, and that is permitted by the city council of Hull, and the power that has control of the river, the Dominion government. Something ought to be done to compel the authorities to take action. I believe in the lower part of Hull there is no sewage system, and the contents of privies are thrown into the Ottawa river. Talk about bacteria and poison. The public cannot help being poisoned. The Senate has taken great interest in the Ottawa river. Years ago we used to have committees in regard to the effect of sawdust on the navigation of the river; now the effect of river pollution is getting too apparent. There is something more to be done, and whether it rests with the provincial or federal government, action should be taken quickly.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—It might possibly be well that the Bill should be made to apply to new localities; but in old places like Montreal, how could you apply it? I took the trouble some time ago, when the hon. gentleman first brought in his measure, to inquire from the authorities of Montreal if it would be possible to prevent the pollution of the river in front of the city of Montreal. I may say that I am in favour of the Bill. I am the seconder of the measure.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—What authorities does the hon. gentleman refer to?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Engineers and others. I asked at the city hall. There is already outside of Montreal a sewage farm, worked by the city corporation, into which all the sewage of St. Denis street, and that section of the city is carried. There is also another sewage farm in a town near Montreal, which has been working for seven or eight years very satisfactorily? But the outlets of the sewers of Montreal are at different places along the river front, and the sewage runs into the harbour. I understood from the engineers that it was almost impossible to collect the sewage or prevent it from accumulating in front of the city.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT. It could be done in time.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I do not know how it could be worked. There is no place where a sewage farm could be established to take care of the whole of it. If an attempt were made to carry the sewage very far to the east of Montreal there would not be sufficient slope, and it would have to be pumped, because before letting it fall into the St. Lawrence it would have to go through a large territory. Of course sewage is collected in Paris, and is there turned into good use as a fertilizer. But that city was laid out years and years ago, and the contour of the city lends itself to it. I am told that in Montreal it would be almost impossible to adopt such a system; but it would be a great improvement if in all the new places being constantly established above Montreal such a system were adopted. Where such a project is almost impossible it would not be fair to ask a municipality to comply.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—My hon. friend wants the biggest sinners to go scot free.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—No, I am quite willing to have it done if it can be accomplished. I am informed it would be almost impossible to do it in Montreal. However, the Bill could be so worded that no new system would be allowed to put raw sewage into the river. Below Montreal, for several miles, the water of the river is not drinkable. It appears that after a certain number of miles the water does become purified automatically. The sewage floats on the surface of the river, and if you go out in a row boat you can observe it. I understand that in the United States similar legislation to that now proposed by this Bill has been enacted. They are preventing new towns from emptying sewage into the waterways, but the old places retain the old system. Perhaps my hon. friend might see his way to make his Bill workable, but I should be very sorry to see the motion of the hon. gentleman from Mille Iles to refer this to the Conservation Committee adopted, because it would have the effect of killing the Bill, for this session, at any rate.

Hon. Mr. DE VEBER—I move the adjournment of the debate until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I move in amendment, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Young, that the Bill now before the House be referred to the Conservation of Natural Resources Commission.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I think this amendment is ill advised, and for that reason I propose to take advantage of the rules. My hon. friend has spoken, and he did not propose his amendment, therefore, he cannot do it now.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Then I will give notice of a motion to amend.

The motion was agreed to, and the debate was adjourned.

CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE INCORPORATION BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN introduced Bill (SS) An Act to incorporate the Federation of Chambers of Commerce of the Province of Quebec.

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think this is the time to raise an objection if an objection should be raised to this Bill. The Committee on Standing Orders received the petition, and the petition was in accordance with the notice. We could only do one thing, and that was to report that the petition and notice were according to the rules. Rule 115 says:

> Any private Bill shall, if it be demanded by two senators, when read the first time, be referred to the Committee on Standing Orders, to ascertain and report whether or not the said Bill comes within the classes of subjects assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces.

I understand that this is a Bill asking for the incorporation of all the chambers of commerce in the province of Quebec only. It is an Act of incorporation. I think it should come under the classes of subjects exclusively assigned to the provinces, and not to the Dominon, and for that reason, as the Bill is now read for the first time, I would ask that the said Bill be referred to the Committee on Standing Orders, before we proceed further, to ascertain and report whether or not the said Bill comes within the class of subjects assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the province. I ask that under rule 115, which provides that any private Bill, if demanded by two senators, when read the first time, shall be referred to the Committee on Standing Orders.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I have no objection whatever to the demand. It is quite a natural one under the rules. I wish the rules to be observed in passing legislation, and I certainly wish to have this Bill referred to the proper committee, which I think is the Standing Orders Committee.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I move, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Montplaisir, that this Bill be referred to the Committee on Standing Orders, to ascertain and report whether such Bill is within our jurisdiction or the jurisdiction of the provinces, under rule 115.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN.

The SPEAKER—I do not know whether it is necessary to put such a motion. According to the rules it would probably go to that committee.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think the Speaker should decide that it was obligatory.

The SPEAKER—I suppose it is a case at all events in which no harm can be done by passing a motion. I think it stands referred under the rule.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I am under the impression that it would be a case where the House had better pronounce on the matter, and send it to the committee by virtue of a motion.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I call the attention of the House to this feature of the rule. It says:

> Any private Bill shall, if it be demanded by two senators when read the first time, be referred to the Committee on Standing Orders, to ascertain and report whether or not the said Bill comes within the classes of subjects assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces.

That is one case. I contend, under this rule, that we do not require to obtain the permission of the House. It goes ipso facto. Then rule 116 says:

> At any time before the final passing of any private Bill, the same may, if the Senate thinks fit, be referred to the Supreme Court.

We see the distinction between the rules. In the first place, if it is asked by two senators it goes ipso facto to the committee. In the second place the House decides.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I am disposed to agree with the hon. gentleman. The House would have no objection. The moment two senators make the request, it would go there.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I have no objection to the proposition of the hon. gentleman from Stadacona, but will this Bill, after the explanation, go from the clerk to the committee without any further instructions?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Yes.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—No further instructions will be required?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—That is satisfactory.

The SPEAKER—It seems to me that under the rule it stands referred to the committee, and it ought to be recorded simply as ordered to be referred.

RIGHTS OF RIPARIAN PROPRIETORS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

1. Did the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council of His Majesty, in England, pronounce, in 1898, upon the question of the respective jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures and of the federal parliament in so far as concerns the property in rivers, lakes and harbours, and the rights of riparian proprietors?
2. What was, in its main features, the decision rendered?
3. According to this judgment, can exclusive rights of fishing be granted, either by this parliament or by the provincial legislatures, in waters where the tide makes itself felt?
4. Has the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council declared that the federal parliament had no right at all to enact section 4 of chapter 95 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1886, in so far as that section allows the federal government to issue licenses for exclusive rights of fishing?
5. Has this section 4 of chapter 95 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1886, been repeated in the Revised Statutes of Canada now in force?
6. Does the government intend to give effect to the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council?
7. In what manner?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The replies of the department are as follow:

1. Yes, except as to lakes and rights of riparian proprietors.

2. Refer to judgment reported in 1898 Appeal Cases, page 700.

3. This is a matter of opinion to be formed upon consideration of the judgment.

4. No.

5. Yes, but subject to the modification introduced by section 4 of the revised Act, R.S., 1906, chapter 45.

6 and 7. The law is being administered in accordance with the decision of the Judicial Committee.

THE MEDICAL STAFF AT IMMIGRANTS HOSPITAL, QUEBEC.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

1. Who is the medical superintendent of the Immigrants' Hospital at Quebec?
2. Who are his medical aids?
3. What is the salary of each of these public employees?
4. Does the medical superintendent live in the hospital with his family, both winter and summer?
5. Has he a horse and vehicle at his disposition?
6. Is he at liberty to practice outside of the hospital and to give his medical services to persons who are not immigrants?
7. Are his assistants domiciled at the hospital itself?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The replies of the department are as follows:

1. Dr. J. D. Page.

2. Dr. Emile Nadeau.

3. Dr. Page, $3,500; Dr. Nadeau, $2,400, per annum.

4. Not ordinarily. He has been permitted to occupy rooms in the hospital this winter as a temporary and special arrangement.

5. Yes.

6. It is understood that his official duties take up all his time and that he does not practice outside.

7. No.

THE IMMIGRATION BUILDINGS AT QUEBEC.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

1. Are the immigration buildings at Quebec closed for the winter?
2. From what date until what date?
3. Upon whose recommendation?
4. Has the office of the agent been transferred elsewhere, and where?
5. Upon whose recommendation? And upon whose authority?
6. Who are the persons who continue to reside in the immigration buildings during the winter season, on what authority, and for what purpose?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The answers are:

1. Yes.

about the end of November, 1909, until 31st March, 1910.

3. The superintendent of immigration.

4. No.

5. See answer to 4.

6. No one.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (TT) An Act to incorporate the Gatineau and Ungava Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Cloran.

Bill (UU) An Act respecting the Essex Terminal Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. McHugh.

Bill (VV) An Act respecting the Dominion Atlantic Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Power.

PROTECTION ON NAVIGABLE WATERS.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Before the orders of the day are called, I wish to draw the attention of the Senate to the notice given by my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. David) yesterday. It reads that when the orders of the day are called for the third reading of the Act respecting the Protection of Navigable Waters, he would move an amendment to refer it to the commission on Conservation of Natural Resources. My contention is that this is not an amendment to the Bill which was before the House yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The objection can be raised when the motion is made. The motion may not be made, and therefore we may have a useless discussion.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It could have been raised when the notice was given.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—The notice was given after the House rose. I draw attention to it now so that the Bill and the motion for adopting the report may be discussed on their merits.

The SPEAKER—But it may not be moved at all.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The proper time to raise the objection is when the motion is made.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 85) An Act to amend the Criminal Code.—Hon. Sir Richard Scott.

Bill (I) An Act respecting the Northern Empire Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Talbot.

Bill (DD) An Act to incorporate the Weyburn Security Bank.—Hon. Mr. Douglas.

Bill (MM) An Act for the relief of Cecilia Marie Pringle.—Hon. Mr. MacKeen.

Bill (NN) An Act for the relief of Ada Ann Reed.—Hon. Mr. Jones.

GOVERNMENT ANNUITIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Right Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the third reading of Bill (Y), An Act to amend the Government Annuities Act.

Hon. Mr. FROST—Before the third reading, I wish to say a few words on the subject of the petition which I presented and read yesterday from the Women's National Council of Canada. The executive of that association have made a complaint of the manner in which they are discriminated against. They have in their petition recited the fact that owing to the greater longevity of women than men the fees have been increased, and they regard that as an unfair arrangement. When we consider that throughout the country today thousands and thousands of women are employed in all manner of work, civil servants, clerks in stores, stenographers, even in manufacturing establishments, earning their own living, working beside their brothers, it seems somewhat unfair that a brother should have the privilege of paying a lesser rate for the same amount of annuity. Of course, I understand that the fees are regulated by actuarial calculations along the same line as life insurance companies; but it strikes me that under the conditions in which men and women work, side by side in these modern days, there ought to be no discrimination in regard to the annuities issued by the government. We know that this annuity is a very admirable thing. The government are to be congratulated upon the success which is attending the annuity scheme, and no doubt in process of time it will become of great value and will benefit thousands of people and, in case there is anything in the operation of the Act to create any feeling on the part of one portion of the people against the other, now is the time it should be rectified. The National Council of Women, as we all know, is one of the largest and most distinguished of the organizations conducted wholly by women. We know that the head of that organization is a very distinguished lady, who graced Government House here a short time ago, and we all remember last June when the conference was held that hundreds of ladies from all countries of the world came to Toronto for two or three weeks consultation, for the purpose of uplifting as far as possible the conditions of their own sex. We know that organization is doing a great deal of good, and when this petition came to my hands I felt that, considering the distinguished names that it contained, it was not anything more than my duty to present it to the House. I am not prepared to say whether it was regular or not, considering the facts that the fees are regulated by actuarial calculations. That is a matter I do not care to go into. My right hon. friend the leader of the Senate will know as to whether anything can be accomplished to make that change, and I am perfectly satisfied to leave this whole matter in the hands of the government, assured that they will do the ladies justice. I, therefore, in order to provoke a little discussion on the motion, move that the word 'not' be inserted before the word 'now' and that the following words be added at the end of the clause:

But that it be amended by adding the following as clause 16 of the Act—

In the purchase of annuities under this Act no discrimination as to the price paid for the same shall militate in favour of either sex.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the motion made is not the motion of which the hon. gentleman gave notice. Scarcely any one who has the Bill before him can at the present moment refer to it and see what the effect of that amendment will be.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is perfectly correct; at the same time this is a public Bill and an amendment can be moved without any notice.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But if it is a substantial motion, notice has to be given of it. No one knows that better than the hon. gentleman.

The SPEAKER—If exception is taken to it, the Bill can stand over.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Perhaps we had better dispose of it now. I am afraid that however desirous I am of meeting the wishes of my hon. friend and of the National Council of Women, that in the present instance it would not be in the power of the Senate to adopt my hon. friend's amendment, and for this obvious reason, that it would of necessity impose an additional charge, be the same more or less, on the public chest, which is outside of our jurisdiction, I think.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Right or wrong, this means that the present regulations made by the government in accordance with the Act, and in accordance with the actuarial calculations, would be so altered as to add slightly to the public burden. That I think we cannot do, and, therefore, the amendment must be held to be out of order. But with respect to the main question; that is to say, the desirability of placing females on the same footing as males, all I can say is that if the ladies can make out a case I shall be delighted myself to comply with their request. I must warn my hon. friend, however, that the actuarial calculations so far submitted are all in favour of the superior longevity of women, and that if they pay a little more, they will receive a little more, inasmuch as they will live a little longer. I understand, however, that that position is disputed by the Ladies National Council, on the ground that these actuarial calculations on which the government has been acting are made under somewhat different circumstances in a different country, and that, as a matter of fact, the longevity of women in Canada does not exceed the longevity of the men. That is a matter of fact, and I will cause some examination to be made into it. I think one thing is very certain, and that is, as anybody who studied the census returns will see, that after a certain advanced age, say after the age of eighty, the longevity of women is decidedly greater than that of man. I think there can be no doubt about that; but it is not so clear from our own census returns whether up to a pretty advanced period of life, say seventy-five or eighty, in Canada, that the same results would apply. My attention has been called properly enough to this subject, and the facts appear to me to warrant some investigation. I think I may venture to say to my hon. friend and the House that they can rest assured the government have not the slightest desire to do any injustice to the women of Canada, and if the contention of these good ladies could be established, that, in the gross, and on the whole, the longevity of the sexes in Canada up, as I said, to an advanced period, is pretty nearly equal, there would be ground for revising our decision. I think I will have to ask my hon. friend to allow that matter to remain in the hands of the government, and it can be dealt with by regulation if they are satisfied as to the facts. I am pretty clear that the objection I first took must necesarily apply, and that we could not import into this Act any provision adding to the public burden. The question is an interesting one, and it shall have our very best consideration; but, as at present advised, I am bound to say that the actuaries are ungallant enough to be dead against the National Council as to the matter of fact.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I should like to emphasise to some extent the absolute necessity of protecting the Act from any differentiation in favour of a particular class of individuals or sex. The value of the government Annuities Act must necessarily be based on well recognized actuarial tables, and immediately the government becomes susceptible to the approaches of any individual or any class or any particular sex with a view of extending to them particular favours, the Act must necessarily lose the confidence and support of the people of Canada. I hope the government will not for a moment permit any factor of that kind to enter into their consideration in dealing with future amendments to the Act. If the contention be based upon actuarial tables, certainly there is no good reason why the government should not place both sexes upon the same plane; but only upon that ground, with all deference, I would submit to my right hon. friend, should any consideration be given to this question.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The hon. gentleman will notice that I was express in the remarks I made in pointing out that it was only on that ground the government must act. I may mention to him, however, that in applying an Act of this kind in this country we are acting under somewhat different conditions to those which apply in a country such as England. There annuities were usually purchased, almost invariably in the case of women, by more persons in very comfortable circumstances, and in rather good condition of life, and I think it extremely probable that calculations based on the length of life enjoyed by those parties may not entirely coincide with the calculations which might be based on annuities granted under our scheme. My hon. friend will notice that we grant annuities up to only a very limited amount, $600 being the maximum, and they will be taken out, I hope, in considerable measure by women of the working classes, as well as by women who earn their own livelihood in other callings. However, I fully recognize the importance of the suggestions made by my hon. friend, and he may rest assured that the government will consider anything that is done in this case very carefully.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Before the right hon. gentleman resumes his seat, I should like to ask whether it has been found in the experience of life insurance companies that the lives of women average longer than those of men?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I do not think the experience of insurance companies in Canada is long enough or extended enough to be of any value. In the researches which were made by myself and officers of the department prior to the introduction of this Act, we found that an exceedingly small number in Ontario altogether were granted, remarkably small, taking into account the extent to which life insurance endowment policies, &c., had been granted in this country, and very few of those had been granted to women. We have no data to go upon except those we have obtained from English actuaries, which, as I have said, are based largely upon their experience in the lives of a class of people rather more comfortably off than those we hope to bring in under our scheme. There may be grounds for the contention advanced by Lady Edgar and her friends, that in this country, under a certain age, the difference, if any, in longevity, is very small. I have no doubt myself from all the evidence that has come before me, that after a certain age there is no question whatever the chances of life on the part of women are very considerably greater than the chances of life on the part of men; but the age limit, of course, would be a very considerable factor in considering any proposition that may be made.

Hon. Mr. FROST—I beg to withdraw my amendment.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

SECOND READING.

Bill (LL) an Act for the relief of Alexander Augustus Barthelmes.—Hon. Mr. Derbyshire.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (C), An Act to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

(In the Committee).

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I have an amendment here as a substitute for the first clause in the Bill. I do not think it is materially different from the clause as printed, only the language is more apt and is better drafted. The only difference is with respect to the word 'loss.' In the amendment now proposed, I have introduced the word 'loss' after the words 'death and injury' in order to cover the case of freight, for instance, on the Intercolonial railway being lost or stolen. As the Intercolonial railway is doing the business of a common carrier I submit that the government ought to be placed in the same position, and under the same responsibility as an ordinary carrier. With that difference, the amendment which I now move is exactly similar to the clause as it appears in the Bill.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The attention of the Department of Justice has been called to this measure. They are of opinion that it is very far reaching in its effects as my hon. friend proposes to amend it, and while there is a great deal to be said for putting government and the Intercolonial railway, which they are operating as a commercial enterprise, in the same position as other common carriers, and, while to that extent they are disposed to concur and agree with him, they think the public would be in danger of incurring very considerable loss if the amendment were passed in the shape in which my hon. friend presents it, and they have placed in my hands this amendment, which would confine the operations of the Act to the Intercolonial railway:

> Every claim against the Crown arising out of any death or injury to person or property, caused by the negligence of any officer or servant of the Crown, while acting within the scope of his duties or employment, etc., etc.

With the exception of the Intercolonial railway, the Department of Justice are of the opinion that it would not be expedient to extend the present liability of the Crown without very careful consideration, and I think it was with respect to accidents occurring on the Intercolonial railway, or damage to property occurring on that road, that my hon. friend was chiefly interested. At this stage of the session, I may observe to him that it would be almost impossible, whether or not he succeeded in convincing this House of the expediency of widening the scope of this Bill, to get it through, and I think he would be well advised, if I may say so, to take a special case that the government are willing to provide for, which, of course, is a case that requires consideration fairly, and be content therewith. Perhaps the amendment which I have placed in the hands of the chairman might be improved by the introduction of a word or two for the purpose of proving losses, as it has been introduced in my hon. friend's main motion.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The right hon. gentleman mentions only the Intercolonial railway. Will his amendment cover other government railways? The Intercolonial railway is one road, and the amendment will only apply to that road.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The Prince Edward Islanders must be very much indebted to the hon. gentleman for the pains he has taken to promote their interests. I have no objection to include the Prince Edward Island railway.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The easiest way would be to include all government works.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—We cannot include all government works.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Could my hon. friend state why this same principle is not extended to all public works?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Railroads, in the opinion of the government, have entered into a very special business, and, while the government are conducting a commercial enterprise like a company railroad, there seems to be no just cause why they should not be subject to the same rules and regulations that apply to other roads; but we will take the case, for instance, of an accident, occurring through the carelessness of a lighthouse keeper. That might incur enormous loss, yet my hon. friend would hardly contend that the public at large, who go to the expense, for the benefit of shippers and ship owners, of maintaining lighthouses all over the Dominion, should be held in heavy damages if one of those employees in any way failed to perform his duty. A curious case arose with respect to damage sustained by a vessel in coming up the St. Lawrence channel. During some spring freshet or storm a boulder was deposited in the channel somewhere between Quebec and Montreal. I am not sure of the exact spot. It was contended, though I think the application was afterwards withdrawn on consideration, that the government, after spending many millions in endeavouring to deepen the channel, and make it more commodious and convenient, should not be held responsible if, through a boulder falling into the channel, a ship and its cargo were damaged. There are many cases which will, no doubt, present themselves to my hon. friend in which it would be very dangerous to the public weal to allow heavy damages to be claimed as the result of negligence or unavoidable accident occurring on a public work. If anything of that kind is ever done, it should be only after very serious examination. In the present instance, the department do not object to bringing the Intercolonial under the same obligations as the other railways, but that is as far as they are prepared to go, and as far, I think as they should go.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The cases mentioned by my right hon. friend scarcely warrant parliament in exempting the government from all actions. Take, for instance, the case of an accident happening on a public building or bridge, a government highway or other public work, to which the public have access. The very knowledge that they are to a large extent free from actions for damages being brought by reason of accidents happening, creates a carelessness on the part of government officials. They feel that no responsibility attaches to them, even if an accident should happen. The consequence is, many cases of hardship do arise through the negligence of officials in the performance of their duties. It seems to me the government should not place themselves in that atmosphere of exemption, so as to tolerate negligence on the part of their employees.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I would be disposed to draw this distinction: where the government receive pay for doing particular work, as on the Intercolonial railway, for conveying passengers and freight they should be liable to damages; but where they simply have at their own cost and charges constructed certain works for the general benefit, on which no fee is paid, then they ought not to be made liable for damages. The distinction seems to be broad and sound and in consonance with our previous policy.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Government bridges are almost notorious for their bad state of repair.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Government bridges where?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Wherever they are built.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Then the government should build no bridges at all.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is a notorious fact that the government bridges are found in a worse state of repair than any other class of bridges. I attribute that fact to the exemption from responsibility from accidents as defined by the law. There should be some well defined sphere within which the government would be responsible. My right hon. friend has spoken of the case of lighthouses. That is a case which would come under a special class possibly; at the same time that is a very serious matter.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Millions of money might be lost through the culpability of an employee. There is this to be remembered, that any government official who is shown to have neglected his duty, and has thereby caused damage or injury to the public, is liable to instant dismissal.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Provided his friends have not enough influence to keep him on.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Provided he does not come from certain favoured localities. At any rate, as matters stand, my hon. friend will have made a decided gain in having the Intercolonial railway liability recognized. As to the other point, I still must say that the principle of not holding the government responsible in damages unless in cases where they receive a fee for doing certain services, as for instance on the Intercolonial railway, I fear is questionable.

My hon. friend knows very well that if large liberty is given to the subject to sue the Crown, that right or wrong most juries would find against the government, and find very handsomely. I should be very sorry to trust the public purse to the tender mercies of twelve honest jurors in any province that I know of, except perhaps Alberta, where experiences may be different.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—In the case of an action against the Crown there is no such thing as a jury, so my hon. friend is conjuring up a possibility that does not exist.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I understand that in the case of the Intercolonial railway they will allow juries to have something to say; there is a Bill for some such purpose. I am very glad to hear that such cases will not be tried before a jury. I do not intend to chop against my hon. friend opposite on a question of law. My belief in the possibility of the Crown escaping damages, where 12 men have to decide a question, is not very strong.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Claims against the Intercolonial railway would not exhaust all the cases where a fee is paid, and where damages might be claimed as the result of negligence of some officer of the Crown. Take the post office service.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The post office is a law unto itself, and has a special statute.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Fees are paid for the use of the post office. I remember a case in the city of Three Rivers where a man walking up to the post office to make his daily call, owing to the very dangerous condition of the sidewalk which was under the care and responsibility of the post office authorities fell and broke his leg. In that case, his action was dismissed by the Exchequer Court because the judge held that he had no jurisdiction. Yet there is a case where there is a fee paid and a direct invitation is given to the public to frequent the place.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —To walk up slippery steps.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—The case of negligence was admitted by the court.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—That would apply to all public buildings.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Yes, where the Crown pay people to do their business.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Supposing my hon. friend from Ottawa met with a similar mishap coming up to the Senate to perform his duties in this Chamber, would he not have an action?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—If the accident happened to my right hon. friend, I think he would feel like making somebody pay for it—the Crown or somebody else. However, I am prepared to be content with what I can get, and accept it with a smile, and look for another opportunity to implement it and obtain what I think I ought to get. I do not withdraw the amendment, but I accept the clause proposed by the right hon. gentleman.

The SPEAKER—Then the question is on the amendment proposed by the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I beg to call attention to the fact that that should come as an additional subsection to subsection 20 because there are other claims under subsection (c) which should not be disturbed. If you strike out this section, then the claims will be protected only as far as they are connected with the Intercolonial railway. I understand it is intended not to affect the rights of claimants as existing in other cases.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I think the hon. gentleman is quite right, because there are cases provided for under subsection (c) which might be destroyed by this. I do not desire to divide the committee on the amendment, and I will accept the proposed amendment for the present.

The amendment was adopted.

On clause 2,

This Act shall be held to have come into force on the 23rd June, 1887.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I understand the hon. gentleman from Ottawa has agreed to strike out the second clause of the Bill?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I propose that instead of making the Act retroactive to the date at which the original Exchequer Court Act was passed, that the provision now adopted should be made applicable to cases now pending in court.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I am afraid I cannot consent to that. It is virtually retroactive legislation.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—But these cases are now pending in court.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I cannot accept that without consultation with the Department of Justice.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I cannot see why.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —You might open the door to an immense amount of litigation.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I propose to make it applicable only to the cases now pending in court, ready for trial. Some years ago the Exchequer Court gave judgment in the matter of Price vs. the King for damages, a case exactly similar, and caused under similar circumstances to the case of Chamberlain vs. the King to which I referred the other day. The damages awarded in Price vs. the King were for injury caused by sparks emanating from a locomotive. In Chamberlain vs. the King the Supreme Court decided for the first time that there was no liability, because the property destroyed was not actually on the right of way of the Intercolonial railway. There were other cases that were instituted at the same time as Price vs.

the King, and unless this Act is made to apply to them they will have no remedy, whilst a large number of other people have been paid the damages they have suffered. Under these circumstances, the Act should be made applicable to those cases.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I cannot concur in that. Cases now pending must go as the law was at the time they were entered. I move to strike out clause 2.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I move in amendment that this Act shall apply to all cases now pending in the Exchequer Court of Canada.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I am afraid, however great the hardship may be, that I cannot consent to that.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—I think that would be a bad precedent to establish.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Would the hon. gentleman inform the House how this legislation is made applicable to pending cases, would it benefit them in any way? Cases are in court. This legislation cannot affect them.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I am very much afraid unless this Act is made applicable, those cases are out of court. The court will hold there is no remedy.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Substantially this is retroactive legislation. I gather from the hon. gentleman from Ottawa that some of the cases to which he referred arose some considerable time back. Of course, this is not the case in the present instance, but you can imagine a case where an influential member of parliament might tell a client that he would introduce a measure which would enable that client to recover against the Crown where, as the law then stood, he was not in a position to recover. That would be a very objectionable condition of things I think, and I am satisfied it did not strike the hon. gentleman from Ottawa that such a construction might possibly be put upon the passing of this clause.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—My only object was as I have stated. I happen to know of several cases similar to Price vs. the King, in which the suppliant recovered, and because of the decision in Chamberlain vs. the King, in the Supreme Court, those people whose cases were pending in the Circuit Court at the same time as the Price case was pending, will not be entitled to recover.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Why should they be put in a better position than the Chamberlain claimant?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Because they have taken advantage of the law and have taken proceedings, and in order to avoid the anomaly of those people not succeeding in their cases when another party has succeeded on the very same state of facts.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I am sorry I cannot agree to that.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—In deference to the right hon. gentleman's wishes, I will withdraw the amendment.

The amendment was withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Before the Bill is reported, I should like to ask the leader of the government if anything has been done in regard to this very court about which I inquired last session, and was answered that something would be done. My hon. friend from Ottawa and myself, at last session, moved to amend the Exchequer Court Act in order that in cases in Quebec where the parties and witnesses were French that a deputy judge or another judge should be appointed who could understand the case and hear it in French. If I remember well, the right hon. leader of the House promised at the time that if we did not press our amendment to the law, that before next session—that would mean this session—something would be done to remedy the evil we are complaining of. So far, I have heard nothing of the matter, and I may say that notices have been given that the judge of the Exchequer Court will hold sessions in Quebec by the end of this month. In my own office we have two cases of claims for damages where the complainants and witnesses are all French, and I should like to know if, in view of the formal promise made by the leader of the House at the close of last session, something has been done in order that our clients and witnesses should appear before a judge who can understand them.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I do not exactly know what that has to do with the matter in hand. I can only say to the hon. gentleman, my recollection is that I promised to bring the matter to the attention of council, which I did. What action the Minister of Justice saw fit to take about it, I will find out and inform the hon. gentleman; but I do not remember at this moment what conclusion he arrived at. I remember the incident the hon. gentleman mentioned and I remember also bringing it before council.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Perhaps I am not completely in order, but this being a Bill affecting that very court, I think it is a proper occasion to ask the right hon. gentleman to remember that promise.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I will make an inquiry of the Department of Justice and mention the point, which I remember very well that the hon. gentleman referred to.

Hon. Mr. WATSON, from the committee, reported the Bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

OTTAWA AND MONTREAL TRANSMISSION COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE moved the second reading of Bill (II) An Act to incorporate Ottawa and Montreal Transmission Company, Limited.

He said: I understand this Bill was reached on Tuesday last, and in my absence was left over until to-day. I read the Bill for the first time on Wednesday of this week. On reading the Bill, I noticed that the point which was taken against it was well taken, that the Bill seeks to give the company power to expropriate under the Railway Act for the purpose of acquiring a right-of-way thirty feet in width, or of such greater or less width as for the purposes of the company may be deemed necessary in the localities which are enumerated in clause 8. As far as I am concerned, I would be opposed to granting such power. On speaking to the party who asked me to take charge of the Bill a few minutes ago, he told me that the solicitors who were to prepare the Bill had positive instructions to avoid that, to ask only for the power to expropriate for the placing of the poles, and that he himself—and he is a member of the House—would be against the Bill as drafted. He was very much surprised when I told him of this provision. With this explanation, I move the second reading of the Bill, with the understanding that it will be amended in committee by striking out the objectionable clause.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would point out to my hon. friend in whose name this Bill stands, that it is of a very much more sweeping character than he has discovered within the few minutes he has devoted to the study of it. It not only proposes to expropriate a right-of-way, as provided in section 8 of the Bill, over a long distance of country, but it proposes to acquire and develop water-powers, and to generate, by means of water-power or otherwise, electrical heat and so on, and to obtain under section 13, lands, property, privileges, rights, contracts, &c. and then by a very insidious means apply the expropriation powers of the Railway Act. It is proposed to extend the Railway Act to this enterprise, which is not a railway and not within the purview of that Act, and to apply all the machinery of expropriation to secure such privileges and easements, and titles, as may be required by this company for the purpose of its undertaking. I take very serious exception to the promoters of Bills by this insidious way practically usurping the rights of the public, and taking advantage of machinery which was never contemplated for such a purpose, thus making an abuse, in my judgment, of the laws which we have placed on our statute-books on behalf of an entirely different class of public works. If these gentlemen had, instead of asking for the application of the expropriation clauses of the Railway Act, stated in detail that they propose to expropriate right-of-way, water-powers, privileges and easements, &c., I venture to say that this Chamber would not approve of the principle of the Bill, and would not give it a second reading.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I have the authority of the hon. gentleman from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Edwards) that he requested when the Bill was drafted that it be drafted on the lines I have mentioned, and it seems to me that that declaration is satisfactory. It is through the misunderstanding of the solicitors that the Bill was drafted in the way I have mentioned, and as the party in charge of the Bill, I have stated that I would be the first to ask, when the Bill is in committee, that it be amended on the lines I have stated.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The reason I criticised the Bill in this way is that I understood my hon. friend to simply apply his remarks to right of way. But if the same remarks apply to the other territorial rights which the promoters seek, then I do not object to the Bill going before the Railway Committee—

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Section 16 of the Bill reads as follows:

16. The Railway Act so far as it is applicable and not inconsistent with this Act, shall apply to the company and to its undertaking, with respect to the acquisition of right of way and possession, the determination of compensation and damages, and the construction of telegraphs and telephones authorized by this Act.

2. Wherever in the Railway Act the word 'company' occurs, it shall include the company hereby incorporated.

3. Wherever in the Railway Act the word 'land' occurs, it shall include any privilege, easement, possession or title required by the company for constructing or operating the works authorized by this Act under, over or along any lands with or without the necessity of acquiring a title in fee simple.

I think that this would apply only to the right of way, because the Railway Act is made applicable only to the right of way. However, this section should be made clear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the hon. leader of the opposition deserves credit for calling attention to the objectionable nature of some of the provisions of this Bill. He seems, however, to have overlooked paragraph (d) of section 8, which I look upon as conferring most dangerous powers on this company. It will be remembered that they propose to operate along the north shore of the Ottawa river from the city of Montreal to the city of Ottawa.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—And further up.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes, up into the county of Pontiac.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—And up to the north pole.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Paragraph (d) of section 8 empowers the company to

(d) Construct, maintain and operate all necessary works, dams, wing dams, canals, intakes, tail races, piers, booms, dykes, channels, conduits, tunnels, transmission lines, structures, buildings, machinery, plant, appliances, instruments and devices, and erect and maintain poles and towers, and lay mains, pipes, cables, wires, baskets or other conductors and connect them with similar lines, either along the lines of the company's right of way, or at the company's works or terminals within Canada.

It will be borne in mind that the people of this part of Canada are very much interested in the construction of the Georgian Bay Ship canal. If you allow this company to erect dams, wing-dams, piers and so on, along the north shore of the Ottawa river, that to my mind will effectually damn the progress of the Georgian Bay canal.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Because it would just mean that in order to construct the Georgian Bay canal, this company would have to be bought out. I think that is quite a serious question to which the attention of the committee will be directed. From what I know of the Railway Committee, I have very little doubt, but that they will do their duty by this Bill, and safe-guard the interests of the public.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The hon. gentleman from Halifax has pointed out a most serious objection to this Bill. It gives the company power to go up into the Pontiac district and down to the city of Montreal. It takes in the Lake of Two Mountains, Laval, Jacques Cartier, and Hochelaga counties. That is exactly the route of the Georgian Bay canal, and if this company gets the first foot-hold, good-bye to the Georgian Bay canal, unless they are prepared to pay an extravagant amount to expropriate the rights of that company. This Bill of itself might do no harm, but in view of the very near construction of the Georgian Bay canal it would be a very dangerous obstruction to place in its way, and one that would be very hard to overcome, because these people cannot carry on their works without damming the river all the way down from Hawkesbury. There are four or five rapids on the lower Ottawa river and very extensive ones. These people would have a right to use all these water-powers, dam them as they please, and occupy the lands on both sides of the river. How is the Georgian Bay canal to be built if this is going to be done? I think the hon. member for Halifax and the leader of the opposition have done a service in pointing out objections to the Bill. I am not opposed to works of this kind; but we must safeguard the public interests and not give such rights to private individuals.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 83) an Act respecting the Vancouver, Westminster and Yukon Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Bostock.

PROTECTION OF NAVIGABLE WATERS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

The order of the day being called:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion for the second reading of Bill (B) An Act to amend the Act respecting the protecting of navigable waters.

Hon. Mr. DE VEBER—In view of the fact that in the consideration of the report of the Health Committee, the adoption of which I shall have to move to-morrow, I shall have to make a few remarks on this subject, and as the question has been so largely dealt with already, I hope I may be excused if I confine my remarks to reading the Bill, and making a few comments thereon. Clause 19a of the Bill reads:

No person shall throw or deposit, or cause or permit to be thrown or deposited, any sewage, offal, or refuse animal or vegetable matter of any kind whatsoever, into any river, stream or other water, any part of which is navigable or which flows into any navigable water.

This clause is very short, very strong, and very drastic, not one whit too drastic, and, if carried into effect and enforced rigidly, will doubtless give us what we need, pure water to drink. It is also very comprehensive. The 48 words contained in the clause embrace every harbour, lake, river, stream, creek, brook, rivulet and spring in the Dominion of Canada. I must congratulate the hon. gentleman in charge of the Bill on the speech he has made. He has expended a good deal of thought, research and energy in obtaining the information that he has given us. In fact his energy has been so great that it will go far to combat the feeling in the other House that once a man is appointed to the Senate, he immediately loses all energy. He has shown us very conclusively that legislation on this subject is an imperative necessity. He has also shown us that we have the power in this House to legislate regarding public health. I shall go further to-morrow in the remarks I intend to make than my hon. friend. He confines himself to the pollution of waters; I am going to take the larger issue of public health. I agree with the Bill thoroughly; I recognize the necessity of such legislation, and agree with his contention regarding the power vested in parliament. I may add a few words probably to strengthen his contention in regard to our power to deal with matters of public health. I will not put it from a legal point of view, being a layman and a physician: I shall put it from the point of view of a physician and the point of view of the man on the street. I came across recently a remark made by Sir John Macdonald in regard to the British North America Act. He made the statement that whilst the constitution of the United States distinctly declared that all power not definitely given to the federal government belonged exclusively to the states; that whilst that was the stated case in the neighbouring country, in the British North America Act, which is the constitution of Canada, all powers not distinctly given to the provinces belong to the federal government. Sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act deal with these questions. Section 92, which includes the exclusive powers of the provincial legislatures, does not in any way make a statement in regard to the public health. It simply provides that the provinces shall build and maintain all hospitals, charitable and elemosynary institutions. These charitable and poor houses are elemosynary institutions, looking at the subject from a medical point of view, having nothing to do with what we call public health, which is preventive medicine. They are simply houses of refuge built by the province to take care of those who may be injured or become sick. The man who is an object of charity is put in one of the charitable institutions, and if he is broken down and unable to maintain himself, he is put in the poor house. That is not what we call preventive medicine, and public health; the object of them is to prevent people having to go to those places. Whilst I agree thoroughly with the hon. gentleman in regard to the constitutionality of the Bill, and his contention with regard to its necessity, I cannot support it, simply because it is premature. The hon. gentleman in his speech has taken altogether one side of the question. He has shown that legislation is needed, and that we have the power to legislate, but he has not mentioned the difficulties in carrying out such a measure. The members of the Health Committee discussed and deliberated upon this question at some length, and in the first report we thought of recommending the Dominion government to call a conference of the health authorities to consider such matters. Whilst we were talking this over, we came across certain facts that we thought would make that inadvisable. My hon. friend quoted very profusely from the report of the Health Committee, but he did not give us any of the report that shows where difficulties lie in enacting this legislation. The report says:

> In the United States, federal law exists in the River and Harbour Act, stating 'It shall not be lawful to throw, empty, or suffer to be done, any filth, refuse or other waste of any kind into any pond, harbour or navigable stream which shall tend to impede navigation'; but no reference is made to any matter affecting the public health.

That is simply in regard to navigation, not health at all. We must remember that when we take up this question that there are international interests to be considered, and there must be co-operation between the governments of the United States and Canada before anything can be done. What good would it do if Canada passed laws preventing the pollution of the Niagara river, if the United States did not co-operate? Every thing done in this regard must be done by co-operation.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (British Columbia)—Take the case of the Ottawa river?

Hon. Mr. DE VEBER—There you have an interprovincial stream. It would be useless for Ontario to prohibit the emptying of sewage into the Ottawa river unless Quebec did the same. The report continues:

> The general right to the flow of a stream in its state of natural purity has been established in the United States under the law of 'eminent domain,' and again and again the same rights have been shown to exist under the English common law, in the courts of Canada. It is therefore manifest that the difficulties which will arise in the matter of the pollution of international streams will prove great, as the powers which the federal government at Washington has attempted to exercise in interstate matters, even in waters wholly under federal jurisdiction, have been undertaken with very great caution, and as in the case of the St. Mary's river at the Sault, the St. Clair, Detroit, Niagara or St. Lawrence rivers, should the federal authority order a city situated on any of these to purify its sewage, or should the government of Canada require any Canadian town so situated to do the same, and should the state or province in either case refuse to support the federal demand, it becomes at once a very interesting question to determine just what mandatory powers the federal governments possess to compel action in either country. If the principle be accepted, which time and again federal ministers in Canada have asserted, that all public health matters, except quarantine, were relegated by the Act of British North America to the provinces, then it is difficult to see how a federal demand in a case of this kind could be exercised and enforced.

These are some of the difficulties. Now we find that, although we have had the power under the British North America

Act to legislate, since 1882, since the Health Act was passed in Ontario, the provinces have been exercising those rights. That certainly creates a precedent, and, as the man in the street would remark, possession is nine points of the law, therefore we might have some little trouble in ousting provincial jurisdiction. For this matter has reached the point that, not only the Senate, but the people in all the provinces are looking for legislation. If you refer to the report, the questions asked by myself and other members of the committee all lead up to the same thing, asking what should be done to prevent the pollution of our streams, and all agreed that there should be some central power—some governing body—that the legislation to be effective must be uniform, and, to be uniform, there must be co-operation between the provinces and the Dominion government. Looking for the best way to attain this end, and whilst we were thinking of making recommendations to the Dominion government to call a conference of the health officers to discuss the question, we found that there was such a body as the Conservation Commission, a non-political body, representing not only the Dominion government, but the provincial governments as well, that they were appointed for exactly such purposes as this, and we concluded that the most reasonable way, and the way that promised most success, was to bring in the report that will come up for consideration to-morrow. I will just read its recommendation:

> Your committee have the honour to call the attention of the House to the exceedingly valuable evidence given before them and contained in the printed report now issued to the public.
> After hearing and carefully considering the evidence, your committee cannot fail to see that the public health of Canada is being considerably imperilled by the present custom of disposing of sewage, garbage, etc., into the lakes, rivers and streams of the country.
>
> Your committee is of the opinion that the only remedy, and the only safeguard lies in the passage of legislation to control it. The legislation to the effect must be uniform throughout the whole dominion and can only be brought about by co-operation between the Dominion and provincial governments.
> It is therefore recommended that the commission of conservation, representing as it does all the governments in Canada, be requested to call together the health authorities of each province to meet them in conference at an early date and endeavour to devise means whereby this end may be attained.

I am sure that the members of the Conservation Commission immediately upon receiving this report will take action. Some question has been raised about my hon. friend on the other side of the House having the right to move an amendment. I am going to move that amendment myself, and to ask that the hon. gentleman, who so ably introduced his Bill—who has fulfilled the greatest part of his mission, that of educating the people up to the fact that legislation is necessary—to withdraw his Bill, we agreeing that it shall become part of our report to the Conservation Commission. It would materially strengthen our report, and I would ask him to help to attain that good end by withdrawing his Bill. If he is willing, as I feel almost sure he must be to do that, I shall be glad; if he does not wish to do so, I will not move my amendment.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I am quite prepared to allow this matter to go before the Conservation Commission, along with the other matters embodied in and referred to in the report of the committee of which my hon. friend is chairman, but I think it would go to that commission with very much more force if the Bill received its second reading first. It would show that this House sanctions the principles involved in the Bill. If my hon. friend will allow the Bill to go the second reading, I am prepared to say that I shall not press it until the Conservation Commission has had an opportunity of inquiring and making a report, so we would have the benefit of the investigation by that commission before dealing with the matter again. If we cannot get a report of the commission this session, I am prepared not to press my Bill before next session. But I do think, if I have impressed my views upon the House in the way which I hope I have, it would be far better that the House should sanction the principle involved in the Bill by allowing it to go to a second reading.

Hon. Mr. DE VEBER—The only object I have in view is to prevent any cause of friction. The provinces have been exercising this right since the year 1882, and it is but human nature to suppose that they will hesitate to diminish that power. If I have what I consider a right that I have been exercising, even without proper authority, and any one should come to me with a club and say: 'You must give it up,' human nature would prompt me to say that I would not, and I would make a fight over it; but if the same person came to me graciously, showed me that it would be mutually advantageous to us that I should give up the right, I would be glad to yield. I should like to have a few words from the right hon. leader of the House in regard to the question before moving any further, but I will move this motion.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Is my hon. friend not willing to adopt my suggestion to let the Bill go to the second reading?

Hon. Mr. DE VEBER—I should like to have the opinion of the right hon. leader of the House as to the effect of it.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—It seems to me that if I undertake not to proceed with the Bill until we have had this report from the Conservation Commission, what more could be asked of me?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I do not know if the Senate could accept the idea contained in the notice of amendment of my hon. friend from Mille Isles; but I would throw out the suggestion that if this Bill were read a second time, it should be referred to one of our standing committees, the Committee on Health, which could then confer with the Conservation Commission.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I approve of that. Hon. gentlemen will see the propriety and importance of what I am asking, that the principle of the Bill should be sanctioned by the House. If I am right in assuming that a majority of the members of this House are prepared to approve of the principle of the Bill, all I ask is that it be so recorded.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—Will the hon. gentleman say what he means by the principle of the Bill? Is it that this parliament has right to legislate in matters relating to public health, or is the principle of the Bill confined to the purification of the water in rivers and streams?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—The principle involved in the Bill can only apply to the subject of the Bill, and that is the dumping of sewage into navigable waters.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—We all agree on that. I was questioning the right of the federal parliament to control the public health in respect to taking charge of all rivers and lakes. That is an important question.

Hon. Mr. DE VEBER—As far as I am concerned, I am perfectly satisfied that the Bill should go to the second reading, provided it is referred to the Committee on Public Health and Inspection of Foods, and that the hon. gentleman agrees to their report, that is, if they say so it shall go in with our report to the Conservation Commission. If he is agreeable to that, I am perfectly willing, so far as I am concerned, that the Bill should have the second reading, because I am thoroughly in accord with his views.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I am quite willing. I know the Bill would be perfectly safe in the hands of the hon. gentleman's committee. I am prepared in advance to accept the report of that committee, because I know the subject will be dealt with in a proper way. I am anxious to have the principle of the Bill sanctioned by this House, and it may be referred to the committee, and dealt with by them or by the Commission on Conservation, in the proper way.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is not my intention to discuss the constitutional question or the right of parliament to deal with questions of this kind. The hon. gentleman from Ottawa is entitled to the thanks of the Senate for the elaborate and exhaustive manner in which he has treated the subject. Every one who heard him must have listened to him with a great deal of pleasure; but I must express the opinion that it is a mistake to place on the statute-books laws which never can be carried out. Any one who reads the Bill must come to the conclusion that it will prove inoperative, and to a very great extent useless. One could understand if the proposition were made to prevent the throwing of any deleterious article which would interfere with the health of the people, into a navigable stream, there might be some reason for the proposition he is making; but when you look at the provision of this clause, it has a very wide range. It provides:

> No person shall throw or deposit, or cause or permit to be thrown or deposited, any sewage, offal, or refuse animal or vegetable matter of any kind whatsoever into any river, stream or other water, any part of which is navigable, or which flow into any navigable water.

Let me give a practical illustration of how this Bill would work should it become law. The city in which I live is on the river Moira. The river runs through the centre of the city, and discharges into the Bay of Quinte. But that river extends some hundreds of miles north of us, and along its course there are twenty or more villages of various sizes emptying their sewage into the main stream. Then there are creeks and branches, on which there are villages, which empty their sewage into the stream, and all that sewage is carried down the Moira into the Bay of Quinte, which is navigable water. This Bill provides that if a dead horse is thrown into the river a hundred miles north of its outlet, or sewage from any of the towns or villages up stream is deposited in the waters running into the Bay of Quinte, then the operation of this law could be invoked, because the River Moira empties into the Bay of Quinte. That is only one illustration. About nine miles east of the Moira is the Salmon river, running through the northern part of the counties of Lennox and Addington into the Bay of Quinte. There are a number of villages along the course of that river. Then west of Belleville is the Trent river, portions of which are navigable, and other portions of which are not navigable, all the way through to Georgian bay; yet, because the waters of that region flow into navigable bodies of water, the depositing of refuge or sewage in the stream at any point, from any of these villages along the route would render the people liable to the penalties which are to be imposed under this Bill should it become law.

I do not wish it to be understood for a moment that I would oppose any practical mode by which the health of the country could be preserved, and I think I could repeat that it is not only folly, but improper if you like, that any law should be placed on the statute-book which is of the impractable nature which this one would become if it were passed. I venture the assertion that it would never be carried out, and I question very much if you could find an army of officials sufficiently large to make it operative. It is utterly impracticable to my mind, and if my hon. friend reflects for a moment I think he will come to the conclusion that if the law is to become operative at all, it must be changed to a very great degree. It is to be referred to the committee who, I have no doubt, will deal with it as the hon. gentleman suggested in moving the second reading; but knowing as I do what the effect of this Bill must be, I do not want to allow it to pass the second reading without giving my reasons why such legislation would be impracticable. Of course no impracticable legislation should be placed upon the statute-book. Let the Committee on Public Health deal with this as they think proper; but it seems to me some change should be made in the Bill to make it useful for any purpose. Then there are very strong arguments against the position taken by my hon. friend from Ottawa, with which I am not going to occupy the time of the House at the present moment. There are scientific treatises written on the subject, in which scientific men point out very clearly that once sewage is emptied into a running stream, after it has travelled a certain distance it purifies itself. I am not going to detain the House by calling attention to authorities on that subject. I have no doubt that my hon. friend, who is chairman of the committee to which this Bill will be referred, is well acquainted with the subject to which I am calling attention. We should be very cautious how we pass a law which is going to have such a radical effect if we adopt it. I merely point this out in as brief a manner as possible, in order that those who do not live in localities where streams pass through may know how a clause of this kind would operate if it were placed on the statute-book.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—While I do not propose to discuss the matter on its merits, I desire to say that I am much in sympathy with the hon. gentleman from Ottawa in the presentation of his case. I think the Senate and the country are indebted to my hon. friend for directing public attention not only to the abuse which has existed, but to the possible methods which have been suggested for remedying the abuse. There are occasions when a legislator is justified in seeking to place on the statute-book what some might term an impracticable Act of parliament. There are times when public attention can only be directed to great abuses through pursuing a course of this character. Not only my hon. friend from Ottawa who has introduced this Bill, but the medical gentlemen throughout the whole of Canada, and the press I might say, have been discussing this question of pure water for years and years, yet no practicable solution has been adopted. It is conceded on all sides, by every intelligent man, that something should be done to remedy this great wrong, and yet we seem to be helpless. Every municipality in Canada assumes more or less authority on questions of public health, and yet they are helpless in carrying out anything like an adequate measure to protect the community within their boundaries. They have referred the matter in turn to the province. They say the province has a wider jurisdiction. The province comes to deal with it and they find they are handicapped on account of interprovincial streams or interprovincial questions—questions larger than those affecting the province, and they in turn hand the question over to the Dominion government, and the Dominion government and Dominion legislators look very wisely into the British North America Act, and they shake their heads with very great gravity and discuss the constitutional question as to whether the federal authority has power to deal with this great question; sometimes it has and again that it has not. Then, very possibly, and very probably, the courts will hold that the federal authority has no jurisdiction in the matter, and so our race continues dying on account of the conflict of authority in endeavouring to settle on whom responsibility lies. What are we going to do? Are we going to sit idly by and watch the death rate mounting up day after day, on account of our helplessness, not having solved the constitutional question? I say no. I say that my hon. friend from Ottawa has pursued the proper course. He has directed public attention to the serious questions involved. He has directed the attention of government and parliament to the fact that some legislation must be placed upon the statute-book for the purpose of remedying this great abuse. Although this Bill may not solve the difficulty, yet I venture to say it has set public opinion in motion, and legislators in motion, so that something will grow out of it. It goes without saying that all our public streams, provincial and interprovincial are becoming practicallly the great sewers of the Dominion. We have reached that stage when municipalities, for the purpose of saving themselves from contracting obligation of debt, find it cheaper to empty their sewage into the streams which run by their doors, than to adopt some scientific method which possibly will cost more, for the purpose of cremating or otherwise destroying the sewage of that community. Is this going to be perpetuated? As our population from year to year becomes more congested, the abuse grows, and rather than sit down and solve the difficulty we simply say it is impracticable. We seem to have concluded that nature has placed those streams by our doors to carry off our sewage, and notwithstanding the fact that the community requires pure water, yet we will reject the best methods of purification and take the consequences. It seems to me we have reached that stage. There must be some central authority to grapple with the question and the Dominion government is that central authority. None other than the Dominion government can set in motion the proper movement for the effective carrying out of the general measure whereby this abuse can be remedied, and whereby the streams of this Dominion can be purified, or be kept in a purified state, so far as possible. I think that this is the object which my hon. friend from Ottawa has had in directing the attention of the Chamber to this matter, impracticable though it may be, upon the statute-book. Therefore, I say, a very grave responsibility rests on the Dominion government to take the necessary steps towards carrying out at the earliest possible day, either by a conference of the health authorities of the Dominion or otherwise, some advanced legislation towards the adoption of a general scheme of scientific treatment regarding the disposal of sewage of the various municipalities throughout the Dominion, which is now being emptied into the streams of the Dominion, and from which the people of the Dominion are drinking and poisoning themselves day after day. So far as the question of sending this matter to a hygienic or food committee, or some other committee, and then calling in the health officers, before that committee, and then referring it to the Commission on the Conservation of the natural resources of Canada, I think is only trifling with the question.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I know of nothing that receives less attention and which we approach with greater indifference than the question of public health. We are legislating day after day as to quarantine, as to keeping the beasts of the field, and the animals of burden in proper physical condition, by requiring a clean bill of health as to all animals coming across the boundary. We are legislating day after day as to the condition of our fields as to keeping the seed which we sow broadcast pure and free from dirt; in fact almost every phase of human activity receives our attention here except that particular branch which relates to the enlistment of our energy in protecting public life. It is time this great question should receive the very best attention at the hands of the government, and that the government should appoint a commission of experts to consider this question with the view of determining whether some general and scientific scheme can be adopted and enforced throughout the Dominion for the disposal of the sewage and the protection of our streams.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Does the hon. leader of the opposition think the control of such legislation is purely in the hands of the Dominion? I understand the constitution to provide that civil rights pertain to the provinces, and this is one of the Acts that is entirely a question of civil rights. Does the hon. gentleman say it would not encroach upon the provincial rights?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I say that so far as it is not local it is vested in the Dominion unquestionably.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I move that the debate be adjourned until Tuesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until three o'clock to-morrow.

ENTRY OF MINUTES OF PROCEEDINGS.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the orders of the day are called, I should like to draw the attention of the House to what took place yesterday, and to inquire if the proper entry has been made in the 'Minutes.' At page 493 of our 'Minutes' I find the following:

> The Honourable Mr. Cloran presented to the Senate a Bill (SS) intituled: 'An Act to incorporate the Federation of Chambers of Commerce of the Province of Quebec.'
> The said Bill was read a first time.

On motion of the Honourable Mr. Landry, seconded by the Honourable Mr. Montplaisir, it was Ordered, that the said Bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Standing Orders under and in accordance with Rule 115.

I do not know whether that concurrence should take the form of a motion, or if, two senators having declared that they desired that the Bill be referred to that committee under rule 115, ipso facto it is referred. That is the sole question. If a motion is made it must be in the option of this House to carry it or reject it. I contend that by rule 115 no such motion should be submitted to the House; that as a matter of right, two senators having asked that the Bill be referred to the committee, it should go by virtue of the rule, without a motion being made.

The SPEAKER—That was stated here yesterday, and I am instructed that it is the entry upon the record, and that this memo was erroneously entered by the clerk of routine.

CORRECTION OF 'MINUTES.'

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Before the orders of the day are called, I desire to call the attention of hon. members and the officers of the House to an error which appears to be made in the order paper which I have before me, as to the place which is to be occupied by order 17, which is fixed for Tuesday next. I had moved—and it is so recorded—that this should be made the first order after third readings. Instead of that I see it is put down at the end of the orders for Tuesday. This should be corrected. The order of the House was explicit, that it should be made the first order after third readings for Tuesday.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The right hon. gentleman is perfectly correct in what he says. I observed this error, and I pointed it out to the clerk in charge of the 'Minutes.' He said that he had already detected it, and that it would be corrected in the 'Minutes' of to-day, so that no harm would be done.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We cannot do that. Once a notice of motion is given, and it appears in our order paper, for a certain day, it cannot be transferred afterwards, whether it be an error or not.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. When this House has distinctly declared that an order shall appear in a certain place on a certain day, the order must be carried out.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I would point out that Bourinot—

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I do not care what Bourinot, or May, or anybody else says—

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman has not a right to decide that question simply because he is leader of the House.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I have a right to inform the hon. gentleman that an order of this House must be complied with.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That question has already come before this House, and has been decided according to my contention—that is, if an error has been made in fixing an order of the day you cannot correct the order of the day, and why? Because some members might desire to speak on the question, and, looking at the orders of the day and finding that the matter was not set down for that day, they might leave the Chamber.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—It is not fixed for to-day. It is set down for Tuesday next.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is all right; I thought it was for to-day.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 97) An Act respecting the Pacific and Atlantic Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Ross (Middlesex).

Bill (No. 113) An Act respecting the Manitoulin and North Shore Railway Company—Hon. Mr. Ross (Middlesex).

MONTREAL CENTRAL TERMINAL COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS moved the second reading of Bill (No. 44) An Act respecting the Montreal Central Terminal Company.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Has the hon. gentleman, who is in charge of the Bill, an explanation to offer?

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—I have no information whatever, except what is contained in the Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS, in the absence of Hon. Mr. Casgrain, moved the second reading of Bill (QQ) An Act to incorporate Insurance Company of Canada.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I direct the attention of the House to the fact that the title of this Bill could scarcely be approved by parliament? Whether the promoter of the Bill desires to deceive the people of Canada by posing as the only insurance company in the Dominion, or whether it is unwittingly done, the title should not be tolerated in its present form. No application containing such a title should be allowed to come into the House.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The hon. gentleman in charge of it agreed to change the name.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

SECOND READING.

Bill (RR) An Act respecting the Dominion Bank.—Hon. Sir Richard Scott.

INDEPENDENCE OF CANADA.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY rose to call the attention of this House and of the government to the following facts:

On the 25th of February last, at the Chateau Frontenac, in the city of Quebec, in the province of Quebec, the Honourable Judge Longley addressed the members of the Canadian Club of that city upon the independence of Canada. The keynote of his speech was independence, said the Quebec 'Morning Chronicle' of the next day, which reports in extenso the address in question. Here are his words:

The question was this: Were such men as he saw before him going to be content to occupy a secondary position? He did not advocate an immediate severance of their relations with the empire. But later on they must secure some national status and develop a pride in Canadianism. In time this question of nationhood must overwhelm all else. They could not endure to be always called colonists. When their population should have mounted to 50,000,000, would England still send them a Governor General and would they always be dependent on a smaller community? When Canada was stronger she must assume her place properly and potentially amongst the nations. If they must have union with England, let it be a union of equality. He hoped and expected that, even though he might not live to see it himself, his children might live to see the day when Canada would be recognized as a nation.

He said: If we take the words of the Premier of Canada, we were already a nation; but it appears that in the eyes of Mr. Longley, we are not yet a nation. I bring this question to the attention of the House to show that there is a flank movement, or a turning movement commenced to-day in Quebec, on the question of imperialism. I do not know whether it is done purposely or innocently; at all events it exists, and we have heard lately in another place two speeches made in accordance with that new policy. I do not want people in this Dominion to understand that the province of Quebec is looking for independence. I think we are quite satisfied with our lot as it is to-day.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I thought Judge Longley was from Nova Scotia?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—He is from Nova Scotia. I am asking, 'Is Mr. Longley, who has promulgated the aforesaid opinion in Quebec, a judge of the Supreme Court in Nova Scotia? I thought he was, but I am sure he is; but I want the information from the government. We are perfectly contented with our lot in Quebec. We cannot have anything better than we now have, and I hope that what we have we shall keep. I do not see why a judge of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia should canvas the population of Quebec on the question of independence, and I know not whether he has found an echo in other places from members of that province while speaking on that burning question. Having called attention to these facts I beg to inquire:

Is the Mr. Longley, who has promulgated the aforesaid opinion in Quebec, a judge of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia?

Did he obtain a leave of absence and the permission of the government to make such a propaganda in favour of the rupture of the colonial tie?

When did the government give him such permission and leave of absence?

For how long a time?

If the government repudiates all complicity on its part in the doings and deeds of the honourable judge, is it its intention to ask the learned judge to put a stopper to his zeal, by refraining in the future from treating coram populo on these burning questions, as the ermine which he wears may give to his words a borrowed prestige and lead many to a serious error?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I beg to inform the hon. member that Mr. Longley is a judge of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia; also that he did not obtain a leave of absence from the government, nor had he the permission of the government for such a propaganda in favour of the rupture of the colonial tie; that the government gave him no such permission or leave of absence for any time. Touching the question of the complicity of the government, I beg to say that they are in no respect to be regarded as in any way responsible for the after-dinner utterances of Judge Longley, or any other hon. gentleman who may chose to prophesy what may happen when Canada attains a population of 50,000,000, a figure which, with all my zeal, and all my hope for the future of Canada, I think is somewhat in the distant future. Touching the request that we should put a stopper on the hon. Judge Longley, I am not prepared to say; that would require consideration, and I am not aware of any method by which the government could put a stopper on the hon. gentleman, with any regard to his physical health.

HYGIENIC CONDITION OF THE SENATE CHAMBER, ROOMS AND CORRIDORS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN moved:

That a Select Committee be appointed, to be composed of the following senators, viz.:—His Honour the Speaker, the Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell, the Hon. Messieurs Power, Dandurand, Lougheed, Ross (Middlesex), McMillan, Robertson, Wilson, De Veber and the mover, to examine and report upon the hygienic conditions of the rooms and corridors and chambers of the Senate, bringing to their assistance any hygienic expert they may think prudent to confer with, and that the question of the method of heating receive their consideration, as to whether it could be improved by substituting a more modern system than the antiquated and out-of-date one now in use in the building.

He said: In bringing this motion before the House, I do so out of a feeling of justice to myself and my colleagues. I have noticed ever since the session opened, that the air in this Chamber, and in the rooms and corridors of the Senate has been to me, as I think it has been to a good many senators, offensive. It is quite clear that the method of ventilating this Chamber is not one that conduces to health. It is brought in through ducts from the bluff in underground conduits, and when it enters the lower part of the building it is passed over hot iron tubes. This process extracts from it almost all the moisture, and the warm dry air is rushed up into the chambers, corridors and rooms, and that is what we are breathing every day. I have more sympathy for senators who have to remain here continuously than I have for those who go to their homes at week ends. Members from Montreal and Toronto leave Friday evening, and remain away until the following Tuesday morning, and thus get a breathing spell; but members who come from more distant parts of the Dominion are unable to get to their homes. They have to remain here, breathing the unwholsome air of this House. We did not feel it in the same way when parliament used to meet in March and April each year, because then we had only four or five weeks during which we were closely housed; but since the change of the fiscal year we now meet in November, and are housed all winter, virtually cooped up, and breathing an atmosphere that is unquestionably injurious. An effort should be made to substitute something better than the antiquated system we have had here for over forty years. I have heard it said that very extensive and considerable improvements will have to be made upon the present system or a more modern system will have to be substituted. The committee named in this resolution should take up the whole question, and suggest some better system to the Minister of Public Works. Why should we be asked to put up with air that is brought in by means of underground ducts, and then heated and rushed up into the Chamber. Why not take in pure air, have it heated without extracting the moisture, and substitute it for the husky, dry air we now inhale? It has been a matter of surprise that the House has so long tolerated the condition of things that now exists. This question should have been taken up long ago, because pure air is one of the most important elements of existence. I venture to say that there is not a member of this Senate who would live in his own home under the unpleasant and unhealthy conditions that exist in this Chamber.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not altogether differ from the hon. gentleman from Wellington in the desire he has expressed that better care should be taken of the health of the hon. members of this House. I do not think, however, that the condition of things is so exceedingly bad as the hon. gentleman represents it. I have on my right hand (Hon. Mr. Scott) an hon. gentleman who has been in the Senate since 1873, and who has been very attentive during the sittings of the Senate, and, considering his age, he appears to have resisted all these malign influences with wonderful success. I see just opposite me the hon. gentleman from Hastings (Hon. Sir M. Bowell) who has been a member of this House for a great many years, has been most assiduous and regular in his attendance, and his health does not seem to have suffered. In fact, I think there is an impression throughout the country that being appointed to the Senate is something like having a very heavy life insurance, and that the average duration of life amongst senators is probably greater than that amongst any other class of His Majesty's subjects in Canada. Further, while it may be possible that the system of heating and ventilation which we have in the Senate building is not absolutely perfect, I do not think it deserves the strong language which has been applied to it by the hon. gentleman. There is a fairly good supply of fresh air, as a rule; but apart from that, we have a standing committee to whom I think this matter, if it is to be referred to any committee, had perhaps better go: that is the Standing Committee on Public Health and Inspection of Food. That committee is composed of the Hon. Messrs. Comeau, David, De Veber, Douglas, Fiset, McMillan, Robertson, Roy and Wilson. I think there are six or seven medical gentlemen on the committee, and I would suggest to my hon. friend that, perhaps, on the whole, if he wishes to have the subject referred to a committee, he should let it go to that Standing Committee. They have already fulfilled the duties which they owe to the public at large, and I have no doubt they would be very glad now to pay a little attention to the more circumscribed sphere of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—As I read the motion authorizing the committee to engage any hygienic expert, I assume that that will possibly require, or give power to the committee to expend any money they might think proper for the purpose of obtaining that class of witnesses. I would suggest, and I think it would be only reasonable, that we could find information that would be advisable to get in the Public Works Department. They must have associated with them in that department an expert whose advice we could secure, without incurring any large expenditure. I have not felt, as the hon. mover of the resolution has stated, that we have suffered in consequence of the condition of the atmosphere in this Chamber. I have had more difficulty in the room that I occupy in stuffing the windows with cotton wool, to keep the fresh air out rather than to bring it in. We have had too much of it. In respect to the corridors, I do not know whether the ventilation is as it should be, but I have not seen any very great evidence that the air we breathe here has affected the health of any hon. gentleman present. I am not against the resolution. I know that our system of heating and ventilation is not modern, but I do not think the Senate has suffered to the extent the hon. gentleman has stated.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I might be allowed to say a word or two in reply to my hon. friend from Halifax. He has drawn attention to the fact that the hon. senator from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Scott) is a very old member of this House, and has been here since 1873, and is now over 80. He is one of those gentlemen to whom I referred when I said a member could leave the Senate and live in his own home, or go to Montreal or Toronto at week-ends to recuperate. The Hon. Mr. Scott does not spend many hours in this House—he has not been doing so lately. He has his own comfortable, cosy home, no doubt in a healthy location right in the city. That is where he recuperates. But we have not our homes here. The Hon. Mr. Bowell goes to his home on Friday afternoon, and does not return until Tuesday. He is another who has the advantage of recuperating away from the House. But I refer to those from the east and far west who cannot go to their homes conveniently, and who have to remain here continuously. I do say that senators under such conditions have suffered, and I can name those in this Chamber who were healthy, vigorous looking men when the Senate opened, who have not by any means that fresh appearance to-day which they had when the House opened for business this session. Then with regard to the experts to which my hon. friend refers, I fully expected that it would be from the Department of Public Works we should get some hygienic expert to come before us and give us information with regard to the present method of heating, and suggest what improvement could be made upon it, or whether it would be better to substitute a new system altogether.

The motion was declared lost.

CANADIAN COAT OF ARMS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

1. What is the coat of arms of the Canadian confederation?
2. At what time and by whom was it granted to Canada?
3. Has it undergone successive alterations as new provinces joined the confederation?
4. What is the date of the latest official alteration made in the coat of arms of the confederation, and by whom was it authorized?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The Coat of Arms of the Dominion of Canada bears quartered the arms of the provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, which are described as follows:

For the province of Ontario: Vert a sprig of three leaves of maple slipped or, on a chief argent the cross of St. George.

For the province of Quebec: Or on a fess gules between two fleur de lis in chief azure and a sprig of three leaves of maple slipped vert in base, a lion passant guardant or.

For the province of Nova Scotia: Or on a fess wavy azure between three thistles proper, a salmon naiant argent.

For the province of New Brunswick: Or on waves a lymphad, or ancient gallery, with oars in action, proper on a chief gules a lion passant guardant.

The Coat of Arms of the Dominion of Canada was granted by Royal Warrant, dated 26th May, 1868.

The Coat of Arms of the Dominion has undergone no alteration as new provinces were added to the Dominion.

There has been no change in the Coat of Arms since the same was granted.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—The government ought to have removed from the entrance floor in the rotunda of this building the coats of arms of the provinces of Canada. It is too bad that we have to walk over them. It is improper from my point of view.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I shall call the attention of the government to the objection taken by my hon. friend.

THE FLAG OF CANADA.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

1. Has Canada a national flag, and what is it?
2. If it has none, what is it authorized to fly on its buildings and ships; under what authority has the English flag been transformed into a Canadian flag by the addition of the coat of arms of the confederation?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The Union Jack, being the national flag, may be flown by British subjects, private or official, on land.

By an order in council, dated 28th February, 1870, the design of a flag for the Governor General of Canada was approved of, showing the Arms of the Dominion emblazoned on a white or grey shield, surrounded by a garland of maple leaves and surmounted by a crown in the centre of the Union Jack.

By the same order in council, flags for the lieutenant governors of Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia were approved of, showing the Arms of the respective provinces emblazoned on a round shield in the centre, surrounded with a garland of maple leaves, but not surmounted by the crown, in the centre of the Union Jack.

By the same order in council, a flag for vessels belonging to the Dominion of Canada, was approved of, namely, a blue ensign, with the Arms of Canada on the fly.

The above mentioned order in council was approved of by the despatch from the Colonial Office, dated 30th April, 1870.

By subsequent orders in council duly approved of by the Colonial Office, flags for the lieutenant governors of the various provinces, with the exception of Alberta and Saskatchewan, were also approved of.

A Warrant of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty was issued on the 2nd of February, 1892, permitting the Arms of Canada to be inserted in the fly of the red ensign, to be used on vessels registered in Canada.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I suppose that the Arms of Canada apply only to the four provinces?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I think it is just the four provinces.

THE IMMIGRATION AGENT AT QUEBEC.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

How much did Dr. J. P. Lavoie, immigration agent at Quebec, charge the government for the use of his vehicle, for each month during the year 1909, from the 1st of April to the 1st December, 1909?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Nothing.

THE QUEBEC DRILL HALL.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE Inquired:

1. Has the Military Riding School at Quebec been used, for some fifteen years, for public meetings, political or otherwise, concerts, &c.? If so, on whose demand has it been so granted, and who made use of it?
2. Was the said Military Riding School, in the course of February last, asked for a public meeting in connection with the municipal elections? If so, by whom, and was the request for it refused? If so, why?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The Quebec drill hall has been used as follows during the past fifteen years:

October, 1899	Mayor of Quebec	Promenade Concert.

That I suppose is the information the hon. gentleman requires.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Not exactly. I know of my own knowledge that some other parties have had the drill hall for meetings.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Yes, on February 15th, by the Hon. Mr. P. Auguste Choquette, senator. The request was refused by the district officer commanding military district No. 7, who was given full power to use his own discretion in the matter, the department, however, at the same time, informing him that there was no objection to his granting the request, provided both candidates for the mayoralty of Quebec joined in requesting the privilege. Both candidates did not so join and the request was not granted.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—It was first granted, and then cancelled.

IMPORTED HARNESS HARDWARE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN inquired:

1. What is the amount of harness hardware imported into Canada the last three fiscal years, giving each year by itself?
2. The country from which imported, and the respective amounts of duty?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Harness-hardware is not separately enumerated in the classification of imports, but it is included in the general heading of 'Hardware, viz:—Builders', cabinet-makers', saddlers' and carriage hardware, including curry combs, n.o.p.', from which it is impracticable to separate the harness-makers' hardware from other articles in the heading.

The value, entered for consumption, of this classification item during the past three fiscal years, together with the duty collected thereon, has been as follows:

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (No. 127) an Act respecting the Grand Trunk Pacific Branch Lines Company.—Hon. Mr. Gibson.

Bill (No. 121) an Act to incorporate the Saskatchewan Central Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Young.

THE FRENCH TRANSLATION STAFF.

The Speaker submitted to the House a memorandum from the Clerk of the Senate, recommending the appointment of an additional French translator, also a certificate from the Civil Service Commission that Mr. Montigny, who had applied for the position, had been examined and proved to possess the necessary qualifications, and also a recommendation that Mr. Montigny be appointed.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved that the recommendation of the Speaker be referred to the Committee on Contingent Accounts and Internal Economy.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What has the Committee on Internal Economy to do on these points? If I understand the provisions of the Civil Service Act, it leaves it entirely to the recommendation of the Clerk and the Speaker. I am at a loss to know how the Committee on Internal Economy could change the recommendation that has been made. I am not discussing the merits of the appointment. I am merely asking for information.

Hon. Mr. SPEAKER—The appointment is an appointment made by the Senate on a recommendation of the Speaker based upon the report of the Clerk.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is for that reason I asked why it should be referred to a committee which, under the law, has nothing to do with it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This is not the first of those recommendations which have been dealt with by the Senate. The Senate, as the hon. gentleman very properly says, takes the place of the Governor in Council, and, as a rule, he refers any question which involves detail to a sub-committee of the council.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not at all.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have not the same experience in that matter as the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is done occasionally, but it is not the practice.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Last session the Senate decided upon this mode of dealing with the question. Senators, as a rule, do not know very much about the gentlemen whose names are submitted to them, and they naturally, in order to find out whether the candidate is a person whom they consider suitable for the appointment, refer the matter to their own Standing Committee, and the committee reports, and the Senate acts finally upon that report. As far as I am individually concerned, it does not seem to me at first blush that there could be any serious objection to the appointment of Mr. Montigny, as the examiners report favourably. Still, suppose the other case. Suppose it to be the case of a gentleman who is not qualified, then the committee may find that out and so report to the House, and then the House will deal with the appointment intelligently.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That would be a reflection upon the Clerk and also upon the Speaker who made the recommendation.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—The only reason why a recommendation of that character might be referred to the Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts is in respect to salary. On referring to Bourinot, I understand that financial questions of this nature have always been referred to the Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts. That is for the matter of salary and services, whether it is appointment to a position where the salary has been fixed, or whether the financial end of it is to be left to the Clerk, and the recommendation of the Clerk, without having been considered by the Senate, is sent to the committee for their recommendation. In other respects, there is no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 110) An Act respecting the Algoma Central Railway Company, as amended.—Hon. Mr. Ross (Middlesex).

Bill (EE) An Act respecting the Grand Trunk Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Gibson.

Bill (No. 67) An Act respecting the Improved Paper Machinery Company.—Hon. Mr. Kirchhoffer.

INTERCOLONIAL BRANCH LINES RAILWAY BILL.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The order of the day having been called:

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the motion for the second reading (Bill 17) An Act to authorize the government of Canada to acquire, by lease, lines of railway connecting with the government railways.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—When I moved the adjournment of this debate the other day, it was not because I had any intention of addressing the House on this important subject. I did it in the interest of the hon. gentleman from Middlesex (Mr. Ross), because I understood he desired to address the House on the subject, and I felt like giving him an opportunity of doing so. I think the House would be pleased to listen to an address by such an able gentleman on so important a question. That request has not been renewed in any way since, though the order has been on the paper several days, and as I have no desire to at all delay the Bill, I do not intend to speak on the subject at length. I think the influence that prevailed in the minds of the people at the time of the construction of the Intercolonial railway was not so much one of revenue as it was of better cementing the union of the provinces, and the greater development of the country. I think the opinion which prevailed at that time has been fully realized. The Intercolonial has not been a revenue producer. I do not think any one will say it has; but it cannot be gainsaid that it has been a great boon to the country in the way of national development. It was a compact entered into largely between the eastern and western provinces, and the construction of the road is too large a question to be dealt with from any provincial or sectional standpoint. Whilst no doubt the railway has been of great advantage to the east, it has also been of great advantage to the western provinces in the way of providing a market in the maritime provinces for the products of the western manufactories. I do not think it can be said that the question has not been fully and thoroughly discussed. A good many able speeches have been made upon it by men who are much more conversant with the subject than I am. The Bill as it stands before us enabling the government to take over the connecting lines, seems to be fairly well safeguarded. The Board of Control must recommend it, and the chief engineer recommends it, and when the minister asks parliament to ratify such a transaction, I think it is pretty well safeguarded, and it could be very well left in the hands of parliament to say how far they will give the minister the right of taking over these branch lines. It cannot be done by the Board of Control, nor by the engineer, nor by the minister. Parliament has to sanction what they do in that direction. Therefore, I intend to support the Bill.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—Just a few words before the vote is taken upon the Bill. The branch line or side line may be quite a large feeder of the Intercolonial or some other road, even though it does not pay itself. Take the Prince Edward Island road as a specimen. It is a very large feeder, yet there is always a deficit on the Prince Edward Island section. The reason of it is, that the freight taken on that road and carried to the Intercolonial railway is carried in three different sections. On the Prince Edward Island road there is only a very short haul, while on the Intercolonial railroad there is a long haul, and on that account it pays very well, or helps to make the Intercolonial railway pay, while our Island section of the road does not pay, because of the short haul. I notice in this House, and have noticed it for quite a long while, a disposition among the members from Ontario and the west to treat the Intercolonial railway as being entirely a maritime province road, and that the deficits arising from its operation are due and chargeable to the maritime provinces. The deficits on the Intercolonial railway for so many years were due largely, not to the maritime provinces, but to the upper provinces. For instance, the freight from Ontario, farm implements, flour, which is a very heavy freight, and other things, were carried at a reduced rate over the Intercolonial railway to the maritime provinces, and again, coal, which was shipped to Ontario or to the west, was carried at a reduced rate also; so that properly speaking, the deficits on the Intercolonial railway were largely due to those two important circumstances, and not to the maritime provinces at all. The part of the Intercolonial that does not pay is the section west of Moncton. The part of the Intercolonial railway which is east of Moncton pays as well as any western road in the Dominion of Canada, and if the part which is to the westward is the cause of the deficit, that is largely due to the western and not to the maritime provinces.

Hon. Mr. McGREGOR—In asking the indulgence of the House for a few minutes, my object is not to speak on the merits of the Bill, which is only permissive but rather by putting before the House some facts respecting the operations of the Intercolonial railroad, that I will in some measure, be able to remove the misapprehension not only held by a few honourable members of the House, but by many of the people of the upper provinces, who look upon the Intercolonial railway as wholly maritime, forgetting and ignoring the fact that Ontario and the other provinces are equally interested with the people of the maritime provinces, because they are equally benefited, as I think I will be able to prove it by data I have of the operations of the Intercolonial railroad during the past year.

I was somewhat surprised in listening to the hon. members from the maritime provinces who took a part in the debate to find a rather pessimistic tone in regard to the branches.

After hearing the addresses of the hon. members from Belleville and North Wellington, I feel justified in saying that they are somewhat prejudiced and that they have allowed these strong feelings, to better their otherwise good judgment, regarding the Bill under discussion; otherwise they would not so strongly and decidedly oppose the taking over and operating branch lines. For instance, the hon. gentleman from Hastings in his remarks said:

> My impression is that if the title of this Bill, and the preamble were changed a little, it would meet the views that I have upon the subject, and the results which I believe will follow from the acquisition of those branch lines. I notice the preamble says that the lines to be acquired by the government of Canada are 'lines of railway connecting with the government railways as feeders thereto and in connection therewith.' If that were changed to read as 'feeders on the revenue of the country at the expense of the people', I think it would be a more accurate statement than to say that they are to be feeders of the Intercolonial railway. . . . There is not a senator from the maritime provinces who has paid attention to the operation of that road that does not know it has been managed for political purposes. On the verge of an election contest in that part of the country hundreds of voters have been put on the pay-lists, and after the elections have been discharged.

In the time to which the hon. member referred, things were very bad; passes were given by the hundreds, contracts were not given to the lowest tenderers, but were allotted to friends of the party in power. These were the conditions in 1896 when the present government came into power, and, I am sorry to have to admit, were continued for a time after. While I do not approve of the running of the road by commission, as it is now run, I have reason to believe that changes for the better have been made. Passes, although not abolished, have been reduced to a minimum and contracts are allotted to the lowest tenderer, and the days of graft on contracts are a thing of the past.

The hon. member for North Wellington appears to have his eye on the Intercolonial railway, and it is almost like waving a red flag before a bull to make any mention of it in his presence. Speaking of the road from Oxford to New Glasgow he said in this debate:

> Then take that new branch that was built from Oxford to New Glasgow. Sir Charles Tupper introduced the Bill for the construction of that branch with an amount of eloquence and forcible argument, such as he was capable of using, and persuaded the House, and his followers especially, that it would virtually vitalize the whole system. He pointed out that the grades from New Glasgow to Stellarton were so steep that an engine could only draw ten or eleven cars on that particular section, and that by the construction of the Oxford and New Glasgow branch the line would be shortened by twenty miles, while the grades would be the minimum grades on any road. It would open up a very large coal trade between Quebec, Montreal and New Glasgow, and would virtually put the Intercolonial railway upon its feet. What was the result? When that branch was built, in place of being twenty miles it was only four and a half miles shorter, and instead of the grades being lower than they were between New Glasgow and Stellarton, they were actually as steep, if not steeper, grades, as proven by the engineers on the investigation that was held with regard to the line.

Sir Charles Tupper, when introducing the Bill for the building the Oxford branch to New Glasgow, illustrated it by taking the three corners of the room. Taking Oxford for one, Truro for one, and New Glasgow for the third, he claimed that by the building of this branch twenty miles would be saved and had the road been built as the crow flies, that distance might have been saved. But after the road was surveyed it was decided to divert it to accommodate the town of Westville, an important mining town which has now a population of 7,000 to 8,000, and the road terminated at Stellarton instead of New Glasgow as at first intended. Even with the diversion there is a saving of six miles. But while there was only a distance of about six miles shortened to New Glasgow there is a saving of twenty-eight miles to Pictou.

The distance, Oxford to Pictou via Truro, and New Glasgow is 97 miles, while the distance, Oxford to Pictou is only 69 miles.

This saving of 28 miles does not only serve the town of Pictou, but the people of Prince Edward Island have that advantage also and every ton of through-freight from and to Prince Edward Island during winter months is hauled over this branch.

Not only did it effect that saving, but it opened up one of the best country districts in Nova Scotia, and supplied railway communication to Oxford, Pugwash, Wallace and Tatamagouche in Colchester, and River St. John, Lion's Brook and Pictou, opening up one of the best agricultural districts in that part of Canada. I am sure the hon. member from Wellington did not know those facts when he spoke so strongly against it. The hon. gentleman added:

For my part I was educated under the Hon. Edward Blake as my leader and under Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier as my present leader to vote against extensions and branches and now I am asked to turn around and swallow myself and vote in favour of what I opposed previously.

I, too, in some measure was a follower of both these men, and I would not like to think they are so narrow-minded as to oppose the progress of the country by refusing to build branches. No more could a tree grow or flourish without branches or a river continue to flow without a source of springs or tributaries than a railway could be profitable and serviceable without branches.

When that part of the Intercolonial railway from New Glasgow to Mulgrave was built and run by a private company it did not pay, as they say, its 'axle grease.' Through the foresight of Sir Charles Tupper it was taken over by the Intercolonial railway and the road was extended to Sydney, with a branch road to North Sydney and Sydney Mines. To-day it is the busiest and best paying part of the Intercolonial railway.

To show what trade has developed thereby, I will take one industry alone—that of steel. The combined output of the two companies, Dominion Iron and Steel Company and the Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company amounts to about 400,000 tons per year, or equal to 1,300 tons a day for every working day in the year, all of which goes over the Intercolonial railway and finds a market in the western part of Canada.

Let me further show what this 400,000 tons per year means of revenue to the Intercolonial railway. The total revenue as published in March, last, for the year ending March 31, 1909, was for:

Passengers	$2,628,000
Freight	5,503,000
Mails and express	350,000
Miscellaneous	46,000
Total	$8,527,000

Of this amount, the Dominion Steel Company paid to the Intercolonial railway 15 per cent of the whole earnings. Or, of freight 23 per cent of the whole earnings. The smaller industry, the Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company, with only an output of 60,000 tons of steel, paid for freight on steel and coal $336,881 for the year ending December, 1909, or a sum nearly equal to that credited by the Intercolonial for the carrying of the mails and express.

Then we have, in addition to the steel industry, the largest coal company in Canada, that of the Dominion Coal Company, and without having taken over of the branch road from New Glasgow to Mulgrave, which was originally owned by a private company, these three industries having a capital of $71,000,000 would not exist to-day.

	Bonds.	Preferred stock.	Common stock.
Capital Dominion Coal.. ..	$ 5,400,000	$ 3,000,000	$15,000,000
Montreal Dominion Steel.	9,000,000	5,000,000	20,000,000
Nova Scotia Steel and Coal..	6,000,000	2,000,000	6,000,000
	$20,400,000	$10,000,000	$41,000,000
Total..	$71,000,000

I have shown what the taking over of the branch road from New Glasgow to Mulgrave has done for the mutual benefit of east and west. Let me further show where the west has the advantage over the east in the transportation of goods for export. I find that the tariff on goods shipped from the west for export is very much lower than on goods for domestic use. For instance, Montreal to Halifax for domestic use, Class 1 to 10, the average rate per 100 pounds is 32½ cents, on the same class of goods for export, 30 cents per 100 pounds, equal to $10 per car of 40,000 pounds. Then again, Halifax to Montreal for the same class of goods, 1 to 10, for domestic use, average per 100 pounds 29 cents; Halifax to Montreal, for import 19 cents, a difference of 10 cents. Class fish, sugar, cotton and paint for domestic use 24 cents per 100 pounds. Class raw sugar, jute bagging, bottles and iron commodities, if imported, 14 cents, a difference of 10 cents per 100 pounds, or $2 per ton of 2,000 pounds, $40 per car of 40,000 pounds, in favour of import over domestic. But the most striking illustration to show the advantage of west over east is upon flour. I find in the Railway Annual report that for the last three years there was carried over the Intercolonial railway an average of 1,500,000 barrels—every barrel of which comes from Ontario and the west. I was unable to ascertain what quantity was exported, but no doubt a large part of it was. The rate for domestic use upon flour is 17½ cents per 100 pounds, and on that for export only 12½ cents per 100 pounds; a difference of 5 cents, equal to $25 per car of 250 barrels.

Let me give another illustration. The mail steamer from England is signalled off Halifax harbour; immediately after the Intercolonial railway officials are notified and they have a train on the wharf ready to leave the moment the steamer arrives, and as soon as the mails can be put on board. We will suppose that the steamer arrives at 8 a.m. An hour later the train is off with a (right-of-way) order over all other trains, and arrives at Montreal at 7 o'clock the next morning. The train for Sydney had left before the mails were landed, but there is no special for Sydney, and, there being only one mail train per day for Sydney, this important mail remains in Halifax for twenty-four hours, or until eight o'clock next morning, so that the mail for the west is in Montreal before the mail for Sydney, and the east leaves Halifax. The conditions are much the same at Rimouski in summer. I landed more than once at Rimouski and found a special train waiting for Montreal mail. The passengers and mails for the maritime provinces had to wait over for the regular train, three, six or nine hours as it might be. Let it be understood that I am not complaining of any injustice, as I know the large population must be served first, but I want to make good my argument and show that the west derives equal, if not more, benefit than the east from the running of the Intercolonial railway.

From the figures and facts I have given, the House, hon. members will admit that the Intercolonial is not provincial, but with more aptness may be called a national work.

Before confederation, and with reciprocity with the United States, cheap transportation and direct communication by water, the trade of the maritime provinces was nearly, if not altogether with the New England states. Owing to the way confederation was brought about, the bitter feeling existing so strongly against it that many of the people of the provinces refused to trade with Canada, as they called the upper provinces. The building of the Intercolonial railway was a part of the compact of confederation, and I may be permitted to read the clause in the British North America Act which authorizes its construction:

> Inasmuch as the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have joined in a declaration that the construction of the Intercolonial railway is essential to the consolidation of the union of British North America and to the assent thereto of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and have consequently agreed that provision should be made for its immediate construction by the government of Canada; therefore, in order to give effect to that agreement, it shall be the duty of the government and parliament of Canada to provide for the commencement, within six months after the union, of a railway connecting the river St. Lawrence with the city of Halifax in Nova Scotia, and for the construction thereof without intermission, and the completion thereof with all practicable speed.

It was also necessary to allay that bitterness of feeling of the provincialists and to promote interprovincial trade. That object has been more than fulfilled. To-day we are Canadians all, and the trade which went to the United States, now goes to the west, for the mutual benefit of both.

To-day the Intercolonial exists for the benefit of the whole Dominion and not of the maritime provinces. No other part of the Dominion receives such advantages from it as do the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. The manufacturers of these provinces, in all lines, find a ready market in the maritime provinces, through the favourable rates of the Intercolonial railway for their products, which have displaced entirely the American trade that formerly existed with nearly a million people.

The policy of obtaining branch lines and of constructing them opens up a new and additional source of trade to the people of the upper provinces, and will be to the material advantage of the whole Dominion in this respect.

I am in favour of acquiring branch lines to the Intercolonial, because the proposal is economically sound. There would be no question about the advisablity of building and acquiring branch lines if the Intercolonial belonged to a company. Every great railway company in Canada sees the importance of controlling the branch lines along its route. The branch lines that are owned or operated by the main line can dispense with separate repair shops, round houses, head office staff, and many other kinds of outlay that they are compelled to maintain when being operated as independent lines. In the province of Nova Scotia, especially, owing to our geographical position, with no part of the province much more than fifty miles from the sea, the branches reaching out to the seaports on either side must necessarily be short, and could not be economically financed or operated by a company. At the same time, these branches might prove to be profitable feeders to the Intercolonial, as the road from New Glasgow has proved. The other great railway systems of Canada do not need to be persuaded as to the importance of branch lines wherever there is a sufficient body of traffic. The Grand Trunk railway, the Canadian Northern and the Canadian Pacific are yearly surveying and projecting and constructing branch lines all over Canada. They are after traffic, and they know that this is the only way it can be secured. It goes without saying that what is needed most of all for the development of the resources of Canada, both east and west, is better transportation facilities. Are the people of the maritime provinces to be told that because they happen to live along the line of the Intercolonial railway, they are to have no expansion and no development of their resources? No, the east must be developed as well as the west. It is impossible that with the large increase of population and the vast expansion of the west, the industries, mining and manufacturing, of the maritime provinces are going to stand still. They are bound to expand in ratio with the requirements of the western country. In addition to the building of the Transcontinental railway, there is an understanding that, as soon as the finances of the country will admit of it, we are to have the Hudson Bay railway, the Georgian Bay canal and the deepening of the Welland canal, and are we to deny the right of the Intercolonial railway in the maritime provinces to expand by building and leasing branch lines? Every true Canadian would like to see this country complete in its possibilities. Shortly we will have three transcontinental lines, and the only open seaports of the Dominion on the Atlantic, for six months of the year, are to be found in the country traversed by the Intercolonial railway. Shall not the national highway be made of more advantage by obtaining and constructing branches reaching out to the sea at different points, so that ultimately all our great trade shall flow to and from the sea in Canadian channels? Any other policy would be short-sighted and would not be Canadian.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—I do not intend to oppose the acquiring of branch lines by the government providing they exercise sufficient caution to see that they are in proper condition before taking them over. Some of those roads are in a very poor, I was going to say rickety condition to-day, and it would be highly improper for the government to take them over until they are put in a condition equal to the other roads in the Dominion. I have in my mind a road built by Mackenzie and Mann from Port Tupper to Port Hood in the county of Inverness, a very poor road, with light rails, sharp curves, and high grades. That road would require to be very much improved before the government would be justified in taking it over. The South Western railway, from Halifax to Yarmouth, is in a better condition, and the road from Windsor to Kings, and Annapolis to Yarmouth, is owned, I believe, by Jewish capitalists in London. I understand that the road is paying very well, and I doubt if the owners would be pleased to hand it over to the government unless they are paid a large amount for it. I should like to quote from a speech of my old friend, Joseph Howe, delivered in 1851, showing his views with regard to the Intercolonial railway:

> The imperial government, with a magnanimity which does honour to the British people, sustained by that unanimity of sentiment among the great leaders of public opinion at home, which promises a long continuance of the honourable relations existing between us, has offered to the three British North America provinces £7,000,000 sterling, at the lowest interest at which money can be obtained in the world. This money is offered for the purpose of enabling them to complete in an incredibly short space of time, and with security and ease, great internal improvements which their advanced condition renders so desirable, which will bind them together into one prosperous community, animate them with new hope and aspirations, and ultimately elevate them from the colonial condition to that of a great and prosperous nation, in perpetual amity and friendship with those glorious islands to which we trace our origin, and to which, through this great boon, so much of our material prosperity will in all time to come be traced.

> I am neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet, yet I would venture to predict that in five years we shall make the journey hence to Quebec and Montreal and the home through Portland and St. John through rail; and I believe that many in this room will live to hear the whistle of the steam engine in the passage of the Rocky mountains, and to make the journey from Halifax to the Pacific in five or six days. With such objects in view, with the means before us to open up 1,000 miles of this noble territory, to increase its resources, and lay bare its treasures, surely all petty jealousies and personal rivalries should stand rebuked; all minor questions of mere local interest should give way.

Hugh Allan, subsequently Sir Hugh Allan, at a meeting of the Board of Trade in Montreal, said:

> It is not then as a politician that we meet Mr. Howe, or as a legislator, but as a great advocate of internal improvements. The people of this colony are glad of the chance of associating and extending connections with their fellow subjects of Nova Scotia and of the provinces below.

That was spoken with a prophetic vision sixteen years before confederation. If Mr. Howe had been sustained by Sir Francis Hincks, and other statesmen, that road would have been built at the time, and it nearly broke his heart, after the efforts he made, that it was not built. He went to Quebec, and addressed the people there, and to Montreal, and met Hugh Allan, afterwards Sir Hugh Allan, who moved a resolution, congratulating him upon the efforts he had made to build the railway.

All this went to pieces by disturbing influences afterwards of Sir Francis Hinks and other politicians in Canada. A word about the Intercolonial railway. I believe that road at present is better managed than ever it was before, and that it is freer from political influences now than it has been up to the present time. Under the present management, carefully conducted, the road can be made to pay, and I am not one of those who would consent to see it given over to a company. I believe that it should be owned by the people, and managed as it is for the benefit of the people. It has been stated that it was built for the benefit of the people of Nova Scotia. That is not the case. It is more of a benefit to the people of Ontario than to us, because we have to take from them their flour, their oatmeal and their butter, their beef and pork, and they have a market there all the year round, while we have nothing to send to them. We have to make the money and treasure it to buy what we require. It is stated that the Intercolonial railway is a burden, but the people should look upon it as a blessing to the people of Canada. We had to build the Intercolonial railway under the confederation agreement, and the great mistake made at that time was that it was not built on the Robertson-Henderson survey. That was the line that the imperial government desired; but even the road-bed of the Intercolonial railway was built politically. It was constructed out of its direct course to Spring Hill to be near the mines. It was again deflected for the benefit of Peter Mitchell's saw mills, and under such influences it could not be properly built. I had the authority of Sir Sanford Fleming, that if he had the location and building of the Intercolonial railway, it would not be in its present bed at all, and he told me two or three days ago that in the short distance from Moncton to Amherst, I suppose about 50 or 60 miles, it could be shortened about 12 miles, with a better road-bed than it has at present. Quebec must look upon that road from a commercial standpoint, when the Transcontinental railway shall have been completed to Moncton, and the trade of China, Japan, India and Australia will come over that road. And what are passengers going to do after they reach Moncton? The Intercolonial railway is not able to take all the business that is offered. It is pressed for freight now with the single track. I would give to any other company, the Canadian Pacific railway if you like, power to build from Moncton to Halifax, or from St. John to Halifax or I would double track the Intercolonial railway. If the Intercolonial railway is to be doubled tracked, the present bed in some places must be changed materially. In some places the grade is 56 feet to the mile, and in other places 52½ feet to the mile. You cannot haul the heavy freight loads that will come over the Transcontinental railway over grades of that kind; therefore, if the policy will be to double track the Intercolonial railway its road-bed must be improved to take some of the sharp turns out of it, and make it equal to the road that will come to Moncton. I am opposed to taking the Intercolonial railway out of its present management. I believe it will be found during the present year, with the fine prospect before us, to pay well, and that there will be a large surplus during the present year. Of course if you hand the road over to a company, the present low rates of freight would be changed. Those low freights are a benefit to the people of Ontario, as well as to the people of Nova Scotia. In Nova Scotia we built from Halifax to Windsor, 45 miles, from Halifax to Truro, about 70 miles, and about 40 miles to Pictou Landing—all by our own government, with our own money, before confederation. The Intercolonial railway will belong to the people, and the people of Nova Scotia would resist its being taken from them. Again I would urge the government to be cautious to find exactly in what condition branch roads are in, before they will be justified in taking them over.

The motion was declared carried on a division, and the Bill was read a second time.

TRANSPORTATION OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS BILL.

SECOND READING.

The order of the day being called:

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the motion for the second reading (Bill M) An Act to regulate the transportation of Intoxicating Liquors, and the motion of the Hon. Mr. Domville, in amendment thereto:—'That the said Bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read a second time this day six months.'—(Hon. Mr. Ross, Middlesex.)

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I called to see the hon. member from Middlesex, and regret to state that he is still an invalid and not likely to be in his place during this week. I discussed with him the proposal that I intended to make when the House went into committee and he entirely approved of it. As other hon. gentlemen are probably going to speak on this Bill, I desire to say, after consultation with the deputation that came from the maritime provinces, that I intend to limit its operation to Prince Edward Island. That is the only province in the Dominion which has prohibition over the entire province. The objection, therefore, that has been urged to the Bill will, I think, in a great degree be minimized by the amendment I propose in that regard. I understand that one or two hon. gentlemen who desire to speak prefer postponing it until to-morrow, and I therefore move that the order of the day be discharged and that the Bill be placed on the orders of the day for to-morrow, to be the first order after third readings.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I think it should be proceeded with. The public are disturbed over it.

Mr. McMULLIN—It is going to be confined to Prince Edward Island.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I hope the hon. gentleman will not persist in the objection. The hon. member from Ottawa agreed to postpone the order to a certain extent on my request, and I hope the hon. gentleman from Rothesay will not oppose it.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—At your request?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Oh, that is all right, I have no objection.

CATHOLIC EPISCOPAL CORPORATION OF TIMISKAMING BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY, in the absence of Hon. Mr. Lougheed, moved the second reading of Bill (PP) An Act to incorporate the Catholic Episcopal Corporation of Timiskaming.—(Hon. Mr. Lougheed.)

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I think the object of this important measure should be explained to the Senate. It is very far reaching. We have here a repeal of an Act of the provincial legislature, so that the Mortmain Act may not come into force to enable them to assume possession of this property. While I am not anxious to interfere in any way with any of those religious organizations in assuming certain rights and privileges, yet it appears to me this Bill is entirely beyond the jurisdiction of this parliament. We should be careful to see that no rights belonging to the citizens, or belonging to the province should be encroached upon by any legislation that is passed by the Senate. If my hon. friend who has charge of the Bill will look at it closely, he will see that they are asking for peculiar legislation such as we have not as a rule, allowed to pass. The Bill is an Act to incorporate the Catholic Episcopal Corporation of Timiskaming. Clause 5 of the Bill reads:

5. No parcel of land or interest therein, at any time acquired by the corporation and not required for its actual use and occupation, and not held by way of security, shall be held by the corporation or any trustee on its behalf, for a longer period than ten years after the acquisition thereof, but shall, at or before the expiration of such period, be absolutely sold or disposed of, so that the corporation shall no longer retain any estate or interest therein, except by way of security.

2. Any such parcel of land, or any estate or interest therein, not within the exceptions hereinbefore mentioned, which has been held by the corporation for a longer period than ten years without being disposed of, shall be forfeited to His Majesty for the use of Canada; but such forfeiture shall not take effect nor be enforced until the expiration of at least six calendar months after notice in writing from the Minister of Finance to the corporation of the intention of His Majesty to claim such forfeiture.

3. The corporation shall give the Minister of Finance when required a full and correct statement of all lands at the date of such statement held by the corporation, or in trust for it, and subject to the provisions of this section.

What is the meaning of this? They claim the right to take security under this Act, and the churches can hold the security so long as they are disposed; but if they own the fee simple in property they are supposed to be compelled to sell it within the term of ten years. Then further down, in clause 6, I find the following:

And for the purposes of such investment may take, receive and accept mortgages or assignments thereof, whether made and executed directly to the corporation or to any corporation, body, company or person in trust for it; and may sell, grant, assign and transfer such mortgages or assignments, and may release and discharge such mortgages or assignments either wholly or partly.

They go as far as to grant the power to make promissory notes. Then clause 7 reads:

7. The corporation may, from time to time, for the purposes of the corporation:—
(a) borrow money upon the credit of the corporation;
(b) make, draw, accept, endorse or become party to promissory notes and bills of exchange; but it shall not be necessary to have the seal of the corporation affixed to any such note or bill.
(c) mortgage, hypothecate or pledge any property of the corporation, real or personal, to secure the repayment of any money borrowed for the purposes of the corporation.

Then looking at clause 8, it reads:

In regard to any real property which, by reason of its situation or otherwise, is subject to the legislative authority of the parliament of Canada, a license in mortmain shall not be necessary for the exercise of the powers granted by this Act; but otherwise the exercise of the said powers shall in any province of Canada be subject to the laws of such province as to the acquisition and holding of lands by religious corporations, in so far as such laws apply to the corporation.

You see that this grants them absolute control and power over any properties they may require. Are we going to do away with the rights and privileges of the local legislatures, where they have laws to control certain societies and say that they shall not have possession? We do not only that, but further powers are granted to this society, and the law of mortmain cannot apply to them. I look upon this as an important Bill, and we should certainly have a fuller explanation at this stage, or have the second reading deferred until such time as the hon. gentleman in charge of the Bill is in his place to explain it. I again call the attention of the Senate to the fact, that this is a very serious Bill and should be explained to us.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If the hon. gentleman would be kind enough to look at the preamble of the Bill, he will see that it meets all the objections he has put forward. Here is a corporate body, which extends to three provinces, Quebec, Ontario and the Northwest—

Hon. Mr. WILSON—If it is partly in one province and partly in another province, they can go to the various provinces and obtain legislation at the hands of the legislatures to cover the whole matter.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But for the Northwest Territories they must come here, because the Northwest Territories are under our jurisdiction. No province can give them an incorporation for the Northwest Territories. It is for that reason clause 8 is framed, which reads:

In regard to any real property which by reason of its situation or otherwise is subject to the legislative authority of the province of Canada, a license in mortmain shall not be necessary for the exercise of the powers granted by this Act; but otherwise the exercise of the said powers shall in any province in Canada be subject to the laws of such province as to the acquisition and holding of lands by religious corporations in so far as such laws apply to the corporation.

It provides for all cases. In Ontario it can be done according to the laws of the province, and for the part that is under the jurisdiction of the Dominion they must come here. They cannot go anywhere else. At all events, this is a matter of fact to be proved when it goes into the Private Bills Committee. If the facts recited in the preamble are not true, then it will be time enough to throw it overboard; but, as far as we are concerned, by the preamble of the Bill itself there is no doubt those parties must come here for incorporation, so far as that incorporation relates to the Northwest Territories.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I think the hon. gentleman from St. Thomas (Hon. Mr. Wilson) will find that this Bill is on all fours with a number of similar Bills that have been passed by this parliament. If he will look up the incorporation of the Archbishopric of Ottawa, he will find, I think, that this is but a copy of the powers that were given to the Archbishop of Ottawa, whose territory covers two provinces, Ontario and Quebec. If there were in this Bill some clauses to which exception may be taken, it can well be debated and settled in committee.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I ask the hon. senator if he will read clause 8, and explain to me what the meaning of that is, where the company are asking powers under this Bill to destroy the rights of the provinces, as far as mortmain shall apply. Will the hon. gentleman explain in what way it is desirable, whether in one, two or three provinces to repeal the powers of the local legislature?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—On the contrary, I think it is respecting provincial legislation and provincial rights.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I confess I have not considered what the effect of passing the clause would be; probably I do not understand it. It makes the holding of lands subject to the laws of the different provinces, where the corporation holds property in mortmain within those provinces. But does it not exempt the provisions of the law in regard to holding property in mortmain in the territories? And are we not, by making this exemption, giving to this corporation authority to hold land in mortmain, an authority which has been refused by the different provinces? I have a distinct recollection that a number of years ago the great Liberal party of Ontario made this very point the subject of every contest which took place in the province of Ontario. During an election as far back as 1863 I had to fight it very strongly in the constituency I was then contesting. I am not prepared to give an opinion by casually reading the clause, as to the effect it would have in conferring upon these religious corporations powers that I know in the province of Ontario and in other provinces where the question has been discussed, have been refused. The question would arise whether it is good policy to grant to ecclesiastical corporations, no matter of what character, powers in the territories that might conflict with the wishes of the people of those territories where they are incorporated. That is a question that can be fully discussed in committee. I think the point is worthy of consideration by the government. I am not speaking from any prejudice one way or the other, because I defended the Conservative party in the course they pursued at the time in connection with such corporations; but at that time, as I have already pointed out, one of the principal planks in the platform of the Liberal party was a declaration against the holding of land in mortmain. We had very severe fights over it. During that period the younger members of this House had very little interest in politics, and probably my hon. friend who is smiling was one of the parties to whom I refer at the present moment.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

PROTECTION OF NAVIGABLE WATERS BILL.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The order of the day being called:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion for the second reading Bill (B) An Act respecting the Act for the protection of navigable waters.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The flavour has rather gone out of the subject. The postponement of a discussion often does take the flavour out of a debate; but I shall say a few words on the subject. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman who introduced the measure, and with the other hon. gentlemen who have spoken on it, with respect to its very great importance. It is a most important thing that the people of this country should have wholesome water to drink, nearly as important as that they should have pure air to breathe, and the thanks, not only of this House, but of the country generally are due to the hon. gentleman from Ottawa for bringing the matter before parliament in the careful and able way in which he has handled the subject. The hon. gentleman's speech was one which I thought was suited to the importance of the question, and it is also the kind of speech which is pleasant to listen to in the Senate, a speech worthy of the dignity of this House. But while there is only one opinion as to the desirability of the people having an abundant supply of wholesome water, in our desire to see that the population have that, we cannot lose sight of other circumstances. There may be difficulties in the way. The way chosen by the hon. gentleman may not be the wisest; irresistible force always has its own way until it comes against an insuperable obstacle, and we have to see whether there are any insuperable obstacles in the obstacle; and we have to see whether there are any insuperable obstacles in the way of this measure.

With regard to this measure, two questions arise.

The first question is, has this parliament power to pass a Bill such as the one before us? The second one is, granting the power, should the power be exercised in so absolute and unqualified and drastic a manner, as is proposed by this Bill? In dealing with a question like this, it does seem unfortunate, that our parliament is not like the parliament of the United Kingdom. The parliament of the United Kingdom can deal with any subject, no matter how great or how trifling and local; but this parliament can only deal with the subjects assigned to it by the British North America Act. There is one point which was made by the hon. member from Mille Isles the other day, to which the hon. mover of the Bill did not seem to attach much significance, but which seems to me to have been a point of very considerable importance. The title of this Bill is, 'An Act to amend the Act respecting the protection of navigable waters.' That Act is chap. 115 of the Revised Statutes, and the new section is 19A. One naturally would suppose that this measure had something to do with the protection of navigable waters, and I think we are justified in so supposing. Section 19 of the Navigable Waters Protection Act provides that:

> No owner or tenant of any saw-mill, or any workman therein, or other person, shall throw, or cause to be thrown, or suffer, or permit to be thrown, any sawdust, edgings, slabs, bark or rubbish, of any description whatsoever, in any river, stream, or other water, any part of which is navigable, or which flows into any navigable water.

Now, the object of that provision—I think that provision originated in the Senate—arose from a desire of some members of this House to prevent the depositing of sawdust and other mill refuse in the Ottawa at the mouth of the Rideau river, and at the Chaudière. Evidence was taken to show the pernicious effect the depositing of sawdust and mill refuse had on the navigation of the Ottawa river. It was shown that the depth of water here in the immediate neighbourhood had been reduced a great many feet by this dumping of sawdust and mill refuse in the river; that explosions had taken place which were dangerous to boats navigating the river, and so on. That section 19 of the Act is intended to protect navigation, but when we come to look at the measure now before us, it goes very much further than that. Once you get above the Chaudière Falls, the Ottawa river is not navigable. The ordinary sewage does not interfere materially with navigation. The colon bacillus, which, I understand is the particular microbe which leads to typhoid fever, does not interfere with navigation, so that the hon. gentleman has not been wise in selecting the place in which to insert this amendment. I think it would have been better to have dealt with the question as one of public health, and located his Bill somewhere else than in the Navigable Waters Act. Section 19 of the Act, looking at it as a measure dealing with navigation, goes about as far as this parliament has a right to go. When we dealt with sawdust, we went to the limit, so that this measure really does not come under chap. 115 of the Revised Statutes.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—So far as navigable streams are concerned, such as the Ottawa and the St. Lawrence, will my hon. friend say that we have not the sole and exclusive jurisdiction, or will he say the reverse?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I say that parliament has the right to safeguard navigation. I do not raise any question about that.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—What other jurisdiction is there that could deal with those navigable streams?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not propose to go into that question. From the point of view of navigation, I quite recognize the fact that this parliament has exclusive jurisdiction; but when you come to look at a river, even a navigable stream, from another point of view, I feel that this parliament has not exclusive jurisdiction. Take the Ottawa river here. The province of Ontario owns the bed of that stream to the middle of the river, and the province of Quebec owns the other side of the bed of the river to the same line. The fact that the river is navigable does not destroy the rights of riparian owners altogether. When one looks at the wording of this measure, it will be seen that it is very sweeping:

No person shall throw or deposit, or cause or permit to be thrown or deposited, any sewage, offal, or refuse animal or vegetable matter of any kind whatsoever, into any river, stream or other water, any part of which is navigable or which flows into any navigable water.

That would just mean that if there was a pool on a farm and a small rivulet trickled out of that pool, and some of the draining from the barn yard got into the pool, and in that way flowed down the stream, the farmer would be liable, under this Bill, to the severe penalties which are proposed to be invoked. While on that point I wish to call the hon. gentleman's attention to this fact, that in his measure he fails to refer to section 22 of chapter 115, which is the section which prescribes penalties. If the hon. gentleman looks at chapter 115 he will find that section 22 refers to the three preceding sections. 19a would either not come under that or would shut the original section 19 out.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—It will be part of section 19.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, it is a new section. However, I do not attach any consequence to that; I simply call attention to it. The main question is whether this measure comes under section 91 of the British North America Act. I do not think it does. The hon. gentleman gave us an exceedingly able argument to show that this measure did come under section 91 of the British North America Act, and, consequently, within the jurisdiction of this parliament; and he wanted to know where jurisdiction over the subject of this Bill could be found in the local legislatures. The hon. gentleman knows that land includes the water within the limits of the land. They are part of the real property, and they come under section 92 of the British North America Act, paragraphs 5 and 13. Paragraph 5 is:

The management and sale of the public lands belonging to the province and of the timber and wood thereon.

And paragraph 13:

Property and civil rights in the province.

My own authority is not worth much, but the hon. gentleman has, I am sure, carefully read the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in a case which arose in New Brunswick, Robertson vs. the Queen, and has also read the Fisheries case, which was decided by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in 1898. In both of these leading cases it was declared in the clearest terms that the streams running through the land, certainly where the streams were above tide water and were not navigable, were within the jurisdiction and ownership of the local legislatures. I do not suppose the hon. gentleman raises any question about it.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—So far as the beds of the rivers are concerned.

Hon. Mr. POWER—More than that: The leading case on the subject is the Attorney General for Canada against the Attorneys General of the provinces and vice versa. There was a decision of the Supreme Court, and an appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The decision was given by the late Lord Herschell, and will be found at page 709. Near the bottom of the page the decision says:

The Dominion of Canada was called into existence by the British North America Act, 1867. Whatever proprietary rights were at the time of the passing of that Act possessed by the provinces remained vested in them, except such as are by any of its express enactments transferred to the Dominion of Canada.

There has been no transfer of ownership of land and streams running through land to Canada. Their Lordships of the Judicial Committee gave the same opinion as to the fisheries:

Their lordships are of opinion that the 91st section of the British North America Act did not convey to the Dominion of Canada any proprietary rights in relation to fisheries.

That is at page 712. Then at page 716:

For example, provisions prescribing the mode in which the private fishery is to be conveyed or otherwise disposed of, and the rights of succession in respect of it, would be properly treated as falling under the heading, 'property and civil rights' within section 92, and not as in the class 'fisheries' within the meaning of section 91. So, too, the terms and conditions upon which the fisheries which are the property of the province, may be granted, leased or otherwise disposed of, and the rights which consistently with any general regulations respecting fisheries enacted by the Dominion parliament may be conferred therein, appear proper subjects for provincial legislation, either under clause 5 of section 92, 'the management and sale of public lands,' or under the class 'property and civil rights.' Such legislation deals directly with property, its disposal, and the rights to be enjoyed in respect of it, and was not in their lordships' opinion intended to be within the scope of the class 'fisheries' as that word is used in section 91.

The hon. gentleman's argument—a very ingenious one—was that inasmuch as the subject of public health had not been expressly left to the provinces, it was vested in the Dominion. This measure deals with the rights to, and the owners of lands. It does not deal directly with public health; it only deals indirectly with public health. My contention is that the implied jurisdiction which he has argued for cannot override the express authority given by paragraphs 5 and 13 of section 92. One remedy against the evils of which the hon. gentleman complains is this, that if any riparian owner were to do or permit to be done on his land any act which might pollute the stream and make it less suitable for his neighbour down the stream, he would be liable to an action. I presume, by the lower proprietor, the water in front of whose land was polluted by the action of the upper proprietor; but that is a totally different thing from this parliament undertaking to deal with a matter which has been left by section 92 to the local legislatures. It seems to me that the hon. gentleman's argument goes too far. If you say that because as a possible consequence of certain action, injury will arise to the public health, and therefore with a view of that possible contingent injury the Dominion parliament has jurisdiction, you will practically enable the Dominion parliament to absorb the jurisdiction over all subjects. One of the good things which the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council have done since 1867 is that they have prevented that process from going on, and have in a great many cases decided that parliament has not the right by such an extension of its power to interfere in matters which really belong substantially to the provinces.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—How does the hon. gentleman account then for the exercise of jurisdiction by this parliament in the two Acts I have referred to, the Act for the Inspection of Animals, and the Act for the Inspection of Food and Drugs. They would be manifestly cases coming under the sections he has just quoted. How does he account for the exercise of jurisdiction by this House in these two matters, if not on the ground of public health?

Hon. Mr. POWER—With respect to the diseases of animals, and the adulteration of food, these subjects come properly under the heading of Trade and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—No.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the adulteration of food does not come under the heading of trade and commerce, I should like to know under what head it does. It proposes to regulate trade and commerce by saying to any one who is interested in the sale of articles of food, you shall not deal in articles which are adulterated, and are consequently injurious.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—These two Acts contain provisions that cannot at all be applied to commerce. For instance, there is a provision which enables an inspector to come to my stable, and take my horse, which is not kept for trade purposes but for my own use. He can take it away and kill it.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—If you have a diseased horse, may that not affect trade and commerce?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—No, the horse is for my own use, and is kept in my own stable.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not undertake to pronounce upon the case of the horse; but the point is, that no question has ever been raised about it, and where the question has not been raised, and there has been no judicial decision, you cannot speak with any positiveness as to the subject coming under one jurisdiction or the other. At any rate, both of these things are matters which come properly under the heading of trade and commerce. If unwholesome food, which a diseased animal certainly would be, or groceries which are adulterated, were allowed to be sold, it would injuriously affect our commerce. If the farmers of this country were allowed to export diseased meat to England, you can see at once the effect it would have on the trade and commerce of this country. The hon. gentleman referred to the fact that the doctors as a rule are in favour of this measure, and in favour of the Dominion jurisdiction. I am not surprised at that. The doctors are always anxious to do that which is best for the health of the public, and, incidentally perhaps, for the benefit of the profession, and I can understand that they should be in favour of this measure. We are all in favour of bringing about such results; and the doctors probably do not worry themselves much about the constitutional question. But I notice this with respect to the medical profession, that all their associations throughout the country are incorporated and controlled by the local legislatures; that the regulations affecting the medical profession in all the provinces have been passed by the local legislatures and, certainly, if that is the case, we would be justified in thinking that dealing with water might go the same way. Of course, I assume that the local legislatures have dealt with the medical profession on the ground that they were dealing with civil rights. Another authority has been cited to me by the hon. gentleman from Fredericton. I do not cite the authority as a great constitutional authority, but as being under the circumstances one to whose words weight should be given. There are only two survivors now of the gentlemen who have been called the fathers of confederation, and one of those gentlemen is Sir Charles Tupper. Not long since, when the hon. gentleman from York asked him if he had again to go over the framing of the British North America Act, whether he would make any changes in it, he said that the only change that occurred to him, as being desirable, was that the question of public health should have been put in the hands of the Dominion parliament instead of being left as it was with the local legislatures. The practice which followed in the years after confederation shows what the feelings of the framers of the British North America Act was. The question of jurisdiction is at any rate a very doubtful one.

I do not myself believe that we have the jurisdiction to pass this measure; but suppose we have that right, should we assert it? On that point I should do nothing more perhaps than refer to the speech made by the hon. member from Hastings (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell) as to what the effect would be in the country in the neighbourhood of the city where he lives. The putting of such a measure into force at once, would mean a complete revolution of existing conditions all over the country. It would involve enormous expense and difficulty. Nearly every farmer who lived on the slope of a hill, would have to reconstruct his buildings and drains and all that, and while in a thickly peopled country like England, Scotland, or Belgium, it might be possible without undue expense to keep sewage from flowing into the streams, in a sparsely settled country like Canada, the expense involved would be something enormous. We must remember that streams and rivers are the natural drains of the country. Naturally everything liquid which is dropped on the surface of the ground except what is completely absorbed, ultimately finds its way into streams and rivers, and it seems to me that time and a good deal of consideration are needed to evolve a practicable measure to place us in the position aimed at by the Bill. Probably we shall some day attain that position, but we cannot do it at once. I quite concur in the opinion of the hon. gentleman from Alberta, the chairman of the Committee on Public Health (Hon. Mr. De Veber), in the view that we had better go a little slowly, and adopt moderate and friendly measures. It seems to me that the body to deal with this matter during the recess of parliament is the Conservation Commission. That commission has at its head one of the ablest and most energetic men of this country, and I have no doubt that before the next sitting of parliament, that commission will have evolved a practicable scheme for dealing with this question. Meanwhile, there are certain steps which may be taken. I wish to direct the attention of the hon. gentleman from Ottawa to the fact that in Great Britain, where they take a good deal of care to prevent their streams from being polluted, the great cities do not take their water supply from the streams flowing past them. Glasgow does not go to the Clyde river to get its water, but gets its drinking water from Loch Katrine. Birmingham and Liverpool get their drinking water from Wales. The Mersey runs through Liverpool, and if the practice which prevails here in Ottawa and Montreal prevailed in the old country these cities would be getting their water supplies which flow through them. Manchester has two rivers running through it, but does not get its water from either of them, but from Lake Thirlmere in Cumberland county. The city of St. John does not get its water from St. John river, but from Lake Lomond, some distance from the city. In Halifax we get water from lakes seven miles out in the country, and it seems to me the natural thing is for Montreal and Ottawa—I do not know much about the position of other cities—instead of going into very expensive schemes to purify the water, to get their water supply from lakes in the not remote distance. I understand that there are lakes within ten or twelve miles of Ottawa from which a good supply of pure water could be had, and I am told that the same condition of affairs exists near Montreal.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—What about the people below Montreal who are being poisoned by the sewage from that city every day of the year?

Hon. Mr. POWER—There was a time when people got their water from wells. I feel there is a grave doubt as to the constitutionality of this measure. I have no doubt at all as to the unwisdom of undertaking to pass it now in its present stage, and I, therefore, have the honour to move that this Bill be not now read the second time, but that it be read the second time this day six months. That will give the conservation commission and the government an opportunity to consider the whole question.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN moved the adjournment of the debate until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (WW) An Act for the relief of Ellen Mellor Fleming.—Hon. Mr. Derbyshire.

Bill (XX) An Act to incorporate the Pioneers Loan Company.—Hon. Mr. Watson.

TARIFF NEGOTIATIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Before proceeding with the orders of the day, may I ask my right hon. friend if the tariff conference between this government and the representatives of the United States government is yet completed, and whether my right hon. friend has anything to report to the House touching an understanding between the two countries?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—My hon. friend will understand that these negotiations, if they may be so called, are of a highly confidential and informal character, and it would not be in the public interest, at the present moment, to enter into any details on the subject. The gentlemen who were here representing the United States authorities have returned to Washington, but I am not in a position to give my hon. friend any information just now as to what passed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I notice a despatch from Ottawa in the Toronto papers to the effect that the representatives of the United States government were making extraordinary demands, and that when some members of the Canadian cabinet were prepared to accede to them, my right hon. friend put down his foot and said 'no.' It is not often I agree with the right hon. gentleman, but on this occasion I hope the statement is correct, that he was not prepared to accede to the demands of a government with whom we have so often tried to come to an understanding, but without success. I hope our government is not prepared to come down at their bidding. If the information is correct, I wish to express my warmest approval of the stand the right hon. gentleman has taken.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I am rather afraid that while personally I would always desire to have my hon. friend's approval, it might not always be regarded as the greatest proof of wisdom on my part to concur with him. As to the other matter, I would just say that it is very dangerous, as he knows well, to rely on newspaper reports as to what happens in the Cabinet, where everybody is pledged to secrecy.

PUBLIC HEALTH AND INSPECTION OF FOODS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. DE VEBER moved the adoption of the third report of the Standing Committee on Public Health and Inspection of Foods. He said: Speaking to this motion, I feel somewhat as I should judge the leader of a battalion would on arriving on the scene of action to find that all his ammunition had been expended; but as it has been expended by an ally, and has done very good execution, I cannot feel very sorrowful over it. With what remains, I shall endeavour to say a few words on this very important question; but as my remarks will be on a very few lines, you shall not have to exercise your patience for any length of time. I was very much pleased, delighted in fact, to hear the discussion on the Bill of my hon. friend from Ottawa, relating to the pollution of navigable waters. Discussion brings out all the good points in legislation, and creates an interest throughout the country. The public becomes aware of certain facts, and when they learn that danger lurks in every glass of water they drink, the press will take it up, and then we may hope for legislation to meet the evil. Very few members of this House belong to the medical profession, and the majority have not had the medical training that would enable them to thoroughly understand legislation on a subject like this. In order, therefore, that you may more fully appreciate my arguments, I think it advisable that I say a few words on contagion. In doing so, I shall be brief and shall avoid as far as possible all medical and scientific terms.

For many years it has been known that certain diseases are communicable by contact, by brushing against clothing worn by people who have had the disease, by opening letters written in houses where there is disease, and which have passed through the mails, and in many ways. All that was known was that some germ or organism went from one person to another, but it was not known until lately, as the result of scientific research with the aid of powerful microscopes, that certain organisms caused these diseases. All these organisms or germs causing diseases have not been isolated, but several have, and I may take three of these especially, the germ of tuberculosis, the germ of typhoid fever, and the germ of diphtheria. It has been found that these three, are caused by bacilli. They are very minute, being much less than one millionth of an inch in length. The bacillus of consumption has its habitat as a general thing, in the lungs of human beings. It may be found in other parts of the body, but, generally speaking, it is in the lungs that it is found, and it is breathed in through the mouth. It comes from a consumptive patient by floating through the air or from the sputa dropped, drying up, becoming dust, and floating through the air. The bacilli of diphtheria have their habitat in the throat, and are also taken into the system in the same way as the bacillus of consumption. The bacillus of typhoid fever has its habitat in the intestines of human beings. It is taken into the system through the mouth, and may be taken in milk, water or food. It does not follow that because it is taken into the system that it always produces the disease. There is in the human system a continuous warfare between health and disease. The bacilli that cause the disease are more abundant than people imagine. They may be found to a certain extent almost everywhere; but to take the disease after absorbing the bacilli a person must be in a certain condition. I may compare the resisting powers of a man to an army of defence, and the bacilli as the army of invasion. If the army of defence is sufficient in numbers, sufficiently well armed and in good condition, it meets the army of invasion, surrounds and walls them off or kills them, or in other ways render them innocuous. So it is not necessary that everybody should have the disease simply be cause he has absorbed some of the bacilli. One would naturally remark if this is not so, how is it so many people escape consumption who are continually in rooms with consumptive patients? Simply because they have an army of resistance, and the invaders cannot overcome this resistance. I may quote here an extract from a New York paper, relating to a woman called 'Typhoid Mary':

New York, Feb. 21.—'Typhoid Mary,' whose real name is withheld at the request of the New York health authorities is a free woman again, after having been confined in a hospital three years because physicians said she was a living receptacle for typhoid germs and a menace to public health.

She was formerly a cook and considered particularly dangerous in that capacity as likely to transmit disease. With the understanding that she is to cook no more, Health Commissioner Lederle announced to-day that the department had decided to release her.

'Typhoid Mary' had of late been confined in a charity hospital on an island in the east river. Her case is unique in medical records. After repeated cases of typhoid were discovered in families for which she had cooked, the authorities made an investigation, which resulted in her detention on the theory that she was a walking reservoir for typhoid germs, harmless to herself but easily communicated to those whose food she cooked.

There are three essentials of life, food, water and air. Of food, we have very many varieties, thousands of them, and if one seems to be unwholesome, we can naturally go to another; but there is only one air, and only one water. Air, of course is very much easier purified than water, because it is in motion all the time. All you have to do is to open a window to ventilate a room, but once water is polluted it will remain polluted. In regard to food, we have laws to prevent adulteration. This report deals with the pollution of streams, and I will therefore confine my remarks to that subject. Water as supplied to us by nature is pure. It falls from the clouds upon the earth, and some of it sinks into the soil, and comes out as a spring. It is still pure, free from bacilli, though it probably has absorbed considerable salts from the earth; but so far as bacilli are concerned, it is pure. Other waters run into rivulets which flow into large streams, and thus down to the great lakes or to the sea. At its source water is pure and remains pure until it reaches the habitation of man or animals. Then it commences to be polluted and as it continue on its way to the sea, it gradually becomes more polluted. When it reaches the sea, or the large lakes, evaporation takes place. It rises to the clouds, is condensed and again falls to the earth. It has passed through nature's distillery, is purified and again comes to us perfectly pure. Now, how is this water polluted?

On its way to the lakes and sea, rains may fall upon some organic material, the waste of man or of animals that have bacteria of certain kinds in them and they are washed down into streams and some into wells. I have seen some of the worst cases of typhoid fever in the west caused by water taken from wells, that it would be almost impossible for anything to get into except by being washed on from the plain. According to the evidence given in our report, typhoid bacilli have been known to live 252 days. It takes a pretty long stream at the rate most of our streams go, to have the bacilli die before they reach one of the large lakes or the ocean. The bacilli float down the stream, waiting, one might say, to be taken up by some human being. One of the greatest obstacles we have to contend against, and it is met in all progressive movements, is old established ideas, which have no real foundation, but are still existing. For instance, I have been told time and again when speaking on this subject, 'Oh, what nonsense, water purifies itself in the course of running so many miles. All it requires is to be stirred up in rapids, and become aerated, and it is pure again.' I must admit that water running a certain distance will purify itself of organic matter, if the volume of water is large. After it goes a few miles, you do not find it offensive to the taste; but chemical reaction shows that the impurity is still there. A few miles further, chemical reaction fails to find it any longer, but that does not affect the bacilli. They still go on. I am sorry to say that some men, who in all other matters keep up with the times, still hold to the idea. I may cite the Niagara river to illustrate what I mean. If there is any river in the world where this contention could be established, it is the Niagara. You have falls, rapids and a great volume of water; but Dr. Amyot, Dr. Hodgetts, and Prof. Starkey, all have been going to the Niagara river and testing the water for different governments, and they made the statement to our committee that they never took a sample of Niagara water without finding bacteria, and it was so bad that, as probably most of you know, the volunteer militia at camp at Niagara was not allowed to take any water for drinking purposes from the Niagara river. One of the worst cities in New York State for typhoid fever, is Niagara, and it is because of pollution of the river. If a large body of water like that with its great fall and rapid current does not destroy the bacilli, I do not know what stream would. If you take ten bacilli and put them in one tumbler full of water, and drink it, you get ten germs. If you mix it up in ten tumblers of water, by natural average you get one germ in each tumbler. Multiply the quantity by a thousand, and there is less chance of course of taking a bacillus into one's system, but the germs are there, and if any body takes them, he is liable to contract the disease. Are the people awakening to the danger? I have here a quotation which I have taken from a paper. It is as follows:

> There is no more vital question confronting the people of this country. From the cradle to the grave every citizen has need of water. How much longer shall it be that every time he raises the glass to his lips, he shall do it with the knowledge that that act may number him within six weeks among the hundreds who in this country annually forfeit their lives because public water supplies are not thoroughly protected against pollution, or, if subject to contamination, are not purified?

Here also is an article from 'American Health,' which shows the movement in the United States:

> That the movement for a national organization of public health has gained a momentum which promises early and extensive legislation by Congress, few may doubt. President Roosevelt, in his speech at Provincetown, among other things said: 'I also hope that there will be legislation increasing the power of the national government to deal with certain matters concerning the health of our people everywhere; the federal authorities, for instance, should join with all the state authorities in warring against the dreadful scourge of tuberculosis. I hope to see the national government stand abreast of the foremost state governments.' This stand taken by the President is in accord with his letter to the Committee of One Hundred. In it he said: 'Our national health is physically our greatest national asset. To prevent any possible deterioration of the American stock should be a national ambition. We cannot too strongly insist on the necessity of proper ideals for the family, for simple living and for those habits and tastes which produce vigour and make men capable of strenuous service to their country. I can most cordially commend the endeavours of your committee to bring these matters prominently before the public.'
> By such an organization only can the most pressing problems be met,—such as the pollution of our rivers, by which contamination of whole populations is brought about and as a result typhoid fever is a constant occurrence. In like manner whole populations may be infected by travellers or by animals or vermin, as, for example, the bubonic plague which already has a foothold in California. No uniform and effective regulations against the spread of tuberculosis can be enforced without national interference. The progress already made in pure food legislation should also be maintained. There can be no question that laws regarding child and female labour, adulteration of drugs and food, contamination of water supplies, or against such destructive scourges as tuberculosis, are amply justified on the ground of public health and will be at the same time legislation of incalculable value to all classes of people.

The practical work of legislation falls naturally into three groups:

1. The readjustment of all bureaus now carrying on public health work or having power to do so together with their unification and coördination in a single already existing department.

Then, in another issue of the same magazine there is a report of an address by Dr. William H. Walsh, the retiring president of the Medical Association. He says:

Nothing is more significant and more hopeful for the promotion of public health than a gathering of this kind under the auspices of this association. The significance lies in the fact that the movement is no longer confined to medical men and professed sanitarians or hygienists, but is has become a great civic movement. The other class of experts who have interested themselves in this subject, next to medical men and sanitarians, are the economists and sociologists. This is most significant because they approach the problem from a different point of view from that of the physician. Both have come to the same conclusion as to the predominant importance of public health to the welfare of the community, as well as its industrial, commercial, physical, social, moral, and political importance. There is no force in the community, educational, political or social, which is not concerned with the great problem involved.

Numberless efforts have been made to secure a department of public health, efforts originating always on the part of physicians who have received little or no attention from those in power. Doctors, individually and in committees, have made their appearance before the committees of the Senate and House, but deaf ears have been turned to their appeal. When one states that public health is essential to the welfare of the community, there is, of course, no dissenting voice. It can not be that those who have the authority to check the preventable waste of human life, constantly going on around us, have no realizing sense of what it signifies. The state does not do its duty in the matter, because, possibly, it does not know what its duty is. When officials are told that the death rate can probably be cut in two if adequate measures, which are well within the possibilities of realization, are inaugurated, the statement does not seem to make any definite impression on their minds. They have got to be informed in detail as to exactly how these proposed measures are to accomplish this desired result, and if they are so informed, can we doubt for a moment that the appeal will be heard? The waste, resulting from the prevalence of disease which we know can be prevented, is incalculable. The measures which should be adopted to prevent this waste are based on a knowledge of the origin and mode of spread of preventable diseases. That knowledge is, to a very considerable extent, of recent origin, but the movement to protect the health of the public is by no means of recent origin. The greatest single incentive to stir up the popular mind to do something in this direction has been the outbreak from time to time in the world's history of some strange, unusual, devastating pestilence.

The beginning of public health reform in England can be traced to the outbreak of Asiatic cholera, about the year 1830. Nothing since the days of black death had aroused such fears and terrors in the minds of the people as the appearance of this disease, previously unknown in western Europe. There were other causes at work, great evils resulting from the large industrial developments. The factories and living conditions of the poor were unhygienic to a degree. All of them were important causes of bad health.

I may say that very little has been done in the United States, and practically nothing in Canada in regard to it. The first nation to take the matter up was Great Britain. And the beginning of public health reform in England took place in 1830. It states here:

It was above all the appearance of Asiatic cholera which started the health movement in England. While Great Britain possibly has not been the principal contributor to our knowledge of the origin and spread of infectious diseases, it is the country most interested and most effective in applying that knowledge. It was conceded that the most of the prevailing epidemic diseases were the result of the contamination of water, soil or air due to filth. They were spoken of as filth diseases and on the whole probably that was the most correct explanation. This led to a general cleaning up of habitations and surroundings. It led to the introduction of public supplies and the establishment of suitable system of sewerage and drainage. But it is to be regretted that so much of the filth was allowed to escape into running streams, and that it was not earlier seen that this was a great source of danger.

Possibly the greatest single triumph in the direction of sanitary reform was the extermination of that disease which is most directly traceable to filth—typhus fever. We can hardly realize at this time the extent and mortality of typhus fever in those days.

We never hear of typhus fever as being epidemic to-day in any country, and yet it was one of the most predominant fevers that we had in the olden days. Large salaries were paid to men like Pasteur, Koch and others to do nothing but experiment and find the origin of such diseases and how to prevent them. They say here:

To what extent is this knowledge applied in public hygiene and preventive medicine? Only to a limited extent anywhere in the world. Any one who is familiar with what is actually known to-day regarding this class of disease is aware that even in the most enlightened countries there is only a fraction of that knowledge applied. Here is another instance in which knowledge outstrips application, but in Germany and particularly in France and England so much of this knowledge has been put to practical use that the results are very apparent. The death rate has been reduced by one-third in many places to one-half of the mortality which formerly prevailed, and this has been chiefly due to checking the spread of the infectious diseases.

In America this new knowledge is applied to a lamentably small extent. We are a reproach to the civilized world by reason of our inattention to matters of public health and the prevention of disease. Can we conceive of our national government if a Koch or a Pasteur should make his appearance in this country, calling him to Washington and by giving him a laboratory afford him an opportunity to confer inestimable benefits on mankind? Incredible. Under existing conditions our government could do nothing of the kind. In whose hands has been placed hitherto the administration of matter of public health? It has been in the hands chiefly of the towns and cities, but only to a limited extent has existing knowledge been applied in a systematic and intelligent way. The reason is because there is no national head to indicate in what direction money and skilled knowledge, which have been so wastefully applied in many instances, can be applied effectively. In England every little town and city has the trained expert in matters of sanitation, one who has the diploma of 'Doctor of Public Health' indicating that he has special sanitary knowledge beyond that of the average physician.

Now, to show what advantages accrue. In congested Europe, with immense population, and small rivers, one would naturally think that if typhoid could develop anywhere it could there, yet they have only one case of typhoid fever per hundred thousand, as compared with seven in America, notwithstanding our great waterways and abundant supply of supposedly pure water. It is simply because the people of Europe have gone through the experience we are going through to-day, and through that experience have realized the fact that they must have proper laws and proper carrying out of the laws if they wish to control these diseases. I have a number of other extracts which I shall not occupy the time of hon. gentlemen by reading. I notice in one of the local papers an article in regard to the quality of the water supply. This paper imputes the large death rate among children in Ottawa to impure water. I can hardly agree with that, for the simple reason that the water that is used in the food of infants is generally boiled, and boiling water would kill all the bacteria contained in it. I admit that if water that had not been boiled were put in the milk, it might be the cause of bowel complaint in children. In addition to the typhoid bacilli, we have in water numerous tribes of bacteria which cause diarrhoea, dysentry and cholera morbus and the other complaints of children.

This paper says:

The most important aspect of this question is of course its relation to public health. That a large amount of typhoid in this country was caused by the pollution of our water cannot be disputed. The United States census of 1900 states that during that year there were 35,379 reported deaths from typhoid in the United States. Whipple says that estimating each one to represent a loss of capital to the community of $6,000, the total amount is found to be $212,000,000, and that probably three-fourths of these deaths could have been prevented, and that there was a needless loss of vital capital of about $150,000,000.

We have in this country proceeded so far with a reckless disregard for the future. We have dispoiled our forests, sacrificed many of our natural advantages and saved nothing for the future. That a different policy must be adopted is apparent to every one. It is very probable that many of our cities must eventually look to other sources for their water supplies and a far-sighted policy would consider this and aim to provide such sources as free from pollution as may be necessary.

Minnesota reports that they believe the federal government should have full control of interstate lakes and streams and should be in a position to prevent their pollution.

New Jersey believes that the federal government should act as a court of last resort when a state refuses to co-operate in the work of purifying interstate streams and so on. The opinion of nearly all the states is that the only solution of this question is to place the jurisdiction in some central authority. To show what a difference it actually makes in the typhoid death rate when you get water which may be classed fairly pure, I will refer to one or two of the states mentioned here. In Albany, after the adoption of their filtration plant, fore filteration was employed to 22·2 during the ten-year average dropped from 88·8 be- the ten years since the filters have been installed, and in 1908 the death rate was 10.9 to the 100,000.

In the city of Hudson where the water supply has been changed (in 1905) from the Hudson river to purer small streams, the death rate from typhoid in 1908 was 18·1 as compared with an annual rate of 59·2 during the past ten years.

The death rate from typhoid fever in the city of Poughkeepsie in 1907 was 112·0. The filtration plant was improved in the fall of 1907 and in 1908 the death rate dropped to 34·5. Previous to 1907 the average annual death rate for eight years had been 39·8.

The reduction in the death rate of Ithica after the establishment of filtration plant was 79·6; Albany, 75·0; Binghamton, 68·7; Watertown, 60·5; Hudson, 55·6; Rensselaer, 53·7; Schenectady, 45·1; Troy, 44·5; Hornell, 44·3; Elmira, 39·7. That is both sewage and filtration plant. They had a reduction of eight per cent.

Whilst in this country we have not legislated very extensively with regard to the health of human beings, we have legislated in regard to animals, chapter 75 of the statutes of 1906 is an Act respecting infectious diseases of animals. The United States has a similar Act. I have something here which I would like to quote in regard to that which shows the feeling of prominent men in this matter. In President Roosevelt's message to Congress, he says:

One of the most striking features was the recommendation that we should conserve not only material, but also our vital resources. As he said, we must remove the reproach that this nation takes more care for the lives of its hogs and cattle than for the lives of human beings.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—What is the hon. gentleman quoting from?

Hon. Mr. DE VEBER—From a magazine known as 'American Health.' If you will look into the statistics you will find that there is no system of uniform national regulation for the preservation of the health of the people of Canada but we have them regarding other animals. For instance, the following regulation in the case of fish:

No person shall place or pass, or allow to pass, into treaty waters any substance offensive to fishes, injurious to fish life or destructive to fish fry or to the food of fishes or of fish fry, unless permitted so to do under any law passed by the legislative authority having jurisdiction.

I am not going to enter into an argument over the jurisdiction of this House in regard to the right to pass legislation concerning public health. That was discussed when the Bill of the hon. gentleman from Ottawa was being considered; but I should like to call attention to the fact that if the Dominion government has the power to legislate in regard to the health of animals and in regard to the pollution of streams that would injure the life or health of fish, or even the food of fish, surely it should have the power to legislate in regard to the pollution of waters that would destroy human life. I may say we have some provincial laws covering these things. We have an Ontario Act passed in 1897 which provides that:

No sewage domestic or factory refuse excremental or other polluting matter of any kind whatsoever, which either by itself or in connection with other matter, corrupts or impairs or may corrupt or impair the quality of the water of any source of public supply for domestic use in any city, town, incorporated village, or other municipality, or which renders or may render such water injurious to health, shall be placed or be discharged into the waters, or placed or deposited on the ice of any such source of water supply; nor within such distance thereof as may be considered unsafe by the provincial board of health, and any person who shall offend against any provision of this section, shall, upon summary conviction be liable to a penalty of not more than $100 for each offence, and each week's continuation after notice.

The weakness of this provincial legislation lies in the granting of power to the Board of Health to say whether the pollution of the water, say one hundred yards, or one hundred miles if you like, from the source of supply, constitutes a breach of the Act. It is not intended to prevent lake and stream pollution generally. It is merely a selfish act, one might say. In Toronto, the authorities were consulted, and in fact had to be consulted, before the water was taken from the lake to supply the city, and they had to make some changes in their intake pipe and extend it into deeper water. It was considered by the Board of Health that they had gone as far as was necessary to make the public health safe, yet what do we find right here to-day:

TYPHOID IN TORONTO.

(G.N.W. press despatch.)

Toronto, Feb. 22.—That a sewage laden sand bar has been formed at the mouth of the intake pipe off the island was the surprising statement made by Mayor Geary at the board of control meeting to-day. He stated briefly that soundings taken by the city engineer had proved this to be the case.

There is a possible danger of the sewage laden sand finding its way into the intake pipe and not only contaminating the water but possibly choking up the whole intake at the elbow. The city engineer is taking measures to prevent anything of the kind happening.

That is in Toronto. In the Northwest Territories we had a statute on this matter, the statute 1898, but I am sorry to say that it has never been carried into effect generally. Perhaps some man would throw a dead horse or steer on the bank of the river above somebody else's property, who would lay an information before the police, and the offender would be fined for it; but there was no general carrying out of the law at all. In Alberta we have had for some three years a law that practically was one of the first Acts passed by the provincial legislature, that no pollution of any kind could be placed in any river, stream or lake in Alberta. It was to have gone into force two years ago on the first of April, but, owing to the health authorities wishing to find out exactly what was the best system of sewage disposal to adopt, it was deferred, and does not come into effect until the 1st of April next. In the city in which I reside, money has been voted to provide a septic tank and filtration plant, and I think that every city almost in Alberta has made preparations to take the thing up properly. I do not know whether Saskatchewan has passed such an Act, but I know that they intend to do so, and it will become law. What we want is not laws that will govern one part of the country and not another. We want no laws to protect Ottawa from having polluted water, and not have the same law protect the people below Ottawa. If any protection is to be afforded at all, the law, to be effective, must be uniform, and we can have no uniformity if nine provinces are legislating each to suit themselves. The only solution is to have the control in one government, not necessarily with a minister at its head, but attached to some one of the existing departments, with power to make regulations. My scheme would be that this department should have the making and issuing of regulations which would govern the whole of Canada in regard to public health; but under the advice of the health officers of each and every province who would meet in Ottawa annually to discuss these health questions as they affected their individual province, and come to an agreement as to what was best. The department would embody these suggestions into regulations and overlook the enforcement of them. The department would have control, but it would not be necessary for it to carry out details because that would have to be done the same as it is in England, by the local boards of health. You would then have a central body able to control things, and the legislation would be uniform throughout the whole Dominion, and we could get better results. Our report is simply that these matters should be drawn to the attention of the Conservation Commission and that they be asked to take the matter up, to call a meeting of the health authorities of the different provinces and come to some conclusion, if it would not be possible by some co-operation between the provinces and Dominion to have some such plan as I have outlined here carried out. I feel certain from the talk I have had with the health authorities of some of the different provinces that they would be only too glad to accede to it, and I think that if the Conservation Commission, which is a non-political body, which represents the provincial government as much as the Dominion government, and which also has the power to hold conferences with the United States with regard to the international streams, took the matter up, there would be no trouble at all, and the legislation we desire would be brought into force without any delay.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS—I have no desire to occupy the attention of this House for any length of time, or even to submit any argument in favour of due attention being paid to this question. I am satisfied personally that the intelligence of this honourable body is quite sufficient to secure any legislation that would be deemed necessary. I rise as a member of the Committee on Public Health, and one who gave close attention to all the meetings last session, when a report was prepared to encourage our chairman in his efforts to make the work a success, and to say that I am much more in favour of the method recommended by the committee than that which is recommended in the Bill of the hon. gentleman from Ottawa. Simply enacting a law with a penalty attached is not likely to bear that fruit we desire to see, and the method that is proposed by the committee—and we were quite unanimous about it—was to leave the matter in the hands of the Conservation Commission. There is, however, an idea which I wish to throw out without travelling in the path which has been gone over by the hon. member from Ottawa so ably. He made an able speech in defence of his Bill. Much of it was not new to the members of our committee, but it certainly was of great advantage to the House; as some of the ideas and methods suggested would no doubt be new to many wh are not of the medical profession. But I wish to call attention to the statement that was made, and to which our chairman has referred very briefly; that is the reference to the great death rate of infants in our cities. I have given a great deal of attention to the subject for the past thirty years; perhaps, more than many members of this House know. I have made it a special study. A German chemist would not attribute the large death rate amongst children to the presence of typhoid germs. There may be such cases. Where water is used in preparing food for children it is generally boiled, and the danger is small. In my opinion, the large death rate of children is due to another state of things. I have not heard any one suggest the real difficulty. If to-day a census could be taken to show how many mothers in the city are capable of nursing their children, I believe the number would be found to be very small. In a city like Ottawa, where we have wealth, high society, high living, late hours, and a great tax upon the ladies in entertainment of one kind and another, there is a strain on the nervous system which, perhaps, they do not count upon, but very few Canadian ladies are able to nurse their own children. The duty is given to professional nurses or parties hired for that purpose, and to a large extent we have to face the difficulty of artificial feeding. Now, this covers the whole difficulty in reference to the death rate of children here or in any other city. It is a known fact that from year to year fewer women in this country are able to nurse their own children. The death rate amongst children, as I have said, is due to this cause, that we are not giving to children under eighteen months or two years the nourishment that is suited to them at that period. The saliva of the child under eighteen months being deficient in certain chemical qualities is suited only to the food which the mother should supply. The principle which the chemists are pleased to call ptylin is given by the Creator to the child later on. If artificial food is necessary, milk is generally used. Now, milk contains caseine, the cheese forming ingredient. No one would think of feeding an infant on cheese, because it could not digest it. I remember being called out at two o'clock in the morning to attend a child who was in great distress. The mother told me she had fed it with canned salmon, and I did not wonder that there was no sleep in that House.

If we take the caseine in cows' milk and give it to the child that has not got in the saliva the element nature depends upon for getting the proper nourishment, we are in error. That is the point I wish to emphasize. We are giving food to a child at a certain age, when nature has not provided the wherewithal to deal with that food. We are told by the mayor of this city that when we attend to the bottle in which the milk is distributed we shall have the best milk supplied in any city in the country, and that the difficulty of supplying pure milk for infants will thus be got over; but when he looks into the chemistry of it, he will find that the artificial food thus supplied to nourish children leads simply to their destruction. Every doctor knows that a child cannot digest caseine, cannot find the nourishment in it that nature demands, and when it becomes lodged in the bowels it becomes putrid and brings about all sorts of trouble. The child is not nourished, and it dwindles, and is laid away among the multitudes that die every summer from the same causes. It is said that one-third of the human family pass away within the age of two years, and very much of that mortality is due to the fact that infants are not getting suitable nourishment. I throw out this hint in the hope that it may be useful, that others may look into the whole question as I have done. When caseine is eliminated from the food of children under two years old, you will have no diarrhœa, no indigestion; you will have an improved condition of health. I may be asked, what would you substitute? But that is another question. I could talk for an hour or two on that if necessary. The point is, that you had better cut out the milk and use instead a spoonful of sweet cream. I should like if the attention of the government could be turned to this point, that it is not bad water that is causing such infant mortality; it is the fact that fewer and fewer of our Canadian mothers are able to nurse their children. The other day, when the speech of the hon. member for Ottawa was delivered, an employee of this House came running after me, and said: 'Doctor, I have had so many children, and they have had their mother's milk, and I have saved every one of them.' I think we could save a great many more children if others followed his wife's example. I think I have struck a note that may be helpful in seeking to counteract the lamentable state of things by which so many of the human family are swept away in infancy. I want to speak of the recommendation of the committee, that we should leave the means to be employed to counteract the condition of things we believe to exist, with the Conservation Commission, rather than pass a Bill and impose penalties, which I am sure will not secure the attention to the whole question that its importance deserves.

HENRY ALEXANDER WISE WOOD PATENT BILL

COMMITTEE'S REPORT ADOPTED.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH moved concurrence in the report of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills on Bill (H) An Act respecting certain patents of Henry Alexander Wise Wood.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Could the hon. gentleman inform the Senate whether any changes are suggested in the Bill itself? Are any amendments recommended by the committee?

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—The committee decided that there was not sufficient ground given to prove the preamble of the Bill; that the fee had been allowed to remain unpaid for so long a time that they would not grant the prayer of the petition, and another fact was the manufacturing which should have taken place in Canada, had not been carried out. For these reasons, they have not granted the prayer of the petition.

The motion was agreed to.

OTTAWA, MONTREAL AND EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

REFERRED BACK TO COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE moved concurrence in the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours to Bill (No. 107) An Act to incorporate the Ottawa, Montreal and Eastern Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN moved that the report be not now concurred in, but that it be referred back to the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, for reconsideration.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—We should have some explanation.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The amendment which is contained in the report requires the consent of the municipalities before the railway bridge and tunnel are constructed. The idea was that the consent should be limited to the city of Montreal as to the building of the bridge or tunnel and not to the building of the two or three hundred miles of railway east and west of Montreal. The amendment goes further than it was intended; therefore, it is but just that the Bill be sent back to the committee to be reconsidered.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I am in receipt of a communication from the City Council of Montreal. It is to the effect that the city, which is most deeply interested in this Bill, does not wish the proposition, which has been mentioned by my hon. friend, to be carried.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—All the members think that.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—All the members do not do their duty by opposing the wishes of the city of Montreal.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Would the hon. gentleman read the communication he has received from the city of Montreal?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I have not got it here. I am giving it from memory. The proposition is this: If the amendment which was carried at the last meeting of the railway committee is sent back to the committee again, there is a chance that it will be modified so that it will only affect the city of Montreal as at present constituted. The object of the promoters of this Bill having been frustrated as far as the city of Montreal is concerned, they are moving down to a little place outside of the city of Montreal, known as Maisonneuve. What they cannot get in the city of Montreal, even through this parliament, they expect to get in that small municipality.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—How many miles would you limit it to?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—To the whole island, the great metropolis of the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—The hon. gentleman voted to leave it to the whole Dominion a while ago.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—This is only a subterfuge to get from under the control of the city. Members coming from the far east and the far west do not understand the situation so far as the city of Montreal is concerned; but we who are directly representing those interests feel it our duty, irrespective of corporate interests and the interests of private individuals and friends, to put before this honourable House the requirements, needs and demands of the city of Montreal. There is to-day a movement to have all the municipalities on the island of Montreal formed into one great city. We have succeeded within the past five or six years in bringing into the city of Montreal several of the outlying municipalities, and it is the object of the rulers of the city to make the island of Montreal one great metropolis. Maisonneuve is the nearest municipality to the point where this bridge or tunnel is to be constructed, and the suburb may become part of Montreal within six or seven months. What Montreal will succeed in obtaining from this parliament is that no tunnel or bridge can be adopted without the consent of the city authorities. To get over that the suggestion is now made to have the bridge built over and into an outlying municipality.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—The hon. gentleman is out of order. I ask that this Bill be referred back, and the hon. gentleman is imputing motives, saying it is intended to do this, and to do that. I have no such intention.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I do not know that any hon. gentleman who fathers a Bill in this House is responsible for every aspiration of the company he represents. If the hon. gentleman is responsible, then he is right in raising this point of order; but I should like to know if he is aware of what the company wants to do?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—No.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Well, I am.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—That can be brought out in committee.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The question at issue now is whether the Bill should be referred back to give this company an opportunity to have the city control the matter, or let the company enter the city in a devious way. We know that the company came to parliament to-day to force an entry into the city of Montreal, and to do so they are prepared to go outside of the city and build a tunnel under the St. Lawrence or a bridge over the St. Lawrence. That municipality will be a portion of the city, and one of the most valuable in a short time. No one knows it better than the hon. gentlemen who come from Montreal. Is it fair to send this Bill back to the committee to run such a danger? The committee has put on record that this company should have the consent of the municipalities before doing anything within the municipality. I do not see anything outrageous in that demand.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that railways are built throughout the Dominion under the limitations imposed upon them by the parliament of Canada and the control of the Railway Commission. We have never allowed municipalities to say whether a railway shall pass through them or not. This is a question of public interest which is beyond the consent of the several municipalities. We thought we were making an exception in favour of the city of Montreal, when it was sought to invade it by a bridge or a tunnel; but there are some hundreds of miles of railway asked to be built to the east of Montreal or south of the St. Lawrence, or to the west of the city. There are three or four hundred miles of railway that will be constructed through the province of Quebec and part of Ontario which cannot be made subject to the consent of the municipalities. All that the hon. gentleman has said would be quite appropriate if we were simply incorporating a bridge or tunnel company; but what is lost sight of is the fact that there are four hundred miles of railway to be constructed in Ontario and Quebec.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does the hon. gentleman say that a railway company can lay their rails through the streets of a municipality?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—It comes under the Railway Commission.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I quite agree with the hon. gentleman from De Lanaudiere (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) in regard to the supervision which is exercised by the Railway Board over the construction and the operation of railways in this country. I can appreciate in many, perhaps the majority of cases, their decision; but that does not destroy the principle which ought to underlie all legislation, that home rule begins at home, the best judges of which would be the municipalities or communities, or the representatives thereof, irrespective of any board, commission, or other organization. I say that for this reason: That there is no municipality in the Dominion of Canada that will object to a railway or any other public utility being constructed within its limits. They will not object. On the contrary, they will give their good money in loans or bonuses to railway and other enterprises to come within the limits of the municipality, so that the assumption that a municipality will oppose the construction of a railway through its limits is unfounded. It is against all considerations of good legislation, and the desire of the people to have their municipality benefited. It is, therefore, no hardship whatever, for a company to have to ask a municipality for permission to build a railway through its limits. The ex-leader of the opposition (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell) has pointed out a possible difficulty that might arise if the road had power to pass through a municipality without consulting the local authorities. The railroad might find it advantageous to use a certain street, as in the case when the Canadian Northern wanted to cross a public street on the level entering the city of Ottawa. It took all the city council to fight them, and the Board of Railway Commissioners were influenced by the action of the Ottawa city council to prevent that level crossing. It is true it was not the city council which finally prevented that crossing. The final decision was given by the Board of Railway Commissioners; but the board was largely influenced by expressions of opinion from the mayor, aldermen and public citizens of Ottawa. So when it is required that railroad or other corporations shall obtain the consent of municipalities through which they are to do business, I do not say this is revolutionary or obstructive legislation, because municipalities are only too glad to have new works within their limits; but the municipality should have the right to say under what conditions the work shall be constructed. Suppose a railway company wanted to use one of the main streets of the municipality, as so frequently happens in the United States.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—That is prohibited by the Railway Act in Canada.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The Railway Act does not prohibit anything. It leaves everything to the consideration of the Railway Board. It is no burden on a corporation of any kind, to submit itself to the control of the municipal authorities, because they will not be obstructive. In the building of this bridge or tunnel, which would be of immense advantage to the city of Montreal, it is quite possible that the city might vote them a million dollars, as they have done in the case of the Canadian Pacific railway and other companies. We are not opposed to the construction of a bridge or tunnel. All we ask is that these important works be conducted under municipal, I will not say control, but under municipal advice, and that they shall not interfere with the permanent works which the city is endeavouring to carry out, I am glad to say, under the happy regime which is going to give us honest, clean government, in Montreal for a few years anyhow. That regime, which is largely due to the efforts of gentlemen who have seats in this Chamber, is destined to build up the city of Montreal on a free, honest and economical basis, and along lines with which this parliament will not have the right to interfere. No senator knows that better than the hon. gentleman from De Lanaudiere, and the hon. gentleman from De Lorimier. Under the circumstances, I do not see that there is any necessity to refer this Bill back to the committee. Of course, if the House deems fit to do so, I hope the hon. members who were present at the last meeting will be there again to see that no extra privileges will be given to the company in view of the fact that Montreal is now consolidating the whole island into one great commercial metropolis, and if the object of this reference to the committee is to secure entry into the city by a back door. I shall certainly oppose it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have the honour of being a colleague of the hon. gentleman from Victoria division (Hon. Mr. Cloran) on the committee, and I have some little remembrance of what took place there. The committee inserted clause 11, as follows:

11. The company shall not construct or operate its lines without first obtaining the consent, expressed by by-law, of the municipalities having jurisdiction, over or under, a road, or such other public place and upon terms to be agreed upon with such municipalities.

The hon. members of the committee who voted for that amendment and carried it, were under the impression that they were protecting the rights of the city of Montreal alone, but, afterwards, when they came to look at the resolution, they found that this amendment in the form in which it presents itself to the House now, would practically enable any little rural municipality to blackmail the railway company and to interfere with their constructing their railway anywhere along a line, I think, of about 400 miles in length, and the object of referring the Bill back is to enable the committee to do what they thought they had done, and to undo what they had not intended doing. The hon. gentleman says that every municipality is anxious to have a railway go through it, and only too anxious, and they would receive the railway company with open arms; but there are other ways of looking at that proposition. I can readily understand that in a rural municipality there may be one, perhaps, fairly large settlement, which has a controlling influence in the municipal council, and they may make the point that if the railway does not pass through that particular village, then the municipality would not grant the right of way, and would not allow the company to put their road through the municipality.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—If they did not pass through the village they would not want it at all.

Hon. Mr. POWER—But an interprovincial road 400 miles in length should not be placed in the position of being liable to be held up by any one municipality. The Railway Act amply protects the rights of the municipalities, and there is no precedent for such an amendment as this. There is no case where a long railway line is placed completely in the hands of any one municipality.

The motion was agreed to.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 118) an Act to incorporate the Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company.—Hon. Mr. De Veber.

THE INSURANCE BILL.

AMENDMENTS OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON moved concurrence in amendments made by the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce to Bill (A) An Act respecting insurance.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think this is rather a large order. Is it not proposed to take some other action?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—No, of course I am in the hands of the House. These amendments are of a technical character, and I think any amendments would be better considered on the third reading, if the House has no objection.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This is going to committee.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This is a public Bill and of a very important character, and one would suppose that if amendments are to be proposed it would be much better to do it in Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—But if nobody has any amendments to offer it would not be necessary.

The motion was agreed to.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I move that the Bill be read a third time to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—There may be one or two small amendments to harmonize and carry out the will of the committee, which may be made to-morrow at the third reading. It may be there are some clerical errors, and in one or two instances some clause should have been amended in order to harmonize with changes which are made in other clauses of the Bill. The amendments required will be of no special importance.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I was going to suggest that as this Bill has occupied the attention of the committee for nearly two months it might be taken up after six o'clock.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would point out to my hon. friend, that those amendments are inconsequential, and I presume can readily be made on the third reading without any notice. The law clerk has directed my attention to three inconsequential amendments. Personally I am not aware of any amendment of consequence that it is proposed to incorporate into the Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL— It has been intimated that one or two amendments might be suggested which are not of an inconsequential character. I fully approve of the suggestion made by the leader of the House that these amendments could be made at the third reading, so as to save the trouble of going through the whole Bill in Committee of the Whole. I would suggest that whatever amendments are to be made, whether of a consequential or inconsequential character, notice should be given so that the House can see at once what they are asked to adopt. There can be no objection to that.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—No.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Then third reading on Friday.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—We can put notice of the amendments in the hands of the clerk, perhaps after six o'clock this evening, so that they may appear on the order paper to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I have no amendments to propose; but I may say that the committee gave a great deal of attention to the matters placed before them. When the right hon. gentleman proposed this measure, he distinctly stated that it would go through Committee of the Whole House in the Senate. That question was put to him and that statement was made. I do not know that it is absolutely necessary to carry it out.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—If desired, of course, we will comply; but I have been informed that with the exception of a very slight amendment, no hon. gentleman desires to raise a discussion on the measure, and as this is a very long Bill it would be a tedious matter to put it through Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Perhaps I might be permitted to read a letter in connection with the Bill. I think it should be on the records of the House. It is from the gentleman who took so much pains in regard to the Insurance Bill, and who, everybody knows, is an expert insurance man. It is from the Sun Life Company of Canada, dated Montreal, March 28. I desire to place it on record, because I think it is an act of courtesy and kindness on his part. It reads as follows:

Montreal, March 8, 1910.

Hon. Wm. Gibson,
Chairman, Committee on Banking and Commerce,
The Senate, Ottawa, Ont.

My dear Senator,—Now that the labours of the Banking Committee are over, will you permit me to take the liberty of expressing to you our deep appreciation of the laborious, thoughtful, fair, friendly, and the able manner in which the Senate committee has dealt with this important and troublesome question. The attendance at every committee meeting was surprisingly large, and the deep interest shown by every member, and their grasp of the subject, were a continual wonder to us, and a source of intense satisfaction. It was indeed a pleasure to feel that the life insurance interests of the country were being dealt with by such a thoughtful and able body of men. It was a source of great regret to us to be the unwilling cause of so much trouble, but you and we may now all have the satisfaction of feeling that while the Bill is probably not what any one of us would like in every particular, yet it is really a better piece of insurance legislation than that of any other country or state in the entire world, so far as I know. Permit me to thank through you all the members of the committee for their courtesy and attention.

Sincerely yours,
(Signed) T. B. MACAULAY,
Managing director.

Hon. Mr. BOYER—Might I suggest that a copy of this letter be sent to the member for North Toronto in the House of Commons?

The motion was agreed to.

TRANSPORTATION OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS BILL.

ORDER POSTPONED.

The order of the day being called:

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the motion for the second reading (Bill M) an Act to regulate the transportation of Intoxicating Liquors, and the motion of the Hon. Mr. Domville, in amendment thereto:—'That the said Bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read a second time this day six months.'—(Hon. Mr. Ross, Middlesex).

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I explained yesterday that I had a conference with the hon. gentleman from Middlesex, and discussed the form which I hoped the Bill would take; that is limiting it entirely to a province in which prohibition existed. As there is only one province in which they have prohibition, and that is Prince Edward Island, after the Bill comes from the committee I hope its application will be limited to that one province. In that way I expect the opposition to the Bill will be entirely removed, because it has been asked for from the entire province without any dissent. I read the resolution passed by the provincial legislature asking for this legislation and gave the reason for it, that they did not wish that beyond their own local law liquor should be sold in the province.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I think my hon. friend is out of order in this matter, under the rules of the House.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—The hon. gentleman from Middlesex hoped to be here to-day. I expect that he will be here to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—When the hon. gentleman from Middlesex moved the adjournment of the debate he had concluded his remarks in regard to the question; but he moved the adjournment, according to his own statement, for the purpose of giving the government a chance to consult with the authorities of Prince Edward Island with regard to the matter. That was the object of his adjourning the debate. He had already made his speech when he made this declaration.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the statement made by my hon. friend to my right

(Hon. Mr. Cox) will show that ordinary courtesy would now require that the debate be adjourned until to-morrow. As everybody knows, the hon. gentleman from Middlesex is one of the most able, eloquent and earnest advocates of temperance in the whole country, and he had not completed his observations when the House adjourned the other day. He has been unable to resume on account of illness, and now my hon. friend on my left (Hon. Mr. Cox) says he expects him to be here to-morrow. Under the circumstances, we might let it stand until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I might not be here to-morrow myself. As a matter of courtesy, would the hon. gentleman postpone consideration of the measure if I were not here? I think the Bill should be proceeded with.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The hon. gentleman from Middlesex also adjourned the debate on the Bill regarding the Intercolonial railway branch lines. He is perfectly satisfied to have his say when that matter comes up for third reading to-morrow. The hon. gentleman from Middlesex was distinct and clear in his statements, and if the hon. gentleman from Halifax will refer to the Debates he will see that the hon. gentleman from Middlesex moved the adjournment of the debate simply to give the government a chance to confer with the authorities of Prince Edward Island. I would be sorry to do any thing which would appear disrespectful to the hon. member. I saw him to-day and he expects to be here to-morrow, as he desires to speak on some other questions. I think he wants to make a few remarks on the Insurance Bill and the Intercolonial railway branch lines, but he made no mention of this matter. I do not think the House will show any disrespect, if we decide the question as to whether the Bill should go to committee or not.

Hon. Mr. BOYER—I would inquire from the hon. promoter of the Bill if there is any necessity for going on with the measure after the declaration that the people of Prince Edward Island are perfectly satisfied to have the Bill apply only to Prince Edward Island. Has the Dominion of Canada any business passing legislation affecting one province alone? The hon. gentleman from Middlesex declared in his very clever speech that it had been decided by the Privy Council that each province had a perfect right to pass any prohibitory law, even forbidding the manufacture of liquor within that province. If such a right exists according to the decision of the Privy Council, what is the necessity for this Bill? Are we going to legislate specially for Prince Edward Island? If Prince Edward Island wants such legislation, let its own legislature legislate for itself, but do not make parliament legislate for one corner of the Dominion. If the people of Prince Edward Island want to get drunk on five gallons, I have no objection. If they want prohibition, it strikes me this is the wrong way to go about it. Why not limit the supply to one bottle? I simply raise the point to ask the hon. promoter of the measure what he thinks of it.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—The object of the Bill is to prosecute persons who are constantly violating the law outside of the province. The province has no control outside its own borders, and it is for the purpose of preventing liquor from being sent into the province. A similar law was passed two years ago in regard to the Canada Temperance Act, and the House discussed the subject then, and, without division, passed a similar law. It is persons outside who are to be affected by the Bill.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—How are the Prince Edward Island authorities going to prosecute people outside who send liquor in from another province, when the Bill is only applicable to the province of Prince Edward Island?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—The chief trouble in Prince Edward Island is caused by parties who smuggle liquor into the Island. It is for the purpose of checking that illicit trade, the same kind of illicit trade which is carried on in the Yukon and other places.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—We have in the province of Ontario what is called the local option law. Will this Bill apply to local option counties in Ontario?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—No, it is limited to Prince Edward Island.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—But it would prevent the importation into local option townships?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Then it would be interfering with the jurisdiction of the province. The province has a perfect right to pass an Act that liquor shall not be sent in to any local option town. This parliament can interfere and protect the province from the action of an outside province.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I live in a part of the country where local option is in force. The district from the city of Hamilton to the city of St. Catharines, with the exception of the little village of Jordan, is under local option. Grimsby has lately repealed the local option Act, however. I regret to say that in my own village, Beamsville, local option has been a farce so far as the enforcement of the law is concerned. Every conceivable kind of excuse is made to bring whisky into the village, and you cannot go to church on Sunday morning without seeing an empty bottle at the door of some one who is known to be a temperance sympathizer. During the time the Scott Act was in force, my own men lost more time in one month than they did for any three years after the repeal of the Act.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—It was not enforced.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Yes it was enforced for three years in the county of Lincoln, and then the people repealed it. During the time it was in force in my county—and the hon. member from Victoria who is a native of the county will bear me out in what I am saying—on Saturday, if there was the slightest appearance of rain, my men had to absent themselves from their work and they went to St. Catharines, where the Act was not in force, and brought home liquor inside of themselves or in jugs. There is more whisky brought into Beamsville under the Temperance Act than there was under the License Act. Under the License Act the regulations were so well enforced that no man could get liquor during prohibited hours. What is the result to-day, under present conditions? One train leaves Hamilton, every night about 11 o'clock, that is called the grog train. Young men and old wait for the arrival of the grog train and get liquor and take it to barns and other places, where they sit and drink it until the last drop is drained. I am talking from what I know--from information received from others and what I see myself on Sunday mornings, and I am prepared to substantiate every statement I make that as far as the local option law is concerned in the county of Lincoln it is a dead letter. I will give you an experience which took place under the Scott Act. Whisky was distributed in tea pots and poured into tea cups. A medical man has been speaking about feeding children with tea; that was the kind of tea supplied from these tea pots. Another mode of selling whisky was men were supposed to buy pipes, and whisky was provided free in order to evade the law.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—What part of Canada is the hon. gentleman talking about?

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—About the province of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Where were their moral principles?

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I am sorry to say further, that the Scott Act did more to create bad evidence than anything else. People foreswore themselves rather than tell the truth with regard to where they got the liquor. I have great respect for Prince Edward Island and its people. If they are as good as the ex-Secretary of State has said—and I have no reason to doubt it—we are going out of our way to legislate for that proivnce. Manitoba has a provincial law; why could not the same law be enacted in Prince Edward Island instead of coming here for legislation?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN. Does the hon. gentleman in charge of this Bill really think he is putting an effectual piece of legislation on the statute-books of this country? If his explanation, that this parliament has a right to prevent one province from sending intoxicating liquor into another province where prohibition prevails, I want to know if he has taken into consideration the fact that there are eight other provinces which can send liquor into Prince Edward Island? Is he aware of the fact that there is also the United States to the south, and the British Islands on the other side of the ocean, and, moreover, that this government has entered into a treaty with France which provides for the importation of wine? Will he say that his legislation will be effective in punishing these people if they send liquor here? If his legislation does not include them, it will be inadequate.

The SPEAKER—I call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that there is nothing before the House, no motion having been made.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved that the order be discharged, and that the said debate be adjourned until to-morrow, and to be the first order of the day after the third readings.

The Senate divided on the motion, which was adopted.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (99) An Act respecting the Vancouver, Victoria and Eastern Railway and Navigation Company.—Hon. Mr. Bostock.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

THE SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 10, 1910.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

REPORT OF THE INTERNAL ECONOMY AND CONTINGENT ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON presented the report of the Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts recommending the appointment of a French translator, and moved that rules 24a and (h) be suspended.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON moved that the report be concurred in.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am somewhat at a loss to understand the principle upon which these appointments are based. I do not refer to this one particularly. We find that of late years we have gentlemen appointed to different positions of a not very important character, who had not at the time, nor for some time afterwards, qualified themselves under the law for such positions. More than that, we find that some have been placed on the staff at a much higher salary than the duties they have to perform justify, while others—and this one particularly, as I am informed—are recommended for appointment at a lower salary than has been given to others, though as I understand the duties to be performed are of a much higher and important character than others to whom I have referred. My principal reason for calling attention to this, is the fact that we have been, since the new Civil Service Act came into force making appointments irrespective of the requirements of the service, of gentlemen who have had no experience in the duties they are called upon to perform. The gentleman who is recommended in this report for appointment is, I am informed, a gentleman not only of high character, but of exceptional ability for the duties which he has to perform as translator, having to do the work of others who are appointed at a higher salary. Let me illustrate what I mean. We appointed a short time ago, on the recommendation of the Speaker who acted for the Senate, and under the law, as he supposed it was, what is termed a chief of clerks of committees. No such office existed prior to that appointment, and the duties to be performed by that official are not of a character that would justify giving him an extra five hundred dollars per annum over and above the class in which he was appointed. If we look at the Civil Service Act we will find that the 33rd clause gives power to the Senate, on the recommendation of the Speaker, to add five hundred dollars to the minimum salary of $1,900. The chief clerk of committees had that $500 added to the minimum rate at which he should have been appointed. Why, I am at a loss to know. Any one who has been in the habit of attending committees knows very well that the duties to be performed by such an official are not of a character to justify that increase. We have, in this instance, a gentleman to whose ability I have already called attention—of course, I am speaking on information of which I have no personal knowledge—appointed to fill a position which other translators have not filled, as I understand it, to the satisfaction of those who have had to have their Bills translated into French. I have noticed in the report made by the Clerk to the Speaker, and laid before the Senate, that this man has exceptional ability. Then why is the salary of only $1,900 recommended in his case, while an officer has been appointed who requires no particular qualification beyond sitting at the table and recording what we do, appointed at a salary of $2,100? It is a mystery to me. I cannot understand it, unless it is on the old principle that kissing goes by favour. If you consult section 21 of the Civil Service Act you will find that an officer can be appointed, if he possess special qualifications, without any examination by the Civil Service Commission or certificate of his qualifications other than the fact that he is recommended. Then section 33 gives the Senate power, through the Speaker, to add to the salary of a specially qualified official, in addition to the minimum sum at which he should be appointed, to the extent of $500. If there is to be any principle by which appointments are to be governed, surely it ought to be that when a man is appointed to any position requiring special qualifications, his salary should not be cut down to two or three hundred dollars less than the salary of a man appointed to fill a position created apparently for his special benefit, and who has no special qualifications. I have no desire to pursue this question further. I am not actuated by any feeling for or against these men, but it seems strange to me that this difference should be made in the two appointments. The object of adopting the present system of making appointments was to remove them from all political favouritism and to base them on qualifications alone. That is why I bring this matter before the Senate. I have no personal knowledge of the qualifications of the gentleman whose appointment we are now considering. My object in bringing the matter to the attention of the Senate is to express the opinion that we should be guided by some principle other than favouritism, if favouritism prevails in these appointments.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I think I can give the hon. gentleman the reason for fixing the salary in this instance at $1,900, because I was in consultation with His Honour the Speaker, when the question of salary came up. His Honour had something to guide him—the report of the Internal Economy Committee last year, recommending that the salary for this very position should be fixed at $1,800. The amount having been so fixed, His Honour was disposed to abide by the amount fixed, namely $1,800; but in this instance the gentleman named in the report refused to accept less than $2,000. After reconsidering the position, he agreed to take $1,900. His Honour the Speaker made it $100 more than the salary fixed last year, in order to be in harmony, as far as possible, with the policy adopted by the committee.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—I do not understand the hon. gentleman from Hastings (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell) to have any special objection to this recommendation. If I understood him aright, his objection was to some of the appointments made last session. At that time, there was considerable confusion as to what the powers of the Senate were in the application of the new Civil Service Act to appointments made by this House. In this matter of reference to the committee, we found the recommendation of the Speaker was that the appointment should be made under sub-division (a) division 2, salary $1,600 to $2,100. Provision is made under section 23 to increase that amount to a sum not exceeding $500 above the minimum salary. The information the committee had of the fitness of the gentleman for the office and the work he had to do, satisfied them that the recommendation could be properly made under the Act.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does the hon. gentleman refer to the present appointment, or the one of last year?

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—The case that is before us now. I understood the reference made by the hon. gentleman from Hastings was more particularly applicable to the action of the Senate last year than to the action of the committee this year. I have given the reasons why the committee felt justified in making this recommendation. The question of salary I regarded as important so long as the Committee on Contingent Accounts continues to deal with financial matters. The expenditure of money of the Sanate is practically a work which devolves on this committee, and in making the recommendation that $1,900 should be the initial salary for this appointment if they found no provision in the Act, it would be a matter for consideration how a recommendation of this character would conform to the provisions of the Civil Service Act. But, under the section I have referred to, appointments for technical work, provision is made for the salaries under the several divisions and classifications. One section says that the official appointed in one of these divisions cannot receive more than the minimum salary. Now this recommendation carried with it $300 more than the minimum salary for the class under which the appointment is made. The matter was considered by the committee, and the reasons given in the recommendation by the Speaker were such that the committee felt it was proper the recommendation should be accepted.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman has misunderstood me altogether. The reason I referred to the appointment of last year was to draw the distinction between appointing a man to a new office just created, and which, to my mind, was unnecessary, at a salary of $2,100, and the appointment of the gentleman recommended in the report because of his superior abilities for the position, at a salary of $1,900. That is the only reason I drew attention to the matter. I should like to direct the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that his interpretation of the law is not correct. The same law existed last year that prevails to-day, and if he will read section 33 of the Act he will find that power is given to the Senate to add $500 to the minimum sum. It says:

The salary of appointment shall be the minimum salary attached to the position, provided that in case the qualifications required for the performance of the duty of the position are of an exceptional character, a further sum not exceeding $500 may be added to that minimum salary.

That law existed last year as well as now. My hon. friend says he looks upon financial matters of that kind as coming under the jurisdiction of the Internal Economy Committee. I repeat what I stated the other day, that the Internal Economy Committee have nothing whatever to do with it. The law provides that the recommendation shall be made by the speaker, and it is a mere formal affair to send it to any committee. I could understand the position of the hon. gentleman who explained why the appointment was made at a salary of $1,900, if it had been said to the gentleman 'you can have the position at a certain salary, and we will give you no more.' It would then be for the gentleman to be appointed to say whether he would accept or not. That does not answer the point I take. I say we ought to have some fixed principle, based upon common sense, in making these appointments, and we certainly have not been acting on any fixed principle in the cases to which I have called attention.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Is not the hon. gentleman too late in speaking now of the appointment of last session? The appointment was made on the recommendation of the Speaker, after having been referred to the Contingent Accounts Committee. The Senate having the right to pass on the recommendation of the Speaker, I cannot understand why we could not send it to one of the standing committees to obtain information or to be reported on. This having been done, and the report being made, and being submitted to the Senate, and being adopted unanimously by the House, it seems to me the hon. gentleman, with the other members of the House, is responsible for the amount then assented to.

The SPEAKER—May I be permitted to say a word by way of explanation? With reference to the appointment made last year of the chief clerk of committees, it must be borne in mind that a large number of new committees have been added to the standing committees of this House. It will also be borne in mind that for the closing part of the previous session and the beginning of last session, a large amount of extra work was entailed by the active operation of so many of those committees, and my attention was called by more than one of the chairmen of committees, to the necessity of having more officials added to the staff. The then staff was not adequate, and could not attend all the meetings that were being held on one day. In consequence of that, the appointment was made of a chief clerk of committees, whose duty it would be to see that every committee was properly officered by a clerk. Upon information I got I recommended then the creation of the new office, and upon that I also recommended the person who was appointed. With reference to the question of salaries, it depended entirely upon the class to which that official should be assigned. He was assigned to the sub-division, the minimum of which was the salary which was awarded to him, so that it was in that way the appointment was made. Now, it will be borne in mind that, following the custom of determining what the salaries should be, and looking at the different classifications that there were in the Senate, I found French translators were in a class by themselves, and were paid very much less than the clerks of the House; therefore, it seemed to me, if that were the view of the Senate, I was bound to recognize that condition and place the official so appointed in the class with others discharging the same kind of duty and receiving the minimum salary pertaining to that particular division. That is the whole principle by which I was guided, and that is the way in which the one comes in the subdivision with the minimum salary, the subdivision which gives him that being of a higher grade than the French translator, whose remuneration all along, both before and since the new classification, has been much less than the clerk in discharge of the other duties. If I did wrong in adopting the view which had been for many years adopted by the Senate in fixing the salaries, it was open at the time for any one to move in the matter, and as it was not challenged, responsibility for it must rest upon the Senate.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The ground taken by the hon. gentleman is that the position of chief clerk of committees, being much more important than that of French translator, it justified putting him in that class.

The SPEAKER—I find the clerk of routine proceedings, the correspondence clerk and accountant, chief clerk of committees and the chief translator and the clerks of the Standing Orders and Private Bills Committees, are all being paid minimum salaries which are higher than French translators, who are in a class by themselves and paid from $200 to $300 less than the clerks of committees. It seems to me that was a guide to me in determining what sum should be paid.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We have an official receiving $2,100 a year, who has three or four months' work to perform, and we give a translator who works a much longer period a great deal less.

Hon. Mr. KERR—We have four clerks who are being paid higher salaries, and who have been paid these salaries for years before.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then you are doing an injustice.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think attention should be drawn to the fact that our translators are in subdivision (a) of the second division. That gives them from $1,600 to $2,100. But in the House of Commons they are in another class. They are in a class they should be in by law. We have not acted according to law in making our classification. Clause 5 says:

> The inside service under deputy heads, excluding messengers, porters, assorters and packers, and such other appointments and employments in the lower grades as are determined by the Governor in Council, shall be divided into three divisions.

That division is made by the Governor in Council; that is, by the Senate in the present instance.

The first division shall be divided into:—
Subdivision (a) consisting of officers having the rank of deputy heads, but not being deputy heads administering departments, assistant deputy ministers, and the principal technical and administrative and executive officers.
Subdivision (b) consisting of the lesser technical and administrative and executive officers, including the chief clerks now holding office and not eligible for subdivision (a).

I contend that the translators should be in class (b), and that division is the division pointed out to us by the law, so that they are not in their place. The chief clerks are in their place, but not the technical officers. The increase given to this officer is only $300. It is not $500, because if he had been put in the other class, he would receive only $1,600, and if the $500 had been added, it would amount to $2,100. He is receiving only $1,900. Why was that distinction made? If an increase should be made, when the law gives it as $500, I do not see why it is cut down to $300. Is it because he has not the ability required? I do not think so. But you might infer that it is so, because he is not up to the mark. If an increase is to be given, it should be given as the law provides, unless there are good reasons to say he is not worth the increase. Our classification should be made as much according to law as they have it in the House of Commons, and our employees should not be placed on a lower footing than those of the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—This matter has been before the Senate for several sessions, and I have to bear testimony, as regards the French translators, to the effect that the Senate is not doing them justice. We have on our staff of French translators men who have a reputation as writers, and authors, men who have been decorated by the French Academy, and by France. We are paying them a very small salary. I think it is not fair that this honourable House should exact from them services for which they are not paid, and that is what we are doing. Some of them are getting $1,800, $1,900, $2,000 and $2,100 per year. I contend that the French translators on our staff are the most eminent men in the Dominion of Canada as far as the French language is concerned. I am glad the hon. senator from Stadacona has mentioned that. I cannot now increase their salary, but I want to put their merits before the country, and the fact that the country is not paying them adequately for their services. As this honourable House can, either by itself, or through its committee or otherwise, secure a proper recognition of their services, I shall be in favour of the motion, and I know whereof I speak. You cannot replace these men for the money we are paying them, and it is a crying shame that the parliament of this country should exact from its servants exceptional service for a pauper fee.

The motion was agreed to.

SALE OF MILK TO IMMIGRANTS AT QUEBEC.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

1. Does the government or the Department of the Interior know whether, in the past, milkmen in general might sell their milk for or to immigrants disembarking at Quebec on the arrival of each transatlantic vessel?
2. Is it the case that quite recently notices have been given to several milkmen, either by the department itself or in its name, notifying those vendors that a contract for the sale or the furnishing of milk had just been given to a person of the name of Guay, of St. Joseph de Levis?
3. Is it the case that this Mr. Guay is to monopolize for the next season the sale of milk for or to immigrants disembarking at Quebec?
4. Has a contract been made to that effect, or has the immigration agent at Quebec received instructions from the authorities enjoining him not to allow any longer milkmen in general to sell their products upon the government wharfs, but to reserve this exclusive privilege to the Mr. Guay above mentioned only?
5. When were such instructions given or when was such a contract signed?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows:

1. Yes.
2. Yes.
3. Yes.
4. Yes.
5. The contract is effective for one year from January 1, 1910, subject to renewal if the plan works satisfactorily.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —There is no objection to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

INSURANCE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the third reading of Bill (A) An Act respecting insurance.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE moved in amendment:

That the said Bill be not now read a third time, but that 1, section 31 be amended by striking out in lines 11 and 12, the words 'office of the superintendent' and substituting therefor the word 'department.'

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Would my hon. friend explain the difference between the two expressions, or is there any distinction?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—No, but in committee, for convenience of reference, the word 'superintendent' was changed into 'department,' and the change was made in a number of cases, but was overlooked in that clause.

The motion was agreed to

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE moved:

2. That in section 98, p. 39, after the word 'directors' in line 29, the following be added:—

Provided however, that in case of liquidation of the company, the policy-holder as such member shall not be entitled to share in the distribution of the assets or be liable to be placed on the list of contributories.

He said: The reason for this motion is that the participating policy-holders are made members of the company, and it raises a question as to whether, in being made members of the company, they would not be entitled, in case of liquidation, to participate in the distribution of assets, or be made liable to be placed in the list of contributories. This amendment interferes in no shape or form with the policy of the Bill as adopted by the committee, but is merely for the purpose of making it clear that including the policy-holders as members of the company shall not entitle them to participate in the assets, or make them contributories.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I yesterday placed upon the Order Paper a notice of motion proposing to amend the clause substantially as my hon. friend's motion would amend it. I may say I have more sympathy for my own motion than for his. I very much doubt whether his motion will be sufficient to change the clause as it was intended. It was not intended that participating policy-holders shall be members of the company for other than a specific purpose, namely that of attending annual meetings, or general meetings, and participating in the affairs of the company so far as those general meetings are concerned; but if they are made members of the company as they would be under my hon. friend's motion, they would occupy the same status practically as shareholders, and be entitled to the same rights as the shareholders with reference to matters other than what might come before a general meeting, and which rights were never intended to be extended to participating policy-holders. I am not prepared to define what those rights might be, but it occurs to me that it was not intended that the participating policy-holders should have access to the books of the company, and other rights of that kind to which shareholders are entitled. The purpose in view could be effected, it seems to me, under the amendment offered in my notice of motion which reads as follows:

That the said Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be amended by striking out in subsection 7 of section 98 in the 26th and 27th lines thereof the words 'a member of the company and be' and by striking out in paragraph (i) of section 146, in line 46 the words 'a member of the company and be' and also the words in the 47th line 'in person or by proxy.'

That is to say, the participating policy-holders should have all the rights specifically mentioned in the 98th clause, without being placed in all respects on the same footing as a shareholder. It seems to me that the adoption of the hon. gentleman's amendment would lead to inconceivable difficulties. We are importing into the Act an entirely new phraseology, which, possibly, may be interpreted in a technical way by the courts, and which of itself has no interpretation at present. We should attempt to give effect to the object we have in view, namely that the participating shareholders shall be made members of the company for the purpose of attending meetings and electing directors. I do not think it was the intention of the committee to go beyond the recognition of that principle, and that principle would be properly embodied in the clause by adopting my amendment.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I think the hon. gentleman would go beyond the object he wants to attain, if he struck out the word 'members,' and did not give them the standing of members in the company, because he would considerably restrict the privilege of the participating policy-holder in his right to discuss and vote at a general meeting. The policy laid down by the committee was that he should have as much right to attend and discuss and participate in the affairs of the company at the annual and general meetings as a shareholder.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I assumed that the attention of the Chamber had been directed to the powers specifically mentioned as having been conferred upon the participating policy-holders in the early part of the clause, namely in subclause 3, of clause 98:

The shareholders' directors shall be elected by the shareholders, and the policy-holders' directors shall be elected by the participating policy-holders.

And again at line 35 in subsection 8:

The policy-holders' directors shall meet with the shareholders' directors and shall have a vote on all business matters.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—That is, the directors.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then in subsection I, in clause 146, it is specifically stated that the participating policy-holder shall be a member of the company and shall be entitled to attend and vote in person or by proxy, at all general meetings of the company. That manifestly was the policy of the committee that they should have those rights, and only those rights which have been specifically prescribed, whereas if they were made members of the company, inferentially they will have all the rights relating to shareholders who are in law regarded as the only members of the company.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—This is no new departure, because the hon. gentleman will find that in thirteen companies incorporated by this parliament the same principle is recognized. Take the Confederation Life, chapter 54 of the statutes of 1871, the 7th section is as follows:

Sec. 7. The members of said association shall be all persons having subscribed stock therein, or become shareholders, and all persons actual holders of policies from the said association (whether such holders of policies shall be holders of shares or not in the said association) who shall, by the terms of the said policies, be entitled to participate in profits, and who are otherwise known as holders of 'participating policies,' and such holders of participating policies shall also be entitled to participate in the management and earning of the same as herein provided.

There are a number of charters in which the policy-holders are made members of the company.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does the charter so express it?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The Manufacturers Life, incorporated in 1901, contains the following:

Sec. 13. At all general meetings of the company, each shareholder present or represented by proxy, who has paid all calls due upon his share in the capital stock of the company, shall have one vote for each share held by him. Every proxy must be himself a member and entitled to vote. Each person holding a policy from the company or a policy from the manufacturers company or the temperance company, whether such person is a shareholder of the company or not, who is by the terms of his policy entitled to participate in profits and who has paid all premiums due on such policy, shall be a member of the company, and shall have one vote for each one thousand dollars of insurance held by him.

The National Life, incorporated in 1897, contains the following:

Sec. 15. The company may agree to give to holders of participating policies, the right to attend and vote in person at all general meetings of the company; and if the company so determines, then all persons who are actual holders of policies from the company, whether such persons are shareholders of the company or not, and who are by the terms of their policies entitled to participate in profits, and are referred to in this Act as holders of participating policies, shall be members of the company and be entitled to attend and vote in person at all general meetings of the company; and every holder of a participating policy of the company for a sum not less than one thousand dollars shall be entitled to one vote for each one thousand dollars in his policy.

The Royal Victoria, incorporated in 1897, the Federal Life, incorporated in 1898, the Home Life, incorporated in 1899, and the Crown Life, incorporated in 1900, recognized the same principle. Then, the Imperial Life, incorporated in 1896, contains the following provisions:

Sec. 15. The company may agree to give to holders of participating policies, the right to attend and vote in person at all general meetings of the company; and if the company so determines, then all persons who are actual holders of policies from the company, whether such persons are shareholders of the company or not, and who are by the terms of their policies entitled to participate in profits, and are referred to in this Act as holders of participating policies, shall be members of the company and be entitled to attend and vote in person at all general meetings of the company, except at those called for the purpose of increasing the capital stock of the company (and shall not be entitled to vote by way of confirmation or against the confirmation of any by-law for the increase, issue, allotment or sale of capital stock of the company); and every holder of a participating policy of the company for a sum not less than one thousand dollars shall be entitled to one vote for each one thousand dollars in his policy.

It is the same in the Southern Life and the Union Life, incorporated in 1902, and in the Monarch Life, incorporated in 1904. The North American Life contains the following:

Sec. 5. Any individual or corporation who is a legal or beneficiary holder of a policy of insurance in the company, or a subscriber to the guarantee fund hereinbefore mentioned, and who shall have paid all due premiums or calls thereon respectively, shall be a member of the company, and entitled to all the benefits thereof under the provisions of this Act and the by-laws of the company.

So it seems to me that the limitation contained in the amendment moved by the hon. member from Salaberry would save the policy-holder from any greater responsibility than he has as a policy-holder in case of liquidation, and would limit his profits to those accruing to him under the present Bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE moved that in section 146, p. 54, line 49, after the word 'directors,' the following be added:

Provided however, that in case of liquidation of the company, the policy-holder as such member shall not be entitled to share in the distribution of the assets or be liable to be placed on the list of contributories.

This amendment is of the same character, but I would call attention to the fact that this section is inserted in that part of the Act which will govern companies to be incorporated hereafter. It will not affect life insurance companies already incorporated. It will be noticed that the rights of the policy-holders will be more extensive in the new companies than in the old companies. I do not desire to disturb the policy adopted by the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I should like to have some information about the note which appears on the first reprint of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is not part of the Bill.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—It ought to be struck out, that was the finding of the committee. We affirm part of clause 139. The decision of the committee was that there should be no charge, and, therefore, the clause should be struck out. I pointed out that if we struck out clause 139 the Commons would re-enact it, and the Senate could not make a change, and that charge would be enormously excessive. I called the attention of the committee to it several times, and they decided that it was better to strike it out.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I understand this note is to the effect that part of subsection 1 of section 37, and paragraph 3 of subsection 1 of section 139 do not form part of the Bill. They are printed for information only. As to paragraph 3 of subsection 1 of section 139, that should be struck out altogether, and the reference to it also.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It will be noticed that the committee struck out the clause entirely and replaced it by another clause, which does not contemplate levying a charge after all.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—This note should be amended, inasmuch as it does not fit in with the Bill to be adopted at the third reading. The note reads as follows:

NOTE.—The part of subsection 1 of section 37 and paragraph 3 of subsection 1 of section 139, which are shown within square brackets, do not form part of this Bill. They are printed for information only and will be struck out before the Bill is passed by the Senate. It is intended to introduce them in the House of Commons.

If the hon. gentleman will look at subsection 1 of section 37 they will find the following words:

And such officer shall be paid such salary, not exceeding $5,000 per annum, as the Governor in Council may from time to time fix and determine.

This would not be initiated in this Chamber, and is simply there to be adopted by the Commons when the Bill reached them, but as the hon. gentleman from De Salabery (Mr. Beique) has just stated, there is no more utility in our making this statement as to subsection 1 of section 139, since it has been eliminated altogether from the Bill. As I have seconded the motion for the second reading, I would suggest that somebody should move to strike out the latter part of the first phrase of that section.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—With the leave of House, I have the honour to move that on the first page of the Bill the words 'and part 3 of subsection 139 be struck out, and that the word "are" should be changed to "is" and the word "they" should be "it".'

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—Some hon. gentleman on my right said a few moments ago that the Bill the Senate was now passing was the original Bill with the amendments passed in committee tacked on. We are passing the Bill right in our hands now.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The Bill of the Senate will go to the Commons as our original work without any amendments appearing thereon.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—Then section 37 should be struck out.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—No, because there is a reason for maintaining this note inasmuch as we cannot vote the salary.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I think the hon. gentleman is right. Of course the Bill, as intended to be sent to the House of Commons, will not contain the first part of section 37.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It will contain it in brackets.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—But not as passed.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Would it not be well to leave it in blank and let the House of Commons deal with it?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—But this does not affect my motion.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That first note does not form part of the Bill.

The SPEAKER—The Bill as it will go to the Commons commences 'Second session, eleventh parliament, IX Edward VII., 1909, Senate of Canada, Bill (A), An Act respecting Insurance.' What business have we to put in a note which is not enacted by this House?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—That note forms part of our work, and it is the first time I have seen the Senate proceed that way. I have generally seen the amount to be voted left in blank; but we put it in brackets, and we have stated that that part in brackets does not form part of the Bill, and will have to be voted by the Commons.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This is not part of the report. This note does not appear in the report.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—It must be entered in the report.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Why should it be? It has not come from the committee in the report. Better leave it out entirely. When it comes before the House of Commons the Superintendent of Insurance will draw their attention to it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—If this note on the face of the Bill is struck out absolutely, then we would need to take clause 37 and eliminate from that clause what is between the brackets, which is beyond our jurisdiction.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The Superintendent of Insurance will draw their attention to that.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I will change my motion to read in this way; that the note be struck out, and that the first paragraph of clause 37 be also struck out.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That would not do at all, because the early part of the clause is an essential part of the Bill. It reads as follows:

37. The Governor in Council may appoint an officer, to be called the superintendent of insurance, who shall have the rank of a deputy head of a department, and all the powers, rights and privileges of a deputy head so far as regards matters relating to or arising out of the administration of this Act.

Then it goes on and states:

And such officer shall be paid such salary, not exceeding five thousand dollars per annum, as the Governor in Council may from time to time fix and determine.

Why should that not remain in brackets, with a note to show the Commons what the feeling of the Senate is with regard to the salary? It does not do any harm.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Why not strike out the salary? We have never filled in the salary in our Bills.

The SPEAKER—The only effect it would have, would be that it would require the Bill to be sent back to us.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I move that the note be struck out, and also the amount mentioned in clause 37.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This House has no right to enact that any salary shall be paid to an officer.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But we do not enact it. We strike it out.

Hon. Mr. POWER—But the officer must get a salary.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The practice with regard to money Bills in the Senate has been to leave the sum blank to be filled in by the Commons.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It is as broad as it is long. Of course, it is unusual to put the amount in brackets.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It should go from the Senate exactly as we have passed it, without any explanation as to what has been done with the original Bill. When it goes before the Commons, they will take the Bill as it is presented to them. It is not usual to consider a Bill originating in the Senate and make a number of amendments to it and send it to the Commons with an explanation of amendments made to the original draft. If this Bill had come from the Commons, then it would be necessary to send it back with an explanation of whatever changes had been made, but we are sending this Bill de novo, as a new Bill, and it does not require any of those explanations. We should send it in precisely the same words and conditions in which it has been passed.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Bourinot says:

> If any Bills are sent down from the Senate with clauses involving public expenditures or public taxation, the Commons cannot accept them. Such Bills may be ordered to be laid aside.

Hon. Mr. POWER.

The better way is to move that those words be struck out altogether.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Why not leave a note which points out that the Senate did not consider the question of salary?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I move that the words five thousand dollars be stricken out of section 37.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The hon. gentleman may include in his motion the striking out of the note as well?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—This means there will be a blank as to the amount of the salary.

The amendment was adopted.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Was the amendment made which was suggested, adding the words 'in Canada,' or was it rejected? The attention of the committee was called to the necessity of adding after the words 'holders of policies' in line 17, page 21, of section 52, the words 'in Canada.' Some insurance companies called attention to it, and one gentleman expressed the opinion that the amendment suggested by Mr. Macaplay, by inserting after the words 'holders of policies' in line 17, page 21, the words 'in Canada' should be made for the reasons very fully set forth.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The suggestion of the hon. gentleman in connection with this is that in case of amalgamation between two life insurance companies, under the Bill as reported from the committee, it is incumbent to notify all the policy holders in both companies, of the amalgamation. This rider has been added giving the right to the superintendent to dispense with the necessity of notifying the policy-holders of the company in which they re-insure; but the hon. gentleman from Hastings draws attention to the fact that the clause should be amended for the purpose of doing away with the necessity of notifying the policy-holders outside of Canada. For instance, in China or Japan, or any other foreign country, it would be very expensive, it would have to be printed possibly in different languages, if it is to be of any effect.

and I must say that I quite agree with the suggestion because there does not appear to be any reason to notify the shareholders all over the world in a case of that kind. It should be sufficient to notify the policy-holders in Canada.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—That was quite thoroughly discussed in committee, and it was quite understood that the matter would be left entirely with the superintendent of insurance, and surely in the case cited by Mr. Macaulay, in respect to policy-holders outside of the Dominion of Canada, they would not insist that that provision should be carried out.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—But the hon. gentleman will see that we gave them the power to dispense only as regards the reinsuring company, and not as regards the other company; therefore, he would have no power to dispense with the notice as regards the company which is being reinsured.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am reading the old Bill, section 52, subsection (c). I refer to the seventeenth line which reads as follows:

> Shall in case of transfer or reinsurance be served on the shareholders and on the holders of all policies other than industrial policies of the transferred or re-insured company.

I suggest that it should read in this way: 'Shall in case of transfer or reinsurance be served on the shareholders, and on the holders of policies in Canada'.

As it reads now it would impose the duty, as has been pointed out by the gentleman who has just spoken, of translating it into a number of languages and sending it to all parts of the world, and it would be almost unnecessary, because if notices had to be sent to policy-holders in all quarters of the world, it could not be carried out. They would never get them, and the suggestion has been made, which struck me as feasible, to add the words 'in Canada' after the words 'holders of all policies'. I therefore move that the words 'in Canada' be added.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Does section 10 not cover the point?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—It seems to me that when an insurance company is going to amalgamate with another company, the policy-holders of that company, ought to know what is being done with them?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You could never reach them.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—But they are policy-holders who have an interest in the company; their money is invested there. I do not see how you are going to change their status.

The amendment was adopted.

The motion for the third reading was carried, and the Bill was read a third time.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. Speaker has not asked the usual question: 'Shall the Bill pass'? which should be done after the Bill is read the third time.

The SPEAKER—Shall this Bill pass?

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It was not a desire to interfere that actuated me when I called attention to the fact that the Bill had not been passed at the third reading; but I happen to remember a very important measure that was before the Senate many years ago, when the Bill had been read the third time, and the question was put by the Speaker: 'Shall this Bill pass'? The hon. gentleman to my right (Hon. Sir Richard Scott) was spurred to make a speech in opposition to the measure, and he made a very forcible appeal to the Senate, with the result that the Bill was defeated at that stage.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—That was the Cable Monopoly Bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes.

TRANSPORTATION OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS BILL.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The order of the day being called:

> Resuming the further adjourned debate on the motion for the second reading (Bill M) An Act to regulate the transportation of Intoxicating Liquors, and the motion of the Hon. Mr. Domville, in amendment thereto:—

'That the said Bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read a second time this day six months.'—(Hon. Mr. Ross, Middlesex.)

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to call attention to the fact that it was I who moved the adjournment of the debate, although it appears in the Minutes as being moved by the hon. gentleman from Middlesex.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Mr. Ross is unable to attend. I wrote him a note and called attention to the Bill still standing in his name, and he writes that he will not be able to attend this week, and hopes to be here on Tuesday.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I had hoped the hon. gentleman from Middlesex would have been in his place, and that he would have given the House an able and eloquent speech, which I am sorry I am not in a position to do; but I wish to submit certain considerations which have suggested themselves to me with respect to this Bill. I do not think that this Bill, in its present form, is a constitutional measure. I do not think it is a measure which parliament has a right to pass. I am not going to enter into any long discussion of the constitutional question, I just wish to indicate that there is such a question. It was claimed, I think, that we have a right to pass this Bill because it is a measure regulating trade and commerce. I wish to direct attention to the fact that this Bill does not regulate trade and commerce, but that it forbids commerce. That is a totally different thing from regulating it, and my contention is that parliament has no right to say there shall be no commerce between the main land and Prince Edward Island, or any other province, in any given material. The constitutional aspect of this question has been considered by the Supreme Court, and also by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The question of the constitutionality of the original Scott Act of 1878 was considered in the case of Russell vs. the Queen, and the ground was taken there by the counsel who contended that the Act was unconstitutional, and did not apply to the whole country, that it was intended to apply only to a certain section of the country where the people had adopted the Act by vote. It was decided, in the last resort, by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council that this ground was not well taken, because the Act did apply to the whole country. All over the country the same law existed that, any county or municipalty which voted for the Act in the way in which the law provided, should come under its provisions that that was the general law, and was not a law affecting only a particular part of the country. That is the distinction which the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council drew. This is not an enactment of that kind. This Bill says that in any section of the country where a local Act has been passed, then certain things shall happen—this Act shall operate. That is a totally different thing; and it has been held by the Judicial Committee that prohibition is not a matter that Parliament can deal with as limited to one province. I do not wish to tire the House by going into an elaborate argument, but if any hon. gentleman wishes to look the matter up he will find it dealt with in the case of the Attorney General of Ontario, and Attorney General of Canada, appeal cases of 1896, page 361, and following pages. I am quoting from page 361 with respect to the point discussed yesterday:

If it were once conceded that the parliament of Canada has authority to make laws applicable to the whole Dominion in relation to matters which in each province are substantially of a local or private interest, upon the assumption that these matters also concern the peace, order or good government of the Dominion, there is hardly a subject enumerated in section 92 upon which it might not legislate, to the exclusion of the provincial legislature.

That does not bear very directly on the question before us, but it does bear on the discussion which took place a little while ago. At page 365, I find the following:

It is not impossible that the vice of intemperance may prevail in particular localities within a province to such an extent as to constitute its cure by restricting or prohibiting the sale of liquor, a matter of a merely local or private nature, and, therefore, falling prima facie within number 16. In that state of matters it is conceded that the parliament of Canada should not imperatively enact a prohibitory law adapted and confined to the requirements of localities within the province where prohibition was urgently needed.

There it was laid down that we had no right to interfere in a case like the present. At page 367 there is a more direct case. The words are:

In the present case the parliament of Canada would have no power to pass a prohibitory law for the province of Ontario.

This was a law prevailing in Ontario, just as the law we are now dealing with prevails in Prince Edward Island. If parliament has no power to pass a law for Ontario, it has no power to pass one for Prince Edward Island. That case goes to show that we have not the constitutional power to pass this measure.

There is one point which occurs to me with respect to this measure, which seems to deserve a little consideration. I have been informed that the parties who were anxious for the passing of this measure presented it to a leading member of the House of Commons from Prince Edward Island and asked him to introduce the measure. That gentleman declined. I do not know whether other members of the Commons from Prince Edward Island were requested or not; at any rate, after this member of the Commons had declined to introduce the Bill, one of the hon. gentlemen who represent Prince Edward Island in the Senate was requested to introduce it here, and he also was disinclined to do it. This is a House in which the provinces are supposed to count for a good deal, and I think that is a consideration which should have a little weight with hon. members.

I do not wish to use strong language about the Bill, but I think it is a sample of the tyrannical legislation which has often been sought by well-meaning gentlemen, and sometimes by well-meaning ladies, who have made a fetish of some particular virtue or some particular line of conduct. In the present case, there are a number of well-meaning people all over the country who have made a sort of little god of the total abstinence from liquor. I do not wish at this late time of day, and this late period in the history of the country to discuss the general question of the propriety of prohibition; but I do say that no hon. gentleman can find anywhere in the decalogue, or anywhere else in Scripture, any prohibition of the use of wine or the use of intoxicants. The hon. gentleman from Middlesex, the other day, spoke of prohibition, and of prohibition being the foundation of law, and all that. Well, we are prohibited by the decalogue from doing various things, but there is no prohibition in the decalogue of the drinking of a glass of wine, or even of stronger beverage, and there is nothing found anywhere in the Scripture which forbids the use, in moderation at any rate, of intoxicating liquors. Of course, like everything else, wine and every intoxicating beverage can be abused. There is no one of the Almighty's gifts to us which may not be abused; but that does not justify parliament in undertaking to proscribe all those things. The truth is, that the first miracle which our Saviour is reported in the Gospel to have worked, was turning water into wine.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Not the wine of modern times.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman says it was not the wine of modern times; but there is no ground whatever for assuming it was not intoxicating liquor.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—He would not produce an adulterated wine.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Noah got drunk.

Hon. Mr. POWER—In the history of the miracle at Cana, we are told that the steward expressed to the host his surprise. Paraphrasing the story, he said: 'It is the usual practice to give the best wine first, and then, when the guests have well drunken, give them that which is not so good. If the wine was not a beverage which could intoxicate, could that have been said? Surely wine there, was the wine of the country. It was not a strong drink like our whiskey, or not as strong as our sherry or port, but it was a wine which, taken in sufficient quantities, would intoxicate; and one of the reproaches urged against our Saviour was that he was 'a wine bibber.' You remember it was said of John the Baptist that he came not drinking, and so on, and our Lord came the other way, and then he was spoken of as a wine bibber, and as being associated with people of that kind; and we find St. Paul, whose authority is good, actually recommends his friend Timothy to use wine under certain circumstances. So there is, as I say, no evidence and no good authority to be found in the Bible, or anywhere else as far as I know, for the contention that there is anything wrong or sinful in drinking wine or intoxicants.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Is the hon. gentleman not exposing himself to a fearful roasting at the hands of certain people?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am not afraid of a roasting. I think, perhaps, I shall get a little roasting in the next world if I get to Purgatory, but I am not afraid of a roasting here. The truth is, these people have a deal of superfluous energy, and I suppose superfluous virtue, and those things must find vent. They ignore other matters, and they devote their energies to this one weakness. They ignore the other failings of our population, and treat people who differ from them on this one point as being, in fact, not much better than miscreants, people who should not be protected by the laws that protect the average British subject. I do not question the sincerity of these worthy people; but this prohibition originated in New England, and New England has been the home of a good many rather peculiar ways of looking at things. It will be remembered that one of the laws of Connecticut, the blue laws as they were called, forbade a man to kiss his wife on Sunday. They have got over that particular kind of law in New England.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—They do not consider it necessary.

Hon. Mr. POWER—And they do not persecute people who differ from them in religion, the way they did a couple of hundred years ago; but the same spirit of intolerance against those who happen to differ from them, still prevails, and it finds its expression in this onslaught on the people who are not like themselves prohibitionists.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—The Bill does not interfere with private persons drinking as much as they like. It does not interfere with the rights of individuals.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not see it that way.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Then the hon. gentleman has not read the Bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes, and carefully. The hon. gentleman says it does not interfere with public rights. Why, it forbids the importation of liquor into the province, and it forbids its being dealt with as a merchantable commodity; but there is a provision, which I understood the hon. gentleman to say he proposed to have stricken out, which allows a man to import five gallons for his own use, and when you eliminate that you practically prevent any one in Prince Edward Island from getting liquor in any shape or way. The Bill does not even contain any provision such as the original Scott Act did, in regard to the sale of liquor for medicinal or sacramental purposes.

This Bill, amongst other things, provides that a search warrant may be issued to go into the house of the most respectable man in Prince Edward Island, at almost any time and search it to see if there is any liquor on the premises. No one who was not a perfect fanatic could advocate a measure as that. Now the Scott Act, so called, has been in operation more or less in this country since 1878, and, as far as I am aware, it has not created any very marked improvement in the moral condition of the country. In the province of Ontario, I think, the Act has been repealed in almost all the constituencies which adopted it. The same is true in the Lower Provinces, and the measure which we are now dealing with is simply an experiment made by the local legislature, who were satisfied that the Scott Act was not a success, that it had failed, and they are trying now if local prohibition will not meet their ends better. There is no reason for supposing it will. My own view about it is that the progress of education, and the change which naturally takes place in people's opinions had, at the time the Temperance Act was passed, made drinking unfashionable. It was considered a discreditable thing for a man to be seen openly under the influence of liquor. One hundred years ago that was not the case, and for the last century the views of people generally on this question have been getting more respectable. If the friends of temperance—I do not say the friends of prohibition—had continued to use moral suasion, and the influence of religion since 1878, I am satisfied the condition of things in Canada to-day would be very much better than it is. You need not take this country, but take the New England states, especially Maine, and Vermont, as examples. In Maine they have had prohibition since about 1850, and in Vermont for about forty years, and I am satisfied that there is to-day, proportionately, more drinking in the state of Vermont than there is in the province of Quebec. As I have said on more than one occasion here, drinking is not the besetting sin of Canada. If hon. gentlemen turn to Mulhall's Dictionary of Statistics, or any other such publication, they will find that the amount of alcohol consumed in Canada per head is less than in almost any other civilized country.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Through the educative effect of temperance legislation.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It was true when the Scott Act was passed.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I can furnish authority for that. There is just one point as to which I wish to say a few words. The hon. gentleman has claimed that the people of Prince Edward Island are anxious for this measure. I have not the figures of the recent elections in Prince Edward Island on local prohibition, but I hold in my hand the returns of the Scott Act elections in Prince Edward Island, and I call the attention of hon. gentlemen to those statistics. I may say that the statistics for the other provinces run very much in the same line. Take the county of Prince, in Prince Edward Island. There was a Scott Act election there in 1878. The total population of that constituency was 34,347, the number of votes cast at the general election preceding 1878 was 4,512; the agreegate number of voters on the roll was 5,434; now what was the vote for the petition?—1762. The votes against, 271. I may say that I do not think they really enter into the question, because there is such a dislike to drunkenness, and such an objection on the part of the ordinary voters to be considered in any way supporting the use of liquor, that men who disapprove of the Act, and very strongly disapprove of it, will not vote against it, consequently the criterion is the number of those who vote for the Act.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—Twenty-five per cent voted for the Act.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Then there was the county of Queens, in which Charlottetown is situated. There was an election in 1880. The population was 26,626; votes cast at the preceeding election 6,082; aggregate number of voters on the roll 6,351, and the number in favour of the Act was 1,317. That is not twenty-five per cent, not one-fifth of the voters. In Kings it was somewhat the same way. Total population 26,433; votes cast at the last general election 3,860; aggregate number of voters on list 5,673, and the number who voted for the petition was 1,076. Only a little more than one-sixth of the voters. The fact is, that Prince Edward Island was brought under the Scott Act by the votes of less than five per cent of the total population. The same figures apply substantially to the province from which I come.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—Why would not the hon. gentleman count those who stayed at home as being in favour of it? If they did not come out to vote, they certainly should be counted as much in favour as against it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have already told the hon. gentleman why. Many years before the Scott Act was passed, excessive drinking had become unfashionable, and the man who drank was not very much respected. The people who were in favour of the Scott Act voted, and those who were not stayed away. When they came to enforce the Scott Act that fact was realized. Unless the Scott Act was carried by a majority of the whole of the voters, it could not be enforced. I do not know what the figures were at the recent election, but if they were anything like the figures in the Scott Act election, they do not form a basis for the argument of the hon. gentleman on my right (Hon. Sir Richard Scott) that the people of Prince Edward Island are anxious for this legislation.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—I may tell the hon. gentleman that the people of Prince Edward Island are anxious for this legislation. Meetings have been held all over the Island, and have been very much in favour of the Act—I should say ten to one in favour of it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Then I should like to know why one member of the House of Commons and one hon. member in this House belonging to Prince Edward Island, when requested to introduce this Bill, declined to do so?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Because they had not popular opinion behind them.

Hon. Mr. BAIRD—An hon. gentleman was asked to introduce the Bill here, but he gave way to a legal gentleman better qualified to put the Bill through.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The answer should come from the gentleman to whom the reference was made.

Hon. Mr. YEO—I suppose the hon. gentleman alludes to me. It is quite true I declined to present the Bill, not that I was opposed to it, but because I wished to put it in the hands of some one who could more strongly advocate the measure than I could. Two gentlemen waited on me, and told me they had this Bill, and told me the nature of it or partly so. I said I have always been in the habit of supporting anything which will advance the cause of temperance, and I will support any Bill in that direction still. One thing they pointed out to me particularly was, they wished to prevent liquor from being forwarded under false labels. I know that such a practice has done a great deal of harm in Prince Edward Island. Liquor comes in under all sorts of labels. I told them I would support that part of the Bill, and everything that would further the cause of temperance. They also told me that the Department of Justice had been consulted and that they were not opposed to the passage of the Bill. I declined to introduce the measure, not because I had anything against it, but because I wanted to place it in the hands of some senator who would be better able to advocate it than I am.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Perhaps the hon. gentleman will answer a question with respect to the introduction of the Bill in the other House. Is he aware that a prominent member of the House of Commons from Prince Edward Island was asked to introduce the Bill, but declined?

Hon. Mr. YEO—I have heard something of that, but I cannot say of my own knowledge.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I know, because the hon. member told me himself.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—And I can corroborate what the hon. member from Halifax says.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I could dilate on this subject for some time, but, probably, it is just as well not to do so. I wish to refer briefly to some statistics which the hon. gentleman on my right (Hon. Sir R. Scott) made use of, with respect to the consumption of liquor in Prince Edward Island. The hon. gentleman pointed out that the quantity of liquor consumed in Prince Edward Island per head, judging from the statistics, was less than in the other provinces. I do not undertake to contradict the hon. gentleman; but I wish to direct attention to the fact that there are large quantities of foreign liquors imported, for instance to Montreal, which are debited to the province of Quebec, but which are subsequently sent by rail or water to the maritime provinces, including Prince Edward Island. The statistics go to show that the per capita consumption of alcohol in the province of Quebec is greater than the maritime provinces.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I made no reference to the quantity consumed in Prince Edward Island. What I did say was this; take the statistics of the Department of Justice, of crime in Prince Edward Island. I concluded that the quantity of liquor consumed there must be much less because there were fewer men convicted for indictable offences. It was only in reference to crime that I quoted the statistics.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman took the Prince Edward Island statistics, and showed that the reason why there was less crime in that province was that there was less drinking. I say he is not in a position to tell how much drinking there was in Prince Edward Island.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I did not quote that at all.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I want to know how the hon. gentleman was able to trace the absence of crime to the absence of drinking?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Will the hon. gentleman allow me to explain?

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, I do not think I shall. The hon. gentleman can explain afterwards. He pointed out that there was a good deal of crime in Ontario. I think the statistics which he read showed there was a great deal more of crime proportionally in Ontario than in Quebec; and I remember distinctly that the hon. gentleman in the course of his speech, said there were more places for the sale of liquor in Montreal than in the whole of Ontario. If the connection between drinking, and the sort of crime which gets people into prison is so intimate as the hon. gentleman contends, how does he account for that state of facts? In a large city, naturally, you expect more crime than in the rural districts. Here we have the fact that in Montreal, where there are more drinking places than in the whole province of Ontario, the amount of crime is only a small fraction of that in the province of Ontario? I am not basing my argument on figures at all. Statistics can be made to tell almost any story in the hands of a gentleman who can use them as skilfully as the hon. gentleman on my right. As I understand, the hon. gentleman proposes now that the Bill should apply only to Prince Edward Island. Such a limitation as that would make the Act unconstitutional. If it does not apply to any place but Prince Edward Island, how can you say that it is a criminal offence for a man in St. John, or Halifax, to ship wine or beer into Prince Edward Island? That is extending the Act to places where there is no prohibition. As the hon. member from Westmorland pointed out, this measure would render the common carrier liable.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Hear, hear! it is so intended.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman boasts that it is intended to do so. Now, why should that be the case?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—If he knowingly commits the offence, he should be punished.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is a provision to punish the common carrier if intoxicating liquor is brought into Prince Edward Island under any other name. Hon. gentlemen know very well that the percentage of alcohol which makes any beverage intoxicating is, under this Bill, three per cent; and they know that there are many patent medicines which contain very much more than that percentage of alcohol. For instance, I understand that Peruna, which is a favourite beverage with a good many temperance people, contains thirty or forty per cent of alcohol. I have already called attention to the fact that this Bill proposes to allow the dwelling houses of the most respectable people in Prince Edward Island or any other province to be entered under a search warrant.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—On suspicion.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It does not say that there is to be any notice or anything of that sort; the officer simply goes there and searches the house. We find that the province of Prince Edward Island is in this way calling in the aid of the parliament of Canada to make effectual the prohibition which they have in that island. I do not think they have any right to do it. I believe it is unconstitutional, and even if it were constitutional there are other objections to it. All over the country the brewers and distillers pay large license fees, and having got these licenses to carry on their business we have no right, and the Dominion government has no right with one hand to take the money of the brewers and distillers and with the other hand deprive them of the means of carrying on their business. It is most unfair and inequitable. They undertake to destroy a business which has grown up under the law, and to render useless the plant and destroy the capital involved in that business. As I said before, this measure reflects no credit on the skill of the gentleman who prepared it. There was an Act passed here in 1908, a most objectionable Act, and the sole object of the measure now before us, its sole avowed object at any rate, is to make that Act applicable to a district where there is local prohibition, not where the Scott Act is in force. The Act of 1908 provided for the case where the Scott Act was in force in a district.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—It is the same provision.

Hon Mr. POWER—I know it is the same provision; but this Bill is not drawn as carefully as the other one. The other Bill was an amendment to the Scott Act. It made provision for the case of wine intended for sacramental and medicinal use. This Bill makes no such provision. That is a serious defect, and shows how people who are very enthusiastic over a given subject are likely to lose sight of other things.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Ample provision is made.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have to apologize to the House for not being better prepared to deal with this question; but I have at all events expressed my opinion.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I should like to ask the hon. member from Ottawa, if an amendment to the Scott Act enabling a province to pass legislation which would permit them not only to prohibit the sale, but to prohibit the importation of liquor into the province, would not be more effective than this measure?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—No, the Canada Temperance Act can only apply to counties where it has already been voted on. That is the principle of it. The principle of the Bill before us applies to where a province, itself as a province, has passed a prohibitory law. The weaknesses in this Bill, which will be changed in committee, are many. Parliament could not interfere, for instance, with Ontario, and say that liquor should not be sent from a county adjoining, a local option county, into the local option county, that would be unconstitutional, but I think it can be clearly shown that where a province has passed a prohibitory law, parliament can say to outsiders: 'You have no right to send in liquor there unless you send it in under the regulations in force.' That is a reasonable proposition, and is intended to apply in this case.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Would my hon. friend say what amendments he proposes to move when the Bill goes into committee? I understand that no notice of motion has been given as to what the amendments will be.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—No, but I explained them.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I understand this is to be simply operative in Prince Edward Island?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I did not feel authorized to make any change in the Bill as it was handed to me, although I expressly disapprove of parts of the measure. When I was asked what changes I proposed to make, I stated them clearly, and fully, that the Act would apply only to any province in the Dominion that was all under prohibition, that the policy of the Bill would be to prevent outsiders consigning liquor to a province under prohibition except in cases where the province itself allowed liquor to come in. The province has made ample provision for liquor to be brought in for medicinal and sacramental purposes, and for private persons who desire to have it for their own use, and not for sale.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is this Bill to be restricted to Prince Edward Island?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—In that sense it is.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That places it in an entirely different position. If my hon. friend says this Bill is to apply to Prince Edward Island only at present, and from which province it comes, I can understand it.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I thought it would be more acceptable in its present shape.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The distinction is this; my hon. friend proposes legislation which he is practically foisting on every province in this Dominion, a restrictive measure, simply because Prince Edward Island desires certain legislation, ancillary to legislation they have passed themselves. I am prepared to vote for the Bill if it is to apply only to Prince Edward Island.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—The possibility of any other province as a whole passing a prohibitory law was so remote that I thought it more constitutional to draw it in that way. The explanation I gave in the first instance was that it would apply only to Prince Edward Island. It mattered not whether I mentioned Prince Edward Island particularly, or spoke of it as a province, because I thought the chances of any other province adopting prohibition for the whole province was so remote that the contingency would not arise. I can readily apply it to Prince Edward Island alone, if the other provinces do not wish it.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—I am not at all satisfied as to the constitutionality of this Bill. My hon. friend says that in committee he is going to propose some amendments which will have the effect of making it constitutional. In all decency, the hon. gentleman should be given that privilege, and I shall vote for the second reading, holding myself free to vote as I think best when the Bill is in Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—Since the hon. gentleman spoke the other day of the condition in Prince Edward Island, I have changed my mind and want to do justice to the people of that province and give them an opportunity of experimenting, I shall, therefore vote for the Bill as introduced by my hon. friend. I do so, believing that local prohibition will not prohibit liquor being sent to Prince Edward Island from other places. The legislation of Prince Edward Island preventing liquor from being sent into the province was declared by the Minister of Justice to be ultra vires of the legislature of that province. I was in Prince Edward Island last year as a representative of the Maritime Board of Trade, and my observations were not favourable to the operation of prohibition. I went down about twelve miles by invitation to where the Scottish games were going on, and saw a number of young men going home in the evening who did not seem to me to have observed the prohibitory law. I do not believe that you are going to do much in the way of reform by coercion of any kind. Allow me to give you a quotation from my old departed friend Joseph Howe:

> I approve of the efforts made by the temperance societies and wish them every success as long as they seek to reform by persuasion, by argument, and by example. When they attempt the impossible, when they seek to coerce the people into intemperance, I conscientiously believe they will fail. I believe that all efforts they have done will be imperiled by resorting to harshness and coercion.

These are pretty much my own views. I believe that the teaching of the different churches, the example that is shown in our Sunday and week day schools, will have more influence in temperance reform than prohibition. Prohibition was tried in New Brunswick, but it will never be tried there again, because it proved a failure, and the government that introduced it went to the wall with prohibition. Now, just a word in favour of the people of Prince Edward Island. I have travelled pretty extensively on that island, and have seen the great improvements that have been made by the farmers, their comfortable homes, their large barns, and all the comforts that are necessary in life. I do not believe that that has been accomplished by people given to drinking. The people are largely of Scottish descent, with a few scattered Englishmen and a stray Irishman. They have all done well in the island, and they are as temperate as the people of any part of Nova Scotia. I must do them that justice. I shall vote for the second reading of the Bill.

RETAIL MERCHANTS' ASSOCIATION OF CANADA BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG moved the second reading of Bill (S) An Act to incorporate the Retail Merchants' Association of Canada.

He said: This Bill is very much on similar lines to the Manufacturers' Association. The object is merely to promote industrial and commercial interests of the retail merchants of Canada. All their powers are set out in paragraphs 2 and 3. It is not a buying and selling association; the object of the Bill is merely the management of the retail merchants, who have formed an association.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (British Columbia)—I believe the Bill is not distributed. It is a very important measure and should not go to its second reading until we know what its provisions are.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The Bill has been distributed.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—The Bill is not printed in French, and it is not on my file; therefore I do not think it should be pressed now.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—As it is printed in English, I could perhaps translate it in French for the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—The hon. gentleman himself ought to object to proceeding with it until it is printed in French. As his hon. colleague from Quebec is not here to look after it, I thought I would assume the responsibility.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It is because I feel I was derelict in my duty that I offered to translate it.

The motion was agreed to and the Bill was read the second time.

MONTREAL CENTRAL TERMINAL RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

ORDER OF THE DAY POSTPONED.

The order of the day being called:

Consideration of the amendments made by the Standing Committee on railways, telegraphs and harbours, to (Bill 44) An Act respecting the Montreal Central Terminal Company.—Hon. Mr. Béique.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—In the absence of the hon. gentleman from De Lanaudiere, I move that these amendments be concurred in.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I beg to call the attention of the House to the important clause which the Railway Committee propose to insert in this Bill. They propose to extend the law which now prevails in regard to municipal control over the construction of railway and telegraph lines on streets in incorporated cities, towns, or villages, all of which legislation might be very good; but this provision extends it to a railway which is to pass under the streets of the city or the municipality.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We have already passed a similar amendment to-day

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—Attention was not drawn to it. When a tunnel is built under a city by a company, the company should not be prevented from carrying passengers from one part of the city to another if they choose to do so. In this case, the railway company cannot do any business in the city of Montreal, although it may have gone to all the expense of constructing a tunnel, without obtaining the consent of the city of Montreal to a matter which does not from that point of view concern the city at all, and we know that as regards that corporation the aldermen are very expensive gentlemen. While I do not cast any reflection on them—I am speaking in a general way—it does not seem to me to be right, to adopt a compulsory clause in any Bill, which may be extended as the time goes on, and although the principle may be good, it is carried in this case to an extreme which I do not think should be permitted. In the absence of my hon. friend, I do not propose any amendment, but I do think, in these days of liberalism and regard for democratic ideas, that we ought not to refuse a company the right to carry passengers on a road built by the company under the city, and not in any way obstructing the streets of the city of Montreal or of any other corporation. One trouble will be that the principle will be extended. We have a provision in the Bill as regards municipalities. The argument I heard upon the question by those who framed this clause, was that because certain things had been done, it followed as a matter of course that this should also be done, and in this way we would be led on from one condition to another and railway companies would be tied up. I do not wish to say any more upon this matter because it is a hopeless case. I hope this Bill will be opposed by the people of Montreal.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I move that the order be discharged, and that it be placed on the orders of the day for Wednesday next.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND. There is no rival interest behind any of these clauses. They have been put there at the demand of the city council of Montreal for the protection of its own franchise, and inasmuch as there is a motion to adjourn this matter until Wednesday next, I shall reserve further explanations until that date. I should like to correct the impression expressed by the hon. gentleman from St. John, that there may be a conflicting private interest that would be served by this clause being inserted in the Bill. There is simply a desire to protect the public and the rights of the city of Montreal. It may be over zealous work on the part of those who think that city franchises should be respected; however, when we come to consider the matter, I will deal fully with it.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (YY) An Act for the relief of John Green.—Hon. Mr. Derbyshire.

Bill (ZZ) An Act for the relief of James Thornton Brownridge.—Hon. Mr. Watson.

Bill (No. 69) An Act respecting the Prince Albert and Hudson Bay Railway Company. Hon. Mr. Davis.

THE ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved that the House do now adjourn.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I would be glad if the right hon. gentleman would give us a little more definite information with regard to the business to be taken up on Wednesday and Thursday of next week. I understood him to say that the principal business would be the Supply Bill, and it was for that business particularly we were to meet next week at all. A number of members are leaving, and will not be back next week under any circumstances; and there are three or four important Bills which, in my judgment, should not be taken up when there is a very small House. The decision as to whether they are to be taken up or not may influence others who are here now in deciding whether they will remain over or not. I refer particularly to the Bill relating to the leasing of branch lines connecting with the government railways, the Bill for the Portection of Navigable Waters, and the report of the Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts Committee.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It is not absolutely certain when we shall get the money Bill. We may get it Wednesday, or we may get it Thursday. I hope to get it on Wednesday. If it should turn out as the hon. gentleman expects, that the House should then be very thin, I would not be disposed to proceed with anything but formal business; but if there should be a good attendance I might proceed with one or two government measures. There is only one government measure, the one which relates to the government railway, which is ordered for committee next Wednesday, that I should like to proceed with; but I shall not do so unless there is a fair attendance of the House.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate adjourned until Wednesday next, the 16th instant.

THE SENATE.

HUDSON BAY INSURANCE COMPANY BILL.

AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON, from the Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported Bill (No. 43) An Act respecting the Hudson Bay Insurance Company, with amendments. He said: This Bill will have to go back to the House of Commons. The amendments were largely made at the instance of the superintendent of insurance, who felt that they were necessary in order that the Bill should conform to the general Insurance Act. I think there is nothing in the amendments affecting the general principle of the Bill. I should like to have these amendments considered now; I therefore move that paragraph (h) of rule 24, be suspended so far as it relates to this Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I desire to enter my protest against this practice of suspending the rules, which results in members of the Senate who were not present at the meeting of committee, being deprived of learning what has been really done. I pay about as much attention to the proceedings of the House as most of the members, and I frankly confess that on the last sitting day I watched with a great deal of anxiety a report which came from the Banking and Commerce Committee, with a view to calling the attention of the Senate to the character of the Bill itself, with the determination of dividing the House upon the principle which I thought was involved in that measure. I subsequently learned that the rules had been suspended, although I sat at my desk and thought I watched attentively what was going on. I found the Bill had been passed through all its stages. To my mind that Bill was a most flagrant violation indirectly, or directly, of the constitution. It was granting to a company, by this parliament, the right to build six or seven miles of railway, in aid of a private enterprise, and in order to evade the provisions of the Confederation Act, it was declared to be a work in the interest of the Dominion that these five or six miles of railway should be built from one end of the stations of the Canadian Pacific railway in British Columbia, to a water-power, a purely private enterprise. The railroading, of such Bills, at a two-forty pace through the House, without hon. members really knowing what they are doing is not in accordance either with the principles which should guide our legislation, or the dignity of the Senate. If it is strictly constitutional to pass a private Bill of that kind and make it a work for the general advantage of Canada, it would be much better that the imperial parliament should be petitioned to so amend the constitution as to place all questions of this kind wholely and solely within the power of this parliament. I noticed an editorial in the Toronto 'Globe,' a government paper, as we all know, of Friday or Saturday, I think Saturday, calling attention to this question and intimating that the matter would be sent to the Privy Council, in order to test the right of the Dominion parliament to set aside the intention of the provisions contained in the Constitutional Act. The article to which I refer points out the readiness with which the majority of the committees of parliament infringe the rights of the provinces in this direction. Those who have paid any attention to the discussions which took place at the time of forming the constitution, know it was urged very strongly, by the fathers of confederation, that certain provisions should be contained in the constitution for the protection of the provinces, and one of the arguments for a second Chamber was the necessity for an upper House to protect and maintain provincial rights. Our practice has been worse even than that of the Commons. Instead of being a protection to the provinces, we set aside their rights as readily as the Commons. The argument is used, that when a question of this importance has been considered by a Standing Committee it ought to be sufficient evidence to the House of the correctness of their proceedings. I know it is against the rules to mention in our debates the proceedings of any committee, but I venture to say that that Bill only passed in the committee by a majority of one, and it was for that reason I intended, when the report came before the House, to call the attention of the Senate to it and test the opinion of this Chamber on the question. I propose in future, unless there is something that is absolutely necessary in the interest of the country to do otherwise, to object to the rescinding of the rules. Whatever amendments are made in committee should stand until we have time and opportunity to consider them. I do not want my hon.

friend to think that I am at all personal in my remarks, or that they are directed against the motion he has made.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—It is entirely agreeable for me to defer this Bill until to-morrow. I am merely following what was the practice last session, when Bills were rushed through here as if they were going through a funnel. Every rule was suspended. I withdraw my motion, and beg leave to substitute for it a motion that this report be taken into consideration to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE. I must confess that I was myself taken somewhat by surprise, and the more so because I appear to have moved not only for the suspension of the rules, but also for the third reading in the absence of the hon. member who was in charge of the Bill. My only excuse for it is this, that I had a number of Bills to report to the Senate, and for one reason or another I found that either the reports were not prepared, or were wrongly prepared, and I had to use the utmost diligence to prepare the reports myself. I was so much occupied by that work, that I did not at the time realize that the Bill which was being moved was the one which has been referred to. I quite agree with the hon. member, that it is a question on which it would have been quite proper to test the opinion of this honourable House.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—I was in charge of the particular Bill to which the hon. member from Hastings has referred, and hon. gentlemen might possibly think that I had some reason for trying to rush it through. As a matter of fact, I had nothing to do with the motion made for the suspension of the rules. The chairman of the Railway Committee will bear me out in saying that this was the first Bill he laid before the House on Friday. It so happened that I was called out of the Chamber for a few minutes, and on returning was surprised to find that the rules had been suspended and the Bill had passed the third reading. Knowing the feeling of some members with respect to the Bill, I had intended myself to fix the third reading for to-day, so that every one would be given an opportunity to discuss the measure. I hope hon. gentlemen will acquit me of having had anything to do with the rushing of the Bill through this House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I had no intention of reflecting on either my hon. friend or the chairman of the committee. The report was adopted in a hurry, and without any one realizing what was done. What I want to do is to call attention to the result of railroading Bills through the House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—All this could be avoided by adopting this course: when the chairman of a committee makes his report, let the member in charge of the Bill himself move the suspension of the rules if he wants to have them suspended. The clerk of the committee sent with the report all the motions to be made, and I am satisfied that the motion which the hon. gentleman moved was not prepared by himself.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—I can hardly get time to read them.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Perhaps the clerk of the committee was anxious to get the work through immediately. There is plenty of time to let us consider the amendments which have been brought in to-day.

The motion was agreed to.

TRANSPORTATION OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS BILL.

SECOND READING.

The order of the day being called:

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the motion for the second reading (Bill M) An Act to regulate the transportation of intoxicating liquors, and the motion of the Hon. Mr. Domville, in amendment thereto: That the said Bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read a second time this day six months.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—In making some observations on the motion made by the hon. senator in this Chamber, whom I do not now see in his place, for the six months' hoist, I should like to say in advance, for the information of the hon. senator from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) that at the time I undertook the charge of this Bill, I was not aware that other gentlemen had declined. I do not believe, if I had been so advised, that it would have made the smallest difference in the course I have taken, because I have considered the Act a very commendable measure—one which it would be extremely unfair on the part of parliament to refuse to Prince Edward Island, which province has been under partial or total prohibition now for nearly twenty-five years, the last ten years, under an Act passed in 1900, total prohibition prevailed. The people of Prince Edward Island, whether they are correct in their views or not, at all events are the ones who are most deeply interested, and they were almost unanimously of the opinion that the proposed legislation referred to in this Bill is going to be of substantial benefit to them. They can protect themselves as far as the island itself is concerned. They have a law on the statute-book which makes ample provision for intoxicants which may be required for medicinal and sacramental purposes, or for arts or manufacture. The Act is most liberal. It is larger and more generous to those who differ from them on the subject of total abstinence than is the Canada Temperance Act. Under those circumstances, it did seem to me very ungenerous and indefensible, that this Bill when first introduced should have been attacked so bitterly by certain hon. gentlemen, particularly in the face of the hon. senators who reside on the island, and whose opinion was altogether adverse to the conclusion suggested by those gentlemen. There was a gentleman, who at one time was a member of this House, though I am sorry to say is not with us now, who two years ago gave his opinion on this subject, and as his views were always listened to with very great respect, I should like to quote a few lines of his opinions on the effect of prohibitory law in Prince Edward Island. I allude to the late Senator Ferguson, at one time a member of the government in this country. In speaking of the Act upon which this is based—that is to prevent law-breakers, whether they are agents, or transportation companies, or smugglers, from forcing liquor on the territories that are under prohibition. The Bill which we were considering and which became law, was for the purpose of protecting some fifteen or sixteen counties, perhaps more, in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. We gave to them the privilege which they asked, of being protected from outsiders, while we declined—and in the opinion of some gentlemen, we should have declined—to give the same privilege to Prince Edward Island. The late Senator Ferguson said in reference to Prince Edward Island:

I think the cause of temperance has been advanced very considerably since the Scott Act was exchanged for prohibition. I think I am safe in saying that the province of Prince Edward Island occupies a position today with regard to the liquor traffic equal to any part of the North American continent, and I think I might go beyond that. I do not say that all drinking is stamped out. I am sorry to say that it is not, but the difference between the state of the community to day and what it was in the old days under license or free liquor is most pronounced.

Then in answer to those who were opposing that legislation this is what the late senator said:

Is it right to leave people who want prohibition, no matter how strong the sentiment may be and how willing they may be to carry it out, to the mercy of outside places who have less advanced temperance sentiment, who can send in the liquor and can make every express agent in the country an agent to sell liquor? This will prevent that practice and it will give the people in those constituencies that want the Scott Act a chance to adopt it. Why should we not give them a chance? Leave the communities who do not want the Scott Act to work out their own problem in the matter of the liquor traffic, but give the people who want the Scott Act a fair chance in their own constituency and do not have their operations swamped by outside influences.

Now, that is the opinion of a gentleman whose observations in this chamber were always held in high esteem—a very level headed man he was, and one whose loss was very seriously felt in this Chamber when he left it. Some reflection has been made on the paucity of votes in Prince Edward Island in favour of prohibition. I have under my hand a return made some years ago—I think about 1893—giving the vote under a provincial plebiscite, and I find the majority in Prince Edward Island in favour of prohibition was a little over 8,000. Then hon. gentlemen will remember that in 1898 the present administration, in answer to a very general demand, had a general plebiscite taken, and on that occasion the majority in Prince Edward Island was 8,315. That showed a very marked appreciation of the benefit arising from prohibition, and it does not rest with any hon. gentleman to say that the sentiment of Prince Edward Island is adverse to the adoption of prohibition. The resolution adopted by the legislature passed, so far as the official report shows, without any challenge. That is, the legislature unanimously asked the government of this country to lend their aid to enable them to keep liquor out of the province. Their law is a most generous one. It is set forth in the Bill before us. They allow liquor to come in for all the purposes I have mentioned—sacramental, mechanical and medicinal. As far as the medicinal part of it is concerned, I think people would get well much sooner without it. However, I shall not raise a controversial question on that point. Then private individuals are allowed for their own use to import liquor, and the limit which they put on it shocked me—it was five gallons at one time. The fact is that their law is far more liberal and considerate to those who differ from them on that question than is the Canada Temperance Act, which has been on our statute-book now for some thirty odd years.

I must confess I was very much surprised, I might add shocked at the extraordinary stand taken by the hon. gentleman from Halifax, who denounced this Bill as tyrannical, and he used language which I will not say was unparliamentary, because we have pretty wide latitude in abusing each other; but those who support the Bill were put in the category of cranks. I regret that the hon. gentleman used language of that kind. In the attempt to justify his own views, he invoked holy writ, and his calling up the Son of the Most High was a great shock to everybody, and his friends deeply regret that he ever made use of profanation of that kind. The hon. gentleman sought to compare the juice of the grape, even as it existed 2,000 years ago, with the product of the modern distillery, which is liquor made out of rotted grain, which God never intended to be used for that purpose, but was intended for keeping up the life of the world. The strongest point on their side made by the opponents of the Bill, was that the measure was unconstitutional. Before I proceed to prove—I think I am safe in using as strong a word as that—that this Bill is intra vires of the parliament, I should like to compare the various clauses in the Bill now before the House with the law we passed two sessions ago, and with the Canada Temperance Act, which has been before the courts, and has been sustained by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. I wish, therefore, to hastily run over the paragraphs and point out that the Canada Temperance Act having been held by the highest court in the empire to be entirely within the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada, the argument that the Bill now before the Senate, which is drafted on exactly the same lines, only being less extreme in its character, so far as those who differ from the total abstainers are concerned, cannot therefore be challenged on the ground of want of constitutionality. The object of the Bill, as I explained, was to prevent parties sending liquor into Prince Edward Island. It is a matter of notoriety in all the maritime provinces that the prohibitory law exists there. The island is from time to time visited by commercial travellers, dealers, merchants and others, and therefore the law is generally known. In passing our legislation, we do not provide that persons are not liable to be punished who plead that they do not know the law; everybody is supposed to know the law. In this case the parties who deal with Prince Edward Island must have known that it was under prohibition, because it has been in that condition now for over a quarter of a century. Clause 1 provides that no person shall, except as in the Act provided, by himself, clerk or agent, bring or ship liquor into the island. The next declares that the selling of liquor transmitted to the island under any other name is illegal. The House, I am sure, will not hesitate to adopt that. The hon. gentleman from Halifax says:

I do not wish to use strong language—

I should like to know what language he could have used that would have been stronger:

I do not wish to use strong language about the Bill, but I think it is a sample of the tyranical legislation which has often been sought by well-meaning gentlemen, and sometimes by well-meaning ladies, who have made a fetish of some particular virtue or some particular line of conduct. In the present case, there are a number of well-meaning people all over the country who have made a sort of little god of this total abstenence from liquor propaganda.

I shall call up the hon. member from Halifax as a witness in this particular case. He illustrated the tyranny of it by informing us that there were breweries and distilleries in Halifax, and they could not be stopped. He assumed that this Act was the outcome of the power parliament had with regard to trade and commerce. He was wrong there, however, in his view of its meaning on that point. Therefore he assumes this is rather against trade and commerce, which he thought rendered the Bill unconstitutional. But he took the case of the distillers and the brewers and said it was monstrous to think of checking them in that regard. Thirty-two years ago, the hon. gentleman supported clauses in the Temperance Act, the important parts of which I will read to the House. One clause provides that: 'From and after the date which this Act comes into force, and so long thereafter as it continues, and so on, exceptions are made for sacramental and medicinal purposes.'

Then the Act proceeds:

No person by himself, clerk, servant or agent, shall expose or keep for sale, directly or indirectly, or on any pretense or device and so on, any spirituous or intoxicating liquor, and so on.

I should like the hon. gentleman to note this particular sentence:

And neither any license issued by or to any distiller or brewer, nor yet any license for retailing on any steamboat, etc., nor yet any description of license, shall avail to render legal any act done in violation of this provision.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman misapprehends the point I was endeavouring to make.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I did not interrupt the hon. gentleman, and I am taking his language.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman interrupted me several times. I just wish to explain what I stated, that this Act was not a general Act applying to the whole of Canada, and that it was an exceptional thing to prohibit the sending in of liquor to Prince Edward Island or any other small district like that. It is not like the Canadian Temperance Act, which is a general Act.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—The hon. gentleman does not say that he has not used the language I have quoted?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Oh, no.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—He admits he did use the language illustrating the effect of the proposed legislation. That he thought we could not do it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think so still.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Although the Canada Temperance Act was based on the assumption that you could not send into a city or county that had adopted the Act any spirituous liquors for sale. That was the basis of it, so that this Act is exactly on the same lines in reference to that important point. The next clause provides that nothing in the Act shall prohibit the vendors legally appointed by the provincial governments from importing liquor. They have a liberal act in Prince Edward Island on that score. They appoint inspectors, and the druggists, as a rule, are those who are authorized to sell for these particular purposes. Section 2 reads:

No act done in violation of this Act, shall be rendered lawful by reason of any license of any discription.

That is following the words of the Canada Temperance Act. Here is a liberal paragraph not in the Canada Temperance Act, it is the permission for private persons to import liquor for their own use. The 4th clause is a penalty clause for violation of the provisions of the Act, and the 5th clause reads:

5. Every one who, in violation of this Act, in the employment or on the premises of another so sends, ships, brings or carries, or causes to be sent, shipped, brought or carried, or delivers to any consignee or other person, or stores, warehouses, or keeps any intoxicating liquor, or packages containing intoxicating liquors, not so labelled, shall on summary conviction be liable to the same penalty as the principal.

The next statement to which I will refer in the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Halifax, reads as follows:

This Bill, amongst other things, provides that a search warrant may be issued to go into the house of the most respectable man in Prince Edward Island at almost any time and search it to see if there is any liquor on the premises. No one who was not a perfect lunatic could advocate such a measure as that.

I should like the hon. gentleman to take the Bill in his hands and let me read the corresponding paragraph in the Canada Temperance Act, and he will find that the one in the Bill before us is a far more liberal proposition than the one in the Canada Temperance Act. The clause reads:

In case a creditable witness proves upon oath before a stipendiary magistrate, etc., before whom any prosecution is brought that there is a reasonable cause to suspect that any intoxicating liquor in respect to which such offense has been committed is in any dwelling house, store, shop, etc., such stipendiary magistrate may grant a warrant to search such store, shop or dwelling house, garden or other place or places for such intoxicating liquor, and if the same or any part thereof is found, to bring the offender before him, and so on.

Under the Act, you will observe, a search can be made at midnight, or at any time, and the Bill proposes that it shall only be made in the day time. That is the only difference between the two. The hon. gentleman from Halifax supported the clause in the Canada Temperance Act, yet he now urges that this provision is fanatical. Well, he ranks as a fanatic. I think I have clearly shown that there is substantially no proposition in the Bill that has been so fiercely denounced by some hon. gentlemen, who I do not now see in their places, and by my hon. friend from Halifax, that had not been already approved of, and that the changes made were all in the direction of giving liberty to those who were opposed to the legislation. It is more generous in its terms. It is not nearly as exacting in the inquiry to be made, and here is a most marked difference. Under the law as it stood, a person holding a search-warrant could enter a man's private dwelling at midnight. There is a limitation in the Bill, that it must be in daylight. I think I have shown that this Bill, so far as the principle goes, is exactly on the same lines as the Canada Temperance Act. The hon. gentleman discussed the judgment rendered by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, in which he expressed the opinion of the court, that the parliament of Canada had the power, because it related to trade and commerce. The Privy Council, in their judgment, expressed the opinion that while the judge of the Supreme Court and the minor judges may have been right in coming to the conclusion that this traffic was under the item of trade and commerce, yet they found very much stronger basis on which to form the judgment, and I may say, and perhaps my hon. friend will remember, that when the Canada Temperance Act was before this Chamber, reference was then made to the powers parliament had on the very first reference to section 91, that any legislation, affecting the peace, order and good government of Canada, was within the control of this parliament. The case arose in Russell vs. the Queen. It went to the Privy Council. The note at the beginning reads:

The object and scope of the Act are general, namely, to promote temperance and a uniform law throughout the dominion. They relate to the peace, order, and good government of Canada, and not to the classes of subjects, property and civil rights.

In giving their judgment, they said:

The general question of the incompetency of the Dominion Parliament to pass an Act, depends on the construction of the 91st clause of the British North America Act, 1867, headed, distribution of powers.

That section reads:

It shall be lawful for the Queen, by, and with the consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces.

In the argument before the Judicial Committee, the counsel urged three grounds, and they were these:

The three classes of subjects enumerated in section 92, were referred to, under each of which it was contended by the appellant's counsel that the present legislation fell. These were: Shop, saloon, tavern, auctioneer, and other licenses in order to the raising of a revenue for provincial local or municipal purposes.

In answer to that they say:

With regard to the first of these classes, it is to be observed that the power of granting licenses is not assigned to the provincial legislatures for the purpose of regulating trade, but in order to the raising of a revenue for provincial, local or municipal purposes. The Act in question is not a fiscal law. It is not a law for raising money; on the contrary the effect of it may be to destroy or diminish revenue; indeed it was a main objection to the Act that in the city of Fredericton, it did in point of fact diminish the sources of municipal revenue.

Next, their lordships cannot think the Temperance Act in question properly belongs to this class of subjects 'Property and Civil Rights':

It has in its legal aspect an obvious and close similarity to the laws which place restrictions on the sale or custody of poisonous drugs, or of dangerously explosive substances. These things, as well as intoxicating liquors, can, of course, be held as property; but a law placing restrictions on their sale, custody, or removal, on the ground that the free sale or use of them is dangerous to public safety, and making it a criminal offence, punishable by fine or imprisonment to violate these restrictions, cannot properly be deemed a law in relation to property in the sense in which those words are used in the 92nd section.

Then they proceed:

Laws of this nature designed for the promotion of public order, safety, or morals, and which subject those who contravene them to criminal procedure and punishment, belong to the subject of public wrongs rather than to that of civil rights. They are of a nature which fall within the general authority of Parliament to make laws for the order and good government of Canada, and have direct relation to criminal law, which is one of the enumerated classes of subjects assigned exclusively to the Parliament of Canada.

Their conclusion is this:

Their lordships having come to the conclusion that the Act in question does not fall within any of the classes of subjects assigned exclusively to the provincial legislatures, it becomes unnecessary to discuss the further question whether its provisions also fall within any of the classes of subjects enumerated in section 91. In abstaining from this discussion, they must not be understood as intimating any dissent from the opinion of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada and the other judges, who held that the Act, as a general regulation of the traffic in intoxicating liquors throughout the Dominion, fell within the class of subject, 'the regulation of trade and commerce,' enumerated in that section, and was, on that ground, a valid exercise of the legislative power of the Parliament of Canada.

There we have the highest authority of the realm holding that the Canada Temperance Act was a proper Act, and one they approved of; and we have the opinion of the Supreme Court wholly ignoring the supreme powers Parliament has in reference to peace, order and good government. That, under the special powers of the British North America Act relating to the regulation of trade and commerce, it gave them also that power. Hon. gentlemen say: 'Oh, but the Canada Temperance Act applied to the whole country!' Well, it did not. It applied to only such parts of the country as chose to adopt it, and we are in the habit of passing laws eliminating particular sections of the country from its operation. We passed a law the other day, a Bill I myself had charge of, in reference to stealing of ores and compelling parties having ores in their possession to give an account of where they got them, and which several gentlemen said they would support if the particular province they came from was excluded from its operation. We finally got it down so fine that we did not apply it to any province; we left it for the Governor in Coun cil to apply it to a province if the occasion arose. Another point raised in opposition to this Bill was that it was applicable to the whole Dominion. I can answer him on that point. In the Canada Temperance Act special provision is made for enforcing a law which is purely local. Take the law known as the Dunkin Act, which prevailed only in certain municipalities. We did not incorporate that law in the Canada Temperance Act, but we have a number of clauses directly affecting it, and giving increased power to carry out the law in the municipalities which have adopted the Dunkin Act. So that on all grounds we have shown that the Bill is clearly within the purview of parliament. That cannot be challenged. I certainly was surprised at the opinion expressed by several hon. gentlemen who addressed this House, in the extreme language they used, denouncing it in the most unmeasured terms as a law that ought not to be supported. I confess I was amazed that those gentlemen had failed to note the change that has occurred in the last twenty-five years in regard to the question of temperance. In all the advanced countries of the world restrictive legislation is being adopted to-day. Canada probably led the van thirty odd years ago in adopting the Canada Temperance Act; but other countries have gone ahead of us with such legislation, and made much more restrictive enactments in order to restrain and check the liquor traffic. In Ontario, year by year laws have been made more stringent on all engaged in the traffic. During the last twenty-five years, year by year, the number of licenses issued to shops, taverns and saloons has been diminished. The hours on which they may keep the bars open have been reduced. Formerly it was limited to Sunday, and then further reduced for the protection of the man who earned his living, and was paid at the end of the week; the bars had to be closed at seven o'clock p. m. on Saturdays and remain closed until Monday morning. Then in order to widen the benefits of restrictive legislation in the province of Ontario, they passed a Local Option Act, enabling counties to enact absolutely restrictive legislation, prohibiting the sale of liquor, not as this Bill does, allowing individuals to purchase and use liquor, but absolutely prohibiting the introduction of it into particular districts to which it was applied. That local option has been carried in the last three years in ninety constituencies. It required a three-fifths vote, not an ordinary vote such as we have at our elections, such as is used for deciding very many important questions, but a three-fifths vote must be recorded before they can pass the law; yet with that difficulty and objection no less than ninety municipalities have in the past three years been placed under local option. I do not know if it is quite proper for me to give the reasons why I advocate a measure of this kind. I have now for upwards of sixty years taken a note of the days that have passed and years, and observed the influence of the free use of intoxicants. I have noticed three effects. Sixty odd years ago, when I was a young man, conditions were different from what they are to-day. A very marked change has taken place. The difference was that in those days our liquors were pure, they were honest; if you drank Madeira you knew it was Madeira, and if you drank port wine, it was port wine. As a boy, I drank port wine, and it had less effect on me than a glass of ginger wine would have to-day, because the wine was pure. As years went on, those who indulged in liquor showed its effect in the shortening of their lives.

I can point out a legion of men who might have lived much longer had they abstained from intoxicants. I do not say they died of delirium tremens, not at all. They were considered moderate drinkers, and they died of Bright's disease, tuberculosis and other causes; but they would have lived twenty, thirty or forty years longer had they been total abstainers. I have reason for knowing this probably more than many within the range of my voice to-day, and I speak of facts as my memory has recorded them. Therefore, I feel that any movement we make to restrict the liquor traffic, particularly the liquors as we find them to-day, is doing good not alone to our country, but to our fellow men, and that is why I so earnestly appeal to this House to adopt the Bill. They certainly can never regret their action. They may congratulate themselves on saving from misery and sorrow many a household. The views that I have expressed are shared by others. I should like to give some few opinions that I have collected from the utterances of prominent men. Last summer twenty-five countries appointed delegates to meet in London in order to consider the question of the use of intoxicants. The United States sent twelve, and they were selected by the government. They represented the army, the navy, and the state. In England, many of the leading men were judges. Now I shall just read an extract or two from the report made by the Washington delegation on their return:

Alcohol and alcoholism are two of the real and substantial enemies of moral, artistic and commercial progress of the human race, according to the report of the United States delegates to the twelfth congress on alcoholism, made public by the state department to-day. The delegates were appointed by secretary Knox as one of his first official acts. The congress was held last July in London, England, and twenty-five governments were represented, the delegates of each concurring in general finding that alcohol not only was unnecessary to human life and comfort but was inimical to health. Three departments of the United States government were represented by delegates, the state, navy and treasury. Twelve representatives went abroad and all of them reported to-day.

According to the report, the interest shown in the congress was greater than ever was known before.

While the congress urged the necessity of imposing the most rigorous restrictions on the sale and traffic in alcoholic liquors, it regarded as equally important the need of educating the younger generation to a true knowledge of what alcohol is and what its effects upon the human system are. The delegates believe that the numerous discoveries as to the harmfulness of drunkenness and even of 'moderate' drinking, also, should be set before children in order that they may see the danger of the practice. The American delegates sum up this phase of their report by saying: 'increased teaching as to its character and influence should be provided to conserve industrial efficiency in the commercial competition of nations, as well as to promote two of the chief objects of government, the public health and morals.'

I should like hon. gentlemen to pay attention to the following paragraph with respect to crime:

The relation of drunkenness to crime was a subject that received much attention at the congress. The chief justice of Britain, however, Lord Alvestone, announced that in his belief, 90 per cent of the crime under observation was due to drink. Judge W. F. Pollard, of St. Louis, Mo., who presides at the second district police court in that city, declared that of the cases passed upon by him, fully 85 per cent of those convicted could charge their degradation to the use of alcohol. Lieut. Col. McHardy, of Edinburgh, Scotland, coincided with Judge Pollard as to the percentage of crimes occurring in the former Scotch capital.

Here is the conclusion:

While the congress took no action looking to international organization for work, the meeting resulted in the organization of the two new auxiliaries. One is the international prohibition which proposed to wage an educational campaign among the adults and the total abstinence of teachers, composed of teachers in the public schools and universities who will pledge themselves to promote the temperance education of youth.

These views rather clash with the views that have been expressed by the hon. member from Halifax. Recently, at Toronto, a meeting was held of representatives of labour unions, four thousand delegates attending. They represented probably three million men. The text of the main discussion was the proposal by Mr. Gompers that there should be a total separation between the various unions and the saloons. The Toronto 'Globe' in summarizing what was said at the meeting has the following:

Labour Unions and the Saloon.

A strong and ringing note was struck by the labour leaders of America at Massey Hall yesterday afternoon. It was the note of open and uncompromising antagonism to the saloon. There was no mincing. There were no saving clauses. Straight from the shoulder the blow was struck. All fellowship between labour unions and the saloon was denounced. Without reserve or equivocation, and in the name of international labour, endorsed by four thousand men with the right to speak, the liquor traffic was condemned as an enemy of the workingman, a burden on his life, and a curse to his home.

The significance of yesterday's declarations is very great. It means a fresh rally of the forces making for sobriety and a new social order. It signalizes the deliverance of a great host of the world's workers from a bondage that has for generations, in Britain and in America, been a blight on the vitality and a bar to the progress of the labour movement.

Recently, in France, Doctor Bertillon, the celebrated expert was called on by the government there to express some opinion in reference to the connection between alcoholism and tuberculosis. I will just read a paragraph or two from his report as quoted in a despatch from Paris, July 13, to the daily press:

Paris, July 13.—The French government has for the first time made a statistical inquiry of a comprehensive and detailed character into the causes and various development of alcoholic diseases. Dr. Bertillon, the eminent authority on hygienic subjects, has made the results the subject of a very striking address before the academy of medical science.

On the kinship between alcoholism and tuberculosis, Dr. Bertillon quotes the statisties of mortality among the retailers of intoxicating liquors as compared with that of all other classes of shopkeepers. Twice as many of the former as of the latter are killed by consumption. They live all day long in an alcoholized atmosphere; even if they be temperate they absorb the poison through their lungs, they take it in, so to speak, through every pore. They are more liable to disease of all kinds than any class of the community. But Dr. Bertillon's diagrams show that tuberculosis is far and away their worst scourge. The figures taken from statistics of publicans and shopkeepers between the ages of 35 and 45, prove that alcoholism of the lungs is twice as common as alcoholism of the liver. Again, to quote Dr. Bertillon: 'alcohol causes consumption through enfeeblement of the constitution—in other words, by robbing of its power of resistance against microbe attack. We all absorb, every day of our lives, the microbe of phthisis. It matters not while we are in sound health.

Women being physically weaker than men, how is it that men are at least twice more liable to tuberculosis than women—who are subjected to greater privations than men, and have a harder fight of it in making a livlihood? The answer is that 'the stronger sex is the drinking sex.' Is it not a tell-tale fact that up to the age of fifteen both sexes are on a par as regards liability to tuberculosis? Up to that age young men are as temperate as young women. 'After that age, the drinking habit begins, and the ravages of tuberculosis among men grow more and more fatal until about the fifieth year.

I do not know whether hon. gentlemen take a note of what appears from day to day in the papers, showing the terrible consequence of over indulgence in liquor; the crimes that are committed, the households that are wrecked and the widows and orphans that are made. But let me give you a statement of what has occurred in the Dominion within the space of seven days. In the 'Globe' of October 25, I find the following:

The Slayer of Men—One Week's Record.
To the Editor of the 'Globe':—

At Woodstock, N.B., on Thursday of last week Sandy Monicelli was found guilty of manslaughter and sentenced to imprisonment for life. In a drunken quarrel he had shot and killed Nicholas Leganie on August 8 last. He was only nineteen years of age.

The same day at Pictou, N.S., began the trial for murder of John Fraser, aged thirty, who on June 8 last, at New Glasgow, had shot and killed Duncan Brown after both men had been drinking freely.

Two days later, at Toronto, Walter Blythe was sentenced to eighteen years in the penitentiary for having beaten his wife to death with a poker at Agincourt in the early part of the year. His defence against the charge of murder was that he was drunk when he committed the crime.

At Vancouver, B.C., there was also a murder trial last week. Charles Egan was arraigned for the killing of William Shields, whom he stabbed to death at Prince Rupert on September 13. Witnesses testified that both slayer and slain were very drunk at the time of the killing.

On Sunday morning last at Lindsay, Joseph Hunter committed suicide in the county jail, where he was awaiting trial for the murder of his wife, whom he had shot and killed at Bobcaygeon some time before, when he was intoxicated.

This waste of human life and wreck of homes all over the Dominion is only a part of the awful consequences of the drink habit and the liquor traffic which burden our country with a terrible weight of misery, brutality, shame and crime.

When I addressed the House before, I gave some instances of what had occurred just the previous week. I instanced the case of an Italian who, under the influence of drink, had killed his two best friends. He was arrested, and when he was taken to the hospital where one of the victims was dying, for the purpose of being identified, he was so overwhelmed that he threw himself on the bed of his friend and wished that he could be there in his place, and all this occurred from drinking. It is sixty odd years since I was called to the bar, and for half a century of that time I was practising my profession, and a greater part of the time acted as Crown prosecutor. There it was I had the opportunity of coming in close contact with the consequences of indulgence in drinking. I have had to indict a man for the murder of his wife, and the implement he used to commit the murder was a whisky bottle. He was under the influence of liquor at the time, and did not know what he was doing. I have had to indict a woman for the death of her husband, and when the poor little woman appeared in court with her children, all of them dressed in mourning, it was a most pitiful sight. When the jury heard her story, and learned that she had killed her husband to save herself, and probably her children too, they acquitted her. Those were sad scenes, and it shocks me very much to find when it is proposed to adopt restrictive legislation, that gentlemen of mature years stand in the way, and say we are fanatics to propose it. Surely when people ask unanimously for such a measure, it is strange that any one should say: 'No, we will not grant it; we will encourage the extending of liquor to your homes, and you must not interfere with it.' Smugglers, buccaneers, law-breakers, are to be encouraged to force liquor upon a population that does not want it, to corrupt the taste of their children, and to destroy the peace and happiness that prevail in the community. The law-breakers are the only people who are attacked in this Bill, and it seems incomprehensible that any number of gentlemen of the ages that we have reached here, should rise in their places, and call us fanatics, and this legislation tryannical. It is a sad thought. I leave the Bill to the Senate, convinced that I have done my duty at all events in presenting the case of the people of Prince Edward Island for the passage of a measure that will protect them from the outsider. In reference to the adulteration of the liquors of to-day, I should like to recall to mind some things that hon. gentlemen may not think of. Would you believe there is a law on our statute-book authorizing men to compound in their cellars all kinds of liquors. Twenty or thirty years ago, I brought up this question in the House and expressed my abhorence that such a law should be on the statute-book, and I thought it was struck off, but it is still in the revised statutes. The Act of 1883, which is somewhat modified, contains the following:

> The term 'compounded spirits' means and includes all articles containing Canadian or other spirits which are enumerated in the schedule to this Act, the duty thereon having been paid—or which may be added to such schedule by any order of the Governor in Council.
> Compounder means and includes every person who by himself or agent compounds or mixes for sale by wholesale any of the articles enumerated in the schedule to this Act, &c.
>
> The schedule is:
> Imitations of British or foreign wines, brandy, rum, gin, old Tom, Geneva Schnapps, British or foreign whisky, and bitter liquors and cordials when containing alcohol.

The reason for this law was, people were compounding liquors and the government thought they could check the practice if they made them pay a license fee; so, under this Act no man is allowed to compound liquors unless he pays $50, but having paid the $50, he is permitted to turn out any form of liquor he pleases. My own conviction is that three-fourths of both the wholesale and retail men of Canada blend their liquors. No doubt there are honourable men in the trade who would disdain to compound; but so far as I can learn, it is practised all through generally. It, perhaps, does not seem to be any particular harm to blend wine. It is done because the law allows it to be done, but it would be absolutely impossible, it would require thousands of officials to watch all the cellars of the various dealers in liquor to-day throughout Canada, so that the opportunity of blending liquors is unlimited. When people buy liquors that they think are pure, they justify their drinking by saying: 'I am drinking, genuine stuff; there is no danger, it has not been blended with any improper fluid'. I say it is quite impossible to come to that conclusion. A few years ago, when the phyloxera were destroying the vineyards in France, the output of champagne did not diminish, but kept on increasing. Men who had wealth thought champagne was the most fashionable of drinks. It was one of the evidences of prosperity, yet it was impossible that all of it could be pure, because the vines in the champagne district had been destroyed. Other wines were purchased and with the advanced knowledge that men have of chemistry, it was easy to make an imitation of any brand of champagne. The same observations apply to all other liquors. I hope I have not tired the House; but I felt it necessary to bring this subject prominently before the Senate because I was surprised at the hostility evinced when this Bill was submitted to the Senate. I thought it was one in the direction of morality, and the betterment of my fellow men. Let me say here I think we are only discharging a moral duty when we pass legislation of this kind. We may have sufficient strength of character ourselves to resist temptation, but we must remember that a large number of our brethren have not the same strength that we possess. They cannot resist temptation. The saloon is an attractive place, and when they see it lighted up in the evening, and filled with gay people, they enter without the intention of drinking. But drinking does take place, they go home drunk, are upbraided by their wives, and some of them thrash their wives. Wife-beating has become a common practice, and when the wife-beater is brought before the court the wife frequently appeals to the magistrate not to punish her husband, that when he is sober he is the best of men, and it is only when he is drunk he is cruel. Thus it happens that the magistrate is often induced by the appeals of the wife to let the wife-beater go. Surely any law that will restrict a traffic which creates such terrible destruction and blights so many homes, ought to be readily adopted without question by men who have at heart the best interests of their fellow men. Having given many years of thought to this subject, I am forced to the conclusion that the less liquor consumed the better for the community, and where a whole community desires to be free from the traffic in liquor, and plead with parliament to prevent liquor being sent into their province, we ought to meet their wishes by passing a Bill of this kind.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (British Columbia)—How will this Bill affect the transportation of liquor through a temperance county to a non-temperance county?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT. The law provides already that the distiller or brewer has no right to send his liquor into a prohibited district. The province of Prince Edward Island is under prohibition. The legislature of the province, without a dissenting voice, ask us to pass this Bill. I am modifying it at the instance of some hon. gentlemen, and it applies only to Prince Edward Island.

The Senate divided on the amendment, which was rejected by the following vote:

MONTREAL CENTRAL TERMINAL RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

The order of the day being called:

Consideration of the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, to (Bill No. 44) An Act respecting the Montreal Central Terminal Company.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Before moving the adoption of the report, I desire to say a word or two. The hon. gentleman from St. John (Hon. Mr. Ellis) took exception to the amendments which were made in committee to this Bill, as going too far. I desire to draw the attention of the House to the fact that under section 225 of the Railway Act, the construction and operation of railways along or across any highway is left entirely to the Railway Board; but by the proviso to the same section, that the construction or operation of street railways or tramways, or any railway to be operated as a street railway or tramway along any highway, which is within the limits of any city or incorporated town, cannot be constructed or operated until the company has first obtained the consent therefor by by-law of the municipal authority of such city, or incorporated town. Therefore, under the operation of section 225 of the Railway Act, as regards electric railways or tramways, the power of the Railway Commission is made subject to the consent of the city having the municipal control over such highway or street. I submit that one of the amendments which has been made to this Bill is exactly in accord with the spirit and letter of the provision. The fact that it is a tunnel instead of being a surface railway, seems to make no difference at all. The municipality owns the sub-soil as well as the surface, and therefore, the consent of the municipality should be obtained. But I may be told that the amendment goes further than that, and actually prevents the operation of the street railway, or of the tunnel authorized by this Bill, even if it is constructed outside the line of street, unless the city's consent is obtained. The main reason of the amendment is to preserve the rights of the city. It is well known that in a large city, such a franchise is of considerable value. Speaking in a general way, I think the city of Montreal derives a revenue of some five or six hundred thousand dollars a year from the Montreal street railway, and to-morrow there may be established an underground system of railway, and surely, whenever it is done, the franchise of that underground railway will represent a valuable asset and the city of Montreal, or any city in this Dominion, should not be deprived of its value. I think that is the reason which influenced the committee in adopting the amendment which has been challenged by the hon. member from St. John. I have referred to the first portion of section 225, and have drawn attention to the fact that, as regards the building and operating of railways proper, it is left under the first part of section 225, to the Railway Commission, but what has been the policy of parliament almost ever since this Railway Act was passed—at least for the last four or five years? The policy of this House, as well as the other branch of parliament, has been invariably to introduce into all the Railway Acts a provision taking away from the Railway Commission that power, and limiting it to the consent of the city, whenever it is intended to operate a railway along the street, highway or public place, which is altogether in the same spirit as the amendment which has been adopted.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—Where it is a subway or underground railway, how is the street or highway to be interfered with?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Because it is under ground. The city owns the subsoil as well as the surface, and by what authority should the city be deprived of its right without any indemnity at all?

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—The hon. gentleman's argument is based on the fact that we have protected all cities and villages in respect to their streets, highways and public places, by putting in a provision of this character. The argument was based largely on the effect that they had roads, and highways and streets in public places, but when you come to build under the streets the surface roads are in no sense interfered with.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—You deprive the city of the ownership of the location and the hon. gentleman is losing sight of the fact that municipal property is not subject to expropriation under the Railway Act; therefore when power is given under the Railway Act in any charter to any company to take possession of a street, whether it is the surface or an overhead street crossing, it means that the power is given to take possession of it without paying any indemnity for it, because under the Railway Act the municipalities are not subject to expropriation and any provision of that kind would be clearly interpreted as depriving the city of the ownership of the property without any indemnity whatever.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—I agree with that; but the hon. gentleman's point was that we are disturbing conditions that exist in the larger centres; that it is a question of paying value for it as a franchise. I can understand how, if the argument is entirely on the question of franchise, the city should have something. That argument is quite clear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think there is this point which the hon. gentleman from Fredericton leaves out of sight, that if this company were allowed to go where it pleased underneath the city of Montreal and build street railways underneath the surface, then the railways which run on the surface, and from which the city of Montreal derives a very handsome revenue, would be put out of business or almost so, and in that way the revenue of the city of Montreal would be affected.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I called attention the other day to the fact that the principle which was embodied in this amendment is not in any way similar to the illustrations which the hon. gentleman has given with regard to existing privileges or powers or rights, whatever they may be, as to the railways crossing highways. There is there a restraining interest on the railway from doing a certain thing. It cannot cross a highway except by complying with certain conditions, and as regards the municipality, it cannot place posts in front of a church or a private dwelling without some restriction. The illustrations which the hon. gentleman has collected are not germane to this matter; they are based entirely on what the company is restrained from doing. It is proposed to shut this company out. Having built its tunnel as a part of a great line of railway, extending perhaps for hundreds of miles through the country, it is in an entirely different position from a railway running on the surface of the street, which the city has built and which it owns. But, having built this underground railway, why should there be any further power than the power which may be in the Railway Commission to deal justly and fairly in this matter, as between the city owning the road bed of the upper railway and this railway? Why should there be a compulsory clause saying that they shall not run the railway at all through the places which they had built it to run, and collect money from passengers? I maintain that the argument based on the illustration which the hon. gentleman has made is unfair, because it carries a sound principle so far that you get it on an unsound basis, and you are applying it not to prohibit the company from building its railway, but from using it after you have allowed it to be built.

Hon. Mr. POWER.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—Was this railway built with or without the consent of the municipality?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It is not built.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT—My hon. friend says it is built.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—No.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—In order that this matter may be disposed of, I move that the order of the day be discharged. I make this motion at the instance of the company, who desire that this course be adopted.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the motion of my hon. friend is carried, that kills the report.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—For my part, I cannot consent to this motion, for the reason that this amendment should have been made to the Act which was passed last year amending the charter of the company. Through an oversight, the amendment was not inserted. It was inserted this year with the consent of the promoters, and if the motion in amendment was carried, it would now have the effect of rejecting the report of the committee, and leaving the company with its charter without this safeguard for the city of Montreal. We have had the same provision in a charter in another Bill affecting another company, and it was done in this case with the consent of the promoter. It seems they have the bad grace now to ask that the report be rejected and that the company be freed from the protection which has been given to the city of Montreal in both cases.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—This measure is for an extension of time.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—They have still a year, and they could go ahead without being compelled to obtain any consent from the city of Montreal.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—So far as the former charter is concerned, does it give any rights within the city of Montreal for doing such business as they suggested?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Yes, it does, and it was not inserted in the charter as it now exists. The House of Commons had one provision which we amended; and the committee added a further provision for the better protection of the city of Montreal.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—The solicitor of the company, in connection with what the hon. gentleman from Russell has mentioned, said to me also that this amendment which has been made was against their interest, and would render the Bill practically useless to them, and they, therefore, desired the Bill withdrawn. In my twenty odd years experience, where a company has introduced a Bill, and subsequently asked that it be withdrawn before it becomes law, I have never known a case where parliament has refused to grant that request. If this amendment is concurred in, it would kill the Bill. The promoters would rather have no Bill at all than the Bill with this amendment. I hope that their request will be granted.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—May I suggest that it stand over until after the adjournment?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I should like to draw the attention of the hon. gentleman who is making this motion to the fact that when these amendments were passed, they were with the full concurrence of the promoters of the Bill, as represented by their attorneys, and it is because I am not sure that the hon. gentleman was present when these amendments were made with the express concurrence of the promoters, that I draw his attention to it.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—I understand that the attorney present did consent. I am simply doing what I was asked to do for the company. As to the city having control under ground, I am perfectly in accord with what has been stated, but I understand that this is a railway which terminates in the city of Montreal by tunnel or bridge, and I am not clear that this road should be put under the same municipal restriction as a tramway.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What object is there in having it stand over? The Bill was discussed in committee fully, and no further information can possibly be given to this House, and as I understand my hon. friend who makes this motion, he is not desirous of adopting the amendment made to the Bill, or adopting the report. He prefers, on behalf of the promoters, to drop the Bill altogether.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What necessity is there to prolong a debate of this kind upon which there is such a diversity of opinion? I can easily understand that if the railway, as intimated by the hon. gentleman who made this motion, is to have its terminus in Montreal, then we can infer it was never intended to have a subway through Montreal. In that case, there would be no necessity for the amendment, but before the committee it was distinctly understood that the company intended, after they had bridged or tunnelled the St. Lawrence, to also tunnel the city of Montreal, and what Montreal very properly, in my opinion, asked was that there should not be a competing line to destroy the franchise which the city owned in the street railway. No one knows better than the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, that a very large revenue is derived by the city of Toronto from the operation of the street railway. They are talking of building a subway, but that is not to interfere with the franchise and receipts which are added to the revenue of Toronto. They retain that at present, and it would be simply taking from these cities a revenue which they now derive from the working of these railways, and subways which would necessitate an additional tax on the people of these cities. If the Bill is to be withdrawn, let it be so understood, and withdrawn at once, and there is an end of it, but I suppose we will have the same thing up again next session.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman who introduced the Bill has requested that final action be postponed until the House meets again, and, as I understand it, the hon. gentleman who reports the Bill from committee is quite willing to extend that courtesy. For that reason, and also that this is a very thin House in which to decide such an important question, it seems to me better to let the matter stand over.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am quite willing to extend courtesy to the hon. gentleman; but it is not a question of courtesy at all. Hon. gentlemen should be at liberty to express their opinions in regard to any matter before the House without being accused of being discourteous.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I do not know to what extent we can refuse the demand of one fathering a Bill to withdraw it. In this instance, it is a Bill for an extension of time in building. Of course it is somewhat unusual to resist such a demand; but I would rather that further consideration of the Bill be adjourned until the 7th April, so that we may see where we stand.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—I move that the order be discharged, and that it be placed on the orders of the day for April 7th next.

The motion was agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (AAA) an Act respecting the Brandon, Saskatchewan & Hudson Bay Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Power.

DELAYED RETURNS.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I some days ago asked the leader of the House to make inquiries about some returns I moved for and I furnished him with a memo. If he has overlooked the matter, I might give him another memo.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—No, I did not forget it. I communicated with the Department of Justice who promised faithfully to send me the returns at an early date. Possibly I may have them to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I hope the hon. gentleman will have them.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I hope so; they were not overlooked.

The Senate adjourned until two-thirty p. m. to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. POWER.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC BRANCH LINES BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (No. 127), An Act respecting the Grand Trunk Pacific Branch Lines Company.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN moved for a suspension of the rules in so far as they relate to this Bill.

Hon. Mr. RILEY—I object to the suspension.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I would ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw his objection; if he has any special objection to the Bill I would not ask him to withdraw it, but we were told—I need not mention where—that the Deputy Governor will come here this afternoon, and if this Bill is sanctioned it would enable the Grand Trunk Pacific authorities to obtain money in the London market this month, and they can then proceed with the branches which are about to be built this spring and summer. If there is no special objection, I think it is one of those measures which the House would well afford to adopt, inasmuch as there were no amendments made to the Bill.

Hon. Mr. RILEY—In this particular case, I withdraw my objection; but I want to notify the hon. gentleman that I will object to any suspension of the rules in regard to the other Bills brought up between now and the close of the session. I objected to the long adjournment.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I express my gratification on the fact that another member is prepared to take exception to the railroading of important measures through the House in the manner in which it has been done in the past. I expressed myself in very strong language the other day in reference to this matter, and stated at the same time that I would take objection to the suspension of the rules unless there were good reasons to my mind for permitting it. For the reasons that have been advanced by the hon. gentleman who has spoken just now, I do not feel inclined to object at the present time, because it is important that the Bill should be sanctioned as soon as possible in the interests of this great undertaking.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN moved the third reading of the Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (FF) An Act to incorporate the Ottawa, Rideau Valley and Brockville Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Derbyshire.

Bill (TT) An Act to incorporate the Gatineau and Ungava Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Bostock.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH IMMIGRATION DEPARTMENT.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY (in French) moved:

That an order of this House do issue for th prodution of all correspondence exchanged between Mr. Stein, of Quebec, and the Immigration Office, Department of the Interor, on the subject of a request for inquiry into a complaint lodged against the immigration agent at Quebec.

The motion was agreed to.

AN ADJOURNMENT.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved:

That when the Senate adjourns to-day, it do stand adjourned until Wednesday, the 6th April next, at three o'clock in the afternoon.

Hon Mr. ROBERTSON—I do not think it will be possible for the House to adjourn until the 6th April. There are in the House of Commons at the present time most important Bills that will be here in a very short space of time, and if we adjourn until the 6th April we will have very little opportunity before prorogation to properly consider and pass them.

There are private Bills 23, public Bills 39, and government Bills 30. I think you may safely say there are one hundred Bills altogether yet to be considered.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think I may promise my hon. friend that he will not be troubled with the consideration of any public Bills here in the present state of business in the House of Commons. As to private Bills, I cannot speak with the same certainty. I am afraid, from what has occurred in the House of Commons lately, we shall have ample time to consider everything that is sent up to us.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—The time will be very short for such an amount of work.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The House of Commons will adjourn from the 23rd to the 30th of this month.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—Would it not be better to have the adjournment end on the 30th in this House also?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—No; if we are to adjourn at all we should adjourn now, and there is no object to be gained by meeting again until a week after the other House resumes sittings.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—I am decidedly opposed to these long adjournments. There is an impression in the country that the Senate is a useless body, and we are simply giving ground for that impression. In about ten days, the Naval Bill, which has taken five weeks to debate in the Commons, will be sent up to us, and we want to give it at least a week's consideration here. Now we are asked to adjourn, and when we come back there will be any number of Bills ready for our consideration. We will be obliged to rush them through near the end of the session. It would be better to remain here and take them up day by day, as they come before us, and give them most careful consideration. I have no objection to an adjournment for nine or ten days; but it is unjust to seventeen or twenty senators who are opposed to long adjournments, to carry this motion. I am only sorry that the right hon. leader of the government consents.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—It is all very well for hon. gentlemen who live in Montreal and Toronto, and the country between these two cities, to ask for adjournments. We only sit four days a week and they have all the other days; that surely ought to be enough; without asking for a longer adjournment.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I can tell the hon. gentleman that his brother senators living in Toronto and Montreal are not asking for a long adjournment. They are accommodated fully by having three days to spend at their homes every week. It is for the people who live beyond these cities that this Easter adjournment is proposed. They want to have an opportunity to spend a little time with their families.

The Senate divided on the motion, which was adopted by the following vote:

THE DAM ON THE RIVER LA DECHARGE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will be pleased to lay before this House, all documents, letters, returns, etc., concerning the damming of the river La Dècharge, near Lake St. John, in the district of Chicoutimi; which returns are to the effect of showing whether it would be possible to maintain the level of Lake St. John at a reasonable height in order to ensure serviceable navigation on that lake and its tributaries.

The motion was agreed to.

TERMINAL OF THE NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY AT QUEBEC.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr CHOQUETTE inquired:

1. Have the government or the Transcontinental Railway Commission arrived at any conclusion whatever as to the best place for the construction of the central railway station in the city of Quebec? If not, when is the decision to be made?
2. Is it the government, or the Transcontinental Railway Commission, or only the Chairman, Mr. Parent, who has to choose the place for the central railway station?
3. Have negotiations taken place on this subject with the different railway companies which at present have their stations at Quebec?
4. Does the government know that nearly all the population of Quebec is opposed to this central railway station being situated at the Champlain market in the lower town of Quebec? If not, does it intend to consult the city council, the chamber of commerce, and the citizens of Quebec, on this subject, or to leave the decision to Mr. S. N. Parent, chairman of the Transcontinental Railway Commission, as the latter has said at Quebec, and has caused it to be said by his son, Mr Geo. Parent, M.P., in public meetings held at Quebec, in February last?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The question of location of the central station and terminus in Quebec, is under consideration, and nothing can be done without the approval of the government.

APPOINTMENTS ON NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE inquired:

1. Since the first of January last until the first March instant, what persons have been appointed to any employment whatsoever on the Transcontinental Railway, or to what persons has a promise of employment been made?

2. Who made these appointments and these promises?

3. Has Mr. P. B. Dumoulin, agent of the Molsons bank at Quebec, a son employed on the Transcontinental Railway? If so,—

(a) Since when?
(b) Where?
(c) What is his employment?
(d) What is his salary?
(e) What are his qualifications?
(f) Has his salary been increased since the first January last, or is it to be increased?
(g) Was this Mr. Dumoulin one of the directors of the Quebec Bridge Company? If so, what amount has he drawn from it as such, and what reports has he made to the government?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The following information is furnished by the Commissioners of the Transcontinental railway:

PATRONAGE ON NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE inquired: Does the government know:

1. That Mr. S. N. Parent, chairman of the Transcontinental Railway Commission passed the greater part of his time at Quebec from the 1st to the 22nd of February last with the purpose of taking part in the municipal elections which then took place in that city, and that he made use of all the influence and all the patronage that the Transcontinental Railway Commission could give to aid the election of Mr. Nap. Drouin as mayor of Quebec?

2. That he caused it to be said at public meetings by his son, Mr. Geo. Parent, M.P., that, unless Mr. Drouin was elected mayor, the city of Quebec would obtain nothing from the Transcontinental Railway Commission, and that the necessary works for the establishment of the terminus at Quebec, and of the central railway station would not be commenced?

3. That Mr. S. N. Parent himself made the same threats to a great number of citizens of Quebec?

4. Had Mr. Parent, as a public employee, the right so to act?

5. Is it the intention of the government to inquire into these facts?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follow:

1. Between the dates named, Mr. Parent was in Quebec on two occasions in connection with business of the Transcontinental railway.

CONTRACT WITH PHOENIX BRIDGE COMPANY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

1. Is Mr. S. N. Parent, chairman of the Transcontinental Railway Commission, the same Mr. Parent, who was chairman of the Quebec Bridge Company, when the contract of more than four million dollars for the construction of the said bridge was given to the Phœnix Bridge Company, a company with a capital of $50,000?

2. If so, what security did he demand from this small company, for the execution of this considerable contract?

3. Who were the other directors of the bridge company who, with the chairman, Mr. Parent, gave this contract to the company?

4. Is it the intention of the government to make an inquiry into the circumstances relating to the making of this contract, in order to know whether the shareholders of this company of $50,000 were only prête-noms of persons interested in the Quebec Bridge Company, either as directors or contractors?

5. What amount has Mr. S. N. Parent disbursed as a shareholder of this Quebec Bridge Company, and what amount has he received from it:

(a) in salary?
(b) in bonuses?
(c) in paid up shares?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Answers to all the above inquiries will be found in appendix No. 6, of the report of the Select Committee appointed to investigate the conditions and guarantees under which the Dominion government paid moneys to the Quebec Bridge Company. 7-8 Edward vii.

MILITIA RIDING SCHOOL AT QUEBEC.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency be pleased to cause to be laid before this House all correspondence, documents, despatches, &c., exchanged between the Honourable the Prime Minister, Sir Frederick Borden, Minister of Militia and and Defence, Colonel Fiset, Deputy Minister of Militia and Defence, and others, and Sir George Garneau, ex-mayor of Quebec, Colonel Pelletier, Senator Choquette, and others, on the subject of granting of the Military Riding School at Quebec for the holding of a public meeting therein in February last.

The motion was agreed to.

SERVICES OF C. E. A. TASCHEREAU ON THE NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY COMMISSION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE inquired of the government:

1. How much has Mr. C. E. A. Taschereau, of Quebec, notary, received during the last five years from the government or from the Transcontinental Commission for professional services, disbursements, travelling expenses, &c., and what is the amount of his accounts to the government or to the said commission which have not yet been paid?

2. Was the said Mr. Taschereau employed only in the city of Quebec, or also in other counties of that district, and, if so, what counties?

3. If he has been employed in other counties, were there not in these counties notaries capable of acting for the government or the Transcontinental Commission?

4. And if there were notaries in those places, why were they not employed?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —In respect to these questions, I have a memorandum from the Department of Justice, which reads as follows:

Referring to question No. 8 on the Senate minutes of the 10th instant by Senator Choquette as to the services of Mr. Taschereau, notary at Quebec. I have written the Under Secretary of State, stating that he should procure the information from the various departments. There is no adequate information in this department as to these payments, although I presume they could be traced from the Auditor General's Report. I may say that the information sought by the first and second paragraphs of the question is such as is usually obtained by return, and would necessarily take some time to get it.

I think my hon. friend had better move for a return as to those two points.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I have no objection to change the inquiry to the form of an address.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It cannot be put as an address.

The SPEAKER—I venture to suggest, inasmuch as some one has to make the change, that the hon. gentleman had better do it and give it in the form of a notice of motion.

CONTRACTS ON THE NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE inquired of the government.

1. Did a Mr. Murdock, alone or together with his brother, obtain a contract on the Transcontinental for the portion passing by Armagh, or in the neighbourhood thereof, in the county of Bellechasse?
2. If so, was the resident engineer for that section, who had to pass the work of that contractor, a person named Francis?
3. Was the engineer of the division from the Quebec bridge eastward, a person named Charlton, and had he authority over the engineer Francis?
4. Have there been difficulties between the Transcontinental Commission and the contractor, or the contractors, Murdock, on the subject of their accounts for work at the Chamberland and Théberge cuts, or elsewhere?
5. Had they charged more than they had a right to, and had their accounts been certified to by the engineer Francis?
6. If so, in what manner have these difficulties been settled? Has the government lost money thereon?
7. Has the engineer Charlton been displaced? If so, why? And where is he at present.
8. Where are now the contractor, or the contractors, Murdock, and the engineer, Francis?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The answer to the first question is 'no'. To the second, the answer is 'Francis has been a resident engineer at Armagh'. The answer to the third question is 'Charlton has been a division engineer and had authority over Francis'. The answer to the fourth, fifth and sixth questions is 'no'. The answer to the seventh question is 'Charlton has been transferred to division No. 1 with headquarters at St. Eleuthère. Reason for transfer: Because of inability to keep proper discipline over his staff at Armagh'. The answer to the eighth question is: The whereabouts of Murdock is unknown to the commissioners. Francis has not been working on the Transcontinental railway since May, 1908.

CONSTRUCTION OF BRANCH LINE BY NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE inquired:

1. In virtue of what Act, statute, or charter, has the Transcontinental Commission or the government the requisite authority to construct a railway from the boundaries of the parish of Sillery to enter the city of Quebec and reach the site of the Champlain market, where it is proposed to establish a central station?
2. If it is not in virtue of the Act which authorizes the construction of the Transcontinental Railway, to whom does the charter, or charters, belong, thus allowing the building in the city of Quebec of a railway from the boundaries of the parish of Sillery to the Champlain market?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The answer to the hon. gentleman's questions is as follows: By virtue of the National Transcontinental Railway Act, chapter 24, 4 Edward VII. See clause 2 of the agreement, which forms the schedule to said Act.

INCREASED ACCOMMODATION FOR PARLIAMENTARY LIBRARY.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. COSTIGAN moved:

That in the opinion of the Senate the question of increased accommodation for the parliamentary library should be considered, with a view to providing a new chamber for the House of Commons, and additional committee rooms for the Senate.

He said: My reason for bringing this matter before the Senate is this: Recently the necessity for increased accommodation in the library has brought itself very prominently before both houses of parliament; but long before that question arose, the necessity for a new chamber for the Commons had been considered, though no solution of that problem has yet been found. The reason I bring this matter before the Senate to-day is because I think, although not an architect myself, and having no pretentions to skill as such, it may be a benefit that this House should discuss the question. I think I can point out a means of providing accommodation, not only for the library, but for a new chamber in the Commons, and increased accommodation for the Senate. My plan may be a very crude one, but I submit it will be practicable, and before the architects of the department consider the work at all I am anxious that they should have the benefit of whatever discussion may take place here. My idea is that, in the first place, a new chamber for the House of Commons is an absolute necessity, and will force itself on the attention of this country before long. It cannot be delayed further. The great question is to find how to supply that want. There is no way in which it can be done, to my mind, without destroying the symmetry of the present buildings, or without encroaching very largely upon the public grounds, either of which, to my mind, would be rather objectionable. I think there is one way in which this could be avoided. The older members of this chamber, as well as the House of Commons, will remember that when this block was first constructed the impression was general that the building was too low and squatty, and to remedy what was admitted at the time to be an architectual defect, the whole front of the grounds was terraced with a stone wall to give it an appearance of height, looking at it from Wellington street. That made some improvement, but at very considerable expense. In reconstructing the chamber for the House of Commons, if another story were added to the front of this building between the tower of the Senate building and the tower west of the main entrance, it would add very materially to the appearance of the building. It would not destroy the architectural effect, but would, on the contrary, improve the appearance of the whole block. You would then have room enough for as large a chamber for the House of Commons as would be necessary. It would also have the advantage of being in the best position that we could possibly have it, and equally well ventilated. If that should be found practicable, the present chamber of the House of Commons could be utilized for a reading room. Then you can take in the whole of the present reading room for the further accommodation of the library. In that way, you would give increased facilities for the library. You would have a new chamber for the House of Commons, and you would have the Senate portion of the upper story in which you would provide rooms that are very much required for committee rooms in this chamber. I hear complaints every day for want of room, not only for the use of senators, but for committee work to be carried on. The committee rooms are altogether insufficient, and many rooms occupied by officers of the Senate are not sufficient for the accommodation required. I thought by calling attention to these facts, it might attract the attention of the architects, before they submit plans for the increased accommodation of the library. To remodel the library will incur a considerable expense, judging from what I know at the present time, and will not afford a satisfactory solution of the difficulty. It will only remedy that one demand, while we ought to consider at the earliest possible moment the expediency of getting a larger Commons chamber, increased accommodation for the library, and for this Chamber also. I submit these suggestions with all respect. I do not submit them as an architect, but simply because I think they are practicable. They may be crude and may be objected to. The architect who will study and prepare plans for these improvements may consider them quite impracticable. It will, however, do no harm to have this interchange of opinion, and I would be glad to hear some other members of this Senate on the same subject.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The matter to which the hon. gentleman has called the attention of the House is a very important one, and I sympathise with him, because instead of proposing a most extensive and expensive erection of buildings, the hon. gentleman proposes rather to utilize the buildings that we have. I trust that his opinions will be considered by the gentlemen who may have occasion to deal with the proposed increase of accommodation for the library. The hon. gentleman has probably noticed that someone, speaking apparently with authority, intimated that the disposition of the government was to erect another building for the library, to correspond with the present library building. I venture to say, although I am not an architect nor a builder, that nothing could be more unwise than that. The expense would be very great, and the circular form, while very pleasing to look at, gives less accommodation for books than any other form. The suggestion made by the hon. gentleman from Victoria, New Brunswick (Hon. Mr. Costigan) is a very good one, that if you could utilize the Commons reading room, and one or two other rooms there, you would probably get all the necesary accommodation for the library at very little expense. I somewhat deprecate the idea of our undertaking to advise the Commons as to providing a new chamber for them. Perhaps the hon. gentleman might just as well leave those words out, because, naturally, the members of the other House might look upon it as somewhat of an infringement upon their rights and privileges. What have we to do with their accommodation, they might naturally ask? With respect to additional committee rooms for the Senate, attention has not been called in the House, very clearly at any rate, to the fact that the Commons have gradually taken away a considerable number of rooms which once belonged to the Senate. At the present time, not only the rooms immediately this side of the tower—which is the centre of the front of the building—are in the hands of the Commons, but rooms in the Senate end of the building, in the wing which belongs peculiarly to us, have been for some years now in the hands of the Commons, including amongst others the old Railway Committee room of the other House. If we got back that room and the room adjoining, to the east of it, that would enable us to have respectable meeting places for our various committees, and the committees would not have to meet, as they now do, in the basement. I quite concur too in what the hon. gentleman has said with respect to the accommodation for the officers of the House. When I first came to the Senate, the officers of the House were infinitely better accommodated than they are now, and I think that without any serious change in the structure of the building, we ought to be able to provide certainly better accommodation than they have at present. It may be invidious to particularize, but take the Usher of the Black Rod. He is one of the principal officers of the Senate. He has to meet daily with a great many people, particularly just at the beginning or before the opening of the session, and at the close of the session; and instead of the luxurious and magnificent quarters which one of his predecessors had—one who was in office up to ten years ago—he is assigned a small room up in the attic of the building, almost inaccessible. One needs a guide to find him, even when one is told where that office is. The hon. gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Costigan), deserves the thanks of the Senate for bringing this matter up, and even without dealing with the Minister of Public Works, the Internal Economy Committee of this House might do something to improve the condition of things, for instance as to the Usher of the Black Rod.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (British Columbia)—Beyond doubt, the first great necessity is to clear out the Library. It is packed now with hundreds of tons of old newspapers. Nobody ever looks at them, nor will ever look at them, yet they fill the passages and basement. Some years ago, before we had official reports of the debates in both Houses, it was necessary to refer to newspaper files; but nobody ever thinks of looking at them now. Everything that the members say appears in the official reports. If the government would remove or destroy the files of papers accumulated in the library, they would furnish much needed accommodation.

The SPEAKER—As a member of the Library Committee, it is only right that the House should be informed of the fact that this matter is not being overlooked. The Library Committee, at the close of last session, brought it to the notice of the Public Works Department. It was too late then to have anything done, but this year, early in the session, it came up again, and subsequently a meeting was arranged, when the Minister of Public Works attended and heard the representations which were made as to the necessity for increased accommodation. He heard suggestions as to the way in which accommodation might be furnished. I understand from one of the librarians that, acting upon that, a plan of a building, as an annex to the library, has been prepared and sent to the librarians, but has not reached the committee yet. I have not seen the plans, but I think I know what they are, and although exception has been taken to them for some reasons by the librarians, I am not at all sure that when the committee comes to see them, they will not work out a good deal better, so far as the library is concerned, than has been understood. Shortly put, they are this: another building, not quite the same in formation as the present structure, shall be built as an annex, connected by an underground passage, as is done now in the great public libraries built elsewhere, and the building should be so deep down into the ground, and well lighted as we can do it now by the use of electricity, that it can be used as a storage room. That is what is wanted for the library, and in that way accommodation would be furnished. The lower stories would be square, and would furnish the very best accommodation for the storage of books. That would accommodate nearly 300,000 volumes, which would be more than the books in the library to-day. The result of that would be there would be an upper part of the building where storage could be later on continued, and it could be used as a departmental division of the library. On the whole, without having seen the plans, or knowing more about them, I know that the question of furnishing increased accommodation is receiving attention, and I am not without hopes that the Minister of Public Works will ask for an appropriation to deal with the matter this session.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (British Columbia)—Has any plan been proposed about the newspapers? To construct extra buildings for them would mean a waste of money.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It seems to me the object the hon. member from Victoria, New Brunswick, had in bringing this mater under the consideration of the Senate, was to draw the attention of the government and Public Works Department to the necessity, not only for increasing the library accommodation, but also of making provision for what must necessarily be required in a very short time, that is greater accommodation for the members. As population increases to the westward, the number of members will increase, and it seems to me the principal object the hon. gentleman had in view was not to dictate what should be done, but to call the attention of the Public Works Department, not only to the necessity for increasing the accommodation, but to suggest a plan by which the symmetry of these buildings would not be destroyed. Not being an architect myself, I cannot understand how an addition could be made even of a similar character to the present library, and connect it with that building, or any other portion of this building, without destroying the symmetrical appearance of the group of structures as it exists to-day. The addition to the western wing of the parliament building has not destroyed the appearance of the building, nor would a similar extension if made to the east wing. The suggestion made by the hon. gentleman seems to me not only practical, but if carried out would add to the beauty of the whole structure, and furnish all the accommodation required. It will be for architects, who are learned in matters of this kind, to consider well before erecting new structures on the ground, and to take into consideration the suggestions which have been made. Sometimes a layman with a practical mind can make as valuable suggestions as any that could come from a professional architect, and I hope the suggestions which have been made here to-day will be brought to the notice of the Minister of Public Works before anything further is decided upon.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

TRANSPORTATION OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS BILL.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I beg to move seconded by the Hon. Mr. Yeo, that Bill (N) An Act to regulate the transportation of intoxicating liquors, as proposed to be amended in Committee of the Whole, be printed for the information of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I am surprised at this notice of motion.

The SPEAKER—Is there any objection to the motion being read?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—It is only for information.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I am going to object to its being received.

The SPEAKER—Then there is no occasion for discussion, if there is objection to it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—My hon. friend on my right can give notice that when the Bill is in committee he will make that motion.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—That is not necessary. It is absolutely impossible for the House to comprehend the proposed changes in the Bill, there are so many of them. It means the scoring out and altering of so many sections, that the Senate could not follow the Bill in committee.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—It is absolutely incomprehensible when the word of the House was pledged that this Bill would not be proceeded with until to-day, to members who left for the west and east, to now find that the Bill had gone into committee, when the hon. leader of this House gave us his pledge that no contentious measures would be taken up.

The SPEAKER—Before discussion of the matter, I would ask if it is intended to press the objection to the motion being received?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—No, I do not intend to do that; but I desire to call attention to the fact that this measure has proceeded a stage, contrary to the pledge given by the hon. leader of the House.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—What is my hon. friend objecting to?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This is simply a motion asking that the amendments which have been proposed to the Bill shall be printed for the information of the Senate, so that they will be thoroughly understood by every member, more particularly by our French members, when the Bill goes into committee.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I have no objection to that.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the proceeding is very irregular. There is such a thing as reprinting a Bill as amended in committee; but this is a case of the hon. gentleman in charge of the Bill saying that he proposes at some time, in the future discussion of the Bill, to make certain amendments, and he asks the House now to order that the Bill, with the amendments he proposes be printed. I think the better way is to wait until we get in committee, and if the Bill is there amended in the direction he wishes, it can be printed for the information of the House before the third reading; but I think it is an exceedingly irregular proceeding to move that the proposed amendments be printed.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—It is tantamount to proposing a new Bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The course which is perfectly right and proper is for the hon. gentleman to give notice that when the Bill is in committee he will move these amendments.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I thought I had explained my object. I do not propose to substitute another Bill for this one. It is simply to print the amendments for the information of the Senate, and it is so marked on the top, 'For the information of the Senate.' That is all that is asked. It is done to enable members to understand the amendments when they are moved in committee. It is not an unusual thing; it has been done over and over again, and motions of this kind have been accepted. It is only giving information to the House, and there should be no objection to it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What has been done is this: when amendments have been proposed which alter the Bill so much that the measure is not in the same shape, or is in an incomprehensible form, it is reprinted; but here we are asked not to have the amendments incorporated in the Bill, but to have a new Bill altogether as it will be amended when it goes into committee.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—Oh no.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is what we are asked to do. The best thing is to come in with a new Bill which we can understand. As the hon. gentleman wants to put it, the first Bill was to enact certain things regarding the whole Dominion. Now we want a new Bill with enactments that will apply to one province only. That is a new Bill altogether.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—No. The Bill will go into committee, and all I ask is that the amendments, as they are proposed to be moved here, shall be printed, for the use of the members. It is not official in any sense.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—How can this hon. House order amendments to be printed which it has not before it? We have no amendments before us. We may have the imagination of the hon. gentleman to print; but we have nothing substantial. How can we order to be printed what is not before us?

The SPEAKER—Objection having been taken, the motion is out of order.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—It is the first instance I have known where such a course has been taken. However, I give it as a notice of motion for to-morrow.

PUBLICATION OF LAWS, RULES AND REGULATIONS IN FRENCH.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

Why do not the supplementary numbers of the 'Canada Gazette,' contain the French version of the laws, rules and regulations which are published in English only?

Does the government intend to give, on this subject, the necessary orders to whom it may concern?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The laws are always printed in English, as a supplement to the 'Canada Gazette,' and have never been printed in French. All rules and regulations relating to the Dominion and published as a supplement to the 'Gazette,' are likewise published in the French language. A French translation of the King's Rules and Ordinances, which were published as a supplement to the 'Gazette' some weeks ago, is in course of preparation, and as soon as it is complete it will be published as a supplement to the 'Gazette,' in exactly the same way as the English version was published. All government notices relating to the Dominion at large, or to the provinces of Quebec, or Manitoba, appear in the 'Canada Gazette' in both languages.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Except the laws which are sanctioned here. Lately some laws were sanctioned, which were published in the 'Canada Gazette,' but in English only. They should be printed in both languages.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —The statutes are printed in both languages, as my hon. friend is aware.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am not speaking of the statutes; that is evading the question. I am speaking of the 'Canada Gazette.' Why should the laws, rules and regulations be printed in English only? The 'Canada Gazette' is for the Dominion, and the two languages are official. The laws of the Dominion, which are printed in English in the 'Canada Gazette,' should be printed in French also.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —I am merely stating to the hon. gentleman what has been the invariable practice since confederation.

SCHOOL LANDS IN THE WESTERN PROVINCES.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS moved:

That in view of the rapid increase in land values in the western provinces, this Senate is of the opinion that the school lands in those provinces should be withdrawn from sale, and leased only, until such time as they can be sold to the best advantage, in the interest of the public schools of the provinces in which they are situated.

He said: I will ask permission to strike out the word 'public' because it might start a controversy, and I do not want to take up time in that way.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I should like to ask my hon. friend why he strikes out the word 'public.' We understand that those school lands are held in trust practically by the Dominion government for the use of the public schools of the western provinces. Do I understand my hon. friend to take the position that those lands are held in trust for all schools as distinguishable from public schools?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—As far as I am personally concerned, I think the land is held in trust for public schools; but as I have already said, there are other people who perhaps, have a different opinion. For the purposes of this motion, the use of the word 'public' is not necessary. My object is to conserve the school lands of the west. In the meantime it does not make any difference what schools are included. All I ask is that we should deal with those lands in a certain way in the interests of the schools, and whether they are public schools or not does not affect the motion. I merely want to avoid a controversy.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We have always understood, and the law has been so interpreted, that separate schools are public schools. Hon. gentlemen will doubtless remember that some two sessions ago amendments were made in the process of consolidating the Dominion Lands Act, and the unprecedented step was taken by the government of striking out the word 'public' from the statute, although that word 'public' had been in the statute almost from confederation to that time. For some reason, for which no explanation was given, the word 'public' was stricken out. The government, however, assumed the responsibility, in making an explanation of their reason for so doing, that nevertheless the trust still continued as it was, and the proceeds of the trust would be only applicable for the maintenance of public schools. Of course it was conceded that a separate school is a public school; but why the government took the step at that time I have never had explained. Why my hon. friend strikes the word 'public' from his motion is also difficult for me to understand, because we well know that the trust can in no way enure to the advantage of denominational schools. If my hon. friend has some explanation to make as to why he strikes out the word 'public' from his motion, I should like to hear it.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I have made the only explanation possible for me to make, that I do not wish to raise a controversy at the present time. I wish to discuss on its merits the question whether it would be wise to hold the lands, or to sell them and the question my hon. friend has raised can be considered later. It does not affect my motion in any shape or form. I take it that the school lands would be considered public school lands without inserting the word 'public' at all.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Does the hon. gentleman mean that all schools are entitled to the same protection and same bounty from the government? Are they all on the same footing?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS.—I am not raising that issue. I have nothing to do with that question, and do not wish to make any statement about it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think we should know what the policy of the government on this question is.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Certainly I shall be prepared to state it. I would say to my hon. friend who makes this motion, that while there can be no objection at all to his stating his views, I would not be prepared on behalf of the government to assent to a motion of this kind. It is taking out of the control of the Department of the Interior a very important tract of property which they are bound to administer in the best interests of the inhabitants of Saskatchewan and Alberta, and for the benefit of the schools. He may be right or he may be wrong—I am not in a position to say—as to the result of the policy adopted by the Department of the Interior. If he has any evidence to place before the Senate, it would of course deserve the consideration of this Chamber, and also the government at large, but he brings forward a bald motion to deprive the government of the control of lands which they are endeavouring to administer to the best advantage of the settlers. I am not in a position to consent, on the part of the government, to any such proposition at present. I would suggest to my hon. friend that he state his case, and then the debate could be adjourned until such time as I shall have an opportunity to consult with the Department of the Interior. I was not aware he was going to bring the motion up to-day, or I would have conferred with the parties in charge of the matter, and have obtained from them a declaration of the reasons which have induced them to pursue the policy which has been pursued up to the present time. But without some very strong reason I certainly could not concur in the proposition which is now laid before the House.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—With reference to the statement of the hon. leader of the House, I may say that I do not wish to deprive the Department of the Interior of the right of the control of school lands, or anything of that kind. I merely introduce the motion so that the subject shall be discussed and taken into consideration by the Department of the Interior. I am simply expressing my own views in regard to it. My view at the present time is that it would be wiser, in the interests of the country, to lease the lands and hold them until we would receive a higher price for them. That is the whole thing in a nut-shell. I propose in the meantime to give all the information I have collected on the subject to the House, and place it in the 'Debates,' and I hope the government and the Minister of the Interior will take up the question and see if they do not think the policy that I have suggested would be a better one than the method adopted at the present time. As a matter of fact, there is quite a large amount of school lands in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. The predecessors of the present government, acting very wisely, laid aside a large amount of land in each township in the new country for school purposes. I think it is up to the present government and succeeding governments to administer that land in such a way as would be most beneficial to the people of the provinces for school purposes, and we might adopt a better system than selling the lands. I propose shortly to give my reasons for this opinion. Before proceeding to do so, however, I wish to give a little statement to the House of the amount of lands there are in those provinces, because I suppose every hon. gentleman is not seized of the information on this question. The information that I give cannot be considered as absolutely reliable, because a great portion of Alberta and Saskatchewan is not yet surveyed; therefore we have to make an estimate of the amount of lands there. The return that I have from the Department of the Interior gives the following information:

Assuming the total area of Manitoba to be 41,169,280 acres, and assuming school sections to comprise one-eighteenth or two sections in every township, the approximate area of school lands in the province of Manitoba is 2,287,182 acres. On the same basis, assuming the area of Saskatchewan to be 151,900,000 acres, the approximate area of school lands in that province is 8,438,888 acres and, assuming the total area of the province of Alberta to be 155,400,000 acres, the area of school lands is approximately 8,633,333 acres.

The school lands disposed of by public auction in the province of Manitoba and in the provisional districts of Assiniboia and Alberta in each year to the 1st September, 1905, when the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta were established, and the average price per acre realized each year are as follows:

Ths area of the school lands in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta sold in each year between the 1st September, 1905, and the 1st of January, 1910, and the average price per acre realized in each year is as follows:—

Year.	Province or District.	Area sold in Acres.	Average Price per Acre.
			$ cts.
1905-6	Manitoba.....	692·00	12 39

	Saskatchewan....	14,737·40	15 98
	Alberta.....	234,862·20	10 94

The approximate area remaining unsold in each of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta is as follows:—

	Acres.
Manitoba..	1,698,755
Saskatchewan..	8,240,014
Alberta..	8,258,879

The total area of school lands disposed of in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, to the 31st of December, 1909, the total principal of the purchase money therefor, and the average price per acre, are as follows:—

Total area sold.. .. ..acres.	1,161,757·76
Amount realized.. .. ..$	11,955,878 93
Average price per acre realized..	10 29

In connection with this, I might say that while the price that we have realized looks to be large—that is a little over ten dollars an acre on the land we have sold up to date—if any hon. gentleman will take the trouble to analyse the figures and statements, they will find that the large price realized was in the small quantities of land sold in or near where towns have been established, or where cities have grown up, and improvements of that kind, have increased the value of land in the vicinity. It only proves that my argument is correct: that if we hold this land it will eventually increase in value to such an extent that we, in the western provinces, will be self-supporting, as far as the schools are concerned. Supposing the government sell the land at ten dollars an acre, which is the average, it is sold on time. They receive a small payment in cash, and are paid five per cent interest on the balance. Taking ten dollars an acre as the price, at five per cent, that is fifty cents a year, they would realize out of the lands sold, and that land is in all the better parts of the country. I claim that if the lands were leased we would eventually realize a much larger amount of money. You would also be able to rent lands that you could not sell. People would rent the land for pasture and give a reasonable rent, whereas if you are selling the land at ten dollars an acre, I am inclined to think that you could rent the land on a twenty-five year lease, at two dollars an acre. I have had farmers tell me that it would pay them if they could get a lease for twenty-five years at two dollars an acre. By that means we could obtain a large rental for lands situated near the towns. We could also rent lands in the outlying districts, and more money would be paid into the treasury in that way, while the government would still own the land. Nobody will deny the statement, that if you hold lands for a certain time they will increase in value. We would be holding the lands and receiving five per cent; but the increase in the value of lands in the Northwest has been far more than five per cent. It would pay the Dominion government, and it would pay the provincial government to borrow the money they wanted and retain the lands. The increase in value of lands in that country amounts to twenty per cent, and as time goes on it will further increase in value. Take the vast amount of property held in Montreal by a few proprietors. How did these landowners get it? They bought it in the early days and held on to it, and in some cases now the land is worth hundreds of millions. Take all the denominations which have bought property, churches, and so on. Some of these places have paid only five per cent interest to the church; but they held the property for years, and they are now selling it at very high figures. I claim that while we have these school lands in the western provinces we should try and hold a certain portion of it for the future, until we could realize a fair price for it. I know certain arguments will be used against the proposition. Some western men will say that if you leased the land there would be no way of collecting the rent. That is all nonsence. We collect the rent on the timber berths.

If it was a private individual to whom these rents would be payable, they would not be collected, but the government can collect them. The same system can be adopted by giving yearly leases. That is, if a man gets a 25 years lease of land, it should be renewable from year to year for that time, and he should be required to fulfil the conditions and pay rent or let his lease lapse. In that way, when a man fences in a piece of land he must keep it clean, as provided in the lease. It might not be a good thing to hold all the lands, but the government might consider the propriety of holding portions of the lands until they increase in value, and we can get something like what they are worth. If one-fourth of the school lands in Saskatchewan were held as I suggest for 30 or 40 years, they would provide funds enough to maintain the schools required for all time. What I want to prevent is the frittering away of these lands at low prices. I have had letters since I put this motion on the order paper asking to lease these lands at rates varying from 50 cents to $2 an acre. There is quite a feeling amongst the people in the west, who do a little thinking, that it is pretty nearly time we began to conserve some of our school lands until we can get better prices for them. I hope the government will give the matter some attention. In view of the statement of the right hon. leader of the House, I do not wish to press this motion.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —As I observed to the hon. gentleman, I shall certainly bring his motion and remarks to the notice of the Department of the Interior, and I may be able to give him some information after they have had an opportunity of looking into the question.

Hon. Mr. De Veber moved the adjournment of the debate until the 13th inst.

The motion was agreed to.

FISHING RIGHTS OF RIPARIAN PROPRIETORS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY rose to draw the attention of the government to the following facts:

1. On the 13th October, 1896, the Supreme Court of Canada pronounced on certain question of law which had been submitted to it by order of His Excellency the Governor General in Council.

Among those questions, to the number of seventeen, were the following:—

5. Had riparian proprietors before confederation an exclusive right of fishing in non-navigable lakes, rivers, streams and waters, the beds of which had been granted to them by the Crown?

6. Has the Dominion parliament jurisdiction to authorize the giving by lease, license, or otherwise, to lessees, licensees, or other grantees, the right of fishing in such waters as mentioned in the last question, or any, and which of them?

7. Has the Dominion parliament exclusive jurisdiction to authorize the giving by lease, license or otherwise, to lessees, licensees, or other grantees, the right of fishing in such waters mentioned in the last question, or any, and which of them?

To these three questions it was answered as follows:—

To the 5th: Yes, by Judges Strong, Girouard, Gwynne, King; No, by Judge Taschereau.

To the 6th: No, by Judges Strong, Girouard, Taschereau, King; No, by Judge Gwynne.

To the 7th: No, by Judges Strong, Girouard, Taschereau, King; Yes, by Judge Gwynne

Three other questions were put to the tribunal of the Supreme Court of Canada as follows:—

8. Has the Dominion such jurisdiction as regards navigable or unnavigable waters, the beds and banks of which are assigned to the provinces respectively under the British North America Act, if any such are so assigned?

9. If the Dominion parliament has any jurisdiction as mentioned in the preceding three questions, has a provincial legislature jurisdiction for the purpose of provincial revenue or otherwise to require the Dominion lessee, licensee or other grantee to take out a provincial license also?

10. Had the Dominion parliament jurisdiction to pass section 4 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, chapter 95, intituled: 'An Act respecting Fisheries and Fishing,' or any other of the provisions of the said Act, or any and which of such several sections, or any and what parts thereof, respectively?

To these three questions it was answered as follows:—

To the 8th: No, by Judges Strong, Girouard, Taschereau and King; Yes, by Judge Gwynne.

To the 9th: No, by Judges Strong, Girouard, Taschereal and King; Yes, by Judge Gwynne.

To the 10th: Yes, by the full court.

2. These decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada were the subject of an appeal of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in England, and on the 26th May, 1898, final judgment was rendered by that high tribunal answering as follows each of the questions above mentioned:—

In answer to the 5th question: 'that the riparian proprietors are not parties to this litigation and it is not proper to pronounce any opinion as to the extent of their rights.'

In answer to the 6th, 7th and 8th questions: 'that under the British North American Act, 1867, the said Dominion parliament has exclusive authority to enact fishery regulations and restrictions and is empowered to deal with proprietary rights in fisheries so far as may be necessary for the purpose of such regulations and restrictions and that it has power to impose a license duty on fishing for purpose of taxation.'

In answer to the 9th and 15th questions: 'that under the British North America Act, 1867, a provincial legislature is not empowered to enact fishery regulations and restrictions either generally or unless and until the Dominion parliament sees fit to deal with the subject: that a provincial legislature is empowered to deal with fisheries in so far as they fall within description of "property and civil rights" or within the description of any other subject assigned to provincial legislatures; and that a provincial legislature may impose a license duty on fishing in order to raise a revenue for provincial purposes.'

In answer to 10th and 11th questions: 'that the Dominion parliament had not jurisdiction to pass section 4 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, chapter 95 intituled: "An Act respecting Fisheries and Fishing," in so far as the said section purports to authorize the grant of fishery leases conferring an exclusive right to fish in property belonging not to the Dominion but to the provinces and that the subsidiary provisions of the said last-mentioned Act, in so far as they are intended to enforce rights which the Dominion parliament was not empowered to confer are of no effect.'

3. On the third of March of the present year, the Hon. Mr. Landry put to the government the following questions which have elicited the answers hereafter given:—

1. Did the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council of His Majesty, in England, pronounce, in 1898, upon the question of the respective jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures and of the federal parliament in so far as concerns the property of rivers, lakes and harbours, and the rights of riparian proprietors?

2. What was, in its main features, the decision rendered?

3. According to this judgment, can exclusive rights of fishing be granted, either by this parliament or by the provincial legislatures in waters where the tide makes itself felt?

4. Has the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council declared that the federal parliament had no right at all to enact section 4 of chapter 95 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1886, in so far as that section allows the federal government to issue licenses for exclusive rights of fishing?

5. Has this section 4 of chapter 95 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1886, been repeated in the Revised Statutes of Canada now in force?

6. Does the government intend to give effect to the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council?

7. In what manner?

Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright—The replies of the department are as follows:—

1. Yes, except as to lakes and rights of riparian proprietors.

2. Refer to judgment reported in 1898 appeal cases, page 700.

3. This is a matter of opinion to be formed upon consideration of the judgment.

4. No.

5. Yes, but subject to the modification introduced by section 4 of the revised Act, R.S., 1906, chapter 45.

6 and 7. The law is being administered in accordance with the decision of the Judicial Committee.

And that he will inquire—

How can the fourth answer of the government be reconciled with the decisions of the Privy Council as given in reply to the tenth question which had been submitted to it?

Does the government refuse to give fishery licenses or permits to those who ask it for them to fish in the rivers where the tide makes itself felt?

If it refuses upon what does it base such a refusal?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—On referring the matter to the Department of Justice, they reply only to his first question. I have not received an answer as yet from the Department of Marine and Fisheries, which is due, no doubt, to the unfortunate illness of Mr. Brodeur. The fourth inquiry is as follows:

How can the fourth answer of the government be reconciled with the decision of the Privy Council as given in reply to the tenth question which had been submitted to it?

To this the department say" this is not a question which the government should answer. Senator Landry put his question, No. 4, on 3rd instant, and it was properly answered in the negative as is manifest by reference to the judgment of the Judicial Committee. The exact words of the Judicial Committee are: 'It follows from what has been said that in so far as section 4 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, chapter 95, empowers the grant of fishery leases conferring an exclusive right to fish in property belonging not to the Dominion but to the provinces, it was not within the jurisdiction of the Dominion parliament to pass it.'

It is perfectly obvious that the committee did not decide that the federal parliament had no right at all to enact section 4, they merely decided that section 4 could not have effect as to property which did not belong to the Dominion. If Senator Landry cannot understand this, I do not see how it is possible to make it any plainer.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We will try.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I shall place the answer in his hands, and send his reply to the Department of Justice, whose officials do not seem to always understand what the hon. gentleman is driving at.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I suppose in the meantime we will have a reply from the other department.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I have asked for it, but have not yet received it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I want to know if the government refuse to grant fisheries licenses, and if so on what ground. If I want a license to fish in rivers where the tide makes itself felt, why should a license be refused?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I put the question to the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and have not yet received a reply from them.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I suppose this question refers more particularly to the trouble on the river Matane?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

BURRARD INLET TUNNEL AND BRIDGE COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. DE VEBER moved the third reading of Bill (No. 118) an Act to incorporate the Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE moved in amendment

That the said Bill be not now read a third time, but that clause 11 be amended by leaving out the following words after the word 'municipality' in line 42:—
'for the purpose of disposing of the surplus power or energy acquired or developed as provided for in this section.'

He said: These words are to be found in the proviso contained in clause 11, and which reads as follows:

Provided, however, the company shall not erect any poles or lines upon or along the highways, streets or other public places of any municipality for the purpose of disposing of the surplus power or energy acquired or developed as provided for in this section, nor carry on a lighting or power business within such municipality without first obtaining the consent, expressed by by-law, of the municipality having jurisdiction over the said highway, street or other public place, and upon terms to be agreed upon with such municipality.

It will be noticed that if these words were left in the proviso, it would enable the company to erect and maintain poles in highways, streets and other public places in any municipality, provided it was not for the purpose of disposing of the surplus power developed. It is against the policy of this parliament to grant any powers which would enable a company to interfere with the rights of ownership of municipalities.

Hon. Mr. DE VEBER—I have no objection whatever to the amendment.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill as amended was read the third time, and passed.

INCORPORATION OF RAILWAY COMPANIES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS moved the second reading of Bill (D) An Act to provide for the incorporation of railway companies. He said: This Bill has been before the House quite a length of time, and I understand some hon. gentlemen have criticised me for allowing the order to stand so long. I may explain that on several occasions I wanted to take it up, but there was always the Insurance Committee, or something of the kind that prevented me from doing so until now. I introduced this Bill last year, but at so late a stage of the session that it failed to get the consideration it deserved. The object of this Bill is to do away with what I consider an unnecessary waste of time in the two Railway Committees of parliament, and to adopt a simpler and more efficient method of granting railway charters than we have to-day. In other ways, the Bill embodies the best principles of railway legislation in the various states of the neighbouring union. We have been in the habit of granting charters to everybody that came along, until they cover the whole country. I know it is the case in my own province. It is crossed with projected railways until the map looks like a cobweb. Charters have been granted for railways which will never be built, and I doubt if the promoters ever expected that they would be. I do not see why the time of parliament should be taken up with work of that kind, when it can be done in a simpler manner by following the method set forth in my Bill. Last year I gave a statement of the number of charters that had been granted in the ten years preceding, and also a statement of the railways which have been built under those charters. It will not be amiss, perhaps, if I refresh the minds of hon. gentlemen with reference to that matter.

I hold in my hand the return of the House of Commons which was moved for by an hon. gentleman this session, giving the number of that class of charters granted since the year 1900, up to date, and in this estimate the Grand Trunk railway, the Canadian Northern railway and the Canadian Pacific railway are excluded. This refers to railways outside of these great lines. I have reduced it to a digest, because the report is too long to read or place in the 'Debates'

I find that in 1900 we granted eight charters, covering 2,670 miles of road. Out of that amount of mileage, 84 miles have been built. We have granted 21 extensions of time, and four of these charters have lapsed.

In 1901 we granted eleven charters, covering 2,977 miles of railway, and out of that mileage only nineteen miles have been built. We have given 13 extensions of time, and seven charters have lapsed. Only four of them have been kept alive, and in regard to two of them nothing was done.

In 1902 we granted twelve charters, covering 6,388 miles of road, and there was not a mile of them built. We have granted 15 extensions of time. And five of those charters have lapsed.

They were getting bolder all the time, and in 1903 we granted twenty-two charters, for 8,415 miles—they were getting a lot, and they would soon be getting up to the moon. There were 150 miles of that built, 21 extensions and six charters.

In 1904, fourteen charters, 3,803 miles; 50 miles built; 12 extensions and three lapses.

In 1905, fifteen charters, 2,365 miles; 15 miles have been built, and we granted nine extensions.

In 1906 we granted seventeen charters, covering 2,254 miles. On one charter they built one and one-fifth mile, and on another charter, the Quebec, Montreal and Southern, they did a good deal of work; they built 144 miles, and we have granted six extensions.

In 1907 we granted thirteen charters, 5,440 miles; nothing built at all, and we have granted two extensions of time.

In 1908, we granted four charters, covering 3,550 miles, and nothing was built at all. The total mileage chartered since 1900 was 37,862 miles. We have granted the right to chartermongers to build all that mileage. Of that amount, 463 miles have been built; but that has been built by 13 out of 116 companies which were chartered; 421 miles of that were built by eight companies, and 42 miles of it were built by five companies; 26 charters lapsed, and there were 86 extensions of time given to 68 companies. That statement speaks for itself.

Last year, I find, on going to the Department of Railways and Canals, that we put through 68 charters, covering about 68,000 miles. This year we have granted 75 charters, covering I do not know how much country, but probably about 75,000 miles, and I do not think any one believes that those roads will ever be built. A few years ago, before we adopted the principle of granting charters to every one that came along there might have been an argument in favour of our practice because at that time we rejected a railway Bill occasionally. Now, we reject nothing. We grant every applicant a charter. If we adopt that principle, there should be a simpler and easier way of getting charters than we have at the present time. I propose to do away with all these difficulties, and I appeal to the hon. gentlemen who sit on the Railway Committee in this House, and who have sat on the Railway Committee in the other Chamber, if they will tell me what has been done by those committees in this year or last year. We simply do nothing at all. We have a model Bill, and we have a Railway Act, and we have to confine ourselves to the provisions of that Act, and we can give nothing that is not already provided for. Why, therefore, should the Railway Committee sit and listen to a lot of argument by people coming before them to get charters for nothing, when there is a simpler way of doing it? My Bill contains a provision for obtaining a charter, but the promoters have to put up a certain amount of money, and if they come to the conclusion to build a road to a certain point, they have to advertise that road and employ a competent engineer, or engineers to go over the work, and make a plan of the road and a profile of the country. They also have to deposit money that will pay damages that may accrue to anybody owning property in the country through which they are building. Under that provision, no company could obtain a charter without expending $250 a mile. If any company want to build a road, they would be prepared to advance that sum; but if any company wanted a charter merely for the purpose of selling it, they would not pay the money, because the risk would be too great. Applications for these extensions of time are a great nuisance in our Railway Committee meetings; not only the charter mongers, but the big railway companies are asking for extensions of time, and what does it mean? They file plans for a road through a piece of country for which they have a charter. The object of filing plans is very often to keep some other railroad from building the line. In other cases it is to induce people to settle in the country, so that the company will be enabled to sell their lands. These railroad corporations own large tracts of land in the west, and if they want to increase the price of the land they go to the Minister of Railways and file a plan, and immediately settlers rush in there with the expectation that they are going to get a railroad, and are left there for years and years raising grain that they are not able to get to the market. Under the system I propose, that will be all done away with. If the Canadian Pacific railway, the Canadian Northern railway, or the Grand Trunk Pacific wanted to build a branch line of road, they would have to send their engineers over there to prepare a plan which would show the character of the country and the cost of the road, and submit that to the Railway Commission or to the Minister of Railways, as the case might be, and he would be in a position to say whether they should be allowed a charter or not. If he thinks the road should be built, then he will give them what bonding powers he thinks they should have, and he is acting on something which he has before him. We now grant those powers without any knowledge of what we are doing. A man comes along, and says there is a charter to build a road in a certain place, and he wants bonding powers for so much a mile. He describes the country; that there are rocks, and muskegs and mountains, and it is very difficult construction. But the committee are absolutely ignorant of the facts. They have no information before them, and they have to take the word of the promoter, and give him bonding powers to the extent of perhaps $40,000 per mile. Under this Bill, if a party goes to the Minister of Railways or Railway Commission, they take the matter up, and they see that a competent engineer has gone over the route, and if he reports that it would cost $40,000 a mile to build the road, the minister will give the company permission to bond it to that extent. When they bond the road, the Railway Commission has to take that into consideration. Promoters might induce people to put $40,000 a mile in bonds of a road that was costing perhaps only $14,000 or $15,000 a mile. When the money is invested, the investors expect to get interest upon it, and no commission would ever think of fixing a rate that would not pay interest on $40,000 a mile if that amount of money had been borrowed whether it was put in or not. It is up to parliament to see that the bonding powers of a railway company are not too high, and the only way to prevent it is by allowing some officer to deal with it on the certificate of the engineer as to the character of the road. This is a long Bill. I went through all the Railway Acts of the different states of the Union, and I extracted from them what I thought suited this country best, and embodied it in my Bill. I claim that it will do away with charter mongers, and it will relieve the members of the Senate and of the other House of useless work in the committees. In the next place, it will do away with lobbying, which I presume every gentleman in this House will agree with me is not a very good thing. Charters will be granted on their merits. Nobody will be going around button-holing senators and saying: 'Vote for my Bill.' The matter is settled on its merits. If the Bill does not commend itself to this House for any other reason, I submit it should, if it has the effect of doing away with the lobby during the session of parliament. Of course it will shorten the session by at least a month. The business of the country is increasing. Sometimes we are in session for six months. If seven millions of people have to keep the federal parliament in session for six months, when we have local legislatures dealing with propositions which do not come before us, what will it be later on as the business of the country increases? We would be able to do our business more quickly if the system I suggest were adopted. It will also end the extensions of time which have become a nuisance and I understand the Minister of Railways gave notice to some of the gentlemen that the time was fast approaching when extensions of time woud not be entertained. In this Bill there is a provision that if a company furnish the information required by law to the Minister of Railways, or to the Board of Railway Commissioners, as the case may be, that they have complied with the provisions of the law, they can go down to the Secretary of State and get their charter, and proceed with the work. In a new country, being sparsely settled, it is sometimes necessary to build a piece of railway promptly. The railway cannot be built until parliament meet; because the company have to obtain a charter. Under the system I propose, if it is found necessary that a railway should be built between sessions, all they have to do is to advertise and comply with the provisions of this measure, and they can obtain their charter here and proceed with the work. There are a number of provisions that should commend themselves to this House. I think the time will come when we must adopt such a system. Members will become tired of discussing matters which can be transacted just as well outside of this House as in it.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—And it can be better done.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—We can employ our time in better ways. The hon. gentleman from Middlesex had several committees appointed, and on several occasions he was unable to obtain a quorum. We could divide the time we save from attendance in the Railway Committees among those other committees.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—We spend time in the Railway Committee room that could be more beneficially spent at some other committee. There was a suggestion as to a Committee on Militia and Defence. It was contended that a great deal of money had been spent by that department. That there was no check on it. I should like to see some of those gentlemen connected with it brought before the committee to show how the money is spent. If we would substitute that for the Railway Committee, I think we would be doing a good thing in the interests of the country. I know it is rather late to submit so important a Bill at the present time, but I introduced it last year, and I present it to the Senate now.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Where would the parties opposing a charter be heard?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—The Bill provides for all that. It provides that advertising shall be done more fully than at the present time, and that anybody who wants to be heard can be heard before the Minister of Railways or the Board of Railway Commissioners. I have inserted the words 'Board of Railway Commissioners' in the Bill; but some people think it should be the Minister of Railways. That could be changed.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Or either.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Or either, and they would come here and the minister would hear all the objections to the road if there were any? Just the same as filing the plans now. The Minister of Railways adopted that system and notifies the members affected by the filing of the route map and hears what is to be said, and it would save a great deal of time. I can assure my hon. friend that there is provision made for everything of that kind. In the first place, the Bill starts off with providing that any body of men who wish to be incorporated as a company to build a road will require to do certain things. The first thing is to show their bona fides by putting up a certain amount of money before they become organized, and the second is to put up a certain amount of money in the bank, where they cannot withdraw it, for the purpose of paying any damages which may accrue. At present any four or five gentlemen whose names may be Tom Jones, or Peter Brown, can apply to parliament for a charter to build 4,000 miles of road. We never inquire into their bona fides or anything else. We grant them a charter and the right to trample over peoples' property without considering whether they can pay for any damages that may accrue, or anything else. We give the power of expropriation to four or five gentlemen who, perhaps, could scarcely buy a wrestling jacket for a mosquito. The Bill covers every phase of the question, and I think, if adopted, it would be a good thing for the country.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I move that the debate be adjourned until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

THE SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 7, 1910.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings

NEW SENATOR.

WILLIAM ROCHE, of the city of Halifax.

TERMINAL ELEVATORS IN MANITOBA.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER moved:

That an order of the Senate do issue for a copy of all correspondence or petitions received by the government of Manitoba grain growers in connection with terminal elevators, especially a letter, dated the 31st January, 1910.

The motion was agreed to.

THE IMMIGRATION OFFICE AT QUEBEC.

MOTION.

Mr. LANDRY moved:

That an order of this House do issue for the production of a copy of the attendance lists of the employees of the immigration office at Quebec, from the 1st April, 1909, to this day, and also, for a copy of the pay-lists of the same employees during the same period.

The motion was agreed to.

ACCOMMODATION FOR IMMIGRANTS AT GROSSE ISLE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved:

That an order of this House do issue for the production of the requests or of the complaints made by the navigation companies for the past five years, on the subject of the insufficiency of the means of accommodation put at the disposal of the authorities of Grosse Isle for the benefit of the immigrants, obliged by the regulations to remain there.

The motion was agreed to.

RE-EMBARKATION OF IMMIGRANTS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

1. Who, in the Immigration Department at Quebec, during the years, from 1905 to 1908, both inclusive, prepared all the reports concerning the office, and more especially the repatriation lists of the immigrants not accepted, the discharge lists of the immigrants at the Grosse Isle quarantine, and at the Quebec hospital. Who personally presided over the re-embarkation of the immigrants sent back to their own country?
2. In 1909, who did the work hereinabove mentioned?
3. If it was the immigration agent, did he do it alone, or did he cause himself to be aided by some employee?
4. By whom, and the name?
5. What are the names of the officers of the department who, during the season of navigation of 1909, were charged with the re-embarkation of immigrants who were forced to go back to their own country?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —It will be necessary to write to Quebec to get the information. This has been done and as soon as the information is obtained it will be brought down.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Then it may stand until Tuesday.

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT —Yes.

The inquiry was allowed to stand.

TRANSPORTATION OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS BILL.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT:

I beg leave to move, seconded by Mr. Yeo:

That Bill (N). An Act to regulate the transportation of intoxicating liquors, as proposed to be amended in Committee of the Whole, be printed for the information of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We have not before us any information to indicate how it is proposed to amend this Bill in the Committee of the Whole, and I do not see why the Senate should make an order for a matter it does not know anything about. The proper course is to wait until the Bill goes into the committee, and the amendments have been proposed. Then let the Bill as amended be reprinted.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—The changes in the Bill are so numerous that it will be quite impossible for the House to understand them unless they happen to be looking at the copy before the chairman, and it was for the purpose of placing information before the House that I moved this motion. Here is the front page of the Bill, and hon. gentlemen will see the amount of it that has been struck out. I would like to know how any chairman could explain it to the committee. And what objection can there be to my proposition? Its sole object is that senators may know what the committee is doing when the amendments are proposed, so that they can discuss the Bill intelligently.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think there is a very easy way of obtaining the information. Why does not the hon. gentleman present a new Bill?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I cannot do that.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Why not?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—That would be very unreasonable.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—He should submit a Bill on the lines he proposes to have this Bill amended in Committee of the Whole, and we would then have the whole document before us.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—Could the hon. gentleman submit the amendments on a separate piece of paper? The hon. gentleman knows what he is going to move, and is prepared to discuss these amendments; but we have not seen them. I think it would be better if these amendments were printed and submitted to the House.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I propose to have them printed and placed in the hands of members.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think we should transact our business decently and in order, and according to the rules of the House. All that the hon. gentleman had to do was to place on paper a notice of the amendments he proposed to make, and have them printed in our minutes; but he has preferred to take another course, which I think is contrary to the practice of this House.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—It would be absolutely impossible to adopt such a suggestion. That is the idea I had at first; but I found it of no value, and I took the other course, in order that the House might understand what the changes meant. I will have to postpone the committee stage.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think it would be easy to bring that in as an amendment in this way, that all the words after the words so and so be struck out and replaced by the following, and in that way he would give effect to his amendment.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Why could the hon. gentleman not accomplish the object he has in view by giving notice that when the Bill goes into committee he will move such an amendment, and that the proposed amendment be printed in the proceedings of the day, and we shall all see it in the minutes to-morrow?

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—I endeavoured to carry that out; but I did not see that it was giving the House the information it desired, because it had not the connection with the context it went with, and therefore I have taken the other course.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The same result will be accomplished if my suggestion is adopted.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the hon. gentleman will say he proposes that this Bill be amended, so as to read as follows, and then give his amendment; that is the whole thing, and he gets his Bill just as it is. As I understand it, he has his Bill in his hand with the necessary amendments made, and all he has to do is to give notice that when the Bill goes to committee this is the Bill which is to be passed.

Hon. Sir RICHARD SCOTT—If the House concurs in that view, I am willing to adopt the suggestion. My whole object is to get the information before us in some intelligible form, that members will comprehend; therefore I give notice that the following are the amendments proposed to be submitted to the House when the Bill goes into committee on Tuesday. They will go on the 'Minutes.'

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (FFF) An Act respecting the Guelph Junction Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Gibson.

MONTREAL CENTRAL TERMINAL COMPANY'S BILL.

AMENDMENTS CONSIDERED.

The order of the day being called:

Consideration of the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours on Bill (44), An Act respecting the Montreal Central Terminal Company.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is it not the intention of the promoters of the Bill to withdraw it?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The intention was expressed when this Bill came before the Senate prior to the adjournment. For my part I took exception to the Bill being withdrawn, because the amendments had been inserted with the consent of the promoters, and for the protection of the interests of the city of Montreal, as those interests had been protected in another Bill similar to this which came before the committee on the same day. The promoters of this Bill having been parties to inserting this amendment in both Bills, now ask to withdraw their own Bill. That is hardly fair, and the request should not be granted. We have received communication from the president of the company, and on examining the exception which is taken to the amendments, especially the fact that this company being a terminal company, we find that the promoters of the Bill at the time the amendment was adopted did not realize the full bearing of the amendment. I must confess, on examining the matter more closely, there is something in that statement, but it could easily be met by the insertion of a couple of words in the amendment made by the committee. The amendment is as follows:

2. No part of the bridge or tunnel or approaches thereto situate in the city of Montreal and which the company is authorized to construct shall be used for the purpose of urban passenger service, or for the passage of pedestrians, vehicles, cars or carriages used for urban service, without the consent of the said city expressed by by-law and setting out the conditions of such consent.

By inserting the words ' by the company ' after the words 'shall be used,' I think the object would be better attained. What is feared by the promoters of the Bill is that if this amendment remains as it is, no company will be permitted to use the bridge without being deprived of passenger traffic to which it is entitled. For instance, if the Grand Trunk railway or the Canadian Pacific railway, or any railway company, which to-day has power to carry passengers from one part of the city of Montreal to another part in that city, this amendment might be interpreted as depriving them of the right to do that, thereby curtailing the operations of companies using the tunnel. It is to prevent that I am now suggesting that these words be inserted, so that the restriction will apply only to the company, and not to any of the companies entitled by their charters to provide an urban passenger service.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The hon. gentleman might move concurrence in the report of the committee.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—That is what I intended to do. I now move that the amendment be concurred in.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON—I understand that the promoters of the Bill, finding that the amendment will do the company an injustice, wish to withdraw it. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that he was particularly anxious the Senate should affirm the amendments made by the committee, because they were in the interests of the city of Montreal. If the city were asking for legislation on this subject, they might ask for amendments. In that case, the city would be paying the necessary fee for the legislation, and if the amendments were not satisfactory to the company, the city might refuse to withdraw the Bill. I do not quite appreciate the ground taken by the hon. gentleman, that because the amendments were made in the interest of Montreal, therefore the private company, who not only introduced the Bill, but paid all the expenses, should not be allowed to withdraw it, but that the city of Montreal should take advantage of the legislation at the expense of the company. The hon. gentleman suggests that he can further amend the amendments made by the Railway Committee, and he is willing to do so in order to protect the interests of the city of Montreal. In view of the claim of the president of the company, that the amendments are unjust to the company, any proposed amendment should be referred to the company in order that they may have some voice on the subject before the amendments are adopted.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I have not heard to-day that any demand has been made by the company that the Bill be withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I have a letter from the president of the company, dated the 6th instant, asking that the Bill be withdrawn. It is a most unusual thing to refuse permission when such a request is made. I do not know of any case where a company was not allowed to withdraw its Bill. I will read one paragraph from the letter of the president:

The company is not an ordinary railway company, but organized to furnish passenger and freight terminal facilities at Montreal for all companies reaching that city. The trains of at least ten railway companies will use the company's tracks and stations, and the amendment would prevent the suburban trains of any of these companies from doing so in the manner provided for. The effect of the passing of this amendment would be to take away from every railway company coming into Montreal rights which they now possess. Under these circumstances, I trust that the Senate will allow the Bill to be withdrawn.

Now my hon. friend proposes an amendment to the amendment.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—He says he will move that at the third reading.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I think the House should hesitate before passing a Bill which the company asks leave to withdraw.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I think it is the hon. member from Ottawa who is responsible for the Bill before the House, and we have not heard any request from him to withdraw it; if he does not so move I shall register my vote against the Bill for this reason: I have not looked at the authorities to see what has been the practice in the past, but before it can be withdrawn there must be a demand formally made for permission to withdraw. It should follow that if there must be a demand, it is within the power of the House to refuse. This Bill came before the Railway Committee, together with another Bill affecting the underground traffic of the city of Montreal. The amendments which are now before us for consideration were the very amendments which had been suggested and were being discussed on the other Bill which had been under review at the preceding meeting. The amendments to this Bill were assented to, with the express concurrence of the representatives of the company that is now under discussion. It was assented to by a number of senators quite reluctantly, who did not feel like having the same clauses attached to the Bill that followed, and it was stated by two or three parties that the promoters of this present Bill consented to these amendments in order that they might be incorporated in the rival Bill. In the face of the statement that the promoters of this Bill accepted the amendments, all opposition ceased and the amendments were agreed to. The other Bill was likewise amended, and now, after assenting to these amendments in order to create a precedent which would avail against the next Bill, the promoters of this Bill demand that this Bill be withdrawn. This Bill passed last year. Some safeguards were placed in it for the protection of the city of Montreal. This year the committee have gone a step further, and furnished additional safeguards similar to those inserted in the other Bill at the same sitting. This is a case in which we should refuse to sanction the withdrawal of the Bill, and in which we should affirm the amendments adopted in the committee with the reservation that it may be amended at the third reading, or referred back to the committee to consider the amendments and the representations made by the president of the company in a letter which has been distributed among the members of the Senate. These are the facts as they stand. It is irregular to mention what has taken place in a committee, but I know that the amendments were passed there with the concurrence of the promoters of the Bill, and in spite of the protest of some members who did not like to see this precedent created. Now, when the other Bill has had to stand these same amendments, we are faced with a possible demand that this Bill be withdrawn. Under the circumstances, this being a special case, if there is no settled precedent or practice to guide us, I think these amendments should be adhered to.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My knowledge of the circumstances which led to the amendment being made in the Bill, and to which objection is taken, differs from that taken by my hon. friend. From what I can learn—and that coincides with the knowledge which I personally have—the amendment was unwittingly made. It was in a sense forced upon the promoters of the Bill without their being able to give a proper consideration, at the time we were sitting in committee, as to its bearing upon the entire Bill.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The hon. gentleman will allow me to state without fear of contradiction, that it was with full consent expressed by the promoters of the Bill, and of the two lawyers who were present, I think Mr. Parent being one of them, and Mr. Hogg the other.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I do not controvert that, but the promoters of a Bill may consent to an amendment being made, in fact they may all be present together with their counsel, without having the opportunity to properly consider the bearing of that amendment upon the context of the Bill, and that I understand was the position in which the promoters of the Bill were placed at the time the amendment was embodied in the measure. The argument advanced by my hon. friend who has just resumed his seat is certainly not an argument against the withdrawal of the Bill. His argument is that if a similar clause be inserted in another Bill that that clause is not of a salutory character provided another Bill be withdrawn. That is what it amounts to; but if the clause is desirable or desired on the part of the interests involved, namely the interests of Montreal in the second Bill, the second Bill stands. There is no intention, so far as I can ascertain, to withdraw the second Bill. Consequently, there is no connection between the two Bills. If it is good in the first case it is good in the second case.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Yes, that is what I say.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—And if it is good, then it applies to the second case entirely irrespective of the first case, so why the first Bill should remain to support the second I fail to understand.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The two Bills are promoted by rival parties.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If the legislation be desirable in the second Bill, that has nothing to do with the first Bill. It must stand as a separate case. Possibly the interests involved may be of an entirely different character. The amendment, although precisely similar, may have a different bearing on the second Bill on account of the object of one Bill being somewhat different from the object of the first Bill.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Will the hon. gentleman permit me to ask him if he thinks it fair, they being rival companies, authorized to do the very same kind of work at the same place, to apply the same thing to both companies, and after it has been accepted by both companies, and after one of the Bills has actually passed both Houses, and been reported to this House as having been passed, to then allow the other company to withdraw their Bill, so that the safeguard which we would impose on both companies would apply only to one?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend cannot be serious in his presentation of the case. He is overlooking entirely the essential feature of the Bill. If the legislation in itself be good, why take into consideration the first Bill? My hon. friend from DeSalaberry apparently takes the ground that the legislation embodied in the second Bill, entirely apart from its being essential to the interests of Montreal, but simply on the ground that it has been inserted in the first Bill, should also be incorporated in the second.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Oh, no; he said that is was good legislation.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then if it be good in itself, it surely should not be connected with the first Bill, because the first Bill it is now proposed to drop; consequently it is non-existent; it is as if it had never been.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The company cannot carry out the purposes of its undertaking.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Is it still within the delay to begin construction.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Unless it gets the extension of time or additional legislation.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It is just because the company is well within its two years that it wants to free itself from the obligations comprised in those amendments.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Let me assume that argument is good; it is tantamount to saying that you interfere, so to speak, with vested rights to the extent of forcing on the company certain legislation regarding a Bill which they already have, regarding rights which they already have, and which they should assert under the legislation already existing on the statute-book. It seems to me to be tantamount furthermore to this: That if the company comes before parliament asking legislation in a matter not germane to the amendment which has been moved, that you engraft upon their legislation further legislation which would destroy the powers which they already have, which would seriously infringe their vested rights, and which possibly might disastrously affect the undertaking which they have in view. That is a principle which I think is not a wholesome one on which to base legislation. If we have given to companies rights and it is shown that those rights have not been subjected to abuse; if they are not the subject of a grievance or entrenching upon the public interest, there is no good reason why those rights should be taken from the company. I am unaware of any case that can be pointed to where we have refused the promoters of a Bill the right to withdraw at any stage before it has reached its final stage. Hon. gentlemen will find laid down in Bourinot at page 649, the right of promoters to withdraw Bills. Furthermore, it seems to me to be only reasonable that applicants who come to parliament for certain legislation, if they in their judgment during the various stages of the legislation consider it undesirable to proceed with the legislation which they have set in motion, certainly should have right to withdraw it in the event of their concluding to do so.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman did not give the right citation. It is not on page 649.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Bourinot says that when an order for the second reading is moved the member may move that the order be discharged——

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is the second reading.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I do not think any importance can be attached to that. The reason that it is mentioned at the second reading is that the cases in point happen to arise at that stage of the Bill. Bourinot says:

> Or if the motion has been made for the second reading, it must first, with the leave of the House, be withdrawn. It is irregular to go into the merits of the Bill on a motion that the second reading be postponed or discharged.

I might say that these authorities are based, as far as I can observe for the moment, upon a rule laid down in the House of Lords, and so far as my knowledge is concerned, they cannot be controverted. I recall this matter being discussed some years ago very fully in the Senate as to the right of the promoter to withdraw a Bill, and I remember the sense of the House at that time was that the procedure which was laid down in parliamentary practice should be strictly adhered to, and, although there was a strong inclination on the part of hon. members that the House should hold possession of the Bill, yet it acceded to the desire of the applicants to have the Bill withdrawn, and it was withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the House has a right to know what the promoter of the Bill has to say on the subject.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—I must say I know very little about the Bill. It was placed in my hands without any explanation whatever, so that I am totally ignorant of the local matters which arise so far as this Bill is concerned, except as I heard them discussed in committee. The same parties who placed the Bill in my hands, asked me to withdraw it. I suggested a withdrawal when my hon. friend reported the Bill before recess, and a request was made to have it stand over, so that it stood until to-day. As I understand, the amendment made in committee imposes certain penalties upon the promoters of this Bill, and I suppose that they have found that they are undesirable. It is so said here. The statement was not made to me in that regard at all. I was asked simply to withdraw the Bill without any explanation whatever.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The hon. gentleman could only withdraw with leave of the House.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—These parties come here asking for an extension of time, and for some other conditions. They do not ask for the amendments that are suggested, and so far as my observation went they were being opposed; but finally, I understood that the solicitor who was there on behalf of the promoters, suggested that he would accept the amendment. It appears, however, that when he reported to his principals he took a different view. It does seem to me that the parties who have sought this legislation have suggested something entirely different from that which was asked for. They are the owners of a charter which is in existence, and that this opportunity should be taken to impose upon them something they do not desire, does not seem to me to be fair play, and in all fairness, I think the wishes of the promoters should be carried out, and the Bill withdrawn.
