Motion that House go into Committee of Supply (Mr. Cartwright)..... 1222
 Motion in amendment—

“That the Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, it is inexpedient and improper for the Government to enter into any agreement or contract whereby public money is paid to members of Parliament—such as the Postmaster General’s Reports of 1875 and 1876, and the vouchers laid on the table of this House on the 15th March ult., show to have been paid to Timothy Warren Anglin, a member of this House for the County of Gloucester; namely, $8,126.31, for the year ended 30th June, 1875, and $10,263.24 for the year ended 30th June, 1876, and $2,709.55 being for the quarter ended 30th September, 1876, in payment for printing and stationery done for and furnished by him to the Post Office Department of Canada ‘per agreement;’ as shown by the return laid before Parliament by the Postmaster General on the 1st March last, and the vouchers reported to the House by the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts on the 15th March, 1877—as such payments are in contravention of an Act passed in the 31st year of Her Majesty’s reign intituled: ‘An Act further to secure the Independence of Parliament,’ which provides that: ‘No person whatsoever holding, enjoying, undertaking or executing, directly or indirectly, alone or with any other, by himself or by the interposition of any trustee or third party, any contract or agreement with Her Majesty, or with any public officer or Department, with respect to the public service of Canada, or under which any public money of Canada is paid for any service or work, shall be eligible as a member of the House of Commons, nor shall he sit or vote in the same;’ and are calculated to detract from the independence of the members of this House.”—(Mr. Bowell).....

FORT FRANCES LOCK.
Motion that House go into Committee of Supply ( Mr. Cartwright ).....	1319
Motion in amendment—
“That Mr. Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be resolved: That Fort Frances Lock is said to be a part of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the money spent thereon has been expended out of the Pacific Railway appropriation, and that the said work is, therefore, subject to the provisions of the Canadian Pacific Railway Act, 1874.
“That by Section 11 of the Canadian Pacific Railway Act, 1874, it is enacted that ‘no contract for any portion of the main line of the said Railway shall be binding until it shall have been laid before the House of Commons for one month without being disapproved, unless sooner approved by a resolution of the House.’
“And by Section 12 of the said Act, it is enacted that ‘in case it shall be found by the Governor in Council more advantageous to construct the said Railway, or any portion thereof, as a public work of the Dominion of Canada, the construction thereof shall be let out by contracts offered to public competition.’
“That the construction of the Fort Frances Lock has been carried on as a work of the Dominion by time work, and has not been let out by contract offered to public competition.
“That no Order in Council has been passed authorizing the construction of said work, or the application of the Parliamentary appropriation thereto.
“That it does not appear, from the papers laid before the House, that the Chief or any Engineer of the Canadian Pacific Railway Survey has ever recommended the construction of the said lock; nor does it appear that there was, or is, any estimate of the cost of the improvements on Rainy Lake and Rainy River, and water stretches connecting therewith, necessary to attain the object for which the said lock is being constructed:
“That, in the opinion of this House, the commencement of said work without any Order in Council authorizing the same, and the construction of the said work, otherwise than by contract offered to public competition, is unconstitutional and a violation of the express terms of the Canadian Pacific Railway Act, 1874.”—( Mr. Kirkpatrick. )	1319

“That Mr. Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be Resolved,—That in pursuance of the Address, passed by this House on the 13th day of February, 1875, full amnesty was granted to all persons concerned in the North-West troubles, for all acts committed by them during the said troubles, save only Louis Riel, A. D. Lépine, W. D. O'Donoughue, and a partial amnesty was granted to Louis Riel, and A. D. Lépine, conditional on five years' banishment from Her Majesty's Dominion, thereby leaving the said W. D. O'Donoughue as the only person liable to the extreme penalty of the Law for all acts committed by him during the said troubles. That this solitary exception has created dissatisfaction among a large class of Her Majesty's loyal subjects of the same nationality as the said W. D. O'Donoughue, and that, in the opinion of this House, as all disquiet and fear of disturbances have long since ceased in the North-West Territories, it is just and proper that the said W. D. O'Donoughue be placed in the same position, with regard to the said troubles, as Louis Riel and A. D. Lépine.”—(Mr. Costigan.)

TUESDAY, APRIL 17TH.

NEW WRIT FOR OTTAWA ISSUED.....	1541
GODERICH HARBOUR WORKS.
Motion for House to go into Committee of Supply ( Mr. Cartwright ) ....	1541
Motion in amendment—

“ That Mr. Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be resolved, That by a Return to an Address from the House of the 21st February, 1877, dated the 8th March, 1877; for copies of all Orders in Council having reference to the Goderich Harbour Works, in 1874, together with a copy of the notice or advertisement calling for tenders for such work, the tenders received in response and Reports in relation thereto, with the contract entered into for the performance of such work, it appears :—

' That in all, 16 tenders were sent in for the performance of said work, averaging from $182,630 to $301,185. The four lowest tenders, being as follows :—

John S. Tolton, Walkerton.....	$182,630
George Neilson, Belleville.....	200,375
W. H. Ellis, Toronto.....	212,155
Moore, Clendenning & Wilson, Walkerton.....	212,540

" That on the 23rd February, 1874, an Order in Council was passed, setting forth the fact that 16 tenders had been sent in, and containing as follows :—' That W. H. Ellis, whose tender is third lowest, and when extended is found to amount $212,155, appears to be in a position to execute the work satisfactorily, and that his sureties appear to be good and solvent, and recommending that the tender of Mr. Ellis be accepted, and that for the due fulfillment of his contract satisfactory security be required on real estate, or by deposit of money, public or municipal securities, or bank stock, to the amount of 5 per cent. on the bulk sum of his contract.'

" That four days later, on the 27th February, without any information in relation to the said Ellis having, as appears by the Return, been furnished to the Department, a telegram to the following effect, was sent by Mr. Braun, Secretary of the Department of Public Works to Messrs. Moore, Clendenning & Wilson :—

" ' Your tender for Goderich Harbour Works is amongst the lowest ; are you prepared to deposit 5 per cent. of contract amount, and are both your sureties men of large means and property,' to which telegram Moore & Co., on the 28th February, replied as follows :—

" ' Prepared to make deposit and go on with Goderich Harbour Works ; can give satisfaction as to standing of sureties.'

" That on the 7th March an Order in Council was passed on a memorandum of the Minister of Public Works of the 5th March, stating :—' That Mr. Ellis has left the country, and recommending that the next lowest tender, that of Messrs. David Moore & Co., whose tender, when extended, amounts to the sum of $212,540, be accepted.'

" That on the 20th March, 1874, a letter was addressed to J. Y. Elwood, Esq., of Goderich, instructing him to examine titles and state value of property offered by Messrs. David Moore & Co., as security, and to say what it would bring at Sheriff's sale.

" That on the 28th March, the said Elwood reported to the Department of Public Works, that the property was worth from $5,000 to $5,500, less a mortgage upon it of $1,400.

" That by a schedule submitted by other valutors appointed by the Government on the 11th June, 1874, it appears that properties valued at $11,800, less $3,400, incumbrances, were accepted as security, the security having been fixed by the Department at $7,500, being $3,127 less than 5 per cent. on the bulk sum of the contract.

" That on the 16th day of February, 1877, after notice had been given of the intention to move for the papers, a letter was addressed by Mr. Page to Mr. Mackenzie, Minister of Public Works, in answer to enquiry from him, explaining the reason why the tender of John S. Tolton had not been accepted, the reason being that the tender of John S. Tolton was at that time looked upon as so low that some trouble was taken to ascertain whether he was a person acquainted with such work ; but no information could be obtained about him, and that it would be injudicious to entrust the execution of such work to him, as it probably would result, not only in a loss to the Government, but also prove ruinous to the man himself. But there does not appear to have been any correspondence in relation to the said John S. Tolton, or any reference to him or to the reason for ignoring his tender at the time the contract was let.

" That on the 22nd February, 1877, the Hon. E. Blake addressed a note to the Hon. A. Mackenzie, requesting that a letter written by him on the 2nd January, 1874, might be included among the papers, which letter was in the following terms :—

" TORONTO, January 2nd, 1874.

" ' MY DEAR MACKENZIE,—David Moore, of Walkerton, asks me to inform you that he is about to tender for the Goderich Works, and I do so accordingly. I told my friend Moore that an introduction was unnecessary, as you would let the work fairly without respect of persons.

" Yours truly,
" (Signed), ' EDWARD BLAKE.'

" That, notwithstanding the statement in the letter of Mr. Page to Mr. Mackenzie, it appears from a statement made by an honorable member in his place in this House, that the Hon. Minister of Public Works had information connected with the said John S. Tolton, the following telegram having been addressed to him by Mr. David Stirton, at that time a Member of this House :—

“GUELPH, January 4th, 1874.

“To the Hon. ALEXANDER MACKENZIE, Minister of Public Works, Ottawa:—

“I understand that John S. Tolton, of Walkerton, has tendered for the Goderich Harbour Works. Mr. Tolton is a thorough practical, honest and reliable man, financially able, and accustomed to the construction of Public Works. The securities named are reliable, sound men.

“(Signed) D. STIRTON.

“That it appears that the tender of John S. Tolton was improperly ignored, and that the country has lost thereby the sum of $29,525.

“That in the opinion of this House, the Government in thus awarding this contract, are justly censurable for violating the principles of the contract system, and causing serious loss to the country.”—(Mr. Farrow) .....

OF THE

HOUSE OF COMMONS OF CANADA

IN THE

FOURTH SESSION OF THE THIRD PARLIAMENT OF THE DOMINION OF CANADA, APPOINTED TO MEET FOR THE DESPATCH OF BUSINESS 8 FEBRUARY, 1877, IN THE FORTIETH YEAR OF THE REIGN OF

HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, 8th Feb., 1877.

The Parliament which had been prorogued successively from the twelfth day of April, 1876, and thence from time to time to the eighth day of February, 1877, met this day for the despatch of business.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at three o'clock.

A Message from His Excellency the Governor General, by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod:—

“Mr. SPEAKER,—

“His Excellency the Governor General commands this Honourable House to attend immediately in the Chamber of the Senate.”

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, with the House, went up to attend His Excellency;

And having returned;

CONTROVERTED ELECTION.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House that he had received from one of the Judges selected for the trial of Election Petitions, pursuant to The Dominion Controverted Elections Act, 1874, a Certificate relating to the Election for the Electoral District of the County of Glengarry.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House, that in conformity with the Act 37 Victoria, Chapter 10, Section 36, he had issued his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to make out a new Writ of Election for the said Electoral District.

VACANCIES.

Mr. SPEAKER further informed the House, that he had received the following notifications of vacancies which had occurred in the representation, viz:—

Of THOMAS SCATCERD, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of the North Riding of the County of Middlesex, by decease; Of DAVID STIRTON, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of the South Riding of the County of Wellington, by resignation; Of ADAM GORDON, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of the North Riding of the County of Ontario, by decease; Of the Hon. MALCOLM CAMERON, Member for the Electoral District of the South Riding of the County of Ontario, by decease; Of BARCLAY E. TREMAIN, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Victoria, N.S., by acceptance of the office of County Judge in Cape Breton; Of CHRISTIAN HENRY POZER, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Beauce, by resignation; Of the Hon. DAVID MILLS, Member for the Electoral District of the County of Bothwell, by acceptance of the office of Minister of the Interior; Of the Hon. DAVID LAIRD, Member for the Electoral District of Queen's County District, P.E.I., by acceptance of the office of Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Territories; Of the Hon. RODOLPHE LAFLAMME, Member for the Electoral District of Jacques Cartier, by acceptance of an office of emolument under the Crown; Of the Hon. JOHN HILLYARD CAMERON, Member for the Electoral District of the County of Cardwell, by decess, and Of the Hon. C. A. P. PELLETIER, Member for the Electoral District of Kamouraska, by acceptance of the office of Minister of Agriculture; and that he had issued his several Warrants to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, to make out new Writs of Election for the said places respectively.

NEW MEMBERS ELECTED.

Mr. SPEAKER further informed the House, that during the Recess the Clerk of the House had received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, Certificates of the Election and Return of the following Members, viz:—

Of ROBERT COLIN SCATHERD, Esq., for the Electoral District of the North Riding of the County of Middlesex; Of the Hon. THOMAS NICHOLSON GIBBS, for the Electoral District of the South Riding of the County of Ontario; Of WILLIAM HENRY GIBBS, Esq., for the Electoral District of the North Riding of the County of Ontario; Of DONALD GUTHRIE, Esq., for the Electoral District of the South Riding of the County of Wellington; Of ARCHIBALD McNAB, Esq., for the Electoral District of the County of Glengarry; Of CHARLES J. CAMPBELL, Esq., for the Electoral District of Victoria, N.S.; Of JOSEPH BOLDUC, Esq., for the Electoral District of Beauce; Of the Hon. DAVID MILLS, for the Electoral District of the County of Bothwell; Of the Hon. JAMES COLLEGE POPE, for the Electoral District of Queen's County District, P.E.I.; Of the Hon. RODOLPHE LAFLAMME, for the Electoral District of Jacques Cartier; and of DALTON MCCARTHY, Esq., for the Electoral District of the County of Cardwell.

NEW MEMBERS INTRODUCED.

The following Members having previously taken the Oath according to Law, and subscribed the Roll containing the same, took their seats in the House, viz:—

ROBERT COLIN SCATHERD, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of the North Riding of the County of Middlesex:—Hon. THOMAS NICHOLSON GIBBS, Member for the Electoral District of the South Riding of the County of Ontario.—WILLIAM HENRY GIBBS, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of the North Riding of the County of Ontario.—DONALD GUTHRIE, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of the South Riding of the County of Wellington.—ARCHIBALD McNAB, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of the County of Glengarry.—CHARLES J. CAMPBELL, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Victoria, N.S.—JOSEPH BOLDUC, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Beauce.—Hon. DAVID MILLS, Member for the Electoral District of the County of Bothwell.—Hon. JAMES COLLEGE POPE, Member for the Electoral District of Queen's County District, P.E.I.—and Hon. RODOLPHE LAFLAMME, Member for the electoral District of Jacques Cartier.

OATHS OF OFFICE BILL.

Mr. MACKENZIE introduced a Bill (No. 1.) respecting the administration of Oaths of Office, which was read the first time.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

Mr. SPEAKER reported His Excellency's Speech, and read a copy thereof to the House; which is as follows:—

“ Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate :

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

“ I am glad to be again enabled to summon you to meet for the despatch of business at the time which has been considered best suited to the convenience of members.

“ During the recess, I visited the Province of British Columbia, and had much satisfaction in becoming acquainted with the people of that interesting part of the Dominion, and with the climate and resources of their Province.

“ The surveys of the Pacific Railway have been prosecuted with the utmost vigour and at a larger cost during the past than in any previous year, but it has not been found possible, as yet, to complete the location of the line, and I have consequently been obliged to postpone the inviting of tenders for its construction on the terms indicated by the Act of 1874.

“ A further correspondence on the subjects at issue between my Government and British Columbia will be laid before you.

“ During the recent suspension of the Extradition arrangements with the United States, I took care that the importance to Canada of a speedy resumption of these arrangements should be represented to Her Majesty's Government, whose attention has been further invited to the expediency of largely extending the provisions of the existing treaty.

“ I am glad to be able to state that, while the operation of the Treaty has been resumed, negotiations are in progress for a convention, more liberal, and better suited to the circumstances of the two countries.

“ The attention of my Government having been directed to some anomalies in the Royal Commission and Royal Instructions to the Governor General, particularly with regard to the exercise of the Prerogative of Pardon, steps have been taken towards the amendment of these instruments.

“ Papers on this subject, as well as on that of the Extradition question, will be laid before you.

Mr. SPEAKER.

"The great public works connected with the St. Lawrence navigation, and the canals required to complete the system, have been prosecuted with success during the past year.

"Nearly all the works on the Welland and Lachine Canals have been placed under contract on terms favourable to the country.

"The active prosecution of these works during the last three years has necessarily increased the public debt, and, though expectations are entertained that the outlay may ultimately be repaid to the country, it may be considered advisable not to press all the works, contemplated in the earlier years of Confederation, to completion at present.

"I am happy to state that the Intercolonial Railway was opened for traffic, throughout its entire length, early in the summer, with as favourable results as could have been expected.

"One of the immediate advantages of the completion of the Railway was the delivery and reception of the British Mails at Halifax after the closing of the St. Lawrence; and I am happy to say that, up to the present time, mails and passengers have been successfully carried over the line without any interruption.

"The exhibition of Canadian products, manufactures, and works of art at the United States National Exposition at Philadelphia was eminently successful, and proclaimed to the world that Canada had already taken a high place as a farming, manufacturing and mining country.

"It is gratifying to be able to state that the expenditure was kept well within the estimate.

"It is but just that I should acknowledge that the success achieved by the enterprise of our people was largely aided by the energy and wisdom of the Commissioners who had charge of the arrangements.

"I have considered it advisable in the interest of the country to make arrangements for exhibiting Canadian products at the Exhibition to be held at Sydney, New South Wales, for which you will be asked to make provision.

"Notwithstanding the loss of revenue, consequent chiefly on the diminution of our importations, the reductions effected during the current year have gone far to restore the equilibrium between income and expenditure, though great economy will be still needful to attain this object.

"I regret that I am still unable to announce any progress in obtaining a settlement of the Fishery claims under the Washington Treaty, though my Government has made every effort to secure that result.

"My Commissioners have made further treaty arrangements with certain of the Indian tribes of the North-West territories, by which their title is extinguished to a very large portion of the territories west of Treaty No. 4; and, although some of the provisions of this treaty are of a somewhat onerous and exceptional character, I have thought it nevertheless advisable on the whole to ratify it. This treaty will be placed before you. I have made an engagement to negotiate a treaty with the remaining tribes east of the Rocky Mountains.

"The expenditure incurred by the Indian Treaties is undoubtedly large, but the Canadian policy is nevertheless the cheapest, ultimately, if we compare the results with those of other countries; and it is above all a humane, just, and Christian policy.

"Notwithstanding the deplorable war waged between the Indian tribes in the United States territories, and the Government of that country, during the last year, no difficulty has arisen with the Canadian tribes living in the immediate vicinity of the scene of hostilities.

"You will be asked to consider the expediency of making such changes in the Joint Stock Companies Act as may obviate for the future the passage of special Acts of Parliament for the incorporation of various classes of Companies, including such corporations as seek to engage in the borrowing and lending of money, by providing for their organization by Letters Patent.

"The desirability of affording additional security to policy-holders of Life Assurance Companies has engaged the attention of my Government, and I trust that the measure which will be submitted will accomplish the desired object.

"A measure will be submitted to you for the purpose of extending to the navigation of the great inland waters rights and remedies at present confined to waters within the jurisdiction of the Courts of Vice-Admiralty.

"You will be asked to amend and consolidate the laws relating to Customs.

"I have considered it advisable to provide for the permanent prosecution of the Geological Survey, which has heretofore been carried on under temporary enactments, and to make this a distinct branch of the Civil Service; your attention will be invited to a Bill for that purpose.

"Measures will be submitted also for the amendment of the Weights and Measures Act, the Excise laws, and other Acts, and also a Bill relating to Shipping.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

"The accounts of the past year will be laid before you.

"The Estimates of the next financial year will also be submitted, and will, I trust, be found to be framed with a view to meet the existing circumstances of the country, while, at the same time, providing for carrying on the administration of affairs with efficiency.

"Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

"I place full reliance on your prudence and ability, and your devotion to the work of legislation, which, I trust, may be carried on and completed in such a way as to minister to the prosperity of the country, and the unity of the people."

On motion of Mr. MACKENZIE, His Excellency's Speech was ordered to be taken into consideration to-morrow.

Resolved, That the Votes and Proceedings of the House be printed, being first perused by Mr. Speaker, and that he do appoint the printing thereof; and that no person but such as he shall appoint do presume to print the same

Resolved, That Select Standing Committees of this House, for the present Session, be appointed for the following purposes:—1. On Privileges and Elections.—2. On Expiring Laws.—3. On Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.—4. On Miscellaneous Private Bills.—5. On Standing Orders.—6. On Printing.—7. On Public Accounts.—8. On Banking and Commerce.—9. On Immigration and Colonization,—which said Committees shall severally be empowered to examine and enquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the House; and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon; with power to send for persons, papers and records.

REPORTS.

Mr. MACKENZIE laid before the House the General Report of the Minister of Public Works, for the fiscal year, ending the 30th June, 1876.

Mr. SPEAKER laid before the House the Report of the Librarian of the House of Commons, on the state of the Library of Parliament, which was read.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD inquired whether the Government had taken or proposed to take any steps with a view to procure an official report of the Debates of the Session.

Mr. MACKENZIE replied that the Government had not taken any steps, the subject being one which the House might deal with in its own discretion. The Committee charged with the desire of hon. members failed to make a report last Session until the House was so thin that there was no time to proceed with its consideration, the objection of any Member being sufficient to prevent discussion. The Government thought it was desirable to leave the question entirely in the hands of the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD hoped the Premier, who had considerable influence with the House, would exercise it so that the House and the country might have a correct report of the debates.

SPEECH.

Mr. BOWELL said the Committee met and adopted a report, and it was in consequence of the Chairman having neglected to present the report in time that it was not concurred in. If blame attached to any one, it was not the Committee, but to the Chairman.

Mr. CAUCHON said he brought the report immediately before the House, and he was not responsible for any delay which occurred.

House adjourned at Four o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, 9th Feb., 1877.

The Speaker took the chair at Three o'clock.

MR. JUSTICE LORANGER.

PETITION.

Mr. MOUSSEAU presented the petition of Mr. Justice Loranger denying the charges contained in the petition of François X. A. Biron and others presented against him at the close of last session, expressing his desire to undergo an investigation, and his intention of demanding one if the petition is reported, and requesting beforehand that he may be heard before the House in the event of further proceedings.

REPORTS.

Mr. BLAKE laid before the House the Report of the Hon the Minister of Justice, having reference to Penitentiaries.

Mr. SMITH laid before the House the ninth annual Report of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, being for the fiscal year ended 30th June, 1876; also, Supplement (No. 1) to the foregoing, being a List of Lights on the coasts, rivers and Lakes of the Dominion of Canada, on the 31st December, 1876.

Mr. BURPEE laid before the House Tables of the Trade and Navigation of the Dominion of Canada, for the year ending 30th June, 1876.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House proceeded to the consideration of His Excellency's speech at the opening of the Session

Mr. GUTHRIE (South Wellington) moved the resolution in reply to the Speech from the Throne. After craving as a new member the indulgence of the House while endeavouring to deal with subjects of such importance to the Dominion at large, he called attention to the period of the year at which Parliament had been called together for the past three sessions, and suggested that the opening should take place even earlier, so that the legislative business might be closed before spring opened. Adverting to the Governor General's visit to British Columbia, he remarked that His Excellency had visited almost every part of the Dominion, and his visits had been received everywhere with marked appreciation. That satisfaction which he expressed having felt, has been felt in return towards him by the people. From His Excellency's speeches it was manifest that he felt a real pride in the country over which he is Governor, and the country was equally proud of its Governor. A great benefit would undoubtedly be derived from the addresses delivered by Lord Dufferin, and his recent speech at the Toronto Club perhaps excelled all previous ones, admirable as they were. The next paragraph in the Speech from the Throne contained matter partly for congratulation and partly for regret. It was satisfactory to find that the surveys of that great national work, the Pacific Railway, had been pushed forward with vigour, and that the expenditure upon them had been greater during the past than any previous year. But it was not agreeable to find that the work was so great and the difficulties so formidable. Sufficient progress had not been made to enable contracts to be let. Every one must admit that it was indispensably necessary before contracts were let or tenders asked, that the location of the road should be completed; but it was indeed not surprising that further delay was necessary when consideration was given to the character of the country which the road would traverse, and the difficulty experienced in finding a suitable scaport as an outlet for the railway; and it was no matter of surprise that the greatest care had been necessary on the part of the engineers in selecting a route, especially when that selection might increase or diminish the expenditure by twenty million dollars. The question of the extradition of criminals between this country and the United States was one of much importance. The treaty which had been for many years in operation was lately suspended, but it had been restored. That circumstance was a matter for congratulation and satisfaction, because, lying as Canada does along a widely extended frontier, with ample means of communication with the adjoining Republic, it was of more importance to the Dominion than to the mother country that the treaty should be in force. It was moreover a source of gratification to find that negotiations were pending with a view of largely extending the class of crimes to be embraced in the extradition treaty. Although the crimes for which offenders might now be extradited were of a grave character, they were comparatively few in number, and the crimes most common in our midst were those for which no provision was made in the treaty—such as larceny, embezzlement, and fraudulent removal of assets by bankrupt traders. He hoped the result of the negotiations would be to have not only a treaty more extended in its operations, but containing provisions framed for its perfect working. Indeed, there was no reason why the operation of the treaty should be confined to what might be called the more serious crimes. Neither Canada nor the United States desired their countries to become asylums for criminals, and the treaty might include the lesser crimes with benefit to both peoples. They were informed in the Speech that steps had been taken to amend the Royal Commission and the Instructions of the Governor General in some respects in which they contained anomalous provisions understood to be inconsistent with our constitutional freedom and that system of responsible government which we enjoy. The anomalies referred to were chiefly: First, the power possessed by the Governor General to pardon a prisoner convicted of a capital offence without the advice or even against the advice of his Council; and, second, the power possessed by him to disallow any act of a Provincial Legislature, also without the advice of his Council or even contrary to their advice. It must be a source of satisfaction that those anomalies were about to be removed; that the country was to enjoy responsible government in a more complete form than hitherto. It was not correct to say that those provisions in the Royal Commission and instructions were obsolete and were never enforced, because with regard to one of them a case occurred not many years ago where the power was exercised; and with respect to the other, viz., that of the disallowance of Acts of Provincial Legislatures, an opinion was obtained from the law officers of the Crown in England as late as 1873 which affirmed that the Governor General possessed that power, and was entitled, of course, to exercise it. These were not, therefore, obsolete, but practical questions, and the administration of the day was entitled to the thanks of the country for having secured the removal of anomalies which, in practice, might not have worked badly in the past, but which might in the future be the source of very great difficulty and misunderstanding. It was the part of statesmen not to be wise after the fact, but before it. The Speech referred to the opening of the Intercolonial Railway, regarding which undertaking it should be remembered that, although the road might not prove remunerative for many years, yet it was not projected or constructed as a commercial enterprise. It was entered upon as a national work, and he was prepared to support an expenditure for any reasonable time in order that the railway might be kept open, and that the Provinces which it serves might be brought closer together, not only with regard to personal intercourse, but in matters of trade and commerce. Since the road was opened, considerable trade had sprung up between the Maritime Provinces and Ontario, and the millers of Upper Canada especially had been enabled to send their produce to ports of Quebec and the Maritime Provinces which they were formerly unable to reach. It was satisfactory to find that, so far, no difficulty had been experienced in keeping the road open during the present season, and even if trouble were encountered, he trusted a determined effort would be made to work the road and avail themselves of our winter port. Reference was made in the Speech to the display of Canadian goods at the Philadelphia Exhibition, which display astonished not only foreign nations but Canadians themselves. The results obtained would be of permanent benefit to the country. He was personally aware that in consequence of the admirable display made by the Dominion, many Ontario manufacturers had received orders from the most distant parts of the world. Those orders had been executed, and if the quality of the goods was as high as was expected, a largely increased trade would ensue. In that connection, the country would consider the Government had acted wisely in determining that Canada should be represented at the forthcoming Exhibition at Sydney. Our relations with other British Colonies should be cultivated. After the display of their own products, nothing was, perhaps, so gratifying at the Philadelphia Exhibition as the very creditable display sent by the Australian Colonies. If, as a result of the Canadian display at Sydney, a trade should spring up, it would be one of great magnitude, and prove advantageous to Canada and Australia alike. No means of removing the prevailing trade depression would prove more efficacious than the opening up of new foreign markets for our manufactures and products. A manufacturer of sewing machines in the town in which he resided (Guelph) did the greater portion of his trade with South America, where he was able successfully to compete with British and American makers. In the discussion on trade depression, the fact was often lost sight of that the country had passed through similar dull times. The present depression was not to be compared with that which followed the crisis of 1857, from which the country did not recover for five or six years. There was bound to be a return of prosperity, no matter what Government was in power, for indeed they could affect it in a very trifling degree. After complimenting the Canadian Commissioners at Philadelphia, the hon. member remarked that the paragraph in the Speech relating to the comparative position of the revenue and expenditure would possess public interest. By reason principally of a decline in importations, there had been a loss of revenue, which, in itself, was always a serious matter, but there was some satisfaction in knowing that the reduction in expenditures proposed by the Government last year, and assented to by the House, had resulted in nearly meeting or being quite equal to the amount of that decline. It was proper that the policy of economy and retrenchment should be still continued. That was what the Government proposed, and it was a course which would receive the sanction of the House and country, because it was the policy of common sense. The decline in imports was due to the fact that the people were not able to buy so freely as formerly, and when their constituents had found it necessary to retrench, the Government should not neglect to act in the same direction. When the people were poor was not the time to increase taxation. The poverty of the people should not be the occasion for increasing their burdens, and the proper policy to adopt was to follow the example of the people, who, by frugality and economy, had been endeavouring to pay their way. The position of the United States towards the Dominion in the matter of the non-payment of compensation for the use of the Canadian Fisheries was one that excited a painful regret that a great nation should so far forget its own honour as to treat with contempt, at all events with neglect, the representations of the British Government, asking them simply to fulfil their obligations. No doubt the United States were as firmly bound as possible in that matter, but hitherto they had set us at defiance in regard to compensation for our fisheries, and we had failed to obtain an excuse, valid or invalid, for the delay; and that, too, in the face of the fact that the British Government had fulfilled all its obligations, and in view of the balance remaining of the fifteen millions, it had much more than fulfilled them. He trusted that the Administration to be inaugurated on the 4th of March would take a view more worthy of the obligations the Washington Treaty imposed on them, and that the country would no longer shrink from performing its duty in that matter. He concurred in the sentiments expressed in the Speech with regard to the mode of dealing with the Indians by paying them a fair compensation for their lands, instead of pursuing a policy of slaughter and extermination, as a just and Christian policy. Legislation respecting the regulation and formation of joint-stock companies, especially such as lend and borrow money, was desirable, as indicated in the Speech. Such corporations had been very plentiful of late years, and had striven to obtain from Parliament more favourable charters than their neighbours. Such legislation must have occupied much time, and towards the end of each session clauses were allowed to pass which otherwise would not have been approved. It was, indeed, well known that some insurance companies and money-lending corporations, in soliciting subscriptions for stock, boasted that they had got most valuable charters. Such an announcement simply meant that they had obtained power to borrow as much money as possible on little security and at a low rate of interest. All would agree that that kind of private legislation should be terminated, and a general Act passed under which no company would be granted any special privileges. In England, the Companies Act of 1862 had prevented special legislation in regard to such corporations, and been found to work admirably. If a similar Act were passed in Canada, much time of Parliament would be saved and the public interest conserved. The hon. member expressed approval of the proposed legislation with a view to protect policy holders of life insurance companies, and pointed to the distress which had been caused by the failure of a leading company in New York. He endorsed the proposal to extend the maritime laws to our great rivers and inland waters, giving special rights and remedies under Canadian laws, a change which he presumed would not be objectionable to the Imperial Government. It was proposed by an Act of the Dominion Parliament to constitute Courts having the civil jurisdiction of Courts of Vice-Admiralty. Those Courts had jurisdiction to the extent of tide water, but they had not jurisdiction over the great inland navigation system of Canada. The Americans did not at first extend that jurisdiction over the lakes and rivers lying between their country and the Dominion, but for some years the maritime law had been extended by them to those waters. A similar law should be extended to Canadian waters. In view of the importance of the mineral resources of the country, he approved of the proposal to place the Geological Survey on a permanent footing, and attaching it to one of the branches of the Civil Service. Within its scope would be embraced botany, meteorology, and other branches of physical science. The concluding paragraph of the Speech from the Throne expressed confidence in their prudence and ability in proceeding with the work of legislation, a confidence which His Excellency would not find to have been misplaced, and it was to be hoped that the result would be, as indicated by His Excellency, the prosperity of the country and liberty of the people. They desired that this young nation should be prosperous and the people united; that there should be no sectional jealousies, and with that as the aim and object of legislation, their purpose would be attained. Viewing the subjects embraced in the Speech, the constitutional questions, the matters relating to public works and to trade, and looking at the important legislation proposed, he confidently asked the favourable consideration by the House of the resolutions which he had the honour to propose.

Mr. BECHARD: However honourable may be the task of seconding the Address in reply to His Excellency, I cannot venture to say that it is with pleasure that I accepted that honour. The feeling of my insufficiency to touch upon every point in the vast field laid open before me, produces a degree of hesitation which the kindness of the House alone can assist me in overcoming. Thus, more than any of those who have preceded me in the path in which I now venture to tread,

Mr. GUTHRIE.

I feel the need of the indulgence of the House. The duty of thanking His Excellency the Governor General for the Speech with which he every year opens the session of Parliament, is one to which the most perfect degree of courtesy is invariably brought; but that duty becomes an especially agreeable one when we are called upon to perform it with reference to the eminently distinguished man who to-day presides over the destinies of Canada. On many occasions since his arrival among us, Lord Dufferin has done the country notable service. No man appears to have taken a greater interest in its prosperity than he, and no man has spoken of its progress and natural advantages more ably than he. Especially the remembrance will not soon fail of the eloquent account which he gave of the country last year, on the occasion of his visit to England, where he became the panegyrist of Canada; he presented it before the eyes of the mother country in the most favourable light, sketching a brilliant picture of its resources, extolling the harmony of its inhabitants, and rendering a high tribute to the character of its inhabitants, their feelings of loyalty to the Crown, and their attachment to the principles of the old British Constitution. But I must here make special allusion to the journey which His Excellency undertook last summer to the most remote Province of the Dominion, the Province of British Columbia. There, again, the Governor General found an opportunity of showing his devotion to the public interests, sparing no trouble to examine into the resources of that Province, and manifesting his wish to see every difficulty smoothed away which might be of a nature to disturb, even for a time, the good understanding which ought to reign between the several Provinces which form part of the Confederation. Time would fail me, Mr. Speaker, if I ventured here to enumerate all Lord Dufferin's claims to our gratitude; I merely wish to be allowed to add that by his affection for the Canadian people, and the lively interest which day by day he takes in their prosperity, he appears to have taken as his device, the words so frequently repeated of one of the best men who ever reigned over a people : "It is my wish that every inhabitant of my kingdom should, every Sunday, eat without stint." Long, Mr. Speaker, may it be possible for him to display in our midst the eminent qualities which make him so dear to Canadians of every origin and of every creed. It was not without a lively feeling of satisfaction that the House heard His Excellency refer in his Speech to the progress made in our various public undertakings; but an event which was received with a special feeling of enthusiasm was the opening of the Intercolonial Railway. That great Railway may now be looked upon as one of the safest, most comfortable, and most complete in all America. Every doubt of its great utility must vanish when it is considered that, in addition to the fresh facilities which it affords to trade, it will in great measure contribute to the development of one of our finest branches of industry, the fisheries, and will at the same time prove a powerful agent in promoting colonization in a portion of territory hitherto comparatively unexplored. In this connection, Sir, may I be permitted to claim a humble share in the merit of those who, as members of this House, contributed to the production of the resolution which decided the selection of that line. Begun soon after the inauguration of our federal system, which made it a political as well as a commercial necessity, the Intercolonial has finally, by its opening, affixed the last seal to the union of the Maritime Provinces with those which formerly constituted the Province of Canada. If we now turn our eyes upon our vast public works in connection with the navigation of the St. Lawrence and those which are in course of being carried out in the boundless regions of the west, we shall find that we have reason to congratulate ourselves and the country upon the rapid progress which, during some years past, has been obtained in the execution of those enormous undertakings. Already the colossal enterprise destined to connect the Atlantic with the Pacific, shows highly appreciable results, and notwithstanding the innumerable difficulties which beset the carrying that work into effect, we may now believe that, thanks to the vigour with which the operations are directed, the line of the Pacific Railway will soon be completely located. This will be a great step towards the accomplishment of that gigantic enterprise, the management of which, as well as that of our other great public works has been hitherto, it is but fair to acknowledge, conducted by the hon. the Prime Minister with a degree of tact and prudence, combined with a spirit of economy, of which the Canadian people will not, in a fitting time, fail to show their appreciation. Connected with the construction of the Pacific Railway is another work, which in no way yields to it in importance, and that is the colonization of the North-West. For several years the Government of Canada availed themselves of different means to attract immigration towards our great western prairies. For that purpose, agencies were kept up in different parts of Europe, and various publications, intended to convey a knowledge of our territory and its natural advantages, were circulated here and there. These laudable efforts doubtless received lively encouragement from the marked results which followed them. I may, however, be allowed to express the view that in my humble opinion the most powerful means which would efficiently contribute to the colonization of the North-West is the construction of the Pacific Railway. I have always considered railways as the most powerful colonizing agents. But here I hasten to request hon. members, especially those who sit on the left of this House, not to be led to infer from that, that, with a view of greater impulse to the construction of that immense railway, I should be disposed to favour an increase of the burdens and of the sacrifices which are now laid upon us. The Pacific Railway is a majestic work which must be carried to a successful termination, without doubt, but in time. To be brought to that successful termination it must, like all our great public undertakings, make gradual progress without haste, without irregularity, and, above all, according to the measure of our resources. If, in contradistinction to the wise temporizing of the Prime Minister, we should be induced by false appearances, or by vanity, to allow ourselves to be drawn into excessive efforts which would paralyze our powers by exhausting them, we should, perhaps, expose ourselves to share the unlucky fate of the Titan who found himself, as a punishment for having attempted to scale Olympus, condemned to pass the rest of his days in absolute immobility. However the case may be, the Government has lately given fresh proofs of its regard for the cause of colonization, and the friends of that work have seen with pleasure, without doubt, that, under treaties recently entered into with the various Indian tribes, vast additions of territory are assured for the future in that immense region which is one day destined to become the granary of Canada, it may even be of Europe. The philanthropic, and above all, Christian policy, proclaimed by His Excellency with reference to our Indian tribes has, I am satisfied, been received with warm approbation by all true friends of humanity, and indeed that policy is but a faithful continuation of the traditional liberality of England in her treaties with those children of nature, the hardships undergone by whom in a neighbouring country have excited pity in every Christian heart. In his Speech, His Excellency draws the attention of this House, in a very marked manner, to the part which Canada has taken at the great Exhibition at Philadelphia, and speaks in flattering terms of the success which we gained there. As it is well known, the American Republic celebrated, last summer, by an exhibition of objects of art and products of every kind, the hundredth anniversary of her independence, of the day ever memorable in history, when she took her position among the nations of the earth. All peoples had been invited to this grand international tourney, in which the combatants no longer presented themselves, as in old time, lance in rest and foot in stirrup; but under the varied forms of the rich productions of the agricultural and manufacturing industries, in which were numberless marvels, ravished by genius from the secrets of science. It was the great strife of the peaceful arts, which seemed to have gathered themselves together in that vast enclosed field, in order to measure their strength there, in pacific contests, whence should result for the nations a new feeling of emulation in the direction of advancement, of reciprocal admiration, and fraternity towards one another. This youthful Canada of ours also entered the lists, and we may say at once that she left them covered with laurels. Her triumph has been so great that it has been resolved to celebrate it in a solemn manner by a festival which is being arranged with this object, and of which the inhabitants of this capital will in a few days be the happy witnesses. This distinguished success certainly confers the highest honour upon the Government as well as upon the representatives of Canada at Philadelphia, who one and all, neglected nothing which could contribute to render it as striking as possible. But as you see, Mr. Speaker, the high reputation which we acquired at Philadelphia already produces appreciable results. Already, far-distant nations seek to open commercial intercourse with us, and the House has, without doubt, learnt with satisfaction, from the lips of His Excellency, that in order to meet overtures which had been made to him in that respect, the Government has complied with the invitation to have Canada represented at an Exhibition which would be held very shortly in Australia. To extend the circle of our commerce to the very ends of the earth, to convey the products of our various industries to the most distant markets, even to the antipodes, would this not be in reality, Mr. Speaker, for our country, as yet so young, a success worthy of the admiration of all, and it is impossible to find one better adapted to encourage amongst us the development of new sources of production. Moreover, that which the country will learn with special interest, and will regard perhaps with reason, as one of the results obtained by our display on the grand theatre of Philadelphia is the fact that on the occasion of the renewal of the treaty concerning the extradition of fugitive criminals, negotiations have been opened, and are now progressing, with the object of giving to the commercial relations between the United States and Canada a more intimate nature and a more liberal basis. We in Canada have not forgotten the admirable results of the commercial policy, initiated by the treaty negotiated in 1854, under the auspices of Lord Elgin, of illustrious memory. This is why, notwithstanding the abrogation ultimately of the treaty by the Government at Washington, that of Canada believed that it served the true interests of the country by remaining faithful to this liberal policy. If, under the exceptional circumstances in which it found itself placed at the close of a terrible civil war, the American Government thought proper to raise, in a somewhat exorbitant proportion, the duties on its imports, on the entry into its ports of foreign products, the disastrous commercial and industrial prostration which has been the fatal consequence, by creating disorder in the fortunes of men, seems also to have deeply moved their minds, and seems likely to be followed by a powerful reaction on a large scale towards its marvellous prosperity. Whatever may happen, the negotiations which are in progress, when more cordial relations between the two countries are considered, will not fail to give an opportunity for the final settlement of the fisheries question, resulting from the Treaty of Washington. This year, again, His Excellency expresses to us his regret at not having to announce to us any advance towards the solution of this question. But the House knows already that these delays are not to be attributed to the Government of Canada, but attach rather to that of the United States. It is to be regretted, doubtless, that the great Republic should have shown, up to the present, so much indifference as to what affects the settlement of this important question. But let us abstain from all recrimination, when we are, perhaps, on the point of obtaining full satisfaction, thanks to the negotiations commenced, and which are so well calculated to cement the friendly relations which ought to exist between two neighbouring countries for the common happiness of their people. His Excellency is pleased to conclude by expressing his confidence in the prudence of the House, in its devotion to the prosperity of the country and in the unity of the people. This House could not in a better way make an echo to the homage rendered to the country, in the persons of its representatives, than by declaring to His Excellency, that, under his happy auspices, and with the skilful assistance of those who have the honour to be his advisers, it would be difficult for this House not to coöperate in the prosperity of our young country, and in promoting the harmony of the various elements which are destined to make us a mighty people. Nothing further remains for me, Mr. Speaker, but to thank the House for its kind attention, and to second the motion of the hon. member for South Wellington.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said it was not intended, so far as he knew, to move any amendment to the Address from that side of the House, provided a change which he would presently suggest was made by his hon. friend at the head of the Government in a clause which contained something, that, if adopted, might be deemed obligatory on the House as a matter of policy. He referred to the paragraph relative to the completion of the work on the St. Lawrence canals. The hon. member for South Wellington, whom he (Sir John A. Macdonald) was glad to see in this House, though he would prefer to see him on the Opposition side of it, had appealed to the House for the usual consideration which was given to young members. Of course, under any circumstances, he would have received that consideration; but there was really no occasion to bespeak the forbearance of the House. He congratulated the House, and especially the hon. gentleman's party, on such an accession to their number. His hon. friend had undertaken to show to this House, and through this House to the country, the great importance of the Speech which they had heard from the Throne, and in so doing had been well seconded by the practised eloquence of his hon. friend, the seconder of the Address. But great artists as the gentlemen had both shown themselves to be, they had not quite been able to conceal the meagreness of the bill of fare which had been placed before the House. However, as they were approaching the season of Lent, they might expect to have Lenten fare, and they had got it. To be sure, the Address was of the usual length, perhaps it exceeded the usual longitude. It might be said by some arithmetical critics, that like a line, it was length without breadth. However, they must not look a gift horse in the mouth, but must be thankful for small mercies. The legislation to be proposed to them, unless there was something concealed in the "etcetera," which they did not know anything about, was not great in amount, though some of the measures, he would agree, would be of considerable importance if they were carefully drawn; and he had no doubt that they would receive the careful consideration of hon. gentlemen opposite. The bill for enlarging the scope of and amending the Joint Stock Companies' Act would have to be very carefully prepared, or it might be very mischievous in its influence. If it were made too liberal in its provisions, it might increase and perpetuate the evils from which we are now suffering in consequence of the "valuable charters" to which the mover of the Address had alluded, as having been embodied, in some way in private Acts; and if it were too restricted, the Government would be continually troubled with applications for special Acts to get rid of obnoxious clauses in the general Act. They could not hope to be able by any general Act, however well and carefully prepared it might be, to get entirely rid of annual applications for special Acts with enlarged powers. However, the attempt was praiseworthy, and he hoped it would be successful. The matter was one of such great importance that he had no doubt every hon. member in this House, on both sides of it, would agree to direct his attention to the perfection of a measure of this kind. So also with respect to the Act to afford additional security to policy-holders of life insurance companies. That question was discussed here before, and he had no doubt it would engage the best attention of the House. He hoped that confidence would be restored in this country to the minds of those who chose to avail themselves of this means of providing for their families and children. A measure for the purpose of extending to the navigation of the great inland waters, rights and remedies at present confined to waters within the jurisdiction of the Courts of Vice-Admiralty, would certainly be an important one, and he had no doubt his hon. friend the Minister of Justice had found a great many difficulties in its preparation. There were constitutional questions connected with that matter which he (Sir John A. Macdonald) had no doubt would be discussed by their friend the Minister of the Interior, unless his elevation to office had caused him to withdraw his attention from constitutional work in order that he might devote it to the more important work of looking after the affairs of his department. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) was not sure that a measure of this kind was required, or that one could be framed which would give that satisfaction which was anticipated. He was afraid it would be found that, guarded though the measure might be, the obstruction to trade in our inland waters that would be caused by the operation of such a measure, would more than counterbalance the security which might be given by it to persons having claims against vessels sailing on these waters. One could not say what was involved in the promise of a measure to amend and consolidate the laws relating to the customs. He presumed from the general way in which it was inserted in the Speech, that it was not at all a measure connected with the tariff arrangement, but that it was simply a consolidated Act, and one to amend those clauses which experience in the Department had shewn were in need of amendment. And so, he presumed, with regard to the Excise law. The measure promised for placing the geological survey on a permanent basis would be useful. The mover of the Address had spoken as if he was a little behind the scenes in regard to this measure, for he told them that it was to be very extended in its operations, that it was not to be confined to the geological survey, but that other branches of physical science were to be placed in the same Department, such as botany and cognate subjects. These were the measures that were promised, and the House would, of course, give them due consideration. They were not of a nature to occupy the House long, and therefore they would have the greater opportunity to consider questions, which, under the present system, were really of as much importance as matters affected by the promised legislation. Both here and in England the tendency had been to confide to the Ministry of the day all important legislation, and it had been found almost impossible for a private member, no matter what his ability might be, or what might be his zeal or industry, to carry any great measure affecting the general interests of the country. That duty had been, both in England and in this country, thrown upon the Government, so that it was said in England that the duty of an Opposition was confined principally to conducting a critical examination into the administration of the affairs of the country. It had been said by a great Liberal of that country that this was the most important duty thrown upon the members of Parliament under the present system. England had had centuries of legislation, and there was now a large body of laws in force under which the country, without any amendment being made to them for a series of years, could continue to flourish. So in this country: we had received from England and from France the advantage of all the legislation of both those great countries, and the affairs of Canada could be carried on and the material progress of the country not be impeded if we had no new legislation for several years, such had been the advantage we had gained from a long series of laws well considered and successfully operated. But in the consideration of public affairs, questions continually arose, whether the Government had been wise or unwise, prudent or imprudent, whether they had conducted the affairs of the country correctly or incorrectly in matters in regard to which an educated country kept a steady eye upon the action of its representatives in Parliament, and in regard to which it was the duty of the Opposition—a duty which the Opposition in this House would perform without factiousness but with firmness—to criticise the conduct the Administration of the day, and see that what it did was for the best interests of the country. He agreed with his hon. friend the mover of the resolutions that this House had learned with pleasure that His Excellency had had much satisfaction in becoming acquainted with the people in British Columbia, and with the climate and resources of the Province. The eulogium passed by his hon. friend upon His Excellency was an expression of the general feeling of the country towards that illustrious individual. They knew the people enjoyed the full advantages conferred by the Constitution, under which they happily lived under His Excellency's guidance; and they felt with regret that Lord Dufferin's sway could not last always. They would be happy to see His Excellency here for many years, and they would regret the time when he would be removed, as a matter of course, to other scenes of usefulness; but when His Excellency did leave this country the information which he obtained not only in British Columbia, but in other parts of Canada, would be of great advantage to the whole Dominion. He believed that the interest of His Excellency in this country would not cease with the government of it. The Speech promised that further correspondence would be laid before the House on the subject at issue between His Excellency's Government and British Columbia. He did not know whether that correspondence would include any communication that His Excellency had been advised by his responsible Ministers to make on political subjects while in that Province. Rumour had it that certain communications had been made from that country, and it was to be presumed they would be laid before Parliament in the usual way and at the usual time. He would say, however, that while the information which His Excellency had acquired would be of use to us hereafter in England, it would, perhaps, have been of more immediate use had it been acquired by the visit of some of his hon. friends opposite at the same or some other time. He believed that some of his hon. friends, exhausted by the labours of their different Departments, had been obliged to take a holiday during the summer. Now, if they had combined business with pleasure, and gone to British Columbia, the experience they would have been able to gain would, he thought, have been of great use to the country. It was a matter of satisfaction to the House to know, from the Speech, that the surveys of the Pacific Railway had been prosecuted with vigour; but he must say that it would have been but graceful for hon. gentlemen opposite to have expressed regret, if they did feel regret, that it was impossible to proceed with the work immediately. He believed that paragraph in the Speech would cause great disappointment in British Columbia, and in the western country generally, both east and west of the Rocky Mountains, and yet no expression of regret found place either in the Speech or in the response. Of course it was of great importance that the Extradition Treaty between this country and the United States should be re-established. It was unfortunate that it was suspended, and it was now gratifying, for very obvious reasons, that the obstructions in the working of it had been removed, and that friendly relations with regard to it between Canada and the United States were resumed. He hoped the Minister of Justice had taken great care with regard to the provisions which should be introduced into the proposed extension of the Treaty. He (Sir John Macdonald) was afraid that he could not go so far as his hon. friend, the mover of the resolution, in hoping that the Treaty would be extended so as to include smaller offences than under its existing provisions. He was afraid that such an extension would be attended by very many dangers, and it would deprive of liberty many of our fellow subjects, or at all events those whose extradition might be demanded for comparatively light offences. Undoubtedly, provision should be made in such a measure that the tribunal before which any extradited person should be sent, should be one of such a status as to prevent the possibility of an injustice being done him. No person in such circumstances should be tried before an insignificant court in a foreign country. They were told that the attention of His Excellency's Government had been directed to some of the anomalies in the Royal Commission and the Royal instructions to the Governor General, particularly with regard to the exercise of the Royal prerogative. Some anomalies certainly did exist, but he doubted whether there was any particular necessity for dealing with that subject now any more than at any former period. These instructions had lasted for very many years, and on a very recent occasion they were utterly disregarded and set aside, and they could be set aside again. His hon. friend who moved the resolution had alluded to some of the anomalies which were to be cured by the negotiations referred to in this paragraph. What these were, they would not learn until the bill was submitted to the House. While the people of the Great West would be seriously disappointed at the information that the Pacific Railway was not to be prosecuted immediately, he thought other parts of the country would learn with equal regret and equal disappointment, that the completion of the canal system was to be postponed; and he hoped and believed that before the session closed sufficient arguments would be used to hon. gentlemen opposite to induce them to reconsider the position they had apparently taken with respect to these great works. It was in reference to that clause that he had called the attention of the Premier to the desirability of an alteration being made so as to prevent the necessity of the Opposition moving an amendment to it. The latter portion of that paragraph stated "that though expectations are entertained that the outlay may ultimately be repaid to the country, it may be advisable not to press all the works contemplated in the earlier years of Confederation to completion at present." Now, a good many hon. members felt that if it were at all possible, though there had been a considerable outlay, and though there would have to be a considerable additional outlay, yet these works should be now pressed to completion. The depression which existed in the country, which was noticed by his hon. friend the mover of the resolution, which could not be denied, which was obvious to everybody, and which he (Sir John A. Macdonald) was afraid there was no immediate hope of dispelling, had caused a great want of employment among our people; and if ever there were a time when not only these works but also the Pacific Railway and other large public works should be pressed forward as fast as possible, now was the time. Our towns were filled with people craving for employment, asking leave to toil, willing to labour, and now, when the families of these people were starving, the works should be pressed to completion. Another reason why this should be done was, that in consequence of the want of employment, and in consequence of the fall in prices, these works could be constructed infinitely cheaper now than years hereafter, when the prosperity, which his hon. friend prophesied would arrive, was on us, and we were enjoying the advantages of it. With returning prosperity, the price of labour and of materials would rise, and if he (Sir John A. Macdonald) were going to move an amendment to the resolution, which he hoped not to be obliged to do, he should move that they hoped, notwithstanding the depression which now existed, and notwithstanding the outlay which had already been made on these works, the Government would be able to complete them at an early date. He had hoped that with the credit Canada possessed, and enjoying as we did the advantages of the able financing of the Minister of Finance, that gentleman would have been able to contrive some means whereby, without unduly burdening the revenue of the country, the Government could complete these works. It was worth while for the Government to strain every nerve to assist the country in this way out of its present depressed state, and he would deeply regret—and he had no doubt the House and the country would also regret—if the condition of the revenue would not admit of the expenditure. The House was glad to know that the traffic on the Intercolonial had been so considerable. The Opposition was sure that the fact that the road had been so successful must give the greatest satisfaction to the Premier, because of the vindication it afforded of the prophecy and defence of the route he made in 1865. It must be a great gratification to the Premier, as it was to him (Sir John A. Macdonald) that the expectations both of them had formed in that respect had been more than fulfilled. Every Canadian and lover of his country must have felt gratified at the success of Canada at the Philadelphia Exhibition, as it had shown not only to the rest of the world but to Canadians, what the Dominion could do in arts and manufactures. At the same time it was true that the advantage Canada had gained, so far as the United States market was concerned, was very little. Mr. Bright had said, two years before, that it was not much use sending manufactures to an exhibition in a country which practically excluded all foreign manufactures from its markets. It had proved that the Dominion gained little, if anything, by exhibiting, so far as American trade was concerned; and, indeed, if our display had had one effect on the Americans more than another, it was that of making the manufacturers resist more than ever before any alteration in the tariff of their country. But while the advantage in the United States market had not been great, the advantage of exhibiting our goods at the place to which people from all parts of the world resorted, had been marvellous, and he joined with the hon. member for South Wellington in congratulating the country and the House and our manufacturers on opening new fields in other parts of the world than the continent of North America. He would in that connection make a single remark about the compliment that was paid to the energies and wisdom of the Commissioners in charge of the arrangements. There were various opinions held with reference to them. It was believed that some were good and some were not so good, and it might be said that if the exhibition, so far as Canada was concerned, had been a success, it had been a success notwithstanding the obstructions placed in the way of the exhibitors by some or one of the Commissioners. With reference to the paragraph relating to the exhibition at Sydney, it might be considered by some a verbal criticism to say that the paragraph was rather too much in the Queen Elizabethan style, stating as it did that the Government had made the arrangements and the House would pay the bill. The paragraph might have stated that the consent of the House to the arrangements as well as to the provision for the arrangements would be asked. He was certainly glad to find that, notwithstanding the loss of revenue consequent on the diminution of our importations, the reductions effected during the current year had gone far to restore the equilibrium between income and expenditure. The question as to how far it had gone to restore an equilibrium, the House would learn by and bye, and whether it had restored the equilibrium, or whether there was a deficit. If the latter, they would bear the announcement with all the resignation possible. The House was glad that considerable reductions had been effected during the year; but in what direction these reductions had been made, of course hon. members did not know. Perhaps they had been effected by the dismissal of some of the numerous clerks, messengers, and servants of the Government of whom the hon. Premier had complained so loudly, so strenuously, and so eloquently as having blocked up all the avenues to the public offices. But if it had been in this direction that the reduction had been made, perhaps it would be found that the officers who had been left have had additions to their salaries by way of bonus or otherwise in order to spur them to accomplish the extra work imposed upon them. Everybody must agree with the regret expressed by His Excellency that he was unable to announce any progress in obtaining a settlement of the Fishery claims under the Washington Treaty. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) was glad to learn that the Government had been making, and would continue to make, efforts in that direction. The Speech did not mention the nature of these efforts, but no doubt in due course they would be made known. He hoped, with the hon. gentleman who had moved the resolution, that if the Government of the United States as it now exists, did not, during the short period which remains for its existence, remove the stigma it had cast upon the good faith of the American people by positively refusing to carry out the provisions of the Treaty, the incoming Government would be more sensible of the good reputation of the United States and their duty towards Canada. He was glad to see that in drafting the answer to the paragraph with regard to the Treaty with the Indians, the House was called upon to confirm the policy of the concessions made to the Indians. Of course everybody agreed that His Excellency in conforming to the judicious and humane course which the British Government adopted and which the Canadian Government had followed, was adopting the proper course, and hon. gentlemen could depend on it that on the Opposition side of the House cordial support would be given to every measure which was calculated to grant to the Indians their rights. The only question which could arise on the matter was whether the concessions had been politic and just, for no matter what length they went so long as they did not exceed the bounds of justice, both sides of the House would agree to them. He hoped the Premier in the course of his reply would favour the House with some explanations with respect to the Ministerial changes that had taken place since last session. The personnel of his hon. friends opposite was very frequently changed. Some old faces were among them this session, but others had gone. Evidently the hon. gentlemen of the Ministry could not help feeling that they had not an abiding city there. They disappeared one by one. Some went to the west and some to the east, and they reminded him strongly of the expression of Burke, "When I consider these changes, I can only think what shadows we are and what shadows we pursue." They still saw the faces of the Premier and the Minister of Justice, who, probably, would get on very well together during the present session. No doubt they would give every consideration to any criticisms offered by the Opposition, and if they adopted that course he promised that, while their administration of public affairs would receive full and ample criticism, they would not meet with any factious obstruction at the hands of Her Majesty's Opposition.

Mr. MACKENZIE said it would be observed from the construction of the Address that it was not intended to commit any member to the maintenance or defence of any position taken by the Government. He would propose a slight change in the paragraph regarding canal works, referred to by the leader of the Opposition. The complaint of Lenten fare made by that right hon. gentleman was not a new one. It had been made on several occasions when that hon. gentleman was leader of the Government. It was repeated last session; but there was this much to be said in favour of the present Administration, that when they promised a dish it was presented, and not withdrawn until disposed of. On the other hand, the right hon. gentleman on several occasions presented a bill of fare, not a single prominent dish of which ever reached its intended destination. Some of his dishes were presented in so revolting a shape that the Opposition were compelled to improve them, and then the right hon. gentleman swallowed them himself.

Mr. BOWELL: Was that the reason why the Insurance Bill was withdrawn last session?

Mr. MACKENZIE said it was withdrawn out of deference to the representations of almost the entire body of representatives of English companies. He concurred with the remarks of the hon. member for Kingston that the duty of the Opposition was to criticise the administrative as well as the legislative acts of the Government, and the right hon. gentleman and his friends had hitherto performed that portion of their duty, whatever they might have done in other directions. The Speech from the Throne contained several points which the Government were not bound to refer to, but they desired to be perfectly frank, and to communicate various matters in such a manner as to convey more or less the intentions and views of the Administration. With regard to Indian treaties, the right hon. member for Kingston complained last year that reference was not made in the Speech from the Throne of Treaty No. 4 having been made with the Indians, and further that the treaty was not made subject to the ratification of Parliament. He (Mr. Mackenzie) took the ground at the time that in treating with Indians it must be remembered that they are a peculiarly sensitive people, and never forget any part of an obligation undertaken by the Government. It could not be expected of those nomadic tribes to agree to have a treaty made with them subject to the ratification of Parliament. The Government had therefore proceeded in the usual way, and he might urge as a further justification that they had pursued the same course as was pursued by the leader of the Opposition when in office, and he hoped the right hon. gentleman would not go back on himself.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I raised no objection.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the right hon. gentleman did not raise the objection to-day, but last session. Mention was accordingly made in the Speech that a new treaty had been made, that His Excellency had been advised to ratify it, and that the treaty would be laid on the table as soon as possible. It was very difficult to communicate regularly and rapidly with Commissioners who were in treaty with Indians several hundreds of miles west of the present line of settlement in regard to matters which might arise in the course of the negotiations, and, therefore, the Commissioners must be treated with a good deal of consideration. The right hon. leader of the Opposition knew who the Commissioners were, and had ample confidence in the wisdom and discretion of one of them. Some provisions were inserted in the new treaty which were not contained in former treaties, and the allusion was specific to that point; but considering all the circumstances, the Government did not feel that it would be wise or expedient, perhaps not just, to interfere with the ratification of the treaty as made by the Commissioners appointed by the Government. With regard to the Extradition Treaty, which was a subject chiefly in the hands of legal gentlemen, he would not say more than to entirely dispute the position taken by the leader of the Opposition, that it was necessary for the Government to exercise any discretion in judging of the kind of tribunals which were to try criminals extradited in other countries. That would be assuming a position beyond our just rights, and one which should not be asserted by any Government. With regard to the suggestion that any communication made by Lord Dufferin to the Imperial Government upon the advice of his advisers, when in British Columbia, should be laid before the House, the right hon. member for Kingston might rest assured that his present advisers had given His Excellency no advice which they were afraid to communicate to the House, and further, that His Excellency knew what was due to the constitutional position which he occupied. As to the right hon. gentleman's remarks about public works he (Mr. Mackenzie) suggested last session the possibility of temporarily avoiding the construction of certain parts of the general canal system, and yet not interfere materially, if at all, with the stream of travel which the Welland Canal, when completed, might be expected to carry to the ocean ports. It would be for the Government to consider what portion of the work could be temporarily delayed in order to ease the pressure upon the public treasury, while fulfilling all the conditions of the scheme proposed by the hon. member for Kingston and his Administration. The Government had been fully alive to the advisability of doing all the work it was possible to undertake at such a time as the present and during the past two years, and it must be admitted that it was impossible to proceed more rapidly than the Government had done in the prosecution of the two main branches of the public works referred to. The Lachine Canal was entirely under contract, and the Welland Canal was all but entirely under contract, and was proceeding more rapidly than was anticipated, from the fact that contractors were able to procure labour cheaper than two or three years ago. The fullest information respecting the canal works would be given to the House at a future period. He proposed to alter the clause of the resolution regarding canal works from "We feel with His Excellency that it may be considered advisable not to press<sup>s</sup> all the works contemplated in the earlier years of Confederation to completion at present," to "We will give our best attention to the suggestions of His Excellency, &c."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: That will meet the point.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the right hon. leader of the Opposition had remarked that the Government had first acted in regard to the Sydney Exhibition, and afterwards asked the House to make provision. That was quite true. And it was also true that his (Mr. Mackenzie's) desire in that and other matters was to obtain the sanction of Parliament to any undertaking before it was entered upon, whenever it was possible. But the right hon. gentleman would readily understand that if Canada were to be represented at Sydney Exhibition, it was necessary to take action before the meeting of Parliament. The Government did not expect the expenditure to be very large, and he believed from the expressions of public opinion which had reached them from all parts of the Dominion that the course of the Government would be approved by the House. He regretted the opinion expressed by the right hon. member for Kingston that the success of Canada at the Philadelphia Exhibition 'was in spite of rather than in consequence of our Commissioners. It was impossible to please everybody, and to avoid difficulties arising with exhibitors who had complaints to make; but those who had given some attention to the matter knew well the devotion manifested and the amount of labour performed by two of these gentlemen, and the patience, perseverance and wisdom of Senator Perry could not well be excelled. He (Mr. Mackenzie) mentioned the name of Senator Penny specially, he being a member of the other branch of the Legislature, and a gentleman who cheerfully gave his time to the accomplishment of that national object. He could not concur in the opinion expressed by the leader of the Opposition, that it was little use sending Canadian goods to the Centennial, so far as regards American trade, the United States tariff excluding the greater portion of Dominion products. There had been an impression prevailing throughout the United States, and to a certain extent in Canada, that the Dominion manufactures were more or less inferior in point of construction to those of the neighbouring Republic. The Exhibition had proved, at all events, to Canadians and citizens of the United States, that our farmers and manufacturers were quite able to compete with their American rivals, and it was important to have been able to disabuse the public minds on both sides of the line, particularly on the southern side, of that impression. Canada had vindicated her claim not only to equality, but to superiority in a very large number of the products exhibited, and most cordial representations in that direction had been made to him by gentlemen occupying high positions in the United States department. Explanations in regard to Ministerial changes he would make to the House on Monday. As to Ministerial changes, he was afraid the stability of the late Administration was not attained, if it was sustained by having the same gentlemen constantly in office. The right hon. leader of the Opposition seemed to complain that members of the present Government had gone east, west, and perhaps, as Byron said of the hon. gentleman's countrymen, everywhere but north, and the hon. gentleman spoke as if it were a crime to depart for other scenes of labour. The right hon. gentleman and his organ appeared to take the ground that the Administration was bound to make all appointments from the ranks of its opponents. A long list was made up of the number of persons appointed and the salaries received yearly by members of the Administration, as if such was morally or legally wrong. No member of the Opposition when he (Mr. Mackenzie) was on that side of the House took that ground. The right hon. gentleman has said that a good deal of the economy alluded to in the speech had been achieved through the dismissal of clerks and messengers who thronged the public departments when he left office. They did dismiss a large number of such officials, who had been appointed by the right hon. gentleman shortly before resigning office. The right hon. gentleman appeared to think that a great many of those left in their appointments should have been dismissed. He (Mr. Mackenzie) believed that when an officer was appointed, nothing should cause his dismissal except misconduct, and if the Government had not carried out the right hon. gentleman's idea of what they ought to have done, it was because they had a more tender feeling than the right hon. gentleman for officials. Nevertheless, if the right hon. member for Kingston had made his suggestion two or three sessions ago, perhaps in respect to the distinguished position he held in the House and the country, the Government might have considered how far they could comply with his wish. He had no objection to the right hon. gentleman's criticisms, and joined with him very cordially in complimenting his hon. friend the member for South Wellington on the admirable speech he delivered in moving the address. His hon. friend the member for Iberville had long been known as a public man; his ability and power of speech were well known and needed no compliment. He quite agreed with his right hon. friend that the seconder of the Address discharged his duty with very great ability. He trusted, in the words of the closing paragraph of His Excellency's speech, that their labours would be conducive to the prosperity of the country and the unity of the people, and he promised, on the part of the Government, every consideration to those who were in a minority in the House, and that they would endeavour to do all that could fairly be asked of them in matters relating to public affairs; and he invited any criticisms that hon. gentlemen opposite might choose to offer, especially that their criticisms made out of doors with such freedom might be repeated by those hon. members from their places in the House.

Mr. DECOSMOS said he desired, before the resolution was passed, to allude to one or two points contained in the Speech from the Throne. The mover and seconder of the Address, in referring to Canada's exhibit at the Philadelphia Exhibition, might have spoken of it as the exhibit made by Canada and British Columbia, because already British Columbia had been treated in such a way as to warrant that distinction.

An HON. MEMBER—The Province has not yet seceded.

Mr. DeCosmos said the days or weeks were few before the Legislature of the Province would ask the Imperial Parliament, which united British Columbia with Canada, to use its power to release the Province from the Dominion, unless the Government was prepared to do the work that the people of Canada had promised to perform. When they remembered that the Province entered the Dominion in 1872; that before the declaration of Union the Government of the day sent surveyors into the Province to commence surveys for works connected with carrying out the terms of Union; that in the summer of 1873 a certain line was declared to be the line of the Pacific Railway; that in the autumn of that year the present Administration came into power; that the Government, though there had been ample time, had not commenced to build the railway; that the Government went on their knees to the Province and asked for new terms; that when the ambassador's proposal was refused, the Government agreed with Lord Carnarvon to commence the building of the railway; that the Government had not done anything to carry out that agreement; that a noble person was sent to British Columbia, as the London Standard had said, "to offer that Province fifty cents on the dollar;" it was evident the Government had not acted in a straightforward manner. He was prepared to prove before a Committee of the House that the statement in the Speech regarding the Pacific Railway was shown to be false by the words of the Chief Engineer, who had traversed the Province. He (Mr. DeCosmos) would not probably have interrupted the usual and ordinary proceedings which obtain when the reply to the Speech from the Throne is under discussion, but that he well remembered reading in a despatch sent by the Premier and his colleagues to England, that the members for British Columbia never objected to the insertion of the taxation resolution in the bill of 1874.

Mr. DeCosmos.

He now took occasion to denounce such conduct, so that the Government should no longer be able to send despatches to England, stating that the members for British Columbia had remained silent and heard such a statement made in the reply to the Speech, without saying a word. The true route for the Pacific Railway had been already settled. The statement contained in the Speech from the Throne was: "That it has not been found possible as yet, to complete the location of the line, and that His Excellency has consequently been obliged to postpone the inviting of tenders for its construction on the terms indicated by the Act of 1874." He found, however, in the report of Railway Surveys in the western or mountainous region, by Mr. Marcus Smith, the following statement:—

"All the surveys projected for the season have been completed, and the following are the results:—

"1. A complete trial location line from the Provincial boundary, at the summit of Yellow Head Pass in the Rocky Mountains, to Waddington Harbour, at the head of Bute Inlet, a distance of 546 miles."

That extract contained a direct contradiction of the statement embodied in the Speech from the Throne. There was a line proposed by hon. gentlemen of the Opposition when in power, and there was a line proposed by the Premier when he sent Mr. Edgar to British Columbia, and when in 1874 he was prepared to go to work and build the road, expending one million and a half annually on the main line. Yet, though three years have elapsed, a statement appeared in the Speech from the Throne, that it had not been found possible to complete the location of the line. The hon. leader of the Government found it, however, quite an easy and convenient matter to build the portion of the Pacific Railway from Thunder Bay to Winnipeg. In proceeding with the construction of the road in British Columbia, the Government should first find its ocean port and terminus, and from that point carry its surveys eastward. It was well known from the Admiralty and Merchant Marine authorities that we have no port on the Pacific, excepting Esquimaux, capable of competing with San Francisco. The only other good port was Alberni. The Government, therefore, should have commenced at Esquimault, whatever might be the course followed on the mainland. The natural route was by way of Bute Inlet to Vancouver Island. The idea that Vancouver Island was an ordinary island was a mistake; no island of equal size was so near the mainland of a continent, the distance at one point not exceeding that from Quebec to Levis. He desired to enter his protest against the action of the Government on the Pacific Railway question. If the Government were able, when Mr. Edgar visited British Columbia, to declare, that, if certain concessions were made, they would commence the railway at once on Vancouver Island, they could do the same work now; but the Speech from the Throne announced that there was no line located on which to commence construction. All the Government had to do was to commence work on the railway from Esquimault and afterwards find their line on the mainland. The statement in the Speech that a Bill would be submitted "for amending and consolidating the laws relating to Customs" might mean either Protection or Free Trade. He sincerely hoped hon. members would receive additional light on the subject at an early day.

Mr. THOMPSON (Cariboo) said the remarks in the Speech from the Throne with regard to the Pacific Railway, taken in connection with the statements made in the House in previous sessions by the Premier, as to the condition of the surveys, amounted to a direct abrogation of the terms of Union between Canada and British Columbia. Two years ago the Premier stated that only a small portion of the line remained to be located. Last year it was announced that the line was located except at two points, and now it was stated that the Government had not been able to complete the surveys. The opinion held in British Columbia was that the Government intended to continue the policy of delay from year to year, and that the railway across the mountains—the railway for which British Columbia entered the Dominion—would not be built. He entered his protest against the gross violation of the terms of Union which had been brought before the House to-day.

The first and subsequent paragraphs of the proposed Address, being read the second time, were severally agreed to.

On motion of Mr. MACKENZIE, the said Resolution was referred to a Select Committee, composed of Messrs. Mackenzie, Blake, Smith (Westmoreland), Cauchon, Vail, Guthrie and Béchard.

Mr. MACKENZIE, from the said Committee, reported the draft of an Address, and the same being read the second time, was agreed to, and is as follows:—

"To His Excellency the Right Honourable Sir Frederick Temple, Earl of Dufferin, Viscount and Baron Clandeboye of Clandeboye, in the County Down, in the Peerage of the United Kingdom, Baron Dufferin and Clandeboye, of Ballyleidy and Killeleagh, in the County Down, in the Peerage of Ireland, and a Baronet, Knight of the Most Illustrious Order of Saint Patrick, Knight Grand Cross of the Most Distinguished Order of Saint Michael and Saint George, and Knight Commander of the Most Honourable Order of the Bath, Governor General of Canada, and Vice-Admiral of the same, etc., etc., etc.

"MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY :

"We, Her Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Canada, in Parliament assembled, humbly thank Your Excellency for your gracious Speech at the opening of the present Session.

"We are grateful to Your Excellency for having again summoned us to meet for the despatch of business, at the time which is best suited to the convenience of members.

"We have learned with pleasure that during the recess, Your Excellency visited the province of British Columbia, and had much satisfaction in becoming acquainted with the people of that interesting part of the Dominion, and with the climate and resources of their Province

"We thank Your Excellency for the information that the surveys of the Pacific Railway have been prosecuted with the utmost vigour and at a larger cost during the past than in any previous year, and that it has not been found possible, as yet, to complete the location of the line, and that Your Excellency has consequently been obliged to postpone the inviting of tenders for its construction on the terms indicated by the Act of 1874, and that a further correspondence on the subjects at issue between Your Excellency's Government and British Columbia will be laid before us.

"We are glad to learn that during the recent suspension of the Extradition arrangements with the United States, Your Excellency took care that the importance to Canada of a speedy resumption of these arrangements should be represented to Her Majesty's Government, whose attention has been further invited to the expediency of largely extending the provisions of the existing Treaty; and to be informed that while the operation of the Treaty has been resumed, negotiations are in progress for a convention, more liberal and better suited to the circumstances of the two countries.

"We receive with satisfaction the intelligence that the attention of Your Excellency's Government having been directed to some anomalies in the Royal Commission and Royal Instructions to the Governor General, particularly with regard to the exercise of the Prerogative of Pardon, steps have been taken towards the amendment of these instruments, and that papers on this subject, as well as on that of the Extradition question, will be laid before us.

"We receive with pleasure Your Excellency's assurance, that the great public works connected with the St. Lawrence navigation, and the Canals required to complete the system, have been prosecuted with success during the past year; and that nearly all the works on the Welland and Lachine Canals have been placed under contract on terms favourable to the country. We recognize the fact that the active prosecution of these works during the last three years has necessarily increased the public debt; and we will give our best consideration to the suggestion of Your Excellency, that though expectations are entertained that the outlay may ultimately be repaid to the country, it may be advisable not to press all the works, contemplated in the earlier years of Confederation, to completion at present.

"We are happy to know that the Inter-colonial Railway was opened for traffic, throughout its entire length, early in the summer, with as favourable results as could have been expected; and that one of the immediate advantages of the completion of the Railway was the delivery and reception of the British Mails at Halifax after the closing of the St. Lawrence; and that up to the present time mails and passengers have been successfully carried over the line without any interruption.

"We feel with Your Excellency that the exhibition of Canadian products, manufactures, and works of art at the United States National Exposition at Philadelphia, was eminently successful, and proclaimed to the world that Canada has already taken a high place as a farming, manufacturing and mining country; that it is gratifying to us to learn that the expenditure was kept well within the estimate; and that we rejoice to know that in Your Excellency's view, the success achieved by the enterprise of our people was largely aided by the energy and wisdom of the Commissioners who had charge of the arrangements.

"We agree with Your Excellency that it was advisable in the interest of the country to make arrangements for exhibiting Canadian products at the Exhibition to be held at Sydney, New South Wales, and that we shall not fail to give our best consideration to any proposal for a provision for this purpose which may be recommended to us.

"We are glad to receive Your Excellency's assurance that notwithstanding the loss of revenue, consequent chiefly on the diminution of our importations, the reductions effected during the current year have gone far to restore the equilibrium between income and expenditure; though we are aware that great economy will still be needful to attain this object.

"We share Your Excellency's regret that Your Excellency is still unable to announce any progress in obtaining a settlement of the Fishery claims under the Washington Treaty, notwithstanding the efforts made by Your Excellency's Government to secure the result.

"We learn with satisfaction that Your Excellency's Commissioners have made further treaty arrangements with certain of the Indian tribes of the North-West Territories, by which their title is extinguished to a very large portion of the Territories west of Treaty No. 4. We thank Your Excellency for informing us that although some of the provisions of this Treaty are of a somewhat onerous and exceptional character, Your Excellency has thought it nevertheless advisable, on the whole, to ratify it, and that this Treaty will be placed before us; and that Your Excellency has made an engagement to negotiate a Treaty with the remaining tribes east of the Rocky Mountains.

"We feel with Your Excellency that although the expenditure incurred by the Indian Treaties is undoubtedly large, yet that the Canadian policy is nevertheless the cheapest ultimately, if we compare the results with those of other countries; and that it is above all, a humane, just and Christian policy.

"We rejoice to know that notwithstanding the deplorable war waged between the Indian tribes in the United States Territories, and the Government of that country, during the last year, no difficulty has arisen with the Canadian tribes living in the immediate vicinity of the scene of hostilities.

"We shall not fail to consider the expediency of making such changes in the Joint Stock Companies Act as may obviate for the future the passage of special Acts of Parliament for the incorporation of various classes of Companies, including such corporations as seek to engage in the borrowing and lending of money, by providing for their organization by Letters Patent.

"We are well pleased to learn that the desirability of affording additional security to policy holders of Life Assurance Companies has engaged the attention of Your Excellency's Government, and that we trust the measure which will be submitted will accomplish the desired object.

"We shall give our attentive consideration to any measure submitted to us for the purpose of extending to the navigation of the great inland waters, rights and remedies at present confined to waters within the jurisdiction of the Courts of Vice-Admiralty, as well as to any measure for amending and consolidating the laws relating to Customs.

"We think, with Your Excellency, that it is advisable to provide for the permanent prosecution of the Geological Survey, which has heretofore been carried on under temporary enactments, and to make this a distinct branch of the Civil Service; and that we shall give our best attention to any Bill laid before us for that purpose.

"We shall fully consider any measures submitted to us for the amendment of the Weights and Measures Act, the Excise Laws, and other Acts, and also any Bill relating to Shipping.

"We thank Your Excellency for the assurance that the accounts of the past year will be laid before us, and that the Estimates of the next financial year which will also be submitted, will, as Your Excellency trusts, be found to be framed with a view to meet the existing circumstances of the country, while, at the same time, providing for carrying on the administration of affairs with efficiency.

"Your Excellency may rest assured that we shall earnestly endeavour to justify Your Excellency's reliance on our prudence and ability, and our devotion to the work of Legislation, which, we trust, may be carried on and completed in such a way, as to minister to the prosperity of the country, and the unity of the people."

The Address was then ordered to be engrossed, and to be presented to His Excellency by Members of the Privy Council.

SUPPLY.

Resolved, That this House will, on Monday next, resolve itself into a committee to consider of a Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Resolved, That this House will, on Monday next, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES.

QUESTIONS AND OBSERVATIONS.

Mr. MACKENZIE moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD asked the leader of the Government if he proposed to make any attempt to obtain an accurate report of the debates of this House during the present session, or whether independent action would have to be taken in the matter by the House. If not, he would give notice that on Monday next he would move that the subject be taken into consideration.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the Government did not last year undertake anything in regard to the reporting. He had been informed by his hon. friend from West Middlesex that he had given notice to-day, as he had given the second day of the session last year, of a motion for a Select Committee on Monday next, so that the matter had already been taken up in the same manner as last session.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said that if the House were fully in charge of the whole subject, it could decide immediately whether they were to have a Hansard this session or not. If action were not taken at once in the matter, the session would be so far gone that a full and accurate report of the debates could not be obtained. He gave the notice to which he had referred.

House adjourned at Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The Speaker took the chair at Three o'clock.

of Cardwell, having previously taken the oath according to law, and subscribed the roll containing the same, took his seat in the House.

REPORTS.

Mr. LAFLAMME laid before the House,—Report, Returns and Statistics of the Inland Revenues of the Dominion of Canada for the fiscal year ended 30th June, 1876.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT laid before the House,—Public Accounts of Canada for the fiscal year ended 30th June, 1876.

INSOLVENT ACTS REPEAL BILL.

FIRST READING.

Mr. BARTHE introduced a Bill (No. 2) to repeal the Insolvent Acts now in force in the Dominion of Canada.

Bill read the first time.

CANADIAN SURGEONS IN ALLAN STEAMSHIPS.

QUESTION.

Mr. BROUSE asked if the attention of the Government had been called to a notification of the Imperial Board of Trade to the English agents of the Allan Line of steamers, that henceforth none of that Company's ships carrying passengers would be allowed to clear at the Custom House, unless the surgeons had graduated in one of the colleges in either England, Ireland or Scotland;—if so, did such notification carry executive authority? Also, had the Government taken the necessary action to correct this insult—an insult alike offensive to the Canadian medical graduates and the Universities of our Dominion?

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland): The attention of the Government has been called to the fact that an order has been issued by the Board of Trade to the effect spoken of by the hon. gentleman. We have, however, had no authentic official information that such is the fact. A communication was sent by Sir Hugh Allan to McGill College, Montreal, and from them we received a copy of his letter, which would appear to furnish evidence that some such steps have been taken by the Board of Trade. We received the communication on the 24th January, and on the 25th, an Order in Council was passed protesting against such a course. That was forwarded to England, and, I suppose, has been received by the Board of Trade by this time. In reference to the second part of the question, I may say that the Board of Trade is a branch of the Executive Government of England, and an order emanating from it, would, I presume, carry with it the force of executive authority.

MANITOBA BATTALION CLAIMS.

QUESTION.

Mr. SNIDER, in the absence of Mr. SMITH (Selkirk), asked whether the Government had considered the claims for compensation put forward by Charles William Allen, R. A. W. Rolph, Henry Walker and other non-commissioned officers and men discharged from the Manitoba Provisional Battalion of Infantry?

Mr. VAIL: The Government have considered the claims of that force, and, upon the facts submitted up to the present time, they see no reason to deviate from the conclusion arrived at when the matter was before the Department last autumn.

REGISTRATION OF SHIPPING.

QUESTION.

Mr. CHEVAL asked whether it is the intention of the Government to amend Section 14 of the "Act relating to Shipping, and for the Registration, Inspection and classification thereof," 36 Victoria, chapter 128, to wit:—

"14. No ship duly registered under the provisions of the said 'Act respecting the Registration of Inland Vessels,' forming chapter 41 of the Consolidated Statutes of the late Province of Canada, before the day on which this Act takes effect, need be registered after that day, in pursuance of the provisions of this Act, except for the purpose of enabling her to proceed to sea as a British ship."

By this section, very great injustice is done to vessels built since the passing of the said Act, inasmuch as in the various canals, of two steamboats of the same tonnage, the one only pays 32 cents, while the other is unjustly compelled to pay $1.95.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said the Government felt this subject to be one of importance, and it certainly appeared to involve injustice. The Government were now considering the matter, and the probability was that some measure would be submitted to redress what seemed to be a grievance.

SITE OF QUEBEC GRAVING DOCK.

QUESTION.

Mr. FRÉCHETTE asked if the Government Chief Engineer had made any report concerning the site of the projected Graving Dock for the Harbour of Quebec.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes; the Chief Engineer made a report about two months ago.

IMPORTS FROM THE UNITED STATES.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. IRVING moved for a return showing the general nature and the value of all the manufactured goods imported into Canada from the United States in the years 1874, 1875 and 1876.

Motion agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES

Mr. MACKENZIE moved that a special committee, composed of Sir John A. Macdonald, Messrs. Mackenzie, Smith (Westmoreland), Blake, Holton, Tupper, and Masson be appointed to prepare and report, with all convenient speed, lists of members to compose the Select Standing Committees ordered by the House.

Motion agreed to.

NAVIGATION OF AMERICAN WATERS.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. CURRIER moved for all correspondence between the Dominion, United States, and Imperial Governments respecting the navigation of American canals and rivers; also any correspondence between the Government and business firms or individuals respecting the same.

Motion agreed to.

PRAYERS IN THE HOUSE.

RESOLUTION.

Mr. MACDONALD (Toronto) moved:

"That it be an order of the House that each day, and immediately after the Speaker shall have taken the chair at three o'clock in the afternoon, the prayers now read daily in the Senate be read in this chamber by such Chaplain as the Speaker may appoint for that purpose, and in his absence by the Clerk of the House."

He said he rose with a great deal of diffidence to bring this matter before this House, a diffidence produced by the very great importance of the subject, and a fear that he should fail in presenting it with that clearness and force which the subject deserved. He was quite satisfied that if he should unhappily use any word that would interfere with the prejudices of any member of the House, it would not be because he was not influenced by a very strong desire not to give utterance to a single sentiment that would grate upon the feelings of any hon. member. He had been very careful in the construction of this resolution. He could not fancy that what was right in the Senate could be wrong in the Commons. He was not prepared to believe that any member of this House, whatever might be his religious feelings, could be opposed to soliciting the Divine guidance upon their deliberations. He did not forget that the House was composed of hon. gentlemen differing in language, in religion, and in race, but neither did he forget that the hon. members of this House were all Canadians, and that Canadians were Christians. He could not forget either that there were many in this House and out of this House who regarded it as dishonouring to them, that in the deliberations of this House, upon which so much of the happiness and prosperity of this country depends, God was not acknowledged. Moreover, he could not forget that whatever might be the religious opinions of members of this House, there were none of them who ignored the inspiration of God's Word, and that Word said that there are no powers but what are of God and the powers that be are ordained of God. The hon. member quoted from the journals to show that in 1792 a resolution was passed in the Legislative Council of the Province of Quebec, providing for the prefacing of the proceedings of the House daily with the reading of a prayer by the Chaplain of the House, and in his absence by the Clerk, a form of prayer for the purpose having been drawn up at the request of the House by the Roman Catholic Bishop and the Protestant Rector of the city of Quebec. This prayer was used daily until the union of the Provinces, when the form now used in the Senate was introduced and made use of until 1866, and it was then merely modified sufficiently to meet the change in the circumstances occasioned by Confederation. In Upper Canada also the proceedings of the Legislative Council were opened by prayer until 1829, (the Chaplain being a clergyman of the Church of England appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor) when a vacancy occurred, he presumed, in consequence of the death of the Chaplain, and it was ordered by the House that, during the remainder of that session, the prayer should be said by the ministers of the various denominations in the town of York, which was done. At length, however, the House refused to receive a chaplain of the Church of England, and the system fell into disuse, very much to the discredit, he thought, of all sections of the House. We lived in times of greater catholicity, when the sense of the country would demand that in the House of Commons, as well as in the Senate, their deliberations should commence with the invoking of God's blessing. He did not think it was anything for them to be proud of in not having prayers said in this House. They were an exception to the legislatures of all civilized countries of which he had any acquaintance. He had been influenced to put this motion upon the paper from being present in the House of Representatives in Baltimore last May, and seeing that the proceedings were there opened with prayer. Following the Speaker into the House was a gentleman clothed in a flowing robe, who proved to be the Chaplain, and he opened the House with prayer, the demeanour of members and the aspect of the whole proceedings being thoroughly devotional. The form used was the same as in the Dominion, with the exception of substituting the President for the Sovereign and State for Province. He (Mr. Macdonald) at that time resolved that he would submit to the Dominion House of Commons the motion he had proposed, and leave the responsibility of accepting or rejecting it with the House. From inquiries made with respect to the practice in the United States, he found that the two Houses of Congress elect ministers of different denominations, who alternately perform the duties of Chaplain; the Legislatures of many of the States follow a similar course; and throughout the whole States the practice was well nigh universal. Whether the prayer in this House should be read by the Clerk, or whether it would be best for the Speaker to read it, he did not say; but he did say that hundreds and thousands of the people of this Dominion wanted and asked that a prayer be read, and he did not think that in following the precedent of the Imperial Parliament in regard to this matter they could go far astray. There, from time immemorial, prayers had been read in the Lords by the junior Bishop, and in the Commons by the Speaker's Chaplain. In order to give the utmost latitude, he had framed the motion in its present form. He trusted that to-day they would, as a deliberate body, discharge this duty, which should have been discharged before; a duty which they owe to themselves, to their children, and to the people of Canada, whose representatives they are.

Mr. MACKENZIE said so far as the motion was concerned there could be little question among members present that what was proposed was a Christian duty. While it was not considered necessary to open the deliberations of all bodies with prayer, it was very plain that the Legislature of the country occupied a position somewhat different to that occupied by municipal councils, agricultural associations and corporate bodies, and that members of Parliament had at heart the welfare of the country in which they performed their duties, and that in a higher sense they were responsible to the Almighty. He had always held those views, but moreover, he had always been alive to the difficulties in carrying on religious services in an assembly composed so largely of different denominations. He did not know the proportion of Catholic to Protestant members, or the proportion of one denomination of Protestants to another, but it was believed that those denominational distinctions might cause some difficulty and jarring in regard to public worship, which the hon. member for Toronto Centre now proposed for the first time to introduce into the Commons. The Government were naturally desirous of ascertaining the views of hon. members, when a matter was brought up which they were disposed to treat with that solemn feeling which must be associated with everything connected with Divine worship, and of becoming acquainted with the opinions of gentlemen of various denominations and positions in the House on the question.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he agreed with the remarks of those who had spoken on the matter. He felt as a body composed of representatives of a Christian country and supposed to be Christians themselves, that it was quite proper that the blessing of the Almighty should be invoked upon the acts of the Legislature. Were this assembly composed entirely of Protestants, although of various denominations, he fancied no practical difficulty would arise, but difficulty might arise from the fact that so large a proportion of the members were Roman Catholics. He was not prepared to say whether it would meet their wishes that the motion should carry in the terms in which it was prepared. They formed so large and important a body, and represented such a large community in the Dominion, that their feelings and even their prejudices should be respected; and he felt that the very praiseworthy object of the mover of the resolution would be thwarted if by its adoption the feelings of their Catholic friends were wounded, and they were caused to abstain from entering the House during prayer. He did not know how the difficulty was to be got over, but he would advise that a conversation should take place in the House on the matter and that it should be left to a committee to inquire into and see how it could be carried out.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he was about to make the same suggestion. This resolution practically involved the adoption of a standing rule, and all such resolutions had hitherto been referred to a Select Committee. His hon. friend had mentioned that in the Province of Quebec, the subject was referred to a Committee, and he (Mr. Mackenzie) found from enquiry that, in some of the other Provinces where a form of prayer had been adopted, which was practically that used by the Protestant Episcopal Church, the Catholic members were in the habit of remaining out of the House until it was over. He thought the suggestion of the hon. gentleman opposite should therefore be adopted, and the matter referred to a Committee to report at an early day. Of course all religious parties should be as fairly as possible represented on such a committee.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD suggested that the debate should be adjourned in order to carefully consider who should constitute the committee.

Mr. MACDONALD (Toronto) said the few hon. gentlemen to whom he had spoken on the subject had been members of the Roman Catholic persuasion, and they had, as a rule, expressed their readiness to have a form of prayer adopted. While he had every desire to be influenced by the expressions of the Premier on the one hand and the leader of the Opposition on the other, he agreed to their suggestion chiefly in order that nothing might be hastily done which might conflict with the prejudices of those who differed from him.

Mr. HOLTON moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. MACDONALD (Toronto) said he wished it to be distinctly understood that the Committee was to be appointed in order to decide on the form of prayer—not to consider the advisability of having prayer.

Several HON. MEMBERS: No, no.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Mr. MACDONALD (Toronto): Then I cannot consent to the adjournment.

Mr. MACKENZIE said it would be hardly respectful for the House to instruct the Committee to decide on the form. The ordinary course would be to instruct them to report on the subject, in which case there would be nothing to prevent their reporting a form if they chose. No doubt any Committee the hon. gentleman named would be accepted by the House.

Motion to adjourn Debate agreed to.

DOMINION DAM ON DEVIL LAKE.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD, in the absence of Mr. JONES (South Leeds), moved for copies of all Orders in Council and all instructions or orders from the Department of Public Works relating to the destruction by force, last July, of the dam called the Dominion Dam, on Devil Lake, in the County of Addington, and for copies of all reports made by engineers or any engineer or employé of the Government, and of all correspondence relating to the said dam, its destruction or reconstruction.

Motion agreed to.

FISHERY CLAUSES OF THE WASHINGTON TREATY.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. MITCHELL moved for copies of all correspondence in relation to the settlement of the fishery clauses of the Washington Treaty, between the Government of Canada and that of Great Britain and between the Government of Great Britain and the Government of the United States, in relation to the aforesaid subject; also copies of instructions to Sir A. T. Galt and correspondence with him upon the subject. He said nearly six years had elapsed since the Washington Treaty was signed. The American Government had settled nearly every point involved in the questions decided in the treaty. It was not generally known that the principal object and motive of entering upon negotiations for the treaty, was to obtain some settlement of the difficulties connected with the Canadian fisheries. Senator Campbell was sent by the Government of Sir John A. Macdonald to England for the purpose of obtaining, if possible, a settlement of that question; and it was in consequence of the application made by the Dominion Government to the Government of Great Britain, that Her Majesty's Government availed themselves of the opportunity to consider various other questions at issue with the United States at that time, which questions were subsequently submitted to a Commission, and an amicable arrangement arrived at in regard to them. Although all other subjects dealt with by the Commission, and included in the treaty, had been settled, the matter of the Canadian fisheries, which was the original cause of the treaty being framed, remain as far from settlement as before the treaty was signed. It was expected that the provisions of the treaty would have been carried out within a reasonable time. but to the surprise of the people of Canada, the fishery question was now in a worse position than before the framing of the treaty. He did not submit the motion in a sense hostile to the Government, but to enable them to lay such information before the House as would assure the country that all reasonable steps had been taken—if they had been taken—to bring that question in which Canadians felt so much interest, to a satisfactory adjustment. The treaty gave the Americans the right to fish in our waters for eleven years; six years having elapsed, without any steps having been taken to determine the value of those fisheries, it was time to ascertain whether the Americans had resolved not to make Canada any allowance or compensation for our fishery rights. He observed that the Government had laid on the table a Minute of Council of 24th November last, in which the attention of Her Majesty's Government was called to the position of the question. He found also a reply, dated January 5th, from the Foreign Office, giving an historical resumé of negotiations, setting forth that the Dominion had agreed to the appointment of Commissioners to meet at Washington for the settlement of the questions at issue; that they agreed to the appointment of arbitrators to ascertain whether any, if so, what compensation should be paid to Canada for its fishery rights; that the two Governments were to appoint arbitrators, a third arbitrator to be chosen by the Austrian Government; that up to this time, though repeatedly asked by the British Government, the United States had refused or neglected to appoint a Commissioner; that in 1875 Sir Alexander Galt was appointed British commissioner, and that the provisions of the treaty in regard to compensation to be paid for the use of Canadian fisheries had been practically null and void. He deferred any further observations until the Government brought down the papers, for a discussion might prove unwise at that stage of the question. Whether the blame for allowing action on the fishery question to be deferred year after year was to be attributed to the Dominion Government, which he did not think was the case, or to the Imperial Government, or to the United States Government, would only be known when the correspondence was submitted to the House; at all events, the time had arrived when the people of Canada should know whether their interests had been carefully guarded.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland): There is no objection to the resolution passing with some amendment. My hon. friend will see the propriety of striking out the passage relating to the confidential instructions given to Sir Alexander Galt which, I think, it would be improper to produce. There are certain parts of the correspondence which the Government may not consider it wise or politic to submit, but other portions can and will be submitted. When the correspondence is brought down, I am sure my hon. friend will attach no blame to this Government for any apparent neglect or delay which may have taken place in this business. The Government has done everything possible to bring about the result, which was expected long ago.

Mr. MITCHELL consented to the proposed amendment.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: It would be highly inexpedient to bring down all the papers and information in the hands of the Government. It might have the effect of injuring our cause hereafter.

Motion, as amended, agreed to, as follows:—

Resolved, That an humble address be presented to His Excellency, for copies of all correspondence in relation to the settlement of the Fishery clauses of the Washington Treaty, between the Government of Canada and that of Great Britain, and between the Government of Great Britain and the Government of the United States in relation to the aforesaid subject.

THE IMPERIAL BOARD OF TRADE AND CANADIAN SURGEONS.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. TUPPER moved for all correspondence between the Government of Canada and the Imperial Government or any steamship company or private individual touching the qualifications of surgeons on British steamers or other passenger ships sailing to or from British ports. He said he had put the motion on the paper in order to give him an opportunity in his place in Parliament to protest in the strongest terms, at the earliest possible moment, against the course which it appeared had been taken by the Imperial Board of Trade in this matter. He had learned with very great satisfaction that the feeling which he, in common with every member of the medical profession, and he might say with the people of Canada, had entertained in relation to that undeserved insult to the medical profession of this Dominion had been felt just as keenly and just as promptly by the Government. He was very gratified to learn that not a day had been lost in presenting that sentiment, on the part of the Government, to the Imperial Government, and he had no doubt that that protest would result in such an arrangement as would at once change the course which the Imperial Board of Trade had, he thought very unadvisedly and very inconsiderately, adopted. He held a degree from the University of Edinburgh, and the diploma of the Royal College of Surgeons, but he was able to say that the medical profession of

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Canada would compare favourably with that of the British Islands themselves; and that the persons who hold diplomas under the stringent regulations in force in this country were as much entitled to the confidence of the public in Great Britain and in Canada as were the graduates of colleges of the very highest standing in the British Islands. He made these statements not only from his own personal knowledge, but he had documents in his possession showing on the highest authority that the students from the universities and colleges of Canada occupied the very highest standing on the other side of the water. Ample testimony had been borne by those best qualified to judge, that when the attainments and abilities of Canadian graduates and the students of Canadian Colleges came into competition with those of Great Britain, the comparison was one of which every Canadian had just reason to be proud, for the students had not only been able to hold their own, but their average ability had been higher and greater than that shown by their fellow-competitors. He had heard with great pleasure of the action of the Government in this matter, and that they had given expression to the feeling that the action of the Board of Trade constituted an undeserved reflection upon the medical institutions of this country.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said the correspondence would be submitted to the House. It was hoped that in the course of a fortnight or three weeks an answer would be received, and when it was received the Government would take an early opportunity of submitting it to the House without formal notice, trusting that it would be satisfactory.

Motion agreed to.

MILITARY COLLEGE AT KING- STON.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. LANGEVIN moved for a return of the number of candidates that have come forward for admission to the Military College at Kingston; how many from each Province, distinguishing those of French origin from the others; how many have been so admitted, how many from each Province, distinguishing those of French origin from the others; also, a copy of the present regulations and a statement of the qualifications required of candidates for such admission.

Motion agreed to.

MARINE HOSPITAL AT SYDNEY.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton) moved for a return of all money expended in building a Marine Hospital at Sydney, Cape Breton; the amount of the different tenders for the construction of the said building, with the names of the parties tendering; also, the names of all persons to whom the Government paid directly for work performed on this building, or improvements connected with it; also, the amount paid for superintending the work, and to whom paid; also, the total amount of expenditure to December 31st, 1876; also, correspondence, if any, which led to the transfer of the contract for this building from the gentleman to whom it was awarded in the first instance, to another gentleman.

Motion agreed to.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES.

APPOINTMENT OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex) moved:

"That a Select Committee be appointed to consider what arrangements can be made for securing an official report of the debates of this House during the present Session; to be composed of Messrs. Ross (Middlesex), Oliver, Dymond, Béchard, Charlton, Tupper, Bowell, Desjardins, and Colby."

He said he had received a number of letters from members during recess, in consequence of which he thought it desirable to ask the House to grant a committee to make arrangements for an official report of the debates. In making the report there was one of two courses to be taken, viz., either to report them verbatim or to condense them. In the former case the bulk would be so great as to render the report of little service. Last year a condensed report was furnished, and there were considerable difficulties with reference to it. It was difficult to satisfy members as to the character of the condensation, as a member might regard as important in his speech a matter which the reporter would consider of little consequence so far as it concerned the question under discussion. In consequence of that fact, reporters had to be dealt with considerably, and the Committee had to be allowed considerable latitude. The reports of the previous years had been tolerably satisfactory, and the feeling in the House, was, he believed, so far in favour of an official report being taken of the debates that the Committee would be appointed without opposition.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the matter was entirely in the hands of the House. It was a matter in which the Government did not wish to exercise any controlling influence.

Mr. YOUNG said he regretted that provision was not made for the publication of the reports before the close of last session. That being the position of the matter, he thought the best way would be to appoint a committee to carry on the Hansard. Upon the whole, he thought that the Hansard volumes already published were successful. The reporting of the debates resulted in members preparing their speeches better and in elevating the tone of the House.

Mr. HOLTON said he had always been in favour of reporting the debates, but it appeared to him that last session the reports were not satisfactory, and the course he took at the close of last session was in order to bring about a full consideration of the whole subject in a full House, and preventing the continuance of what he felt to be a defective system. He complained that last session many important speeches, including one by Mr. Blake, were very much condensed and might as well have been left out altogether. What was wanted was an authentic record of the utterances of the leading public men, and he thought the House had failed to obtain that result.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said that in order to make the Hansard successful, it should be carefully edited, and there should be a larger staff of reporters than there was last session. He believed from the general feeling in the House that it would readily sanction the expense of keeping a full staff of reporters in order to take a report of everything which took place in the House, the short conversations as well as the lengthy speeches. When the report was written, a competent editor in whom both sides of the House should have confidence, should look over it with a view to condensing. The English Hansard was greatly condensed, and it was well known that the Times did not now publish such lengthy reports of the proceedings of Parliament as it did some years ago. The country, he was satisfied, would not be satisfied unless the system was continued. The Hansard had been useful. It had not contributed to lengthening the speeches, or to lengthening the session of the House; on the contrary, hon. members knowing that their remarks would be taken down, had carefully prepared their speeches, and kept out irrelevant matter.

Mr. BOWELL said the Committee were fully alive to the difficulties referred to by the hon. member for Chateauguay who, apparently, had not read the report presented by the Committee last session. On the 6th of April the report was laid before the House, its recommendations having been arrived at after much consideration, and a perusal of it would show that the scheme submitted would obviate the difficulties alluded to. Had notice of motion for the adoption of the report been given by the Chairman of the Committee, the hon. member for Chateauguay could not have taken the objection which prevented its adoption. He was surprised to hear that an important speech made by the Minister of Justice, had been omitted; whenever complaints were made to the Committee, steps were immediately taken to have the inaccuracies or omissions corrected. He desired, moreover, to state that the report of the Committee was not presented to the House by the Chairman, but by a member of the Committee, and that no steps were taken by the Chairman, though repeatedly urged, to place a notice on the paper, in order that it might come properly before the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Mr. BLAKE said he did not know that one of his speeches had been so much condensed, nor did he care how far his utterances were condensed. Hon. gentlemen would never find him complaining. He, however, thought that members when misrepresented had good reason to complain, and he would take that opportunity of saying that he would not hold himself responsible for the reports of what he had been supposed to say, because he had been reported as saying what was diametrically opposed to what he had said.

Motion agreed to.

CHANGES IN THE GOVERNMENT.

MINISTERIAL EXPLANATIONS.

Orders of the day called.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that before the orders of the day were called, he desired to make the Ministerial explanations for which the leader of the Opposition had asked on Friday. Such explanations were generally made in Parliament, chiefly because they might involve some new policy on the part of the Administration, or the adoption of a new policy by any of the members joining the Administration. Three vacancies had occurred since the Administration had last met Parliament. One was caused by the elevation of Mr. Laird to the Lieutenant-Governorship of the North-West Territories. One had occurred upon the retirement of his hon. friend the late Minister of Inland Revenue, consequent upon a long illness, which, he was sure, every member of the House, on each side, would regret as sincerely as he did. He was also sure they would all anxiously indulge the hope which he entertained, that it might leave no permanent injury to the health or system of that hon. gentleman, and that they might long see him an ornament to the House, as he had been for many years. The third vacancy had been caused by the elevation of the late Minister of Agriculture to the Lieutenant-Governorship of Quebec. He would say nothing about the appointment of these two gentlemen to the highest political position which the Canadian Government had it in their power to bestow, confident as he was that both appointments would meet the approval of the country, and that, at any rate, this was not the occasion on which to criticise them. The place occupied formerly by Mr. Laird was offered by His Excellency to the hon. member for Bothwell, who accepted the position, and thereby became a member of the Administration. The position occupied by Mr. Geoffrion was offered to the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, who accepted the offer and became a member of the Administration. The position occupied by Mr. Letellier was offered in the first place to the present Minister, who, upon some consideration, felt indisposed at the time to enter the Senate, and on that account declined to accede to the request that he should join the Administration. Upon that, he (Mr. Mackenzie) had the pleasure of offering the position, with a seat in the Senate, to Mr. Joly, but he, while entirely concurring in the policy of the Administration on public matters, felt indisposed to accede to the request upon personal reasons, which, however, involved no matter of policy in which either the Administration or the House was concerned. He then again approached his hon. friend, Mr. Pelletier, asking him to reconsider his determination, and upon reconsideration he decided to accept the position which was originally tendered him, and was accordingly appointed to the office with a seat in the Senate. These were the very brief explanations he had to tender in relation to the changes which had taken place; and he presumed they would be entirely satisfactory to hon. gentlemen opposite.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he thanked his hon. friend at the head of the Government for his explanations. It was well that this practice of making such explanations when a reconstruction of the Government took place, or when a change occurred—a practice which prevailed in the old country—should be followed here, in order that the House, and, through the House, the country might know whether there was any change of policy involved in the introduction of a new member into the Government; and also that the House might be able to decide whether their position towards the Ministry was altered thereby. He quite agreed with what the hon. gentleman had said with regard to the hon. member for Vercheres. That hon. gentleman was always a popular member of Parliament before he took office, and his conduct in office had not in any way diminished the general esteem in which he was held on both sides of the House. With reference to the member for Jacques Cartier, who had succeeded that hon. gentleman, that hon. member was known, before he was made a Minister, to be in the most confidential relations with the Government, and he might as well be a Minister as a mere outside confidant. With reference to the appointment of the hon. member for Bothwell to succeed Mr. Laird, he (Sir John A. Macdonald) could only compliment the leader of the Government. He had no doubt that hon. gentleman would make an able Minister. He regretted that his hon. friend the leader of the Government had felt it his duty to send Mr. Laird to the North-West, for that hon. member had just begun to understand the very complicated duties of the Minister of the Interior, and last session, when he had a very difficult measure to carry through this House, although he was put to a little trouble occasionally in the course of the discussion of the details, the then Minister of Interior showed that he had really grasped the details, and understood the questions involved in that measure—the Indian bill. He had hoped, therefore, that as long as the present Government lasted, the country would have had the benefit of the experience that Minister had gained at the head of that Department. It was of the greatest importance that the responsible Minister at the head of Indian affairs, (and that was one of the chief branches of the Department of which that Minister was in charge,) should fully understand that subject. While he had the fullest confidence in the gentleman who now held that office, the newly-appointed Minister could not be expected by intuition to arrive at the knowledge of the subject which his predecessor had acquired after considerable study, pains and experience. On public grounds, however, he might perhaps rejoice at the elevation of Mr. Laird, as it had given him the advantage of the aid and the countenance of his hon. friend (Mr. Pope) who sat beside him.

Mr. MACKENZIE: On a Protection motion?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said his hon. friend from Queen's would no doubt protect him from the assaults of the First Minister. With regard to the appointment of the present Minister of Agriculture, it seemed rather an unusual thing, and perhaps a course which was not well adapted to maintain the dignity of the Upper House, that a member of this House should be in the first place appointed a Senator and then appointed a Cabinet Minister. While his hon. friend opposite had a choice among those who usually supported his Government, and had confidence in it, he thought it unreasonable that the doubtful honour should be conferred under those circumstances. He could have understood the elevation of the President of the Council to the Upper House. They had an English precedent for that. The Earl of Beaconsfield was a Cabinet Minister, and in ascending to the House of Lords he was receiving a reward for his long service in the House of Commons, besides which he was at the head of the Cabinet.

Mr. BLAKE: What about Mr. Chapais' case?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Mr. Chapais was a Senator before he was a Minister.

Mr. BLAKE: There was a voided election for Kamouraska, and you sent him up there while you kept Kamouraska unrepresented.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Then he was not a member of this House. He was quite sure the late Government did not give a double honour to a member of this House. Rumour had it that the President of the Council was going to the Upper House, and although they would all regret to have that gentleman leave them, they must consider the exigencies of public life and the fact that the Premier would have been acting according to precedent in sending the President of the Council to a body of which that hon. gentleman was previously a member, and from which he descended amidst the general regret of those he left. But if rumour were correct, the President of the Council refused to go to the Upper House. He, no doubt, felt bound to sacrifice himself for the benefit of his Party. He, as the able and trusted leader of the French Canadian Liberals, felt that he ought not to sacrifice his friends in this House and in this country, and leave the Rouge party without a leader, through allowing himself to be benefited personally by being sent to the Upper House. It was said that the hon. gentleman had, with his usual disinterestedness, sacrificed himself twice over, first in not going to the Senate, and next in not becoming the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec. Such instances of disinterestedness were very few, and he complimented his hon. friend on it. No doubt his hon. friend the Premier was wise in strengthening his hands in this House and in the country by keeping here at the head of the Ministerial supporters from the Province of Quebec his hon. friend the President of the Council.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Mr. CAUCHON said the hon. member had been trying to be witty as usual, but if he had consented to serve under him, he should still be found very useful, as he was for a long time before. He defied any hon. member to say he had ever asked for any situation of any kind.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I did not say so.

Mr. CAUCHON said some had done so, as the House was aware, and some had done something else, which he would not characterize.

Mr. POPE, (Queen's, P.E.I.) asked the indulgence of the House while he said a few words in reference to the Province of which he was one of the representatives. Before the present Government was formed, the first session after Prince Edward Island became part of the Dominion, a seat in the Cabinet was offered to Mr. Laird as one of the representatives of that Province. Since then Mr. Laird had been appointed Lieutenant-Governor of the North-West, and the seat he had held had been filled by a gentleman from Ontario, and Prince Edward Island left without a seat in the Cabinet, which the people of that Province thought was depriving them of a great advantage to which they were entitled. Soon after Mr. Laird was promoted to the Lieutenant-Governorship of the North-West and just previous to the election to fill the place thus left vacant, it was rumoured in Prince Edward Island that the seat was not to be given to any member from Prince Edward Island, and consequently there was a good deal of dissatisfaction there. To allay that, the Dominion law agent publicly stated there that it was not the intention of the present administration to deprive Prince Edward Island of its seat in the Cabinet, but that on the other hand if the electors of Queen's County would return a good man to support the Government and fill that position, the seat in the Cabinet would still be given to that Province. A day or two after this statement was made, the seat in the Cabinet was filled by the present Minister of the Interior. A few days later another vacancy occurred in the Cabinet by the retirement of Mr. Geoffrion, and the law agent again made a statement to the effect that there was another vacancy in the Cabinet, and if they would only return Mr. Welsh to support the Administration that seat would be given to Prince Edward Island. The people thought, however, that Quebec would hardly give up the seat, and did not place much credence in that promise. At another large meeting it was stated that the reason why the seat in the Cabinet belonging to Prince Edward Island was filled by the present Minister of the Interior was, that the work of that Department was very much behind, and the gentleman who had been appointed to it was placed there because of his great legal knowledge and his high standing as a lawyer. He (Mr. Pope) would like to ask the hon. First Minister why a seat was given to Prince Edward Island in the first place. Mr. Laird, against whom he had nothing to say, was appointed to that position not in consequence of anything that was known of him. He had been two sessions, he believed, a member of the local legislature, and about six months a member of the local Government.

He was almost unknown in public life, and his opinion was that the Government did not first nominate Mr. Laird, but accepted his nomination at the hands of the four members for Prince Edward Island, who agreed to aid them in turning the late Government out of power on condition that they should be permitted to name their own representative in the new Cabinet. If this appointment was not made because of Mr. Laird's ability, and he had heard it stated by the hon. member for King's, who, in his position, as a public man stood far higher than Mr. Laird, that he might have had the seat in the Cabinet, if he had chosen, but had nominated Mr. Laird instead—it must have been made because Prince Edward Island was entitled to a seat in the Cabinet, or because a bargain was made, and he had heard the hon. member for King's state at a public meeting that the only stipulation the Island members made, was, that they should have a seat in the Cabinet in return for their support. Those hon. gentlemen certainly deserved to be fairly dealt with, because they had given a faithful and loyal support to the Government ever since, and if the present Administration did make this bargain, he would like to see them carry it out. If the promise was made that Prince Edward Island should have a representative in the Cabinet on the condition stated, it was surely understood that representative should continue during the present Administration. If the representatives from the Island sold themselves for a seat in the Cabinet, let them have the seat. If a seat were taken from Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, it would still have one left, and Ontario would have four left if it lost one, but Prince Edward Island was now left without any. He held that Prince Edward Island had not received that justice from the hands of the Government which it was entitled to, the more particularly in view of the fact that it had sent six members to the House to support the present Administration.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that it was not a convenient time to discuss the question whether it was necessary that every Province should have a representative in the Cabinet or not. It was too late in the day for an hon. gentleman to come forward, three years after the general election, and discuss proceedings consequent upon the action of the Government in 1873. It was, to say the least, unusual in that quarter of Canada, whatever it might be in the Province in which the hon. member resided. He had merely to say with regard to the hon. gentleman's observations:—First, that the Government has no legal agent in Prince Edward Island, and, second, that no such transaction or conversation ever occurred between himself and Mr. Laird as that to which the hon. member for Queen's County had referred. He gave the statement a flat contradiction; nor did it occur with any gentleman of any Province in the Dominion. He would scorn to be a party to such a transaction as the hon. gentleman insinuated; and he was amazed that the hon. gentleman had such a low opinion of public men as to think any of them would be guilty of it. The hon. gentleman had said that Mr. Laird was a man of no ability, and so if he had sold himself, the price should be paid. That hon. member might get his own price when he sold himself. Let him leave other people alone. Such had, no doubt, been his practice when selling himself.

Mr. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.): It has been offered to me, but I would not take it.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that with regard to Mr. Laird, it was bad taste for the hon. member to attack a gentleman who was not present to defend himself. The hon. member's own leader had spoken five minutes before of Mr. Laird's supereminent ability, and even went so far as to imply that his successor would scarcely worthily fill his place for a long time to come; but the hon. member for Queen's had declared Mr. Laird to be a man of no ability, who could not have been chosen for a seat in the Cabinet for his ability, and must therefore have been chosen for some other reason. Mr. Laird was, however, chosen for his ability. He had proved his ability by the manner in which he had discharged his duties here, and he would prove it in the discharge of his duties in the North-West.

Mr. MACKENZIE.

Mr. MASSON said the hon. leader of the Government had scorned the idea of any inducement having been given to any member of the House on the hon. gentleman's accession to office in 1873. While the hon. gentleman himself might not be aware of the fact, hon. members on his side of the House knew what means were resorted to in order to obtain votes on that day. He (Mr. Masson) knew those means personally; and he had never said it till this moment that he was approached, at that time and offered a front seat on the Government side of the House if he would only turn his back on Sir John A. Macdonald. He did not say that the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government made the offer or that he would do such an act; but the offer was made. The same offer might have been made to others besides himself. He would briefly examine the explanations given by the Premier regarding Ministerial changes. The explanation was very good so far as it went; but the hon. First Minister must not forget that rumours were circulating in the Province of Quebec to the effect that more than one gentleman had been offered a seat in the Cabinet and more than one had refused. The rumour went that certain most extraordinary reasons were given by gentlemen who now sat in this House for refusing a seat in the Cabinet. The statement in regard to the offer of the seat to Mr. Joly, and to that gentleman declining it, was made in such a way as to lead the House to believe that no similar offer was made to any other gentleman.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Hear, hear.

Mr. MASSON said he was glad to hear that such was the fact. It would be, therefore, desirable that the report of a Cabinet seat having been offered to others should be denied, and they should know if the hon. head of the Government went freely and openly to Mr. Joly and offered him the seat, and offered it to no one else, and that no gentleman was placed in the position of refusing it because the President of the Council is a member of the Cabinet. It was, then, a fact that no member of the Liberal party had given as his reason for refusing to accept a Cabinet seat, that he would not sit with the President of the Council, and that none could, therefore, take credit for having done so. Up to the present moment there had been some doubt in Quebec as to the status of that hon. gentleman, in the Government. Those hon. members who read the newspapers of the Province of Quebec, would be aware that the whole Liberal party at one time proclaimed that the President of the Council was not the leader of the Liberal party in that Province; that the administration was not that of Mackenzie-Cauchon, but of Mackenzie-Geoffrion. It was afterwards decided that a reconstruction of the Administration should take place, and that the member for Vercheres on account of ill-health should resign his seat in the Cabinet. His successor was the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, and it was thereupon heralded all over the Province of Quebec, that at last the old Liberal party had found its leader in the person of the hon. Member for Jacques Cartier. That report was allowed to go to the public, and the Conservative party had no reason to controvert the assertion that the Liberal party would not accept the President of the Council as its leader. He (Mr. Masson) would relate an incident to show the struggle which the President of the Council had had to obtain the position he occupies to-day. He met the Minister of Inland Revenue at St. Laurent and discussed the public questions, and in the presence of that Minister—and this showed the want of harmony in the present Government—the President of the Council was most disgracefully abused by a leading member of the Liberal party in the Province of Quebec. The President of the Council himself knew that on this occasion a young gentleman of talent and an ornament to his party, who was a member of the House a few years ago, said, in reply to the charge of inconsistency brought against the Liberal party by him (Mr. Masson) that it was mistake and a shame for the Liberal party to have accepted Mr. Cauchon, but he washed his hands of the affair.

Mr. LAFLAMME: Where was that?

Mr. MASSON: At St. Laurent.

Mr. LAFLAMME: I never heard any such statement made by Mr. Fabre.

Mr. MASSON: It was made by Mr. Mercier.

Mr. LAFLAMME: Nor by Mr. Mercier.

Mr. MASSON said the statement was made in the presence of three thousand people, and had been repeated at every corner. There was now no doubt, whether the Liberals liked it or no, that the Government was the Mackenzie-Cauchon administration. It had been said in Quebec that they would soon see the President of the Council leaving his seat alongside of the Premier and Mr. Laflamme taking his place as the leader of the Liberal party of Quebec, but the President of the Council still occupied the front place on the Government side of the House, to which his ability and experience entitled him. He (Mr. Masson) did not know which to admire most, the stubborn persistence with which the Premier imposed upon the Liberal party of the Province of Quebec, leaders whom they disliked, or the meekness with which the party received the lash whenever it was applied. They knew that the Liberal party of that Province did not accept the present Postmaster-General; proof was afforded last session that he did not represent the feeling of either the English or French population. They knew, too, that the Minister of Inland Revenue had been imposed on the Liberal party of Quebec, that, notwithstanding his talents, he did not represent the ideas, principles, call them, if you please, prejudices of the French population of Lower Canada. They knew, moreover, that the nomination of the gentleman who sat in the other Chamber did not meet with the approval of the Liberal party of the Province of Quebec, and he (Mr. Masson) must admit that he could not understand why, unless it was because was the candidate of the President of the Council. He must disagree with the right hon. member for Kingston, who stated that the President of the Council could not obtain a Governorship, which he denied. That hon. gentleman had not been appointed to a Governorship, because the Liberal party required him as their leader; because they wanted him to be the successor to Mr. Dorion. It was, indeed, a proud day for the President of the Council—the born enemy of the Grits—when he could tell those whom he formerly called the “Radicals of Ontario:” “Do what you choose; revile me as you choose—this is the Mackenzie-Cauchon Administration, and you must submit to it.” It was a proud day for the President of the Council when he could turn round to the Liberal party of Quebec, who had vilified and abused him in every corner, and tell them: “Say what you will, I am your leader to-day; Mr. Mackenzie has chosen me to sit on his right hand, and to be leader of the great Liberal party of Quebec.” But if it was a proud day for that hon. gentleman, what must it be for the Liberal party of Quebec? They had received in their ranks a man, a gentleman, whom they had considered among the Conservative party the one least worthy to sit in this House. They had taken from the Conservative ranks the person whom they most belittled while a member of it, and placed him at the head of the Liberal party of the Province of Quebec. The hon. the Premier, had taken a grave responsibility upon himself in admitting the President of the Council to divide the authority with him, as it would remain as a fact in the history of this country that the man who had been considered least worthy of all the Conservatives, had been deemed worthy of being made the leader of Quebec Liberals. It would prove a lesson to the people for future generations, even to the Liberals, who in past days had spoken of the corruption of the present President of the Council. The Conservatives were now able more than ever to reply that they had no right to preach political morality and pretend to uphold its standard. There was a rumour in the wind that before long the President of the Council would pass away and become Governor of Manitoba, or occupy some other position. But the deed was done for ever; whatever may be their future action, they could not get rid of the awkward situation in which they had placed themselves, and why should they get rid of him. The Liberal party would never forget that he was the most able man among themselves; that he has sometimes been useful to them; that they got out of a scrape on the school question two years ago by his ability. The Conservative party could only congratulate themselves upon the action of the Liberal party of the Province of Quebec for having whitewashed them, as the latter had done. There was no accusation which the Liberals could now bring against them, since the former has taken from the Conservatives the one who, according to themselves, was the blackest among the Conservatives, but whom they had nevertheless thought worthy of being placed over them as their leader.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he had no doubt the Liberals of Quebec could manage their own affairs without the interference of his hon. friend. That hon. gentleman, however, had shown his extreme interest in something in the last words he had uttered. He had congratulated the Conservative party on certain events which had taken place, because he said that would whitewash his friends. They must be very black and in need of paint or whitewash when the hon. gentleman attempted to put it on that ground. He had no doubt that hon. gentlemen opposite required to be cleansed as much as possible, and if there were no means of doing it except by the application of the caustic lime, it must be done. If the hon. gentleman considered that anything the Government had done had contributed towards that end, he (Mr. Mackenzie) would be glad to accommodate him still further in facilitating so laudable a purpose. The hon. gentleman said he had been offered a position in the Cabinet, though he admitted not by him (Mr. Mackenzie). He was sure he never offered such a thing to the hon. gentleman, and never dreamed he had a desire for a position in a Liberal Cabinet. There were certainly many gentlemen in this House who would be more entitled to be offered a position by the leader of a Liberal Government than his hon. friend—not, perhaps, on the ground of ability, for he was a very able man, though, even in that particular, they might be his equals. The hon. gentleman must deal with those who had been playing jokes upon him. He (Mr. Mackenzie) washed his hands of it.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said the hon. member for Terrebonne seemed to think that there was a better day coming for the Conservative party in the Province of Quebec that circumstances had occurred which led him and his friends to believe they would recover from the disasters which befell them three years ago. The hon. gentleman rejoiced that there was a chance that Reformers might be corrupt, and seemed to think that by-and-bye they would be able to travel the road which his party had trod; and in that direction only he seemed to see the dawn of light and hope. He hoped that by following the course of his party in corruption and inconsistency, the present Government might meet the fate their predecessors met, and so well deserved. He joined the hon. gentleman in the hope that when the Reform party in the Province of Quebec, or in the Dominion of Canada, or any party, commenced to follow the course which he had indicated, they would meet the fate which befell the hon. gentleman and his friends. The hon. gentleman and his friends had in the past been fond of laughing at the Liberal party of Quebec, which had been a small party at one time, but he could not now count the members of that party on his fingers. The Liberal party, so long unpopular and misunderstood in the Province of Quebec, to-day reckoned among its ranks able and liberal men. The tide of public opinion was nowhere so strengthening in favour of the Liberal party as in the Province of Quebec. As far as he (Mr. Huntington) was concerned, he represented at least an individual who had never been so fooled as to believe that his adversaries desired him to enter a Cabinet with them.

House adjourned at Ten minutes to
Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, 13th Feb., 1877.

The Speaker took the chair at Three o'clock.

BOUNTY ON COAL.

PETITION.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) presented the petition of Henry Mitchell, and others, coal owners, and others interested in the coal trade and shipping interests of the Dominion, praying that the duties imposed by the United States on Canadian coal, may be neutralized by an equal bounty on all coal sent to the United States; or that a duty of 50 cents per ton be imposed on all coal imported into the Dominion, —which was read.

REPORT.

Mr. HUNTINGTON laid before the House,—Report of the Postmaster General, for the year ended 30th June, 1876.

OFFICIAL REPORTING OF THE DEBATES.

MOTION AND REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex), with leave of the House, moved:

“That the Select Committee appointed to consider what arrangements can be made for securing an Official Report of the Debates of this House during the present Session, have power to Report from time to time.”

Motion agreed to.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex) presented the first Report of the said Committee, which was read.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

Mr. MACKENZIE presented the Report of the Special Committee appointed to prepare and report lists of members to compose the Select Standing Committees of this House,—which was read.

Mr. MACKENZIE moved concurrence in the said Report so far as relates to the Committee on Standing Orders.

Motion agreed to and Report concurred in, so far as relates to the Committee on Standing Orders.

OFFICIAL REPORTING OF THE DEBATES.

CONCURRENCE IN COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex) moved concurrence in the first Report of the Select Committee appointed to consider what arrangements can be made for securing an Official Report of the Debates of this House during the present Session.

Mr. HOLTON said he did not propose to object to the adoption of this Report on the point of form to-day, as he had felt justified in doing on the last day of last Session, because the benches were now full, and the obvious sense of the House was in favour of continuing a system of reports. Personally he was in favour of it also, and he had no doubt the discussions that had taken place would lead the Committee to remedy some of the more practical defects which were complained of last Session. Of course the motion was open precisely to the same objection which was taken last year if any hon. member chose to insist on it, and to the further objection that, as it involved an expenditure of money, it should originate in Committee of the Whole. He was, however, willing that the whole matter should be submitted to the Committee chosen yesterday by the House, in order that the system might be resumed at the earliest possible moment.

Motion agreed to, and report concluded in.

MANAGEMENT OF THE LIBRARY.

COMMITTEE APPOINTED.

Resolved, That a Select Committee be appointed, to assist Mr. Speaker in the direction of the Library of Parliament so far as the interests of this House are concerned, and to act as Members of a Joint Committee of both Houses on the Library; composed of Messrs. Baby, Blanchet, Brouse, Cartwright, Cauchon, Delorme, Frechette, Higinbotham, Holton, Laurier, Sir John A. Macdonald, Masson, Mills, Tupper, Wright (Ottawa), and Young.

ADJOURNMENT FOR ASH WEDNESDAY.

RESOLUTION.

Resolved, That when this House adjourns this day, it do stand adjourned until Thursday next.

Mr. MACKENZIE.

MR. JUSTICE LORANGER.

PRINTING OF PETITIONS ORDERED.

Mr. BLAKE said the House would have observed that his hon. friend from Iberville had a motion on the paper relating to a petition presented last Session relating to the administration of justice in the District of Richelieu. The hon. member for that District had also presented a petition from the learned Judge whose conduct came in question. He (Mr. Blake) thought it would be proper that the House should have the opportunity of reading the allegations before the motion of his hon. friend was disposed of. He therefore moved:—

“That the Petition of F. X. A. Biron and others, concerning the administration of justice in the District of Richelieu, and the Petition of Mr. Justice Loranger relating thereto, be printed in the Votes and Proceedings.”

Motion agreed to.

REPEAL OR AMENDMENT OF THE INSOLVENT ACT.

QUESTION.

Mr. ROSS (East Durham) asked if it was the intention of the Government to repeal the Insolvent Act or to amend the same during the present session, to make it more satisfactory to the country.

Mr. BLAKE: It is not the intention of the Government to propose any measure for the repeal of the Insolvency Act. The question whether any amendments should be proposed to the present measure is under consideration.

PIERS AT BAY ST. PAUL, EBOULEMENTS AND MALBAIE.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. LANGEVIN moved for a copy of Mr. Kingsford's report on the Piers at Bay St. Paul, Eboulements and Malbaie, in the summer of 1876.

Motion agreed to.

REDUCTION OF PETROLEUM DUTIES.

RESOLUTION PROPOSED.

Mr. COLBY moved:

"That in the opinion of this House, the interests of the country would be promoted by a reduction of the duties on refined petroleum."

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: The House will recollect that, on the occasion of the debate last Session, the Government promised to take this measure into consideration, and I therefore ask my hon. friend to withdraw his motion for the present, promising him, that, if, after the Budget is delivered, he finds reason to dissent from the views expressed by the Government, he shall have every opportunity of bringing the subject forward again.

Mr. COLBY: With the understanding intended to be conveyed by the hon. the Minister of Finance, more forcibly, perhaps, by implication than in words, I have no objection to allow the matter to stand for the present.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

DAILY PRAYERS IN THE HOUSE.

COMMITTEE APPOINTED.

Order for resuming the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Macdonald, (Toronto): "That it be an Order of the House, that each day and immediately after the Speaker shall have taken the Chair at three o'clock in the afternoon, the prayers now read daily in the Senate be read in this Chamber, by such Chaplain as the Speaker may appoint for that purpose, and in his absence by the Clerk of the House," read.

Mr. MACDONALD (Toronto) moved:—

"That Messrs. Macdonald (Toronto), McCraney, Gibbs (South Ontario), Wood, Blackburn, Goudge, Casgrain, Desjardins, McDonald (Cape Breton), Ryan, Carmichael, Platt and Wright (Ottawa County), be a Committee to bring before this House a form of prayer."

Mr. HOLTON said the hon. member for Centre Toronto did not appear to have the same idea as some other hon. members with regard to the understanding come to by the House yesterday, which was that the whole question of the expediency of introducing the practice he suggested, and also to submit to the House, if it were deemed expedient, what that hon. member proposed in his present motion. The real point involved in yesterday's debate was the practicability of introducing the practice without doing violence to the feelings of a considerable number of hon. members. He therefore hoped the hon. member for Centre Toronto would so frame his motion as to meet what was the general understanding of the House, viz., to refer the subject-matter itself to a Committee to be reported upon.

Mr. DYMOND said there might be devotional exercises without any form of prayer being used. There was silent and individual prayer, which was the best of all prayer, and it was possible that the House might come to the conclusion to adopt that very simple form of devotional exercise instead of having a form of prayer read. As one who respected the motives of the hon. member for Centre Toronto, he hoped anything like an instruction to the Committee to recommend a form of prayer would be omitted from the motion.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn, and Order discharged.

Mr. MACDONALD (Toronto) moved:—

"That a Special Committee be appointed to consider and report upon the desirability of using a form of prayer in this Chamber; to be composed of Messrs. Macdonald, (Toronto), McCraney, Gibbs, (South Ontario), Wood, Blackburn, Goudge, Casgrain, Desjardins, McDonald (Cape Breton), Ryan, Carmichael, Platt and Wright (Ottawa County)."

Mr. MITCHELL said he understood the adoption of that motion would not bind the House to have a form of prayer.

Mr. DECOSMOS said he was prepared to submit an amendment, that this House is of opinion that it is not desirable to have prayers. The Province of British Columbia had one of the best school systems on the continent, a non-sectarian school system, under which the Bible was not allowed to be read in the public schools, lest it should interfere with the prejudices of Catholics or Jews. There was no more necessity to have prayers in this House to do the legislation of the country than to have prayers in dry goods stores in Toronto to sell goods. He regretted to observe so much delicacy on the part of hon. members in dealing with the question contained in the motion. Hon. members really desired to push the subject out of the House, while the hon. member for Centre Toronto wished to press it on the House, contrary to the wishes of its members.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at Five o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, 15th Feb., 1877.

The Speaker took the chair at Three o'clock.

PETITIONS INVOLVING EXPENDITURE.

SPEAKER'S RULINGS.

Motion being made, "That the petition of Henry Mitchell and others, coal owners, and others interested in the coal trade and shipping interests of the Dominion, praying that the duties imposed by the United States on Canadian coal may be neutralized by an equal bounty on all coal sent to the United States; or that a duty of 50 cents per ton be imposed on all coal imported into the Dominion, be now received";

Mr. SPEAKER decided: That as the prayer of this petition involves a public charge, it cannot be received.

Motion being made, "That the petition of R. M. Rolph, and others, ex-Staff Sergeants of the Provisional Battalion of Infantry, at Fort Osborne, Manitoba, setting forth certain grievances, and praying for six months' pay, and other compensation, be now received";

Mr. SPEAKER decided: That as the granting of the prayer of this petition would involve the expenditure of public money, it cannot be received.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES.

SECOND REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex) presented the second Report of the Select Committee appointed to consider what arrangements can be made for securing an

Mr. DeCosmos.

Official Report of the Debates of the House, which was read, together with the report of the sub-committee, there-to appended.

Mr. SPEAKER: When members desire the report of a sub-committee to be read, it should be incorporated in the report of the Committee and made a part of it. It is not desirable otherwise that reports of sub-committees should be read.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex), with leave of the House, moved concurrence in the Report.

Motion agreed to and Report concurred in.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 3) respecting Procedure and Evidence in criminal cases. Mr. Irving.

Bill (No. 4) to repeal the Act 37 Victoria, Chapter 49, intituled: "An Act to authorize Corporations and institutions incorporated, without the limits of Canada, to lend and invest moneys therein." Mr. Blain.

Bill (No. 5) to amend the Act relating to Criminal Procedure, by allowing persons charged with crime, to give evidence as witnesses for the defence. Mr. Dymond.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

LISTS CONCURRED IN.

Mr. MACKENZIE moved concurrence in the Report of the Select Committee to prepare and report lists of members to compose the Select Standing Committees of this House, in so far as it relates to the following Committees, viz.:—On Privileges and Elections; on Expiring Laws; on Railways, Canals, and Telegraph Lines; on Miscellaneous Private Bills; on Printing; on Public Accounts; on Banking and Commerce; and on Immigration and Colonization.

Motion agreed to and Report concurred in.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING.

MESSAGE SENT TO SENATE.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex) moved:

"That a Message be sent to the Senate, requesting that they will unite with this House in the formation of a Joint Committee of both Houses on the subject of the printing of Parliament; and informing their Honours that the members of the Select Standing Committee on Printing, viz.:—Messrs. Bourassa, Bowell, Charlton, Church, Delorme, Desjardins, De Veber, Goudge, Lanthier, Ross (Middlesex), Ross (Prince Edward), Stephenson, Thompson, (Haldimaid), Trow, and Wallace (Norfolk), will act as members of the said Joint Committee on Printing."

Motion agreed to.

PALMER'S POINT.

QUESTION.

Mr. DOMVILLE asked whether it was the intention of the Government to erect a lighthouse at Palmer's Point, on the St. John River, in the vicinity of the wharf.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland): I beg to inform my hon. friend that the Government have not decided to build a lighthouse at the place named.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

QUESTION.

Mr. SINCLAIR asked whether the Government had taken any steps for finding out and establishing the most safe, speedy and practicable route for keeping up regular communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland during winter, and if not, was it their intention to do so before the opening of navigation.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland): I beg to assure my hon. friend that the Government are getting information on this subject from day to day, having a steamer there at the present time. As to further steps the Government may take, I am not just now prepared to say, beyond mentioning the fact that we are endeavouring to ascertain the best practicable route.

NATURALIZED ALIENS.

QUESTION.

Mr. TROW, in the absence of Mr. YOUNG, asked whether any further despatches had been received from the Imperial Government touching the recognition of naturalized aliens as British subjects in foreign countries, and if so, would they be laid before Parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I believe that no further despatches on that subject are in the possession of the Government.

GEORGIAN BAY BRANCH.

QUESTION.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew) asked whether the Government had, since the sixth day of March last, entered into any contract or contracts for the construction of the Georgian Bay Branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and if so, whether such contract or contracts would be laid before Parliament during the present session.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No such contract has been entered into.

THE RIVER SYDENHAM.

Mr. STEPHENSON asked whether it was the intention of the Government to place a sum in the Estimates for the improvement of the navigation of the River Sydenham, in the Counties of Kent and Lambton and the Electoral Division of Bothwell, to be expended during the present year.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The practice of asking what will be in the Estimates is, I think, both inconvenient and irregular. The Estimates, I hope, will be on the table within two days at the farthest, and then my hon. friend will see what is to be done.

TELEGRAPH LINE ON VAN- COUVER ISLAND.

QUESTION.

Mr. DECOSMOS asked whether the Government proposed to grant a subsidy to aid in the construction of a telegraph line between Victoria and Nanaimo, if so, what was the amount of the proposed subsidy.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The Government has not considered that question.

PACIFIC RAILWAY SURVEYS.

QUESTION.

Mr. DECOSMOS asked whether the Government proposed to lay before this House, during this session, a progress report of the surveys of the Canadian Pacific Railway up to December, 1876; if so, when.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That report has been before the House for five days.

BOUNDARY LINE OF ALASKA.

QUESTION.

Mr. DECOSMOS asked whether any arrangements had been made with the Government of the United States for defining the boundary line between Alaska and British Columbia; also whether any correspondence had passed, since last Session of Parliament, between the Government of the Dominion and that of the United States, respecting the said boundary.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes, a good deal of correspondence has passed; some of very recent date, but it is not in the public interest that the correspondence should be brought down at the present time. I can assure the hon. member that the subject has been attended to as closely as possible by the Government.

WELLAND CANAL WORKS.

QUESTION.

Mr. NORRIS asked whether it was the intention of the Government to draw the water out of the Welland Canal next winter for the purpose of completing some work on said canal, or if any method could be devised to do this work without drawing off the water.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is the intention of the Government to draw off the water next winter, and we know of no plan that would obviate the inconvenience which some parties must more or less suffer.

TAMPERING WITH REGISTERED LETTERS.

QUESTION.

Mr. LITTLE asked whether the Postmaster-General intended making such arrangements as would further prevent registered letters being tampered with; and, if loss were sustained by the sender of such a letter, whether compensation would be allowed by the Post Office Department.

Mr. HUNTINGTON: The Department has no knowledge of more than one case which has occurred for which the Department is responsible in the manner indicated, and there is at present no intention to change the existing arrangements. The Department has no power in law to compensate any such party.

SALT INTERESTS.

QUESTION.

Mr. FARROW asked whether it was the intention of the Government, this Session, to give any relief to the struggling salt interests of this country by putting on small duty on salt (as was put on slate last year) coming from the United States into Canada.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: The intention of the Government on this subject will, I hope, be announced in a few days in connection with similar subjects. The hon. gentleman is in error in supposing a duty was imposed on slate last year. It could not be done by the Government, and no alteration was made in the tariff last year.

MAILS ON THE CANADA SOUTHERN RAILWAY.

QUESTION.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD, in the absence of Mr. ORTON, asked whether it was the intention of the Government to place a mail on the Saint Clair Branch of the Canada Southern Railway, the coming spring; and if not, why not.

Mr. HUNTINGTON: The subject, which has been pressed on the attention of the Government by the hon. member for Elgin, is still under consideration.

SECRET SERVICE FUND.

EXPLANATIONS.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish, Mr. Speaker, to make a few remarks on a matter personal to myself. I suppose most of the members in this House have read the Ottawa correspondence of the Globe of Tuesday last, referring to an entry in the Public Accounts by which it appears that $25,579.04 were paid by me—refunded or repaid by me—into the Public Treassurely from the Secret Service Fund. I am not at all surprised that this entry should cause enquiry, and the tone of the enquiry I am sufficiently acquainted with politics not to care much for. The communication savoured rather of an attack upon myself, and made it appear rather as if I had taken so much out of the Treasury, instead of putting so much into it. The suggestion in the article apparently is that this sum of money had been for two years in my hands; that I had used it—God knows how!—none could know; and that under gentle pressure or the prick of my conscience, I had restored it to the Treasury. I have only to say, Mr. Speaker, in the first place, that not one farthing of that money was ever in my hands. A few years ago, in consequence of the troubles in the United States, which caused corresponding troubles on our frontier, the House placed at the disposal of the Government of the day a sum of money commonly called Secret Service money, to be used in the exigency of that time, and that grant was subsequently repeated. In the course to be adopted by the Government in a matter of that kind, requiring so much caution and secrecy in order to secure safety to the person from whom the Government wished to derive information, the delicacy of the matter was such that the practice of the Government, from the beginning to the end, was to appoint a committee of leading members of the Government to attend to it. Whenever this sub-committee asked for a sum for their purposes under requisition, the sum was carried to their credit, a special account was kept in the Bank of Montreal for that purpose, and the Council, as a whole, entrusted to that sub-committee the management of that fund. At the time the last vote was granted, the sub-committee consisted of Sir George Cartier, Mr. Alexander Morris, Sir Francis Hincks, and myself. By degrees, as the House is aware, I was left the survivor. Sir George Cartier died, Mr. Morris went to the North-West, and Sir Francis Hincks left the Government. At the time the late Government resigned, there was remaining of that fund the sum of $32,179, lying at the credit of the sub-committee. It may be asked why such a large sum of money was in charge of the sub-committee. The reason was simply this. There were large claims set up—some of them most preposterous claims—by parties who thought they had earned the money and had done the State great service in time of exigency, and it was not known exactly what these claims would amount to. The time was approaching when the sum of money in the Treasury would lapse; the Government did not desire to come to the House and ask for a new vote of Secret Service money; the amount of claims was very considerable but unascertained, and in order to prevent it lapsing, the balance was transferred to this committee which I have mentioned, and they settled the claims from time to time, as best they could. At last, at the time the Government resigned, I was the only remaining member of the sub-committee, and there was left a sum of $32,179. The matter stood over for some time, as I expected to hear a good deal about the claims. I knew there was $6,600 of claims that, beyond doubt, must be paid, because in one case one of my colleagues had paid the money out of his own pocket; and in another, my colleague had pledged his personal honour and his legal liability to pay the amount. These claims had not been adjusted, and were allowed to stand over until, in November, 1875, I was down here in Ottawa on private business, settling my own private affairs in this city, as I had gone to live in Toronto, and I thought I had better close this also. I was not up exactly to the correct mode of doing it, so I went to the Auditor-General, and asked the best mode of doing it. I said I should wish to retain $6,600 to meet the two claims I have mentioned, which would leave $25,579, the sum mentioned in the Estimates, which I wished to refund. I made up my mind that all other claims, all just claims, had been pretty well quit and settled, and that I could pay it over; and I had no doubt that if any other just claim came up, with the consent of the party, I could confidentially go to the present head of the Government and state it. I therefore thought the time had come when the money should be paid over. This money lay in the Bank of Montreal as a special fund to be drawn upon by this sub-committee. It was never touched by me in any way whatever from the time we resigned until I gave two cheques drawing on the special account which stood there in my name as the surviving member of the Committee—one cheque in favour of the Receiver-General, and another to myself for the purpose of reimbursing my two colleagues. No portion of this money was ever in my hands, no portion was ever in my pocket. I paid it over in the manner I have mentioned, and that is the whole story. This communication in the Globe, among other things, alludes to the fact that I had, before the Public Accounts Committee, refused positively to give the names of the individuals receiving money from the fund. I did so before the Committee and also before the House. I stated that to give up the names of parties who had received money would destroy all the object for which the money was granted by Parliament. It was only to be used in cases of exigency. The parties who received it did not even give a receipt. It might be as much as their lives were worth to give a receipt which might be produced, and I hope my hon. friends opposite may never have the troubles we had, and that there may be no more border troubles. If there should, however, be border troubles hereafter—and we saw the other day the effect of the supposition that there was to be a war in the East—the hon. gentlemen may have to apply to Parliament, and they will be able to get no information unless the parties are quite confident that their names will not be given up. There was a resolution passed in the Committee on Public Accounts, stating that all future payments should be submitted to some confidential committee. I stated at the time that I had not the slightest objection for the future, but for the past obligations I could not, I would rather cut off my right hand than, betray who it was who had been employed at a time of great public exigency, and who might be in danger by such disclosure. But, in future, of course I had no objection. No payments, however, have been made of any kind by the Government, or by myself, except for old obligations which were incurred before that resolution was passed. In that same article, there is an allusion made to the sum of money which was claimed by the member for Selkirk. The answer to that, I see, has been given in the newspapers, that I did not think for one it was a sum which could properly be paid out of that fund. It was a sum of money which was advanced by the hon. member for Selkirk, at the suggestion of the Lieut.-Governor of Manitoba, without communication with the Government, at a time of great exigency and urgency, as they thought; and Mr. Archibald, the then Lieut.-Governor, stated that, if the Government repudiated it, he would pay one half, and the member for Selkirk would pay the other half out of their own pockets. I said, on behalf of the Government, I thought we ought not to repudiate an arrangement made in the public interest by a high officer like the Lieut.-Governor of Manitoba. The difficulty I had, was—out of what sum it should be paid. I did not think it should be paid out of this fund, and I was greatly embarrassed, as the House can understand, when they look back on the discussion which took place on all matters connected with the North-West. The embarrassment ceased by our going out. Then the hon. gentleman struck a special committee and I gave my testimony, giving my judgment that, in fairness and honesty, the engagements made by Mr. Archibald should be relieved and the sum paid, and I believe it was. That is all I have to state in reference to matters personal to myself. Other enquiries can be made in the regular way, but I wished to disabuse the minds of the House of any idea that any part of this sum was ever in my possession. It lay in the Bank of Montreal as a special deposit.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The House may, perhaps, reasonably expect a few words from me in reference to this matter, as the vote in the Public Accounts will show this money was deposited to the credit of the Government before the meeting of Parliament last Session. The hon. gentleman opposite will remember that I called his attention to it early in the Session, and informed him of the view I took of the transaction; also, that I pointed out it would be desirable, as I felt, that the matter should be brought at once before the House. But various circumstances, including the hon. gentleman's illness and other matters, prevented our reaching it at a convenient period before the end of the Session. I pointed out to the hon. gentleman, the resolution adopted on the 29th May, 1872, which reads as follows:—

“That, inasmuch as such large sums of money as $75,000 have been voted for Secret Service Money, of which there is no audit, as in the case of other expenditure, this committee is of opinion that an account of all sums hereafter spent for Secret Service should be kept, as in England, in a book specially prepared for the purpose, and that this book should annually be inspected by a confidential committee, of whom two shall be members of the Opposition of the day.”

I considered that this resolution debarred him, or any member of the late Administration, from touching one farthing of that money. I also said that the rule in England was, as I stated on a former occasion, that all such sums should be at once deposited at the end of the year in the same manner as other sums which had not been used for the purposes for which they had been voted. Todd upon this subject says:—

“There is yet another fund, that for ‘Secret Services,’ the disposal of which is in the hands of Government, although the greater part of the amount is annually voted in supply. The vote in supply for this service usually amounts to between thirty and forty thousand pounds. But this does not include the whole amount at the disposal of Government for secret services, on the contrary, the distinction has been uniformly maintained, that while it is proper to come to Parliament to make a general grant for such purposes, it is right that Government should have at their disposal a fixed amount, which is independent of an annual parliamentary vote. Accordingly, the Civil List Act, which is passed upon the accession of the sovereign to the throne, sets apart the sum of ten thousand pounds per annum, which is payable out of the Consolidated Fund for ‘Home Secret Service.’ The annual vote in supply is intended to supplement the deficiency of this grant. The Secretaries of State, and others who may draw upon this fund, are bound by oath not to use any of it for purposes which do not legitimately appertain to their several departments, and the names of all persons receiving Secret Service money, with the sums paid to them, must be entered in a book, in order to be produced in either House of Parliament if required. It is not usual, however, to give information to Parliament in regard to the expenditure out of this fund.”

And hon. gentlemen who may refer to the volume will find the following remarks, with references to various pages of Hansard and other authorities. The mode in which the Secret Service Fund is audited, is described in the Report of the Commissioners of Public Accounts for 1865; and that mode I embodied in the resolution which was passed in the Public Accounts Committee.

“For the year ending March 31st, 1867, the vote was £32,000. This amount has not varied for several years past, but the money is only paid out as required by the Secretary of State. Secret Service expenditure is chiefly incurred by the Foreign office. The balance not required remains in the Treasury, and is surrendered to the Exchequer at the end of the year. Considerable sums have thus been surrendered from time to time.”

Now, Sir, the ground I take, as head of the Government, is the same that I took last year with regard to this matter, when it came before me, viz., that this money should have been paid back to the Receiver-General and Government as soon as the year had elapsed; and, further, that the moment the late Administration went out of office, they ceased to have any control over this or any other vote which Parliament had made; that disbursements of money came necessarily, naturally and constitutionally into the hands of those who succeeded them. I am aware that the hon. gentleman took a different view of it, and the following extract from a well-known speech of his, shows the way the hon. gentleman regarded the matter. He said, with reference to what I had stated regarding the Secret Service Fund:

“This was not the case. Either Mr. Mackenzie had been altogether misinformed, or had said what he knew to be untrue. There were two funds in England—a Special Service Fund and a Secret Service Fund. The expenditure of the Special Service Fund was disclosed to a Committee, but the Secret Service Fund expenditure was never told; and so closely were all the secrets kept in connection with that fund—so closely was it kept under the control of the Ministers, that if the Government were going out of office with £100,000 at their credit in the fund, they would not leave it behind them, but take it with them for their own party purposes in opposition."

Now, Sir, I do not say that one dollar of this money was either kept or used improperly; but I do say that the hon. gentleman had no right, and that no member of his Administration had the right, to pay one dollar of that money after they left office. In accordance with the resolution passed on the 29th of May, 1872, the precise practice which had been followed in England should have been followed here. As the hon. gentleman declined to give me either the names of the persons who received, or inform me of the destination of, this money, I think that, at all events, these expenditures should be entered in a book kept for the purpose, and audited according to the intentions of Parliament, when it would appear in the report of the Public Accounts Committee; this I conceive to be the true course that should be taken. I make these explanations because the Public Accounts will show that the Government were cognizant of the circumstances attending the re-deposit of this money to the credit of the Government; and, if I did not mention the matter at all during last Session, it was simply because I desired to arrive at some understanding with the hon. gentlemen who had been members of the late Administration. I have consequently—and until Parliament met—kept the matter entirely in my own hands, as the hon. gentleman knows, and have not attempted to make any use of it, or of any of the documentary evidence, that has been in our hands with regard to it. It will be, of course, for this House, or its Committees, to adopt any course that it, or they, may see fit to take with relation to the disposal of this $6,000 odd, retained for payment to some person or other, the destination of which, as I have said, the hon. gentleman did not see proper to communicate to his successors in the Government, the only parties who were properly and constitutionally entitled to have anything to do with the spending of such money, or of any portion of it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I don't think the hon. gentleman entered into any long statement to myself.

Mr. MACKENZIE.

The chief conversation I had with my hon. friend was when, after the Session, I called upon him at his own office, and told him, so far as I thought I possibly could do so, what was done with this $6,600. I told him $600 had been actually paid by the hon. member for Cumberland for detective service. My hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie) asked to know the names of the parties paid. As regards $6,000 I told him Senator Campbell had made himself personally responsible to that extent, that he was liable for it, and would have to pay it. I said: "I do not want any after-claps about it." My hon. friend the leader of the Government will remember that.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes, quite well.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I said the amount was not yet paid, but Senator Campbell had made himself liable for it and would have to pay it out of his own pocket if it were not paid to him. I mentioned that to my hon. friend and so we parted. I take it that this matter will come before the Public Accounts Committee, when I shall have no objection to enter into any further details as far as is possible, without giving the names of individuals, which I am quite sure are not asked for in England. With regard to the speech which my hon. friend has quoted I stated the practice at that time as I understood it to be. The practice has varied considerably in England since. In England, if an expenditure of Secret Service money is made, for example, in the Home Office, a statement is given of the nature of the service to which it was devoted, but the names of the parties to whom it was paid are not stated. The same practice prevails in the Foreign Office, where expenditures are made for diplomatic purposes, in order to obtain information, often of great importance, and also in other departments. My object in rising was simply to make a distinct statement of the fact that no portion of the money in question was in my hands at all, that I never used it for any purpose, that it was lying on deposit in the Bank of Montreal on special account, until a cheque was given for its transfer to the Receiver-General.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Of course I quite agree in the correctness of the statement made by the hon. gentleman that Senator Campbell was responsible for the $6,000, or that he had made engagements which would hold him for that amount. There is no dispute about that, nor do I contravert the statement, but I do deny that he can give any authority for the practice which he says exists in England. I have given my authority. We all recognize Mr. Todd as a high authority.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE: There is no question about the facts. The only point of difference between us, at those interviews, was that I did not recognize the right of the hon. gentleman to pay the money at all. I did want, and I think I was entitled from my position, to know the very parties to whom the money was to be paid and the nature of the service for which it was paid. The hon. gentleman chose, though sitting on the Opposition side of the House, to use this money—which ought not to have been in his hands—for purposes of which he constituted himself the sole judge, instead of the constituted authorities of the country doing so.

REPRESENTATION IN PARLIAMENT.

MOTION DROPPED.

Notices of motion called.

Mr. HOLTON: Mr. Devlin has requested me to say, on his behalf, that owing to his absence, he would not ask hon. gentlemen to proceed with his motion for a Select Committee to consider the expediency of providing some system for securing a more equal and just representation of all electors. It must, of course, be dropped, under the order of the House; probably, however, to be renewed at a subsequent period of the Session.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT.

MOTION FOR INSPECTORS' INSTRUCTIONS.

Mr. FLYNN moved for instructions from the Department of Inland Revenue to Inspectors, in connection with the Weights and Measures Act. He said: My object in making this motion is because I believe the instructions issued to Inspectors are not in accordance with the Act. Some time last autumn, the Inspector for the constituency which I represent, came to inspect the weights and measures. Many parties thought they had a right, under the statute, to use the Winchester bushel, but he refused to allow them to do so, unless they could show that a contract existed. I considered it then to be my duty to telegraph to the Department, asking if it were the intention of the Department to enforce the immediate use of the imperial gallon. I received a reply from Mr. Brunel, that the Department had no instructions to enforce the "imperial gallon." He added "the Act points out what is required, and circular 123 explains how that part of the law is to be administered." On looking at it I found that circular 123 said:

"Where you are satisfied that such specific contract is made, and that the parties thereto are desirous to submit the measure to be used in determining quantities under such agreement for verification."

In answer to my telegram as to whether the circular enforced the use of the imperial gallon, except in regard to contracts now existing, and stating that the Inspector refused to verify the old Winchester bushel and the wine gallon, it was stated that this was to be the case unless there was a special contract. Therefore the Government enforces the imperial measure immediately, which in my opinion is contrary to the Act. The Act itself does not interfere with the old Winchester bushel and the wine gallon until 1880. My contention is that the Department should not have issued any circular under this Act. The Inspector had a right, was bound in fact, to verify the old Winchester bushel and the wine gallon. I thought it my duty to bring the matter before the notice of the Department as the circular was contrary to the Act.

Mr. BLANCHET: I am very glad the matter has been brought up, as I have a notice of motion in regard to it. I want to have the names of the Inspectors and of the Sub-Inspectors given in the return. As the notices of motions are very numerous, the motion of my hon. friend might be amended in such a way as to ascertain the names of the Inspectors and the Sub-Inspectors. To save time, I might say that the execution of that circular has caused a great deal of dissatisfaction in my part of the country. I cannot tell who issued the instructions, but they are very unpopular. As the Government announce that the measure will be amended, I hope my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior will amend it in such a way as to give satisfaction to the country.

Mr. POPE (Compton): I want to call the attention of my hon. friend opposite to the great noise the question has occasioned. The requirement is one to which the people ought not to be called upon to submit. It has failed from one end of the country to the other. It does seem to me that much of the difficulty would have been obviated had my hon. friend issued instructions that the country was to be divided into districts for the purpose of verification. As it is now, many parties in my county have to go thirty or forty miles to have their weights and measures verified.

Mr. LAFLAMME: There are districts arranged so as to give a radius of not more than five miles.

Mr. WORKMAN: I hope the Government will introduce an amendment to the measure, because the greatest difficulty has been experienced in carrying out the instructions. It is almost impossible to carry out the provisions of the Act in its present terms. I do not think there was ever any more unpopular measure than that as to the inspection of weights and measures. There was one universal howl against it throughout the country. I do hope that the amendments, as indicated by the Speech from the Throne, will obviate the existing difficulties. During some weeks after it was enforced, I was in constant communication with the heads of the Government and their officers, in reference to the measure, and I must admit that they met the just complaints of the people with the greatest attention, and showed every disposition to abrogate the obnoxious provisions, and announced the intention of the Administration to propose amendments to Parliament.

Mr. BLANCHET.

Mr. ROCHESTER: If the expenses of going thirty or forty miles in the country for verification are proportionate to the expenses of going half a mile in towns, they must be very heavy indeed. Although scales might be as correct as it was possible to make them, they must nevertheless be inspected and branded. They were sent to the Inspector, but all the good effected was the receiving of $6 or $8 by the Inspector. The law as a whole is not a bad law; it is the abuse of the law which is complained of. It is, however, one of the most fertile arrangements which has been prepared for many years, in the way of making positions. I am not speaking in a political sense. Parties in favour of the Government and those opposed to it are crying out against the abuses in connection with the inspection of scales. I prophesied that as soon as the regulations were placed in operation, a cry would be raised against them from one end of the country to the other, as is now the case.

Mr. ROSS (Prince Edward): I agree with the member for Montreal West. It is a very unpopular measure and should be either amended or repealed. The present Government is not altogether to blame, for the measure came originally from the other side of the House.

Mr. GIBBS (North Ontario): I can quite agree with those who say the Weights and Measures Act is not a popular measure, but I am not at all prepared to say that it is not required. It requires some alteration, however. The gentleman who acts as Inspector in my constituency is efficient, and is desirous to discharge his duty properly, but he feels that he is hampered by the Act. The great difficulty in my Riding is that the Inspector has not control of the officer who follows him to make the alterations. There is no scale of charges to guide the individual who performs this work, and it has been complained that the fees have been exceedingly excessive and have given a great deal of trouble. As I understand the Speech from the Throne, this Act will be amended, and I will take this opportunity of suggesting if it would not be well that the expense of altering scales should be borne by the country, and not by those who use or own them. Those who use scales are desirous, for the sake of their own business, that they should be correct. They are not the only persons interested, but the whole country at large is interested. I think it is imposing a very unnecessary expense upon gentlemen in the trade, who are building and using scales, that the whole expense should fall upon them. It is reasonable that the expense of verifying scales should be borne wholly by the country, especially where they are found to be correct. When scales are found to be incorrect, then there might be some excuse for charging for rectifying them; but where scales have been formerly inspected and found to be correct, it seems to be a hardship for the user or owner to be obliged, from time to time, to incur such a large expense. The Inspectors should, moreover, have control of the men who alter the scales. I am satisfied the country demands some amendment in working the Act.

Mr. DAVIES: As yet, this measure is not applied to Prince Edward Island, but I believe it will be applied next year. I can only say it will be most unpopular. The people have been in the custom of using the wine measure, and I don't see any good reason why we should be compelled to use the imperial. We have a large trade with the United States and the West Indies, and there the wine measure is used. The imperial measure, it seems to me, is dying out, and why it should be introduced into the Dominion of Canada, I cannot see. The measure will be most unpopular in the Island, and I hope the Government will reconsider the matter.

Mr. WOOD: The objection I entertain to this Act is the want of uniformity in the action of the Inspectors. The largest scale manufacturers in the Dominion are in Hamilton. That firm has been put to the expense of altering all their patterns because the Inspector will not certify platform scales, the beams of which are marked into tenths instead of sixteenths, the Inspector stating that he has orders from the Commissioner not to certify them. In Toronto, scales are passed which are not subjected to the same condition as those in Hamilton. I wish to convince the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue that the system is not carried out in accordance with the Act. The operation of the Act tends to make the Government unpopular.

Mr. PLUMB: I do not object to the law on the ground urged by the hon. member for Hamilton—that of making the Reform party unpopular. I am glad, however, that this discussion has taken place, as I have often thought of calling the attention of the Government to the matter, and I have often been requested to do so. As this has been done by other hon. gentlemen it is not necessary for me to say anything further, except that I have very great complaints from my part of the country as to the measure. I trust the Government will either amend it or give instructions whereby relief will be given to those who have been subjected to annoyance in connection with its working.

Mr. LAFLAMME: I am much obliged for the observations of hon. members on the law. I have received a number of suggestions in a private manner, and I should be obliged to any hon. member who would convey to me anything which would tend to improve the system.

Motion, as amended, agreed to, as follows:—

Resolved, That an Order of the House do issue to the proper officer, for copies of instructions from the Department of Inland Revenue to Inspectors, in connection with the Weight and Measures Act; together with the names and salaries of each Inspector and Sub-Inspector.

BOUNTY ON COAL.

MOTION TO RECEIVE PETITION.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton): I wish, Mr. Speaker, to make a few remarks on a question of privilege. I consider every member of this House has a right to present a petition, so long as it is couched in proper and respectful language, and so long as it does not ask for any additional burdens on the public. I presented a petition from Henry Mitchell and others, asking that the coal trade of the Dominion of Canada should be taken into consideration by this House, and I understand you have decided that it is not admissible, on the ground that it asks that additional burdens should be imposed on the people. On looking over the petition, I cannot see that it asks for any additional burden to be imposed. The petition is rather in the nature of a remonstrance of those who are interested in the coal trade, to the effect that the policy pursued by the people of the United States, in excluding our coal from their market, while their coal was admitted to our market, was disastrous to the coal trade of the Dominion, and it asked that this House should take the matter into consideration. Yet it does say, certainly, that it would be desirable that a bounty should be allowed on coals shipped from the Dominion; but it places the matter in the alternative, in that a duty might be placed on coals coming into the Dominion from the United States. There is nothing in the petition, in my opinion, which contravenes the regulations of this House. I perceive there are certain instances in which a petition is not received by the House of Commons. It is laid down by May that a petition to the Commons praying directly or indirectly for an advance of the public money, for compounding or relinquishing dues, or the remission of taxes, will only be received if recommended by the Crown. But it does not in any way state that a petition shall not be received which refers to a matter of trade, and which asks that a duty shall be placed upon a foreign article. At any rate, the petition is one which should receive the consideration of this House. I therefore move:

“That the petition of Henry Mitchell and others be received.”

Mr. SPEAKER: I judged of the character of the petition from the endorsement. The hon. gentleman says the duty may be neutralised by an equal bounty on all coal sent to the United States. I don't care to go beyond the hon. gentleman's own statement, and on that statement I rule that the petition should not be received on account of its asking that public moneys should be paid to certain private parties, which, as the hon. gentleman himself admits, would be inadmissible. He suggests that it is merely a remonstrance. This House does not receive remonstrances, but only petitions. But I find it does ask for something:

“We therefore ask, in the interest of free-trade, not of protection, that your hon. House will neutralize this hostile duty of seventy-five cents by giving an equal bounty on all coals sent to the United States.”

Under these circumstances, I cannot change my views with regard to the propriety of receiving this petition. And I doubt the propriety of the mode in which the hon. member seeks to set my decision aside. I think also if he is determined to take that course that it would be better for him to postpone it for a day, in order that I may consult the authorities.

Mr. MACKAY: Mr. Speaker, I bow to your decision. As regards the endorsement, it was not by myself but by officers of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: The rules require that a petition should be endorsed by the hon. member himself.

Mr. MACKAY: It is endorsed, I think, but only to a certain extent. I will let the matter stand until tomorrow, in accordance with your desire.

RECOGNITION OF THE VOLUNTEERS OF 1837-38.

RESOLUTION.

Mr. BROUSE moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

“That some substantial recognition should be given to those loyal Volunteers who defended the British flag during the troubles of 1837 and 1838 in this country. And therefore it is the opinion of this House that an area of the wild lands of the Dominion should be granted them, not less equal in extent to that offered to the immigrant settler.”

He said: An eminent writer once said a wise statesman will legislate for the purpose of promoting loyalty among the subjects. I know no way in which this can be better accomplished than by giving some consideration to loyal acts in the past, in order to encourage the performance of others in the future. All nations are full of precedents of this character, our own among the number. We find in 1775, when the rebellion of the United States was closed, and when the British flag was dishonoured and that of the United States was raised in its place, that some ten thousand men and women, loyal to the British Crown, settled on the banks of the St. Lawrence in our midst. It was felt that some recognition should be given to those loyal people, and a portion of the wild lands were given to them and to their descendants. When our country was invaded in 1812 by a foreign army, to each of the loyal volunteers who came forward and nobly repulsed the enemy, driving them completely from our territory, Parliament granted a portion of the wild lands. That legislation has been supplemented by the present Dominion Government, and no act of the Administration has given greater satisfaction to the people than their application for $50,000 for grants to be given to the veterans of 1812 who so nobly came forward in the defence of their villages and their institutions. About forty years have elapsed since other demonstrations of loyalty were made in this country. I will not refer to the causes of the troubles of 1837-38; suffice it to say, that time and a forgiving public have effaced almost from history the causes of the troubles; but I cannot forget what is due to those loyal men who came forward in defence of their country and suppressed the rebellion. I can, indeed, speak of the incidents as an individual, for some of them occurred in the county which I represent. In the state of New York, not far from the boundary line of the St. Lawrence, a large body of troops were gathered in 1838 for the purpose of invading Canada. They were under the command of a distinguished American officer, and it was known they intended to make their attack in the vicinity of Brockville and Prescott. The vessels of the invaders were driven from the landing places and drifted down stream to Windmill Point, which is well known in connection with Canadian history. A landing was made there by the American troops, who were well armed and disciplined, and, who visited the country, not for a temporary visit, but as invaders; and it was only by the determined loyalty of the people they were driven from the soil. Forty years have passed away, and no substantial recognition has been given to those men for their services. When a foreign flag was placed on Windmill Point, when the best of the dwellings were taken possession of by the invaders, then the loyalty of the people, especially of those on the banks of the St. Lawrence, was manifested. The by-ways were crowded with men, some with arms and some with inferior weapons, coming to repel the invaders. Many of those who came forward at that time to drive the invaders from the soil, came not to return again. Others returned maimed; and shall there be no recognition of their services when the country follows the precedent of having rewarded loyalty in the past? I ask hon. members if it is not the duty of this or any Government to follow the practice followed in the past, and to legislate with a view to promote the loyalty of the people. I am happy to say that in this country it may not be necessary to take such action, because it is only a few years since we had an illustration of the loyalty of the Canadian people. When the sentiment of the British public was declared to be that no person should be taken from the deck of a vessel carrying the British flag, the Canadian people were loyal to the old flag. This Government and preceding Governments have been exceedingly anxious to send emigrant agents to the old European countries to induce emigrants to come and settle in Canada. Those immigrants had not only portions of their passage money paid, but also their expenses, and when they arrived we were anxious to give them a portion of our wild lands for settlement. The object was to preserve the British flag in this country—half of a continent. Shall we be more anxious to reward strangers, to whom we allot a portion of our wild lands, than those who protected the British flag in this country in time of danger? We have in the North-west a vast area of wild lands, and I submit that a portion should be given to each of those loyal men, equal in extent to that offered to an immigrant settler. I believe the grant of a portion of those lands would not impoverish the country, and it would reward the loyalty of those who, forty years ago, repelled an invasion of the country. Therefore, I ask the House to take the action contemplated in my motion, which I submit with a full belief that, if its provisions were carried out, it would be more effective than any other measure in settling the North-west.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is some doubt as to whether a resolution of this kind is strictly in order. True, its adoption would be a mere declaration of opinion on the part of the House, and my recollection of the authorities is that, in such cases, a great degree of latitude is allowed. It certainly would be out of the question that any Bill to give effect to this resolution could be introduced into the House without the assent of the Crown. I am not prepared to rule the motion out of order, but it is for the mover to consider whether he will press the matter further under the circumstances.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I will call the attention of my hon. friend to some facts in connection with the class he alludes to, to which he has not referred. In the first place, it was provided by the Legislature of the old Province of Canada that a pension, not exceeding $30, should be paid to all those who were disabled in consequence of wounds or hardships encountered in the short but somewhat vigorous campaign upon our frontier at that time, and a very large number of pensions are granted under that authority. There was a Board of Physicians appointed, if I recollect aright, in each county, and if they reported that any person had served and was disabled in the service, he became entitled to a pension not exceeding $80. It may, therefore, fairly be presumed that all those who have been disabled have been pensioned in this way. Another matter requires a little attention. That Rebellion was confined to the two Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, lately the Province of Canada. The lands at the disposal of the Dominion Government are the property of the whole Dominion—the new as well as the old Provinces—and it may be doubtful, therefore, whether we should be able to consider the resolution as my hon. friend has proposed it. But no one can doubt the expediency of doing everything that is just and fair and reasonable to encourage the class to whom he alludes. He first brought before the House the case of the old soldiers who had served in the war of 1812-14, and in consequence of his bringing the matter before the House, these old pensioners received a recognition at the hands of Parliament. Although the sum granted was small, it gave a good deal of pleasure, and, we hope, some profit to some. This matter has only been brought to the attention of the Government, for the first time, this morning, and we are not prepared to say anything definite with regard to it at present. I hope, therefore, my hon. friend will not ask for a Committee of the Whole now, but will defer the matter, content with having brought it under the notice of Parliament and the Government, and I promise him, on our part, that we shall consider it at as early a day as possible.

Mr. ROBINSON: I hope the House will not allow such an important question as this to escape their attention on a mere question of order. Representing a loyal population myself, I give the mover of the resolution great credit for introducing it. We are apt to think more highly of motions pertaining to one party or the other, than of one such as the present. It was not necessary to refer to the exertions of the volunteers in the campaigns of '76, 1812-14, and 1837-8, or in the Fenian Raid, to make those exertions palatable and agreeable to the House. It is well known what results attended upon the patriotism and the spirit of the volunteers, in reference to whom the Duke of Wellington, in his place in Parliament, at the time of the discussion of the Union Bill, in 1840, stated that the exertions of the militia of this country in 1812, when England's hands were tied behind her back, had not only saved this country to the Crown and people of Great Britain, but had raised a monument to their honour equal to that any country in the civilized world could boast of. We all know that in 1837-8 the Monroe doctrine was in force on this continent, and the Americans declared that they alone had the right to possess it, but, owing to the gallant exertions of the volunteers, the enemy's standard was kept out of Canada. But for their gallantry and devotion, we should not now be sitting here. Perhaps by wise legislation, we have sent our agents abroad to tell strangers that this country is well deserving of their immigration and that they would prosper here. I believe 7,000 or 8,000 Mennonites, from Russia, are settled where I hope they may prosper; but those men, from their peculiar religious belief, would not come forward to defend our flag if it was being trod in the dust. Probably the same applies to the Laplanders. Recollecting the services of the people who served in 1837-8, we cannot refuse them the same amount of land which we give to Laplanders and Mennonites. In Ontario, the Legislature frequently gives as much as 10,000 acres of land per mile to railways, but, though that is a good object, how much better is it to recognize the interests of these men by giving them an equal grant of land for their services. I suppose it is not so much for the sake of the value of the 100 acres of land that this is asked, as for the recognition it conveys of the patriotism of the men,—a sentiment which it would tend to sustain though it could not strengthen. It is often stated as a matter of pride, that people are descended from the United Empire Loyalists, and I think the Legislature would do an excellent thing if it would agree to this motion.

Mr. ROSS (Prince Edward): I hope the hon. mover of this resolution will be as successful as he was two years ago, and that the veterans of 1837-38 will receive recognition as well as the veterans of 1812. It is not for the value of the grant, but as a gracious act done by the Queen, through the Government of this country, that this is asked. I was present when the paltry sum of $20 was handed to those veterans 80 and 90 years old, and I saw their cheeks wet with tears, not from the value of the gift, but from the sense that their Queen and country recognized their services. I am glad to learn, from the expressions of the Premier, that he will consider this matter, and I have no doubt the hon. member for Kingston will acquiesce in a grant being made, and that no member on either side will oppose it. It would be much better to encourage our own people to settle the millions of acres in the North-West, than to import immigrants from the old country, and I think the Government might grant 200 acres instead of 100, and permit the sons of these people to take them if they do not go themselves. I suppose half the immigrants we get do not stay here, but go to the other side.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I can only say that, in this case, I cannot even vote, for I am one of the volunteers who served in 1837-8, and I hope I shall get a substantial recognition.

Mr. BROUSE: I have been very happy to hear the remarks of the Premier on this question, and, in consequence of the statement he made, and believing as I do, that, as we well know, the rebels of 1837-8 have already been paid—

Mr. DYMOND: No, no.

Mr. BROUSE: The hon. gentleman was not here at that time, but if he had been and had had friends who shed their blood in the struggle, he would not say, "No, no." I am glad to accept the Premier's statement, and I am prepared never to rest satisfied until these loyal men have received some recognition from their country.

Motion withdrawn.

MERCHANT SHIPPING.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. TUPPER, in the absence of Mr. MITCHELL, moved for copies of all correspondence between the Government of Canada and Her Majesty's Government in relation to legislation affecting Merchant Shipping; also, copies of instructions given to Mr. William Smith, Deputy of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, on his recent mission to England in connection with the above subject, together with all correspondence relating thereto, had between the said Deputy and Her Majesty's Government, or any of the officials thereof; also, all correspondence had in relation to such mission between the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the said Deputy, with the report of the said Deputy in relation to such mission.

Motion agreed to.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

MOTIONS FOR RETURNS.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for a statement shewing the following particulars in regard to a main brick sewer constructed through the station yard of the Intercolonial Railway at Moncton during the past year:—

“1. The Parliamentary authority under which the expenditure was made;

“2. Plan shewing the locality, size and extent of the work, and the buildings served thereby;

“3. The cubic yards each, of earth and rock excavations; the days' labor and amount expended in making such excavations; the quantity each of stone, bricks, lime and cement used and the amount paid therefor at the place whence received; the amount paid or allowed and charged for transportation; the number of days' labour and amount expended in laying the bricks and stone work; the quantity of material used in covering, and the days' labour and expense expended in covering the sewer;

“4. The particulars of all other amounts charged as for such main sewer;

“5. The total cost of the sewer;

“6. The names of the persons from whom, and the places whence each lot of material was procured, and the amount paid to each person therefor, with the date of payment;

“7. The statement to show how the charges in connection with the sewer have been classified and entered in the Public Accounts.”

He said his object was to elicit information in regard to what must have been a very large expenditure in the vicinity of the public buildings at Moncton. They heard rumours as to how work was being done, and extravagance carried on, but they had no data on which to form a judgment until the papers were laid before the House. He had not been able to find the particulars he required in the Report of the Minister of Public Works, and hoped the necessity of finding the authority for this expenditure would be a justification for his asking for so many papers.

Mr. TUPPER.

Mr. MACKENZIE said it would be quite impossible to comply with the hon. gentleman's requisition. He had no means, nor could any possible means be found to count the bricks in that drain, or to obtain many other particulars which the hon. gentleman asked for. The motion might pass, and all the details which the accounts permitted would be furnished.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for a statement showing:—

1. The original size and cost, exclusive of heating apparatus, of the brick building at Moncton known as the general offices of the Intercolonial Railway;

2. The size and cost of the additions to such building;

3. The original cost of the heating apparatus and of any additions made during the year 1876;

4. A plan of each of the four floors of said building as at present arranged, showing the purpose to which each of the rooms is appropriated;

5. The parliamentary authority for the various expenditures;

6. The names of all persons who may have been employed as Inspectors, Firemen, or Supervisors of such work, the time allowed to each and the wages paid them. In case any part of the work was done under contract, the statement to show the fact, the date and amount of the contract and the name of the contractor;

The statement to shew the items or particulars of cost, as well as the total amount expended in each case, and the manner in which the expenditures have been classified.

He said he submitted the motion for the purpose of eliciting information for the benefit of the public. As to the particulars with reference to the sewer, it would not be necessary, as the hon. the Premier seemed to intimate, to count the bricks, for the contracts and tenders still existing would certainly give the quantity bought, delivered, and paid for. It was openly stated, that this work was erected partly by contract, and partly by day's labour, that the material was brought from various places and credited to all branches of the railroad. Stories had been scattered broadcast over the country about the extravagance of the Government officials and General Superintendent; and it was in the interest of the Government that the public should have such information as it was justly entitled to, with regard to those expenditures.

Mr. MACKENZIE, said the Government would furnish the hon. gentleman with as close a statement as could be procured, but of course it will take some time, involving an examination of the books for many years back.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for a statement from the proper Intercolonial Railway official showing the quantities, kinds and cost of rails, fish plates, bolts and nuts, spikes and sleepers, as follows:—

“On hand but not in use on 30th June, 1875—received during the year ending 30th June, 1876—used and otherwise disposed of during the same period—the balance on hand but not in use at that date—received during the six months ending 31st December, 1876—used and otherwise disposed of during the same period—and the balance on hand but not in use on the 31st December last.

“The statement to show the date when each lot was received, the quantity, the place whence received, parties from whom purchased, name of the vessel freighting rails, fish plates, &c., amount of freight paid, and also the names of all persons to whom any such material was sold, the quantities so disposed of and the prices received therefor.”

Mr. MACKENZIE said this statement must be necessarily confined to the period in which the stock was taken. This would take a much longer time than any other motion on the hon. gentleman's long list, and he must not be surprised if the information required could not be given before the House rose.

Mr. DOMVILLE said that would be satisfactory, but, as it was said that there was a peculiar style of book-keeping, which facilitated the harmonizing of figures, it became necessary that the statement should be brought down as far as possible in the way he had intimated, in order that they might get anything like a correct idea of the Public Accounts.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for a statement showing the authority under which two dwelling-houses with stables and outbuildings were erected during the past summer at Moncton, for the use of the resident Engineer and Traffic Superintendent of the Intercolonial Railway; the amount authorized to be expended and the amount actually expended, the statement to be accompanied by statements showing, in detail, all charges made for such works, and the accounts to which such charges have been entered in the books of the railway; such statement to be so made up as to show the following particulars:—

1. The quantity, kind and cost of stone used in the cellars and foundations;
2. Labour and cost of procuring the same;
3. Cost of erecting foundations and cellars;
4. Cost of foundation not used and its subsequent removal;
5. Cost of labour and material used in constructing drains and of connecting same with main sewer;
6. Amount paid for water pipes and for laying the same, giving the size and length of such pipes, the cost of tanks, baths, pumps, sinks, closets and fixtures in connection therewith;
7. Cost, each, of chimneys, grates, stoves, woodwork, plastering, earth embankment and fencing;
8. Cost of Inspection.

The statement shall give the names of places from which the stones were procured, the number of days the trackmen were employed in procuring such stone and the amount charged to the buildings therefor, and the amount allowed or charged for freight on the same.

He said he could not find any appropriation for these buildings; and the public alleged that these railways had cost a very much larger sum of money than had been officially reported. If these buildings had been erected without proper authority, the question arose: In how many other instances this practice had been followed. It was openly reported, and he believed correctly, that the Superintendent promised to provide the men with a museum, or a reading room, and curiosity shop. He thought such buildings should not be put up without the consent of the Government, and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries should have something to say in the matter; for, although the hon. member for Westmoreland, of whom New Brunswick would always be proud, had been labouring in the interests of the country, Mr. Brydges took to himself the credit of what was done in this relation.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that, besides these two buildings, nineteen others, built during the Administration of the hon. gentlemen opposite, had been erected in consequence of the absolute necessity for affording accommodation for the people there employed. All the occupants paid rent to the Government, and for the two houses to which the hon. gentleman had alluded the rent was $500 per annum.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for a statement showing the quantity of work done in enlarging the railway water-works at Moncton during the year 1876, with the particulars of all expenditures in connection therewith.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for a statement giving full particulars of all expenditure made in constructing restaurant, enlarging the store-house, erecting freight-house, altering and improving the station-house, constructing sidings, erecting coal-sheds and trestle works, constructing platforms, ballasting tracks and grading the yard, and other such work done in the railway station-yard at Moncton during the year 1876.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for a statement of copies of all correspondence which has taken place between the officer in charge of the Government railways and his subordinate officers, as well as with the Department of Public Works and the Canada Guarantee Company in reference to the defalcation of Alfred Brush, late cashier of the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he must request his hon. friend not to press this motion, as steps were to be taken to procure further information concerning this person, and it was not advisable, in the public interest, that the particulars should be disclosed.

Mr. DOMVILLE said he would withdraw it.

Motion withdrawn.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for a statement giving a full account of all accidents which had occurred on the Intercolonial Railway since 1st July last, giving the locality and cause of each, the damage done, the cost of repairs to stock, indemnification to persons for goods damaged or injuries sustained, and the action taken in regard to any dereliction of duty which may have caused such accident.

Mr. MACKENZIE.

Mr. MACKENZIE said his hon. friend would find the information required in the Public Works Report. If, on examination, he considered further details necessary, the Government would be prepared to furnish them.

Mr. DOMVILLE said he had looked over the Report, and found that some of the accidents to which he hereafter proposed to refer were not mentioned, though this might not be within the knowledge of the Premier. One case concerned an elderly female who was run over and seriously injured. She was supplied with medical treatment, necessities and comforts under instructions from the Intercolonial Railway authorities, but, when the bill was sent in, payment was refused. He moved for the papers in order that he might hereafter bring up the matter in a more prominent shape.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for copies of any Orders in Council and of all correspondence which has taken place between the officer in charge of the Government Railways, or his Traffic Superintendent and the Minister of Customs, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and the Minister of Public Works in regard to the appointment of Mr. James McAlister to the position of Cashier of the Intercolonial Railway, the creation of the office of Dominion Auditor at Moncton, the transfer of Mr. McAlister thereto, the appointment of Mr. Charles D. Thompson to the position of Cashier, the subsequent removal of Mr. Thompson, the abolition of the office of Dominion Auditor and the re-appointment of Mr. James McAlister to the office of Cashier; also in regard to the subsequent provision made for Mr. Thompson.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he could not give copies of correspondence which had passed between Ministers, save of such as were strictly official, and concerned business matters.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for a statement made up so as to show for each month of the two years ending 31st December, 1876, the following particulars in relation to the working and management of the Intercolonial Railway:--

1. The number of miles run by the engines in each service, as follows:—Ordinary passenger trains, special passenger trains, freight trains, mixed trains, construction trains, with the mileage made by each description of cars used in each service.

2. The gross working expenses, without deductions, made up in accordance with the general classification of the railway accounts.

3. The particulars of all charges made for the use of engines and cars, as well as for railway freight, debited to the various services and deducted from the working expenses of the railway. This statement 'o show the deductions as made from each subdivision of the expenses, and to what service such deductions were charged.

4. The average, in detail, before and after such deductions have been made.

5. A statement giving full and detailed information in relation to the special trains for the conveyance of passengers or officers of the railway, which were run from the 1st July, 1875, to the 31st December, 1876. The statement to show whence and where to each such train was run, and the date; the distance; the names of the conductors and engine-driver in charge, the reason for running it, the amount received for each service, and the expenses incidental thereto.

He said the motion required a good deal of information to be furnished; but it was necessary, in order to clear up some alleged difficulties.

Mr. MACKENZIE said these details could certainly be given, but to do so would necessitate the employment of a great many additional clerks for several months. As it would require an examination of the books of each station on the line, he submitted to the hon. gentleman, as well as to the House, whether such an expensive return should be asked for. It would be much better if the hon. gentleman would specify exactly what he wanted.

Mr. TUPPER said he did not know whether his hon. friend at the head of the Government had been advised respecting the answer he had given, but he would assume that was not the case. He did not believe it necessary, from his acquaintance with the mode in which books were kept in connection with the Railway Department, to visit a single station. The information in question could be furnished in a very short time by the head of the Department, from the records in it. The report of the Minister of Public Works, laid on the table of the House during the present Session, showed every mile that any train had run. Of course, if the adoption of the motion did involve the appointment of a number of additional clerks and a large amount of extra labour, it would be a very grave reason why some hesitation should be shown by the Government regarding that matter, but his hon. friend, on referring to the books of his Department, would find that they would furnish all the information required, without involving much delay or expense.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he admitted the information could be supplied, but it would necessitate a good deal of expense and take up a good deal of time. The motions the hon. gentleman was submitting, ought not, strictly speaking, go on the Journals of the House in their present shape, as the Government were compelled to qualify so many of them. A portion could not possibly be granted and passed as they stood, for such a course might, in the future, cause some misunderstanding. He had permitted them to pass because he was desirous of affording all possible information.

Mr. HOLTON said he regarded the order of the House as a sacred thing, which was not to be trifled with, and, therefore, not with reference to this particular motion, but with respect to all such motions, he thought that the Premier, who would pardon him for saying so, ought either to accept them in their fullness, in their obvious sense, or amend or reject them.

Motion agreed to.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the chair.

After Recess.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for a statement showing the expenditure incurred during the last two years ending January 31st, 1877, for carpets, curtains, dining and bedroom furniture, fixings, fittings and utensils, linen, crockery, china, cutlery, and silver ware; also for desks, tables, chairs, sofas, lounges, pictures and fittings for the General Offices of the Intercolonial Railway at Moncton. The statement to give the name and cost of each item and to include all articles furnished by any department or branch of the Railway Service.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for a statement giving copies of all correspondence which has taken place between the officer in charge of the Government Railways or any official in charge of a department of the Intercolonial Railway and the Phoenixville Iron Company, or any other person, from a company in the State of Pennsylvania, in relation to any offers for bridge superstructure, iron roofs, turn-tables, engines, cars, work, supplies or other matter or thing since 31st December, 1875, whether such correspondence has been in the form of tender or otherwise, stating upon the face of any offer if the same has been accepted.

Mr. MACKENZIE said it would be impossible to give all the items.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for a statement giving a full account of all charges made and expenses incurred for changing the gauge of the Intercolonial Railway, and shewing how the expenditure is classified in the Railway Accounts.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for a statement shewing the names, ages, denomination, date of appointment, occupation and salary of all persons, except ordinary mechanics and labourers, who were in the service of the Intercolonial Railway on the 31st March, 1876; also a separate statement giving similar information in regard to persons who were in the service of the Railway on the 31st December last; such return to include the names of all employés whether on the pay sheets or otherwise.

Mr. MACKENZIE said all the labourers were on the pay sheet as a matter of course.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for a statement giving a full epitome of all offers or tenders made from the 30th June, 1875, to 31st December, 1876, to any authorized officer of the Intercolonial Railway, for each of the following: wheels, axles, springs, tubes, tools, stoves, iron, ironwork, iron roofs, bridge superstructure, cars, ploughs, oil, tallow, waste, fuel, rails, frogs, spikes, and other principal supplies, and also for buildings, snow sheds, or any description of work usually done by contract; the statement to include the names of the parties who made such offers, and the names of those whose offers were accepted, as well as the names of those who in any case were invited to submit offers, and the names of those, if any, whose contracts were cancelled, and giving the cause thereof.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for a statement showing the names and address of all persons, firms or companies, who supplied materials or stores of any kind, during the two years ending 31st December, 1876, for the use of the Intercolonial Railway; such statement to show, opposite each name, the date, general character of the goods supplied, the amount of the purchase and the reference number of the receipt taken when the goods were paid for.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for a statement giving a general description and cost of each of the works of the Intercolonial Railway, not chargeable to ordinary maintenances, which have been constructed during the two years ending 31st December, 1876; by day's labour or private arrangement, giving the name of the engineer and inspector under whose immediate supervision the work was done.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he thought all that was in the report. Nothing could be given but what the engineers had already disclosed.

Mr. DOMVILLE said he was informed, but was not prepared to say that his information was correct until the papers were brought down, that works had been awarded amounting to $10,000 which ought to have been tendered for. He could not find anything in the reports which would show how these contracts were given.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for a statement giving copies of any agreement, arrangement or correspondence in pursuance of which the officers of the Intercolonial Railway or any other Government officials, are insured with the Guarantee Company of Canada, such statement to be accompanied by statement showing who of the officers of such railway have been so insured, the amount of such insurance, the premiums paid in each case, and the amount of insurance paid by the said Guarantee Company on any policy. He said the officials felt it was not right to have deductions made on the pay sheet without their consent; and, further, they did not know on what plan the insurance had been effected.

Mr. MACKENZIE said every officer in a responsible position was required to give personal or other security. The officer paid the security himself—the Government did not pay it.

Mr. TUPPER said he believed there was an insurance altogether different from the insurance for good behaviour. As he understood it, these deductions were made for the purpose of insuring their lives from death or personal accidents.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that was a different thing, covered by the next motion. He suggested that the words "or any other Government officials" should be struck out.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for a statement showing—1st, the arrangement made for insuring the employés of the Intercolonial Railway against accidents; 2nd, the monthly deductions made from the wages or salaries of such employés, on account of said insurance from the time the Government undertook the risks up to 31st December last; and 3rd, the particulars of all amounts paid out of the Railway on account of such insurance.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for a statement showing the following particulars in regard to the traffic of the Intercolonial Railway for each of the six months preceding the 1st of January last:—

1. The number of tons of through freight forwarded to each Station of the Intercolonial from any Station on the Grand Trunk Railway; showing in each case the total freight charges thereon, the amount of such charges apportioned to each Railway, the whole number of tons carried per mile on each line, the average receipts per ton per mile by each line, and the amount paid to the Grand Trunk Railway Company for the mileage of their cars used on the Intercolonial.

2. The like particulars respecting through freight forwarded to each Station on the Grand Trunk Railway from any Station on the Intercolonial.

3. The number of tons of local freight forwarded to each Station on the Intercolonial from each other Station, shewing the freight charges thereon, the whole number of tons carried per mile and the average receipts per ton per mile.

4. The number of local and through passengers carried, shewing the Intercolonial Railway proportion of the sums received therefor, the whole number carried per mile, and the average receipts, per passenger per mile.

5. The Revenue arising from each other source.

6. The total Revenue.

7. The number of tons of freight received at Halifax from any European steamer or vessel and transported over the Intercolonial on through Bills of Lading or otherwise, to points beyond River du Loup, and shewing the Intercolonial Railway's proportion of the freight charges thereon, and the average receipts per ton per mile.

He said there was a great injustice done to the residents of the Lower Provinces, and he believed he could show, when the papers came down, that the rates charged were not in accordance with justice. Flour was carried on the Intercolonial Railway to St. John or Sussex at $45 to $50 per car load, but return freights were charged $65 to $70. Freight was brought from Halifax at $22.50 per car load, but from St. John to Halifax it was $65 to $70—nearly three times the rate. This system was injurious, not only to local trade, but also to steamers on the North Shore, such as the Gulf steamers, which were almost run off the line. He was informed that there had been fifteen different tariffs issued within the last twelve or eighteen months, and that from St. John to Shediac potatoes were carried less per barrel than by the car load, in proportion.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the labour of collecting the statement would take several months, but he was quite willing to give all the information he could.

Mr. MITCHELL said that the rates on the Intercolonial had practically destroyed the capital invested in the steamboats trading from Montreal to Quebec, yet he had no fault to find with the management of the railway except in one particular. He had always advocated the construction of the railway and its location as it existed, and thought this was justified by the result which had sprung from it. The down freights were so very low that they had driven off private enterprise. He believed it to be the true interest, as well of the East as of the West, that that road should be built, even if at a large expense to the country, it being one of the great arteries which connected the eastern with the western portion of the country. It was in the true interest of Canada that the road should get the traffic at any sacrifice. He had suffered with others, but he did not complain of that. He complained, however, of a barrel of flour being carried at 28 cents to Halifax, when the return freight was 50 to 55 cents. It was unfair to discriminate to such an extent against the private enterprise of the steamship companies. He hoped the Premier would look into it, and he was satisfied he would apply a remedy. While, five years ago, probably one-half of the flour and cereals which were used in the Maritime Provinces came from the United States, now there were hardly any. But restrictions were placed upon the traffic from the east to the west. In the county from which he came, over 400 people were engaged in the fishing interests—taking fresh fish to the United States. If a proper tariff were established, they could go to New York by way of Montreal, and thus thousands of dollars would accrue to the Intercolonial. But, unless a whole car load was got up, special rates by that route could not be obtained, and the traffic was thus lost. It was true that the railway obtained a portion of its traffic by St. John to Boston by steamships, but if anything like the rates established on the western were placed on the eastern-going freights, it would get the whole of that traffic; and it would amount to a very considerable sum of money.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the Government was placed in the same position as a commercial company, and was bound to obtain the largest amount of revenue for the outlay expended. The mileage by the Grand Trunk to the Lower Provinces was almost exactly the same by Portland as by Rivière du Loup, and if they did not carry flour by the intercolonial at as cheap a rate to Halifax and St. John as it could be carried via Portland, they would not get the business. It was a matter of indifference to the Grand Trunk over which route the traffic passed eastward from Montreal, the expense being the same by each. It was matter for regret that the working of the Intercolonial Railway had greatly injured the steamship companies trading between ports on the St. Lawrence. It would be much more gratifying to the Government if all the steamship lines were prosperous as well as the railroads, but that appeared to be impossible. The charge of $28 a carload from Pictou to Halifax, a distance of 113 miles, was not excessive. When the question was before the Railway Committee, attention was called to the fact that the rate from Ottawa to Prescott, which was only half the distance, was greater.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is a monopoly.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is a monopoly which does not pay any dividend.

Mr. MITCHELL: And never will under its management.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the Government were exceedingly anxious to arrange an equitable tariff. It was impossible to establish a pro rata tariff over the Intercolonial without reference to rates received by connecting companies. As to the statement of the hon. member for Northumberland in regard to fish traffic, a part of it was new to him. He was not aware that it was possible to send portions of carloads over the line and connect with New York; but thought it was necessary in order to carry fish, especially in the hot season, to provide refrigerator cars.

Mr. MITCHELL: I mean in winter.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the Government would give the matter attention, and, if any desirable change could be made, they would lose no time in having it carried out. He was obliged to the hon. member for Northumberland for his suggestion.

Mr. TUPPER said he was glad the Government were growing wiser in their generation; there certainly was great room for it. Those members who had been for a number of years in the House would remember that constant attacks were made upon the late Government in regard to rates charged over the Government railways in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. It was alleged that the Government were working the roads at a great loss to the country for the special convenience of the people in that section. In time, a change of régime was brought about, and hon. gentlemen opposite were charged with the duty of administering the Government railways. Almost immediately after their accession to power, it was proclaimed throughout the country that those railways were to be placed on a commercial basis, and that a tariff of rates was to be applied to passengers and freight which would render them self-supporting. He ventured to controvert the policy of the Government when it was announced to the House. He contended that if they could accomplish what they proposed, under the circumstances, it would be unjust, and he went further, and stated that, looking at the question from a purely commercial stand-point, the policy would result in the loss of a large amount of public revenue. The question was deferred until the item in the Estimates for the Intercolonial Railway came up, and then he was obliged to be absent from the House. He was prepared to show then, as he was prepared to show now, that the change made by the Government in the tariff on the Intercolonial Railway resulted in a loss of at least $100,000 per annum to the country; that the addition of 20 per cent. to the tariff greatly injured the trade and business of the country, while it acted most oppressively and injuriously on individuals who had made contracts on the faith of the tariff remaining unaltered; it injured the traffic of the road to such an extent that it would take years to recover, and caused a large outlay of capital by farmers to obtain means less oppressive to get their goods to market. He was glad, however, to know that the Government was not incapable of improvement, and their late experience had not been lost upon them. Having tried half a dozen tariffs, the Government had returned to substantially the tariff in force under the late Government. He congratulated the Government on having thus gained wisdom by experience—experience bitter to those sections which suffered from the injudicious and injurious changes—and on being able to report that the present state of affairs was more satisfactory.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It takes time to place in order what was left in such disorder.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for a statement showing:

1, The names, occupation and salary of all persons appointed to any office or place except that of labourer in connection with the construction and management of the Intercolonial Railway during the year ending 31st December, 1876; 2, the amount of any increase made in the salary of any general officer, superintendent, engineer, clerk, inspector or other officer of the Intercolonial Railway during the same period; 3, the names of all persons upon whose recommendation, or at whose instance such appointments were made or increased salary was granted. The statement to show also the names, occupation and remuneration of all persons who have served in the capacity of clerk in any office during the year, but who have not been regularly or permanently appointed to positions in the railway service.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he must decline to give the names of persons through whose recommendation appointments were made.

Mr. TUPPER said there was good reason why those names should be given. It would be remembered that the Report of the Superintendent of Railways laid on the table announced a new policy in regard thereto. It went into an elaborate statement to show the injurious character of political influences being brought to bear on appointments in connection with railways, and the necessity of relieving railway appointments from all political influences. It would be interesting to know how far the Government had been able to carry out the suggestion made in the report. There would be no difficulty in showing that the Government had been subject to the same kind of mundane influences and pressure on the part of political friends as were their predecessors.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. member for Cumberland was mistaken. The Government had not been subjected to political pressure of that character. Mr. Carvell had stated that he was directly informed while the late Government was in power that members of a particular society, which was a political organization, were to have a preference. The management of railways, however, must be conducted on the best mode to secure efficiency, and the conductors, engineers and employes, upon whom the regularity and safety of trains depended, should not be chosen because they happened to have a political friend. Such were not chosen officials by the present Government. It might occur that political friends recommended parties who were thoroughly capable, in which case he would give them the preference. That any pressure had been brought on the Government in regard to such appointments, he utterly denied. The hon. member for Cumberland had been sufficiently long in public life to know that to include in a return letters written in confidence to a Minister, would be quite improper. If a questionable appointment had been made, and the hon. member desired to take objection to it, the Government were responsible for it, and would have to bear the consequences of the act; but other parties could not be held responsible.

Mr. TUPPER said he would remind the House that the gentleman who was appointed by the present Government to inspect the Intercolonial Railway reported that everything was in admirable order, that the offices were filled with men thoroughly qualified to perform their duties, and that he was gratified in being able to state that the appointments had been made without going outside of the railway department. Such afforded ample proof that political influence had not been abused by the late Government. In reply to the assurance of the Premier that no political influence or pressure had been brought to bear on the Government in regard to Intercolonial Railway appointments, he undertook to say, that if the Government submitted the correspondence relating to the appointment of Mr. McAlister, it would reveal the most scandalous developments with regard to political pressure ever known. It would then be found that, when an important position became vacant to which an officer, who had been for years in the department, was fairly entitled, one of the least creditable controversies took place between a subordinate officer and the Government; that the Government of the day, for the purpose at the same time of maintaining the appointment and recommendation of the Superintendent of the railway and of meeting political pressure, to which they were compelled to bow, created an office and appointed a person, pressed on them by political influence, and, though he had no experience, gave him a large salary.

Mr. LANGEVIN said he desired, as head of the Public Works Department under the late Administration, to distinctly state that he never gave any such instructions to Mr. Carvell as had been referred to, and did not cause any such instructions to be given; nor were any such given by the Government so far as he was aware.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is so stated in Mr. Carvell's report.

Mr. DOMVILLE said political considerations had largely entered into the appointment of certain officers of the Railway. At an important station a man was appointed station-master on account of political considerations, although he was unacquainted with the duties. One of the leading railway officials was sent through the constituency of Kings to work against him during an election contest.

Motion amended by the omission of the third clause, and agreed to.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for a statement shewing the several amounts paid to each of the newspaper proprietors in Canada for advertising done in connection with the Intercolonial Railway during the year ending 31st December, 1876; also, showing the particulars of the several amounts paid to any person, firm or company for placards, posters, show-bills, illuminated cards, railroad maps, show-frames, time tables or other means of advertising; also, the several amounts paid to newspaper proprietors during each month of the year, for printing of all kinds, and stating whether done under contract or otherwise.

Motion amended so as to include a statement of amount paid to each newspaper during the year, and agreed to.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for a statement shewing the monthly sales of season, also of commutation tickets, at each Station of the Intercolonial Railway for a period of eighteen months preceding the 31st December last.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for a statement giving full information in relation to the arrangement made between the Government or their representative and the Pullman Palace Car Company, in pursuance of which their cars are run on the Intercolonial Railway, such statement to be accompanied by a copy of the agreement and a statement giving a detailed account of all expenses incurred by the Government for transporting the cars, and for cleaning, painting, repairing and lighting them since they were put upon the line to 31st December last.

Motion amended by adding the words "as far as practicable," and agreed to.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for a statement giving copies of any arrangement made between the Government Railways and the Grand Trunk Railway Company, for the interchange of cars and transportation of passengers and freight.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for a statement shewing the various tariffs for the carriage of freight on the Intercolonial Railway, which have been in operation since 1st January, 1875, together with the changes made therein; the return to be accompanied by a statement shewing all special rates granted from time to time since 1st January, 1876, to persons and companies or particular stations, and also showing the Parliamentary authority under which these several tariffs have been issued. He said he had been under the impression that those tariffs were never published, and he had experienced great difficulty in procuring a copy of the tariff, though he had applied personally and by letter. There had been a small movement in a certain class of goods the other day, and Montreal people came down to buy. On being informed as to the Grand Trunk rate, the Government said they would take the goods for less. The Grand Trunk then reduced their price to the Government figure, and then the Government employé stated, that they would carry the freight for a still less sum. If this could be done on one occasion, why could it not be done on another? and he, as a merchant, through not having driven as close a bargain as a competitor in business, might thereby be placed at a disadvantage. The Government should not permit touters to go about and pick up freight, offering very low rates as an inducement. The tariff should be published in the Canada Gazette, in order to prevent the infliction of a grave injustice. As to Protection and Free Trade, how could a factory situated along the line flourish if it were obliged to pay twice and three times as much for the carriage of freight as was paid for the moving of goods brought from England. They should have at least fair competition.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: What is the practice with respect to tariffs? Are they not published in the Canada Gazette?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think they are. I am not sure that they have been always published, but I believe the present one was. It was adopted by an Order in Council in the usual way.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: With respect to Canals, I think the tariffs were published by Order in Council, and the same reason certainly applies to railways. It was always done by the late Government.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Not always.

Mr. LANGEVIN: When the railways were under our control I know that the tariffs were published in the official Gazette. I think that some of them have been published since, but not all.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for a statement showing the particulars of all amounts in addition to salary paid to any general or departmental officer of the Intercolonial Railway during the year 1876.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he was not aware of any such additions; but the motion might pass.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for a statement showing which of the bridges and culverts of the Intercolonial Railway between Pictou and Halifax received extensive repairs and alterations or were renewed in part or in whole during the seasons of 1875 and 1876; also a statement giving the quantity and cost of each kind of material procured therefor, the persons from whom and the place whence it was obtained, the cost of transportation, the amount and cost of labour expended, and generally full particulars in regard to the work in each case.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for a statement shewing all claims made against the Intercolonial Railway for damages or loss of any kind sustained by private individuals during the year 1876, also showing what was paid thereon and how disposed of.

Motion amended to read:—A statement showing all claims made against the Intercolonial Railway, for damages or loss of any kind, sustained by private individuals from the working of the railway during 1876, and agreed to.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for all papers, correspondence and telegrams relating to property on the Marsh Road in the County of St. John, New Brunswick, damaged by fire from locomotives on the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The motion, if adopted, will simply result in nothing, for I do not admit that any property was damaged by fire from the locomotives. It should be changed to read,—“alleged to have been so damaged.”

Mr. DOMVILLE: The word “alleged” will throw a doubt on it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I do not intend, by a vote of Parliament, to declare that fires were so caused.

Motion amended accordingly and agreed to.

Mr. LANGEVIN.

Mr. DOMVILLE, on the motion for copies of all papers and correspondence in connection with the investigation and dismissal of one Davis, an engine driver on the Intercolonial Railway, said, that as he had learned yesterday that Davis had been re-instated, he was willing to withdraw the motion.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he was very glad this was the case, because it would not be right to allow the publication of correspondence regarding the dealings of the Government with their employés, who either had, or had been alleged to have, misconducted themselves. This would be very inconvenient unless some charge was brought against the Government.

Mr. DOMVILLE said his object was not so much to get the papers as to show the negligent way in which the trains were run on certain occasions, and the careless manner in which human life was regarded, for which parties in authority were much to blame.

Motion withdrawn.

SESSIONAL PAPER No. 96.

MOTION TO PRINT.

Mr. LANGEVIN moved that Sessional Paper No. 96, of last Session, be printed for the use of Members.

Mr. MACKENZIE said, if the hon. gentleman would accept an invitation to call upon him, he (Mr. Mackenzie) would willingly ascertain what he desired in that relation. He could not understand how the paper was wanted for the use of members, and he was quite unwilling to consent to the expense of printing it unless the reasons were alleged.

Mr. LANGEVIN said he would communicate to the Chairman and members of the Committee the portions of the paper he thought might meet the object he had in view.

Motion withdrawn.

QUEBEC MARINE HOSPITAL.

MOTION FOR REPORT.

Mr. LANGEVIN moved for a copy of Mr. Langmuir's report on the Marine Hospital, Quebec.

Motion agreed to.

MANITOBA RAILWAY RESERVE.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. SCHULTZ moved for copies of all correspondence between the Minister of the Interior or the Surveyor-General and the Dominion Lands Agent at Winnipeg, relative to the railway reserves within the Province of Manitoba. He said he had called the attention of the House to this matter last session, and had done so in consequence of the large reservations which had been made in various parts of the Province. The difficulty, which then existed still existed, and the fact was to-day that so much land had been taken up by reservations for Mennonites, Icelanders, French Canadians and the half-breed and railway reserves that there was scarcely a desirable homestead left, and it was a common occurrence last summer for emigrants from Ontario to land at Winnipeg, and, in looking over the Provincial map in the Land Office, only to find that this quarter-section was in a Mennonite reserve, that one was either in the railway or some other reserve, and to go back disgusted from that Province where, having been taxed for the purchase of this prairie country, he naturally felt that he was entitled to a homestead, and at least should be as well treated as a Mennonite or an Icelander. The attention of the Government was drawn to this matter last Session by himself and others, and doubtless information derived from this and other sources determined the then Minister of the Interior on bringing in a Bill which would relieve the situation in point. On page 1,001 of Hansard for 1876, it was stated that "Mr. Laird introduced a Bill respecting Dominion lands on the Canada Pacific Railway," explaining that its object was to enable settlers to go on the land reserved on each side of the line, 80 acres to be given as a homestead, and 80 acres by purchase at a rate to be afterwards based on the arrangements made with the Railway contractor. This Bill certainly relieved the situation in part, and, although he and his friends urged a more liberal one, yet, on the principle that half a loaf is better than no bread, it was accepted gratefully. This Bill passed through its second and third readings, and then, without any explanations, it was withdrawn during the closing days of the session. He believed that, by this action, the Government was committed to the principle that Bill contained. If there was a necessity then, there was a greater necessity now for the opening up of these railway reserves. Pushed away from the navigable streams and main highways of their Province, Ontario immigrants had still managed to commence the thriving settlements of Rockwood, Greenwood, Victoria, Springfield and others, but just as they were fairly started on a long line of townships, they were shut in effectually by this railway reserve, with no chance for development, no chance for combined action in the matter of churches, schools, or roads, no chance to welcome friends or relatives to adjacent lands. It was a hardship to the Province as it was an injustice to the immigration interests generally, that land, unused for the purpose for which it was reserved, should be locked up from the actual settler, and he trusted the present Minister of the Interior would either re-introduce the Bill of last session, or one with more liberal clauses still.

Mr. MILLS said the subject was under the consideration of the Government.

Motion agreed to.

ACCIDENTS ON THE INTER-COLONIAL RAILWAY.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. MITCHELL moved for a statement of accidents which have occurred on the Intercolonial Railway in the County of Northumberland; the number of cattle which have been killed by locomotives on said Railway; with a statement of the causes of such accidents, and whether the same have arisen from want of fencing along the line of said road or otherwise; with a list of claims made by proprietors of cattle killed or injured; amounts paid on such claims; with a statement of claims rejected, and the reason of such rejection; also a statement as to whether it is the intention of the Government to erect a fence on the said line of Railway, where none now exists in the vicinity of the town of Newcastle, the non-existence of which has caused several accidents. He said it had been stated, and the statement had been endorsed by a petition from respectable people residing near the town of Newcastle, that a portion of the road was unfenced, and, as that was near a snow-shed, from a sixteenth to an eighth of a mile long, cattle would in the summer get into the snow-shed to protect themselves from the flies, would sleep there, and so cause several accidents to occur. Several had, it was stated, already occurred through the want of fencing, and, if that were so, the state of things ought to be remedied. He desired to know who was to blame, the railway officials or some one else.

Mr. MACKENZIE suggested that the words "the non-existence of which has caused several accidents" should be expunged, as they asserted a matter which, he thought, the House should not take for granted.

Mr. MITCHELL consented to the alteration.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

IRON RAILS LOANED TO RAILWAYS.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. BOWELL moved for a return showing the quantity of iron rails removed from the Government railways; railway companies to which they have been loaned; the date of such loans; the counties and districts through which said railways run; the quantity loaned to each railway company; the terms upon which such loans have been made; the nature of the security given by each railway company to secure the return of said iron rails; the names of the directors of the companies respectively to which iron rails have been loaned, together with all correspondence between the Government and any company or individual making application for such loans.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL.

DISALLOWANCE OF PROVINCIAL ACTS.

MOTIONS FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. LAURIER moved for copies of all correspondence between the Imperial and Canadian Governments not already laid before the House, concerning the mode of exercising the power of disallowance of Provincial Acts.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. LAURIER moved for copies of all correspondence between the Federal and any of the Provincial Governments since the establishment of Confederation, concerning the disallowance of Provincial Acts or the action on Provincial Bills reserved.

Mr. BLAKE said that, although considerable portions of the papers on this subject had been already laid before the House, he concurred in the view that the series should be brought down complete, and he ventured to hope that, when they were brought down, the Printing Committee would consider favourably the view that they should be printed, so that one volume might contain the whole series. Those who had to discharge the duties of Minister of Justice would, he was sure, have their duties much lightened if the Local Legislatures were aware of the general current of correspondence, and it would be brought more directly to their attention if the series of papers were printed in one volume.

Motion agreed to.

LIVE STOCK.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. McDougall (Renfrew) in the absence of Mr. CASEY, moved for a classified return of imports and exports of live stock, showing origin and destination of stock for each quarter, from March 1st, 1875, to January 1st, 1877, and further month of January, 1877.

Motion agreed to.

IMPORTATION OF SUGAR.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. DESJARDINS moved for a return from the 1st January, 1875, to the 1st January, 1877, shewing the quantities of different grades of sugar imported from Europe, British and Foreign West Indies and the United States; also the value of each such importation and the duties paid thereon. He said that, last year, when he had occasion to move for a resolution relating to the interest of the sugar trade, he had stated that the question could not be regarded as a private one affecting merely the refiners. That question equally involved the interest of our international trade, the establishment of markets for our home produce and the development of our navigation, because the whole of the consumers, that was, the whole of the public, were interested in it. In this view he was gratified to be sustained by influential members on both sides of the House, but he was opposed, he was sorry to say, specially by two members whose position he respected very much, but who were not, he considered, altogether authorised to decide completely on that question. He referred to the hon. member for South Waterloo, and the then chairman of the Committee, now the Minister of the Interior. The hon. member for Waterloo had assumed a position some weeks previous in reference to this matter which ought to have made him an apostle of the view he (Mr. Desjardins) entertained. He had said, speaking of the causes of the unsatisfactory state of the trade with the British and the West Indies, that one of them was to be found in the fact that,—

“The causes are not difficult to discover. One, possibly, is that we are not alive to bringing cargoes in our vessels from the West Indies. In other words, they take more largely of our articles than we take of theirs in return. It is possible that some legislation might take place that would have the effect of increasing this valuable trade.

If they looked at the correspondence on the subject of free trade with the West Indies that was published during the last month, they would see that the only produce which could be imported into this country with some advantage was sugar. This specially appeared in a letter published by Mr. Mason, who had taken the initiative in creating, if possible, some more extensive relations with the West Indies. In describing the imports and exports of those countries he mentioned the following:—

“Jamaica.—The principal exports are sugar, molasses, &c. Imports of last year £1,331,185 sterling; exports, £1,283,000.

In fact, it had been admitted by all, that, if it was possible to create some relations with those countries, it was only to be accomplished by creating here a market for their raw producers. This, however, was objected to by the hon. the Chairman of the Select Committee on Depression. While other members admitted that the principal cause of the difficulties we had to encounter in the way of creating that trade lay in the discriminating duties between raw and refined sugar, and in consequence of the creation of a drawback by the United States, so as to cover a bounty in favour of refiners, the Chairman of the Committee, in his speech on that question, boldly asserted that no such bounty existed. He went further and committed the whole Committee to his view. He said:

“As to the other statement of Mr. Drummond that the United States refiner receives by the drawback allowed upon sugar exported a sum sufficiently large to give him a bounty of 55 cents per 100 pounds, the Committee think this greatly exaggerated, if not wholly unfounded.”

He would not attempt to prove the contrary by these unhappy refiners, who were considered as criminals because they dared to come and ask justice at the hands of the Government, and were examined by the Chairman of the Committee as if they had been guilty of some great crime, but he would apply to authorities that he expected would not be contradicted by the free-traders and Liberals on the other side of the House. He would quote from the Sugar Cane of Manchester, a free-trade paper, which said:—

“The proof that the drawback on ‘hard sugar’ gives a bounty of 50 cents per 100 lbs., as stated very clearly by the New York Commercial Chronicle, is based entirely on the figures given by the ‘American experts,’ as the Canadian report styles them; in other words, by the United States refiners themselves; for it is a curious fact that the materials for calculating the drawback were furnished to the United States Treasury Committee by those most interested in the maintenance of a bounty, without any steps being taken to verify them."

But we had more than that, we had the testimony of the American refiners themselves, and he would read the following from the New York Bulletin :—

"The table here presented is a striking exhibit of the enormous increase in our export of refined sugar which has resulted from the augmented rates of drawback established about two years ago. The increase in the trade with Canada has been especially remarkable. The exports in that direction of a few years ago, when the Dominion had its own refineries, were comparatively trifling, but, when our Government granted the present liberal drawback to our refiners, the Canadian refiners succumbed, and there are no sugar refineries in the Dominion now in operation. It will be observed by the statistics, that the exports to Canada in 1876 were over 100 per cent. larger than in 1875, though there was a marked falling off in the shipments to other countries; still as compared with 1873 and 1874, as will be seen, there was a very decided increase, and it is by no means improbable that there will be an improvement this year. There can be no doubt but that the decrease in the exports to Europe in 1876 was entirely due to the high price that ruled during the last half of the year, when there was a sudden and very marked falling off in the shipments. This large increase in the trade with Canada alone prevented a very decided decrease in the aggregate exports as compared with 1875."

Mr. HOLTON: Will my hon. friend allow me to ask if he has any idea who wrote the article in that Manchester paper which he quotes?

Mr. DESJARDINS: I have no idea of the writer, but I suppose the paper is responsible.

Mr. HOLTON: I think I could inform my hon. friend who wrote the article, and I thought perhaps he would inform the House if he knew.

Mr. DESJARDINS said he believed the hon. member for Chateauguay was well enough acquainted with the laws of journalism to know that no paper of any value would commit itself to any statement of facts or opinion which would not be surveyed and endorsed by the editor or staff of that paper. There was another home authority that he expected the hon. member for Chateauguay would not contradict, namely, Mr. Patterson, the Secretary of the Board of Trade, and, if he was well informed, a friend of the

Mr. DESJARDINS.

Administration. Before quoting Mr. Patterson, however, he would give some figures taken from the Herald of Montreal. He did not know if the hon. member for Chateauguay would show him that some indiscreet stranger had put his hand to the editorial pen of the Herald. From a table showing the exports of sugar from the United States in 1875 and 1876, published in that paper, it appeared that in 1875 the United States exported to other countries 41,305,166 lb. against 7,208,894 lb. exported to Canada; and that, while in 1876 the quantity exported to other countries was depressed to 29,587,926 lb., Canada compensated for the loss, as the quantity of refined sugar she imported from the United States rose to 15,757,525 lb. He presumed these figures spoke eloquently by themselves. Mr. Patterson, in reference to the bounty, the existence of which was denied by the hon. the Chairman of the Committee, said:

"The bounty system enjoyed by the United States refiners is the cause of much of the difficulty before which Canadian refiners have, one after another, succumbed; with these additional obstacles, that the Dominion Parliament have not only not attempted to save them by countervailing legislation, but that the tariff is alleged to discriminate to some extent against the importation of certain kinds of raw sugar. There can be no doubt but that the United States Government believe their refineries to be, as they undoubtedly are, the key to an immense and varied foreign trade, and hence every facility and advantage are afforded them in the shape of what are denominated 'drawbacks.'"

As to the discriminating duties, he valued them at from 8 to 10 per cent. in favour of refined sugars against raw material. The great objection of the hon. members had regard to the interest of the country. They said, if the refineries were allowed to exist, we were threatened with having to pay a higher price for our sugar than if we were left altogether to the good-will of our American neighbours. He had received a letter from a man who, he thought, would not be suspected of having any share or interest whatever in the refineries of the Dominion, Mr. McGibbon, who wrote as follows:—

"During 1875, yellow sugars were supplied by Redpath from 7c to 8c a pound, and white sugars from 8c to 8½c a pound. These prices ruled pretty evenly up until the refinery closed in April, 1876. Prices for yellow and white sugar commenced then gradually to go up, until, in July, whites had got up to 10c (1½¢ advance from April). Raw sugars, in the meantime, had not advanced, so it was clear that the closing of the refinery had put competition out of the way, and the public made to pay 1½¢ to 2¢ dearer for their sugar, by not having the refinery going on as formerly. Towards autumn, prices still advanced, especially for Scotch yellows and American whites, until they reached as high as 10½¢ to 11c for yellow, and 11c to 12c for white. Raw sugar, in the meantime, had advanced also, but nothing like the yellows and whites, showing still stronger the importance of our refinery, and the great loss to the consumer, by having to depend on the American and Scotch refiners, the difference being fully 3c more in 1876, without a refinery, than prices were in 1875, with a refinery. Raw sugar never advanced more than ½¢ or ¾¢ during this time, so that the public of Canada have had to pay, and are now paying, fully 2c to 2½c a pound more for their refined sugar than they would do if Redpath was still in operation. All this extra price goes into the pockets of the American and Scotch refiners."

Even the quality of the sugars had produced great complaints. He again quoted the letter of Mr. McGibbon:

"Scotch and English yellow sugars I maintain are not equal to that produced by Redpath, because in Great Britain great quantities of beet root sugar are used, and to get a brightness of colour, chemicals are brought into requisition, which causes some of the sugar to give a bad colour and taste to whatever is done with it; and some of the white sugar when boiled will turn as black as coal, and if melted in water will turn pink or the colour of ink. The American yellows are also adulterated, and in some cases so full of gum as to require a pick-axe to remove it from the barrels. Their white sugar is more or less adulterated, and the quality is becoming worse every day, so much so that very little sweetening is to be got out of it, and consequently the complaints of bad sugar are now very frequent."

Taking the propositions as laid down by a paper which was considered as the principal organ of the Ministry in Ontario, the Globe, he thought they could arrive at some favourable conclusion. The Globe, in an editorial on that question said: "It was desirable by all proper means to encourage every class of manufactures, and a direct trade with the West Indies would prove a great benefit to the country." He contended that it was not by closing one's arms and leaving the fate of our industries in the hands of ambitious and unscrupulous foreign competitors, that the first difficulty could be met, as was attempted by the Government last year, but by judicious and well-timed measures of protection and encouragement. As to the establishment of direct trade with the West Indies, he asked if it could be obtained by the monopoly of some subsidized line only. Evidently not; but, as he had said before, by the creation in Canada of a market for the raw products, the principal article of export of those countries. As to the nature and value of the products we could exchange in return, he would mention the following now furnished to the trade of those Islands by the United States; boots and shoes, brushes, brooms, paper, soap, furniture, organs, vinegar, lumber, sashes, doors, agricultural implements, leather belts, rubber goods, safes, nails, scales, spirits, pianos, axes, wooden ware, sewing machines, watches, coal oil, butter, pork, hams, flour, peas, cheese and other articles. Seeing the experience they had had he did not think they ought to allow these industries to remain in operation on the same basis as during the last twelve months. They had lost already the labour of many hundreds of working men who were obliged to go to another country to find the employment they could not obtain here. He knew that property had considerably lessened in value around where the Montreal refinery had formerly been in operation. Whilst we had spent large sums of money to aid in bringing out immigrants, we had been losing some most valuable hands, because they could not find here the labour which they had a right to expect. The Globe further said, in the editorial he had before referred to:

"While it may not be a violation of political economy for the Government of one country to resist, by counteraction, the granting of bonuses by a foreign Government, such action, as well as any changes in the fiscal policy relating to sugar, generally should only be taken after the necessity has been clearly and absolutely demonstrated."

The facts and figures he had quoted could not, he thought, leave room for a doubt as to the existence of such bonuses as those awarded by the United States to their refiners. But the Sugar Cane said:

"We look to Canada to take the lead in stopping so flagrant a breach of free-trade principles, and we see a Canadian committee appointed to examine the question, torturing its witnesses with an unintelligible confusion of figures, taking New York statements for gospel, though they require only to be read to be refuted, refusing to believe the statements of men who have been actually driven out of their business by the facts they state, and then calmly reporting that they have ascertained that it is impossible for American refiners to have a bounty, and that there is no way in which they can have any advantage in the Canadian markets. These gentlemen may be able politicians, but they are evidently unfitted for the very simple arithmetical task undertaken by the Committee."

He was satisfied to leave it to the Minister of Finance and to the majority of the House to reduce into practice the propositions laid down by the Ministerial organ, and to say in what way the disasters of last year could be repaired and these great industries could recover and resume their operations.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: There can be no objection to giving my hon. friend such information as the Customs returns will permit us to furnish. I have not his motion before me, but as far as I have gathered his meaning, I think we can supply all he requires. The discussion of the main question may probably be more fitly reserved until these papers come down; then if my hon. friend or any other hon. gentleman wishes to discuss the question in extenso, we shall be happy to afford him an opportunity of doing so. I would call attention to the fact that when any hon. gentleman talks of the price of sugar being materially affected by the closing of the refinery in Montreal, he would do well to remember that the total consumption of sugar in Canada is only some 50,000 tons, or something like one per cent. of the total production of sugar throughout the world; and, if there has been any very material change, it is infinitely more likely to be owing to the failure of the beet crop in France and other countries, which supplied hundreds of thousands of tons, than to have resulted from the closing of a refinery in Montreal or elsewhere. It is in our power to lay down sugar in this country from

Mr. DESJARDINS.

Great Britain at a cost of  $\frac{1}{4}$  cent per pound at the outside, and, as Great Britain is a country in which sugar is produced under perfectly free conditions, I do not think there can be any very material difference between the price of sugar here and in England, any more, at any rate, than the difference between freight and ordinary commission. The question whether it is or is not for the benefit of the people of Canada to artificially encourage the refining of sugar here is open to argument, but, according to the best information I can obtain, I am confident the people of Canada must make up their minds to lose \$600,000 or \$800,000 of revenue, or to pay that to the sugar refiners, without putting one cent into the Treasury, just for the purpose of establishing this refinery.

SUPERANNUATED AND RETIRED OFFICIALS.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

Mr. CARON moved for a statement showing the names of all persons superannuated or placed on the retired list from 1st January, 1876, to this date.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the information was contained in the returns laid upon the table to-day.

Motion withdrawn.

MAIL SERVICE BETWEEN VICTORIA AND SAN FRANCISCO.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. DECOSMOS moved for copies of all correspondence that has passed between the Postal Department at Ottawa and Post Office Inspector of British Columbia in 1876 and 1877, respecting the Ocean Mail service between Victoria and San Francisco; also a copy of all correspondence between the contractors for such service and the Postal Department within the said period.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE IN THE DISTRICT OF RICH-ELIEU.

MOTION FOR A SPECIAL COMMITTEE.

Mr. BECHARD moved :

“That the entry in the Journals of this House of the 3rd April, 1876, relating to the petition of F. X. A. Biron, Notary, and others, of the District of Richelieu, complaining of the conduct of Mr. Justice Loranger, be now read.”

Motion agreed to.

Entry in the Journals read.

Mr. BECHARD moved :

“That a Special Committee, consisting of Messrs. Bechard, Holton, MacDonnell (Inverness), Appleby, Kirkpatrick, Irving, Masson, Desjardins, Brooks, Baby, Jetté, Taschereau, and Laurier, be appointed to inquire into the administration of justice in the District of Richelieu, in the Province of Quebec; and that the petition of F. X. A. Biron, Notary and others, of the said District of Richelieu, complaining of the conduct of the Honourable Thomas Jean Jacques Loranger, Judge of the Superior Court of the said Province of Quebec, and petition of the Hon. Mr. Justice Loranger be referred to the said Committee, and that the said Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to report from time to time.”

He said he hoped the motion would be allowed to pass. He had endeavoured to prepare a Committee which would be acceptable to both sides of the House, and he had shown the names to the right hon. member for Kingston and the member for Terrebonne. In submitting the motion he was actuated by no personal feelings against the learned Judge, with whom he had had no relations, and no acquaintance. Charges having been made against the learned Judge, it was the duty of the House to inquire and ascertain whether they were well-founded. If they were proved to be without foundation, the learned Judge would be vindicated, but if the contrary were the case, then it would devolve upon the House to apply what remedy it deemed proper.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said it was true that the hon. member had shown him the names of the proposed committee; but he expressed no opinion beyond saying it was a fair Committee. He did not wish to appear as desirous of determining the Committee or as being a party to the arrangement.

Mr. MASSON said the only remark he made to the hon. member for Iberville on the subject was a suggestion that his (Mr. Masson's) name should be omitted from the Committee.

Mr. BABY said a counter-petition had been presented by the learned Judge, which should be referred to the Committee.

Mr. BARTHE: I understand there are two other petitions relating to the same subject. I understand one of the petitions is dated 5th June, 1874, presented by a gentleman of the name of Latour and others, and another petition was presented in February, 1876. I beg to submit, as one of the representatives of the district in which the hon. Judge administers, that the two other petitions be referred to the same Committee as that now proposed to be appointed. This will be in the interest of the Judge as well as in the interest of the people of the district. Though I have not given notice of motion, I ask leave to propose that these two petitions be referred to the Committee proposed by the hon. member for Iberville.

Mr. BLAKE: Perhaps I may be permitted to say that, if I rightly apprehend my hon. friend's motion, it refers to the petitions which have been presented to His Excellency in connection with this matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: This, I think, must be the case.

Mr. BLAKE: These petitions are not yet before the House, and are not susceptible of reference. If, under the circumstances, it would be proper to put them before the Committee, I think it right to say one or two words to the House on the subject. Of course, a motion of this character is one which must be approached with gravity and deliberation. The right hon. gentleman opposite, when acting as leader of the Government and Minister of Justice, had occasion to consider a similar motion, respecting which a Committee was struck; and, upon another occasion, when another specific charge was made, we had an expression from him, stronger perhaps than I could echo. But there can be no doubt whatever, both upon reason and upon authority, that we should not lightly proceed upon an enquiry of this description; and there can also be no doubt, I think, that before we enter into such an enquiry, the charges should be of a grave and serious character,—such as, if established, ought to lead to an address for the removal of the Judge. Anything short of direct and specific accusations is hardly fit for action in Parliament, although it may be subject of observation within these walls, and such a discussion may operate upon public opinion. The charges, although in not very technical form, are laid in such a way as to give the Judge an opportunity of answering them. It seems to me that they are of such a nature that their contradiction may be established by a statement made on the part of the Judge, on hearing the motion. That course ought to be open to him; and there may be cases—and perhaps this is one—in which it would be manifestly impossible for the Judge to enter satisfactorily into such a refutation and explanation of the circumstances as would dispose of the case. Therefore, if there is to be an answer at all, I believe it must be by enquiry. I also agree with my hon. friend who has moved this motion that the mode in which he has selected the Committee is convenient, and these two courses have been proceeded with before by other deliberative bodies. With our short Sessions, the large amount of business before us and the little time we have at our disposal, I think it is very obvious that the enquiry should be made by Committee as suggested. This was also the course which was taken with reference to Judge Lafontaine. I might also suggest that this Committee ought to proceed with all the solemnity possible under such circumstances; and, although, as the House is aware, I am not one of those who are disposed to attach very great importance to our system of taking evidence under oath, yet I think that, while that system prevails in other judicial proceedings, a case of this description is one regarding which advantage should be taken of the Act passed during last session, and my hon. friend ought to follow up this motion—if the House receive it favourably—by moving that the evidence should be taken under oath. The Committee appointed in the case of Judge Lafontaine, at an early meeting, considered the procedure they ought to adopt, and they then determined that the Judge should receive notification, and have opportunity of either attending their sessions in person, or of being represented by counsel. As some of the charges did not appear to be sufficiently specific, and capable of a proper defence being made, they further desired that more specific accusations should be laid against the Judge. The application of the general rule as to the character of the charges and the degree and precision which has attended the allegation might lead to some embarrassment as to our action, were it not for the fact that the learned Judge presented a counter petition, in which he himself earnestly desires that the House should dispose of the matter by reference to a Committee. I am, therefore, sure that the House will see the wisdom of the Committee taking the counter petition into their consideration when they sit. I venture to suggest that it is expedient that the hon. gentleman who made the motion should be very careful in the selection of the members of the Committee. I have looked over the names which he has submitted to the House, and I trust that they will be generally acceptable to the House, and the course which my hon. friend has taken in ascertaining the opinion of some of the leading men on the other side of the House was judicious. A considerable time ago, a petition was presented to the Executive, and I am not sure but that a petition was presented at a more recent time. I apprehend that the petitions referred to are these. I am not quite certain whether one is not a petition presented to the House, but determined not to be in order; of course, that petition could not be referred. Those petitions together with any proceedings which have been taken upon them up to this time, I conceive, under present circumstances, although the proceedings are not complete, are in a fit state to be brought before the House if any member should move for them, and, being so placed in the possession of the House, the petitions and correspondence under them might then be referred to this Committee if the House should think fit. It is proper I should say in regard to these petitions that while they contained certain general charges against the learned Judge—charges so general, that, even if no difficulty intervened, it was thought not fit that the Executive should take any action whatever on them—one of them contained a charge with regard to the demand and receipt of public money for more days, as it was alleged, than the days on which he sat, and for courts at which it was alleged he did not at all sit. Upon that particular branch of the petition addressed to the Executive, inasmuch as there was, although not full information, a considerable degree of information, and inasmuch as it concerned the receipt of public money, which the learned Judge was alleged improperly to have obtained, and the fact that Executive action had proceeded on a somewhat similar case formerly, with a view to the restoration of the money which it was supposed had been obtained through a misapprehension or impropriety, it was thought not improper to tell the petitioners that, if they formulated that particular charge in a more precise shape, the Government would consider whether they would take action on it. They did formulate the charge with great precision and detail. I considered that the Public Accounts and other material would enable me to determine whether I would ask the learned Judge anything whatever about the allegations, and the investigation was proceeding in my office when the steps were taken in the House last Session. Almost contemporaneously with those steps, a notice was placed on the paper for the production before the House of the records of those proceedings which had been going on under the petition to His Excellency. A person approached me on behalf of the learned Judge, and represented that, as he had not had an opportunity of answering those petitions which, it was presumed, contained charges against him, it would not be proper to bring them down in the manner proposed. I quite agreed in that view. It was subsequently thought proper not further to delay the matter, and the complaint was transmitted to the learned Judge. From ill-health and other causes he delayed his answer until very recently; indeed, until within a few days from the opening of the Session. The answer was in very considerable detail, and the petitioners had been allowed to make observations upon it. I have not had time or opportunity to verify the allegations of the answer, but I think it due to the learned Judge to say that, assuming his statement to be in the main correct, it dissipates the allegations of that particular article of the charge. Under these circumstances, it would be quite proper for the hon. member for Richelieu to move, with the consent of the House, or at an early day, for the production of all those papers, with a view to have them submitted to the Committee, if it should be appointed, whose labours would be facilitated by what has already been done in the direction of charge and counter-charge. I have indicated the reasons why I think the House should agree to the motion of the hon. member. I do not think, however, the House is bound, in agreeing to this motion, which the House will observe is in the same words as the former reference in the case of Judge Lafontaine, to consider itself called upon to investigate into all the matters of the charges. I conceive it would be the duty of the Committee, with reference to the various matters of charge contained in the petition to consider which of them are of that degree of gravity to be deserving of enquiry, and that such as were thought of a trivial character, the result of which, if proved, would not amount to a case for censure or the removal of the Judge, should not be proceeded with. That was the course pursued in the case of Judge Lafontaine, who thought himself entitled to demand further and more precise allegations, and it was considered whether upon those charges the learned Judge should be called upon to answer. I agree that the reference should be made, particularly when it is desired by the Judge himself, and the fact of the reference in itself does not cast any reflection on the learned Judge. It is the hope and the belief of every hon. member that the enquiry into this matter will result in the refutation of every charge which may tend to affect the honour, the integrity, and the standing of the learned Judge and the administration of justice in the district. I trust the enquiry will be conducted with all diligence consistent with a proper opportunity being afforded to both sides to marshal facts and obtain witnesses, so that this matter, which has been since 1874 more or less before the public, may be thoroughly, yet speedily, investigated and set at rest for ever.

Mr. BARTHE: I do not refer to the petition which was the object of the last motion; I refer to the petitions presented before the petition now before the House. There are two such petitions, and I observe, from the petition of the Judge himself, that he seeks an investigation not only on the petition now before the House, but on the petitions which have been lying before the Minister of Justice for several years. I beg to submit to the House that it is in the interest of the people of the district of Richelieu, as well as the public generally, and the Judge himself, that an enquiry should proceed on every one of these petitions. My only object in submitting the motion was to seize the House of all the matters relative to the Judge.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Richelieu does not understand the point raised by the Minister of Justice. It is the opinion of the Minister that the petitions named in the hon. member's motion are not petitions in the possession of this House, but petitions sent to His Excellency the Governor General. I am satisfied myself, looking at the motion, that this must be the case, and, therefore, it would be entirely out of the question for these petitions, not being in the possession of the House, to be referred to a committee of the House. They must first be brought before the House, and the Minister of Justice has suggested a mode by which this can be done.

Mr. MOUSSEAU: I rise to a point of order, which must imply a constitutional question, and I venture to submit it to the Minister of Justice. Every hon. member of this House must be glad of the utterances of the Minister of Justice of the respectful hesitancy with which he approached the subject. A good Bench is the best safeguard and bulwark to liberty. The charges brought against the learned Judge are of two kinds: some are specific, others are general and vague. There is no charge relative to the administration of criminal justice. The charge is confined to civil suits. The motion, however, is that a Committee of the House should have the power to investigate into the administration of civil justice in the District of Richelieu. I submit that the administration of justice, in regard to civil matters, pertains exclusively to Local Legislatures, and this Parliament has no power or right to inquire into the administration of justice, civil side, either in Quebec or any other Province. I may, perhaps, be met by the precedent afforded in Judge Lafontaine's case. It may be said that the charges are general, and imply the administration of criminal justice, but the gist of the motion related exclusively to civil matters. Nothing whatever is said against the learned Judge with respect to his administration in criminal courts. The charges, as formulated, related, first, to public money to which, it is alleged, he is not entitled; and, secondly, to what had been done in civil cases, which point is repeatedly mentioned in the petitions. Under these circumstances, I do not understand how a Committee could enquire into the administration of civil justice, and I respectfully submit my doubts to the Minister of Justice for his consideration.

Mr. BLAKE: My hon. friend the member for Bagot will observe that his objection applies equally to the administration of criminal justice, because it must be founded on the provision of the Confederation Act which gives the administration of justice, not civil any more than criminal justice, to the Local Legislatures. If this were a motion to deal with the administration of justice without reference to some specific petition or complaint having for its object the removal of the Judge, it would be of an entirely different character, and it is therefore unnecessary to discuss the precise extent of the powers of the Dominion Parliament in regard to such a reference. But it is obvious that, following the language used in a former case, the Committee should not deem itself called upon to enquire into any points respecting the administration of justice other than those in the petition, or with any other object than that which induced them to consider the question whether the Judge has done anything which ought to lead to his resignation.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. BLAKE moved :

“ That it is desirable that any witness to be examined by the said Committee, be examined on oath.”

Motion agreed to.

Mr. BARTHE moved for copies of the petitions of T. D. Latour and others, dated the 5th June, 1874, and the 2nd November, 1875, presented to the Government, concerning the Hon. Mr. Justice Loranger, and of all correspondence relating thereto.

NORTHERN RAILWAY COMMISSION.

QUESTION AND REPORT.

Mr. MACKENZIE moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. BOWELL enquired whether the report of the Northern Railway Commission, would be laid before the House at an early day.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I present it now.

Mr. MACKENZIE delivered a Message from His Excellency the Governor-General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, which is as follows :---

“ DUFFERIN.

“ The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons the Report of a Commission appointed by Order in Council of 22nd July, 1876, to enquire into the affairs of the Northern Railway Company of Canada.

“ Government House,

“ Ottawa, 15th February, 1877.”

Mr. BOWELL said it had been a matter of complaint in various journals in the Dominion that these reports, by some means or other, had been placed in the hands of certain newspapers before they had been laid on the table, and that this favouritism had been extended to the Ministerial journals only. He had just learned that portions of this report were passing over the telegraph wires to certain newspapers in the West. This was not only improper and unfair with regard to the House, but also unfair to the press generally.

House adjourned at Fifteen minutes to Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The Speaker took the chair at Three o'clock.

COAL OWNERS' PETITION.

SPEAKER'S RULING.

Mr. SPEAKER: In respect to the petition of Henry Mitchell and others, interested in the coal trade and shipping interests of the Dominion, which was not received yesterday, I have to state to the House that I have since considered the question carefully. The objection to the asking of bounties will, I think, only apply to cases where an individual or individuals personally interested ask for such bounty as will be profitable to themselves. Where the petition is of a general character, and is signed by persons other than those immediately interested, and, in fact, asks for a modification or change of the financial or fiscal policy of the Dominion, on the ground that such change will be beneficial to the country at large, then such a petition stands precisely in the same position as one asking for an imposition of taxes for general purposes. On examination of this petition, I may state that I see no reason to conclude that it is signed exclusively by persons immediately and directly interested, and I am therefore of opinion that it can be properly received.

RECEPTION OF PRIVATE BILLS.

MOTION TO EXTEND TIME.

Mr. RYMAL moved that the reception of petitions for private bills be extended ten days from Monday next. He said that the time for their reception, according to the revised rules at present in force, expired on Monday next. He understood that some sixty notices of application for such bills had been made, though only ten petitions had been presented. Another rule, however, he believed, precluded him from making the motion without reference to the Standing Committees. No Standing Committee had as yet been organized, and he was at a loss with regard to what course he should pursue. This he would leave to the House to decide.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the proper mode was to have the Private Bills, and some other Standing Committee organized the day following, when the two Committees could join in the recommendation, and report on Monday.

Mr. SPEAKER directed attention to the 69th Rule.

Mr. BLAKE said he supposed that, under the 69th Rule, it was not within the capacity of the Chairman of the Committee to make a motion which might be now dealt with by the House. It stated that no motion should be maintained until after reference was made. The motion must, therefore, be made, and could only be disposed of by being referred by the House to the Committee.

Mr. HOLTON: Very much of the value of the new rules will be destroyed, I fear, if we return to the old practice of suspending rules. I do not wish to oppose the motion of my hon. friend, but these rules have been very carefully considered, and their object was to secure the earliest presentation of Private Bills, in order to avoid the hustling of them through without proper consideration, towards the close of the Session. The sense of the Committee was that rules could be suspended only when a strong case was made out, and it was felt to be better that parties who are remiss in presenting their petitions and Bills in due time, should pay the penalty of negligence and want of diligence, thus preventing the consequences of which we have had reason to complain. While I do not object to the motion to refer to the proper Committee the question of suspension, yet, when the reports of these Committees are before us on Monday, I think the House should pause before entering on the old practice of suspending these rules indefinitely.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think it but right to inform the House that the subject of giving due information to all parties concerned in Private Bills, as to the changes made in the rules, occupied the attention of myself and the proper officer of the House for some time last fall, and an order was given as the result of our deliberations that, in every case where parties gave notice of their intention to introduce Private Bills, a copy of the new rules relating to the manner in which Private Bills must be introduced should be sent them, so that there is scarcely any excuse to be made on the score of ignorance as to what our rules require.

Mr. RYMAL moved that the question of the extension of the time for the reception of petitions touching Private Bills, be referred to the Standing Committees on Private Bills and Standing Orders.

Motion agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill was introduced and read the first time:—

To incorporate the Maitland Marine Insurance Company. Bill No. 6. (Mr. Goudge.)

AMENDMENT AND CONSOLIDATION OF THE INSURANCE ACTS.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT moved:

“That this House do forthwith go in Committee of the Whole, to consider the expediency of amending and consolidating, as amended, the several Acts respecting Insurance, repealing for that purpose the unrepealed portions of the Acts of Canada, 31 Victoria, Chapter 48; 34 Victoria, Chapter 9; 37 Victoria, Chapter 48; 38 Victoria, Chapter 21; part of the 23rd Section of 38 Victoria, Chapter 20; and Chapter 52 of the Consolidated Statutes for Upper Canada."

Motion agreed to.

(In the Committee.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD asked for explanations.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: The Act, which it is proposed to introduce, founded on these resolutions, is in most respects a copy of the Act which was under consideration by this House, and by the Banking and Commerce Committee during last Session. The chief alteration which will be introduced is one calculated to meet the objections preferred last year by the British and other companies. They complained, and I felt that there was some force in their objections, that it would be a hardship to extend the law retrospectively in regard to their business. That objection I have considered, and I think it will meet their views to introduce a clause exempting their former business from the proposed legislation. I will do so the more readily because I am informed by the Superintendent of Insurance that the deposit in the hands of the Government, which is liable to application to the benefit of Canadian policy-holders, is in many cases quite sufficient for reinsurance purposes; and it will be obvious to the House that these companies, the English ones particularly, are in the main very strong, and, of course, every company, by the natural operation of time, will fall into line, and be precisely harmonized, as to position, with our Canadian companies. This is the only amendment of importance. The bill I propose to introduce shall, as on the former occasion, after being considered and after having passed a second reading here, go to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, where the details can be settled, and any objections, if any be made, may be heard. I might add, that I understand from the officers who have special charge of these matters, that the companies interested express themselves as well satisfied with the bill as they could be expected to be.

Mr. TUPPER: I am very sorry to learn from the statement made by the hon. Minister of Finance, that the result of the attention of the Government being drawn during the last few Sessions, and for some considerable time previous, to the question of life insurance, has not been the adoption of a more comprehensive view, as to the duties of the Government with relation to this very important question. The question of life insurance is one of the greatest possible moment to the whole country. It is the means by which provision is made for a great number of families who otherwise would be left in a very destitute condition. It is a question that has been considered worthy of the attention of all Governments and of all statesmen who have at heart the interests of the great masses of the community, and the events of the past year—the events which have taken place since this Legislature adjourned—have been of a character, I think, to draw the attention of the Government to the great importance of this question more than anything that has previously occurred. The efforts which have been made to obtain the greatest security for the mass of the people depending upon life insurance, by Government inspection, have proved, in some very important instances, to be quite abortive. No doubt the system of inspection taken up by the present Administration is of very great importance. We were inclined to hope that it would be so successful as to secure to a large extent the public confidence in those institutions; but the circumstances which have taken place in the State of New York in connection with some of the largest and most important life insurance companies doing business on this continent, and in Canada, have shown how utterly hopeless it is to expect to obtain security for the public through the agency of Government inspection. Institutions supposed to be the most reliable, supposed to be the most deserving of public confidence, have crumbled away, and left vast numbers of people, who have paid enormous sums of their private means to those companies, without the hope of securing the comfort to their families, when they are obliged to leave them behind, that they expected to do. Those institutions have crumbled into dust and caused widespread misery and misfortune throughout the country. I think the time has arrived when it becomes the duty of the Government seriously to entertain the question of giving some more direct, some more absolute certainty, to persons investing their money in life insurance. It is most desirable, from every point of view, that the policy of insuring lives should be encouraged. It is of the greatest possible moment that such absolute security should be given to persons thus investing their money that the practice, which is not only a wholesome one, but one essential to the general prosperity of the country, should be extended still more widely than heretofore. I believe that if life insurance could be rendered absolutely safe, if it could be removed from the dangers found to attend it under the best management that can be obtained, it would be not only widespread but universal, and the result would be most beneficial to the country. We stand in a peculiar condition in Canada in relation to this matter. We stand on the borders of a great country, a good many of whose companies do business here, and it becomes peculiarly necessary that our people should be protected against any want of security on the part of companies outside the Dominion. It is a fact that over $2,000,000 belonging to the people of this country goes out of Canada annually, and becomes a foreign investment. That fact, I think, is one deserving of the most careful and attentive consideration on the part of the Government. We have every reason to believe, further, that this amount of money will never return; that the companies in which it is invested will become unable to return it, not altogether perhaps on account of mismanagement or fraudulent management in connection with the administration of their affairs, but in connection with the great change in value and profits. This state of things ought to induce the Government to consider the question whether it might not be found practicable to give absolute certainty to parties making investments of this important character and, at the same time, to retain our own money in our own country. I do not say at this moment that it can be done; but I think, if the subject were carefully considered, it might be found entirely practicable to adopt a system of Government security in connection with life insurance that would not only render absolutely secure the money of parties investing, but make the practice of insuring so widespread and universal as to be attended with the greatest possible benefit to the people of Canada. We are continually going abroad to borrow money. If we could adopt a system by which the security of the Government could be given to parties investing in life insurance, the result would be that we would not be obliged to cross the water and go to England or anywhere else to ask for foreign loans. The $2,000,000 per annum now going out of Canada would remain and find investment in this country. I may be met at once with the remark that the difficulty is that life insurance is especially a business which it would be extremely inconvenient for the Government to undertake; that the Government would be exposed to temptation and pressure, which would be calculated to disqualify them from dealing with this important measure in the same way that a private company can. I believe a happy medium can be found to secure to the Government as well as to the country itself absolute security in relation to this matter, without the difficulties which have been suggested. I think that private companies which have shown evidences of their financial soundness and resources, might be allowed to do this business, to stand between the assured and the Government in relation to the examination as to who are proper subjects for insurance and who are not; the money being invested in the funds of the Government, and such security given to the Government as would relieve it of any danger of loss in regard to the matter, while giving absolute surety to the insured. Provision could also be made against any change with regard to the holders of the stock in the company without the consent of the Government, which would give perfect protection against loss or injury at any time. In France there is a system of Government insurance in operation. Precautions have been taken against the insurance of parties who ought not to be insured by providing that no policy shall be paid unless it has been in existence two years. That provision is an almost perfect guarantee against the insurance of lives not entitled to the benefit of life insurance. It might, however, be found impracticable to introduce that system here. My object in speaking was to draw the attention of the hon. the Minister of Finance, and the other gentlemen who are dealing with this question, to the additional distrust in the public mind in consequence of the gigantic failures which have occurred, and the significance of the fact that those companies which were regarded as the strongest on the continent have been found most insecure. Under the circumstances, I think it is the duty of the Government to take the question up and see if it is not possible to give the people some assurance more absolute and perfect than Government inspection, however vigorously or carefully carried on, can accomplish.

Mr. HOLTON: The question brought up by my hon. friend the member for Cumberland is one of very great importance, and one deserving of the attention and careful consideration of the hon. the Minister of Finance and the House. But I am sure the hon. member will agree with me that the matter is hardly yet ripe for legislative treatment. We have not the information necessary to enable us to proceed to legislate upon the subject, which is an important one, and ought to receive the consideration which he invites the Minister of Finance to bestow upon it, and which, at a future day, I have no doubt, the hon. gentleman, if not the Minister of Finance, will invite the House to bestow upon it. The amendments which my hon. friend the the Minister of Finance proposes to the law as it stands are substantially, I understand, those embodied in the Bill of last year, and such as the immediate exigencies of our position call for; and I hardly think we can ask him to stay his hand in inviting the House to enact this necessary legislation in order to consider the perhaps more important subject brought to the notice of the House by the hon. member for Cumberland. My attention has been called to this matter for a year or two past. I cannot say that I have studied it thoroughly, but I have given it some desultory attention, and in the course of the last Session I privately had some conferences with my hon. friend the Minister of Finance in relation to it. I found that he was quite open to suggestions, as I am sure he will be to-day; and it may be a question whether, by means of a Select Committee during the course of the present Session, he would not lay the foundation of some future definite action on the subject. I merely make these remarks in response to the timely and well-poised speech of the hon. member for Cumberland. Of course this is a subject in which we all have a common interest—as much on one side of the House as on the other; and I therefore suggest to the hon. the Minister of Finance, that after giving this matter the preliminary consideration that its importance demands, he might agree to the appointment of a Select Committee to take evidence on, and consider, the subject and submit some tangible scheme for dealing with it to the House.

Mr. WOOD asked the Minister of Finance if the repeal of these various Acts would affect fire insurance offices.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said it was not the intention of the Government to deal with anything but life insurance.

Mr. WOOD said he had a motion respecting life insurance on the paper, but the hon. member for Cumberland had, to a certain extent, forestalled what he had to say. He therefore did not think it necessary to move for the Select Committee of which he had given notice.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he hoped if the Minister of Finance accepted the suggestion of his hon. friend from Chateauguay, he would consent to take charge of the Committee.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: It is so very rarely that I am able to agree with the remarks of my hon. friend from Cumberland that I feel the greatest amount of pleasure in rising to say that, to a very great extent, if not altogether, I do concur with him in reference to the great question now under consideration. I hold that, in dealing with any question of this magnitude, it is of the greatest importance that the Government should not enter into any hasty or not well-considered legislation. It should have the very fullest information and the whole question should be most carefully dealt with. It has not escaped our observation that some very considerable irregularities have occurred in companies which, although doing business on this continent, do not reside here, but have their headquarters in the United States. It has not escaped my attention either that a very considerable class of people who, I have always thought, it was most important should avail themselves of the benefit of life assurance—I refer more particularly to artizans, farmers, and small tradesmen, whose families suffer very great hardships when the breadwinner dies—hardly ever receive any of the benefits of life insurance. I am much inclined to think that, until this class is able to avail themselves of the security afforded by Government and by Government alone, or at any rate of the security which in their minds would be associated with the Government, they will never avail themselves of insurance, except to a very limited extent. Government life insurance in England has failed, in a measure, from reasons which I will not now venture to discuss. In the colony of New Zealand, however, I believe that the project of Governmental life insurance has been tried with marked success. There are some other countries in which it has been attempted, but I am not sufficiently advised to lay the results before the House. However, I may say that the subject has engaged, and will continue to engage, our attention, but I do not at all mean to pledge the Government to legislative action upon it, at any rate for some time to come; and I have some doubts whether, in such distress as exists at present, it is desirable to make such an experiment. Those who have studied the subject agree that the depression has had a most unfortunate effect on insurance, in consequence of the large number of policies which have lapsed. I do not think it wise that a totally new scheme should be proposed now. Moreover, there are practical difficulties which will easily present themselves to hon. gentlemen, with the experience of the hon. gentleman opposite, in the way of the Government working the scheme. As to the other suggestion by the hon. member for Cumberland that it could be worked through private companies, I would not like to express an opinion at present. I shall certainly be open to receive any suggestions on the subject, and am glad that this is a measure in regard to which the Government, if it introduce it, can fairly count upon receiving the support of all sides and parties in this House. Any suggestions which the hon. gentlemen opposite choose to make will be carefully considered, although I must entirely refrain from committing the Government, at present, to any definite line of action.

Mr. WOOD said there was really no Government insurance in England—only a system of Post Office insurance; and the reason for its not being more successful was the mixing up of a practice of selling annuities with life insurance—two things that should be kept perfectly apart.

Resolution agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend and consolidate, as amended, the several Acts respecting Life Insurance, repealing for that purpose the unrepealed portions of the Acts of Canada 31 Victoria, chapter 48--34 Victoria, chapter 9; 37 Victoria, chapter 48; 38 Victoria, chapter 21; part of the 23rd section of 38 Victoria, chapter 20; and chapter 52 of the Consolidated Statutes of Upper Canada.

Resolution ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Resolution reported.

Mr. MASSON called the attention of the Government to this fact,—that in the correspondence which had been furnished in reference to the Jesuits' Barracks, Quebec, the most important part had been left out, viz., the correspondence which was going on at the moment the motion was made last Session.

Mr. BLAKE said he observed the papers brought down were incomplete. He presumed the officer who prepared the Return had followed the ordinary rule of making it complete only to the date of the motion. He had no doubt, however, that the rest of the correspondence could be brought down without another motion being necessary.

INSOLVENT ACTS REPEAL BILL.

[BILL No. 2.]

(Mr. Barthe.)

SECOND READING PROPOSED.

Order for second reading of Bill (No. 2) "To repeal the Insolvent Acts now in force in the Dominion of Canada," read.

Mr. BLAKE: Before my hon. friend rises, I would ask him not to proceed with the second reading of the bill today. As I said in answer to my hon. friend from East Durham, the Government has under consideration some proposed amendments to the Insolvency Act. If it happened that the amendments regarded minor matters of detail, such as those to which the attention of the House last Session was invited, they, of course, would not materially affect the important question which the hon. gentleman's bill raises; but if they involve more important matters, it might not be unreasonable for the House to have before it the alternative propositions—that of the Government and that of the hon. gentleman,—if such were made by the Government before the disposal of the hon. gentleman's Bill. I think the convenience of that course will be obvious. I would ask the hon. gentleman to consent to a postponement of the second reading for a week, at any rate.

Mr. BARTHE: I should be very happy to comply with the wishes of the hon. the Minister of Justice, but for personal reasons I have made up my mind to press this Bill. I am quite willing to postpone the Bill until Monday, if it suits the Government.

Mr. BLAKE: Say Monday week.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I hope my hon. friend from Richelieu will consent to the suggestion of the Minister of Justice to postpone this second reading until Monday week. Then we can have the whole subject discussed.

Mr. BARTHE: As it is the desire of the House, I will comply, provided it be understood that it be the first order on Monday week.

Mr. BLAKE: I do not wish that there should be any misunderstanding. I have every hope that the propositions of the Government may be matured by that time, and therefore I name it. But circumstances may arise under which we would have to ask the indulgence of the House for a further postponement.

Order discharged, to stand the first order for Monday week.

THE "NORTHERN LIGHT" STEAMER.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. PERRY moved for a copy of the contract with Mr. Sewell for building the steamer "Northern Light," report of Inspector and Agent, telegrams, and all other documents connected with the same; also, correspondence between the Department and the Agent at Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, and the number of trips up to date. He said he desired to give the Government an opportunity of showing whether the steamer, the "Northern Light," was substantially built and suitable for the purpose or not. He saw it stated in some of the papers that the Government did not intend to carry out the present scheme of communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. It was necessary that the papers should be brought down to ascertain whether the Government had acted honestly or not. The communication had been a great boon to the people of the island, as it brought them into relations with the people of the other Provinces, and enabled goods to be carried backward and forward. So far as he could see the steamer was not a humbug. It had made trips in three and a half hours, and that in ice running from eighteen to twenty inches in thickness. The people he represented were satisfied the Government had acted sincerely. He thought a Commission of three persons ought to be appointed to see which was the best place for a ferry. It was for the interest of the island that there should be only one ferry for the Government steamer.

Mr. POPE (Queen's, P. E. I.) said he agreed with the remarks of the hon. member with regard to the two points between which the steamer should run in winter. He did not look upon this vessel as a great success. At the same time he had no desire to find fault with the Administration on this account, as he believed they allowed the Maritime Province members to settle it pretty much their own way. He did not wish at the present time to say much against the "Northern Light," but, in his opinion, she was not capable of doing her work in the solid or fixed ice, although he thought she might answer very well for working her way through drift or floating ice. When Charlottetown River was fast frozen over last autumn, she made an attempt to tow one or two schooners loaded with potatoes out through about four inches of soft ice, but could not manage it. She succeeded with difficulty in getting out herself some two miles beyond the harbour's mouth, bound to Pictou, but returned, being unable to proceed further. She made a second and a third attempt and returned. The last time, she broke the ice up to the railway wharf, for the purpose of coaling, when it took her more than an hour to break sufficient ice, then about seven inches thick, to enable her to turn round. After about a week, during half of which time she was drifting up and down the Gulf in the ice, she succeeded in reaching Georgetown, where Mr. Sewell afterwards joined her. The Newfoundlanders had a great deal of experience in ice-breaking vessels, and all theirs were built with over-hanging stems, which facilitated their being forced up on the ice. Besides this, the main breadth of their vessels was near the bow, and, when they broke the ice down, the rest of the vessel passed through easily; whereas the "Northern Light" was much the shape of a wedge, and when she broke through she wedged herself in nearly her whole length, and could not go further without first backing out and running full speed at it again. Another great objection to the "Northern Light" was her great draught of water, which was over 17 feet, whereas she should not exceed 12 feet. On this account she could not enter many of the harbours. Murray Harbour was about 10 or 12 miles nearer Pictou than Georgetown. It was open all the year round, and if a steamer must run to Pictou in winter, this was the port on the island side which she should run to; but there were only 12 or 13 feet of water at the entrance to the harbour, and the "Northern Light," of course, could not go in. Again, should this vessel be caught out in a gale of wind with extremely cold weather, bound to Pictou, she would be unable to extricate herself from the ice, and would probably be carried on some of the reefs or ledges of rock between Pictou Island and Cariboo and be lost altogether. He hoped the Government would accept the suggestions made, and place her in the most suitable locality, where the whole mail service could be concentrated, and where, during very cold weather when she would be unable to run, the mails could be carried regularly in the ice boats, for it must be borne in mind that, in all time to come, the mails would and must be carried via Cape Traverse. The adoption of this route would necessitate the construction of a railroad from the main line on the Island, to Cape Traverse—a distance of 10 or 12 miles, and in New Brunswick from Aulac to Cape Tormentine—a distance of about 30 miles. Should this be accomplished, the water communication in summer, as well as in winter, would be reduced to a mere ferry of 8 or 9 miles between New Brunswick and the Island, and the travel would all be this way. The expectations of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries' constituents, who had been promised something, would thus be realized. He must again express a hope that the Government would adopt this route and make the necessary arrangements to carry it into effect.

Mr. DAVIES said he thought it would have been better had the delegations that had come up to make arrangements for Confederation negotiated for the construction of two short railway branches, one between Cape

Tormentine and Aulac, about 33 miles in length, and the other between Cape Traverse and the Island system, about 10 miles in length. With regard to the provisions for winter steam communication some little delay had occurred. In the first instance, sufficient time had not been allowed for the building of the boat, for which it was found that two years were required. The steamer had been stationed where the boats crossed, in a narrow passage; and it had been thought desirable to place her where the Straits of Northumberland opened below Pictou, a large basin perhaps forty miles in diameter. There were no dangerous reefs in that locality, and as early crossing from Cape Tormentine was very difficult, until the ice became firm, this was considered the proper position. This, he believed, however, lay between Georgetown and Pictou. The performance of this steamer had, in his opinion, completely solved the question of the winter navigation of the St. Lawrence. He was not prepared to estimate its value, but the steamer had crossed during the last four weeks the most difficult part of the Gulf, into which the ice was blown, owing to the western winds. As the channel was comparatively narrow, of course passage was rendered more difficult for the steamers than would be the case in the large open parts of the Gulf, which were at least half covered with unfrozen water. What the hon. member from Queen's had said with respect to the performance of the steamer in the harbour ice was, in the main, correct. He believed that the steamer had not succeeded in breaking through the harbour ice, which was more than eight or nine inches thick, but as far as hummocky, field and floe ice was concerned, she had proved to be admirably adapted for the purpose, even far surpassing their expectations. As he had previously stated, the western winds had driven the ice down, a greater quantity having accumulated than during the last five winters, which were all severe. The pressure of the ice did not at all affect the steamer as, under such circumstances, she rose beyond the reach of danger. It would be difficult, he thought, to build a steamer better adapted for both harbour and channel winter navigation. On the whole, the venture had been a success. It was questionable whether it would not be better to remove the steamer from the narrow passage at Cape Tormentine. It was possible that she might be able to do her work there, but it would be much more dangerous. On each side of the Straits was stationed fixed ice, termed port ice, fastened to the shore, for an extent of a mile or a mile and a half, remaining there throughout the winter. By cutting docks in the ice, the steamer could run from side to side, taking advantage of these openings. At Cape Tormentine was, however, situated a very dangerous reef of rocks, and with a rapid current of five or six knots; the steamer, if carried on the rocks, would inevitably be lost, and no such peril existed where she was at present stationed. Mr. Sewell, who, no doubt, was a very good judge regarding these matters, considered navigation between Cape Tormentine and Cape Traverse quite practicable for the steamer, but as to this he was not prepared to give any decided opinion. If nothing else had been done it had been demonstrated that winter navigation was practicable and easy, and the steamer had done good service for the money she had cost.

Mr. McINTYRE remarked that this subject was a matter of very great interest to the inhabitants of the Maritime Provinces, and of Prince Edward Island particularly. The failure of the steamer to do her work, in the harbour of Charlottetown last fall, was due, in his opinion, principally to the inexperience of the persons placed in charge, a fact which, of course, was not surprising under the circumstances, the enterprize being new and unusual, and one to which all were strangers at the time. However, since Mr. Sewell had superintended operations, the steamer had made perfectly regular trips. He was on board the boat on the third of this month, and had been greatly surprised at the facility with which she worked her way through the ice. The first night they were out, the ice closed around the boat—in the language of the ice, she "got nipped,"—but the effect was to raise her nearly out of the ice, and, if this had not occurred, he believed that she would have been crushed to pieces like an egg shell. Such would certainly occur if she were of any other construction than she was. Georgetown was one of the best positions, if not the best, on the island. Pictou harbour was subject to being blocked up with ice, when the wind came from the North-East. Cape George, where there was an excellent breakwater and an abundance of water, offered more favourable inducements; and a small branch, to connect with the Eastern Extension Railway now under contract, he considered should be built, and the steamer should run between Georgetown and Cape George. He thought a passage between Cape Tormentine and Cape Traverse would never answer, because the channel, being narrow, was, during the greater part of the season, choked up with ice. As regarded the docks which had been mentioned, he thought they would easily fill with ice; and, with reference to the building of piers at Capes Tormentine and Traverse, the bottom being sandy would render their permanence doubtful, while the action of the ice and the sea would carry them away. Besides, the expense of building a line of railway from Cape Tormentine to Aulac station, and a line of about the same extent on the island, in all over sixty miles, would cost, with the piers, not less than half a million of dollars. He was sure that no one wished to see a repetition of what had occurred in the harbour of Charlottetown last fall, and he believed that this would be the result if the steamer were taken off her present route.

Mr. McISAAC said that, although he did not represent any portion of Prince Edward Island, he felt he had a right to express an opinion on the subject before the House. The steam communication under consideration, as forming one of the articles of Union, was a matter in which every member of this House, especially every member from the Maritime Provinces, should feel an interest. From the very contradictory accounts just given of the success of the "Northern Light," by the gentlemen representing the Island, he found it delicate to be obliged to say that they all did not give a correct statement of facts. He was far, however, from insinuating that any hon. gentleman had told this House what he did not believe to be true. The "Northern Light" had been said by some to be a success, by others to be the reverse; but, from what had been heard to-night, and what had been published in the papers for several weeks past, his opinion was that it was impossible for any person here to see how far she had been able to accomplish her undertaking. Under the terms of Union, the Dominion was bound to maintain a steam communication for carrying mails and passengers between the Island and the mainland. So far, Pictou was the only point on the mainland she had been struggling to reach. Important as Pictou had a right to be considered, he was of opinion that the boat should be allowed, or rather, should be made to test other termini on the mainland before the country was in a position to say how far she was able to fulfil her engagements. When she first began her work, Charlottetown was her Island terminus. As had been stated, the ice proved too thick for her, but when the enterprising builder, Mr. Sewell, appeared and took charge, she soon, in his hands, overcame what some people were willing to regard as a proof of her unfitness. With him she leaped out of her difficulties and demonstrated the fault was not hers. Afterwards, Georgetown was made the terminus, and since then she had been plying between that point and Pictou with considerable success—a success sufficient to prove the feasibility of winter communication between the Island and the rest of the Dominion. To test what she could do, he maintained that she should be made to try other termini on the mainland. One place especially should be tried, namely, Cape George, which had already a large pier built by the Dominion. The distance between this point and Georgetown was not greater than that between the latter place and Pictou. And, besides, in a direct course between these two points, the ice, owing to its proximity to the Strait of Canso and the entrance between Prince Edward Island and the Island of Cape Breton, never packed so solidly as it did farther west in the Strait of Northumberland. To show that Cape George should be tried, if not adopted as a mainland terminus, he stated that three or four winters ago the Prince Edward Island mails were landed there when Pictou could not be approached. Some might have an interest in stating that land travelling from Cape George was difficult. His answer was that the pier was about fifteen miles from a railroad at present under contract, and connecting with the Truro and Pictou Railroad. In view of these facts he suggested that the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries should give instructions that this terminus should be tested in order to give the country a full opportunity of seeing how far the present arrangement to effect a winter communication between the Island and the mainland would be successful.

Mr. SINCLAIR said he thought the Government would soon find that they would have to change the route of the boat, because no business man would be contented with irregular business communication if it could be avoided. The present available route, in his opinion, lay between Capes Tormentine and Traverse, and, if this were selected and piers provided for shelter for the commencement of winter, he believed that after winter set in, the boat could make provision for herself. For mails and passengers, the route by the Capes was much more certain, for, when the steamer could not cross, the ice-boats could, and the same crew could work both. The route by the Capes also had a great advantage as a speedy route, for it struck the Intercolonial Railroad at a point very favourable for travellers or mails going east or west. The matter should be so arranged that winter communication could be carried out fully and pretty regularly. The Government should appoint a disinterested Commission to examine the Straits of Northumberland while full of ice, and, if it considered that the steamer could run between the Capes mentioned as well as where she at present was running, he thought it would come to the conclusion that the former was the proper route. The Government spared no pains or expense in building a strong and efficient boat, and, in fact, she had done more than the most enlightened residents about the Straits ever considered probable. The winter navigation of the Straits, in his opinion, was now accomplished. Some considered that a steamer propelling through the ice would require a screw so deep that it would not be interfered with by floe ice, but he was informed that in Newfoundland the screws of steamers passing through the ice were protected by a strong web of iron, and it might be better if this one was so, and drew less water. The steamer had done well, and Mr. Sewell deserved, in consequence, great credit. It was yet but an experiment, and no doubt would be greatly improved.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said he was very glad that his hon. friend had made this motion, as it had created a discussion which had certainly been very complimentary with regard to the Government, and peculiarly pleasing to himself, inasmuch as the enterprise was immediately connected with his Department. He was gratified also with the moderate tone of the hon. member from Queen's, who bore testimony to the efficiency of this boat, which, when it first arrived at Prince Edward Island, was said to be an utter failure and totally unfit for the service. Many severe criticisms were passed respecting her, but time had shown their injustice, and now the testimony establishing the success of the enterprise had really become extraordinary. As to where the point of communication on the Island side would be, he was not at present in a position to state, but of course he had a very strong conviction on the subject, as he always had, but further enquiry was necessary before the Government could come to a conclusion regarding this matter. The papers would soon be laid before the House, and he thought they would fully bear out all that had been said in favour of the Government touching this subject. Everything that was possible had been done to make the enterprise a success, for neither pains nor money, so far as was consistent with economy, had been spared in this connection. He was very much gratified to learn that the members from Prince Edward Island were so much in favour of the course taken by the Government. The crew was taken from the Island, because the Government felt that the inhabitants of Prince Edward Island were more interested than any others in the Dominion in the success of the enterprise. Many of them had enjoyed a very wide experience touching winter navigation, and Mr. Sewell had certainly shown surprising skill and judgment respecting this matter.

GOVERNMENT LIFE INSURANCE

MOTION WITHDRAWN.

Mr. WOOD, with reference to his notice of motion for a Select Committee to take into consideration the question of life insurance, observed that, in consequence of the action of the Finance Minister respecting this question, it was quite unnecessary for him to move for a Select Committee. During the past three or four years, he had given considerable attention to the question, and he was very glad to see that a strong feeling in favour of such a system had grown up in the country. A number of the members of the House had also paid a great deal of attention to the question, and he hoped that, at a very early day, the Government would feel called upon in the interests of the public and policyholders to adopt the system in question, as it would create unbounded confidence among intending insurers. Before the close of the Session, he would, possibly, have an opportunity of addressing the House regarding this matter, if the Government again brought it up; but, in the mean time, he would ask that his notice of motion be dropped.

DISMISSALS FROM OFFICE.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

Mr. CAMPBELL moved for returns of all tenders and contracts for the construction of a harbour at Ingonish, Nova Scotia, the names of the parties to whom the contract was awarded; showing if it was awarded to the lowest tender; the names of the parties to whom the contract was subsequently transferred, and of their securities since the commencement of the work; the dates of such transfers; the amount of the original contract; and if the contract has been completed in accordance with the original plans and specification; if not, the reason why; also, if the contract has been taken off the hands of the contractors, and if so, when; also, what portion of the original plans and specifications have not been finished or completed, and what further sums are to be paid to the contractors for what work they have performed, and if it is the intention to finish the works in accordance with the original plans and specifications; also the amount paid for superintendence of contract and to whom paid; also copies of correspondence between the Government and the contractor relative to relieving him of the contract in order that he might contest the County of Victoria for the vacant seat. His object in making this motion, he explained, was to clear up a good deal of mystery connected with these transactions. The disclosures of the secret arrangements which had been made could not be expected, but something wrong existed in relation to the contract in question, and the contractor, who was a supporter of the present Administration. He thought it only just to his hon. friend the Minister of Militia that he should notice the subject in his presence, in order to give him an opportunity of setting himself right before the country. He had had only the kindest regards for the hon. gentleman during several years past, and he felt sorry that the hon. gentleman's conduct respecting this matter had to be placed before the country. It was only right that the hon. gentleman should explain the character of the arrangements made with these contractors. By certain parties, the report of the Minister of Public Works, touching the harbor of Ingonish, was regarded as being very indefinite, and the hon. Minister informed them that vessels entered this harbour, but he did not state what was the size of those vessels. Perhaps they were only of three or four tons burden. He (Mr. Campbell) desired to secure the papers, and to obtain fuller information on the subject. It was wrong for members of the Government to go down into a county, and intrigue with their own subordinates to induce them to attempt to enter the House; and he considered that this was unpardonable conduct on the part of Ministers of the Dominion. If they were to have free institutions and the enjoyment of liberty in this country, Ministers of the Crown should act constitutionally; or else what was to prevent the Government of the day, armed with all the money and influence which was at its disposal, from tyrannizing over the people. In this manner they might recruit their ranks. He had had no intention of contesting the election, as it did not suit his purposes, until he discovered that the Government of the day was resorting to corrupt practices, of which he complained. He supposed that this had been done to satisfy the feelings of revenge the Government entertained in his regard, in consequence of insubordination on his part—because he did not approve wholly of the policy of the present Administration. This he considered tyrannizing. He had frequently expressed his sentiments, and had suggested the needs of the country, but the Government would not listen to him. The facts connected with these matters had converted him into a bitter and avowed opponent of the present Administration. His opponent during the contest had been relieved from the obligations of his contract, which concerned the amount of $58,000; and, from what he could understand from the report of the Minister of Public Works, the reports in this relation had been fixed. The House should strongly condemn such transactions, because if they permitted the Government to use the means at their disposal in order to corrupt constituencies, the country would be placed entirely at the mercy of the Administration of the day.

Mr. MACKENZIE: There is no objection at all to the production of the papers the hon. gentleman calls for. With regard to the former part of the motion, the contract was let early in 1873, and the papers, therefore, go back some years. With regard to the latter portion of it, Mr. Ross, on the 9th September, applied for permission to retire from the contract. That application was submitted to Mr. Perley, the Engineer of the Department, with the simple query, "Is this work nearly completed? Do you see any objection to this?" On the 25th September, Mr. Perley stated in reply that there was no objection to Mr. Ross being relieved from his share of the responsibility. Mr. Ross was then applied to in the usual form to procure the consent of the sureties to his retirement, without which he could not be permitted to retire, in order that the Government might retain hold of the contracting form. On the 29th October, Mr. Ross, for some reason or other, withdrew his application to retire from the contract, and that is the last paper in our possession. The papers will be brought down, I presume, on Monday or Tuesday.

DISMISSALS FROM OFFICE.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. CAMPBELL moved for a return of correspondence with John Baine, Angus Morrison and Charles L. Campbell regarding their dismissal from office as seizing and landing officers at Great Bras d'Or, and the reasons for said dismissals. He said the hon. the Premier had announced that no officials should be removed, except for reasons assigned. The dismissal of these men, however, was scarcely in pursuance of that policy. The men did not know on what grounds they were removed. The persons who succeeded them were receiving 50 per cent. more salary, which was scarcely in accord with the professions of economy and retrenchment made by hon. gentlemen opposite. He did not approve of the hon. the Premier announcing one policy and acting upon another. The real reason of those dismissals was a bargain made by the Minister of Militia with the contractor, that all subordinates who did not vote for the Government should be discharged.

Mr. BURPEE said one of the men referred to was 68 years old, and another 74 or 75. Whatever action was taken in the matter was on the recommendation of the Inspector. The Department knew nothing about politics. One of the officials referred to only received $60 a year, which was not enough for any one to make a complaint about. If the hon. gentleman had examined the matter more closely, he would have perceived that, instead of there being an increase of salaries at that port, there was a considerable reduction. Mr. Campbell's dismissal was recommended by the Inspector and consented to by the gentleman himself, who considered that his services at his business were worth a great deal more to him than his salary as an official of the country.

Mr. TUPPER: I think the House will listen with great surprise to the explanation just offered by the hon. the Minister of Customs. As my hon. friend the member for Victoria has stated, the hon. the leader of the Government said in his place in this House that the settled policy of this Administration was to permit the displacement of no official from office except for reasons assigned, and that apart for any political consideration. Now, the hon. member for Victoria says: "I came here as your supporter a year or two ago, and I gave you an independent support on every question on which it was in my power to do so. Where I conscientiously differed from you, where I considered your views and principles and policy contrary to the interests of the country, I was reluctantly compelled, as an independent member of the House, to refuse my support. For that reason I am made to suffer the penalty. My son, holding a small subordinate position, has been displaced and dishonoured—as far as the Government can do it— not because he failed in any duty to his country, but because I would not become the tool and instrument and slave of a corrupt Administration." That is the declaration, that is the charge, which my hon. friend has made against the Ministry in this House. He says: "My friends who supported me, my son, who gave me his vote, are deprived of small offices held at the hands of the Government—driven out of public office and other men put in their place. With a view of saving money? No. My friends, who gave me an independent support are deprived of office, and three supporters of this Administration are put in their places at a largely increased cost to the country." Those men were driven out of office without a charge assigned. All the disgrace, all the obloquy, all the punishment that the Government can inflict upon them is inflicted; and when the hon. member asks for an explanation, the Minister of Customs tells us that it was on the report of an inspector. Is the character of a public servant in this country come to this? Are the reputations of the public servants come to this—that they are to be struck down and deprived of office and driven out of office, after having exercised their free and independent franchise, on the report of a pliant inspector? I say that is not the spirit of the public service of this country. I rejoice to know that both the great parties of this country have been compelled by an independent public sentiment to refuse to accept or acknowledge such a doctrine; and I believe, wherever it is attempted to be practised by anybody, it will be visited, as it ought to be, in the interest of the people of this country, by the universal condemnation of men of all parties. My hon. friend says that a Minister of the Crown went down and made a bargain with a public contractor, relieving him of his contract; and then the press supported the Government and came out with their challenges to the opposition to "Come on!" There was the Government candidate, the man who yesterday was a public contractor, who was outspoken as a denunciator of the Government. He is interviewed by a Minister, and is relieved of his contract. The hon. gentlemen on the other side have sometimes taunted me by saying that I stood alone and unsupported in this House; and yet, when they felt called upon to fill a judicial appointment, did the Minister of Justice select a man prominent for his legal talents and qualifications? Let them ask their supporter, the hon. member for Cape Breton, if the selection was made on that account. Why, Sir, the paper which the hon. gentleman is supposed to inspire and edit proclaimed to the people of this country that the judicial office was filled not on account of the attainments of the person who filled it. What happened in the matter under discussion? My hon. friend, who formerly represented the county, on going down to the city of Halifax in connection with his business, was asked to come forward; but he declined. He said his business would not permit him, and knowing that the county was safe to exercise a free and independent opinion, he refused. The hon. gentleman who was returned by a large majority came here as an independent representative; but it was stated on the hustings, as it was on the floor of this House, that his opponent was not a free man. Is it any wonder that the hon. gentleman tells the Administration it was beneath them to carry down this feeling of revenge to matters so small and unworthy? He expressed a sentiment that will be re-echoed from one end of the country to the other. I tell the Administration it is by acts of that character, undeserving the support of anybody, that this overwhelming change in public sentiment all over the country, wherever the free and independent voice of the people gets an opportunity of being heard, is accounted for.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The characteristic reply or speech of the hon. gentleman will surprise none of those who are used to hearing him. The hon. gentleman assumes, as a matter of fact, that these men were dismissed for political reasons, when he was told that they were not. The hon. gentleman bases his whole speech upon this false assumption. If the hon. gentleman were honest and fair in his expression of opinion, he would say that this Government have shown the utmost possible forbearance to the people whom he, a month before he went out of office, appointed to positions in his own Province. Every person knows that he replaced the inspector a few days before he left office; now he chooses to affect ignorance of him. It is a fact that this Government did not dismiss a single individual, from one end of the country to the other, for political reasons, strongly as we were pressed by the scandalous conduct of the Ministry who preceded us to do something of that kind. Yet the hon. gentleman has rewarded us by this coarse abuse in which he from time to time indulges in the House. We have endeavoured to act upon the principle that no person should be dismissed for political reasons, unless he was charged with something else that would afford a proper reason rather than an excuse for his dismissal. I have known, under the old Government, a public officer occupying a high position taking the course on a public platform of advocating the cause of the Government of which he was a servant. Has any one known of any such scandalous abuse of office under this Administration? The hon. gentleman says that the hon. the Minister of Militia did not rise and explain the matter and contradict the charges. The proper and regular steps were taken at the time in the matter. If the gentleman who was a candidate had been elected without giving up his contract, he would have been disqualified. When the hon. gentleman from Cumberland chooses to say that this Administration has lost the confidence of the country, he will find, notwithstanding the extreme depression which has prevailed, notwithstanding the difficulty which the Government have had to contend with, that the Administration and the supporters of it, possess the full confidence of this country, and that the other members of this House are quite as capable of appreciating the value of the public opinion of this country as the hon. gentleman himself.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland): The hon. member for Cumberland speaks of political influence being used by or against public officials. I gave direct instructions, immediately on my taking office, that not one of the officials, from the highest to the lowest, was to be interfered with on account of his politics. I do not now know anything about the political opinions of the employés in my department.

Mr. VAIL: As my name has been brought prominently forward, it may be necessary for me to make a few observations in order that the House should understand how far I am responsible for the charges made against me. The hon. member for Victoria, I believe, on the hustings at Baddeck, took advantage of the opportunity, in presence of the then candidate, Mr. Ross, to state that an improper bargain had been made by the Dominion Government, whereby Mr. Ross was to receive $50,000 for extras on the Ingonish Breakwater contract, provided he would come forward as the Government candidate. And, notwithstanding that Mr. Ross gave this a prompt denial, the hon. member for Victoria has continued to repeat it up to the present time. When the hon. member for Victoria addressed the House, the matter seemed to be of so little importance that I thought it hardly necessary to occupy the time of the House by a reply; but, as the hon. member for Cumberland has thought proper to refer to it, I may be pardoned for expressing a little surprise that the hon. member should so suddenly work himself up to a fever heat, and accept the statement of the hon. member for Victoria as a fact, and charge the Minister of Militia with having gone down to the county and made a corrupt bargain with Mr. Ross to get him to become a candidate. I say I am amazed and astonished beyond measure, that the hon. gentleman, with all his experience in public life, and well knowing how little reliance is to be placed on rumours circulated at the time of an election, would dare to get up in the presence of the members of this House, and endorse the statement that I had made a corrupt bargain with a Government contractor. As I have already said, the grievance of the hon. member for Victoria seemed so insignificant and frivolous that I determined to make no reply, but, as the hon. member for Cumberland has taken the case up, continued silence on my part might be misinterpreted by my opponents and misunderstood by my friends, and it is therefore quite proper that I should state a few facts in connection with this matter. There was a rumour, before I left Ottawa for Nova Scotia, that Mr. Ross intended to run for the county in the Government interest. When I mentioned it to my hon. friend the Premier, he at once said: "He cannot be a candidate; he is a contractor, and consequently ineligible." I then thought it incumbent on me to explain to Mr. Ross that, unless his contract was completed, he could not be a candidate, and I so stated it to Mr. Ross when I saw him at Truro; since which time I have had no correspondence with him in reference to the contract. If, after that statement, the hon. member for Cumberland will get up and repeat his allegation, I think we may very properly conclude that his capability for stating things that have very little foundation in fact has not been over-rated. My hon. friend has referred to another matter in connection with the dismissal of customs officials in the county of Victoria. This I know nothing about, but I think he is the last member in this House who should condemn it, after the Minister of Customs had stated that, to the best of his recollection, they were removed on the report of Mr. Kerr, who, it is well known, was appointed by the hon. gentleman himself only a few days before he left office, and who, I am informed, is a brother-in-law of the hon. member.

Mr. TUPPER: The gentleman is no connection of mine whatever.

Mr. VAIL: This may be true, but at all events this gentleman was removed from the office of Collector of Customs at Amherst, and made Inspector, in order to make place for the hon. gentleman's brother as collector at that port; so, if this be true, and we all know it is, the hon. member for Cumberland should not find fault with the Government for adopting Mr. Kerr's recommendation. The hon. member for Cumberland, when charging me with making a corrupt bargain with a public contractor, thought proper to denounce the Government in very strong language for using the power they had over the officials and servants for political purposes; but the hon. member need not expect that, with his public record in regard to public officials, the present Government need be afraid of anything he may say seriously affecting them in the country, for it is proverbial in Nova Scotia that no election took place there during the reign of the late Government, either for the Dominion or Local elections when the Dominion officials were not marshalled in full force in favour of the Dominion Government and against the Local Government of Nova Scotia. In fact, it is well known that a letter was written by the Minister of Customs to the Customs' officials at Halifax, requesting them to go and vote for the Government, and yet the hon. member for Cumberland would have us believe that the present is the most corrupt Government that ever existed. In conclusion, let me tell the House there was nothing in connection with the Victoria election from the beginning to the end that I would object to writing out and laying on the table to be read by every member of the House.

Mr. MACKENZIE suggested that it was scarcely worth while for the House to meet again after six.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: In that case, I will move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion to adjourn Debate agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

THE ESTIMATES.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT delivered a Message from His Excellency.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, and it is as follows:—

“DUFFERIN:

“The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons estimates of sums required for the service of the Dominion for the year ending 30th June, 1878, and, in accordance with the provisions of the British North American Act of 1867, he recommends these estimates to the House of Commons.

“GOVERNMENT HOUSE, Ottawa.

“16th February, 1877.”

House adjourned at Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The Speaker took the chair at Three o'clock.

PETITIONS FROM UNITED STATES CITIZENS.

SPEAKER'S RULING.

Motion being made, “That the petitions of the several Boards of Trade, of the City of Detroit, U. S., of the City of Chicago, U. S., of the City of Oswego, U. S., of the City of Toledo, U. S., of the City of Cleveland, U. S., and of the Chamber of Commerce of the City of Milwaukee, U. S., severally praying for some mitigation of the evils attendant upon the detention of steamers and vessels with passengers, crews, and cargoes upon the canals from Saturday night until Monday morning, be now received,”

Mr. SPEAKER said: These are the petitions to which I drew the attention of hon. members on both sides of the House when they were laid on the table. They are petitions from citizens of the United States, asking us to make certain changes or alterations in our internal arrangements. My impression is that citizens of the United States or other aliens have no right whatever to petition this House, and that this House ought not to receive petitions from the citizens of a foreign country who are not living in this country at the time of presentation. The case brought before the English House of Commons to which I referred will be found in a paper now lying on the table, and I would ask the senior members of both sides of the House to direct their attention to this matter, so that we may lay down some fixed rule for the future guidance of Parliament. No doubt petitions of this character will come Session after Session, and it is one of those matters which ought to be dealt with. My own opinion, and it is a very strong one, is that the petitions ought not to be received.

Mr. HOLTON: What is the prayer of the petitions?

Mr. SPEAKER: The prayer is that certain alterations be made in relation to the regulation of our canals. Steamers have to be stopped on Sundays and it is prayed that this be changed,—something to that effect. If hon. members have no objection or suggestion to make, I shall rule that these petitions ought not to be received. That is the distinct ruling in the Boulogne case in the English House of Commons.

Mr. HOLTON: In that case, although the Committee did not give reasons for the conclusions they arrived at, they gave the evidence leading up to the conclusion---that such petitions ought not to be received. I think the House will sustain you, Sir, in the decision.

Mr. SPEAKER decided: That these petitions can not be received, on the ground that aliens, not resident in this country, have no right to petition this Parliament, and that this House can not receive any petitions from such persons.

PRAYERS IN THE HOUSE.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE CONCURRED IN.

Mr. MACDONALD (Toronto) presented the Report of the Special Committee appointed to consider and report the desirability of using a form of prayer in this chamber, which was read.

Mr. MACDONALD (Toronto) moved concurrence in the said report. Motion agreed to.

Mr. SPEAKER said he thought there should be a distinct understanding as to when the prayers should be read—whether before the doors were opened or afterwards.

Mr. HOLTON said it was the practice in the Senate to have the prayers before the doors were opened.

Mr. DYMOND said that was also the practice in the English Parliament.

Mr. SPEAKER said he thought some hon. gentlemen might desire the occupants of the galleries to be present.

Mr. HOLTON said the reason for reading prayers before the doors were opened was obvious. They had matters of domestic concern to consider before the galleries were opened, and necessarily the time for prayers should be at the first stage of the proceedings.

Mr. CURRIER said it should also be understood whether the prayers were to be read in both languages or only in English. He thought they should be read in both languages.

Mr. SPEAKER: That is for the House to determine.

Mr. MASSON said he thought the French members should understand that the prayers should be read in English only, when the Speaker used that language. Some parties desired that they should be read by the Clerk of the House, but, speaking for himself, as a Catholic member, he thought the First Commoner should perform the duty. He did not care about the prayers being read in French if the Speaker could not read that language.

Mr. LANGEVIN said he objected to French members waiving their right, and would insist upon the prayers being read in French.

Mr. MASSON said he did not wish to waive any right, but he did not consider the prayers as an ordinary proceeding. It was not a question of translation, but of prayer.

Mr. LAURIER said he concurred with the hon. member for Terrebonne. No rights were involved in the question; it was simply a matter of reverence and decorum. The Divinity could be invoked as well in the English language as in the French.

Mr. SPEAKER said the matter was not introduced in order to raise an unpleasant discussion; he simply thought there should be a clear understanding on all points involved. If he could read French acceptably to the hon. members he would have no hesitation in doing so.

Several HON. MEMBERS: Try.

Mr. SPEAKER: No, I shall not make any attempt; it would be ludicrous.

Mr. FARROW said he thought all members should observe the same custom, as, if some sat down and others knelt, it would appear unseemly. He thought it an important matter.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he would suggest that, under the circumstances, the subject should be deferred until the members speaking the French language could come to some conclusion on the matter.

Mr. MILLS said, as the prayer was addressed to the Almighty and not to the House, he did not see why any difficulty should arise.

Mr. DESJARDINS said he did not think any language should be imposed upon hon. members. For his part, as a member of the Committee and as a Catholic and French Canadian member of the House, he did not abandon his rights as to the use of his own language, but, nevertheless, his desire was that the question should be amicably settled.

Mr. HOLTON suggested a solution of this somewhat delicate matter. Both languages were on a footing of perfect equality in all their proceedings. As his hon. friend the Minister of the Interior had just said, it was not a question of legislative proceedings. The language of the present Speaker was English, and it would be very indelicate to insist on the rendering of the prayers into French by him. In the ordinary course of things, the Speaker's chair would yet be filled by a gentleman whose native tongue was French, and, when that time came it would be but natural and proper to have the prayers read in French. He thought that the French Canadian members would acquiesce in the propriety of this arrangement.

Mr. CAUCHON said he considered that the objection raised by the hon. member from Terrebonne showed the difficulty of the position. If the hon. member did not want a translation, and if the Speaker could not read French, how was the difficulty to be settled?—then they would have no prayer at all. Of course, he felt that they could do without it; still he would submit to the decision of the majority. No objection could be raised to the reading of the Lord's Prayer. The versions were all translations, and the only course to be taken was to make them as accurate as they could. For his part, he would prefer the reading of the prayers by the Speaker, who, if French, should read them in French, the Clerk reading the English version, and vice versa; unless the Speaker was familiar with both languages.

Mr. MASSON said that it was not a question of translation. The real difficulty lay in the propriety of the Clerk, an employé, reading the prayer. A translation by the Clerk would be as good as one by the Speaker, but a prayer should not be treated like an ordinary document.

Mr. BLAKE read from the Rules of the House an extract to the effect that either language could be used in the debates, and that both languages should be employed in the respective Records and Journals of the House, both being obligatory in the latter sense. The Clerk, when the Speaker was not familiar with both tongues, read in one or the other language, as the case might be. He quite agreed with the hon. member for Terrebonne that it would be degrading the prayers to the level of a document or journal or something to be translated for the information of members, if they were to be read in one language by the Clerk. The Speaker could use the language with which he was most familiar, and, in that with which he was least familiar, they should assist him as best they could.

Mr. CARON said that several members on his side of the House did not understand English, and of course the matter of addressing a prayer to the Almighty was a matter of such importance that these members should at least understand what they were doing.

Mr. ROBINSON said he would infinitely prefer the course he understood his hon. friend from North York to suggest—quiet, individual, unseen, and unheard prayer. He feared, from what he had heard, that the reading of prayers would degenerate into mere lip service.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that it might be well that copies of the prayers printed in both English and French, should be laid on the desk of each member, in order that hon. gentlemen might follow them when read by the Speaker. This might meet the difficulty.

Mr. SPEAKER said it had occurred to him during the debate that a translation of the prayers should be prepared under the careful supervision of members of the House, who were competent to judge of its accuracy. This might be printed in the Votes and Proceedings on the first day of each Session, and thus hon. gentlemen, if they chose, could be furnished with a copy. The Speaker should also read the prayers in the language with which he was most familiar. If they were read first in English, and afterwards in French, he was afraid that, owing to the length of this proceeding, the practice either of avoiding prayers, or of paying little attention to them in one or other of these languages, would in the course of time begin to prevail, creating a scandal among members and the public.

Report ordered to be amended according to Mr. Speaker's suggestions.

Motion agreed to, and Report, as amended, concurred in.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time :—

Bill (No. 7) To amend the Act respecting Weights and Measures.—(Mr. Bolduc.)

Bill (No. 8) Respecting the St. Francis and Megantic International Railway Company.—(Mr. Brooks.)

Bill (No. 9) Respecting the Canada Southern Bridge Company.—(Mr. Casey.)

Bill (No. 10) To amend the Act incorporating the London and Canada Bank.—(Mr. Burk.)

Bill (No. 11) To amend the Insolvent Act of 1875, with reference to liabilities between traders and non-traders.—(Mr. Landerkin.)

Bill (No. 12) To grant additional powers to the Springhill and Parrsborough Coal and Railway Company (Limited).—(Mr. Domville.)

THE ESTIMATES.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT moved :

"That the message of His Excellency the Governor General presented to the House on Friday last, and the Estimates accompanying the same, be referred to the Committee of Supply."

Motion agreed to.

RECEPTION OF PRIVATE BILLS.

MOTION TO EXTEND TIME.

Mr. RYMAL moved :

"That the time for the reception of Private Bills and Reports thereon be extended for a period of ten days."

Mr. BLAKE said it might be as well publicly to state that the feeling of the House in favour of this extension existed only because this was the first Session succeeding the adoption of the new rules, the real benefit and advantage of which would be almost entirely lost if the system of extending the period in question should prevail. Although he did not really see the grounds of excuse on this occasion, if the special precautions of which the Speaker had spoken on a former occasion in this relation had been observed, yet, as the Bills received were so few in number, there was room for the supposition that some misapprehension was entertained on the subject. He hoped, however, that this would be the last time such an indulgence would be granted.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said that, on this point, he quite agreed with his hon. friend the Minister of Justice.

Mr. BLANCHET said the Committee on Standing Orders had only been organized on Friday last, and the two Committees on Private Bills and on Railways on Saturday last, and, if the time for presenting Bills expired next Thursday, the Committee on Standing Orders would have to examine between fifty and sixty petitions between this date and Thursday. He consequently hoped that his hon. friend the Premier, who was so remarkable for his diligence, would see that the rules were observed next year, and that the Committees were organized at an earlier period.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he quite concurred in the observations of the hon. member for Bellechasse. He remembered that on Tuesday, the fourth day of the Session, he had moved that the Committee on Standing Orders should at once be approved of, not waiting even until the names were printed. This Committee might, therefore, have been organized on that evening or on Thursday morning last. It was perhaps his duty to see that the organization had taken place; but, of course, the Committee could report on any number of petitions each day, as they were able to attend to them. He really thought, however, that no time had been lost in consequence of non-organization.

Motion agreed to.

IMMIGRATION AND COLONIZATION COMMITTEE.

EXPLANATION.

Mr. TROW said he rose to a question of privilege. On the organization of the Committee on Immigration and Colonization, of which he had the honour of being Chairman, he had made a few remarks regarding subjects which possibly would be worthy of consideration during the Session. Inadvertently, however, the sense of his statements had been misconstrued in the reports of the Ottawa Free Press. He was reported to have said that he did not desire to encourage immigration, but what he did say was that it was desirable that immigration should be encouraged by the Government, and that this country possessed a large tract of land suitable for colonization. He was further reported to have said that he did not desire to encourage the immigration of tenant farmers from Ireland, but in reality he had stated the exact contrary. Centralization was the order of the day in Ireland, and tenants were in consequence obliged to abandon holdings and leave that country, and the settlement of this class amongst us was very desirable. He was, in addition, reported to have said that on visiting Prince Edward Island recently he had found a large field open there for immigration, and that the Government of Prince Edward Island were offering free grants of land to settlers. What he really did say was that the land of this Island was arable and fertile, and that there was an opening in the Province for a small immigration, and that land was to be obtained there from the Government at a very cheap and reasonable figure. He only wished to place himself right before the country regarding this matter.

THE JESUITS' BARRACKS.

QUESTION AND REMARKS.

Mr. MASSON, with reference to the correspondence relating to the Jesuits' Barracks, said it would be remembered that he had asked for it towards the end of last Session. The Premier then stated it was quite impossible to bring it down, as the correspondence was not closed. He was informed that a portion of it was dated the 5th of April, but he now saw in the return submitted that no part of it was dated the 5th of April, 1876. He now asked whether the correspondence had been in progress on that date, as the Premier had represented. If it had not been going on at that time, as was his opinion, he was sure that the Premier had not intentionally deceived him, but that he had himself been deceived by someone.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he thought the hon. member should have spoken to him privately regarding this subject. The fact was that correspondence had been in progress about two buildings in Quebec, the Chateau St. Louis, and the Jesuits' Barracks; and he had mistaken one for the other. He had brought with him papers relating to both subjects.

Mr. MASSON said he supposed that the correspondence of the 5th of April related to the Chateau St. Louis.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he had not said so. The hon. gentleman had not given notice of his intention to bring the matter up, and had not observed the courtesy usual between gentlemen sitting on either side of the House, in calling attention to the discrepancy, which it was quite impossible to correct on the spur of the moment.

Mr. MASSON said he had shown no discourtesy. He had alluded to the matter publicly two days ago, and it was now too late to say that he had not observed the rules of courtesy.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman had not explained the matter to him. The hon. gentleman had only stated that the papers were not complete. He might have made a mistake through having been incorrectly informed. If the hon. gentleman had come to him privately, he would have given him an explanation. As it was, he could only afford the hon. gentleman the explanation that all the papers had been brought down.

Mr. MASSON said he would not remain under the imputation of not having informed the hon. gentleman of his intentions. He had previously told the hon. gentleman that he desired to obtain the correspondence which he had been led to understand had passed on the 5th of April. The hon. gentleman might have misunderstood him, but he had certainly made such a statement.

MAIL TO WEST INDIES.

QUESTION.

Mr. FORBES asked whether any arrangement had been made to afford more frequent mail communication between the Dominion and the British and foreign West Indies in the future than there was at present.

Mr. HUNTINGTON: No such arrangement has been made.

BAYFIELD HARBOUR, LAKE HURON.

QUESTION.

Mr. GREENWAY asked whether it was the intention of the Government to place in the Estimates a sum sufficient to protect work already done and further improve Bayfield Harbour, on Lake Huron.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman will observe by the Estimates that no appropriation is being asked for that purpose.

Mr. MACKENZIE.

STEAMERS BETWEEN ONTARIO AND CAPE BRETON.

QUESTION.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton) asked whether it was the intention of the Government to subsidize a line of steamers to run between ports in the Province of Ontario and ports in the Island of Cape Breton, the coming summer.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It has not been under the consideration of the Government at all.

NORTH-WESTERN BOUNDARY OF ONTARIO.

QUESTION.

Mr. MASSON asked what progress had been made towards the settlement of the question of the North-Western boundary of the Province of Ontario.

Mr. BLAKE said that, as the hon. gentleman was already aware, Arbitrators had been appointed—Judge Wilmot by the Dominion Government, and the Chief Justice of Ontario by the Government of Ontario. Upon the latter gentleman assuming a position in the Supreme Court, he resigned, and the Government of Ontario appointed the present Chief Justice of Ontario in his place. An understanding had been reached between the two Governments, by which Sir Edward Thornton, the British Minister at Washington, would probably act as the third Commissioner or Arbitrator. Considerable progress had been made, and this Government had been for some time investigating the case and mastering the details, which necessitated many papers being searched. Communication had been going on for some time past with the Government Agent in England, and other authorities, to complete, as far as possible, the information on that subject, and it was probable that the question might be disposed of in the ensuing summer or fall.

TÊTE-DE-BRULE INDIANS.

QUESTION.

Mr. GILL asked whether it was to the knowledge of the Government that there was to be found on the upper part of the River St. Maurice, in the Province of Quebec, a tribe of Indians called Tête-de-Brule, numbering about 200 souls; that their hunting grounds had been overrun by lumbermen without any compensation; that they had never received anything from the Crown; and whether it was the intention of the Government to grant them any assistance in their poverty, and to give them the same protection as was given to all other Indians.

Mr. MILLS said it was within the knowledge of the Government that there was such a tribe of Indians as the Tête-de-Brule tribe of the number stated. It was not within their knowledge that their hunting grounds had been overrun by lumbermen. These Indians had a Reserve or a hunting ground of 14,000 square miles, at the head of the River St. Maurice. The Government had been informed sometime in October that they were suffering from want of food, and aid had been given by them through the Hudson Bay Company. They did not know whether the Company had been making any depredations upon the reserve, or whether the property reserved was the property of the Indians, or whether it was land upon which the Indian title was not extinct.

COUNTY COURT JUDGE OF LEEDS AND GRENVILLE.

QUESTION.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD asked when the office of Judge of the County Court for the counties of Leeds and Grenville became vacant, and whether it was the intention of the Government to appoint a successor, and if so, when?

Mr. BLAKE said he was not in the Government at the time of the decease of the late Judge of the County Court for the counties of Leeds and Grenville, but he understood from the papers that he died on the 11th January, 1875. He was informed that, two or three months after his decease, the First Minister received a letter from the junior Judge informing him that a settlement had been arrived at by which the duties of the district could be discharged. He did not think it in the public interest at that time, without further complaint of the inefficiency of the administration of the law, to appoint another Judge. Since that time, no such representation had been made to him from any quarter.

REPLY TO THE ADDRESS.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

Mr. MACKENZIE delivered a Message from His Excellency.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, and it is as follows:—

“DUFFERIN.

“Gentlemen of the House of Commons:—

“I thank you for your loyal Address, and for the assurance it conveys that the measures to be submitted to you will receive your earnest attention.

“GOVERNMENT HOUSE,

“OTTAWA, 17th February, 1877.”

THE HOUR OF ADJOURNMENT.

RESOLUTION.

Mr. BLAIN moved:

“That it be an Order of the House that if at the hour of 10 o'clock p.m., the business of the day be not concluded, Mr. Speaker shall leave the chair and the House shall stand adjourned until its next regular meeting unless it be otherwise resolved by a majority of the members present at that hour, and in case any desire to continue in session, Mr. Speaker shall, on being requested by not less than five members, put the question without debate.”

He said that last Session, when the rules of the House were under consideration, he had to draw attention to this subject. He thought it was generally the feeling at that time—and as far as he could ascertain it was the same now—that some change should be made in the sittings of the House. He had thought that probably they might have made some change in the hour when the House met, and he had intended to include that in his motion; but when he came to examine it he found he was not able to do it. He was afraid that a private member might not be able to bring up that motion properly before the House, as the concurrence of the Government would have to be obtained, as it seemed to him that some change in the constitution of the Standing Committees would be required. It occurred to him that, if the number of members of the Committees were reduced to one-half, one-fourth or one-sixth the number arranged at present, they would be altogether more efficient than they were. There were nine Standing Committees, and he was prepared to say that more business would be accomplished if they were divided up into thirty. It had been his experience that large Committees were rather a hindrance to business than an assistance to it. If he had had an opportunity of consulting the Government before he put his notice on the paper, he might have asked them to consider that branch of the case, and parcel out the business by referring different portions to various sub-divisions of Committees. But, as he was not able to do that, and as the matter must necessarily rest with the Government, all that he could do was to bring up the motion in the form it was, and to ask the Government and the House whether it was not desirable that a time for adjournment should be fixed, without interfering in any way with the rule they now had of commencing at three o'clock in the afternoon. He did not desire to dictate to the House the hour when it should adjourn. It was necessary in his notice of motion to mention some hour in order that a discussion might be raised; but he had no intention of fixing, arbitrarily, the hour. He desired merely to elicit an opinion as to a suitable hour for retiring. He found, on looking at the rules of some other deliberative bodies, what might have been expected, that there was no fixed hour in any of them. The House must necessarily have the power of meeting and adjourning when it pleased; the majority had the matter at its disposal, and it was one of custom rather than a settled rule. The rule in England was that, after a certain hour, no business which would cause opposition was taken up. But this limited the kind of business and it did not deal with the general question of the sittings of the House. It seemed to be the custom in the United States Congress to meet sometimes at two, sometimes at half-past two, and sometimes at three o'clock in the afternoon: and they seemed to retire early—the House adjourning apparently before six o'clock as a rule. He believed, however, that Congress sat considerably later, if the business required it. The French system seemed somewhat similar. There was no rule, but the custom of the Assembly seemed to be to that effect. In England, the custom was to sit late at night, and he thought in this House they had followed out that custom last Session to its full extent. He did not think it necessary to mention that nearly all the members were more or less injured by the late sittings of the House. They knew that there were some of their most valuable members absent from their seats that day whose decease, if not brought on, was quickened materially by the badly ventilated condition of the House. He thought he might safely say that after eleven o'clock the business of the House was not properly attended to. He thought they would accomplish as much in pushing forward business if they adjourned at eleven o'clock as if they adjourned at twelve. His recollection was that, last session, there were few members who remained until the House adjourned, and very frequently the most active members of the Committees had to leave before the end of the sitting.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he believed there was a general desire that the House should adjourn at an earlier hour than it did last Session. Although, for the first two weeks, they might adjourn at ten and eleven o'clock, it might be very inconvenient to make it a rule to adjourn at so early an hour as ten o'clock. Important debates might be going on, and it would be unwise to interrupt them, and public business might suffer. Then hon. gentlemen might, as they did last Session, enter into a struggle with himself as to who could sit longest, in which case he thought he was able to meet them at any time. He would suggest that the hon. gentleman should amend his motion by changing "ten o'clock" to "eleven o'clock."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I don't think my hon. friend can alter the motion in that way.

Mr. MACKENZIE suggested that the motion be amended so as to read "That it be an Order of the House that if, at the hour of eleven o'clock p.m., the business of the day be not concluded, Mr. Speaker shall announce his intention of leaving the chair, and, in case five members object, shall put the question without debate." If any Order of the House was adopted, it must have a little more elasticity than the motion the hon. gentleman had proposed. It might be desirable that it should be understood that the House should adjourn earlier than it had been in the habit of doing for some Sessions back. This, it seemed to him, might be reached without placing any Order upon the Minutes. He would be glad to hear what hon. gentlemen opposite had to say upon the matter.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said at his age he would be as ready to adjourn early as any member of the House, but he thought the motion was destructive of the independence of Parliament, and of the independence of the Opposition in particular. Propositions of this kind had been made again and again in the British Parliament, and they generally looked there for precedents instead of to the United States Congress or the Chamber of Deputies in France. But the attempt to fix an hour for adjournment was resisted by every Government, no matter of what political complexion it might be. The system now in force in England, and there could be no objection to such an arrangement, was that no contested measure should be taken up after twelve o'clock. But this resolution was simply adopting the French system of cloture. The Government of the day in France, when it thought it convenient to stop the debate, and wished to press its advantage of a majority, could have the vote taken at once. The same use of this power was made in Washington, and in many of the individual States the debate was stopped and the previous question was put at once. The proposition of his hon. friend would lead to this, that, if the Government brought up a matter for discussion, and ten o'clock arrived, it could still, by the will of the majority, be continued; but if, on the contrary, the motion was in the hands of one of the Opposition, and ten o'clock arrived, as a matter of course the Opposition would have no power against the majority, who might insist upon Mr. Speaker leaving the chair. The House could now adjourn when it liked, and he appealed to his hon. friend opposite that the question of adjournment should be a debateable one. They had a free Parliament, a free House and free discussion, and the rights of the minority were protected. His hon. friend, although strong in his majority now, would have felt very much aggrieved if a discussion had been cut off by the late Government when the hour of ten or eleven had arrived. His hon. friend opposite would see that it was very unsafe to depart from the precedents already laid down. Occasionally, if the Opposition were factious, they might discuss the question of the adjournment perhaps to the inconvenience of the majority of the House. But that would happen seldom—very seldom, he hoped. At all events, it was one of the protections of the minority from which they should be loath to depart. He was sure that the leader of the Government and the Minister of Justice, when considering the question in that light, would agree with him that the question had better be an open one, even though an understanding were arrived at that the House would adjourn as early as possible.

Mr. BLAKE said he did not think there was any analogy between the proposition now made and the French system. The latter was that the debate was closed without the minority being consulted at all, and the vote was put at once. But the present motion simply proposed that the House should adjourn at a certain hour, as a rule; but then the debate also would be adjourned. This was very different from the system of cloture. He, like his hon. friend beside him, was very much in favour of early adjournments when possible, without reference to any motion. He would like to arrive at a general understanding that, except under circumstances of urgency, the House should adjourn at eleven o'clock. It could be left as part of the unwritten law, and no doubt the object of his hon. friend from West York would be accomplished. But he ventured to say that, were the motion carried, guarded as his hon. friend proposed, the rights of the Opposition would be preserved. The motion would simply prevent a discussion on the motion for adjournment—which he considered a great abuse of privilege in general, when a certain hour arrived. It was only under circumstances of extreme urgency that there should be any serious discussion on the motion for adjournment.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said that when he compared the proposition to the system of cloture he meant that its effect would be the same, as it would throw over the debate to a future day, and his hon. friend knew very well that when the paper got full it would practically prevent the motion, in many cases, from coming up. He was gratified at the spirit in which the remarks he had made had been received by the Premier and the Minister of Justice, and he thought it would be agreeable on all sides that, as a general rule, except in cases of urgency, the House should adjourn at an early hour—say at eleven o'clock—and that a discussion on the motion for adjournment should not take place.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the better course to adopt would be to arrive at a general understanding that the adjournment should take place about the hour named. If, after a little experience of the practice, any difficulty should arise, the hon. member might bring the subject again before the House.

Mr. BLAIN said he had already expressed the opinion that the question could be better determined by arriving at an understanding as to the future practice than by adopting an Order of the House. He had no intention of injuring the position of the Opposition. As a motion for adjournment was always in order and the Government had a majority in the House, they could adjourn the House at any time. The right to have a discussion on a motion for adjournment had been much abused in all legislatures, and had been used sometimes for party purposes. The object of submitting the motion was, however, to expedite the substantial business of the House, and not to form a rule or order which would place the Opposition in a worse position. He had no objection to accept the suggestion of the Premier, that it should be well understood that the House should adjourn at eleven o'clock unless the position of business was such that an adjournment would be inconvenient.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he hoped that an understanding having been arrived at, the motion would be withdrawn.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he understood the arrangement to be that the House would adjourn at eleven o'clock, unless matters of such importance were under consideration that the House should decide to proceed.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Motion withdrawn.

ACCIDENTS CAUSED BY RAILWAY FROGS.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. FLEMING moved for a return of the number of accidents to persons caught in railway frogs; the points where the accidents occurred, and the particulars connected therewith for the five years ending the 31st December last. He said he submitted the motion because he believed that quite a number of accidents had occurred to railway employes in several parts of the Dominion from the use of open frogs. On Tuesday last an accident occurred at St. Thomas: a switchman in the service of the Canada Southern Railway, while in the performance of his duties, was caught in one of these frogs and run over by a train, receiving such serious injuries as to necessitate the amputation of a leg. Another case of a similar nature occurred on 16th December at St. Mary's, when a brakeman on the Grand Trunk Railway was caught in one of these frogs, and was unable to extricate himself before some trucks passed over him. The man was dreadfully lacerated when found, and died after two hours of severe suffering. While the newspapers reported such accidents from time to time, there were no ordinary means of learning the extent to which these cases occurred, and it was desirable that some such motion as he proposed should be submitted in order to ascertain whether it was necessary in the interests of humanity that some legislation should be had on that subject.

Mr. MACKENZIE said hon. members were aware that there was a provision in the general Railway Act, requiring Railway Companies under the control of Parliament to make certain returns. Among these returns was one relating to accidents, but he was afraid they were not made in such particular form as to provide the information sought to be obtained in the present motion. They would embody simply a statement in each case that a certain person had met his death on a certain date, on a certain road, at a certain place. A number of the railways, moreover, were under the control of the Local Legislatures, and, therefore the Government had not the power to furnish the information from the ordinary returns. The Government, would, however, endeavour to procure the information by making applications to the respective Railway Companies. He was quite aware of the danger of accident occurring from the use of the frogs. On one day last year, four deaths occurred from that particular cause. He had called the attention of the engineers on the Government railways to the necessity of avoiding, if possible, the form of frog which was at present in use, as being the most prolific source of danger connected with the roads.

Motion agreed to.

EXTENSION OF JURISDICTION OF VICE-ADMIRALTY COURTS.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. BOWELL, in the absence of Mr. KIRKPATRICK, moved for all correspondence between the Government of Canada and the Imperial Government, and all Orders in Council, and other papers touching the extension of the jurisdiction of the Court of Vice Admiralty to the inland waters of Canada.

Mr. BLAKE said the return would be made more complete if the motion was amended by introducing the words

“The Government of the Dominion and late Province of Canada,” instead of the Government of Canada, some of the correspondence having taken place before Confederation.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

TELEGRAPHIC LINES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

MOTIONS FOR RETURNS.

Mr. LANGEVIN moved for copies of all correspondence which may have passed between the Government of Canada or any of its officers and F. J. Bernard, Esq., contractor for the telegraph lines in British Columbia, since the 26th May, 1875, also all Departmental Orders or Orders in Council since the same date in relation to the construction or maintenance of the said telegraph lines; or in relation to the claims made by the said F. J. Bernard, in consequence of the orders given him on the 9th April, 1875, to stop work on the said telegraph lines in British Columbia.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. LANGEVIN moved for a statement shewing each sum of money paid to F. J. Bernard, Esq., contractor for the telegraph line in British Columbia, since the 10th February, 1875, also stating why each sum of money was so paid, and giving the estimates, vouchers, reports and orders in virtue of which each sum was so paid.

Motion agreed to.

COAL SHIPMENTS ON THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved:—

“That inasmuch as large quantities of coal belonging to private persons or Corporations, while in course of transit over the Intercolonial Railway during the past year, were detained, forfeited or misappropriated for the use of the said Railway, an Order of the House be issued for all papers, correspondence or telegrams relating to or in connection with coal so detained, forfeited or misappropriated, and showing by whose authority such coal was detained, forfeited, or misappropriated, and whether such action has been ratified and approved by the Inspector of Government Railways or by the Government.”

He said his object in submitting the motion was to afford private parties an opportunity to ventilate their grievances. In Mr. Brydges' report for 1874 he said—

“The rule is that all freight shall be paid for as it is taken away, and there is a cashier at the station, Mr. Mack, whose duty it is to receive the money and transmit it to the cashier at Moncton.” Also “that the rule should be imperatively carried out; that no property is delivered until it is paid for, and the payment should be made to the cashier.”

If the acts complained of had been committed by private individuals, they would have been liable to prosecution for misdemeanour. Law makers should not be law breakers, and the property of individuals was not to be confiscated even to please the Government itself; but, if it was done, some redress should be given. The seizure of a quantity of coal while it was being carried over a railroad was liable to throw the factory for which it was ordered out of work, and involve the loss of much business for several years, which loss would not be recouped by an apology from the General Superintendent, or by payment of the cost price of the coal. The matter had probably not been reported to the Minister of Public Works. It was time the people of New Brunswick should know whether they were to be run over by an upstart—the General Superintendent of the Government Railroads—from whom it was impossible to obtain a civil or straightforward answer, but who, when applied to for information, gave an evasive reply.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he presumed, from what he had heard, that some car loads of coal going to the factory of the hon. member were sent by some mistake in some other direction. The papers which would be brought down would show the facts of the case, and he must ask the hon. member to omit from his motion the reference to large quantities of coal having been misappropriated.

Mr. DOMVILLE said the coal was not taken by mistake, but had been appropriated during a term of nearly twelve months at different intervals, and that not because of a pressure caused by a snow blockade. The coal did not belong to his factory, but to an establishment in which he was merely a shareholder. There were, moreover, other cases in which coal had been misappropriated. If it proved necessary to take the coal of private parties to run a railroad, it was due to neglect and want of forethought in the management.

Motion, as amended, agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That an Order of the House do issue to the proper officer, for copies of all papers, correspondence or telegrams relating to, or in connection with coal alleged to be detained, forfeited or misappropriated, and showing by whose authority such coal was detained, forfeited or misappropriated; and whether such action has been ratified and approved by the Inspector of Government Railways, or by the Government.

REVENUE PAID BY PROVINCES.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. ARCHIBALD, in the absence of Mr. YOUNG, moved for a return, setting forth, as nearly as the officers of the Government can do so, the amount of the revenue paid by each Province of the Dominion, and the expenditures made therein on Dominion account during the past five years—namely, 1872, '73, '74, '75 and '76 respectively; the return to show, further, the contributions and receipts per capita in each Province to and from the Public Exchequer.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the information demanded, if it could be accurately obtained, would be of very considerable value. It was right to call the attention of the House, however, to the fact that the Customs returns of trade between the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec would not in the smallest degree show the amount of revenue paid by each of these Provinces, it being well known that an extremely large proportion of the imports entered at Quebec and Montreal were for the benefit of, and consumed in, the Province of Ontario. The Government would do its best to comply with the request, but, looking at the length of time the motion covered, he doubted whether the information in their hands would enable them to give such accurate returns as ought to be made for more than one year. They would bring down the returns and endeavour to give with tolerable accuracy the information asked for.

Mr. MITCHELL said a considerable proportion of the goods consumed in the Maritime Provinces were re-importations from Montreal, Quebec, and Toronto. The hon. the Minister of Finance should take into consideration, in this connection, that Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island bought a quantity of goods for which the consumer paid duty through the Provinces of Quebec and Ontario.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said they could only try to arrive at an accurate statement; absolute accuracy could not be promised.

Motion agreed to.

HARBOUR IMPROVEMENT.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

Mr. TUPPER moved for all correspondence or papers in the possession of the Government relating to the improvement of the harbour at the mouth of Partridge Island River; also, all papers or correspondence, relating to the repair and protection of the pier at Partridge Island. He said he believed an engineer had been sent to report upon the condition of the works with a view to making such provision as the case might require. In looking over the Report of the Public Works Department he did not find that either of these matters had engaged the attention of the Government. The harbour at the mouth of the Partridge Island River was one of the principal ports on the Basin of Minas. It was one of the best harbours of refuge to be found there, and it was exceedingly important that such improvements should be made in the harbour as would render it still more valuable in that respect. There was a railway under construction, which had received a large subsidy from the Government of Nova Scotia, to connect the coal mines at Springhill with the Basin of Minas. That would place the principal coal mines of Nova Scotia in connection with the Atlantic ports, and would be the only connection during the winter season that could be had. The harbour was open ten months out of twelve, and there was no doubt that a large amount of provincial as well as foreign shipping would be drawn to it at all seasons of the year. He hoped the Government would make such provision for the improvement of the harbour as the case required. The pier at Partridge Harbour was built under a resolution of the Nova Scotia Legislature as a point of communication with the railway system at Windsor. It was an essentially provincial work, and had been maintained and all repairs done by the Department of Public Service of the Province. He was advised that for the want of a small outlay this work was likely to be very seriously damaged, if not altogether destroyed.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) said if Partridge Harbour was open ten months of the year, the harbour of Louisburg, which was almost in the vicinity of the coal mines of Cape Breton, was open during the whole year. The statement that the former port was the only one from which coal could be shipped in the winter season was not literally correct. If the hon. member had given as much attention to the geography of eastern Nova Scotia as he had to the Springhill Mines he would not have fallen into the blunder he had.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. member for Cumberland was right in supposing that the Government Engineer had made an examination of the works, but that official was not impressed with their importance for the protection of shipping. In other words, there were many places of far greater importance than this in the nature of a harbour. The pier might be much in need of repairs, but a mere wharf was often confounded with a pier with relation to harbour improvements. The object of the Dominion Government was always to afford shelter to shipping, and if accommodation could be afforded for landing purposes at the same time, it was so much the better. All he could say at present was that he would look at the papers and plan again, and would perhaps call the hon. gentleman's attention to the matter some evening before further action was taken.

Mr. TUPPER said he supposed he must be satisfied with the very slight comfort presented by the remarks of the hon. Minister of Public Works. He trusted, however, that further examination of the question would lead him to the opinion that these works were entitled to the consideration of the Government. He did not wish to be understood as saying that there was no other port in that Province so accessible to the coal mines as Partridge Harbour. The harbour of Louisburg was undoubtedly open at all seasons of the year, and coal might be shipped from that point, but as far as shipments to the Atlantic ports, which afforded a market for the coal of Nova Scotia, were concerned, the harbour at the mouth of Partridge Island River was preferable on account of the distance.

Motion agreed to.

THE LOAN OF 1875.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. TUPPER moved for a return of Prospectus issued by the hon. the Minister of Finance in London for the last loan, a statement of the time allowed for the reception of tenders and the period when the reception of tenders was closed, with the several amounts offered by parties tendering, and the names of those whose tenders were accepted, and the amounts allotted to them respectively. He said he had no intention of anticipating the explanations the hon. the Finance Minister had prepared to offer to the House tomorrow. He had placed this notice on the paper in order that the House might have before it the means of dealing with that branch of the question when the Budget was delivered.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said it was impossible to grant all the information asked. The names of the tenderers were in the hands of the London brokers, and could not be produced. On a former occasion they were asked for and the reply was that it was not customary for the trade in London to give such information inasmuch as a great many of those tendering did so through brokers. The rest of the information could be got, but, with regard to some of it, he would have to trust to his memory.

Mr. TUPPER said he must accept such information as the hon. the Finance Minister would give. For himself, he did not see what objection there could be to giving this information.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the hon. member for Chateauguay had asked precisely the same information of a former Finance Minister, and it was refused for the same reason he had given.

Mr. TUPPER asked if the hon. gentleman had any objection to give the names of the brokers.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he did not think he could furnish that information.

Mr. HOLTON said he had pressed Mr. Rose very strongly for similar information, and had been refused it. He supposed that the hon. the Minister of Finance had found out from his own experience that Mr. Rose's reasons at that time were valid. They had not the same opportunities of judging on this matter when they sat on the benches which the hon. member for Cumberland now occupied, and which he hoped he would long adorn.

Motion amended by striking out the words: "And the names of those whose tenders were accepted," and agreed to.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the chair.

After Recess.

GREAT BRAS D'OR POSTMASTERSHIP.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. CAMPBELL moved for copies of correspondence regarding the Postmaster at Great Bras d'Or, and the reason why McLeod did not get the office after he was appointed and had given sufficient bonds to the Department; also the name of the present Postmaster and the names of the securities. He said it was disagreeable for him to be continually finding fault with the members of the Government, and particularly because the Ministers were changed so frequently that they had scarcely become sufficiently acquainted with the duties of their position before they were removed to some other Department. Two years ago, Mr. Fraser, who had been acting as Postmaster at Great Bras d'Or, resigned, having been elected member of the Local Assembly, and another person, Mr. McLeod, who lived at a more suitable place at the ferry, was appointed. The latter sent in bonds and security to the Department, but nevertheless, as yet, had received neither the books nor emoluments of his office. Besides, Mr. McLeod had not been returned his bonds. Mr. Fraser continued a member of the Legislature, and could not at the same time lawfully act as Postmaster.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said he had understood sufficient of the hon. gentleman's remarks to discover that the hon. gentleman, like one of the distinguished ancients, seemed to be in search of an honest man, and he hoped that the excellent conduct of the Government would remove the impression from the hon. gentleman's mind that this was at all difficult in the present instance. He trusted that the papers, when brought down, would disabuse the hon. gentleman of the feeling which had induced him to make this motion. The hon. member would find, if his memory served him well, that the person to whom he alluded could neither read nor write.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton) said he hoped the hon. member for Victoria would obtain the papers for which the motion was made, and in this respect be more successful than he (Mr. McDonald) had been under similar circumstances last year.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said he trusted that the hon. member for Cape Breton would not lead the House to suppose that papers for which he had moved had been withheld. If any such papers had not been brought down, this would immediately be done. He was very sorry if any error had been committed.

Mr. McDONALD said he did not doubt that the Postmaster-General stated what was quite correct; nevertheless his motion last year was based upon a complaint lodged against a postmaster in his county, and this complaint had not been brought down with the other papers. Consequently, the entire return was worthless. Regarding the statement that Mr. McLeod could neither read nor write, he did not believe the Postmaster General or the Government had any right to refuse to make the appointment on that ground, when other men, equally incapable, received appointments in other parts of the country. Several persons so circumstanced had secured very important situations in his constituency. If he was not very much mistaken, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had the names of those persons in his office; some of them he, however, believed had been removed. When the Government lost a constituency, officials were dismissed—at least that was the case in his county—amongst others, a person who had filled an office for fourteen years, fulfilling his duties to the satisfaction of all who knew him, had been dismissed last fall, for political reasons. The papers in that case were moved for, and it was then stated that the arrangement made was one only of a temporary nature; but it was plain that the Government had violated the principles they had held in the past.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said he must advise the hon. gentleman to give notice of his intention to make such complaints, in order that he might have an opportunity of looking into the cases. He was, however, quite certain that, in no single instance, had men been removed from positions in the hon. gentleman's county, or in the county of Victoria, for political opinions. He would guarantee that the cases of persons who could read or write would be duly considered by the Government.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) said, if reference was made to changes which took place in the offices in his county some years ago, it would be found that those matters had been previously brought before the House and investigated.

Mr. CAMPBELL said he did not consider the reply of the Postmaster-General satisfactory. He had corresponded with Mr. McLeod, and he had taken it for granted that he could read and write. If that was not the case, and if this was sufficient to condemn the appointment, of course the bonds should have been returned, and the reasons therefor given, in order that Mr. McLeod might contradict them if they were not true. At all events, he had never heard the objection which had been mentioned. He knew, however, that the man was most respectable, and that he could give any security that might be required.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said he was sorry that he had been obliged to give such a reply. He intended to furnish explanations to the hon. gentleman in the most courteous manner possible. According to his recollection, the answer he had given was true, and for any disgrace that might be attached to it he was not responsible.

Mr. TUPPER said the reply of the Postmaster-General was eminently unsatisfactory. He understood the hon. gentleman from Victoria to say that, two years ago, the present Government appointed a gentleman to the position of postmaster, and that then the latter forwarded bonds for acceptance in order that he might receive his commission; and still the man was left without his commission, while the bonds had not been returned. At the same time a party who occupied the position of a member of the Local Legislature discharged the duties of postmaster, or got them to be discharged. The whole public, in consequence of this state of things, were inconvenienced. An answer had been flippantly thrown across the floor of the House that McLeod could not be appointed postmaster because he could neither read nor write; but he had never been dismissed, and no intimation had been given of the objection entertained to the appointment. The Postmaster-General, in the absence of distinct information, should not make statements calculated to degrade a man in the estimation of the House, and of the country. If the hon. gentleman knew positively that what he had mentioned was true, he had failed in his duty. It was then due to the public service that the appointment should have been cancelled, and explanations furnished.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said he did not think the hon. gentleman should have made a scene regarding this matter. He had stated his only reason, and had said nothing about a dismissal. He presumed that Mr. McLeod was a very excellent and respectable man. The officers in his Department had informed him that the postal service at the place in question had been well performed. The hon. gentleman must have noticed that the hon. member for Victoria had not risen simply for the purpose of obtaining an explanation, but to make an attack on the Government and himself personally. There was only one explanation to be made, and that he had supplied. Without doubt, when the papers came down, the hon. gentleman would find that there was nothing in the whole matter.

CONVICTIONS FOR CAPITAL OFFENCES.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. DYMOND, in moving for a return of all convictions for capital offences, including date of conviction, name of convict, locality in which the crime was committed, and action of the Government in each case, for the three years ending December 31st, 1877, said that, with permission of the House, he desired slightly to amend his motion. He had made a similar motion three years ago, and the Minister of Justice had informed him that the return he then obtained contained certain inaccuracies. With the permission of the House, therefore, he would ask for a return covering the whole period under consideration, from the 1st of July, 1867, until the 31st of December, 1876. The law of this country was certainly not at the present time in a satisfactory state as related to capital offences. We were behind the British law in that respect. For some 17 years, the crime of murder had alone been punishable with death in Great Britain, with the exception, of course, of the highest political crimes. In Canada, there still remained upon the statute-book a number of offences for which the penalty of death was never inflicted, and he had hoped, when some reference was made to questions of this kind last Session, that the Minister of Justice by this time might have been able to bring down some measure which would have placed the law in a more satisfactory state, limiting the death penalty, at all events, to the crime of murder, and, possibly, endeavouring so to classify offences coming under the general denomination of murder that a larger amount of discretion might be left to the courts, and a smaller amount of responsibility thrown on the Executive. The duties of every Minister of Justice, and of all concerned in the administration of the law, was, at the present time, an extremely painful one. It must be distressing to refuse an appeal for mercy; and it was obvious on various grounds that the fewer applications the state of the law rendered necessary the better it would be for all parties concerned, the better for the dignity of justice, and the better for the Minister, who was charged with sitting virtually as a Court of Appeal, where the exercise of the prerogative was given him. He was quite aware, however, that since the House met last year, the Minister of Justice had been forced to consider many important and weighty matters, not only in Canada, but on the other side of the Atlantic; and he was not at all surprised to learn from the Speech from the Throne—as far as that might be said to indicate the policy of the Government for the Session—that no measure would be brought down during the present Session. When such a measure was before the House, he might, perhaps, for a few moments, discuss the question of capital punishment,—one which he believed neither this House nor the country was prepared to take action upon at the present time.

Motion, as amended, agreed to, as follows:—

Resolved, That an Order of the House do issue to the proper officer for a return of all convictions for capital offences between the 1st of July, 1867, and the 31st December, 1876; showing the name of the convicts, the nature of the crime, the action of the Executive, and the date of such action.

HALF-BREED LANDS IN MANITOBA.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. RYAN moved for copies of all papers and correspondence relating to the distribution of half-breed lands in the Province of Manitoba. He said that before the North-West Territories were admitted to the Union, an Act of this Legislature was passed appropriating 1,400,000 acres of land for distribution among the half-breed children. The object of that distribution was to extinguish the Indian title to lands in Manitoba and in the North-West Territories, and its justice had never been questioned. In 1872, the half-breeds throughout the various parishes of Manitoba met, and chose such portions of the public lands as they desired to have reserved in order to meet the appropriation. In the great majority of cases the lands they asked for were reserved for them; and it was a very fair conclusion that the half-breeds, being born in the country, and knowing every acre of land within the limits of the Province, chose the best land; and, as a matter of fact, the half-breeds had reserved for them a very large proportion of the very finest agricultural land in the Province. From the time the reserves were established in 1872 nothing was done about the matter until 1875, although occasionally a good deal was said. During the latter Session he called the attention of the House and the Government to the fact that these reserves were blocking the path of Provincial progress. The Hon. Mr. Laird, at that time Minister of the Interior, in reply to a question asked by him, stated that the delay in settling the matter had arisen from conflicting claims, called staked claims. At the same time, the hon. gentleman took occasion to assure him that a decision had been arrived at upon the question of staked claims, and that the Government were prepared at once to proceed to the distribution. He (Mr. Ryan) knew fully at the time, as he knew now, that the answer was neither full nor satisfactory, as in many reserves, amongst others the reserves for the half-breeds of White Mud River, Portage la Prairie, High Bluff and Poplar Point, in the county of West

Marquette, not a single case of staked claims had arisen, and, therefore, there was no reason for the delay in these parishes. Nevertheless, he accepted the assurance of the hon. gentleman that something would be done in the matter. The year passed away, and again, during the course of last Session he felt it to be his duty to remind the Minister of the Interior that his promise respecting the distribution of the Reserves had not been fulfilled. Again he had received his assurance that the Government was going to abate the nuisance at once and to distribute the reserves. Another twelve months having expired, he found his half-breed constituents, and the Province of Manitoba precisely in the same position which they had occupied during the last five years. He was well aware that a partial allotment had been made in two or three of the parishes, and therefore it might seem to those not acquainted with the circumstances, that something had been done towards the distribution. He had witnessed three allotments, and from two of these nothing had resulted, and they had no guarantee that anything substantial would result from the third. The consequences had been most prejudicial, indeed disastrous. The city of Winnipeg was situated at the confluence of the Assiniboine and the Red Rivers, almost in the centre of the Province, and it was surrounded by some of the best land in the Province. It was only natural to suppose that settlement would commence around the capital and proceed gradually towards the extremities of the Province; but a great deal of land had been taken up by the reserves in the neighborhood of Winnipeg, and the result was that settlement, instead of proceeding naturally, was scattered broadcast throughout the Province. Hence, the already depleted treasury of Manitoba was drawn upon to pay for many miles of roads and many bridges that would not have been necessary were it not for the reserves. For the same reason, the administration of civil and criminal justice cost the Province more than it otherwise would, and settlers in the different settlements, with the reserves lying like barriers between them, were deprived of that facility for establishing and supporting schools and churches which they would otherwise have enjoyed. But the most injurious result of all was that the Province had by these reserves lost many settlers. He had himself known several parties from Ontario who had, during the past season, come up to Manitoba, to settle, who would have been a valuable acquisition to the Province, but who, on account of the Reserves, had left without locating. In order to prove that he was not stating the matter too strongly, he had procured a map of the Province upon which the parts colored red represented the different reserves. Members could judge at a glance for themselves and would readily conclude that it was an imperative duty—the duty of the hour as far as Manitoba was concerned—to throw open some of those reserves. He would ask the Minister of the Interior if, in the public interest, he should find it necessary to make any future reserves, to locate them in some parts of the public lands not likely to be required for settlement. The hon. gentleman would certainly agree with him that when our own countrymen went out to Manitoba, paying their own way, it seemed hard to them to be compelled to pass lands upon which they would willingly settle, but which were being kept for some one who was still in Europe, and who perhaps might never come to this country. The greatest possible care was required in granting a reserve, because evil results were sure to follow, whereas the good was uncertain. Out of all the reserves established for colonization purposes, only two or three were likely to produce a sufficient amount of immigration to justify their establishment. The others were unmitigated evils and had not in some instances introduced a single immigrant. He had never believed in the principle of provincial representation in the Dominion Cabinet. He thought the House and the country had a right to expect that the different portfolios would be given to the ablest men in the ranks of the Ministerial party, irrespective of the Provinces from which they came. But, if anything could shake his opinions on the subject and lead him to believe that there was more in the principle of provincial representation than he had been inclined to admit, it was the manner in which Manitoba matters had been neglected. Had one of the Manitoba members held office in either of the Administrations during the last five years, in his own interests he would have been obliged to insist on something being done on that and other important matters, otherwise a Province, proverbially cool as was Manitoba, would have been too hot to hold him. Although the present Minister of the Interior was not from Manitoba, it was only fair to say that the news of his acceptance of office had been received there with very general satisfaction. It was thought that his eminent abilities and services rendered not less to his party than to the country, entitled him to the position. He hoped the new Minister would apply his great abilities to the different Manitoba questions, and would not only realize the expectations entertained of him, but would exceed them and increase his already extensive reputation.

Mr. MILLS said there was no objection to the motion, but there was very little correspondence to furnish on the subject. On assuming office his attention was almost immediately directed to the subject. The hon. member for Marquette was of course aware that provision was made for the allotment of the land into half-breed settlements, and that, before any action was taken, claims were put forward on behalf of private parties to particular tracts of land within the district. On investigation, it was found that there were several hundred of these claims. All possible information was obtained in order that the claims might be disposed of at the earliest practicable day; and he trusted that this would be very soon. The Government were fully aware of the mischief which had resulted to Manitoba from no action being taken in allotting the land, and they had considered the injury occasioned by locking up lands by merely changing the form of reservation. They had considered whether it was not possible to bring these lands into the market and at the same time respect the rights of the half-breeds; but it was impossible for him to say if that could be effected; but, if it could, there would be no delay in the issue of patents.

Mr. RYAN said he was extremely pleased to learn that the attention of the new Minister had been directed to the matter; but from the tenour of the hon. gentleman's remarks he should judge that the Government had re-opened or re-considered the question of staked claims. In 1875—as the hon. gentleman would find if he consulted the Hansard,—the Hon. Mr. Laird informed him (Mr. Ryan) that the question of staked claims had been disposed of; and he trusted that the Government were not now going to re-open it, because he saw no possible escape out of difficulty if it were revived. The land would be locked up for a year or two to come, and the injury to the Province would be beyond measure.

Mr. SCHULTZ said he probably would not have been tempted to say anything on the subject, his hon. friend having placed it so clearly before the House, were it not for two or three points touched upon by the hon. Minister of the Interior. The grievance brought before the House, as he understood it, was this, that a large section of the best lands of Manitoba had been virtually given to a class of the people who were helpless because minors; but none of the obligations had been fulfilled. Year after year excuses were made and reasons were given for their nonfulfilment, and from the policy of the present Government, as foreshadowed by the hon. the Minister of the Interior, it was to be feared that there would be a repetition of that course for three or four years more.

Mr. BANNATYNE said he had, with great pleasure, listened to the remarks of the hon. members for Marquette and Lisgar with regard to the very great dissatisfaction of the people of the Province of Manitoba, in consequence of not having all the land questions and other promises settled long ere this. If the patents for the reserves of the natives of that Province were issued, they would have no complaints that emigrants, after having come there, were obliged to leave and settle in the United States, as had been done. These reserves, when first set apart, in many quarters were well wooded. No protection had been given by the Government, and now the wood was nearly all gone, and the value of the Reserves was so much less. As soon as the reserves were drawn, and the lots of each party known, they should be published, and the parties to whom they belonged, on coming of age, would have the right to protect them and dispose of them as they thought proper. With regard to the stake claims, he must differ from his hon. friends, for he was aware, from the fact that many of his constituents had such claims, and came to him to go to the land office with them to look into their claims, that the Government had only done justly in looking into them, as justice should be done to all parties. It was true that by this delay these people had 240 acres in one place, instead of 190 as at first supposed. However, they believed that, from what they had seen since the hon. member for Bothwell had been appointed Minister of the Interior, matters were much improved, that they had the right man in the right place, and that without any delay all these matters would be settled. Let all the land questions be settled, and the Railway reserves thrown open, but only to actual bona fide settlers, and Manitoba would not be the least of the Provinces of the Dominion.

Mr. MILLS said the delay had been unavoidable. There were more half-breed children in the Province than had been supposed, and, when a settlement was about being arrived at, these stake claims began to come in.

POST OFFICE PRINTING.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. BOWELL moved for a return showing the amounts paid for printing and stationery for the Post Office Department during the years 1875 and 1876 respectively, other than to the Parliamentary Printer and Contractor at Ottawa—said return to specify the Province in which said work was done, the nature of the work done, the name or names of the person or persons who performed such work, whether by contract or otherwise, and the name or names of the party or parties who received payment and gave receipts therefor. He said: I have been induced to make this motion, after having examined the Public Accounts and other reports, by my inability to find out the information which I and the country desire to obtain from these reports. On referring to the Public Accounts of 1875 and 1876, I find the amount paid for Post Office printing—a general statement in which no particulars are given—to have been $65,527.93. However, upon reference to the Post Office Reports of these years, I find that two establishments, —one in the city of Halifax, called the Citizen publishing Co., and one at St. John, New Brunswick, called the Freeman—received $42,658.98 of the $65,527.93, leaving to the balance of the Dominion $22,868.95. This $42,658.98 I find to have been divided somewhat in this way: In 1875, the Citizen Publishing Company printing for the Post Office Department, whether for the Province of Nova Scotia alone or not, is not stated, $9,140.99; Money Order Office, Halifax, $1,033.75; advertising mails, $25,—making a total of $10,199.74. In 1876, that is, the year ending the 30th June last, the same Citizen Publishing Company received for Post Office printing, Halifax, $13,258.11; Money Order Office, $940.25; advertising mails, $79.60—total $14,277.96. This latter sum, I suppose, was given to the establishment since the debate on this question took place last year. In these two years, the total amount paid that establishment was $24,477.70. In addition to this, I find the amount paid for advertising Post Office notices, in the city of Halifax, to have been, in 1875, $125.04, and in 1876, $318.81, making a total of $443.85. How much the Citizen Publishing Company received of this amount, which is part and parcel of the total, I am unable to say, because, in this particular, the names of the persons and the journals to whom it was paid are not given, as they are in similar expenditures for the Militia Department and some others. So far as the report applies to the expenditure in New Brunswick, it appears that a newspaper called the St. John Freeman received, in 1875, for printing, $7,194.31; Money Order Office, $471; Post Office at Fredericton, $14; Post Office at St. John, $300; advertising for mail tenders, $145; total, $8,126.31. The work at this establishment increased in the same proportion as that of the other favoured office at Halifax in 1876. The items are for 1876:—For printing, $8,984.70; Money Order Office, $538; Post Office, St. John, $680.24; advertising mails, $61; total, $10,263.94. For advertising, or some other printing not named, in 1875, at St. John, there is an amount of $1,787.56 debited, and another of $660.58 in 1876, footing up to $2,448.58. Whether the St. John Freeman received any portion of this amount, I am unable to say, and the Public Accounts do not inform me. Now, Sir, I have called the attention of the House to these different items, and I desire to have this return brought down, in order that the country may know to whom this money was awarded. We have read a great deal in the newspapers in reference to these matters. Whether the statements made are correct or not we shall be able to decide when the names have been laid before the House, and the receipts, signed by the parties who have received the money, put in our possession. It has also been stated—I know not how true the statement is, but as far as the Halifax Publishing Company was concerned it was not denied in the discussion of last year—that one of the Ministers and a prominent member of this House were interested in the establishment, and, consequently, if any dividend was declared for the business of those years, they would receive a proportion of these profits.

Mr. JONES (Halifax): Hear, hear.

Mr. BOWELL: Whether I am to understand from that that the hon. member for Halifax received any dividend, or not, I do not know. He smiles, and I presume I may take it for granted that he has profited by this $24,000 which has gone into the pockets of the stockholders of this Company.

Mr. JONES (Halifax): Do you want some stock?

Mr. BOWELL: I don't know that I do, considering the parties who have in the past been connected with that paper, and more especially, if it be true that the establishment has been sold to an avowed Annexationist, I do not want one cent of its stock. It has been publicly stated that the St. John Freeman has no job office in which this work could be done. That is a matter which, I presume, will be discovered when we are put in possession of the receipts and other papers moved for; but I can hardly suppose that any Government would inaugurate a system of middlemen in this country who, you know, Mr. Speaker, stand in your country between the landlord and the unfortunate men who pay the rent; and who have been designated the leeches which have sucked the life blood from the labourers, and by that means kept them in poverty. Whether that be the case or not, I cannot say, but I trust we will be able to ferret out the truth in connection with this business. Why two establishments, one in Halifax and the other in St. John, New Brunswick, should have allotted to them $42,868.95 in two years for printing for one department alone, out of a total of $65,527.93, it will be for this House to determine when the papers come down. No doubt the country will appreciate the motives that have induced the Postmaster-General, whether the present occupant of the office or his predecessor, to act as he has done in this particular.

EXPENSES OF ADVERTISING.

MOTION FOR STATEMENT.

Mr. BOWELL moved for a detailed statement of the expenses during the years 1874, 1875 and 1876, in advertising on behalf of the Government or any public service, in the public journals of the Dominion, the amount paid each journal respectively, and the purpose for which such money was paid; also the amount paid in subscriptions, for what papers paid, and whether such papers were ordered for the use of the Public Departments, for circulation in Europe, or otherwise. He said that in 1873 they had a similar return brought down. The one asked for would complete it up to date.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. BOWELL.

LE CRÉDIT FONCIER DU BAS CANADA.

Mr. BÉCHARD moved for a clear and complete statement of the property and business (assets, liabilities) of a Company bearing the name of "Le Crédit Foncier du Bas Canada," incorporated under Chapter 102 of the Statutes of Canada, 36 Vic., (1873), and in particular:—

1. The amount of the subscribed capital ;
2. The amount of this capital paid in ;
3. The amount of bonds in circulation ;
4. The amount invested and secured by hypothecs ;
5. The value of the real property hypothe- cated ;
6. The amount of capital held as deposits from the time when the Company commene- ed business up to the 1st January last (1877).

The said statement not to include the assets, debts, rights, actions, privileges, and hypothecs which the said Crédit Foncier du Bas Canada may have acquired from any Building Society or Societies established under Chapter 69 of the Consolidated Statutes of Lower Canada, or resulting from any union or amalgamation between the said Cr-édit Foncier du Bas Canada and any Company or Companies established under the last cited Act.

A separate and distinct, clear and complete statement of the property and business (assets and liabilities) of any such Company or Companies, so acquired and possessed by the said Crédit Foncier, to be made in like manner, in the form and manner first above mentioned up to the 1st January last (1877).

Further, copies of the various statements duly made and certified by the said Crédit Foncier du Bas Canada since it commenced business, up to the 1st January last.

Mr. BLAKE said the Company was required by law to send half-yearly to the Finance Minister a statement of its assets and liabilities. He did not know whether all the particulars asked for by the hon. gentleman could be obtained. In permitting the address to pass, it should be understood that the Finance Minister would consider what further particulars ought to be asked in this case, and, if those required by the hon. member could be furnished, the Government would furnish them.

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

MOTION TO PRINT.

Mr. ORTON moved :

“ That the evidence obtained by the Agricultural Committee, and reported to this House last Session, oral as well written, be printed in blue book form, in the same manner as the Report of the Committee on Depression of Trade.”

Mr. BLAKE said the statement referred to by the hon. member had not been submitted to the House. It should be presented to the House before it went into the hands of the Printing Committee.

Mr. SPEAKER said a great deal of this matter could only come to the House through a report of the Committee. The “ oral evidence ” asked for was not in the possession of any members of the Government or any other public body that might be called upon for it. He presumed that evidence had been received since last Session.

Mr. ORTON said a large amount of the evidence submitted to the House was not printed by the Committee, and the object of the motion was simply to have the evidence referred to printed in the usual bluebook form. That was the only way of getting the evidence before hon. members.

Mr. BOWELL said, if he remembered correctly, the Report of the Committee on Agriculture was referred to the Printing Committee, who thought there was altogether too much of it, and that it was not worth printing. It was usual, when a document was referred, for the Committee to accept that as an indication that the House desired it to be printed. Of course, it was a different matter when the document was sent with instructions to consider whether it should be printed or not.

Mr. BLAKE said he disagreed with the view of the hon. gentleman as to the powers of the Committee. In referring a matter to the Committee, the House did not divest itself of all authority over it. If every reference was to be taken as a statement of the House that the document should be printed, they should give up that form and order the printing directly.

Mr. BOWELL said he did not refer to general documents that were sent to the Committee as a matter of course; he spoke simply of special cases.

Mr. BLAKE said the rule of the House, as he understood it, did not debar them from their privileges for the purpose of giving the Printing Committee the absolute authority to pass on the question, whether it was proper and convenient that a document should be printed or not. If that was the understanding, he would certainly object to this or any other document going to the Committee.

Mr. TUPPER said the House distinctly divested itself of all powers in ordering papers to be printed. The Committee dealt with this matter, and, if the House disagreed with them on any matter, it did not adopt the report. The Committee reported that certain papers should not be printed, and the House took no action whatever.

Mr. BLAKE said the rule was as follows:—

“ On motion for printing any paper being offered, the same shall be first submitted to the Joint Committee on Printing for report before the question is put thereon.”

The Committee reported, and the question was put whether the report should be adopted.

Mr. TUPPER: The matter in question has already been reported.

Mr. BLAKE said he knew nothing about that. If it was the case, and if the hon. gentleman's proposal was to reverse the decision the Committee arrived at last year, he did not see how the hon. member's motion affected the matter. They were not dealing with the merits of the case now. He was quite willing to have the matter referred again, but it should be distinctly understood that the doctrine of the hon. member for North Hastings was not to prevail—that the reference of the motion was to be taken as the sense of the House that it should be printed.

Mr. TUPPER said he would like to have Mr. Speaker's decision as to the practice he had referred to.

Mr. SPEAKER: As the rule stands, the mere motion of a member that a certain document be printed, if it find a seconder, carries the paper to the Printing Committee. I am not at liberty to put the question on it. The rule reads:

"On motion for printing any paper being offered, the same shall be first submitted to the Joint Committee on Printing for report, before the question is put thereon."

There is, therefore, no position taken or recommendation whatever made by the House. The hon. member, on his own responsibility, moves that a certain paper be printed, he finds a seconder, the motion is put into my hands, and I merely read it and pass it to the Clerk; the sense of the House is not taken thereon. Hon. members have probably fallen into the error from the fact, which frequently occurs, that some hon. member has been able to bring to the notice of the House some paper, the importance of which has not been perceived, and has tried to get an expression of opinion that it was of such importance as to require printing. The Printing Committee have accepted such expression, I presume, as sufficient reason to reverse the practice. There is another point on which I was myself mistaken a day or two ago, when I was thoughtlessly going to put the question on a motion for printing a paper which was before the Committee last year and which they refused to print. On considering the matter afterwards, I came to the conclusion—and I am sustained by the opinions of the officers whom I consulted upon it—that the transactions of each Session are entirely complete in themselves. At the Prorogation everything is finished, and, when a matter comes up again, it is entirely de novo. It is for the Printing Committee to decide whether the reasons for the printing of a document are sufficient or insufficient. The House passes no opinion whatever on the reference. If it passed an opinion, a vote might be taken, and that would be an expression that the paper should be printed. I find there is a seconder to this motion and I must pass it to the Clerk.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he desired to call the attention of the House to the fact that the motion of the hon. member for Centre Wellington was materially changed from that on the notice paper. The motion, of which notice was given, read:

"That all the evidence obtained by the Special Committee on Agriculture of last Session be printed, including any evidence obtained by Committee after reporting."

The motion, now made, was as follows:

"That the evidence obtained by the Agricultural Committee, and reported to this House last Session, oral as well as written, be printed in blue book form, in the same manner as the Report of the Committee on Depression of Trade."

There were absolutely not two consecutive words the same as in the notice the hon. member had given. Anything more irregular could hardly be conceived, and the motion could not possibly be allowed to be put in any such shape at all. The original motion gave entirely different grounds, was couched in entirely different language, and, in fact, had no resemblance to that which was now produced. He (Mr. Mackenzie) differed entirely from the interpretation of the duties and practice of the Committee given by the hon. member for Cumberland. He served on the Committee for some years, and it was certainly the practice then to examine all documents before them and report what portion thereof should be printed. It was occasionally the practice of the Chairman to call the attention of movers to what he proposed to print. If it could be effected, those gentlemen were invited to appear before the Committee to state their views on this point. There could be no question that the intention was to make the Committee practically a sub-committee of the House to examine in detail the manuscripts before them in order to give an opinion as to what it would be useful to publish.

Mr. ORTON said he would give some reasons why this evidence should be printed. The Select Committee on Agriculture had a great deal of discussion in reference to the report and finally a compromise was effected. A Sub-Committee had been appointed to draft a synopsis of the evidence and put it in a form which could be cheaply printed. A majority of the Committee, however, concluded that they would rather not have any of the written evidence reported to the House, and urged him very strongly that only the oral evidence should be presented. Finally, it was agreed that, if the majority would submit the whole evidence, the minority would accept the oral evidence along with it. It was not for him to say that any understanding was come to, but he thought the hon. member for North York might be able to cast some light on the question. In order to save expense, circulars were sent to representative farmers throughout the country, and a large amount of evidence was thereby obtained regarding the entries of productions of the United States into Canada. An attempt was apparently made to report the whole evidence, but, as this was not done, he was obliged to obtain a record of a portion of the evidence in a manner which was perhaps irregular. He was still of opinion that the latter section of the testimony should be printed.

Mr. SPEAKER said there was virtually no motion in his hands and the course pursued was entirely irregular. The hon. member could not refer to the Committee on Printing any document not in the possession of the House. In drawing up the motion, the hon. gentleman should be very careful to insert nothing even casting a doubt on the fact that the documents were in possession of the House. If this was not the case, the first step was to place them in its possession, and then move reference to the Printing Committee.

Mr. TUPPER said he thought the hon. gentleman might conclude his statement, and the motion might then be withdrawn.

Mr. DYMOND said the hon. gentleman had made a charge against him which he considered it would be well for him to contradict.

Mr. SPEAKER said that he did not understand that any such charge had been made.

Mr. DYMOND said the hon. gentleman had invited enlightenment from him, but he knew nothing whatever regarding the action of the hon. gentleman's Sub-Committee. As regarded enlightenment, he had for a long time abandoned the hope that the hon. gentleman could be enlightened by anyone.

Mr. TUPPER said that, if the hon. gentleman was deprived of the opportunity of amending his motion, he thought this would be the first time he had ever seen such a course taken.

Mr. ORTON renewed his motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: Why does the hon. gentleman use the word "oral" as well as the word "written"?

Mr. MASSON: The motion refers to evidence, oral or written, that has been reported to the House.

Mr. CAUCHON: The hon. gentleman must bring, by motion, the evidence before the House, in order that it may be read. Then it may be referred.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is a great deal of force in the observation made by the President of the Council. Papers which came before us last Session are not, properly speaking, before us this Session. We only know of their existence by reference to the Journals.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he thought there were a number of precedents of members having moved that a certain entry in the Journals be read for the purpose of placing it before the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: We have fallen into this mode irregularly. We have passed resolutions similar to this, but I think quite irregularly.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex) said the Printing Committee had seen fit to order the printing of the oral evidence, but the evidence which had been received in reply to circulars, when laid before the Committee, was rejected. The Committee was supposed to exercise its own judgment regarding the matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: This motion for printing goes to the Committee. In the future, hon. members must understand that they must proceed in the regular way.

Mr. SINCLAIR said the Printing Committee had found many of the questions sent throughout the country answered in such an erroneous manner that they could not order them to be printed. He thought that it would be better to leave the matter as it was.

Mr. BLAKE said the hon. gentleman should make his explanations before the Printing Committee.

Mr. TUPPER said his hon. friend would have an opportunity, when the Printing Committee made its Report, of presenting his case to the House.

RETURNING OFFICER AT THE DORCHESTER ELECTION.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. ROULEAU moved for copies of all letters, correspondence, telegrams, &c., asking or having reference to the appointment of Thomas Jacques Taschereau, Esquire, as Returning Officer for the Electoral Division of Dorchester, at the election held in the month of December, 1875. He said he did not charge any dereliction of duty against the Returning Officer on the occasion in question. He simply desired to know what had induced the Government to select a person outside the Electoral Division of Dorchester, to act as such Returning Officer. The Registrar of the Division had so acted during the local elections in the Province of Quebec, and he saw no reason why the Registrar could not also have so acted in December, 1875. It was true that the law permitted the Government to choose either the Sheriff or Registrar, but, as the former lived at a considerable distance from the Division, he thought that he ought not to have been preferred to the Registrar, who was a resident of the Division, and who would naturally take a greater interest in its affairs than a stranger, whose interests would naturally be somewhat antagonistic to those of the electors in question. As the nomination of a non-resident of the constituency as Returning Officer occasioned great inconvenience, he hoped that, if this step was again taken by the Government, some member more influential than himself would move an amendment to the law, requiring that a Returning Officer, under such circumstances, should appoint a resident of the constituency as his secretary, with full power to act as such officer, or that the Returning Officer should reside in the constituency, at all events, during the period between the day of nomination and the day of election.

Mr. BLAKE said he understood the hon. member to ask for this supposed correspondence not because he argued that Mr. Taschereau, the Sheriff of the Judicial District of Beauce, within which the constituency of Dorchester was situated, was a person illegally appointed, or because he was not fit, by reason of character and attainments, to be the Returning Officer, but because Mr. Taschereau, although such Sheriff, did not reside within the limits of the Electoral Division of Dorchester, and because another officer was named in the Election Act,—the Registrar, and the hon. gentleman thought that the public convenience would have been better served by the selection of the latter official. Now, the law authorized the Government to appoint as Returning Officer either the Sheriff of the District, or the Registrar of the District. The fact that the Registrar resided within the Electoral Division was, in the hon. gentleman's opinion, a preponderating reason why he should have been chosen for such purpose; that, in such a case, the election would in all likelihood have been more fairly conducted, and the convenience of the public interested would have been better cared for. These were the hon. gentleman's views. He (Mr. Blake) had no reason to doubt that the Registrar was an extremely respectable man. He had reason to believe that this was the case, and, moreover, the Registrar had a very good name—the name of Rouleau. Further, if he was rightly informed, the Registrar was the hon. gentleman's brother. If this was so, he thought the Government might fairly choose, of the two officers entitled to be appointed Returning Officer, the Sheriff, Mr. Taschereau, who did not happen to be the candidate's brother.

Mr. ROULEAU: I suppose the hon. Minister thought I had some personal interest in having my brother appointed.

Mr. BLAKE: No, no. However, there is no correspondence, and I would suggest that the motion be withdrawn.
Motion withdrawn.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved for a return of the names, offices, salaries, present residences, dates of appointments, and national origin of all officers appointed to the Civil Service of the Dominion since November, 1873.

Mr. CASEY suggested that the motion should be altered so as to secure the return being continuous from the return which was brought down dated May, 1872.

Mr. COSTIGAN agreed to alter the date to January, 1872.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

MANITOBA LAND CLAIMS.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. RYAN moved for a return showing the number of cases tried and disposed of under the provisions of the 38 Vict., cap. 53, entitled "An Act respecting conflicting claims to lands of occupants in Manitoba." He said his object was to show another very forcible example of the extremely leisurely manner, to use no stronger term, in which Manitoba affairs had been dealt with. By the 32nd section of the Manitoba Act and amendments thereto, parties in possession of lands at the time of the transfer of the Province to the Dominion were declared to be entitled to the patents. As was natural, there were very many conflicting claims under this section, perhaps 200 or 300; and, as the ordinary courts of Manitoba had no jurisdiction to try these cases, it was found advisable in May, 1873, to pass the 36 Vict., cap. 6, creating a special tribunal to try them. Under this Act nothing was done; it remained a dead letter on the Statute Books for a couple of years, and, in 1875, its machinery having been considered too cumbersome and expensive, it was repealed by "An Act respecting conflicting claims to lands of occupants in Manitoba." The latter Act was probably an improvement on the former, but an Act having been passed that would work, it was supplemented by the appointment of a Commissioner who could not work—the Hon. Alex. Morris. The Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba had so much to attend to—so much public business and so much private business,—so many official appointments to make, and so many Indian treaties to negotiate, that he had no time to devote to the discharge of the duties of Commissioner. The consequence was that not a single case had been tried or disposed of. It was extremely unfair to keep the whole Province in hot water for so long a time—nearly seven years. It embittered social and business intercourse; it kept several thousands of acres of land unimproved, because no one would venture to improve disputed lands. It would have been the natural and better course for the Government to have appointed some one of their friends in Manitoba the Commissioner, and, if they had no friend of sufficient ability and character to justify his appointment, then they should have appointed the Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench in the Province, Commissioners. Such a course would have been most satisfactory to the Province. So far as expense was concerned, it did not matter whether one Commissioner took six months, or three Commissioners took two months, and the sooner the question was disposed of the better for all parties. Mr. Justice Betournay could take the French parishes, and Chief Justice Wood and Mr. Justice McKeagney the English parishes. It was not at all probable that Mr. Morris would have any spare time to devote to the duties of Commissioner before the expiry of his term of Lieutenant-Governor next summer, and the country could not afford to wait so long. It was an imperative necessity that something should be done at once. He would request the Minister of the Interior to give his attention to the subject, and in the interest of the Province appoint some one who could give his time to the settlement of the disputed claims.

Mr. SCHULTZ said he had very little to say, except to corroborate what had been said by the hon. member for Marquette. These disputed claims, like all disputed claims, were vexatious, and doubly so from the lapse of time since they should have been adjusted. He thought under the late Government an assurance was given that there should be an adjustment of these difficulties almost at once. Since then, every year, either in the House, or by the head of the Department, this assurance has been renewed. Nevertheless, not a single one of the disputed claims—and he believed they were more than the number just stated—had been adjusted. Not only was this the case, but no general report had been made by the person appointed, and no general principles had been laid down by which the claims were to be adjusted. This was a serious matter to those concerned. Much of the property had increased greatly from its original value; but in many of these cases the lands had largely depreciated from the fact that the title was in dispute. It was possible for the Minister of the Interior to at once correct this matter, as there was no such difficulty existing as he had felt in the matter of the stake claims. He trusted that a proper commission would at once be appointed. It was not the function of the Lieut.-Governor to enter into such matters. The Lieut.-Governor was said to be largely interested in speculative matters himself, and it might be possible that he might be called upon to adjust some claims in which he had a direct interest. That was not a position, surely, in which His Honour would like to be placed, neither would the Minister of the Interior like him to be placed in this position. He (Mr. Schultz) hoped that the result of the motion would be to draw the attention of the Minister of the Interior to the necessities of the case, and that he would appoint a commission of several of the resident Judges, or such other persons as would satisfactorily perform the duty.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman who has just sat down has made a distinctive charge against the hon. gentleman who has been appointed Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba, namely, that he is himself largely interested in these lands.

Mr. SCHULTZ: I said that it was generally believed that the Lieutenant-Governor had bought land for speculative purposes. I did not say he was interested in the claims in dispute. I simply said he might be interested in claims coming before him.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is different from what I understood. I can only say that we have no reason to believe that Governor Morris is interested in any kind of speculation that would at all affect his position in relation to these lands. There were such charges made, but I have the very best authority for stating that they are entirely incorrect. At all events, we have no correspondence, and, therefore, it cannot be brought down.

Mr. RYAN: There being no correspondence, of course I withdraw my motion.

Mr. MILLS: I had a letter a few days ago from Governor Morris stating that he was ready to go on with the Commission. I, at once, without a day's delay, issued the necessary instructions, and submitted for his decision 150 cases. There are, perhaps, as many more to be disposed of. There has been no decision, and therefore there is no report to make.

Motion withdrawn.

NOVA SCOTIA INDIAN COMMISSIONERS.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. FORBES moved for a return of the number of Commissioners for Indian Grants in Nova Scotia, the counties over which each presides, the amount annually placed in the hands of each District Commissioner in the Province of Nova Scotia, the amount distributed in each county, also the names of Commissioners who have made returns to the Government. He said he made this motion in the interest of the tribe of Indians which inhabited Nova Scotia. Some years ago the Indians were placed in the hands of a Commission, which had charge of three or four counties. Since then the supervision must have been very lax indeed. The county which he came from and the next county were in the hands of one Commissioner. The Commissioner had never been in the county of Queen's or of Shelburne. There had been nothing but one continual complaint by the Indians, they having received nothing from him. He lived in another county, and the Indians there received all his attention. Last year was one of great distress amongst the Indians. They came to the white people who had almost entirely to support them. This attracted the attention of the parish priest—the Indians being all Catholics—and the priest came to him and stated that he could get no communication established with the Commissioner in charge. Such being the case, he (Mr. Forbes) put himself into communication with the Department. The change in its head, however, prevented the active steps being taken which otherwise would have been. If the returns were obtained, it would be seen how much money had been expended by each of the Commissioners since they took charge of the Indians. He believed in every part of the Province the same thing was heard; and he supposed there must be some truth in the complaints, or these charges would not be so general as they were. Nobody knew what amounts were distributed or anything about the matter. It was said the Indians were paid in kind. In spring, seed might be handed out in the county in which the Commissioner of whom he spoke lived, but it was said that nothing was done elsewhere in his district. Whether the Commissioners had the power to buy blankets or not, was not known. His own house had been pestered with the Indians coming for clothes, food and medicine; and he therefore spoke feelingly upon the subject. Did the Commissioners make any returns? Did they explain what had been done with the money, were they responsible for it, or did they use the money as they pleased? He believed there was money enough given for the Indians to keep them comfortably. If the money was merely handed to the Commissioners, and they were not called upon to make any returns, it was time, he thought, that the system was changed and a new one adopted. He hoped that, under the energetic management of the new Minister of the Interior, this sort of thing would be altered. His own impression was that each county should have its own separate Commissioner; and, as it could be found out how many Indians each county had, there would be no difficulty in so arranging it that each county would get its quota of money according to the number of Indians. While the gentlemen who acted as Commissioners were perfectly honourable, and no doubt could account for every farthing of the money handed to them, yet, not being business men, they were not fitted to make out the returns to the Department. He would suggest that the Commission be placed in the hands of real business men, who would understand making out returns, and thus enable a check to be kept upon them. There was some sort of check under the old Government, but under the present régime there was none at all. He hoped the new Minister of the Interior would see his way clear to introduce a change in this important matter.

Mr. MILLS said there was no objection to furnish the information asked, so far as it was in the possession of the Department.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, 20th Feb., 1877.

The Speaker took the chair at Three o'clock.

APPOINTMENT OF MR. TREMAIN TO A JUDGESHIP.

EXPLANATION.

Mr. CAMPBELL (Victoria) rose to a question of privilege. He said he found himself reported in the Globe of yesterday as having accused the Government of improperly appointing Mr. Tremain to a judgeship. He denied having ever used his name on the floor of this House, or having said anything at all against his appointment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 13) To incorporate the Dominion of Canada Civil Service Mutual Benefit Association.—(Mr. Wood.)

Bill (No. 14) To amend the several Acts incorporating the Montreal, Portland and Boston Railway Company.—(Mr. Baby.)

Bill (No. 15) To amend the Insolvent Act of 1875; and to make the said Act operative within the temporary Judicial District of Nipissing.—(Mr. White, Renfrew.)

Bill (No. 16) Respecting the Beaver and Toronto Mutual Fire Insurance Company.—(Mr. Bowell.)

Bill (No. 17) To extend the provisions of section 56 of the Act 34 Victoria, chapter 5, intitled: "An Act relating to Banks and Banking," to the Bank of British North America.—(Mr. Frazer.)

Bill (No. 18) To make better provision respecting the Geological and Natural History Survey of Canada, and for the maintenance of the Museum in connection therewith.—(Mr. Mills.)

BANKING AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE.

MOTION TO ADD NAMES.

Mr. MACKENZIE moved:

"That the names of Messrs. Ouimet and Sinclair be added to the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce."

Motion agreed to.

ST. FRANCIS AND MEGANTIC RAILWAY BILL.—[Bill No. 8.]

(Mr. Brooks.)

ORDER DISCHARGED.

Mr. BROOKS moved:

"That the Order for the Second Reading of the Bill respecting the St. Francis and Megantic International Railway Company be discharged."

Motion agreed to.

Order discharged and Bill withdrawn.

REPORT.

Mr. VAIL laid before the House—
Report of the Minister of Militia for the year ended December 31st, 1876.

Mr. CAMPBELL.

MAILS BETWEEN SYDNEY AND COW BAY.

EXPLANATION.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) rose to a question of privilege. He said that in the proceedings of the Senate placed on the table of the House on the 15th inst., it appeared that a motion had been made in the Senate by certain hon. members, praying for copies of all contracts entered into in 1876 for the conveyance of mails from Sydney to Cow Bay. In one of the papers published in this city a certain hon. gentleman was reported to have said, respecting the granting of the contract to the present holder, that it was a "corrupt political job and that the recipient was a political friend of the representative of that district, a supporter of the Government, and that it was done at the expense of an opponent." The master stood thus: The Government decided on granting a daily mail between Sydney and Cow Bay instead of the then tri-weekly mail; that he had made enquiries and discovered that the new contractor was doing the work for a lesser sum than the other contractors over part of the line had offered to do it for. He disclaimed and repudiated the statement that it was a corrupt political job, and stated that there were rumours of corrupt influences at work outside of Cape Breton county. It did not do for an honourable gentleman to impute corrupt motives to others, who, in December, 1874, in Halifax, at a public meeting, said, with respect to Confederation, "that he would never allow the walls of the Legislature to stand between the question and the people;" who two years afterwards voted for it, and shortly afterwards was promoted to a high position in the State.

An HON. MEMBER: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER said he could not understand what the hon. gentleman desired to imply.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: This is an abuse of the rights and privileges of this House. The hon. member rises to a question of privilege, and proceeds to abuse some one or other. I say this is an abuse of the privileges of the House, and the hon. gentleman has presented himself to the House under false pretences.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton): I disclaim anything of the kind. I say I have been misrepresented by the newspapers of the day.

Mr. SPEAKER: I doubt very much the propriety of hon. members replying to newspaper articles. If, in a newspaper report, a mistake should occur, and should put members in a false position, I think they are quite in order to explain that they had not made the statements attributed to them. Of course, if the hon. gentleman had a charge to make against a newspaper proprietor he could do so; but it seems to me that a reply would not be in order.

SUPPLY.

RESOLUTION REPORTED.

Resolution (February 19th) reported, read the second time and agreed to.

STATEMENT OF RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURE.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT laid before the House a statements of receipts and payments on account of the Consolidated Fund, from 1st July, 1876, to 10th February, 1877.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

Order for the House to go into Committee of the Whole to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty, read.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: Whatever difference of opinion, Mr. Speaker, may exist between hon. members of this House as to the policy which the Government has pursued in the past, or as to the policy which it may be the duty of the Government to pursue in the future, I think that hon. members of all sides and parties in this House will agree with me in the statement that the financial year which closed on the 1st July, 1876, was one of an exceedingly critical character, and one which will be long remembered in our financial history. Indeed, in some important points it may be said to mark the turning point therein. Now, Sir, I fear that the questions with which the House will have to deal to-day will prove to be of a somewhat complicated character, and I must beg the indulgence of the House if I should appear to be somewhat unduly tedious in my treatment thereof. During the year to which I have referred, our expenditure has touched the maximum point which, as far as we can judge, it is likely to touch for a considerable time to come; and, on the other hand, as not unfrequently happens under such circumstances, our income (partly from extraordinary and accidental causes, partly from the extreme depression of trade), has been reduced to a very low point—I would fain hope to the lowest point that it is ever likely to reach. However that may be, the net result is this: that whereas our expenditure during the year amounted to no less than $24,488,000 in round numbers, our total receipts fell to about $22,587,000—being a total deficit of no less than $1,901,000. Now, Mr. Speaker, I would be the very last man in the House to made light of this fact. View it as we may, account for it as we may, the existence of a deficit at all, much more of a deficit of this magnitude, is a circumstance of a very serious and formidable character, none the less because it is the first avowed deficit, though not the first that has really existed, since the period of Confederation. And, Sir, if I believed that this large deficit was about to become chronic, then there could be but one question before us, and but one course for the Government to pursue. In such case it would undoubtedly be necessary to adopt very vigorous measures for the purpose of restoring the desired equilibrium between income and expenditure. But, if it should appear otherwise, if a fair and impartial consideration of the items of which this deficit is composed should show to the House that there is good ground for believing that by far the greater part is due to extraordinary and abnormal expenditures, not likely in the nature of things to occur again, then, of course, the advice which ought to be given to the House might be materially modified. Now, if hon. gentlemen, having the Public Accounts in their hands, will do me the favour to refer to the various items making up this deficit, they will find that a very large proportion of this $1,901,000 is composed of items precisely of the character to which I have alluded. In the first place, some $134,000 are charged on account of the expenses of the boundary surveys between ourselves and the United States, which expenditure was actually incurred prior to the close of the year 1873-74, and which, perhaps, as a matter of book-keeping even, ought to have been charged to the expenditure of that particular year. They will find also that no less than $210,000 is charged for special services for the Philadelphia Exhibition, for the loan to the Mennonite settlers, and for the relief granted to the distressed settlers in Manitoba, all of which are clearly extraordinary and exceptional charges. Now, the House will recollect, with respect to another large entry in the Public Accounts, that the policy of the present Government has always been to close, at as early a period as possible, the great expenditure which was going on upon what are generally known as minor public works—i. e. buildings and improvements of various kinds in different parts of the country; and they will also remember that this expenditure was largely in excess of the amount which, in our judgment, ought to be properly set apart for this service, at least, under the present circumstances of the country, and that of the total sum so charged, $1,980,000, in round numbers, $980,000 may be fairly treated as exceptional and extraordinary expenditure, incurred for extraordinary purposes, the accounts for which are closed and which need not recur again. There remains only one item more to which I shall call attention, and that is the charge of $250,000, or thereabouts, made for the change of gauge, and also for the substitution of steel rails for iron on those portions of the Intercolonial Railway which belonged to the old Nova Scotia and New Brunswick railroad systems. These I also hold to be exceptional charges, and charges which in a very short time will disappear altogether from our books.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT.

Therefore, the House, if it will add these sums together, will see that I am justified in saying that $1,574,000 of the total deficit is really and fairly due to exceptional causes, and that this deficit may, therefore, to a very considerable extent, be looked upon, as I have said, as one of an abnormal character. But, Sir, this is not all. I have a further proof, and I am happy to say a much more satisfactory proof of the general correctness of that view. I find, on examining the records of my Department, that the total expenditure to the first day of January, 1877, amounted to about $10,100,000, whereas the total expenditure for the same services during the like period of the year ending the 1st January, 1876, was no less than $10,900,000. In other words, the reductions which the Government have effected have amounted to no less than $800,000 in that period alone, a process which if it can be continued during the next half year, would of itself almost entirely remove the deficit. I ought, perhaps, to add that the current receipts to that date from all sources have almost exactly equalled the current receipts to the same period for the year 1876, and that I feel justified in now stating to the House and to the country that, had we been favoured with even a barely average harvest—had there not been an unusual and extraordinary deficiency in the harvest throughout many portions of the country—the calculations on which the Government proceeded last year would have been very completely verified; and that not only would the deficit have been greatly reduced, but I have no manner of doubt that I would have been able to state to the House that it would have been absolutely extinguished by the end of the current financial year without further exertion on our part. And here, Sir, I would pause to correct an impression which may possibly have been made on the minds of some hon. gentlemen, unless they have considered with some little attention the note which I have caused to be appended to the statement of receipts and expenditure laid on the table. The half year ending on the first of January in any year, as hon. gentlemen opposite probably know, is usually a much more convenient point of comparison than any later period, for this obvious reason, that a great many of the payments which are made after the first of January are made after the irregular intervals, as has been notably the case in the present instance. In point of fact, in the payments up to the date of the 10th February, 1877, $1,250,000 in round numbers, has been charged on account of interest and of the sinking fund investments in excess of the amounts charged for those purposes at the same date of 1876. Now, I need hardly point out to hon. gentlemen that it is a matter of no importance whatever, in calculating our ultimate expenditure, whether these sums are charged ten or twenty days sooner or later in the months of February or March; but I am especially desirous of calling their attention to the fact—because the statement itself otherwise might be completely misleading, not only to them, but to other parties here and elsewhere; and I might also add that even the statements of receipts are scarcely to be relied upon, because we had clear evidence last year that a very unusual quantity of money was paid into the Public Treasury about this time in anticipation of a change in the tariff—a circumstance which has not affected our receipts to any appreciable extent during the present period. There remains, Mr. Speaker, however, another and a graver question to consider, and that is the question—not how these receipts compare with each other, but what are our prospects for the future? Is the revenue, already so reduced, likely to fall, or is it likely to increase? Now, Sir, with respect to this, it is not in my power, it is probably not in the power of any human being in Canada, to say with absolute certainty what the final result may be. I can merely give the House the best approximate estimate I can make, with the facts and inferences I draw therefrom, and to leave it to the House to say how far I am warranted in the conclusions I have arrived at. I may, however, note this fact, that, large and unusual as the expenditures for the past year undoubtedly were, they are, nevertheless, well within the actual receipts for the year ending on the 1st

July, 1875—the actual receipts for that year having amounted to about \$24,650,000, whereas the total disbursements of last year amounted to \$24,488,500, showing (which is worth noticing) that, compared with the actual receipts for the year 1874-75, our gross expenditure, large as it is, is still within the mark then attained. That is a point of some little importance, because, as I had reason to show on a former occasion, our receipts for that year were very considerably diminished by the operation of a variety of causes, to which I need not now refer; and, besides, the year itself was not one by any means of remarkable prosperity, as compared with those which preceded it. It may, also, be observed that the great loss in our revenue has arisen almost entirely from a falling off in one source alone. A great number of the important items which go to make up our revenue receipts remain fairly constant. One, that of Excise, has considerably increased, as compared with the preceding year. The great falling off, as everybody knows, occurred in the item of Customs. The reduction was simply enormous. The Customs have fallen off from a total of \$15,351,000 in the preceding year to a total of \$12,823,000, being a reduction at the rate of about \$2,500,000—a sum larger than our entire deficit. I might also observe that there can be no doubt that, had we enjoyed an importation equal to that of 1872-73 and 1873-74, the receipts, large as they were, would have been very much increased; and, therefore, that the real reduction in Customs is very considerably larger than even the heavy sum which appears in our Public Accounts. I think I am justified, under these circumstances, in saying—not indeed that the Government were able to foresee exactly what would happen, but—that the policy and expectations of the Government were reasonably and fairly accurate. We did not base our policy on the expectation of a steady advance, we did not base our policy even on the supposition that we could maintain the great importations which had existed up to that time. We made our preparations not only for a stationary period, but for one of very considerable retrogression. The only thing we were not fully prepared for was the enormous and almost unprecedented retrogression in imports, which took place between 1874 and the close of 1876. In order that the House may fairly understand how enormous that depression has been, I would like, with their permission, to make a short comparison with our position now, and in 1867, which is the first year with which we can make any accurate comparison. Now, as I have excellent reason to remember, and as many hon. gentlemen in this House no doubt have excellent reason to remember, the first year of Confederation could by no possibility be defined as a speculative or even a fairly prosperous year. On the contrary, it was a year in which almost every merchant or importer felt himself bound to pursue an extremely cautious and conservative policy. There were many special causes which conduced to this. That year was the last of a period of very great depression. We had just lost the advantage of the Reciprocity Treaty with the United States, and two of the oldest and largest banks in the old Province of Canada had been obliged to suspend, resulting, in one case, in total loss, in the other, in a heavy loss to the shareholders. There were also, as the House knows, very serious political complications, regarding which it was not possible for any man then to see the end. In one word, the whole commercial policy of the country at the time was, as it ought to have been, characterized by extreme caution. Now, there is very good reason for believing that our total population, in the year to which I have alluded, could not have exceeded three millions and a quarter—I am speaking of course of the four Provinces which originally formed this Confederation—and it has even been doubted by some persons who are well able to form a correct estimate on this point, whether it was even three millions and a quarter. Since then, matters have considerably changed. The five or six years which have elapsed since we last took the census, with the great exception of the last, have been years of prosperity. There has been a good deal of immigration into the country, and the total loss from emigration has been comparatively very small. I am therefore disposed to put the present population of these four Provinces at four millions, and, if that point be granted—though I do not think it of very great importance to the correctness of my argument,—then we have this somewhat remarkable result: That, whereas in 1867-68, the first year of Confederation, we had a total importation of seventy-three and a half millions, with a population of three and a half millions, yet, in the year just passed, with a population of four millions we imported only eighty-seven millions, Manitoba, British Columbia and Prince Edward Island being deducted. In other words, not only had we gone back to the point we occupied in 1867-68, but if you take a per capita estimate, our importations were positively three millions less, relatively speaking, in the year which has just passed than they were at the commencement of Confederation; and, even if you choose to take the goods entered for consumption in place of those actually imported, you will have an importation per capita at the present time barely equal to that in 1867. Now, Sir, the House knows I have not been usually chargeable with the reproach of over-extravagance in estimating our resources; but I have always seen clearly that, since the culmination of Confederation, there has been a very great and marked increase in the wealth of this country, and that many indications show that this has been far greater in proportion than the augmentation of our population, and, therefore, whatever be the correctness of my calculations regarding the mere matter of population at these respective periods, if I can show, as I think I can, that we have advanced very greatly in relative wealth since that time, I am justified in saying to the House that there is good reason for supposing that we have seen probably the worst of the present depression. I do not attach any great value to such indications of prosperity as are to be found in the number of banks established in this country, but these banks do, undoubtedly, afford us certain standards by which we may estimate with tolerable precision the increased volume of business throughout Canada; and I find that the general increase in various matters which are usually considered reliable signs of the advance of the population in wealth have been very marked during that period. For instance, it is well known that the amount of the circulation of a country, at different periods, affords a very tolerable indication of the volume of business done therein; and I find that, whereas, on the 1st January, 1868, our total circulation amounted to barely \$14,000,000, at the same period of the year 1877, that circulation (deducting in each case the Government notes held by the banks) had increased to, as nearly as possible, \$26,000,000, an increase of nearly 100 per cent. Similarly, within the same period, the bank deposits in the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, for which alone we have returns, have increased from \$29,689,000, to a no less sum than \$70,450,000, the absolute increase in that case being 130 per cent.; and the deposits in Government Savings Banks from \$1,686,000, to \$7,178,000, an increase of fully 400 per cent., which is specially valuable as showing the growth of habits of thrift and frugality among our population; while the quantity of shipping owned and registered in this Dominion has grown from 776,000 tons in 1867, to 1,204,000 tons in 1877, being a total increase of 65 per cent.—deducting from this estimate the outlying Provinces since this added to the Dominion; and, although the gross volume of exports do not show equal additions, yet the exports of our own products from the four original Provinces have grown from \$45,000,000 in 1867 to \$65,000,000 in 1877, exhibiting an increase in this direction of 45 per cent. But, Sir, great as that increase is, an examination of the items of which it is composed will go even farther than the statement of the gross business transacted in showing the accuracy of the statement I make that the absolute wealth of Canada has increased far more than in proportion to its population within the past decade. In the first named year, Mr. Speaker, the total produce of the Fisheries amounted in value to \$3,357,000, whereas, during the last named year, the exports from that source amounted to about \$5,250,000. The exports of articles from the forest amounted to about \$19,750,000 in 1876, as against \$18,250,000 in the first named year, this increase being very small, while the exports of animals and their products have risen from \$6,893,000 in 1868 to no less than \$12,305,000 in 1875. The exports of agricultural products during the same time advanced in value from \$12,871,000 to \$20,469,000; deducting in all these cases the exports of the Provinces recently added to the Dominion from the calculations. There was also an equal proportionate increase in the department of manufactures; and there are some other increases which go incidentally to prove the truth of my statement. For instance, the total importation of sugar has risen from fifty-seven millions of pounds in 1868 to no less than one hundred and ten millions during the year just closed; and, although I have not accurate statistics on the subject of life insurance, I believe I am correct in saying that within the past five or six years the gross amount of policies of life insurance outstanding in Canada has increased from about \$35,000,000 to about \$85,000,000. Moreover, new and valuable branches of trade, as the House knows, have been developed; a large additional area of land has been taken under cultivation, and the land which is under culture is, as I can testify concerning certain portions of the country, and as, no doubt, other hon. gentlemen could testify respecting other sections of the country, very much better cultivated than ever before; our stock has increased in number and greatly improved in quality; our railway communication is better and more extensive than it was, as compared with the previous period; and, although a large portion of the railway expenditure incurred within that period was of little practical utility—much money being spent wastefully, and much prematurely—and although I fear that no inconsiderable part of the inflation and extravagance from the effects of which the country is now suffering has resulted from the improvident engagements which were entered into in that direction, whether by English shareholders or Canadian municipalities; still, notwithstanding all these drawbacks, it is clear that much valuable work has been done, and that we are justified in believing that considerable profit will accrue to the country at large therefrom, however misdirected may have been the efforts of many of the parties originally engaged in these enterprises. I may add that the Customs Returns up to the present time afford very tolerable evidence that an improvement has already commenced. Not only have the receipts maintained themselves fairly, as compared with the corresponding period of last year, but I also note with pleasure that there has been a decided increase in that great item of the  $17\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. list, on which, during last year, we sustained our heaviest loss. I am sorry to say, Mr. Speaker, that I cannot give an equally good report of the condition of the Excise Department. Though the receipts in this branch have been as large as they were during the year 1874-75, there has been a decided loss as compared with 1875-76, partly perhaps attributable to the exertions of our temperance friends, partly, no doubt, to diminished consumption from ordinary causes, and partly to illicit distillation, which the low price of barley and hard times combined have contributed to develop in certain portions of the country. Other branches of revenue have not only maintained themselves well, but have even increased somewhat compared with the corresponding period of last year. I may also observe that our railway receipts, which are necessarily just now at their lowest ebb, may, I think, be reasonably expected to go on increasing and improving, as new traffic develops, as ought, and probably will be the case along the lines recently opened. Turning to the Estimates I have recently had the honour of presenting to the House, you will perceive that the total sum demanded for the service of the year varies a little from the sum demanded for the past year, amounting to \$23,167,000 as against \$23,031,000, an augmentation of about \$136,000. Now, with reference to the augmentation, I may observe that it is almost purely nominal, being composed in part of an item of about \$45,000, which appears on both sides of the account (in one case as an addition to the Sinking Fund, and in another as investment of the interest of the Sinking Fund), and in part of \$60,000 or thereabouts, composed of interest on money which we are about to pay off, and for which funds are lodged and actually bearing interest at this moment. The Estimates are therefore substantially almost identical in amount with those submitted during the preceding year, although, as the House will see by reference to them, we have been obliged, in consequence of the contraction of the recent loan in London, to increase the annual charge on the public debt by nearly \$500,000. These Estimates in a general way will speak for themselves. There are, however, two or three items to which I would desire to call attention. A certain increase is necessarily demanded for the efficient performance of the Lighthouse and Coast service, which is partly due to the natural increase of the cost of this service, and partly for repairing injuries caused by violent storms on some portions of our coast. The increase, however, to which most interest and probably most importance should attach, is the large item of \$86,000, required for the services for Indians, to which I shall presently allude. Before doing so, however, it is a matter of some importance that the House, in looking at these Estimates, should bear in mind how very large a proportion is occupied by charges over which we can hardly be said to have any control. If the House will apply to these Estimates the same division introduced in the abstract in the Public Accounts, they will find that the total charge for "ordinary expenditure" during the years 1877-78 is no more than \$6,503,343 being a reduction of very nearly two millions on the actual charges which were incurred for these services in either the year 1873-74 or 1875-76; and that, too, although as the House will perceive, the expenditure for Indians, to which I have already alluded, has increased enormously, and although there is a much heavier charge on account of the Mounted Police in the North-West than in 1873-74. Now, Sir, these charges for Mounted Police, for Indian treaties, and, indeed, for the whole Government of the North-West, are, I think, in a certain sense and to a certain degree, to be fairly regarded as charges on capital. Not that I at all propose so to treat them or remove them from the Consolidated Fund; but it is evident to every hon. gentleman that, when we undertook the government of that great region, we undertook a task in performing which we must make very large present sacrifices for the sake of the future gain which we hope may accrue therefrom. And I desire to call the special attention of my hon. friends from British Columbia who, on former occasions, have made it a charge against the Government to which I belong, that we were utterly callous and indifferent to the prosecution of the Pacific Railway, to the fact that the present Government has expended from 1st July, 1874, to 1st January, 1877, no less than \$6,000,000 on the work of the Pacific Railway and the survey thereof; and that the present outlay for Mounted Police and for Indian Treaties, and the Government of the North-West,—all of which are absolutely indispensable preliminaries to any successful attempt to colonize that region or construct a railway through it, whether it be done with our own funds or by agreement with contractors or other parties, will entail an addition to our ordinary annual charges of no less than \$800,000. Now, if that sum were to be capitalized, it would represent, at 4½ per cent., no less than \$18,000,000. I think, therefore, whatever other charge the Government may be liable to, that of indifference to the prosecution of this railway, or reluctance to do everything which we could reasonably and fairly be expected to do for that purpose is certainly not one.

Mr. TUPPER: Do I understand the hon. gentleman that the expenditure since 1874 on the Pacific Railway has amounted to $6,000,000?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: From 1st July, 1874, to 1st January, 1877, the amount of $6,000,000, as nearly as may be, has been expended on the railroad works and the surveys—the survey of course absorbing a considerable portion of that sum. Before proceeding to discuss other matters, it may be as well that I should give the House details of the loan which I contracted recently in London, and the reasons which induced me to issue it in the manner I did. As the House is aware, in last November I had occasion to issue a loan for £2,500,000 sterling in London, at the fixed price of £91 per cent. That loan was made with the usual allowances customary in such cases; and the usual commission of one per cent. and no more was paid to the agents entrusted with the negotiation thereof. I may add that that loan fetched the highest price ever obtained on our own unaided credit, and I may further add—and it is a good illustration of the correctness of the judgment of the Government in deciding to issue a four per cent. instead of a five per cent. loan—that that loan fetched absolutely a higher price at wholesale than the highest retail price obtainable for our five per cents., payable in 1903, the actual value of that loan at 91 being as nearly as possible equivalent to five per cents. at 108, whereas the current selling price of those five per cents. was barely from 105 to 106½, deducting accrued interest. Now, Mr. Speaker, the bare statement of these two facts might, and, under ordinary circumstances, would probably have been sufficient; nor should I have felt it necessary to weary the House with a prolonged explanation of the reasons which induced me to issue this loan at 91, or to adopt the mode of issuing it at a fixed price instead of by way of tender, save for one consideration. I am aware that the propriety of the course I adopted had been called in question; and (which is of much more importance) I foresee that it is necessary to disabuse the mind of the public of some gross misconceptions on this point, if we would avoid serious difficulty and danger in future negotiations; and I shall, therefore, be compelled to speak at some considerable length as to the exact position in which Canadian loans have stood for some years past, and my grounds for the steps I took. And, in the first instance, I must beg the indulgence of the House while I glance at the general position of Canada in the London money market. It must be remembered that the late loan was only one of a series,—that two other loans had been issued, and that it was known that other loans must follow within a very short period. Now, I do not at all wish to arrogate to myself any particular wisdom in the negotiation of these matters, but I must say this,—that no Canadian Minister of Finance has ever had such a task before him, or has ever had to discharge it under circumstances similar to those under which it has fallen to my lot to issue a series of loans in London. The House must bear in mind that the change of security from a 5 to 4 per cent stock, was necessarily an experiment, and a difficult and delicate experiment, and that there was a great deal of tacit but very decided resistance to such an issue. It was perfectly understood on the Stock Exchange and elsewhere that, if Canada succeeded in establishing 4 per cent. as the rate at which she could borrow, all the other colonies of good standing would follow her example, and possibly other foreign countries; and therefore, not unnaturally, considerable difficulties were thrown in our way; nor was it a very easy matter to place Canadian 4 per cents. on the market as a favourite and popular security. Indeed, for some time, it was very doubtful if we could establish them at all. It was matter of notoriety in London that a large amount of our loan of 1874 remained for a long time unabsorbed in the hands of the capitalists who had taken it, and perhaps it is not so well known as it ought to be that this loan was for a time at a discount in the London market, which would have been enhanced but for the precautions taken by large holders of the loan to sustain it. Under the circumstances in which I found myself placed, I think the House will agree that the Finance Minister had a double duty to discharge. It was not enough for me to negotiate a single loan on good terms. I was bound to obtain the best reasonable prices for our securities; but I was also bound to take all possible precautions to guard against the risk of failure. I need scarcely say that there can be no man in the country more anxious than the Minister of Finance, whoever he may be, to obtain as good a price as he can for the securities of Canada, but I may add that there is necessarily no other man in Canada who is or who ought to be so keenly alive to the possible consequences of failure, or who, if he is fit for his position, is so well able to judge of the mischief which may ensue therefrom, as the Minister of Finance; and, therefore, I say that any man who goes to London charged with such a duty has the right to expect that he will receive from his colleagues and from the country a reasonable amount of confidence, and full plenary power to do as he may judge best in the interest of the country. I do not object to any fair criticism of my conduct, but I desire to point out that I had two things to consider,—not only how to get the best immediate price, but the possible consequence of failure in negotiating this loan, which I do not hesitate to say would have been of the most serious moment to Canada. I do not wish to cast the least reflection upon any hon. gentleman opposite; but I have felt on more than one occasion that it was a personal misfortune to myself and to the Government that there is no hon. gentleman on the Opposition benches who has at any time filled the position of Minister of Finance. I felt that, if any of those distinguished gentlemen who filled the office before me, if Sir Alexander Galt, Sir Francis Hincks, or Sir John Rose were sitting beside the hon. member for Kingston, it would be unnecessary for me to enter into these lengthened explanations, as they would understand that the Finance Minister had only taken the precautions which they themselves never failed to practice, and that they would be the first to declare that a Finance Minister who neglected to take these precautions, for the sake of a little temporary popularity or a little doubtful gain, would deserve the severest censure of the intelligent portion of his countrymen. Nor would they have made the vulgar blunder, to which a great deal of all this misconception is owing, of catching at some stray quotations in some odd English newspapers, and disregarding the steady current of quotations for months together. To judge of the price which can be obtained for any loan at wholesale by mere accidental retail quotations shows a very partial acquaintance with the real state of the case. If quotations are continued for a long time, and are genuine bonâ fide quotations of fair amount, they do, it is true, afford a guide which may be relied on to a great extent, though it often happens that a market which would be well sustained, with a small quantity of stock to dispose of, would droop exceedingly if any large amount should be suddenly thrown upon it. As is well known in London, and, as I should imagine, ought to be equally well known in Canada, there are many stocks in which a peremptory order to buy or sell even the small amount of £50,000 or £100,000 sterling would have sent the stock up or down, from 1 to 2 per cent., as the case might be. Moreover, the fact seems to have escaped observation that the quotations usually referred to are those of the old loan of 1874, a loan which, having run 2½ years, is necessarily more valuable and likely to attract the attention of large investing companies in preference to a similar loan which has thirty years to run. I am not, however, disposed to confine the case to mere general arguments. I have here a statement carefully prepared from journals of high financial repute—from the London Economist and the Investors' Monthly Manual—showing the actual quotations, after deducting accrued interest, (another matter which has been entirely overlooked) of the old loan, which, as I have shown, was preferable to the new. Now, Sir, on the 1st July the Economist quotation, (which I think hon. gentlemen will admit to be as high an authority as can be produced) showed that the actual retail price of our four per cents. varied from £90 6s. 8d. to £91 1s. 8d.—a quotation which was not disturbed during the entire month of July. In August it had risen to £90 11s. 9d., varying towards the close of the month from 90¾ to 91¾. The same state of things prevailed not only through September, but through the greater part of October, and only towards the close of October, through legitimate but accidental and temporary causes, did it range as high as 92½. The quotations from the Investors' Manual, deducting accrued interest, and based on actual business done, show that the quotations varied from 90½ during two of these months to 90¾ in September, and reached the maximum of 92 in the month of October. This is all the more important because, in each case, these figures represent the actual latest business done; and, though I am quite aware that one or two stray quotations may have ranged a point higher, I had very excellent reason to know that this advance was purely temporary and could not possibly have been maintained. Now, Sir, while I am on this matter, I ought to state to the House the fact that, so far from those gentlemen who engaged in this transaction having the opportunity of making a large sum of money at the expense of Canada, the actual fact was that, the moment the new loan was issued, the price of the old loan, (which, as I said before, is a preferable security) appears to have fallen to 91½, a rate at which, I need not remark, no possible profit would accrue to anybody who held the new issue; and it appears during the whole month of November never to have touched as high a rate as 92, (deducting accrued interest,) while during the month of December it varied from £90 18s. to £91 5s., these quotations being taken from the official markings on the Stock Exchange from the 10th or 12th November to the 31st December, 1876. To those who understand the meaning of these quotations, it will be apparent that it would be perfectly impossible for anybody to gain any wide profit out of our loan by purchasing into the new issue at a fixed price of 91, even deducting the allowances to which I have alluded; and, if any hon. gentlemen are desirous of maintaining that it is possible for any man—I do not care who he may be—I do not care what security he may be dealing in—to obtain anything like as high a price at wholesale for a loan of several millions sterling thrown suddenly on the London market, as he can for the same securities by retail, I would desire to call their attention to the circumstances under which a variety of loans were issued by other Governments doing business in the same market.

Taking all the loans of any note whatever, which have been made during the period from 1868 or 1869 up to the present time, we find these results:—Brazil in 1871 issued a loan of £3,000,000 at 89—the market price at that time being no less than 97 for similar securities. These were, however, to expire in a fixed period of no great length, and, therefore, that quotation does not quite fully represent the actual state of things; but in 1875 that country issued an important loan for a larger amount at 96½; the then market quotations being from 100 to 101. The Republic of Chili about the same time issued a loan at 94, the current market price thereof being 97. It afterwards issued a loan at 88½, the detailed quotation being 91 to 92. Apparently the loan issued by the French in 1872 was placed at about 80. In the case of the Italian loan, which was issued at about 69, the difference was also very great. For that, I presume, there are special causes. In the case of Russia, in 1873, there was also a great difference. In the case of Sweden, in 1876, one or two loans were issued at 96½, the retail quotation being 97 and 99. The same remark applies to the Norwegian loan, made at nearly the same period as mine. The fact of the matter is this, Sir,—and it is thoroughly well understood elsewhere, and is, I may say, apparent on the face of it—that it is quite impossible to obtain the same price at wholesale for any sum you may place on the market, by at least one or two per cent., as you can obtain in the small retail transactions on which these quotations are usually based. But, if my hon. friends ask for further proof, I think I might fairly refer them to the circumstances under which Mr. Tilley negotiated a loan in 1873. Now, it must be borne in mind that Mr. Tilley was able to present to the English market a security having very great advantages. Our four per cents., bearing the Imperial guarantee, are, to say the least of it, as good as any security which exists in London or any other part of the world. I desire to say, in the first place, that I am not in the slightest degree censuring Mr. Tilley for anything which has been done: I am merely calling attention to the circumstances under which he acted, and to the utter impossibility of obtaining as high rates for a wholesale transaction as for a retail operation, however good the security may be. Although it bore the Imperial guarantee, he was unable to obtain as much for it, within five per cent., as Sir John Rose obtained for the mixed loan issued by him in 1868-9, allowing for the discount on our five per cents at that date. The actual result was that Mr. Tilley netted about 102½, the retail price of guaranteed fours at that moment, as any hon. gentleman can see by reference to the Economist, being from 104½ to 106, while I, who netted 90½ on quotations ranging from 92 to 93 at retail, got quite as close to the maximum price with my decidedly inferior security as Mr. Tilley was able to do with the loan he issued. I may mention another curious fact bearing on a point to which I heretofore called the attention of the House, and that is this:—that, whereas the real intrinsic value of Mr. Tilley's fours, when issued, was no less than £114, as contrasted with the then price of consols, which were 92, Mr. Tilley was unable, as the House will see, to obtain within twelve per cent. of the sum which he ought to have got, if we merely regard the actuarial value of the two securities,—the fact being that it is a matter of considerable difficulty in England to negotiate any loan at a premium, and such is the effect of long custom or of prejudice in the London market, that any new security, no matter how good the guarantee may be, is always very much cheaper than the old and better established ones. Now, I have already alluded to the fact that the loan of 1874 was a loan from which almost all the parties, who took an interest in it, derived very little or no profit. The House is probably not aware, but the returns of the Stock Exchange and other official documents will show that all through 1875, and the greater portion of 1876, our loan (deducting accrued interest) was positively at a discount—in one or two instances going to as low a figure as 86½. I am not disposed to inflict on the House another long list of those quotations, but I shall be happy to verify the statement either with the hon. member for Cumberland or any other gentleman who desires at his leisure to investigate it. As to the question of employing middlemen—in other words, as to the possibility of dispensing with agents and other intermediaries in London, in negotiating our loans,—I beg the House to remember that any country going to London to borrow money must, more or less, conform to the customs of that market. The London market is, to a very great extent, under the control of a corporation,

(I might almost say of a close corporation,) consisting partly of a number of very powerful capitalists, and partly of brokers and agents; and the position which the outside English investing public occupy in relation to Canada can be only described as one of great indifference, of which a substantial proof may be found in the fact that many English papers of large circulation do not insert Canadian, or indeed any colonial, securities among their daily quotations of transactions on the Stock Exchange. This, no doubt, is a matter to be regretted, and it is one which I hope to see remedied by-and-by; meantime, I think I would have been very much to blame if, under such circumstances, I had failed to avail myself of the ordinary means of placing our loans in the market. If I had done so, I would have run the risk of making a total shipwreck of the transaction. In fact, the whole question of employing middlemen and agents in London resolves itself, to a great extent, into a question of insurance. No doubt, under a peculiar combination of favourable contingencies, you can float a loan without the intervention of these agencies; but, in so doing, you are very much in the position of a merchant who sends a ship on a dangerous voyage with a most valuable cargo uninsured, and I did not feel it in the interest of Canada to run any risk at that moment, which I could fairly and honestly avoid. As to the other question, whether, even admitting all that I have said, it was a prudent act to issue the loan at a fixed price or by tender, I frankly admit that this is a fair question for argument, as is also the question of the employment of agents, but I repeat it is necessary in all such cases to pay some regard to the temper and preferences of the market in which you are dealing. Now, Sir, the same remarks that I made with respect to the question of issuing loans at wholesale prices, one or two per cent. below ordinary retail quotations, applies, and applies with even greater force, to this question of issuing at a fixed price and not by tender. Let us take the list already referred to, which is in fact a list of all the countries which have issued any loans of magnitude — that is, all the countries of good standing — for the last eight years. Brazil, in 1871, issued a loan of £3,000,000 stg., at a fixed price; in 1875, one of £5,500,000 at a fixed price; Chili, as I before remarked, did the same; the Belgian Government issued one of £1,400,000 at a fixed price; France issued her two large loans at a fixed price; Hungary issued its large loans in the same way; Italy did the same; Russia did the same; Sweden issued its loans, each of similar amount, at a fixed price; and, lastly, the Norwegian Government, almost at the same time that we issued ours, issued its (at a much cheaper rate to the investor than mine,) also at a fixed price. These loans exhibited every variety of difference in the rate of interest and in other particulars, but they presented one common point — that they were all issued at a fixed price and not by tender. I find that they were issued by houses of the highest reputation, by the Rothschilds, Baring Bros., Stern Bros., and others, and I put this question to the House:— Are we to suppose that all these countries and all these well-known houses are entirely mistaken in their judgment of what is desirable and wise, in dealing with the London market? Or are we to believe that these houses so well and honourably known in every exchange in the world, conspired together to defraud those who put trust in them? I repeat, Sir, that, although these loans differ in almost every imaginable particular, the House will find them all alike in reference to the important points,—that in each and every case the wholesale price is less than the retail price, and that in each case they were issued at a fixed price and not by tender. I need not say this was a point long and earnestly discussed by the agents and myself. I was aware of the prejudice that existed here on this question; and, if I could have done so with a due regard to the interests of Canada, I would have humoured the prejudice—groundless as I believe it to be. But I think that it will be found, on due examination, that there are only two cases in which parties may safely venture on issuing by tender. First, where, as in the case of a bond bearing the Imperial guarantee, they have security so good that they are masters of the situation; or in cases where time or immediate success of the negotiation is a matter of indifference. As an appropriate illustration of the correctness of this view, I may state that one of the most important Australian colonies had occasion some time ago to negotiate a loan of £1,500,000. That loan was offered to the market by tender, with a sealed minimum. The tenders at or above the minimum only amounted to some £300,000. The minimum was then disclosed and tenders again invited, but only £300,000 or £400,000 could be obtained. After many efforts to float it, the loan was finally withdrawn, and the balance was taken up by the Australian banks, on private arrangements best known to themselves. I need not say that our case was directly opposite to this. Time was of vital importance, and any failure in the negotiation would have been attended with serious consequences to the credit of this country. As it was, we just escaped meeting with unpleasant reverses. Although no time was lost, although our prospectus appeared in the London papers the very moment that the armistice was agreed to between Turkey and Servia, yet, within twenty-four hours of the closing of the loan, the whole market was completely deranged by the speech made by Lord Beaconsfield, at the Mansion House, and replied to by the Czar of Russia next day; and I have the best possible reason for saying that it would have then been impossible to negotiate a loan on anything like the advantageous terms that Canada actually obtained. While on this question, I may repeat that the London Stock Exchange have taken the strongest possible ground against the issue of loans by tender at sealed minimums, and that I much doubt if it would be prudent to adopt that method of floating a loan, except perhaps in the case of Imperial guaranteed bonds. It is well known that, in the case of an open minimum, there is not much chance of getting more than a few shillings above the price named, and that there was but a very doubtful advantage to be gained in running the risk, as we certainly would have done, of losing a great many valuable subscribers,—men whose names I desired for various reasons to see recorded on the list of subscribers to the Canadian loan. Unhappily, there seems to exist a rather serious delusion as to the readiness with which we can borrow money in the London Market. Doubtless, our securities are gradually creeping into a good position there; but, unhappily, the mere fact that money is plenty in London does not by any means insure success to a Colonial Minister of Finance in negotiating a loan there. Money is plenty in a great many cases simply because credit is scarce, and it by no means follows that it is therefore always easy to induce investors to put their money in a comparatively unknown security. I may add that there were certain special features in our case which I was bound to consider, and which this House was bound to consider. It is perfectly well known that Canada is not looked upon with a friendly eye by persons having great influence with the London press. More than once, during the progress of negotiations of previous loans, hostile articles have appeared in London journals of widely extended circulation; and I had good reason to know that, if there was much delay, we might be exposed to the same adverse criticism, to the very serious detriment of the operation. It must be borne in mind that it is as well known in London as it is here—at least by those interested in such matters—that a very considerable deficit in the revenue of the past year was inevitable; in fact, they had only to refer to my Budget speech to see as much. The depression which existed in Canada and all over North America was perfectly notorious, and would necessarily exercise an unfavourable influence upon this class of securities. The fact that we had heavy engagements to meet for various public works, and that we had a serious difficulty with British Columbia in regard to the Pacific Railway was equally well known; and, furthermore, we were weighted down by the circumstance that a very large amount of English capital, amounting in all to a sum very nearly equal to the whole of the national debt of Canada, is unhappily locked up in railway investments from which very little return is at present looked for. I need scarcely add that it was likewise known to many on the Stock Exchange that large masses of Canadian indebtedness were maturing within one or two years, and that other loans must be contracted for the purpose of paying them off. Now, Sir, bearing in mind the facts I have stated, and bearing in mind that, for months before and for months after the issue of this loan, the retail price barely ranged from 90 to 92 at the very outside, with perhaps the exception of one or two stray unimportant quotations, I must say it did but small credit to the good sense and patriotism of my critics to find that, without waiting for those explanations which I alone had the power to give, there were persons found indiscreet enough to attack not only my conduct in negotiating the loan—which they were perfectly welcome to do—but the personal honour of the distinguished houses which had been employed by me, as they were for many years by my predecessors, in conducting the financial affairs of Canada. Those attacks were dastardly, dishonourable and thoroughly to be deprecated; I trust before this debate closes there will be a universal expression of disgust at them from both sides of the House; and I desire to say, with reference to the houses of Baring and Glynns that, on both occasions, in 1874 and in 1876, every penny of our stocks which they took was taken up especially at my request, and at my earnest desire. They asked for none and wanted none. It was I who took the responsibility of inducing them to subscribe, for reasons which would induce me, under similar circumstances, to repeat the request. And I have to add that the special means which these firms have of ascertaining the true value of the stock, and the fact of their being very large subscribers, had a great deal to do with the success which attended this loan. That success was remarkable, and was attributable to two causes. First, to the precautions taken; and, secondly, to our good fortune in the choice of the moment of issue. I need not say that, in the present state of Europe, and in the state in which it was when I last made my appearance in London, no man could say how soon the market might have been thrown into utter confusion, or when the present complications might have resulted in universal war, or how that contingency might have affected our chance of borrowing money at all. I hold that it is the very keystone of a sound financial policy for a country in our present condition with such large responsibilities, accruing and accrued, to be always well in advance, and never to allow ourselves to wait for the last moment for obtaining a loan,—more especially as it really costs this country very little, as I am always able to obtain nearly, if not altogether, as good a rate for whatever amount I have in hand as I have to pay to the lender. Moreover, Sir, another advantage of this loan was that it left no less a sum than £2,100,000 stg., Imperial guarantee, still in reserve, which may prove exceedingly valuable to this country, inasmuch as it is a security which I can always succeed in floating, no matter what difficulties or embarrassments may attend the negotiation of ordinary securities in the English markets or elsewhere. However, my main object is to correct two false impressions which I found prevailing on this side of the Atlantic. In the first place, I desire to correct the absurd idea that it is possible, under any circumstances, to obtain as much for a large sum at wholesale as at retail prices; and I desire to call attention to the falsification or misconception of the quotations which actually exist in the London market. Let hon. gentlemen take any recognized authority they will—whether the Economist or the Investors' Manual or the official markings of the Stock Exchange, and they will find that, with the possible exception of a few stray transactions, the whole current of the quotations of our loans is precisely as I have described. Now, Sir, any attacks made upon me can do me little harm, and I am perfectly able to defend myself here or elsewhere; and any attacks which may be made on the personal honour and integrity of the agents of Canada will do them very little harm. But I cannot but feel that they may do this country very considerable harm; and it is on that account that I have deemed it my duty to indulge in this somewhat long and tedious explanation, in order that every hon. gentleman may satisfy himself that the advice given by our agents was fair and sound, and based on the true condition of the market. And I repeat that, before this debate closes, I hope that the right hon. member for Kingston, who, as the First Minister of the previous Government, must have been intimately acquainted with the whole of the transactions between Canada and these two great houses for a considerable time, will take occasion to disown the attacks which have been made upon the integrity of those gentlemen. If he does not, I am afraid even his silence may be construed into an endorsement of this most unfortunate attack on men who, both in former times and now, have done and are doing all in their power to maintain the good name and the credit of Canada. Perhaps, before finally disposing of this question, I may as well embrace this opportunity of explaining to the House the application which has been made of the large sums of money which have, at various times, been borrowed by this Government. We have borrowed in all—on three separate occasions—the nominal sum of £9,000,000 sterling, realizing an actual net result of $41,000,000 or $42,000,000. I find, on examining the Public Accounts, and those of my Department not yet produced, that it is accounted for as follows:—From the first July, 1874, to the first January, 1877, we have expended in all on the Intercolonial Railway the sum of $4,173,000. We have expended on capital account for the Nova Scotia and New Brunswick Railways a further sum of $922,000. For the completion of the Prince Edward Island Railway we have expended some $1,018,000. On the Pacific Railway survey we have expended $1,652,000; and on the works of construction therewith connected we have expended $4,356,000, making a gross expenditure, on what I may call railroad account, of $12,121,000. With respect to other public works, chargeable to capital, we have expended on the Lachine Canal, $1,457,000; Welland Canal, $4,296,000; and, on other canals, about $1,238,000; on the completion of these buildings (the Parliament Buildings), $629,000: and on what are known as improvements of the River St. Lawrence, conducted under the Montreal Commission, $564,000,—making the total for other purposes $8,184,000; or total expended in these two years and a half, $20,305,000 on capital account. We have, besides, now in hand a sufficient sum of money to expend between $6,000,000 and $7,000,000 on the various works mentioned in our Estimates. And I have also made provision for the redemption of something like a couple of million of dollars which fall due within the next nine or ten months. We have, moreover, paid off debts or made advances to the various Provinces amounting to between $16,000,000 and $17,000,000, with this satisfactory result, that, whereas we have increased the charge for interest by about $1,750,000 on the one hand, we have reduced it on the other by about $930,000. In other words, the $27,000,000 (composed of the sums now in hand, which we are about to spend, together with the expenditures which I have just enumerated), will cost this country very nearly three per cent per annum, which is not a very bad financial operation,—always admitting the necessity of constructing these works at all. Now, it is perfectly well known that I myself have never approved of the construction of all these works at one time; and, although I do not wish at this present moment to enter on anything like a political discussion, I must observe that I believe there is not a single one of the works to which I have alluded for which, or for the inception of which, the present Government can in any way be held responsible, with the exception of a certain part of the expenditure for the construction of the Pacific Railway. And now, Mr. Speaker, having shown to the best of my abilities the results of the general financial policy of the Government, and having given such explanations as I think the House can fairly demand at my hands, of the reasons which induced me to select the particular mode and price of issue of the loan recently effected, I ought perhaps to add that, for obvious reasons, I have not hitherto stated to the House certain circumstances which came to my knowledge as to the difficulties with which we met in establishing our four per cents in the English markets. I would now repeat my assurance that these difficulties were neither few nor slight, and that we required not months but years of patient negotiation to overcome some of the most formidable of them. The only other point on which much further explanation is needed is with reference to the future position which we are likely to occupy, as regards both our ordinary annual expenditure and our capital outlay on those other great works which we are obliged to undertake or proceed with. It is extremely necessary in estimating the present position of this country, and in judging correctly of the policy which the Government are about to advise the House to pursue that we should bear accurately in mind the liabilities now existing, (or which will exist when the funds at present in hand are expended) as compared with those which we found impending at the time we assumed office. In 1874, counting from the 1st July of that year, I find that our liabilities up to 1880 were computed by me pretty nearly as follows:—I expected to be obliged to spend, on the completion of the Intercolonial Railway, a sum varying from $6,000,000 to $7,000,000, which I may say, is almost exactly the amount that has been or will be spent for this purpose, if the Estimates for 1877-78 are fully expended. I also expected that the task of completely repairing the Nova Scotia and New Brunswick Railways, as contradistinguished from the original Intercolonial Railroad, would require a total of about $2,000,000, which I proposed to expend and have expended, partly from capital and partly from income. For the Prince Edward Island Railway, I estimated $1,000,000, which has been slightly, though not much, exceeded, and their land grant would, I knew, require $800,000 if they chose to apply for it. I estimated the expenditure for a great variety of minor public works then in hand, including the completion of the Ottawa Buildings, at something like $4,000,000—and I fear that this expenditure has rather over-run than under-run my estimate. I estimated that the cost of completing the Welland Canal, as from that date, would involve the expenditure of about $10,000,000, and the Lachine Canal, of $6,000,000 or $7,000,000. For the Ottawa Canals, even without prosecuting them to their full extent, as was at one time contemplated, I knew fully $2,000,000 would be required, and, for the St. Lawrence improvements and similar objects, I set down the sum of $1,500,000. For the Pacific Railway, I was obliged to make merely approximate estimates, and these I placed at something like $10,000,000. The advances to the Provinces on old engagements represented about $1,000,000. I knew that we had a mass of debts maturing to the amount of no less than $35,000,000, and I expected that the St. Lawrence Canals would consume a further amount of from $6,000,000 to $9,000,000. In other words, I knew that, between 1874 and 1880, the country would be called upon to contract loans either for the purpose of redeeming outstanding debt or for carrying on the public works then actually commenced, which would amount absolutely to $81,300,000; or, if you include the last named items, to no less a sum than $90,000,000. I knew also that the expenditure which might be incurred in the North-West Territory for the purpose of properly organizing and managing that great country—although then unknown—would certainly be very large; and that the mere expenditure for some years to come in running the Intercolonial and other railways would likewise consume a very considerable portion of the public revenue. Now, comparing the estimate as made in 1874 with the estimate I have before me of the probable expenditure from the year 1878 to 1880, I am able to congratulate the House and the country on the enormous reduction which is being made in this great mass of liabilities. I have every reason to believe that the total capital expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway proper will be entirely closed by that date (1878), though possibly a small balance may remain to be provided in the case of the Nova Scotia and New Brunswick

Mr. CARTWRIGHT.

Railways. The Prince Edward Island Railway, as well as the Prince Edward Island grant, has, as the House knows, been finally closed. Expenditure on minor public works, including the Ottawa buildings, will, I hope, be also closed before that time; and, as to the Welland Canal, the estimates which have been brought down, together with a small supplementary estimate, will come so near defraying the cost of the final completion of that great work that I am informed the sum of $2,250,000, at the outside, will be all that will remain to be expended for that purpose, while the sum of $2,500,000 will, it is expected, suffice for everything really required in the case of the Lachine Canal. The outlay on the Ottawa Canals and the St. Lawrence Improvement Fund will likewise by that date be closed, and, although I am unable to fix any absolute limit to the expenditure on the Pacific Railway, yet, bearing in mind the facts stated as to the large sum already expended, I think it a fair estimate to say that $4,000,000 will represent the probable outlay from 1878 to 1880. Now, even allowing $2,000,000 or $3,000,000 for general miscellaneous purposes, I think that this result will follow:—That, as against absolute engagements in 1874 of $46,300,000, we can say that, after 1878, we have provided for all save about $11,600,000 against which I hold, intact and unbroken, £2,100,000 sterling of Imperial guarantee; and, as against the mass of debt of $35,000,000, we only have thirteen millions of dollars remaining to refund, after deducting the sums for which I have made provision. With respect to the St. Lawrence Canals, I am of opinion, as is also my hon. friend beside me, after full consideration, that the expenditure on those works can fairly and reasonably be delayed for a short time without the least prejudice to the public interests. The general result of all this is, therefore, that, whereas, when this Government came into office, it was confronted with total liabilities amounting to fully $90,000,000 (according to the programme laid down by the hon. gentlemen opposite), without taking into account the enormous obligations incurred if the Pacific Railway contract was to be carried out in its entirety, we have now a total amount of liabilities to be provided for rather under than over $24,000,000, an amount which, if we only succeed in floating another small loan on anything like as advantageous terms as the last, is not likely to give us any considerable trouble. I might properly add,—because this is a very material point in estimating our present position—that we have every reason to believe that the estimate for the cost of governing the North-West has now attained its maximum, and that we will not be obliged to come down to the House, and demand any large addition for this service, unless some entirely unforeseen accident should occur. So, in the case of the Intercolonial Railway, it will be manifest, I think, to every hon. gentleman that there is reasonable ground for believing that that expenditure has attained its maximum, and that the receipts may be expected to increase from time to time, which amounts substantially, of course, to the same thing, so far as reducing the deficit for that service is concerned. Nor, Mr. Speaker, is this all. It will be observed, as I have said, that we have demanded a total vote of about $23,170,000 for 1877-78, although, as I have explained, at least $100,000, is merely a cross entry. The House may very fairly say: Suppose that you do expend, as on your own showing you expect to expend, this additional $11,000,000, will you not be compelled to incur fresh outlay in providing for the interest thereon? Sir, for that also, I think I shall be able to satisfy the House sufficient provision has been made. If, as I said, I succeed in effecting another loan on the same terms as the last—of which there is a reasonable probability,—the reduction in the rate of interest on thirteen millions, coupled with the charge on certain sums now about to be discharged, will give a total reduction on that item amounting to no less than $250,000. Then, as I have said, there is every reason to believe, that the losses incurred in running the Intercolonial Railway, (which, I may observe, now includes the whole system of the Nova Scotia and New Brunswick Railroads), will be diminished in one way or another by a sum of at least $250,000. The House will bear in mind that in making this statement I am not depending on increased receipts; I am merely calling attention to the fact that the sum of about $250,000 is now charged as extraordinary expenditure, for changing the gauge and replacing the iron by steel rails,—an expenditure which, in the nature of the case, must very soon cease altogether, nor will it require to be renewed for a great many years to come.

Mr. TUPPER: What do you estimate the cost of working the railways above receipts?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: The present dead loss to us is, as nearly as I can recollect, about $550,000, including the cost of running the Prince Edward Island Railway, which will amount to above $100,000.

Mr. TUPPER: You expect to reduce that by $250,000?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: By about that, owing to the fact that a large portion of the extra charge is caused by replacing iron by steel rails. My hon. friend, the Minister of Public Works, maintains that the estimated life of the steel rail very greatly exceeds that of the iron,—the former of which he places at from fifteen to twenty years as against six or eight in the case of the latter. That, of course, is a matter on which I am not in a position to give much information to the House. But the point to which I wish to call attention is that we have, in these two items alone, reasonably well-ascertained means of meeting the increased interest for the increased expenditure on capital account, to which I have alluded, without further charge to the people, while, if the expectations entertained (no less by hon. gentlemen opposite than by myself,) as to the increased commerce which may fairly be expected to flow through the Welland Canal when opened on an enlarged scale, are even approximately correct, I am warranted in expecting that some addition may come to the public exchequer from that source. The lowest estimate at which that is placed is $250,000; and, looking at the fact that the canal pays a considerable net revenue even now, when it is able to admit only vessels not exceeding 400 or 500 tons, there is really fair ground for believing that a considerable augmentation of the public revenue may be looked for from that source. But, that being an uncertainty and a matter yet remaining to be proved, I have not felt it wise on the present occasion to do more than call the attention of the House to it as a probable source of increased revenue; for which reason, likewise, I do not calculate on the additional revenue we may expect to derive from the increased receipts of the Intercolonial Railway. The House will therefore see that there are certain very important points which may be regarded as reasonably fixed in considering our present position. They will see that our total expenditure has, at last, attained a position which it is not likely to exceed for some time to come, always excepting such casual cross-entries as are caused by accumulating interest on Sinking Fund, which amounts to $130,000, if not more, since 1874. With such exceptions, we are in a position to assure the House that an expenditure of about twenty-three millions and a few hundred thousands, more or less, either way, ought to meet the working expenses of Government. We have also so greatly reduced our absolute engagements, and so greatly reduced the amount of debt we are positively obliged to pay off, that I do not anticipate anything like the same difficulty in dealing with that question which I dreaded in the past. I think we have gauged with tolerable accuracy the extent of the depression up to the present time; although I must admit it is, unfortunately, yet a matter of some uncertainty as to whether the future depression may not even exceed the point which has now been attained. It is a question of some considerable interest whether the taxes which were imposed in 1874 did or did not diminish the importations to such an extent as materially to reduce the benefit accruing therefrom. I may say that, after giving the subject much consideration, I am inclined to think they did not; and I base that opinion on several grounds. In the first place, as the House knows, the imposition of the additional two and a half per cent. ad valorem was neutralized, or nearly so, by the very great fall in the average value of the articles on which it was imposed; or, to put the matter in another shape, had the duty been specific instead of ad valorem, the country, without any nominal increase, would have obtained a very much larger revenue than it now does. The fact was that the diminution in values has cost us much more revenue in proportion than we got from the increase of two and a half per cent. duty. Moreover, I have caused special inquiry on this matter to be made by gentlemen of known authority, and, although they differ on minor points, all agree in believing that no serious diminution in importations has taken place from the imposition of that additional tax. I might add that we had pretty strong evidence on that point in the demand for the imposition for further duties for purposes of protection, which has been advanced by my hon. friend from Montreal West, and others, on the very ground that no diminution of imports had taken place, and to a certain extent in the testimony which was given by the hon. member for Cumberland on the occasion of the debate in 1875, in which the hon. gentleman admitted that such were the resources of the country that no hardship whatever had resulted from the imposition of the additional duty. Moreover, on examining the free list and the articles on which no alteration in duties was made, it will be seen that a corresponding reduction took place in importations, and that even to a greater extent in many cases. For these reasons I am strongly inclined to believe that no diminution in the total volume of our imports resulted from the steps taken by the Government in 1874, for the purpose of providing additional revenue.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the chair.

After Recess.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT resumed. He said: Mr. Speaker, before the recess, I had taken the opportunity of explaining to the House my views on the general position of the country at the present moment. I had stated to them certain reasons, which appeared to me valid, for supposing that we had probably seen the extreme point of depression, or, at least, very nearly the extreme point that is likely to be reached, and that we had a fair ground for hoping that we would not have any serious reduction on the revenue received last year (1875-76). I had also stated that, but for the unfortunate deficiency in the harvest which occurred last year, I had no doubt whatever that the expectations of the Government would have been fully realized, and that it would have been easy for us to have paid our way without having recourse to the disagreeable necessity of imposing any further burdens upon the people. Unhappily, as the House knows, the last year's harvest, so far from being a fair average, was decidedly deficient; and that calamity, coming on the top of an unprecedented depression in trade, did undoubtedly upset all reasonable calculations, and will, in all likelihood, inflict upon us a deficit, though a small one, in the operations of the current year. I think, on the whole, that it is expedient, taking all things into consideration, that we should take steps to supply that deficiency. The House knows that, no matter how it may be explained, no matter under what circumstances it may have arisen, a repetition of these deficits in the revenue would seriously affect our credit; and, for many reasons, it is obviously desirable that the credit of Canada should be maintained at as high a point as possible. Now, there are two things which it especially becomes us to consider at a time like this. I have always held that the Government of this country was not justified in imposing any duties whatever that the necessities of the revenue did not fairly demand. That principle I had occasion to expound at great length last year, and I shall do no more than briefly allude to it on the present occasion. It is obvious, also, that at a time of depression, it is desirable not in any way to increase the already serious burdens of the people of this country; and, in the proposals I am about to submit to the House, we have endeavoured as far as possible to keep in view the necessity of meeting a deficiency in the revenue, and also of so re-adjusting the tariff that the net result shall either not inflict any loss at all, or at all events as small a loss as possible on the pockets of the general public. Now, Mr. Speaker, in conformity with my pledge to the House last year, it becomes my duty to consider in the first instance, the proposal of the hon. member for Stanstead, affecting the present duties on petroleum or coal oil. As to this, I may say, in the first instance, that it was a duty which I never liked, and would never have imposed myself, and which always appeared to me decidedly objectionable, though I did not consider that the general circumstances last year warranted me in opening up the tariff, and, perhaps, provoking a series of long and awkward discussions for the sake of a single article. Moreover, I felt then, as I feel now, that there was something to be said on the side of the refiners also. I felt that their complaints were not wholly unreasonable, and especially that their complaints as to the vexatious restrictions which necessarily attended the collection of any Excise duty deserved the attention of the Government. Sir, it is very well known to this House that it is impossible to collect an Excise duty without so interfering with the manufacture as, in many cases, to prevent valuable improvements and experiments from being carried out; and in fact it is laid down almost as a fundamental rule that every Excise duty is proportionately more oppressive to the manufacturer than a corresponding Customs duty of equal amount. As respects the amount of duty involved, I find, as nearly as I can calculate, that the total consumption of coal oil throughout Canada may be estimated at about 8,000,000 of wine gallons, that being the measure on which the duty is imposed. Of this total of 8,000,000, about 5,500,000 are manufactured in Canada, about 800,000 are imported, paying duty, and, according to the calculations of my hon. friend from Stanstead (which do not differ very widely from those of the officers of the Customs Department), probably double that quantity has been imported into Canada without paying duty—

An HON. MEMBER: Smuggled.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: As my hon. friend remarks,—speaking briefly—has been smuggled. I agree to a great extent with the hon. member for Stanstead that the loss to the country by this duty is decidedly greater than the amount of the duty itself. It is known that, in the case of duties bearing so high a proportion to the value of the article as the present duty on coal oil, you must add a considerable percentage for the additional loss inflicted on the consumer before it ultimately reaches its destination; and, therefore, assuming a consumption of 8,000,000 gallons, I am very much inclined to say that the position taken by the hon. member for Stanstead, that a loss varying from $1,100,000 to $1,200,000 was inflicted on the public, is not very much out of the way. My own opinion is that it is not quite so great, but that, nevertheless, a very serious loss is inflicted on the public. The Government, therefore, have carefully considered this whole question with a desire to reduce the burdens of the people as much as they could, and yet not utterly to wipe out of existence a Canadian industry which had grown up under the protection of the law as enacted by hon. gentlemen opposite. The conclusion we have come to is this:—We propose to abolish the Excise duty altogether, and to reduce the duty on imported petroleum from 15 cents per gallon, as it is at present, to 6 cents; and by this operation, I believe the people of Canada will be the gainers by the full 9 cents, and more, on every gallon of the 8,000,000 at present consumed. If we adopt my hon. friend's calculations, the saving to the people would amount to $1,200,000. In my opinion, the people of Canada would be the gainers by at least $750,000, and, as far as I can see, the loss to the revenue—because I believe the entire amount now smuggled would be brought in paying duty—would be only a little in excess of $200,000. It is necessary for us, under existing circumstances, to take back an equivalent for that amount; and we desire to do that with the minimum of disturbance to existing interests, and in such a way that, if better times come, it may be removed as easily as possible. So, therefore, as we are giving the country the benefit of a reduction of duty varying from $750,000 to $1,200,000, according to one or other of the calculations which I have submitted, we think we may fairly ask the country to recoup us by paying an additional duty of one penny sterling, or two cents per lb. on tea imported into the country. That would make us tolerably square, and restore the desired equilibrium, as far as it goes. But there is a certain deficit which it is highly desirable we should make good; so we have to propound for the acceptance of this House certain other changes, which, I venture to say, will disturb the current of trade as little as any alterations which would bring the required amount of revenue. The main change is one affecting the article of malt, and beer brewed therefrom. I impose that tax with some reluctance and can quite understand the objection of all English-speaking men to pay a further tax on beer; but, on the whole, we believe that our proposal will be in the interest of the country. We propose to put a tax of one cent per pound on malt, and three cents (or a trifle more,) per gallon on beer, if brewed from other articles than malt. That constitutes the main change to which we shall ask the House to consent; but there are certain other alterations, suggested by my hon. friend the Minister of Customs, which it is desirable to make; and these are mainly in the direction of a readjustment of the revenue, and, with one exception, cannot, I think be said to involve any serious additional charge on the consumer. It has been found, in collecting the revenue, that, under the tariff as at present worded, very considerable discrepancies exist in the duties collected on various articles. One man is found paying one duty at one port, while another pays a different duty at another port, and so great hardship is suffered by the honest importer; and in various ways there is a considerable loss to the revenue. Some of these anomalies we propose to remove, and in the following way:—We find, for example, in the article of cotton and linen thread, that the language employed in the Customs Act renders it, in practice, nearly impossible for Collectors to discriminate between those particular kinds subject to 10 per cent. and those subject to 17½ per cent. (and it is very doubtful whether it will be possible to arrange the Act so as to avoid these discrepancies), from which cause the revenue is suffering considerable loss. For the purpose of avoiding this injustice and this loss to the revenue, we propose to place all these in the same list of unenumerated articles—that is, to remove them from the 10 to the 17½ list; and I cannot understand very clearly why the distinction was originally made. Then there is a question which may touch some of my hon. friends more nearly. The Customs authorities have been subjected to considerable difficulty in dealing with the duty on cigarettes, and they think that, as the law stands, they should pay duty as cigars; but we intend to remove all doubt by expressly including them under the head of cigars. We propose—as many objections were raised at the time the tariff of 1874 was introduced, against the apparent injustice of taxing a low grade of cigars at the same rate as a high grade,—to subject all cigars to a specific duty of 50 cents per pound, and an ad valorem duty of twenty per cent., which will allow the low grades to be imported at precisely the same duty as at present, and, at the same time allow us to secure a little more revenue. On the article of perfume, which is now paying several rates of duty, we propose to place a uniform rate of 25 per cent. ad valorem; and, as this is very clearly an article of luxury, I do not suppose hon. gentlemen will raise any very serious objection to this alteration. We propose also to remove the article known as tubing from the free list. The presence of this item on the list has caused considerable inconvenience, and considerable loss to the revenue. It is, in practice, almost impossible to discriminate between the various classes of tubing, and, therefore, we propose to make the duty on the whole of these articles 17½ per cent. I am also informed that some considerable difficulty in respect to the duty to be levied on certain parts of locomotives and tubular boilers has occurred from the same cause. I never could understand why this was placed on the free list, and I do not know any reason why it should not pay 17½ per cent., as well as other unenumerated articles and other kinds of tubing. We have found, also, that very considerable fraud has existed in connection with the importations of wine, and that all sorts of charges, such as bottling, cartages, labelling, packing and things of that kind are placed in invoices, in such a way as to reduce the wine below the standard to which it properly belongs. We therefore propose to amend the tariff in that respect, so as to prevent these frauds occurring in the future. We propose to introduce an alteration in the law regarding packages, under which (not to delay the House by reading the clause, which is somewhat long), in certain cases therein provided, packages, when they contain goods subject to specific duty, shall be required to pay 17½ per cent., and, when they contain goods subject to ad valorem duty, shall be included in the fair market value of such articles. These matters, however, may be more fairly and advantageously discussed in Committee, when these resolutions are in the hands of hon. gentlemen. I should say that, on imported malt, 2½ cents per lb. is to be placed. The alteration in respect to packages has reference to the frauds that are at present committed in connection therewith. Perhaps I had better read the resolution.

Mr. WOOD: How are you going to manage in the case of the free goods? Will free goods make the packages free?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: I am inclined to think that my hon. friend is correct—they do so. It has also been found expedient to alter the duty on ale, beer and porter imported from other countries. This we propose to make specific, in place of the present mixed specific and ad valorem duty, and we will put the duty at 18 cents per imperial gallon in the case of ales and porters imported in bottle, and 12 cents per imperial gallon in the case of ale, beer and porter, imported in wood.

There was one article that I omitted in the free list, cotton thread in hanks, coloured and unfinished, No. 6 ply, which we propose to remove from the free list to the 10 per cent. list. The duty on ales and porters is in fact a redistribution, a slight increase having been made in consequence of the duty we propose to impose on malt and on beer when manufactured in the country itself. Now, to put the matter briefly, the net result is this, that while the revenue will certainly gain a considerable sum—probably between $400,000 and $500,000, (a sum which I think will be sufficient to make good any deficiency that is likely to arise next year, even should our imports remain at their present low figure) we will, at the same time, put an end to the mischievous practice of smuggling, which is beginning to prevail, and, although we do take $400,000 or $500,000 out of the pockets of the people in one way under the operation of the increased tariff, which I propose to impose, they will nevertheless gain $800,000 by the remission of duties on petroleum. So that the net result to the people of Canada will not be an addition, but a direct and considerable diminution of the burdens under which they are at present labouring. As regards our expectation of future revenue from these various sources, we estimate the Customs duty likely to be received during the year of 1877-78 at something like $13,600,000; our Excise duties, which of course are diminished by the loss of the duty on petroleum, at about $5,300,000; and our other receipts substantially as in the year before—that is to say: Stamps, about $250,000; Post Office, $1,100,000; Public Works, $1,750,000; and Miscellaneous, from various sources, about $1,400,000—making a total estimated income of $23,400,000 for the year 1877-78. It will be seen, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that the Government has adhered strictly and rigidly to the policy they have heretofore laid down; that they are not disposed to add to the burdens of the people in any way or shape, unless the necessities of the revenue really require it at their hands. And, when we consider the depression which prevails elsewhere, which prevails almost all over the civilized world, and notably in the neighbouring States, I think I have reasonable ground for saying to the House that, after all, severe as the depression has been, much as we have suffered, we certainly have not suffered more than—it is a question whether we have suffered as much as—the neighbouring people. Sir, as the United States has been held up to us as a model and example of fiscal policy, I would desire to call the attention of the House to the practical results of the policy which has been in force in that country for a considerable number of years past. In the first place, as there has been an extraordinary and unprecedented diminution in the imports to this country during the last few years, it may be as well to see how the United States have fared during a similar period. In 1873, the gross imports into the United States, as given in the quarterly report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, amounted to $663,000,000, falling in the succeeding year to $595,000,000, in 1875 to $553,000,000, and in 1876, to $476,000,000. In other words, the imports into the United States have fallen off in three years nearly one-third,—in all, about $200,000,000. And I regret to say that that diminution still continues, for I find that the gross importations into the United States during the three months ending September, 1876, only amounted to about $102,000,000, as compared with $127,000,000 in the corresponding three months of 1875. Now, Sir, it will be seen, from that brief statement, that, whatever misfortune may have overtaken this country, we, at any rate, are not one atom worse off than our neighbours on the other side of the line, who have enjoyed the benefits of a fiscal policy, which, according to some hon. members, is a panacea for all the commercial evils that can possibly overtake any country. I may add, that, if I were disposed to pursue that analysis further,—that, if we were to deduct from those imports to which I alluded the importations of such articles as tea, sugar and coffee, and of bullion, and make a corresponding reduction from the imports into our own country, we would find that the reductions in American imports were even more marked in proportion than they are in the statement that I have submitted. And it may be as well, before I finally pass from this subject, to call attention to the fact that even the United States exports in 1875-76—of which we have also heard a great deal—do not compare at all disadvantageously for us with the exports from Canada during the same period. I find that the total exports from the United States during 1876 amounted to $644,000,000, reported in mixed values as their custom is, of which about $525,000,000 in gold were reported as the produce of the United States. Now, out of this $525,000,000, I find that no less than $493,000,000 (representing a gold value of about $440,000,000) were made up of the following raw materials: bread-stuffs, $132,000,000; cotton (raw), $193,000,000; provisions of various kinds, about $90,000,000; oil and oil cake, $38,000,000; tobacco, something like $23,000,000, and about $12,000,000 of products of the forest,—while miscellaneous articles such as leather, quick-silver, tallow, coal, live cattle, etc., make up a sum of $40,000,000 more. The net result is that the total exportation of manufactures from the United States, reduced to gold value, is very little more than $53,000,000 or $54,000,000, which, in proportion to our population, is rather less than the exportation of manufactures from Canada, which amounted to about $5,320,000 of the same kinds of articles. If there is any advantage at all, it has been on the side of Canada, which is exporting quite as many manufactures in proportion to population and area as the people of the United States, notwithstanding the fostering protection they have so long enjoyed. And, Sir, if, deducting the article of coin and bullion, you compare our gross exports during that year with the exports of the United States you arrive at this result:—That our gross exports, making the requisite reductions, are about $72,500,000, against theirs of about $575,000,000, gold value,—in other words, the exports of Canada per capita are fully one-third larger than the total exports of the United States.

Indeed, I am not certain that the percentage may not be properly placed very considerably higher. It must be borne in mind that the reduction of the imports into the United States has taken place on a vastly smaller importation per capita than that into Canada, and that, at this moment, whereas the United States, with all their great advantages, are not exporting much more than $11 or $12 per capita, we in Canada are exporting at least $18; and whereas they only import $10 or $11 per capita, we in Canada, even in a season of great depression, are importing about $22 per capita. In other words, Mr. Speaker, our general trade is fully twice as great as that of the United States, and not only do we both buy more and sell more than they do in proportion to our population, but we sell and buy on better terms for ourselves, because the much talked of balance of trade in favour of the United States, although it may mean their slow recovery, may, and probably does mean, that they are paying a great deal more for the articles they are importing than they are worth, and may also mean, and probably does mean—as is freely alleged to be the case in regard to the exportation of certain manufactured articles—that they are encouraging an artificial commerce at the expense of the American taxpayer. Now, comparing the result of our fiscal policy with the result of the American fiscal policy, I say boldly that so far as these figures show, and so far as the facts are known to us, they show we have no cause to dread a comparison. As for their home market, I have said before, and I now repeat, that the number of persons employed in manufactures in the United States is not greater relatively to population than, if indeed as great as, the number so employed in Canada. And not only do they not employ more men, but they do not, at present, at any rate, pay them one whit more. Indeed, I doubt much whether the purchasing power of wages in the United States is at all as great as that of similar wages in Canada; while, as to the condition of the general labour market, it must be a matter of common notoriety to every hon. gentleman in this House, that, if there is (as unfortunately there is) depression in Canada, there is still greater depression in the United States; and if there are, unfortunately, men now unemployed in our large cities, in New York alone, on the other hand, it is reported that something like one-fifth or one-sixth of the entire male adult population is unemployed, and clamouring for employment at the popular expense. Now, I have never doubted in my own mind that a people so intelligent, so enterprising and so industrious as the inhabitants of the United States, and possessing almost unexampled natural resources of every imaginable description must naturally become a very important manufacturing people. But I doubt whether, in some important respects, they are taking the right way to secure their speedy acquiring this position. I believe, myself, they would have made greater progress in their whole trade, export and import, whether as regards manufactured articles or ordinary raw material, if they had adopted a system more closely analagous to the system we now possess. Taking into consideration the extraordinary severity of the strain to which Canada has been subjected, I am inclined to think we have not unreasonable ground for congratulation, when we remember that we have had to contend with a most extraordinary general depression, affecting our best customers as well as ourselves, and exasperated by an unusually indifferent harvest, at the very moment we have had to defray special expenditures on our public works and to provide for a great mass of debts maturing. I think the country may be congratulated that so dangerous a crisis in our affairs has passed without our sustaining any very serious loss. I hold that equilibrium is now being restored. Our credit has been sustained, and, more than sustained, and despite our deficit and the difficulties with which we have been loaded, our securities have obtained a better price than ever before, and, unless another such misfortune as the last overtake us in the present summer, we will be able without very much difficulty to weather the storm. If we are disappointed, the Government knows its duty and is prepared to do it. Canada has yet ample resources untouched to enable it to meet its engagements; and, although I trust I will not be compelled to again add to the public burden, still, if the public service demand it, I am sure the people of Canada will not allow their credit to be impaired. And, Mr. Speaker, allow me to say this, that had it been possible for us in 1874 to have foreseen the situation as now developed, could we have foreseen that within two years we would have had to contend simultaneously with a loss on importations amounting to about $35,000,000 on a total of $127,000,000, with a bad harvest, with four consecutive years of depression in the United States, and that, during such a crisis I should have been obliged to appear in the London markets on three successive occasions to negotiate loans to the extent of $45,000,000, I would have said it was utterly impossible we could have escaped one quarter as easily as we have. Doubtless much caution is still needed—that given, I do not fear the result. I count, as I think I have a right to count, with some confidence, on a steady though gradual improvement in a young country like ours. That is almost a condition of our national existence, and has never disappointed reasonable calculations. My position is that the inflation which culminated in 1872-73 and 1873-74, and the reaction which has succeeded it were both excessive, and that it would be as impolitic to believe that we will long remain in our present condition as it was impolitic to assume that great inflation as a sound basis for entering into those enormous engagements which I, to-night, have endeavoured to depict. If the country is content, as I believe it is, to atone for past extravagance and folly by the simple recipe of thrift and hard work, there need be no ground for apprehension, and the Government will endeavour to set the example of a reasonable and prudent economy. I admit that all these calculations are based on the average probabilities on which calculations, as to ordinary human affairs, are constantly based. I do not pretend to say, Mr. Speaker, that I can guarantee this country against the consequences of another bad harvest or misfortunes of the like character. We may have a bad harvest, the depression in the United States may be prolonged, or hon. gentlemen opposite might return to power. Misfortunes never come singly, and one great misfortune might be followed by a still greater; but, otherwise, Sir, I believe that we are drawing moderately close to clear water, and, if it is not possible,—as undoubtedly it is not possible,—for us to escape from the position in which we found ourselves, without some loss or peril, the damage we have sustained is, all things being considered, very much less than might have been expected; and I hope, with some degree of confidence, that, on the next occasion on which I may be called to address this House, I may be able to congratulate it on seeing the deficit which now exists entirely extinguished, and our Treasury once more restored to the state in which for some years back it was happily maintained. Sir, I have the honour to move that you do leave the Chair, and that the House resolve itself into a Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. TUPPER: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the House will concur in the statement of the Finance Minister when he opened this discussion to-night, that every member sitting either to the right or to the left must feel alike the deepest regret at the condition of public affairs which he has been obliged to pourtray; and, Sir, I think I can say that, in this House and out of it, many will be found who will feel more than great regret—who feel no little mortification—that the time has arrived in the history of Canada when it becomes necessary on the part of the Minister of Finance to make the statement as to the condition we occupy that the hon. gentleman has been compelled to make here to-night. I may say, Sir, that, at this decennial period of our existence—at the close of ten years of national life—we have lessons that I think it may not be unwise on the part of hon. gentlemen charged with the important duty of legislating for their country to calmly consider. We have a period of seven years of our national existence of unexampled prosperity, and no country in the world presents a more brilliant example of what a country may achieve and what a country did achieve in such a short period as seven years. This has been followed by three years of adversity. But, Sir, we have these two periods, a period of unexampled prosperity and that which the hon. gentleman rightly characterised, a few evenings ago in this Parliament, as one of deep distress. Now, Sir, we not only have these two periods, but we have them separated by a sharp line of demarcation, and that line marks the change in the Government of this country, and a change of infinitely greater importance in the policy of this country. I want to ask the indulgence of this House while I draw their attention to the lesson which I think is taught us by a careful and candid examination of the different policies followed in the past and the present. At the close of seven years, Sir, the late Government were able to show that we had not only been able to carry on the service of the Government with the utmost efficiency, but we had also met every demand on the public service with the utmost liberality, so great, indeed, that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have not unfrequently characterized it as extravagance—I shall by-and-by come to the consideration of that question—and at a time when public demands were neither few nor far between, we were able to take from the current revenue a no less sum during that period than thirteen millions to apply to the reduction of our debt. Not only was this the case, but I must add to it, as precisely of the same character, the sums of money applied to the Sinking Fund, which is a direct reduction of the National Debt, and something like three millions is to be added on that account. Thus, at the termination of seven years, we could show to the people of this country that we had provided liberally for the public service, and that, while the wants and necessities of the public had been met on every occasion, the debt of Canada was lessened by some sixteen millions out of the current surplus revenue. Is it not worth while to examine for a few moments, the policy that led to that state of things? We had, it is true, only a 15 per cent. tariff, but we had the highest tariff required in order to provide most amply for the public service, and it must not be lost sight of that this tariff represented a greater protection to the manufacturing interests of Canada than one of 20 per cent. would to-day. No person who knows anything of the condition of labour and public affairs in the great country alongside of us, which had just emerged from a serious war, can fail to appreciate the fact that the relative price of labour in Canada and the United States was then such as to give to a 15 per cent. tariff a much higher protection than 20 per cent. would afford in the present changed condition of things. And, when I refer to the protection afforded to the artisans and manufacturing interests of Canada, I must not forget, that part of our policy was that, while we imposed such duties on articles coming from abroad into competition with our manufacturing interests, we added largely to this protection by placing on the free list the raw materials our manufacturers were obliged to use. Further, where machinery that could not be manufactured in Canada was required by our manufacturers, we allowed it to enter free. So, Sir, it was the policy of the late Government to give all possible protection to the great manufacturing interests of Canada. Then, Sir, when we found that we had more revenue than we required, and the duty of lightening the burdens of the people was consequently imposed, how did we meet that emergency? By reducing the scale of protection? No. But we lessened the burden of the people by a step eminently calculated to foster our manufacturing industries, by removing the duty from tea and coffee, and these amounted to $1,200,000 a year; this was a step in the interest of the employés of our manufacturers. Now, Sir, not only was this the case, but I will take the article of shipping—one of the great manufacturing industries of the Maritime Provinces, and one that has been referred to by the hon. Minister of Finance to-night, in such terms as will carry conviction of its importance to the mind of every member of this House. When the hon. gentleman told the House, as he did, and that correctly, that in ten years the shipping of Canada had increased 65 per cent., he gave to the House some little inkling of the wisdom of the late Administration, when they adopted the policy of making everything which entered into the manufacture of our ships free, and thus fostering and protecting that industry in a manner attended with results of which the hon. gentleman is now enabled to boast. Then, Sir, having done all that was possible to be done in relation to our trade under the circumstances, and under the necessities of the case, and having found the result such as I have detailed to the House, the question of opening a free market for our fish came under our consideration, and by the Washington Treaty the tax which was imposed on the fisheries of Canada was remitted, and the markets of the United States were thrown open to the free ingress of one of the great staples of the Maritime Provinces—a staple which, taken in connection with the shipping interests of the country, the obtaining of a valuable mercantile marine, and the extending of the trade of the country, is scarcely to be over-rated. It is true that the terms of that treaty have not been observed, that we have not derived the advantages which the treaty promised to the people of Canada; but I shall have something to say about that by-and-bye. But, having adopted that policy, the millstone which had hung about the neck of that industry was removed by the late Administration, and the great markets alongside us were opened to the fishermen of Canada. Well, Sir, the policy of the late Government was not only to do what I have stated, but the fiscal policy on the other side of the line caused the adoption of a similar principle, and we made a successful struggle for the imposition of a duty upon articles imported into Canada from the United States, which, when imported from Canada into that country, were met by an almost prohibitory tariff. The result of that was that we were able to impose a duty on coal, and flour, and upon the grains that came into competition with the agricultural interests of our own country, and salt that came into competition with Canadian interests:

MR. TUPPER.

and what was the result? In the one short year that that policy was given to the people of this country, it was instrumental, I think, in teaching two important lessons and settling two important questions. When the late Government proposed that policy, they were met with the statement that is always in the mouths of hon. gentlemen opposite, that we dared not, and that Canada could not afford to protect her own interests against the United States. We were met with the threat that the United States would retaliate upon us, and so the interests of Canada would be injured. But, Sir, notwithstanding that, we were enabled to put it on the Statute-book, and instead of those predictions being realized, that one short year of its continuance was sufficient to enable parties interested in the development of the great coal mining industries of this country, to point triumphantly to the fact that no such injurious results followed, but that the American duties on coal were immediately reduced from $1.25 to 75c., the duty on potatoes, of which there was a considerable export from the Maritime Provinces, was largely reduced, and so was that on lumber and other articles, and, instead of the policy resulting, as predicted by hon. gentlemen opposite, as an injury to the revenue, the result proved to be entirely the reverse, and, while Canada derived $800,000 of revenue upon those articles sent by the United States into this country, we saw an immediate amelioration of the tariff which existed then, in favour of Canadian industries. Now, Sir, we also adopted the policy of vigorously pressing the construction of public works. The hon. gentleman opposite, in his statement to-night—and I was sorry to hear him do so—has spoken in terms of disparagement of the railway undertakings of this country. The hon. gentleman intimated that people who invested their money in promoting the railway enterprises of Canada would lose it. I say it was an unpatriotic statement for the hon. gentleman to make.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: They have lost it.

Mr. TUPPER: The hon. gentleman says they have lost it. It may be true that, in some ill-advised and badly managed undertakings, money has been lost, but I say, where would Canada be to-day but for the money which has been brought into the country for its development and for the construction of its railways? I tell the hon. gentleman that a large advantage has accrued to the people of Canada from the prosecution of its public works, and in consequence of the expenditure of British capital; and he would be in a worse position even than he is if it were not for the fact that foreign capital has been introduced into this country. We felt, as we feel now, that these public enterprises should be engaged in, and I think, before I sit down, that I shall be able to show the hon. gentleman that he has gone back upon himself, and that the day is not so far back when he found it convenient to state, in a most authentic manner, to capitalists of Great Britain, the great advantage that accrued to the people of Canada from the construction of public works. The House knows very well that one of the engagements entered into on the Confederation of these Provinces was that, so soon as the position of the country would permit it, we should enlarge our canal system and open up the North-West. The hon. gentleman has now come down with a speech, and he is responsible for it, which indicates that the Government of this country is to shut down on its half-completed policy, and not to keep good faith with its people, as the Parliament of this country provided. There was another feature of our policy, and it was intimately and closely connected with the portion to which I have alluded—I allude to the policy of immigration. I can point with pleasure to the fact that under the hon. gentleman who sits near me, (Mr. Pope) and his policy, this country obtained most valuable results. I can point to the fact that his policy was attended with results much more beneficial than that of the Administration of the hon. gentleman opposite. Our policy was to bring people into our country, and to furnish employment for them when here. And that is the only policy by which Canada can hope to attain to any position of importance in the world. If we are left to the ordinary natural increase of population, we must go on slowly, but the only conceivable means by which Canada can take the position that nature evidently intended she should occupy is by a large and extended immigration, and by giving work to people when they come here. There are the fertile millions of acres in the North-West, which are at present untrodden and unused, for them to occupy. I say the Government of Canada forgets its duty to the people if it does not give to the question of immigration the prominence which it deserves. Now, sir, what has been the policy of the Reformers, as they call themselves? They have reformed all this.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Deformed.

Mr. TUPPER: My hon. friend to my right says they have deformed it. Those who look at the accurate picture I have drawn of the country, when hon. gentlemen opposite came into power, and at the picture portrayed by the hand of the Finance Minister to-night, must feel that the change is one of which this country has no reason to be proud. What is their policy now? Their policy did not require to be developed when they took their places on the Treasury benches, for, previous to that, they almost to a man had combined to defeat a small measure of protection obtained on products coming from the United States. At the very hour at which my right hon. friend beside me was engaged as a Commissioner of Her Majesty, endeavouring to obtain reciprocity for Canada, which was of the greatest importance to us, they combined as a party, with every gentleman they could obtain from this side of the House, to strike down his arm, to paralyse it, at the very moment he was most likely to obtain reciprocal trade to a large extent for the people of Canada. That was the first fatal development of the policy they have followed up from that hour. When we had done what I have described in advancing the interests of the people of Canada, when this country was united from sea to sea in one harmonious whole, we felt it was incumbent on us to endeavour to accomplish the construction of easy and rapid means of communication from one end of the country to the other. We therefore took up the Pacific Railway as a means by which we could extend and continue a policy having for its object the prosecution of public works, which has been found to be so successful in our country, and a scheme was propounded by means of which a hundred millions of foreign capital would have been drawn into Canada, and hundreds of thousands of immigrants would have been annually brought into the country, which would have developed its trade and business as nothing else would develop it. How were we met? Those gentlemen then sat on this side of the House, and every member in the House now here and who was in it then, knows there was no obstruction they could throw in the way to thwart that policy that was not resorted to. They went to the country at the general election in 1872, denouncing the late Government for attempting to carry out the construction of the Canada Pacific Railway, although it had been definitely fixed that the work must be performed by a company, and the payment was placed at thirty millions of money and fifty million acres of land. Is there a man in Canada—there is not one in this House—who will not say that one of the greatest possible boons would have been conferred on the country by the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway on the terms proposed, whereby we would have made emigration agents of thousands of people on the other side of the water, who would have become interested in the construction of that road by having invested money in it. There is not a man in this House who does not feel that a Government which would have accomplished such a boon, or to-day could accomplish such a boon, would be worthy of the regard of its country as having contributed in the highest degree to its advancement. These hon. gentlemen, I say, opposed and obstructed us in every possible way, both in the House and out of it, and that successfully. When the project was likely to be floated, when leading capitalists and engineers had undertaken to obtain money for the work and engage in its prosecution, a hue and cry was raised throughout the country, and means were adopted to throw such discredit on the whole enterprise as to break it down and render its accomplishment for the time impossible. That was another step in the policy which the hon. gentlemen opposite adopted, and which has resulted in placing Canada in the disastrous position they are obliged to confess she occupies to-day. What was the next step? The hon. the Minister of Finance had said to-night that the unpleasant duty of proclaiming a deficit had devolved on him for the first time. This is not the first time he has announced a deficit. When Canada was prosperous, when there was no reason for doubt as to the confidence which commercial men entertained as to the condition of the country, the hon. gentleman anticipated the duty which he has honestly performed to-night, of proclaiming a deficit which never had an existence except in his own fertile imagination. The hon. the Minister of Finance regretted that there was no gentleman of equal eminence to whom he could address himself. He seemed to regret there was no gentleman on the Opposition side of the House who had occupied the high and distinguished position of Minister of Finance, to whom he could address the able argument he was offering for the consideration of the House. I sympathize with the hon. gentleman, especially when addressing his argument to this House in regard to the loan he had attempted to justify, but which it would require a Minister of Finance in order to feel that the hon. gentleman had extricated himself and satisfied the House that he had acted wisely in the matter. But there are those in the House who are able to instruct a Finance Minister. The hon. gentleman has himself told the country that the hon. member for Stanstead brought forward a proposal to save some $1,200,000 per annum to the people, and he rejected it; that he mustered his supporters, and voted down that proposal to which, in another year, he was compelled to submit. I need not adduce any argument on that question; he has himself admitted it. I read, moreover, in the hon. gentleman's speech in another Session, that his declaration of a deficit of three millions, made on the 1st of July, was a mistake. His own statement in the Budget speech of two years ago set forth that the three millions of additional taxation were imposed not so much to meet any deficit that then existed, but to meet further obligations. So, also, the Minister of Justice at Walkerton, I think, or at all events in one of those orations with which he favoured the country, and which he would give a good deal to-day if he were able to recall—

Mr. TUPPER.

Mr. BLAKE: No.

Mr. TUPPER: He does not require to be reminded of the old saying, "O that mine adversary had written a book!" The uppermost sentiment in the heart of the Minister of Justice must be, "O that I had not been so much my own enemy as to make a speech!" But he did make a speech; he said: What reason had the people of British Columbia to complain? Had we not added one-sixth to the whole taxation of the people of Canada for the purpose of constructing the Pacific Railway? The whole case was given up by the hon. gentleman, for he admitted that instead of additional taxes of three millions being levied to meet a deficit that existed, it was levied for the purpose of constructing a Canadian Pacific Railway. If any further evidence was required, it would be obtained in the deficit now admitted. What did I tell the Hon. Minister of Finance a year ago? I showed him what sort of a deficit he would have to face if his contentions in 1874 had been sound. I showed him that during the last three months of the year the revenue and expenditure about balanced each other; I showed him that we had a surplus at the end of nine months of 1873-74 of \$126,000, and that he would have had that amount, if not more, at the end of the year, just as now he had no greater deficit on the 1st of July than existed when he brought down the Budget on the 1st of February. I need not occupy the attention of the House with this matter; but the hon. gentleman gave a rude shock to the confidence which commercial men had felt in regard to trade matters, and one which did much to bring about the disasters which have followed. The hon. gentleman has ventured to say that I expressed qualified approval of the tariff he brought down in 1874. Everyone knows that I am not often guilty of expressing approval of the hon. gentleman's acts, and I tell the hon. gentleman that, before I admitted that those \$3,000,000 of additional taxation had been drawn from the people without a great deal of distress and injury, I must remind him that the House had taken the liberty of modifying, changing and altering the tariff proposed by him in about thirty particulars, and it was no more like the crude and indefensible proposal he submitted than day is like night. But the hon. gentleman followed that futile policy, to which he now blindly adheres, in the face of all these facts, instead of attempting to meet the changed and altered condition in which our manufacturing industries were placed by the altered position of affairs in the United States. He was compelled to give the people  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. additional to the tariff, instead of  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. which he proposed. The hon. the Minister of Finance has spoken to-night in glowing terms of the magnificent shipping interest of the Dominion, of which every Canadian is justly proud. But what was one of the hon. gentleman's first acts at that time—just at the time when that great and important industry, especially to the Maritime Provinces, was feeling a certain amount of difficulty and embarrassment? He submitted a policy to impose a duty of no less than one dollar per ton on every ton of shipping built in the country. Fortunately, the good sense of the House was sufficient to defeat him, and to reduce the duty to some 20 cents per ton, but we have not the Finance Minister to thank for that modification, but the greater wisdom of hon. members who compelled him to admit that, though they had not occupied the position of Finance Minister, yet they were able to teach the hon. gentleman something in relation to his own Department. Then, in regard to machinery, which had been admitted free to foster the manufacturing interests of the country, at the very time when trade was beginning to become embarrassed on account of the changed condition of labour, the hon. gentleman's Government imposed a tax upon machinery which had been previously brought into the country without the payment of duty. As if further to prostrate and bring down that which had been giving the greatest possible benefit to the people in connection with the trade of this country, the hon. gentleman took the raw materials, which they had been previously allowed to bring in free, in order to manufacture their fabrics and other articles, and imposed a duty on them. I call the attention of the House to this matter because I believe that if the hon. gentlemen on that side of the House will give that careful consideration to these questions which I believe they deserve, the result will be that the fatal policy which has already brought about most disastrous consequences to the people of this country will be arrested and changed. Then, when the hon. gentleman required more revenue; when the necessities of the country required, according to his own showing, that he should obtain an additional \$3,000,000 by the increased taxation which he had determined to impose and did impose upon the people of this country, he could have done it and at the same time could have expanded and continued the fostering consideration for the interests of the people of Canada which they required at his hand, and which, if given to them, would have resulted in the greatest advantage; but he taxed the articles of tea and coffee, which had up to that time been free; and thus increased the cost of labour, because he increased the cost of living to every employé in every manufacturing institution in Canada. If he had so adjusted the tariff as to give the fitting protection demanded by the resolution of my right hon. friend last Session, he would have avoided the disastrous effects which have followed, to a very great extent; but instead of that, a tariff was framed in such a way as to impose every conceivable burden and depress every industry. Though it was improved and amended to a large extent, it still had defects of a very serious character, and was entirely different from the policy pursued by the previous Government, which had admittedly been attended with so great benefits to the country. Then, Sir, as to the Pacific Railway, I ask hon. gentlemen opposite what they think of their policy now. The whole people of Canada and this House had taken bonds from these honourable gentlemen that they would not deviate from the sound policy of the previous Government in relation to the Pacific Railway; they had given pledges and made promises that the road should never be constructed in any other way than by a company, aided by a grant of lands and money. What did the hon. gentleman do? Without any authority from Parliament, without any authority from the people of this country, no sooner was the first Minister clothed with the insignia of office, no sooner was he intrusted with the affairs of this country, than he went to Sarnia, abandoned his pledge to the Parliament and the people of Canada, and declared the resolution of the Government to be not to do this work by the agency of a company, aided by grants of lands and money, but by the Government. That was a rude shock to the confidence of the business people of this country, to that confidence which is the life-blood of trade and business. I have already referred to the immigration policy of this Government. That is virtually abolished. It is now an emigration policy. Indeed, Sir, I was surprised not to find a vote proposed in the Estimates to send people to Europe instead of bringing them here; that after the policy which the Government had proposed, and the unfortunate results of that policy in the condition to which Canada was reduced to-day, they do not yield to the demands of the hundreds of people who are left without resources to send them back to the country whence they have come. You have only to look at these points to see what it is that has clouded the whole commercial and political horizon of Canada, which has changed that beautiful picture on which every one delighted to gaze, of the prosperous condition of our country, and substituted one which no patriotic Canadian can look upon without the deepest regret; that under such great mismanagement the country should present a picture so different from that which she exhibited before. We have not received from the Washington Treaty what we had a right to hope for; but does not every one know that instead of taking up that treaty and pressing it to its legitimate conclusion, instead of pressing for the payment of the millions which the United States now owe to this country, the present Government adopted a policy the very reverse. They sent the Hon. George Brown to Washington, to go upon his knees to the people of the United States, and pour into their ears the tale that we had been so long compelled to listen to from gentlemen in this House, that we were supplicants to the people of the United States for permission, commercially, to exist. They sent him with proposals which were of a character to indicate that all the United States had to do was to persevere in their restrictive policy, and keep us out of their markets, so as to get the trade of Canada first, and afterwards the whole country itself. Can any one be surprised that under these circumstances the trade of this country was convulsed? There was not an industry in Canada but, after the publication and announcement, the glowing announcement of what was going to be accomplished by this—happily for Canada—abortive attempt to transfer the interests of this country to another,—I say there was not an industry in Canada that was not paralysed and largely injured by that abortive attempt, and what more, Sir, I ask? Why have we not received the millions which, under the treaty, we are entitled to to-day? I say it is because the Government of the United States know that the Treasury Benches in Canada are occupied by men who hold entirely different views and opinions in relation to our connection with the United States of America from what were held by the gentlemen who formerly occupied them. How could Canada hope to gain any consideration from the Government of that country when one of the first statements made by the Prime Minister of Canada, as Prime Minister of the country, was a declaration to the world that under that treaty nothing could be obtained. I want to know what hope we can have in connection with a matter in regard to which the First Minister of the Crown has unfortunately so failed in his duty to the country as to publicly, and in a way to be carried to the United States Government, make the declaration that nothing could be obtained. Is it any wonder they should refuse to give us what they owe us under the treaty and what, under the treaty, they are bound to give, when they know the hands the Government of Canada is in to-day, and that it being in such hands they are masters of the position. I have glanced at the policy of the former Government; I have glanced at the policy of the party; I have glanced at the policy that the hon. gentlemen opposite have pursued and its disastrous results. With the result that at the end of three years all remedy for the condition of things to which I have referred is refused. At the end of three years, instead of showing millions applied from the public revenue to reduce the public debt of Canada, they show that, after using all the revenue of the country, they have increased the public debt over two millions, according to the Public Accounts brought down to this House, as any hon. gentleman will see at once who observes that the mark minus supersedes the mark plus, which appears in all former accounts—\$2,000,000 over and above the capital expenditure of the country. But that is not all; that does not represent, as the Minister of Finance knows, the great change, the great distress which has come upon Canada. The hon. gentleman knows that instead of there being a deficit of \$2,000,000 there is a deficit of over \$5,000,000 to-night. He knows that he levied \$3,000,000 of additional taxes on the people of Canada, and he knows that this amount, which was intended to be applied in building a Canadian Pacific Railway, is all gone; not a dollar of it remains, and no Pacific Railway is built. No; this magnificent scheme of a Government Railway, the hon. Finance Minister tells us—and it seems to be a matter of boast with these gentlemen, how much they can spend in surveys—they place it in the Governor General's Speech as the great crowning effort of the Administration, that they have been able to spend more money on surveys than any Government had ever been able to spend before. If we had had as many persons pressing us for places as they have, I do not doubt we could have spent as much. The hon. gentleman has spent all this money, but with what result? That, as the hon. gentleman boasts to the House to-night, Canada's debt has increased six millions during the past two years, for the building of a Canada Pacific Railway that is not yet begun—when I say not begun, I mean to say that no practical step has been taken for the accomplishment of the whole work; that having been taught the folly of departure from the policy of the former Government; having announced a few months ago that they would ask for tenders for carrying out the work in the same way as we proposed, they come down to Parliament and admit that they are not even in a position to ask for tenders for the construction of a Pacific Railway. And yet he can boast that they have spent six millions of money on that work during the past two years. Do they remember that in the elections of 1872 they proclaimed throughout Canada that we were going to destroy this country because we proposed to give thirty millions for the construction of the Canada Pacific Railway, without any further responsibility, risk or obligation on the part of Canada? And yet they boast that one-fifth of that thirty millions they have been able to dispose of within two years, while they have not taken any practical step for the construction of the whole railway. After putting three millions of taxation on the people of Canada, they come down to-night and tell this House the melancholy tale—the “o'er true tale,” that the money was all spent, and that they are obliged to add two millions more taxation. I was glad to hear my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, say that the resources of Canada were not yet exhausted. Well, Sir, he is exhausting them, I think, as fast as he can, but I must remind him that he has changed his opinion on that subject. I must remind the hon. gentleman that in that lugubrious, that delusive statement which he made to this House when he was first entrusted with the duties of the high office which he now holds, he made this statement to the House: "I do not think that more taxation could be safely resorted to." Why not? He brought down his tariff and imposes three millions of additional taxes, and he tells the House that he had touched the limit of taxation. But he went further, he said not only "I do not think that more taxation could be safely resorted to," but he also said—"Nor do I think that we should be called upon to consider the question of raising any great amount by direct taxation." Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman seems to have changed his mind. What is the cause of this? Has he altered his opinion because the country is more prosperous than it was three years ago when this statement was made? Is it that which inspires him with the hope that he may still be permitted to go year after year to the money market of the world to negotiate loans, and that he will still be able to assure the capitalists of the world that he has yet, untouched, large resources of taxation? Now, Sir, I wish to say that when the hon. gentleman tells us that if this had not been, and if that had not been, he would have forecast the condition of the country very accurately, he is trading very largely upon the credulity of the House. Whenever the hon. gentleman begins to forecast the condition of the country, I put my pen down. I look upon it as a waste of ink and paper to put down any suggestion the hon. gentleman makes in reference to the future, and I will give the House briefly the grounds on which I make that statement. The hon. gentleman not very long ago—I have the statement in my hand—stated that last year would give us \$25,250,000. Well, Sir, I think if he deducts the amount that was obtained, \$22,587,587—a mistake of \$2,662,413—he will come to the conclusion that it is not very safe to forecast the condition of affairs; but I wish to draw the hon. gentleman's attention—I now speak, not of the mistake, which the hon. gentleman makes, and which I freely acquit him of any intention of making, because I am quite sure the hon. gentleman would not venture upon a prophecy in this House when he knew that a few months, or a year at most, would show it to be entirely fallacious—I freely acquit him of any intention of misleading the House, but I want to draw attention to the fact that for two successive years I have called the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that the papers published to the people of the country from his own Department are utterly fallacious and misleading. The Government are obliged to publish a monthly statement of receipts and expenditures for the information of the people of Canada, and no public man who is following the course of public events, can intelligently forecast the future, can intelligently study the condition of the country, unless some reliance can be placed in those papers issued from the office of the hon. gentleman himself, from the office of the Auditor, who is an officer under the hon. Minister of Finance. I pressed the hon. gentleman here a year ago again and again, when he was forecasting the future, to tell us where we would stand on the 1st day of July, 1876—that was only three months ahead. Did any one ever hear until the last Session of this Parliament of any Finance Minister in the world ever undertaking to deliver a Budget speech and so failing in his duty as to refuse to give the slightest statement as to the position the country would occupy three months hence, and yet I pressed the hon. gentleman over and over again, for the best of reasons, to give such information, and he declined to do so. The hon. gentleman, standing as he did in the position of Minister of Finance, could not afford to tell the House what he knew to be the truth, what every intelligent man of this House knew to be the truth, that the year would close with a deficit somewhere in the neighbourhood of \$2,000,000 if not more—but that could not be extracted from him. We have had statements of the expenditures and income printed monthly and signed by Mr. Langton, the Auditor-General, which were utterly false and misleading—I want the hon. gentleman to explain this to the House; I want him to justify it if he can. I challenge him across the floor, if he did not pledge to the House that those blunders and mistakes should not occur again, and why, at the close of the financial year, the Gazette shows a surplus of \$1,082,813 instead of a deficit of \$1,900,785, which is now admitted.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: I will explain to the hon gentleman. The hon gentleman is making a disingenuous statement, and one which, in fact, coming from a man who has occupied the position as Minister of the Crown, is not quite fair. He knows perfectly well that no Gazette statement ever published went further than to give expenditures as reported to the audit office. These statements are no doubt literally true, as the expenditures reach the Auditor-General. It has never been the practice in Canada, nor is it desirable that it should be the practice, to go on to the close of the year giving estimates of the expenditure brought down in the public accounts.

Mr. TUPPER: I would like the hon gentleman to tell the House what those statements are published for. Is it to deceive the House? Is it to deceive the country?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: I must call the hon gentleman to order. He has no right to impute intentions to deceive the country. He knows precisely that the same statements were published under his own régime for many years.

Mr. TUPPER: I tell the hon gentleman that he is mistaken. When my attention was first drawn to the discrepancy in the public accounts, I went to Mr. Langton and called his attention to it. I told him I was satisfied that it arose from negligence, by putting capital expenditure to account of expenditure under the consolidated fund. He told me he would look into it, and he subsequently informed me that was how the mistake occurred. It was a mistake where the expenditure was largely in excess of the expenditure of the country. The hon gentleman should not put words into my mouth. I asked him if it was intended to deceive the country. It does deceive the country; it does deceive me and every member on both sides of the House who take sufficient interest in the affairs of the country to examine the figures. I say take out the statement from the Gazette, and never let it appear again, unless it is a statement on which some reliance can be placed. The statement I say is misleading to the country, and I should not have had to wring from the hon gentleman the condition of affairs that would exist on the 1st day of July, which he ought to have given without a suggestion from anybody. I find a remarkable coincidence in relation to it—I will not say more. There was a mistake in reference to the public accounts of Canada published in the Gazette up to the 1st July last to the extent of $2,983,598. A surplus is declared on the 1st July, 1876, in the Gazette, of $1,082,813, instead of a deficit of $1,900,785. The hon gentleman may say it is ingenuous, but I say a more disingenuous statement was never made by any Government. There never was a graver ground of complaint as to public documents either by this Government or any other Government. The hon gentleman promised to see to it.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: I beg to contradict the hon gentleman's statement most emphatically. I did not promise to alter or correct the regular returns as they were always given.

Mr. TUPPER: Did not the hon gentleman promise to see to the matter?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: No.

Mr. MASSON: You did!

Mr. TUPPER: I beg to say the hon gentleman did, and I can appeal to the House on both sides whether he did not, many of whom must have a distinct recollection of it as the hon member for Terrebonne, and I say the hon gentleman has forgotten what he has promised.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: I have not forgotten.

Mr. TUPPER: I am afraid, Sir, that the people of Canada must have come to the conclusion that the hon gentleman has forgotten a good many promises made. Well, Sir, I want the hon gentleman to tell the House why, if he was unable to forecast events three months ahead, he committed the folly of taking up the time of this House in forecasting fifteen months hence. I want the hon. gentleman to tell the House of what value is his statement if he is not to be bound by his own declarations which he has not reiterated here to-night as to what the deficit would be, and as to the remedy. I will not venture to make the statement from memory, as the hon. gentleman seems so forgetful and may deny what I will say. I will, therefore, read it from the Budget speech, as reported in Hansard, and corrected by himself. It was when the hon. gentleman was making a speech in this House on the Budget—the Budget speech—when he gave his reason for the imposition of $3,000,000 of taxes. He gave as his reason, Sir, that the credit of Canada would be broken if we had a deficit at the end of three months.

“He repeated the fact was precisely as he stated, that had there been no additional taxation, there would have been a clear deficit in 1874 of one and a quarter millions, and in 1875, of probably two millions. We would have lost control of the market and the scenes would have been again repeated—scenes which the people of this country had not forgotten—which we witnessed in 1866, when Sir A. Galt was obliged to inform the House that he was unable to borrow money on Canadian Bonds at 8 per cent. per annum. He would ask the House if they had forgotten that in 1866-67, our five per cents., now quoted at 106 to 107, had run down to the ruinous figure of 74 or 75 cents on the dollar.”

I asked him why if he could forecast the resources of this country for fifteen months, he could not foresee this. He knew he was only postponing the admission for a year that Canada had not only absorbed the $3,000,000 of taxes levied upon her, but that there was a deficit in addition to that, of $2,000,000 more on the 1st of July, 1876. And yet the hon. gentleman concealed the fact from the House and from the country. The Gazette gave a public statement of affairs that would mislead any person in this House or in this country. I say, Sir, he stands before the people of Canada convicted by his own declaration of knowing what the deficit would be; of having folded his arms, knowing that he would have to proclaim to the world a deficit of $2,000,000, and yet he refused to readjust the tariff, or to adopt any means by which that “broken credit” of Canada could be averted; and yet he undertakes to tell this House, and he expects his statement to be received, as to what the revenue and expenditure of this country a year or two hence are to be. His estimate was last year twenty-five million and a quarter dollars. We got $22,537,587, or only $2,662,413 less than the hon. gentleman led the House to suppose he would obtain. He is taxing our credulity a great deal when he ventures, under this state of facts, to ask this House to rest with any confidence upon the suppositions he may form as to what the financial condition of Canada may be. But, Sir, what is this deficit? It is $1,900,785, according to the hon. gentleman's own showing, but is nothing to be added to it? I ask the hon. gentleman to be candid with the House, and tell us whether there is no larger sum to be added to that deficit. I ask if he did not say just before he sat down, that in that year there was discounted a large amount of Customs duty, owing to the wide-spread information that there was going to be a change of tariff.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: I did not say so; nothing of the kind. I will explain. I was calling attention to the fact that no just comparison could be made between the revenue returns up to February the 10th of this year, and February of last year, because in those six weeks a certain amount of revenue had come in.

Mr. TUPPER: His own statement. It is a distinction without a difference.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: There ought to be a difference.

Mr. TUPPER: Was there not a wide-spread sentiment that there was going to be a change in the tariff? Did not the Toronto Globe say that 2½ per cent. would be added to the tariff? Was not the whole commercial world of Canada in a perfect whirlwind in preparation for a change in the tariff? Did not the hon. gentleman say in 1874 that an enormous amount of money must be discounted because of the expectation of a change in the tariff? Then, Sir, I ask him, is this half a million, or is it a million, or is the claim of 1873-4 of $2,000,000 to be added to the deficit in order to get to the correct figures? That must be added, according to the hon. gentleman's own logic or showing, in order to give the people a correct idea of what this deficit really is. What more? The hon. gentleman said in his Budget speech that the renewal of iron rails with steel was a matter that must be charged to revenue. I can readily understand that a Government who have got a large amount for capital expenditure for the change of gauge, can present any accounts they like for a year or two in relation to the maintenance of way, because under the guise of a change of gauge they can put the whole road in first-class condition. But there is one point in this Budget speech, stating that one of the charges he insisted upon putting to revenue, was the substitution of steel for iron rails. Now, I wish to know why he has, in view of that statement, put $89,257 to capital expenditure, as re-laying, not with steel but with iron rails, that portion of the Government railway between Halifax and Windsor. Then, Sir, I think he will admit there are receipts that do not belong to the receipts of the year—the $25,000 of Secret Service money replaced to the credit of the Government.

Several HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. TUPPER: And, while hon. gentlemen are saying hear, hear, I will draw their attention to the $5,000 Secret Service money drawn out of the Treasury to put into the hands of the Hon. Geo. Brown, when he went to Washington. I do not know what sum it was found necessary to place in his hands for Secret Service or anything else, but it appears he was able to hand back $5,000 unexpended. The hon. gentleman can hardly say that belongs to the receipts of the year, and therefore we must add the $30,000 to the amount of the admitted deficit, making $2,019,842, and when we get the account of the steel rails on the Provincial railways of the Maritime Provinces, borrowed from the Canadian Pacific Railway that does not appear on the accounts, we must add that? But, Sir, it is large enough in all conscience, and when I add half a million, or take one-half what the hon. gentleman himself would claim under the circumstances, and did claim on a former occasion under like circumstances, a million from the Customs receipts, I think that the figures are such as would present a still more melancholy and truthful picture than that presented by the hon. gentleman to-night. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman tells us, and it would be a very important statement if it was correct, that they intended to meet this distressing condition of public affairs by economy. That the country requires economy no one can deny, for if ever any country was in a condition that behoved the Government to exercise all possible retrenchment and carry out the policy on which these hon. gentlemen obtained possession of the benches which they now occupy, I say it is at this crisis; but I regret to state that they cannot claim the confidence of the people of this country on such a ground, and that at a time when disaster, depression, loss of trade and loss of revenue are paralyzing the resources of the whole country, instead of practicing economy, everything else but it is practised, and if there has been any economy shown in the expenditure, it has been exhibited with reference to the public works of the country, while the expenditure has been most lavish where the personal interests of the hon. gentlemen were concerned. This economical Government, Sir, succeeded to power about the 1st of November, 1873, really about the 6th of November of that year, and they are always throwing in our teeth the expenditure for 1873-4, but is it fair or just comparison to compare the expenditure for that year with subsequent expenditure? I say that it is true we prepared the Estimates but we did not expend the money; we were four months out of that year in power, and had charge of the expenditure for that period, while the hon. gentlemen were for eight months of the year in power, and had charge of the expenditure for that time. I need not tell the House what every one knows: that, having been long out of office, the hon. gentlemen had around them a host of clamorous friends eager for office and employment; and these offices and these buildings, through which the hon. gentlemen used to regret that they could scarcely pass from one end to the other for the messengers and clerks with which they were filled from cellar to garret, were found altogether inadequate for their purposes, and these hon. gentlemen immediately had to tax their energies to the utmost to fill these buildings still fuller with employés, and the room being insufficient, they have erected a new building, in which they will provide for a few more of their friends. It is therefore obvious that the comparison I have mentioned is unfair. The true and just comparison would be to compare the last whole year—1872-73—we were in power, with the first whole year these hon. gentlemen were in power, and what does that show? The House will be startled when I tell them our expenditure was $19,174,141 in 1872-73, but no sooner were these hon. gentlemen for one whole year in power than they managed, I believe, to spend a much larger sum without the slightest difficulty, nay, with the greatest ease, ably assisted by the distinguished talents of the financier who has proclaimed here to-night that there was no foeman worthy of his steel in this House, and not only that he is called upon to negotiate loans and borrow money for Canada, but also to spend it too. The hon. gentleman, moreover, has gone further, and I am afraid, Sir, that we shall lose him; I am afraid that when the speech made by the hon. gentleman to-night reaches Washington, Congress being now in session, when they find that their Secretary of the Treasury knows nothing about the administration of the affairs of that great nation, and that all they have to do in order to place their country in a condition which would give it the greatest possible prominence, all their hopes will be centered in the importation of the distinguished gentleman.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: The hon. gentleman runs no such danger.

Mr. TUPPER: The hon. gentleman from his seat in the House has to-night instructed the United States as to the mode in which their financial affairs should be managed, but I trust that we may not lose him. I feel, however, that the hon. gentleman ought to have a body guard to prevent his being carried over the lines, or being at all events taken possession of for the purpose of teaching the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States how to reduce the public debt, how to levy taxes on the people and how to dissipate them after they are levied. The hon. gentlemen, during the first whole year they were in power, managed to spend $4,538,430 more than we spent during the last whole year we were in power, and that is not all. I will take the year 1873-4, the most extravagant year, concerning which, having had a revenue that enabled us not only to largely reduce the public debt but also the taxation by $2,000,000 per annum, besides carrying on the public service in the most liberal manner, we managed to expend, with the able assistance of the hon. gentlemen opposite for the last eight months of the year $23,316,316. But did the hon. gentlemen intend to be economical? If they did they took a curious way of showing it. What did they do? What was their first step? They came down to Parliament and said that it was unfortunate for the people of Canada that these extravagant gentlemen occupied the Treasury benches, but did they state that they would economise? Did they declare that they did not want anything like the expenditure which had been provided for before? No; their first move was to get their supporters in this House to place at their disposal for expenditure—and this during their first year of power—$26,800,000. Their Estimates voted by this Parliament to these gentlemen were no less than $3,483,648 more than the largest expenditure by the late Administration. But I will now come down to the expenditure itself, and what do we find? That our expenditure for 1873-4, claiming it to have been ours, according to their own showing, unfair and unjust as this pretension was, and that their expenditure for 1874, for which they will have to admit that they were responsible, exceeded the amount mentioned by $396,665. This is in accordance with their own showing, and they must add to that amount, $85,000 of Customs refunds of other years placed to the charge of the former year. Something further was to be added. The change made in the way of keeping the railway account. With regard to the two years in question, the money Parliament voted for capital expenditure, and which we expended on capital account, they charged to current expenditure for 1873-4, to the extent of half a million. They then came in, and turning round, took half a million of money voted by this House for current expenditure, and charged it to capital account, so they will see that they must, to make the account correspond for the two years, and for a fair comparison, there must be added to their expenditure $545,605, in all $1,007,260 more than the largest previous expenditure recorded in our history; and this illustrated to the people of this country how economical the hon. gentlemen were. And if the expenditure for 1873-4 is contrasted with that for the past year, the comparison is still stronger, exceeding by $1,172,056 that which they declared to have been the most extravagant ever witnessed in this country; and if you come down to the present Estimates, they say, and some people who know nothing about public affairs accept the statement, and have been led to believe that because these gentlemen have reduced the estimates, they are saving money; but how? Because they chose to ask the House to vote $26,800,000, which they could not spend within three millions, and then discovering their blunder, correct it by asking for two and a half millions less. Is that reducing the Estimates? It is, but it is not effecting a saving. They pretend that it is so, but the statement lacks bottom, and these hon. gentlemen know perfectly well that as far as the country is concerned, any person who places the slightest confidence in the reduction of the Estimates as a reduction of expenditure, is entirely misled and completely deceived. We have the expenditure for 1873-4, $23,316,316, and the Estimates for 1876-7 are $274,414 less, but there is a little item of which perhaps the House has lost sight, and turning what appears to be a reduction in the expenditure into an excess as regards the present estimates. I dare say that the House did not pay particular attention to a little Act which the hon. gentlemen slipped quietly through Parliament before they rose last Session, by which, through an Order in Council, more money could be placed at the service of the Government than Parliament supposed they would have for the year. The hon. gentleman knows that the late Government determined that the representatives of the people in Parliament should have complete control over the expenditure of the public money, passed a law directing that any money voted by this House, which was not expended on the 1st of July, should lapse and go into the Consolidated Fund, and thus the people, through their representatives, had fair, legitimate and distinct means of knowing what was being expended. And what was this little Act? It simply enabled these gentlemen to sit down in Council, and by Orders in Council to pass over these lapsed balances for three months. I have a notice on the paper touching this subject, and think that the hon. gentleman would only have acted courteously, as the notice could not be reached in time, for the full information of the House with respect to this discussion, if he had anticipated the resolution and laid the statement of these lapsed balances on the table of the House. Still, turning to the Public Accounts, it will be seen that these hon. gentlemen, on page 278 of part second, have carried over the lapsed balances, and added to the Estimates that which had been voted—$678,587, so that at this moment they had at their disposal half a million more for these reduced and economical Estimates than had ever been included in the largest previous expenditures of this country. Then, Sir, take the Estimates for 1877-8, and you will find that they are $148,628 less than the expenditure of 1873-4, but what will they be when we get the supplementary Estimates? I would like to ask the hon. gentlemen sitting uneasily behind the Treasury Benches, upon the tenter hooks of expectation about this. They will no doubt stand by the Government and carry them through the Session, notwithstanding the outspoken sentiment that has been used in every section of the country. Let them stand by the Government and wait for the supplementary Estimates, and we will find this balance of $148,000 one way turned into half a million the other way, or a good many disappointed faces will be seen. They have made some reduction. How have they made it? by scattering to the four winds of heaven those officials which thronged the passages of the Government offices so that the Premier could not get his portly form through them? No; it was by reducing the vote for immigration from $312,572 to $230,550, or $98,022. Why, if they would reduce the expenditure in the extravagant department in London, and use the balance for the purpose of a wise and judicious immigration, everybody would be disposed to favour it, but it is no part of their policy to reduce official expenditure, whether on this side of the water or not. Then we find in the public works a reduction of $862,200. I do not think there is much economy in that. One thing is certain, either the public buildings and works of the country are all that is necessary, or they are not. If they are not, then this is an unwise and irrational reduction and economy; if they are complete, no person can thank them for not spending money that they are not called upon to spend. For lighthouse service, there is a reduction of $155,984, and the same remarks will apply to that item. If that service is so complete that the hardy mariners have all the protection that can be given them, the reduction will be well enough, but, if they have not, it will be an unwise economy, and not an economy which in the true sense of the word entitles the Government to claim any credit. Now, I find that these revised Estimates, these Estimates brought down in the face of the deficit of $5,000,000, as compared with the period at which these gentlemen took office, show an estimate of $47,668 more in the Customs Department than the largest expenditure we ever had in the country. Perhaps I may be permitted to remind the House that we, with a 15 per cent. tariff, collected a very much larger sum than these hon.

gentlemen at a much greater cost to the revenue. Then, for the Excise Department, I find an increase of $34,265 provided, over and above the largest expenditure we ever had in that Department, and again, in the Post Office Department, there is an estimate of $382,530 more than our largest expenditure. For pensions and superannuations, an abuse in many cases of public money, such as I do not think this House will be disposed to sanction, because it provides for the application of public money for the pensioning of able servants of the country, and the burdening of the treasury with the expense, with a view to placing other officers at higher salaries in their places,—there is $107,550 more than the largest expenditure we ever made; so that in these economical estimates we have no less than $572,013 for Customs, Excise, Post Office and Superannuation over the largest expenditure we ever had, or when the revenue of the country was much larger than it is likely to be for the coming year. I think the statement of the Customs revenue of 1873-74 was $14,325,192; for 1875 it was $12,823,837, or $1,491,255 less, under the increased taxes, than we collected in 1873-74, and what is more, it cost the country to collect the $14,300,000, $658,299; and it cost for the collection of the $12,800,000, $721,008, or $62,709 more than we expended. I will not occupy the time of the House longer, because it is unnecessary, in order to show that at a time when the country demands and requires at the hands of these gentlemen the utmost economy, so far from anything like economy being found, we have the very reverse. There is a decrease in the Estimates for Immigration of $59,600; for Public Works $223,040; for Subsidies $170,508, for Lighthouses $47,741, or half a million, while there is an increase on the other hand in the Estimate, over our largest expenditure, of half a million to counterbalance it. I think that if the country is not able to continue these subsidies, as the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick require, of course we must submit. If the Government have not the money and Parliament cannot provide it, difficult as it will be for the Governments of these Provinces, they will have to submit to the reduction; but, if submitted to, it will be submitted to with a bad grace, it being well known that while money cannot be found for the continuance of these subsidies, half a million of money over previous years could be found to expend on the Departments these honourable gentlemen have the honour to preside over at the present time. Now I come to a very painful portion of my remarks, and that is the criticism of statements made by the hon. gentleman with reference to the loan. Anything that assumes in this House a personal character, is always painful to any hon. gentleman, and anything that has the effect of reflecting in any way upon the integrity, or capacity of hon. gentlemen, has an unpleasant effect upon the country, and its necessity is to be deplored by every member of this House. I was in hopes that I would be spared the unpleasant duty of reviewing the conduct of the hon. gentleman in reference to the loan. I do not wonder that the hon. gentleman wanted an audience of Finance Ministers to address, because I am certain that his arguments failed to bring conviction to the minds of all who, like myself, are only plain members of Parliament. I can quite understand that Finance Ministers may have spectacles of their own, through which they may look at these things. I can quite understand that it may be pleasant to go across the Atlantic to negotiate a loan, a duty which the hon. gentleman seems to take pleasure in performing annually. Although he has said that it is a very unfortunatè thing to go over there to borrow money, the hon. gentleman seems to have changed his opinions on that point, as he has done with reference to many others, and he has come to the conclusion that an annual trip to London is a pleasant, if not profitable, occupation for a Finance Minister. It was my duty to criticise the hon. gentleman's mode of putting a loan on the market some two years ago. I then objected to his fixing the price himself, and pointed out that it took away the only safeguard that existed between the pockets of the people and what might be the cupidity of the Minister. I acquitted the hon. gentleman of having acting in any other than an honourable and straightforward manner, but I did hope that the criticism, which was duly impressed on the hon. gentleman's mind, would not have been effaced so soon. He afterwards negotiated another loan, and he was congratulated on having done justice to the people of Canada, inasmuch as he invited tenders in the markets of the world for these debentures. The result of placing the loan upon the open market and inviting tenders was eminently satisfactory. The hon. gentleman stated that it was satisfactory. It was satisfactory to this House, and I am sure it was satisfactory to the people of Canada, to learn that the hon. gentleman had placed himself and every person connected with the loan above suspicion by the course he then pursued. Now, Sir, I want to know, if that course was satisfactory, why he went back on that policy and placed this last loan on the market under the circumstances which he did. I have listened to the hon. gentleman's speech with a most sincere desire to hear him make statements in reference to this transaction which would, in my judgment, justify it in the presence of the House and before the country; and although he laboured long and hard, and resorted to every sophistry of which he is master, and that is saying not a little, he sat down, having utterly failed to show the House why Canada, standing in the position she did, in consequence of the management by the late Government, was, in reference to her loan, treated in that way.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: Hear, hear.

Mr. TUPPER: The hon. gentleman says hear, hear, but the hon. gentleman knows that when he went to London he used as an argument to show the people of England the high position Canada deserved to occupy in consequence of the successful administration of affairs under the late Government, and not under his own. That was the evidence, the reluctant testimony, borne by a hostile witness as to the position this country occupied when we resigned the Treasury benches, and to the end of time it will show the appreciation we received from even our opponents. The hon. gentleman says he had a difficult task to perform. Why the task was performed when he put his name to that statement, which, it will be seen, was in antagonism to what he said to-night, and to the statements put into the mouth of the Governor General when he opened the Legislature. He wanted to address his arguments to a Tilly, a Rose, and a Hincks, and regrets that they are not here. Why, Sir, they are here—if not in person, their example is here. And I want him to show me a single instance in which these hon. gentlemen negotiated a loan that is not the most palpable evidence against him. He says that the financial agents managed the loan. While I speak of the financial agents let me say that I have not got a word to say against them, but I say that the hon. gentleman cannot shelter himself behind the financial agents of the country. I have the honour of knowing the Barings, and Glyn, Mills and Company, and I have every confidence in them, but I say that they are British capitalists, and they want to make all out of their money they can, and they know enough of their business to know whenever they can make £50,000 or £100,000 legitimately, as they do make it legitimately if they make it in accordance with arrangements with the Finance Minister, they make it. He says they pressed him to fix the price. No doubt they did. Where are the brokers that would not want him to fix it at a rate that would put a fortune in their pockets? Why, the hon. gentleman says that at his earnest entreaty they took a million. Does he suppose that they would take a dollar at the entreaty of any person in the world unless it was a good financial transaction? I tell the hon. gentleman that the responsibility of this transaction rests upon himself and him alone, and not upon the agents. Sir, when the Finance Minister of Canada is in London we have no financial agent but him in that city. The merest tyro would reject advice from an interested party, and does the hon. gentleman mean to tell us that in a transaction of that kind the men who are going to put a million of money into it have not the object of fixing the rate at a sum that will be a remunerative one to them? The hon. gentleman talks to us of France. Does he not know the conditions under which France negotiated the loan? That broken by war, her credit depressed, and her position altered in the face of all Europe, her situation was one entirely different, I am proud to say, from that which this Dominion occupies in regard to its financial credit. Does he not know that a nation so situated would have largely to submit to the dictation of a house like the Rothschilds, who would say they could negotiate the loan at a certain fixed price, and could not do it otherwise. The hon. gentleman then wanders away to Brazil and Chili. It is true these countries have negotiated fixed loans, but is Canadian credit so broken that she has to borrow money at the rate of those countries, and is obliged to consent to a loan at a fixed price in order to negotiate it? Let the hon. Minister of Finance look at the quotations in regard to Brazil and Chili, and he will find the position they occupied totally different from that of Canada. Their financial credit in the money market of the world was as different from that of the Dominion as it is possible to conceive. I have quotations at hand showing the price of Chili and Brazil 5 per cents. in London, and which prove that the hon. gentleman was proceeding without knowledge on the question when he addressed his argument to the House. But what did the hon. gentleman do? I will not quote a hostile witness; I will take the Daily Globe, the organ of the Government. The London correspondent, who was on the spot, and therefore acquainted with everything connected with the transaction, said the worst thing of the hon. Minister of Finance ever said of him, though being ignorant of the bearings of the question. It was said in praise. I object to a loan being placed on the market at a fixed price, because it enables parties to manipulate it to the advantage of themselves and their friends, and enables acts to be done that should not be done; but I say further, that the hon. gentleman fixed the price too low, but if a fixed loan were to be placed on the market, was it the business of the Minister of Finance to state to the London financiers that Canadian securities which were then selling at 94½ and 95 were only worth 90? The hon. gentleman says he fixed the price at 91. He knows he fixed the price at 90, because he gave a rebate of interest in connection with the loan that reduced the price below 90.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: No.

Mr. TUPPER: Canadian securities at that time were bringing from 94 to 95.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: Give your authority.

Mr. TUPPER: I have the London Economist, and perhaps the hon. gentleman would accept that as a good authority. I am able to show that before the loan was put on the market, four per cent. Canadian debentures were selling at 94½ and 95, and that ex-dividend.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: The hon. gentleman is entirely wrong.

Mr. TUPPER: I have the documents here.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: I do not care if you have.

Mr. TUPPER: The hon. gentleman seems to have rushed blindly forward with midsummer madness. I have here the London stock and share list for 1876. The dividends on Canadian 4 per cent. debentures are payable on the 1st November, and they were quoted at 93½ and 94½, business done at from 94½ to 93½ ex-dividend. Will that satisfy the hon. gentleman.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: Certainly not.

Mr. TUPPER: The hon. gentleman says what is quite true, that no Finance Minister could put 2½ millions on the market and obtain the current price at which small parcels of debentures are selling. I freely admit that, but I would like to know from any capitalist in this House who knows anything of financial matters, if there was any cause for placing the price so much below that at which business in small parcels of debentures was being done. No man who knows anything of finance will be able to find any good ground. The London correspondent of the Globe wrote that there was a good deal of comment and criticism as to the mode in which the Finance Minister placed the loan on the market, but he wrote:—the bankers and brokers say it was a capital way. It was no doubt an excellent way for bankers and brokers, but not for the people of Canada. The hon. gentleman knows there never was a time in history when money was such a drug in the London market as when the loan was negotiated, when the banks were swollen with millions drawing one half per cent. interest, and in many cases probably less, for safe keeping, and when, in consequence of the condition of Continental affairs, money was being refused for any investment except such as the Canadian Government had to offer. In that position of affairs the hon. Minister of Finance ventured to decry the character and debentures of Canada, and to lower them by his prospectus below 90. I placed a motion on the notice paper, asking for a return showing the names of the buyers. The hon. gentleman says it would be unpleasant to give names. Why should it be unpleasant? The people who obtained Canadian securities on such terms had no reason to be ashamed of the fact; they had reason to boast of it. Why should the hon. gentleman not give the brokers' names? The reply given was that it was altogether informal. There was, however, nothing discreditable to them in having obtained such favourable terms. The hon. gentleman had laid a most unsatisfactory paper on the table in answer to my motion for these returns. Two years ago, when I made a similar motion, the hon. gentleman was able to give, in detail, the amounts allotted to the several parties. Why should the hon. gentleman return to Canada without such information, and then inform Parliament, which was to be but a short time in Session, that the information was in England. That information was furnished on a previous occasion, but it was refused now. Why? The fact is this, and the people may as well understand it, that at least 2 per cent. on 2½ millions sterling has been taken out of the pockets of the people of Canada and distributed among the happy parties who had the good fortune to obtain this loan. If there were no other transactions in connection with this Government that ought to deprive them now and for ever of the confidence of this House and the country, this is sufficient: that two days after the parties who had secured the loan upon the terms fixed by the Finance Minister, the financial intelligence of England raised our credit, thus depressed by the hon. gentleman, and those very debentures sold by him at below 90, were selling, as evidence under my hand shows, at over 2 per cent. premium. I want to know, on behalf of the people of Canada, where is that money? Who has it? Who has obtained the securities on these terms? Were we so flush of money? When the Government coming down with the humiliating confession that they had made away with five millions of surplus in three years, that it was all disposed of and gone. Are we so flush of money we can afford to give fifty thousand pounds sterling to be divided among anybody, and that which was fifty thousand then, made in two days by the rise in price of those securities, is one hundred thousand pounds now. The hon. gentleman says: "I am glad to be able to leave so unpleasant a part of the painful duty which devolves on me, which, performed once, is performed for ever." I have shown the hon. gentleman that he is not supported in his action by precedent afforded by any previous Minister of Finance.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: What about Sir Alexander Galt?

Mr. TUPPER: He never negotiated a loan for the Dominion. I could excuse Sir Alexander Galt, for the time he effected such a loan was in the days of old Canada, when we are told our credit was broken and our securities selling for 74 cents on the dollar.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: That was in 1860, eight years before Confederation.

Mr. TUPPER: He was driven to adopt such a policy. There is a book—"Fenn on the funds"—in the library, and if any gentleman wants to satisfy himself of the condition in which a country ought to be placed before it resorts to fixed loans, he had only to peruse that work to become satisfied that the course pursued by the Minister of Finance is utterly unjustifiable. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman comes down with his policy—what is it? Has he got anything to offer? He has described the condition in which the country is reduced; he has described the fact of the deficit, which is to be proclaimed to the country and to the world by himself, and he has told you what the effect of that must be upon the character and credit of Canada. What solution has he to offer? Why, Sir, he has borrowed the policy of the Opposition from my hon. friend the member for Stanstead, and has relieved, as he has said, the people from an unjust tax of something like $1,200,000 per annum. But what does the hon. gentleman say in his Budget speech of 1876. He says: "Things are in a bad state, but we want more time." Well, Sir, we have had more time; we have had a year, and where are we? There is no improvement, nothing to justify the hon. gentleman in refusing to so readjust the tariff of Canada as to protect and preserve her credit, which has unfortunately been placed under the hon. gentleman's care. Not only that, but to-night he comes before the House and says the Government of which he is a member, have nailed their colours to the free-trade mast, and that sooner than yield, they will go down with the ship, and down they will go. I have no hesitation in saying that, fortunately for the people of Canada, the hour is near when the independent expression of the people of Canada will place the administration in the hands of those who will do justice to her interests, and I rejoice that I am enabled to say what I could not otherwise say, that although gentlemen opposite will go down with their free-trade colours flying at their mizzen, they will not be able to drag Canada down much further with them. The time will soon come when the same policy under which Canada flourished before, will be the policy of Canada again, and with like results, and when we will be able to go again to the money market of the world, and present a picture similar to that which the hon. gentleman was able to show on attaining office. One would think we were listening to the Secretary of the Treasury, so fully did he place the United States affairs before us. Fortunately, the affairs of that country are not in the hands of the Finance Minister of Canada. He tells you that those who are thus protected are suffering more than those who are not. I will give an authority which ought to be good, as results of the protective policy, which he says is ruining the trade of the United States. The President of the United States sent his message to Congress the other day, and put this statement over his own signature. Did he say that, as in the case of Canada, they were rolling up an additional public debt year after year, and that their public expenditure had exceeded their income last year by more than $2,000,000? Did he say that more taxes required to be levied to meet their emergencies, or that the results to their trade and commerce were of the character which the hon. gentleman showed to-night? No, Mr. Speaker, but he was able to point with pride to the fact that that country, ruined by protection as the hon. gentleman says, that country which has not long since emerged from a terrible war which placed a most frightful burden of taxation upon her people, and which is suffering from a superincumbent load of debt, which apparently could never have been borne had reduced her taxes within the last seven years nearly $300,000,000. The hon. the Minister of Finance says Canada will compare favourably with the United States. While, in Canada $3,000,000 of taxes levied three years ago have disappeared, and $2,000,000 more have gone along with it, the hon. gentleman says Canada will compare favourably with a country which has achieved such a result as this. Our national debt is rolling up much in the same style in which the old Canadian public debt used to increase.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: That was in the time of the member for Kingston.

Mr. TUPPER: But the President of the United States says the national debt of that country has been reduced in the same time by $435,000,000 and that is the country at which the hon. the Finance Minister points the finger of scorn, and which he says is being ruined by its financial mismanagement, which he thinks gives him the opportunity to scoff at it. In the same time the balance of trade, the President states, has been changed from over $130,000,000 against the United States in 1869, to over $120,000,000 in their favour in '876. That, Sir, is the country which the hon. gentleman selects as the argument which is going to satisfy all the gentlemen who sit behind him that protection is a thing to be eschewed and avoided, and that free trade is the only policy under which any country can prosper. But that is not all. He went on—I was going to say with a fatuity, but I do not like to use an offensive word, with an apparent obliviousness of the point of his argument, to show how enormously the imports of the United States were being decreased. Why, Sir, the very evidence of the prosperity of that country is the decrease in her imports. They have decreased because the country which yesterday was importing millions and tens of millions of the manufactured products of other countries, is now manufacturing them itself. It is the protective policy of the country which has changed the whole balance of trade and the whole question of imports. The Centennial Exhibition, which closed the other day, has astonished the world, and well it might. It has been found that a country which was dependent on England but the other day, and which, under a free-trade policy, had to import almost everything which her people used, has suddenly, by a giant stride, sprang into the first rank of manufacturing countries, and that not only is she rendered independent of the imports of England and the rest of the world, upon which she depended before and had to export her gold to obtain, but she is able to go abroad after supplying her own people, and compete successfully with England, hitherto the mistress of manufacturing industries of the world, in her own market; and yet that is the condition of things that the hon. gentleman thinks renders it incumbent upon him to lecture the Government and Congress and the people of the United States upon the mismanagement of their affairs, and the necessity of adopting the free-trade policy of the hon. gentleman himself. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman says that this Government are going to adhere to their policy, and so it seems. I had been in hopes, Sir, that there were some industries that might, in view of the appeals that have been made in this House, have attracted the hon. gentleman's attention. The hon. gentleman must know that if we are to have a country at all, it must be by bringing people into it. The hon. gentleman knows what the effect has been of having our sugar refineries in this country crushed out, and capital driven out of the country. That capital is now building up our great commercial rival and neighbour, and we are now rendered dependent upon them for our sugar, and obliged to pay them such prices as they choose. I am not going into that question exhaustively, but I will just remark that evidence was laid before the Board of Trade of the enormous bounty in the United States by which the sugar refining industry of this country has been completely annihilated. The hon. gentleman knows that it is desirable to extend our trade with the West India Islands. He knows that a policy which would enable sugar to be refined in this country, a policy that would reduce the tariff on raw sugars and impose a countervailing duty on foreign refined sugar would build up our country. I say that there is no country better situated to derive great advantage from such a policy than ours. It would stimulate our fisheries and would increase the ship-building business of the whole country in a most valuable and important degree, and he knows too that that business, while giving employment to a numerous class in this country, increasing our marine, building up a flourishing trade with another portion of the British Dominions on this continent, would, at the same time afford a most valuable freight over the Intercolonial Railway, which was constructed with our money. To take it from whatever point of view you will, the hon. gentleman knows that, giving a fitting and fair protection to the refining of the 1,0,000,000 pounds of sugar that now go into consumption in Canada, and which would soon be doubled, would undoubtedly be of very great advantage to the people of this country. But he is bound to come down with the declaration that no alteration can be made. It was only the other day that he himself brought this subject before the House. It was only the other day that he inveighed against the injustice of having such a monstrous provision in our tariff as that which placed a higher ad valorem duty on raw than on refined sugar, which imposed a duty of 40 per cent. on the manufactured article, while it placed a duty of 50 per cent. on the article out of which the refined sugar was manufactured, and yet the hon. gentleman now finds himself unable to deal with this great industry of the country, and says, as he did a year ago that what is wanted is more time. Well, what of coal? I want to know why coal is not to be subjected to a duty? Is it because the Province of Nova Scotia is the only place in which there are large and important coal mines, except in New Brunswick, where there is a description of coal, but not any very large amount of it. Coal is confined principally to Nova Scotia. Is it because it is a Nova Scotian product? Will the hon. gentleman tell the House how it is that he will still give a protection to petroleum to the extent of 33½ per cent., and refuse any protection to coal? Is the petroleum interest of Ontario more important than the coal interest of Nova Scotia? Take it as a pure question of revenue, and will the hon. gentleman tell me, will he tell any hon. gentleman in this House, that it is right to tax the clothes a man wears, the tea he drinks, and the light that he uses, and not tax fuel? Can he tell me why 595,000 tons of coal should come into this country free from the United States to paralyse an industry of this country, in which twelve millions of capital had been invested, to destroy a capital of that amount, and to spread poverty and dismay among a large class of the people of this country who depended upon the coal mining industries of this country for their living? Will he tell me why he should give protection to the petroleum industry of Ontario, and deny a particle of protection to the coal industry of Nova Scotia? Why is the latter exempted? In 1872, this country imported from the United States 216,000 tons of coal, and we exported 270,000 tons. That was under the influence of a tariff which put a duty of fifty cents a ton on coal, and thus gave a most important impetus to that industry. What is the state of things now? We are importing to-day from the United States 595,000 tons, and exporting 60,000 tons, and we have a memorial presented by my hon. friend the member for Halifax, and signed not by opponents of the Government only, but by the strongest friends and supporters they have, signed by all classes, and laid on the table of the House, asking that this monstrous injustice be remedied. Why is it that this industry is selected for exemption from protection? Is it on sectional grounds? I want to know if the tax the hon. gentleman proposed to put on the shipping of this country was a sectional tax? That tax would have affected injuriously five or six thousand people in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, to the extent of about $100,000, and only $7,000 or $8,000 in Ontario, and yet, when an industry in one of the finest Provinces required to be protected, as well as to be relieved from depression, it is a sectional matter and must be put off. I am a citizen at this moment of the great Province of Ontario, and as a resident of Ontario I demand that this important industry of Canada should receive due consideration at the hands of the Government. I say that there is not a man in Ontario who can deny that there would be any greater injustice in a duty for revenue purposes, if you please, being levied on this 595,000 tons of coal coming into this country from the United States, than putting a tax on petroleum that Ontario manufactures, and on which the people of the Maritime Provinces pay the duty. I say there is a feeling in this country among the intelligent men of all classes and all sections that if we have to make this a great country we must look at the industries of the whole country, find them where we may, and when we have great industries like coal mining, an industry that extends to the shipping interest in the same way as the sugar trade, and is important as a means of obtaining reciprocal trade at the hands of our neighbours, it is only fair that that policy, which has been shown to be without injury to any one, and with advantage to the country, should be resorted to and restored. But the hon. gentleman says "No; what we want at coal mines and sugar refineries, and where all other valuable industries can be established, is not protection; you want time." Look at it, Sir, in relation to the United States. This country has been demanding in every possible way that it can a revision of the tariff as between us and the United States. Take it from that point of view, is there an honourable gentleman in this House—is there an intelligent man in this country that does not feel, other things being equal, that we ought to foster trade with Great Britain rather than with a foreign country? Is there a person who does not feel that the country which receives our products with open arms and exhibits the most paternal concern in our welfare in every way is as deserving of consideration at our hands as any other country? And yet what do we find? Look at the trade returns and see what they say. We find that in 1873 the goods entered for consumption, imported into Canada from Great Britain, amounted to $68,522,776. In that year, the goods imported from the United States were $47,745,678, so that we were receiving from Great Britain four years ago $20,887,000 more goods than from the United States. Where are we to-day? These trade returns show that for the year 1876 our imports from Great Britain have gone down to $40,000,000, and our imports from the United States have gone up to $46,000,000, instead of $20,000,000 more from Great Britain than the United States in 1873. The whole story is changed, and we have imported over $6,000,000 more of goods entered for consumption from the United States during the past year than the total imports from Great Britain. Then, take the exports, and what do we find? That the exports to Great Britain in 1873 are $3,000,000 less than to the United States; but, Sir, we find that the exports of 1876 are $12,000,000—nearly $13,000,000 less to the United States than to Great Britain, so that the country that, as I said before, is receiving our products with open arms, is the country that is to receive no consideration at the hands of the Government of Canada. And from that point of view, Sir, I believe it is entitled to and deserving of consideration. Whether you look at it, Sir, in relation to revenue; whether you look at it as a means of getting a reciprocity treaty; whether you look at it as a means of giving a just, fair and legitimate protection to the great manufacturing industries of, and to the great agricultural interests of this country; look at it from what point you may, a policy the very reverse of that which is pursued by this country is demanded by the interests of Canada. Boards of Trade, representing the commercial and manufacturing interests of the Dominion, have dealt with this question, and in no uncertain way. They have asked that the tariff should be so reconstructed as not only to preserve our credit intact, but to foster and promote our industries. The resolution which the right hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) moved a year ago, the policy on which the party he leads have taken their stand, propounds to the country that fitting protection should be given to the suffering industries of the country. It has found a hearty response, not in a political chamber, but in a chamber where the independence as well as the manufacturing and commercial interests of Canada are represented, and yet the Government turn a deaf ear to all that, and say all that we will give you is time. I have said, Sir, that the country has shown what its sentiment is in relation to this matter. The hon. gentleman at the head of the Government labours under the impression that the agricultural sentiment, of Ontario at all events, is opposed to any protection of agricultural interests, I say, Sir, that the hon. gentleman's eyes ought to be opened by this time. He had evidence enough to the contrary offered to this House last year. But what has taken place since? Why, at the recent contests in agricultural sections, where the different policies have been fairly and squarely debated by the ablest men representing the hon. gentlemen opposite that could have been put on the platform, the result has not only been their defeat, and not only an intense expression of public sentiment hostile to the policy they advocate, but the very gentlemen whom they put forward to ask for the suffrages of these rural and agricultural constituencies, had not been a week in the country face to face with the farming population, when they declared for protection, and began to point out how admirably they would be situated if elected for the purpose of changing the policy of the Government. I trust that the statement made by the Hon. Finance Minister to-night will undeceive the whole country. I trust that any who may have been misled by the declarations made by the candidates of the Government in relation to the question will have their eyes opened, and that the whole people will understand that if they want any fair and legitimate policy calculated to foster the manufacturing and agricultural industries, under which Canada prospered so eminently before, carried out to its legitimate results, they will have to restore to power the party who have proclaimed that policy, and under whose management of public affairs and development of that policy the country prospered as it has never prospered since. I say, Sir, that I rejoice to know that however much hon. gentlemen may shrink from that ordeal, they must be more than blind if they have failed to see evidence on every side that they have lost the confidence of the people of this country. I do not intend, Sir, to appeal to them and to point out to them that when the Government of England, when the Government of Mr. Gladstone, was situated as the hon. gentlemen opposite are situated to-day, when election after election taught them that they had power, but not the concurrence of the public sentiment of the country, when this was the case, I say that hon. gentleman felt he owed it to himself and to the great Party of which he was the leader, that he should not consent to hold office upon terms which he felt so humiliating. Sir, I have no hope that they will follow this example. I will not therefore waste words nor breath in order to take up the time of the House in making any hopeless appeals, but again congratulate the people that the day is drawing rapidly near when the independent public sentiment of this country will again have an opportunity of being heard, and that again there is a prospect of a brighter day dawning upon Canada than I regret to say has shone upon it for the last three years.

Mr. TUPPER.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I have listened, Mr. Speaker, as I always listen, with interest, if not with pleasure, to the harangue—I will not call it a speech—of the hon. member for Cumberland. Three-quarters of it I have heard before. We hear it as an annual harangue to be delivered upon the occasion of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance delivering his annual statement. But it is fraught not only with fallacies, but fraught also with a degree of violence and a degree of temper that is not to be found in the speeches of any other public man in this country. Sir, the hon. gentleman ventured to assert, time after time to-night, that the statement made by my hon. friend, and the statements published by Mr. Langton were false. Those were his words. Now, I have examined into the statements that he has characterized as “being fraught with falsehood,” and I find that Mr. Langton’s system of presenting the statements is precisely a continuation of the system which existed under the late Government. I have the proof here beside me. I might characterize the statements of the hon. gentleman opposite, as he has improperly characterized the statements of the Finance Minister, as incorrect. The hon. gentleman was simply incapable of understanding the mode in which Mr. Langton published the statement, and it was through this that he ventured to make his false remarks. There were various matters brought before the House to which I shall briefly refer. His speech was not a criticism of the Budget and the financial affairs of the country, as presented by the Minister; it was a mere tirade of abuse, delivered annually on similar occasions. It was a mere attempt to grapple with the question, and to draw away the attention of the House from the very able statement presented by the Finance Minister, and the very full information which he supplied, information of the very fullest character, information which has never been exceeded by any previous Finance Minister for fulness and detail in regard to the financial affairs of the country. But, Sir, hon. gentlemen opposite seem almost to have forgotten the events of 1871-72 and 1872-73. One would think hon. gentlemen opposite would have been ashamed to say anything in reference to the Canadian Pacific Railway or the Treaty of Washington. The hon. gentleman ventured to speak of one of my utterances regarding the Treaty of Washington, as if I was putting a weapon of offence in the hands of the people and of the Government of the United States. Sir, I have never said half as much of that wretched instrument, the Treaty of Washington, as I should have said. I have never characterized the gross blunders made in it as I should have characterized them, for the simple reason that my official position in the country made it exceedingly difficult to speak of some parts of that transaction as they ought to be spoken of. But, while I have been thus reticent, if hon. gentlemen are to avail themselves, for the purposes of political capital, of that very reticence which has guarded them from the imputation of the gross ignorance which they manifested on that occasion, I shall no longer keep silence. Why, Sir, we find ourselves, in consequence of that Treaty of Washington, placed in an invidious position in regard to several matters. There is a direct advantage given to the United States in regard to the canal navigation that no legislative and no administrative action of ours can ever possibly overcome. When the hon. gentleman came back from Washington, he boasted that he had obtained the free navigation of the Yukon, the Stikkeen and the Porcupine, and for this he gave away the free navigation of the magnificent St. Lawrence; he being actually in a state of supreme ignorance of the fact that we had the navigation of those rivers before then, by a treaty with Russia in 1825, and in a more complete way too. We had the navigation of the northern rivers of this continent, not only for commercial purposes, but for every other purpose; and yet the hon. gentleman gave away the free navigation of the St. Lawrence to obtain navigation of these rivers for commercial purposes, and the immediate result is already a quarrel between the two countries as to whether or not a prisoner can be conveyed down the Stikeen River. We are bound, by one of the clauses of that treaty, to give the United States the free use of all the canals of the Dominion, and they are bound only to use their influence with the individual States to secure for us the navigation of the canals of the States contiguous to us, traversing the boundaries of the two countries. So they placed us actually in a position of inferiority in this respect from which no negotiation can possibly deliver us; and the successors of the hon. gentleman's Government have been obliged to take a stand upon other grounds in vindicating the rights of this country to certain privileges in connection with the navigation of these waters. I congratulate the hon. gentleman upon his having at last settled himself down into a policy of protection. I congratulate the hon. gentleman, as a Nova Scotian representative,—though he says he is a citizen of Ontario, and speaks in that character,—that he has been obliged to hoist the pure protection banner, and that under that he is resolved to fight for the future. So be it. We have never swerved in our devotion to what we conceive to be the true trade principle of the country, viz., that we should have a revenue tariff, and a tariff imposed only for the purposes of revenue, although it is well known that, with our revenue necessities, such a tariff practically yields a very large measure of protection. Sir, this Government found almost immediately upon its accession to office that we had to impose a considerably larger tariff than that which was previously in force, and we did impose two and a half per cent. more, and the hon. gentleman will venture now to speak of it, I suppose, as a protective tariff. I am a little amused, Sir, to hear the quotation which the hon. gentleman used with reference to the tariff and the system of protection, and I was reminded of the very inglorious resolution proposed by the leader of the Opposition last year. He did not then, Sir, venture to assert a bold protective policy. Let me read the resolution.

“ Sir John Macdonald moved in amendment—That all the words after ‘that’ to the end of the question be left out, and the words inserted—This house regrets that His Excellency the Governor-General has not been advised to recommend to Parliament a measure for the readjustment of the tariff, which would not only aid to alleviate the stagnation of business deplored in the gracious Speech from the Throne, but also afford fitting encouragement and protection to the struggling manufactures and industries as well as to the agricultural products of the country.”

He does not venture to tell us what was that fitting protection. He does not venture to say that the tariff which was already imposed afforded either too much or too little protection. “Fitting encouragement” is an ingenious phrase, and “fitting encouragement” is all that the hon. gentleman ventured upon then; but the hon. gentleman now thinks that he may fairly hoist the protection banner and sail under it for the future. However, I am glad at last to have caged him in any position, a thing which has never before been possible. But, Sir, let me revert for a moment to some passages of the hon. gentleman's speech. He says that the policy which was initiated in 1870, called the National Policy, by which we imposed a duty of fifty cents per ton on coal, actually frightened the United States of America into lowering their duties. Well, Sir, I think that he is undoubtedly a very great man. He is a wonderful man, and no doubt he wishes to frighten us who are on this side of the House very much; but I had no idea, until he declared it in his own words, that he had also frightened the whole people of the United States. There is, to be sure, the usual element of inaccuracy in the statement; there is the statement that the United States duty was immediately reduced fifty per cent.

Mr. TUPPER: No; from $1.25 to 75 cents.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Then I misunderstood the hon. gentleman. At all events, the imposition of fifty cents duty upon their coal frightened them into the reduction of their rate. Why, Sir, the entire amount of American coal brought into this country during the whole year only yielded, if I recollect aright, between eighty and ninety thousand dollars of revenue. This was the entire amount, and the imposition of fifty cents per ton did not, and could not, bring one ton more of coal from Nova Scotia to the Upper Provinces than was previously the case. I am aware that some was brought as an experiment, but it was a mere experiment which could not possibly succeed, because we in Ontario are contiguous to the coal fields of the United States, and any attempt to force the coal of Nova Scotia upon Upper Canada must of necessity be a failure, unless a protective tariff of between two and three dollars per ton is imposed. This is well known to the hon. gentleman; but, Sir, why is it—if this scheme is to have such a grand remedial effect, and if this policy was such as coerced and frightened the Government of the United States into terms—that the hon. gentleman's Government repealed that policy themselves. Nay, more, Sir, he made a pathetic appeal to us to-night—an appeal which I am certain I have heard fifty times before—in which he said that at the very time that the hon. gentleman the member for Kingston was struggling on behalf of Canadian interests at Washington, we struck down this generous and magnificent policy of theirs. Why, Sir, the hon. gentlemen opposite controlled a majority of forty or fifty votes in this House at that very time. The majority of the then Government was indeed from fifty to seventy.

Mr. TUPPER: On that question?

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentlemen had a majority on every question which, as a Government, they chose to place before the House. Either this was the case, or they were without a majority on such questions as they chose to present to the House. They did choose to present this policy to the House in 1870, and they themselves chose in 1871 to come down and repeal it.

Mr. TUPPER: How about petro-

leum? Where is the hon. gentleman's policy voted in this regard last Session, and the policy made known to-night?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I will deal with that presently, but now I will deal with the hon. gentleman, and, as soon as I get through with him, I will take up some other person. Now, Sir, it was very remarkable that in the face of this appeal the hon. gentleman should have voted against the resolution, which I will just read:—

“Moved in amendment by Mr. Bowell, seconded by Mr. Brown, that in view of the negotiations now pending at Washington between representatives on the part of the British Empire and the United States, touching questions which may lead to the renewal of the Reciprocity Treaty, it is, in the opinion of this House, inexpedient to repeal the duties now imposed on certain articles enumerated in Sec. 2 of the Bill amended; and be it therefore resolved, that the Bill do not now pass, but be referred back to the Committee of the Whole for the purpose of expunging the words between ‘coke’ and the words ‘hereafter repealed.’”

Although this was moved by one of the hon. gentleman's own followers, and although the suffering member for Kingston was then in the agonies of parturition at Washington, having been sitting there for weeks in the hope of bringing forth a treaty, yielding reciprocity, it seems that in spite of all the hon. gentleman's distress in the American Capitol, his own followers deliberately voted against this resolution proposed by the member for North Hastings— for I find among the votes in favour of repealing the duty on coal, the name of Mr. Tupper, and the name of every member of the Government in this House at the time. And this, Sir, is the gentleman who is preaching a new morality, and this is the gentleman who speaks of consistency, this, Sir, is the gentleman who presents, as he says, the spectacle of constant consistency in all political matters. Why, Sir, consistency is a word unknown to the hon. gentleman. I have read this to show that the hon. gentleman not only does not believe, and did not believe what he stated to-night, but, further, that he proved by his vote that he was entirely opposed to the policy which he now says is the only salvation for the country. Sir, the hon. gentleman, a moment ago, in reply to my accusation, answered that they did not control the House on every subject. No doubt they did not, and the hon. gentleman was willing to remain in office, although he and his colleagues could not control their followers on certain subjects. Why, the hon. gentleman himself avows that he defended the protective system. He says that he was in favour of it before, and he accuses the Opposition, who were then in a minority of from sixty to seventy in this House, of having carried a resolution in defiance of the Government. I have shown that he himself recorded his vote for the repeal of that duty; but, assuming what the hon. gentleman says to be true, was it fair to the public and to the protective interests he has taken under his wing, the grand political policy of which he sets himself up as champion, that the moment he found that a majority was likely to be recorded against this grand policy, he himself should turn round and march with the tide. And yet, Sir, this gentleman has the assurance to charge us with inconsistency, and to declare that we have not fairly carried out the policy which we announced to the country. So much, Sir, with regard to the coal duties. The hon. gentleman knows very well, in reference to other matters in which he indulged very freely during the discussion, that he was not representing the real feelings of his own party, nor the real facts of the case. Why, Sir, in one breath he denounced us for not spending the public money in time of distress, and then for imposing duties for the purpose of spending money. We were denounced because we increased the tariff; we were denounced because we borrowed money in the English market, for works which were avowedly intended to be built with capital on capital account, and at the same time we were denounced because we proposed to resort to easier means in regard to the construction of such works. But what are the facts? During 1875, there was spent, in addition to what was expended on the Inter-colonial Railway, something over eight millions of money on public works, and, during 1876, very nearly nine millions for the same purposes; a much larger amount was thus spent during these two years than during any two previous years, not only in the history of Confederation, but also in the history of Canada. And it has been done with a view at once to carry out works that are projected and must necessarily be carried on to completion, and with a view also to avail ourselves of the comparative cheapness of labour and material at this particular period. But, Sir, it must be remembered that there must be a limit to all expenditure, and the Government in proposing to limit the expenditure upon certain canals, knows that the object sought to be accomplished by building various new works where old works are starting can be obtained by another mode which will avoid for the present the expenditure originally contemplated. That we propose to do in order to save a considerable amount of public money which otherwise would have to be expended. I was a little amused in connection with the hon. gentleman's views on the question of protection. The hon. gentleman expressed himself in favour of protecting all kinds of manufactures; but any one in reading his speech to-morrow will find that he denounced the Government because they proposed a duty on machinery. It appears that everything is to be protected except machinery, and that everything will be protected, including machinery, at some time or other.

Mr. TUPPER: The hon. gentleman, I am afraid, is again committing an inaccuracy and is mis-stating what I said. I said, machinery that could not be manufactured in this country should be admitted free. My statement was limited to that, and yet the hon. gentleman represents me as having opposed a duty on machinery.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Will the hon. gentleman say what kind of machinery?

Mr. GIBBS (N. Ontario): Cotton machinery.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I can say that cotton machinery is made in this country.

Mr. GIBBS: It was not made then.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I will not enter into a discussion on the matter. We know very well that that machinery is made not far from the city of Hamilton, and that there is no kind that is not made here.

Mr. GIBBS: Now.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It may be procured of better qualities out of the country—I have no knowledge that will enable me to decide upon that point. But I say that, if one kind of material is to have the benefit of protection, all material should equally have the benefit of protection, and the man who manufactures machinery as well as the man who manufactures sugar should surely be entitled to the same share of protection. I will not enter into an exposition of the principles of protection, or what, in my views, its fallacies are, because I have taken the ground that, although I am a free trader, it is impossible to have free trade in this country. Our circumstances forbid it, and our revenue tariff is one, which, for all practical purposes, has become operative as a protective tariff. And I will say further that no one knows better than the hon. gentleman that, if he carries out his system of protection, it will stop the imports; and, as you must have your revenue from somewhere, you will have to get it by direct taxation. There is no stopping point. The moment you increase the revenue by exaggerated protection, that moment you have to obtain taxation from some other source. This there can be no possible doubt about. Now, sir, I think the hon. gentleman ought to be ashamed of himself to speak of the Canadian Pacific Railway matter at all. The hon. gentleman ventured to say that we had expended six millions and that there was not one mile under contract.

Mr. TUPPER: I did not. I did not say a syllable about miles; I said that practically the work was not begun.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Well, the hon. gentleman says the work was not practically begun. What "practically begun" in his estimate means, I do not know. All I can say is that we have about 300 miles under contract, a large portion of which is completed. A portion of the rails are laid, and the rails may be laid next year on at least 200 miles more which are under contract. I should say, Sir, that that is a very practical beginning, and, if having 200 or 300 miles of railroad all but finished, is not a practical beginning, I fail to know the use of language. I am happy to tell the House that under the wise management of the Government, 228 miles of railroad west of Lake Superior are under contract on the main line; and that 228 miles of railroad will be constructed, finished, and completed for, as nearly as can be, half the cost per mile of the Intercolonial Railway. That is not merely having it practically begun, but it is having it practically carried on in such a way as no railroad was ever carried on before in this country. Our object in pushing the work as we have done I have explained time and again to this House and to the country. We have power under the Act of 1874 either to proceed in the mode of obtaining tenders for the entire work or for small sections of the work. We felt that the obligation laid upon us by hon. gentlemen opposite when they engaged to build the road in ten years from 1871, was one that compelled us to move in the matter at once in order to show the best honesty in keeping our engagements with the new Provinces. And while the surveys were proceeded with the greatest possible diligence, we proceeded with the sections that were surveyed, with the understanding that as soon as the surveys were completed the entire road would be put under contract, if they could be put under contract consistently with the means and resources of this country at our disposal. When the hon. gentleman taunts me with having held out hopes last Spring that we would have the surveys completed so as to be able to advertise for tenders in June, he is not showing that fairness which should characterize the leading public men of this country. If he had been able to show that we had exhibited the least lack of diligence, that we had made a hypocritical statement and had not tried to carry it out, the criticism would have been fair and just; but, I appeal to him, and to every member of this House, to say if there is a particle of evidence to be found to prove that we did not carry out the promises we made at the time we took office and last spring. The hon. gentleman says that we went about at the general election in 1872 denouncing the Pacific Railway scheme of the hon. gentleman opposite. Why, the hon. gentleman does not remember, I suppose, that the Pacific Railway scheme was not developed at all during the election of 1872. He assumes that it was, and ventures to say that we opposed their policy at a time when the policy was not conceived, and if conceived, it was not brought forth to the country. We denounced them at the general election of 1872 for their extravagant bargain with British Columbia and not for their railway policy, because at that time the policy was not known, for the hon. gentlemen were then engaged making arrangement with Sir Hugh Allan, Hon. D. L. Macpherson and other capitalists. Such, Sir, is the reckless assertion of the hon. member for Cumberland, in order to make political capital at such a time as this. As the recognized financial critic on the opposite side, the hon. gentleman's speech ought to have been a criticism of the remarks of my hon. friend the Finance Minister and a correction of his figures, if he was able to correct them. Instead of that, his speech was a wandering rehash of abuse and reckless assertions, a few of which I have dealt with, rather than go over the whole field. The hon. gentleman indulged in one very remarkable misstatement—shall I call it a misstatement? For courtesy's sake I will. He says that the last year in which the late Government was in office they managed to carry on the affairs of the country easily with $19,000,000, and the first year we were in office we required $24,000,000 to do the same work. Does the hon. gentleman deny this statement?

Mr. TUPPER: I do most distinctly. I said the expenditure for one year was so much, and the estimates for another year were so much.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Very well. I am glad he makes this statement. He knows very well they took estimates for 1873 for nearly $24,000,000; and if only $19,000,000 were required, why did they take estimates for so much? Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that they deliberately took $5,000,000 more than they required? If he does not mean that, he must abide by his own estimates, and the fact remains that their estimates exceeded our expenditure by several hundred thousand dollars, if we admit the services on the boundary question, the Indian treaties, and the North-West Mounted Police, and one or two other matters for which they never paid a farthing during their term. The absence of this expenditure alone, reduces our estimates of 1874-5 considerably below the estimates they took for 1873-4. I exposed this fallacy in a speech I made at Whitby in the presence of the hon. gentleman himself, and I gave there the exact figures and the services, and I proved conclusively that our expenditure was less during our first year of office than theirs was expected to be for the last year that they took estimates.

Mr. TUPPER: What was the verdict of the people?

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman says the battle of protection was fought out in some of the rural constituencies, but he says also that in the Ontarios the Ministerial candidates were outvying the Opposition candidates in their advocacy of Protection. Well, their defeat must be attributed to that. What took place with regard to my hon. friend from Bothwell? He did not sail under false colours. He fought out the battle of Free-Trade, and he had the two apostles from the Ontarios and four or five others, and a great many others who could not tell if they were asked whether they were protectionists or not, fighting against him. We had the whole tribe there, and the result was that my hon. friend came back with a largely increased majority. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman said tonight, referring to the amount of customs collected by my hon. friend behind me, that it cost $50,000 more during the first year we were in office than it did during the last year we were in office. I think that was the statement.

Mr. TUPPER: No; I will give you the figures.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Well, while the hon. gentleman is looking for the figures I will tell a little story.

Mr. TUPPER: The hon. gentleman can go on with his story when I have finished. What I said was that in 1873-74 we collected $1,491,255 more in the customs than the present Government in 1875-76, and that the cost in 1875-76 was $62,709 more.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Very well; I will tell the story now. I am sure the hon. gentleman forgets it, and it will be remembered with some interest. It took place in the last days of October, 1873, and in the early days of November, 1873, and during that interesting period in which my hon. friends opposite were industriously engaged in keeping up a sham battle in this House, and making appointments of various kinds. In the early days of November, 1873, the hon. gentlemen opposite were engaged in making appointments by the hundred, and not content with that, my hon. friend from Cumberland had an Order-in-Council which raised all the salaries in the Customs to the extent of $60,000, almost the exact amount which he charges my hon. friend with having spent. It was quite evident to any one who had access to the Privy Council Chamber immediately after the resignation of the late Governor, that when the place was vacated by the hon. gentlemen opposite, they never expected to inhabit the place again. And, notwithstanding a little assistance that a time of distress has been to them during last season, they never will be tenants there again.

Mr. TUPPER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman's story, but I must do so in order to be true to history. The hon. gentleman will find if he takes my figures, that the expenditure that very year for which the salaries were increased—1873-74—was $658,000, as against $721,000 for 1875-6.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman cannot deny that what I state is a fact—that the increase of salaries was in the neighbourhood of $60,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE.

Mr. TUPPER: The increase of salaries was made under an order of the House.

Mr. MACKENZIE: What we have also done has been under an order of the House. He cannot have the plea of an order of the House as an excuse in his case alone. The hon. gentleman in comparing the figures of the respective Governments, forgot to mention another little item of interest. I have shown that when they left office the public expenditure was at twenty-four millions. When they entered office the public expenditure stood at thirteen millions, and in the course of six years they increased the expenditure by eleven millions. We have been in office three years, and have decreased the expenditure by one million and a half. That is the difference between the two Governments. We have, moreover, made the most ample provision to have all the public wants attended to. We have erected public buildings in different places, the buildings at Montreal, Toronto, and in this city having been almost entirely constructed during that period; and further, we have effected the reduction of the Estimates which were left us when the hon. gentlemen opposite resigned office. This is a true statement. Anyone who chooses to examine the Public Accounts will see for himself the real state of affairs. When these gentlemen were installed in the Government in 1867, the country was in the hey day of prosperity. For three years previous our farmers sold everything that could be sold. The United States markets were exhausted, and they looked to Canada for a supply of produce and goods required during the war. Our farmers east and west, and our mechanics were able to send their products into the United States. As I have said, those hon. gentlemen took office in the midst of the prosperity, and that prosperity continued for years. They went out of office at the very time when we were all beginning to feel that a period of depression had arrived, which would tax the energies alike of private citizens and the Government, and any fair minded man would have acknowledged the difficulties with which this Government has had to contend. But instead of that, the Government received nothing except the most captious, ill-natured and unfair criticism that ever assailed a Government. If the hon. gentleman and his friends imagine that the country is so blinded by passion or prejudice as to accept his statement and his interpretations of public affairs during the past few years, the hon. gentleman never made a greater mistake. The people are not ignorant, and it does not require the presence of the hon. member for Cumberland, even in Ontario, to enlighten the people in that dark region by his own exit from his own Province, into the the midst of them. Those hon. gentlemen came into power, and instead of husbanding the resources of the country at the time when they had resources to husband, instead of acting as the Israelites did in Egypt, when called by Pharaoh to provide against the seven years of scarcity, they spent everything they could lay their hands on, and when they went out of office, carried the whole balance with them. Why, if hon. gentlemen had had any successors except those who were provident, active and careful in the administration of public affairs, if they had been succeeded by rash men like themselves, the country might have been ruined; but it rested with the Reform party to succeed hon. gentlemen opposite just as they had brought the country to the verge of disaster, as they had defiled its public morals, as they had spent its money, as they had made preparations for further expenditure. It was left for us to take up the management of affairs at this particular juncture, and by the wise efforts and management of the Finance Minister and other Ministers, public affairs have been so directed that the finances of the country have been husbanded and prosperity will ere long return—a prosperity that is even now appearing on the horizon, a prosperity that owes nothing either to that political party or to this. The prosperity of this country depends on the industry of its people. It does not depend upon party claqueurs or upon political nostrums, but it depends upon the industrial power of the people; and the day will never come when either the hon.

gentleman or I will be missed when we take our departure from these legislative halls, because other men will rise in our places, and the country will go on never heeding the time when a Tupper pronounced as the sole remedy for the ills of Canada the imposition of a duty on sugar and coal. John Bright said, in a very recent speech, that he could not compare the extravagant absurdities of some people who waited upon him desiring protection, to anything except a person who had got a box on the right ear and turned round desiring a corresponding one on the other ear. And this is the sole remedy of these hon. gentlemen for the sorrows of the country, the sole remedy for a depressed people and for depressed industries. Their sole remedy is to tax the people more; make the people pay more, say these hon. gentlemen, and that will surely bring a general era of prosperity. My belief is that if the country does desire to be more highly taxed, the hon. gentlemen opposite should return to power, for they and they only of all public men are willing to adopt this extraordinary remedy. For a patient whom they admit to be tolerably sick, they propose the system of counter-irritation; because there is a sore on one side the hon. member for Cumberland proposes to put a blister on the other, and that is done to promote the prosperity of the country.

Mr. TUPPER: That is good treatment.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Then God help the country that is to be subjected to that treatment. I do not, to-night, Sir, propose to enter upon any critical analysis of the statements of the hon. gentleman, because I will leave that to my hon. friend the Finance Minister. I desired merely to deal shortly with some of the political features of his address, and with some of the extraordinary statements he made in the course of it, and I shall on a future occasion take the opportunity of referring more at large to some of the questions he raised. In the meantime, Sir, I have only to say that if the hon. gentleman imagines that speeches such as he has delivered to-night are calculated to advance either his personal or political interest, or to advance the prosperity of the country, I think that he will find that the voice of this House on both sides will pronounce against such an assumption, and that a considerate and fair criticism will always be best for the object he is aiming at—best in the interest of the dignity of the country and the dignity of this House, and that any other procedure on his part, or on the part of any other public man, will merely result in a degradation which must be deplorable to every honest man.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. the Premier is wise in his generation. He says he will not at this late hour of the night, or at any other time indeed, attempt to make an analytical criticism of the speech of my hon. friend. He wisely leaves that to the Finance Minister. It is far above his capacity, and the announcement he has now made shows that he is conscious of the fact. If my hon. friend wanted a tribute to the surpassing ability of his speech to-night, if he wanted evidence of the effect it has had on the Premier and on his followers, he would have it in the tone, in the manner, and in the style of the speech of the hon. Premier. I have heard the First Minister make many speeches, I have heard him make many strong speeches; but never in my life did I hear him make, either as a private member of this House and unofficially, or as the head of the Government, a speech so replete with violence, so replete with strong and unparliamentary language, so uncandid and so ungenerous, and so unworthy of his position, as that which he has made to-night, and he, forsooth, charges my hon. friend with making his speech a mere tirade of vulgar abuse. Sir, it was an incisive speech, it was an able speech, it was a fair speech, a conclusive speech, showing the faults of the present Government; and it was because it was of its incisiveness that it was so felt by the hon. Premier, and so felt by the whole House. Had it been a tirade of abuse, or had there been anything unparliamentary in it, you, Sir, in the exercise of your functions, would have called the hon. gentleman to order. But my hon.

Mr. MACKENZIE.

friend's speech was not of that character, and he has a right to throw back on the hon. gentleman the charge that it was unparliamentary, or that it was unworthy of him as a distinguished statesman of Canada or as a member of this House. But, Sir, the flesh will quiver when the pincers tear; and as every sentence came down on my hon. friend and on the Finance Minister they felt it keenly, and the feeble cheers you heard behind them showed that it was also felt among all the supporters of the hon. gentleman. The hon. Premier charged my hon. friend with using improper and coarse language, because he stated that the return in the Gazette was false in fact. My hon. friend told this House that either these returns were of no value, or that they were calculated to deceive the country. What were those returns placed in the Gazette for? To give information to the public as to the actual state of the revenue, as to what are actually the receipts and expenditure. The hon. Minister of Finance admits that they are not correct returns, and, therefore, that they are not of any value to the country.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: They were quite correct when they were made.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman says they were quite correct so far as known to the auditor, but of what advantage is that to the country? What the country wants to know is what the whole amount of the receipts and expenditure is at present, and not what it was at some other time in the Audit Office. The hon. gentleman says that my hon. friend from Cumberland should have confined his speech to a criticism of the Budget speech, but that instead of that he launched into a general political discussion. He did not do so, Mr. Speaker. As was his duty and as was his right, and as was according to practice, he went into a general discussion of the state of public affairs as connected with the revenue and expenditure, and as connected with the financial policy of the Government. That is what he is here for, and that work he did thoroughly; and when he alluded to the Washington Treaty, to the Pacific Railway, or to any other subject, he did not discuss those matters as matters of general political importance, but purely in their commercial and financial relations. He spoke of the Washington Treaty with reference to the Fisheries, with reference to the policy of the Government in regard to that subject, and with reference to the mission of Mr. George Brown to Washington in connection with that Treaty. He did not enter into a general discussion of the treaty. My hon. friend the Premier took quite a different course. He wanted to draw the herring in front of the hound in order to lead him off the scent. He wanted to take away the attention of the House from the exposé of the incapacity and extravagance of the Government, and their failure to carry out the pledges and promises they made at the time they took office. He commenced to say that if such speeches were to be made, if the policy of the Government was to be discussed, if they were to be arraigned for their incapacity, if the policy of the Finance Minister was to be attacked, he would not reserve his reticence on the Washington Treaty. Let the hon. gentleman tell what he knows. The hon. gentleman has never shown such reticence on that subject when he thought he could make it the ground of a political attack on his political opponents, and he is welcome to make use of what he knows in regard to it. He thinks that in saying this he is hitting me. He was hitting the Imperial Government; he was hitting Mr. Gladstone's Government; he was not hitting me at all; and, Mr. Speaker, I can only say this, that looking back to 1871, and looking at the position in which England stands now and the position in which she has stood for the last four months, I can thank God as a patriot and as a lover of my country that that treaty was made. Sir, we all know that if all differences had not been settled between England and the United States,—if the Alabama difficulty had not been arranged—England would have been powerless as a nation. She could not hold her position in Europe with the United States on her flank.

Mr. BLAKE: There's a patriot.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman calls me a patriot. I believe I am a patriot. I certainly love my country, perhaps not more than the hon. gentleman, but as earnestly and as honestly as the hon. gentleman. Sir, England has been in great danger for months and months of a war in Europe and the Mediterranean. She has been in danger of being at war with one of the greatest military powers in the world. We all know that if the Alabama question had not been settled, and England was about to engage in a war with Russia, she would have to prosecute it against the united powers of Russia and the United States. But by the consummation of that treaty, and by the settlement between the United States and England under that treaty, it is that England can assume the position of the controlling power of Europe. But we have fought out that treaty in this House again and again, and it has been approved time after time. We have gone to the country on it, and it has been approved. Parliament approved of the treaty, and I believe the House approves of it since. And now, moreover, we are quite prepared, any time when the hon. gentleman pleases, to submit the question to the people again, and I have no doubt that we would be successful. The hon. gentleman chose to sneer at my hon. friend for his allusions to the national policy, and he ventures to charge my hon. friend with having voted against his own policy, with having repealed that policy, and with having improperly attempted to make capital against the hon. gentleman or the other side for their course. Never, Sir, was there a more disingenuous statement made—never a statement more unfounded, in fact, than that. I am surprised that the hon. gentleman so far forgot himself as to make that statement in this House. I know the hon. gentleman made it elsewhere, but I am surprised that he would have the hardihood—if that is not an unparliamentary expression to use—to do that, Mr. Speaker; when the resolution was carried to repeal the Act of the previous session, what is called the National Policy Act, the whole power and force of the Government was ex-exercised in order to defeat that proposition. But the hon. the Premier was the leader. He led every one of his followers, whether Free Traders or Protectionists, to vote for the repeal of the National Policy.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I was not here, Sir.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: There was a combination. He was joined by men who usually supported the Ministry. The Government had a good working majority at that time in Parliament for their general policy, and for their general course and administration. On that question there was a difference of opinion. A certain number of their followers voted and joined with the hon. gentlemen, and I have no doubt most of them have regretted it bitterly since.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I was not here at all.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Oh no. I forgot that my hon. friend was attending to a local election at that time.

Mr. MACKENZIE: And carried it too.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: But his spirit was here and his followers were all here. The whole power and influence of the Government were used for the purpose of preventing the repeal of that Act; but were defeated by the whole vote of the Opposition uniting with a portion of the Ministerial supporters. The Government had one of two courses to take: either to accept the decision of the House or to resign. Mr. Speaker, they accepted the decision of the House—and why did they do so? Because they were defeated in one branch of the National Policy was that a sufficient reason why they should hand over the whole National Policy to the gentlemen opposite. The hon. gentleman knows, and this country knows that it was alleged and stated by the Ministry at the time they laid their policy before the House originally, that it was the commencement of a national policy. It was a tentative proposition. It was the entering wedge for the purpose of laying the basis for a national policy. The hon. gentlemen opposite would not have carried out this policy, but would have introduced the policy which they are carrying out to-day, namely, that of rigid free trade, irrespective of all encouragement to our agricultural and manufacturing interests. I say my colleagues would not have been justified* in resigning, especially in my absence, I being at Washington. And so the proposition of the House was accepted. It would have been an unwise, unpatriotic and unstatesmanlike course to have resigned; and therefore they accepted the decision of the House, and in obedience to that decision they amended the Supply Bill, to carry out the resolution of the House. The Government, having accepted the decision of the House, were bound in honour to carry it into effect by an Act of Parliament. If they had gone back on their pledge, and had tried to steal a reversal of the decision of the day before, they would have acted dishonourably. And so that vote, of which the hon. Premier boasts so triumphantly, was only carrying out their pledge, they having submitted to the decision of the House. Mr. Speaker, with reference to the Budget and tariff that have been now brought down, I must say that intelligence respecting the alterations in the duties, will be received through the whole of this country—at all events throughout the length and breadth of the two Provinces of Ontario and Quebec—with dismay. Sir, the struggling and suffering manufacturers of both these Provinces have been hoping against hope for some relief, and although but little was to be expected from the hon. gentlemen opposite, they thought that the depression was so obvious, the distress so overwhelming, and so long continued, and the cry for help from all parts of Ontario and Quebec so unanimous, that the Government, notwithstanding their prejudices in favour of free trade, and the opinions some of them had expressed in this connection, would have risen superior to their past position and pride of opinion, and have come forward with aid in this trying extremity of this country—this extremity of distress, which is admitted by the hon. gentleman in his speech on the Budget—and this great financial and commercial depression. And the hon. gentleman knows, because he is, of course, owing to his position, in communication with Montreal, and the great centres of business and manufactures in the country—that the cloud is darkening, and that notwithstanding the hope expressed by the Premier, there is no light in the sky as yet, and no sign exhibited of the disappearance of the present state of depression and distress. Sir, all these industries, and not only the manufacturing classes, but the working men, the labouring classes, and the whole commercial community, were looking forward for financial relief as a consequence of the meeting of this Legislature; and I say that when the news is flashed over the wires to-morrow, west, east, north and south, that there is no such alteration as is required, and no relief, many a man who has been keeping up his heart, and keeping open his warehouse and place of business at a ruinous sacrifice in order that his workmen might not starve, will be obliged to close his factory, and dismiss his employees, and perhaps be driven to the Insolvent Court, owing to the policy adopted by the hon. gentlemen opposite. But at least there is a relief,—we will have our coal oil a little cheaper. But even as to that, Mr. Speaker, the old women when they look at the lamp, they will say, “We are getting our oil a little cheaper, but it is only transferring the tax to the tea-pot.” Mr. Speaker, the policy of the Government is one at which I am not surprised. It was announced last Session by the hon. member for North York, who is a powerful supporter of the Administration—that the line had been drawn at last, and that the line between the Ministerial party and the Opposition party was protection and free trade. He thanked God that the Ministerial party had at last hoisted the free trade banner, and that they were going to fight under it. The hon. gentlemen may fight under it, but they will fall under it, and although my hon. friend the Premier may keep up his heart, and try to encourage his supporters by stating that their position is not affected and that the country is still with them, notwithstanding all this depression, for which he will not hold himself responsible, still the fact is, that he does not possess the confidence of the country. Why Sir, this country must be paying a vast sum of money for this style of administering its affairs. The hon. gentleman says, that neither this nor any other Government could relieve the country; but I deny that. A wise Government can do great things towards alleviating distress and depression. They cannot do everything, but they can restore confidence by assuming such a position as gives confidence to the country. It may be that the country is wrong and the hon. gentleman right; it may be that the unpopularity, which it must be obvious to the hon. gentleman and everybody, has come upon the hon. gentleman, may disappear, and it may be that they will recover their standing in the country, and regain the confidence they have forfeited; but can they, as gentlemen of candor and men of honesty, say that they do not know that the country is now against them. Why, Mr. Speaker, it would be admitting that they were blind to the plainest evidence, if they did not admit that the present feeling of the country is not in their favour. There is dissatisfaction in Ontario as the hon. gentleman knows well,—there is, in fact, dissatisfaction in every part of the Dominion. The elections as they have come off prove that beyond a doubt. Whether you look at the two Ontarios or at Kamouraska, you will find what the feeling in Canada really is. If you want to know what the feeling is in Nova Scotia, look to Victoria; and, as my hon. friend says, go to Halifax and see why the Government dare not open that seat. My hon. friend the Premier has tried to convict my hon. friend who sits beside me of an inaccuracy or a want of memory in stating that in 1872 the policy of the Government on the Pacific Railway was not known. The hon. gentleman says the Government had not formed their policy, and that it was after the election that they announced it. Well here are the Statutes of 1872, and here is the Act respecting the railway, which gives the Government power to raise thirty millions of money and to grant fifty millions acres of land; it also gives the Government power to amal-gamate with any company which may be formed. There is the Act, and in that Act the policy is laid down, the maximum of money is specified, and the quantity of land is laid down. It was passed, as everybody knows, in the Spring of 1872, and was discussed at every hustings in the country. My hon. friend the Premier is certainly amenable to the charge which he has hurled at the hon. member for Cumberland when he states that at the general election of 1872 the scheme was not before the country. We have heard a great deal from the Premier about what they had done on the Pacific Railway. We will, however, have that up by-and-bye on the report. He says they have done an enormous amount of work, in reply to my hon. friend from Cumberland, who stated that there had been $6,000,000 spent in surveys, and no part of the railway was practically finished. I believe the Report the Minister of Public Works as laid on the table shows that there are twenty-four miles finished. My friend, therefore, was not so inaccurate, for if there are only 24 miles finished, while $6,000,000 have been expended on surveying where the road is not to be laid. Mr. Speaker, at this late hour I do not propose to detain the House any longer. This subject will be and must be fully discussed, and all the various questions which have been introduced into this debate will be considered again and again, so that every hon. member will have the opportunity of expressing himself upon it. Again, I say, I regret for the sake of the country, for the sake of our struggling industries, for the men of business who are now trembling on the brink of bankruptcy, that the Government have not come forward to give them assistance. The hon. gentleman quotes my resolution of last Session, and says, that we do not there propose an increase in the tariff. I believe in an increase that will not press unduly on the resources of our people. I believe in a re-adjustment of the tariff that if carried, would give confidence to every manufacturer, that would give labour to our skilled artizans, that would restore confidence to our financial institutions, and that would give back to the country the prosperity it lost three years ago.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: At this late hour I shall not avail myself of the privilege which belongs to the Finance Minister, of replying at any length; but, as the right hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House, if I understood him aright, intimated that the Government is largely responsible for the existence of the present depression, and that a wise Government could do a great deal to restore confidence. I give him notice that, when the question comes up again, I shall call the attention of the House to a series of interesting facts which occurred during his régime. We had a total deficit of about 8 per cent. on the transactions of last year; but what were the deficits which occurred during a term of ten years during which that hon. gentleman presided over the destinies of the country? One year it was 25 per cent.; in another it was 8; in another it was 12; in another it was 22; in another it was 9; in another it was 4,—facts which, I suppose, he thought too insignificant to mention. If that hon. gentleman really wishes to discuss the position of the late Government, nothing will give us greater pleasure than to go into details and to show who is really responsible for the present position of the country, and I will be willing to discuss those matters at as great length as hon. gentlemen may require. As to other matters, I will, for the present, confine myself to calling the attention of the House to one or two of the most glaring inaccuracies in the statement indulged in by the hon. member for Cumberland. I desire to point out that the whole question at issue between the hon. gentleman and myself is this: Was I, or was I not justified in estimating the true market value of the loan, not by two or three stray quotations for two or three stray days, but by the price at which bonds sold on the London market for months before and after my loan was put on the market? With respect to the course pursued by Messrs. Baring and Glynn, as to whose conduct I am exceedingly sorry the hon. gentleman should have spoken as he did, I desire to call attention to this fact, that the price of the loan was fixed before I gave any instruction to Messrs. Baring and Glynn, that I expected them to take a certain portion of it. It is my duty to state further, that, although the London agents might have fairly claimed the right of taking subscriptions to the amount of £500,000 each, they confined themselves to the subscription of £250,000, and, if they made £50,000 or £20,000 out of the transaction, they must have been even more dexterous financiers than the hon. member for Cumberland. With regard to the other allegation of the hon. gentleman, if he will show to the House a single loan made by a foreign country of note in England, during the last half-dozen years, except at a fixed price, I will admit there is some just cause for his censure. As the hour is late, I will not review the hon. gentleman's somewhat rash and inaccurate statements, but I confine myself to repeating the assertion that, as touching returns, furnished by the Audit Department, be the present system good or bad, it was acted on for many years under the régime of the hon. member for Kingston. If, therefore, any blame is to be attached to any one, the blame must rest on that hon. gentleman, who inaugurated and continued it for so long a period. I beg to move, Mr. Speaker, that you do now leave the chair.

Motion agreed to.

House resolved itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

1. Resolved,—That in lieu and stead of the duties of Excise imposed on the articles herein mentioned by the Act respecting the Inland Revenue (31 Vic., chap. 8) it is expedient that the following duties of Excise be imposed and collected:—

1. On every pound of malt, two cents.
2. On every gallon of any fermented beverage made in imitation of beer or malt liquor and brewed in whole or in part from any other substance than malt, eight cents.
3. Provided that Brewers using sugar in the manufacture of beer and paying the above-mentioned duty on the beer made therewith, may receive a drawback equal to the duty paid by them on the malt used with such sugar in making such beer.

2. Resolved,—That it is expedient to amend the Act 31 Vic., cap. 44, and other Acts amending the same, and the Tariff of Duties of Customs contained in the Schedules annexed to the said Acts:—

3. Resolved,—That it is expedient to repeal so much of Schedule A of the said Act, 31 Vic., cap. 44, as imposes any Specific Duty of Customs on any of the goods or articles hereafter mentioned, and to substitute therefor the following Duties of Customs, viz.:—

On Cigars, including Cigarettes, 50 cents per lb., and 20 per centum ad valorem.

On Tea—Green or Japan, 6 cents per lb.

On Tea—Black, 5 cents per lb.

On Cologne Water and Perfumed Spirits when in flasks or bottles not weighing more than 4 oz., 25 per centum ad valorem.

On Malt, 2½ cents per lb.

On Oils, viz.:—Coal and Kerosene, distilled, purified and refined, Naphtha, Benzole and refined Petroleum, Products of Petroleum, Coal, Shale and Lignite, not otherwise specified, and Crude Petroleum, 6 cents per wine gallon.

4. Resolved,—That it is expedient that so much of Schedule B of the Act 31 Vic., cap. 44, or any Act amending it, as imposes any Duties of Customs upon Ale, Beer and Porter be repealed, and that the following specific duties be imposed and collected thereon, viz.:—

On Ale, Beer and Porter, when imported in bottle (6 quart and 12 pint bottles to be held to contain an Imperial gallon) 18 cents per Imperial gallon.

On Ale, Beer and Porter, when imported otherwise than in bottle, 12 cents per Imperial gallon.

5. Resolved,—That it is expedient that so much of the Act 37 Vic., cap. 6, or any Act amending it as imposes a duty of ten per centum upon the following goods, viz.:—

Cotton Thread in hanks, coloured and unfinished, Nos. 3 and 4 ply—White —Not under No. 20 yarn,

Cotton Warp, not coarser than No. 40,

Cotton Thread on spools,

Machine Twist and Silk Twist,

Linen Machine Thread, be repealed and the said goods be held to be and dealt with as non-enumerated articles, subject to a Duty of Customs of 17½ per centum ad valorem.

6. Resolved,—That it is expedient, that so much of Schedule C. of the said Act 31 Victoria, ch. 44, or any Act amending it, or any Order in Council as admits the following goods for entry free of duty, viz.:—

Tubes and Piping of brass, copper or iron drawn.

Cotton Thread in hanks, coloured and unfinished No. 6 ply—White, not under No. 20 yarn.

be repealed; and that the following duties of Customs be imposed and collected on the same, viz.:—

On Tubes and Piping of brass, copper or iron drawn, 17½ per centum ad valorem.

On Cotton Thread, in hanks, coloured and unfinished, No. 6 ply—White—not under No. 20 yarn, 10 per centum ad valorem.

Mr. WOODS said that formerly drawn tubings were admitted free if not screwed and coupled. He asked if they would still be so admitted.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said they would come under the name of unenumerated articles under the operation of that clause.

7. Resolved.—That it is expedient that so much of the Act 37 Vic., cap. 6, as imposes a specific duty of Customs on wines be amended by adding thereto the following provision—In computing the worth of all wine there shall be included the cost of bottling, corking, wiring, labelling, and of the materials used therein, and all other expenses incurred prior to actual shipment—except the cost of bottles and packages which shall remain subject to the duty of 17½ per centum ad valorem, provided by the next following resolution.

8. Resolved, That it is expedient that so much of any Act or Schedule as aforesaid, as imposes any duty of Customs on non-enumerated goods and packages be repealed and the following provisions substituted therefor, that is to say :—

The value of all Bottles, Flasks, Jars, Dimijohns, Carboys, Casks, Hogsheads, Pipes, Barrels, and all other vessels or packages manufactured of Tin, Iron, Lead, Zinc, Glass or any other material, and capable of holding liquids, Crates containing Glass, China, Crockery or Earthenware; and all packages in which goods are commonly placed for Home Consumption, including cases in which bottled Spirits, Wines or Malt Liquors are contained, and every package, being the first receptacle or covering enclosing goods for purposes of sale, shall in all cases in which they contain goods subject to an ad valorem duty be taken and held to be a part of the fair market value of such goods for duty, and when they contain goods subject to specific duty only such packages shall be charged with a duty of Customs of 17½ per cent ad valorem to be computed upon their original cost or value, and all goods not enumerated in this said Act or any other Act as charged with any duty of Customs, and not declared free of duty by some unrepealed Act or provision,—shall be charged with a duty of Customs of seventeen and one-half per cent. ad valorem, when imported into Canada, or taken out of warehouse for consumption therein; but all packages not herein before specified, and not specially charged with duty by any unrepealed Act, and being the usual and ordinary packages in which goods are packed for exportation, according to the general usage and custom of trade, shall be free of duty.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT.

9. Resolved, That it is expedient to repeal the Act of 31st Vic. cap 50, intituled "An Act to impose certain duties on Spirits and Petroleum."

Mr. TUPPER: I did not catch the statement of the hon. the Finance Minister as to how much he expected to obtain from the revision of the Tariff in addition to any loss which he expects to accrue.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: Between $400,000 and $500,000, I think.

Mr. TUPPER: You assume that you lose on the petroleum, and make it up on the tea, and gain that amount on the whole revision of the Tariff?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: Yes.

The Speaker took the chair at Three o'clock.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time:

Bill (No. 20) To amend the Act of incorporation of the London and Ontario Investment Company (Limited).—(Mr. Macdonald, Toronto.)

Bill (No. 21) To amend the Act 37 Victoria, chapter 57, respecting Permanent Building Societies in Ontario.—(Mr. Hall.)

Bill (No. 22) To incorporate the "Dominion Grange of the Patrons of Husbandry."—(Mr. Rymal.)

Bill (No. 23) To extend to the Province of Prince Edward Island certain of the Criminal Laws now in force in other Provinces of Canada.—(Mr. Blake.)

Bill (No. 24) To amend the Act respecting larceny and other similar offences.—(Mr. Blake.)

THE LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR OF MANITOBA.

EXPLANATION.

Mr. MACKENZIE: In justice to a high official of this Government, I feel bound to allude to a matter that was brought forward here, two days ago. The hon. member for Lisgar stated, as common rumour, or as his own belief, I forget which, that the Lieut.-Governor of Manitoba was deeply interested in land speculations, implying thereby that he was not a suitable person for the Government to employ in the capacity of Commissioner for the settlement of claims under discussion. I ventured at the time, from my own previous knowledge of that gentlemen, and also from precise information, to contradict the statement as far as I could do so. Governor Morris, however, telegraphed me as follows:—

“Absolutely false that I am largely interested in land speculations. I have no interest direct or indirect in scrip or half-breed claims. I own three quarter-sections, two farms and certain city property acquired from private owners. You are authorised to use this statement.”

I think it but just that I should make this statement.

Mr. TUPPER: I regret exceedingly that the information has been given in the absence of the hon. member for Lisgar. I think, when a statement impugning the veracity of any hon. member is made, care ought to be taken to give the hon. gentleman an opportunity of putting himself right before the House. Now, the hon. member for Lisgar—and I say this as much in the interest of Governor Morris as of any other person—immediately disclaimed any intention of attacking in any manner the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba. He said he felt that the appointment of the Governor as a Commissioner in reference to the settlement of these claims was open to objection, because he was reputed himself to be concerned in land speculations. He did not say he was interested in half-breed claims or anything of that kind. I hold the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba has a perfect right to speculate in lands. I hold he has a perfect right to buy lands in open market the same as any other person, or to sell lands: I do not know of any reason why he should be deprived of the right. Certainly there is nothing in the Constitution which deprives the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario or the Lieutenant-Governor of any other part of this Dominion from exercising the right of investing his money in such mode as he wishes. I am quite sure every hon. gentleman who sits in this House and who has the pleasure of the acquaintance of Lieutenant-Governor Morris, knows he is incapable of engaging in any transaction that would touch his personal honour or would be open to animadversion. But I did not understand the hon. member for Lisgar as assailing his character or imputing anything to him; and I think it is unfortunate that such a construction should be given to it by any hon. member of this House; and I especially regret that the First Minister should have made the explanation in the absence of the hon. member for Lisgar.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I did not know whether the hon. member for Lisgar was present or not; but the hon. gentleman who made the statement must be supposed to be present. The statement will be published. I have nothing to say on the matter; simply to give the telegram as it is received. I may say, however, that I differ entirely from the hon. gentleman opposite if he thinks the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba is in precisely the same condition as the Lieutenant-Governors of the other Provinces in reference to speculations in land. I do not think it would be a proper thing for a gentleman in his position to be speculating in lands which might be subject to disputes between the two Governments. If there was any reason at all for the statement made by the hon. member for Lisgar, it was to cast discredit upon the choice of Lieutenant-Governor Morris as a Commissioner; and I feel bound not merely to defend Lieutenant-Governor Morris—which I would be glad to do at any time,—but I feel bound to defend his position as a high official of the Government; and it was quite right that the explanation that I have given from Lieutenant-Governor Morris himself should be given in the place where the statement was made.

Mr. RYAN: I am glad to hear the Premier make the statement he has just made, because it affords me much satisfaction to know—as in all probability the hon. gentleman and his Government will have an opportunity of appointing another Governor—that our next Governor will not be likely to speculate in lands. If the Hon. Alexander Morris has not engaged in speculation, and to a very great extent, certainly rumour in our Province must do the hon. gentleman great injustice. This I can say, without fear of contradiction, that in one single transaction of the Hon. Alexander Morris, in reference to the Drever Estate, one of the most valuable in the City of Winnipeg, the Governor not only made a speculation, but one of the most profitable speculations ever made in Winnipeg. I was also under the impression that, outside of this speculation in the Drever Estate, he was a very extensive speculator in other respects. Of course, since he has telegraphed to the Premier that it is not so, I suppose I must be mistaken; but I would like to have had a little opportunity of making some enquiries, because the impression is very general that Lieutenant-Governor Morris has speculated in lands.

THE "NORTHERN LIGHT."

EXPLANATION.

Mr. POPE (Queen's, P. E. I.) stated that his remarks respecting the steamer "Northern Light" had been incorrectly reported in the newspapers and corrected errors therein.

ANNUITIES TO INDIANS.

QUESTION.

Mr. BORRON enquired whether the amount of arrears of annuity owing to the Indians on the North Shores of Lake Huron and Superior, under what was known as the "The Robinson Treaty," had been definitely ascertained, and if so, what was the amount thereof.

Mr. MILLS: The amount has not yet been definitely ascertained. I cannot therefore state the amount at present.

Mr. MACKENZIE.

MAIL ON THE LONDON, HURON AND BRUCE RAILWAY.

QUESTION.

Mr. MACMILLAN asked whether it was the intention of the Government to place a mail on the London, Huron and Bruce Railway the coming spring, and if not, why not.

Mr. HUNTINGTON: The Government does not intend at present to place a mail on the London, Huron and Bruce Railway.

FREE POSTAL DELIVERY.

QUESTION.

Mr. DESJARDINS asked whether it was the intention of the Government to extend the benefit of Free Postal Delivery at the house, of letters and newspapers directed to persons within the different Municipalities, situate on the outskirts of the city of Montreal, and specially the town of St. Henri, Ste. Cunégonde, and the villages of St. Gabriel, St. Jean Baptiste, Côteau St. Louis, and Hochelaga.

Mr. HUNTINGTON: It is not the intention of the Government to extend the Free Postal Delivery within the Municipalities named.

GODERICH HARBOUR WORKS.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

Mr. FARROW moved for all Orders in Council passed having reference to the Goderich Harbour Works in 1874, together with a copy of the notice or advertisement calling for tenders for such work; the tenders received in response, and all reports and correspondence in relation thereto, with the contract entered into for the performance of such work.

Motion agreed to.

FORT FRANCIS LOCKS, OR CANAL.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK moved for all Orders in Council authorizing or relating to the construction of the Fort Francis Locks, or Canal; all papers, correspondence, instructions to Engineers and reports of Engineers and others pointing out the advantage to be gained from this Public Work, and giving an estimate of its cost and of the cost of the entire works necessary to attain the object for which it is proposed to build the Canal. He said: I think it but right to give some of the reasons which induced me to make this motion. In the report brought down at the close of the last fiscal year, it will be observed that a considerable sum of money has been expended on the Fort Francis lock; and being desirous of ascertaining the ultimate cost of this work, and the utility it was designed to accomplish, I searched through the different reports of the Public Works Department, and I regret to say that the result has not been satisfactory. I am very unwilling to believe that this or any other public work would be undertaken by the Minister of Public Works without first ascertaining the cost, and I am equally unwilling to believe that, having reports and estimates of the work, he would fail to present them to the House as the basis on which he asked for an Estimate. In the Public Works Report of 1875, however, no mention is made of it at all, and, in that of 1876, it is passed over with the slight remark that the advisability of constructing a lock 200 feet in length by 40 feet in breadth at this point is under consideration. This was signed in December, 1875, and yet we find, by the report laid upon the table this year, that this work had actually been commenced in June, 1875, six months prior to the date of the report. I find, further, that the hon. gentleman, when speaking of the Pacific Railway, in 1875, only alludes to it incidentally, as a connecting link in the magnificent water stretches between Thunder Bay and Fort Garry, and conjointly with the prophecy the hon. gentleman deigned to make that within two, or at the farthest two and a half years from that time, the portion of the Railway from Thunder Bay to Lake Shebandowan, and from Rat Portage to Fort Garry, with the lock at Fort Francis, would be completed. Now two years have elapsed, and what is the result? We find that the Railway from Thunder Bay to Lake Shebandowan has been abandoned, the branch deflecting northwards at about fifteen miles from this Lake, and that, instead of the lock at Fort Francis being used in connection with the Pacific Railway, the latter will actually pass about one hundred miles to the north of it. Therefore, this work is not connected with the Pacific Railway, and, consequently, I think that the work itself should be abandoned, because it is unnecessary in that respect; nor is it necessary as a commercial enterprise, or for the settlement of the country for very many years to come. Besides, this lock was actually commenced without any estimate of the cost having been made, and I see in the Public Works Report, just laid on the table, page 207, that the Engineer, Mr. Baillargé, who was sent up last September, one year after the work had been undertaken, states that $108,000 had been expended on it; further, that this lock requires certain other improvements on the Lake of the Woods and Rainy Lake to make it of any use. What are these improvements, and their cost? We are informed that no definite scheme or estimate can be submitted in this respect unless certain necessary levels, soundings, and measurements are taken along the entire line of navigation; and we are to presume that these were never taken. Is this the way that the public works are to be entered upon? Are we to be asked to spend and vote money blindly, in a happy-go-lucky manner? I find that, up to the end of last year, $115,000 had been spent on the canal alone, and further, from the Public Accounts Report, that, in connection with this work and the Lake of the Woods and Rainy River, $113,000 more have been expended, making a total of $230,000 in round figures, for which no estimate is to be discovered in the Public Works Report. The utility of the work is also very questionable, even in relation to the Pacific Railway, and, as the Thunder Bay Branch, passing about 100 miles to the north of Fort Francis, is to be the all-rail route, I ask for what purpose are we to expend money in this connection? The expenditure in question is charged to the Pacific Railway, with which it has no more to do than has the Welland Canal. Two seasons, those of 1875 and 1876, have moreover been spent on it, and one-fifth of the work is done. At this rate, I leave it to hon. members to judge how long it will take to finish it, without alluding to the improvements mentioned. Mr. Baillargé states that the canal can only be used for four or five months during the year, and are we to spend an unknown quantity of money, in order that for a few months a few barges or tugs may pass through it? When we are to have an all-rail route, what is the use of improving magnificent water stretches in addition. I think it is time for the Minister of Public Works to tell us that this work is to be abandoned, and no further money spent on it. If the motion is allowed to pass, it will enable the House to judge of the ultimate cost of the undertaking, and the utility which it is likely to accomplish.

Mr. MACKENZIE: There is no objection whatever, Sir, to the motion of the hon. gentleman, but, before it is put, allow me to correct some inaccuracies into which he has fallen. He says, Sir, that I announced to the House that I would abandon the route by Lake Shebandowan, but it is not abandoned. It is deflected, as the hon. gentleman said, a little to the north in order to obtain a better route. It touches at present west of the Lac des Mille Lacs, or rather, the Kaministiquia River, at a navigable point, a little beyond which the latter falls into the lake. From that point there is almost continuous navigation with a few short portages on the way to Rat Portage, the crossing place of the Pacific Railway on Winnipeg River, with only one great obstacle, which could not be overcome in any other way than by constructing a lock at Fort Francis. There are, as I stated roughly last night, two hundred and twenty-eight miles under contract between Lake Superior and Red River, of which one hundred and sixteen miles lie at the east end, or westward from Fort William; at about seventy miles from thence we reach a point east of Lac des Mille Lacs, thereby coming into the best navigable system at a place much farther west than would have been obtainable if the first contemplated line had been followed out. Those who choose to look at the map will observe that the first line, which we hoped to take, went almost in a straight line from Kaministiquia Bridge to a place called Sturgeon Falls, this being at the head of a long arm of Rainy Lake stretching north-eastward. That route was found to be, not exactly impracticable, but expensive. The line, as the hon. gentleman says, was carried farther to the northward, but two-thirds of that country perhaps consists of water, and in the vicinity of Rainy Lake the country to the north, in particular, is intersected by deep, wide channels, which reach either the exact vicinity of the railway or very near it, between Rat Portage, the crossing of the Winnipeg River, and the end of the eastern contract, a distance of one hundred and eighty miles—what we may call the Central District of that region. No matter with what speed the road may be prosecuted, that part cannot be completed within four or five years; and in the meantime, if this lock is finished, as I am informed it will be during the coming season, we will be able to send out steamers to Rat Portage, and to the eastern end of Rainy Lake during the season after next, and from that point to Lac des Mille Lacs is a comparatively short distance, so that in a few years we will be able to avail ourselves of these most magnificent water stretches connecting the two points which the railway would touch east and west. The policy of the Government from the first was always to have the railway completed as straight as possible, and in the meantime to utilise any portion of the water communications which would connect the two points that might be reached by railway—years before they could actually be connected by rail. This is the cause why it is of the utmost service to the Government in the construction of the railway to have the means of passing through these waters in the way I have indicated, especially with regard to the very heavy and cumbersome carriage of rails and materials of that kind, which are to be taken either from the west or east. The cost of the carriage of rails from Duluth to

Mr. KIRKPATRICK.

Red River is $15 per ton, three times the amount of the cost for transporting them from Montreal to Duluth. If the railway is finished to Lac des Mille Lacs, and if the Government, when that time may come, should be directly interested in carrying on the contract over the intermediate space to which I have referred, we expect that we could carry the rails at one-half the present cost in consequence of the completion of that undertaking, as the transshipment would be very difficult and expensive over the small portages, and particularly at Fort Francis, while I believe that to take the material from Red River eastwards would entail still more formidable expenditure. I make these brief explanations in order that hon. gentlemen may see that we have, at all events, reasons which were satisfactory to the Department and to the Government, for inducing us to come to the conclusion to prosecute this work.

Mr. MASSON : The hon. gentleman says that he expects the work to be completed during this season.

Mr. MACKENZIE : I hope so.

Mr. MASSON : Will the hon. gentleman explain the passage in Mr. Baillargé's report, which states that he has very considerable plant on hand, such as steam drills, electric batteries &c.; also, that the work will be completed during the next two years, provided it is carried on successfully during winter.

Mr. MACKENZIE : That relates to the season of 1878.

Mr. MASSON enquired of the Minister of Public Works, whether it would be advisable to proceed with this work, which had already cost over $100,000, and which would probably entail an expenditure of from four to five hundred thousand dollars, as the Pacific Railway would pass about one hundred miles to the north of this point. Was this good policy? And as the water communication to be provided would be completely useless, would it not be more advantageous to expend the money on the Pacific Railway, between Fort William and Red River. Further, it would probably be more convenient in the future, if the Government was about to undertake any work, for them to ask the House for a vote to meet the necessary outlay, informing the House, moreover, as was always done in England under similar circumstances, what would be the ultimate cost. It was useless to husband the resources of this country if the Government were allowed to place in the Estimates sums that, at first sight, might appear to be very small, but which would entail a much larger expenditure during future years. The hon. gentleman should not enter upon any enterprise—in the objectionable manner, indeed, that was pursued with respect to the Military College—without knowing what would be the ultimate cost. This precaution which was observed in ordinary life should with much greater reason be observed by Ministers of the Crown.

Mr. TUPPER asked how it was proposed to utilize that work. Looking at the map furnished, he found that it was some seventy miles to Fort Savaune where communication with the water stretches was available. This route to Port Savanne over a length of about twenty-four miles was now, he believed, laid, and he supposed that the work was being actively carried forward; at all events, the rails must be laid to Port Savanne before the hon. gentleman could utilize the works at Fort Francis. Then, looking westward, he found that the road, according to the statement of the hon. gentleman, was far advanced between Red River and Keewatin, and the latter place, he imagined, was in the neighbourhood of Rat Portage. What he could not understand was, how they could facilitate the construction of the intervening link with water communication for the purpose of laying the rails between Red River and Rat Portage on the one hand, and Thunder Bay and Port Savanne on the other hand. As far as he could see there was no means of touching the intervening portion by the aid of water communication.

Mr. MACKENZIE : We believe that we have the means of touching it. I said, either the intervening portion, or parts very near it; that was my statement.

Mr. TUPPER: It does not look so on the map.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I dare say. The map is on a very small scale, but I think that the Engineer's Report will explain it. The country is full of water channels capable of floating almost any vessel. They are, however, somewhat crooked, and in all directions they afford very great facilities indeed. Almost in the neighbourhood of Keewatin, water communication reaches in behind to the eastward, and the entire country is full of such facilities, which in the opinion of the Engineers will be very useful in connection with the construction of these works, and beyond all question, when the road is completed to Savanne, it will be finished independently of the route we have at present.

Mr. TUPPER asked what amount, in all probability, would cover the expenditure, between Port Savanne and Keewatin.

Mr. MACKENZIE replied that he did not anticipate making any outlay in this relation.

Mr. TUPPER asked what amount would be spent at Fort Francis, and along the water stretches.

Mr. MACKENZIE replied, that he did not exactly know what they would have to expend on the small portages between Lac des Mille Lacs and Rainy Lake. He supposed that the hon. gentleman referred to this section.

Mr. TUPPER said that he included the whole of the works at Fort Francis.

Mr. MACKENZIE replied that he was unable to give the required information at the present moment. They had a fair passenger steamer, of about 33 feet beam, on Rainy Lake, and another large steamer on Lake of the Woods—which were built before he came into office—besides small tugs and other vessels; and it was of the utmost importance that these vessels should have as free access as possible to the water communications with Rainy Lake. His original proposal was that, when the work in question was finished, they would be able to have uninterrupted navigation to Keewatin, or that neighbourhood, and the North-West; and, in the meantime, if necessary, before section 25 should be finished, to the east end of Rainy Lake, a cheap tramway should be constructed over the other two portages between that and Lac des Mille Lacs. He had no doubt whatever that the outlay in this relation would amply repay the country both in regard to the Pacific Railway as a general work, and otherwise. They had not been, and it was utter nonsense for them to think of being, able to make full arrangements for even transporting passengers over this road, during the last two years; and it was quite evident that the stream of travel, at present, ran through the United States, causing a loss of a greater or less percentage to us, both in immigrants and others, for a number of Mennonites who were sent over the American route to the North-West, had been induced by speculative agents to settle in the States; and it did seem to him desirable, as anything could be so, that as soon as it could be done, at a cost proportionate to the value of the work, they should be able to take the stream of travel to the North-West through our own territory. He believed that it was of the last importance with respect to the construction of the Pacific Railway to have the North-West Territories settled, and it was of the last importance in this connection, that there should be a road built from Lake Superior entirely through our own country to that section. On these two suppositions and on this hypothesis had the whole scheme between Fort William and Red River been based. He was glad to say that the labours of last season had produced, almost over the entire route, a much easier road than was supposed possible during this period. There were places of considerable difficulty both west and east of Keewatin, but it was not convenient that he should then enter on any lengthy explanation in this respect; therefore, he would now content himself with merely giving to the country, to the hon. gentleman, and to the House generally, an idea of the importance that would attach to the prosecution of this particular work in connection with the Pacific Railway Survey.

Mr. MACKENZIE.

Mr. MITCHELL said the First Minister would perhaps recollect that when the subject of the grants for the Pacific Railway and improvements of the water stretches was being discussed, he (Mr. Mitchell) asked whether the crossing at the vicinity of Keewatin and Rat Portage would be to the northwards or southwards of the latter place. The reason why he made the enquiry was because some three or four miles of the river there were unnavigable. He could quite understand that, if the crossing was to the south of Rat Portage, the improvement upon the Fort Francis Lock would be of great service to navigation. It would give a stretch of 240 to 230 miles of river communication, and be of great advantage to the lumber interests of that section lying between Lake Superior and Lake of the Woods. He was not going to take exception to the outlay which was proposed for the purpose of improving the navigation and finishing that lock; on the contrary, he thought the work very desirable; but he quite agreed with the hon. gentleman who had made the motion that, before entering into any expenditure, the Government ought to have had an estimate, based upon scientific information, obtained by practical and competent engineers, as to the cost of the work. If the crossing was to the northwards of Rat Portage, it appeared to him that the means of transmitting heavy goods and property, such as lumber, which was the great resource of that section, to the western markets, would not be good; it would not afford those advantages which would follow if the crossing was to the south. Would the hon. the First Minister state the position of the crossing.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he was unable, on the spur of the moment, to state precisely the position of the crossing. He might remark that the water stretches were very imperfectly laid down on the maps. There was a certain lake north-west of Lake of the Woods—Mud Lake, or Shore Lake, or some such name—which stretched a considerable distance west and a little north of Rat Portage itself, and the steamer would reach the vicinity of the road there further west of Keewatin than if it were to cross to the north.

He would look at the precise crossing as indicated by the completed surveys, and take an early opportunity of giving the hon. member for Northumberland, and the House, the information he asked.

Mr. MITCHELL said he hoped he would be given credit for bringing the matter up simply on public grounds. It was of the utmost importance to the people of that section that the railway should be where steamers could approach the station.

Mr. MACKENZIE said there was no question but that that would be effected.

In reply to Mr. POPE (Compton),

Mr. MACKENZIE said that Mr. Dawson's report stated the length of all approaches. They were very short—some about a quarter of a mile.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD asked if the construction of this lock would defrayed out of the Pacific grant.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is charged to the Pacific Railway appropriation, and is specified as one of the works to be done.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said, although this was a portion of the water communication for the purpose of economically transporting materials for the Pacific Railway, he doubted very much whether it was constitutional or legal to pay for that work out of the appropriation for the Pacific Railway. This improvement might be very convenient for the purpose of forwarding supplies, materials and other matters for the construction of the Railway, but it was no more a portion of the road than any other canal or improvement on the route. The cost ought not, therefore, to be charged against the Pacific Railway fund. It might be desirable in every respect, but it was a distinct work. It had no connection with the railway. As the hon. the Premier had remarked, the whole chain of water communication was commenced before the present Administration came into power. Some of the steamers were there before the hon. gentleman took office. All the expenditure by the late Government there was for the improvement of the Dawson Route. It was going too far to spend money appropriated for the Pacific Railway on another work which might assist the building of the road in some respects, but was certainly no portion of it. He referred to that point because he thought it was of some importance. His hon. friend the first Minister knew that the practice of using an appropriation for one specific purpose for another was long fought over in England by the different Governments of the day, and Mr. Gladstone said it was the last thing they had to conquer in the way of Parliament gaining complete control over its money appropriations. In France also the practice of applying money voted for one purpose to another was one of the greatest causes of dissatisfaction during the reign of the last Emperor. He spoke in this way because he considered it a matter of some importance that the rule should be observed and the Government strictly held to it. He would ask the hon. Minister of Public Works if the contract was under tender.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he thought, then, that the Government had committed a breach of the Public Works Act, which provided that all public works should be done by tender except in two cases: one, great urgency, and the other, when, in the opinion of the Government, the work could be more advantageously performed by the officers and servants of the Government. He could quite understand what cases of emergency were. If the lock of a canal should be out of repair and impede the whole trade of the country, that would be a case of emergency, and the Government would be warranted in undertaking the work. But it could not possibly refer to any large work, because the Government had not officers and servants enough to undertake such a work. The other case was if the work could be done more economically by those officers and servants. But those were the only two cases, as he understood the Public Works Act, 1867, in which the Government had the power to construct any public work except by tender. The clause was as follows:—

“It shall be the duty of the Minister to invite tender by public advertisement for the execution of all works, except in cases of pressing emergency, where delay would be injurious to the public interests, or where, from the nature of the work, it could be more expeditiously and economically executed by the officers and servants of the department.”

It was a question whether the rails or other material could be more economically conveyed by this water route than by any other. There were a quantity of rails at Red River, and twenty-four miles from the Eastern terminus had been constructed; and it would appear to him that, as was the case in the building of the Union Pacific Railway. The railway should be its own feeder—that the material should be carried over the track as the road progressed. That was the most economical, the cheapest and the best way of constructing a railway in a new country. He hoped that other works in connection with the road would be undertaken before the completion of the lock at Fort Francis. This work would be very expensive; it would probably cost $500,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Oh, no.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK: About $220,000 has already been expended on it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said it would take two years to finish the work, and the cost would amount to over $500,000. Half a million had been spent on the work when the only argument in its favour was that it would carry material cheaper, and give a few emigrants a chance to go in and settle in the country. They knew perfectly well that the majority of emigrants went by Duluth, and that very few would go by this line when it was finished. Besides, in three years, the whole railway would be completed from Lake Superior to Red River, and it was scarcely worth while to make the improvement in question for one year's convenience. It would be of no use whatever except for a few settlers along what was an exceedingly broken country—of no service whatever after the construction of the line connecting Lake Superior with Red River.

Mr. CURRIER said they had not yet heard from the hon. Minister of Public Works how many portages there were between Fort Francis and Keewatin.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I do not think there are any.

Mr. CURRIER: I mean between Fort Francis and where the route touches the end of the railway that reaches from Fort Garry this way.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I do not know that there are any.

Mr. CURRIER: The hon. gentleman spoke of some portages.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That was between Rainy Lake and Lac des Mille Lacs, the east end.

Mr. CURRIER: Then how many are there between Thunder Bay and Manitoba?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I cannot say. Mr. Dawson's report will show.

Mr. CURRIER said if there were many portages the proposed communication would be entirely useless for the transportation of freight; and it, therefore, seemed a waste of money to expend half a million upon that improvement, when it could be much better expended on the main track.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he wished to point out that the Public Works Act of 1874 stated distinctly that each section or sub-section of the Pacific Railway should be let by contract. Now, the improvement under discussion was either a portion of the Pacific Railway or it was not. If it was not a portion of the Pacific Railway no part of the appropriation could be expended on it; and, if it was a section of the Pacific Railway, it should be offered to public competition.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Not at all.

Mr. CASEY said he understood the hon. the Minister of Public Works to say that the route would be used to furnish rails from Port Savanne to the other end of the road. In that case the objection of the right hon. member for Kingston would be obviated. There must be some means of getting the rails down to Red River.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said there were rails there now.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Oh no.

Mr. MASSON: Are there not rails there now?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Not for that purpose.

Mr. CASEY said he understood there were not sufficient rails at that point to build the railway between that point and Red River. To get the rails there by Duluth cost $15 per ton, and he thought the proposed communication would prove much cheaper.

Mr. MASSON said, if rails could be got to Red River at all, they could be conveyed there for any purpose.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the rails there would all be used for that immediate vicinity.

Mr. MASSON said the road could be graded to Fort Garry, and the rails could be brought as the road was made. In fact, it was the duty of the Government to do this if they wished to save the money of the country.

Mr. MACKENZIE said in those matters he generally relied on the engineers as long as he had confidence in them, and, when he lost confidence, he ceased to employ them. In regard to the expenditure, the amount stated by the hon. member for Frontenac was extravagant.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said he could show the very page of the report to prove that the amount expended was upwards of $200,000 within the last two years. With reference to the excuse of the hon. member for West Elgin in regard to the necessity of completing that work, he wished to say that, if the improvement was for bringing up steel rails, they should know it, and then the cost could be charged to steel rails, which would make their cost greater than the present rates. On page 208 of the Public Works Report the expenditure against the Fort Francis Canal was:

During the Fiscal Year
1874-75.....	$7,411 91
During the Fiscal Year
1875-76.....	67,142 35
From 1st July to 20th
December, 1876.....	34,119 98
Total.....	$108,674 24

On turning to the Public Accounts for 1876, he found that the expenditure during the fiscal year of 1875-76, was given as $76,529.34. The following items also appeared on page 250:—Lake of the Woods and Rainy River, paid Sifton, Ward & Co., $113,055.75; Fort William to Shebandowan, $179,804.15. If $113,000 were added to $115,000 it would make very nearly $230,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE said they had no works under contract there.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK: What is that work, then?

Mr. MACKENZIE said the payment was to the contractors who were building a road from Fort William westward. He was not responsible for any particular words that might be used. But the figures quoted were of no account, for not a dollar of the amount had been spent on the locks at Fort Francis. The expenditure to this date, as stated at page 208 of the Public Works Report, was $108,674.24. But a considerable portion of that sum was for supplies for the Canadian Pacific Railway survey and plant, and the actual expenditure was somewhere about $90,000. Even a large portion of the latter sum was for the transportation of engineers and their assistants going to the various points of the Pacific Railway. The expense of the work altogether would not be much over one-third of the amount the hon. member for Frontenac had stated. He would bring down the papers as soon as possible.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said he was referring to the hon. gentleman's own report which put under the head of Lake of the Woods and Rainy River an expenditure of $113,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is not my report.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said it was in the Public Accounts. He found that, for the Railway from Fort William to Shebandowan, Sifton, Ward & Co., received $141,000. Therefore, it was a distinct contract, entered twice in the same way for the improvements. Had those contractors any connection with those improvements?

Mr. MACKENZIE: No.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK: Have Sifton, Ward & Co. any contract in connection with the improvements on Rainy River?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I know of no contract.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said of course he would have to go to the Public Accounts Committee to find out. He was not able at the present moment to combat that answer. He hoped, before the Government reached that item in Supply, the First Minister would consider the advisability of discontinuing the work, because it was next to impossible to have it completed much before the completion of the railroad to Fort Garry, and when that was finished the work would be useless. It was impossible to increase the number of men employed. They had to work on a space of 200 feet solid granite, and the force could not be increased to hurry on the work. The engineer reported that it would be two years from last December before most of it could be completed. It would, therefore only be in use one year before the completion of the branch railway.

Mr. BORRON said in his opinion the construction of the locks at Fort Francis were justifiable on the ground both of urgency and true economy. It was a matter of the greatest importance to a large number of his constituents, to the settlers at Red River, and to the people of the Dominion generally, that the railway from Thunder Bay to Red River should be completed as speedily as possible. To do that, the line must be divided into a number of sections, to be placed under construction at one and the same time. Provisions and clothing for the workmen employed and tools and materials for the work must be moved to the ground. The idea that operations need only be carried forward at the two extremities of the line, completing the track and taking the necessary supplies along it as the work proceeded, seemed to him quite incompatible with the completion of that important section of the Pacific Railway. That was evident when they considered how long it had taken to build the Intercolonial Railway, although work was carried on upon fifteen or more sections of that line simultaneously. He was convinced that the only practicable mode of transporting supplies to the various points between Savanne Portage and Rat Portage, when such might be required, was to take advantage of the water navigation afforded by what was known as the Dawson route, and of the navigable lakes and rivers it intersected or approached, and forming depôts as near the line itself as possible. It was true, as was stated by the hon. member for Frontenac, that Fort Francis itself might be nearly 100 miles distant from the line of the railway as now located, but that was about the most distant point on the whole route. He believed that between Fort Francis and Savanne Portage, and between Fort Francis and Rat Portage, various points could be found for the establishment of depôts very much nearer to the railway line than Fort Francis itself. To those points he was of opinion supplies should be conveyed during the summer season, and during the winter, when the ground was covered with snow and the smaller lakes frozen, it would be possible to haul the supplies to the more important points on the line, in the same manner as the lumbermen moved supplies to the shanties in many parts of the country. The completion of the locks at Fort Francis would greatly facilitate the transportation of the necessary supplies for the railway, whether coming from the Savanne Portage end or from the Rat Portage, and as might be most advantageous. In his opinion, therefore, the construction of the locks at Fort Francis was quite justifiable, as contributing to the speedy and economical construction of the railway from Thunder Bay to Red River.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) said many hon. members had overlooked altogether the fact that, before rails could be carried from Fort Garry to Lake of the Woods or the interior, they must first be brought to Fort Garry. The hon. the Minister of Public Works said it cost $15 per ton to bring them from Duluth to Fort Garry. If, on the other hand, they could be brought by the Dawson Road, and this $15 per ton could be saved and devoted to the cost of making the road, it would surely be a gain to the country. But, apart from the economy of carrying the rails by that route, he viewed it as a matter of the greatest importance that there should be a suitable communication between the eastern part of Canada and Manitoba as soon as possible. The Minister of Public Works had said that in passing through the United States, a certain number of the Mennonites who were going into Manitoba had been induced to settle in the United States. He was sorry to say that this was not confined to Mennonites alone. He had seen large numbers of men from Ontario, who intended to settle in Manitoba, who had, through the representations made to them while en route by way of the United States, taken farms south of the line. It was, therefore, most desirable that settlers going into Manitoba should not be subjected to inducements thrown in their way by Americans. It was surely of some importance that there should be uninterrupted water communication for 250 miles; and they all knew that, notwithstanding they might have railroads in a comparatively short time, in three, four or five years, nevertheless water communication, if uninterrupted, was less expensive. The water stretches, for a distance of 250 miles, might be made available for steamers. He, therefore, thought that, instead of cavilling at the manner in which instructions had been given, hon. members should join in the desire to have the work carried out as rapidly as possible.

Mr. HAGGART said he had made enquiries this year as to the necessity of constructing the works at Fort Francis Lock. So far as he learned, it would not be of any use to bring rails to that section of the country, as the line would be constructed that distance before the locks could be utilized. It was a matter of curiosity to people there as to the purpose for which the locks were being built, there being no necessity for them whatever. He did not believe there would be a single rail sent up that way.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew) said, in some of the arguments used in reference to building the locks, it was stated they would cause a great saving in the construction of the western part of the road. He, however, understood that the cost of constructing the canal, with the improvements said to be necessary at Fort Francis, would be $500,000, and this was more than sufficient to lay 350 miles of rails, including the cost of bringing them from Duluth to Red River.

Mr. TROW said, if even the railway was completed, he would advocate the construction of the locks. There was a large tract of arable land ranging along the river and the borders of the Lake of the Woods. Some was already taken up, and had been opened to immigration. There was a continuous stretch of water communication from Rat Portage to Kettle Falls, probably a distance of 250 miles, and the only obstruction was at Fort Francis. The lock was highly essential—just as essential as the locks on the St Lawrence, in time at least. He hoped to see the day when that part of the country would have water communication about as important as on the St. Lawrence and Niagara Rivers.

Motion agreed to.

THE NORTHERN RAILWAY COMMISSION.

PROPOSED MOTION FOR INSTRUCTIONS.

Mr. ROBINSON, in the absence of Mr. OLIVER, proposed to move for a return of instructions given to the Commission to investigate into the affairs of the Northern Railway. He said he had not consulted the hon. gentleman, and had not his permission to make the motion.

Mr. SPEAKER said in that case the hon. gentleman could not move it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. member for West Toronto could give the necessary notice himself.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

Mr. CASEY, in submitting a motion in reference to the Civil Service, said there was comparatively little known of the subject, in consequence of which, perhaps, but little interest was felt in it. Every member of the House would admit that the management of our

Mr. WHITE.

Civil Service was a question of the highest importance, and that, in carrying out the directions of the House, civil servants had as much to do with legislation as the members themselves. This was especially true in such branches of the public service as the collection of revenue, and the inspection of weights and measures. Civil servants, in such cases, had it within their power to make the operation of the laws much easier or much more annoying to the public, according to their efficiency or inefficiency. In other respects, also, in regard to the Pacific surveys and the superintendence of public works, a great deal lay in their power. There had been statements before the Public Accounts Committee and the House showing the great losses which had resulted, not from their inefficiency only, but from a lack of proper superintendence in carrying out plans made by engineers. In fact, there had been circumstances where direct collusion appeared to have existed between superintendents of public works and the contractors. He thought the Executive function of the Government was as important as the action of the members of the House. He might draw attention to the elaborate annual report of the English Civil Service Commissioners. It showed, in detail, besides the general report of the work, the system of Orders in Council under which the Service was conducted; statements of the regulations of the Service, including the limit of age, &c.; full returns of the examinations, with the papers set in each competition, statistical tables, the list of candidates passed, &c. Besides this, there was a full discussion of proposed changes and the working of the Service generally. In short, the report furnished the public with a complete means of watching the operations of the system and of deciding on the propriety of proposed changes. He thought we should have something of the sort here. He asked for the returns named in his motion partly as a basis for future reports. He would state briefly what he asked for. The return would give them information as to the number of the civil servants; the total cost to the country, by the year; the average salaries in each department; the mode of appointment; the qualifications required; the means taken to test these qualifications; the age of entering the service; the average length of service; and the regulations of the service. Besides forming the basis for future detailed reports on the Civil Service, he intended to make the papers a basis for some action to be taken by the House this Session. He hoped to bring a resolution before the House, or to submit it to a Committee, embodying a scheme for remedying certain defects in the plan of making appointments and the general management of that Service. He did not consider it proper to discuss the question at length until the required information was before the House. He moved for a Return of both the inside and outside Divisions of the Civil Service, by Departments, showing:—

A.—1st. Number of Employés in each division and in the whole service, arranged according to classes in both divisions, where practicable, or according to grades of Office in outside service where no other classification has been established, giving the number in each class or grade.

2nd. Total salary paid in each division and in the whole service during financial year, showing also

(a) Total paid in each class or grade during current year.

(b) Maximum, minimum and average salaries payable in each class or grade, with statement of annual increments or bonuses allowed, and hours of work.

3rd. Maximum, minimum and average age of Employés in each class or grade of both divisions; shewing also,

(a) Number of Employés in each class or grade—

Over 18 and under 20 years of age.
“ 20	“ 25
“ 25	“ 30
“ 30	“ 40
“ 40	“ 50
“ 50	“ 60
“ 60	“ 70

(b) Average age of Employés at time of appointment in each class or grade of both divisions, and in whole service.

(c) Average age of retirement from service since Confederation.

B.—1st. Number in each class or grade, and total who entered service before the establishment of Civil Service examinations.

2nd. Number appointed to each class or grade in both divisions, in each year since Confederation, and totals for the whole period by classes and Department, and in whole service.

(a) As possessing special qualifications, but who were submitted to no general or special examinations to test such qualifications.

(b) Not on the ground of special qualifications, but who were submitted to no general or special examination.

(c) After undergoing a general or special examination, noting which class of examinations has been submitted to, and distinguishing the number who passed from the number who failed to pass, but were nevertheless appointed or continued in appointments, and also the number examined and rejected.

(d) Number of cases in which examination preceded appointment and vice versa.

C.—1st. Regulations respecting ordinary and special examinations and appointments made under the system of examinations.

2nd. Such other regulations for the management of the service as are not established by Statute.

3rd. Copies of questions used at last general and special examinations, prior to 1st January, 1877, with statement of what degree of proficiency was required of candidates.

4th. List of successful candidates, showing percentage of marks obtained.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the information sought for was scarcely worth the expense which would have to be incurred in procuring it, except in reference to the object of the hon. gentleman from West Elgin; and he was afraid he could not use the information to any purpose. He should like to know whether the hon. gentleman consulted the Administration of the day respecting it. The object for which the hon. member said he was making his present motion would, if carried out by him, be a decided vote of want of confidence. If there was one thing more than another which belonged to the Government it was the mode of appointing and selecting the civil servants, with the dismissals, suspensions and compensations, and the framing of regulations with respect to the same. If the House appointed a Committee, and this Committee was requested by the Government to assist them in improving the system of civil service, then the motion of the hon. member might come before the Committee. But, as it was, a motion embodying the object proposed would be taking out of the hands of the Administration work which clearly belonged to them; and it would be a vote of want of confidence in the Government system. As to the English report on the Civil Service, the evidence was taken by Royal Commission, issued for the purpose of assisting the Crown. It was an act of the Crown by responsible officers, and there was no intention of taking the public business out of the hands of the Ministers. He did not think the hon. member intended to take public business out of the hands of the Administration.

Mr. CASEY said he had no intention of taking legislation on this subject out of the hands of the Government. He was aware no Committee could be formed without the consent of the Government. He had made a motion as to the Civil Service two years ago, without objection being made, and he did not think he was violating any precedent in repeating the same course. His Committee would merely collect information and make recommendations to the House. He left it to the Government to consider whether this was a vote of want of confidence or not. In case they did, of course it would have to go to the wall.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Renfrew) said he thought such action ought to be taken as might be found necessary to bring the Civil Service into such a state of efficiency as they would like it to attain. As he understood it, the mover had no objection to the present system in itself, but he merely wished to propose means whereby it might be still further improved. He had no doubt that the members of the Government themselves felt it very difficult on many occasions to deal with the question of supplying such vacancies as occurred in the various departments. They all knew that, in this country, no matter what Government was in power, the patronage, unless there was some special objection, rested with their supporters. They all knew also that although many men were very well able to discharge the duties of the office which they sought, yet in the majority of cases the applicants for office were such persons as could not succeed in the world, through their want of those very qualifications which would make them useful if they were appointed to office under the Government. He thought it would be of the greatest advantage indeed to have such examinations as would secure, at any rate in the persons who would obtain the offices, literary qualifications. He did not mean to say these were the only qualifications that were required, but at the same time they were usually the evidence of industry and energy on the part of persons who possessed them; and it was altogether likely that the same energy and industry which caused these persons to attain these qualifications would still continue when they were discharging the duties of the office which might fall to their lot. He thought, however, that there was one omission in the motion, and that was the want of reference to the sex now performing but a small portion of the Government work. He thought that very much of the work done in Departments might be performed by women as efficiently as it could be performed by men. This would relieve many women from distress. He trusted that the Government would give attention to this matter.

RIVER SYDENHAM SURVEYS.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

Mr. STEPHENSON moved for Returns in detail of all expenses incurred and moneys expended in the payment of Engineers, Surveyors, &c., for services rendered, as well as for horse hire, etc., in connection with the surveys of the North Branch of the River Sydenham from the forks at Wallaceburgh to the Village of Wilkesport, in the year 1876. He explained that a very large trade existed in the town, village and municipalities in question. The Customs' returns for the year 1874 amounted to $5,000; for 1875, to nearly $4,000, and for 1876 to about $3,000—some $11,000 in all. It was stated that the improvements on the river had cost some $40,000, but he found from the Returns brought down by the Minister of Public Works, that the expenditures made, including money spent in this relation by the late Administration, amounted in reality to about $8,000.

VITAL STATISTICS.

MOTION FOR SELECT COMMITTEE.

Mr. BROUSE moved for a Select Committee to examine and report upon the subject of Vital Statistics and public health with power to send for persons and papers. He said this was a question of very great importance, in which they were all deeply interested. It alike concerned the physician, the scholar, the divine, and the statesman. Public hygiene was a large and comprehensive subject, and it was more—it was a science. It would be within the recollection of hon. members that, on two previous occasions, he had brought the matter before the House. The most enlightened countries had legislated in this connection, and the results were both remarkably encouraging and cheering. The State of Massachusetts, through this means, had during the past eight years reduced their death rate fifteen per cent., while the reduction in Michigan, owing to sanitary legislation, amounted, during the past six years, to 16 per cent., and other States had followed the example thus set them. An effort was now being made at Washington to secure legislation in this regard for the entire States. France in 1842 passed a health bill, and the rate in 1862 was reduced from 1 in 36—the figures of 1842—to 1 in 39; and during the next decade to 1 in 47, showing a decrease of nearly 33 per cent. Austria and Russia had taken a deep interest in this important matter, but Germany was now taking the lead, possessing not only health officers in the different provinces, but also an Imperial Board of Health at the capital, to which the other Boards were compelled to send returns. During the last forty years, England had passed no less than fifty Public Health Acts and the results were most extraordinary. In Edinburgh, the death rate had been reduced from 38 to 26 per thousand, and in London from 40 to 20. Dr. Guy, the eminent health officer of England, had stated that out of 36,000 deaths from consumption alone, in that country, contracted in workshops, 5,000 were preventible by a proper regard for sanitary measures. Dr.

Aiken, another eminent physician, had shown that the death rate had decreased owing to sanitary legislation, an average of 30 per cent. In Brighton, the rate had been decreased from 23 to 18 per thousand, the diminution of deaths from typhoid fever having been 63, and from consumption 20 per cent. In Newport, the rate had been lowered from 31 to 21 per thousand, the decrease touching typhoid fever having been 36, and for consumption, 32 per cent. In Salisbury, the rate had been lowered from 27 to 21 per thousand, the diminution in the number of deaths from typhoid fever having been 75, and from consumption, 45 per cent., Dr. Buchanan also showed that the rate in 25 cities had been decreased respectively from 20 to 38 per cent. We were equally interested in a matter of such importance, and he would consider the subject under three heads. Dr. Guy had informed the Government of England that one-third of its present death rate was preventible. In what condition, then, were we placed? The rate in Canada, as far as could be ascertained, averaged about 25 per thousand. Our population was four millions, and the consequent loss by death was about 100,000 per annum; and, if Dr. Guy's theory was correct, this number could be reduced by 33,000 per year. However, to bring the matter fairly before the House, he would reduce these figures to 20,000, representing lives which could be annually saved in this country. In France, it was estimated that the days of sickness averaged eight days per inhabitant; and, among four millions of population, there would consequently be 32,000,000 days of sickness, representing ten millions of days which might be prevented by the adoption of proper sanitary measures. For every death, it was estimated that there were 20 severe cases of sickness, and consequently 400,000 severe cases of sickness were preventible. Ten million working days were yearly lost to the country, and, at the rate of half a dollar per day, this represented a loss of $5,000,000. A life was calculated to be worth $1,000 to a country, and, if we lost 20,000 inhabitants annually, at a valuation of $500 each, we lost yearly

$10,000,000; and if the five millions, of which the country was deprived through the loss of labour were added, this made a total annual loss of $15,000,000. It was also to be remembered that a large amount of crime, poverty and degradation followed in the wake of sickness. He regretted that this subject had not been considered in the Speech from the Throne. At the last meeting of the Medical Council in Toronto, last spring, a resolution was passed asking the Government to introduce such legislation; and, at the meeting of the Dominion Medical Association, a similar resolution was adopted; while recently, at Philadelphia, a congress of physicians, including the most eminent men from every part of the world, had, he believed, made a similar recommendation to both the American and Canadian Governments. He understood that it was not the intention to send for persons in connection with this motion. He moved

“That a Select Committee be appointed, composed of Messrs. Brouse, Holton, Tupper, Blanchet, Pope (Compton), Dymond, Landarkin, Forbes, Christie and Kerr, to examine and report upon the subject of Vital Statistics and Public Health, with power to send for persons and papers.”

Mr. TUPPER said he fully concurred in the statement of the hon. member for South Grenville that this question was one of very great importance, and one very well deserving of the attention of the Government and of the House. He had entertained the hope, from a statement made by the First Minister on a former occasion, that this matter had received, and was receiving the careful consideration of the Administration. The question of statistics, whether vital or otherwise, under the Union Act, had been placed exclusively within the control of the Dominion Parliament, and the attention which had been given to the subject by the local Government of Ontario he held was entirely unconstitutional. No branch of statistics could be compared in point of importance with vital statistics. In Nova Scotia the Government had legislated in this regard, to the very great satisfaction of the country; the system adopted was not expensive, and a large amount of valuable information had been obtained. When the Union Act came into force, this Department passed into the hands of the General Government, and was continued down to the present year. He noticed, however, that in the Estimates just submitted no provision had been made for this purpose. He felt no hesitation in saying that this fact would create great regret and annoyance in Nova Scotia. It was a retrograde step. Nova Scotia was the only Province in the Dominion which had done anything in this relation, and he thought that the hon. the First Minister, would have better discharged his duty towards the people of this country if he had matured a scheme for making the system general. He could not say that the late Government were free from blame touching this matter, but they had left behind them much information concerning the subject, and had taken a long stride in the direction of the preparation of a measure having for its object the establishment of a system of statistics for the whole Dominion. He trusted that the Government would give countenance and support to the recommendation of the hon. member for South Grenville, and mature such a measure as would be acceptable to the House.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he differed entirely with the hon. member for Cumberland, in his interpretation of the constitutionality of the Act.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD read the 95th clause of the British North American Act, as follows:—

“In each Province the Legislature may make laws in relation to agriculture in the Province, and to immigration into the Province; and it is hereby declared that the Parliament of Canada may from time to time make laws in relation to agriculture in all or any of the Provinces; and any law of the legislature of a Province, relative to agriculture or to immigration shall have effect in and for the Province as long as, and as far only as it is not repugnant to any Act of the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE said immigration was not in the list of subjects in the schedules. He was quite certain that he was right in saying that the matter of public health was not within their cognizance.

Mr. TUPPER: "Statistics."

Mr. MACKENZIE said that clearly referred to statistics of a general character and not to those having reference to a question of public health. The question of quarantine came under their control, and they were bound to and did attend to it. But the matter of public health was one of personal and civil rights, and one within the cognizance and management exclusively of the Local Legislatures. He had no doubt that, under the phrase "statistics," they might possibly go a certain length, but they could not enforce provisions that the Local Legislatures could enforce. For instance, they had been asked to take cognizance of the drainage of the city of Montreal, to take cognizance of gas escapes, and impure water, and matters of that sort; but they had been obliged to point out to the citizens that this was wholly beyond their jurisdiction. With regard to vital statistics, the hon. member for South Grenville had said that the Province of Ontario had given a little attention to the subject; he thought the Province had given much attention to it. It was true the system in Ontario was not so perfect as that in England owing to the difficulty in initiating measures in a new country which required the close attention of the public; but still the municipal divisions had been essentially useful, and the municipal officers had been made useful in gathering the statistics of births, marriages and deaths, which had been reasonably perfect. He admitted all the importance that the hon. member for South Grenville attached to this subject; he was earnestly anxious and desirous of doing everything that he could fairly and reasonably could be expected to do to promote the end the hon. gentleman had in view, and whatever might be of their powers, their opinion and the expediency at the present time of organizing an expensive system, they would, at all events, be glad to consider anything brought before the House by the Committee in the most favorable light that could be attached to it.

POSTMASTERSHIP OF PORT HOPE.

QUESTION AND REMARKS.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD called the attention of the hon. Premier to a statement that had appeared in the public prints to the effect that the hon. member for East Durham had been appointed Postmaster for Port Hope. One paper stated that the writ was actually issued, and he asked whether such was the fact.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I have not heard of it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: That is a very Jesuitical answer.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I call the hon. gentleman to order.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I did not say it was wrong to give a Jesuitical answer. The Jesuits are a most respectable body of men.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Will the hon. gentleman tell what he meant by the word?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I asked if the rumour was true that the writ was out, and the hon. Premier said he had not heard of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: How is that Jesuitical?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: My hon. friend might have asked the hon. Minister of Justice at once to have given an answer.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I suppose he would have been able to answer it. I will merely say there is no truth whatever in the statement referred to, nor was the appointment ever intended, asked, or suggested.

Mr. SPEAKER said the adjective Jesuitical could not possibly be offensive.

House adjourned at Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, 22nd Feb., 1877.

The Speaker took the chair at Three o'clock.

MR. JUSTICE LORANGER.

MOTION FOR REFERENCE.

Mr. HOLTON moved :

“ That the Return to Address of the 15th instant, for copies of the petitions of T. D. Latour and others, dated the 5th June, 1874, and the 2nd November, 1875, presented to the Government concerning the Hon. Mr. Justice Loranger, and all correspondence relating thereto, be referred to the Special Committee to enquire into the administration of justice in the District of Richelieu, in the Province of Quebec.”

Motion agreed to.

THE PUBLIC ACCOUNTS.

MOTION FOR REFERENCE.

Mr. YOUNG moved :

“ That the Public Accounts for the fiscal year ended the 30th June, 1876, be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts; as also the supplementary statement of income and expenditure during the current year.”

Motion agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were introduced and read the first time :

Bill (No. 25) To amend the Act incorporating the Canada Atlantic Cable Company.—(Mr. Thompson, Welland).

Bill (No. 26) To vest the property and powers of the Pickering Harbour and and Road Joint Stock Company, in Joseph Harris McClellan.—(Mr. Gibbs, South Ontario.)

Bill (No. 27) To amend the Act respecting Offences against the Person.—(Mr. Blake.)

WELLAND CANAL.

QUESTION.

Mr. NORRIS asked whether the Government had placed any sum in the Estimates for the purpose of constructing a double track bridge across the Canal at the foot of St. Paul Street, in the city of St. Catharines.

Mr. SPEAKER.

Mr. MACKENZIE: In the Estimates the sum of $70,000 has been placed, $50,000 for ordinary repairs, and $20,000 for extraordinary repairs. Part of this is intended to provide for the building of some bridges, but I am not quite certain whether any portion will be devoted to the purpose in question until I have received another report from the Engineer of the Public Works Department, who has gone up to the Canal to look into the matter.

CANAL TOLLS.

QUESTION.

Mr. CHEVAL asked whether it was the intention of the Government to provide in the Estimates a sum sufficient to indemnify owners of steam vessels when they should have paid a sum of over one hundred dollars for canal tolls, which they would not have been compelled to pay, but for the existence of an unjust and arbitrary law, whereby in the case of two steam vessels of the same tonnage, the one paid but thirty-eight dollars while the other paid two hundred and forty dollars.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland): The Government do not intend to put in the Estimates any sum for the purpose of reimbursing persons who have made payments in the manner of which my hon. friend speaks. I may say that it is under the consideration of the Government to provide means and measures for remedying the injustice complained of with regard to the difference made in the toll arising out of the different measurements of ships.

IMMIGRANT SHEDS.

QUESTION.

Mr. GULLIES asked whether it was the intention of the Government at an early date to erect emigrant sheds at Southampton to meet the necessities of the anticipated large emigration to Manitoba and the North-West that was expected to pass by that route during the ensuing season.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is not the intention of the Government to erect an emigrant shed at Southampton for the mere purpose of affording temporary shelter to passengers travelling westward. Such a course would involve expenditures at least at six different points. It is supposed that the abundant passenger accommodation provided in these localities will suffice, and I am sure that Southampton will not be behind any other place.

PROCEDURE IN CRIMINAL CASES BILL.—[BILL No. 3.]

(Mr. Irving.)

SECOND READING.

Mr. IRVING moved the second reading of the Bill respecting procedure and evidence in criminal cases. He said that branches of law connected with the practice of criminal law, which had not as yet been introduced into this country, had existed for some time in England, being well settled by Imperial legislation. The first branch of the Bill introduced related to the extension of the Act ordinarily known as intended to prevent vexatious indictments. Some years ago it was found necessary to restrict the power of Grand Juries in finding bills of indictment concerning matters relating to the obtaining of goods under false pretences, to perjury, to a certain class of assaults, and one or two offences of that character, in which it was found to be too much the habit of parties, irresponsible as it were, to go before a Grand Jury and give information, thereby incurring the expense as well as the odium of criminal prosecutions, which probably would not have been instituted, had the proceedings been primarily taken before the ordinary Justices of the Peace of the country; and practice showed that this related to this inconvenience:—that, when a Justice of the Peace framed his orders for a commitment and declared that a prosecution should be instituted, he was apt to describe but one offence, and that when subsequently the evidence came to be examined by the proper law officers of the Crown, it was discovered that the evidence in question would have justified some other class of offence, as a different number of counts or descriptions of the offence, differing from that which had occurred to the mind of the Justice of the Peace; and in such cases, there had resulted the inconvenience of acquittals being obtained, and sometimes of motions to get an arrest of judgment, which had tended to quash convictions, after they had been secured. This enactment was intended to remedy this inconvenience, leading practically to the introduction of the English practice on the subject, and allowing a variety of counts or charges to be made, provided that the same evidence was given, which was laid before the Justices in the first instance, subject always to the opinion of the Court that such was a proper course to pursue. Then, there was a slight extension, which he believed was not in the Imperial Act, and this was to make the same precautions applicable to offences respecting nuisances. Many indictments for nuisance had been preferred, which would not have been desirable had the information been taken in the first instance before a Justice of the Peace, or a Police Magistrate. Another branch of the law relating to this Bill was a matter of evidence, and this was very important. It had been found that, when a man or a prisoner stood indicted for having received stolen goods, on his premises were discovered not only the particular goods that might be in question, but also other stolen property, belonging to a variety of different persons. As a matter of fact in the administration of justice, the law of evidence did not permit the Crown to admit testimony showing that these other goods were in the prisoner's possession, and thus proving guilty knowledge on the part of the accused. The law prevailed in England in this state until about five or six years ago, when it was changed, and this legislation he had also copied. He believed that this would be of such use to the Province, that no difficulty would be experienced in obtaining the assent of the House to the reference of the Bill to a Committee.

Bill read the second time.

Mr. IRVING moved :

“That the bill be referred to a Special Committee, consisting of Messrs. Mousseau, Laurier, Cameron, Appleby, Guthrie, Brooks, McIsaac, McCarthy and the mover.”

Mr. BLAKE: There is no objection to the second reading, and no objection to the Bill. I observe that my hon. friend has pointed out the subjects proposed for the consideration of the House; but it will be for the Committee no doubt to take up and specially to consider the new proposals, and the applications of the restricting provisions to which the hon. gentleman has referred with regard to cases of nuisance. I am sure that we are aware of such cases of vexatious prosecution for nuisance having existed. It will be necessary, however, for the Committee to consider whether their occurrence is of sufficient frequency to justify restricting provisions. The only other alteration which the hon. gentleman proposes that is not already contained in the pages of the Statute Book is this: he applies the first section to the provisions of section 29 of our Act, whereas it has been applied only to the corresponding sections or section 28 of the English Act. I do not myself perceive any material difference or any objection to the course which the hon. gentleman proposes to pursue in that particular, and the amendments appear to be such as to deserve the consideration and attention of the House.

Motion agreed to.

LENDING AND INVESTING INSTITUTIONS BILL.—[BILL No. 4.]

(Mr. Blain.)

SECOND READING PROPOSED.

Order for the Second Reading of the Bill to repeal the Act 37 Victoria, Chapter 49, intituled, "An Act to authorize Corporations and Institutions incorporated without the limits of Canada, to lend and invest moneys therein," read.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said that, as the Bill would affect a measure with which the Government was about to deal, it would possibly be as well for his hon. friend to let the matter stand until he (Mr. Cartwright) introduced the Bill of which he had given notice, respecting the incorporation of joint stock companies doing business in borrowing or lending money in this country.

Mr. IRVING.

Mr. BLAIN said he had no desire to force this question on the attention of the House at present; but, as the difficulty did not arise in this House, but rather in the Senate, he thought perhaps it would be as well to discuss the propriety of repealing this Act before the Government measure came down. However, if it was thought desirable that the questions should come up together, he had no objection that the motion should stand.

Second Reading postponed.

CRIMINAL WITNESSES BILL.

[BILL No. 5.]

(Mr. Dymond.)

SECOND READING PROPOSED.

Order for Second Reading of Criminal Witnesses Bill, read.

Mr. BLAKE requested that the second reading of the Bill should be postponed.

Second Reading postponed.

DISMISSALS FROM OFFICE.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order for resuming adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Campbell for Order of House for correspondence with John Buine, Angus Morrison and Charles L. Campbell regarding their dismissals from office as seizing and landing officers at Bras d'Or, &c., read.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Mr. Speaker, although the Government opposed the motion, I thought it my duty to move the adjournment of the debate. I deemed this was necessary as I considered it my duty to make my protest against the way in which this subject was dealt with by the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches, and the manner in which not only the mover of this resolution but the mover of the motion preceding it was treated in the discussion. The member for Victoria, Nova Scotia, in the exercise of his duty and of his right, moved the motion now under consideration. I think he used quite parliamentary language. The member for Cumberland took up the question and repeated the nature of the remarks and applied them strongly. Upon that, the Premier arose and attacked my hon. friend a second time in unparliamentary and most unreserved language for what he had said.

Mr. BLAKE: Hear.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I would appeal to this House and to my hon. friend from South Wentworth whether the hon. member for Cumberland used a single unparliamentary expression, a single expression which was not in his right to use. But the only answer that he obtained in return was "that it was his usual style of pouring out a tirade of coarse abuse;" and then there was the usual attempt to divert the attention of the House from the subject by saying: "You're another! You cannot say anything; you were so-and-so and so-and-so." That was the style of the argument used by the Premier. Now, I protest against that course; I protest against the relevancy of it; I protest against the attempt, persistently made, to stop the current of the discussion, and draw away the attention of the House on every occasion from the particular subject before it to the real or the presumed delinquencies of the late Administration. The hon. the First Minister took occasion to say that the mode in which the late Administration made appointments before they left office was scandalous; they made them by hundreds, he said. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have a word or two to say about that matter. No appointments made by the late Administration were scandalous; neither were there any appointments that the Government cannot justify, no appointments that the Government had any need of excusing. And, when the language is used towards the late Government that they made scandalous appointments, I say it is unwarranted, and if I chose to take the same kind of argument that the hon. the Premier did, I would say the assertion was slanderous. The Government on the 27th October, before they left office, brought down returns of 101 appointments. Of these some 71 were cancelled by the present Government. But the hon. gentleman said these 101 appointments were made for the purpose of conferring office upon the favourites, friends and followers of the Government, just before we retired. Mr. Speaker, on looking at that list you will find, as the hon. member for Cumberland stated, that of these 101 appointments, some 35 were appointments in the newly-acquired Province of Prince Edward Island. These were appointments that were Provincial. Most of the officials had held office for years under the Government of Prince Edward Island, and they were merely transferred from being Provincial to being Dominion officials. Some of these officers, such as Harbour Masters and Shipping Masters, can scarcely be called officers of the Government at all. They were under the Administration, but not paid out of the public treasury, but by fees. Some of the gentlemen appointed were political opponents of the late Government. I may name as examples, Lieutenant-Colonel Jackson, made Assistant-Adjutant General; Colonel Gzowski, made Colonel of Engineers in the Militia. These appointments were but filling up old offices—promoting persons to situations to which they had a legitimate right. I do not complain of the Premier making the statements he made the other night; he made them on his own responsibility, and if he did any wrong to any one, that person has a right to complain to this House. But I protest against the idea that, because he chose to cancel so many of those appointments, that was evidence that the appointments in themselves were wrong; the proof that the opposite is the fact is that, in very many of the appointments so cancelled, the parties were restored by the hon. gentleman opposite. The First Minister has only to consult the authorities on this point to see that the constitutional practice is fully laid down by Sir Robert Peel, that it is of the very greatest importance to the State that the political changes of administration should be made with as little disturbance, as little hindrance and as little obstruction to the ordinary business of the country as possible, and that, up to the very last moment a retiring Ministry remain in office, they are possessed of as full power as the day they took office. There is no constitutional distinction which can be drawn between what duties they can perform and what duties they cannot perform. They are Ministers to all intents and purposes, or they are to no intents and purposes. And so was the principle understood, as the hon. member for Chateauguay, from his multitudinous reading, must be aware, when Pitt resigned. His successor was actually appointed, but he could not be sworn in or "kiss hands" on account of the temporary insanity of George III. Yet, although his successor had accepted office—the legal transfer not having been made, however—Pitt came down and carried the Bill of Supply. Still further: I shall refer to the authorities quoted by Mr. Todd:

"For, notwithstanding their resignation, the out-going Ministers are bound to conduct the ordinary business of the House, inasmuch as they retain the seals of office, and continue in full possession of their official authority and functions until their successors are appointed. Upon this point it has been declared by Sir Robert Peel that, 'though members of an Administration may have tendered their resignation, they were still entitled to make any appointments which the exigencies of the public service might require, and these appointments they were undoubtedly entitled to go on making until they were actually superseded by an entrance into office of their successors. It was always the practice to fill up vacancies. Peerages promised by a Minister's predecessors in office had been granted, though no instrument had been signed or sealed on the subject. The moment it was proved that those peerages had really been agreed to by the out-going Minister, he having taken the pleasure of the Crown on the point, that moment the Ministers in power agreed to confirm the grant, and thus respected the engagements of their predecessors. Occurrences of this kind constantly took place. Nevertheless, the political power of filling up vacancies is one that is not invariably exercised by an out-going Minister. In 1782, George III interposed to prevent it; and, when the Russell Ministry resigned in 1852, they left several vacancies not filled up. But, in 1866, upon the dissolution of the second Russell Ministry, an office was filled up by that Government which did not become vacant until two days after their resignation had been tendered to Her Majesty."

I say it was the right of the Government to fill these vacancies; and, to show how courteous in-coming Ministers are to out-going Ministers in England, I may mention the case of the Marquis of Lansdowne, a distinguished statesman and leader in the Liberal ranks, one of the most distinguished of the old school. He arose in the House of Lords and stated, after he had taken office and was sworn in, that he had received a note from his predecessor, stating that a certain gentleman had been recommended by him to a position, and the appointment had been approved just as he left office. Thereupon Lord Landsowne said as a matter of course he would make the appointment, which he did. It will be found that in 1830, when the Ministers had retired, they put four persons on the pension list. Mr. Gordon, a Scotch member, objected to the Lord Advocate, Sir Wm. Rae, being put upon the list under those circumstances, but it was held by the Government that they had a perfect right to act as they had done. Then, again, Lord Grey, head of the Reform Administration, vindicated and defended his act of conferring positions on his own relations, when he signified his resignation. I quote these cases to show hon. gentlemen that it was our right to make the appointments referred to, although hon. members may differ as to the matter of taste. Such being within our constitutional right, I say we ought not to be liable to continuous personal attacks on this ground. If we have created any office not called for, to provide for our friends, then let the hon. gentleman pour out his vials of wrath upon us; if we have done anything but appoint persons to offices that had been created by law, then let us be attacked; but this mode of diverting the attention of the House from attacks made on the Government, on subjects which the Government do not like discussed, is pretty nearly played out. A new Ministry just coming in have a right, to a certain extent, to take that course. They have not yet committed any sins, and they can say that the late Government did certain acts, but they were going to introduce reform, and the country has a right to take their promises. But, Sir, when they have remained in office for a length of time, they are open for criticism; they are paid for it; they took office for the purpose of receiving criticism; and they are bound to receive criticisms respectfully, and to answer them fully. It is true the hon. the Minister of Militia spoke of the insignificance of my hon. friend from Victoria, who was too insignificant to answer. It was only when the hon. member for Cumberland addressed the House, that he thought it necessary to make a reply.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Mr. VAIL: If the hon. gentleman will allow me to correct him, I will explain that what I said was that the charge made was too insignificant—that it was not worth taking up.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Mr. Speaker, that is too thin. If the matter was insignificant, it was equally insignificant from the hon. member for Cumberland as from the hon. member for Victoria. It is quite true my hon. friend from Victoria is a private member; he is not perhaps of the distinguished abilities of my hon. friend the Minister of Militia. But he comes here as a representative of the people; and when I talk of a representative of the people, I say every one is a representative of the whole people. We are here in our positions not only to represent the individual constituencies that chose to return us, but the whole people of the Dominion of Canada. And, when the hon. member for Victoria rises and makes a statement, he has a right to expect the considerate, respectful attention of the hon. gentlemen on the Ministerial benches. I say that, although my hon. friend from Victoria does not hold an official position like the hon. the Minister of Militia, and is not perhaps so high in the social rank, yet he is entitled to the greatest consideration from even the highest official as being a representative of the people. There is no difference of rank in this House—all are equal; and the youngest member from the smallest constituency has the same right to be heard and the same right to be treated with courtesy as the man who has earned laurels from holding office. The hon. the Minister of Militia might have remembered a warning that a man almost as great as himself, Lord Palmerston, received. Lord Palmerston, as his partial biographer admits, once lost his head. When returned by an overwhelming majority he tried to rule the House of Commons. His supporters, although strong partizans in that House, were still members of Parliament, and thought more of the privileges of Parliament than of party allegiance, and they drove him from office solely because of the curt style in which he tried to rule the House with his triumphant majority. Now, with respect to the motion on which the hon. the Minister of Militia addressed the House, what was the charge?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think that is not the motion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: He spoke to it, and I think I have a right to speak to it and reply to him. Has not the hon. the Minister of Militia spoken on the motion that is passed? Has nobody the right to reply to him, as a matter of Parliamentary right? I hope my hon. friend will not press his objection.

Mr. BLAKE: The circumstances were that the hon. member for Cumberland irregularly referred to the motion in his speech, and having committed that irregularity the hon. the Minister of Militia replied to him. If the debate is to be upon the general motion let us understand it. I do not think it should be so.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I say my hon. friend was not irregular. He was strongly protesting against the course which had been adopted. He illustrated the injustice that had been meted out to the hon. member for Victoria, Nova Scotia, not only on this motion but on the previous motion. He illustrated one by the other; and he had a perfect right to do so. But the hon. the Minister of Militia did not put that excuse. He did not answer the motion until the hon. member for Cumberland spoke. What was the statement—for I do not mean to make any charge. Here was a contractor about running for a vacant seat in Parliament. He was known to be opposed to the policy of the Administration—he had avowed himself so.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Not so.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: That was the statement. He was loud in his denunciation of the Government, and he was about to run as an Opposition candidate. Then came the difficulty; then came the conference. The Minister of Militia went to the Premier, and the Premier said: "Mr. Ross cannot run for he is a contractor—we have got him there. He cannot run against us, but suppose we get him to run for us." So, accidentally, or on purpose, the Minister of Militia went all the way down to Truro. I would like to know if the hon. gentleman did not send any telegram to get the contractor to meet him there. The conversation was not reduced to writing; it was verbal. The Minister of Militia went from Ottawa to Truro to warn the candidate that he could not run because he was a contractor. He, however, was relieved of his contract, and the gentleman, who a week before was coming out as an opponent of the Government, afterwards came out as a warm and full-fledged supporter of the Administration. The consequence was that he did not get elected. But he obtained his contract back. We have heard of a man's hair turning white in a night through fear or sorrow, but here is a public man who, after being relieved of an onerous contract, changes at once from an out-and-out Oppositionist to a full-fledged supporter of the Administration. The moment after the election he writes to the Minister of Public Works, stating that he had changed his mind, and that he had better obtain the contract. This is the little story which is too insignificant, says the hon. the Minister of Militia, to warrant the hon. member for Victoria introducing it in this House. I venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that, if this evidence was laid before any Judge of the Supreme Court, on a question of undue influence, it would be held that Mr. Ross was unduly influenced. Every contractor under the Government can become a candidate under this system; all he has to do is to make arrangements with the Board of Works that he shall be relieved of his contract, and try his luck in an election contest, and, if he wins, all right—some relation will get the contract—and, if he is defeated, he can get the contract back again. In this motion, reference was made to three gentlemen who, the hon. member for Victoria says, were dismissed for voting for him. Was that true or was it not?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It was not.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. the Minister of Customs did not say it was not true.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I said it was not true.

Mr. BURPEE: I said the reasons of the removals were, in two of the cases, because the gentlemen were old, one 76, and the other 86 years, and they had not performed any services for years, and, in the case of Mr. Campbell, because he had engaged in business for his father; and he also had done nothing for some time. They were dismissed with a view to the efficiency of the service, and I did not know then, nor do I know now, anything about their politics, or whom they voted for.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: The statement of the hon. member for Victoria was that those men were dismissed from office because they voted for him. It is no argument to say, in reply, that they were dismissed on the report of an inspector. It is very easy to break a dog's tail when you find a stick to break it with. That report was made, I think we should see, if the papers were brought down, after the election. And the hon. gentleman had better bring it down. The other night he said he had not time to read it.

Mr. BURPEE: I said that I believed there was a report and correspondence, and that whatever papers there were would be brought down.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman said he had not time to read it, and if so, how could he know what was the reason? Let the hon. gentleman bring the papers down and then we shall see how the matter stood. Now, it is true that the hon. gentleman said that two of these men were too old. If they were past a certain age, still they might have been efficient. And then the other gentleman was too young, or rather that he was so young that it was a pity to see the boy wasting his time, throwing away his life and energies on a small office of $60 a year; and so the hon. gentleman, from mere philanthropy, from fear the boy should go to the dogs, dismissed him. But the boy was dismissed after he had voted for his father; and the other two men were dismissed after they had voted for his father, and not long after. That was the fact, Mr. Speaker; that is the evidence that has come out; and you can understand, from the serious nature of the allegation made by the hon. member for Victoria, and repeated by the hon. member from Cumberland, the reason why there was an anxious attempt to try and divert the attention of this House from it by discussing the "scandalous conduct" of the late Administration. Why, I can use pretty much the same language to the hon. gentleman as Sidney Smith did to Lord Melbourne. The latter gentleman, although an accomplished man, had the old-fashioned habit of swearing a little, and enlarging his language with certain expletives and oaths which are not in use in the same society now-a-days. The Rev. Sidney Smith was discussing some matters with him, and Lord Melbourne began to swear although he did not mean to commit any impropriety by it—it was simply the fashion of the early days of the Prince Regent and George IV—but it was exceedingly improper and offensive in the presence of a clergyman. Sidney Smith, in his quiet way, turned round and said, "Now, my lord, let us consider everybody cursed, and go to business." Now, Sir, let us consider that the late Administration are damned, not for all eternity, but for all time, at any rate.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We do.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: My hon. friend would look much more pleasant if he thought that was going to happen. Let us consider that they have committed every sin in the calendar, from high treason down to the nuisances my hon. friend from Hamilton is going to deal with, and what then? The hon. gentlemen opposite have to answer for their own offences, and not for those of others. It is for the purpose, first, of entering a protest against this style of discussion, and also against the contumelious manner in which it was attempted to treat my hon. friend from Victoria, and also to call the attention of the House to those two cases that I have ventured to speak so long.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Perhaps the House will pardon my taking a few minutes in reply to the right hon. member for Kingston. He is quite right in supposing that I would not insist on the irregularity of the debate; I merely wished to prove that it was an irregularity. He assigned to his colleagues a punishment far beyond what I supposed they would deserve, but no doubt he knows their deserts better and is better able to measure their punishment.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Yes, we are more of the publicans than the Pharisees a great deal.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes, but the mere fact that the hon. gentleman acknowledges himself a publican does not constitute other people Pharisees. The scriptural publican repented, but, if the hon. gentleman is to be allowed to characterize himself as a publican, he will surely allow other people to characterize themselves. I would advise the hon. gentleman not to venture on scriptural quotations; he is not very well acquainted with that authority and frequently makes blunders. Sir, the hon. gentleman complains of the style of the debate. He ventured to say to-night—he said it on previous occasions, and he says it invariably when he is worsted in argument—that I used unparliamentary language. I defy him to point out a single unparliamentary expression.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I am afraid the hon. gentleman's memory is bad. He said the statement of my hon. friend was inaccurate, and I say that at any rate he was guilty of vulgar abuse.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Then, I can only ask if the word "inaccurate" is unparliamentary, what was the conduct of the hon. member for Cumberland when he charges another with falsehood?

Mr. TUPPER: The hon. gentleman cannot find the charge of falsehood made against any hon. member in any remarks of mine.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I have a perfect recollection of the remark being used in reference to the entries in the Gazette. I know I am correct in that. Then, Sir, the hon. member for Kingston says that we imported something into the debate to divert the channel of discussion. On the contrary, we imported nothing extraneous into the debate. It was when the hon. member for Cumberland had imported every conceivable kind of attack upon the Government that we were obliged to reply. Does the hon. member for Kingston really pretend that a prominent member should take advantage of an ordinary motion to make a general attack and that he should not receive a general reply? Is that the ground the hon. gentleman takes, and is that his idea of fair play? If it is his idea of fair play, I do not think that the House entertains it. I tell the hon. gentleman that he shall not make such an attack without its being replied to promptly; and, if he imagines that either one of his colleagues or himself shall take advantage of an ordinary notice of motion without the slightest intimation to the House that there is going to be a general attack on the Administration, and to carry out that policy with impunity, he must imagine we are very silly indeed. Proper notice should have been given, and the Government would have been prepared to repel it. We were prepared to repel it as it was, as we are always prepared to repel such charges. But the hon. gentleman even ventures to defend the extraordinary transactions of October and November, 1873. He says the appointments were for filling vacancies and for the good of the public service. Was it necessary for the public service that several appointments should be made under an Act which did not go into operation for four months after the hon. gentleman went out of office. I say, Sir, that they anticipated Acts of Parliament, and appointed men to offices not in force and which might never have been enforced.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: My hon. friend is wrong there.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am not wrong.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I am satisfied that the hon. gentleman is wrong.

Mr. MACKENZIE.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I will produce the authority to-morrow.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I suppose the hon. gentleman means the Inspectors of Weights and Measures Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No, I do not. Then they were building certain light-houses, some of them under contract and some of them not under contract. They could not possibly be used or lighted until the June following, but it was absolutely necessary in the hon. gentleman's opinion to make the appointments on the first day of November, 1873. Yet, Sir, they were necessary for the public service. Then, again, let me call attention to two other appointments—two appointments so scandalous that they outrage every feeling of decency. The hon. gentleman speaks of British Administrations of the past few centuries. Does anyone imagine that Lords Palmerston, Melbourne, or Derby, or any of the great men who have reigned as premiers of England, would assert they had a right, in anticipation of defeat, to appoint one of their colleagues as Lieutenant-Governor and another a Judge, and that the two gentlemen should sit here after the date of their appointments by Order in Council. Why, Sir, at the very last stage of their existence as a Government, they asked an adjournment of the House. They knew that they could not force an adjournment, and Mr. Tilley, acting as the leader of the House got up in this very spot where I now stand, and appealed to us to adjourn the debate on the ground that it could be continued the next day. They never met the House again. They adjourned the debate for the purpose of completing some business appointments that were completed and signed the next day. In order to bind that matter still further, I may say that we have the official books and the copies of those letters, with the date changed a day back, in order to put it right. This, Sir, is the high-toned morality of the hon. gentleman. This, Sir, is what he attempts to justify, as he says, by British practice. I have never denied, and do not deny now, the fact that an out-going Administration should fill every vacancy properly occurring; but I do not admit, I do not believe in the propriety of that whole list of appointments, counting up several pages of that book—scores of them, that they made in one day—offices that were not required, which they had no business to fill and could not legally and properly fill; and then, Sir, after all, doing what was the nearest approach to selling the Bench that was ever done in this country, when they appointed one of their own followers, a political partisan, a member of the Government sitting here on the verge of dissolution. And yet that gentleman and another of their colleagues took two of the highest offices in the country, one, Mr. Tilley, being appointed, I think, on the 21st October, the day before the House met. And yet he sat right through that Session holding this appointment in his pocket. So much with regard to those appointments. The hon. gentleman says it was not denied here the other night that those three officers were dismissed for political reasons. It was denied, and I said I that defied the hon. gentleman opposite to find a single instance where an official was dismissed by us for political reasons.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew): Mr. Harvey of Arnprior.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Mr. Harvey was not dismissed for political reasons, but for misconduct in his office, and if the misconduct had come to my notice he would have been dismissed earlier. But, Sir, I can point to offices that were vacated ostensibly for political reasons in the previous régime. Now, with regard to those three men. Two of them were simply past all use in fact to the public service. They were too old; they were not performing any duties that required their service. Another was engaged in mercantile transactions, although employed as a Customs officer; and everyone must recognize the impropriety of an official being engaged either as an assistant, or as a partner, or as a dealer.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Or as a Minister of Customs?

Mr. MACKENZIE: The Minister of Customs is not engaged in trade, that I am aware of. The hon. gentleman has made an insinuation unworthy of him, and let me tell him it is far more unparliamentary than anything he has had to complain of. Now, with regard to the other point. I stated all that could be stated about the contractor, Mr. Ross. I stated that there was no communication with the Public Works Departments, or with myself, except the official communications. But I believe that Mr. Ross was always a supporter of the Government. I know he was in 1874. He supported his brother and voted with the Liberal party. I had no means of knowing whether he was a supporter or opponent of the Government, and I will not accept the authority of the hon. gentleman in that matter; he knows as little about it as I do.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I know nothing about it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Precisely so. But one would never have thought that. I say that he had a perfect right to become a candidate if he pleased. I took no steps in regard to the matter; and I may say further that the contract is finished. The matter was referred to Mr. Perley, and he said there was no objection to releasing Mr. Ross from his contract if the sureties gave the necessary assent. That is done almost invariably. I might pursue this subject a little further. I might say, for instance, that I have known contractors—men who were really the contractors though nominally other names were employed—sitting in this House under the hon. gentleman. I might state, and there is no harm in stating the fact, that since the hon. gentleman went out of office and those parties went out of Parliament, I have happened to have to deal with the parties as contractors who were sitting in this House nominally as independent members, but really as contractors. I might go a great way into this sort of thing, and the hon. gentleman had better confine himself to actual facts instead of drawing upon his imagination. I am quite willing that every transaction in my Department, everything done in it, shall be subjected to a strict scrutiny by a committee of one, and that one the hon. member for Kingston.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: In not one single remark that I made did I say there was any irregular communication between the hon. gentleman and Mr. Ross.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman stated that it was nicely arranged at once that this contract should be given up, and that immediately after Mr. Ross was defeated the contract was restored. No one could do that but myself.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: It was so, was it not?

Mr. MACKENZIE: It was not. I stated the facts here. I had the three letters which passed in my hands. One was asking that he should be released from the contract; the other was referring that to Mr. Perley, and the next was Mr. Perley's report. I also stated that on the 26th October a letter was received from Mr. Ross to the effect that he did not intend to withdraw from the contract. I stated everything, and the hon. gentleman has no right to make the insinuation that he did—that I, as head of the Public Works Department, had made arrangements with this gentleman so that he could come back to his contract. I deny that there was a particle of impropriety in the whole transaction. Besides all that, as I before stated, the contract has been practically completed for months.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Is it wound up.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is not quite wound up.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: That is all the difficulty.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is no difficulty whatever. There might have been a difficulty in it some years ago, but there is none now. I protest against the hon. gentleman forming conclusions upon such premises. I only wish to say, further, in regard to the question immediately in dispute that I deny absolutely that the hon. member for Victoria, was treated discourteously. The hon. gentleman truly never complained of being treated discourteously. Every information was given him that could be furnished on the two motions, and some that we were not called upon to give was given him on the first motion. I might have said that the papers would be brought down, but I stated their purport. There was no question of courtesy or discourtesy until the hon. member for Cumberland made a general attack upon the Government. Does the hon. member suppose that we are bound to listen to those attacks and make no reply? I can only say that if he thinks that is the policy to be pursued by this Government, he is mistaken. I shall reply to everything and on the spot.

Mr. TUPPER: I hope the House will accord to me the same indulgent consideration that it has given to the hon. the First Minister, who stands in precisely a similar position with myself. The complaint that I made was that the House was treated improperly, that the country was treated improperly, when one of the gravest charges and accusations that could possibly be preferred against any Government was pointedly preferred against one of the Ministers—a charge, which if true, would be sufficient to drive him instantly, not only off the Treasury Benches, but out of public life. I do not think that any one will hesitate to agree with me in that statement. What I complained of was that, an independent member of this House having made such a charge in his place here, not a word of reply was made. Were the House and the country not entitled to a reply, or was it to go abroad from one end of the country to the other that a charge of the most corrupt character which could be preferred against a public man should be allowed to pass without any explanation being offered? I simply recounted the statement that was made by the hon. member for Victoria. It was this: that an election took place in the county of Victoria—a vacancy occasioned by the appointment of the member for that county to sit on the Bench. While this question as to who should be the candidate was pending, a gentleman who was a contractor, and who was therefore ineligible to run, and who was known to be hostile to the Government, was approached by the hon. the Minister of Militia with a view to getting him to run as a Ministerialist candidate. I have in my hands the report of a speech made by the hon. member for Victoria in the presence of the contractor, Mr. Ross, in the face of the whole people on nomination day, in which he said :

“ When William Ross was turned out of office without warning, every right-minded man was insulted, and not one of you, I am sure, felt that his brother John would to-day be running, if not as an avowed supporter of the Government, at least as a man pledged, should he be returned, to support them during the rest of the term against the men who built the lighthouses and public works he spoke of in his speech. I make no charge against Mr. Ross, but only allege that this transaction of suddenly relieving him from an unfinished contract, and the current report that $50,000 of the people's money will be paid, demand the fullest information, particularly when the Government itself is the most corrupt that ever disgraced any country.”

Of course, Sir, I could not make that statement for myself. I would not like to say anything to hurt the feelings of the hon. gentlemen opposite ; I merely repeat what was said on the hustings by the hon. member for Victoria. Mark what follows—the statement being made in the presence of Mr. Ross :

“ This last fact I state on the authority of Mr. Ross himself, it not being a month since he abused the Government. Mr. Ross went to Truro an opponent of the Government, came back relieved of the contract on most favourable terms, and is now, I believe, a supporter of the Government.”

Now what my hon. friend stated, whether true or untrue, was certainly entitled to an explanation from gentlemen on the Treasury Benches. The hon. member for Victoria, Nova Scotia, said in language so strong that even I feel some hesitation in endorsing it that this avowed opponent of the Government, who was open-mouthed in his attacks upon them, met the hon. the Minister of Militia at Truro. I do not think that the hon. the Minister of Militia will say that that meeting was not brought about by a telegram from himself down to the county. That was the rumour there. It was no secret that the hon. gentleman had sent a telegram which induced this meeting at Truro between himself and a contractor known to be hostile to the Government. It was no secret that William Ross was induced to go into office because his support was necessary ; and it is no secret that, when certain intriguers, not connected with persons in this House but with certain parties whose interests could be better served by the hon. the Minister of Militia than Mr. Ross, exerted their power, Mr. Ross was driven from the county in the most insulting and ignominious manner. He went out of the Cabinet breathing vengeance against the Ministry, and it was only his self-interest that compelled him to accept a position at their hands. That was the position he took and that feeling actuated his brother, who was also strongly opposed to the Administration. But he was a contractor, and when, the election came, the hon. the Minister of Militia tells this House that he went to the hon. the Minister of Public Works and spoke about his being a candidate, and the latter said he was ineligible. Now the hon. the First Minister says he had no communication with any one with reference to that election. How can the hon. gentleman say so when his own colleague, the Minister of Militia, states that he went and discussed the candidacy of that county with the hon. the Premier, who said that Mr. Ross was ineligible because he was a contractor. I suppose that the hon. gentleman had no need to go to the hon. the First Minister to find out that a contractor was ineligible. It appears that the hon. the Minister of Militia left his Department and travelled down to Truro for the purpose of having an interview, which is believed to have taken place—I do not assert it, but the facts will leave no doubt on the matter—in consequence of a communication between the Minister and the contractor. It is notorious that after that meeting the press in Halifax supporting the Government, the journals with which the hon. Minister himself is connected, in the most defiant terms challenged the Opposition to come out and meet the Goliath they had put in the field. The man who just before was an avowed opponent of the Government, and so declared himself on nomination day, was put forward as the Government nominee, and the Opposition were invited to try their strength if they dared. In the last discussion, I simply drew the attention of the House to the fact that a grave charge had been made against the Government, a charge which would cover the Government with disgrace if not explained, and that the explanation given was unsatisfactory. The Minister of Militia in making his explanation forgot himself, as I believe no hon. member, since this was a Parliament, ever forgot himself. The hon. the First Minister occasionally ventures to state to the House that I use language unjustifiably strong and such as is considered by hon. gentlemen opposite as offensive. I will, however, call his attention to a report of the remarks of his colleague, the Minister of Militia, with reference to myself which were allowed to pass without any rebuke from you, Mr. Speaker, or any remonstrances from the hon. gentleman's colleagues, though the hon. the Premier is bound to take notice of any such unparliamentary conduct coming either from his colleagues or supporters. What did the hon. the Minister of Militia say? He said:—

“He was amazed the hon. member for Cumberland, with all his experience in public life, would dare to get up in this House in his presence and in that of the hon. member for Victoria and make such a statement.”

What statement did I make? I simply called the attention of the House to the fact that an unanswered statement remained against the Government which required to be refuted. The hon. Minister of Militia further stated that: “There had been a rumour before Mr. Vail left Ottawa for Nova Scotia that Mr. Ross, who became a candidate, intended to run for the county. * * He then thought it was incumbent on him to instruct Mr. Ross in the matter.” Did he suppose a gentleman of Mr. Ross's intelligence, who seemed to be able to gauge pretty well the amount of Government responsibility, did not know the fact of being a contractor made him ineligible? The Premier does not tell us that he got any information from the Minister of Militia, but that, when the election was approaching, on a certain day before the election, Mr. Ross applied to him to be relieved of his contract in order to become a candidate. The Premier does not say “in order to become a candidate”; but I assume that was the fact. He says he took care—which was quite proper—to ascertain from Mr. Perley, the engineer, whether Mr. Ross could be released from his contract without injury to the public service. After receiving Mr. Perley's report, the Premier again took the very proper course of calling on Mr. Ross to obtain the consent of his sureties before he could be relieved from his contract. Does he tell us that Mr. Ross got the consent of his sureties? Nothing of the kind. He showed the House that Mr. Ross had never obtained the consent of his sureties, but that Mr. Ross, after being defeated as the Government candidate at that election, asked to be allowed to withdraw his application to be relieved of the contract. If Mr. Ross had been elected it would have been shown that he was not a contractor, but, being defeated, he is still a contractor. That is a state of things which should not be possible in this country. The Premier has informed the House that the present Government have no difficulties with contractors. But I want to know how the public interests are protected when contractors are relieved from contracts before they are completed. Even if Mr. Ross had obtained the consent of his sureties to be relieved from the contract, no one would have been more interested in its completion than he. In order to protect the public exchequer, a law was passed setting forth that contractors for the Government should not hold a seat in Parliament, and that law would be violated in spirit and essence if men with all the interests of contractors could sit behind the Government which depended on them for continuance in office. If the arrangement with Mr. Ross had succeeded and he had been elected, he would have sat in the House while still holding the deepest interest in the contract. The Government claim that they have changed the system pursued by the late Government with respect to contracts; but the past history of the country failed to furnish such a case of that of the Georgian Bay Branch contract, which cost the Dominion

$100,000. During the debate, the Minister of Militia further said :

"If, after that statement, the hon. member for Cumberland would get up and repeat his allegation, he should take it for granted that his character for stating things that had no foundation in fact was so well understood that he might expect to see it developed at any time."

I am not able to find in the records of this Parliament language so indecent and insulting. After twenty-two years of continuous public life, it is not necessary for me to make any vindication of my public character on the floor of this House or in the face of the people of this country. But, when my character and record are referred to, I may remind this House that, having passed twelve years of public life in Nova Scotia, a large portion of which time I discharged the duties of a leading member, and, in later years, of the head of the Administration, I resigned my connection with the administration of the affairs of the Province on the passing of the Union Act, on 1st July, 1867, at which time I had the honour of being surrounded and sustained by a two-thirds majority in the People's House and in the Legislative Assembly. The record I left behind was one of which I have no reason to be ashamed. When I entered the Nova Scotia Government, the valuable mineral possessions of the Province were held by a close monopoly in London; when I retired from public life there, they were free to the enterprize and industry of the people of our own country. When I entered public life the representative of a community with only one hundred and fifty votes was equal to that of a large constituency, and the Representation Bill was passed by the Government of which I was a member. I found officers of the Crown standing all around me in the House of Assembly and the Legislative Council, but that was reformed by the passing of the Independence of Parliament Act. I was able to leave an Educational Act on the Statute book, to which the Globe, the organ of hon. gentlemen opposite, directed the attention of the Ontario Government, as one worthy of careful study, in considering the educational system of that Province. I may claim from the Minister of Justice the credit of having assisted in carrying a measure which he has proclaimed to the world as one of the most valuable boons ever given to the people of Canada—the Union Act. If I stood in the position of the Minister of Militia, I would not be disposed to challenge anybody's record. Those who wish to know what that hon. gentleman's views and sentiments are will find in Morgan's Parliamentary Companion that the hon. gentleman writes himself down or permits himself to be written down as a Reformer. What claims has the hon. gentleman to that title? What right has he to sit in any Reform Administration? The two great tests constantly applied by the First Minister to the question as to whether a man was a Reformer or not were vote by ballot and the trial of controverted elections by the Judges.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I never said so.

Mr. TUPPER: Has the First Minister not held again and again that vote by ballot was one of the principal grounds upon which he claimed the confidence of the people as a Reformer?

Mr. MACKENZIE: No; on the contrary, I never was an advocate of vote by ballot. I accepted it as the will of the people, declared by their representatives, but I have expressed an adverse opinion frequently.

Mr. TUPPER: I am quite aware of the opinion held by the hon. gentleman, but I am also aware that, when the subject came up for discussion, the hon. gentleman claimed that the measure was a Reform one for which he claimed the support of Reformers. The system of vote by ballot was introduced into Nova Scotia in opposition to the action of the Minister of Militia. Moreover, that hon. gentleman, after the system had been tried, induced the House to vote for the repeal of the Act and revert to the old system. And if, Sir, the ballot exists to-day in Nova Scotia, it is because the hon. gentleman was not able to defeat and destroy the measure, and because he was prevented by the Legislative Assembly from passing the repeal of that law. Then, take the question of the trial of Controverted Elections by Judges. If any person wants to see every possible argument adduced with the view of preventing this being done, he has only to read the speech delivered on more than one occasion by the hon. the Minister of Militia, who was the bitterest opponent of that measure, and who was accustomed in the strongest manner to insist upon elections being tried under what the Premier denounced as the old, corrupt, and improper system of parliamentary committees. Yet, Sir, with this record, the hon. gentleman who proclaimed himself as a Conservative on the floor of the Nova Scotia House of Assembly, comes up here and writes himself as a Reformer, and as such this Administration is able to accept him. We have had a good deal of sham, spurious reform attempted to be passed off on the people of this country; but I will not detain the House any longer in referring to that matter. Let me tell the hon. the Minister of Customs, that I did not say that these parties were dismissed on the report of a pliant inspector, but I did say that, when a man was degraded in this country by the Government, and driven out of an office held under the Crown, the Government ought to be able to assign some reason other than the report of a pliant inspector. I do not believe that any such report exists, but, if the hon. gentleman had said that he had an inspector's report, recommending the removal of these parties, I would not question his veracity. If there was a report, it were an easy thing to read it; and therefore, until the hon. gentleman lays such a report on the table, I will take the opportunity of questioning the existence of any such document. Still I do not wish, for a single moment, to be understood as questioning the hon. gentleman's veracity. It is said that these men were old; then, the number of years which they have spent in the public service certainly entitled them to some intimation that the time had come when their services were to be dispensed with. The hon. member for Victoria has stated that these three gentlemen were driven out of office, dismissed, and superseded by other people, appointed at double the salary to perform the same duties, a fact of which, of course, I know nothing; that hon. member has personal cognizance of the facts he has brought before the House, and this is his statement, that these men were driven from office without a word of prior intimation from anyone. Now, I ask the hon. the Minister of Customs, whether the public service will be promoted by turning three men out, and putting another three in their places, without some other notification than the announcement "Go about your business! Your salaries have been stopped," and my hon. friend tells me that, up to the time when he left his county, these three men had never received the slightest intimation that any objections was entertained as to the mode in which they performed their duties. How does the Minister of Militia attempt to answer that accusation? I do not complain of the statement of the Minister of Customs, because he said that he had an impression that an inspector's report in this regard existed, but that he had not had time to read the papers. When he has had time, I will receive with great attention any statement he may have to make. As to the old men, they were entitled to some intimation, and, as to the young man, if he was in any business interfering with the due performance of his duties, would it not have been quite sufficient to have informed him that, such being the case, he would be obliged to resign. These men, who had long served the country, when the Government was desirous of dispensing with their services, should have had the option of tendering their resignations, avoiding thus the obloquy and injustice of being exposed to the comments of their neighbours, for having been summarily, and without notice, driven from office. How does the Minister of Militia answer that? He says that the Inspector was a brother-in-law of the hon. member for Cumberland. Suppose that I had made such a declaration, I would then have been gently reminded in the bland and suave and refined terms the hon. the First Minister so frequently uses, that there was a slight inaccuracy in my statement. The hon. the Minister of Militia ought to know something of the facts. I rose in my place and explained to the House that the hon. gentleman was mistaken, and that the gentleman in question was not my brother-in-law or any connection of mine. And how was I met? One would have supposed that the hon. gentleman would have been covered with confusion, as would have been the case with most men under such circumstances. One would have imagined that this would have interrupted the eloquent flow of the remarks on which all hung so intently and delightedly, as they fell from the lips of the Minister of Militia. But not at all, Sir. He stopped, and having communicated with the Minister of Customs, ascertained that I had a brother who was Collector of Customs, and he says, the Inspector is not my brother-in-law, but my brother filled the vacancy made by the Inspector. And this is the statement which the Ministerial press boasts confounded the hon. member for Cumberland. I do not, however, see anything in it to confound anybody except the Minister of Militia, who, grasping after something in order to sustain himself in one of the most difficult and trying positions that a member of this House can occupy, had to resort to means so utterly beneath and unworthy of—I will not say, the hon. gentleman, but the office he holds. What are the facts? That Inspector in the Province of Nova Scotia became insane, and was sent to an hospital for the insane. For a year or more, I believe, the Government hesitated to fill up the appointment, in the hope that he would recover, he having been a valuable public officer. The vacancy existed for more than a year, and the Minister of Customs can learn from the permanent staff in his office—and very able gentlemen they are—that, out of many Collectors in Nova Scotia, none stood higher for accuracy and careful attention to duties, than the Collector at the Port of Amherst,—a barrister by profession, and an able and efficient officer. This was before the motion of vote of want of confidence was moved; at all events, it was previous to what is now known as that period. We do not forget what is called the throes of dissolution by the hon. gentleman opposite; it is too painful a period to be very rapidly effaced from the mind of any gentleman who has to go through it. But, in any case, it was not during that period. We appointed the Collector, a barrister of ability, a painstaking officer of many years' public service, as Inspector of Customs, and I did commit the great crime of naming my brother as a suitable person to fill the office just vacant.

Mr. JONES (Halifax): At the same salary?

Mr. TUPPER: The same rule was applied to that Department and to that office that was applied to all Departments in the public service, with scarcely an exception. A sum of money was placed at the disposal of the Government by Parliament for the readjustment of salaries, and I can show my hon. friend, should he at any time desire it, that the salary assigned to that post—it was $1,300 I think—it is entitled to by the collections.

Mr. JONES (Halifax): Did the previous Collector receive that amount?

Mr. TUPPER: The previous Collector's salary would have been arranged, under the same circumstances, at the same rate. The hon. gentleman, I suppose, knows that, with reference to the salaries of collectors the amount of the receipts of the office is the principle on which salaries are adjusted, and I think I can say with justice that this principle was not departed from with relation to the office under consideration. At the close of twelve years of public life, when at the head of the Government of Nova Scotia, I was able to say that, though, throughout the length and breadth of the Province, I had great numbers of relatives able and qualified and quite as ambitious, I dare say, to fill positions under the Crown as anybody else, you could not find a relation of mine in office from one end of the Province to the other. I give that back to the Minister of Militia as my answer when he says he confounded me; and I further say that it was the demand of the county which I have represented for almost twenty-two years continuously, the county in which I was born and where a considerable portion of my life has been spent, that I should give my brother an appointment. In response to that demand, the office was conferred, and, though I went back to the county almost immediately, despite the heavy weight which the Government managed to bring to bear upon our shoulders during that struggle, a majority of 380 endorsed my conduct. I have also a word to say with reference to what has just fallen from the First Minister. He says that I charged him with falsehood. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. I said that the statement in the Gazette was false and misleading to the extent of over a million. Was I justified in stating this or not?

AN HON. MEMBER: No.

MR. TUPPER: I can give the hon. gentleman the figures, showing that the surplus up to the 1st of July, 1876, was over a million. I am prepared to go into that question of the examination of Gazettes, with regard to the statement of my hon. friend, and he will find that it was in accordance with the practice of the previous Government that these publications were made the first time. I recollect noticing any serious discrepancy in this statement of revenue and expenditure was with reference to the year 1873-4, after we had gone out of office. The Minister of Finance knows that the facts were the very reverse what was then published, for a very large deficit was intimated when in reality none existed. I went to Mr. Langton, drew his attention to it and told him I was satisfied that the capital expenditure had been confounded with the expenditure chargeable to the Consolidated Fund. Mr. Langton subsequently saw me, and I ascertained that this was the case, assuring me, moreover, that it would not occur again. As I said the other night, it was a false and misleading statement. I charged no falsehood. Falsehood requires to be intentional, while a statement may be false without the party who has made it having intended to mislead anybody. I did, however, charge negligence against the Minister of Finance, because such a thing should not occur. I do not believe that either Mr. Langton or the Minister of Finance is capable of falsehood. We had a right to have information, and to have it accurate. Either the publication of the figures in the Gazette should cease, or they should be accurately given. The First Minister, in answer to my hon. friend, still refers to scandalous appointments and nominations made with relation to Acts which had not then come into force. I would like to know what the Acts were, and what were the appointments. Were any appointments made which were not required and contemplated by the public service? If these hon. gentlemen will bring down a statement of the dates of the appointments of Inspectors of Weights and Measures in this country, I will be able to show the House that they have paid salaries for twelve months before the men had any duties to perform. The way in which the Weights and Measures Act has been taken advantage of, has exerted a feeling of intense dissatisfaction and indignation against the Administration from one end of the country to the other.

MR. TUPPER.

MR. JONES (Halifax): It is raised against the measure.

MR. TUPPER: I tell him, Sir, that the hon. member for Hamilton strongly stated in this House, that it is not so much the Act, as the mode in which it has been administered, of which he had to complain. I draw from the statement of the hon. gentleman that the Government is open to a charge of the same character, only to an intensely greater degree. I think this ought to have concluded the discussion; also what took place in this House a year ago ought to have done so on the part of the First Minister, or any hon. gentleman connected with the Government. I then brought this matter before the House, and I said that, when I had the pleasure of visiting the North Riding of Renfrew in company with the Premier, he (Mr. Mackenzie) declared to the electors that, when the late Administration was in the last throes of dissolution, they had created some two hundred offices, and made some two hundred appointments. The hon. gentleman then pointedly denied having said so. I accepted the denial, and that ought to close the subject, though I added, I was afraid that the electors, as well as myself, had misunderstood him. I proved from public documents on the table, brought down by the Government, that to the 35 appointments we had made in Prince Edward Island these hon. gentlemen had added 75; also that where we had made 25 appointments in the Customs, these hon. gentlemen, instead of finding any of them unnecessary, had replaced them; while we had appointed many parties who were never supporters or friends of our Administration, they appointed 66 Customs officers where I think we had appointed 25; and what was the answer of the hon. the First Minister? Not a word; and I consider that this ought to have terminated the discussion on the subject. I then, as now, further challenged the hon. gentlemen to show that they saved one thousand dollars to the country by the cancellation of appointments. But this they cannot do; nor can they give the names of five officers, appointed by the late Government, whom they have not replaced. The First Minister has a very great objection to hear any person repeat himself; this he cannot endure; it shocks him beyond measure; but he ought to remember that no hon. member of this House is open to that charge more completely than himself. He is in the habit of making stereotyped statements, which are frequently, I may say, moreover, clothed in identically the same words. There is another reason why the hon. gentleman should not complain. What did he say in reply to the statesmanlike comments my right hon. friend made at the opening of the Session on the occasion of the answer to the Speech from the Throne?

Mr. BLAKE: Order! Order!

Mr. TUPPER: My hon. friend, the Minister of Justice, is very much afraid of any violation of the rules of order; but this is never the case when my hon. friend at his right is addressing the House. It is wonderfully how astute, and how keenly alive, the hon. gentleman becomes—

Mr. BLAKE: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. TUPPER: Of course, Mr. Speaker, I would like to know when the First Minister made complaints; and may I not be allowed to say in my place in the House, when the hon. gentleman invites me to make criticisms—

Mr. BLAKE: I rise to a question of order: the hon. gentleman alludes to a former debate.

Mr. TUPPER: I am not repeating what I just stated, but what every person will remember equally well with myself. The hon. gentleman wishes to know if any other Government ever made appointments after it was known that they had not a majority in Parliament to sustain them. Is the hon. gentleman so ignorant of history as not to know that it is held to be one of the most solemn and sacred duties of every outgoing Administration to redeem all the pledges they have made, and that the highest function of the Crown—the appointment of Peers of the realm,—not merely life appointments, but those which go down to the latest time, and continue to be inherited,—is constantly performed by the Imperial Government under such circumstances? Does the hon. gentleman not remember that after the general election in which Lord Derby's Government sustained such an overwhelming defeat at the hands of the people of England, when it was known that they must go out of office as soon as Parliament met, having a majority against them of something like one hundred, one of the colleagues of Lord Derby, the Earl of Mayo, was appointed to the high and distinguished position of Governor-General of India with the enormous salary which is attached to it. Although there were people to be found, connected with the press of England, who said it would become a question for Parliament, no Statesman in the House of Commons or the House of Peers in England ventured to tarnish and destroy his reputation as a public man by questioning the right of the Government of England to make that appointment. Why has the hon. gentleman referred to the appointment of Mr. Tilley in terms which he should be ashamed to use of a gentleman in his absence, and seeing the high position he occupied in the House and now occupies in his own Province. Does he want to degrade the office of Lieutenant-Governor in the eyes of the people over whom he presides, as if he had been guilty of something discreditable? What, Sir, was the fact? Mr. Tilley was appointed to that office, selected for it and the Order in Council passed, if my memory serves me, before he had returned from England.

Mr. BLAKE: That is so. He was appointed about the time of your first resignation.

Mr. TUPPER: What does the hon. gentleman mean?

Mr. BLAKE: I believe that these appointments were made—that Mr. Tilley was appointed Lieutenant-Governor of New Brunswick, Mr. Hugh Macdonald was appointed a Judge, and Mr. Crawford was appointed a Lieutenant-Governor—because the Government were at that time about resigning.

Mr. TUPPER: The hon. gentleman may believe what he pleases, but I think he has no right to make such a statement on the floor of this House. I state that the late Government, in their wisdom, selected Mr. Tilley to be the Lieut.-Governor of New Brunswick before his return from England. When he came back, I think I was the first who had the pleasure of telling him what the Government had done; and, as I think the then Minister of Marine and Fisheries will remember, he said he would require some time for consideration before he would decide. He never sat in this House, or gave a vote in this House, or contemplated such a thing after he had decided to accept the Governorship of New Brunswick. I do not suppose there was any impropriety in the present Government determining to select one of the most important and honourable of their colleagues, Mr. Dorion, for the position of Chief Justice. I think it was perfectly well understood in this House, and out of it, that he was selected for that position.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I deny it.

Mr. TUPPER: That public opinion subsequently received very cogent verification by the act of the hon. gentleman himself, and no one complains that this was the case. Until Mr. Dorion had decided to accept the office, no one questioned his right to sit in the House. No one doubts that it might have passed through the mind of the late Minister of Justice that, on the consummation of a certain Act, he might possibly be induced to accept the high position of a Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada. At all events, the hon. gentleman did accept it, and no one has ever found fault with his carrying the Act through this House, and then accepting an office under it. And yet, in a question so nice, as it affects Mr. Tilley, some gentlemen seem to think that one doctrine should apply to one side of the House, and another to their opponents. Now, the hon. gentleman says that they have never dismissed any one from office, that they have never been guilty of the creation of offices, and that they have never dismissed any one for the purpose of getting an office to bestow upon a friend. They hold that to be corrupt—they hold that to take the public money of the country for the purpose of appointing a friend, when his services are not required, is an act of corruption which ought to drive any one from power. Let us try them by their own acts. When the hon. the Minister of Militia was in public affairs in Nova Scotia he was anxious to have a little arrangement made by which a member for the county of Halifax could be quietly got out of the way in order to put some one else in his place. They went about it by getting the assistance of the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury Benches in this House. The member of the Local Legislature was induced to accept the position of Superintendent or Warden of the Penitentiary at Halifax. The salary had been large enough for the previous Warden, who had held the office for years, but it was not large enough to tempt a member of the Local Legislature to make this convenient arrangement; so Estimates were introduced largely increasing the salary. The next step was an application from the Department of the Minister of Justice to the Inspectors of Penitentiaries, to report Mr. Dunkin, the Warden of the Halifax Penitentiary, for superannuation; but they said: "We cannot do it." Fortunately for the country they were honest men, and were not disposed to lend themselves to an act so unjustifiable as to burden the public revenue of the country in order to make places or positions for anybody. They said: "We cannot do it. If you want a report we will give it; but, in justice, we will have to say he is the ablest public officer we have in the Dominion,"—I do not speak of his age. But they were then told they need not make a report at all. I can establish that by one of these Inspectors themselves, who will come before any Committee of this House and testify to this statement. Look at these laws for superannuation. You find an enormous increase in the amount voted by Parliament for superannuation, and how is it disposed of? Mr. Dunkin is superannuated to-day, and at an enormous increase over the amount to which he is entitled by the Superannuation Act, because he must be got rid of for this purpose. In the first place, the whole spirit of the Superannuation Act, which requires men to continue to discharge their duties as long as they are able to discharge them, whatever their age, is violated; and, in the second place, a much larger amount is given than is required, in order to quiet this gentleman. My right hon. friend from Kingston was defeated some few years ago in carrying a vote through the House for the financial offices in Halifax. The hon. gentlemen opposite mustered their forces and attacked the Government on this. No sooner, however, did the Government change hands than it was found that this sum was not large enough, and a considerably increased vote was granted. It was large enough at that time to maintain the public service in the most efficient way, but it was not large enough to meet the wants of hon. gentlemen opposite in supplying places for their friends. Their first act was, therefore, to increase the vote on which they had defeated the late Government—a defeat which had been submitted to with that grace which the late Government always showed when their views were not supported by the House. Then, Charles Edward Ratchford, who is now able to go into Mr. Langton's office and do his duty, a man physically and intellectually strong, and able and ready to perform any duty the public service may require, is pensioned off. He was Assistant Receiver-General at Halifax; he had been five years in office, and his salary was $1,600 a year. The Public Accounts show that he, in the full vigour of his intellect and of his body, is put on the Superannuation Fund at between $700 and $800—double the amount that the law would allow. The reason given for his superannuation is age, and yet this very Government who superannuated him on account of age, and gave him double the amount of money he was entitled to by law, have made him the manager of the Savings Bank in the county of Cumberland, at the village of Amherstburg—an office, the duties of which, if he is not in the full possession of his intellectual vigour, he is wholly unfitted to perform. I think hon. gentlemen, under these circumstances, had better be careful about challenging these criticisms here, which they know have only to be presented to the free and intelligent electors of this country, in order to bring, day by day, that condemnation from the hands of the constituencies of this country which they know only too well awaits them.

After Recess.

Mr. BLAKE: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that both sides of the House will join in the regret that I venture to express at that irregularity which has characterized a debate of this character on a motion such as that which is now before you. The motion which is before you is one for papers connected with the dismissal of three persons who held small appointments, I need not say not of a character involving all their time, inasmuch as all the emoluments connected with them were $60 dollars a year, and, upon that motion, the hon. member for Cumberland thought fit to take occasion to refer to a motion which had been carried immediately before and to discuss in very strong terms the representations which had been made by my hon. friend from Victoria upon the occasion of the preceding motion. To that irregular course it is due that the debate was subsequently adjourned, and that we have spent the better part of this day in the discussion of a matter which is not properly before the House. I venture to hope, Sir, that the great extent of inconvenience to which this irregularity has upon this occasion given rise will induce the House to sustain you for the future in confining hon. members to that which is more properly before the House upon the occasion of their speaking. I have also to express my regret at the tone in which hon. gentlemen opposite have thought fit to conduct this debate. I think it is unfortunate that it should have been conducted with such violence of language and such acrimony of temper. I had hoped, and I still hope, that the general current of our debates will be distinguished by opposite characteristics, and that we shall be able in the midst of all our political contentions, even when they come to that most disagreeable point of any hon. member's public duty involving censure upon another public man, to conduct them in a different spirit and in other tones than has characterized this attack upon the Government which the hon. members for Kingston and for Cumberland have been engaged in to-day. Now, Sir, before we go to what is not before you properly, let me touch on what is before you properly. The motion is for papers connected with the dismissal of these three officers. My hon. friend the Minister of Customs, in whose Department these officials were, stated to the House, in answer to the averment of the hon. member for Victoria, that these persons were engaged as boatmen, that two of them were men of advanced age—and he gave their ages—that they had for two or three years not been in a boat at all, that, being engaged as boatmen, they had not been in a boat, and that under these circumstances—their years unfitting them for the duty, and the duty not having been discharged—it was reported to him, either by correspondence or by a report—he said he could not tell which, but one way or other the information reached him, by letter or report—that this was the state of things, and, for the efficiency of the service, these men were replaced by others. To the third no objection was alleged on the score of age. He happened to be a son of the hon. member for Victoria, and is, I believe, a young man; but the hon. the Minister of Customs stated of him that he was engaged in trade at the port of which he was also an officer in the Customs, in the boat service, and that it was inconsistent with his duty, as such officer at $60 a year, that he should be engaged in trade, for very obvious reasons. He made no imputation against the officer of actual misconduct, but I am sure that every fair and candid man in the House will see that it is not proper for one dealing in imported articles at a port to be a preventive officer at that port. These are the three men who have been replaced by others, my hon. friend says, on information of this character and simply and solely for the efficiency of the service. The member for Victoria charged that they were dismissed because they had voted for him. The Minister of Customs stated in the House that he did not know and had never been informed for whom these men voted, or what were their political views, and, that distinct statement being made, the hon. member for Victoria not having been able to fortify the expression of his opinion by any evidence here to-day, not having as yet done so at any rate, I apprehend that, for the time at least, and I believe for all time, the House will be disposed to accept the statement of my hon. friend the Minister of Customs. At any rate we may ask the House to accept that statement until the positive statement of a Minister of the Crown that no such motives actuated him, and that he had no material on which to act on such motives, has been disproved. But two other things are to be remembered. If I am rightly informed, the vote in Nova Scotia at that election was by ballot. If that be so, it is very clear that it was not likely the Minister, or any one else, would know for whom these three persons did vote. Still more, amongst the allegations which the hon. member for Cumberland made was this, that the hon. member for Victoria had been returned to this House as an independent supporter of the Government, and that that was his attitude while he was here; if that be true, and it was made in the hon. gentleman's presence by his friend, and, I suppose, present leader, the member for Cumberland, could there be any such motives? If a Minister of the Crown should so far degrade himself, should so far step down from the high position he occupies, should so far disgrace himself as to do what is alleged, could it be so when the hon. member came to Parliament to support the very gentlemen for voting for whom he says these men were dismissed? Under these circumstances, at this time, and in this state of the case, I think prudence, discretion and fair play would have left this matter where it was, seeing that papers had been asked for and promised, and that no evidence had been brought forward at the moment against the statements of my hon. friend the Minister of Customs, until the time when the evidence was brought forward, or the papers should give occasion for fresh criticism. But, Sir, the debate was enlarged. The tone and temper in which the hon. member for Cumberland conducted it led to a suggestion from my hon. friend the First Minister that these were not the persons to accuse. Now, Sir, I quite agree in the proposition of the hon. member for Kingston, who, this afternoon, abandoning all defence, for the moment at any rate, of the conduct and career of his Administration, agreeing that if we pleased we might consign him—I know not where, or at any rate I will not say—said that, while we might justly do so, that was no excuse for us. It is no excuse that, if one man does wrong, another man should do wrong; but men are so constituted ordinarily that the blush of shame will mantle the cheek of the accuser, who is convicted of having done ten-fold that of which he accuses his neighbour. It does not lie in the mouth of those who have committed enormous offences of the character of the trivialities they charge against others to be the accusers; and that agrees with the view, "Let him that is without sin cast the first stone." But, although I aver, and I believe the common sense of mankind will agree, that it is not notorious sinners who are to turn accusers of others, and that they had better, as I said this afternoon, if they believe and confess themselves to be publicans, and that to the name of publican which has made it reputable instead of infamous—repentance and confession; and, although the common sense of mankind will agree that such notorious publicans, not repentant or confessing, but glorying in their crimes, are not the persons to be the accusers of others, yet still we are contented to accept the accusation from the hands of any man, however much he ought to be debarred from speaking on any such subject, and to answer the accusation from whatever quarter it may come. We do not justify ourselves, acknowledging anything to be wrong, because the hon. gentleman was infinitely more wrong; and I should have thought it not worth while, under these circumstances, to discuss the hon. gentleman's defence, because I admit that, if he was wrong, that is no excuse for our being wrong, but that he stated certain general principles upon this subject in the course of his justification which I consider it is not fit should remain without discussion, and such an answer as I believe should be given to them. Sir, you will remember the condition in which the political situation of this country was in the month of October, 1873. You will remember that the excitement which had ensued ever since charges were made against hon. gentlemen opposite in the spring of that year, which had been increasing owing to various circumstances during the whole of that year in the progress of the developments which took place, was, about the 20th or 22nd of October, almost culminating in the expectation of the meeting of Parliament, which was summoned for the 23rd of that month. Now, Sir, before we discuss the reasoning applicable to the conduct of the hon. gentlemen in reference to the appointments, let us see a little what the facts were. Upon the 13th many persons were appointed; upon the 18th a very large number of persons were appointed; upon the 21st many more officers were appointed. Among these were Mr. Crawford, a member of this House, to be Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario; Mr. Tilley, also a member of this House and Finance Minister, to be Lieutenant-Governor of New Brunswick; and Mr. Macdonald, also a Minister and member of this House, to be Judge of the Superior Court of Nova Scotia. It appears there also were appointed a number of persons as County Court Judges in Ontario. On the same day Mr. Kerr was removed from the Amherst collectorship and made Inspector of Customs for Nova Scotia, and with commendable promptness the hon. member for Cumberland recommended Dr. Waltham Tupper as his successor on that day. On the same day also Mr. Chalmer was appointed Shipping Master at Quebec and Mr. Higham Chief of River Police at Quebec. I state these appointments as samples; the full list is too long to weary the House with. The hon. member for Cumberland, reinforcing the argument of the hon. member for Kingston, stated that it was not a matter of privilege but a high and most solemn duty for an out-going Government to fulfil the pledges that it might have made to various persons to nominate them to office. He extolled it into a sort of sacred function to be performed at the moment of dissolution, to be performed at the time when the mind is filled with solemn thoughts, and animated by a desire to make amends for the sins of the man's political life, corresponding somewhat to the case of natural dissolution; and the high and solemn duties to be performed on the eve of political dissolution the hon. member sums up in these words, "You must take care of your friends under these circumstances." Just as, if the hon. gentleman were expecting to leave this sublunary sphere, he might feel it to be his duty to divide his property among his relatives and friends, so he says, when about to depart in a political sense, he felt it to be his duty to consider those relatives, friends and supporters, and dispense among them that portion of the good things of which he was—not the owner, but the trustee for the public. That is the hon. gentleman's exalted notion of the functions of a retiring Ministry. Let us, then, apply these facts to what took place on the 21st and 22nd October. The late Government had not many votes to spare at that time, and they knew it. When about to meet Parliament they were quite aware that for some time previous they had been in a very critical position. On the day before the meeting of Parliament—I understand it met on the 23rd—they, it seems, determined to deprive themselves of three of their supporters in this House, including two Ministers, one of whom was the Minister of Finance, perhaps the most important officer in the Government next to its leader. The Government is determined in the discharge of this sacred duty to deprive themselves, I say, of the votes and of the assistance by speech upon the floor of this House of these three gentlemen. They determined to meet in the House a mutilated Administration, with two of its members lopped off and an important independent member out of his seat. They were so determined to do this, that they made the nomination of the chief among these three—Mr. Tilley—during his absence, before he had reached this place, while he was yet at sea, without communicating with him, and without knowing whether he would or would not accept the high office to which, by Order in Council, approved by His Excellency, he was formally appointed on the 22nd October, with the other gentlemen to whom I have referred. Now, that is their statement. They must pardon me if I am somewhat incredulous as to the accuracy of their recollection at this distant date. The fact is clear that they did determine to make these appointments, because we have an Order in Council showing they were made on that day, but my conviction has been that they were made on that day because at that time they had determined not to meet Parliament. That is my belief—that is my conviction. I cannot think that at that time and under those circumstances, they deliberately determined to pass an Order in Council appointing two leading members of the Administration to offices which rendered their seats vacant, and also an important member of the House to an office which rendered his seat vacant, intending to meet Parliament and carry themselves through and sustain themselves. They then, I believe, intended to leave office, and it was in the agonies of that dissolution, afterwards protracted for a few unhappy days and finally consummated on the 5th November, in my opinion, these appointments were made, Strong though the evidence may be which the hon. member for Cumberland has given us of their carelessness with regard to political principle and their determination to make whatever use of the power with which they were entrusted, provided they could save themselves, I can hardly conceive that at the time they nominated these gentlemen, they determined this—which is the other alternative—to appoint these gentlemen, to meet Parliament with two vacancies in the Administration, and one in the House, to place these gentlemen so appointed before the public as members of Parliament still, two as Ministers and one as an independent member; to utilize them, and afterwards, when the struggle should have ceased, to announce the appointments. It is true that afterwards, having changed what in my opinion was their intention at the time the appointments were made, they were driven to that course. The Government could not spare the men. If they could have spared them, no doubt the Gazette would have shown the appointments; no doubt the vacancies in the House would have been announced, and the Ministerial changes which succeed vacancies taken place; but having altered their determination, and having in the meantime made the appointments, the Government concealed those appointments, presented to the House and the country those three gentlemen having a right to sit here as Ministers and members, and used them up to the close of the struggle, until ultimately obliged to resign; then it turned out that, during the whole of the struggle, we had phantom Ministers of Finance and Inland Revenue, and a phantom member for West Toronto, and those gentlemen were not Ministers and members, but Governors and Judges forsooth. It was then and under these circumstances that these appointments were made; and I want to know how the hon. member for Cumberland can reconcile with the high views which he now enunciates with respect to the independence of Parliament the fact that these gentlemen should have been sitting here during that struggle. The hon. gentleman has discussed the question of the position which Mr. Ross would have occupied in the House had he succeeded in the contest in Victoria. He has pointed out that it would have been a most flagrant violation of the independence of Parliament if Mr. Ross had sat here. He has said that, although Mr. Ross was relieved of his contract, he would still have been interested in some way in it, and the spirit, if not the letter, of the law as to the independence of Parliament would have been infringed. If so, what was the position of Mr. Tilley, Mr. Macdonald and Mr. Crawford? The hon. gentleman says Mr. Tilley did not know anything about his appointment until his arrival here. Perhaps Mr. Tilley and Mr. Macdonald, sitting at the Executive Council Board, did not know what Orders in Council passed; had not the least idea they were Governor and Judge respectively; had not the least idea of the animated and exciting struggle in which they were engaged, and, as the hon. gentleman the Lieutenant-Governor of New Brunswick said, I recollect very well, in his speech after the opening of the House, on the question which caused the fall of the Administration, he had determined to stick to the ship. So he did for forty-eight hours longer, until the ship had got hard and fast aground, when he found he had a life belt around him, with which he got safe to shore. A part of the code of so-called honour in the days of the code duello forbade either of the contestants wearing a coat of chain-mail or a band of silk which might prevent the stab being fatal to him. That was not the situation in which those three gentlemen were placed. They were not to suffer, whoever lost; they were here to fight, but not to lose—they were here to win. Were these the only terms on which their services could be retained? Or what was the reason which kept them here to fight that battle when they had no longer any right to sit in this House? The hon. member for Kingston justifies these and other appointments which were made at a much later date, and to a much larger extent by reasoning and by reasons. He says that an Administration in England has filled offices after they had resigned but before their successors were appointed, and he points to the case of the appointment of the late Lord Mayo. I do not remember whether anything was said in Parliament regarding it, but I do recollect that it was made the occasion of very considerable, extended and unfavourable criticism throughout the country in which it was made. But the right hon. gentleman's argument was that a retiring Government was bound and entitled to fill such offices as the exigencies of the public service require. In that argument I agree; we differ upon the question of exigency. Ministers are entrusted with the responsible office of advising the Crown as to who shall be appointed to situations in the public service. Their advice is, under our system, necessarily to be accepted; the Crown itself has no responsibility in this or in such like matters. The advice of the Ministers is accepted because they are responsible; it is the advice of responsible Ministers that is taken. The security of the country is that responsibility. Those hon. members who come from Ontario will recollect that a great part of the battle of responsible Government was fought out on this very point of the right of Ministers to nominate to office, and that this caused the discussion during which the leader of the Liberal Administration resigned and brought to the test the question whether the country should have some one who should be responsible to it for the administration of the patronage. Why should this not be? What executive act can be more important, what consequences more lasting, for good or ill, than these appointments to high offices. The tenure of political life is short and uncertain. The people can place and displace the politician at comparatively short notice. The good he accomplishes does not always save him from displacement; the evil he inflicts does not always secure speedy displacement. His position is entirely different from that of a person in a permanent office in the public service. And, therefore, while this is a high and an important function—a function the consequences of the exercise of which are very lasting for good or evil—it is necessary that it should be exercised with regard to that one condition which alone makes its exercise tolerable, viz., that it is exercised by Ministers responsible and feeling their responsibility to the country. What in these days and in this country is the measure of this responsibility? Simply this, that if Ministers fail to discharge their duties according to the view of the country, they are displaced from office and driven from power. The security consists in the power to drive the Minister from office, which is the extreme punishment that can now be inflicted for the abuse of the power of office. To what extent, Mr. Speaker, does that responsibility and that security exist in the face of an Administration then in the throes of dissolution, and on the point of resigning, and being punished for their crimes, or for other reasons? An Administration so situated should only make appointments until their successors are elected; and this, under such circumstances, is the only security that the people possess, and the only security which exists. Under that general principle, Sir, it falls, and no Ministry which has resigned should make a single appointment to office. I lay that down as a sound constitutional rule. A Government at such a stage of its existence should only carry on such things as are absolutely necessary to be done, and, as to such matters alone, they may give advice, pending the appointment of their successors. That, in my opinion, is the true and constitutional rule. The hon. gentleman adverts, it is true, to precedents, and says that in England Ministers, after having resigned, make peers. This is quite true, and the hon. gentlemen have that precedent, and, when they were in the throes of dissolution, they too, Sir, accepted the resignation of one of our peers, and appointed a son, son-in-law, or some one, as a successor. In this they followed precedent, and Mr. Trudel sits now in the Upper House by virtue of that precedent to which the hon. gentleman has alluded. We should view precedents by the light of reason, and not by the light of expediency, and if they happen to be mischievous, let us not be bound by them. I suppose the hon. gentleman will not deny that there is some progress in the world, and some progress with reference to political doctrines and views; and I suppose he will not deny that transactions, which were esteemed honourable and indeed laudable in former days, under a different system, become dishonourable and blameworthy. I suppose he would not advance his private views, whatever they may be on the subject,—I would not presume to intrude upon them—but I do not think that he would to-day propose a recurrence to the “rotten borough” system. I do not suppose that he would think it right—openly and avowedly at any rate—to buy a seat in Parliament any more, and yet we know that seats in Parliament were once bought by honourable and honest men; and that in England some time ago—and not so very long ago—men who to-day are esteemed as venerable and worthy, complied with the customs of that time, and acted according to the light of that time, and purchased seats in Parliament, using the only means by which a Ministry could then govern the nation. They have, however, advanced in England a good deal, and those doctrines which prevailed in the time of Walpole, and in later times, no longer prevail. I would not say anything on this occasion, if I can avoid it, which should in the slightest degree injure the feelings of any hon. gentlemen, and I will not enter further on topics that may occur to the mind of any man touching this subject; but I do say, however, that upon the grounds I have stated, we are not at this time of day to be driven from the field of reason, right and common sense, by reference to precedents. The hon. gentleman has referred to the fact that

Earl Grey, a highly honourable nobleman, whose life was one long exhibition of political honour and virtue, thought it right to defend the practice, not merely to give offices, but to give offices to his relatives. Well, do we not know that such was the condition of the aristocracy in England at that time, and such their hopes of public service, that there had been developed a regular system of parcelling offices among Ministers' relatives, and the dependents of Ministers; and that this practice was then considered a justifiable custom; and, indeed, during a later period, the great families parcelled out the offices and the patronage and emoluments of State to a large extent among themselves. Such was the state of things then, but such is not the state of things in England now; therefore, Sir, whether the hon. gentleman sustains himself by the suggestion that an Administration which has resigned is justified in giving offices, or whether by the old rule of giving offices to the friends and relatives of Ministers, I say that common sense rebukes it; that the conscience should rebuke it; and that the sense of the House and of the country is against any such practice. Tried by this principle, and the general proposition that retiring Administrations have forfeited the security which alone justifies the exercise of patronage, Cabinets under such circumstances ought not to bestow offices, qualified by the exception that the service of the State may require some offices to be filled, when, these being the only persons who could advise the Crown, this may be done; but I say that, tried by these principles, the list which is contained in this book is a condemnation forever of the men who caused to be filled the offices of that day and of that time. Was the Lieutenant-Governorship of New Brunswick then necessary to be filled? Was that Judgeship, which had at that time been vacant so long, necessary to be filled? Was the Lieutenant-Governorship of Ontario, of which its respected incumbent was still in possession, necessary to be filled? and was the other Junior Judgeship necessary to be filled? Why, Sir, I had to answer the hon. gentleman with reference to one of the Judges. He wanted to know why I had not filled the Senior Judgeship, and I had to tell him that the Junior Judge reported to the First Minister that he alone could discharge the whole judicial duties of the county, and that there was no necessity of having two Judges there. Let us go a little further. We have heard some talk of improper superannuations and of appointments to offices filled up at high salaries. Amongst these appointments I find the names of Russell, Higham, and Chaloner. There was an officer in Quebec who was Shipping Master and Chief of Police; and his salary was $1,200 a year. He was superannuated, in the discharge of the high and holy duty the hon. member for Cumberland talks of; and two offices were created, Chaloner being appointed Shipping Master, with a salary of $1,600 a year, and Captain Higham Chief of Police, also with a salary of $1,600 per annum, involving an expenditure of $3,200 to ensure the performance of duties which had been previously attended to by a single individual with a salary of $1,200 a year. Well, now, if I had been in the hon. gentleman's position, I should have been disposed to consider whether it was not possible for Mr. Russell to have been retained a few days longer, until somebody really responsible to the people, and who might be effectually called to account for what they did, were in a position to advise the Crown whether Mr. Russell should be superannuated and replaced by two officers, each receiving a higher salary than the single incumbent who preceded them. Well, Sir, I have heard all that the hon. gentleman referred to in the case of Mr. Tilley, and of those other gentlemen sitting in Council, and passing Orders in Council, appointing themselves to offices; and he said, using the same argumentum ad h minem his colleague and leader repudiated a moment before:—"You criticise such cases; why, you are not in a position to do so; one Minister of Justice was appointed by you to be Chief Justice of Quebec, and another Minister of Justice, after having carried through the Bill establishing the Supreme Court, was, some months subsequently, appointed one of its Judges.

Mr. BLAKE.

These are parallel cases. If there was any impropriety in these two gentlemen occupying these benches with offices in their pocket, you, at any rate, cannot say anything, because the respected names of Dorion and Fournier are placed in the same category." No, Sir; far from it. Now, Sir, it has been said once and again in this House that there was some understanding with reference to Mr. Dorion's appointment during the Session of Parliament; and it will be remembered that the hon. member for Kingston, upon one occasion, indicated something of that kind across the House to my honoured friend Mr. Dorion, than whom no man has in our day stood higher in this country, or been treated with greater reverence by either foe or friend; and he answered openly and at once that there was no truth whatever in the statement. At that time, Sir, I was occupying the position of a private member, and I did not know what passed in the Councils of the Government; but I had formed a very strong opinion that it would be a fit and proper thing that Mr. Dorion should be offered the Chief Justiceship of his own Province. I was not in political life at the time, but I knew that on a former occasion, when, after a long struggle, he and his friends had succeeded to power, he being Attorney-General, the Chief Justiceship had fallen vacant; and that he had declined on that occasion to accept that high and honourable object of a lawyer's ambition, because he thought that necessity required him to remain in public life. Knowing that my honoured and beloved friend—and I am sure I speak for every man who knew him when I use that term—knowing, I say, that in 1872 he had desired to retire from political life and had left the country stating that he would not return to Parliament, and that he had been elected by his friends in his absence against his will, I thought it was a fitting thing that Mr. Dorion should receive the honour of the Chief Justiceship of Quebec; and he was invited to crown, if he so pleased, an honourable and a laborious political career by taking the highest seat of justice in his Province. I did not talk to him about it, but, being on intimate terms with some of his friends, I spoke to them. I found that they shared these views. I was told by one of them who had mentioned the subject to Mr. Dorion that he understood no such appointment would be accepted by him. My own impression was, when I left Ottawa at the close of the Session, that, in case that offer was made—although it was never understood that it was to be made, or was agreed to be made,—he would decline it. These were the circumstances which my personal knowledge enables me to mention with reference to our friend who now fills that honourable position. It was perfectly right and proper that Mr. Dorion should receive that offer at a convenient and fitting season, as my hon. friend subsequent to the Session made it to him. And it was equally fitting that he should, as he did, on the representation of his friends, greatly regretted as was his retirement, accept the position. What is there in that transaction, in that honourable close of an honourable career, to compare with the transactions which we have been discussing this evening? As to my hon. friend the Minister of Justice who preceded me, I know I am enabled to speak with positiveness that there was no talk of his being appointed a Judge of the Supreme Court until very long after the close of the Session; and there is no pretence for insinuation that there was a design that he should fill the office. It was also fitting that he, a leading lawyer of Lower Canada, should have an opportunity at a convenient season of doing service to his country in the exalted position in which he is now placed. That is not a case to be mentioned in the same breath, on the same occasion, in the same discussion as that to which we have been referring. The hon. member for Cumberland mentioned by way of re-primination some other nominations of the Government, or rather some other superannuations. He referred to the case of the Warden of Halifax. That appointment is one for which the hon. gentleman, I suppose, is largely responsible. The law upon the subject of superannuations entitles the Government, without further cause, to place any person on the list who has attained the age of 60, or who has become incapacitated by bodily infirmities from performing his duty. It was also indicated that the Governor in Council might deal with a servant by way of superannuation after ten years' service. But the attainment of the age of 60 or incapacity after a certain service entitled to superannuation. And why? Because, although the officer may not be absolutely incapacitated at 60 years, that was presumably the age at which incapacity might be expected.

Mr. TUPPER: A minimum?

Mr. BLAKE: No, because with bodily infirmity you could do so earlier; but it is discretionary at 60. The Order in Council, which hon. gentlemen passed not very long before the appointment of Mr. Dunkin, provided certain regulations. It provided, in substance, that an officer who had attained the age of 65 could only be retained in the service upon a special report of the head of the Department. There was a presumed incapacity at the age of 65, requiring an affirmative report of the head of the Department. And this order was of course repeated every year after the age of 65. Such was the state of the law in reference to superannuation of civil servants at the period of Mr. Dunkin's appointment. Parliament decided, at the instance of hon. gentlemen opposite, that it is quite likely at the age of 65 that a man is not able to perform his duty. Nevertheless these same gentlemen appointed Mr. Dunkin to office at the mature age of 67—seven years beyond the time at which, if he had been in the public service, he might have been superannuated without further proof, and two years after the time when it would require a special report from the head of the Department for him to remain in his position. The office was that of Warden of the Penitentiary, an office which I venture to say, with some knowledge of the requisites, demands very great physical as well as mental vigour. This is a position which ought to be filled by a man of great strength and commanding will. It is only a few months ago that the Warden of one of our Penitentiaries was attacked and might have been dangerously wounded; but, having those special physical qualifications, he was able himself to suppress what might otherwise have attained to a general riot, occurring as it did among 400 or 500 convicts. I do not speak of what Mr. Dunkin's physical or mental abilities were. I know nothing of him; but I do say that, if the House will consider for an instant what the requisites of a Warden of a Penitentiary are, it will agree with me that he is a man that should be appointed at the prime of life, and such an officer should then be of vigorous constitution. True, Mr. Dunkin may have been of such exceptional character that at the age of 67 it was to be expected that he would retain for a reasonable number of years the qualities which a man is likely to lose at 60. But I shall not believe it until I have 'a well-authenticated surgical report of the fact. This is the gentleman who was superannuated at "three score-and-ten." My predecessor in office, if I am correctly informed, made a recommendation on which the superannuation was based. Although I have not seen the paper, I am told he referred to the supposition that there must have been some peculiar qualifications which led to the late Administration appointing a man 67 years of age to this particular office. I suppose that was the charitable presumption under the circumstances. Perhaps the right hon. member for Kingston will, however, seeing the corner in which he is placed, vindicate this appointment, and perhaps the late Minister of Justice will be disposed to say that this man of 67 had some peculiar qualifications which made this a proper appointment which otherwise would have been nothing less than scandalous. Of the other cases to which the hon. gentleman alluded I know nothing whatever, and, therefore, I will say nothing. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries informs me that this Order in Council of the 23rd October, 1873, to which I have alluded, included appointments under the Wreck and Salvage Act, which came into operation on the 1st January, 1874. And my hon. friend tells me that one of them, James Kerr, is the same James Kerr who was appointed Inspector. This is a sample of the cases in which the hon. member for Cumberland says the exigencies of the public service, in the high and holy duty to which the hon. member devoted himself, absolutely required that the expiring Ministers should nominate under an Act not in force. These appointments were cancelled, and I do not believe, if the hon. gentleman was to move a resolution that they were justifiable, that he would find even the men behind him following him.

Mr. MITCHELL: Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask what were the salaries attached to the appointments?

Mr. BLAKE: I know not; I believe they were paid by fees.

Mr. TUPPER: Hear, hear.

Mr. BLAKE: That is the point. It is then adjudged lawful to appoint an officer, if he was paid by fees and not by salary. I quite admit, Sir, that the officers could not draw for fees or salary until the 1st January, 1874, because the Act was not in force until then. I am obliged to admit they never received any remuneration, because they were turned out before the office could be legally filled.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: They were wrecked upon this occasion.

Mr. BLAKE: You see what errors a man falls into who becomes a zealot and a bigot in the discharge of a high and holy duty. It is true they were wrecked; they did not escape, while the great fish I have referred to were able to get safely to land. The hon. member for Cumberland gave us an interesting and edifying account of his career as a Nova Scotian. I have addressed the hon. the Minister of Militia as a Nova Scotian also. I should have thought, Sir, the hon. member for Cumberland might have found enough, as a history, in the period since we have been more acquainted with him as a public man, after Confederation, without dragging us back to Nova Scotia, with which we have no more to do than with Ontario or Quebec before 1867. We are not discussing the legislation which Doctor Tupper—as the hon. gentleman was known before 1867—accomplished before Confederation. I am sure, from the tone and manner in which the hon. gentleman spoke, that he might have said much more in favour of himself. However, there was one public Act, very closely connected with Confederation, to which he did allude, and upon which he challenged my applause; and it is the only point to which I shall refer. I do not care who supported it, who voted for it, who is responsible for it. I never will admit any responsibility, for I never will defend the course pursued in making a change in the Constitution equivalent to a revolution, without the people having an opportunity of expressing their opinion upon it. There was a great concurrence of sentiment in favour of the Union. In the Province of Ontario the people were—I will not say unanimously, although appearances led almost in that direction—but preponderatingly in favour of the Union. But this was not the case elsewhere; and the existence of a preponderating majority in one or two Provinces, Ontario and Quebec, did not, in my opinion, render it right that that great change amounting to a revolution should have been adopted by Parliament without the people being called to signify their opinion upon it. Mischief did not ensue in Ontario, because the people in favour of it predominated. But mischief did ensue in Nova Scotia, and the mischief was not confined to Nova Scotia—mischief from which the Dominion has suffered, from which Nova Scotia has suffered, from which the prospects and hopes of Union have suffered, which has led to difficulties inevitable and inexorable. I believe, although the hon. gentleman was sustained by a majority in the House, that he did not go to the country because he apprehended, at any rate, that he would not be sustained by such a majority. I think all the circumstances, as far as I have been able to gather them in reference to Nova Scotia, were sufficient to indicate that the majority of the hon. gentleman did not reflect the public voice upon that particular question. And it would have been infinitely better for Nova Scotia, it would have been infinitely better for Canada, it would have been infinitely better, for the cause of Constitutional Government and liberty throughout the entire world, so far as our humble example can influence the world, if that unfortunate precedent had not been set. I am assuming the worst. Defeated for a time, the measure would have passed in time. Does the hon. member for Cumberland say we ought to have taken Nova Scotia into the Union against her will? Yes, for he did it. But I blame him for it. It would have been infinitely better to have delayed the matter for a year or two. Look at what happened in your own Province, Mr. Speaker. There was a majority at first against Union, but that majority was finally decreased into a minority. A great constitutional change like this ought to proceed slowly; it ought to ripen by degrees; it ought to be accompanied and preceded by an ample discussion before the people as well as in the halls of legislation. These are my views upon that subject. I do not care whom they may compromise. I say it is no laurel upon the hon. gentleman's brow, no feather in his cap that he made use of his majority to drag Nova Scotia against her will into the Union, thus making heart-burnings from which we have not yet recovered. Now, Sir, I do not follow, as I have said, the hon. gentleman upon this subject. I do not enter into his Nova Scotia politics; I do not enter into that which I take was a laboured eulogy upon his acts in his former capacity. But I pass to the irregular part of this debate. I pass to the subject of the other motion which had been carried, and upon which the hon. gentleman's comments were made, and which has produced this discussion. The hon. gentleman was not satisfied with reminding the House of what hon. members had said in the House; he entered into what gentlemen said outside the House.

Mr. TUPPER: In the presence of the contractor.

Mr. BLAKE: The hon. gentleman preferred to read a report as evidence of the views of the hon. member for Victoria, although that hon. gentleman is very well able and not at all reluctant to give us his views himself. It appears from the paper which has been put into my hands that some part of it referred to his sentiments towards the Government. I do not say all, but I do not recollect exactly what precise point the hon. gentleman read from the speech. I will not read all the letter, because it contains passages which it would be well not to apply in this House to an hon. member, especially when at the time they came from an angry man. There was a reference in the article in the Herald to the part of this speech of Mr. Campbell's, containing what the editor says was a serious charge against Mr. Ross, and which charge was repeated in the Herald. The letter in reply to these charges is signed by Mr. John Ross, the late candidate for Victoria. Mr. Ross says:

"I therefore state in terms as 'emphatic' as Mr. Campbell used that I have not entered into any arrangement, verbal or written, with Mr. Vail or any other member of the Government, for extras amounting to $50,000 or even $5. That no demand of this kind up to date was ever made by me, and no proposal of any sum of money was ever made by the Dominion Government or any other person in their behalf. I never wrote a letter or spoke to any official that would show any intention or application of this kind.

"It is due to Mr. Vail and to all the members of the Dominion Government that I should say that no pledge or even political support was asked, and none verbal or written was ever given by me. I resigned my interest in the Ingonish contract in a legal manner in order to become a candidate at last election, but my former partner and bondsmen are as much bound to finish that contract as the day it commenced.

"Unfortunately for them and for me, that contract is not finished, and from my experience in public contracts in Australia, extras would not be even asked till original contract was finished. The experience of other contractors from Nova Scotia, as often detailed in the Herald, would not make me expect anything from the Dominion Government except what I would be entitled to under the contract. Those who know me are already satisfied that this is all I expect to recover. No money, except what I was honourably entitled to, was ever received by me, and so far, not one cent received or promised except what is certified by the engineer for work done.

"A large portion of the contract was carried away last fall, which was this year rebuilt and completed to the satisfaction of the engineer in charge; and I did ask that the woodwork, being so finished, should be taken off my hands, but this was refused till the whole contract would be finished. Such are the favours that I have received from the Dominion Government. Mr. Campbell and every man who chooses to do so may examine the public records and they will find no claims of this kind or any demands for extras made by me.

"I always understood that even extras had to be voted by Parliament before they could be promised or paid. I therefore state in the strongest and most 'emphatic' language that I can use, that the serious charge is—"

I will not read what follows. Now, the hon. member for Cumberland seems to impute to my hon. friend the Minister of Militia some wrong-doing in this matter—something which he ought to have done which he did not do, and something which he did do which he ought not to have done. My hon. friend the Premier stated plainly what the facts were: That Mr. Ross wrote to him a letter requesting to be relieved of his contract; that he was told that a report from the Engineer would relieve him provided that his sureties agreed, but that he could not be relieved if they did not agree; and that there was no other negotiation of any kind whatever between my hon. friend and Mr. Ross, or anyone on his behalf, until a considerable time later, when Mr. Ross stated that he had changed his mind and that he withdrew his application to be relieved of his contract. Now, Sir, upon that statement I want to know what there is which my hon. friend has done that he should not have done, what he has omitted which he ought to have done? Is it to be said that he was wrong in referring Mr. Ross's application to be relieved of the contract to the Engineer, and in obtaining the Engineer's report indicating that his relief would be proper if his sureties would assent, and then informing the contractor that he could be relieved upon obtaining the assent of the sureties, but not otherwise? Was that wrong? Is wrong to be imputed to us on that account? I say, no. I wait for the accusation. I cannot understand that there was anything wrong in making that statement. Mr. Ross, by this very letter I have read, assumed he had resigned the contract. He appears to have supposed he had got rid of it; but he never complied with the terms, and he never was in fact released. I say that, in point of law, upon the statement of the Minister of Public Works,—which I suppose my hon friend opposite me will not deny—he never was released of his contract. Even if he remained a contractor, is my hon. friend responsible for that? Could he force him? If my hon. friend had been very anxious that Mr. Ross should be fit to present himself before the electors, he would have written him and said “Remember you are going to stand by our interests. Mark you, you will have to go further; you will have to give up your contract.” But he did nothing of the kind. My hon. friend did nothing publicly or privately in the matter. Mr. Ross asked to be relieved of the contract, and he was told the terms on which he could be released. No fair, honest, straightforward man could find anything fairer than that transaction, which the hon. gentleman opposite confessed he was unable to understand. The hon. gentleman presents to this House a theory of this kind. First of all, that Mr. Ross was a bitter opponent of the Government. Then he says my hon. friend the Minister of Militia went to him and bargained that he should be relieved of an onerous and difficult contract—released of something that was unfortunately hanging over him, if he would come out for Victoria as a supporter of the Government—that my hon. friend made this bargain with him that it was arranged he should come out; and then, after he was defeated, the hon. gentleman says he came back and got the contract again. Three weeks ago, he was to be bribed to the support of the Government by being deprived of an onerous contract. The hon. member, forgetting his argument of five minutes before, says he was bribed again by being returned to the advantageous position which he held first. I suppose it is entirely unnecessary to do more than state an argument which furnishes its own answer. There was one reference which the hon. gentleman has made to an entry in the Public Accounts on which I desire to say a single word of explanation. He indicated that a gross and flagrant abuse was established by an item in the accounts for the last financial year, by which it would appear, as I acknowledge it does appear in the form of the accounts, that a sum of $109,000 was paid to Mr. Foster on the Georgian Bay Branch. The hon. gentleman might have asked some explanation on this subject before making the charges, and using the very strong language which he did in reference to it, and, having asked for that explanation, the answer which would have been given to him would be this: There were, as the House will recollect, two different transactions which sometimes have been, and have in this instance in the Public Accounts, mixed together in the discussion—the Georgian Bay Branch and the Canada Central Extension. For the latter an Order in Council was ratified by a vote of this House authorising a subsidy of $12,000 per mile upon certain conditions as to the payment of the moneys, which were that 75 per cent. of the value of rails deposited would be paid to the contractor for that Extension, the rails becoming the property of the Government on the completion of the enterprise or adjustment of the account. Of this amount of $109,000, $68,000 is an advance in the direct terms of this ratified order of 75 per cent. of the rails deposited on account of the Canada Central Extension and which are now the property of the Government, and $41,000 only is applicable to the work done on the Georgian Bay Branch. The House will perhaps recollect that, in the report presented to Parliament last year, it was stated that the claim of Mr. Foster in relation to this work was $38,000 at that time. His engineer had not then come in and all the accounts had not been presented. They were subsequently presented and examined carefully by the hon. the First Minister and the Chief Engineer, and the report was received to the effect that $41,000, being a difference of about $2,200, was justly due, and that was the total amount paid to Mr. Foster in respect to the Georgian Bay Branch, the sum representing all work done, explorations made, &c. In annulling the contract under the circumstances stated in the Order of Council—I am not called upon to defend that; it was brought before Parliament last Session and the hon. gentlemen did not object thereto—in annulling the contract, I think it was not at all unfair or unreasonable that the contractor should receive the value of those works and explorations to the extent that the Chief Engineer reported would be serviceable to the Government. If I was disposed to indulge in any contrasts, I might remind the hon. gentleman that there was another contractor for another work; I might remind him that there was a Canadian Pacific Railway Company once—that there was a Company which contracted for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which deposited $1,000,000 with the Government as security for the performance of the work; and that Company indicated to the Government its inability to fulfil its engagements, and asked the annulment of the contract and return of the deposit and obtained them both. I do not think that the hon. gentleman, who thought that a proper transaction in reference to the public interests, can much complain of the payment of the $41,000. This concludes the observations I have to make on this occasion. If I had been disposed to adopt the tone of the hon. gentleman, many warm and bitter things might have been said, but I have endeavoured, as far as I could, to refrain from giving an acrimonious character to the discussion; I have endeavoured to state fairly what I conceive to be the facts with reference to the transactions brought before the House. It is necessary, if there be an attack, that there should be a response; it is necessary if principles we deem sound are condemned, that there should be a defence; it is necessary that we should not permit positions to be taken by public men on one side of the House without allowing the privilege of reply on the other; and, in sitting here in the position of Ministers charged with the public affairs of this country, in the position of Ministers having that executive control which the constitution has reposed in them, we should have consideration commensurate with the responsibilities which I have endeavoured this night to elucidate.

Mr. MITCHELL said he had not intended to take part in this debate, because he quite agreed with the views of some hon. members, that a large proportion of what had taken place was irregular. Still, as reference had been made to the administration of the Department over which he had charge before the present Government came into office, he thought he should be allowed to give such explanation as the circumstances would warrant. Insinuations had been made across the floor of the House that certain appointments of the late Administration had the appearance—he would not say of a job—but, at all events, were not warranted by the necessities of the public service. For instance, it had been charged that keepers were appointed to lighthouses, just before the Government went out of office, which were not in operation until the following spring. He had endeavoured to obtain the particulars of this charge from the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, but that hon. gentleman stated it was impossible to furnish the information to-night, and that he would try and do so to-morrow. To-morrow might be too late to answer the charge in the same manner in which it was made, and it would go to the country that it had been allowed to remain unanswered. He could only say—and he thought the records of the Department would bear him out—that he had no recollection of any appointments being made that were not absolutely necessary for the public service.

Mr. BLAKE.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said that, since the hon. gentleman had spoken to him, he had tried to get the information. He could state now that a keeper was appointed for Covey Lighthouse, Cape Breton, in 1873, and the light was not put in operation until November, 1874.

Mr. MITCHELL said he heard that information for the first time now, and he was not prepared to say when the light went into operation. He was not aware of the circumstances under which the appointment was made, but if the facts were as stated by his hon. successor, he had no doubt there was some good reason why the man was placed in charge before the light was in operation. He could quite understand that it was necessary to appoint persons sometimes to attend to and protect the public property while lighthouses were in process of construction. He asked whether, at the date of the appointment, the man's salary was paid.

Mr. SMITH: No, Sir; the appointment was cancelled.

Mr. MITCHELL said probably when the appointment was made it was thought that the light would go into operation at once; at any rate, it was necessary to have some one to supervise the work, and he had no doubt, although he could not remember the facts, that that was the reason of the appointment. The hon. the Minister of Justice had referred to the appointment of four persons as receivers of wrecks. He presumed that reference was made to all those appointments to create an impression that every place it was possible for the late Government to fill was filled before they gave up office in 1873. Hastily running over the legislation of that year, he found four Acts on the Statute Book,—one respecting wrecks and salvage, another respecting the Trinity House at Quebec, a third with reference to pilotage, and the other relating to the classification of vessels—all of which came into operation on the 1st of January, 1874. Now, he thought the insinuation of the hon. the Minister of Justice was uncalled for when he stated, in speaking of the appointments, that they simply wished to give remunerative offices to the friends of the Government. If that were their motive, why should they appoint men as receivers of wrecks, to which office no salary was attached, when they might have made numerous and valuable appointments under the Pilotage Act?

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland): The pilotage authorities get no pay.

Mr. MITCHELL: They do get pay. The secretaries of the Pilotage Commissions are paid. My hon. friend is not as well posted as he might be on this question. The Secretary of the St. John Commission receives $800 per annum, and the Secretary of the Halifax Commission the same.

Mr. SMITH: They did at that time, but not now.

Mr. MITCHELL: I will show my hon. friend. At page 206, sec. 11 of the Pilotage Act, he will find that a fit and proper person is to be appointed Secretary of the Commission at St. John, who shall receive $800 per annum. The same provision is made in sec. 16 for the Secretary at Halifax. The officers under the Pilotage Act are paid, and if we desired to override the law in providing offices for our friends, we could have made many valuable appointments. But that was not the object.

Mr. MACKENZIE: My hon. friend cannot remember everything.

Mr. MITCHELL: But I remember too much for the hon. gentleman. The Act for the Classification of Vessels, which involved valuable appointments, came into operation in 1874. Those Acts were deferred, because it was necessary that rules and regulations for the whole scheme of reform embodied therein should be provided. The remuneration of the receivers of wrecks, to which the hon. Minister of Justice had referred with apparent exultation, was by fees, which were only payable under an Order in Council fixing their salaries and compensation.

Mr. BLAKE: The hon. gentleman had not time to arrange the matter.

Mr. MITCHELL said there was plenty of time, but there was no desire to do that. It would be well for the hon. the Minister of Justice if, instead of imputing bad motives to his opponents, he would exercise a little Christian charity. The hon. gentleman should bear in mind that members on their side of the House had some of the public spirit and patriotism which distinguished the occupants of the Government benches.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland): The fees the hon. gentleman referred to were prescribed by law, and not by Order in Council.

Mr. MITCHELL: There, again, my hon. friend is wrong. He will find the following section on page 246 of the Statutes of 1873:—

“There shall be paid to every Receiver the expenses properly incurred by him in the performance of his duties, and also in respect of the several matters specified in the first schedule to this Act, such fees chargeable as herein mentioned, as may from time to time be directed by the Governor in Council."

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland): Will the hon. gentleman now refer to page 250?

Mr. MITCHELL: It is unnecessary to refer to page 250. That is sufficient when it says that no fees shall be collected until after an Order in Council has been passed.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland): My hon. friend will find a memorandum of the charges on the page I suggested.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes; but they were only to come into operation when the Order in Council authorizing them was passed.

Mr. BLAKE: There was no such hurry about naming the fees, because the Act did not come into operation until the 1st January, and no fees came into operation until then. But it was urgent to appoint men to receive the fees afterwards provided for.

Mr. MITCHELL: I can answer my hon. friend there too. A sufficient reply is that it was by an oversight in the passage of the Act that it did not come into operation until 1874. It was found that property was cast on the shores of Nova Scotia and there was no means of protecting except by that Act, which could not be put into operation. What did we do then? We appointed officers for the performance of that duty, who had been connected with the Department for years. But we had no desire to take money out of the public Treasury to pay them for the service. If, instead of casting his insinuations on this side of the House, my hon. friend had asked for an explanation, perhaps the information given in response would have been more satisfactory to him than it is at this moment. Mr. Mitchell then proceeded to give the history of the circumstances connected with the appointment of Messrs. Chaloner and Higham at Quebec. When he assumed the duties of Minister of Marine and Fisheries he found that Quebec was governed by several different heads. There were the Trinity House, the Pilotage Commissioners, the Harbour Trust, the River Police, and the Shipping Master.

Mr. MITCHELL.

His desire was to unite as many of those offices as possible under one head, without interfering with the efficiency of the Department. After several experiments he found that it was desirable to place Major Chaloner in charge of the River Police, and to give Captain Higham control of the shipping branch, and that arrangement had worked satisfactorily and for the good of the service. But reference had been made to the increased cost to the Department by these and incidental changes. Now, one or two of the principal officers were old men, and it was found advisable to employ young men when the service was reconstructed, and they could not be obtained at the rates which were considered fair 20 years ago. That was the reason for any increase that had been made, and he thought it was a perfectly reasonable ground to work upon. Was he to be taxed now to supply from memory the details of his Department? His hon. friend, with the able assistants that he had around him, might be able to trip him up on some little matter of detail; but he could state to the House that the explanation he had made was substantially true and correct. If the hon. the Minister of Justice had been as familiar with the circumstances as he (Mr. Mitchell) was, he would not have made the charge that he did. He appealed to the House whether the defence he had made was not satisfactory. He was not going to enter into a defence of the actions of the past Government. What he might say was, notwithstanding the insinuations and the charges made, that it was just as good a Government as, and indeed a great deal better and a more faithful Government than, that which existed at the present day, although no doubt it had its faults and had committed errors.

Mr. JONES (Halifax): Hear, hear

Mr. MITCHELL said he did not suppose that even the member for Halifax pretended to be perfect. Whatever were the faults of the late Government, to it was due the union of these Provinces in a Dominion, wielding power from the Atlantic to the Pacific. If the present Government found the country prosperous, it was through no action of theirs, and, if it was not now prosperous, it was owing very much to their mismanagement. Referring to Mr. Tilley, he said he did not think it was manly to be constantly attacking the reputation and the acts of a public man who was not here to defend himself.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he rose in respect to one transaction especially affecting his department, which the hon. member for Cumberland had referred to, viz., the superannuation of Mr. Ratchford, at one time Assistant Receiver-General at Halifax. When he (Mr. Cartwright) came into office he found, as the public accounts of 1873-4 would show, that there were two gentlemen drawing salaries to the extent of $1,800 each at Halifax, Mr. Ratchford and J. R. Wallace, who was entitled "Manager of the Savings Bank," both of whom were doing what could be performed alone by Mr. Ratchford. In accordance with the provisions of the Superannuation Act, Mr. Ratchford was superannuated, a course which promoted the efficiency of the public service, besides being more economical. He was put on the list at $782 a year, and $1,000 per annum was thereby saved to the country. If the Government were blameable at all, it was in that, owing perhaps to undue tenderness on their part, they had superannuated him. It was represented, if not by the hon. member of Cumberland at least by his friends, that he was an aged and poor man, and that the salary was an important matter to him, and so the Government appointed him to a small office in the county in which he resided at a salary of $250 a year.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton) said the hon. gentleman opposite had complained of a man who had been appointed to a lighthouse six months before the light was put in; but, immediately after the present Government came into power, they appointed a successor. He would ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries if he would give the House to understand that he had not appointed any officers to lighthouses before they were completed.

He knew one case in his county where such an appointment had been made.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland): The first appointment referred to was made in October and was cancelled in November. I cannot recollect when the second appointment mentioned was made, but I will ascertain. But this I will undertake to say,—that the pay dated from the time the man took possession of the lighthouse.

Mr. McDONALD asked why had he discharged men because they were old and appointed men in other positions in the country who were equally old—one man, 84 years old, being appointed Harbour Master in Annapolis; another at Bear River, 73 years. An old man, in his own county, was appointed Inspector of Fish and Fish oils. In reference to the contractor and the election at Victoria, it was necessary that he should state the public feeling in that part of the country at the time. Immediately on the appointment of the County Court Judges in the Province, a newspaper which had hitherto supported the Government, and which was edited practically by an hon. gentleman who was a supporter of the Government, and who had now a seat in this House, stated in reply to the Halifax Chronicle :

“The good people of the Upper Province, who take any interest in Nova Scotia politics, are not probably quite so easily gulled as our contemporary imagines, and will no doubt fully understand that the elections in Victoria and Lunenburg will afford no criterion of the reaction which is actually taking place in this Province. ‘The good people,’ &c., know very well, if they have watched the course of events, that the ‘reaction’ in Nova Scotia has delayed for many months the appointment of the District Judges, and that the Government have been at their wits ends in their efforts to meet the claims of their supporters, and at the same time avoid opening up the disaffected counties; and after months of anxiety and doubt have had at last to go back on some of their supporters to whom they had promised the nice little sinecure of a District Judgeship, and appointed others who had little or no claim upon the party. Had the Government dared to open up Cape Breton county, the District Judges would have been gazetted long ago. They feel very sure of Victoria and Lunenburg, and probably will, in one way or another, by the expenditure of patronage and the influence always wielded by the party in power in an election, return their men, but the result will not be any criterion whatever of the state of feeling throughout a large portion of the Province. The next general election will afford the best test of the matter. Two years will soon pass and then if the present patch-work Government is not hurled from power, we have not rightly read the signs of the times, or rightly gauged the feelings and resentments of an outraged people.<sup>55</sup>

No doubt the hon. gentleman who wrote this article must have been in a position to make this statement. When the election in Victoria was about to take place, the Government saw that their supporters hitherto were likely to desert them, and the Minister of Militia undertook to see Mr. Ross. Mr. Ross was a Government contractor. He was well known in the county of Victoria as being in opposition to the Government on account of the manner in which his brother, the late Minister of Militia, had been driven from the Government. This was not only generally known in Victoria, but throughout eastern Nova Scotia. They imagined great injustice had been done to that section of the country; they felt aggrieved that their representatives were passed by and that a gentleman not in the House had been appointed. This caused a reaction in the county and also eastern Nova Scotia generally. But perhaps the abilities of the hon. gentleman now occupying the position of Minister of Militia should overweigh this. The Minister of Public Works said that the election in the county of Victoria took place on the 21st September. On the 9th September the Minister of Public Works said that Mr. Ross applied to the Government to be relieved of his contract. Three days after the election, on the 25th September, he declined to be relieved of it. In the meantime the Minister of Marine stated to the Minister of Public Works that Mr. Ross, the contractor, was to be a candidate. The Minister of Public Works stated that he could not be a candidate because he was a contractor; and the Minister of Militia said he, as a friend of Mr. Ross', thought it well to go and instruct him. Accordingly, he went down to Truro to instruct Mr. Ross. He (Mr. McDonald) was surprised that the Minister of Justice did not attempt to defend the Minister of Militia. It seemed as if the hon. gentleman had overlooked him altogether. If Mr. Ross had been elected the matter would have been in his own hands; he would have been able to have dictated his own terms; but he was not elected, and so he got back his contract. There was a doubt that he had surrendered the contract. But the matter was not over yet. It would be found next year that a large sum was paid for this fraudulent election—fraudulent because the candidate could not have taken his seat, because, according to the Premier's statement, he had not been relieved of his contract. When the Public Accounts were laid before the House next year it would be found that a large sum of money had been paid for this election, in which the Minister of Militia instructed Mr. John Ross to run, knowing him to be a Government contractor at the time. This was a matter that should be thoroughly investigated.

Mr. RAY: I think I understood the hon. gentleman to say that a person had been appointed in the county of Annapolis who was 84 years of age.

Mr. McDONALD: It is so stated in the newspapers.

Mr. RAY: No such appointment has been made in my county, nor has any application been made for it.

Mr. McDONALD: What is the age of the Harbour Master at Annapolis?

Mr. SMITH: I will find out tomorrow.

Mr. RAY: The Harbour Master was appointed under the late Government.

Mr. CAMPBELL said that in moving for the correspondence in the two cases before the House, he did so fully appreciating the great responsibility he was undertaking. He must be either a bold or reckless man who would attempt to face the present Ministry with a charge of corruption, however well founded, for they held everything that was dear to men in their power, except their heads. Especially as he was familiar with the case of Mr. Woodworth, who was voted out of the General Assembly for attacking the present Minister of Militia, and although such treatment was condemned by the Courts of Justice, still the man was hounded to death by the press supporting the Administration of which that hon. gentleman was the actual leader. With regard to dismissals, while he had objection to the Government dismissing subordinates, he preferred such a course to the present mode of dismissing on account of their politics, and afterwards, rather than acknowledge the fact, endeavour to find fault and disgrace and injure the character and reputation of respectable public servants. In the present case the hon. the Minister of Customs had stated that the two Preventive Officers were dismissed for old age, one being 65, the other 76 years of age, and comparatively useless. He would not wish letter fun than to see the hon. Minister of Customs in the grip of one of these men stated to be old and useless. He could not say what their exact age was, but he knew they had got old in the service, and he never heard a hint of their inefficiency. They were still strong men and quite competent to perform their duty as Preventive Officers or as boatmen. Why, he asked, were they not notified of the charges of old age and incompetency brought against them, and why were they not superannuated? They were considered below the notice of the present pure and liberal government. He would not believe the Inspector of Customs ever made such a report as the hon. Minister of Customs had asserted, but if he had, why was it not produced? If there was such a paper in the department, the hon. Minister for his own credit should have brought it down before this discussion was closed. The hon. Minister of Customs in answer to the charge of increasing, by fifty per cent., the salaries of the three men appointed in place of the three removed from office, had stated that he had reduced the salaries of other officials in the department in the port more than the increase alluded to. The costs of collecting the Revenue Customs in Victoria county for the past six years he found as follows: viz., 1871, $1,166; 1872, $1,586; 1873, $2,067; 1874, $2,067; 1875, $1,908; 1876, $1,905. It would thus appear that the cost had largely increased since 1871 and reached the highest figure in 1875. On making enquiry where the reduction was effected, he found the salary of the sub-collector at the port of New Campbellton was reduced from $240 to $160. The Preventive Officer at St. Anns received $240, or nearly as much as the Collector and the three Preventive Officers at New Campbellton, the most important port in the county as it lies at the mouth or entrance of the Great Bras d'Or. When a vessel passed that port, she could land her cargo without hindrance in any part of that inland sea, a navigable distance of over a thousand miles; yet the present Government boasted they had made a saving in the collection of the revenue by cutting down the salary of the Collector of that port—he presumed because his name was Campbell. They could not expect that a man living five or six miles distant and across the Bras D'Or could keep an office at the port for $160 a year. The result was that the public service was not effectually performed. Formerly one Preventive Officer was appointed for the harbour and one on each side of the Great Bras D'Or, where they could sight vessels long before they got inside the entrance. Afterwards four men were appointed to replace the old officers and they were placed on the opposite side of the Bras D'Or where comparatively little trade was done, while the port and that side of Bras D'Or was left without an officer. An unwise saving of fifty dollars had been effected at the port of Baddock by the discontinuance of a boat and crew. At Baddock, a farmer about three miles away from the port, was in receipt of $240 a year as Preventive Officer, although the Department could not afford to continue the grant of fifty dollars to a boat and crew at the port. The extra charge for collecting the revenue for the present year would amount to over $9,000, although the amount to be collected was estimated below the ordinary sum. The hon. the Premier had informed the House that he did not know the reason why Mr. Ross gave up the contract, nor did he know the reason why Mr. Ross resigned in a month afterwards; but unfortunately for him the Minister of Militia contradicted him and told the House and the country that he consulted with the Premier on the subject of getting Mr. Ross to run as a Government candidate. Of course, they could not expect either of those members to tell the pros and cons of the interview. But this the Minister of Militia admitted, that after this interview with the Premier, he, the Minister of Militia, posted off to Truro, and telegraphed to Mr. Tremaine to come on at once and meet him. It must be remembered that Mr. Tremaine was deeply interested in the negotiation, as his promotion depended on the result. The hon. Minister of Militia returned to Halifax overflowing with delight at the success of his diplomacy, and one of his journals came out on the following morning with the announcement that they had found Goliath and challenged the Dominion to bring out a man in the Opposition to fight him, and called on all good Reformers to rally around the man of their choice. He felt that no money would be spared to carry the county if they thought there was any danger, and that his best policy was to keep as quiet as possible till the last moment and, as military men would say, spring a mine upon them. Mr. Ross went back and was relieved of a bad contract, and his friends reported that he and his partners were to receive twenty thousand dollars each and be relieved of the contract. The hon. Minister of Militia accused him of spreading over the country the report that Mr. Ross was to receive fifty thousand for extras. He (Mr. Campbell) was only in the county two days before the nomination, and left immediately after the declaration. There must, of course, be two sides to the bargain. One main condition doubtless would be that Mr. Ross was to succeed in the election, but that was never doubted. Hon. gentlemen had denied there was any money paid improperly; of course no one gave them credit for so much simplicity. But the position had changed. Mr. Ross had not come to Parliament to support the Government. The Minister of Justice had read a letter from Mr. Ross denying any dishonest bargain with the hon. Minister of Militia, and stating that he would not keep any money except what was honestly due him. When the hon. Minister of Justice was compelled to come down to this House with such evidence to defend the hon. Minister of Militia, in the face of that Minister's own acknowledgement, the case was indeed desperate. Mr. Campbell having read from Mr. Perley's report the reference to the storms of the previous year carrying away a large portion of the work, he asked what could be more reasonable than that the Government would make good the loss that Providence had inflicted on that innocent but honest Mr. Ross, particularly if he would be a good, dutiful boy to the Ministry; and would it not be a most righteous act, after his condemnation of the Government. The funniest part of the negotiation was when Mr. Ross asked what was to be done with him (Mr. Campbell). "Oh," said the hon. Minister of Militia, "we had Campbell there once we and could make nothing of him; we must on no account allow him to go back any more." The hon. Premier would not admit as evidence what he (Mr. Campbell) said in Mr. Ross's presence at the nomination, and would not believe him when he said he had it from Mr. Ross himself—he made no secret of it—that he was strongly opposed to the Government, on account of the treatment his brother received at their hands. As the hon. Premier would not admit such evidence, he would be compelled to produce the next best evidence within his reach. But before he could do that, he must ask leave of the hon. Minister of Militia to produce correspondence marked private and confidential, and he would pause for a reply.

Mr. VAIL: I have not the slightest objection to the hon. member making use of any letter marked private and confidential in regard to this matter, it being understood that I shall have liberty to produce letters marked private and confidential from that hon. gentleman.

Mr. CAMPBELL said he would read a letter from the hon. Minister of Militia dated November, 1874.

Mr. VAIL asked as to what election the letter had reference.

Mr. CAMPBELL said it had reference to another election.

Mr. VAIL : I rise to a question of order. The hon. member asked for permission to read private and confidential correspondence on this question. I replied that I had no objection. The hon. member then rises in his place and proceeds to read a letter dated November 1874, two years before the election in question took place. I say that letter has nothing whatever to do with the transaction under discussion, and the hon. member has no right to read it.

Mr. CAMPBELL said it did refer to the subject under discussion—the fact that the Messrs. Ross were opposed to the Government. The letter was as follows :

“PRIVATE AND CONFIDENTIAL.

OTTAWA, 19th November, 1874.

MY DEAR SIR,—When I last had the pleasure of seeing you in Halifax you appeared somewhat undecided as to whether you would be a candidate for the seat in the Commons or not ; and my object in writing you now is to ask what conclusion you have arrived at. My own opinion is that you would rather enjoy the change, and I may say to you candidly that I would like to see you here for two reasons : first, because you were always a constant supporter of mine in the local House ; and secondly, because I think you could carry the county against the Ross influence, which I hear is not very favourable to the Government just now. I am informed that one great objection William Ross had to accepting the office of collector at Halifax, was, that it would leave the county in your hands, or in other words leave you master of the situation, which he could not think of doing * * *”

He would not read the letter further as it did not refer to the subject ; but he thought that this evidence would be accepted by the House and by the country as showing that the Government were opposed by the Ross party. He regretted to have been compelled to ask leave to refer to private correspondence, but he was driven to it by the hon. the Premier, who would not accept anything less. Was it creditable on the part of the hon. Minister of Militia—the man whom the Government induced to resign his seat in the Legislative Council of Nova Scotia to come and help them to break up an influence which the hon. Minister had helped to create—that because that party had turned against the Government and he would not be their humble tool, the hon. Minister should endeavour to drive him out of the county for which he had fought for twenty-five years. The hon. the Premier had stated that the Government had not lost the confidence of the country. Those whom the gods want to destroy they first make blind. Let the Ministry look at their defeats in Victoria, Cape Breton county, Halifax, Prince Edward Island, and in constituencies in Quebec, British Columbia and Ontario. While the hon. Minister of Justice stated that Mr. Ross was not legally relieved from his contract, the hon. the Premier stated that he was so released. In his speech on nomination day he had declared that the present Government was the worst that ever disgraced any country, and he believed he had now proved the truth of the assertion, and every sentence in that speech he was prepared to substantiate. He would be glad if the hon. Minister of Militia would enlighten the House as to the bargain to which he had referred. It must be gratifying to the Reformers of Ontario that the Government were compelled to send to Nova Scotia for an old Tory and give him a seat in the Cabinet. The Dominion Parliament and Local Legislatures had passed laws to preserve the purity of elections, and when, in the face of such laws, the hon. Minister of Militia was charged with a gross infringement of those laws, the Minister rose in his place and said they were beneath his notice.

Mr. PLUMB proposed that the following words be added to the motion :

“Together with any reports or letters of the Inspector of Customs relating to said dismissals ; or any other correspondence on this subject.”

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) : I would not have taken part in this debate, except for the fact that I feel compelled to answer a statement made by the hon. member for Cumberland, I do not recollect whether on his own authority or not, that a certain article had been published in a certain newspaper which he ascribed to myself. The article in question was not written by me or with my knowledge ; I did not see it until after it was printed, and I am therefore astonished that the hon. gentleman should have connected my name with it. It need not be matter for surprise, however, that the hon. member for Cumberland should base a statement upon a mere rumour or statement made outside for the purpose of attacking members on this side of the House, for his course in that direction was well known. But the hon. gentleman, before he made the statement to which I refer, should have had some authority to do so, for his allegation had no foundation whatever. When the right hon. member for Kingston charged certain gentlemen on this side of the House with using unparliamentary language, he should himself recollect his action towards an hon. member, when he stated that that hon. member rose in his place for the purpose of making a personal explanation, and that he got the ear of the House under false pretences. That is a statement which is unparliamentary. No statement has been heard in the House this Session of so offensive a nature, and therefore it ill becomes that right hon. gentleman to characterize the remarks of hon. members as unparliamentary. When any hon. member alleged that there was a revulsion of feeling in the Province of Nova Scotia, which was indicated by the election in Victoria, he was very much mistaken, and the hon. member for Victoria had made too much of his triumph. It is well known that none of the supporters of the Government went into the county, while a large number of supporters of the Opposition went there and rendered their assistance to secure the return of the present member. The reasons were obvious, and since the hon. member for Victoria has seen fit to quote from a journal published in Cape Breton, I am justified in making a short extract from the well-known organ of the Opposition printed at Halifax. The article is dated September 16th, and affords a very good indication of the reason why the hon. member for Victoria holds his seat in the House to-day. In that article in the Halifax Herald, the writer says:—

“As will be seen by our despatch this morning, there is going to be a rather close contest in Victoria for Mr. Tremaine’s seat. Mr. John Ross has been nominated supposedly in the Government interest; but it is a significant fact, illustrating the weakness of the Reform element in Cape Breton, that Mr. Ross, notwithstanding that he has supposedly the many influences of the two Governments to support him, besides his strong personal feeling in the county, did not care to define his position as a Government supporter. In a measure, the contest may be said to be between two Opposition candidates, for Mr. Ross’s declining to pledge himself to the Ministerialists shows that he is not an ardent supporter of the Reformers.”

That statement showed clearly the opinion entertained by the Opposition party with respect to the position occupied by Mr. Ross. After stating in that article that Mr. Ross was not a supporter of the present Government, that journal in an article published on the 23rd of September, after the news of the return of the present member for Victoria became known in Halifax, said :

“Victory has perched upon the Opposition banner once more. . . . Mr. Ross, the beaten candidate, did not dare profess himself a supporter of Mr. Mackenzie.”

Some HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKAY: The hon. gentlemen need not cry hear, hear. They will recollect that these were the utterances of their own organ. I do not say that they are correct. Far from it. I believe they have no foundation in fact, with the exception of the statement that Mr. Ross was not a supporter of the present Ministry. He (Mr. Ross) was an independent candidate. It was absurd to charge the Ministry with making a corrupt bargain with Mr. Ross, who, in fact, on election day, so conducted himself that Reformers of my own and adjoining counties did not see fit to give him the support they would have accorded him had he declared that he was a supporter of the present Government. If the Minister of Militia had made any such arrangement as was alleged, Mr. Ross’s conduct did not indicate it, and he was a very poor pupil, as shown by his utterances on nomination day.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: It was a bad bargain.

Mr. MACKAY: The hon. member for Cumberland had eulogised himself in his speech as highly as the hon. gentleman’s warmest friend could desire, crediting himself amongst other things with having, by his legislation, opened up the coal mines and minerals of Nova Scotia. Did the hon. gentleman not know that the credit of having broken up that monopoly was due to the late Judge Johnson, and to him alone? The hon. gentleman has evidently presented himself before the House, in this respect at any rate, under "false pretences," and I presume this is a parliamentary expression, since it has been used by the right hon. member for Kingston. His hon. colleague had undertaken to say that one person appointed by the Government in the county of Cape Breton—the office held, he believed, was the Inspectorship of fish oils and fish—was over the age of seventy.

An HON. MEMBER: Eighty-four.

Mr. MACKAY: If the hon. gentleman will look at the records he will find, I think, that the individual in question had not received his appointment at the hands of the present Government.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton) said he thought that his hon. colleague from Cape Breton well knew that a reaction had taken place in Cape Breton as regarded the policy of the present Administration. He desired that the electors of Cape Breton should hear that this hon. gentleman declared that he had had nothing to do with the writing of a certain article which had appeared in the newspaper of which it was known that the hon. member was principal proprietor and editor. The office of this newspaper was in the building in which were the barrister's office of the hon. gentleman, as well as the office of the hon. gentleman's partner, and it was very singular that the article in question should appear in that newspaper without the knowledge of either the hon. gentleman or his partner. However, this might be the case. Nevertheless, a reaction against the Government was going on in the Island of Cape Breton, as well as in other parts of Nova Scotia; and the article to which he alluded, reflected the sentiments of the people in that section when it stated that the Government had for months delayed the appointment of County Court Judges, because they were not able to secure a supporter of the Government in that quarter. The county of Victoria was the only constituency the Administration was confident of carrying, and it had sent to the House a gentleman opposed to the Government. The hon. member for Cape Breton had forgotten his first statement; he admitted that Mr. Ross did not dare to go to the people as a pledged supporter of the Government.

Mr. MACKAY: Mr. Speaker, I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon, but I said nothing of the kind. I stated that the Opposition organ of Halifax said so.

Mr. McDONALD said the hon. gentleman gave this statement as a reason for the defeat of Mr. Ross, who well knew the people of the county of Victoria; and much better than the hon. gentleman. Mr. Ross had represented the county for several years in the Local Legislature, and they all were aware what politicians would do to secure election. In his own hearing Mr. Ross had announced on the hustings that he was not pledged to support the Government, and admitted that the late Administration had done a great deal, and more than the present Administration, for the county of Victoria; and the Sheriff of the county declared that if Mr. Ross consulted his own private feelings and convictions, he could not support the Government, but that, under the circumstances, if returned, he (Mr. Ross) would be compelled to support them. He wished to ask the Minister of Justice, if the late representative of the county of Victoria, Mr. Tremaine, when appointed county Judge, promised to be able to return a supporter of the Government for the county.

Mr. BLAKE: Mr. Speaker, I was not in this country when any office was offered to, and accepted by, Mr. Tremaine; but I can say that I never heard until this question was asked, the suggestion of any communication having been made to Mr. Tremaine as to the possible consequences of his being appointed to office.

Mr. RYMAL said he considered that this debate, which related to the production of certain papers, a matter of very small importance, had taken a very wide range. Much of it arose from the relations which existed between the hon. member for Cumberland and his last follower, whom the hon. gentleman wished to exhibit on every possible occasion with regard to the administration of public affairs. The hon. gentleman seemed to take the same pride in making this display as would a mother hen, who, having gone through the process of hatching for a long time, was rewarded with a single chicken, which she showed in the barn yard in such a way as if to say—"No other hen in this yard has such a chicken as I have got." But he feared that his disappointment would be as great as that of the mother hen, when, after a few weeks, she found out that her chicken was a young goose. There was an old fable which he had read when a boy: It was about a mother wolf, who, after great and maternal longings, was rewarded with the birth of a single whelp, which she handled very fondly. Her fondness for it was almost unspeakable, but, in her fierce affection, they were told, she hugged the whelp to death. Now, he trusted that the moral of this fable—the fate which befel all this handling—would never be the fate of his hon. friend from Victoria, whose pluck and determination he admired, though compelled to differ with him in principle. The hon. gentleman was bound to have his say, and he was glad to see men of that stamp in the House. He was not afraid of denouncing a good old Tory, and he had some respect for men of that class who had been born and brought up in the faith; but with men who changed their names and their principles so often that they did not remain the same for more than twelve months together, he was utterly disgusted. He believed that the papers for which the hon. member for Victoria asked, would be granted, and he hoped that so small a matter would not again be made the occasion for such a violent attack. If his hon. friends opposite chose—as they had a right to do—to attack the Government, they should not attempt in this way to steal a march on them. When they were in Opposition they had given the late Administration due notice of such assaults. But whether the Opposition desired to steal a march or not, he warned his friends that they might look out for squalls, because the Opposition meant business; and whether the Government desired, or were able to defend their actions or not, they would be called upon to give an account. The time was approaching when a record must be made, and the hon. gentlemen opposite were shrewd enough to know that the time was at hand when the record was to be prepared. These tactics would be continued, and if the Government had been guilty of any great dereliction of duty, or of the commission of any great political crimes, he knew that his hon. friend from Kingston, with whom he had been acquainted for many years, would ferret these acts out and drag them to light. He trusted, and firmly believed, that the Administration would be able successfully to dispose of the charges that would be brought against them. He hoped that they would see a little of the old fire that used to animate politicians in old Canada displayed, because for this he had great admiration. He did not believe in a namby-pamby way of conducting the debates; he liked to see men in earnest, laying off their gloves when they come into the fray; and acting as valiantly and boldly in the House as they did at pic-nics. More than a year ago, he believed, his hon. friend from Kingston rejoiced over the election of an hon. member for a Riding in Toronto, and expressed his pleasure at the new accession to his ranks, as one necessary to render him assistance when he met the beasts at Ephesus. A considerable time however had elapsed, and the battle with the beasts had not as yet come off, but he trusted that they would soon see the fight in progress.

Mr. VAIL said he would on a future occasion take the opportunity of replying to certain statements made during the debate.

Mr. TUPPER said in reference to a statement made by the Minister of Finance regarding the superannuation of Mr. Ratchford, that the late Government had voted a certain sum for financial offices at Halifax. This appropriation had been increased by the present Government, and, having done so, they had superannuated one of the ablest and most efficient officers in their service. He was willing to refer his statement concerning Mr. Ratchford's qualifications to the Committee of Public Accounts, with the understanding that Mr. Langton was to be called before them; and if Mr. Langton did not then say that Mr. Ratchford had been entrusted with public money to the extent of a million dollars at a time, and, further, that he was one of the most accurate officers in the service, he would recall the eulogium he had passed upon that gentleman, who, in receipt of a salary of $1,600 per annum, and a public officer of a few years' standing, had been superannuated at the cost of $700 or $800 per annum. The hon. the Minister of Finance had given this statement a contradiction, and he (Mr. Tupper) declared that the law had been violated.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: I say that it is not violated.

Mr. TUPPER said he could not conceive how it was possible under the law to superannuate an officer of five years' standing, in receipt of $1,600 per annum, with an allowance of between $700 and $800 a year; and he took it for granted that the law had been violated. The hon. gentleman said that a saving had been effected, two officers having done the work which one officer to-day performed; but it would be seen in the Estimates of 1873-4, those of the late Administration, that the appropriation for the offices of Assistant Receiver General and Auditor at Halifax was $10,500, while for the year ending June 30, 1875, the appropriation was $12,000, an increase of $1,500 before the superannuation in question was affected; and for the last year, it was no less than $10,877.80. If $782.08, the amount awarded to Mr. Ratchford on his superannuation, was added, the cost to the country for last year was raised to $11,664.88. The hon. member for the county of Cape Breton had challenged the statement he had made, that he was a member of the Nova Scotia Government, which broke up the monopoly in mines and minerals which had existed in that Province; but his statement was correct. The Hon. Justice Johnston was leader of that Administration, and he was Provincial Secretary. Mr. Archibald, a member of the Opposition and Mr. Johnston, went to England and made the negotiations, and, on their return, the Government, with the aid of Mr. Archibald, carried the measure through the Legislature.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said that the hon. member for Cumberland, as usual, was entirely wrong as to the facts of the case. Mr. Ratchford was superannuated because he and Mr. Wallace were not both required and neither would be subordinate to the other. He believed that the Government had been strongly applied to, if not by the hon. member for Cumberland, at all events by his friends, to treat Mr. Ratchford with all possible liberality, and if he had no right at all to favour, the circumstances looked most suspiciously like a job. It had been said that Mr. Ratchford's qualifications entitled him, under the Superannuation Act to the special allowance for ten years' service.

Mr. TUPPER: I grant that.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said it was possible that the Government had stretched a point too far in consideration for Mr. Ratchford, on the abolition of the position in question, but he would repeat that these officers were in each other's way, and that it was absolutely necessary in the public interests to have but one head for both branches. The complaint seemed to be that they had dealt too leniently with Mr. Ratchford, who was brought by the hon. member for Cumberland to Halifax at the time of Union, and for whose special benefit the office was created. In no other part of the Dominion was there a Deputy Receiver-General and the head of a Savings Bank at the same place. Mr. Wallace was a perfectly competent officer of thirty years' service, having charge of the Savings Bank, and he should have been Deputy Receiver-General as well; but this arrangement would not have suited the hon. member, because he had a place to find for a friend from his own county. These officers had concurrent charge of the public money, and it had been brought to the notice of the late Government that it was advisable in the public interests that only one man in Halifax should be responsible for the public money. Shortly afterwards, this arrangement was carried out, and Mr. Ratchford was superannuated; and the charge was now made by the hon. member for Cumberland that the Government had dealt with that gentleman too leniently and too generously.

Mr. TUPPER: The charge is that the Government has violated the law.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said he thought the Minister of Finance was perfectly correct in saying that influences were brought to bear upon certain parties in the public offices, in order to create the impression that Mr. Ratchford was a most valuable public official; and that, if the office was to be abolished for special reasons, this officer should be generously dealt with. He would ask the hon. member for Cumberland whether Mr. Ratchford had not previous to going to Halifax filled the position of Weigh-Office Keeper in the hon. gentleman's own county.

Mr. TUPPER: I think I am correct in stating that Mr. Ratchford had previously held no office which entitled him to a grant under the Superannuation Act.

Mr. JONES: That is not an answer to my question.

Mr. TUPPER: I am not aware of Mr. Ratchford ever having been Postmaster, or of his having previously held any office of a Dominion character that would entitle him to a grant under the Superannuation Act. If this was the case, it was without my knowledge, and I do not believe it to be the case.

Mr. JONES said the hon. gentleman should have been aware of the circumstance, because the representation was made that Mr. Ratchford had been in the public service of the country under the branch entitling him to a grant under the Superannuation Act for five or seven years before he was sent to Halifax, and these years of service in Cumberland had been taken advantage of by the gentleman's friends. He thought the Government was open to censure for having given Mr. Ratchford such a large retiring allowance.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: I will have the opinion of the Minister of Justice as to the legal point, and of course if the law has been violated, and any error committed, the allowance can be reduced to the proper figures.

Mr. JONES said he thought the Government was very much to blame for granting such a large allowance; and if, on investigation, it was shown that this was in excess of that which Mr. Ratchford should have received, he considered that the amount should be reduced, and all that had been paid in excess deducted from the payments that would yet be made. He was glad that the hon. member for Cumberland had brought this before the House, because they wanted, when their public servants were superannuated, for them to be superannuated on a proper basis without any undue influence being exercised, and he was glad to hear from the Minister of Finance that it would be placed in the position it ought to be.

Mr. COFFIN said that, as far as he understood, the Opposition blamed the Government for dealing with this gentleman too leniently. When the question of superannuating Mr. Ratchford came up, the view taken by the Treasury Board was to give him all that his case would allow, and he had applications from Mr. Ratchford's friends to do the best that could be done for him. He considered that he had been dealt with leniently, and that everything was given him that the law would give him, and possibly more. If there was any dissatisfaction about this, the matter should be investigated and the amount reduced to that to which he was strictly entitled. He thought it was disingenuous for the friends of Mr. Ratchford to accuse the Government of giving him more than he was entitled to.

Mr. TUPPER: I am quite content to adopt the suggestion of the Minister of Finance, to settle this question by having it referred to the Committee on Public Accounts.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: No, no.

Mr. TUPPER: To have it determined whether the statement I made was correct or not, that the gentleman is said in the Public Accounts to be superannuated, not to consolidate the offices, but on account of age. I showed the absurdity of superannuating him, and then appointing him to a Savings Bank. I showed that the law had been violated. The hon. gentleman stated he had been superannuated strictly in accordance with the law, but now, while I think the law was broken, he thinks it was only stretched. I think it was stretched so far that it snapped. I think a gross injustice was done Mr. Ratchford in depriving him of the office without any pretence of saving any public money, but the Government have no right to take friendship into consideration in administering the law, and they had no right to exceed the amount allowed by law. Having, however, obtained his office by giving him a certain amount, it is doubtful how far they have the right, without a breach of faith, to deal with it as they propose. If the Minister of Justice suggests that they should adopt this course and the Government is willing to do it, they will confess that this is a job, which is a word the hon. gentleman opposite has placed in my mouth; I say his superannuation was a job—not his appointment.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, 23rd Feb., 1877.

The Speaker took the chair at Three o'clock.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following bills were severally introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 28) Respecting the Niagara Grand Island Bridge Company.—(Mr. Thomson, Welland.)

Bill (No. 29) To amend the Act passed in the 39th year of Her Majesty's Reign intitled: "An Act to incorporate the British Canadian Loan and Investment Company (Limited)."—(Mr. Young.)

Bill (No. 30) To incorporate the Union Marine Insurance Company of Halifax, Nova Scotia.—(Mr. Jones, Halifax).

Bill (No. 31) To authorize and provide for the winding up of the Metropolitan Bank.—(Mr. Workman.)

Bill (No. 32) Respecting La Banque Jacques Cartier.—(Mr. Jetté.)

Bill (No. 33) To incorporate La Société de Construction St. Jacques, as a permanent Building Society; and for other purposes.—(Mr. Jetté.)

Bill (No. 8) To change the name of the St. Francis and Megantic International Railway Company, to the International Railway Company; and for other purposes.—(Mr. Brooks.)

Bill (No. 34) To amend the Act to incorporate the Ottawa Agricultural Insurance Company.—(Mr. Rochester.)

Bill (No. 35) Concerning the Ottawa, Vaudreuil and Montreal Railway Company.—(Mr. Hagar.)

THE INLAND REVENUE ACT.

RESOLUTION TO BE REFERRED.

Mr. LAFLAMME moved:—

"That the House will on Tuesday next resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to amend the Act respecting the Inland Revenue and to provide for the imposition of a license duty of fifty dollars on each importer or manufacturer (not a manufacturer of beer, wash or spirits, or a rectifier of spirits) of stills, worms, fermenting tuns or other apparatus suitable for the manufacture of beer, wash or spirits."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD called the attention of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue that his notices on the motion paper were insufficient. The Bills should be introduced at once, as it was an idle form to resolve the House into Committee of the Whole to amend the Bill. Every proposition should be introduced and carried out formally before this stage. Then, as a matter of notice, the order paper should show what the amendments were.

Mr. LAFLAMME said they would be set out in full.

Mr. MACKENZIE said there was no doubt but that the hon. member for Kingston was correct. The object of going into Committee at all was to discuss the actual change to be made.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he would not press the point, but he hoped the Minister of Inland Revenue would put the particulars at once on the Votes and Proceedings so that the House would know what was before them when they came to consider the resolutions. His hon. friend the Minister of Justice had taken care to specify the points of the propositions which he wished to amend.

Mr. BLAKE said he understood the rule to be that the substance of the proposition should be given. He had been a little minute because he happened to draw the Bill. It was not necessary to give all the contents.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Oh, no; the basis of the Bill is sufficient.

Motion agreed to.

ADULTERATION OF FOOD, DRINK AND DRUGS.

RESOLUTION TO BE REFERRED.

Mr. LAFLAMME moved:—

“That the House will on Tuesday next resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution: That it is expedient to amend the Act to impose License dues on Compounders of Spirits, to amend the Act respecting the Inland Revenue, and to prevent the adulteration of Food, Drink and Drugs.”

Motion agreed to.

INSPECTION OF GAS AND GAS METERS.

RESOLUTION TO BE REFERRED.

Mr. LAFLAMME moved:—

“That the House will on Tuesday next resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution: That it is expedient further to amend the Act to provide for the inspection of Gas and Gas Meters.”

Motion agreed to.

SALARIES OF JUDGES.

RESOLUTION TO BE REFERRED.

Mr. BLAKE moved:

“That the House will on Tuesday next resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolutions:—

1. That it is expedient to amend the eighth section of the Act passed in the thirty-seventh year of Her Majesty's reign, intituled

Mr. MACKENZIE.

An Act to amend the Act, thirty-six Victoria, chapter thirty-one ‘for the readjustment of the salaries of Judges, and other purposes, by striking out the words ‘for fifteen years’ in the said section contained and substituting therefor the words ‘for ten years.’

2. That it is expedient to provide that the said amendment shall extend to the application of the amended section to the County Court Judges in Nova Scotia by virtue of the second section of the Act passed in the thirty-ninth year of Her Majesty's reign, intituled An Act to provide for the salaries of County Court Judges in the Province of Nova Scotia, and for other purposes.”

Motion agreed to.

LIFE INSURANCE BILL.

FIRST READING.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT moved concurrence in the following resolution:—

“That it is expedient to amend and consolidate, as amended, the several Acts respecting Life Insurance; repealing for that purpose the unrepealed portions of the Acts of Canada, 31 Victoria, chapter 48—34 Victoria, chapter 9—37 Victoria, chapter 48—38 Victoria, chapter 21—part of the 23rd section of 38 Victoria, chapter 20—and chapter 52 of the Consolidated Statutes for Upper Canada.”

Motion agreed to and report concurred in.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT introduced a Bill founded on the said resolution, intituled “An Act to amend and consolidate the several Acts respecting Insurance.”

Bill read the first time.

SUPPLY.

III.—CIVIL GOVERNMENT.

House resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

3. The Department of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada..... $15,000
4. The Department of Justice. 11,600

Mr. TUPPER asked for an explanation of the decrease from $16,200 last year.

Mr. BLAKE said the House was aware that almost immediately before the resignation of the late Government, the Mounted Police was organized, or at least the organization had commenced. The business of the Mounted Police was then placed in the hands of the Department of Justice, but it had been since transferred to another Department. This enabled some reduction to be made. Circumstances had also enabled him to make arrangements for removing the more highly salaried officers, and replacing them with officers of a lower grade, at less salary. The Department was now, he thought, as economically managed as it could be without its efficiency being impaired, although the amount of business had been rapidly increasing for some years, and was now, and it could only be efficiently performed by the diligent supervision of the heads of the Department. The hon. gentleman would observe that notwithstanding the total decrease, an increase was proposed in the salary of the new deputy, the successor of the late deputy, who was superannuated. It was impossible to obtain a deputy able to discharge the duties of the office at a less salary than was proposed. The amount specified in the Estimates as the salary of the deputy was not the total amount received by that officer. Being also Chief Clerk to the Attorney-General, he received from the Indian fund $400 as Solicitor. It might be stated that the new deputy had received $6,000 as professional income, which he left for $4,000. Some comparisons had been made which were not exactly accurate, between the expenditure in former years of the Department of the Minister of Justice and the expenditure of late years. He had, therefore taken occasion to make a comparative statement of the expenditures since 1873, from which it appeared that in November, 1873, the amount was $13,202.50, as against $11,600 which was proposed for this year.

Mr. BLAIN called attention to the appointment of a gentleman to correct Private Bills. The hon. member for Chateauguay and some other gentlemen of the House were very anxious that an officer should be appointed, whose duty it would be to endeavour to reconcile the private legislation of the House. He asked the Minister of Justice if it was intended to appoint such an officer, the necessity being generally conceded on both sides of the House.

Mr. BLAKE said the Estimates showed that no additional appointments were proposed. He thought, however, it would be of the highest consequence that such an officer should be appointed who would no doubt save thousands for every dollar he received. An arrangement might be made by which he could assist the Attorney-General during the recess. However, until his hon. friend the Finance Minister was enabled to present a picture more agreeable to the hon. member for Cumberland, he was afraid he could not recommend the appointment of such an officer.

Mr. PALMER: Do the Estimates include the whole expenses of the Department?

Mr. BLAKE: Yes.

Mr. PALMER: Do I understand that this includes payments made to deputy Ministers?

Mr. BLAKE: Some persons assume the title of deputies of my office who are not.

Mr. PALMER: Still they get paid, do they not?

Mr. BLAKE: They do not.

Mr. PALMER: Do I understand that they work without pay?

Mr. BLAKE: The gentlemen who call themselves my deputies in some Provinces are really my legal agents; and they are paid by fees.

Mr. PALMER, Where do the fees appear?

Mr. BLAKE: The fees are paid in the various Departments in whose service the gentlemen are employed. The amounts vary according to the amount of business the Government has to do.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK—Have you any agent of that kind in Ottawa?

Mr. BLAKE: I have not precisely an agent, but Messrs. Walker & McIntyre are employed to conduct that portion of the Government's legal business. The late Ministry employed the same persons.

Mr. PALMER: Where is the estimate of fees?

Mr. BLAKE: There is no such estimate. In fact there could not be. Is not the hon. gentleman a lawyer, and does he not know that lawyers' services are inestimable.

Mr. TUPPER: I see by the Estimates of 1876-7 that the appropriation was $15,200, and for 1877-8 $11,600. Then I find charged to the Mounted Police Branch, formerly in the Department of Justice, $2,700, and, making the necessary deduction, I find that the reduction on the whole is $1,900.

Mr. BLAKE: Even that is not correct. The fact of the matter is, that the staff of the Minister of Justice was not sufficient to supply a proper degree of attention to the Mounted Police Force, and the staff as now organized with reference to this Force in the Secretary of State's office has $2,700 a year more than was contributed to it formerly in the Department of Justice. I estimate that there has been a saving in this Department of about $35,000.

Vote agreed to.

5. Department of Justice, Penitentiary Branch..... $3,850

Mr. BLAKE said the new items related to the Bill of last Session for the appointment of Assistant Inspectors of Penitentiaries in Manitoba and British Columbia. These officers were not yet appointed, but shortly would be; and then the expenditure would be incurred. There was also a slight increase in contingencies to cover the possible travelling expenses of two Assistant Inspectors, as well as in the salary of the Inspector of Penitentiaries. Urgent representations had been made as to the inadequacy of the salary paid under that Act. Undoubtedly the functions of Inspector were very important, and, although the officer was supplied with an efficient clerk, they were very responsible. On the whole, the Government had deemed it not unnecessary to invite an increase in this respect of $250, making $2,250 instead of $2,000. Arrears had accumulated in the office, and it had been found requisite to appoint a clerk of superior standing to overtake them.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the increases in question were, he believed, all statutory increases.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Is there any increase in the Money Order Office?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: No; I think not. I believe that the total numbers are rather less than formerly.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: There are rumours in the air about losses and irregularities in this connection, but I do not know what truth there may be in them.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: The fact of the matter is, that we have found it necessary to institute a very much more rigorous law in this regard. For a considerable time we have had suspicions that irregularities might occur and were occurring; and my Department is now charged with the special audit of the Money Order Office. No doubt some serious irregularities in certain cases have been discovered, leading to the dismissal of officers, and perhaps more serious punishment. The precise details, of course, I am hardly in a position to give, and perhaps it would not be expedient to discuss them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that it may not now be convenient to make an enquiry into these matters, but perhaps when the enquiry is over, we may be informed to what extent the irregularities have gone, and what may be the estimated amount of loss, if any, and what precautions are to be taken in the future. That is a matter which I think ought to receive, as no doubt it will, the serious consideration of the Government. Although the Money Order system is a very convenient one, and though I would be very sorry to see it closed, still, unless these irregularities can be stopped, the public revenue cannot go on sustaining serious losses, if any have been experienced. I know that irregularities occur from time to time in this Department, and I remember that in our time the hon. gentlemen opposite found them to exist; and some legislation it seems to me, must be provided, by which every postmaster must know that, under such circumstances, he is committing a felony. And if any error is once found out, except it be one that can be suitably explained, no matter how dependant the guilty party may be, or how anxious his friends may be to cover up the irregularity and return the money, no such return should be allowed. Such a man should not be forgiven his offence or retained in office. I know perfectly well, from old experience, what is done with regard to such cases, and I do not allude to the Post Office in particular. Every Government is subject to such pressure. In this branch, where implicit confidence must be reposed in the Postmaster having charge of the money order system, the punishments for irregularities, which are due sometimes to carelessness and sometimes to causes far worse, should be certain, and there should be no condonation of the offence. I dare say that this subject has occupied the serious consideration of the Government, and I think that the Minister of Justice should introduce a Bill in this relation, making the punishment so severe and so prompt as to override any temptation to use the money so often placed in their hands.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: I quite agree with the remarks which have fallen from the right hon. gentleman. My own opinion always has been, that far too much indulgence has been shown to people who have so abused the public trust, and these cases the Government has had for some considerable time under consideration; and my own Department has now assumed in a special manner the auditing and charge of this Branch. Regulations have also been introduced tending to greatly diminish the temptation and opportunity for that kind of crime to which the right hon. gentleman has alluded. As to the point on which the hon. gentleman has laid most stress, that parties should be punished without indulgence if they choose to abuse positions of trust, I entirely agree with him, and undoubtedly the head of the Department and the Minister of Justice will take very prompt steps in all cases henceforward that come under their notice, to protect the public interests in that direction.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said the right hon. gentleman had very properly called the attention of the House to the great and growing importance of the passage of this vast amount of money through the Post Office, the aggregate being as much as the expenditure of the nation. Some re-organization had been found necessary, and no doubt, the Government would be in a position to explain the changes to the House during the Session.

Mr. MITCHELL said he understood the Ministers to state that the increases which had been made, were statutory increases; but he found that salaries had really been increased to a very considerable extent. The expenses for the Post Office this year were set down at $85,950, while, for the fiscal year ending in 1874, they were $66,410. The Public Works Department would cost this year $48,884, while for the other year mentioned, the amount was $41,360. The figures for the Department of Justice this year were $11,600, although in this the expenses for the Mounted Police, were not included, while for the year ending June, 1874, the amount was $9,550, in which the cost of the Mounted Police was included. The figures for the Department of Militia and Defence were, during the present year, $35,750, and for 1873-4, they were $30,480. In connection with the Secretary of State's Department, $27,000 odd were appropriated for the year 1873-4, and this year, the sum was $31,190. The Department of the Interior would this year cost $42,760, and in 1873-4, it cost $16,920. The Receiver-General's Department during 1873-4 cost $17,000, and this year the appropriation would be $21,000. The Finance Department cost $45,460 during 1873-4, and this year the amount would be $49,800. The appropriation for the Customs Department would this year be $26,900, and during 1873-4 it was $19,775. The Public Works Department during 1873-4 cost $41,360, and this year it would cost $48,800. The cost of the Marine and Fisheries Department during 1873-4 was $20,015, and this year it would be $25,000. The Contingencies Fund during 1873-4 amounted to $150,000, and this year the appropriation would reach the figure of $170,000. He did not mean to imply that the increases indicated were not necessary, but, under the circumstances, he did not think the Ministers should claim so much credit for a reduction in the working expenses, since it was so obvious, that two years ago the transaction of the Executive business cost the country so much less than it did to-day.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said that under the Statute, as it now existed, the great bulk of the employés received every year increases of $50 each, provided they had done nothing to forfeit them, and until these gentlemen attained the maximum of their class, the expenditure of Departments must continue steadily increasing; and they must do one of two things—either suspend the augmentations to these gentlemen's salaries, as well as the promotions, or be prepared to establish on the average a certain annual increase varying from $500 or $600, to $1,200 or $1,400, according to the size of each Department. If the hon. gentleman would compare the Estimates for 1877-8, with those of 1873-4, he would see that, in the great majority of cases, the increases established amounted to a matter of $3,000 or $4,000 a year in the larger Departments, and of about $2,000 or $3,000 in the smaller ones; and therefore the sums now paid were precisely the sums paid during 1873-4, making the necessary deductions for the ordinary statutory increases. The only exceptions, of any importance, to this rule, were the Departments of the Post Office, and of the Interior. In the latter Department, as everybody knew, the work had prodigiously increased during the last two or three years, and if his memory served him aright, this Department was organized during the last year the hon. gentlemen opposite held power. Of course, it was quite impossible at that time to say what organization or what expenditure would be required.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: The Department was organized before, but the name was then changed.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said that, at any rate, everybody saw that the increase of expenditure in this Department must necessarily be large. The whole work of Committees, and the duties connected with surveys had increased enormously.

Mr. MITCHELL: The surveys are not so much as they were.

Mr. MACKENZIE: They are more than they were in 1875.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said that, in any case, the Post Office Department, as the Public Accounts showed, was constantly in the habit of overrunning its appropriations. A great number of people had been paid out of contingencies in former years; and it had been impossible to carry out, without augmented expenditure, the improvements introduced under the administration of the present Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario, although he believed that these ameliorations had been loudly called for in the country. They had given great satisfaction, but nevertheless they were somewhat expensive, and they inflicted upon the Government the necessity of making large additions to the staff of the Department. As to contingencies, it was quite true that for the year 1873-4, the vote was $150,000, and the same vote had been made in 1872-3, but if the hon. gentleman would look at the Public Accounts, he would find that the departmental accounts always exceeded this appropriation by about $30,000 or $40,000. He had consequently thought it very much better to ask the House for the sum likely to be expended, than to be invariably bringing down Supplementary Estimates to cover these matters, which were largely connected with the employment of extra clerks, &c., especially during the Session, when a great number of returns were moved for. As to the increase from $150,000 to $175,000, this was purely nominal, because the previous practice had always been, he supposed, to take a supplementary vote upon these expenditures. Some complaints had been made as to the hardship to which the Civil Servants were exposed, and he deemed it well to call the attention of the House to the fact that a very great number of salaries had been increased under the regular operation of the Statute, extending at least to the sum of $200 over the sum formerly received.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said that, while the statutory increases were made yearly to salaries, compensation was obtained by young men entering the service at low salaries and replacing the officers at high salaries who left the service.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he had found that remarkably few officials dropped out of the service. After a number of years, a considerable body of officials would retire from natural causes. The Civil Service and Superannuation Acts had been in operation only a few years, and the Government were losing a good deal more than they gained, as would be the case for some years.

Vote agreed to.

The Department of Agriculture.....$28,290 00

Mr. POPE (Compton) asked if provision were made for the salary of a Secretary to the Minister.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said there was not, as the present Minister had not yet appointed a Secretary.

Mr. POPE (Compton) said the Estimates did not therefore show the total expenditure. Every Private Secretary appeared now to receive the full amount of $600. The Private Secretary to the late Minister of Agriculture received the $600 and a Clerk's salary, raising the amount to over $1,600. When he (Mr. Pope) occupied that position, his Private Secretary only received a gross salary of $750. Similar increases appeared under the head of all the Departments.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the hon. gentleman was in error; the Private Secretary of the Minister of Justice received $350, and the Secretaries of the Ministers of Inland Revenue and Customs $400.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said there might be occasionally other reasons for granting increased salaries. While the Post Office Department contained many competent officers, he understood an officer had been brought from outside into the Post Office Department at a salary of $1,650 a year. It was desirable that the House should know whether such was the fact.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said the officer was brought into the Department from outside, and he had proved very efficient. The position was created on the report of the Superintendent of the Department, and was entirely at his suggestion. In consequence of that appointment, the services of two clerks had been dispensed with. If the hon. member for Kingston would examine the circumstances, he would be satisfied that a first-class man was necessary to assist the Superintendent in the discharge of his responsible and onerous duties.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said from his acquaintance with the Post Office Department he knew it contained a great number of officials on the permanent staff who were qualified for almost any service. All the qualification needed was to be a good accountant and an honest man.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said another first-class clerk in the Money Order Department was appointed from outside for the same reason. In administering the Department, aided by the judgment of its responsible superintendent, he would use the best means to secure efficiency.

Mr. JONES (Leeds) said that where there was an efficient man in the outside service he should be brought into the Department when opportunity offered, more especially in the Customs Department.

Vote agreed to.

16. The Department of Marine and Fisheries .....$25,070 00
17. Treasury Board Office.....$4,050 00

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the increase of $750 was caused by the appointment of an official to audit the accounts of the Money Order Branch.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the Money Order Office might be placed under the Finance Department.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the money order business appeared to be so mixed up with post office regulations that he did not perceive how it could be placed under the Finance Department.

Vote agreed to.

18. Departmental Contingencies.....$170,000 00

Mr. TUPPER said the item for contingencies appeared to be creeping up.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said there had been an apparent increase from $150,000 to $175,000. The former sum was, however, always exceeded; in 1872-73 by $30,000, in 1873-74 by $40,000 and $50,000. He saw no possible advantage in having to bring down a Supplementary Estimate, and he had therefore inserted a sum which would cover the actual expenses. In 1873-4, in two cases under the head of "civil government," the bonuses were charged with the regular salaries.

Mr. TUPPER: How was the year 1873-4?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: It was larger still than 1872-3—$220,000, I think. The contingencies have been steadily increasing since 1873-4. Last year the total expenditure was $172,500.

Vote agreed to.

20. To meet the possible amount required for new appointments by an extension of the staff, or any other change.....$10,000 00

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the expenditure had been largely reduced, partly because a large number of salaries had been augmented by the operation of the Statute, or by increases granted by heads of Departments; partly because of some readjustments, and partly because, owing to the present condition of the revenue, they did not feel justified in asking for any large sum.

Vote agreed to.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT.

IV. ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE.

21. Miscellaneous Justice, North-West Territories $20,000 00
22. Travelling expenses of Stipendiary Magistrates in North-West Territories.....$4,500 00

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD asked how those expenses were regulated.

Mr. BLAKE said there had been, as yet, no regulations. The law provided that the expenses should be regulated by Order in Council, but it was deemed expedient to wait for time to demonstrate what the actual expenses were, before arranging the matter,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD asked, as a matter of information, whether the travelling expenses of the officers appointed had been paid.

Mr. BLAKE said he believed as a rule they had been paid, or some allowance made. Unless the officer was paid a small salary under exceptional circumstances, in his opinion the practice ought to be done away with.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the English practice was that when a man was appointed he should go at his own expense to the future scene of his labours. Afterwards, if his duties involved travelling, his expenses were paid.

Mr. BLAKE said he knew that was the practice there. There was a great difference in the distances in the two countries. Travelling was very high when Winnipeg was reached.

Mr. SCHULTZ asked where the stipendiary magistrates would be stationed.

Mr. BLAKE said that it was provided that their posts should be fixed from time to time as directed by the Governor in Council. Only two magistrates had been appointed as yet. One who was at Pelly, would be ordered to remove to Battleford as soon as the Governor removed there; he would act as the legal adviser of that official. The residence of the other magistrate was fixed for the present at Pelly; but it was obvious that should be changed according as they found the settlement extend and according to where they would be useful.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Who are the Stipendiary Magistrates?

Mr. BLAKE said Mr. Ryan, formerly of Montreal, was one, and Mr. Hugh Richardson the other. The vote was taken for three, but there was no intention of appointing a third unless necessity arose.

Vote agreed to.

23. Circuit allowance, British Columbia ..... $15,000.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the vote appeared to be for a large sum.

Mr. BLAKE said it was a large vote, but the Government were engaged in trying to obtain statements which would enable them to reduce the expenses. Of course travelling in British Columbia was expensive, but representations had been made which led him to believe that there had been a considerable degree of liberality in this respect, and that long Circuits were made with very small results in the administration of justice. They had only a concurrent power in this matter, and while the Local Government determined where the Assizes should be held, it was difficult for the Dominion Government to intervene. If the Act was disallowed they would have to provide for the expenses of the Judge.

Vote agreed to.

24. Circuit allowance Manitoba..... $1,500.

Mr. SCHULTZ asked why, as $3,000 was voted this year, the amount had been cut down one half?

Mr. BLAKE said they had found from experience that $1,500 would be sufficient, and it was not thought necessary to ask Parliament for a larger sum than would be required.

Mr. SCHULTZ asked if the estimate was made on the same basis as that for British Columbia.

Mr. BLAKE said the allowance had been changed once or twice in Manitoba. The amount was now fixed upon the consideration that it was a fair remuneration for the expenses incurred. The condition of things in British Columbia was unsatisfactory. The account was vouched by the Judge, but there was no means of declaring to the Judge that the sums charged were confined to such as ought to be charged. Of course, there was no reason for thinking there was anything wrong, except from the enormity of the amounts charged. There was reason to believe that the services of an officer, a registrar or clerk, charged as travelling expenses, ought not to be charged.

Mr. RYAN asked if it was intended to place a sum in the estimates to provide for the payment of the Commission to try disputed titles in Manitoba.

Mr. BLAKE said the remuneration was fixed by Order in Council at $1,000, with such salary as might be fixed by the Minister of the Interior for the Clerk.

Mr. BUNSTER said he did not think the allowance was a fair one. Manitoba was a large country and it was difficult to travel over. He did not think $3,000 too much for the service.

Vote agreed to.

25. Precis-writer of the Supreme Court of Canada and the Exchequer Court..... $1,850.

Mr. MITCHELL asked how the increase was intended.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the clerk was entitled by statute to the increase if he remained in the office.

Mr. BLAKE said this officer's salary was voted last year, and the terms of his appointment were $1,800 for the first year, with an increase of $50 per year for four years. He was a kind of superior officer in the court, and had to prepare the reports of the cases.

26. Clerk of the Supreme Court of Canada and the Exchequer Court... $425.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said there was a very great discrepancy between the two salaries.

Mr. BLAKE said this office was dealt with just as they thought the exigencies of business required. When the appointment was made the salary was only $300. An advance of $100 had been made, and the other $25 was statutory. There were three officers and a messenger connected with the Court, and he possibly might have to appoint another messenger.

Vote agreed to.

28. Contingencies and Disbursements, including Judges' travelling expenses and printing and binding reports, also salaries of officers to be appointed in the Supreme Court of Canada, and the Exchequer Court..... $8,000.00

Mr. MITCHELL said he supposed, looking at the large expenditure for Judges, that where it was found more convenient and less expensive, the Court would go to Halifax and British Columbia to collect evidence.

Mr. BLAKE said under such circumstances the Judges would at any rate go to Halifax and Quebec, but it was not proposed that they should go to such a distant point as British Columbia. In case it was necessary to obtain evidence at British Columbia ample provision was made for obtaining it by commission, and transmitting it here.

Vote agreed to.

29. Salary of Registrar of Vice-Admiralty Court, Quebec,..... $666.66

Mr. JONES (Halifax) asked why a salary was put down for the Vice-Admiralty Court of Quebec, and nothing for the Halifax Court. He thought it was a new item.

Mr. BLAKE said this was nothing new, it had appeared in the accounts for several years. He found on investigation lately, that the Court Registrar received fees. He had transferred the item from where it was before to the present place in order that it might be properly understood by the House. The system of fees was first introduced by Sir George Cartier during the absence at Washington of the right hon. member for Kingston. He had caused a return to be made, from which it appeared that the Registrar's fees amounted to a considerable sum. He would ask the House to pass the item this year, and before next year he would cause a full examination to be made.

Mr. BLAKE.

Mr. MITCHELL said the whole Court required considerable reformation. From his experience in the Vice-Admiralty Court, he judged that the system was most cumbersome, involving great delay and expense.

Mr. BLAKE said it was due to the learned Judge of that Court to say that the hon. member must be mistaken, or he would not cast a reflection upon the Judge's conduct.

Mr. MITCHELL said he did not mean to cast any reflection upon the Judge of the Court. On the contrary, he thought he was a very able man. The system of taking evidence and the obtaining of witnesses was very cumbersome, and the delay was very great. He desired not to be understood as passing any reflection upon the Judge or any of his officers; they were all very courteous and gentlemanly. He did not find fault with them, but with the system, and as some changes were contemplated, he hoped that the entire system would be investigated and improved, both as to fees and the manner of taking evidence.

Mr. CARON said Parliament could not interfere in the matter, the arrangements having been regulated by an Imperial Act. The Court was one of the best conducted in the country. All the officers were always ready to do their duty, and he could bear testimony to their zeal. He thought the question of fees was regulated altogether by the Imperial Act.

Mr. BLAKE said he did not propose to interfere with the fees, but to regulate the salaries, as having some relation to the fees. It was not within the competence of the Dominion Parliament at present to alter the form of business in the Admiralty Court, which was established under a Imperial statute, and its rules were in force under the authority of that statute. Representations had been made to his predecessor by the Judge of Quebec, and by the officer of the Admiralty Court of Halifax, to the effect that the procedure was so cumbersome as to deter litigants from applying to the courts. He had an opportunity upon a recent occasion to place this matter before the Imperial authorities, and it was agreed to modify the arrangements. The system in force in the Admiralty Courts in Canada was antiquated, the modern improvements introduced in England, not having been extended to the outlying Admiralty Courts. He had learned that it was the intention of the Imperial Government to give Canada the benefit, he hoped at not a very remote time, of those improvements.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said the point he wished to make was, why the Court in Quebec was paid by fees and not the Court of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

Mr. BLAKE said his view was that no Court officers should be paid by fees.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said the Judge presiding over the Court in Halifax had been obliged to pay the crier and messengers of the Court out of his own pocket. He thought the time had arrived when the item under discussion should be struck off.

Mr. BLAKE said the House would observe that the officers had been paid for the last six years.

Mr. MASSON said he hoped the Minister of Justice would see the propriety of leaving these Estimates for a future occasion, as the report was not before them in a printed form. He invited the attention of the Prime Minister to the matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he had known occasions when the Estimates were passed without any reports at all being in possession of the House. At present every report that could be presented was before them, and the items were given with the utmost possible detail.

Mr. BLAKE said that, under the law as it now stood, the report of the Inspector of Penitentiaries could not be made until the 1st of February; consequently it was utterly impossible to have it now before the House in printed shape. It was presented at the earliest possible moment; and he was informed that it could not be printed at all during the session. He agreed with the view of the hon.

gentleman that the report should be printed, and for this and other reasons he was prepared, and hoped, to introduce to the consideration of the House on Monday a Bill making certain changes, such as arranging for the presentation of the annual Report, in future, in October, for the preceding fiscal year up to the month of July. He hoped that the House would accept the modification, and remedy the inconvenience of which complaint was made.

Mr. MASSON: I think the Report concerning Penitentiaries was before us two years ago, and if we cannot get it now we are retrograding.

Mr. BLAKE: I merely state what the wisdom of Parliament unanimously agreed upon a few years ago. Perhaps this wisdom was in error, and a change may be made in the manner I have suggested. As to the appropriation, hon. gentlemen will observe that the amount is considerably increased. The increases for the maintenance of convicts have almost or entirely amounted to $19,000, and this is almost entirely due to the augmented number of prisoners. The Estimates last year were based on a prison population of 625, owing partly to a great increase of crime throughout the country, and partly to the circumstance that we are obliged to send large numbers of Quebec prisoners from St. Vincent de Paul, in consequence of its lack of accommodation. The Estimates are not based upon a prison population of 770. The increased expenditure is almost entirely due to that fact, although, to a certain extent, it is owing to the increased cost of some of the articles required. Hon. gentlemen will observe that I have distinguished the items this year—a sub-division that did not exist last year—and I intend next year to introduce still further sub-divisions. The vote, $55,000, for maintenance, was made en bloc last year, but it is now distributed among officers' clothing and the maintenance of convicts, buildings, implements, &c. It is not to be understood that officers' clothing is a new item; it was embraced in former estimates, and I intend next year to make an item of the vote for salaries. Another item relates to gratuities to retiring officers. It is apparently an increase, but it was omitted by error last year. I hope that the whole of that vote will not be required to be used during the approaching year. There is further, an item for additional farm land and a small item for fencing. The number of prisoners is very largely increased. The old contracts for labour are running out in one case; in another case the Company failed, and in the third case the contractor has given notice it is utterly impossible to obtain any new contracts, although every effort has been made in this direction. Under these circumstances, the mode of employing the labour has been a source of very considerable anxiety. We have procured from the various public departments any work that could be got, but it is obvious that we ought to make an effort to secure further employment. With this object in view it is proposed to purchase a farm, and add to the grounds, the price being in my opinion moderate. I hope the investment will prove profitable, besides giving good and wholesome labour to the convicts.

Mr. MASSON said that if he understood the matter aright, the increase in the expenditure had been proportionately greater than the addition to the number of the convicts, having advanced from $55,000 in 1876-77, for 625 men, about $88 per head, to $75,000 in 1877-78, for 770 men, so that for 145 convicts more, it would cost $20,000, which would make for the 145 men, $127 per head.

Mr. BLAKE said the item of buildings, furniture and implements was larger than in the former year, and also the item for maintenance, which led to an item being proposed last year in the Supplementary Estimates. The cost of living was also higher.

Mr. MASSON asked if the hon. gentleman expected to have 770 prisoners, exclusive of those that would be sent to St. Vincent de Paul?

Mr. BLAKE said he had no expectation of being able to send any to St. Vincent de Paul during the present financial year. On the contrary, he estimated for 60 from St. Vincent de Paul.

Mr. MASSON pointed out that there was a great difference between the amount asked for gratuities to retiring officers at Kingston and at St. Vincent de Paul. In the latter case, the total amount for gratuities was put in a lump sum of $1,000.

Mr. BLAKE said the law and regulations provided in certain cases for gratuities, but these must depend on the number of convicts discharged. There had been a rather irregular system as to the officers, but he had adopted a regular system. If an officer retired who had behaved well, he recommended the Council to grant a month's salary for a year of service. In these cases, however, he took the estimate of the amount required from the Warden, but the same principle was applied in all the Penitentiaries.

Mr. MASSON said the amount for gratuities at St. Vincent de Paul was estimated at $1,000 in all for both convicts and officers, while at Kingston another system must prevail, because there $2,000 was asked for officers' gratuities alone. Still, there were only 14 more officers in Kingston than in St. Vincent de Paul.

Mr. BLAKE said these things depended upon circumstances. Last year, St. Vincent de Paul was in a considerable state of disorganization. He had had to retire quite a number of the officers, and he supposed the Warden imagined that the present staff would remain for some time. He (Mr. Blake) should not hesitate, if the exigency of the public service required it, to retire more officers, and he should trust to Parliament to indemnify him for the cost. He could only take the estimate of the Warden.

In answer to Mr. LANGEVIN.

Mr. BLAKE said the item for St. Vincent de Paul was applicable to both officers and convicts. As to criminal lunatics a vote of $3,500 was taken for them under the head of the Rockwood Asylum.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said an important subject was the utilization of convict labour. They found that every year there was a considerable loss by the Penitentiaries in the different Provinces, while in the neighbouring Republic convict labour was employed advantageously, and, in some cases, at a profit. It was a difficult question, and he thought it was very undesirable that convict labour should be brought into competition with the honest mechanic and labourer outside the prison walls. He thought some system might be devised by which convict labour might be utilized without bringing it into competition with the labour outside, and he hoped that, as in England, the labour might be made remunerative and might make these establishments self-supporting.

Mr. BLAKE said he confessed he was unable to conceive of a plan by which he could propose a remunerative system of employing the labour of convicts without to some extent displacing the free labour outside. It was clear that, if convicts did the work, someone outside who would otherwise have done it, must be deprived of it. He thought there were considerable disadvantages in the contract system, and quite agreed that, if they could find another system, it would be more advantageous. But, as that system had always been adopted at Kingston, and as he had no other means of doing the work, he had thought it his duty to let the labour for a reasonably short time if he could. He accordingly advertised for tenders, but failed in obtaining them. He had, therefore, asked the Departments to give him any work they might have to do. The Postmaster-General had given him a contract for some mail bags, and he had also obtained work from the Minister of Militia, and for boots for the Mounted Police; but in none of these cases could he discover that he was not displacing an equivalent amount of free labour. In order to obtain a useful and healthy employment for the convicts, he had thought it desirable to ask for a sum to add to the farm land of the institution. He hoped the convicts would be engaged in producing vegetables for the prison, and perhaps for the market, but he was afraid that, if they did not do so, some farmers would be producing the supplies, so that there again they would be entering into competition with free labour.

Mr. DYMOND said he quite agreed with the remarks of the hon. member from Frontenac as to the desirability of adopting the best system of convict labour. He did not sympathise with him in the objection to convicts being trained in the arts of honest labour, and he fancied that, although the honest labourer might in one way find a disadvantage by the work being performed by convicts, he gained in the long run by their being trained to useful avocations. He had a strong opinion that convict labour could not be made profitable. He did not believe that people working under the conditions under which convicts worked were likely to produce results of the profitable nature that would accrue from the work of free men. He would suggest to the Minister of Justice another point—that of securing employment for persons who, after they had undergone the reformatory process, which they should desire to see carried out in the prisons, were turned adrift upon the world. There could, he supposed, be nothing more inimical to a sound, economical system than turning adrift men who had no avocation, who had lost their character, and who were most likely, almost perforce, to return to the place whence they came. It was the more serious when they saw that in one year the Minister estimated an increase of our criminal population by something like one-third. But, when they found that the total number of persons in the Penitentiaries did not exceed something like 1,300, the problem ought not to be one very difficult of solution. There could hardly be any greater duty devolving upon them than to prevent the increase amongst us of a criminal population. He had seen too much in the crowded population of the old country of such a class growing up not to desire most earnestly that we should endeavour to avert such a result in this country. It was very difficult to obtain employment, even under the most favourable circumstances, for persons who had been known as inmates of Penitentiaries, but it would be strange indeed if they could not hope that, in many cases, reformation would succeed the salutatory treatment they had been providing for these persons during so many years. In Great Britain, a Society had been established, which though not in an official position, was recognized by the authorities as an earnest coöperator with them, under the name of the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society. It was the duty of this Society to take in hand those persons who showed a desire to lead an honest life after being discharged from prison, and to endeavour to find them employment where they might be treated judiciously and removed as far as possible from temptation, so that in the course of a few years their history might be forgotten and they might become useful members of society. He should think in a community like ours, where the population was sparse, where there was a great demand for labour, where, in fact we were importing emigrants from Europe in order to provide the labour that the manufacturers and farmers required, that the Inspector of Prisons might devise some scheme whereby a percentage of those persons might be provided with employment on their discharge from prison. He knew something of the difficulties of the system and the prejudices which prevailed in regard to it; but those difficulties and prejudices were not altogether insuperable if they endeavoured to deal with the subject on a small scale at first, enlarging it in proportion to the success which might follow.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. member for North York had said truly that the question was surrounded with difficulties, and one of the main difficulties was as to the mode of employing convict labour. The contract system was objectionable on many grounds. It was to a great degree destructive of, or prejudicial to, the discipline of the prison, and thwarted the efforts of the officers in effecting the desired reform. The contractor's only object was to get as much work out of the convict, and make him as profitable as possible. As a body, he believed contractors to be respectable men, but inducements were held out to the prisoners, by little bribes or otherwise, to get as great an amount of labour out of them as possible and to keep them in good humour. Besides they got improper information with respect to what was going on among their families and the outside world, which they ought not to get, except through the constituted authorities. The system was bad, and had been utterly condemned in the old country. The greatest authority on the question said it was injurious, if not destructive, to any Reformatory. During his Administration, the effort was made to employ some of the convicts, without the intervention of a middle-man or contractor, through the officers themselves. But there were great difficulties surrounding that system. It was almost impossible to make the men labour profitably. There was not the same inducement to make them work as if they were under a contractor. The labour was mere routine, and was unprofitable. One of the great aims of the establishment of Penitentiaries, as distinguished from the ordinary prisons, was to attempt to reform, as well as to punish the men. While the law was vindicated and the crime punished, the convict was to undergo a sort of treatment, severe and stern, yet paternal that he might leave the institution a wiser and better man, with something of the milk of human kindness toward his fellow-men in his breast. The great object was to attain that, but as to how it was to be done, one could see the difficulty rather than suggest the remedy. But the remedy was, he thought, to employ them under the direct supervision of the officers as much as possible and in those branches of trade which would, as little as possible, interfere with the honest artisan outside the Penitentiary. To a certain extent, the hon. gentleman was correct in stating that every pound of work done within the Penitentiary walls displaced a certain amount of work done outside. That, however, was not strictly the case, for, in this country, where we were importing articles for use that we did not manufacture, articles which were not yet introduced as ordinary branches of industry might be manufactured in the Penitentiary under the direct supervision of the officers and would displace and disturb as little as possible the labour of the outside artisan. In England, it was admitted by political economists to be unfair to run convict labour against honest labour. They held it was granting a bounty to the criminal, who was fed, clothed, doctored and otherwise attended to, and it was not right to place him in competition with the honest artisan who had his family to look after, and other expenses and difficulties to meet. In this country the system has not had the same injurious effects. We have a sparse population and wanted more labourers, and he did not think, the system would have as injurious an effect here as in England. He had no doubt, however, it would cause a great deal of uneasiness and discontent, as it was now one of the means used by agitators to arouse workmen against the Government both in the United States and in Canada. He scarcely knew how to suggest any remedy, except that new industries not yet introduced should be introduced in the Penitentiaries, and that as much as possible of the work should be done under the direct auspices of the officers rather than by contractors. Would the hon. the Minister of Justice say what progress had been made towards acquiring the land required for the Penitentiary?

Mr. BLAKE said the offer which had been made appeared a very reasonable one, and arrangements would be made to complete the bargain subject to the approval of Parliament. His hon. friend from North York had properly said that the great object of the Penitentiary system was the reformation of criminals, but the hon. gentleman added that they ought not to lose sight of the convict after he left the prison, but endeavour to find him honest employment. That would give the duties of the Government a very wide range, and he did not think that at present he could see his way to inaugurating such a system. His hon. friend from Kingston seemed to concur in the general view of the question taken by the hon. member for North York, and they all three agreed that Government ought, even if it did not attempt to undertake to find employment for the convicts when they left the Penitentiary, to try as far as possible to fit them for profitable and remunerative employment, or to make the Penitentiary instruction conducive to their chances of obtaining an honest living after the term expired. But it would be utterly inconsistent with the object of enabling those men to earn an honest livelihood if they were trained in some trade or employment which they could not follow when they left the Penitentiary. He did not know what particular trades or employment the hon. member for Kingston would suggest, but he could understand that the introduction of the manufacture of articles which were used but not produced in Canada at present would involve a large outlay of capital, extensive machinery, skilled workmanship, &c. He did not mean to say that we had not some such trades, but roughly speaking, that was the kind of industry which was surrounded with the difficulties he had mentioned. The ordinary mechanical trades were those which could be most likely carried on with the least loss and with the nearest approach to an equilibrium, and also the most likely to enable the convicts to earn a living after they left the prison. The hon. member for Kingston had adverted to the competition of convict labour with free labour, and pointed out that political economists had declared that the advantages the convicts possessed were unfair to the honest workmen outside the prison. But it was to be remembered that, with all the criminals' advantages, it was still a question of free against slave labour, and he believed the importance of this distinction could not be over-estimated. The net results of free labour, he thought, would always be found greater than those of slave labour. No one had yet suggested a scheme of employing the convicts which did not more or less conflict with honest labour. Some time ago they had a contract for the manufacture of boots and shoes by the convicts. The contractor had power to continue the contract, but before it expired he gave notice to cancel it. They endeavoured to get him to prolong the contract for a short time at reduced prices, as it was thought inadvisable to deprive the prisoners suddenly of occupation. But the manufacturer would not continue the contract on any terms, as he concluded he was better without convict labour. The prisoners did their work fairly well, but it could not be expected that they would do as good a day's work as free people who were animated by altogether different motives. But with our number of prisoners, modes of employment and state of labour in this country, the question was not likely to become a pressing one for some time to come. It might be agitated from time to time; indeed they had discovered that certain hon. members would avail themselves of the opportunity it afforded for agitation. The aim of the Government should be to make convict labour diminish the expenses of the Penitentiaries, conduce to the reformation of the men, and place them in the way of becoming useful members of society, without necessarily entering into competition with free labour.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said he was not certain whether the hon. the Minister of Justice had insinuated that he had attempted to raise the question of free labour against convict labour. If that was the insinuation he denied it entirely and hurled it back across the floor of the House. Because the question was a difficult one, that was no reason why it should not be raised in this House, and debated fairly and calmly and without any insinuations being cast. He was not ashamed to say that the subject was a difficult one to him. Mechanics had spoken to him about it and said: "How can we compete in making boots and shoes with convict labour?" He brought up the question as a fair one. He brought it up in an endeavour to make these institutions as self-supporting as possible, while at the same time interfering with free labour outside as little as possible. He did not belittle the importance of the question, nor did he object to the convicts being trained to some useful trade; he believed that was one of the objects for which they were incarcerated; but he believed, at the same time, that there were some industries in which their labour might be employed without coming into competition with local trade or local mechanics.

An HON. MEMBER: How?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said it was a difficult question to particularize, but he might venture to name one industry which, so far as he was informed, was not carried on in Canada, and which did not require expensive machinery, neither would it interfere with free labour. It was an industry carried on in Penitentiaries in England, and he saw no reason why we should not import the raw material and carry it on here. He referred to the manufacture of mats.

Mr MACKENZIE: Mats are made in Canada.

Mr. SCHULTZ: At Cobourg.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK: I do not know to what extent, but I have my information from very good authority.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Another industry would be the making of canvas.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said there were many other things. At all events there was no reason why the Minister of Justice should not tell the House that he had given the matter his attention, without casting across the floor of the House insinuations, as he had done. He (Mr. Kirkpatrick) desired to see convict labour utilized, but he wanted it done without injury to the free labourer or mechanic.

Mr. MILLS said the position taken by the hon. gentleman was a very extraordinary one. He argued: If we withdraw a few hundred people engaged in the ordinary industries of the country, and confine them where they do less than if they were free, thereby free labourers are unfairly competed with. He would ask him what was the difference by way of competition between a thousand men in Kingston Penitentiary and the same thousand engaged in the ordinary mechanical and industrial pursuits of the country, competing as free labourers. Were they in a worse condition? Certainly their labour was less efficient than it would be if they had the motives of free men, so they competed less as criminals than as honest citizens. The hon. member for Kingston had said these men did not really do a great deal of harm while they were at large, but the moment they were confined they were brought into conflict with honest labour. They ought then to try and remedy that mischief, and to leave these men at large. The logical inference of the argument of the member for Frontenac was that the prisoners should do nothing. But what were they to do with them? If they must not employ their labour, they must pension them. There was one class of persons they pensioned for long and faithful work for the State; but here was a class of criminals whom they were to pension in order that the whole population might not suffer by their industry. That was a very extraordinary theory of political economy which the hon. gentlemen opposite adopted. When they occupied the Treasury benches they asked for money to enter into competition with the free labour of this country by bringing out immigrants, and yet they complained because the prisoners in the Penitentiary, by compulsion of the State, were made to do the very thing they put immigrants to do. Supposing that the views of the hon. member for Kingston were carried out—leaving out the objection which the hon. Minister of Justice had pointed out, that these men could not obtain employment after they came from the Penitentiary—if they engaged them at unprofitable pursuits, how were they to make up the loss which the State sustained? They would have to put a tax upon the industries of the country. These considerations were perfectly conclusive to his mind against, he would not say the arguments, but the clap-trap suggestions of the hon. member for Frontenac. He was glad to see that the opinions of the hon. member for Kingston had undergone some change. He remembered, on one occasion, that hon. gentleman telling the House that it was not the duty of the State to help but to hurt criminals; that it was not the part of the State, at all events not principally, to confine prisoners in order to secure their reformation.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I say so yet.

Mr. MILLS: The hon. gentleman's opinions have undergone some change.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Not in the slightest.

Mr. MILLS: I think so.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said it was all very well for the hon. member to talk that way. He had always held the same opinions as he had expressed to-night: first, punishment; but, after punishment itself, it had always been held by civilized Governments that there was a secondary, a more important duty, but still not the principal duty, namely, to attempt to reform the convict. To say that an attempt had been made to arouse the honest mechanic against the convict system was not worthy of the hon. gentleman. When he held the place of the Minister of Justice, he had stated the difficulty again and again, and he repeated his objections against the contract system again and again, but he did not see how they were to get rid of it at once, although he hoped this might be done by degrees. As to the argument of his hon. friend, he would only say it was against Mr. Mill, who said, "It is contrary to the first principles of political economy to subsidize convict labour against free labour."

Mr. MILLS: Just in the proportion as it is not self-sustaining.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the Government would listen with great pleasure to any suggestions which would diminish, in any way, the cost of this Institution. He had always felt that it was strange that, there being 1,000 people costing $100,000, they could not obtain 20 cents per diem. Undoubtedly, this was an extremely difficult matter. He knew it was very difficult to get a fair day's labour out of a convict. After all said and done, the best solution of the difficulty was what the present Minister and the ex-Minister of Justice had suggested, viz., the cultivation of the soil.

Mr. HAGGART asked the reason of the great difference in the cost in the different penitentiaries throughout the country. He found that a Penitentiary prisoner in Ontario cost $155 per year; down in St. Vincent de Paul, nearly $300; in Manitoba and British Columbia $600 or $700. The latter was a very large sum for the maintenance of prisoners.

Mr. BLAKE: Hear, hear.

Mr. HAGGART: I would like to ask what is the difference in maintenance here and on the other side, say in

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

New York, and whether these are self-sustaining.

Mr. BLAKE said the hon. gentleman had asked two different questions; the principle susceptible of a solution of the first would not apply to the second. It was true there was an apparently enormous discrepancy in the cost of the various Penitentiaries at so much per head, but this was attributable to several circumstances. In the first place he might lay down the rule, that the larger the number of prisoners in any institution the smaller per head would be the cost, because for a large number of prisoners the same proportion of guards and officers would not be required as for a small number; supplies could be more cheaply furnished in proportion; and then a building for a small number would proportionately cost more than for a large number, as it would have to be built with a view to its future necessities. On looking at the Estimates a cogent proof of this would be found. In calculating the presumed increase of prisoners in the Kingston Penitentiary, only two more officers had been appointed, and, although there was a much less population in the cities in Manitoba and British Columbia where the Penitentiaries were built, nearly the same number of officers would have to be employed as at Kingston a short time ago, for nearly the same number of gates, &c., would have to be watched. As to St. Vincent de Paul, the circumstances were peculiar. The building was not very well adapted for the purpose, and not being in the same place where most of the criminals come from, the provisions and general management cost more. He had reduced the guards to the lowest possible number to secure safety. As soon as the new building was erected the expense per head would be diminished, although not, he thought, to the same extent as at Kingston. These observations would apply to Halifax and St. John, with the additional observation that their expenses were even now smaller than at St. Vincent de Paul, where owing to an arrangement made before Confederation, a large number of short term prisoners were kept, causing a great expense and being to the detriment of the institution so far as its reformatory influence went. The hon. gentleman would notice that a building was being constructed at Dorchester as a Penitentiary for the Maritime Provinces. That of course would be on a large scale, and he expected considerable economy to result from it.

Mr. CURRIER said he thought it ought to be considered whether there was not a larger number of prisoners sent to the Penitentiary than there ought to be. He knew four or five men who had got into a row through having too much liquor, on the other side of the river, who had been brought to this side and sent to the Penitentiary for five years. They were very respectable, decent fellows, all of them. His hon. friend who sat beside him and himself had tried to get them out for the last three or four years, but had not succeeded. He did not know what length of time they had to serve yet.

Mr. BLAKE: What did they do?

Mr. CURRIER: They got into a row; nothing very serious. They were decent fellows.

Mr. BLAKE: If the hon. member will give me their names I will see if I cannot take some steps to restore them to the society of his friends.

Mr. CURRIER said if hon. gentlemen were guilty of half they were charged with they ought to be in the Penitentiary.

Mr. KERR said he thought it was his duty to correct the misapprehension entertained by the hon. member for Frontenac, with regard to the mat factory. This trade had been extensively established in the town of Cobourg, and that municipality had given a very large bonus towards the encouragement of this important industry. He failed to see why convict labour should to any appreciable extent affect free labour prejudicially. He supposed that the object of all punishment was two-fold: to prevent the repetition of the offence, and to reform the offender. He could not conceive how this result could be so well attained as by teaching the prisoner some useful art or trade.

Vote agreed to.

34. Rockwood Asylum, $3,500.

Mr. BLAKE explained that this small sum was asked in anticipation of the early transfer of the Asylum to the Province of Ontario. The agreement which had been completed would be laid on the table, and a Bill of which he had given notice in this regard would be shortly presented to the House.

Vote agreed to.

35. Halifax Penitentiary, $28,824.63.

36. St. John Penitentiary, $40,498.50.

Mr. LANGEVIN said he saw on page 48 of the Public Accounts that the following revenues were furnished by the Penitentiaries named: Kingston, $12,600; St. Vincent de Paul, less than $2,000; Halifax, $9,205, and St. John, $19,148. St. John gave the largest revenue, and, with Halifax, more than double the revenue of Kingston Penitentiary.

Mr. BLAKE said the explanation was very easy. If the hon. member looked at the bottom of the vote for Halifax, he would see a vote for materials and maintenance of plant; and at the bottom of the vote for St. John a similar item. They purchased each year a good deal of raw material; and at St. John pails and brooms were manufactured. He was sorry to say that this enterprise had been seriously injured, owing to the competition from the United States, of which so much complaint had been made by other employers of labour, and he, too, took this opportunity of saying that this was a severe grievance.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: We will protect you.

Mr. BLAKE: I will be glad to put the hon. gentleman in a position to protect me, and to give him the opportunity of producing pails and brooms. I am sorry that the net result has not been more favourable, as far as profit and loss is concerned.

Mr. LANGEVIN read a short extract from an English work on contract labour, to the effect, that, although profit was not so narrowly looked after under such circumstances as by employers of other labour, still the convicts could be best employed upon work required by the Government.

Mr. BLAKE: That is the principle I would work upon.

Mr. LANGEVIN said such a system would have the advantage of saving much money to the public. It was the rule in England and elsewhere, that prisons were self-sustaining when they were not large. The matter required careful study, and as these institutions would, unfortunately, be permanent, for this there would be abundant time and opportunity.

Mr. BLAKE said the statements of the hon. member contained a great deal of truth. Overgrown convict establishments were not so desirable, in his opinion, as smaller ones. The increase of convicts during the past two years had been abnormal. This was due, in part, to the great depression, and, in part, to the large numbers of persons who had come from the United States to Canada. He believed that the Kingston Penitentiary would accommodate the prison population of the Province of Ontario.

Mr. MASSON said that he was very happy to agree with the Minister of Justice relative to the cost of maintaining large and small Penitentiaries. He was very glad to see the hon. gentleman had discovered the reason why the St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary had proved so expensive; still it had been very difficult for his hon. friend from Chateauguay to understand this fact two years ago. In fact a committee of investigation was then appointed in this regard. It was absolutely necessary to have the same staff of officers for a small as well as for a large number of prisoners.

Mr. HOLTON: We found that out two years ago.

Mr. MASSON said he did not believe it was possible to have a Warden at the head of the Penitentiary who would conduct its management more economically and zealously than the officer appointed by the Hon. the Minister of Justice. The principal difficulty connected with the institution arose from the unsuitable character of the building. From a personal visit to the Penitentiary he was satisfied there was a constant danger of convicts escaping, owing to the Warden's quarters not being surrounded by a wall, and there being wooden cells. He hoped the Government would push forward the work of building the wall. As the Government had purchased stone quarries in the neighbourhood, the convicts might be employed there, and a tramway built for the transportation of the quarried stone. The employment of convicts on farm work, except for the necessities of the Penitentiary, was a dangerous undertaking, from the difficulties experienced in superintendence, and under such circumstances an additional number of guards would become necessary.

Mr. BLAKE said the convicts of St. Vincent de Paul were engaged in getting out stone for the new building and brick works had been established to provide bricks to be used on the building and for sale. The question of constructing a tramway had been under consideration for a considerable time, but no decision had been arrived at with regard to it. A few trades were carried on by the convicts at Kingston.

Mr. HAGGART inquired why there were two surgeons at Kingston Penitentiary.

Mr. BLAKE said the arrangement had been made by the late Government.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said it happened there were two surgeons living in the immediate vicinity, an elderly gentleman possessing much skill and a young and energetic practitioner, and so the salary formerly given to one surgeon, $1,200, was divided between them.

Mr. JONES (Leeds) said there were large deposits of iron ore at Kingston, and he would suggest that the manufacture of steel and iron rails could be carried on in the neighbourhood of the Penitentiary with great advantage. He regretted that the hon. the Minister of Justice had expressed himself in favour of carrying on the ordinary mechanical trades in the Penitentiaries.

Mr. BLAKE said he did not suggest that all mechanical trades should be carried on, but that he believed the convicts should be trained in such ordinary mechanical trades as they could find profitable employment in after leaving the Penitentiary.

Mr. JONES (Leeds) said he would regret very much if trades should be carried on which would compete with honest labour. Boot and shoe contractors failed because more goods were manufactured than they could find a market for in Canada, and they could not send their goods into the United States markets. But from every Penitentiary in that country goods came into the Dominion, and the consequence was that our manufacturing interests were ruined.

Mr. BLAKE said the contractor he referred to did not fail. He employed 75 hands in the Penitentiary. Now, the total manufacture of boots and shoes was estimated at $16,000 and they could imagine what an appreciable difference the labour of 75 men would make in the interests of that large industry.

37. St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary .....$78,164.13
38. Manitoba Penitentiary...$14,389.77.

Mr. BLAKE said they had considered the question of the Surgeon for this institution. There were difficulties attending the appointment of a practitioner residing at Winnipeg. The Penitentiary was situated about 16 miles from the city, and the doctor would have to drive in several times a week; it would also be inconvenient in the case of accidents occurring, which would require immediate attendance. It was thought best to have a man who would settle near the institution, in the hope of extending his practice as the country prospered. He thought $800 was an economical sum for the service.

Mr. MITCHELL asked if it would not have been better to locate the Penitentiary near the city.

Mr. MACKENZIE said it was necessary to get near an abundance of stone on which the convicts could work.

Mr. RYAN asked whether the appointments of Wardens and others had been made.

Mr. BLAKE said Mr. Benson, an excellent officer, had been appointed Warden.

Mr. SCHULTZ asked why coal had been used instead of wood for heating purposes. The cost of the former was $27 per ton, whereas wood could be obtained for $2 per cord.

Mr. BLAKE said the House would readily realize the difficulty of administering the internal economy of an institution of that kind; and that was one reason why he had asked the appointment of an assistant inspector. A telegram was received from the Warden in the fall, stating that it was necessary that a certain number of tons of coal and eleven stoves should be purchased immediately. The message was so urgent that it was impossible to make inquiries, but he presumed the circumstances were such as to justify the purchase, and he therefore authorized it. He had, however, asked explanations from the Warden on the subject.

Mr. SCHULTZ said he could readily perceive the difficulties under which the Department laboured, which pointed to the necessity of a speedy appointment of an Inspector. He suggested the advisability of making a road from the Penitentiary to Winnipeg. It was partly the duty of the Government to build that road, because it passed through the reservations of the children of the half-breeds. No doubt telegraphic communication would also be necessary. The country was dangerous to travel in winter, and the telegraph posts would be of great service as guide posts.

Mr. BLAKE said there was no authority to employ the prisoners outside of the grounds designated as the Penitentiary.

Mr. MITCHELL asked how many prisoners there were in the Institution.

Mr. BLAKE said the Estimate was for 18 prisoners.

Mr. MASSON said it was very extraordinary that in a building for 18 prisoners, eleven coal stoves should be required.

Mr. BLAKE said the Penitentiary was not designed for 18 prisoners. It was expected that Manitoba would progress and furnish a large number of inmates for the institution in time.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the law provided that the Penitentiary should be useful for the maintenance of prisoners in the North-West beyond the boundary of Manitoba.

39. British Columbia Penitentiary.....$20,950.00

Mr. MITCHELL asked the reason of the large increase.

M. BLAKE said the note explained this. It was as follows:—

“The convicts have hitherto been maintained in the local prisons under temporary arrangements, pending the completion of the new Penitentiary. The increase is attributable to the extra cost of a separate establishment for a small number of convicts.”

Mr. BUNSTER said he thought if the Government allowed persons to take out the convicts at so much per day and utilize their labour as much as possible, a great portion of the expenses, as put down in the Estimates, would be saved. Where convicts in British Columbia now cost $600 each a year, under the system he proposed they would not cost more than $300. It was tried in Washington Territory and found practicable. They could return at night when the day's work was done.

Mr. BLAKE: That would be contrary to the whole Penitentiary system, and I am afraid it would go against the reformation of the prisoners.

Mr. BUNSTER: It was found to work well in Washington Territory.

Mr. BLAKE: I am sure if the hon. gentleman will make any practical suggestions, whereby the present great expenses can be reduced, nobody will be more grateful than myself.

Mr. BUNSTER: I think a person ought to be allowed to take prisoners out, at so much a day, and have the benefit of their labour.

Mr. BLANCHET: What would become of the building.

Mr. BUNSTER: The prisoners would remain there every night.

Mr. BLAKE: They are mostly Chinese and Indians.

Mr. BUNSTER: Yes; and they furnish an example of the way the Liquor Act operates in our Province.

Mr. BLAKE.

Mr. BLAKE: They cannot get liquor.

Mr. BUNSTER: But they can get it. The Indians make it themselves. The law is so strict that a man cannot sell it to them. If the law were thrown open they would be able to get a better glass of liquor than they get now. Hon. gentlemen may laugh, but I have seen it tried practically. In the Sandwich Islands the natives are not allowed to have it, but when they come as sailors to our ports they are permitted to go to taverns the same as other people, and they act like peaceable citizens. It would be wise to give this liberty to our Indians, or the majority of them. You cannot suppress liquor drinking. If an Indian cannot buy it, he will get a coal oil can, some sugar and molasses, and other materials, and make an intoxicating liquor for himself.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Yes, and the worst kind of spirits, too.

Mr. BUNSTER: Hence the reason for crime among our population. I think it would be wise to throw the trade in liquor open to the Indians.

Mr. McCALLUM: Then the Penitentiary ought to be turned into a distillery.

Mr. BUNSTER: I never suggested that.

FORM OF PETITIONS.

SPEAKER'S RULING.

Motion being made,

“That the Petition of Elias Tower and others, interested in the navigation of the St. Lawrence, praying for further improvements to facilitate the navigation of the River St. Lawrence, be now received,”

Mr. SPEAKER decided: That in accordance with Rule 85, which requires the signatures of at least three Petitioners on the sheet containing the prayer of the Petition, and the sheet of the prayer of this Petition not having any signature at all, it cannot be received.

PROTEST OF INLAND BILLS BILL.

FIRST READING.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) introduced a Bill (No. 37) relating to the Protest of Inland Bills in the Province of Nova Scotia. He explained that it was merely intended to extend to the Province of Nova Scotia the laws which existed in the other Provinces with respect to the protest of Inland Bills and notes of hand. The banks in Nova Scotia could not at present protest a bill of inland exchange, or a promissory note, at the expense of the defaulter, and the Bill provides, that in case of such default the banks can make protest in the same manner as they would concerning a foreign bill of exchange, at the expense of the defaulter, fixing the cost of the notarial certificate at one dollar.

PROCEDURE IN CRIMINAL CASES BILL.

FIRST READING.

Mr. PALMER introduced a Bill (No. 38) respecting procedure in criminal cases in New Brunswick. He said the Bill was rendered necessary in consequence of a change in the law concerning criminal cases, or rather a change in jurisdiction with reference to such cases from the Supreme Court to the County Courts of the different Provinces. He did not exactly know what the procedure regarding appeals from decisions of Judges trying criminal cases might be in Ontario or the other Provinces, New Brunswick excepted, but in that Province there was no appeal whatever, save at the discretion of the Judge holding the Court. No practical difficulty in this regard had arisen so long as such jurisdiction had been confined entirely to the principal

Court of the Province, because the Judges had been accustomed to consult each other, and to reserve questions of law for the consideration of the Court, when any reason existed for such a course, but since the creation of County Courts jurisdiction in criminal cases—capital cases excepted—had been conferred on any single Judge, who did not have the same standing as a Judge of the Supreme Court, and it was a very serious jurisdiction and power to place in the hands of any County Judge without any remedy in the way of appeal. The general object of the Bill was to remedy this defect. He would go farther into the matter on the second reading, when he proposed to show, more particularly for the satisfaction of the Minister of Justice, why he thought that this or some similar Bill should be passed.

Mr. BLAKE said he was sure his hon. friend would agree with him that he should establish some cogent reason why a Bill should be passed, making the criminal procedure in one Province different from that which obtained in the other Provinces. He did not mean to say that such procedure was precisely alike in all the Provinces, but the endeavour had been made to assimilate it as far as was possible, and it was almost alike in all; therefore, unless some very special reason was applicable in the case of New Brunswick, he thought it would be difficult to sustain this Bill in the restricted form in which it was introduced.

Mr. PALMER said he did not think jurisdiction in criminal cases was identical throughout the Dominion. He might, however, be in error.

Mr. BLAKE: It is very nearly so.

Mr. PALMER said if the evil of which he complained existed in the other Provinces, of course he would have no objection to discuss the question in a more extended relation.

INSOLVENT ACTS REPEAL BILL.

FIRST READING.

Mr. PALMER introduced a Bill (No. 39) to repeal the Insolvent Act of 1875, and all Acts passed in amendment thereof. He said he had prepared the Bill during recess. He did not wish to interfere with a Bill having a similar title, which had been brought in by the hon. member for Richelieu, but, as he had drawn it up during recess, and as the Act in question had done more injury than he had attempted to point out would be the result on the occasion of the passage of the law, he wished to introduce the Bill. He had understood that the Minister of Justice intended to bring in a Bill to amend the Insolvency Act, but, as he was strongly of opinion that no amendment could cure the evil resulting from the existence of such a law, he preferred to obtain the independent opinion of the House as to whether the country really required such an enactment. The principle involved was not political, but one, he was sure, regarding which the Government would be ruled by the sense of the House. On a former occasion the hon. member for Kingston, the hon. member for Cumberland and the whole Government had opposed him, and still he had secured a one-third vote; and he thought that subsequent experience had justified the fears he had then entertained with regard to the working of the law. An able Committee had made the Insolvent Law as perfect as possible, but still, in his opinion, it had been an utter failure. The principle of the law was not suited to the genius of the country.

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. member looked into the question of order with regard to this case. There is a Bill having the same title before the House.

Mr. BLAKE: According to the hon. member from St. John, a good many Bills could be introduced for the repeal of the Insolvent Act.

Mr. MITCHELL: The more the better, if they are only a success.

Mr. BLAKE: May I ask my hon. friend whether the Bill he has prepared during recess is very long?

Mr. PALMER: No; it is very short.

Mr. SPEAKER: It occurs to me that the introduction of this Bill must really be out of order. I find laid down in May a principle which I think is applicable to it. It is there stated that the House should not permit any question or Bill, which is substantially the same—though the title be different—to be offered a second time during the same Session, when it was one on which the House had expressed its judgment during the current Session, otherwise the same question could be proposed again and again during the same Session.

Mr. BLANCHET said he differed with the Speaker. The principle in question only applied to questions which had been negatived during the same Session. It had, moreover, not been carried out for a great many years. During every Session hon. members moved for leave to introduce Bills having almost the same titles, and sometimes Bills upon the same question were referred to a Select Committee or to a Committee of the Whole House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the rule in question did not apply to this case. Hon. members had a legal and moral right to introduce Bills on any subject they chose, and this was a matter of every-day practice. The hon. member at the head of the Government would remember that half a dozen Usury Bills had been introduced by various members having various views on the subject. He had never before heard of the question being raised.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he had no recollection of the question ever having been raised in this precise form. The Bills relating to the Usury Laws were not similar to each other. He had not seen the Bill which the hon. member had prepared during recess, but he took it that, as it had been drawn during recess there was something in it more than ordinary. He would be exceedingly sorry if the hon. gentleman was unable to avail himself of his labours during recess, and he supposed that leave for the introduction of the Bill had better be given.

Mr. SPEAKER: I will look into the question of order.

Mr. PALMER said he could not see why he was not at liberty to introduce any Bill he chose, on any subject concerning which he had given proper notice.

ONTARIO MARITIME COURT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Mr. BLAKE introduced a Bill (No. 41) To establish a Court of Maritime Jurisdiction in the Province of Ontario. He said the proposal was to establish a Court of Maritime Jurisdiction in Ontario, which should have, in a word, jurisdiction over all civil and maritime cases arising on the Great Lakes, in our inland waters, not embraced within the jurisdiction of any other Vice-Admiralty Court of Canada, or in the criminal or precise jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court, and certain jurisdictions with reference to revenue and customs, &c., concerning which we had not sufficient provision in the ordinary Courts of the country. His object in the first instance was to apply the Court only to that peculiar class of cases for which peculiar functions were required, leaving the existing jurisdictions unimpaired.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he hoped plenty of time would be given to enable the Bill to be seen by ship-owners, and the profession generally, in order that an intelligent opinion might be formed respecting it.

Mr. BLAKE said the Bill would be distributed within a few days.

Mr. PALMER said that, while the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court in the Maritime Provinces was very valuable, yet the working of the system under the Imperial Act was very expensive and cumbersome. He was not at all sure but that a great benefit would accrue if the Vice-Admiralty Court was constituted under Dominion authority, and made in all respects more adapted to the wants of the country.

Mr. MACDONNELL said he desired to ask the Minister of Justice whether he proposed to confer the admiralty and civil jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court upon the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia. At present the method of procedure in the Vice-Admiralty Court was not only cumbersome, as the hon. member for St. John had stated, but almost impracticable. Redress was seldom to be obtained in the great majority of cases in Nova Scotia. A vessel could escape to the United States before any proceedings could mature or any process be secured. Only last fall, a case of collision had occurred in the county he represented, and, before twenty-four hours had elapsed, the vessel which had inflicted serious injury on a British barque, was under sail for the United States, and it took a fortnight or more before the necessary process for the seizure of the vessel was issued. He had read with great pleasure the correspondence which, through the Minister of Justice, had taken place with respect to the Admiralty Court, but he had hoped that more active proceedings would have been taken to confer upon the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia admiralty jurisdiction.

Mr. BLAKE said no representation had ever been made in this House of any desire expressed on the part of any of these persons, as to obtaining a domestic quorum under domestic control.

Mr. MITCHELL: Until I did it the other night.

Mr. BLAKE: I was speaking anterior to the time when I had an opportunity of saying something in this regard. I know that my hon. friend is always more or less foremost in everything that is done or said; but before I had an opportunity of making any representations on the subject, I was myself very clearly of the opinion that we could best meet our own peculiar wants and wishes ourselves, and best mould our practice, procedure and remedies ourselves. The very fact that the very cumbersome mode of procedure in force in the Vice-Admiralty Courts had been abandoned in England for a great many years I thought reason enough,—if there was no other—why some steps at any rate, should be taken towards improvement; but I was not authorised, Sir, by the Government, nor did I conceive that in the absence of any expression of opinion in this House, it would be prudent to press the matter further than I did, as will be observed in the correspondence, by stating my individual views upon it, which I believe to be shared by my colleagues; and I thought that the time was not far distant at which the Imperial authorities would be called on to consider the question of abolishing the admiralty jurisdiction with the view of having civil jurisdiction in this regard conferred by ourselves on local tribunals. What I had to deal with was then—not a grievance presented to me as to the Admiralty Courts of the Lower Provinces, but a grievance presented as to the absence of admiralty jurisdiction in our inland waters; and with the view of remedying that grievance, a question of policy had to be considered, whether it should be done by applying for a new Act or machinery, or for Imperial machinery, or by taking the power ourselves; and I was satisfied that it was better to take the power ourselves. The details give a very large power to the authorities to prepare rules and regulations and provide for the appointment of deputy Judges from time to time, as circumstances may require, with more or less limited jurisdiction, with the very view of meeting, as far as possible, that difficulty to which my hon. friend from Inverness has referred, as well as all cases occurring which may require instant action in some of our outlying ports, in order to prevent a failure of justice, my proposition will be founded, not in detail but in general, on the principle, which, I believe, will enable the Government from time to time, as they find business growing and the wants of the mercantile community, for whom the Bill is proposed, increasing, to provide for the nomination of deputy Judges at the different local ports. If the Bill should meet the approbation of the House and become law, that of itself will go a long way towards facilitating the object to which my hon. friends opposite have referred; and I have no doubt that a further expression of opinion in this House on this subject will be useful to the same end; therefore, I invite rather than discourage, any such expression of opinion.

Mr. MITCHELL said he was glad to find that a remedy had been proposed with reference to the difficulties of our marine jurisprudence. This was not the first occasion on which public attention had been called to the matter. In 1872, several prominent members of the House, representing shipping communities, called his attention to the want of some marine jurisdiction of a summary character which would enable grievances to be redressed in our inland waters. They found no jurisdiction outside of the ordinary civil Courts which would protect them from damages resulting from collisions or trespasses, or any accidents which might occur in our inland waters. His late leader had his attention drawn to the matter on more than one occasion, and he took it under his consideration. But it was one of those questions, as would be agreed by the hon. the Minister of Justice, which was surrounded by considerable difficulties, both as to jurisdiction and expediency, which it was necessary to carefully consider before entering into any such legislation. He (Mr. Mitchell) appreciated the manner in which the hon. the Minister of Justice had placed the matter before the House when he stated that he invited discussion and advice from those members who might have special interest in marine matters. It was to be hoped that the remedy would not remain confined to the inland waters, but would be extended over the whole admiralty jurisdiction in the Dominion of Canada. He quite agreed with what had been said as to the system now in vogue. It was a century old, and was obsolete, and the time had arrived when it should be amended, not only with reference to inland waters but tidal waters. He was satisfied the Minister of Justice would consider the suggestions made, and would endeavour to frame a bill to make less expensive the onerous, troublesome, and inoperative system now prevailing. His hon. friend, in making the motion, had appealed to two or three legal gentlemen, as to their experience; but commercial and shipping gentlemen had a great deal more interest in the matter than legal gentleman, who rather liked delay and expensive litigation.

Mr. PALMER said in 1872, when the hon. member for Frontenac had a Bill before the House, the Government of that day did not do all in their power to remedy the matter. He had not had time to read over the correspondence between the Minister of Justice and the Imperial authorities, but he had seen, with great pleasure, the comments which appeared in the press. Whatever they might say as to the policy of this Government, Canada owed a debt of gratitude to the Minister of Justice for his action in this matter. If the correspondence had been rightly interpreted by the press, the Minister of Justice had done much good, which should be extended in a further direction. The admiralty jurisdiction created a maritime lien, which, in the colonies, was different entirely to that created by what was called the High Court of Admiralty Act in England. Under precisely the same circumstances, there might be a lien in England and not here, and vice versa; of course, we could not deal with the matter ourselves. In England, the County Courts had been granted jurisdiction up to £1,000, and the difficulty could be settled locally and inexpensively. We had not the same improvements as in England, simply because the Imperial Government could not possibly feel the same interest in our affairs. We had no representative there to point out these incongruities. In New Brunswick and Nova Scotia there was only one place at which redress could be obtained, although the vessels in question might be far away at another port. He thought we had a right to say when a lien or mortgage should be placed upon shipping or other property, and when it should not. It was also worth considering whether persons supplying materials should not have a lien upon the ships.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said he understood the intention of the Minister of Justice to be that, if the present measure received a favourable opinion from the members from the Maritime Provinces, he would lay a Bill before the House extending the provisions to the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. BLAKE said it would be a matter of agreement between the Imperial authorities and our own Government, as otherwise there might be conflicting jurisdiction.

Mr. MITCHELL asked whether such a Bill could not be passed; its action, however, to be suspended until an agreement had been arrived at.

Mr. BLAKE: I think we shall get the law by waiting until our representations to the Imperial authorities are acted upon.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said that if the Bill was desirable for Upper Canada, he did not see why it was not equally desirable for the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. BLAKE: There is no Vice-Admiralty Court in Ontario.

Mr. JONES said he was aware of that fact. But it was proposed to establish such a Court by the present Bill; and it appeared to him that it would be desirable to assimilate the law in the Maritime Provinces to it. He knew there had been a great deal of difficulty in Nova Scotia with regard to the Vice-Admiralty Court. It was a bugbear to the mercantile community, who often would rather suffer injustice than be put to the delay and expense involved in litigation in the Admiralty Courts.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) said he was pleased to hear the remarks of the Minister of Justice, and he trusted he would consider the shipping interests of Nova Scotia. He looked upon the Vice-Admiralty Court as a huge and cumbersome machine, of very little service to the litigants, and so expensive that some persons would sooner pay exorbitant claims than go into the Court at all. It was a Court which had existed for a great length of time, and it retained many of the old forms which certainly ought to be reformed. It was a system which could hardly be followed up outside of the city of Halifax, where the Judge resided, and it was almost impossible for anything like justice to be had. If a vessel received injuries through a collision, reference had first to be made to Halifax before any process could be taken, and a large amount of expense must be incurred before the matter could be brought to a head or a trial. The present system was almost a blot upon the legislation of the country, in that it had existed so long. Something was certainly required to be done in the interest of shipping and of the public generally.

Mr. BLAKE said it was right, after the observations made in reference to Nova Scotia, that he should state that among the papers brought down in answer to the motion of his hon friend from Frontenac, would be found an earnest statement on the part of the learned Judge as to the extravagant nature of the fees and the cumbersome practice of the Court, which he thought would be largely redressed by the adoption of the more modern rules used in England. So it would be seen that the learned Judge himself was forward in pointing out the difficulty. The papers would also show that he (Mr. Blake) did not fail to press the subject, as one requiring immediate attention, upon the authorities in England with a view to redress, in anticipation of the change. As to the remark of the hon. member for Northumberland respecting legal gentlemen, he was sure it was to their interest that litigation should neither be dilatory or expensive. The true way was to make the law as cheap as possible.

Mr. MITCHELL said he only referred to his experience as a commercial man, and did not desire to cast any reflections upon the legal profession.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I think, if my hon. friend were a member of the legal profession, he would perfectly understand that they hold that "a nimble sixpence is better than a slow shilling."

Mr. MITCHELL: It is all very well in theory, but not in practice.

Mr. MacKay.

Mr. PALMER: You may not be aware that my hon. friend was a member of the bar in New Brunswick.

Mr. MITCHELL: And having left the bar twenty-four years ago to engage in commercial pursuits, I am the better prepared to give an independent opinion in the matter.

THE LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR OF MANITOBA.

REMARKS AND EXPLANATION.

Orders of the day called.

Mr. SCHULTZ said that, before the orders of the day were called, he desired to make some remarks in connection with the telegram from Lieut.-Governor Morris read by the Premier in this House on the 21st February. He would have made these remarks before but had been waiting for the Official Report of what had been said on that occasion. As this was delayed however, he would take the report as given in the Toronto Globe of the 22nd February as a correct account. He believed that the telegram then read by the Premier was consequent upon some remarks made during a discussion in the House about one week ago. The hon. member for Marquette had then moved, seconded by himself, for an Order of the House for returns of all cases tried and disposed of under the provisions of 30 Vic. Cap. 53, entitled an Act respecting conflicting claims to lands of occupants in Manitoba. The hon. member, in making this motion had pointed out the grievance which was felt at the delay in the settlement of these claims, and the long time which had elapsed since Mr. Morris had been appointed Commissioner, without anything having been done, and his belief that the appointment of Mr. Morris was objectionable because that gentleman's numerous and onerous duties rendered it impossible for him to attend to this matter properly, and that the appointment should be cancelled and given to the Judges or some other persons who had time to attend to it. He (Mr. Schultz), in seconding the motion, had agreed in the views expressed by his colleague from Manitoba, and had added that, as it was currently reported and generally believed in the Province that the Lieutenant Governor had speculated largely in lands, the position of Commissioner for disputed claims was one which he thought the Lieutenant-Governor would not be likely to seek, and that it was ill-advised in the public interest to force upon him. Consequent apparently upon these statements, seemed to have come the action of the hon. the leader of the Government on the 21st of February, which was reported in the Toronto Globe of the following day in substance as follows:—

Mr. Mackenzie said that he felt bound to allude to a matter that took place a day or two ago here in justice to an official of the Government. The member for Lisgar had stated as a common rumour or his own belief, he forgot which, that the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba was deeply engaged in land speculations, implying thereby that he was not a suitable person for the Government to employ in the capacity of Land Commissioner for the settlement of claims in dispute. He ventured at the time from precise information, to contradict the statement, and said that the Lieutenant-Governor had now telegraphed him as follows:—

“It is absolutely false that I am largely interested in land speculations. I have no interest, direct or indirect, in scrip or half-breed claims. I own three quarter-sections, two farms and certain city property acquired from private owners. You are authorized to use this statement.”

The reading of this telegram seemed to have been followed by the member for Cumberland, who regretted that the Premier should have chosen to make this statement when the member for Lisgar was not in the House. Mr. Mackenzie then stated that he did not know whether the hon. member was present or not, but that the statement would be published. He had nothing to say in the matter, but simply to read the telegram. He did not think the Governor of Manitoba stood in the same position as a Governor of another Province, and would not think it the proper thing for a gentleman in his position to be speculating in lands which might be subjects of dispute.

Mr. Ryan, of Marquette, seemed then to have followed with this statement:—

“It gives me much pleasure to hear the statement just made by the hon. the Premier. Since the hon. gentleman and his Cabinet will, in all probability, have the opportunity of appointing a Lieutenant-Governor for Manitoba next summer, we may expect one who will not speculate. If the Hon. A. Morris does not speculate very extensively, report must in Manitoba do him a very great injustice. I myself was of the opinion that he speculated extensively. I know of my own personal knowledge one case, that of the Drever Estate, one of the most valuable in the City of Winnipeg, in which he not only made a speculation, but made one of the best and largest speculations made in the Province of Manitoba. Since the Hon. Mr. Morris telegraphs that he does not speculate, I suppose I must have been mistaken. but I regret that I had not a little time to enquire into the matter, as the belief relative to Mr. Morris' speculations is very wide-spread in Manitoba.”

As regarded the telegram itself, he (Mr. Schultz) said it unfortunately did not at all serve the purpose for which it was intended, for it contained a direct admission of the facts alleged. Two or three quarter-sections, and certain city property, seemed harmless enough for a Lieutenant-Governor to speculate in, even viewed in the rigid light in which the Premier seemed disposed to view such actions by Lieutenant-Governors. The member for Marquette told them what sort of a speculation one of these city properties meant. It was true that a purchase of property for $15,000, which increased in value in two or three years to $50,000, might not be considered by the Governor of Manitoba much of a speculation, nor be so considered by the Government; but in Manitoba, accustomed to deal with smaller figures and smaller interests, the view of the hon. gentleman from Marquette obtained, and it was considered a very good speculation indeed. The hon. gentleman from Marquette had stated from his place that he knew, of his own knowledge, of this one speculation. He (Mr. Schultz) did not know of it except by general rumour; but he did know, and had no hesitation in stating from his place in the House, that at this moment a portion of this Drever property was in dispute; was claimed by the City Council, and formed the subject of a dispute between the City Council and the Lieutenant-Governor. The portion of it in dispute was small, but still it was in dispute. What action the city might take, he could not say; but, if the patent for the land was not issued, and the city pressed the claim in the usual way, how inconvenient it would be for the Lieutenant-Governor to act in his capacity of Commissioner. He regretted that the Premier should have felt called upon to make what looked like a Quixotic defence of the Lieutenant-Governor. The better way would have been to have made those quiet enquiries possible to the Department which had the matter in hand, and thus given that consideration to a matter on which, he believed, three out of four members of this House held similar views, and which were shared in also, he thought, by Manitoba's representatives in another branch of the Legislature.

LUNENBURG SHIPPING MASTER.

EXPLANATION.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said he desired the attention of the House for a few minutes while he referred to a debate in the other chamber, in which the hon. Senator for Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach) made a serious charge against one of the officers of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. He (Mr. Smith) had in his hands a report of the speech the hon. Senator delivered on that occasion, which contained a charge of a grave character against Joseph Creighton, the Shipping Master at Lunenburg. According to this speech, the officer had been guilty, not only of arson, but of murder; but it was unnecessary for him (Mr. Smith) to dwell on that portion of the charge, which, it seemed to him, was a fit subject for the legal tribunals of the country to deal with, and not one which ought to be brought up in Parliament at all. On the 22nd October, 1873, Mr. Wm. Young was appointed Shipping Master at Lunenburg, and in May, 1874, the Order in Council appointing that gentleman was cancelled, and the duties of his office devolved upon the Collector of Customs of the port. That was in accordance with the law, which provided that, in the absence of a Shipping Master the duties pertaining to such office should be performed by the Collector. It was admitted by all parties concerned that the duties of the Shipping Master could be more easily performed by the Collector, because every captain of a vessel had to go to him to clear out, and it was more convenient that that official should attend to the business which devolved upon the Shipping Master. The hon. Senator stated in the course of his remarks, that Mr. Young was displaced after he (Mr. Kaulbach) had some conversation with him (Mr. Smith) personally. That conversation was of a private nature, and his recollection of it was that Mr. Kaulbach disapproved of the displacement of Mr. Young, who seemed to be a particular friend of his. The hon. Senator said, moreover, that he informed him during that interview that Creighton was a bad character. He (Mr. Smith) was not prepared to say whether such information was given during the conversation or not, but, if it was, he had no recollection whatever of the circumstance. The general tone of the hon. Senator's observations was a condemnation of the action of the Department in removing this man, but he attributed this more to politics than to anything else, because he was aware of the fact that the hon. member for Lunenburg and Mr. Kaulbach were politically hostile. The appointment of Mr. Creighton was made in May. The matter went on, and he heard no more of it. In March, 1876, the Collector of Customs wrote, asking to be relieved from the duties of Shipping Master, inasmuch as his ordinary duties were greatly increased, and he could not attend to both offices. He knew nothing of the Collector or his politics, but on inquiry he found that he was appointed in 1869 by the late Government. The letter requesting relief from the duties of Shipping Master was as follows:—

“CUSTOM HOUSE,

“LUNENBURG, N. S., CANADA,

“MARCH 21st, 1876.

“SIR,—I beg respectfully to bring to your notice that the duties of the Shipping Master of this port are now being performed by me, the office having been transferred to the Customs on the 24th of October, 1874.

"As the trade of the port is steadily on the increase, and as I am the only officer attached to the port (with the exception of a Preventive Officer) the duties of the Customs and Registrar of Shipping, to be efficiently performed, require the greater portion of my time; I would therefore respectfully request to be released from the position of Shipping Master at the end of the current fiscal year.

"I have the honour to be, Sir,
"Your obedient servant,

(Signed,) "EDWARD DOWLING, "Collector.

"The Deputy Minister of "Marine and Fisheries,
"Ottawa."

On the 30th March, a short time after the receipt of the above, he received the following letter:—

"HOUSE OF COMMONS, OTTAWA.
"March 30th, 1876.

"SIR,—Referring to the letter forwarded to your Department by Edward Dowling, Esq., Collector of Customs, at the port of Lunenburg, N. S., stating that at the end of the present fiscal year he wishes to be relieved of the duties of shipping seamen, and recommending that then a separate shipping office be established at that port, I have the honour to respectfully request that his suggestion be carried into effect.

"I beg to add that before the time named, I will recommend a suitable person to fill the office of Shipping Master for the said port.

"I have, &c.
(Signed,) "C. E. CHURCH.

"Wm. Smith, Esq.,
"Deputy Minister,
"Marine and Fisheries,
"Ottawa."

On the 10th May he received another letter from the hon. member for Lunenburg as follows:—

"CHESTER, LUNENBURG COUNTY, N. S., "May 10th, 1876.

"SIR,—In the month of March last, as you will remember, Edward Dowling, Esq., Collector of Customs at Lunenburg, N. S., in a letter to your Department, asked to be relieved of the duties of Shipping Master for that port at the end of the present fiscal year, and recommended that a separate shipping office be established there after that date.

"I spoke to the hon. Minister on this subject before I left Ottawa, and he expressed his willingness to grant the request. Since my return home, I have seen Mr. Dowling, and he desired me to press the matter, stating that his duties as Collector fully occupied his time.

"I now have the honour to ask that the separate shipping office be established at Lunenburg on the 1st of July next, and I have pleasure in naming Capt. Joseph Creighton as a suitable person to be Shipping Master. Mr. Creighton has been a master mariner for a number of years, and I believe he will make an efficient officer. He resides in the town of Lunenburg.

"Please bring the subject to the notice of the hon. Minister. I beg to refer you to Mr. Dowling's letter, to which I have already alluded.

"I have, &c.,
(Signed,) "C. E. CHURCH.

"Wm. Smith, Esq.,
"Deputy Minister,
"Marine and Fisheries,
"Ottawa."

That correspondence would show that it was represented to his Department that it would subserve the business interests of the people of the Dominion that Collectors of Customs should be Shipping Masters, and he acted on that representation in respect to almost all the ports in the Dominion. He did not know Mr. Creighton, and it was not contemplated at that time that the office should be held for a short time by the Collector and that then the Collector should resign and another person be appointed. It was never mentioned or suggested, nor did he know such a thing was proposed. The matter so continued for one or two years, when, it would be seen by the correspondence, that the Collector of Customs desired to be relieved of the position on the grounds stated. That request was supported by the representative of the county, and Mr. Creighton was appointed, he being stated by the member for the county to be a respectable man, who had been a captain of vessels for many years, and who lived in Lunenburg. The hon. Senator for Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach) had represented Mr. Creighton as being an exceedingly violent man. If he were guilty of what had been alleged, he was certainly unworthy of holding his office, and he (Mr. Smith) would not allow him to continue in his position a single moment if the facts alleged were established. The grave charge was made against Mr. Creighton that he had been guilty of arson and murder. It was matter for surprise, however, that if the hon. Senator were justified in making that charge, he had not taken the necessary steps to have the offender brought to justice; that he should go free, unwhipped of justice if there were evidence in support of the charge of crime; and if there were no evidence, he doubted the propriety of any hon. gentleman making a statement charging any man with a high crime such as murder. If there were proofs he failed to understand why the hon. Senator did not produce them before a proper tribunal. What he desired to state to the House was, that if Creighton had been guilty of the minor charge and if were proved he had said to the hon. Senator, as he had alleged, frequently, and not long before coming to Parliament this Session, that man had attacked him in the street and in infamous language hustled him and threatened he would finish him off if he spoke about him or used his name, every hon. member, irrespective of politics, would say that that man should be dismissed. What he proposed with the consent of his colleagues in the Government was, to institute an enquiry at once into the charge. If the result of the inquiry were to establish the charge made against that officer by the hon. Senator, Creighton would be at once dismissed.

Mr. CHURCH said that, in justice to himself and Captain Creighton, he felt bound to address the House briefly. The hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had correctly stated the facts of the case in regard to the correspondence which led to the appointment of Captain Creighton. The Senator for Lunenburg had, in a speech delivered by him in the other branch of Legislature on 30th March, 1875, made serious charges against the character of Captain Creighton, who was not at that time an officer of the Government, the duties of shipping master being then discharged by the Collector of Customs who had been authorized to perform the same by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. On the return of Senator Kaulbach, to Lunenburg, after the Session of 1875, he was met by Captain Creighton in the street and an explanation demanded of his remarks in the Senate. They had a rencontre, and Captain Creighton, he had been informed, had taken hold of the hon. gentleman, who afterwards entered an action against him for assault and Captain Creighton was bound over to keep the peace, and called upon to pay a fine. Those were the circumstances as far as he knew them, though, as he did not reside in Lunenburg town, he did not know the circumstances of the case exactly as they occurred. He had made some inquiries into the matter, and several persons living in the town thought the provocation given to Captain Creighton was sufficient to warrant him in so acting, and some went a little further and thought a little more violence would not have been more than the case demanded. That of course was a matter regarding which he (Mr. Church) need not here express an opinion. But he wished it to be distinctly understood by the House that at the time the attack was made in the Senate on Captain Creighton's character, he was not an officer in any Department under the Government, and consequently he did not think the Senator should have attacked him as he had done on that occasion: and any gentleman upon whom an attack was made by a member of the other chamber, under such circumstances, would naturally like to have an explanation; and a rencontre might occur, such as was said to have taken place. In the speech lately delivered by the hon. Senator for Lunenburg, Captain Creighton was accused, not directly, perhaps, but yet very pointedly, as being guilty of both murder and arson. The house of the hon. Senator was burned some two or three years ago, whereby he lost nearly all his property and effects, in which misfortune he had received the sympathy of a number of persons in the county. He (Mr. Church) had not been aware that Captain Creighton had threatened the hon. Senator in the manner stated in his speech. His first knowledge of it was on reading the speech referred to. He would make no objection to an investigation of the charges being made by the Government; he trusted the enquiry would be thorough and the facts ascertained, and, as the representative of the county, he was willing to abide by any fair decision arrived at. As to the character of Captain Creighton, he had never heard any serious accusation made against him; he had been an efficient sea captain for a number of years, and belonged to a respectable family, the President of the Legislative Council of Nova Scotia being a near relative of his. He (Mr. Church) would certainly not recommend any person as suitable for an office under the Government if he knew that the character and qualifications of the individual were not good. Captain Creighton was recommended to him by persons residing in Lunenburg town largely interested in the trade and shipping of the port—as a suitable man for the position of Shipping Master; and, consequently, he had recommended him to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and he was appointed as the hon. Minister had explained. He could not surely be expected to recommend a political opponent, and he felt bound to name Captain Creighton for the position, he having been recommended to him by gentlemen in whom he trusted and reposed full confidence. He would not speak further on this subject now, but if it should come up for discussion again, he would crave the indulgence of the House to make further remarks upon it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said it was quite clear that the party in question ought to be dismissed. It was said that this person went for an explanation to a Senator, called him to account for the language used in one of the Houses of Parliament, and then assaulted him.

Mr. MACKENZIE: He was no officer of the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said that made no difference. The person of every member of Parliament was sacred; and the language he used in Parliament, on his own responsibility, could not be the subject of assault, to say the least of it, or anything further, perhaps, then remonstrance. It was quite clear that this man had no right, if the explanation was unsatisfactory, to assault a Senator for what he said in Parliament, no matter whether the language was strong or violent, or called for, or justifiable, or unjustifiable. It was absolutely requisite for members of Parliament that the person of every member who made any statement on his own responsibility should be safe from attack. When he was attacked, it was plain that the other party was in the wrong, from the fact that he was bound to keep the peace. He was glad to hear from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that he was going to enquire into the matter. This ought to be done, and the guilty party ought not to be allowed to remain for one instant afterwards in the public service. He thought the hon. member from Lunenburg had spoken from information received.

Mr. CHURCH: I related the circumstances as I heard them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he should not expect him to recommend a political enemy. He quite understood, of course, that he should recommend a political supporter. He thought the hon. gentleman would allow him to say that he thought he might have made more particular enquiries. It seemed to him that he was not quite immaculate, and he himself said he had not heard any serious charges brought against him.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland): I think it quite right to say with regard to the assault that it took place nearly two years ago, and that I never heard of it until the statement of the Senator was made the other day.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I am quite sure of that.

INSOLVENT ACT REPEAL BILL

[BILL No. 2.]

(Mr. Barthe.)

SECOND READING PROPOSED.

Mr. BARTHE said he would submit that the feeling of the people was more than ever adverse to the existing Insolvent Law. This was positively exact for the Province of Quebec as a whole, and particularly for the rural districts of which he had the honour to be one of the representatives. He might add that the feeling in some of the other Provinces was not less intense. The reasons why such a feeling existed were numerous, and he would try to indicate some of them. When the Insolvent Act of 1864 was introduced we had been many years without such a law and the country had been prosperous. The commercial morality of the Canadian people was then proverbial. He did not pretend to say that the divers Insolvent Acts introduced since 1864 were the unique causes of the hard times we now had, but he did state that he was convinced that those divers laws had contributed, to a large extent, to demoralize the commercial community and the people generally. In former years it was an honour generally deserved and observed by Canadian commercial men to endeavour to succeed in paying their debts in full. Now, they saw to be an insolvent was not a stigma, but a kind of fashion, la mode du pays, as they say in French. He could not better state his view on this point than by citing the following remarks, written by a commercial man :

“Give to any community the knowledge that, should they err in judgment in the management of their business affairs, the law will step in and correct their mistakes and free them from the results of their blunders by granting a discharge from all liabilities, and what do we see as the result? A reckless mode of doing business, a total disregard of all sacred obligations of another's rights in property entrusted to their care. This is the effect of the present Insolvent Act when it grants a discharge to all who apply for relief from their liabilities.”

This feeling had been expressed by several newspapers in the country and several commercial men of high standing. The Quebec, Levis and Halifax Boards of Trade had passed resolutions for the repeal of the law. He had read the discussion on the subject at the last meeting of the Montreal Board of Trade, and several prominent members of the Board had pronounced against the law. So it was with the Dominion Board of Trade. By referring to the statistics supplied to them by the Select Committee appointed by this House at the last Session for the purpose of inquiring into the causes of the depression of the leading commercial interests, he found that from Jan. 1875 to Feb. 1876 there had been 1,391 cases of insolvency, representing an aggregate liability of $26,933,709, upon which dividends to the amount of $5,071,325 had been paid, the average rate of dividend being 22½ cents in the dollar. This made a direct loss of $20,852,381, being equal to 77½ per cent. These amounts had been classified in the statement. The largest failures had occurred in the following branches :—

125 dry goods merch'ts, liabilities...	$4,880,106.
32 hardware dealers, do ...	3,004,159.
327 general merchants, do ...	2,339,942.
65 lumber merchants, do ...	2,182,145.
122 grocers, do ...	1,541,587.

These five branches of trade took up one-half of the aggregate liabilities of insolvents, and the balance was divided amongst 101 other trades, from the wine and spirit dealer to the undertaker. Those official figures, if applied to our population, showed that one-half of our people did not pay their legitimate debts, protected as they were by the law of the land called the Insolvent Act. Those figures showed that a half of our people speculated and lived on the energies of the other half of the population. One argument he had heard against the repeal of the law was that so many, having lost the greatest part of their earnings by the effect of this law, should not be themselves deprived of the benefit of it at a proper time. If this objection could stand, it would be better for this House to decree a general Bankruptcy Act than to wait by degrees such practical expectations. Some people, favourable to the existing law, said that nearly every country had its Insolvent Act, and they did not see why Canada should not. He did not intend to enter into the merits of this objection further than to say that, in France, it was a stigma; there was a kind of criminality attached to insolvency. In England, as well as in Scotland, the law was not known to be used as an encouragement to bankruptcy; the relax of commercial morality was not known to be there as we saw it here. Our country was young, and young nations as well as young children were more apt to be contaminated than the elder people or nations. But we had near us the example of the United States. After their last gigantic and ruinous war our neighbours adopted an Insolvent Act, in 1867, he believed. The result of the war was a reason for the adoption of such a law. But in Canada, where we had lived in peace under the protection of the glorious flag of England, the same reason did not exist for the adoption of such a law. In fact, in 1864, when the first law was passed, there was no necessity for its adoption and the country had had since to suffer from its demoralizing effect. And what did they see now in the United States? The repeal of the law that had been necessary had been decided. He hoped that this example would be followed by the Canadian Parliament. He now came to an important point—how the law worked. This was explained in one way by an accountant writing to the Montreal Herald. He said :

“The method pursued is as follows, viz.: When an insolvency takes place, the wholesale merchant, whose calculations are based upon such insolvency, assumes the position of the friend of the unfortunate insolvent, helps him to obtain a favourable settlement, and when this is accomplished, sells him a large quantity of goods at profitable prices, obtains his notes for the same, and discounts these notes at a profitable rate of interest to the particular Bank whose capital protects his position, and everything is thus made pleasant for everybody immediately concerned.”

Well, this was one way by which things were done in insolvency matters, but there were many other ways not less disreputable. In many, and he dared say in most cases, before the insolvent assigned, there was some understanding either between the insolvent and his future assignee, or between the insolvent and some large creditors—future inspectors—in such a way that the law was made an instrument of speculation for a few instead of being a relief for all. The big fishes eat the small ones. Then came the scandalous run of assignees to have the estate. The practical result was that the insolvent's estate was either bought by the insolvent himself, at a few cents on the dollar, or the stock was sold by auction at a loss. What was the consequence? The honest merchant, a neighbour, who worked hard to pay twenty shillings in the pound, could not compete. He was forced to become an insolvent himself. So the ruin and the demoralization spread all round. He had no hesitation in saying that a law which produced such results was a law that deserved to be repealed. Now, they had the assignment made. What went on? The writ was taken and the interim assignee was soised of the whole estate. So much went for the lawyer charged with preliminary proceedings, so much for the interim assignee, so much for the official assignee, so much for inspectors, travelling expenses, &c., so that at last the estate was all gone, and the creditor left was trotting after the assignee for his dividend when a dividend is advertised. He did not intend to throw any stigma on the assignees as a body. He supposed they did the best they could; but taking the results as they were, he must say that the way the law allowed them to manage the estates was equivalent, in many cases, to a legal robbery. He had read in several newspapers many illustrations of this. He found the following statement published in one of the newspapers.

“How to ‘Settle’ an Estate by Law.—Here is an Assignee's Bill for settling an Insolvent Estate in Nova Scotia:—

Total costs . . . . . $2,785 87

And this is how the estate stood originally as between the debtor and his creditors:—

Assets (actually realized) exclusive of incumbrance upon
Real Estate . . . . .	$3,873 35
Total liabilities (less mortgage).	3,866 20

Surplus . . . . . $7 15

It will be seen that, after paying off the mortgage, the estate was worth 100 cents in the dollar and was put into insolvency on account of the death of the insolvent under the belief that speedier and more economical closing up could be had for the debtor's orphan children than by the usual way of liquidation. We presume the creditors had not much experience of the sublime science of ‘addition, division and silence’ as practised in the office of an Official Assignee. The estate went into the assignee's hands, solvent, in October, 1874—and there wasn't one hostile creditor,—and it came out of his hands in October, 1876, thus:—

Net proceeds . . . . .	$3,873 35
Assignee's account . .	$2,785 87
Amount cancelled . .	172 00
	<hr/>
	2,957 87

Representing 24 cents in the dollar—all the rest, ‘gone where the woodbine twineth.’”

And this was a solvent estate. Here was one case for Quebec city, found in a Quebec paper:—

“The following is a recent case in Quebec city, in which the Assignee had about $4,000 assets to be divided among the creditors. They got only 33 per cent., 53 per cent. going for cost of liquidation. The total costs were $2,207.96.

There was another detailed account found in the same paper for an estate in Three Rivers, in which the total costs amounted to $2,207.95. A strange fact was that, in both cases, the expenses were the same, one $2,207.96 for the Quebec case, and one $2,207.95 for the Three Rivers case, being one cent difference. This proved that the tariff was uniform. He could cite many other cases, but he felt it was useless, because there was no hon. member of this House who, in his own district, had not some knowledge of such intolerable legal robberies. One of the grievances of the law was that the same disbursements existed for a small as for a large estate. The only difference was that the assignees having less in hand, their fees were necessary less, and that in the last occurrence nothing was left for the creditors. The following instance was from a Montreal paper:—

“Alas! for the poor creditors.—How an insolvent estate of $800 in Montreal was distributed—costs of winding-up $441.50!—the landlord, $365.45; and the creditors, for $2,270, get nothing!”

The following was another case:—

“Cost of winding-up an insolvent estate.—20 per cent. to creditors and 80 per cent. costs.—We have lately published some extraordinary accounts of assignees in connection with the winding-up of insolvent estates, but that to which we now request the attention of our readers eclipses all hitherto given publicity to. The winding-up costs eighty per cent. of the assets, whilst not twenty per cent. went to the ‘poor creditors.’ The question arises whether it would not be better to allow insolvents to keep their estates, and accept what they might offer, rather than allow the assets to be eaten up in costs?”

The following statement he found in the Journal of Commerce:

“It is surprising what ups and downs some people will have during a lifetime. Mr. P. B., a tailor, started business more than 23 years ago, with a small capital, but with youth and energy; after a run of five years failed and compromised at ten shillings in the pound. Having started again in August, 1866, he was a second time an applicant for insolvency, and again compromised at ten shillings. In March, 1868, he failed; in March, 1876, he settled at twelve shillings and sixpence; and now again for the fifth time he has been served with a writ of attachment. There is a saying that ‘it takes three failures to make a fortune.’”

Some people would say there was a remedy against such abuses. The discharge of the insolvent might be contested, as well as the discharge of the assignee. There was no remedy at all. It might be that, in many cases, it was the duty of the assignee to contest the discharge of the fraudulent and reckless insolvent, but the experience they had was that it was not done. The creditors were dispersed, and, for want of time or otherwise, they did not have the necessary control over the assignee, who, in many cases, was the nominee of the insolvent himself, to a large extent. Then they might add that the creditor had the right to contest either the discharge of the assignee or of the insolvent. This was no remedy at all, because the result for the creditor was null. The contestation of the insolvent's discharge by the creditor would not oblige him to pay his claim, and, furthermore, the trouble and expense of such a contestation was discouraging. He saw no remedy at all against the reckless and fraudulent insolvent. In fact, he believed it was nearly impossible to frame a law that would attain that object. Now, he would speak of the honest debtor, for whom the law might be said to have been framed. The reason that an honest but unfortunate merchant would be deprived of a relief by repealing the Act was, in his humble opinion, no reason, because an honest merchant dealing with honest creditors, by showing that he had been brought into difficulty by unavoidable circumstances, must have his relief from them. They could not suppose that honest creditors would not abide by the position. It would be their own interest to understand, and they must suppose, that creditors were human beings. In some Provinces, he understood that the common law was not sufficient to protect creditors against dishonest dealers. This was not the case in the Province of Quebec. They had a disposition of the law by which an insolvent was bound to have his estate distributed equally to creditors according to their rights, au marc la terre, with less expense and time than by the Insolvent Act. Though not familiar with the machinery of the procedure in other Provinces, he submitted that this disposition of their law could easily be adopted in all the Provinces. He called the attention of the gentlemen of the legal profession in other Provinces to the few and clear dispositions of the Quebec Code regulating this matter, and he felt confident that they would come to the conclusion that they might be very easily adopted by all the Provinces. Those short and clear articles constituted the best Insolvent Act they could desire. How many of the farmers and others in this country, he asked, were there who could not take advantage of the law for themselves and had been ruined? How many men with large families had lost the earnings of many years of hard work and seen their families in want in consequence of having trusted a disguised insolvent without any resources, who had become legally, if not honourably, discharged of all his obligations. A writer on this subject said:

"Many are accustomed to look lightly and carelessly upon these frequently-recurring fraudulent failures because they see no actual personal distress and want and suffering growing out of them. John Jones fails and pays three cents upon the dollar, and yet John Jones' family retains the fashionable and expensive pew in the brown stone church, rides to it with the pair of greys that they drove last year, and the wife and daughters swing their long skirts up the broad aisle as proudly and gracefully as if they had been paid for, instead of having been cheated out of confiding dry goods retailers."

He could not better conclude than by quoting the following observation from another writer on the subject:

"When great mercantile houses make most disastrous and disgraceful failures—failures which reveal the fact that they have been worse than nothing through long years of good credit, and it turns out that all partners of the bankrupt concern have, during the years of their good credit, hedged against the future by paying for immense annuity insurance policies out of the money belonging to their creditors; when badly-failed merchants continue to live in magnificent houses which have been settled upon their wives not long before they went into bankruptcy, does there not seem to be something wrong about the laws which permits such settlements? When a known swindler works his way through bankruptcy and gets what is called an honourable discharge, when everybody seems to be aware that he is a fraud, deserving gaol, is there not something wrong in the laws of bankruptcy?"

"And, finally, when we find these classes of bold swindlers, who have, through long years of trickery, fraud and the sharpest sort of practice, made their way to apparent financial comfort over the wrecks of the fortunes of worthy people, kindly and favourably received in good society, their past conduct apparently atoned for by lavish use of ill-gotten gains, must we not conclude that there is something radically wrong in our social system?"

Mr. SPEAKER: I feel it my duty to call attention to the fact that the hon. gentleman has read a portion of his speech. I did not interfere with him, because I felt the House would indulge him on this occasion. But I would like to warn hon. gentlemen that, unless there is some understanding in the matter, I will feel it to be my duty to prevent speeches being read. If it should become the practice to read speeches, it would lengthen the proceedings very much. I presume it is difficult for French members to make a speech in English without writing it; nevertheless, it is contrary to Parliamentary practice, and my feeling is that it will be my duty on other occasions to prevent speeches being read.

Mr. BARTHE: If I forget not, it was done last year.

Mr. SPEAKER: And the consequence was that towards the end of the Session a great many speeches were read. I think it is inexpedient to read speeches, and I shall deem it my duty to prevent this being done in the future.

Mr. WOOD said he did not know whether the hon. gentleman who had just addressed the House was a merchant, a lawyer, a professional gentleman in any way, or a farmer; but he thought, if he had been a merchant for the last twenty-five years in Canada, he would scarcely have taken the position he had to-day in favour of striking from the Statute-book the Insolvent Law so recently placed there. If the Bill were carried, we would be taken back to the position we occupied before 1864, when there was no such thing as an Insolvent Law in the country, and when the merchant selling goods to a country dealer had to risk his goods being seized by another merchant on a preferential assignment, without the first creditor being paid for them. The repeal of the Insolvent Law would bring the country back to a state of chaos, and the wholesale merchants might as well cease doing business. He could remember that, when a young merchant, he had sold $1,000 worth of goods to a country dealer on credit and then another merchant swept them all away for preferential claims, while he himself did not receive a cent. The present law prohibited such a law as that, and enabled creditors to get their share pro rata of the debtor's property. He admitted that hardships had arisen very frequently in compositions with debtors, and when a merchant failed merchants generally grew indignant and talked of imprisonment. The machinery of the law was ample today for the distribution of every estate, and, if there was not an equal and a fair distribution, it was not the fault of the law, but of the creditors. He contended, therefore, that to do away with the law would be to inflict a great injustice upon the commercial community of this country. The law prevented fraud, although the hon. member for Richelieu had said it was prolific of fraud. The machinery was provided for detecting the fraudulent debtor. If a merchant made the proposition to settle for ten or fifteen cents on the dollar, the debtor could be made to give a full statement of his affairs. But, if the law was not in existence, the debtor could hand over everything to his aunt or his mother, sister, or uncle, and the creditors could be cut off without a sixpence. He admitted that credit was too cheap; but the banks were largely to blame for this. If the law was well and fairly administered, it would give the creditors what the debtor had to give. He, therefore, moved:

"That this Bill be not now read the second time, but be read the second time this day four months."

Mr. OLIVER said he thought the arguments adduced by the hon. member for Richelieu were sufficient to convince the House that the repeal of the Act would result in much benefit to the people of Canada. This was the view he had taken of the Act ever since he had held a seat in the House, and at all times and on all occasions he had voted against it. The hon. member for Hamilton declared that the repeal of the Act would take us back to where we were twenty-five years ago. It appeared, by the statement of the promoter of the Bill to repeal the Insolvent Act, that in Quebec a law existed which enabled the assets of a debtor to be distributed pro rata among the creditors. If it was within the jurisdiction of the Province of Quebec to have such a law, the Province of Ontario could certainly pass a similar law; but that would not be done unless the Insolvency Act were repealed. But, according to the statements of the promoter of the repealing Bill, it would be of little consequence to the creditors whether or not we did go back to the condition we were in twenty-five years ago; as, according to the hon. member for Hamilton, the creditors did not receive any adequate proportion of the assets of the insolvent. That was ascribed to the neglect of the creditors to look after the assets. It was no wonder that they did not do so, for they had been looking after the assets for the last eight or nine years, and were now pretty tired of the operation. After spending days and weeks looking after the assets, the creditors obtained five, ten, or fifteen cents on the dollar, but the time consumed would be more valuable than the whole amount they could receive from the insolvent's estate. Even if we were to return to the state of affairs that existed twenty-five years ago, the result would be that the creditors who seized the stock of the debtor would get paid, while under the present state of affairs not one of the creditors obtained payment.

Mr. WOOD: They would all get something under the Insolvent Law.

Mr. OLIVER said it must be remembered that the time spent in obtaining the dividend was more valuable than the dividend itself. The official assignees and the officials connected with the insolvent's estate received something, but the creditors got practically nothing. The law was supporting a set of officials from one end of the country to the other, which the people could well do without. It was stated by the promoter of the Bill to repeal the Act that, before the passage of the law there were less failures and less money lost in trading than at the present time. He believed it was truly stated that there were more insolvent traders in Canada in proportion to the population, than in any other country in the world. That was because there was a standing invitation upon the Statute-book for men to go into mercantile operations who had no substantial basis on which to expect success; and if they were not successful there was the means open to them by which they could get out of their difficulties. Men entered into mercantile business with very little capital and very little experience, and the result was that, at the end of five or ten years, the wholesale merchants who had been supporting them through that time came in and took the balance of what was left. It was stated—but he did not know how true it was—that if a wholesale merchant received a small amount of money paid upon the stock furnished to a young merchant commencing business without experience, and if the latter remained in business five years, and then failed, and the wholesale merchant obtained thirty-three cents on the dollar, he was paid by the operations of the five years. He knew instances of young dealers who were bound to trade only at certain houses, and who, if they changed, would have their stock seized. The fact was that wholesale merchants were much to blame for the large amount of insolvency throughout the country; inasmuch as they forced their goods upon country dealers, the result of which was that the dealers were compelled to go into bankruptcy. The hon. the promoter of the Bill had pointed out that the law was not only injurious to the commercial interests and to the consuming population, but it was a direct injury to the honest trader. A compromise was made with a merchant in the country to pay 50 cents on the dollar; he then went into insolvency, and re-purchased; or some of his friends gave security to pay 33 cents on the dollar within a certain time. By such an arrangement, the trader was enabled to turn round and sell his goods at 25 per cent. less than cost. This was done time and again, and the honest trader who desired to pay 100 cents on every dollar, was compelled to stand behind the counter idle or go into insolvency. The honest trader demanded the repeal of the Act. During last Session—and no doubt the time would shortly arrive for its repetition—they heard a great deal of the sacrifice of foreign goods in Canada. It was this measure that had distributed those goods throughout the country, and caused the sacrifice. The stock of insolvents had been slaughtered in the Dominion markets, and so worked a vast amount of injury to the honest trader. It was unnecessary for him to enter more into details, as the Act had been fully discussed on previous occasions. There was no vote that he could give with more pleasure or greater satisfaction than that for the repeal of the Insolvency Act.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario) said he had hoped, in view of the arrangement made the other night between the hon. the Minister of Justice and the hon. member for Richelieu, that the amendments the Government intended to submit on this measure would have been before the House before they were called upon to pronounce as to the propriety of repealing or continuing the present Act. He felt very reluctant to vote for any measure which would effect the repeal of the Act without having an opportunity of considering the amendments which he understood the hon. the Minister of Justice intended to bring in. Candidly, he believed that the people as a whole desired the repeal of the present Act. If he spoke the sentiments of his constituency and the people in his neighbourhood, he would have no hesitation in saying that he would be obliged to record his vote for the Bill introduced by the hon. member for Richelieu. If there had been any necessity for an Insolvent Law in the past, he feared, notwithstanding the glowing picture of approaching prosperity presented in the Budget Speech the other day, there was still a necessity for its existence

In the interest of the trading community and the country generally, he thought it desirable that this law should be continued; but he did not wish to express any definite opinion on the question just now. The House was not in a proper position to pass on the question, since the amendments promised by the hon. the Minister of Justice were not before them. Speaking personally, he would, if the House was pressed to a division, vote for the amendment in the hope of gaining some amendments to the law; but if he was simply to pronounce on the naked, bald proposition before the House, he would feel it his duty to vote for the original motion of the hon. member for Richelieu.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Elgin) said he had listened with pleasure to the able speech made by the promoter of the Bill; but he thought that on reflection the House would agree with him that the objections taken by the hon. member to the present Act were more to its working than to its principle. Objection was taken first to the expensiveness of proceeding under the law, and to its operation so far as the proper distribution of the estate was concerned; but these objections applied rather to the operation or procedure under the Act, rather than to its principle. He thought the hon. gentleman would agree with him that, if a trader was not able to meet his engagements in full, his estate should be distributed among his creditors in proportion to the debts, and as speedily and cheaply as possibly could be done, compatibly with his interests and the rights of the creditors whose interests were involved. The law on the Statute-book proposed to dispose of the estate in this way. Probably in its operation it might not have had that effect, and hence the desirability of the House having before them the amendments to be proposed by the hon. the Minister of Justice before taking action on this subject. While regretting that such was the case, he agreed with the hon. member for South Ontario that there was some reason for the existence of a law for the adjustment and distribution of the estates of unfortunate debtors. Supposing, for the sake of argument, the law was repealed, as proposed by the hon. member for Richelieu, what would be the consequence? The first creditor who happened to get judgment would have his claim satisfied, if there were a sufficient estate for the purpose. Directly this creditor had obtained his judgment, another would commence operations, and then another, until the whole of them had judgments recorded against the estate; and the result would be that the very evil which the hon. the mover of the Bill deprecated would exist to a much greater extent than at present. The hon. member for North Oxford told them they should repeal the law, and that then, no doubt, the Legislature of Ontario would take up the matter and dispose of it. This House, however, had sole control of the legislation in regard to insolvent estates, and it was no use for them to expect that a Legislature, over which they had no control whatever, would take up a difficulty with which they were unable to cope, and dispose of it satisfactorily to the people of one Province. It might be true that we should have no Insolvent Law, but it must be apparent and command itself to the common sense of all, that an estate must be disposed of in some way, so that the creditors could get some part of it at the smallest possible expense. Besides, the unfortunate debtors should be enabled as early as possible to recommence business, not only for the benefit of themselves and families, but for the benefit of the community at large. In 1857 and 1858, we had no Insolvent Law, but we had the old Insolvent Debtors' Court Act, which was not sufficient to meet the requirements of the time. The consequence was that many useful members of society and men honestly disposed were obliged to leave the country, for judgments piled up one after another until they could not meet their engagements, and they had to suspend. If the Insolvent Law were repealed, he feared that such would be the consequences in Ontario. The hon. member for Richelieu had stated that great expense was entailed in the administration of estates. That objection, however, did not apply to the principle of the Act; it was a difficulty that could be overcome by experience. The House, from the working of the law, would be enabled to remedy that objection; if it could not be met, of course it was a vital objection to the law. If the estates were eaten up by costs and the assignees did not discharge their duties, the creditors were themselves responsible. The principle of the measure was this: The estate was placed in the hands of the creditors and then disposed of as their own property in as easy, quick, and inexpensive a manner as possible. A misapprehension prevailed to a great extent, with regard to the functions of the assignees. They were simply appointed for the institution of the suit. As soon as the creditors met, they were at liberty to choose whom they pleased to act as assignee. If they did not do so, then the Government nominee became the Official Assignee; but at any time, if the creditors saw fit, they could dismiss that official. From the time of the first meeting the creditors had the affairs under their own control, and, if the assignee did not act properly, he was liable to be discharged; so that if the costs were increased or the estate improperly disposed of, it was the result of their own negligence or want of circumspection. Still, he thought amendments could be offered to the Act, which was of purely a practical nature, to improve its operation. If, after such amendments as experience suggested had been made, the law was found to be inoperative and expensive to meet the object for which it was passed, then he would gladly vote for its repeal; but he believed some such law was necessary, and that the present Act, which was the result of much care and deliberation, would be found sufficient to meet all demands after the amendments which experience would suggest were adopted. It was said that fraud was practised, but was there a law which was not sometimes broken? Wherever there was a law regulating the distribution of estates, or the disposition of money, there would be infractions of it, or fraud would be practised. Every possible provision that human skill and ingenuity could suggest was inserted in the Insolvent Law. If a debtor was found guilty of fraud, he was not permitted to have his discharge, and he was likewise liable to the severest kind of punishment. Moreover, if the trader was proved to have been improvident in conducting his business, he was liable to be punished by his discharge being refused. Certain expenses were undoubtedly created in the operation of the Act which he thought could be avoided, but no doubt the hon. the Minister of Justice had had this objection under consideration, and would introduce an amendment to remedy it. He thought that the time which intervened from the convoking until the first meeting of creditors was too long, and that the fees of the assignees appointed by the creditors might be more fairly disposed of than at present. These, however, were faults in the operation and procedure under the Act. It was true that every man should be able to pay his deb'ts in full, but so long as our commercial system continued, so long as we had credit—and he did not see any possible way of carrying on the business of the country without credit—there would be more or less failures. Crises would occur in the commercial history of a country, and it was impossible to do without an Insolvent Law. It was to be expected that fraud would be practiced now and then, but that was no reason why the honest debtors should not have an opportunity of relieving themselves from pressure in regard to engagements which they were unable to meet, which embarrassed them and prevented them from being useful to their families and society at large. The great objection to the old law was that it allowed voluntary assignments to be made. But that system was abolished by the passage of the present Act, and the debtor, however willing he might be to go into bankruptcy, could not take the step unless the creditors put him in. Whatever objection there might be to the law, it must be admitted that it afforded every possible opportunity to the creditors to dispose of and administer the estate. Everyone knew that the Act was passed in the interest of the wholesale dealers. The hon. member for Oxford said there was too much canvassing for customers in the country, but that was an evil which would bring about its own cure. When merchants found it was not profitable to force goods on country traders, they would soon cease the practice.

Mr. WOOD rose to a point of order. He wished Mr. Speaker's decision on rule 41, which provided that no rule relating to or altering the laws concerning trade was to be brought into the House until the matter had been before the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COLBY said he thought Mr. Speaker would find numerous precedents for a decision on that point.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the chair.

After Recess.

Mr. BLAIN asked for a ruling upon the question of order raised before recess.

Mr. SPEAKER: I find it decided by my predecessor, at least once—and I think it was so ruled more than once, and I quite concur in his decision on the matter—that this does not affect trade in the sense of the rule of the House, or of the ruling on which the House of Commons of England acts.

Mr. McDUGALL (Elgin) resumed the debate, and said that the Government had provided for the appointment of an interim assignee, if the creditors so chose, at their first meeting; and if this person was allowed to become the assignee of the estate by virtue of no other nomination, then he proceeded to administer the estate, but if any other assignee was selected, then the interim assignee was to be paid for his costs and trouble, his fees being settled by the Court, or judge, so that he could not charge more than his services were really worth. Then, if the interim assignee administered the estate, the Act settled his fees. It would be recollected that the Act, before it became law, was submitted to the consideration of a large Select Committee, composed of members of both sides of the House, men of large experience in commercial matters, and leading members of the legal profession. He believed that all branches of trade and avocations were represented on the Committee. The result of their deliberations, as well as those of the Government, was the arrangement of the tariff of costs and the other details of the Act. So also with respect to the solicitors' fees; which were subject to be taxed by the Judge or Court, as in any other ordinary suit. He consequently deemed it unadvisable to repeal the Act. It was admitted that some law for distribution of debtors' estates was necessary, and the Act in question should be given a fair trial. He gathered from remarks made that the objections to the law were based on the operation of, and procedure under, the Act, and not on its principle. Moreover, at this particular juncture it was desirable that there should be some such law in force for the distribution of estates, by which honest debtors might have the opportunity of surrendering what they possessed, and of receiving discharges, which would enable them to continue in business if they could obtain credit, and by which creditors might have the opportunity of distributing such effects among themselves pro rata. These considerations induced him to think it unadvisable at this time to vote for the repeal of the law. He was not prepared to say that it should be permanent, but, at this juncture particularly, he considered it unwise to vote for its repeal.

Mr. BLAKE: Mr. Speaker, I intimated that I hoped it would be in my power to present my propositions concerning this law favourably before the House by to-day, although I gave no pledge. On Friday last I gave notice of the proposal, and notice of the Bill for to-day; and I should have availed myself of it, if it were not for the fact that, on the same evening, intimation was received by several of my friends that it was desirable, before bringing the Bill formally before the House, to wait some time longer, as the Montreal Board of Trade at that moment was engaged in considering several amendments to the Act, which they earnestly desired should be presented for my consideration before the Bill was brought down. In that relation, I desired to introduce a formal Bill, containing a great number of amendments of detail, if information concerning the views of these gentlemen, which on such a subject are entitled to be received with considerable weight, had not reached me, and I consequently thought it better to wait until the appeal was made to me by the hon. member for South Ontario, with reference to what, after all, is the substantial question under consideration in this connection, as it, perhaps, would only confuse the mind of the House rather than otherwise, if any great number of smaller and subsidiary questions, although they are of considerable importance, tending to do something towards the relief and the removal of some of the difficulties under which those labour who come under the operation of the Act, whether debtors or creditors, were submitted, and as they are not of sufficient importance to be presented as an alternative proposal to that made by the hon. member for Richelieu. Now, Sir, before I proceed to state what that is which the Government thinks an important amendment and one to be considered by the House, as its alternative proposal, I desire to advert, although very briefly, to some of the views which have been expressed with regard to Insolvency Acts in general, and the operation of this Act in particular. The position of all Governments on this question, as far as I know, from the time when it first came before the Legislature of old Canada, and certainly since the Union, has been rather questionable, until a comparatively recent period, when the Government of my hon. friend undertook the amendment of the Insolvent Act. It was never promoted by the Government at all; the fact is that leading members on both sides of the House have entertained conflicting views on the question of this law, and that, whether for good or ill, it has been one on which political lines have never been drawn, and on which divisions of a party nature have never taken place. Whether that was advantageous or otherwise, whether it was right or wrong, my hon. friend from Kingston, so long as he led the Government of this country, did not attempt to undertake the management of this subject as a Government matter, although I think I am right in saying that he always cast his weight and influence, as a member of this House, in favour of the proposition that there should be an Insolvent Law. Well, Sir, the House will recollect, that for a considerable period, the question whether there should be such a law or not was one of great doubt, so far as the question was to be determined by the votes of the members of the old House; and, at one time, my hon. friend from Stanstead was successful in obtaining a majority in favour of the repeal of the Act, but subsequent divisions were conflicting and the feeling of the country, or at any rate of those who were more actively or more largely engaged in trade, seemed to have changed from what it was formerly, and the general opinion of the country seemed to be settled down in favour of the proposition that there should be an Insolvent Act. That was the view which my hon. friend who leads the Government took on the question when he came into office, and before he appealed to the people he indicated that the Government would make an effort to introduce a law placing the provisions of the Insolvent Law on a more satisfactory footing. In conformity with that pledge, a Bill was introduced during the first Session of this Parliament, but not pressed; during the second Session a Bill was brought in by the late Minister of Justice, and submitted to a very large and influential Select Committee, owing to the mode in which these bills had always been treated, and correctly treated, thus differing from the ordinary Governmental measures. It made very great progress, and ultimately received the support of a very large majority of this House. Its leading provisions—in fact, I think all its provisions were exposed to the hostile criticism, and the propositions for its amendment were sustained, not only from the leading benches on this side but from the leading benches of the other side of the House. It is said, and I dare say with some degree of correctness, that there has been evoked—by circumstances which I do not think are altogether attributable to the mere fact of an Insolvent Law being on the Statute-book, but rather to the circumstances of the country, and, to a very great extent, the commercial distress, and to the very large extent in which the Insolvent Law has been used—to some degree, a change in the public opinion on this subject. It may be so, but it behoves us to consider, before we take a step so decided as that for which the hon. member for Richelieu proposes, to consider very carefully and to determine whether it would be not acting altogether too hastily to reverse the deliberate judgment of Parliament on the general question of the law and its details before the law has really had time to be understood and carefully worked out, and before the difficulties which necessarily accompany the operation of the provisions of such a measure have had time to disappear, and to propose other amendments before they are removed. There are several grievances which are alleged, and I think that all of them may not be unfairly summarized by the remark made by an old member of this House, whose speech on the subject we all recollect when he said that no Insolvent Law would be entirely satisfactory, except one, providing for the payment in full of all creditors, and for the discharge in full of all debtors. I believe that no law will be entirely satisfactory that does not produce such result, and that such a law is altogether impossible. I conceive that perhaps no Insolvent Law will be entirely satisfactory. Now, Sir, the grievances which are complained of, as arising from this measure, are, as I understand them—in the first place, that there are fraudulent insolvencies, that there are cases in which men go into insolvency having made arrangements for the secretion of assets, and with the view of obtaining discharges by which creditors shall be cheated, and by which they themselves shall be practically enriched; and that there is a low state of commercial morality prevalent, under which it is not reckoned a disgrace or a stain, more or less, on a man's commercial credit, that he should have been obliged to go into insolvency; but these are difficulties which would exist independent of the natural operation of the Act. Then it is said that great difficulties are experienced with assignees, great difficulties with inspectors, and great difficulties with lawyers; that the result is that estates are administered in a very expensive manner; that they are administered negligently; that the assignees and lawyers get the bulk of the estate, and that but a very small part indeed of that which existed at the time of going into insolvency is left. And, lastly, it is stated that discharges are obtained altogether too easily; that almost everybody obtains discharge and relief; and that there are many cases in which a discharge ought not to be obtained. Now, Sir, there will always be fraudulent debtors; whether you have an Insolvent Law or not, you will have devices by fraudulent debtors to secrete their property; such devices existed before an Insolvent Law existed in England; they have existed ever since in cases beyond the operation of such a measure, and they existed—and that to a scandalous extent—in the Province of Ontario before there was an Insolvent Law, and in connection with cases to which this law does not at all apply. As everybody knows, there have been many, many cases, in which debtors have secreted their property, in order to obtain fraudulent settlements, &c., and cheat their creditors, entirely irrespective of the question of an Insolvent Act. As to the question of a low standard of commercial morality, under which it is not thought a disgrace to make a failure, and even a bad failure, I admit that this is a very seriously difficulty; I think that it is a matter to be deeply regretted, that there should not be a better tone of commercial feeling in that respect throughout the country. I think it deeply to be regretted that men should not feel it a disgrace to fail, or to be obliged to allow themselves to be put into insolvency—a disgrace only to be palliated or wiped out by the clearest and most satisfactory explanations, showing that there has not been gross negligence or fraud to produce such distressing results. I do not mean simply the result of going into such insolvency, but the result of going into that condition with such a dividend and return to the creditors as ordinarily happens in the case of insolvencies in this country, of late years. With reference to the question of assignees, of lawyers, and of fraudulent debtors, I must say that on this point I know no particulars in which the present law can be substantially amended. I do not say that there are not some amendments, of more or less importance, which I may be called upon to propose if the law is to remain on the Statute-book, but I do say that the law substantially does give to creditors the very greatest possible facility for the discovery of fraud by debtors, for the punishment of frauds by debtors, and for their punishment, not merely by the refusal of discharge, but by the operation, I will not say of too severe, but of a sufficiently stringent criminal law, if only it were invoked. Three years in the Penitentiary is a tolerably severe punishment, and that punishment the law, which is now under your consideration, awards for cases of fraud against creditors by an insolvent debtor. So with reference to assignees, every precaution has been taken to place them under the control of creditors; to make them their servants, their agents, and their employés; to prescribe their duties; to arrange their mode of discharging their functions in such fashion as the creditors shall elect, and to bring them in a summary manner before the judge, in case of any default of theirs; and the machinery by which the power, which would otherwise perhaps not be used by the creditors, being so diffuse as not to be practically taken advantage of, is given by the appointment of inspectors by the creditors. There may be appointed one or more inspectors, under whose operation the assignee is to act, one or more being chosen from their own number, but generally one is appointed, a creditor himself, who represents the creditors, in order to control the assignee with reference to the punishment of the fraudulent debtor, to the prevention of his discharge; and, with regard to the control of the conduct of the assignee, and the control of the expenses of the administration of estates, it seems to me, that if creditors only chose to avail themselves of the powers which this law gives to them, for these matters are as much in their hands and under their control as in the nature of such things are possible. If any point, in which that does not exist can be shown, and if a practical difficulty of that kind, capable of being remedied by legislation, can be brought forward, I am sure that the House will be disposed to consider carefully any such suggestion, and to adopt the required legislation; and, although, as I have said, I shall propose some minor amendments more or less bearing on the question, I say, speaking in a general sense, regarding the matter to which I have referred, that the law if only the law were used by those for whom it is provided, is substantially satisfactory. But, Sir, I have always been of opinion that an Insolvent Law which did not make more stringent provision than this one, with reference to the discharge of debtors, was a defective Insolvent Law. Those who have taken the trouble to listen to the words which I have addressed to this House on former occasions on this subject, will recollect that the general principles which I ventured to lay down to the House, as in my opinion the sound one, was this,—the principle, I know, is not extremely popular, but I believe that it is sound, though I do not intend to propose anything but a modification of it to the consideration of the Chamber,—that it is the duty of the debtor to keep himself informed of the state of his affairs; that the trader debtor ought, to know how his business is going on, and to charge himself with that knowledge as a duty, and that he ought the moment he is unable to pay twenty shillings in the pound, to put his estate in such a position that the moment it has ceased in all due equity to be his, and belongs to his creditors, it shall be administered equally and justly between them. That, Sir, is my opinion. I think that, the instant a debtor is unable to pay twenty shillings in the pound, that instant his whole and sole care ought to be to see that his estate should go for the benefit of his creditors equally and justly. It may be that the best mode of accomplishing that result is possession; it may be that the best mode of accomplishing it is to sell the estate for the benefit of those whom it may concern; it may be that the only mode is to wind it up; but, whichever way it is accomplished, that way ought to be the one which will realize the most for the creditors. If the estate is not in a position to pay twenty shillings in the pound, the debtor's care should be to pay the nineteen or eighteen shillings, or whatever it is, which remains, which should go to his creditors equally. In that view, it appears to me that we ought to give the debtor that opportunity, that we ought to couple that opportunity given to him with stringent conditions which should govern his discharge, so that if he too long forebore to hand over to the creditors his property, so that a mere nothing remained, then he should be punished for that by not getting his discharge. I do not intend to make any such proposal to this House, because I am aware the sense of the House was, and I suppose continues to be, decidedly adverse to it. But I intend to propose such a modification as, preserving the principle which has been consecrated in this character by very large majorities, viz., that it is for the creditors, and the creditors alone, to throw a debtor into insolvency, would prevent his obtaining his discharge except upon more stringent conditions than those which now obtain. It will be remembered there was considerable discussion upon this subject during the passage of the present Act through the House, and the 58th clause was inserted after much debate in Committee—I am not sure whether there was any actual amendment proposed in the House, but that clause was adopted after much consideration in the very large Committee. That 58th clause is as follows:—

“Wherever it appears that the estate of the insolvent has not paid or is not likely to realize for the creditors a dividend of thirty-three cents on the dollar on the unsecured claims, and sufficient account is not given for the deficiency, the court or judge may, in its or his discretion, suspend or refuse altogether the discharge of the insolvent.”

The House will observe: first, that the dividend is fixed at 33 cents; second, that there is a loose provision about a satisfactory account not being given of the deficiency; and third, that the action of the Judge is discretionary. The practical result of this clause has been, so far as I have been able to inform myself, nugatory. I do not understand that, in the great majority of cases in which creditors have objected to a discharge—and then alone does this become material,—there has been anything approaching to a 33 cents dividend. I am not of opinion, so far as my information goes, that there has been a satisfactory account of the deficiency given in such cases, in the sense in which I understand the Legislature to have intended, viz., some reasonable account as to how it occurred that the estate came to pay less than 33 cents on the dollar, and as to why it was that the business was not so adjusted as to pay that much when the trader did fail. Lastly, I believe that the discretionary power given to the Judge has been exercised in a compassionate spirit towards the debtor which makes the law practically nugatory, so that it might as well be out of the Statute as in it. Before I state to the House the clauses I intend to propose, I wish to call attention to the difficulty which some of us felt with regard to this proposal of dividend and other provisions when the subject was before the House the Session before last. We had an Act which contained no provision to allow the debtor to go into insolvency, no provision to allow a debtor to notify his creditors in some such form that, if they did not choose to take advantage of the notification, he should be relieved of the consequences of his estate wasting after that time and thus becoming unable to pay a legitimate dividend. In such an Act I was then, as I am to-day, opposed to a stringent provision with regard to the amount of dividend, because, unless some such saving clause were inserted for the debtor, unless there were something which will point out his duty and provide some means of calling the attention of the creditors to the fact that he is insolvent, it does seem to me unjust that you should say to him: “You may tell your creditors you are insolvent, and call on them to put you in insolvency; they may decline, against your will, to take that step. Your estate may be eaten up by one or two creditors, by the actions or judgments; perhaps, from 60 or 70 cents on the dollar to 15 or 20 cents; they may, after a lapse of time, put you into insolvency, and although the fact that your estate does not pay a substantial dividend is not due to your delay or default, but to the inaction of your creditors who can alone put you in insolvency, we will require you to pay a special dividend as the price of getting your discharge." That did seem, and now seems to me, to be unjust, but I believe we have found, and I hope the House will agree with me, an alternative proposition, which, while preserving the great principle to which I have referred,—that the creditors alone shall determine whether the creditor shall go into insolvency—will secure more stringent conditions of discharge, and yet not do injustice to debtors. I may remind the House of the provisions of the English Bankruptcy Act. They provide that a discharge shall not be granted unless a dividend of 50 cents on the dollar is paid, or unless it is proved to the satisfaction of the Judge that the creditors have passed a resolution that the failure to pay the dividend of 50 cents is due to causes for which the debtor is not justly responsible. I will now read to the House the clause which it would be my desire to see inserted in the Insolvent Act in this particular. It is as follows:—

"The Judge shall not grant any discharge under any of the provisions of the Insolvent Act of 1875, hereafter called the principal Act unless it be proved that one of the following conditions has been fulfilled, that is to say:

"(1.) That a dividend of not less than fifty cents in the dollar on the unsecured claims has been or will be paid out of the insolvent's property."

I desire the House to observe that, with the exception of the 58th section, which I propose to repeal, I do not take away any of the securities and restrictions which at present surround the ground for the discharge. This is a supplementary restriction and an alternative one; the Judge will not have the power to grant a discharge unless some of four conditions be proved to have been fulfilled. The first condition, as I have stated, is that a dividend of 50 cents on the dollar has been, or will be paid. The second is:—

"(2.) Or that such a dividend might have been paid but for the negligence or fraud of the assignee or inspector."

It would be obviously improper not to give a discharge if the assignee, who is the creditors' servant, or the inspector, who is their agent, were proved before the Judge to have been the cause of the default. In that case, the creditors, having the Judge's judgment that these officers have caused the default, will have their remedy against the assignee or inspector for the amount which the Judge had declared to have been wasted. The third condition is the one foreshadowed in my observations with respect to the relative rights and duties of the embarrassed debtor and his creditors, and is as follows:—

"(3.) Or that the insolvent had on some one day prior to the institution of the proceedings in insolvency mailed, prepared and registered, to the address of each of his creditors, so far as known to him, a declaration acknowledging his insolvency, and that no proceedings in insolvency had been instituted against the insolvent for more than one month after the mailing of such notices, and that such a dividend would have been paid but for circumstances for which the insolvent cannot justly be held responsible, arising more than one month after the mailing of such notices."

This gives the insolvent the power, and in a sense imposes on him the duty, when he finds himself to be insolvent, of mailing notices to his creditors acknowledging his insolvency. If, after receiving that notice, proceedings are not instituted by the creditors within one month, the other provisions apply and this provision is not applicable. As the debtor has no right to go into insolvency, that being a power which will remain as now entirely with the creditors, if the creditors do not choose after one month's full and fair notice of his inability to meet his liabilities, and if he proves before a Judge that the delay of more than one month has caused the deficiency in the amount of dividend, then the Judge shall have the power to grant a discharge, not holding the debtor responsible for the actions of the creditors or other circumstances beyond his control arising, more than one month after notice was given to the creditors. The last clause is to this effect:

“Or that the insolvent has obtained assent to his discharge or to the proposed composition and discharge, in accordance with the 52nd section of the existing Act, which allows a majority in number, comprising three-fourths, in value, of the creditors to sign a written assent to a discharge.”

That point there is no difficulty about. It allows a majority in number and three-fourths in value of the creditors to sign a written assent to the discharge, and, if that is signed, subject, of course, to all the provisions as to fraudulent obtainment by the personification of creditors or otherwise, I am sure the House will agree with me that a recalcitrant majority of one-fourth in amount and a minority in number ought not to prevent the discharge being granted. These, then, are the four conditions, I think, we may fairly expect, if the House will favourably receive this proposition, that the debtors will, as I have always urged, feel that it is their interest as well as their duty, when they become unable to meet their liabilities to see their creditors, to disclose their position and place their creditors in such a position that they may, without any difficulty, avail themselves of the benefit of the Insolvent Act. It will certainly be their interest more than it has ever been before, because, as we know, under the present system fifty cents is not paid. A very small dividend is paid. The practical result is—although I quite admit that assets may be badly handled, and there may be very considerable losses in the winding up—that men's difficulties are not now disclosed to their creditors until a period long subsequent to that at which they ought to be disclosed. This is the real difficulty. Men go on, through carelessness or ignorance, hoping against hope, contracting new liabilities, piling up the old ones, getting through their credits as long as they can, bad debts growing worse, and old stocks growing older, their difficulties accumulating; and then they go into insolvency without anything practical being accomplished except that the insolvent gets his discharge, when really there is nothing left to the creditors. In reference to some of the observations made, I believe the results, so disastrous as to windings up, are more apparent than real. You find that a man gives his book debts when he makes a statement, and we all know he makes his books appear a great deal more favourable than they really are. He values his stock at a great deal more than it is worth. An apparent balance is produced, which, under the most careful management, if taken into the creditors' own hands, would never be actually produced. The real condition of the estate is almost always worse than the exhibit discloses. But, if a debtor knows that the actual test of results is to be complied with, if he is aware that in order to obtain his discharge he must be able to pay fifty cents on the dollar, then that delusive hope which he hugs to his breast, while he knows the assets to be false, will disappear, because he will not dare to run the risk of being stripped of his property. Such, I hope, will be the working of the proposed amendments, if they commend themselves to the favourable consideration of the House. It is perfectly clear that all the securities which creditors now have against fraud will practically remain in the subsidiary provision, which prohibits the action of the Judge in a case which does not fall within the four conditions to which I have called the attention of the House. I deem it my duty to advert to just one point which I should have been glad if I had been able to propose this Session, it being something which I think would be an important further amelioration of this law. I believe that in some instances considerable difficulties are created by the persistency of a particular creditor against sanctioning any arrangements, contrary to the express will of the majority of the creditors, both in number and in value, before insolvency. My attention has been called to the expediency of making provision by which a proper majority of creditors, in number and value, should, even before insolvency, be enabled to settle a composition which would be binding on the minority. I have prepared clauses with that view, but I find it impossible to adapt them to the Act without, in effect, recasting it. They require, in order to secure their proper execution, a very considerable degree of elaboration in detail as to claims and to various topics with which I do not care to worry the House, and I find it impossible, with due regard to what I owe to the House, to bring down a measure which I should wish to be responsible for in that particular. But I think the subject eminently deserving of the attention of those members of the House who pay particular regard to this branch of the law; and I shall be able, if the law be preserved, to introduce such an amelioration at an early day. I may submit for the consideration of the House, and more particularly of those who are disposed to oppose the Insolvent Law, whether the present is an opportune time for repealing it? I have heard many gentlemen say that the law ought not to be a permanent one on the Statute-book, but that it ought from time to time to be placed on the Statute-book when necessity arose. I do not myself concur in that view. I believe we ought, if the law be a good one at all, to have it working in good times as well as in bad times. But to those who talk of a temporary Insolvent Law, as suitable to a time of commercial stringency, I beg respectfully to represent that this is a time of commercial stringency. So it is not, from their point of view, a time fit to remove the operation of the Insolvent Law. I think, if it were now removed from the Statute-book, it would open a very great number of sores which are now closed lately, and would open up also a great number of evils which will not exist under the operation of the law, at any rate as I propose to amend it. But no law of this description will ever work effectually unless the creditors are prepared actively to supervise its workings. If they choose to say: "We are throwing away good money after bad money, and we will let the assignee and lawyer work their sweet will and pleasure on the assets, and we will take the few cents which come to us and will not try to make it more," of course the law will not work well. But, if the creditors make it their business to watch the assets, if they properly employ the power given them over the assignee, if they properly utilize the power to appoint an Inspector, if the Inspector makes it his duty to inspect, to counsel and to advise, then I believe the country will gain far more on the whole under the operation of this law than it would gain by the repeal altogether, and the substitution of the old system of "grab," to use a vulgarism, which existed before we had such a law. Therefore, speaking my own sentiments, which, as the House knows, have always been in favour of some Insolvent Law, I would suggest to the House that no circumstances have occurred to really alter that decided opinion which was expressed not a long time ago in favour of the introduction of an Insolvent Law, and particularly in favour of the passing of this Act. And I suggest whether the evils complained of cannot be ameliorated by legislation, because they will exist anyway, and by the amendments I propose to introduce, whether creditors will not receive better dividends than they have had heretofore. I must say that I deem it my duty to support the amendment of my hon. friend from Hamilton.

Mr. MACDONALD (Toronto) said he had no hesitation in saying that the amendments proposed by the Minister of Justice would tend materially to improve the Insolvent Law, and to make it alike beneficial to the debtor and creditor. The law of 1868, to which the Minister of Justice had referred, gave a debtor his discharge after the payment of 33½ per cent.—the discharge, however, being in the discretion of the Judge. The result had been that, at a meeting of creditors in a county town, all the creditors not being present, instead of having to pay 33½ cents, the debtor received his discharge from the Judge on payment of 10 cents on the dollar, thus causing immense demoralization throughout the country. He regretted that he had not heard all the remarks of the hon. member for Richelieu, because he could scarcely conceive that the hon. member had purposed pressing his motion to a division. But he gathered from his remarks that the hon. member virtually said that the Insolvent Law had made traders dishonest. He referred to the period of by-gone honesty and golden days when all men were honest, before this Insolvent Law came into operation. But he (Mr. Macdonald) ventured to say that, for every debtor who now absconded to the United States, ten absconded then; because now they had the hope of settlement, while then they had no hope. He understood the hon. gentleman to refer to official assignees getting the cream of the estates and to friends of the debtor entering into collusion and thereby obtaining the whole of the estate in their own hands, and to the fact that the great bulk of the estate only paid 22½ cents on the dollar. He would ask the hon. gentleman and every member of the House if these facts, if they were all true, resulted from the Insolvency Law. He claimed that they did not. And he would ask the hon. gentleman whether these men who paid 22½ cents on the dollar under the Insolvency Law would have paid more with no Insolvency Law.

Mr. BARTHE: They would pay in full.

Mr. MACDONALD said no law passed by the House could prevent any dishonest man from evading it. A man thoroughly dishonest would find some means by which to defraud his creditors. He was at a loss to understand for whom the hon. gentleman sought to repeal the law. It could not be for those who had paid 22½ cents on the dollar, because they had compromised already. It could not be for the honest traders, because their condition would be immensely worse without the law than with it. It could not be for the lawyers, because they claimed that they were most prosperous when the country was most prosperous. It could not be for the wholesale merchants, because it would ruin them. And he must take it for granted that the motion was made on behalf of those who thought 22½ cents in the dollar too much, and that they could make a better settlement for themselves when the law was repealed. He observed this faulty feature in the hon. gentleman's remarks: It was proposed to repeal the law, but what was proposed to put in its place? Did the hon. gentleman wish them to go back to the law of preference when everyone caused a confession of judgment and obtained an advantage over his neighbour, thus causing universal distrust throughout the whole country? Whether the hon. gentleman intended that or not, he (Mr. Macdonald) contended that it would be the result of the repealing of the law. He did not claim that the law was perfect; he did not claim that there might not be a law that would give the creditor more speedy access to the assets, and the insolvent more speedy distribution, and a more equitable distribution both to the debtor and creditor. But, if the law was faulty, let them better it; if it was wrong, let them amend it. Under all circumstances let them keep the law on the Statute-book until there was something better in its place. If merchants would but take the trouble to attend the meetings of creditors and act under the law; if a few healthy examples were made of fraudulent tradesmen throughout the country, a decided improvement would be noticed amongst that class. His hon. friend the member for Ottawa had said there were men in the Penitentiary worse than the men on the Ministerial side of the House.

Mr. CURRIER: The hon. gentleman is mistaken. What I said was that if the hon. gentlemen on the other side were half as bad as they were represented to be by gentlemen on this side of the House they would have been in the Penitentiary.

Mr. MACDONALD said he begged the hon. gentleman's pardon. If there were men in the Penitentiary who, perhaps under the influence of hunger, had unhappily committed a crime, how much better were the men who, deliberately and coolly, when they could pay 100 cents on the dollar, planned how they need only pay 25 cents on the dollar, so that they could put the rest in their pockets? The clause as to the 50 cents would prove beneficial as to the working of the Act. Let it be borne in mind it was a very different thing to have an estate merely showing 50 cents on the dollar and one yielding 50 cents on the dollar. And, if a debtor was to pay 50 cents on the dollar, he would consider whether he had not better work the whole problem out and pay 100 cents on the dollar. Had the hon. gentleman any idea of the amount wholesale men had invested in this country?—it could not amount to less than $90,000,000. But this would be jeopardised if a measure such as that proposed were passed which would cause derangement and distrust.

Mr. WORKMAN said he had listened with pleasure and gratification to the lucid explanations of the Minister of Justice and the amendments he proposed making to the present Insolvent Act. It was a time when stringent amendments should be added, because he was convinced the Act had become in its working very unpopular. When the Act first came into force, it was looked upon as a great boon by the commercial community of Montreal at least. There it was probably better understood and worked than in any other part of the Dominion. For one or two years very fair results were obtained from an insolvent estate; indeed he was so much satisfied with the working of the Act that he opposed its repeal on the floor of the House, and frequently spoke in favour of it. But now, had he not heard the amendments proposed by the hon. Minister of Justice, he would have been compelled, owing to recent experience, to have voted for the Bill of the hon. member for Richelieu. He was quite willing to give the law a fair trial of another year at least; it would be much to be regretted if it should be wiped off the Statute-book at present. He would give an instance of the condition of things in Ontario prior to the passage of this Act, when the old system of preferential assignments was in force. A large ironfounder at Toronto failed. The debtor selected a certain banker and his own father-in-law and made them preferential creditors of his estate. After they were paid in full, the balance was divided among the other creditors. The estate was carried on under an assignee or agent for ten years before being wound up. It was originally worth $75,000 in genuine assets. The banker and father-in-law were paid in full, and the other creditors did not get a dollar. He would regret exceedingly if they were thrown back on such a system as that. The discharge he considered one of the weak points of the law. A majority, or three-fourths of the creditors, could give a discharge to the bankrupt, no matter how his business might have been carried on. True, the law was not supposed to allow that, but it was within his own knowledge that dishonest debtors got favourable settlements, and procured their discharges, because they produced documents signed by three-fourths of the creditors, a number of which were obtained under false representations and statements. It was this state of things which had disgusted the merchants with the working of the Act, and he hoped the clause to be introduced to correct this evil would be of the most stringent character. He doubted very much the policy or even the necessity of conferring upon the majority of the creditors the power to compel the minority to accept a settlement of less than 100 cents on the dollar. He had attended a great many meetings of creditors previous to the introduction of this Act, and never knew an instance, when an honest, straightforward statement was made, where the debtor was not granted a liberal discharge. Small dividends were frequently accepted from an honest man who made a struggle to pull through, and he had often known resolutions of sympathy to be passed. But the system under the working of the Act for the last two years was a legalized conspiracy to rob the honest creditors. Assignees and debtors had become so well posted that they knew exactly what to do and how to do it; and often the assignee became a partisan of the debtor—he sold himself to the debtor and entered into a conspiracy to defraud the creditor. He knew that remark would not apply to a great many of the assignees in and around the city which he had the honour to represent, for many of them were of the highest integrity and principle, but it would apply to a great number of assignees in the rural and country districts. In those districts they were friends and relations of the debtors, and they had no compunction in entering into arrangement against the rich merchants of Montreal, Toronto, and Hamilton, and securing a settlement at 10 cents, 20 cents, and 30 cents on the dollar. Those were some of the reasons why the Act had been so unpopular of late. He knew, however, that where the Act had been given fair play, very beneficial and favourable results had been derived from insolvent estates. In the city of Quebec, a man of wealth and a large amount of property, entered into a conspiracy to deliberately rob his creditors. The creditors got information of the scheme, and were able, under the Act, to have their man tried in Court, and he was now in jail suffering the penalty justly due to him. But, where there was one dishonest debtor punished, a hundred escaped; and in all his experience he had only known of two or three men being sent to jail. The Judge, as a rule, sympathized with the debtor, who was often a friend or an acquaintance. This question was one of great importance, and deserved the most careful consideration of the House. He was present at the meeting of the Montreal Board of Trade, to which allusion had been made, and it was at his request that an expression of opinion was given on the subject. While some of the members were violently opposed to the working of the Act, a large majority of those present were in favour of its continuance with certain improvements. A Committee was appointed to inquire into the subject and to prepare a report, which would be submitted to the hon. the Minister of Justice. The gentlemen on that Committee had given the subject a great deal of study and attention. One or two were originally opposed to the Act, but since they were placed on the Committee they had come to the conclusion that it would be wise to continue it. For the reasons he had stated and many others, he should vote against the Bill of the hon. member for Richelieu.

Mr. PALMER said he wanted hon. members distinctly to understand that, if they voted for the resolution of the hon. member for Hamilton, the law would remain on the Statute-book for one year more, and could not even be debated again this Session. He felt under great obligations to the hon. the Minister of Justice for the way in which he had treated this matter. He thanked the hon. gentleman for so fully indicating the amendments he proposed to the Bill. He thanked the hon. gentleman for another thing—that the Act was a curse to the country, and in his (Mr. Palmer's) opinion would always be a curse to the country. What was proposed to be done with the Act? He understood the hon. the Minister of Justice to say that the amendments ought not to stand in the way of the consideration of the question of repeal or not. The hon. gentleman was quite right in that, and, while he (Mr. Palmer) was inclined to differ with him, there was no doubt the country owed him a debt of gratitude for his endeavours to make the law perfect. The first amendment proposed was that the debtor should not be discharged unless the estate paid 50 cents on the dollar, or unless it was the fault of the assignee or inspector that the estate would not pay that amount. That was no great improvement in view of the time required to wind up the estate, and he would tell his hon. friend that the law was bad from foundation to top. No good had ever proceeded from it, and he did not think that any little cheese-paring amendments would effect any good. It was claimed that the law was prepared with great care and that every device for the protection of creditors that human ingenuity could suggest, was inserted. There was no denying, however, that the Act had not worked well, and that it was not likely to operate better in the future than it had done in the past. An hon. gentleman pleaded for more experience of the Act before talking of repealing it, but how much more time was required? Surely, eight years was enough experience of the working of a bad Act, and he hoped they would not have much more experience to suffer before the law was got rid of. Some of his hon. friends opposite had argued the matter on a wrong basis. They assumed that because a man had no property he had no ability to pay his debts. That was scarcely correct. A man had a certain amount of personal power, the destruction of which took away a great portion of the energy and power within him. The denial of that principle was one of the radical wrongs in the Act. But it was urged a dreadful calamity would happen to the country if the law were repealed; the wholesale dealers would have to shut up. Well, he thought the country would get along just as well if those dealers were shut up. His hon. friend from Montreal West said the assignees were honest in his neighbourhood, but that those in the rural districts connived at fraud. He would ask that hon. gentleman if he or some of his friends had never received a note endorsed by some honest farmer, who was rather rural when he attached his signature thereto, and if he had ever let the man off. The wholesale merchants sent commercial travellers who were known as bummers around the country, to force trade on the inhabitants of the rural districts, and it was not to be wondered at that insolvency was often the result. The law was exclusively in the interest of the wholesale people and the farmers obtained no benefit from it. He thought the less these bummers went round the rural districts the better it would be for the farmers. The belief of the men in the rural districts had been that it was a piece of dishonesty, a crime, a sin for a man not to pay his debts. The new way was to pay the debt through the Insolvent Court; at least, that was what the big bugs did. He knew villages where men would scorn to owe anything, and think it a crime if they did not pay their debts, but the present law had made many a dishonest man. Some hon. gentlemen spoke as if all the rogues in the country were lawyers—

Mr. BLAKE: No, as if all the lawyers in the country were rogues.

Mr. PALMER: I was going to say—and vice versa. He wondered if many of the assignees were lawyers. In St. John they had a gentleman for assignee who was a lawyer appointed by the present Government, but they could not have made a better selection, as far as he knew, in the Province of New Brunswick. He was a highly honourable man and it was no fault of his that the law had not worked well. The Minister of Justice said it was the fault of the creditors because they did not look after the matter. Let them take the case of a creditor for $200—a very serious matter for him—the man who went into insolvency might be 100 miles away; the creditor had to support his family, and yet he was compelled to go and look after this debt from time to time, and he might spend more than the $200 in doing it. Surely, they would not have done more under the old law than they did under the present. His hon. friend from Montreal West was in favour of the amendment. Now, by getting a majority, they could override the honest man.

Mr. WORKMAN: You have to pay 50 cents now, formerly only 10 cents on a dollar.

Mr. PALMER: You do not understand. These are the people who do not pay a single cent.

Mr. BLAKE: If the majority of a man's creditors in number and three-fourths in value agree, not only to a composition, but to a discharge, the Judge has power to discharge him although the compromise to which they have assented is less than 50 cents.

Mr. PALMER said that was really the worst feature of the Bill, and yet the hon. member from Montreal West was perfectly electrified with the proposed amendment. He had stated that the Bill was unpopular among his constituents. He (Mr. Palmer) supposed the fact was that all the hon. gentleman's constituents were not wholesale dealers. If he made them all wholesale dealers he would get their vote notwithstanding his course on the Insolvent question. He hoped he would see that the best thing was to do away with this law, which had not done any good, and to which his constituency was so much opposed. As to the lawyers, he held that they were not as a class more disposed to make litigation or trouble than other people. The number of lawyers in the House, as compared with the number of lawyers in the country, showed that the people generally had confidence in them as a class. He could tell them why the expenses were so much. The moment the estate passed out of the hands of the man whose interest it was to pay, it did not matter to him how much the estate paid, and the result was that every one who had a fictitious claim of any kind to which he could stretch his conscience to swear, trumped up that claim against the estate. The result of all this was a number of lawsuits, and they could not expect lawyers to work professionally without being paid. The result was that a great sea of law was caused by the transfer of the estate. It was all the creature of the Insolvent Act, and the result was that the expense was piled up and had, in numberless cases, taken fully half the estate. If he thought that the Act could be worked better, he would be willing to let the country suffer a little longer, but he did not think any harm would come from the repeal of the Act. It was said that it was hard for an honest debtor not to be able to discharge his debts and begin the world again, if he had met with misfortune. The hon. member for Montreal West had stated that he knew no case in which, if an honest man could fairly show that he could not pay, his creditors would not sign off his discharge. The result of that was to prevent all this sea of law and to enable the creditor to deal with the man himself. He would like to know where was the merchant who would undertake the odium and trouble that would necessarily be involved in prosecuting a dishonest debtor. There was not one man in a hundred in trade who would face the odium of such a prosecution. All these people had a great circle of friends and a man did not desire to stir up a hornet's nest about his ears. He supposed that, if there were any money in this law for the lawyers, he would get it as well as anybody else, but he scouted the idea that anyone in his profession ever took money from a man without rendering him an equivalent service. If he thought the contrary, he would at once withdraw from his profession. If any hon. gentleman were to be falsely accused, and were to be tried for his life, he would place his case in the hands of some trusted lawyer. The matter presented another difficulty. If it was right to have such a law for the trader, why should it not be extended to other classes, and particularly to the farmer. It was said that there were reverses and uncertainty in trade in excuse of the policy adopted, but he held that the farmer was equally open to the loss of money from no fault of his own. The agriculturalist might sow, but it depended upon Providence whether he should reap; he might sell, and the merchant to whom he sold might fail. The Act should be abolished altogether. It encouraged reckless trading. He warned the hon. gentlemen who were in favour of repeal that, if the amendment of the hon. member for Hamilton passed, the result would be that the Act could not be again touched, in the way of appeal, during the present Session.

Mr. DOMVILLE said the question interested merchants to a greater degree, perhaps, than lawyers. In New Brunswick, the Act practically worked against the honest trader, and the amendment proposed by the Minister of Justice would not, he thought, do away with the difficulties experienced in this regard; he presumed in other parts of the Dominion the first difficulty lay in the clause enacting that the word insolvent should mean a debtor, and, in the next place, if a debtor ceased to meet his liabilities generally as they fell due, it was almost impossible to place him in the Insolvent Court. The Judge was clothed with immense power under the Act, and he might consider that a debtor brought before him had the right to continue in trade, and he was sole judge in the matter. In one case a debtor had ceased to meet his liabilities for some two years; a well-known merchant applied for settlement; but the man said that he could pay nothing; he might however pay ten per cent. and he would renew his paper. He had no goods, and his book debts amounted to a trifle. The merchant said; "You have eaten up the estate, and frittered away the assets"; and he applied to a Judge in order to have the debtor declared insolvent. On the case being heard, the Judge said; "It is true that he has no goods, and that he is deeply in debt, but he avers that he has promissory notes and book-debts, which, if collected, will enable him to meet his liabilities." Although it was patent that the promissory notes were worthless, the Judge, who was compassionate, held that the man only wanted time to meet his engagements, and discharged the case. The debtor in the name of himself and partner then filed a suit against the merchant to recover $10,000 damages; and, although the man afterwards became insolvent, compromising at ten cents on the dollar and never paying anything, continued the suit, and, as the Judge before whom it came ruled out evidence touching the insolvency, on the ground that the court had previously held the then plaintiff to be solvent, a verdict against the defendant, in accordance with the charge of the court, was found. The question had been since appealed from court to court. This was a very hard case. The alteration proposed by the Minister of Justice went to make the law more stringent, but it did not go far enough. He would cite another instance regarding the working of the Act. A large American firm in New Brunswick failed for millions, in court they showed that they were solvent at the outset, having assets to the amount of one and a half millions of dollars, but, through the assignee, this whole property was sold for $60,000 or $90,000. Suppose some of the creditors had been in England or British Columbia, how could they have attended the sale, of which only thirty days' notice was given. If the property was sold in small parcels, a very fair dividend might be obtained, but it was disposed of en bloc to the highest bidder. He was not in favour of putting so much power, as was the case at present, in the hands of the largest creditors. There had been too much talk about dishonest men and dishonest lawyers, so much so that a stranger would think that there were very few honest men in the country. A really honest trader would easily get his discharge under any circumstances. A case might now and then occur when a man would refuse his consent to the discharge of a really honest debtor, but friends would come forward and get rid of such an obnoxious creature. The merchant, if trade ever again became sound, could, as in Great Britain, make a purchaser place his position in writing, so that if this proved incorrect he could prosecute him for obtaining goods under false pretences. The number of traders would then be considerably diminished and trade would be established on a more satisfactory basis. The retailer suffered as much from the reckless credit system as the wholesale merchant. He knew of goods having been sold at twenty cents below cost in large quantities; and how could the honest trader import under these circumstances. He was willing to submit to any law putting these matters on a better basis, but he was not prepared to accept an amendment which provided for a fifty cent compromise, and which allowed the Judge to use his discretion. Besides, if this amendment were adopted, instead of the creditor getting a larger dividend the assignee would secure a bigger slice of the estate. He did not think that the assignees were dishonest, but, if they were, they were appointed by the present Government. He would vote against the Act and for its repeal.

Mr. MITCHELL said he could not give a silent vote on a question of so much importance to the mercantile community of the country. He had always opposed the continuation of this bankrupt law; and, in 1875, he had taken some part in pointing out the monstrosities of the 1st section of the present Act. His experience during the past two years, and the intercourse he had had with leading business men in Montreal and other cities of the Dominion, had led him to the conclusion that, if a vote was to be polled to-day, two-thirds of those who, five years ago, favoured this law would now declare that it had done nothing save positively injure the trade of the country. It encouraged reckless trading; the wholesale merchant forced goods on the retailer, and the retailer in turn forced them on the farmer and the mechanic. What was the result? Last year, fully one-half of the business transacted throughout Canada had led to embarrassment, either on the part of the wholesale merchant, of the retail trader, or of their customers. The Herald, Gazette, Mail and Globe published lists of bankrupts day after day, and week after week; and in place of 50 cents, he durst say the average dividends were not 25 cents on the dollar. He was not opposed to granting relief to the poor man, and the remedy he proposed was not founded on mere theory, but upon experience obtained in New Brunswick. Whenever the necessities of trade and the wants of the country required a considerable amount of relief to be afforded, a bankrupt law was placed upon the Statute-book for two or three years; and then it was allowed to expire. He believed that the Insolvent Law had done its duty, and that there would be no end to the misery and suffering and losses occurring daily until this Act was wiped off the Statute-book. The amendment of the Minister of Justice was a step in the wrong direction. Were they to punish a man's misfortunes? If the law were to continue, he desired to afford more liberty, more opportunity, and more facility in the way of securing relief from liabilities, enabling men who were in difficulties to make a fresh start in the world, and to accumulate fresh means. The only argument in favour of a bankrupt law was that it should furnish relief to the debtor rather than protection to the creditor. The latter class were generally wealthy, and they were able to refuse credit. He would impose upon creditors the responsibility of giving credit to such classes only as were able to conduct business properly, or who possessed means. The system advocated by the hon. member for King's, which was that adopted in England, was based on sound principles. Under it, a trader was able to ask his customer who desired credit to make a statement in writing of the position of his affairs, and a false statement made therein was deemed to be a false pretence, and liable to heavy punishment. An examination of the evils which had grown up in connection with the Insolvent Act satisfied him that it should be swept from the Statute-book, and that it were better that two or three debtors should suffer than the whole class. With respect to the remedy proposed by the Minister of Justice to compel debtors to pay 50 cents on the dollar, or deprive them of any benefit under the Act, it was well known that many estates which at first showed 100 cents on the dollar would not pay when wound up 50 cents on account of shrinkages in the value of property. The proposed legislation of the Minister of Justice amounted to punishing the misfortunes of bankrupt traders. If the proposals were carried into effect the law would be made worse, and a system would be created tyrannical in its character, and detrimental to the true liberty and independence of the people. The Insolvent Law had carried out its object; it had enabled, or should have enabled any unfortunate trader to have become free from his difficulties before now; and the effect of the existing Act was to cause a class to grow up in the community who were trading on the existence of the bankrupt law, by which, though possessing facilities for obtaining credit and goods, they secured goods and afterwards made a composition at the rate of 20 or 30 cents on the dollar, and serious injury was inflicted on the honest trader by goods being sold at sacrifice prices. This compelled the honest trader to sell goods at ruinous prices, and the result was that other traders became bankrupt. Under these circumstances he held that the Insolvent Law should be repealed and the country obtain a clear bill of health. The farmers suffered an injustice in that, while they had to bear losses through insolvent traders, they could not themselves avail themselves of the Act in case of meeting with difficulties. He would vote against the motion of the hon. member for Hamilton and afterwards in favour of that of the hon. member for Richelieu.

Mr. YOUNG said the question of an Insolvent Law was an important one, and a mistake made by the House with regard to it might have a serious effect on our commercial interests. He had always favoured an Insolvent Law; but he must confess that some very serious evils had manifested themselves in working the law during the last two or three years. Those evils had not been confined to creditors alone. The creditors, under the operation of the law at present, had the whole matter in their own hands; they could manage the insolvent estate as they pleased, and, if they did not manage it in their own interest, the blame rested with themselves. There were, however, another class of whom he had heard very little during the debate, who had suffered very much from the operation of the Insolvent Law, namely, solvent traders. That evil did not apply simply to cases of failures. In such cases, very frequently, the trader's estate was wound up, and he went out of business, and the solvent trader did not suffer any very injurious effect. But a great evil had arisen of late years in the extensive system of composition carried on, which was actually more injurious than the absolute failures which occurred. They knew well the effect that system had had on solvent traders. When a trader compromised with his creditors at 50 cents or 25 cents on the dollar, and continued in business, it had an unfortunate effect on the adjoining trader, who, perhaps, found it difficult to meet his payments and who would thereby be rendered less anxious to make the necessary exertion to pay one hundred cents on the dollar. While he desired that amendments should be made in the law, with the view of protecting solvent traders from this unequal and undue competition, and to prevent fraudulent debtors from getting discharges, he would not like to support the proposal to repeal the Act altogether. In a commercial community, an Insolvent Law in some form was an absolute necessity, and, if the law was repealed, evils would follow ten times greater than those which had arisen in the working of the law. Some feeling had, of course, been manifested against the Insolvent Act, but a like result occurred with regard to other laws. If the law were repealed altogether, the table of the House would in all probability be covered next Session with petitions praying for its re-enactment. One of the greatest evils in connection with legislation of that class was the constant changes which took place, and the uncertainty that prevailed in the public mind as to the course which would be pursued by Parliament with respect to the question of insolvency. If the commercial public thoroughly understood the working of the provisions of the law, the evils which had manifested themselves would have been decreased 50 per cent., but the Act had been amended so that it was not generally understood, and while the people were thus unacquainted with its working, the hon. member for Richelieu asked, as he did in a previous Session, that the law should be repealed. It would be derogatory to the character of Parliament if, after much time had been devoted two years ago to framing the measure, the most able members of the House having composed the Committee, it were repealed without having received a fair trial. He was convinced that the Act had not yet had a fair trial. Those who were most connected with the working of the law—chiefly creditors, did not fully understand its provisions; but, when they became acquainted with them, creditors would find they had entire control of debtors' estates falling into insolvency. The hon. member for Northumberland had depicted the evils of the Insolvent Law, and spoken of the failures and consequent sufferings which had resulted from it. It could not, however, be supposed that if the Act were repealed, the country would get rid of failures in business, losses through failures and frauds. It was well known that before the enactment of the law there were quite as many failures, losses and frauds as there had been under its operation. In 1857-58, when there was no Insolvent Law in force, there were more failures, greater losses and more frauds than during the recent period of depression under an Insolvent Act; and it was not correct to say that, under ordinary circumstances, when the wheels of commerce were moving freely, insolvencies increased under the operation of the old Insolvent Law. He remembered having laid statistics before the House some years ago to show that, under the operation of the law of 1864, during a time of commercial tranquility, failures had decreased, and the circumstance of their recent increase was due to the commercial depression existing throughout the country. The only effect of repealing the law would be that, while it would not get rid of the loss, creditors would thereby be placed in a much worse position than at present to realize the assets of estates. That would be one of the first effects of the abolition of the law. Other results would follow. They would find that many of those who failed—some of them enterprising men—would betake themselves to the United States, having no hope of engaging further in business or doing anything more for themselves or the creditors to whom they were indebted; and many men, honest men, too, who had failed because of their enterprise, and not because of their dishonesty, would in that way be driven out of the Dominion. He did not, therefore, believe that the trading community would be placed in one whit better position if the Act were repealed, as proposed by the hon. member for Richelieu; for, while failures, losses and frauds would not be prevented, creditors would not occupy so favourable a position to quickly realise the assets of an estate as they did under the operation of the present law. He took it for granted that the House would not take the extreme step proposed after the law had been tried only two years, and after the statement of the Minister of Justice with regard to the important amendments which the Government would propose, and probably the hon. Minister had not stated all the amendments which he would submit to remedy the evils which had arisen under the Act. It should be remembered by the House, in considering the question of repealing the Insolvent Act, that of late years the business of our leading merchants and traders had become very much more extended than before Confederation took place. It was now not uncommon for merchants in the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec to send large quantities of goods to Manitoba, British Columbia, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, and merchants in those Provinces to send their goods to distant Provinces of the Dominion. If the Insolvent Act were repealed and the country fell back on the old system of confession of judgment and preferential assignment, the local creditors would lay hold of the estate and creditors at a distance would be placed at a great disadvantage. That was an important matter, because it struck at the foundation of all credit, which was of much consequence in a young country like Canada. In the young Provinces, especially in the new districts, it was absolutely necessary that business men should have credit to a greater or less extent in the older Provinces. If the measures by which the creditors could at least obtain a share of the debtor's estate in case of failure were removed, a serious blow would be struck at all credit, and injury would be inflicted on the people of the distant Provinces and the commercial community as a whole. He was not an advocate of long credits, because he believed short credits were desirable in the older Provinces, but, in the new Provinces of the Dominion, where money was scarce and the people struggling, credit was an essential element of success and progress, and the repeal of the Insolvent Law would deal a fatal blow to reasonable credits being given in those newly formed Provinces. The amendments to the law which had been foreshadowed by the Minister of Justice should at least have a fair trial, and possibly, before the subject came before the House finally, other points might have suggested themselves to that hon. gentleman's able mind. Personally, he would have preferred that, instead of raising the amount of dividend to obtain a discharge to 50 cents on the dollar, the rate should have remained at 33 cents, but that other and more difficult restrictions should have been imposed upon dishonest insolvents getting a discharge. He could easily understand cases occurring in which a trader would be unable to pay 50 cents on the dollar, though perfectly honest. Experience had proved that, in order to realize 50 cents on the dollar, the estate must be worth at least 60 or 65 cents. He could, therefore, easily understand that a trader, by being burnt out, by the shrinkage of values, or by endorsing notes for a friend, might be unable to pay the dividend proposed to be inserted in the law. The measure was one that did not affect the general public, but only the trading community. He had not found in the press any evidence that the commercial men of the country did not desire the Act to continue in force, and the Dominion Board of Trade had invariably passed resolutions in favour of its continuance. While they had suggested frequent amendments, they had always expressed themselves in favour of an Insolvent Act, and, therefore, the House should hesitate before it endorsed the proposal of the hon. member for Richelieu and repealed the Act. Let them make all possible amendment in the law so as to secure a more perfect system; let them surround the obtaining of a discharge with more restrictions, and render it more certain that fraud should not be perpetrated, but let the House not repeal an Act which, he believed, on the whole, was required by the interests of the commercial community.

Mr. PATERSON said he would not have addressed the House except for the fact that the sentiment appeared to be so strongly in favour of the motion of the hon. member for Richelieu. While he did not think hon. members were in the temper to adopt the motion offered by that hon. gentleman, there was nevertheless a strong feeling in its favour. Viewing the question as one of great importance to the commercial community, he felt that, if he could say anything that would tend to produce a result contrary to that sought by the hon. member for Richelieu, it was his duty to address the House. He had felt, in common with the wholesale trade, that they had suffered from the working of the Act, not because of the Act, but notwithstanding it. Casting aside for the time the proposed amendments of the Minister of Justice, the question was simply this—Shall Parliament repeal the Insolvent Law and return to the state of things which obtained prior to the passing of the Act, or shall the law remain on the statute-book? Although aware that some business men of large experience and means took a contrary view, it nevertheless seemed strange that any intelligent business man could contemplate the repeal of the Insolvent Law at the present juncture of the country's affairs, without a feeling to awe. He supposed there never was a time when an Insolvent Act was needed more than at the present time. We were passing through a period of great commercial depression, and the repeal of the Insolvent Law would aid mightily in increasing the depression. He would shrink from the responsibility of throwing such a disturbing element into the business of the country. If the law were repealed, the debtor would be at the mercy of his creditors, and innumerable suits would be the result. Without wishing to cast aspersions upon the trading community, he thought he was justified in saying that fully one-half of the traders were being "carried" to a greater or less extent. Repeal the Insolvency Law, and the "carrying" would cease. Any creditor that could rush to the lawyer's office and get confession of judgment first would secure something, while all the other creditors would lose their honest dues. The law should not be repealed in the interest of the creditor more than in the interest of the debtor. It had been agreed for years in that Chamber that an Insolvency Law was a necessity, that it was right in the interests of justice and mercy. It was necessary to enable the honest debtor, who, through a combination of circumstances, was unable to pay all his debts, to have relief, in order that he might have that opportunity which the hon. member for Northumberland was so desirous he should have to retrieve his fortunes. The present Act did this, and under the proposed amendments the creditors would have a larger proportion of the assets than they could under the 33½ per cent. clause. If the Insolvent Law were repealed, honest or solvent traders would not be less free from the unfair competition which they now complained they have through the sale of bankrupt stock. The Sheriff would be put into possession, and the goods would be sold by auction, and traders would have precisely the same difficulty to face. There was only one way in which the thing could be managed, and that was to have the law so stringent as to compel a man winding up his affairs to put his stock into other hands and realize something like 75 cents on the dollar instead of the goods being sacrificed at 40 cents. Under the proposed amendments, a tradesman, in order to be sure that his assets would cover 50 cents on the dollar, would have to take stock frequently, and would have to ascertain that his stock of goods was worth 75 cents on the dollar; else his book debts, not being all good, would not allow him 50 cents. It being determined that it would be disastrous to repeal the Act, he hoped the amendments proposed by the Minister of Justice would receive that consideration they deserved. He approved of the amendment as to 50 cents, although its operation might now and then be harsh upon a debtor; say, for instance, a man who had a large stock of goods on credit in his store which caught fire; but he held that no man should have such goods without insuring them. He considered it to be the duty of the House to ponder well before they cast their votes upon the question. He ventured to predict that, if the law were repealed, results most disastrous would follow. He would feel it his duty to vote against the repealing of the Act.

Mr. DYMOND said the discussion had mainly related to the interest of the trader, either as creditor or debtor, with some indications that the interest of the lawyer was not altogether forgotten. He ventured to say there was a fourth party to this controversy that might be considered in this connection, and that was the House itself. He supposed, if they were to go back to first principles, no Insolvency Law would be needed, because there would be no credit, for, by the adoption of a rigid system of political economy, he maintained that credit could receive no protection at the hands of the Legislature. He was glad to believe there was growing up in Ontario a disposition greatly to abridge the credit system. They were all cognisant of the Granger movement. That movement had established a cash competition, which had had the effect of inducing many traders to lower their ordinary prices in return for cash payments. The ultimate effect, he thought, would be to greatly decrease the number of insolvencies in certain districts. The present time seemed to be one eminently unsuitable for no settled policy with regard to the question, because trade was in an abnormal state; and there could be no doubt that a large proportion of insolvencies had occurred in consequence of the prevailing depression, whilst it was probable the number had also been increased by persons who would not, under other circumstances, have adopted the practise of providing settlements, but who had availed themselves of what was regarded as the new Insolvency Law. He did not think, therefore, they were justified in thinking that the evidence before them was sufficient to warrant them in moving in a retrograde direction. If there was to be credit, it would seem only natural that there should be some system by which the proper guarantees against fraud and for the equitable distribution of the assets of debtors should be obtained. He did not think justice was done to the debtors if account was not taken of the responsibilities of the creditor in connection with the frequent insolvencies. He believed the wholesale house and the banks were far more responsible than a large number of the unfortunate persons who had fallen under the provisions of the Act. It was a notorious fact that wholesale houses had for years bolstered up their credit whilst in a state of helpless insolvency by inducing persons dependent upon them for credit to grant them accommodation papers, and by drawing $500 and $1,000 where the trader owed them $100; and it could not be in utter ignorance of this system that a large quantity of this paper found its way into the banks, and then the banker became alarmed, and the wholesale dealer became insolvent, and his creditor became nominally his debtor on the estate. This law had only been a year and a half in operation. The Act was not a Government measure, but was forced on the House by a powerful majority of gentlemen on both sides of the House being responsible for it. It was almost re-cast by a large Committee, and there was a long and exhaustive discussion upon it in Committee of the Whole. That being the case, the honour and dignity of the House was committed to giving the Bill at all events a fair trial. He believed, if the Bill were repealed, the House would make a confession in the face of the whole world which would be humiliating to the last degree; in fact, if the House were to repeal it at the present time they would acknowledge that such was the insolvency of our political constitution that an honourable discharge would be utterly hopeless.

Mr. PATERSON.

Mr. CAMERON said he felt it his duty to support the amendment of the hon. member for Hamilton. If lawyers consulted their own interests, they would undoubtedly vote for the repeal of the Act; but this question was entirely beyond personal interests. The result of the Act had been to take business out of the hands of lawyers and to place it in the hands of assignees, and other officers. It would be a public calamity, in the present circumstances of the country, if the Insolvent Act were repealed. Previous to taking such a step, they ought to satisfy themselves that the law was wrong in principle. It seemed to him that, in a country which carried on an extensive commercial business, and especially where credit was almost entirely its foundation, such a law was a necessity. The principle of the Act had not been attacked by any hon. gentleman who had spoken, but objection had been taken to its mode of administration. In this respect, as the hon. member from King's County, New Brunswick, had pointed out, the injudicious carrying out of its provisions was wholly due to the neglect of creditors to look after their own interests, or to the errors of Judges, which could have been corrected on appeal. The objections presented, the amendment offered by the Minister of Justice would tend to a great extent to remove. Again, if the law had done a great amount of harm, as some hon. gentlemen had affirmed, petitions would have been offered to the House against the Act, but this had not been the case. On the contrary, the Dominion Board of Trade, and almost every other Board of Trade had endorsed the Act. Before its repeal was resolved upon, they ought to be thoroughly convinced that the country desired a step of this grave character to be taken. He did not think that any evidence in this direction had been submitted. It had been said that the agricultural class was opposed to the law, but he did not think that this feeling existed; nor did he believe that any general feeling in the country had been aroused in opposition to the Act. The farming community would find that the greatest evil possible would accrue were the law to be applied to them, as no allowances would be made for bad harvests and other unavoidable misfortunes. So long as business was carried on by credit to such a large extent, we must have an Insolvent Act. It seemed to him that hon. members would be only performing their duty in giving the Act a further trial before it was condemned.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) said, as hon. gentlemen from other Provinces had given their opinions, he ventured to speak in regard to Nova Scotia. As far as he knew, there was no dissatisfaction with the Insolvent Law in that Province. It worked not only to the benefit of the solvent trader, but also of the creditor. The main feature of this Act was that, in the first instance, all the goods of an insolvent debtor passed into the hands of the creditors, they having complete and full control over it. There was no better way in which the interests of creditors could be protected. He thought, in the majority of cases where no satisfactory result had been arrived at, it was the fault of the assignees or creditors. There was one point, however, which he thought might be amended. Certain acts of the insolvent constituted a penal offence, but there could be no prosecution unless one of the creditors made it his own private business, and was prepared to sustain all the legal expenses. He did not understand why there should be any distinction made between this and other penal offences. The prosecution should not be at the instance of the creditor alone, but arranged so that any person should be able to prosecute, and the expenses should be arranged as were those connected with the trial of other penal offences. The Act should remain on the Statute-book for this year at least, especially as there was no other proceeding which could supply its place. If the law were repealed, the creditor nearest to the debtor would naturally be the first to obtain redress in case of an insolvency. This would prevent those creditors living at a distance getting their share of the assets, and sometimes they would get nothing. It would be seen, therefore, that the attempt now being made to stimulate inter-provincial trade would be a failure, for no merchant in the West would give credit to a trader in the Maritime Provinces, or vice versa, unless their interests were protected.

Mr. DAVIES said he had a lively recollection of the time when there was no bankruptcy law. The unfortunate debtor was stripped of all he possessed, and then treated as a criminal and thrown into jail. He thought some hon. gentlemen were too harsh upon the unfortunate debtor. The operation of the Act in his Province had been satisfactory on the whole, and it would be a retrograde step to repeal the law. If honest traders suffered from dishonest debtors, they must put up with it. Merchants need not credit their goods unless they liked, and if they did so they must run the risk. A great deal of the trouble was to be attributed to banking accommodations. There was a great deal of rivalry among banking institutions, and money had been scattered among people who otherwise would not have gone into trade, and the result had been commercial disasters. He thought they ought to have a bankruptcy law on the Statute-book. He did not think the amendments proposed by the hon. the Minister for Justice would improve the Act much, and he would therefore support the motion of the hon. member for Hamilton.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex) said, as it was evident that no decision could be arrived at for some time, he would move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. BARTHE hoped that the remarks he was about to make, though in French, would be understood sufficiently by Mr. Speaker, and by the majority of the hon. members of the House. In reply to the arguments adduced during the very interesting discussion which had taken place during the evening with regard to his Bill, he begged to say that he had acted in the interest of his electors; and he was convinced that, not only the electors of the county which he had the honour to represent, but also those of the great majority of the counties, in the rural districts particularly, favoured the repeal of the law in question. Numerous arguments had been brought forward against its repeal, but the experience obtained in this relation since the law was first enacted in 1864, had condemned its continuation. The Act had been amended at nearly every subsequent Session of Parliament, but nevertheless in all the Provinces of the Dominion, and especially in the Province of Quebec, a general sentiment of indignation had been aroused against the measure, which had, to a large extent, ruined and demoralized the population. During the speech he had made on moving the second reading, he had cited cases going to show the mischievous operation of the law. Nobody would deny that the American people were eminently commercial, eminently practical, and possessed of great aptitude for business; and in the United States, three times, under exceptional circumstances, had a bankrupt law been tried, and on each occasion, after a comparatively brief trial, had it been abolished. In connection with the civil war, which had been so ruinous in its nature, a bankrupt law had been introduced in the United States, and recently petition after petition had been presented against it by business men, and finally the American Legislature had resolved upon its abolition. In this House, not one petition had been presented in favour of the Act, and if his memory served him well, the hon. member for Montreal West, in 1869, signed and presented a petition praying for the abolition of the law. He was convinced that the people of the Dominion were satisfied with their unhappy experience in this regard, and that they were generally of the opinion that the law should be abolished. By means of the statistics with which he had furnished the House, he had proved that during the space of a single year the insolvencies had amounted to twenty-six millions, occasioning a loss of twenty-two millions. No member of this House had more respect for the opinion and abilities of the Minister of Justice than himself, but, having examined the amendment which the hon. gentleman proposed, that the bankrupt should pay fifty cents on the dollar, he respectfully submitted that it would not meet the end which the hon. gentleman desired. In fact, if a bankrupt was, in equity, obliged to pay fifty cents on the dollar, he could pay, on the average, one hundred cents. Such a bankrupt would not be a bankrupt at all—he would be solvent, because, in most cases, the cost would amount to nearly fifty cents. If a man was honest, and yet unfortunate, and not able to meet his obligations, how could he pay fifty cents on the dollar and the cost of liquidation? He could never obtain his discharge. For these reasons he found that the amendment of the Minister of Justice would not meet the object the hon. gentleman desired, he was convinced, in the best interests of the Dominion, which the hon. gentleman so usefully served as Minister of Justice. He thought that the representatives of the rural districts would faithfully represent the opinions of their electors in voting for the repeal the Act which was so unpopular, particularly in those sections of the country. Of course, other Provinces had a right to say that they must have a law for the whole Dominion, but he submitted very respectfully the articles of the Code which was in force in the Province of Quebec to the lawyers who represented, in this House, constituencies in the other Provinces. This was a matter of extreme importance, and he was sure, from the reputation borne by these hon. gentlemen, that, if they studied the provisions of this Code as carefully as it merited, they would eventually be adopted, for these provisions were so clear, and so simple, that they could very profitably be made applicable to the whole Dominion. The hon. gentlemen who sat in the House knew what was passing in their constituencies, and even before this debate had opened he was convinced that at least a portion of these hon. gentlemen had their opinions formed on the subject, and that the arguments, which had been given with so much eloquence and with such force by a large number of hon. members, had had little influence with respect to these opinions; therefore he would say no more than this—in proposing this Bill, which was perhaps a bold step, calculated as it was to change the existing condition of things, his only object was to honestly fulfil his duty as a member of the House in the interest of his constituents as well as in the interests of the people of the whole Dominion.

Mr. CASEY said he thought it was unreasonable to insist on a division to-night. The question formally before the House was the repeal of the Insolvent Law, but that was not the real question to consider. There was an alternative proposition made by the hon. the Minister of Justice, who had presented to the House the amendments he was prepared to make in the present Act. He thought, as those propositions were new to most hon. members, that time should be taken for their consideration. Although the law was objectionable to many, yet it was quite possible that a consideration of the proposed changes would bring about a more favourable view of the law. He urged the hon. member for Richelieu and his friends to consent to the adjournment of the debate.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he thought the reasoning of the hon. member for West Elgin was unanswerable. This matter was of very great importance, and they had just heard from the hon. the Minister of Justice the details of his proposed amendments, which, so far as he could catch them, appeared to be in the right direction. It was, however, almost impossible to form an opinion from an oral statement made across the floor of the House, and the amendments were of so much importance, that one could not make up his mind in regard to them until seeing them in print and ascertaining their effect on the whole measure. If the objections were removed to the Act as it stood at present, hon. members now opposed might favour a continuance of the law as amended. He thought it would be well to adjourn the debate.

Motion to adjourn debate agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, 27th Feb., 1877.

The Speaker took the chair at Three o'clock.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced, and read the first time :—

Bill (No. 42) To authorise the town of Kincardine in the county of Bruce, to impose and collect certain tolls at the harbour in the said town. (Mr. Gillies.)

Bill (No. 43) To authorise the Union Forwarding and Railway Company to reduce its paid-up capital. (Mr. Currier.)

Bill (No. 44) To amend the Act to incorporate the Bridge Company of Riviere du Loup, in the County of Maskinonge. (Mr. Boyer.)

Bill (No. 45) To incorporate the St. Lawrence and Pacific Railway Ferry Company. (Mr. Jetté.)

Bill (No. 46) To incorporate the Union Cable Company. (Mr. Jetté.)

Bill (No. 47) To amend the Dominion Elections Act of 1874. (Mr. Richard.)

ALBERT RAILWAY COMPANY
BILL.

FIRST READING.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for leave to introduce a Bill (No. 48) To grant additional powers to the Albert Railway Company.

Mr. MACKENZIE said this Bill was subsidiary to one which had been stopped in the House the other day. The Company in question had been incorporated by the Local Legislature of New Brunswick, and the Bill proposed to give certain powers to it, though it had never been incorporated by this Parliament. He was not prepared to say that this or the other Bill, on amendment by the insertion of a certain clause, could not be brought under the jurisdiction of this Parliament, but then some special reason must be assigned to justify this step. It was difficult to see what reason could be assigned to bring the Bill under the jurisdiction of this House, as the railway in question was one of the most local character possible. He really thought that it would be very difficult to allow the Bill to take even the preliminary stage.

Mr. DOMVILLE said that this railway was a feeder of the Intercolonial Railway. Moreover it had received a donation or loan of old rails in furtherance of its completion. The plea on which the powers required were asked was the desire to issue debentures bearing seven or eight per cent. interest, which could not be done under the local law. The best legal talent in New Brunswick had advised application to this House for this purpose. The railway was in the vicinity of a coal mine, and it needed powers in order to enable it to carry on its business. He hoped the Premier would look into the matter.

Mr. PALMER said he could see no objection to the admission of the Bill. The legal interest in New Brunswick was six per cent.; and, besides, the railway might require to own shipping. Instead of resorting to the Courts, he thought it would be better if the powers required were granted by both Local and Dominion Parliaments. On the second stage it might be dealt with as the public interest demanded.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said that, in his opinion, the Bill should be referred to the Railway Committee, to be afterwards considered by the House.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the rule by which they should be guided was laid down by law. Railroads passing from one Province to another were necessarily under the control of this Parliament, and railroads which passed only through one Province, having a terminus at each end in a foreign country or waters, like the Canada Southern, might very properly be under the charge of the Dominion Parliament, but he did not think that a Company, could obtain powers from both Local and Dominion Houses. If this railway were brought under the jurisdiction of this Parliament, it must remain there for the future. He was satisfied that both the bills which were in question had been introduced irregularly, but he would not object to their being sent to the Railway Committee. He would have a clause prepared for this Bill similar to that which was required for the Bill which had been the other day before the House.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT.

FIRST READING.

Mr. COOK moved for leave to introduce a Bill (No. 49) To amend the Act respecting the election of members to the House of Commons.

In reply to Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD,

Mr. MACKENZIE: It appeared that the Bill, made some minor amendments to the general Election Law. The hon. gentleman had a perfect right to introduce such a Bill.

Mr. COOK said he had intended to explain the Bill on the second reading. Its object was to do away with the envelope, which afforded opportunities for the practice of corruption. He did not wish to say that the envelope had been wrongfully used in recent elections and that the majorities had been augmented in consequence thereof, but he would say that, if a candidate or his friends chose, they could commit a great amount of fraud under the present system. A voter could present himself at the polling booth, and after receiving the envelope and ballot could return to the recess to mark it in the ordinary way and hand the envelope to the Returning Officer minus the ballot. He would then be in possession of a blank ballot, and would be in a position to purchase votes by getting voters to return the blank ballot. He (Mr. Cook) would have liked to have gone further and exempted from punishment the party selling his vote in order that he might divulge the names of those purchasing the votes. Both parties were now liable to heavy punishments and both were interested in keeping the transaction secret.

Mr. BOWELL asked how fraud could be perpetrated in this way. If the voter returned the empty envelope and placed the ballot in his pocket, then no vote was cast. If the man went and bought another vote where was the gain?

Mr. COOK said the voter could continue that all day. Five votes could be purchased for $5 in some districts, one of which, under the system he had explained, would be lost. Suppose, for instance, 30 polling places were operated; that would amount to $150—a small sum of money, as some of his hon. friends knew—and would purchase 150 votes; but one vote in five would be lost, which would reduce the number by 30. Upon a division, that would give 240, and some of his hon. friends in the majority now would be decidedly in the minority as a result.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY BILL.

[BILL No. 18.]

(Mr. Mills.)

SECOND READING.

Mr. MILLS said it was unnecessary to make any lengthened remarks, as the Bill did not change the system of geological surveys that had been carried on for some years. The statute at present in force expired on the 1st of July next, and it was necessary to introduce some measure for the purpose of continuing the system. Under the circumstances, the Government thought that the geological survey should be made permanent and carried on as a branch of the Department of the Interior. The present law was but slightly changed. In some respects, the provisions were made more extensive than before, because the efficiency of the survey required such a step. The Bill, however, would not make much practical difference in the working of the survey. The conduct of the surveys and appointment of various parties connected therewith were provided for. It was deemed best not to name in the Bill the officers required in order to render the service efficient, as he found, on looking over the list of persons at present employed, it difficult to name those who would be required, and to state the duties they would be called upon to perform. This year it was intended to apply for a lump sum as before; next year, when the Branch was properly organized, it would be in the power of the Government to state what would be required for salaries. The Bill provided for the appointment of a director, whose duty it should be to report from time to time to the Minister of the Interior, and appoint such other officers as necessary for the efficiency of the staff. The removal of the geological museum from Montreal to Ottawa was also provided for, whenever the Government thought it necessary and Parliament provided the requisite means. He thought the Geological Department would never be thoroughly efficient until it was removed here, and the representatives of the people were to some extent interested in the researches made in the public interests, which would not be likely unless the work was brought under their immediate attention. Provision was also made for the apparatus necessary for the prosecution of the survey. The Department was, to some extent, engaged in making assays for the purpose of testing the character of minerals found in various parts of the country, and for the purpose of preventing persons engaging in mining enterprises which might turn out unprofitably, and which they would not undertake if they possessed proper knowledge of the subject. Statements had been received from parties engaged in mining of the importance of the geological branch in this subject. Among the minerals found in this country were many which were found in other parts of the world, but as there was some difference in their chemical character the process of assaying was in many cases required to be different from that employed elsewhere. The experiments constantly being performed in connection with the survey, if performed as efficiently and extensively as was necessary, would no doubt contribute largely to the early development of the resources of the country. He had no doubt that in the immense extent of territory we possess there are mines of great wealth which would be highly profitable when properly worked; and it was of the utmost consequence that this branch of the public service should be made more efficient than it had been. To bring about that result, however, it would, no doubt, be necessary to obtain a larger amount of aid from the public treasury than had been received in former years; but that was not asked at present. It might be in the interest of the various Provinces to co-operate to some extent with the Dominion in the prosecution of the surveys. The Bill provided also that the persons employed in one branch of the Department of the Interior might be directed by the Minister to perform any duties connected with another branch. That was a necessary provision, for the reason that persons connected with the department were engaged in making geological surveys, mapping out the topography of the country, etc., who might be utilised in this branch. He moved the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. MASSON said in the course of time it might be advisable to remove the Museum to Ottawa, but it was not a proper step to take at present. The majority of people who visited Canada, and were interested in her resources, went to the large centres, and it was necessary that the Museum should be in one of the large cities. When the Emperor of Brazil was here he did not visit Ottawa; he wished to learn something about the resources of the country, and accordingly visited the large cities. While at Montreal he went to the Museum, and was quite impressed with its contents. Members of Parliament would take very little interest in the subject, and the Museum should be where scientific men could avail themselves of it. It would be a mistake to remove the Museum at present.

Mr. DEVLIN said he had to thank the hon. member for Terrebonne for having so kindly called the attention of the House to the proposal of the hon. the Minister of the Interior to remove the Geological Museum from Montreal. He agreed with the remarks of the hon. gentleman, and he was at a loss to know what crime Montreal had committed against the hon. the Minister of the Interior that he should manifest this hostility so very early after his entry into the Ministry. His hon. friend from Terrebonne had given the reasons very forcibly why this removal should not take place. The Museum had been in Montreal for many years and was a source of great interest and attraction to the great number of visitors who were in the habit year after year of going to Montreal. The removal of the Museum to Ottawa would, in his judgment, be a great and serious mistake, besides being—as he had no doubt it would be looked upon—an insult to the City of Montreal. The hon. the Minister of the Interior could assign no valid reason for the removal of the Museum. At this stage of the proceedings, he (Mr. Devlin) could do no more than to record his protest against the removal, and he was certain he would be sustained in his protest by the citizens of Montreal. He trusted the hon. the Minister of the Interior would, upon reflection, see that he would be committing a great injustice, and one that would reflect in no very commendable manner upon the Government of which he was a member.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Renfrew) said he did not see that this was a matter which concerned Montreal alone, as the Museum was supported by the people of Canada generally. The fact that Montreal had possessed it for so long was no reason why it should continue to possess it. The fact that Ottawa was the Capital of Canada was a good reason why the Museum should be removed to that city. It would then be under the immediate control and surveillance of the Government who could see that the money appropriated was properly expended, according to the wishes of the people of the country. He supposed that in the discussion of a matter of this kind, the fact that any member who spoke had any direct interest, or that his constituents had an interest in it, would cause his remarks to receive less consideration than the remarks of gentlemen who had no interest whatever beyond a general one. He, of course, represented a constituency not very far from Ottawa, while at the same time it was not so closely allied to that city that it made very much difference whether the Museum was located there or at Montreal. This was a matter which interested the students as much as the people who happened to visit the country. Ottawa was quite as well situated for the people of Canada as Montreal or any other city in the Dominion. This fact, combined with the fact that Ottawa was the place where Parliament met, made the reasons stronger in favour of Ottawa than were the reasons in favour of any other city. The argument of the hon. member for Terrebonne was not a very strong one. As many people visited Ottawa as all the other cities put together.

Mr. DEVLIN: You are mistaken.

Mr. WORKMAN said he also thanked the hon. member for Terrebonne for his presentation of the claims of Montreal. It was quite true that strangers took a great interest in the institution. There were scarcely any men of natural or scientific attainments who did not spend a portion of their time there. He, himself, had accompanied gentlemen visiting Montreal to the Museum, and they had expressed the greatest gratification at what they saw. Were the institution removed to Ottawa, three-fourths of the people who now visited it would do so then. There were ten times the number of people who visited Montreal in their tour through Canada than visited Ottawa. In fact, he had once said that Ottawa was the ultima Thule of civilization, although a great change, he was happy to say, had come over the city since then. The House was told that there was a considerable deficiency, and yet it would be necessary to increase the expenditure by creating a building for the purpose of storing the collection, if it were removed to Ottawa. The Museum was a valuable means of education, and Montreal was the centre of education, with its large schools and colleges. It was also under the superintendence and surveillance of most experienced and excellent men.

Mr. CAUCHON: They would come up here.

Mr. WORKMAN said he did not think so.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he would relieve the mind of the hon. gentleman about the expenses of a new building at Ottawa. It was not the intention of the Government to bring down estimates for that purpose.

Mr. CHARLTON said he understood that the total number of visitors at the Museum during the year was 600, which was not very large. He understood also that the building in Montreal was not suitable for the purpose, as it was not fire-proof. He had no local prejudice in the matter, and he was satisfied that it was eminently proper that the Museum should be removed to the capital of the Dominion. It could not be a matter of much importance to Montreal, if only 600 persons visited the Museum in the course of the year.

Mr. DECOSMOS said he was one of those who agreed that there should be a Geological Museum at the capital of the Dominion. But he also agreed with the two hon. gentlemen from Montreal that it was desirable that all the great cities in the respective Provinces should have museums of geology. He looked at the cost as a very small matter, and he hoped his hon. friend would be able to establish a fine museum in Ottawa. While other places were being considered, he would ask that the claims of the chief mineral Province of the Dominion, British Columbia, be not overlooked.

Mr. DYMOND: We would require a guarantee against secession.

Mr. DECOSMOS: I think the best guarantee against secession would be for this Government to commence the Pacific Railway at once. I may say that science which comes up in this discussion is not connected with any particular nationality or Province more than with another.

Mr. CAUCHON said if every town was to come up as a claimant he would present the claims of Quebec, that being the oldest city in the country. There were museums in Quebec, but the chief museum ought to be at the seat of Government. Washington was the seat of Government in the United States, and the national museum was there; yet Washington was not a large city. If the Emperor of Brazil had known that the Museum was at Ottawa, he would have gone there and not to Montreal. He had seen larger cities than Montreal.

Mr. MASSON: But not in Canada.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. CAUCHON said the Emperor of Brazil had been to New York. The several Provinces might have their own museums, but they should have them at their own expense. In Quebec there was at first some objection to the Educational Department being removed from Montreal to Quebec, the capital of the Province, but there was nothing said about it now.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the proposition to make the geological survey a prominent branch of the Department of the Interior was one which would meet with the commendation of the House. But he was afraid that the scheme proposed was too large in its scope. The survey was instituted, as its name indicated, for the purpose of making a geological survey of the whole country and for other enquiries in the nature of physical sciences, but these other enquiries, including natural history, were merely subsidiary and incidental to the survey itself. The men employed in the survey were men of science, and their attention would naturally be directed to the various productions of the country, its flora and fauna and fossils, &c., but they would only treat them incidentally to the express object. These investigations did not materially delay or obstruct the survey. Yet hon. gentlemen now on the Ministerial side, who were at one time inclined to be rather economical, objected, and there was great difficulty in obtaining the grants necessary for maintaining the survey. If the proposal of the Hon. the Minister of the Interior were carried out, it seemed to him the expense would be much larger than was originally designed, and the primary object of the survey would be lost if so much prominence was given to what were before only secondary objects. The Bill said:—

“The objects and purposes of the survey and museum shall be, to elucidate the geology and mineralogy of the Dominion, and to make a full and scientific examination of the various strata, soils, ores, coals, oils and mineral waters, and of its recent fauna and flora, so as to afford to the mining, metallurgical and other interests of the country, correct and full information as to its character and resources. It shall be the duty of the persons in charge of the said survey to collect, classify and arrange such specimens as may be necessary to insure a complete and exact knowledge of the mineralogical resources of the several Provinces and Territories of Canada; to carry on palæontological investigations, to study and report upon the fauna and flora of the Dominion, and to make such other researches as will best tend to ensure an exact knowledge of the climate, natural resources, and agricultural and industrial capabilities of the different portions of the Dominion; to continue to collect the necessary materials for a Canadian museum of natural history, mineralogy and geology."

While he did not object in any way to the geological surveys or the other branches being made auxiliary and within the scope of the survey, he thought, if those branches were to be followed up as it would seem, they would absorb the greater portion of the money. In reference to the question of the place where the museum should be established, he would be very sorry to see Montreal lose it, because that city was one of the chief cities in the Dominion. A great many persons went to Montreal first when they came to Canada, and it was a very proper point to have a Geological Museum. There was, however, a great deal to be said on the other side. The seat of Government was an eminently suitable place to have a Museum, and, if there was only one Museum, it should be at the Capital. When this question was before the late Government, some enquiries were made, and it was ascertained that the specimens at Montreal were so numerous and so rich that duplicates of nearly all the minerals could be obtained for Ottawa. At one time enquiries were made as to whether a building could not be erected contiguous to the Parliament Buildings at a moderate cost, without diminishing the real value of the Museum at Montreal. He thought it possible for there to be a Museum at Ottawa and at Montreal as well.

Mr. SCHULTZ said that, as it was evident from remarks of hon. members that there was a question as to where the Geological Museum should be finally located, he would offer a suggestion which would be fair to, if it did not satisfy, all parties. Clearly if the principle was admitted that the Museum need not necessarily be at the capital, then the fairest way was to choose the geographical centre of the Dominion as its site. In the interests of the Province, a portion of which he had the honour to represent, he would be very happy to advocate his view. He felt, however, that at present it made little difference where the Museum was situated. The amount of money yearly appropriated was far too small for the purposes of the Survey. It was quite true that under the able management of Professor Selwyn a great deal had been accomplished; still the amount was far too small, and matters of detail had to be left, while only general information was obtained. It was asserted, especially since the acquisition of the North-West Territories, that we had in Canada a larger wheat growing area than the United States,—an important fact, if it could be established: important because of its influence in our immigration interests in Europe, and important in making any estimate of our possible future as a nation. This assertion had been demonstrated to be a fact by the researchers in connection with the Geological Surveys. It was found that we had really a very much larger wheat growing area north of the boundary line than south of it. It had been found that wheat, barley and other grains might be grown five degrees north of where it was thought possible; and some of the cereals shown at the Centennial Exhibition showed that far north of Peace River, countries supposed to be icebound for all but a few weeks in summer were susceptible of producing waving fields of grain. While the Geological Survey had demonstrated this important fact in regard to our agricultural capabilities, he ventured to predict that it would be found that our mineral resources were almost equal or superior to those of the United States. Much of the mineral producing country was not now known at all. On the Mackenzie River were found beautiful specimens of amber, immense beds of asphaltum, and deposits of sulphur almost as pure as that which was shipped from Sicily. On some of the rivers flowing into the Arctic Sea there were enormous deposits of nearly pure copper, while gold and silver were found in many portions of the country. Of more importance perhaps than any of these were the enormous deposits of coal and iron in the richest agricultural portion of the North-West. Exact information on all these matters was needed, but unfortunately it could not be obtained on the limited appropriation of money which was yearly made. Of all the items in the estimates there were none upon which he voted with more pleasure than that for the geological survey. There was no way, in his opinion, that in the present condition of the Dominion money could be better spent, and leaving the question of the locality of the Geological Museum aside altogether for the present, he trusted that the hon. the Minister of the Interior would succeed in persuading his colleagues in the Government to double or even quadruple the amount proposed to be voted in the Estimates.

Mr. MILLS said all subjects of natural science were made subsidiary to the geological survey. No provision was made for independent investigation apart from those economic considerations which were specially mentioned. It was impossible to carry out with advantage a geological survey without considering its scientific side, and the provisions in the Bill with respect to palæontology were absolutely necessary in order to determine the mineral resources of the country, because rocks which might be considered upon a superficial examination to belong to a particular class, might on closer inspection of their palæontological features, be found to belong to an entirely different class and age. The mineral wealth of the rocks depended upon the age to which they belonged, a correct opinion regarding which could only be obtained from an examination of the palæontological features. It was therefore necessary, in the interest of economic geology as well as geology and science, that those features should not be lost sight of, and it was proper that provisions with that object should be inserted in the Bill. Questions concerning fauna and flora were also intimately connected with economic geology and the agricultural capabilities of the country, and it was of the utmost consequence, therefore, if the geological investigation were to be of any economic value that those matters should be carefully considered. In an interview with the Director of the Geological Survey, Mr. Selwyn gave his concurrence to the views he (Mr. Mills) had expressed. If the geological survey were to be of any real value and if the Dominion were to occupy a moderate, not to say respectable standing before the civilized world, it was necessary that those scientific subjects should be considered in the geological investigation. In view of the action of Parliament towards the survey in previous years, the country was safe against any lavish expenditure under that head. With regard to the Museum at Montreal, he assured the hon. member for Montreal Centre that he had no pique against that city. If the Museum, in so far as it was a public institution, were removed from that city, sufficient material would be left for the establishment of a Museum there as large as Montreal would desire. The Director of the Geological reported, however, that there was not accommodation in the Montreal building for the collections of specimens during several years, and that for that reason they were unavailable. The Government would be obliged, when the finances of the country would warrant the expenditure, to make an outlay somewhere, and the question would then arise as to where the expenditure for a National Museum should be made. It was a matter of very great inconvenience to have a number of officers connected with a Government department, over which in order to secure its efficient administration, the Minister should be enabled to exercise some practical supervision situated 150 or 200 miles from his office. In order that that part of the Geological Survey might be made satisfactory to the public, the National Museum must be established at the capital, while the Montreal Museum might remain in that city and fulfil its purpose as an educational agent. The officers of the survey had been engaged for years in collecting specimens, and the Department was prepared to supply educational institutions throughout the country with specimens upon application being made.

CRIMINAL LAW EXTENSION BILL.

[BILL No. 23.]

(Mr. Blake.)

SECOND READING.

MR. BLAKE moved the second reading of the Bill to extend to the Province of Prince Edward Island certain of the criminal laws now in force in other Provinces of Canada. He said he did not deem it proper that Prince Edward Island should any longer occupy the position it held at the time it entered the Confederation. A great many of the criminal laws of that Island were not even modern English law; for example, the punishment for burglary was death, and several other criminal laws were equally antiquated. At the same time, in introducing into an old and long settled community, where there was an extensive local magistracy numbering, he believed, six hundred and fifty, a fresh code of laws, such as our criminal laws, he had thought it expedient to propose a somewhat distant day after the Act was passed, as that upon which it should go into effect, with the view that there might be a very full opportunity given to those called upon to administer the law to acquaint themselves with its provisions. Some years ago an edition of the Statutes up to 1874 was published and a number of those volumes would be circulated. The subsequent Acts were few in number, and he proposed, in case the measure received the favourable consideration of the House, to cause an equivalent edition of these few acts to be printed in order that they might be distributed amongst the Barristers of the Island, at the close of the Session, and then to allow a sufficiently long interval before the law itself went into operation.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.) said he would, with great pleasure, support the Bill which the Minister of Justice had introduced. One of the terms with regard to the admission of the Island into Confederation provided for the establishment and maintenance of Penitentiaries; but up to this time, and nearly four years had since passed, nothing had been done in this connection, and the whole expense in this relation had been borne by the Province. Penitentiary provision had, however, been made for the other Provinces; the present estimate for New Brunswick was some $40,000; for Nova Scotia, some $28,000; for Manitoba, some $14,000, and for British Columbia, some $11,000; but Prince Edward Island was not included in the list. He might be told that the Government intended to erect a Penitentiary for the Maritime Provinces at Dorchester, but he considered that this would be a very inconvenient and unsafe location, as the prisoners must be removed across the Straits, and passage was attended with very great difficulties. The expense of transit would also be considerable. During the past year, in Queen's County, the Local Government has been obliged to expend $11,000 or $12,000 to increase the size of the common gaol, and this expenditure might not have been necessary had the terms of Union been observed.

MR. BLAKE: Under the Criminal Law of Prince Edward Island there were no Penitentiaries established, nor any provision for any person being confined in a Penitentiary at all. Until this law is introduced into the Island, no local necessity will arise at any rate for such a question as the hon. gentleman has put, because until that time, the old laws of the Province will remain; and I may say that they will remain for some time. At any rate, in consequence of the suggestion made, it would be premature to introduce them, and there is now really no duty incumbent on the part of Canada to provide for the accommodation of such prisoners, the duty of Canada being to provide for Penitentiary prisoners only. There are not now, and there will not be until this Act comes into force, any Penitentiary prisoners in the Island. The question, as the hon. gentleman has put it, however, assumes another aspect. He points out the dangers of crossing from the mainland to the Island, and the risks the victims of the country's laws will suffer in being handed over from the Island to Dorchester; but as long as the Island's parliamentary representatives, and men so valuable as my hon. friend, are exposed to the danger of crossing the Straits on either the ice boat or on the "Northern Light," I shall not feel called upon to build a Penitentiary to preserve convicts from the same dangers.

Mr. POPE: I alluded to the risk of escape.

Mr. BLAKE: I think that if they escape, it will be only an escape to a watery grave. That would be the principal description of escape, under those circumstances. I can assure the hon. gentleman that it would be a very great economical mistake to think of such a thing as building a Penitentiary for the Island. It has been supposed to be necessary, and perhaps it was, owing to the very great distance from us of Manitoba and British Columbia, to put the country to the enormous expense, as I mentioned the other day, of building these establishments in those Provinces, when a very small number of prisoners are confined in them; the cost is appalling, and the proposition—when there is an easy mode of collecting together a considerable number of prisoners at a definite place, such as Dorchester for the whole of the Maritime Provinces—of establishing a separate institution in Prince Edward Island, which would entail twice or thrice the expenditure per head that would be necessary at Dorchester, is one upon which, I think, the hon. gentleman will not, upon consideration, be disposed to insist. It is in that view, largely in an economical view, and also because better discipline can be preserved, and better reformatory results thus be obtained, that the Government, although such institutions exist at Halifax and St. John, are still proposing to abandon them, and have one institution for the whole of the Maritime Provinces—where such numbers can be collected, as within the limits discussed the other day, and referred to by the hon. member from Charlevoix, may permit economical and effectual administration and reformatory discipline. These were views upon which, some years ago, the determination was arrived at to have one Penitentiary for these Provinces, and there is no probability at all of it being altered. I have said that no legal claim exists on the part of the Island for the maintenance of prisoners under her existing Criminal Law, and because under this Law there are no Penitentiary prisoners. I may add that the Local Government—and my experience does not lead me to believe that Local Governments in general are very apt not to prefer claims which are tenable or even plausible,—has not, to my knowledge, presented any such claim, but I have thought for some time,—ever since indeed my attention was attracted to the position of things in Prince Edward Island—that there was some reason for such a claim being presented as to whether Parliament might not fairly be called upon to vote a sum equivalent to the cost of maintenance of prisoners who had been sentenced to terms longer than two years,—that being the Canadian term for Penitentiary prisoners—during the term prior to the establishment of the Dorchester Penitentiary. Certainly my intention, in case the Criminal Laws in Canada should come into force in Prince Edward Island before Dorchester Penitentiary is opened, is to propose to the authorities of the Island an arrangement for the maintenance of Penitentiary prisoners in the Common Goal in the meantime, we paying the expenses of maintenance, as was done for some time in Manitoba, and as is done to-day pending the opening of such an institution in British Columbia. That relates to the future; as for the past, I say, that there is no legal claim, but if the Local Government should prefer such a claim, it will be for the Government to consider how far they would be justified in submitting to Parliament a proposition to pay the expenses of maintaining prisoners sentenced for longer than two years' terms during the interval which has elapsed between Confederation and the introduction of the Criminal Law.

Mr. CAMERON asked whether the Schedule annexed to the Act embraced the whole Criminal Law of Canada.

Mr. BLAKE: These are the same Acts which were applied to British Columbia on its introduction into Confederation, and I believe that they are all such Acts as apply to the whole of Canada. A distinguished legal authority of Prince Edward Island appeared to be satisfied with them. I am not aware that any on the list, applying to the whole of Canada, are excluded; but I did not personally go over the Schedule. I instructed the Law Clerks to adopt the British Columbia Acts, and I took the means to which I have referred, to ascertain whether they would be satisfactory on the Island.

LARCENY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

[BILL No. 24.]

(Mr. Blake.)

SECOND READING.

Mr. BLAKE said he had explained, on the first reading, the object of this Bill. Representation had been made to him from several quarters concerning the inconvenience caused by the omission of the word "sheep" in clauses having reference to certain kinds of larceny. He intended to propose to the Committee of the Whole further amendments in the law, at the end of the 4th section, which made three years the maximum punishment for simple larceny, the old section concerning simple larceny in the Consolidated Statutes of Canada made the extreme punishment light, and it was obvious that, in certain cases of simple larceny, three years was an inadequate punishment in itself, and entirely inconsistent with other portions of the law. The proposal he intended to make to the Committee of the Whole was to substitute seven years as the maximum punishment instead of three years.

Bill read the second time.

OFFENCES AGAINST THE PERSON BILL.

[BILL No. 27.]

(Mr. Blake.)

SECOND READING.

Mr. BLAKE said the object of this Bill was to abolish the punishment of death, and to substitute as the maximum punishment imprisonment for life, with certain other punishments in the discretion of the Judge, for two classes of offences for which the sentence of death was now necessary to be recorded by the Judge in case of conviction. His hon. friend from Joliette had last Session called the attention of the House to one class of cases in which his own experience as Crown Prosecutor had shown him the evils resulting from maintaining on the Statute-book the punishment of death for that offence.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: that relates to the 1st section.

Mr. BLAKE: The 1st section: the one touching assault with intention to murder. The result of the maintenance of the punishment of death for these crimes of assault, and poison with intent to murder, and for certain offences with respect to persons under a certain age, was that, the possibility of the result of conviction being that execution would take place, convictions were more difficult to obtain than otherwise would be the case; and in the experience of the hon. member for Joliette, it tended to prevent convictions, while on the other hand, such convictions were not, in point of fact, followed by capital execution or sentence, so that the other evil existed, of putting a law in the Statute-book which was systematically disobeyed. There was a written law, and at the same time an unwritten law. Several years ago, the punishment of death was abolished for this offence in England, and for many years, the punishments which he proposed to substitute here, or punishments nearly equivalent, the maximum being the same, were awarded in England for this offence. There was another class of offence, which the hon. member for Kingston had mentioned sometime ago, and for which the punishment of death was the only punishment capable of being awarded—that of rape. Although he had not thought fit on this occasion to propose a further alteration of the law in that particular, yet he thought it right to explain, shortly, the reason why he did not adopt the mode proposed by the hon. gentleman of mitigating the penalty of the law, or rather preferred to put plainly the punishment of imprisonment for life as the maximum penalty in the Statute. He was quite satisfied that to award, in the discretion of the Judge, a penalty of death, was practically to abolish such penalty of death; and it seemed to him useless, therefore, and illogical, and contrary at any rate to the moving reasons for this alteration of the law, that it should nominally award to the Judge a power which no Judge would ever exercise.

Bill read the second time.

INSURANCE ACTS AMENDMENT BILL

[BILL No. 36.]

(Mr. Cartwright.)

SECOND READING.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the principle of the Bill met with no opposition on the other side of the House, and, as the details had been fully explained on several occasions already, he proposed to refer it at once to the Banking and Commerce Committee for any further modifications, which might then be suggested and discussed, and, if advisable, adopted by the Committee, and afterwards submitted to the House. The only alteration of moment in this Bill, compared with the Bill submitted last year, consisted in excepting the operations of companies up to a certain date. The other alteration of moment had been inserted chiefly in compliance with the requests of English companies doing business in this country. It had appeared to him, on consideration, that there could be no opposition to it, and he had agreed to it.

Mr. BLAIN said he desired to draw the attention of the Minister of Finance to one or two matters connected with the Bill. The Bill did not now propose, he believed, as it did, in its most obnoxious feature last year, to be retrospective. Last year, when the Bill was under discussion, the gentlemen who were in favour of the principle of the Bill, as he had been himself, considered that one of its chief features was the 4½ per cent. clause; and he was not at all certain that this could not be altered with benefit. He found that some companies had issued their policies on the basis of three per cent., and some he was told, computed them at the rate of 3½ per cent. and others at 4 per cent. If, therefore, the Government persisted in the 4½ per cent. clause, it was manifest that there would not be a sum in this country equal to the amount necessary to re-insure the policies, and this seemed to be the whole object of the Bill. He understood that some of the English companies carrying on business in this country calculated the rate of interest all the way from 3 to 4½ per cent., and it seemed to him that it would be proper for the Minister of Finance to consider the propriety of permitting these companies to continue to compute upon the basis of that contract, where the amount was less than 4½ per cent. There were several amendments which he thought would have to be moved in Committee, and he would refer to them when the Bill came up. He had very little doubt that, when the Bill was passed, a very considerable number of companies would withdraw from this country. He would suggest that the Government would probably take the whole question of insurance and the propriety of dealing with it as a Government business into consideration. The remarks he wished to make on the other points he would reserve until the Bill was in Committee.

SALARIES OF JUDGES BILL.

FIRST READING.

Mr. BLAKE moved :

“That the House do forthwith resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolutions:—

“1. That it is expedient to amend the eighth section of the Act passed in the thirty-seventh year of Her Majesty's reign, intituled: ‘An Act to amend the Act thirty-sixth Victoria, chapter thirty-one, for the re-adjustment of the salaries of Judges and for other purposes’ by striking out the words ‘for fifteen years’ in the said section contained, substituting therefor the words ‘for ten years.’”

“2. That it is expedient to provide that the said amendment shall extend to the application of the amended section to the County Court Judges in Nova Scotia, by virtue of the second section of the Act passed in the thirty-ninth year of Her Majesty's reign intituled: ‘An Act to provide for the salaries of the County Court Judges in the Province of Nova Scotia and for other purposes.’”

Motion agreed to.

Mr. BLAKE.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BLAKE said the Committee would observe that the proposition of the resolutions was to alter the term in the existing law when the County Court Judges could claim the retiring allowance. Some years ago, the hon. member for Kingston proposed the law in regard to the retiring allowance of Judges, in which it was provided that County Court Judges should not be entitled to the allowance until after fifteen years service, even in approved cases of incapacity or inability to perform the duties. The reason assigned for that was that those Judges differed from the Superior Court Bench, since public attention was not so much drawn to the former that there was not so much scrutiny exercised by the public towards them, and that some person might therefore be appointed who was unfit for the office and might shortly afterwards retire on pension. To prevent such result the hon. member for Kingston proposed the measure accompanied by the limitation stated. The position taken by the hon. gentleman was not altogether logical, because, if carried out, it would result sometimes in the very mischief which it was designed to prevent, because people would not complain of a Judge who was not eligible to retire on the allowance. Notwithstanding that, he felt there was much force in the observations made by the hon. gentleman opposite in introducing the measure, and he did not propose to repeal the safeguard, but simply to modify it by prescribing a smaller term, which was the same as in the Civil Service, ten years. Practical experience had convinced him that the administration of justice was suffering very much from the circumstance that the Government was not in a position to retire Judges disabled by no fault of their own from discharging their duties. The shorter term would in a great measure tend to redress the evils which existed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said that, if the hon. the Minister of Justice had found the administration of justice was interfered with, he did not object to shortening the period. He was glad, however, that his hon. friend intended to preserve that line between the County Court and the other Judges for obvious reasons, which it was unnecessary to discuss.

Resolutions ordered to be reported.

Resolutions reported, read the second time, and concurred in.

Mr. BLAKE introduced Bill (No. 50) To amend the Act 37 Victoria, chapter 4.

Bill read the first time.

THE INLAND REVENUE ACT.

RESOLUTION CONSIDERED.

Mr. LAFLAMME moved:—

“That the House go into Committee to consider the following resolution:—

“That it is expedient to amend the Act respecting the Inland Revenue, and to provide for the imposition of a license duty of fifty dollars on each importer or manufacturer (not a manufacturer of beer, wash, or spirits, or a rectifier of spirits) of stills, worms, fermenting tuns or other apparatus suitable for the manufacture of beer, wash, or spirits.”

Motion agreed to.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. LAFLAMME said the object of the resolution was, as much as possible, to check the illicit distillation of spirits. Most of the stills that had been seized had been imported from the United States, and it was proposed that manufacturers of stills, worms, &c., should make a declaration as to the destination of such articles. Information was also to be given to the officers when the manufacture of any worm or still was commenced, which would constitute a double check on the use of such apparatus. The measure was purely preventive, and would tend to bring about a better observance of the Inland Revenue Law. The duty was to be imposed on those who imported the stills, or those who manufactured them. It appeared that the revenue on spirits had fallen off considerably lately. As the consumption could not have decreased materially, the reduction in the duty collected must be attributable to illicit distilling. After search had been made, it was found that stills had been imported from the United States secretly, and others had been manufactured in like manner. It was in order to prevent this practice that it was proposed to insist that a declaration should be made by any party intending to import or to manufacture a still to the inspector of the district, and that a return should also be made of the destination of the still. The Excise Officer by this means, would always be able to ascertain what had become of the still; and it was thought that this system would aid in correcting the evil complained of, and would render illicit distillation very difficult, and would consequently be a benefit to the revenue.

Mr. ROCHESTER said a common carpenter could make a tun or vat for a brewery or a tannery, but in order to do this he would have to pay a license fee of $50, he understood.

Mr. LAFLAMME: No, he is only required to make a return as to its destination. There is to be no duty paid except the tun or vat is to be used for the purpose of distillation.

Mr. ROCHESTER said, under these circumstances, he had no further objection. He would only say he was always very dubious as to anything emanating from the Department of Inland Revenue. If the House had well looked into what had transpired before, there would not have been as much trouble as there was now, and the Act would not have been so inoperative as it was.

Mr. LAFLAMME said the officer at the head of the Department was competent. He did not deny that there were defects in the law, and in order to give effect to the law it was necessary that instructions should be given to the officers.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said of course, until the House saw the Bill, it could not go into the whole question. But it should be explained why the $50 was going to be imposed on manufacturers of machinery. The hon. gentleman said it was for the purpose of decreasing illicit distillation. He could not see how the imposition of $50 on the manufacturers of vats and tuns would do this. This $50 was a tax upon the manufacturer, and would increase the revenue to that extent. If the Government meant to put a tax on machinery, all very good. But the reason the hon. gentleman gave was not sufficient. It seemed to him that the effect would be just the reverse of what was intended. Fifty dollars was a heavy tax upon any trade. Of course that $50 must be added to the cost of the article, and there would be consequently an increased incentive to smuggle from the United States, because the articles could be got cheaper there, the American manufacturers having no tax of $50 to pay. He thought it important that the measure should be before the House.

Mr. LAFLAMME: I have no objection to let the resolution lie over.

Mr. ROCHESTER said he was glad the hon. member had consented to leave the resolution over. It might be that the manufacturer who paid $50 for his license fee would only make one or two stills or vats. It seemed perfectly clear to him that a man who wanted a still for illicit purposes would go to the other side for it, where he could get one cheaper than he could here, and where he would also be less in danger of being tracked.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said unfortunately there was evidence of a great many illicit distilleries. The practical thing which his hon. friend was desirous of guarding against was the distribution of these vats throughout the country. The proposed Bill was similar to an English Act which had proved of service.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said there was no doubt that these illicit distilleries ought to be put down with a strong hand. No legislation could be too stringent for this purpose, providing it did not interfere with personal liberty. The objection he had to the Bill proposed was that it would not at all effect the object. If he thought it would do so he would support it most heartily.

House resumed.

Progress reported.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the chair.

VII.—LEGISLATION.

House resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Senate.

40. Salaries and contingent expenses of the Senate... $50,918

House of Commons.

41. Salaries, per Clerk's estimate ..... $59,850

Mr. SPEAKER said an officer had died during the recess, and, on consultation with the officers of the Department, they had come to the conclusion that they could get along very well without any re-appointment. There were nominally two increases in regard to junior clerks; one of these was employed in the French Department for a number of years, being paid by the day for nearly the entire year, and he had concluded that it would be better to put this officer on the permanent staff, a saving being thus actually effected. Another, an old gentleman, had been employed year after year, nominally as sessional clerk, and he had decided that in this case also it was desirable to place him on the permanent staff at a salary smaller than the sum he had received for some years previous. In each case, a saving had actually resulted. He had endeavoured this Session to obtain a return to enable him to submit to the House an exact statement of the financial condition of the Department, but he was sorry to learn that this was impossible, owing to the rather irregular manner in which the accounts had been kept. He believed that, if he had the accounts before him, he would be able to show that, notwithstanding the very material increase in the salaries, he had succeeded in effecting a very considerable reduction in the total expenditure.

Vote agreed to.

42. Expenses of Committees, extra Sessional Clerks, &c., $3,560

21½

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said a reduction had been effected in the expenses of extra Committees. Of course, as to whether they would keep within that figure or not would depend on the number of Committees granted.

Mr. SPEAKER said he did not consider the amount appropriated for Special Committees, $4,000, sufficient, and last year this expenditure had reached the sum of $6,500. He had endeavoured to cut down the charges in this connection, but he had found it to be exceedingly difficult to do so.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said that special causes had made the expenditure of last Session heavy. More economy would probably be shown if the amount was limited.

Mr. DYMOND said that a great deal of inconvenience had been experienced during the last two Sessions in consequence of not having competent shorthand writers available for Committee work; and he suggested the employment, in some of the Departments, of excellent shorthand writers or reporters, of whose services advantage could be taken during the Sessions of Parliament. Last Session they had been obliged to secure casual assistance in this relation; and he thought it would be desirable to take the step which he proposed.

Vote agreed to.

43. Contingencies..... $20,100

Mr. SPEAKER said the Commissioners, as hon. gentlemen were aware, were members of the Government who kept a very sharp eye on the expenditure.

Mr. MITCHELL said that if this vote had not been expended last year it would be well to strike out the item.

Vote agreed to.

44. Publishing Debates of the House of Commons.... $15,000

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: That item has been already adopted by the House.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex) said that the publication of the debates last year cost $12,288, and for the previous year $13,400. Under the present arrangement, he thought the amount would not exceed $12,280.

Vote agreed to.

45. Salaries and Contingencies per Sergeant-at-Arms'
Estimate..... $28,850

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he was sorry to state that the major portion of the total decrease of $6,600—$6,000—was merely a transference from this account to the Public Works Department, as his hon. friend the First Minister had made a contract with the Water Works Commissioners of the city of Ottawa. The remainder of the decrease, $600, was caused by the retirement of a permanent messenger.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD asked whether the maintenance and repairs of the building were paid out of the grant of Parliament, or by the Board of Works.

Mr. SPEAKER said he believed that the larger portion of the expenditure on the building itself was paid by the Board of Works, or the Minister of Public Works.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said his impression was that everything of this kind was done by the Government, no money being expended save under the direction of a responsible officer of the Government. The Commissioner of Woods and Forests and of Public Buildings had everything of this nature under his charge, and the money was disbursed on his responsibility. He suggested to the Minister of Public Works whether it would not be well to adopt the English system. The Palace of Westminster, as it was called, was supposed to be the Sovereign's Palace, where she summoned the Houses to meet her, and the responsibility of receiving her and her officers, and of making them comfortable, was assigned to the Government as a portion of their duties.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that this was really at present being done. As the hon. gentleman knew, a good deal of the expenditure about the Buildings of Parliament had been connected with the original plan. Such changes as were material for the final completion of the Building, and the finishing of the front porch, had been effected under the special appropriation obtained for this purpose last year. The expense connected with furnishing the Buildings with water and gas was now taken in charge by the Public Works Department.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: That is quite right.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that the expense of fitting up the old Library for the Supreme Court room had been defrayed out of the special vote for the Library and Buildings, but the ordinary repairs and changes were now, and would always be hereafter, charged to the ordinary vote for the grounds and repairs. The system to which the hon. gentleman referred he had himself always advocated, and he was now endeavouring to carry it into practice.

Mr. SPEAKER said that this expenditure was entirely under the control of the Sergeant-at-Arms. It would hardly work to be compelled to run to the Minister of Public Works, or to one of the Deputies, to obtain authority for the execution of slight repairs or changes; but of course, touching any work of an expensive character, this ought to be done, as he believed was now the case, under the authority of the Minister of Public Works.

Vote agreed to.

MISCELLANEOUS.

46. Grant to Parliamentary Library, including provision for Law Books,.....$10,000.00

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he believed that the provision of a sufficient number of law books and books of reference for the Library to be attached to the Supreme Court would be a somewhat expensive matter. He understood that a very considerable number of books of reference was required for that part of the Library.

Mr. BABY asked if anything had been done towards carrying out the recommendations of the Committee in regard to the reorganization of the Library.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the Commission received the Librarian's Report as to what he considered necessary in the way of reorganization. The Librarian's salary had been increased and two junior clerks appointed. Mr. Todd was of opinion that the staff was amply sut-ficient to enable him to conduct the business. They left it to the Library Committee, appointed this Session, to make such further changes as might be required.

Mr. MASSON said the officers ought to have been appointed according to the report of the Committee, which was to the effect that three competent assistants should be appointed.

Mr. BABY said he exceedingly regretted that the suggestions made by the Committee had not been carried out. The Committee had investigated the matter thoroughly and reported what they thought necessary for the reorganization of the Library. In many respects the Library was an institution to be proud of, but in certain departments it did not compare with other libraries on this continent. The historical department was lamentably deficient, especially in American works. Although the Librarian was an accomplished and efficient officer, yet he could not attend to all the details, and it was necessary for the efficiency of the institution that the recommendations of the Committee should have been carried out.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he was unable to understand the ground of the complaint made by the hon. gentleman. Was it because the Government had not expended enough money, or because more than required were not appointed? They had appointed only such officers as were reported necessary for the efficiency of the Library. The whole question had been remitted to a Committee of the Privy Council, and by them arranged upon its present basis. The object of the Government was to secure the best possible service at the least possible expense. Mr. Todd was one of the most efficient Librarians in the world, and if he had surrounded himself with an insufficient staff, the Library Committee would bring that to light.

Sir. JOHN A. MACDONALD said he understood the objection of the hon. members for Terrobonne and Joliette was that the report of the Committee had been adopted by both Houses, and the Government had disregarded it.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the House passed no such order. The Committee had merely expressed an opinion on the question, and they were not bound by it. He did not wish to shelter himself behind the Committee or any one, but was prepared to accept the responsibility of his action in this respect.

Mr. MASSON said his object was to say that the hon. Minister of Public Works had shielded himself behind the Committee. The hon. gentleman was so shielding himself.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he really must object to such observations. He had no need to shield myself behind anyone, as he had done nothing wrong. He would stand by his action.

Mr. MASSON: The hon. gentleman said he acted on the advice of the Librarian.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Why not?

Mr. MASSON: Well, then, the hon. gentleman is shielding himself behind the Committee and the Librarian. He was informed that the Library was deficient in old Canadian works. Now, the hon. gentleman himself would admit, that if Canada was to have any Library at all, the first effort should be to obtain works relating to the country. In the legal department an assistant conversant with law was required, to give advice in regard to legal books. Any one could point out where particular volumes were to be found, but more capable help in this particular branch was needed.

Mr. MACKENZIE said there was no legal knowledge required such as would necessitate the appointment of a legal expert. All that the Librarian and his assistants had to do was the maintaining of the Library in proper order, and seeing that there were the proper facilities for obtaining the books which might be required by persons who had a right to visit the Library. He understood that the Assistant Librarian was a legal gentleman, and probably as good a constitutional lawyer as some of the legal gentlemen in the House, and no doubt he was perfectly able to discharge his duties. He saw no reason why the Library should be divided into classes, and experts appointed for each. Moreover, the opinion of the Committee was not by any means so distinctly formed as was represented. The Committee said they were of the opinion that the Library should be divided into three departments, viz., the general, the French, and the legal, and that each department should be under the care and superintendence of an assistant librarian. These assistants could be called by any names the House pleased. But the real objection seemed to be that, whereas the Committee recommended three superintendents, the Government had found that two were sufficient.

Mr. MASSON: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE: And that there is less expense.

Mr. MASSON: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the Government had no object in making only two appointments but to save the public money. He believed they had saved the public money, and that the work had been efficiently performed.

Mr. BABY said that, despite the Committee, which had been appointed to assist in the organization and management of the Library, the Librarian was the only man who was consulted in the matter. Why should fifteen members of the House be called away from their ordinary work to sit in the Chamber and hear Mr. Librarian express his views. The thirty members of the Committee had examined minutely what was necessary, and they had come to the conclusion that the Library should be divided into three departments, with an assistant in each department. The hon. the Premier said the House had no right to complain when he had decreased the number of assistants; but it was possible to decrease the expenditure and impair the efficiency. He did not, however, impute any motives to the hon. the Premier. He hoped that the hon. gentleman would come to the conclusion, when he had read the report of the Committee, that the Committee only desired the efficient management of the Library.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Of course.

Mr. BABY said that, with regard to class legislation, the House had nothing to do. All that was wanted was that there should be a person of legal attainments in the Library. The members of the House were law-makers, and they required some official who could place in their hands any law treatise on the subject which they were discussing. Even the most learned gentlemen required reference books sometimes; and the most trained constitutional lawyers sometimes required to have their memories refreshed. But there was not a lawyer in the library.

Mr. MACKENZIE.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We will trust to the hon. gentleman for the law.

Mr. MILLS said the hon. member for Joliette, would observe, if he looked at the Bill providing for the maintenance of the Library, that merely the Librarian and two assistants were mentioned. When the Committee last year recommended three assistants, they recommended what the law itself did not permit. It was impossible that the Government could have immediately carried out the instructions received from the Committee, even if they had desired to do so. When the Committee made their recommendation it was quite clear that they had not looked at the Statute. The hon. gentleman had asked that an assistant should be appointed who should be an expert in legal matters. Then why not appoint an expert in commercial matters and political economy? In fact the legislation was dependent upon their impressions regarding the commercial and industrial interests of the country. If the view expected by the hon. member for Joliette were correct, the assistants would in themselves form a perfect encyclopaedia, and they would supercede the necessity for a Library. In the department of political economy, the hon. gentlemen opposite would want a protectionist, and the hon. gentlemen on the Government side would want a free-trader. Instead of a Library, there would be an university with a staff of professors who would not be called upon to give statistics, but who would act as private tutors to the members, in order to qualify them for the positions to which they had been elected.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he was not desirous of destroying the ornate appearance of the Library, but, as he understood that it did not hold the books that were now possessed, he would like to know whether any arrangement was proposed by which all the books could be placed away. He would ask the hon. the Premier whether there was any possibility of the space in the centre being utilized so as to make room for more books.

Mr. MACKENZIE said it was a matter of regret to him that the Library was not nearly large enough for its purpose. It was not until the interior was nearly completed that the Librarian called his attention to the fact that it would not hold more than 80,000 volumes. The side rooms, which it was intended should be used as reading rooms, had to be utilized for the storage of books. The Public Works Department took great trouble to retain a not less ornate appearance on the interior than the exterior presented. Various suggestions had occurred to him as to what should be done in regard to arrangements. The old Library was turned into the Supreme Court room, and a passage was cut from the rear rooms so as to afford an entrance into the Library without passing through the Court room. The Government were unwilling to go to the expense of erecting a new building for the Supreme Court when there was accommodation within the precincts of the House. Perhaps, some years hence the Court might be held in some other part of the building, and then the present room might revert back to its original use as a Library room. Another matter which should enlist the attention of the Library Committee was that fully ten or twelve per cent. of the new works were not books of much service in such a Library. They were very useful and very pleasant to the ordinary public, but they were not essential in a Parliamentary Library. It might be advisable that a considerable proportion of such books should be disposed of on that ground, and that means be taken to prevent the public money being invested in books of that class for the future. It would be observed that it was impossible to extend the new Library without ruining its outside architectural design. However much it was desirable to obtain more room, he was sure that no hon. gentleman with any taste would be willing that what was perhaps the most beautiful edifice in North America should be destroyed. Although the Library had cost a considerable amount of money, he believed it had caused much pleasure to hon. members, Canadians generally and many distinguished foreigners, who pronounced it one of the most beautiful buildings they had ever seen.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said it was quite true that a number of the books in the Library were not required for a Parliamentary Library. Still it must be borne in mind that we had nothing like a National Library, such as the British Museum in England. The Library here served the purpose both of a Parliamentary Library and a Library for the whole Dominion. He hoped that some day there would be a National Library, and then the Parliamentary Library could be confined more particularly to works of reference and treatises on general law, constitutional law, political economy, and the sciences, excluding that branch of literature known as Belles Lettres, the books treating on which, would be transferred to the National Library. But, until this could be accomplished, it was necessary to have books of a general character. Nevertheless, perhaps many of the books in the Library could, with advantage, be replaced by others of a more useful character.

Vote agreed to.

47. Printing, Binding and distributing the Laws.....	$14,900
48. To meet the estimated expenses in connection with consolidation of the Laws.....	$8,000
49. Printing, printing paper, and bookbinding.....	$70,000
50. Contingencies of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery	$1,200
51. Miscellaneous Printing...	$2,000
52. To meet the expenses in connection with the care of Archives.....	$3,000

Mr. POPE (Compton) said he hoped that the collection of the papers and records in question would, in future, be pursued with diligence, as the matter was extremely important.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said that he had brought the question on more than one occasion under the notice of his late hon. colleague, the present Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec.

Mr. POPE said that, if his hon. friend would look over the reports of 1872, 1873, and 1874 on this subject, he would find a large catalogue concerning manuscripts relating to this country which existed in London and Paris. Something had been done in this regard while he had had the honour of being at the head of the Department of Agriculture, but the work had not been completed. Mr. Brymner's report would be very useful for reference.

Mr. BABY said that peoples, like families, desired to have their records and archives kept in a complete condition. The Minister of Finance last year had promised to do everything in his power to have the papers mentioned by Mr. Brymner transcribed and placed in the archives of this country. The States of the American Union took a great pride in keeping the records relating to their early history complete, and it was a fact that in Boston and Albany could be found more of the history of Canada in manuscript form than could be seen here. He hoped that some one would be sent to England and France to collect the papers in question.

THE NEW MEMBER FOR KAMOURASKA.

Mr. LANGEVIN: The newly-elected member for Kamouraska is waiting to be admitted and take his seat; would the First Minister or the Minister of Finance be kind enough to move that the Committee rise, in order that this member may be admitted?

Mr. MACKENZIE: This is a rather extraordinary proposal, and one of which I have never heard before, but as the hon. gentleman has made the application, I shall not object.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Of course the newly-elected member has a right to take his seat; besides, he may wish to say something on the very questions which are at present under the consideration of the Committee; and, of course, the proceedings will only take a few minutes.

Mr. POPE.

House resumed.

NEW MEMBER INTRODUCED.

CHARLES FRANÇOIS ROY, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Kamouraska, having previously taken the oath according to law, and subscribed the roll according to the same, took his seat in the House.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Vote No. 52 agreed to.

53. To meet expenses in connection with the organization of the Patent Record. $7,200

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he was happy to state that, owing to the increase of business, the receipts for the Patent Record were very respectable, amounting last year, he believed, to $35,000, more than clearing expenses in this connection.

Mr. MITCHELL: What is the object of the Record? Is it simply to keep a list of registrations and of patents?

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is a small journal in which are published all the drawings, and some of the specifications of patents.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: And a very valuable record it will be hereafter. I am very glad to hear that the funds received enable the Government to meet the necessary expenses.

Vote agreed to.

54. To meet expenses in connection with the preparation of criminal statistics..... $5,000

Mr. MACKENZIE said that these statistics were sent in by the officials of the various courts, who were remunerated for this work in accordance with a schedule of fees that had been adopted by an Order in Council.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex) called the attention of the Government to the importance of making some arrangement whereby statistics of various kinds could be collected for the use and benefit of the country. Anyone acquainted with the system of statistics which had been prepared by Edward Young, Chairman of the Bureau of Statistics at Washington, would see how vastly superior the American system was, in this particular, to the Canadian. Statistics in condensed form were issued quarterly from the office at Washington, informing the country with respect to the imports and exports, the duties and debts, and all statistical matters interesting both to legislators and to the public generally. Statistics of the same kind, affecting the Dominion, could only be found in our Library after a great deal of research, and he thought it was desirable that a department of this nature should be established. He believed that the Chairman of the Committee had called the attention of the House to this matter last year, and he did not see why some clerk could not be instructed to attend to this particular duty. For instance, at Washington, in the Educational Statistical Department, a Commissioner of Education could, in a few minutes, give information regarding the state of education in every State of the Union: the number of children between certain ages attending school, and the number of people in the States, individually and collectively, who were able to read or write; and give a bird's-eye view of the social, political and moral standing of every State. If one desired to secure similar information respecting the Dominion of Canada, he was obliged to examine the educational reports of each Province separately, and this could not be done without considerable labour and the devotion of a great deal of time to the task. He strongly and respectfully urged the Government to secure the services of a competent person, who, at regular intervals during the year, should issue a volume from the Department on Trade and Commercial matters, &c., in order that the House might yearly obtain reliable and satisfactory statistics of this kind.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said he deeply regretted the omission of the vote for $4,100, Salaries and contingent expenses of Statistical Office, Halifax, and $1,880, Salaries of 316 Deputy Registrars, Province of Nova Scotia, and allowance for getting marriage returns. The system in question had been established previous to the Union, and it had proved to be very valuable. He hoped that the Government, before Parliament rose, would adopt the course they had pursued last year, and submit these items to the House in the Supplementary Estimates.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said that, if his memory did not fail him, notice was given last year that these items would not in any likelihood be continued for another year. There was a great deal of force in the statement as to the desirability of having such statistics for the whole Dominion, but their preparation would involve a very great deal of labour and expense. He did not think that they were now, or that they would be for a very considerable time to come, prepared to undertake any such work, and under the circumstances, it did not appear fair to continue the collection of a small portion of them in one Province. He did not consider it possible to justify the vote asked for, unless a general system was adopted, and this they were not at present in a position to do.

Mr. JONES said there might be good reason why the Government was not prepared to adopt a general system, but this was no reason why they should abolish the system already in force in Nova Scotia. He held that this would be almost a breach of faith with that Province, necessitating, in addition, the loss of the services of valuable officers, and the destruction of a system which had worked extremely well.

Mr. POPE (Compton) said he quite agreed with his hon. friend from Halifax. If there was one thing more than another to which the Government should give attention, and one on which the expenditure of money would be valuable to the country, it was the collection of statistics. In almost every country but Canada, a system of statistics was in operation. Such a system, however, could not be perfected in a day, and could not be carried out with a small amount of money. It was unfortunate, in view of the great importance of the subject, that this Province should not be allowed to carry out the system until it was extended over the whole Dominion. If it was found impossible to extend the system to the Dominion at present, it was no reason why Nova Scotia should suffer. He trusted the system would be allowed to go on for another year.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the Government was not justified in entailing the expenditure which attached to the system of statistics at present, and would not be for a considerable number of years to come. He deeply regretted that they could not comply with the request, but he saw little chance now of gathering the vital statistics in such a way as to be useful. To some extent, no doubt, the system of Nova Scotia had been of value, but it could not be complete and extensive.

Mr. GOUDGE said he was glad the hon. member for Halifax had brought this matter to the notice of the Government. Because the Government did not feel able to introduce a general system, he did not think that the Province should be deprived of a system of statistics which, in the past, had enabled them to arrive at certain data and conclusions. It was a step backwards, he thought, for the Government to abandon a system which had hitherto worked well. Besides, the act would be regarded as a breach of faith, and he hoped, before the House rose, some provision would be made in the Supplementary Estimates for the continuance of the system.

Vote agreed to.

55. Immigration and Quarantine..... $120,550

Mr. MASSON said the vote for this Department was about the same as last year, and it would therefore appear extraordinary to every hon. member that, notwithstanding the continual reduction in the number of immigrants coming to the country, the expenses remained the same. This was more striking when it was considered that last summer an extraordinary event occurred. Those immigrants whom we had taken so much trouble and spent so much money to bring to Canada were sent back to the country from which they came by the Government. Whatever might be the explanations on this subject, every one must feel that it was a striking coincidence that at the very moment they were spending so much to induce people to come here, they were also spending money to undo the work they had been at so much trouble to do. He could understand that, if the Government could explain that the immigrants were sent here previous to the year 1874, there might be some excuse in returning them; but it would be within the recollection of every hon. member who had followed the report of the Minister of Agriculture, that every precaution had been taken in France since 1874 to prevent immigrants of a certain class coming to Canada, and that the Immigrant Agent, against whom a great deal was at one time said, had taken every precaution to send a proper class of immigrants here. He had even made every man desiring to come here sign a paper indemnifying the Government against any accusation of having been misled in coming to Canada. Under the circumstances he would like to know how the Government had decided upon giving such a blow to our whole system of immigration as to pay money to send 230 persons back to the country from whence they came. He understood the difficulty there existed in obtaining immigrants from France. The French people did not generally emigrate; they did not like to leave their country, and it was only in times of political commotion, or similar excitements, that they could be induced to emigrate, and it was not likely, in ordinary times, that that people would pay great attention to the representations of the emigration agent. The field for emigrants in Europe was, on account of peculiar circumstances, becoming temporarily exhausted, and it was time to look to other countries for the supply of population for Canada. They should look around, and see whether there was a field nearer our border which might be more productive in this respect than Europe. Two years ago he introduced a motion into the House to bring about the repatriation of our fellow-countrymen who had emigrated to the United States. At that time he met with rather a severe rebuke from certain members, and, unfortunately, some from the Province of Quebec; but he was glad to see that a strong reversion of feeling on that subject had taken place. There was a feeling now in favour of repatriation, and the Canadians across the border, having observed this disposition, were inclined to avail themselves of the opportunity to return to their future country. The report of Mr. Lalime stated:

"When I entered on my duties on the 22nd of April, 1875, the advantages which Manitoba has to offer to emigrants were not known, and in the United States there was but little said about emigrating in the direction of that Province. The Canadians of Worcester, Mass., where I reside, had alone taken the initiative of such a movement, and I should add that in several other centres of Canadian population, where the question had been somewhat agitated, the people were quite opposed to an emigration towards the Canadian prairies. But, when the news spread that your Government intended seriously to direct towards Manitoba a stream of Canadian emigration, and it was seen in operation, opposition ceased and the news was received with satisfaction."

This report was a justification of the position he took on this question two Sessions ago. If steps in this direction had been taken when the depression first came upon the United States, the results would have been very gratifying. There was no better class of immigrants for this country than the Canadians, Irish or French, who were compelled some years ago to emigrate to the United States. It was generally conceded that agriculturists were specially needed for Canada. On that point Mr. Lalime said:—

"The Canadian population of New England is essentially suited to colonise Manitoba; it is made up of the Canadian, French and Anglo-Saxon races, and is almost entirely composed of agriculturists."

The efforts so far in the direction of repatriation had been so successful that during the last season 350 French-Canadians residing in the United States were sent to Manitoba. Notwithstanding the risk and the difficulty they had on Lake Superior, and the fact that some of them arrived late in the country, they were not discouraged; and they were all satisfied with the country and had urged their compatriots in the United States to follow them. He knew of a gentleman who was going to the United States, at his own expense, to find as many emigrants as he could for the North-West. A great many French-Canadians in the United States wished to go there, and they only required some one who knew Manitoba to go to them and encourage them. He was not speaking of French-Canadians in the United States only. He understood a large number of the Irish people wished to take the same step. He did not agree with the opinions of the hon. member for Lisgar, inasmuch as that hon. gentleman was opposed to what might be called "national" establishments or settlements. It was quite natural that a body of people going to, what was to them a foreign country, should desire to live together. It was very advisable to set apart one or two townships for French immigration, and he hoped the Government would not change the system it had adopted in this respect. As a proof of the necessity of the Government apportioning certain districts or townships for the reception of bodies of people of the same nationality, he referred to the proposal of a member of the Swiss Legislature on this subject. In fact, he thought it impossible to obtain any considerable emigration from any one country unless there was a hope of all the emigrants being near to each other. The proposal of the Swiss emigrants might be somewhat extraordinary, but he thought it might be modified so as to be acceptable to the Government. He did not speak in a hostile spirit to the Government, but at the same time he thought the Government ought not to take credit for what had been done in sending a large number of French-Canadians to the Province of Manitoba, because he believed if they had not been pushed they would not have done it.

MR. MACKENZIE: We all admit the hon. gentleman frightened us into it.

MR. MASSON: I do not think the hon. gentleman is frightened by anybody except his own supporters. In deference to the hon. member for Chateauguay, the Nestor of the House, and fearing evil consequences, the Government had to adopt almost the same proposition as I myself made.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the French who had come from France, and over whom the difficulty occurred, were not as desirable a class of settlers as was possible. A considerable number of them had to be sent back to Paris. He agreed with the last speaker that the movement in France was very liable to degenerate into abuse; but the moment the true state of affairs came to the notice of the Government, they stopped it. Unfortunately a great deal of money had been spent in this way.

Mr. POPE (Compton): How many were sent back?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he believed 230 were sent back, the expense being $22 per head, amounting to something over $5,000 in all. He entirely agreed with what the hon. member for Terrebonne had said about it not being the business of the Government of Canada to pay for people coming out here, and then to pay their expenses back if they did not like the country. A considerable amount of money had been spent by the Government for the purpose of inducing immigration into Manitoba. The aggregate amount per head was calculated at $26, which was somewhat considerable. There was no doubt that the great depression which had extended all over North America had tended to considerably decrease the number of immigrants. Nevertheless, a great number had been reported as having settled in Manitoba during the past year. Looking at the amount expended on behalf of the Mennonites and Icelanders, and considering the circumstances, it could not be said that immigration had been abandoned. He agreed that it was desirable to encourage the agricultural class, and not the mechanical class, as the wants of the country, as to the latter class, were already amply supplied. Judging by the experiment with the Icelandic population, he saw no objection to setting apart a reasonable portion of land for persons of French-Canadian extraction who might wish to settle together.

Mr. JETTÉ said he wished to sustain what the hon. member for Terrebonne had said with reference to the Canadian agent in Paris. That gentleman had taken the greatest care to send out to this country only such emigrants as were suitable. If he were deceived in some cases it was not his fault. When he (Mr. Jetté) was in Paris two or three years ago, he had occasion to see some of the correspondence on the subject, and he could bear personal testimony to the care which the agent took in only encouraging those to come who were suitable to the wants of the country. Some accusations had been made against that gentleman, he being charged with not being sufficiently careful what class of people he sent out on account of his getting so much per head; and therefore he thought it his duty to make that statement.

Mr. MASSON: The hon. gentleman may add, I think, that the agent in Paris has recommended that the system of giving so much per head should be abandoned.

Mr. PALMER said the vote asked for in connection with immigration was excessive, and it was not desirable that the policy of maintaining the expenditure at a high figure should be longer continued. It was no doubt important that during prosperous times, when there was abundant work and large public undertakings under contract, a liberal immigration policy should be pursued; but it was unwise to continue the system in full operation in the present dull times, when the Minister of Finance had announced a considerable deficit and additional taxes were about to be imposed. He did not charge the Government with being responsible for the existing system, which required to be changed. The immigrants would constitute the same class of labour as that which was now unemployed in the cities. Many persons attributed that distress to the policy of the Government, but, whatever was the cause, it was useless to bring into the country people who had no means and who could only be sustained by the capital at present in it. The immigration vote should be regulated each year by the needs of the country, and this year it should be reduced to a very small amount. When the statement was made that twenty thousand people had settled in the country within a recent period, it should be remembered that with the present scarcity of labour, they would have displaced an equal number of persons formerly employed. The proposed vote of $230,000 could be reduced by three-fourths, without injury to the country.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said a portion of the proposed vote was connected with quarantine and protective measures for the public health, while $187,000 properly belonged to immigration, of which a very large amount was required to meet the expenses of the Mennonite colony in case they chose to avail themselves of the contract or stipulation they had made with the Government. The question of the possible reduction of the amount for emigration travelling agents and others was now engaging the attention of the Government; if they were able to effect a reduction, they would be glad to do so. No doubt, in times like the present, it was not desirable to encourage any immigration other than agricultural, for which, nevertheless, there was in certain portions of the country a considerable demand, which was likely to continue so, and also for certain classes of domestic servants. The proposed vote showed a considerable reduction, as compared with the amount granted last year.

Mr. POPE asked the number of Canadian emigration agents in Europe.

Mr. BURPEE said there were thirteen.

Mr. POPE enquired whether the Government proposed to change the arrangement made with the Mennonites, which only extended to the years 1874-5-6.

Mr. BURPEE said it was not intended to change the system at present in force.

Mr. POPE said the time for which the arrangement was made had expired.

Mr. BURPEE said he thought that was not the case.

Mr. POPE enquired if the Government had made any arrangement with the steamship companies for reduced passage rates for immigrants.

Mr. BURPEE said the existing arrangement was being continued.

Mr. POPE said the arrangement was that up to 1876 immigrants should come out at the rate of $30 per head; from 1876 the rate would be $40 per head, to be extended until 1882, if the Government thought proper.

Mr. BURPEE said further explanations would be given.

Mr. POPE asked if Shipping Agents on the other side of the Atlantic were employed by the Government as Emigration Agents, and if so, what was their remuneration.

Mr. BURPEE said they had a per capita allowance.

Mr. POPE: Then they are employed.

Mr. BURPEE: No special employment is given them.

Mr. POPE said that according to Mr. Klotz's report of 1876, a large body of people in Russia composed of Mennonites, Catholics and Jews were about to emigrate. In his report Mr. Klotz said:—

“ Besides the so-called Mennonite emigration from Russia, a large German emigration from Eastern Russia, along the Volga, is to take place. The denominations of these people are Catholics, Lutherans, and some Mennonites. This impending emigration is said to be of very great dimensions. Delegates from these sections were here at Hamburg in July last on their way to the Brazils. With great difficulty I had several interviews with said delegates, with the object of inducing them to pay a visit to Canada, which, after frequent interviews, they promised to do. The particulars of said interviews, and how a large share of said impending emigration may likely be secured to Canada, I have communicated to the Department at Ottawa, through the London Agency under date 21st August, 1876.”

He desired to inquire whether any arrangement or representation had been made by the Government to induce those people to emigrate to this country.

Mr. BURPEE said no arrangement had been made.

Mr. POPE said the late Government determined to make the experiment as to what could be done in the direction of inducing emigrants to settle in Canada. A considerable number of agents were sent to Europe, as it was necessary that the Dominion should become as widely known as possible, at the same time he felt that in a few years a smaller number of agents would be necessary, when the most efficient men would be retained. At that time, labourers were required who could obtain employment at the large public works then in progress. But the position of the labour market in this country had changed; nevertheless the Public Accounts would show that the expenditure by the late Government at the time to which he referred was only $4,000 more than the Estimate for this year. Practically therefore, there had been no reduction effected by the present Government. In 1872 the expenditure of the Dominion for immigration purposes amounted to $126,124, and the number of immigrants brought into the country was about 34,000, costing something like $3.50 per head. Feeling the necessity of increasing their exertions in this Department, the late Government had employed a larger force of agents in 1873, and the actual number of immigrants who came from Europe during that year was 42,000, costing $5.60 per head. In 1874, and the result in that year had been affected by the work performed during the preceding year, the number of European immigrants was 25,000, and the cost, under the administration of the present Government was $10.50 per head. In 1875, the immigrants numbered 18,000, and the cost was no less than $16.50 per head. In 1876 the immigrants from Europe numbered about 14,000, and the actual cost was $20.60, so that the cost had been quadrupled since 1873. This was the manner in which hon. gentlemen opposite managed this Department. He had no complaint to make against the policy of those hon. gentlemen because they had generally pursued the same policy as the late Administration, but, whenever they had made a change, it did not last over one year, and the results were disastrous. The Agent-General, with all his paraphernalia, had been most expensive; but this officer had only followed out his instructions. He thought that the Agent-General, who he presumed had done the best he could, had been treated most unfairly. That official had been lauded as the best man that could possibly be found for the purposes the

Mr. POPE.

Government had in view, and great things were expected of him; but nevertheless, about the 14th of last February, as soon as House met, he was most cavalierly dismissed.

Mr. MACKENZIE: He was not dismissed.

Mr. POPE: It was tantamount to a dismissal.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No, it was not.

Mr. POPE said that the ex-Agent-General had been extravagantly praised. In fact they were told that he had written a book.

Mr. MITCHELL: Two or three of them.

Mr. POPE thought that the fault had not lain with the ex-Agent-General, but with the management of the Department here. Immigrant agents had not been kept at their work; they did not know what they had to do, and they had no particular instructions. This he saw was the case when he was in London. The ex-Agent-General had received very valuable assistance from the Hon. Mr. Macdougall; and in fact he believed that the former could have accomplished nothing without the latter's aid. It had been stated in a certain newspaper that Mr. Macdougall had been unnecessarily kept in the pay of the Department for seven or eight months, but this was wholly due to the present Administration. Mr. Macdougall's engagement expired before the late Government resigned, and he had to return to London to have his accounts audited and settled. Mr. Macdougall had been employed to encourage emigration from Norway and Sweden to this country, and he stated in his report that emigrants could be readily sent out in sailing vessels at $7 per head if the Government would pay one-half of the passage money, which had previously been very high. He also made arrangements with various steamship lines in this connection. The present Government were entirely responsible for keeping Mr. Macdougall in London for seven or eight months after the term of his engagement had lapsed.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Hear, hear.

Mr. POPE said the hon. gentleman exclaimed "Hear, hear;" but they could not have done without the services of Mr. Macdougall, as the ex-Agent-General knew nothing at the time about his department, or about the system of emigration.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Mr. Macdougall gave no assistance.

Mr. POPE said that he knew better than that, because he had seen the contrary when in London, where he had met Mr. Matson, the agent sent to replace Mr. Macdougall, doing nothing—without instructions and without advice, though anxious to know what he was to do. And Mr. Matson was not alone in this plight; all the other officers had the same difficulty. The system was good enough, but it had been badly managed. He wished to be particularly understood to declare that the expenditure on 42,000 immigrants in 1873 was not $4,000 more than the estimated expenditure of these hon. gentlemen for the current year, for which they claimed a reduction of $60,000, while the expenditure on 14,000 immigrants during the last two years had been considerably more than it had been on 42,000 immigrants, who arrived in Canada during the last year of the existence of the late Administration. He considered himself entirely responsible for the arrival of all the Mennonites who had come to this country, bringing with them something over $600,000 in money, and he hoped that the immigration of this valuable class of people, would be fostered. They had settled on the prairies, and were found to be very successful and very prosperous, and to have a very large extent of land under cultivation. He was delighted to learn that the French-Canadian repatriation scheme had been attended with good results. He had warmly promoted it, having sent Rev. Mr. Geniron through the United States to encourage it. Repatriation had cost about $17 per head, while the expenditure on the Mennonites who came from Russia, had amounted to about $20 per head. He saw that one agent was stationed at Chicago, and this person, judging from his report, had done nothing at all; and another at Detroit, who had also effected nothing, though he had expended a considerable sum of money. When in office, he had examined into the question of sending paid agents to the Western States, and he had come to the conclusion that it would be useless. The Americans would feel that these men had no business to be there, and would obstruct their operations; while, on the other hand, he could well afford to pay a certain sum per head for all persons induced to emigrate thence into Canada. He thought that the Government had done a great deal to retard immigration. Immigrants required work, and desired to go to a prosperous country, and the Government had broken down the manufacturing interests of the Dominion. In 1873, he had found the factories and manufacturing establishments of Western Canada filled with immigrants lately arrived from Great Britain, but to-day this was no longer possible. Factories were either closed, or run at a loss, and all this tended to retard immigration. Again, merchants were abandoning our principal cities in consequence of the commercial policy adopted by the Administration, and seeking New York, and we were being taxed to bring immigrants into the country while the Government were practically sending people out of it. He hoped that the hon. gentleman at the head of the Administration would do better, and that the Government would come to their senses. What would Montreal, Hamilton and Quebec Centre say when it was found that immigrants were to be brought at great expense into the country, while its own people were being driven out of it. Under ordinary circumstances, if he was aware there would be even reasonably decent management and there was any indication of the hon. gentlemen opposite coming to their senses, he would entrust them with this money with great pleasure. But, on witnessing the feeling from one end of the country to the other, that the Government were not to be entrusted with this expenditure of money, he would be committing almost a dereliction of duty if he supported this vote. However, he was inclined to trust them a little longer as he saw a disposition to "hark back" in the hon. the Finance Minister. Canadian immigrants ought to be brought into Canada; there was no reason for the distress which prevailed except the policy of the Government. In the expectation that the hon. gentlemen opposite would do right in this matter, and endeavour to find employment for the immigrants, he would favour the vote, although he would like more definite answers than he had received to his questions.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the Government were very deeply indebted to the hon. member for Compton for the generous and unstinted support, he was willing to give them on this question. He was sensible how large a sum would be put at their disposal, and how long they would retain this vote could the hon. gentleman do anything to deprive them of its management. He was really surprised to hear a gentleman of such good sense as the hon. member for Compton insinuate that the Government were to blame for the depression existing in the country. They were no more responsible for it than the late Administration were for the commercial prosperity which existed for some time while they were in power. It was ridiculous to hear any gentleman contend or insinuate that the late Government was the cause of the prosperity; they had just as much to do with it as any other set of flies on a wheel, and no more. It would be well, however, to compare their expenditure in this respect with that of the late Government. In 1873-4 the expenditure was $327,000, whereas the amount now asked for was $220,000. Of this, $43,000 was for quarantine and purposes of health, and another large portion of the sum was on account of the Mennonite immigrants, for which the hon. member for Compton was responsible. He would ask hon. gentlemen opposite if it were such a serious thing not to bring immigrants to the country. If the Government were responsible, as the hon. gentleman alleged, for the state of the country, what would be said of the Government who ruled Canada from 1860 to 1870, when he told the House that during that decade no less than 370,000 Canadians removed to the United States. It was not going to enter into a comparison of the state of the country then and now, but he could tell the hon. gentlemen opposite that the Government had nothing to fear from such a comparison, and that, if there was any deficit, it was not one-third of the deficits which used to prevail during the term of the late Administration.

Mr. POPE (Compton): The hon. gentleman supported that Administration.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he supported them because he believed their policy was for the best interests of the country; but, when he found out that the contrary was the fact, he withdrew his support and gave full and fair notice of his intention and reasons for doing so. There might be something in what the hon. gentleman had said as to the desirability of reducing the salaries at certain of the agencies, and, if the Government could see their way to dispense with the services of certain gentlemen, no doubt they would be happy to do so. He must protest against the assumption that, because in times of great prosperity a large number were likely to emigrate to the country, it was therefore fair to take the per capita standard and estimate the work of the Department. The time might come, and he hoped it was not far distant, when we would require considerable immigration, and if they utterly broke up the system it would be difficult to restore it to efficient working order. He therefore thought that the best plan for the Government to adopt was to look carefully into all these expenses, to reduce where they could, to diminish the number of travelling agents if it appeared they were not doing good service, &c. That the Government were fully prepared to do, and any suggestions the hon. gentleman might make in that direction would be cheerfully received and carefully considered.

Mr. PALMER said he could not allow the declaration of the Finance Minister, to the effect that the Government had nothing to do with the depression or prosperity of a country, to go abroad without entering a protest. If that was the case they could save money at least by reducing the expenses of administration. He had always been under the impression that the condition of a country depended largely on the administration of public affairs. The moment a Government confessed itself powerless to prevent depression or ameliorate a bad condition of affairs it abrogated its functions. At one time there was a cry raised by hon. gentlemen on the Ministerial benches that the late Administration was injuring Canada, but it would appear from the statement of the hon. the Finance Minister, that that was simply a party cry, and that Government could do nothing to effect a return of prosperity. He did not think that better times were to be brought about by immigration; the first requisite was to profitably employ the people at present in the country. If the hon. the Minister of Finance could effect the reductions he had suggested, it would be a step in the right direction, and, notwithstanding the hon. gentleman's declaration, would aid in the return of prosperity. He thought some little injustice was being done to St. John in not allowing the immigrants there the benefit of a chaplain and a matron, as was the case at Halifax.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he hoped the debate would be adjourned, as there were several hon. gentlemen who wished to speak. Besides, the hon. the Minister of Customs had promised further information in regard to the item.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time.

Bill (No. 51) To Extend the Powers of the Montreal Loan and Mortgage Company—(Mr. Holton.)

Bill (No. 52) To further amend the Act to incorporate the Canadian Mutual Marine Insurance Company—(Mr. Domville.)

Bill (No. 53) To make further provisions for the establishment and management of Building Societies in the Province of Quebec—(Mr. Jetté.)

Bill (No. 54) To authorize the construction of Waterworks by Joint Stock Companies—(Mr. Jetté.)

PRISON DISCIPLINE BILL.

FIRST READING.

Mr. BLAKE, in introducing a Bill (No. 55) To make further provision for improvements in prison discipline, said the purpose of the Bill was to apply to prisoners in the Central Prison in Toronto that provision of the law which authorized in cases of good behaviour and industry a remission of the sentence by one-sixth. The Bill certainly appeared to make a difference between Ontario and the other Provinces in this respect, but it was to be remembered that the Central Prison was a prison of a different character to an ordinary common jail. It was, in fact, intermediate between a common jail and a Penitentiary. The Act would apply to the Province of Ontario as soon as the rules and regulations of the prison made by the Lieut.-Governor should be submitted to and approved of by the Governor-General in Council; and, in order to make no difference between Ontario and the other Provinces, the Bill provided that the provisions of the Act referred to could be applied to the other Provinces so soon as they should have a prison of similar character to the Central Prison, the rules of which had been approved of by the Governor in Council. He had not overlooked the fact that it was thought that on the whole the terms of imprisonment were quite short enough, as the maximum term of imprisonment in the Central Prison was two years. He had thought it well to make a provision in the Act by which, in case a Judge thought that a prisoner should not escape the maximum term, he could sentence him to two years and four months, so that in the event of good behaviour the prisoner would suffer no less than two years' imprisonment, and in the event of a tendency to behave badly the prisoner would have the inducement of a remission of four months of his sentence if he behaved himself well, which he thought would be more effectual in making prisoners orderly than the fear of the dark cell.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he approved of the principle of the Bill, but he had a difficulty with regard to the provision giving power to the Judge to give prisoners a sentence over one-sixth longer than he really intended to inflict. He thought that the Judge would do that on the second conviction only, and when a party had once been in a Penitentiary it was quite clear that the only interest he would have in behaving well and reducing his term would be for his own comfort, so that his good behaviour would be no evidence of his reformation. The object of the Bill would therefore be lost.

Mr. BLAKE said it seemed to him they would come nearer to a similarity of punishments throughout the Dominion by giving the Judges the power to add one-sixth, not in all cases, but when they considered the probability of the prisoner by good behaviour reducing his term to its ordinary extent. With reference to second convictions, it was rather important that those convicts supposed to be more hardened than the others should not be rendered desperate by the solitary cell, the privation of luxuries, etc., but should have the benefit of the same humanizing influences as on the first conviction. The Government had another thing in view besides the reformation of the prisoner, viz., the good of the institution itself.

GAMBLING IN PUBLIC CONVEYANCES BILL.

FIRST READING.

Mr. BLAKE in introducing a Bill (No. 56) For the prevention of Gambling Practices in certain public conveyances, said his attention had been called by the managers of certain large railways to the necessity of having a law provided for the speedy bringing to justice and punishment of three card monte men. This Bill was designed for that purpose.

POST OFFICE IN ST. ROCH.

QUESTION.

Mr. THIBAUDEAU asked whether it was the intention of the Government during this Session to put a sufficient sum in the Estimates to build a Post-office at St. Roch, Quebec?

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is not the intention of the Government to erect a second Post-office in the city of Quebec.

THE TRENT WORKS.

QUESTION.

Mr. BERTRAM asked whether it was the intention of the Government to retain control of the Trent Works, or if any arrangement had been made to hand them over to the Ontario Government?

Mr. MACKENZIE: No such arrangement has been concluded, but the matter is under consideration.

EXEMPTION FROM DUTY.

QUESTION.

Mr. DOMVILLE asked when the roof tendered for under date, 7th September, 1874, was delivered at Halifax; if such roof was admitted free of duty; if not, did the Phoenixville Iron Works (Clarke, Reeves & Co.) pay the duty?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Up to that time and some time afterwards, all articles brought in for the railway were admitted free of duty. Last year, however, the duties had to be paid whether the goods were brought in by the Government or by private persons. The roof referred to was brought in under the old rule—duty free.

Mr. DOMVILLE: The hon. the Premier has not mentioned the date on which the roof was delivered at Halifax.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I did not observe that part of the question, but I will inform the hon. gentleman to-morrow.

PROTECTION OF FISH.

QUESTION.

Mr. BROUSE asked whether the Government had taken any action to secure assimilation with the United States respecting the protection of fish along our joint rivers; would the Canadians be prevented using nets to catch fish along the north side of the River St. Lawrence between Cornwall and Gananoque, while the Americans on the south side of the same territory were persistently netting and destroying the fish?

Mr. MACKENZIE: The Government has had correspondence with the Federal Government, but not with the State Governments. At present no assimilation has been obtained.

CARILLON DAM.

QUESTION.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Renfrew) asked at what time the contractors of the Carillon Dam and works were to have completed them, and what progress had been made?

Mr. MACKENZIE said he believed the time expired some months ago for the completion of these works. It was difficult, in answer to a question and in a few words, to state the progress that had been made. The foundation of the whole dam was laid, and perhaps the most difficult portion of the work had been completed, but not more than one-fourth or one-fifth of the dam was completed.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

Mr. MACKENZIE delivered a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, which is as follows:

“DUFFERIN,—

“The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons further correspondence having reference to the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

“GOVERNMENT HOUSE,

“OTTAWA, 16th February, 1877.”

FORM OF PUTTING QUESTIONS.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think it my duty to say that the way some hon. members put their questions is not the proper way. It is the rule of the Imperial Parliament—a rule which is very strictly carried out there, and ought to be carried out here—that no question should contain any matter that might possibly be the subject of argument, and no assertion either directly or indirectly. In the question put by the hon. member for South Grenville to-day, that gentleman violated this rule, though not very strongly. It asserts that the Americans on the south side of the St. Lawrence are “persistently netting and destroying the fish.” That might be a question of fact or a question of argument. In the Imperial Parliament any question that might possibly lead to argument is not allowed to go on the notice paper; in fact the Clerk of the House makes all questions conform to this rule before they are placed upon the paper.

THE GEORGIAN BAY BRANCH

MOTION FOR REPORTS.

Mr. McCARTHY moved for a copy of all Reports or statements made as to the construction or attempted construction of the Georgian Bay Branch of the Pacific Railway, under contract by the Hon. A. B. Foster; as also all correspondence between the Hon. Mr. Foster and the Government as to the said contract, or the work done thereunder, or the failure to perform the same, any Departmental Orders or Orders in Council passed as to the matter of the said Public Work, especially the order as to the cancellation of said contract; together with a statement of the service or services for which the sum of $109,000.50 has been paid to the said A. B. Foster on account of said contract. He said hon. members would remember that a Canadian Pacific Railway Act was introduced on the present Government assuming the reins of power, and the construction of the Georgian Bay Branch of the road was then contemplated for the first time, so far as he knew. In that Act it was provided that the contract with reference to the other sections of the road should be submitted to Parliament; but with regard to this branch, as also to the Pembina branch, it was not thought necessary by the First Minister that they should be submitted to the House or approved of by Parliament before the contracts took effect. He understood that the reason for this departure from the general principle laid down in the Act of Parliament, and from what he might term the general principle that was announced by the gentlemen opposite when in Opposition, was that it was necessary to proceed with the construction of these branches without any delay, and that the works would have to be under contract before the House met. No contract was, however, made in regard to this Georgian Bay Branch until late in the year, when, after tenders had been called for, a contract was made by the Department of Public Works with the Hon. Mr. Foster. The contract, a copy of which had been brought down to the House, provided very stringently for the performance of the work. It provided that the work should be commenced on the 1st June next, that was 1st June, 1875, and be completed before the 1st January, now passed. The contract provided that for this work the contractor should be paid $10,000 per mile, and 20,000 acres of land per mile, and, in addition thereto, that he should get interest upon the sum of $7,500 for the period of 25 years after the road was completed. Now it appeared from further papers brought down to the House that, although a survey was made under this contract, the contractor — either because he found he had taken the contract at an unremunerative price or that the work was impossible of construction — applied to the Minister of Public Works for an alteration in the terms of his contract, an alteration which was very material. One of the original terms was that the road should be built from the mouth of the French River to the proposed terminus of the Pacific Railway. But when Mr. Foster went upon the ground, he discovered that there was another "magnificent water stretch" which the hon. the First Minister had failed to discover, viz.,

from the mouth of the river to twenty-six miles up, which would do away with the necessity of building the road that distance. He wanted to make the river navigable for the twenty-six miles by removing some obstructions, and he modestly asked that he should receive the $10,000 and the 20,000 acres of land for the entire distance, just the same as if he had built the twenty-six miles. This proposal was not acquiesced in. Then Mr. Foster sent in a bill to the Government which appeared to have been $38,862, on which he demanded payment on account. The next step taken was that an Order in Council was made by which the contract was annulled, and it was decided that Mr. Foster should be paid the amount claimed by him for explorations, and for so much of the work as had been performed. But instead of being paid the $38,862, he was paid $109,000 according to the Public Accounts, for works performed under the contract, although the contractor had only applied for $38,000, and although the hon. First Minister had thought that $26,000 was all, at that time, which could be paid. The explanation might be that of this sum $61,000 was not paid in the contract, but that $41,000 was; but this explanation could not be deemed satisfactory to the House. He would ask why was the money paid? The contractor had not alleged that he had been imposed upon in any way, he had not alleged that there was any breach of faith on the part of the Government or the Department. So far as appeared, the contractor entered into the contract with a full knowledge of the location of the proposed line, its length and the difficulties he would have to encounter, and he should have satisfied himself that the amount of compensation was sufficient. The House had the right to assume that there was no imposition on the part of the Minister of Public Works. Then he would like to know upon what principle the contractor had been paid the $41,000? When a person entered into a private contract he did not look to be relieved of it if he afterwards discovered that he could not make it profitable, and certainly he would not expect a sum to be paid him which would cover all expenses with a very wide margin for profit on the actual work done, and a public contractor should be treated the same way as a private contractor. The articles of agreement contained the following:—

“The contractor shall diligently and continuously prosecute and continue the same, and the same respectively, and every part thereof shall be fully and entirely completed in every particular to the satisfaction of the Engineer, and fully equipped for working on or before the first day of January, in the year of Our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-seven. * * *

“If at any time during the progress of the works it should appear that the force employed, or the rate of progress then being made, or the general character of the work being performed, or the material supplied or furnished are not such as to ensure the completion of the said works within the time stipulated, or in accordance with the contract, the Minister shall be at liberty to take any part, or the whole work, out of the hands of the contractor, and employ such means as he may think fit to complete the works at the expense of the contractor, and he (the contractor) shall be liable for all extra expenditure incurred thereby; or the Governor in Council shall have power at his discretion to annul this contract. Whenever it may become necessary to take any portion or the whole work out of the hands of the contractor, or to annul this contract, the Minister shall give the contractor seven clear days' notice in writing of the intention to do so, such notice being signed by the Minister, or by any other person authorized by him.

* * * The Governor in Council, in the event of his annulling this contract, may direct the Minister to proceed to re-let the same, or any part thereof, or employ additional workmen, tools, and materials, as the case may be, and complete the works at the expense of the contractor, who shall be liable for all extra expenditure which may be incurred thereby, and the contractor shall forfeit all right to the percentage retained, and to all money which may be due on the works or securities deposited, and he shall not molest or hinder the men, agents or officers of the Minister from entering upon and completing the said works, as the Minister may deem expedient.”

Parliament had provided that before any contract was entered into, the Minister of Public Works should satisfy himself, and the Council, that the contracting party had the means to carry on and bring the work to a successful termination. In addition, the deposit of a large sum of money by the contractor was required, and it was recited in this contract that this deposit had been made, though he had been unable to discover where it had been placed. It was stated in the contract that the deposit had been made in the Ontario Bank, but if this was the case the amount had not been put in any way to the credit of the Receiver-General, and it was not entered in the accounts which he had seen; still, as to this he would not be positive. But assuming that the contractor possessed the means of carrying on the work, and that the deposit of $85,000 had been made, he would like to know on what principle the contractor had been permitted to abandon the contract at his own option, simply because it was not profitable; and this appeared to have been allowed. The hon. gentleman who led the House was entitled to all the credit of originating the scheme regarding the construction of this branch of the Pacific Railway, to which at all events the Province of Ontario was very strongly opposed. They all were aware of the great burden assumed by this Dominion when it was agreed to build an all-rail route to the Pacific Ocean; and they all knew that this project was considered, by the hon. gentlemen opposite, one which should not have been entered into, and one of too gigantic a character for so young a country as the Dominion; and yet these same gentlemen who had proclaimed their opinions about the enormity of undertaking the Pacific Railroad, had assumed in addition the construction of this branch, the cost of which had been estimated by the First Minister at six millions of dollars. He trusted that this branch road would now be abandoned, and that the Government would devote their energies, means and abilities, to the building of the Main Line, leaving the branches untouched until the trunk was finished. If they got out of the contract with Mr. Foster simply with the loss of $41,000—which was virtually thrown away as he understood it—the country, in his opinion, would cheaply escape from a bad bargain, and the trammels of a bad policy, which in his judgment should never have been entered upon. With the permission of the House he would limit the motion to papers not already brought down, and add the following words:—

“Also the advertisement for tenders for the said work; the evidence showing that the contract was worth $4,000 per mile, as was recited in the contract, and the certificate of the Department respecting the deposit of $85,000, also referred to therein.”

The House knew that the contract had been made, but it was not in possession of the advertisement calling for tenders, or the evidence showing that the contractor was worth the sum mentioned, and the place where the $85,000 in question was deposited. He thought it was important that the House should obtain the information desired, in order to form an opinion as to whether the contractor had imposed on the Minister of Public Works, or the Minister on the contractor. It was also important to discover whether the latter was worth the sum required by the Act of Parliament, and to obtain the evidence on which the Ministry had assumed him to be worth that amount. If Mr. Foster was worth what the Act required, he thought that the country should not suffer the loss in question. The House was not ignorant of the fact that Mr. Foster was supposed to have conferred upon the hon. gentlemen opposite a favour, which had to be paid for; and, when they found that he (Mr. Foster) had been dealt with in a manner different from other contractors, and in a manner in which no private person would deal with a contractor, this knowledge was calculated to strengthen that suspicion, and therefore he trusted that no opposition would be made to the fullest enquiry being had, and to the submission of all the papers.

Mr. MACKENZIE: There is no objection to the fullest possible statement being brought down; although I am of the impression that there is nothing to be submitted; but, if there are any such papers, of course they will be presented. The hon. gentleman who moved the resolution has fallen into several errors. In the first place, he will find in no speech of mine any such declaration as he believes I have made regarding the general principle, that all contracts should be submitted to Parliament for ratification. Such a course would be so utterly impracticable that it would become absurd. I never made such a statement. I did, Sir, however, say that contracts for work like the Pacific Railway, especially if let in one contract, should be so submitted, and I say so still. But if this principle were generally observed it would greatly inconvenience the whole public, and retard the progress of the country. I never took such a ground, though I am aware that it has been frequently so asserted, and the hon. gentleman who has just spoken has no doubt seen these assertions, and taken for granted that it was true. In the next place, the hon. gentleman is mistaken in thinking that we were required by the Act of 1874 to submit any tenders for branch railways to Parliament. The truth was, Sir, that the branches which it was proposed to construct were expected to be put under contract immediately. The Act was drawn advisedly in such a way as to leave the hands of the Government free in that matter. The two branches contemplated were the Georgian Bay Branch and the branch from Winnipeg to Pembina. The hon. member will recollect that the late Administration was anxious to have one of these branches constructed at an early date; and it was provided that the Winnipeg Branch should be absolutely completed to Pembina by the 31st of December, 1873. The clause referring to the submission of contracts reads as follows:—

“No contract for the construction of any portion of the Main Line of the said Railway shall be binding until it shall have been laid before the House of Commons for one month without being disapproved of, unless sooner approved of by resolution of the House.”

The contract for the Georgian Bay Branch was therefore not subject to the supervision of Parliament, and my impression at present is that I made a statement that any contract, even for branches, if made at a convenient time for submission to Parliament, should be so submitted. It also is true that I did lay this contract on the table of the House, and that it became ratified by lapse of time. I was looking in the Journals for the day of submission, but, as I did not find it, I make this statement subject to correction. Still I believe that I am right in this regard. The hon. gentleman also says I declared that this road would cost six millions of dollars; but I think he will fail to verify that observation. It may, however, have been stated by some other person, but I have no recollection of having done so, nor can I conceive how I could have done so, as it could not be correct. With reference to the entry in the Public Accounts, my hon. friend the Minister of Justice has already informed the House that this was simply incorrect and that the real amount of money advanced, or paid rather, to Mr. Foster was $41,000. This payment was made in accordance with the Order in Council, cancelling or annulling the contract, which Order was published last year in the Sessional Papers; and this stated that the sum of somewhere between $38,000 and $39,000 of work was certified by the Chief Engineer as available to the Government in completing the surveys of the line intended to be built. And this amount was exceeded by the difference between it and $41,000. The total amount, $41,000, was certified by Mr. Fleming for work available in the terms of the Order in Council relating to the prosecution of the undertaking. The other amounts were apparently paid according to the Public Accounts on the Georgian Bay Branch, but really to the Canada Central Railway Company under an Order in Council which is published on page 219 of the Journals of 1875. This Order also provides for payment on rails delivered at any point on the line which was to be constructed, to the extent of 75 per cent. of their value, such rails becoming the property of the Government until they were laid on the road for use. The amount of $68,000 was therefore paid on certificates dated September or October, 1875, given by the Chief Engineer, certifying in the first place that $23,000, and in the second case that $45,000 could be paid, making a total of $68,000 payable under this particular Order in Council.

Mr. HAGGART: On what was this money paid? On rails?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I have just mentioned what it was paid on. I was stating that the Order in Council provided for the payment of 75 per cent of the value of rails, as they were delivered at any point on the road.

Mr. HAGGART: But no rails have been delivered at any point.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman says that no rails have been delivered at any point on the road. I can only say, in reply, that the certificates of the Engineer declaring that they were delivered are in the Public Works Department. I never made an examination to see whether the rails were delivered or not, but I am bound under the law to make payments upon receiving such certificate that they have been delivered, and these certificates were of course presented. This explains a seeming discrepancy in the Public Accounts. The entry in question should not have been made, as the Georgian Bay Branch had a distinct account of its own; as also has the Canada Central Railroad. One payment was made upon rails, and the other upon work certified by the Chief Engineer to have been performed, and to be available for the prosecution of the survey.

Mr. HAGGART said that no person knew better than the Minister of Public Works that the sum of $41,000 represented an expenditure of nearly $500 per mile for 85 miles of road; and no one knew better than this Minister that $500 per mile would be sufficient to defray all the engineering expenses of this line. As to the statement of money having been paid for rails for building the road from Douglas to Burnt Lake, he had excellent information—of the accuracy of which he did not doubt—to the effect, that not one rail had been laid on that section of the road, or within ten miles of it; but 1,500 tons of rails were lying at Renfrew, ten miles from the town of Douglas. He had taken the trouble to have these rails counted, and an estimate of the quantity prepared, and he found that at the rate of $33 per ton they would not represent within $15,000 or $18,000 of the value which the Premier had mentioned. There could be no mistake on this point. Besides, the rails were iron, such as never would be used on any main railway line; and those which lay at Renfrew would not complete more than seven miles of the road between that place and Douglas, thus leaving the contractor within over three miles of the commencement of the work in question. He could not understand why the payment to which he alluded was made, unless the Government owed something to the Hon. A. B. Foster for furnishing certain valuable information, as had been reported throughout the country. The number of these rails was 7,764. He denied that they were in the neighbourhood even of the line, nor was there any such quantity of them as could represent the payment of $68,000 under the terms of the contract. He also denied that any such amount as $41,000 had been expended on engineering surveys between Burnt Lake and Georgian Bay; this was impossible, if he was rightly informed. The Premier had considered the sum of $38,000 an exorbitant charge for surveys, when he (the Premier) made the payment of $20,000 odd down. He desired to learn what quantity of rails was certified by the Chief Engineer to have been lying at Renfrew, and the amount per ton which had been advanced on them.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I can only state, in reply to the hon. gentleman, that the certificates of the Engineer will be produced. I was not aware that they were called in question. I do not know that I ever saw them. The certificates came in in the usual way, and were paid in the usual way by the officers of the Department. I have no reason to believe that Mr. Fleming, who is a very careful officer, would give false certificates. The hon. gentleman says that the survey of these 85 miles should not cost $500 per mile; but we completed the entire survey, and I may remark that the survey of the Pacific Railway has already cost $1,500 per mile, and a considerable portion of it is not yet finished.

Mr. HAGGART: Does not the Premier know that not one rail has been laid along this road?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I will not permit any hon. gentleman to insult me in this House.

Mr. COCKBURN said he took exception to the statement of the hon. member for Cardwell, that the Province of Ontario was opposed to the construction of the Georgian Bay Branch. Speaking for a large section of country, he was of opinion that it was a great misfortune the construction of the road by the Government could not be proceeded with, for it would have proved of great advantage not only to Ontario but to the whole Dominion. In regard to the remarks of the hon. member for South Lanark that the cost of the surveys should not have exceeded $500 per mile, he was personally aware that much labour was devoted to an examination of the country, numerous trial lines made, involving large expenditure.

Mr. WRIGHT (Pontiac) said he regretted to learn from the hon. member for Cardwell that the Province of Ontario was opposed to the construction of the Georgian Bay Branch Railway. He had been under the impression that the representatives from Ontario had given to the project of building that road a very hearty support, considering that it would develop the internal resources of the Province, and give it a back line which it did not possess at the present time. But, if Ontario was opposed to that enterprise, the Province of Quebec was decidedly in favour of it, and, in consequence of the promises which had been held out, the people of the latter Province had incurred serious obligations in order to secure the construction of a line from Quebec to meet the eastern terminus of the Georgian Bay Branch road. He echoed the sentiments of regret expressed by the hon. member for Muskoka that the line was not now in progress of construction. He believed not only the Province of Quebec, but the eastern portion of Ontario, and especially the Ottawa Valley were strongly in favour of its construction, believing that it would develop the resources of the Province and prove a link in the Pacific road. He thought that probably a little error had been made in the location of the line. It had been shown to the First Minister, by two large and influential deputations from Montreal and Quebec, that the selection of Douglas and the proposal to reach the mouth of French River were disadvantageous. The great error in the location of the line arose of the fact that it was made without any proper survey having been made. There was no doubt the contract was let upon the verbal report of the Engineer, who was supposed to have walked over the country, but according to his own admission he did not complete the journey, for, becoming enveloped in smoke, he beat a hasty retreat to the river. When the Quebec and Montreal deputations waited upon the Premier and asked the Government to assist in the construction of the connecting road eastward, it was proved that the Georgian Bay Branch should have taken a more northerly direction. That was the result of the examination for which the country had paid $40,000. In view of the declaration made by the Premier that the line on which the railway was located was only surpassed by the Canada Southern, and believing that the Public Works Department possessed information which could not be obtained, the people of Quebec proceeded to immediately construct the Northern Colonization, now the Quebec, Montreal and Ottawa and Western Extension, which was all under contract, and completed for two-thirds of its length. It was well known that the Quebec Government, which now had charge of that railway, only awaited the determining of the eastern terminus of the Pacific Road or Georgian Bay Branch, if that were to be part of the general railway, to complete the line through to Quebec. While he regretted that the Georgian Bay Branch line, to the completion of which they had looked forward as a means of developing the country, should be in such an unfortunate position, he could not agree with the hon. member for Cardwell, who had expressed the view that if the country got rid of that undertaking by an expenditure of $40,000, it would be a good bargain. He hoped that, as surveys had been made and certain work done on the road, it would be pushed forward to completion.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said that, lest the motion of the hon. member for Cardwell should be barren of results, as the Premier had announced from there being no papers to bring down, he would propose an amendment on a subject which was cognate to it. Some time ago the Premier stated boldly and defiantly that he was ready to have his Department investigated from cellar to garret and to appoint a Committee of one for the purpose, and that one the hon. member for Kingston. He did not doubt the sincerity of that offer, but, when he asked the First Minister the other day for information regarding the subsidy granted to the Canada Central Railway, he failed to obtain it because it was asked in an informal manner. He, therefore, now brought forward the question in a constitutional manner. Having examined the Orders in Council, he would state to the House the conditions on which they were ratified whereby a subsidy of $12,000 per mile was granted to the Canada Central. The Order in Council making that grant was dated November 4th, 1874, and to it certain conditions were affixed. That order was submitted to the House and ratified on March 13th, 1875. The conditions were such as if carried into effect would have accomplished the object in view—the construction of the Georgian Bay Branch, and the continuation of the Canada Central Railway. It was provided that the Company should, within one month from the ratification of the Order in Council by the House, satisfy the Minister of Public Works that they had entered into a bonâ fide contract or contracts for the building of the railway, and provided sufficient means with the Government bonus to secure the completion of the line before 1st January, 1877; and also that the Company should, from the date of the contract, make continuously such progress as would justify the hope of the completion of the line within the time mentioned. It was due to the House, which had reposed great confidence in the hon. the Minister of Public Works, that this subsidised work should have been carried on in accordance with the spirit of the Order in Council. He proposed to ask by the amendment that the hon. gentleman should lay before the House the evidence which satisfied him that the contractor had provided means for the completion of the work on or before the 1st of January, 1877, and also the reports made from time to time that such continual progress was being made as would justify the hope of the completion of that line by the time mentioned. It was upon those conditions that the Order in Council was ratified. But, thinking that the hon. Minister of Public Works would require from the contractor the same security which any prudent business man would demand in a private undertaking, gave the House authority to make payments on account of the work from time to time, so that he should not have to wait for the meeting of Parliament for a vote. The hon. the Premier was authorized to make payments on account of "rails delivered at any point of the line to be constructed to the extent of 75 per cent. of the value thereof, all such rails to become the property of the Government until laid on the road for use." It had been stated that those rails were not on the line to be constructed. By the correspondence laid before the House last Session, it would be seen that, on the 20th December, 1875, Mr. Foster asked to have the Order in Council amended so as to make the commencement of his subsidised line at the village of Renfrew. That was an admission that it was not a part of the line to be constructed; but they found also that, before that date, in September or October, the contractor had been paid for the rails delivered at Renfrew. In February, 1876, the hon. the Minister of Public Works said that at a subsequent date he would take into consideration the propriety of amending the Order in Council. So far, however, no papers had been presented to the House showing that the amendment had been made. It would thus be seen that, not only had the letter of the Order in Council been disregarded, but its spirit had not been carried out. He would like the hon. the Minister of Public Works to give the evidence to the House that, when the payment was made in September or October, sufficient progress had been made to warrant him in hoping 120 miles of railroad, the first sod of which was not turned, which was not even located, would be completed within fourteen months from the date of the payment. The amendments which he wished to add were as follows:—

"All letters, correspondence and evidence laid before the Minister of Public Works to satisfy him, in pursuance of the terms of the Order in Council dated 4th November, 1874, and ratified by resolution of this House on 13th March, 1875, that the Canada Central Railway Company had provided sufficient means, with the Government bonus, to secure the completion of the line on or before the 1st January, 1877; also, reports made from time to time, showing that the Company were making such progress as justified the hope of the completion of the line within the time mentioned; also, a statement of payments made to said Company on account of the subsidy granted on the conditions mentioned in said Order in Council, and of the quality, kind and weight per yard of the rails delivered at any point of the line to be constructed; the value of said rails, the evidence or certificate of said value, and payments made on account of said rails, and the dates of such payments, and the place or places where said rails are delivered, and if not delivered on the line to be constructed, the distance or distances therefrom."

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew) said he had derived a good deal of information from the statement which had been made by the hon. the First Minister in reference to this matter, but he had hoped the hon. gentleman would have indicated to the House what course the Government intended to pursue respecting the Georgian Bay Branch. That the hon. Premier considered the connection of great importance was evident from the address he made when he went before the electors of Lambton for re-election in 1874, and from a speech delivered by him in the county of Renfrew, last year, when the hon. gentleman made the following statement:—

"The opposition offered by Dr. Tupper, on Mr. White's behalf, to the selection of the Georgian Bay Branch, which would open up the most direct, and by more than 100 miles the shortest route to be found from Montreal and Quebec to the navigation of Lake Superior, through the Ottawa county, was equally unintelligible, and it would require no argument to convince the people of the Dominion, but especially those of the North Riding of Renfrew, that such was the case."

The position of the hon. gentleman was well understood, and the fact that, in bringing down his Canadian Pacific policy in 1874, he took power to construct that as well as the Pembina Branch without submitting the contracts to the House for ratification was evidence that he considered the work should be prosecuted with the utmost vigour and dispatch. He (Mr. White) took exception to the statement that the whole Province of Ontario was opposed to this branch line. The fact that the hon. the leader of the Government had obtained a large majority from that Province contradicted that statement. The construction of the line, moreover, received the support of the hon. members from Quebec; and he thought the hon. Minister, in view of all the circumstances, should have taken the first opportunity which offered to state to the House whether the road had been finally abandoned or not. Upon looking over the Estimates, he failed to find a single dollar for this road, which was somewhat extraordinary, considering the manner in which it was at first pressed. It was stated that the contract of Mr. Foster was annulled because that gentleman found it was one on which he could not make any money. In the locality from which he (Mr. White) came, there was a painful impression that, in cancelling this contract and returning the deposit of $100,000, the Government had gone back upon their professions and statements when they condemned the right hon. member for Kingston for cancelling the contract of the late Government with Sir Hugh Allan. There was the following clause in Mr. Foster's contract:—

“In default of such completion as aforesaid on or before the last-mentioned day the contractor shall forfeit all right, claim, or demand, to the sum of money or percentage herein agreed to be retained by the Minister of Public Works, and any and every part thereof, as also to any moneys whatever which may be at the time of the failure of the completion as aforesaid, due or owing to the contractor, and the contractor shall also pay to Her Majesty, as liquidated damages, and not by way of fine or penalty, the sum of $1,000 for each and every week, and the proportionate fractional part of such sum for every part of a week during which the works embraced within this contract, or any portion thereof, shall remain incomplete.”

Under all those circumstances, it was singular that the contract should have been cancelled and the deposit returned. With reference to the rails presumed to be delivered along the line, he could state from his own knowledge that not one of those rails for which the hon. the leader of the Government had paid $68,000 of the public money had been delivered beyond the village of Renfrew, which was no less than ten miles distant from the commencement of the line. Under these circumstances he thought all the information which it was possible to obtain should be brought down. It was quite possible that the hon. the leader of the Government desired to keep this matter in abeyance until another election. The present Government had made a great deal of use of their pretensions as to what they were going to do with reference to this line.

Mr. McDUGALL (South Renfrew) said it seemed to that the hon. member for North Renfrew might have curbed his party zeal in discussing a question which had been first advocated by the party now in power. This Government was the first which had shown any desire to meet the real wants of Central Canada, and the hon. gentleman might have displayed more anxiety for the good of his part of the country than for a fling at the Government. He agreed that the first duty of the members was to see after the interests of the whole country, but, when any part was systematically neglected by the past Government, and by the old Government of Canada, and was now attended to by the existing Government, he thought the hon. representative should show some satisfaction and appreciation. He did not see what a discussion on the Georgian Bay Branch had to do with the Canada Central extension from Douglas. That contract was not with Mr. Foster but with the Canada Central Railway Company. He must differ from the hon. member for Frontenac in saying that the Government should adopt a different route to the one which was adopted as being more advantageous for Quebec. He (Mr. McDougall) understood that the Legislature of Quebec had petitioned for a different route to the Bonnechère route. He must say, with all humility, that there was no evidence to warrant any change in the route. The interests of the Dominion being bound up in the best route being adopted, he believed that the Government would therefore adopt the best one.

Mr. McCALLUM said he would like it to be explained to him for what purpose the Georgian Bay Branch was to have been built at all. No person would take that route. He was there last summer, and could not imagine of what use a railway would be. Vessels could not get to the mouth of the French River at night, and so barren was the country around that not soil enough to bury a man could be found in forty miles square.

Mr. MASSON said the present was not a proper time to discuss the Georgian Bay Branch, and especially what route it was to follow. His hon. friend from Renfrew had spoken for the Province of Quebec, and it must be supposed he was authorized so to speak. He himself would not discuss the question until the papers asked for had been brought down.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he wished to say to the hon. member for Frontenac that he did not intend to be curt with him, as it appeared it was thought he was. He only meant to show that necessarily he could not discuss with a gentleman across the floor of the House a policy of the Government before that policy was matured.

Mr. JETTÉ said, although it might not be the proper time to discuss the route of the railway, yet it at all events was the proper time to state that the Province of Quebec was in favour of some connection between her railway system and the Pacific Railway. The Province of Quebec had spent a great deal of money on railways with the idea of this connection.

Mr. COOK said he found in travelling over the country that there was a very harmonious feeling as to the Pacific Railway policy of the Government. The hon. gentlemen opposite assumed now to be great purists. Let him refer back to some transactions on the Intercolonial Railway. George and James Worthington had a contract for $299,000, but they received $60,000 more than this sum; Messrs. W. E. Macdonald & Co's contract was to have been finished in July, 1872, but, it not being finished at the end of 1873, the Government took it off their hands; Messrs. Wilson & McGaw were to have their contract finished in July, 1872, but it was not completed until the summer of 1875, and so on through a great many other cases. He thought it was unfair to the Government for hon. gentlemen on the other side to impute any improper motives for the cancellation of the contract if it was to the interest of the country that this should be done.

Mr. BERTRAM said he did not think that this was a proper time to discuss the question whether there should be a Georgian Bay Branch or not. But, if the object was to be gained, he thought he could point out a route which would be much cheaper than the railway at French River. There was a charter in existence now of a railroad between Ottawa and Toronto. If the Government would grant a subsidy from Carleton Place to Peterborough, a communication with the North-West could be had by deflecting to the Midland Railway. The distance by this route would be not much longer than by the other, and would be much cheaper.

Mr. ROBINSON said two-thirds of the population of Ontario were of the opinion that were there no Hon. Mr. Foster, there would have been no Georgian Bay Branch. The members for Montreal, and other representatives of the Province of Quebec, had spoken of the importance of the Quebec system of railways connecting with the Pacific Railway, but he would ask whether this could be done by the construction of the Georgian Bay Branch. The railroads running west of Georgian Bay approached excellent harbours, and it was well known that the mouth of French River was not a harbour which, at certain seasons, could be approached with any safety. There was not one natural bay on the Georgian Bay which had not some settlement on its shores; and this the hon. member for Muskoka well knew. Besides, no good harbour could be made at the mouth of French River, as the reports of engineers and practical men certified.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No, no.

Mr. ROBINSON begged his hon. friend's pardon. What he stated was really the case. His hon. friend from Muskoka stated that two-thirds of the people of Ontario favoured the construction of this railway. Was this because it was a longer route than could otherwise be obtained, or because it ran to a harbour inferior by far to the harbours approached by other railways running westwards? Ontario furnished, he believed, the means for building this branch, and he would like to know what advantage it would be to this Province when finished. It ran about seventy miles north even of Barrie. A deputation had waited in this relation upon the Prime Minister, who, in the interests possibly of the Province of Quebec, had positively refused to furnish any assistance whatever for the extension of any of the Ontario roads beyond this Branch of the Pacific Railway. Did this course meet with the approval of two-thirds of the Province of Ontario? His hon. friend from Pontiac of course desired the construction of this line, but it would be of no advantage, in his opinion, to Ontario.

Mr. BLANCHET said his hon. friend from North Simcoe had not made a fortunate comparison in contrasting this branch with the Intercolonial Railway. The contractors for the latter undertaking had not, at the outset, had proper information on which to base their estimates, as was intimated by Mr. Fleming, the Engineer-in-Chief, and the Government and Parliament were consequently bound to indemnify them for the cost incurred owing to this circumstance. A petition urging this course had been presented to the then Minister of Public Works, signed by over eighty members from both sides of the House. In this instance the same excuse did not apply. Very little had been done on this branch, and judging from what he had heard, he thought that its construction would not be in the best interests of the country. He considered that the best route would be by the north side of the Ottawa River, enabling the line to connect with the railway system of the Province of Quebec.

Mr. DESJARDINS had heard with pleasure the remarks of the member for Montreal East. It was some consolation at all events to find that, while the Quebec Ministers were silent, some members from Quebec on the opposite side of the House were inclined to say something in the interests of the Province of Quebec. The Liberals had conducted the electoral struggle of 1872 on the question of the construction of the Pacific Railway, the establishment of its terminus, and the building of the Georgian Bay Branch; though, since that day, the Liberals from Quebec had said very little about these matters. In 1874, the Premier had changed his policy in this relation, but the Ministerial members from the Province of Quebec had not endeavoured to prevent the Prime Minister from acting, as they believed, against their Provincial interests, and it was very difficult for them to forget the manner in which they had been treated by the Ministry. The Liberals in 1872, and the Premier subsequently, had announced that the terminus of the Pacific Railway would be placed south-east of Lake Nipissing, as a compromise of the claims in this regard of the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec; and, under these circumstances, the latter was naturally surprised to find this decision changed without notice and without protest on the part of the Quebec Liberals, who did not seem even to be chagrined at this result. The contract for the Georgian Bay Branch had, however, been hastily given to Mr. Foster, and tenders had not been invited. He hoped that the example of the member for Montreal East would be followed by other Quebec members on that side of the House, and that the policy of the Ministry would, as a consequence, be so influenced that Quebec would receive just treatment at their hands. The Ministerial members from the Lower Province should endeavour to realize the promises which they had so liberally made on the hustings when seeking the suffrages of the people.

Mr. MITCHELL said that the member for North Simcoe had unjustifiably dragged the question of the Intercolonial Railway into the discussion. The contracts for three sections of the latter road had been awarded before proper surveys were made, and it had been deemed only fair that the contractors in question should be indemnified for the consequent loss, as it turned out that the cross sections had not been laid out. The country had demanded at the time that, as soon as the line of this great national work could be located, the contracts should be given out, and a very large majority of the members of the House had asked the Administration of the day to indemnify the contractors, who had faithfully endeavoured to carry out their respective undertakings. The hon. gentleman from North Simcoe cited this case as an excuse for the Government having let the Georgian Railway Branch contract before a survey was made, but there was a great distinction between these two cases. The line of the Intercolonial had, in fact, been repeatedly surveyed during a period of twenty years, and pretty accurately, by Major Robinson and others, though the cross-sections of the sections mentioned had not been taken out, and the road had been brought to a successful completion at a cost within a trifle of the original estimate. He did not desire to shield the late Administration from any blame which they might have incurred; but he was not disposed to allow the unfair parallel which had been drawn, in order to shield the Government from censure, to pass without question.

Mr. BECHARD said the member for Montreal East was not the only member from the Province of Quebec on his side of the House who was in favour of the construction of this link between the Pacific Railway and the railway system of the Province of Quebec for which he had voted. He agreed with the hon. member for Levis that the Canada Central Railway should be continued from Pembroke, on the Ottawa, to a point communicating with the Northern Railway from Quebec.

Mr. McCARTHY said the hon. the Premier had misunderstood his remarks with reference to the contract not having been submitted to Parliament, for he had endeavoured to draw the distinction between contracts for branches and contracts for the construction of the main line. His statement as to the cost of the Georgian Bay Branch was made on the authority of the speech made by the hon. the First Minister when submitting his Pacific Railway policy to Parliament in 1874. With respect to the general question, as to whether the Province of Ontario was in favour of the construction of the Georgian Bay Branch, considerable difference of opinion had been expressed by hon. members, but he had failed to hear a single hon. member address the House in favour of the proposition except those who were locally interested in it. He still, therefore, maintained that, with the exception of those localities interested, the Province of Ontario, which would have to pay a very large proportion of the cost of the work, was opposed to an expenditure which was looked upon as perfectly useless. The undertaking was to build a Pacific Railway, having its eastern terminus at Lake Nipissing, but it was never agreed to connect that road with the railway systems either of Ontario or Quebec; at the same time, if it was proper that the road should be connected with the latter, it should be also united with former railway system. If the Georgian Bay Branch were built, Ontario would have to connect its system at Lake Nipissing, while the Quebec railways would be united by a road built at the expense of the Dominion. He was glad the hon. member for North Simcoe had expressed himself in favour of constructing the Georgian Bay Branch as a Dominion work, which would involve an expenditure of $6,000,000, and, when the hon. gentleman returned to his constituency, he (Mr. McCarthy) would have pleasure in reminding him of the policy he had enunciated on the floor of Parliament. He thought the expenditure of $41,000 on the Georgian Bay Branch had been lost to the country, and he hoped the hon. the Premier would awaken to the condition of public feeling on the question.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he had no objection to offer to the amendment, because he had nothing to keep back regarding the question. He was not, however, aware that he or any other person had collected evidence in regard to the capacity of the Canada Central, and there was no such evidence to bring down.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said it was the hon. gentleman's duty to have done so, because it was so laid down in the Order of Council.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he knew his duty as well as the right hon. gentleman.

Motion as amended, agreed to, as follows:—

“That an Address be voted to His Excellency, for a copy of all Reports or statements made as to the construction or attempted construction of the Georgian Bay Branch of the Pacific Railway, under contract by the Hon. A. B. Foster; also all correspondence between the Hon. Mr. Foster and the Government as to the said contract or the work done thereunder, or the failure to perform the same, any Departmental Orders or Orders in Council passed as to the matter of the said Public Work, especially the Order as to the cancellation of said contract; together with a statement of the service or services for which the sum of $109,000.50 has been paid to the said A. B. Foster, on account of said contract; and also for the advertisement for Tenders for said work; the evidence showing that the Contractor was worth $4,000 per mile, as recited in said contract, and the certificate of the deposit of the $85,000, also referred to therein, so far as not already laid before the House; also all letters, correspondence and evidence laid before the Minister of Public Works to satisfy him, in pursuance of the terms of the Order in Council dated 4th November, 1874, and ratified by Resolution of this House on 13th March, 1875, that the Canada Central Railway Company had provided sufficient means, with the Government bonus, to secure the completion of the line on or before the 1st January, 1877. Also, reports made from time to time, showing that the Company, were making such progress as justified the hope of the completion of the line within the time mentioned. Also, a statement of payments made to said Company on account of the subsidy granted on the conditions mentioned in the said Order in Council; and of the quality, kind and weight per yard of the rails delivered at any point of the line to be constructed; the value of said rails, the evidence or certificate of said value, and payments made on account of said rails; and the dates of such payments, and the place or places where said rails are delivered, and if not delivered on the line to be constructed, the distance or distances therefrom.”

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

PRIVATE BILLS.

SECOND READINGS.

The following Bills were severally read the second time.

Bill (No. 25) To amend the Act incorporating the Canada Atlantic Cable Company.—(Mr. Thomson, Welland.)

Bill (No. 35) Concerning the Ottawa, Vaudreuil and Montreal Railway Company.—(Mr. Hagar.)

Bill (No. 28) Respecting the Niagara Grand Island Bridge Company.—(Mr. Thomson, Welland.)

Bill (No. 29) To amend the Act passed in the 39th year of Her Majesty's reign, intituled “An Act to incorporate the British Canadian Loan and Investment Company (Limited).” —(Mr. Young.)

Bill (No. 30) To incorporate the Union Marine Insurance Company of Halifax, Nova Scotia.—(Mr. Jones, Halifax.)

Bill (No. 33) To incorporate la Société de Construction St. Jacques as a permanent Building Society and for other purposes.—(Mr. Jetté.)

Bill (No. 8) To change the name of the St. Francis and Megantic International Railway Company to the International Railway Company, and for other purposes.—(Mr. Brooks.)

PICKERING HARBOUR AND ROAD COMPANY BILL.

[BILL No. 26.]

(Mr. Gibbs, South Ontario.)

SECOND READING.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario), in moving the second reading of the Bill (No. 26) To vest the property and powers of the Pickering Harbour and Road Joint Stock Company in Joseph Harris McClellan, said the Company was organized under the Act passed in 1853, and continued to do business until 1872. During that time, however, it became indebted in a large sum to the late hon. John Hillyard Cameron, who in 1862 got a Bill passed through the Ontario Legislature, vesting the property in him and giving him authority to dispose of it in the name of the Company. Mr. Cameron disposed of the property to Mr. McClellan, but objection was made that the title was defective because the Legislature had no jurisdiction over the tolls levied by the Company. The object of the Bill was to confirm Mr. McClellan's title.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the Bill had only this moment been placed in his hands. He would allow it to pass pro forma until he had time to look at it.

Bill read the second time.

METROPOLITAN BANK BILL.

[BILL No. 31.]

(Mr. Workman.)

SECOND READING.

Mr. WORKMAN, in moving the second reading of this Bill said it provided for the calling of a general meeting of stockholders, when three trustees would be appointed to wind up the Bank and divide the assets pro rata. One of the stipulations was that not less than 60 cents on the dollar should be refunded to the stockholders.

Bill read the second time.

OTTAWA AGRICULTURAL INSURANCE BILL.—[BILL No. 34.]

(Mr. Rochester.)

SECOND READING.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD, in the absence of Mr. ROCHESTER, moved the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the second clause was a very remarkable one. It asked the House to confirm certain insurance upon property that appeared to have been effected irregularly. He was afraid that was not proper legislation.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the clause, he thought, was to provide that irregular policies should not be made obligatory upon the Company.

Mr. MACKENZIE said there should have been a clause explaining that.

Bill read the second time.

SPRINGHILL AND PARRSBOROUGH COAL AND RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.—[BILL No. 12.]

(Mr. Domville.)

SECOND READING.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. GIBBS.

Mr. BLAKE said, if the Bill was allowed to go to the second reading, it should be on the distinct understanding that the House in no sense committed itself to its principle, which seemed to be of a very objectionable and exceptional character. To grant the powers asked to a local railway would be to make a sort of double and divided authority. It was proposed to give this Company, the creature of another Legislature, certain specified powers only to be obtained from the Dominion Parliament. This was a peculiar procedure, although the conveniences of such double authority were obvious.

Mr. DOMVILLE said he had pointed out this to the parties who placed the Bill in his possession. They, however, did not want to make another application to the Local Legislature, as it might affect their subsidy. He could quite understand the objection to the Bill, and he hoped the hon. the Minister of Justice would look into the matter, and the House would be bound to accept the construction he placed upon it. The work was considered a feeder of the Intercolonial Railway and was of some public advantage.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said there were serious objections to this divided authority, and he could scarce see how the difficulty was to be overcome except by a declaration in the Bill making it a Dominion work. He thought the principle of the Bill was fraught with evil, and the House ought to decline to interpose their power of legislation on such a matter.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said he supposed the real object of the Bill was to enable the Company to issue debentures at 7 or 8 per cent.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said perhaps the Legislature of Nova Scotia might not wish the corporation to have that power.

Mr. DOMVILLE said the Local Government had given full powers in this respect, but the legal adviser of the Company thought that Legislature had no right to grant such powers.

Bill read the second time.

BEAVER AND TORONTO MUTUAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY BILL.—[BILL No. 16.]

(Mr. Bowell.)

SECOND READING.

Mr. BOWELL, in moving the second reading of the Bill said the Companies were originally organized under the Act enabling the Mutual Fire Insurance Companies to do business in the old Province of Canada. Subsequently a union took place between the Beaver and Mutual Companies, after which they were advised that the Act of Union did not bring them under the clause of the Insurance Act passed previous to their union. The Company now asked for extended powers under the Act of Union, which he was convinced would be granted, and to be relieved from the operations of the general law, which he did not think Parliament would be disposed to grant. He was instructed to say that the Company were quite willing, if the Bill should pass the second reading, and be referred, to submit any amendment for winding up their affairs, to enable them to continue operations by making the requisite deposits, or to cease doing business altogether.

Bill read the second time.

INSOLVENT ACT REPEAL BILL.

[BILL No. 2.]

(Mr. Barthe.)

DEBATE ON SECOND READING RESUMED.

Order for the resumption of the debate on Mr. Barthe's motion for the second reading of the Bill to repeal the Insolvent Acts now in force in the Dominion of Canada, and the motion of Wood in amendment thereto, read.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex) said he had moved the adjournment of the debate in order that the House might become better acquainted with the amendment. In 1869 an Insolvent Act was passed which formed the nucleus of the Act now in force. A Committee of the legal gentlemen from both sides of the House gave this matter their most careful consideration; and the draft Bill was also carefully revised by the Committee of the Whole House. An

Insolvent Act was absolutely necessary from the circumstances of the country. That body which took such a deep interest in everything connected with trade—the Dominion Board of Trade—had, for the last five or six years, given considerable attention to this question, and that body, as well as other Boards of Trade, had always decided in favour of an Insolvent Act. At the last meeting of the Dominion Board of Trade in Ottawa, in January, a large committee was appointed to consider the question of an Insolvent Act, and one of the first resolutions adopted was: "That the Insolvent Act should not be repealed." They accepted as a first principle the necessity of an Insolvent Act being retained upon the Statute-book. To-day a petition from the Montreal Board of Trade was presented praying that the present Act be not repealed. He thought, if the time for the final decision of the House were extended for a few weeks, petitions from all the Boards of Trade would be presented. The House having deliberated upon the matter so carefully before the Act was adopted, and the Act having been only such a short time in existence, it would be unwise to now suddenly repeal the measure. Had an election intervened it could be done with some show of propriety, but it was the same Parliament now as when the Act was passed. The great financial interests at stake rendered it necessary that some Insolvent Act should be on the Statute-book. According to the census of 1871, there was $77,000,000 invested in manufactures. The products of this capital amounted to the value of $221,000,000 annually. Besides, there was imported last year $94,000,000 worth of produce for consumption, and an exportation of over $80,000,000. Adding these sums together, there was the large amount of $400,000,000 which stood in relation to both of the parties calculated to be affected, either as debtor or creditor. Looking at the vast amount of money to be summarily dealt with, he thought the House should pause before repealing the Act. When the small amount of the liabilities of insolvents was compared to the large amount of money invested in business, it did not appear to him that our commercial affairs were upon such an uncertain basis as they had been represented in some quarters. We had $500,000,000 invested in business, and only 5 per cent of this amount, according to the returns of Dun, Wiman & Co., came within the purview of insolvency, which was a very small percentage considering the many inexperienced persons who hurriedly engaged in business. It was alleged that the debtor was the last party that should make any complaint of there being no Insolvent Act. But should not the honest debtor have some protection? An Insolvent Act was found on the Statute-book of every civilized country. Provision was made for the honest debtor in the old country and in the various States of the American Republic; and there should be a similar provision here; or at least the Dominion of Canada should be prepared to give a reasonable amount of protection to the honest debtor. Perhaps the debtor was the most interested party, but the House had heard the statements of two hon. members of the House who were large traders and doubtless stood creditors to a great number of debtors, and both had urged the continuance of the Insolvent Act. They said that, although the Insolvent Act might have some imperfections, yet it would be disastrous to the trade of the country to repeal the Act. This testimony, by men of practical experience, should have great weight. Another standpoint from which the question ought to be looked at was, as the hon. member for South Brant had pointed out, that this was a time of great commercial depression, and matters would only be made worse by suddenly changing the relations of debtor and creditor. He ventured to say that there were many creditors who were struggling anxiously against difficulties, being "carried," as it were, by the benevolence of generous creditors, but who would be overcome with disaster were there no Insolvent Act, for, without it, the creditors would not feel that their interests were protected, and they could not afford to run the risk of allowing their claims to be forestalled by those who might be first to issue an attachment and secure the entire stock of the struggling debtor.

Mr. Ross.

Mr. COLBY said he had been endeavouring to persuade himself, notwithstanding his former convictions on the subject of the Insolvency Law, in consideration of the peculiar condition of the country at this time, and in deference to the hope held out that some beneficial change would be made by virtue of the amendments proposed by the Minister of Justice, to give a silent vote in favour of the continuance of the Act. But he had been unable to come to that conclusion. If this was simply an Act of 1875, if this was simply an Act of two years' experience, he would say that, considering the the short period of the trial and the peculiar circumstances of the country, it might be unwise to adopt so violent a change as would be involved in a total abrogation of the law. But they must remember that the Act of 1875 was the outgrowth of legislation dating back to 1864. At that time, the gentleman who interested himself most conspicuously in the introduction of the Act was perhaps of all men in Canada most competent to deal with it. He had before him the Insolvent Acts of other countries, and an Act was framed which it was thought would be adapted to the condition of this country. But that Act was not a success. It might have been correct in principle, but, in its practical workings, it was not satisfactory. And so, in 1869, the whole matter was reconsidered, and it was endeavoured to frame another Act which should be free from the objections which experience had shown attached to the Act of 1864. He had felt it to be his duty on two separate occasions to move for the repeal of the Act and the sentiment of the House of Commons in two Sessions was expressed against the Act. He mentioned these circumstances to show how unsatisfactorily the Act had worked. It could not be said that the objection which was found to the Act to-day was owing to the peculiar condition of the country, because, at that time, when the country was at the height of its prosperity, when there was no commercial crisis, when the Act had every opportunity of working, it was found unsatisfactory, and its repeal was twice voted for by the House of Commons. In 1875, with all the antecedent experience, the Government submitted a Bill, which was first carefully prepared by the Hon. Mr. Dorion, and revised by his successor and the ablest legal and commercial gentlemen of the House conversant with this matter. Weeks were spent upon it, and the House had the benefit of the gentleman who was then President of the Board of Trade of Montreal, and now, or recently, President of the Dominion Board of Trade. The Act of 1875 was passed. Now, had this Act been satisfactory? He need not ask the question. No hon. gentleman on the floor of the House would say that the operation of the Act had been satisfactory.

Mr. MACDONALD (Toronto): Yes.

Mr. COLBY said this was the first expression of the kind he had heard. It was said that this was a good Act, but the merchants themselves, who were most interested in making it a success, did not find that it worked well. One attached the blame of its failure to the Act, and another laid it on the manner of its administration; but he heard no one, either on the floor of the House or outside of it, declare that it worked well. He believed that the House could not mature or perfect an Act which would give satisfaction to this country. In attempting to avoid one evil they fell into another; if it was devised for the benefit of the debtor, the result was fraud, dishonesty, over-speculation, and a great many other evils; and, if it was framed in the interests of the creditor, the debtor was oppressed. The difficulties met were inherent in the system. In some countries, perhaps, an Insolvency Act might work well, but in this young country this was not possible. The great fault of the age, of this continent and of this Dominion, was a tendency to over-speculate, and for men without capital or experience to go into business. The results were disastrous. He had endeavoured to look with favour on the amendment proposed by the Minister of Justice, but he had not found this possible. He hardly knew a solvent trader, not already over-rich, who would be able to obtain his discharge under our expensive Insolvent Act and pay fifty cents on the dollar; and the enforcement of such a clause, under our present system, would lead to great injustice. The honest retail trader, under the Act, was placed in a condition of great embarrassment; bankrupt stocks were thrown on the market, and his difficulties were increased by the hardness of the times and the trouble experienced in collecting his dues. He believed that it would require an estate worth 150 per cent. to realize 50 cents on the dollar, if placed in liquidation under the existing Act. Nor did he believe that it would be right to wrest a man's estate entirely out of his own control, place it in the hands of an assignee to be managed or mismanaged, and at the same time to force the debtor to pay 50 cents on the dollar, before a discharge could be secured. In fact this would entail monstrous hardships. He quite agreed, however, with the proposition to require a certain amount to be paid, provided a man went voluntarily into insolvency. The proposition of the Minister of Justice would tend to create widespread ruin and disaster, and rather than submit to this alternative it would be better to wipe out the Act altogether. If this were done, he did not think that they would be thrown back on the old system of preferential assignments or any thing of that kind. Under such circumstances the Minister of Justice would see the necessity of enacting a law of broader application, by which arrangements between the creditors and debtors might be facilitated, and preferential assignments done away with.

Mr. HOLTON: In this Legislature?

Mr. COLBY, said this could be effected by adopting for the Dominion the practical and simple civil law of the Province of Quebec, where the system of preferential assignments was unknown; and by enacting with that law an addition by which a debtor might obtain his discharge with the concurrence of his creditors or of a certain majority of them in number and value, not as a matter of right, but as an arrangement effected between debtor and creditor. This scheme would provide an Insolvency Act within the meaning of the Constitution, and free from the serious objections attached to the Acts that had been placed on the Statute-book in this country. These laws had encouraged reckless trading, induced inexperienced persons and men of too limited means to enter into business, seriously lowered the standard of mercantile honour, and driven honest and capable men out of commercial pursuits. Their tendency had been of an extremely demoralizing nature. It had been urged, that the useless and dangerous weeds would pass away in time, but the result of the operation of these laws had rather been to leave these weeds in full possession of the commercial field. He did not think that they were adapted to the true interests of the country, and their effects it was sad to contemplate. The amendments of the Minister of Justice, on the other hand, would make the law too stringent; it was all very well in theory; a nice and pretty thing in the closet; but, in practice, it would be most mischievous and a delusion and a snare. No honest trader would give notice to his creditors that he was in difficulties until it was too late, and then he would not be able to take advantage of the proposed clause which would relieve him from certain liabilities. Such a person would hope against hope, and defer action in that direction until he would be hopelessly involved. An estate thrown into insolvency might pay one hundred cents on the dollar, not immediately, but in time, if left under the insolvent's management; but, under the present system, modified, as was proposed by the Minister of Justice, how could it be made to pay fifty cents on the dollar, and how could the discharge be obtained? He could not see how this was possible; and was this a law they should carry home to the retail traders of this country? Such a law would be conceived wholly in the interests of the Shylock, if the commercial Shylock existed, and in the interest of the creditor, whether he were lenient or harsh. There was not a redeeming feature in it; it gave no opportunity whatever to the debtor to do anything on his own account, and the moment any merchant throughout this broad Dominion failed to meet his obligations he would be exposed to the danger of having his estate snatched out of his hands and placed in alien custody, and, under these circumstances, if it paid only fifteen, ten, or five cents on the dollar—though in reality worth far more—he was obliged to pay fifty cents on the dollar before a discharge could be granted. He was not willing that such a measure should continue to be the law to be enforced for the next year, especially in the present hard times. Let the House consider with what difficulty honest traders were keeping themselves afloat. In these excessively and continuously hard times—with short crops in many sections of the country, and the state of things aggravated by insolvent traders dropping down to the right and left, with stocks thrown upon the market and sacrificed to such an extent that it was impossible for goods to be sold at honest prices—every trader in difficulty in this country was to be exposed to the operation of a law which gave him no gleam of hope, but placed him at the mercy of any creditor, whether friendly or hostile, and, unless his estate paid 50c. to the dollar, prevented him from getting his discharge. He knew of many estates that were ordinarily estimated at 100c. to the dollar that had not been able to pay 50c., or 30c., or 20c., or even 10c. to the dollar, while others had been entirely wiped out under the operation of the Insolvency Act that the country had been blessed with for the last two years. While he was not willing to open the door to all the frauds of voluntary assignments, on the one hand, he was not willing, on the other hand, to support a law which was entirely in favour of the creditor, and gave every disadvantage to the Insolvent debtor.

Mr. MACDONNELL said the member for Stanstead reminded him more of an advocate addressing a jury than of a member of this House taking a fair and impartial view of the question before it. He had first said that the Insolvent Law was perfectly fair in principle, and, to show that, he had remarked that, in an old country, where men were brought up to business, the law might work well. He afterwards said that no law which discharged a debtor from paying his debts was right, thus contradicting himself. He said an unfortunate debtor should be allowed to make a compromise, but he could do that under an Insolvent Law as well as if there was none. The Insolvent Law was intended for the honest but unfortunate debtor. It was not originally intended for the benefit of the creditor, but, under the law of 1875, which compelled the debtor to pay 33 cents on the dollar, the interests of the creditors were considered and respected. The hon. gentleman said that this was the same law which had been on the Statute-book since 1864. He (Mr. MacDonnell) denied it. The law from 1864 to 1875 made no proviso that the debtor should pay any amount to the creditor. The hon. and learned member argued in favour of the debtor at one time and in favour of the creditor at another, when he said that the law enabled reckless or inexperienced men, without capital, brains, or competence in business, to enter into trade, thus defrauding their creditors and possibly the public; while on the other hand he declared that the law which enabled a creditor, at any moment when the debtor was in difficulty, to get process issued against him and bring him into court was an unjust law. The law had worked very well in the Province of Nova Scotia and he should be very sorry to see it repealed after such a short experience. He found the sentiment of the commercial men was in favour of the principle as well as the practice of the law. The hon. member said it was good in principle but was imperfect in practice. If the House adopted a right principle they should be able, by their wisdom and legislative ingenuity, to reduce it to practice and carry it out by legislative enactment, he admitted it was difficult to pass an Insolvent Law which would work well, but what law was perfect? From the first day that England had a Legislature down to the present, she had been amending and altering her laws, and, while they possessed no powers beyond human powers, they would not be able to pass a law which would be perfect in its operations. This was no time to condemn this law, seeing that we were passing through a time of unprecedented stringency in trade and in the industries of the country.

Mr. LANDERKIN said he had supported the present Insolvent Act, as he believed at that time that it was a necessity. He thought so still. He did not believe it would be in the interests of the country to have the Act repealed at present. The objects of the Act, as he had then conceived them to be, were of a two-fold character—not only to relieve the debtor, unfortunate in certain cases, but to secure the creditor. By that Act, the creditor got possession of the estate of the insolvent in a more ready and in a cheaper method than he could otherwise have done. It had also been stated that the object of the Act was to prevent the continuance of the old system of giving certain creditors a preference in regard to the estate of the insolvent. The principles of the Act had commended themselves to his judgment, and he had resisted any amendments which had since been proposed, as he desired that a longer time should be given, in order to see whether the law had worked beneficially and had carried out the expectations which were formed when it came into force. It was well known that too many persons engaged in trade to the proportion of the amount to be done. That was to be regretted, but he did not think the Insolvent Act had anything to do with the fact. The Act was framed with great care, to protect the rights of every class engaged in trade, and if it secured the honest debtor's release, upon certain conditions, from his liabilities, and punished the dishonest one, its operation must have a beneficial tendency. It was required to protect the wholesale traders, who frequently lived a distance from those dealing with them, and it was impossible, in many instances, for them to get a share in an insolvent estate, unless there was a law of this character. There were many things which should be considered before attempting to remove the Act from the Statute-book. If they looked for a moment into the operations of the Act, it would be seen that the number who failed in 1876 was less than in 1875. Possibly, when the Act became better understood, and its operations more effectually carried out, it might prove a great boon to the country. It was to be regretted and it was also unsatisfactory if a creditor did not receive the full amount of his account; but such a thing was one of the risks of trade, and it was difficult to legislate to prevent it. Country merchants and retail dealers, it was true, had difficulties to contend with, from the fact that when a man was forced into insolvency, the goods were sold at bankrupt rates, and brought into competition with the regular trade, whose interests were thereby injured. Cases of this kind frequently occurred, and were not unknown before the Insolvent Law. The Bankruptcy Act did not create this state of things. If the House would consider provisions for the regulation of trade, they might arrive at some solution of the difficulty arising from so many persons entering into business. If some standard were required by the House as a guarantee, it might be worthy of consideration, but, as things were, with the credit system in full force, it was to be expected that a great many insolvent cases would occur. But, notwithstanding all the difficulties which beset the retail dealers, many of them, who had started with small capital, had managed by industry and perseverance to amass considerable wealth. Failure, in a great many instances, was due to a lack of business training; and, if it could be arranged that incompetent persons could not enter into trade, he thought insolvency would be rare. No doubt much of the existing state of things was due to over-trading; there must be failures if a larger number of persons engaged in trade than was necessary for the requirements of the country. It was to be regretted that so many farmers' sons embarked in business, but it was difficult for the House to interfere in such a matter. As soon as it became understood that agriculture was better adapted for the young men of Canada than any other business, and would enable them to earn a competency and independence much quicker than any other walk of life, this evil would cure itself. He had given notice of a Bill to make some amendments to the Act, but upon consideration he concluded it was more desirable to watch more closely its operation than to interfere with it at present. After listening to the debate, he had formed the opinion that it would be unwise and impolitic to repeal the Insolvent Law, and he would, therefore, support the motion of the hon. member for Hamilton. There was no doubt that trade would revive, especially as the affairs of the country were being so judiciously managed, and, when that desirable result came about, there would probably not be so much need for a Bankruptcy Act. If the law were then found inadequate to the requirements of Canada, the propriety of its repeal would be worthy of consideration. If the Act was repealed now, perhaps the wholesale merchants would cease carrying the retail dealers, and the latter would force the consumers to pay, which would be hard all around at present. Perhaps, in another season, there would be a bountiful harvest, and the farmers would be better prepared to conduct their business on the cash system. When that result was attained, it would be time enough to talk of the repeal of the Act.

Mr. KERR said he was a firm believer in the maxim that silence is golden and speech only silver, and nothing but the strength of his convictions on the question before the House constrained him to break the golden silence and explain why he should vote in favour of the amendment of the hon. member for Hamilton. He would vote for that amendment, not as a lawyer, to show his unselfishness, but from a conviction of duty. He would not vote for it for the sake of vindicating the fair name of that ancient and honoured profession of which he was but a humble member; nor would he ever feel it necessary to vindicate the honour of that profession so long as its chief possessed the immeasurable talents and shining integrity possessed by the present Attorney-General of the Dominion. This was a larger question than one of self; it was one that affected the interests of the whole country; and, in casting his vote on this occasion, he rejoiced that he could not if he would, and would not if he could, give a vote which would be considered Provincial rather national in its character. He trusted hon. gentlemen would look at this question from a Dominion and not from a Provincial standpoint. He would not argue to show that an Insolvent Law could be framed which would be satisfactory to all the people of the country. Such a law could not be framed. They were not called upon to decide whether the Insolvent Law was a good or a bad law. His opinion was that it was an evil, but that it was a necessary evil; and that it was the least of two evils; and as such he intended to discuss the matter. That it was an evil to be without an Insolvent Law was evidenced by the arguments of those who favoured the amendment. The onus of proof lay upon those gentlemen who opposed the Bill. His experience was that the state of things before 1864, when the Insolvent Law was enacted, was eminently conducive to dishonesty and swindling. They were told that one of the effects of the Insolvent Law was that it was favourable to that kind of conduct. If this were the case, the same kind of conduct would be practised with impunity without the law. So much was this the case that, in 1864, a great many persons, with much wisdom, asked Parliament to place upon the Statute-book some law that would act as a check to these fraudulent operations. Even if the present law was defective, it would be better, before making any decided opposition or urging its repeal, to wait until the hon. the Minister of Justice brought down his proposed amendments. It was a significant fact that those gentlemen most interested in the law had spoken in favour of it. It was not in human nature to remain long under a grievance. If this country felt that the Insolvent Law was a grievance, that grievance would be fully set forth by petitions. Instead, however, of any petitions having been presented against the Act, all the representations from the public to the Government were in its favour. It would seem, from the remarks of some of the hon. members, that the Province of Quebec suffered somewhat from the operations of the Act. Quebec entered the Confederation as a man would enter into the marriage state—for better or for worse. If Quebec had more of the worse than the other Provinces, it ought to bear it if the law was to the advantage of the Dominion at large; and, even if there were any disadvantage, it was more than outweighed by the advantages of Confederation otherwise.

Mr. MOUSSEAU said that he would record his vote in favour of the motion of the hon. member for Richelieu, and, when the occasion presented itself, he would with pleasure vote with the hon. member for St. John for the complete repeal of the Insolvent Act. It had been stated that the merchants generally of Montreal, Toronto, Quebec and other places, did not desire the abrogation of this measure. The debate during this evening, as well as during previous evenings when it had come up, had concerned one, the commercial interest, and it had been intimated that the agricultural class and the artisans were at the mercy of these honourable gentlemen; and that the legislation of this country, year after year, was only calculated in the interests of commerce, of great speculators, and of the large importers of Montreal, Toronto, &c.; but he thought that the time had at length arrived when the House and country should understand that there were more classes than one—the mercantile class—in the Province of Quebec, in the Dominion of Canada, and in the world. There existed other important and numerous classes of great productive power, which made nations prosperous by means of their toil, though they often became the victims of other classes of society. The sole interests of commercial men were not at present in question, but those of the country in general. Hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House had established the fact that the present law had produced enormous disasters, from moral, commercial and social points of view. The very principle of the law was immoral, because its tendency was to allow debtors to pay their debts with nothing; and, day after day, it continued working moral, commercial, and social ruin. It was an exceptional measure, and it ought to be only resorted to in the event of an absolute necessity existing for its being brought into operation. He thought that such a necessity had for a long time past disappeared, and that it was now causing an immense and an incalculable amount of ruin, which could only be repaired after some ten or fifteen years of industry and economy. In fact, what were the consequences of the law? Statistics and figures had been laid before the House clearly proving the disastrous nature of its operations. It had been shown that a great number of bankrupts, perhaps nine out of ten, had paid such sums as five, ten and fifteen cents on the dollar; and more, in many instances which had occurred, in lieu of effecting reformation, this law had created great moral disasters, and men had become insolvent, not once only, but four or five times during the period of its operation. One of the causes leading to this unhappy result was perhaps due to the ease with which discharges were obtained. In the United States, such a measure had been introduced after the civil war; and, in this country, an irresistible desire for speculation, and for living beyond one's means, and for stock-jobbing was exhibited, such as had never been witnessed prior to its enactment; and men, as was done in New York, in Boston and other places over the border, aped a style entirely disproportionate to their actual resources. Another cause of insolvencies was this: a large number of young men, who lacked capital but did not longer wish to remain employés, aspired to be merchants, and their unfortunate inclinations in this respect were encouraged in consequence of the enormous importations that had taken place. The wholesale merchants of Montreal, Toronto, and other principal cities had imported perhaps ten times more than the country required, and what was the result? They sent their goods at any price to retailers not only in the cities, but in villages, even to the very outskirts of the settled portions of the country. And the consequence of such speculations, and of entry into business without either the requisite means or ability, had been a resort to the provisions of the Insolvency Act. Under such circumstances this was not surprising, and the losses thus incurred fell rather upon the banks and capitalists than upon the wholesale dealers. This law was not necessary for the honest debtor, who, to speak frankly, was always protected under the old law. The honest debtor was not compelled to fail; he was always aided by the banks when in difficulty, and supported by his excellent reputation. Commercial disasters and misfortunes had occurred before this measure was introduced in 1864, but they had been repaired. He perceived that several members were disposed to vote against the Bill of his hon. friend from Richelieu, and in favour of such a course they gave excellent, nay, superb, reasons. They admitted that they were not satisfied with the Act in its present state, but then they awaited the amendments foreshadowed by the Minister of Justice. These proposed amendments appeared very fine indeed, and before them the hon. member for Montreal West bowed in evident admiration. It was proposed to compel the insolvent debtor to pay fifty cents on the dollar, but, as had been remarked, when such a debtor could make such a payment and meet the claims of the assignee, and of people who preyed upon such estates, he was under no necessity of becoming bankrupt. He respectfully submitted that the country at the present time required the repeal of this law. If the commercial disasters which had occurred since 1864 were carefully studied, it would be seen that commercial honour and morality had since that period been considerably lowered, and he was convinced that this was due to this Act. The ease with which, under its operations, debtors obtained compositions and releases from the payment of just debts and the results of extravagant speculations, and, above all, the expectation, in imitation of the example shown in the United States, that, no matter how recklessly business was conducted, creditors and expenses could thus be readily paid had lowered seriously the standard of commercial honour; and, he therefore believed that the time had at length arrived when the law which had contributed to this demoralising state of things, should be offaced from the Statute-book. He would not dwell upon the losses due to the bad management of insolvent estates by assignees; this subject had been exhausted during the previous debate, but the mismanagement in question was undoubtedly frightful, and there seemed to be no way of remedying it; even the merchants themselves appeared incapable of suggesting any mode by which this could be done. He would not say that they were not prepared for a law modelled on the English and not ably on the French system; but still it must be admitted that an Insolvency Act provided excellent means for living at the expense of other people. He would quote the following appropriate remarks from the valuable work written on this subject by M. Bédarride, a distinguished French author:—

“This was, that at all periods of history, bankruptcy has given rise to the most odious speculations; that cupidity and unfaithfulness had regarded it only as a means of getting enriched to the detriment of public interest; that probity, up to this point the most exemplary, had not been able to continue before the future of misery, in the presence of which it found itself insolently thrown; and finally that interested solicitations, or that sentiments honourable in their origin, ably taken advantage of, concealed from the eyes of conscience the gravity of the acts which they determined.

“These frauds and these artifices, compromising the fate of creditors who were acting in good faith, were an extraordinary danger in business. The disturbance of confidence and the restriction of credit, which sprang from this state of things, could at least compromise, if they did not destroy, this first and most precious element of public prosperity.

“It was necessary at any price to remove this danger; and it was requisite to re-establish commerce on a sound foundation by means of an energetic and salutary protection, of a nature to weaken, if it did not absolutely remove the evil, by neutralizing its principal effects.

“The legislature of 1838 had not failed to do what the social interests required. The intervention of the public prosecutor a l'incertain, and his right to have, at any period, communication with the accounts, books and papers of the bankrupt, usefully controlled the reports, which the official assignee must address him, and presented an obstacle to influences calculated to relieve the bankrupt from the punishment which he merited.”

“More than thirty years had elapsed since the enactment of this law, and it could be said with truth, that these abuses, if they had not been completely uprooted, had at least become less prevalent. Sufficiently guarded, the public and the private interests had been able to protect and defend themselves, and justice had not failed them, even when she was obliged to take the initiative.”

He further stated that the destruction of confidence among men engaged in commercial pursuits of credit, which was the result of this Act, formed a very grave feature for anxious consideration. In the presence of almost daily bankruptcies, of failures often repeated by the same person, and of continual losses, although the coffers of banks were filled with money, and capitalists were extremely wealthy, the system of credit was disturbed to its very foundations. The law favoured trade conducted on a suicidal basis and dangerous speculations; these people who lived at the expense of others were destroying credit, and it was necessary under these deplorable circumstances to reassure those engaged in trade, and take steps which would lead to the restoration of confidence. His only object was to subserve the public interests. If a law could be framed which would not cause in this country the evils he had instanced, he would support it; but this was impossible. The country was not prepared for so severe an enactment as existed in other countries, and the House did not desire it. In France, legislation in this regard was severe, and the results were most admirable. In France the honest debtor possessed satisfactory guarantees; the books of the trader must there be carefully kept; they must show the precise causes of failure and misfortune; it must be proved where the money had gone—whether it had been absorbed in private expenses or in unfortunate speculations. Besides, rigorous precautions were taken to prevent fraud and wrong-doing. The books and papers of the bankrupt were taken possession of by public officers, and subjected to a rigid and scrupulous examination. After thirty years' experience, it could be truthfully said, that if commercial dishonesty had not been uprooted in that country it had been severely checked. Public and private interests were protected and defended, and justice did not fail to be done. If the House was ready and the country ripe for legislation of the same severe character, restraining commercial operations within the bounds of moderation, he would vote for it. He simply wanted to see the fraudulent debtor punished as he merited, and the honest debtor treated as he deserved. His hon. friend from West Northumberland had not looked at this question from a proper point of view, which was that of the general interests of the country; his hon. friend said it was strange that the people of the Province of Quebec and their representatives in Parliament should demand the abolition of this law; but he would inform his hon. friend that they did not make this demand more in their interests than in those of the other Provinces of the Dominion. They wished to see the law abolished, simply because it was useless and dangerous. His hon. friend the member for West Northumberland had not only fallen into a strange error with regard to their motives, but he had also committed another and a sufficiently serious mistake when he declared that the burden of proof fell on the shoulders of those who demanded the repeal of the law. He, however, offered with pleasure in this relation, the speeches made on this subject by his hon. friends from Richelieu and Stanstead. The proof required was complete, and it had been laid before the House. The same hon. gentlemen had invoked, he believed, the history of the past, declaring that, before the enactment of the Insolvency Act of 1864, great misfortunes had been inflicted on the country. He considered that this appeal was most ill-judged, because this country had never been really richer, happier or more prosperous than it was prior to that year. It was better to transact a little less business, and to have it transacted on a sound foundation. In reply to another observation made by the hon. member, he would say, it seemed to him that all the Provinces of the Dominion had made enough sacrifices in this regard; and he thought that the Province of Ontario was rich enough to submit to the sacrifice of seeing this law amended. The consequences entailed by the Act were ruinous and discreditable; and, nevertheless, it was argued that they must submit to it, because Ontario did not wish to amend the law, for the reason that such a step would exercise a disturbing influence. He would vote with pleasure for the repeal of the law.

Mr. LAFLAMME said he thought that the House, before it arrived at a determination to repeal this law, which regulated most of the transactions between creditors and debtors, should ascertain the exact position in which the country, and in particular the trading community, would be placed if such a step were taken. He regretted the fact that his hon. friend from Richelieu had not thought proper to present to the House equivalent substitutes for those portions of the law which were acknowledged as, and accepted to be, of essential benefit to the whole community. He understood, from the tenor of the arguments adduced on both sides of the House, that objections were confined to the working of the measure; but as to its principles, he failed to discover any serious or valid objection. The essential objects of the law were—first, to obtain, when a debtor became insolvent, the control of the estate for the benefit of the creditors concerned. The second object was to realize the proceeds of the estate in the most beneficial manner for those to whom it naturally belonged, viz.: the creditors. The third object was to see that the honest and unfortunate debtor obtained relief. The law, as it had been prepared, was made for these objects. No one would deny that the creditors had absolute control over the debtor's estate, and, if the assignees absorbed the estate for their own individual benefit, it was by reason of the neglect and absence of attention on the part of the creditors. Unless the law was made with very stringent provisions to force the creditor to attend to his own interests, this could not be remedied. As far as he understood the law, and had seen it worked, and as far as the intention of the promoters of it went, that intention was to leave the whole matter of the debtor's estate in the hands of the creditors. The official assignee was merely an individual who took possession of the estate, after the debtor had been declared insolvent. Some hon. gentlemen had objected to creditors having the power to force a man into insolvency who was really solvent. The law provided a speedy remedy in that case. If the party was not insolvent, and had enough to pay his debts, he could go before a judge, oppose the demand of his creditors to put him into insolvency, establish his solvency, and then remain under the ordinary course of law. Some of his hon. friends who had spoken seemed to have forgotten the principles which regulated the regulation of creditor and debtor in the Province of Quebec. The principle of their law was that, the moment a man had not sufficient to pay his debts, and satisfy the whole of his creditors, that moment he was insolvent, and his property became the pledge of the whole of his creditors. This was principle which had been established by the Insolvent Law for the whole Dominion. They did not require an Insolvent Law in the Province of Quebec to establish that principle. It was already there, and had always existed. He was really astonished to hear gentlemen belonging to the bar of Lower Canada complaining of the costs accompanying the procedure under this Insolvent Law. What was the condition of the merchant or creditor towards his debtor before the establishment of this Insolvent Law? Unfortunately, most of the ancient principles of the French law had been done away with—by practice, not by legislation. There was in France, before the cession of Canada, a provision which allowed the creditor to go to the judge and obtain an order or attachment in certain cases. This, by practice, not by positive enactment, had been removed, and, instead of that, the creditor had, before he could attach the property of a fraudulent debtor, to go before a Court and swear that his debtor was secreting and doing away with his estate. Then, if he could not substantiate his allegation, he was liable to damages, and had to take an action in the ordinary course of law to obtain his debt. This would be opposed by the debtor, who, by retaining an intelligent lawyer, might delay the case for a year. Pending this action, the debtor, being warned of the intention of his creditor to bring him to the hammer, would try to dispose of his property by some means, and when one creditor would take an action, the others would follow. He had some experience in commercial cases, and had known estates worth twenty shillings in the pound, which, after this process, would not yield enough to pay twenty shillings in the pound to the lawyers. There was not an action on a promissory note, where there was a contestation, that would not entail, without any appeal to a court of revision, expenses amounting to at least fifty pounds.

Mr. MITCHELL: Lawyers are a very bad lot.

Mr. LAFLAMME said everybody knew how, if there were twenty creditors who took action, the estate would be realized. The first judgment creditor would take an execution, and bring the whole chattel property to sale. It consisted of the man's stock, but it could not be sold in any place except where the man was trading. If he traded in a distant country part, the stock had to be sold there, yard by yard, and often there would be friends of the debtor to buy in the goods at a nominal price. Then the proceeds were brought into court, and every creditor was called upon, by advertisement in the Canada Gazette, and by notice at the church door, to file his claim. Every one of these claims was attended with a fee of $10 or $20, and, if contested, the contestation was equivalent to an action. Besides that, the most valuable of the debtor's estate consisted in his book debts. How could that be obtained for his creditors?

Mr. MITCHELL: Put it in the hands of the lawyer, and let him sue it.

Mr. LAFLAMME said that might be a benefit; but the only way of securing what was due to the creditors was by way of attachment or garnishing. The creditors had to take a writ of attachment in the case of every debtor of his debtor in order to force him to come to court and declare what amount he owed, and then he was forced by a judgment of the court to pay this amount over to the creditor.

The result was that, in most of the country districts, where the debts rarely exceeded $10 per head, the cost absorbed more than the amount to be seized by the creditor, and there was a dispersion of the creditors who would not take the trouble to wind up the concern. The debtor, therefore, tranquilly enjoyed the benefit of his debts, and lived by his creditors. It would, perhaps, be said that the debt remained, that the creditor had still his lien on the property. But the fact was that when the creditor could not obtain his discharge, his wife would take action for separation des biens, and no court would refuse, because the moment a man became insolvent the court was bound to give his wife this separation. The wife would then begin business, and the debtor would laugh at his creditors. If he was an honest debtor and wished to arrive at a settlement, the only way was to stop action on the part of the creditors, and he had always found an invariable disposition to treat the debtor fairly. But, even then, when there was a chance of bringing the whole matter to a satisfactory conclusion, a few debtors might say they would not accept, and the arrangement would fall through. This was the actual condition of things before the Insolvent Law came into operation. He was personally opposed to the introduction of the measure, but he came to the conclusion that it was necessary to give a more speedy remedy to the creditors, to allow them to attach the whole estate of the insolvent, and then to allow them to arrange the final settlement. If those two provisions had existed previously, there would have been no necessity for the law. This system was no new thing; it had existed in France for 300 years. A man who had been unfortunate in his business could go into court and make an absolute assignment of his possessions and claim a discharge. True, there was a kind of infamy attached to the proceeding. The debtor had to go into court with a green cap on, and to fall on his knees and beg relief from his creditors, and the disgrace of that prevented many from seeking release from their liabilities. The man also who compounded with his creditors now in France was disgraced, and could not occupy the same position in society as he did before. He was astonished that persons of common sense in other Provinces did not acknowledge the sound principle of the law, because, the moment a man became insolvent, he had to give a lien on his property which no longer, in point of equity, belonged to him. He could not see what objection hon. members from Quebec had to the law, particularly at this critical juncture of commercial affairs. It would be impolitic to repeal a law which regulated the position of a debtor towards his creditors in the present condition of the country. There were provisions in the law which were essential to the prosperity and morality of a commercial community. The provisions regarding fraud were not new. Under the old French law, a fraudulent debtor was liable to be imprisoned until he had satisfied his creditors. He admitted that that was too strict, and our law had fixed the largest term of imprisonment at two years. It would also be well to remember that there was no legal definition of commercial fraud outside the Insolvent Act. He would remind hon. members from Quebec that the commercial community they represented had advanced large quantities of goods all over the Dominion, and, the moment the law was repealed, the nearest creditor would take out judgment, and the estate would be fastened up until the demands were satisfied. That would be a very unsatisfactory condition of affairs, and would lead to hardships which could not exist under the Act, because then three, or four, or five creditors would be found who would be willing to try and resist the desires of all the other creditors. There was no case where three-fourths of the creditors agreed unanimously upon a composition which was not the best that could be done in the interest of all. His hon. friend said the law, as amended, would become a law entirely against the creditor.

Mr. COLBY: I was speaking of the law of 1869, which contained the voluntary assignment clause.

Mr. LAFLAMME said he begged his hon. friend's pardon. The present law left the whole thing in the hands of the creditors, with this advantage: that, if the debtor was not fraudulent, and could not afford to pay fifty cents in the dollar, three-fourths of the creditors would be able to give him his discharge.

Mr. COLBY: My understanding is that, in the proposition of the Minister of Justice, you are going from the Scylla of the law of 1869, to the Charybdis of the law as it will be with the general amendment fully in the interest of the creditor. I do not think either law is a law which can be worked.

Mr. LAFLAMME admitted that in many cases the wholesale merchant forced the goods upon the dealer. In that case, the debtor became more an agent of the wholesale merchant than his debtor; and consequently all that could be exacted from the debtor was to require him to show that he had fulfilled his agency and his trust with honesty, and that, having received the goods with a sort of compulsion on the part of the wholesale merchant, he had delivered them over to his purchasers, but had been unfortunate in the collection. Therefore, he was equitably entitled to more consideration than a man who borrowed £10 or £20 for the purpose of purchasing the necessaries of life. Although he was in principle opposed to any Insolvent Law, yet he believed this was an unfortunate time to repeal the present law. If his hon. friend from Richelieu, instead of bringing down a motion to totally and absolutely repeal the law, had substituted something, even the principles of the Civil Law in the Province of Quebec, then his motion might be supported. But, under the existing state of the country, a total repeal of the law would be disastrous. He did not believe there was an intelligent merchant in the community who would consent to the repeal of this law without some substitute being provided.

Mr. BARTHE: There is time enough for that. We do not know that we may not agree.

Mr. LAFLAMME: Let the hon. gentleman first show the principles he intends to substitute, and then we can compare them with the law.

Mr. BARTHE: If the hon. gentleman will vote for the repeal we will work together for a new Bill.

Mr. LAFLAMME: I would not like to leave the country in suspense. I want the amendment to be concomitant with the repeal.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario) said he had taken occasion to say that he thought the Act in different parts of the country was becoming very unpopular, and that there was a general desire that it should be repealed. While he made that statement, he had not hesitated to say that there was a great deal laid to the Act which was justly chargeable to other causes. He believed it was because the Act had been so frequently resorted to that year that it had become obnoxious. He agreed that an insolvent estate was entirely under the control of the debtors; but he suggested that there ought to be some more ready way of obtaining examinations of fraudulent creditors than that which existed. There was no difficulty in an honest debtor getting through all right; the trouble was in bringing the fact of fraud home to a fraudulent debtor without vexatious delay, trouble, and expense. While he would vote against the repeal of the Act, he did not think the amendment proposed by the Minister of Justice, as to the right of the creditors to exact 50 cents in the dollar before allowing a discharge, would be of any advantage. He said this upon the broad principle that creditors would not be hard upon the unfortunate but honest debtor, even though he could not pay 50 cents, while they would not be so willing to take 60 or even 75 cents from another debtor who attempted to get into insolvency from fraudulent motives. Another consideration was that, if a man went into the Insolvency Court when he was perfectly solvent, the expenses would be so great that he, perhaps, would not be able to pay more than 50 cents when he came out. He trusted that, with the revival of business, there would not be so many persons availing themselves of the Insolvency Law as there had been in the past.

Ordered, That the said Bill be read a second time this day four months.

House adjourned at

Twenty-five minutes after Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, 1st March, 1877.

The Speaker took the chair at Three o'clock.

THE CHARLEVOIX ELECTION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a certified copy of the judgment and decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in the Charlevoix contested election appeal case, declaring the election void.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved:

“That a writ do issue for a new election for the county of Charlevoix.”

Mr. BLAKE said the law provided that the Speaker should, at the earliest possible moment after receiving the certificate from the Court, give the necessary directions for the issue of a writ for a new election. If the Speaker delayed taking action, the House would still have the power to call upon him to obey the law; but it would be the better course to assume that the Speaker was about to execute the law and give him the opportunity of doing so, than to propose a motion as in the case of delay, until the delay had occurred.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he thought that, since the tribunal for the trial of election cases had been changed from the House or a Committee of the House to the Judges, in England the practice still obtained of proposing a motion for the issue of a writ when a vacancy occurred during a Session of Parliament. He thought the English practice was similar to that in Canada. It was desirable that the practice of submitting a motion for the issue of a writ should be continued, so that the House should still retain power over the issue of the writ.

Mr. HOLTON said in his view the House should retain all its powers in its own hands. The report of an Election Committee was just as conclusive as the judgment of the Supreme Court, and yet a motion had always been made. Sometimes the reports of Election Committees were accompanied by a statement regarding matters connected with the election which called for the intervention of the House. The House possessed precisely the same privilege with respect to the judgments of the Courts trying controverted elections as it had under the old law in respect to the reports of the Election Committees.

Mr. SPEAKER said there was a very wide distinction between the present state of things and that under the old law. Under the old law, Election Committees could only sit during the Session and their report could only be made while Parliament was in Session. He did not think that the old law required the Speaker of his own motion to issue the warrant, but it was left to the House in that case.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he would withdraw the motion, and he hoped Mr. Speaker would, under the terms of the Statute, proceed to issue his warrant for a new writ of election forthwith.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said that under the Election Act it was provided that, when a Judge reported that corrupt practices had prevailed, or there was reason to believe such had prevailed, then the Speaker was not to issue his order for a new writ save by order of the House. The right of the House to order the issue of the writ in that case was expressly reserved.

Mr. SPEAKER said he would order his warrant to issue.

Motion withdrawn.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that I have, in conformity with the Act 37 Victoria, chapter 10, section 36, issued my warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery for a new writ of election for the Electoral District of the County of Charlevoix.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 57) To authorize the Royal Canadian Insurance Company to reduce its capital stock, and for other purposes.—(Mr. Jetté.)

Bill (No. 58) To change the name of the Dominion Building Society to that of the City Mortgage Loan Company, and to change, amend, and in certain cases to increase the powers of the said Society.—(Mr. Ouimet.)

Bill (No. 59) To amend an Act incorporating the Union Life and Accident Insurance Company of Canada, and to change the name to the Union Insurance Company of Canada.—(Mr. Kirkpatrick.)

COMMERCIAL AGENCIES.

QUESTION.

Mr. BERNIER asked whether it was the intention of the Government to introduce a law during this Session to protect business men against false reports delivered by Commercial Agencies, which had the effect of injuring the credit of parties perfectly solvent.

Mr. BLAKE: It is not the intention of the Government during the present Session to propose any such measure.

QUEBEC AND LAKE ST. JOHN'S RAILWAY.

QUESTION.

Mr. THIBAUDEAU asked whether it was the intention of the Government, during this Session, to grant a sum of money in aid of the construction of the Quebec and Lake St. John's Railway.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The Government have not had the matter under consideration.

THE GRAND TRUNK STRIKE.

QUESTION.

Mr. SCRIVER asked whether, in view of the difficulties recently occurring between the Grand Trunk Railway Company and the Locomotive Engineers in their employ and the great injury to the public interest arising therefrom, it was the intention of the Government at the present Session to introduce any legislation having for its end the prevention of similar evils in future.

Mr. BLAKE: This very important subject has been under the consideration of the Government. I cannot see that there is any hope of preventing the evil by legislation; but it is in expectation to propose to the House some measure which may have for its end the prevention of some of the evils, or at any rate which would tend to their mitigation.

TWENTY CENT PIECES.

QUESTION.

Mr. CHEVAL asked whether the Government would be good enough to take into consideration whether the most expeditious mode of causing the twenty cents piece of money to disappear from circulation would not be to call it in and have it stamped as twenty-five cents, inasmuch as it would always be a real nuisance to the public.

Mr. SPEAKER: The questions are inconsistent with the rules of the House, which forbid debateable matter being introduced into a question. It is quite debateable whether twenty cent pieces are a nuisance or not.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: Some considerable time ago there was a Government order issued that, when any of these twenty cent pieces were paid in, they were not to be re-issued. I was not aware that there was any considerable amount of twenty cent pieces outside but I will cause further enquiry to be made on the subject.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES AMENDMENT BILL.

[BILL No. 7.]

(Mr. Bolduc.)

ORDER DISCHARGED.

Mr. VAIL said some arrangement had been made with the Minister of

Mr. MACKENZIE.

Inland Revenue that this Bill should be dropped.

Mr. BOLDUC moved that the order be discharged.

Order discharged and Bill withdrawn.

INSOLVENT ACT AMENDMENT
BILL.—[BILL No. 11.]

(Mr. Landerkin.)

ORDER DISCHARGED.

Mr. LANDERKIN said he had stated the preceding evening that he did not intend to proceed with this Bill; therefore he moved that the order be discharged.

Order discharged and Bill withdrawn.

INSOLVENT ACT AMENDMENT
BILL.—[BILL No. 15.]

(Mr. White, Renfrew.)

ORDER DISCHARGED.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew) said that his object in bringing this Bill before the House was to obtain such amendment to the Insolvent Act of 1875 as would make its provisions applicable to traders residing within the Judicial District of Nipissing, in which there was no official assignee, and no Judge having county jurisdiction, but nevertheless a number of traders, some of whom carried on an extensive business. These traders were subject to all the vicissitudes of their class, and he had presumed that, under the 14th section of the Act, an insolvent debtor residing in the district might make an assignment to the official assignee of the county of Renfrew upon demand being made upon him. It appeared, however, from a recent decision of the County Judge of the county of Renfrew, and also of one of the Superior Court Judges at Toronto, that a writ of attachment could not be obtained against an insolvent trader in this district if he refused to make an assignment under the Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I presume it would answer the purpose of the gentleman if such an amendment were inserted in the general Act amending the Insolvent Act.

Mr. WHITE: Certainly.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Then, if the Order be discharged, I will call the attention of the Minister of Justice to the matter.

Mr. WHITE: On that understanding, I move that the Order be discharged.

Order discharged, and Bill withdrawn.

ONTARIO PERMANENT BUILDING SOCIETIES BILL.

[BILL No. 21.]

(Mr. Hall.)

ORDER DISCHARGED.

Mr. HALL: I move that the Bill be read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Mr. MACKENZIE: This Bill, as I understand it, is simply and solely intended to facilitate the change of name on the part of these societies. I think it is probable that a clause might be introduced into the general Bill affecting Companies about to be incorporated or already incorporated under the general Stock Companies Act, which would accomplish the change the hon. gentleman desires.

Mr. BLAIN: I may say, with reference to this matter, that considerable difficulty has arisen regarding such changes of name. There are several Bills now before the House having this end in view, and I know of a Bill of this character which was passed last Session, sent up to the Senate and adopted. After it received the assent of the Governor-General, however, it was discovered that the name so authorized was identical with the name borne by another Company then doing business. It seems to me that some more convenient machinery should be devised for these purposes; and I think that the principle of this Bill might in some shape be adopted by the Government.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: That point has already attracted the attention of the Government, and a special clause is inserted in the Bill, which will be introduced in a day or two, guarding against that particular class of errors.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The Bill had better stand as dropped in the meantime.

Mr. HALL: I have no objection.

Order discharged.

PROTEST OF INLAND BILLS BILL.—[BILL No. 37.]

(Mr. Jones, Halifax.)

SECOND READING.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said he had explained, when he introduced this Bill, that he proposed submitting it to the Banking and Commerce Committee, in order that it might there be discussed. He therefore moved the second reading.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) said he had drawn the attention of the hon. member from Halifax to the first and, he believed, the only clause of the Bill, referring to the protesting of notes or bills of exchange. On this point, the wording did not seem to him to be sufficiently clear, inasmuch as it stated that, in the absence of a Notary Public, the Bill might be protested before a Justice of the Peace. He thought the wording of the clause was hardly sufficiently explicit. What did the hon. member mean by the absence of a Notary? Did it apply to cases in which no Notary lived in the county, city, village or place where a note happened to fall due and was not paid, or to be presented for acceptance and was not accepted? If the definition was not made more clear, he was perfectly satisfied that the fruit of the Bill would be a very considerable amount of litigation. He also considered that the Bill should be referred to a Committee of the Whole House, as it referred to matters of trade, particularly because the portion to which he had referred was so inexplicit and so ambiguous.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) explained that the Bill had been placed in his hands by bankers of Halifax, who had found themselves in the position of not being able to protest a note or bill of exchange at the expense of the defaulter. When it came before the Committee on Banking and Commerce, the hon. gentleman from Cape Breton could fully discuss the matter. His attention had already been drawn to the point to which the hon. gentleman had referred, and another hon. member had suggested that the clause might be so altered as to allow notes to be protested by a Notary Public or Justice of the Peace.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) said he was under the impression that, as the Bill related to trade and commerce, it could not properly be before the House until they were in Committee of the Whole. He saw that, under Section 41 of the Rules of the House, a Bill of this kind should be submitted to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. YOUNG said he thought the Bill should be referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee.

Mr. SPEAKER said the hon. member for Cape Breton had taken an objection, which, if valid, would be fatal to the Bill in the present stage. He did not think, however, that the objection was valid. Bills relating to banks, banking and insurance, and other Bills of this class, had not been held to be Bills affecting trade in the technical sense of the word, or in the sense in which it was used in the Rules of the House.

Mr. YOUNG: Do I understand that to be your decision?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes.

Mr. YOUNG said he would much prefer to have the Bill sent to the Banking and Commerce Committee, which was specially informed on questions of this kind, and to which, he was sure, no other Committee could be superior, it being under the able chairmanship of the hon. member from Chateauguay, for the consideration of clauses or measures of the description in question.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is laid down in May that the rule requiring Bills affecting trade to originate in Committee is held to apply not only to trade generally, but also to any particular trade. Bills respecting insurance and interest, for instance, are held not to come under the rule, and I believe the present Bill comes under the same category, and does not apply to a particular trade.

Bill read the second time.

Mr. JONES.

AMOUNTS CARRIED OVER BY ORDER IN COUNCIL.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. TUPPER moved for a return showing all amounts carried over by Orders in Council, at the end of the financial year, under the authority of Chapter 2 of the Act of last Session; with copies of the Orders in Council, and a statement of the amounts of such lapsed balances remaining unexpended at the end of three months from that date.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he would not object to the motion if a further clause were added. They had found that considerable amounts of unexpended balances brought forward by Order in Council had been expended, as far as could be discovered, without any Parliamentary authority. While this Government had been in office, it had sometimes been found necessary to use unexpended balances, but they had always asked the authority of Parliament therefor. He could discover no authority for the expenditure of two or three large sums in 1871 and 1872. He suggested the addition of the following words:—

“Together with a statement of all amounts carried forward by Orders in Council from the 1st July, 1867, showing the sums actually expended in each case and the Parliamentary authority sanctioning the same.”

He had not consulted the Minister of Justice on the point, but if, as he supposed, the expenditure of money in this way was a crime or misdemeanor, perhaps the hon. gentleman opposite would think it necessary to obtain an Act of Indemnity therefor.

Mr. TUPPER said he had no objection to the amendment proposed by the hon. the Minister of Finance. He was prepared to enter upon the discussion of the question of expending public money without Parliamentary authority at any time the hon. gentleman pleased.

Motion as amended, agreed to, as follows:—

Resolved, That an Order of the House do issue to the proper officer for a Return showing all amounts carried over by Orders in Council, at the end of the financial year, under the authority of Chapter 2 of the Act of last Session; with copies of the Orders in Council, and a statement of the amounts of such lapsed balances remaining unexpended at the end of three months from that date, together with a statement of all amounts carried forward by Orders in Council from 1st July, 1867, showing the sums actually expended in each case, and the Parliamentary authority sanctioning the same.

APPOINTMENT OF SENATORS.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. MASSON moved for copies of all correspondence between the Dominion and the Imperial Governments from the month of October, 1873, to 31st December, 1874, relating to the appointment of Senators for the Dominion. He said his intention in making this motion was to draw the attention of the House to a very serious matter which had created no small excitement and surprise in the country. It was well known that during His Excellency the Governor-General's visit to British Columbia last summer there existed in that Province a deep-felt sentiment of dissatisfaction and bad feeling towards Canada on account of some alleged bad faith. That discontent had assumed such proportions that his Excellency thought it proper to interfere; and he most generously exposed himself to misunderstandings in order to allay the dissatisfaction which was threatening to become serious. They all knew that his Excellency's intention was to put Canada right with British Columbia.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman will be careful in that connection.

Mr. MASSON said he would be careful, and Mr. Speaker would have no reason to call him to order. His Excellency could evidently not remove the ill-feeling which existed without pledging himself as to the good faith of his own Ministers, hoping no doubt that, if British Columbians, on account of some extraordinary or unaccountable circumstances, could not extend full confidence to the Ministers, they would place confidence in himself. The great difficulty which stood in the way of those who pretended the Government was guiltless in this matter was the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Bill in the Senate. The general impression in the Province was that the Government had not done what they could to carry that measure, which the hon. the Premier himself had proposed as an equivalent or compensation for delays in the construction of the Pacific Railway. His Excellency evidently desired to remove that feeling, and he did so by an unexpected declaration, which, having been printed in every paper in the Dominion, had become public property, and which, according to the rules of Parliament and constitutional rules, he was entitled to read to the House. Referring to the defeat of the Bill, His Excellency said:

"I saw Mr. Mackenzie the next day, and I have seldom seen a man more annoyed or disconcerted than he was. Indeed he was driven in that interview to protest with more warmth than he has ever used against the decision of the English Government which had refused, on the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, to allow him to add to the numbers of the Senate. When, soon after his accession to office, Prince Edward Island had entered Confederation, 'Had I been permitted,' he said to me, 'to have exercised my right in that respect this would not have happened, but how could these mischances be prevented in a body, the majority of which, having been nominated by my political opponents, is naturally hostile to me.'"

His intention in making the motion was also to obtain the reasons which induced the Government to make this extraordinary demand for more Senators. When he made use of those words "extraordinary demand," he was employing a mild expression, for it was a most unprecedented, a most unaccountable demand to ask power to increase the Senate at a time when it was not required. He also wanted to know what could have been the motives of the Imperial Government in refusing to accede to the request, whether it was considered in England that the hon. the Prime Minister had no right to make the demand, or whether it was thought that the request was improper and should not be granted. If they admitted the right, which, according to the law, they must, of the hon. the Premier to ask an increase in the number of Senators on his own responsibility, it was surprising that the requisite authority should not have been conferred upon him, unless the reasons he had suggested had actuated the Home Office in their refusal. In England, increasing the number of Peers was a serious question, and statesmen, even in times of great difficulty, were always chary about elevating persons to the House of Lords; they found it preferable to forego their right of adding to the numbers of that House in times of emergency, and they would rather have their proposed legislation fall through than do anything which would be contrary to the dignity or independence of the House of Peers. If that reluctance existed in England, where the constitution allowed the number to be increased to an unlimited extent, there was more reason for it to be displayed in Canada, since the Act of Confederation limited the increase of Senators to six. The intention of the legislators was that, in cases of great crises, the Crown would, under the recommendation of their constitutional advisers, appoint no more than six Senators; and, at the time of the passage of the Act of Confederation, it was contended the Crown should not have the right to swamp the Senate or to reverse its decision by appointing a number of men in accord with the House of Commons. No less an authority than the hon. the President of the Council had written an able book on that subject, in which he upheld the position that the provision of the law was a wise one, inasmuch as it prevented the Government of the day from increasing the number of the Senate to bring it in accord with their views. That hon. gentleman said in his work:

“ On nous répondra sans doute : mais le nombre des pairs n'est pas fixé et le souverain peut l'augmenter à volonté. Cela est vrai en théorie, mais ne l'est pas également dans la pratique. Le souverain fait monter à la Chambre des Pairs les hommes qui, pour des services rendus à la nation, ont mérité des récompenses exceptionnelles, et non pour y submerger la volonté de la majorité, paralyser la libre action et anéantir la dignité et l'utilité de ce corps si important et si nécessaire dans la constitution.”

What reason had the hon. Premier to suppose that he should require an increase in the Senate? What reason had he to believe that the Senate would be hostile to him? The fact that the hon. gentleman had deemed it necessary to apply for such power was a slight on that hon. body. The hon. gentleman should have known that the Senate was composed of men who knew their duty towards their country and would not offer any factious opposition to measures calculated to benefit the Dominion. Yet the hon. gentleman tried, by his action in this regard, to make the people believe that the Government could not expect fair play from the other House. Complaint was made by the hon. gentleman that the Senate was chiefly composed of his political opponents. That was a consequence of the Constitution which the hon. gentleman and his friends accepted; but he would remark that the Constitution practically carried with it the remedy for that evil. Those who framed the Constitution saw very well that on account of appointments or death the Senate would be continually renewed, and that no political party could be in the majority any considerable time unless it altered the membership of the Chamber according to its wishes. Since Confederation, 40 members had been appointed, and since the hon. Premier had been in power, only three years, from twelve to fourteen of this number had entered the Chamber. The hon. gentleman should have remembered that, in the natural course of events, he would have had a chance to renew the Senators in accordance with his views and opinions. The hon. gentlemen said that, if he had been allowed to increase the number of Senators, that unfortunate event, the defeat of the Nanaimo and Esquimalt Railway Bill, would not have occurred. He thought the hon. gentleman was mistaken. If he had received the authority for which he applied, he would probably have appointed men holding the views of the hon. the Ministers of Justice and the Interior, and they would have helped to throw out the Bill. Did the hon. gentleman think if he could not control those hon. members in the House he would be able to do it in the Senate, where it was admitted the Government had not so much power as in this House? There was no ground at all for the hon. the Premier to reproach the Imperial Government and say that the Carnarvon terms would have been accepted had they granted his request. It was impossible for the hon. gentleman to pre-judge in such a matter. When it was not necessary to augment the number of Senators, when there was no important question before the country in regard to which it was necessary to have the two Houses in accord, the increase was asked for; but when it was the duty of the Government, in order to preserve the Carnarvon terms, in order to allay the dissatisfaction in British Columbia, in order to have carried out those measure which would have brought peace and tranquility to the Dominion, the hon. gentleman failed in his duty by not asking for the increase. He thought the hon. gentleman had an account to render to the country in this respect.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I have no objection to the adoption of the motion. I will not follow the example of the hon. gentleman and discuss the speech to which he refers, nor do I care a great deal when he asserts in a dogmatic manner what was or what was not my duty. The hon. gentleman has his opinion as to what my duty was, and he has expressed it, but I am not bound to act on it or accept it. I conceive it to be my duty to make this remark—that what I did was within the limits of the law upon my responsibility as a Minister. I accept the responsibility, and am quite willing to render the account to the country or to the House, which the hon gentleman says I must do.

Mr. TUPPER: I have no intention of prolonging this debate, but I take this opportunity to ask the First Minister whether the speech of His Excellency in British Columbia was not reported incorrectly in relation to a very important point, because there is an evident anachronism that requires to be explained. The report of the speech as it appeared, I think, in all the leading journals of the Dominion was to this effect,—that the First Minister had expressed very great annoyance at what had taken place in regard to the rejection of the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Bill; that he had stated on that occasion that if he had been permitted to add to the number of the Senate, as he was entitled to do upon the admission of Prince Edward Island into the Union, this would not have happened. As Prince Edward Island was admitted into the Union and the Senators of that Island were appointed previous to the hon. gentleman coming into power it was quite impossible he could have been deprived of the exercise of that power in connection with the Senatorial appointments which had been made at a previous time in accordance with the terms of Union. I direct the Premier's attention to what seems to be an inaccuracy, and give him the opportunity to explain.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Surely the hon. member for Cumberland does not expect me to explain the speech to which he has referred. I have no cognizance of the correctness or incorrectness of the report, and am not responsible for anything in it. I have no explanation to give respecting it, and until the hon. gentleman mentioned it I had no recollection of the matter referred to. I am unable to say anything in regard to it. It is quite clear, however, there is an inaccuracy.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I concur with the hon. gentleman that he cannot be responsible for the speech of another individual when he does not know of it. He is, however, responsible for every utterance of the Governor-General, except when that illustrious individual expressly states that what he states he says as an Imperial officer by Imperial command. It is important that that principle should be laid down if we are to be a free country. If responsible government is to be maintained, this principle should be strictly upheld, and I am surprised to hear an hon. gentleman, occupying the position of Premier of this Dominion, who boasts that not only is the country under responsible government, but that its Constitution is moulded after the same plan, and on the same line as the British Constitution, should aver that he is not responsible for the language of the illustrious individual who so worthily represents the Crown in this country. I remember when the doctrine was propounded long ago by the old Tories of Upper Canada, it was denounced by the whole of the Liberal party of Lower Canada, and it was after a long and severe battle fought by the Baldwin Reformers of those days that constitutional and responsible government was obtained. There have been a great many fights between the old Tory party before it took the name of Conservative, and the Reform party, comprising the Liberals of Upper Canada, as to which deserved most merit for very many great reforms and changes; but there is one question in which the old Tory party has no right to claim any share, viz., the victory won by the Baldwin Reformers over the Crown Colony system. That victory was consummated under Lord Sydenham, in September, 1841, when it was decided that thereafter the Government of Canada was to be a responsible Government, and that everything connected with the public welfare, whether legislative or administrative, should be done only on the advice of responsible Ministers and advisers. This is the first occasion since 1841 that I have heard this doctrine denied and repudiated by the leader of what was the great Reform party. The representatives of the Crown can have no more rights in Canada than the Crown itself, and the Crown could not make any utterances on public affairs for which some Minister would not be responsible. Some Minister must be responsible for every announcement, every statement, every opinion expressed by the Sovereign, and, if that principle is once abandoned, then we shall return to the old system so much decried, and for which the old official party, both in Upper and Lower Canada, were attacked, and properly attacked.

Mr. MILLS: In November, 1873, a despatch came here which the right hon. gentleman repudiated.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: What despatch do you mean?

Mr. MILLS: The despatch of His Excellency the Governor General to the Colonial Secretary.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Oh, yes; but the hon. gentleman cannot make any comparison between that case and this. The Governor General in the capacity of an Imperial officer can write to the Colonial Office what he pleases; he can carry on a confidential or a private correspondence.

Mr. MILLS: But that despatch was brought before Parliament.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: He can communicate to the Colonial office what he pleases. The Ministry cannot know, and have no right to ask, what the Governor-General may write to Lord Carnarvon; but there are no utterances and no action in relation to the Government of this country which can be said or done except under the responsible advice of his Ministers. It will be remembered, for it is a matter of recent occurrence, that Mr. Lowe, a Privy Councillor, an ex-Member of the Ministry, took occasion to say that Mr. Disraeli had yielded to the personal request of the Sovereign in carrying the Bill declaring her to be Empress of India, when two previous Prime Ministers had refused to introduce the Bill. It will be remembered that Her Majesty, in order to vindicate the personal honour and position of Mr. Disraeli, now Lord Beaconsfield, was obliged to give him authority to state that the statement was utterly untrue, and one of the grave charges brought against Mr. Lowe by the press and in Parliament was this, that the Sovereign had been forced, in consequence of the charge he made, to speak personally, to remove the veil that hung between her and her people as regards her personal opinion, and to force her to make a declaration which was not on the personal responsibility of the Ministry and which was bringing her in person before the public. I therefore say that the statement of the hon. the Premier is an infraction of the great principle of responsible government. I hold that the Governor-General can write to the Imperial Government as an Imperial officer what he pleases; can send to the House what he pleases, if he takes the position of an Imperial officer under instructions from the Home Government. As a dependency of the British Empire, we have to hear what he says and pay respect to his utterances when he announces them as coming from the Imperial Government; but we are not bound by them; we may dispute them or we may yield to them. We may concede all that is asked, or we may refuse. We may disagree with Her Majesty's Government, or we may meet the requirements of the Government in regard to a matter of policy. But that is very different to the statement that hon. gentlemen opposite are not responsible for the utterances of the Governor General in his capacity as a constitutional Governor. So much are Her Majesty's Ministers in England responsible for the utterances of the Sovereign, that a member of her Cabinet is always with her, whether she goes to Balmoral, France, or the Isle of Wight, so that no question affecting the public weal, or the exercise of her power or prerogative as a Sovereign could be answered by her, except on the responsibility of one of her advisers. That is the principle which we acknowledge. We boast that our Constitution is based on the British Constitution, and that we have the same constitutional privileges, and that we are as free as our fellow-subjects in England. We have the right to believe that every utterance on public matters by the Governor General is held to be, and must be held to be, an utterance for which the Ministers are responsible, and we have no right to say or believe that any such utterance is made by him except upon the advice of his Ministers. If it should happen that the representative of the Sovereign should do here what the Sovereign would never do in England, namely, make a declaration for which his Minister were not responsible, then they had a plain duty to perform, to state that they would not be responsible for the statement, that they did not sanction it, and that it was made without their advice and they must take the constitutional privilege of relieving themselves of the responsibility. I will not say a word with respect to the motion, which is one for papers. I have no doubt that the papers when brought down will disclose the reason why the hon. the Premier urged that additions should be made to the Senate. It is rather a strong measure and it may be justified in the papers, though I have exercised my ingenuity to find a justification for it and have failed. I understand that in another place these papers have been promised, so that we will get them down in a few days, and then we will be able to judge whether there were sufficient grounds to take that strong measure, which, at the first blush, appears to be an attempt to affect the independence of a co-ordinate branch of the Legislature.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The right hon. member for Kingston has entered with some warmth into the defence of the principle which he has spent his life in denouncing, and he has grown earnest in vindicating a principle which is not violated. The right hon. gentleman ventures to attack me because I said I was not responsible for the accuracy or inaccuracy of the statement in that speech. Does the right hon. gentleman intend that I must be held responsible for what the hon. member for Cumberland has called an anachronism? I admit the responsibility of the Ministers for every utterance made by the Governor-General respecting public affairs, or which has any bearing on public affairs, but I do not believe that either Her Majesty in England or her Representative here, is bound in every word or sentiment uttered to consult the Ministers or to have the Ministers at hand always to consult. I do not admit that. It is stretching the doctrine far beyond what any Reformer ever ventured to state. The Ministers are responsible for everything that affects the conduct of public affairs just as the right hon. member for Kingston was responsible for every despatch he brought down by order of His Excellency. It was the duty of the hon. gentleman to bring the despatches down, and, if he thought they should not have been brought down to Parliament, he should have resigned rather than have done so. But, having brought these messages down, he made himself responsible for the Act. The statement I made was that I was responsible for any inaccuracies in the Governor General's speech, that I was not responsible for any utterance in it of the nature referred to by the hon. member for Cumberland.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: You said "I cannot be responsible for the utterances of another individual."

Mr. MACKENZIE: I say that yet—responsible for the utterances of another individual on matters not affecting State affairs. My statement was with reference to the anachronism which the hon. member for Cumberland has pointed out. There is a continuous effort made by hon. gentlemen opposite to strain everything and to make it appear in the worst possible light. They will accept no statement, no explanation. A false colouring must be given to every statement made. This is the constant habit of some hon. gentlemen opposite, in criticising any statement. To prevent any possible misconception, I repeat that I believe now, and have always believed, that the Ministers must necessarily be responsible for every utterance coming from the Governor General, affecting public affairs. I mentioned that I was not responsible for the inaccuracies referred to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. the Premier has made the usual attempt to say "you are another." I am surprised that he has ventured to state that I have been vindicating a principle which I have spent the principal part of my life in opposing. The hon. gentleman ought to have reflected before he made that statement, and, if he had looked at history, he would have found that the question of responsible government was settled in 1841. I entered Parliament in 1844, and took office in 1847 as the responsible adviser of the Crown, and ever since that time the principle of responsible government has never been disputed, and I think it is as safe in our hands as in those of hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. the Premier has stated that the Government must be responsible for every Message sent to this House by the Governor General. I can fancy a case, and probably such a case as has arisen in Lower Canada, when a Minister of the Crown would feel it his duty to bring down a Message from His Excellency sending a despatch from the Colonial Office and move that the policy pointed out in that despatch was injurious to the best interests of Canada. I can quite fancy that such a course might be taken. His Excellency had the right to send to the House any communication from the Imperial Government, but the Ministry and the Parliament must deal with it according to the best interests of the Dominion.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he presumed the hon. gentleman opposite was as responsible for his actions before he went into Parliament as he was after. He was sure there was no more zealous supporter of the usurpation by Lord Metcalfe than the hon. gentleman, both in Parliament and out.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said, respecting the course Lord Metcalfe took, he believed the principles of responsible government were as much infringed upon by those who attacked his policy as by those who supported it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Of course you do; and consistently.

Mr. BOWELL said a short time ago the Government disavowed any responsibility in connection with the repleves of those who had been convicted of a certain crime in the North-West. Judging from the despatches, they were cognizant of everything going on, but they assumed no responsibility, and throw the whole responsibility upon the Representative of Her Majesty. Yet they brought down the papers in the blue books and placed them before Parliament, and the House was now to understand that the Government avowed responsibility in the matter. If the principle was good in the case referred to by the hon. gentleman, it must be good in reference to the point under discussion. One thing was evidenced, and that was, that the policy of the Government was on this occasion, as on all others, suited to the circumstances which might arise at any time.

Motion agreed to.

QUEBEC GRAVING DOCK.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. BLANCHET moved for the Report of Engineers and other documents relating to the proposed Graving-dock at Quebec. He said his object was to ascertain what progress had been made in the selection of the site. He hoped that the Minister of Public Works would not blame him for making the motion, as the Graving-dock was not only of interest to Quebec, but to the whole Dominion. He did not wish to say anything for the purpose of affecting the decision of the Government, as the selection of the site would depend upon scientific reports made by competent engineers. If the hon. the Minister of Public Works asked for delay or said that the present was not a proper time to give the information, he was ready to withdraw his motion.

Mr. CARON said he did not agree with his hon. friend, the mover, as to the site of the proposed Graving-dock, but he was happy, nevertheless, to second the motion. He was not surprised that the question had come up this Session, and he would not be surprised if it were brought up again next year. Last year he had stated that the question had been used as a political engine to influence the election. Since that time nothing had happened to change his views, except by way of confirmation. The question was used as a political engine in the district of Quebec, but more particularly in the city of Quebec and county of Levis. Whenever an election took place on the Levis side, it was urged that, if a Government candidate were elected, the Graving-dock would be placed on that side; and, when an election was held in Quebec, across the river, the same kind of argument was used. This was not a question which affected Quebec alone; it was of such commercial magnitude that it interested the whole country. He thought it time that the matter was decided, and the work was proceeded with. As far as he was concerned, he had always tried to treat the question as one affecting the whole Dominion, as one of national importance, but its importance was diminished when it was made a party affair.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman might have knowledge that the question was used as a political engine, but he himself had not. He was aware of no person who had used the question in that way. He was not aware of any delay in coming to a conclusion which could possibly be avoided. He stated last Session that the matter would be referred to the Chief Engineer or to some engineers. It was submitted early last season for the consideration of Mr. Page, the Chief Engineer of the Department of Public Works. In reply to an Order of the House that gentleman had made a report, but a further report was necessary. If his hon. friend from Bellechasse looked at the information published in 1864, he would find that it was absolutely necessary in coming to a conclusion that the Government should have plans, specifications, the contract and other particulars regarding the proposed dock. The change of size entered materially into the question of whether it was possible to locate it in the St. Charles River or not. The engineers who had examined the harbour and made plans, now about being executed under the Harbour Commissioners, expressed an opinion that, in a commercial sense, it would be better to have the dock located in the harbour, that was, in the St. Charles River. But they also expressed the opinion that it would be more cheaply constructed at another point on the other side of the river, there being a difference in cost of £20,000 between the two sides. It rested with the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to recommend the adoption of a site. Of course, they had no personal knowledge of the ground, nor that scientific knowledge which would enable them to give an opinion of their own. They had, therefore, to depend upon the opinions of those who were capable, from their position, education, and acquirements, to give a valuable opinion, and upon that opinion, of course, the Government would act. In a few days it was expected that some further information would be presented to the House. His hon. friend from Quebec East informed him the other day that the engineer in charge of the works had arrived in Quebec, and it was expected that all the documents requisite to enable the Government to come to a decision would shortly be ready. He was not able to bring down the one report that had been made, because it had been submitted to the examination of another engineer, with the view of ascertaining whether he concurred in the view expressed by the first. At the present he must ask the hon. member for Bellechasse to withdraw his motion because it would serve no purpose to have it passed. He could not bring down the report now, but he could assure the hon. gentleman that from the very first moment the existing Government had taken the matter in hand until the present time, they had lost no time in trying to arrive at a decision. He did not admit that this was a Quebec question at all. It was a question affecting the shipping of the whole country; and he denied the right of the hon. gentleman from Quebec or those residing there to appropriate it to themselves.

Mr. CARON: We do not assume to do so.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is a question of vast general interest, and any Government that would, for party purposes, or for the purpose of mortifying an individual, take a wrong step in this matter, would be subject to the just censure of the House and the country.

Mr. CAUCHON said, as something had been said in reference to the election in Quebec Centre, he wished to state that there was not one word of truth in the assertion that the question of the Graving-dock at Quebec had been used for political purposes. His opponent had sent him a programme requesting that he should promise that the Graving-dock should be in the River St. Charles; but he refused to make any such promise. At all public meetings which he attended, he distinctly refused to make any promise on the subject. The electors were to decide as to the merits of the candidates,—on the merits of the politics. He had not uttered one word by way of promise—not even insinuated one. Of course as a representative of Quebec he had always been desirous that the work should be constructed there; and he was still so desirous, if it was consistent with the interests of the country, and nobody could blame him for that. He could, however, understand why hon. gentlemen opposite wished to place him in a false position.

Mr. CARON said this was a personal matter, and he hoped he would be allowed to make some explanation. He had not mentioned nor referred to an election in Quebec Centre; but he was not surprised that his hon. friend should immediately think of that election. To use an expression which was occasionally used in the House, he must say that he was perfectly amazed at what the hon. the President of the Council had said.

Mr. CAUCHON: I would like to know whether this is an explanation. If it is not, I should like to reply.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is not in order; of course he has a right to make an explanation, but nothing else.

Mr. CARON: My explanation bears upon this point. The President of the Council has stated that it was unfounded in fact that this question of the Graving-dock had been used in a political way in the election in Quebec Centre.

Mr. CAUCHON: I object to that unless discussion is to go on. That is not a question of privilege.

Mr. CARON: I did not say it was in Quebec Centre.

Mr. SPEAKER: The explanation ends there.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the chair.

After Recess.

Mr. MASSON moved the adjournment of the debate, as the President of the Council was not present in his seat, and as a question of veracity had arisen with the hon. member from Quebec.

Motion to adjourn debate agreed to.

PILOTAGE AUTHORITIES.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton) moved for a copy of returns from Pilotage Authorities for the year 1876—showing the names of all Pilots, and the amount paid to each; also the amount paid to the secretaries of the different Pilotage Authorities from Pilotage funds, also balance at credit of Pilotage Authorities on January 1st, 1877, where deposited, and what rate of interest, also copy of rules and regulations of the said Pilotage Authorities.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said he had no objection to furnishing the desired information. His hon. friend would, however, find a very considerable portion of it in the departmental report which had been laid before the House. If his hon. friend would state precisely what he wanted, he would very gladly meet his wishes, but to provide all the motion included would entail an amount of labour and expense which he did not think it desirable to incur.

Mr. McDONALD said he was quite satisfied with the reply of the hon. gentleman so far as obtaining information from the blue-books before the House was concerned. The statement he particularly desired referred to the Board of Pilot Commissioners for the county he represented. The pilots of this county had for a long time made complaints to him with respect to the distribution of pilotage money, and his object in making the motion was to ascertain the names of all the pilots in that district, and the amounts paid them by the Board of Pilot Commissioners, in order that he might see what the pilots' grievances really were.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said he would comply with the hon. gentleman's request.

Mr. SPEAKER said that, in this case, the motion should be so amended as to refer solely to the county of Cape Breton. An order of the House should not issue, and then be in part disregarded.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland): I and my hon. friend can easily agree as to the motion.

Motion agreed to.

THE STEAMER "NORTHERN LIGHT."

Mr. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.) moved for a return showing the total amount of cost of the steamer "Northern Light;" also a detailed account of any and all expenditure in connection with the said steamer up to 31st January last.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland): I have no objection to the motion. I presume that my hon. friend does not want the total amount of expenditure, but the cost of the boat and the expenses incurred regarding it.

Motion agreed to.

THE COAL INTEREST.

MOTION TO REFER PETITION.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) moved:

"That the petition of Henry Mitchell and others be referred to a Select Committee composed of Messrs. MacGregor, Norris, Flynn, Campbell (Victoria), Power, Robinson, Tupper, Fraser, Workman, McDonald (Toronto), and the mover, and that the said Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records; and report from time to time."

He also begged leave to amend the motion by placing the hon. member for Hants on the Committee. He said he did not think it desirable to make any lengthened remarks on the subject-matter of the petition, because, if the Order was granted, considerable light, which he was not then in a position to bring to the notice of the House, would be thrown on the subject. Still, inasmuch as the granting of the motion was a matter of grace, he felt it desirable to say something in connection with the most important subject of which the petition treated. He did not think that the coal interests of the Dominion had received at the hands of the House that attention which their magnitude warranted, though it seemed to him that on a great many other interests of very much less magnitude, a very considerable amount of attention had been bestowed. Every now and then applications were presented to refer to Select Committees matters relating to the agricultural interests, the lumber interests and also, he believed, the fishing interests. But this was the first time since Confederation that it had been proposed to submit the coal interests of the Dominion to the consideration of a Select Committee. The necessity of enquiring into the exact position of the coal trade of the Dominion was pressing itself very strongly on the notice of the House and of the country, and when they remembered that one of the most important industries in the mother country was that relating to the mining of coals, that the basis of her prosperity, to a large extent, if not entirely, was dependent on the development of her mineral resources, and that in no portion of the Dominion, save in Nova Scotia, and near the Pacific Coast, did there exist any quantities of coal, they could readily conceive that a very considerable degree of attention should be given to this important interest, not only by the Government, but also by the House generally. The people of Nova Scotia were deeply concerned at the manner in which the House took this question into consideration. It was, he believed, pretty well known, that of the 1,260,000 tons of shipping owned in the Dominion, over half a million of tons belonged to the Province of Nova Scotia, and, as the coal and shipping interests were very closely related, the former could not be disturbed without also affecting to a very great extent the other. Our shipping interests depended largely for support on our lumber and fishing resources, but to a still greater extent on the coal trade. Nova Scotia possessed coal fields 120 miles square in extent, containing 15,000,000 tons of coal, and, when it was remembered that in this country coal was not a luxury but a necessity, it must be admitted that this interest in its depressed state should engage the serious attention of the House as well as everything concerning its future prospects and prosperity. The Provinces of Ontario and Quebec were entirely dependent on a foreign country—the United States—for their supply of this article, which was absolutely necessary for the comforts and to supply the wants of their people, and it seemed to him that, under present circumstances, this House should see what steps should be taken for the purpose of enabling the Dominion to obtain within its boundaries an article so essential to the country. A great falling off had taken place in the quantities of coal mined and exported from Nova Scotia to the United States, and he thought it desirable to enquire into the cause of this state of things; and, if it were possible, the House should do something in order to revive the coal trade, which was in such a languishing state. For instance, in 1865, they had exported from Nova Scotia 465,194 tons of coal to the United States, and in 1876, this quantity had been reduced to 95,168 tons. On the other hand, in 1871, the Dominion imported from the United States 263,355 tons of coal, and in 1876, 595,480 tons, showing that, as the Nova Scotia exports of coal had decreased, the coal imports of the Dominion had increased. It appeared that the policy on the other side of the line was to exclude our coals from the United States markets, while a successful effort had been made by the Americans to open every Province in the Dominion to their exports; moreover, not satisfied with placing a duty of 75 cents per ton on the coal we sent to the United States, they also offered a drawback of $1.30 per ton on all coal shipped from West Virginia to Baltimore, and from Baltimore to the Eastern States purposely to exclude us from their markets. The importance of our coal fields was very well illustrated by a report made by Mr. Randal, an American Consul, who had been in Canada, to the American Secretary, to the Treasurer, in which he stated, after dilating very fully on the vast resources of the island of Cape Breton:—

“The rich coal deposits of Cape Breton occupy not less than 120 square miles containing available seams for the working of bituminous coal of the best quality. The extensive and varied fisheries; the rich deposits of the finest coal, with the best iron ore, the superior quality of the timber and extraordinary facilities and conveniences for shipbuilding; the same advantage of inland navigation, bordered by good land for agricultural purposes; the existence also of abundant salt springs, lofty cliffs of the best gypsum and the finest building stone of all kinds; with the geographical situation of the island as the key of the St. Lawrence, and the position which commands the entire commerce and fisheries of the north-eastern portion of North America—all combine to render Cape Breton one of the most important and most desirable possessions of British North America.”

He might mention that, during the year 1873, \$120,000 was the average monthly payment to the persons employed in connection with the coal mines of Nova Scotia; and he found that, during the past year, the number of people so employed was 500 less than during any previous time since 1873. This industry was, in his opinion, more unjustly treated than any other industry in the Dominion. Almost every other interest was protected, or at any rate looked after, or concessions made to it; but, when the coal question came up, it almost seemed to him as if there was a determination shown on the part not only of this Government, but also of the previous Administration, to stamp it out of existence. The Local Government of Nova Scotia collected a royalty of ten cents per ton on all coal mined and exported; almost every article that was consumed by the coal miners was taxed  $17\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., whilst the distilleries and tobacco manufacturers of this country were protected; while the boot and shoe trade, and the lumber, fishing and shipping interests were more or less considered in the same relation, the coal trade bearing more than its share of the burthens of the state. He could not understand how it was that articles which entered into the building of ships were admitted at 5 per cent. or 10 per cent., and in some instances free, and that an apparently hostile discriminating policy should exist against the mining interests of the country. Wire ropes for ships were admitted free, but the ropes of the same material for mines had to pay  $17\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. This was an anomaly which it was high time should be removed; and it was only one amongst many instances. The agricultural interests had also a certain amount of consideration shown them; indeed, the fact stared them in the face that almost every industry was favoured in this respect but that of the coal miner. It was humiliating that the United States should be allowed not only to cripple, but to destroy this most important industry. Whether it was desirable to place an import duty on coal or not was for the House to consider, but he did not see why, even for revenue purposes, coal should not pay something into the exchequer as well as coal oil. He hoped the House would allow the matter to go to a Select Committee.

When the report was presented, they would have possession of certain facts not properly before them now, and he would avail himself of the opportunity to bring the subject again before the House.

Mr. MCGREGOR said he hoped the House would grant the Committee. They wanted to prove to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick the exact position in which they stood in relation to the coal interests of the country. When the facts were brought out by the Committee the House would, no doubt, see that Ontario could not purchase coal from Nova Scotia. Ontario was peculiarly situated. Coal was delivered in Sarnia for $2.75, Goderich $2.85, Port Stanley $2.85, Toronto and Hamilton $3.50 per ton. With those low rates he did not think it would be difficult to prove the impossibility of improving the trade between Ontario and Nova Scotia.

Mr. OUMET said the hon. member for Cape Breton complained that the coal mines of Nova Scotia were not sufficiently protected by the present tariff. He (Mr. Ouimet) believed the same thing, but he thought the hon. member for Cape Breton should join the great party which was waving the flag of protection, and help on the movement to bring about a national policy of protection to all industries. Representatives of one Province should be willing to make sacrifices for the good of the Dominion. The trouble now was that everyone was asking protection for himself and refusing it to his neighbour. He hoped that, when the great scheme of protection was brought before the House, hon. members would make concessions to one another, and so inaugurate a system under which Canada was sure to prosper.

Mr. MACDONNELL said he thought it was time that the important industry in question received the careful and earnest consideration of the House. The House was not asked to do something to prosper the coal industry on the ground of protection. Only the other day the hon. the Premier said that we could neither have Free Trade nor Protection in its purity. We must have a system which would give revenue and protection at the same time. The hon. member for Essex quoted the prices at which coal was delivered in Ontario, which were lower than those in operation in Nova Scotia. If he was rightly informed, however, the coal used in Ontario came from the United States, and it was simply justice to afford the Nova Scotia mines an opportunity to compete with American coal. The Committee should give this matter serious consideration. It was not Nova Scotia alone that was interested in this question. We were a united people, and the interests of one section were the interests of another, and he thought the people of Ontario ought to submit to the duty suggested.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton) said he presumed the object of the hon. mover of the motion was to establish trade with the Province of Ontario in the matter of coal. He was glad to hear his hon. colleague, as well as the hon. member for Inverness, advocate a duty on American coal. These hon. gentlemen should have spoken to the Finance Minister on the matter when they heard him deliver his Budget Speech and state his intention of not recognising the coal industry of the country. He hoped these hon. gentlemen would vote for this matter even against the Finance Minister. The Finance Minister was opposed to the prayer of the petition. And if there was any doubt upon that question, the hon. the Premier himself would have already dissipated it when he referred particularly to coal. His hon. colleague, as well as the hon. gentleman from Inverness, need not have any hope on that point. He hoped that, if this Committee were appointed, its labours would not end as the labours of former Committees, and especially that celebrated Committee on Depression; and he hoped no attempt would be made to baulk the report. There was no doubt that a trade in coal could be established between Nova Scotia and Ontario. There was a trade already, but it was very small; still, with some assistance it would assume fair proportions. If such assistance were not given, the coal mines of Nova Scotia would have to be altogether closed. It was impossible for them to exist under the present circumstances. In regard to the statement made by the hon. member for Essex as to the price of coal in Toronto and other places in Ontario, he had received a letter bearing on this question. According to this gentleman, coal in Buffalo was $4.50 a ton of 2,000 pounds.

Mr. WOOD: What kind of coal?

Mr. McDONALD said he presumed it was bituminous, and it was not superior to our coal. The difference in the currency and the difference in weight, (our ton being 2,240 pounds,) would make a difference of fifty cents, which would enable the Nova Scotian coal to undersell the American coal in Toronto, if the object for which the Committee was asked could be obtained.

Mr. GIBBS (North Ontario) said, in speaking of Free Trade v. Protection, they should use the terms as they were understood by the people of the country. They properly believed that they should raise a revenue by duties and not by direct taxation. What the country required was that the different interests should be so affected that they should harmonize. Every argument made by the hon. member for Cape Breton was an argument in favour of protection. If the hon. member and those who represented the coal interest of Nova Scotia wished to bring about any beneficial change, they would have to come out from among the gentlemen opposite, and separate themselves from those who pronounced themselves to be Free-traders, or else they would have to go to their constituents and tell them that those with whom they worked in accord were opposed to their best interests, and unwilling to do anything to relieve the existing depression. It was impossible for isolated interests to be benefitted whilst others were left out. The hon. member for Cape Breton had said there was exceptional legislation in this country, and he instanced coal oil and other articles. And yet he desired exceptional legislation in favour of coal. That hon. gentleman desired to have a duty put on American coal, or a bounty or offset which would enable the Nova Scotia coal dealers to compete with American coal. That could not be done unless these gentlemen were willing to meet the other interests of the Dominion. He did not believe they were returned to Parliament to legislate for simply provincial interests. If the hon. member for Cape Breton was desirous of developing the coal interest of Nova Scotia, he must unite with that party which was willing to make mutual concessions. Why should there be protection of coal any more than of any other interest—such as flour and manufactures? The hon. gentlemen opposite said they could not protect industries without increasing the taxes. On the contrary, the hon. members of the Opposition argued that it was possible to so arrange the tariff that industries would be assisted, and at the same time there would not be a single dollar of extra taxes. A sufficient amount of revenue had to be raised some way or other, but this could be done while another purpose was served at the same time; certain concessions must be made to Nova Scotia in coal, and to Ontario and the rest of the Provinces in other matters. Instead of spending $100,000 for immigration and bringing in raw recruits, a policy should be adopted which would keep within our borders men well acquainted with the country, who were now forced to leave because they could get no employment, because this country was strewn with the wreck of manufactures. The hon. the Minister of Finance had stated that the Government had no more to do, by way of legislating for the prosperity of the country, than a fly upon a wheel.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the hon. gentleman had misstated what he had said. Besides, he had no business to refer to matters which had come up in previous debates.

Mr. GIBBS said he did not intend to misrepresent what the hon. gentleman had stated, but he so understood him. Hon. gentlemen opposite did not possess the confidence of the country. If they believed they had, he invited them to appeal to the country, and they would soon see that the decision would be adverse to them.

Mr. ROBINSON said he thanked the mover for putting him on the Committee. Although he came from Ontario, he would be happy to be of any service in such a matter, which was of great importance to the whole country. If the motion did not receive the sanction of the House and of the Ministry, similar motions would be brought up again and again. Nova Scotia was more or less forced into the Confederation on the understanding that the question of coal should receive the attention of the Dominion. Two millions of dollars were taken from the pockets of the people of Ontario for coal, and it all went out of the country for the benefit of Ohio and the Western States, instead of our fellow countrymen in the Maritime Provinces. If the same feeling of patriotism was shown here as was shown in the United States, a great inter-provincial trade would spring up. The petition signed by the hon. member for Lincoln was signed by shipowners, shipbuilders and manufacturers, and others interested in the prosperity of Ontario. There was no business for shipbuilders, but, if trade was stimulated between the Eastern and the Western Provinces, there would be a demand for ships, and many other industries would flourish. This was a very important question, and it concerned the most material prosperity of the country. He was one of those who believed that Confederation had been brought about for our mutual protection, and to advance our mutual commerce; and, if this was not done, the laws they passed would become mere ropes of sand, and the country would not really be united by any firm bonds. He believed the time had come when such motions as that made by the hon. member from Cape Breton would be brought up again and again, if they were not approved of by the House. They could never exist as a Confederation, unless their mutual commercial relations were firmly cemented together.

Mr. ORTON said he heartily endorsed the sentiments of the hon. member for Cape Breton. It appeared from the returns that Canada paid $3,300,000 yearly for foreign coal; and he was positive that the mining of this coal employed not less than thirty or forty thousand men. If even one-third or one quarter of this number were furnished such employment in Canada, the prosperity of the country would be vastly increased, and valuable assistance would be rendered to our manufacturing and agricultural interests. The imposition of a duty on coal would be a step in the right direction, affording encouragement to the coal miner, the manufacturer, and the agriculturist. To say, as Free-traders affirmed, that this would injure Ontario was a fallacy; the extra price of coal caused by the duty would be recouped to the manufacturer in the increased sale of goods in the new market created; and by interchange of products freights could then be obtained for return trips, and it was probable that under these circumstances the cost of transportation would be reduced. American flour to the value of no less than $2,500,000 had been brought into the Dominion in 1875: and he could not help feeling that the Government should inaugurate a Protectionist policy in order to advance the best interests of the people of this country. The mill-owners of Ontario, in the matter of oatmeal, had competed most successfully for the United States market, even after a duty of 50 cents per barrel was imposed, but the Americans had shut off this competition by imposing $1.00 per barrel on this article and had not only shut out Canadian oatmeal from their market, but had got control of the Canadian market. A duty on coal would also vastly benefit our shipping interests, as it would increase the commerce of our country. If, instead of imposing duties on malt and tea, the Government had placed a duty on coal and the manufactured goods which we could produce, as well as upon agricultural products, the revenue would have been benefitted, and at the same time relief would have been given to our languishing and distressed industries. He hoped that the Committee in question would properly place before the House the great importance of the Nova Scotia coal interests, and show how could be developed an immense source of wealth for the whole country. He endorsed the remarks made by the hon. member for West Toronto, that the Confederation should not merely be a union on paper, but a real union combined with a joint endeavour to develop the general resources of the entire Dominion. The course which was at present pursued might weaken the ties which bound together the various Provinces, and do the country great and lasting injury.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said he deeply regretted the greatly depressed state of the Nova Scotia coal interest, and he thought that every member of the House would join him in expressing such regret. This interest was declining year after year, as was well known, and the lumber interest for similar reasons occupied the same unfortunate position. To what was this due? When the Washington Treaty was under discussion, Canada being represented on that occasion by the right hon. member for Kingston, the American Commissioners had offered to admit our great staples, coal and lumber, free into their market for a certain number of years, but that right hon. gentleman had thought proper to reject this offer; and then was struck a most fatal blow to these great interests—one indeed from which they never would or could recover in our day unless the Washington Treaty was abrogated, and a new treaty negotiated. While listening to the hon. members on the other side of the House, who invited the gentlemen sitting on his side of the House to join them in the endeavour to benefit the coal interest, he could not help thinking that, if any gentlemen should hesitate in alluding to this great question, they were those hon. gentlemen who supported the right hon. member for Kingston and the Washington Treaty, which had had the effect of sacrificing this interest.

Mr. TUPPER: What does the hon. gentleman say as to the action of his own colleague, who was since returned by the hon. gentleman's own constituency?

Mr. JONES: My colleague is able to speak for himself. He was returned to the House since that time.

Mr. TUPPER: He was returned by the constituents since he supported that treaty.

Mr. JONES said that he, who voted against the treaty, had also been since returned to the House. This was his answer to his hon. friend. It was very well for the hon. gentleman to shelter himself behind that pretext, but it was too thin. When these hon. gentlemen declared to the people of Nova Scotia that they were willing, at this late hour, to protect this interest in order that they might make political capital out of the present position of affairs, he wished the people of Nova Scotia and the representatives of the two great interests he had mentioned to understand that their depressed condition was due to the policy adopted by the late Administration. Mr. Rutherford, a gentleman brought out from England by the Government, of which the hon. member from Cumberland was then leader, and an eminent mining engineer, who was largely interested in the Nova Scotia coal interests, had stated before the Depression of Trade Committee last year, that the price of coal at Pictou was $2.16 per ton, and that it cost $6 per ton to lay it down in Toronto; while the hon. member for Essex had informed the House that American coal had cost last year, delivered in Toronto, $3.50 per ton. Under these circumstances, if Nova Scotia was to supply Ontario with coal they must ask the Government to impose a duty equal to the difference between $3.50 and $6, or $2.50 per ton. Would any hon. member say that this would be a wise policy? He thought not; but suppose it was imposed, then the people of Ontario and Quebec would have been obliged to pay last year such a duty on the 789,000 tons of coal they had imported, or a sum equal to $1,985,000; but, if Ontario and Quebec were sufficiently patriotic to make the sacrifice, as the hon. members from Toronto and North Ontario would lead them to suppose, and if they were so boiling over with patriotism that they desired to throw this large sum of money into the public revenue of the country, of course he had no objection. If the people of Quebec and Ontario were so full of patriotism that they wished the Government to impose $2.50 duty on coal for the special benefit of Nova Scotia let them do so. He would never ask them to impose such a duty. A great deal was said on the other side of the House about the depressed condition of the manufacturing and other industries. To-day, the manufactures stood in a different position from what they did last year. The discount on American invoices was 8 per cent better; they had a 17½ per cent. revenue tariff, and, when they came to import goods from England and the United States, 7½ per cent. should be added for expenses. Thus they had an actual protection of 25 per cent. on every article manufactured in the Dominion; and, if that was not enough, he thought no manufacturer ought to exist. How would this proposed duty on coal affect the manufacturers who were largely interested in its consumption? Many factories would consume five or six tons per day, or 1,800 tons a year. At $2.50 per ton, that would amount to $4,500, which those patriotic gentlemen wished to pay into the coffers of the Dominion. When this question was discussed before, an hon. gentleman said he was agreeable to a duty on coal, providing anthracite coal was not touched. That showed the inconsistency of the hon. gentleman who desired protection. According to Mr. Rutherford's statement it would cost $4.50 per ton. to import coal from England, at which price it could be laid down in Nova Scotia. It would therefore be seen that they could compete with the coal from Great Britain. If the consumers in the lower markets preferred English coal, the only effect, following out the argument of hon. gentlemen opposite, would be to force people to pay a duty to consume coal which did not suit them, because, if they had as much patriotism as those hon. gentleman seemed to possess, they would use Nova Scotia coal and pay a little more for it. He trusted the Government would not agree to the imposition of the duty prayed for. That the coal interest was depressed was to be regretted, but the persons engaged in that industry were not suffering alone. The lumbering interest was experiencing the hard times to a large extent, but its representatives did not come into the House and ask for a bounty or protection, because they knew it would not be granted. At the same time they were bound to look after their interest as well as any other, as all interests were alike when they came to be sifted by Parliament. He did not know what was in store for the coal interest; he did not see that daylight was breaking. The only opportunity for making the trade valuable was known only by the hon. member for Kingston when he signed the Washington Treaty, and so refused to admit our coal and lumber into the United States. What they saw to day was the natural result of that treaty, and it ill became any hon. member of the other side to charge that the Government was in any way responsible for the depressed condition of the coal and lumber trades.

Mr. TUPPER said he would suggest that the hon. mover of the resolution should ask that all similar petitions on this subject be referred to the Committee. There was a petition presented by the hon. member for Halifax which he would like to go before the Committee. The statement that so enormous a duty would be required in order to send the coal of Nova Scotia as far as Toronto was an entire misapprehension. Mr. W. H. Howland, one of the foremost commercial men in Toronto, had pointed out again and again at the meetings of the Dominion Board of Trade the practicability of consuming Nova Scotia coal at Toronto under a 50 cent per ton duty. If that was the case, and he placed the utmost reliance on Mr. Howland's testimony, it was not exactly patriotic for the hon. member for Halifax to have delivered such a speech as the House had just listened to. It was not often an hon. gentleman availed himself of his position in the House to show how little his constituents knew him. If there was a constituency in Nova Scotia more prominent than all others for its commercial standing, wealth and intelligence, it was the one the hon. gentleman represented. But the hon. member had abused his position by his action in this matter. The petition which the hon. gentleman had presented to the House, and which represented the views of the commercial men of Halifax, refuted every statement the hon. member had made. He (Mr. Tupper) believed that it was the imposition of the 50 cents per ton which led to the reduction in United States coal. The hon. gentleman had bemoaned the utter hopelessness of the coal trade reviving, but he could tell him that if he looked at matters from the standpoint of the Opposition side of the House, a great deal of the Egyptian darkness with which he surrounded the question could be dispelled. A month ago the steamship Armenia was chartered to carry coal from Sydney to Toronto, and to take the products of Ontario back. The freight up was to be $2.50 per ton, and 50 cents per barrel down. This circumstance, he thought, would convince the hon. gentleman that his fears about the future of the coal industry were groundless. The hon. member had also abused his position when he referred to the Washington Treaty in the terms he did.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must call the hon. gentleman to order.

Mr. TUPPER said the hon. gentleman had been allowed to make an attack in regard to the Washington Treaty and he should have the right to reply.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman must not say any hon. member has abused his position in the House.

Mr. TUPPER said he would recall that statement, because he supposed an hon. member was entitled to give the freest utterance to his sentiments however obnoxious they might be to the sentiments of the constituency he represented. He was of opinion that the sentiment the hon. gentleman expressed with reference to the Washington Treaty was not sustained by the County of Halifax, or the Province of Nova Scotia. The hon. gentleman knew that if there was one person responsible for the failure of his right hon. friend to accomplish more for the country than he had, he was that one. At the time when his right hon. friend was struggling to obtain reciprocal trade for the Province of Nova Scotia, and was asking for greater concessions than the Americans were willing to give, he would ask what the hon. member for Halifax was doing at that crisis?

Mr. JONES.

Mr. JONES : Did he not refuse the coal and lumber ?

Mr. TUPPER said the offer on coal and lumber was never made. Fresh fish and coal and lumber were to come up in five years. That was a very different thing. When the offer was made, his right hon. friend would have been faithless to his trust if he had not availed himself of it, and had not endeavored to obtain more satisfactory justice.

Mr. JONES : That's too thin.

Mr. TUPPER said at the time in question the hon. member for Halifax was combining with other hon. gentlemen in the House and paralyzed his right hon. friend's efforts by striking off those duties which formed the lever by which the Americans would have been led to take off responsive duties. It did not come properly from the hon. member for Halifax to attack the right hon. gentleman as to the Treaty of Washington, when he himself had done all in his power to paralyze his efforts. The hon. member for Halifax gave the treaty his most hearty hostility and denounced it in every shape and form, although his colleague gave it his most hearty and enthusiastic support. Every hon. gentleman who supported the treaty was returned from Nova Scotia, but the hon. member for Halifax was not elected. The hon. gentleman by his side shared the same fate.

Mr. JONES : He voted for the treaty.

Mr. TUPPER said this was not sufficient to condone for his other offences. The whole of Nova Scotia sent back a united phalanx to sustain the right hon. gentleman then leading the Government.

Mr. CARMICHAEL said he believed the depression in coal was owing largely to the same causes which had brought about the depression in all the other industries of the world. When there was a general revival of trade, the coal interest would also revive. No legislation could improve the coal trade of Nova Scotia. He was personally interested in the coal trade of Nova Scotia, and he opposed the proposed change as he believed it would be injurious to coal owners. It was preposterous to suppose that coal could be transported to Toronto from Nova Scotia and compete with American coal merely by the latter having 50 cents a ton placed upon it. No reasonable man, acquainted with shipping and commercial matters, would suppose that coal could be carried 1,000 miles for $2.50 a ton. He would not deny the fact, but he had not much respect for the intelligence of the man who would say that the trade could be profitable. The very lowest rate at which coal could be carried to Montreal from the Maritime Provinces was $2.00 a ton. The placing of 50 cents duty on American coal would therefore have no appreciable effect in favour of Nova Scotia coal. It was said Nova Scotia preferred that a duty should be placed on coal, but because one Nova Scotia member had asked for the duty it must not be supposed that he expressed the general feeling of the people of that Province. If a duty were placed on coal, a duty would have to be placed on the materials of which ships were constructed, and this would so increase the rate, that an industry, far more important to Nova Scotia than the coal industry, would be crushed out. The House was told that a policy of retaliation should be adopted. The petition which was presented stated, and it was also stated by the hon. member for Cumberland, that an imposition of 50 cents per ton on coal, in the National Policy, had made the Americans immediately reduce their tariff on Canadian coal from $1.25 to 75 cents. This was not true. The duty on American coal was imposed on the 12th May, 1870, and it was repealed on the 22nd March, 1871; but the Americans did not decrease their duty until the 1st August, 1872,—eighteen months after the repeal of the Canadian duty.

Mr. McCALLUM said it seemed to him that the imposition of 50 cents a ton on American coal would not only benefit the Nova Scotia mine owners, but would benefit the whole country. It would be necessary, however, if coal were protected, to protect the agricultural and manufacturing interests. If a duty were placed on American flour, cargoes of flour could go from Western Canada to the Maritime Provinces, and bring return cargoes of coal. A vast inter-provincial trade would thus spring up. The first and last argument of the hon. member for Halifax and some other hon. members of the House was the shortcomings of the Treaty of Washington, and they did not discuss the question as it affected the country now.

Mr. TUPPER said he rose to make an explanation. The hon. member for Pictou had said that the statement he had made with reference to the effect of the Canadian national policy was untrue. He was certain the hon. gentleman did not use the word offensively, but meant that he (Mr. Tupper) was mistaken. The House would agree with him that it was a matter of some importance as to who was correct. The hon. member for Halifax would agree with him as to the reliableness of a gentleman he would name, as an authority on this matter.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said the hon. member was not speaking in order.

Mr. TUPPER said he would not trespass upon the time of the House, neither would he go beyond an explanation. The gentleman he referred to was Mr. John Rutherford.

Mr. JONES: But you said Mr. Howland was a higher authority.

Mr. TUPPER said the hon. member would not deny that Mr. Rutherford was a good authority, and he had signed the declaration that the imposition of a duty on American coal was immediately followed by a difference in the United States duty. He (Mr. Tupper) would give the hon. gentleman further evidence. When the attempt was made, in 1871, to repeal the Canadian duty, he implored the House not to do so, and he pointed to the fact that the United States had, in consequence of the National Policy, reduced their duty from $1.25 to seventy-five cents. He could not have made this remark if the Americans did not make their reduction until August, 1872.

Mr. JONES: Oh, yes, you could.

Mr. TUPPER said this remark was worthy of the hon. gentleman but unworthy of his position.

Mr. SPEAKER: I could not quite distinguish whether the hon. member for Pictou said that the statement of the hon. member for Cumberland was untrue or that the statement in the petition was untrue. I did not therefore think it necessary to refer to it at the time, as no hon. gentleman then objected to it.

Mr. CARMICHAEL said he considered he had a perfect right to affirm that any statement made by an hon. gentleman was not true, although of course he did not mean that the hon. member for Cumberland had wittingly stated what was false. He did not mean to say anything offensive.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. member for Pictou, I think, said that the statement in the petition presented a few nights ago was untrue.

Mr. SPEAKER: With regard to explanations, I must remind hon. members once more that, if, in the course of a debate, a statement made by an hon. member is misunderstood or misstated by another hon. member in the same debate, then that hon. member whose language is misunderstood or misstated has the right to explain what he did say; but he is bound to go no further. He has not the right to reply after he has made his explanation.

Mr. MILLS said it was not parliamentary to say that any statement made by an hon. member was untrue, although it might be to say that an hon. member was telling an untruth. The first statement put the untruth on the statement: the latter on the hon. member.

Mr. SPEAKER said he agreed with this, but he thought it much better to say that an hon. member was mistaken than that any statement he made was untrue, for that was apt to lead to unpleasantness.

Mr. YOUNG said that, as four or five hon. gentlemen from Ontario had advocated the imposition of a duty on coal, he deemed it his duty, as a representative from a large manufacturing district in that Province, to dissent from their views. He was not aware of a single manufacturer in Ontario who was not determinedly opposed to such a tax. The Nova Scotia coal measures were valuable, and he regretted they were not at present prosperous; but they were situated so far from the portions of the Dominion that used coal to a large extent, that it was practically impossible to employ it, except by placing an enormous burden on those engaged in businesses in which it was consumed. The price would have to be so increased that they would pay much too dearly for their whistle. The discussion had brought very distinctly into relief the difficulties and some of the absurdities connected with an extreme protective policy, for the very simple reason that what was a finished article in one business was the raw material of another; and it so happened that coal was the raw material of a large proportion of our manufactures. Nevertheless, the gentlemen who sought to constitute themselves the advocates of our manufacturing interests, actually proposed to put on duties which would largely raise the price of coal, which was certainly an extraordinary way of protecting our manufacturers. After all they had said in the country about the depression in manufactures and the necessity of assisting them, it was almost amusing to find that their first proposition was to tax manufacturers highly for an article of such prime necessity to them as coal. Various statements had been made as to the amount of duty necessary to shut American coal out of the Ontario market. The hon. member for Cumberland had mentioned the views upon this point, of Mr. Howland, a very respectable gentleman, but he was not aware that Mr. Howland had any special knowledge of the matter more than other gentlemen, whose opinions they possessed. Mr. Brydges, who was thoroughly acquainted with the subject, in his evidence before the Depression Committee last year, conclusively showed that Nova Scotia coal could not be brought to Ontario, unless with the aid of a very large duty imposed on American coal. Fifty cents per ton, not many years ago, had been imposed, but he was not aware that this brought any Nova Scotia coal into Ontario.

An HON. MEMBER: Yes, it did.

Mr. YOUNG said in that case the quantity was very small indeed. He was convinced that the operation was exceptional, and not repeated. He was of opinion that a duty of $2 per ton must be levied on American coal, to enable Nova Scotia to supply Ontario with coal to any very large extent. If, for argument's sake, $1 was taken—for he felt certain that fifty cents was too low—hon. members would readily see what a large tax would thereby be imposed on the manufacturers of Ontario and other parts of the Dominion.

Mr. TUPPER: What can bituminous coal be bought for in Toronto?

Mr. YOUNG said it was stated last year that Nova Scotia coal could not be laid down in Montreal at a rate less than $4.10 per ton; but that American coal was delivered at some points in the West at $3.50 per ton. The freight from Montreal to Toronto, he believed, was about $1.75 per ton, and this would make the price of Nova Scotia coal laid down in the latter city about $6 per ton.

Mr. TUPPER: The hon. member overlooks the statement I have made to the House that coal owners have actually contracted to carry it for $2.50 per ton; and this sum, with $1.50, the price per ton, placed on the vessel, would make the cost of each ton $4, delivered in Toronto.

Mr. YOUNG said that such a contract might be entered into, but then they knew perfectly well, to use a homely phrase, that the proof of the pudding was in the eating of it. This venture might fail, and result in loss. Mr. Brydges stated last year that it would cost at least $4.10 to lay this coal down in Montreal; and how it could be sent by the St. Lawrence and the Lake to Toronto for the sum mentioned, he could not understand. He felt certain that a duty of $1 would be required to enable Nova Scotia to compete successfully for the Ontario market. As they imported last year 794,000 tons of coal, such a duty would compel the manufacturers of the country to pay a tax of $794,000. Besides, Nova Scotia could not supply them with anthracite coal, of which they used a large quantity, and consequently such a duty levied on coal would take out of the pockets of the manufacturers of the west, and of the Province of Quebec, a sum probably not less than one million dollars annually. He was convinced that, if adopted, such a policy would exist for only a very short time. When the experiment was previously tried, a strong feeling was excited throughout the country against the imposition of 50 cents per ton on foreign coal; and who repealed it? Why, the supporters of the right hon. gentleman opposite.

Mr. GIBBS (North Ontario): I think you are mistaken.

Mr. YOUNG said, if desired, he would read the names of the gentlemen who voted for the repeal. The vote in favour of the abolition of what was known as the National Policy numbered eighty-three.

Mr. GIBBS (North Ontario): What was the motion?

Mr. YOUNG said the motion was to set aside the duties on coal, wheat, and other articles included in what was commonly known as the National Policy, which only existed for some nine months, and then died apparently of inanition. Fifty-five members voted against the motion; and, of the eighty-three who supported the repeal, forty-two were gentlemen who usually supported the right hon. member for Kingston. He was surprised to find among the eighty-three the name of the hon. member from Frontenac, who, a few moments previously, had seemed to think he (Mr. Young) was wrong in saying that a very small quantity of Nova Scotia coal was used in Ontario.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK: You said that no Nova Scotia coal at all found its way there.

Mr. YOUNG said that, during the first Session of the Confederation, the late Administration had put on the duties he had instanced, and the very next year had witnessed the abolition of this National Policy. During the third Session, it was again adopted, and during the fourth, it was again abolished; and he ventured to predict that, if it were again to come into force, such a wave of indignation would sweep over the land against it and particularly against the coal duties, that whatever Government might then be in power, they would be compelled to do away with it during the first Session subsequent to its adoption. Some manufacturers used yearly 500 tons of coal, others 1,000 tons; a few, even 5,000 or even 10,000 tons; and consequently a tax of $1 per ton, would be unbearable. Hence, he was surprised to hear the hon. members from North Ontario, Centre Wellington, and West Toronto speak as if such a duty would be a boon to the manufacturers of the country, when such a policy would really strike the most vital blow against our manufacturing interests that they had ever received.

Mr. GIBBS (North Ontario): I said that we wanted reciprocity.

Mr. YOUNG said the hon. gentleman argued as if the whole country could get rich by taxing everybody and every interest in the community. This was a fallacious policy, which would tend to impoverish the country; and make industries of all kinds depressed and unprofitable. He had supposed, from what had been said by some of these gentlemen, and largely by the hon. member from North Ontario at divers pic-nics, that some policy would have been promulgated, tending to greatly benefit the manufacturers of the country. And yet the grand panacea of this hon. member was to tax coal, the raw material used by a large proportion of these manufacturers. Again, wood was becoming scarce, at least in the west, and, in the cities and towns and even villages, coal was now used as fuel by the poor as well as the rich; and despite this fact it was proposed to tax the very fuel which the people used to preserve them from the severity of our winter months. He wished these hon. gentlemen joy regarding such a policy, for which they would be thanked neither by the manufacturer, the mechanic, nor the workingman. He deeply regretted the depressed condition of the coal industry, and, as he had said before in the House, he repeated that the day must come when the coal and iron of Nova Scotia would be an immense source of wealth to it; but, at the same time, it was impossible to overcome the geography of the country. The idea of levying high duties on coal, in order to force Ontario to use this product of Nova Scotia, was one of the greatest absurdities of which he had heard in Parliament for several years.

Mr. CHARLTON said that last year, before the Committee on Depression, Mr. Brydges had stated that the Grand Trunk Railway Company had contracted for the delivery of 30,000 tons of Nova Scotia coal in Montreal, at $4.50 per ton; and it might be assumed that it would cost $1.50 additional, at least, to lay this coal down in Toronto. It was true that the hon. member for Cumberland announced that a contract had been made to transport coal to Toronto for $2.50 per ton; but any gentleman conversant with the shipping interest well knew that this was not a rate at which business could be done with profit. The member for Essex, who was well informed regarding these matters, stated that American coal was delivered in Toronto at $3.50 per ton, and, with $6.00 as the price of Nova Scotian coal, this would make a difference of $2.50 in their actual cost. Mr. Brydges had been asked: "Your experience in the use of coal will enable you to state what are the comparative qualities of Nova Scotia coal, and that obtained from the Ohio mines? A. The quality of the coal coming from the Western States is very varied, some is excellent and some not; the best coal received in Toronto comes from Cleveland and Erie, and this is much better than the Nova Scotian coal in my opinion." The American miner was able to place coal more cheaply than the Nova Scotia coal owner on our market for this reason: most of the American coal was placed free on the cars at 80 cents or 90 cents per ton, owing to the fact that it was simply carried out of the sides of hills, while the Nova Scotia coal generally cost $2 at the pit's mouth. It was impossible for Nova Scotia to contend against these two-fold difficulties: the greater cost of taking the coal from the bowels of the earth, and the greater cost of placing it on the market. Further, a duty of $2 would be necessary to open our market in Ontario to the Nova Scotia coal, and as to anthracite coal, it must and would be used under any circumstances. It was sold west of the Mississippi at $12 per ton, while the price of bituminous coal in the same region was $4 per ton. No duty on American coal could prevent its consumption. He thought they now saw evidence of the introduction into Canada of the celebrated American system of log-rolling. Various interests which could not stand on their own naked merits, would combine together, and by casting their vote solid one for the other, impose on the country a class of measures which otherwise would be overwhelmingly rejected. The proposed duty on coal was one, and the projected duty on breadstuffs was another example in this relation. These interests would ring in one with another, in the hope of returning a party favourable to them at the next general election. He considered the policy in question absurd. The policy of placing a duty on coal was even absurd in the light of the Nova Scotian miners' interests; and he was sure that, when their protectionist friends unfolded their policy, it would be rejected by the country. He was satisfied that a duty of fifty cents per ton on coal would be totally inoperative, and that a duty sufficient to afford effective protection would be found too intolerable to be borne.

Mr. WORKMAN thought that the imposition of a duty on coal, however small, would totally injure the manufacturing interests throughout Canada. Not a wheel was turned nor a grindstone worked in a great many of our manufactories but with the motive power derived from coal; and to impose a duty of fifty cents per ton would be a fatal blow to many industries. If, however, the duty would stimulate the coal trade of Nova Scotia, he would probably partly consent to it; but he considered it would only increase the consumption of that coal as far west as Montreal. It would cost $1.50 extra per ton to place Nova Scotia coal in the Toronto market. He hoped the speculation which the owners of the Armenia had entered into would prove profitable, but he thought it would only take a few months to demonstrate that it would be a losing operation. About eight years ago the steamer Merritt was chartered to carry four from Toronto to Nova Scotia, and return with cargoes of coal. She made several trips during the summer and fall, and the result was disastrous in the extreme. There was a loss on almost every trip. The parties interested became insolvent, and one, in desperation, committed suicide in a foreign country. When he occupied a seat in the House before, he opposed the National Policy of the hon. gentleman opposite. He was a manufacturer and a protectionist to a moderate extent, but, looking at the question from that standpoint, he could not agree to the imposition of the proposed duty. The largest steamboat company in Canada, the Richelieu, running between Montreal and Quebec, when the duty was placed on coal, put an additional tax of fifty cents on every cabin passenger they carried between those cities.

Mr. MASSON said the additional rate was not caused by the tax on coal, but in order to work up a public sentiment in order to have the imposition removed.

Mr. WORKMAN: I had the positive statement of the directors that it was imposed because of the fifty cents duty on coal.

Mr. TUPPER: Is the hon. gentleman aware that, during the year that duty existed, coal was as low in Quebec and Montreal as it was at any other time?

Mr. WORKMAN said he thought the price was only advanced about twenty-five cents. It was an absurdity to think that Nova Scotia coal could compete with American coal at Toronto, and it would be very injudicious to impose the proposed duty.

Mr. PATERSON said a great difference of opinion had been expressed in regard to what was a vital point in considering the question of imposing a duty on coal, viz., the price at which it could be laid down in Toronto. He, in common with other representatives from Ontario, judged from information which had been gathered that it was impossible to levy a duty on American coal which would bring Nova Scotia coal into use in the western part of Ontario. He felt that the duty would be such an amount that it would prove a burden to which the people of Ontario would not submit. He therefore suggested that the Committee should determine, on authority, the cost at which Nova Scotia coal could be laid down in Toronto. As however there were large manufacturing interests in the western part of the Province it would be desirable also to ascertain the cost at which coal could be laid down at more western points. If the Committee were granted, he hoped that some practical good would be accomplished, not in the direction of imposing a duty—which he did not think was likely—but in acquiring and submitting to the House valuable information.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the Government, if this Committee were granted, desired it should be thoroughly understood that in no shape or way was the Committee to assume to itself the right to recommend the imposition of a tax. As to the question itself, he scarcely thought it was worth while to enter into any abstract discussion as to protection or free trade. That would probably be discussed with more propriety when the propositions of the Government in regard to the tariff were before the House. With regard to the particular prayer of the petition, he would only say that there had always appeared to be two serious difficulties in the way of imposing a duty on coal. The first was that it would be a duty placed on what was a prime necessary of life in a climate like this; and the second was, that under no possible circumstances could the duty be prevented from operating with great hardship on a particular portion of the community, viz: the poorer classes in our large cities. It was obvious that, whatever was the merit of the proposition in any other respect, every cent of duty placed on coal would inevitably add to the price of coal on the borders of the great lakes. It would be the duty of the Committee to investigate into the facts, and he thought the subject was one on which a fair and intelligent report would be of value. He thought it was very desirable that all parties concerned should have the opportunity of presenting their case, and he was satisfied the Committee would conduct the enquiry with due impartiality. The Government would not object to granting the Committee if the names of Messrs. Laurier, Appleby, Sinclair and Dymond were added to the Committee, it being distinctly understood that the purpose of the Committee was to investigate the statement made in the petition, and not to propose the imposition of any new taxes.

Mr. BOWELL said there was another point in connection with the Committee which it would be well to understand at the outset. When such motions had been submitted to the House previously, the Committees had been organized so as to place on them a majority of gentlemen who had expressed their opposition to the principles involved either in the petition or in the motion referred. He found that Rule 78 said :

“But it shall be always understood that no member who declares or decides against the principle or substance of a Bill, resolution or matter to be committed can be nominated on such Committee.”

Such a decided expression of opinion had been given by at least one of the hon. members who had been named on the Committee, and the hon. member for Essex had been one of the first to express an opinion adverse to the prayer of the petition. It could not be pretended, moreover, that the hon. member for North York was in violation with the prayer of the petition.

Mr. DYMOND said he had expressed no opinion on any matter which had before the House to-night.

Mr. BOWELL said there were several gentlemen named on the Committee who were avowed free-traders, not only as to the abstract principle, but as applied to every branch of industry and trade in the country, if the hon. member for North York would say that his interpretation of his opinions was not correct, he (Mr. Bowell) would withdraw his objection. He asked the ruling of the Speaker on the point.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman assumed that this was a Committee to recommend the imposition of a tax.

Mr. BOWELL: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE said, if such was not the case, the objection had no weight. If the Committee was to be composed of members who were committed to the imposition of protective duties on coal, there was no use in appointing a Committee to inquire into the facts. The Committee must be fair and impartial, and it would be absurd to have such a Committee representing a minority in the House, and that minority representing a principle which they desired to see carried into effect.

Mr. TUPPER said the objection taken by the hon. member for North Hastings was that in appointing a Committee no hon. member could be named who had expressed himself opposed to the prayer of the petition referred to the Committee.

Mr. HOLTON said the prayer of the petition asked something to which the Government could not consent, and an objection ought to have been taken to the motion. The House could not consent to refer to a Committee a petition praying for something which the Committee itself could not recommend.

Mr. DYMOND said it would be remembered that, when the petition was presented to the House, a debate arose as to its being received. He would venture to submit that, if the petition could be received by the House, it must be competent for a Committee to consider its subject-matter. If the Committee could not be appointed to consider the matter of the petition, then the petition itself should never have been received.

Mr. BOWELL said, if the Committee was merely to be appointed for the sake of causing some expense, and was to be restricted in its expression of opinion as to the prayer of the petition, then the Committee should not be appointed. His point was that the petition prayed for a certain matter, that certain members of the House had expressed opinions in opposition to that prayer, and that therefore under the rule they could not be placed on the Committee. The object of referring the petition to a Committee was to ascertain whether the assertions it contained were well founded, and whether the prayer of the petition could be granted by the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said it had been very properly decided that the petition could be received as it was general in its nature, and did not contain on the face of it a request from persons interested in the subject-matter of the prayer. The petition was for a tax, or a bounty which was in the nature of a tax, and the reference of the petition could only mean a reference of a consideration of its prayer. There was a rule that, when a Committee was appointed, the members placed upon it must be in favour of the principle or substance of the resolution submitted to them, and that rule applied in England as well as here. No member could properly or honestly sit on a Committee if he was altogether opposed to the principle of the Bill, measure, or resolution submitted to it. In England, it frequently occurred that a member refused to sit on a Committee because he had made up his mind against the principle of the measure to be referred. It did not follow that the members must be committed fully to the principle, but they must either be in favour of the principle or not committed against it.

Mr. HOLTON said his objection was the constitutional one that the petition prayed for something which the Committee could not report in favour of. He had been taught by Robert Baldwin that it was shirking the responsibility of the Government to permit the reference of any matter involving the expenditure of money or the imposition of taxes to a Committee of the House. The right hon. member for Kingston would support him in the statement that such was Mr. Baldwin's uniform teaching. He thought the Committee as proposed by this motion was irregular and would lead to the introduction of a very unsound practice, and to no practical result, because, under the rules of the House, the Committee could not report in favour of the prayer of the petition referred to. Therefore, cui bono? He doubted whether the technical rule invoked by the hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell) could be applied to this at all, but his (Mr. Holton's) objection went deeper and upon more constitutional grounds.

Mr. BLAKE said it was evident, by common sense and the very ground of a Committee of enquiry, that the rule could not have the meaning sought to be given it. The Finance Minister had stated that he was willing to grant a Committee to enquire into the facts alleged in this petition. The hon. member for Kingston said the Committee should be composed either of men who were all impressed with one view of the facts, who had come to one conclusion on them, who wished to bring forward one view of them to the House, who would conduct the investigation, or, as the hon. gentleman said, marshal the evidence, so as to present their side of the question to the House; or of those who were neutral, who had no opinion at all, and who were like the ignorant jurymen who did not read the papers, and were the only class in the United States considered competent to try a cause; but the hon. gentleman would on no account have a Committee which would represent both sides of the question. If the enquiry were conducted by those who had opinions all on one side, was it likely to be full, fair and impartial? Was it likely to convince the House or country that the enquiry had been sufficient? In that case, they might give up the idea of a Committee of enquiry at all. Let them see, however, if they could not find a sensible rule, which would not lead to such preposterous consequences. When they had a matter of which the principle was laid down by a resolution, but the execution of the details required investigation and consideration, they committed it to a Committee of those who were favourable to the principle, who proceeded to ascertain how most effectually that principle could be carried out in detail. But, if they were referring a matter of enquiry into facts, they did not take those who were pledged or strongly impressed with one or the other side of the question, but took men who had impressions on both sides, and used the ordinary means of getting all the evidence on both sides brought forward and a conclusion on the disputed question reached by the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said that might be very well for a Committee of enquiry, which was constituted to look into the whole subject, but they knew what the prayer of this petition was, and, if it was referred, that and no other was the subject which the Committee would have to enquire into. It was a petition not for enquiry, but for redress. What was the use of referring it if its prayer was not to be considered? The Government said: "You may have your Committee, but you must agree in the first place that by no possibility can you get what you ask for."

Mr. BLAKE: Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said that not only was the point of order well taken, but there was a constitutional question which the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) had well stated. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) remembered very well the course taken by Mr. Baldwin both in the Opposition and in the Government. Whenever a yielding Government sent a petition of this kind to a Committee, he always opposed it as an abdication of the duty of the Government, and in the Government he was very determined in carrying out the rule himself. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) did not desire to interfere with the hon. gentleman getting a Committee of enquiry, but a Committee shackled by the conditions placed on it by the Minister of Finance would be worse than nothing.

Mr. MILLS said there was a series of allegations contained in the petition upon which the petitioners came to their conclusion. Was it the conclusion or the facts into which the Committee was to enquire?

Mr. BOWELL: The whole.

Mr. MILLS: Is the Committee for the purpose of determining whether a tax shall be imposed or not?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK: Yes.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: That is the purpose for which it is moved.

Mr. MILLS: That is wholly improper. The hon. gentleman says a Committee should assume the function of advising the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I do nothing of the kind. I am on the other side.

Mr. MILLS said the Committee should enquire into the facts alleged in the petition.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said in that case it should be a Committee to enquire into the coal trade of the Dominion and into the facts stated in the petition, and should not be in this form. If the House referred the petition to the Committee, it virtually acceded to its principles.

Mr. BLAKE said it had become the custom to strike Committees of this kind. It had been done in the time of the late Government. The object was to get at some facts to show that the country would be benefitted by taxation in favour of the interest affected. His hon. friend had proposed a reference of this petition because, he supposed, he thought the coal trade would be benefitted by taxation. Petitions had not unfrequently been presented, so guarded in their language as not to come within the direct meaning of the rule which forbade the reception of a petition praying for a grant of money, and Committees had been struck on these. But it would be out of order for this Committee to report in favour of a bounty or tax.

Mr. PLUMB said he thought the prayer of the petition must be either adopted or rejected. It would be impossible to separate the statements and the prayers of a petition which was for such a specific purpose as this.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must confess that, looking at the resolution as it is in my hands, and not as the hon. the Finance Minister suggested it should be, I cannot help arriving at the conclusion that, if it passed in that shape, the whole petition, as well the prayer as the allegations, would be referred to the Committee to deal with, and I believe they would have power to make some report as to the petition. Very frequently Committees have blundered by exceeding their powers, but I believe it would be in the competence of the Committee to express an opinion on the prayer of the petition. Formerly, Committees were not allowed to express their opinion on any subject, but the Parliament of Canada has been accustomed to receive reports in which opinions were expressed, and a recent rule of the Imperial Parliament allows Committees to express an opinion upon the subject-matter referred to them.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Not upon the granting of money.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think it is possible for a Committee to put its opinion before the House, even upon that, not as a recommendation, but as an abstract opinion, as any hon. member might do in introducing a resolution into the House. My impression is that the point raised by the hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell) is well taken. I find only two who, in this debate, have expressed any opinion adverse to the prayer of the petition. No hon. member has expressed any opposition to an enquiry being made. In fact, all have stated facts which would very fairly be subject for enquiry.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT moved in amendment:

“That all the words after ‘Petition of H. Mitchell, and others’ be expunged, and the following words be substituted: ‘be referred to a Select Committee, composed of Messrs. MacKay (Cape Breton), Laurier, McGregor, Flynn, Fraser, Workman, Macdonald (Toronto), Campbell, Power, Tupper, Appleby, Sinclair and Dymond, to enquire into and report upon the allegations as to the state of the Coal trade, contained in the said Petition.’”

Mr. WALLACE (Norfolk) moved the adjournment of the Debate.

Motion to adjourn Debate agreed to.

House adjourned at Ten minutes to
Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, 2nd March, 1877.

The Speaker took the chair at Three o'clock.

THE COAL PETITION COMMITTEE.

RULING OF MR. SPEAKER.

Mr. SPEAKER: A point of order was raised last night, which, I think, is a novel one in the experience of the Canadian Parliament. I cannot remember its ever having been raised before, certainly not since I have taken the chair, and to-day I felt it my duty to look very carefully into the whole question, in order to satisfy myself as to whether my ruling was correct or not. I think it is my duty to lay before the House the result of my investigations. I find, in the first place, that no such rule as ours exists in the British House of Commons. In a little work, published in 1859, I am told, by Sir Erskine May, in which the rules of the House appear, I find no rule similar to that we have in our rules. Of course, that being the case, the precedents of the British House of Commons can hardly justify action on our part; but it may be well to state what the practice there is. In the year 1861, Mr. Ewart moved a resolution in the House of Commons asking that the mode of selecting Select Committees should be changed, and that the number of their members should be reduced. This proposal led to a discussion, during which much was said which is very pertinent to the point we had under consideration. Sir George Lewis, whose authority in matters of this kind would appear to be entirely unquestioned—at all events it was so in this instance,—after stating what the practice with regard to Private Bills, and concerning the Committees to which Private Bills were referred, had been, went on to say: “The hon. gentleman had asked why that system which worked so well with regard to Private Bills Committees, was not extended to Public Bills Committees, and the answer was that the two cases were wholly dissimilar. The business before Public Committees was conducted entirely by members themselves, who had to call and examine witnesses, sift their evidence, and in short perform all the functions counsel performed before Private Bill Committees. If, therefore, Public Bill Committees consisted wholly of impartial men, their investigations would be most unsatisfactory; strong partisans on each side were knowingly and advisedly chosen, in order that the truth might be elicited by the conflict of opposite, and, it might be, interested opinions. Indeed, in the formation of such Committees, the avowed object often was to have different interests represented; and the complaint was sometimes made that a Committee was unfairly constituted, precisely because conflicting interests were not represented in it. It was also frequently alleged that Scotch and Irish members were excluded. The practice further was to have some members of the Government and some leading members of the Opposition on every important Committee, a usage in favour of which obviously a great deal might be said." I find that subsequently, when it was proposed to appoint a Committee—indeed a Committee had been appointed, and it was proposed to add a member to it—to take into consideration the whole question relating to matters affected by the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill, it was moved that Mr. McElvoy be one of the members of the Committee. Objection was then taken to referring a question of that kind to a Committee, and Mr. Chichester Fortescue and other gentlemen took the ground which was taken last night by the hon. member for Chateauguay,—that, in a question of that kind, the Government should form its own policy, and act on it, and not endeavour to screen itself under the action of a Committee of the House. I also find here, that Mr. Vance condemned the proposed Committee as unfairly consisting of ten who were favourable to the object in view, and of five who were against it, instead of eight on the one side, and seven on the other, the usual proportion. This was stated as a matter of fact in the House of Commons, and it was received as a statement of fact, which was not disputed, showing that the practice there was to name a Committee of fifteen for the consideration of all subjects of this kind, eight on the one side, the members of the Government being favourable, I presume, to the measure, and seven on the other side. I find that in an unpublished edition of Mr. Todd's work, this question is enlarged upon; and I requested him to copy his views on the subject, as they are contained in this work, which I hope will be some day or other published; and in this he says: "Public Committees are usually appointed either at the suggestion or with the direct approval of the Government, and are composed of a fair proportion of leading men on both sides of the House, including members of existing and of former Administrations, in order that, as a general rule, the balance of parties may be maintained and the feeling of the House represented thereon. Men should be selected to serve on public Committees, who from their abilities or experience, or the special interests they represent, are become qualified for such service. Strong partisans on each side are knowingly and advisedly chosen"—here he quotes the words of Sir George Lewis—"in order that the truth might be elicited from conflicting or opposite, and it might be, interested opinions. If such Committees consisted wholly of independent men, their investigations would be most unsatisfactory." It is evident from all this that, if we had not the rule in question among our rules, it would have been my duty last evening to decide differently; and yet I cannot, on looking more carefully at the Rule, perceive that it was open to me to rule in any other way than I did. The matter referred to the Committee, I am still of opinion, included as well the prayer of the petition as allegations of fact contained in the petition. It is open to the Committee to express an opinion as to the expediency or in expediency of imposing a duty on coal, or granting a bounty on coal. Under all these circumstances, I am satisfied that my ruling last night was correct, and I am equally satisfied that the rule, as it stands, is inconsistent with free parliamentary action in matters of this kind.

Mr. MACKENZIE asked whether the ruling referred to the amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am speaking entirely about the point raised last night by the hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell). The amendment puts the question in an entirely different shape; and perhaps the ruling is of little consequence one way or the other, as it is not the intention of the Government to accede to the points contained in the motion, or what they seem at all events to be. Still, as there was much difference of opinion on the subject, and as it was new to me, I felt that it was my duty to look into the question and to put the result of my enquiries before the House.

Mr. CAUCHON asked whether the ruling referred to private as well as to public measures.

Mr. HOLTON: I venture to think that the rule in question is a very useful rule if properly applied. For instance, if the House passes the second reading of a Bill approving the principle thereof, it is obviously right and proper that a Special Committee, appointed to consider its details, should be completely composed of friends of the measure. In like manner, if the House frames anything in the shape of a resolution, and appoints a Committee to consider any details arising out of it, this Committee, after such an affirmation of a principle, should be composed of friends of it, who may be supposed to be the majority of the House; but a Committee of enquiry or investigation, to which any matter of public policy is referred, obviously ought to include friends and opponents of the proposition. This distinction I would draw in my own mind, and therefore I thought the point raised by the hon. member for North Hastings last night did not touch the essence of the matter at all. I formed a different opinion, and I considered that, if the Committee were ordered, then the technical objection of the hon. member from North Hastings was not applicable. It would not do to abridge the freedom of enquiry which the House may choose to order.

Mr. SPEAKER said this was his own view of the matter long before he pronounced his decision.

Mr. MACKENZIE.

Mr. HOLTON said that Private Bills were considered judicially in Committee.

Mr. BLANCHET said he feared if such Committees were composed of opponents and friends of the question under consideration, the object in view would be defeated in a great many cases. Some years ago, a member of the House had asked for the appointment of a Committee particularly to investigate the expediency of having a law passed in favour of compulsory vaccination; and he was so unfortunate as to place on the Committee medical gentlemen who were opposed to that principle. They absented themselves from its meetings, and it was impossible for the mover, who was actuated by philanthropic motives, to bring in a report. The hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) would also recollect that a few years ago, the late member for Gaspé (Mr. Fortin) proposed the formation of a Committee regarding the improvement of navigation and the fisheries. The mover placed on his Committee hon. members who were opposed to his views, and his object was entirely defeated. He thought it would be well if an absolute rule on this subject was not maintained, lest it might in a great many cases occasion serious difficulty.

Mr. BLAKE said he could readily understand the duty of laying down a rule, but he did not understand the necessity for ordering that rule to be placed on their journals. When some principle, some projet de loi or something of that kind, the details of which it was desirable to carefully talk over and bring into shape, was in question, he could understand why an hon. member should decline to put on the Committee persons whose views were entirely hostile to the principle, or projet de loi, because these persons might be obstructive and have an object in not perfecting the matter under consideration. But to appoint six men who had already declared themselves to be favourable to any subject, into the expediency of which it was desirable to enquire, to take it under consideration, was absurd; and it would be carrying the farce—for such it would be—still further if these members of the Committee called witnesses to establish what in their own predetermined opinion was right. The only safe way under such circumstances would be to appoint two Committees, one wholly composed of persons favourable to the measure, and the other wholly composed of its opponents; still this would be a very cumbersome method. The authorities which the Speaker had cited only reduced to language the common sense of the matter. It was clear that such enquiries should be conducted by Committees on which persons of different views were placed; therefore, while he agreed with the general proposition of the hon. member from Bellechasse, he was not disposed to agree in the view that subjects of enquiry should be submitted to one-sided Committees.

Mr. BOWELL said, in raising the point he did, he had taken the literal meaning of the rule, and, notwithstanding the objection taken by the hon. Minister of Justice last night—who had denounced everyone holding his (Mr. Bowell's) view as lacking in common sense—he was gratified that one of the highest Parliamentary authorities in the Dominion acquiesced in his reading of the rule. The objections taken to it by the hon. member for Chateauguay and the reasons just given by the hon. the Minister of Justice, were no doubt well founded, but Mr. Speaker had to decide according to the meaning of the rule as it stood on the Rules of the House. It was clear that a Select Committee could be selected from parties holding views in accord and in unison with the subject to be referred to them and that the report was a foregone conclusion, but was it not equally true that a Government, who made an apparent concession to a supporter by allowing a Committee to be appointed to carry out a whim or idea, could so form and constitute that Committee as to make it sure to report in accord with the wishes of the Government. The whole argument only showed that the rule should be amended so that on reading it would mean what the precedent read by Mr. Speaker intended to mean.

Mr. MACKENZIE said it was quite evident that the rule must be amended, and he would take an early opportunity of attaining that result.

MR. JUSTICE LORANGER.

MOTION TO REFER PETITION.

Mr. BLANCHET moved for copies of the Petition of J. B. Brousseau, Esquire, of the town of Sorel, dated 26th February, 1876, in relation to Mr. Justice Loranger; also that the said Petition be then referred to the Committee appointed by this House to enquire into the charges preferred against the hon. Judge.

Mr. BLAKE said he could not consent at this moment to the latter part of the motion. There was no objection to the motion passing for the petition to be brought down, which he would take care was done at once. He suggested that the latter part be struck out.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

MOTION TO SUBSTITUTE.

Mr. BLANCHET moved:

“That the name of Mr. Roy be substituted for that of Mr. Langevin on the Select Standing Committees on Public Accounts, and Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.”

Mr. MACKENZIE said he had only this objection, that an hon. member from British Columbia had called attention to the fact that there was no member from that Province on the Public Accounts Committee, and he proposed to put Mr. Thompson in the place of Mr. Langevin, in order that British Columbia might be represented. This was one of the most important Committees, and it was not usual to appoint an entirely new member of the House to it.

Motion, as amended, agreed to, as follows:—

Resolved, that Mr. Roy be added to the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines; and Mr. Thompson (Cariboo) to that on Public Accounts.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY BRANCH.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

Mr. MILLS moved:

“That the House do forthwith resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, to consider the following resolutions:—

1st. That it is expedient to provide that the salaries or remuneration of the Director of the Geological Survey and his Assistants be determined by the Governor in Council, subject to the approval of Parliament.

2nd. That it is expedient to provide that the Director and persons appointed to permanent positions in the Geological Survey Branch of the Department of the Interior, shall be considered as being within the provisions of the Act 33 Victoria, Chapter Four, to provide for the superannuation of persons employed in the Civil Service in certain cases."

Motion agreed to.

(In the Committee.)

Resolution ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Resolution reported, read the second time and agreed to, and referred to Committee of the Whole on Bill No. 18.

TRANSFER OF THE TRURO AND PICTOU BRANCH RAILWAY.

MOTION TO REFER RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. MACKENZIE moved:

"That on Tuesday next the House will resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolutions:—

"That it is expedient to authorize the Governor in Council to make arrangements for carrying out the transfer of the Truro and Pictou Branch of the Intercolonial Railway in pursuance of negotiations entered into with the Government of Nova Scotia, and the Halifax and Cape Breton Railway and Coal Company under the resolution passed by this House on the 19th May, 1874; and for that purpose to provide:—

1. That the said Branch Railway, with sufficient land for the purposes thereof, and the Stations and buildings thereon, but without rolling stock, may be transferred absolutely to the person or Company constructing a line of Railway from New Glasgow to the Strait of Canso, and providing sufficient rolling stock and appurtenances for the same, and a proper Steam Ferry across the said Strait, the whole to the satisfaction of the Minister of Public Works.

2. That temporary possession of the said Branch Railway may be given to the person or Company with whom the Nova Scotia Government shall have contracted for the construction of the said extension to the said Strait, and the establishment of the said Steam Ferry, as soon as such person or Company shall have expended not less than $400,000 on the work to the satisfaction of the said Minister of Public Works; subject to immediate resumption of the said Branch Railway by the Government of Canada and repayment of the net earnings thereof, in case of failure to fulfil the conditions aforesaid, by such person or Company, who shall give proper security for the fulfilment thereof and for the payment of all damages resulting from such failure, to the satisfaction of the Minister; such failure also operating the avoidance of any arrangement for the absolute transfer of the said Branch Railway."

Motion agreed to.

INSOLVENT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Mr. BLAKE introduced a Bill (No. 60) To amend the Insolvent Act of 1875 and the Act in amendment thereof.

Bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL LAWS EXTENSION BILL. [BILL No. 23.]

(Mr. Blake)

THIRD READING.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 23) To extend to the Province of Prince Edward Island certain Criminal Laws now in force in other Provinces of the Dominion.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. DAVIES said he understood that prospective cost of the jail in Prince Edward Island would be defrayed by the Government until the Reformatory at Dorchester was erected. He thought the island was also entitled to retrospective costs since the date of Confederation. While on this subject, he would take occasion to say that he did not agree with his hon. friend from Queen's that it was necessary to have a local Reformatory at Prince Edward Island. Such institutions were very expensive, as was proved in the case of Manitoba, and that in course of erection at Dorchester by the Government would meet all the requirements.

Bill ordered to be reported.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

LARCENY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL No. 24.]

(Mr. Blake.)

THIRD READING.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 24) To amend the Act respecting Larceny and similar offences.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BLAKE moved in amendment :

"That in the 3rd clause, 4th section, the word 'three' be substituted by 'seven,' so as to authorize the maximum imprisonment being seven years for simple larceny."

Amendment agreed to.

Bill, as amended, ordered to be reported.

WAYS AND MEANS—CONCURRENCE—THE TARIFF.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Resolution 1, reported from Committee of Ways and Means on Tuesday, 20th February.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Mr. Speaker, this resolution and all the other tariff resolutions which are before the House, are, it must be remembered, a temporary measure to meet a temporary exigency, to meet a temporary deficiency which is stated by the Government to exist. It therefore does not of necessity embrace in it the larger question which is before the country, and which, as we all know, is before the House. of the general financial position of the country. But it seems to me that, as the debate cannot be kept within the strict limits of the resolution, it will, under the circumstances, be on the whole more satisfactory to this House and to the country if the present be accepted as a fitting opportunity for a full discussion of the financial question on its general merits. I know this question engaged the attention of the Government, not only last Session, but during the whole of the summer, and also to a great extent the attention of the whole people of the Dominion. It is my intention or the intention of some other hon. gentleman to move at an early day a resolution which will affirm the general opinion on this side of the House as to the proper policy to be pursued for the benefit of the country with respect to the revenue and with respect to the general financial policy of the Government and of the Dominion. I propose to move an amendment to this first resolution now before the House, but in its terms it will apply to all the other resolutions as well. The alterations to the tariff which are submitted to the House for the consideration of the House in Committee have, as I anticipated, created a great deal of dissatisfaction throughout the country. I believe that not only is there a great deal of dissatisfaction among those interests which are particularly and specially affected by the various items, but that throughout the whole country there is a feeling of general despondency, that the measure does not hold out some hope to the struggling industries of Canada. It seems to me that the Government have lost a good opportunity. There is a general feeling of depression in the country, as is admitted by the hon. the Minister of Finance. There is a feeling of want of confidence, and, instead of decreasing, it is expanding and widening. A word of encouragement, or a step in the way of protecting, developing or sustaining our struggling industries at the present time, would have a magical effect in arousing the sympathies of the people. Had the Government taken but one single step in assisting but one single industry, it would have had a salutary effect. It would have redounded to their credit, and have greatly raised them in the estimation of the country, while at the same time it would, perhaps, in some degree have reconciled the people and the various industries to a suspension of their hopes for protection for another Session. Instead, however, of the alterations in the tariff assisting any industry, instead of their holding out a hope to any class whatever, if they have had any effect at all, it has been against some industry. It has had the effect of attacking some of our industries, and of increasing the depression which is so widely prevalent in the country. The hon. the Minister of Finance has lost a good opportunity to accomplish at the same time two objects, viz.: meeting a deficiency, if necessary, by increased taxation and so adjusting the taxation that it might incidentally be of some service to some interest, to some class, industry or manufacture. Instead of that, however, the Government have told the House that they had adopted what might be called, "the fly on the wheel" policy—that they had no interest in it as it were, further than to raise the necessary amount of revenue in the easiest way, the most comfortable way to themselves, without regarding either the convenience, the interest, the comfort, or the good of the country. I had hoped better things from the hon. gentlemen opposite. Although the House knew that the proclivities, or rather principles, of some of the hon.

gentlemen were free-trade, yet some encouragement was held out in occasional utterances of my hon. friend the Premier. Although he is a Free-trader and has announced it in the strongest language, yet, both in this House and out of it, he has stated that it is not possible to introduce a free trade policy to the full extent, any more than it would be possible to introduce a policy of protection to the extent demanded by its advocates. I had hoped that, as the hon. gentleman holds such an opinion, which agrees very much with my own, some attempt would have been made to steer a middle course; that, while not abandoning the principles of free trade, but admitting that the case of this country was exceptional and that free trade in the abstract could not be carried out satisfactorily to the fullest extent, the Government would have shown a disposition to aid the impoverished national industries in the scheme of taxation which they brought down. But if that scheme had been drawn by the most rabid Free-trader, the most fanatical admirer of what Carlyle called the "Dismal Science," it could not have been more strictly in accordance with the most fanatic prejudices of the most advanced Free-trader. Look at the tariff they propose. Look at the first resolution. Here is a tax on malt of 100 per cent.—a Canadian industry which is based upon the use of a Canadian agricultural product—having some claim, one would think, to the sympathy of my hon. friend at the head of the Government, and not only the head of the Government and the distinguished leader of a great party, but the representative of an agricultural constituency. One would suppose that, occupying the honourable position which the hon. the Premier does, the millers and brewers are concerned, and with the farmers so far as regards malt. The duty on malt is 100 per cent—72 cents on a bushel of malt, which is equal to a bushel of barley. It seems to me that this duty recommends itself to no interest and to no party. My hon. friend the member for West Middlesex will see that there is in it a discouragement of the use of the produce of malt, of the use of ale, and that there is a heavier duty proportionately put on it than there is on whiskey and other ardent spirits. Even the most enthusiastic teetotaler would say that if there must be anything having alcohol in it, if we could not have light wines entirely, beer was the most wholesome and the least noxious of all the beverages which are considered by teetotalers as being altogether injurious. This impost is a direct tax against a wholesome beverage and one which is not so obnoxious in the eyes of a total abstainer as whiskey. As to the duty on ale, I have no doubt that the Minister of Finance has heard a good deal on that subject from the brewers; and he will hear a great deal more in this regard, I fancy, before this proposition becomes law. I am told, Sir, that the duty on ale in this country is now seventy per cent. higher than in any other country in the world. I am told that the duty on spirits in England is 17s. 6d. sterling, or $4.38 per gallon, while on ale the duty in England is about the same figure as it is in the United States, which is one hundred cents in greenbacks, or eighty cents a gallon less than the duty in Canada. But here, we have an excessive, disproportionate duty imposed, in comparison with the duty on ardent spirits. This tax, therefore, has no merits whatever. It is a tax on the consumer, and is certainly of no benefit or advantage to any interest in this country. Then, look at the duty on tea. Surely, in the adjustment of the tariff, the hon. gentleman opposite might have found some other subject for taxation which would not have put so excessive a tax on a beverage which is almost a necessary of life in the greater portion of the Dominion of Canada. Its friends know that is "the cup that cheers and not inebriates," and the use of tea has been found to be the best antidote to the excessive use of ardent spirits that has yet been discovered. Yet here we have a specific duty of two cents placed on tea, in addition to the duty already imposed on it, making five cents per pound on this article. Surely the hon. gentleman opposite could have found something else upon which he could have levied taxation. He had the whole range of subjects open to taxation before him, and yet he has deliberately chosen out of this number a harmless beverage, a useful beverage, to impose an extra duty on tea, which is and a necessary of life, and he has imposed it in the most obnoxious possible way. We have a specific duty upon tea of five cents per pound, the same duty is levied on the twenty-five cents per pound tea of the poor man, and on the hundred cents per pound tea of the rich man. This is a direct discouragement to the use of this article, and it is an unequal amount of taxation. If this tax had been imposed ad valorem, according to value, they would have had two advantages in favour of this course; in the first place, this would only be doing justice to the masses who used cheap tea, and it would have made the rich man, who likes the aroma of the finer brand, the Gunpowder, the Imperial, the flavored Pekoe, and the other fancy grades, to pay proportionately for the enjoyment of this luxury; and while it would have had this effect it would also have had this other effect—it would, to a great extent, if not altogether, have remedied the injustice that was perpetrated—if I may use the expression—when the ten per cent discriminatory duty was taken off the tea some years ago, because as the ad valorem duty is reckoned according to value at the place of export, it would have, in part, if not altogether, removed the injustice which I have mentioned, and restored in a great degree our direct trade with China. As to the other subjects of taxation contained in the resolutions I shall say nothing. Not being a commercial man—of course I do not profess to be an adept in these matters—I shall leave the different details of the tariff to be discussed by other and more competent persons, and I have no doubt they will supply any deficiency in that respect in my argument. As I understand it, these duties are proposed to provide for the loss caused by the reduction of duty on petroleum to the amount of $400,000. Now, it seems to me that these hon. gentlemen who desire to be so economical, and who feel the necessity in times of depression to apply the pruning knife, might have applied it a little more than they have done to the expenditure connected with the ordinary administration of civil affairs. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the affairs of this country were as efficiently administered in 1872-3, and in 1873-4, as they are to-day; I do not say that the Administration was at that time more efficient, but I think that it was as efficient as now; and I also think that in the present depressed state of affairs, while we have the deficiency mentioned to meet, these hon. gentlemen might well have placed the pruning knife to the expenses connected with the ordinary administration of the Government to a greater extent than they have done. And, if this step had been taken, and if these hon. gentlemen, in addition to such an economical process, had assisted, by the imposition of a duty, some one—if only one—of the industries of this country, I think that this House and the country would have been infinitely better satisfied than they are at present. I would be very sorry, Mr. Speaker, for the reasons which I have given, to see any of the great enterprises which are chargeable to capital, and which the House and the country have sanctioned, stopped. There is no necessity for any such stoppage of these works; and such a step would only have the effect of increasing the depression which at present unhappily exists, of throwing more people out of employment, and of adding in every way to the gloom which is spreading over the country. If the hon. gentleman had applied his ingenuity to the subject, and had closely scanned the expenses of the ordinary administration of affairs, he might have made in this regard a considerable reduction, and also, by means of a proper readjustment of the tariff, have removed to a considerable extent the feeling of distress which exists in the country. I must say, I must confess, that the policy presented to the House does not at all meet the wishes of the country, because there is a great disappointment, as I said when I commenced my first remarks, spread throughout the country in this regard; and not only is this the fact with respect to these comparatively unimportant changes, but there is also a deep disappointment felt in all the great industries of which I have spoken, owing to the circumstance that there has not been a complete and thorough and scientific re-adjustment of the tariff, such as would assist them in their development, foster them in their growth, and resuscitate them from the present sad condition into which they have either sunk or are fast sinking. If, Mr. Speaker, we were desirous of a party triumph, we might be glad and rejoice at the course which has been adopted by the hon. gentlemen opposite. The Government are playing the game of the Opposition in the country, and strengthening the hands of the Opposition throughout all parts of this Dominion and, although we might rejoice on this account as party men, we must as patriots and as Canadians regret the fact that the Government have not come forward to the aid of our struggling industries. I hoped that my hon. friend who is at the head of the Administration would have laid aside all private opinions, and have risen superior to them, owing to the existing condition of the country. I know perfectly well, although the hon. gentleman is not called upon to confess it in the House, that his desk is loaded with letters of discontent, remonstrance and prayer. I would like the hon. the Minister of Finance to give us a little memorandum of the number of communications which he has received from all parts of the country from persons engaged in all these interests, not alone those which are taxed, but also from those who are engaged in trade and in manufactures, protesting against the insufficient and unscientific alteration of the tariff which has been presented to us; and still more against the omission of the Government to deal with the whole subject in a scientific way for the relief of the whole country.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I have no objection to let the hon. gentleman see mine.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: My hon. friend will hide the names if he does. I will move, seconded by Mr. Tupper:

"That the said resolution be not now read a second time, but that it be resolved, that this House regrets that the financial policy submitted by the Government increases the burthen of taxation on the people, without any compensating advantage to Canadian industries; and further, that this House is of opinion that the deficiency in the Revenue should be met by a diminution of expenditure, aided by such a readjustment of the Tariff as will benefit and foster the agricultural, mining and manufacturing interests of the Dominion."

Mr. MACKENZIE: Mr. Speaker, before the motion is put to the House, I beg to make a very few remarks. The hon. member for Kingston has not, in the few remarks which he has been good enough to address to the House, ventured very far upon the ice in this matter. The hon. gentleman has, no doubt, some fear that if he ventures far from land he must certainly break through; the hon. gentleman has, however, my earnest and warm sympathy. I always sympathize deeply with any gentleman who is pledged from party considerations to advocate a policy he has no faith in. I know, Sir, that it may please the hon. gentleman, and temporarily tickle some of his followers, to tell the House and the country that the Government is playing the game of the Opposition, but they would be playing into the hands of the Opposition without doubt, if they should venture, at such a time as this, upon a reconstruction of the tariff, when there is universal depression in the world, making prices and markets altogether abnormal. My hon. friend, however, has stated very correctly the position I have taken; that is, that we have not really the questions of protection and free trade as political principles of action to define or to expose in this country, and he was good enough to say that this policy, which I defined as my own, was also the policy which he had adhered to, if he had any policy on this subject. Now, Sir, I have heard many speeches from that hon. gentleman in former times as to the very question under consideration, and I am bound to say that they have always been consistently free trade or revenue tariff speeches; and I am glad to find that to-day, after all that we have heard about the adoption of a firm protectionist policy, the hon. gentleman adheres to his old policy. But, Sir, he ventures to say that it is a matter of universal regret that we have not done something to foster the struggling industries, and that we have done nothing to promote the prosperity of all branches of manufactures. I did venture to hope, Sir, that the hon. gentleman would favour us with some particulars, and, as he has had such lots of letters himself that he anticipates that we have had a vast correspondence on this subject, I hoped he would be able to present to the House some view of the particular industries to which he refers, as those which required to be fostered by the Government and the community; but, Sir, a very slight consideration of the general laws of trade and commerce must satisfy the House and the country that if any trade is to be fostered it must be fostered at the expense of some other trade or party. It must be quite clear, Sir, that we cannot make money out of air; the mere passage of an Act of Parliament will never establish any trade, and will never foster any industry unless it be to change from one pocket to another the proceeds of the industries of the country. It may be quite possible,--- nay, it is possible, and has been done, and it is one of the very worst features of the principles of protection,—that one class of people is made to pay for the prosperity of another class of people. I have no objection to the principle of protection per se, that is, if you can make everybody wealthy without making any person poor; if that is the principle of protection, I am quite in favour of it, if the plan by which it is to be achieved can be shown. And the hon. gentleman must be aware that the moving of a negative resolution of this kind is no way to bring out the grand principles of action upon which he is going to found—I was about to say his new, but no, Sir, I will say the resurrected policy that he is now about to commit himself to. There is no policy more consistent with what we usually call the Dark Ages of the world than that of protection as a principle. There is no principle more consonant with the advance of human freedom; there is no principle more in accordance with the great prosperity that prevails in our time—the great intelligence that prevails in every country of the world—than that absolute freedom of commerce which I advance as the right principle, where it can be obtained or achieved, and if we are not able on this continent, in British America, to carry this principle into active operation, it is because of our geographical position, and because of circumstances over which we have no control. That geographical position and those actual circumstances are such as to compel us to the adoption of a policy which can neither be characterized by the name of Free Trade nor Protection. But, Sir, there is one thing tolerably clear, that the policy which the hon. gentleman has to raise the country in time of depression is one which cannot possibly be sustained by argument. He says that our manufacturing industries are suffering. Well, if our manufacturing industries are suffering, the people who maintain those manufacturing industries must be suffering. The workingman must be suffering, and, if the workingman is suffering, is it the way to relieve his suffering to make everything he purchases dearer than it is now? I declare, Sir, that there is no worse oppression of the workingman than the manufacturing or the political autocrat who would usurp all political power within a limited circle, and would restrict that freedom of motion and action which is the necessary result of perfect freedom of commercial intercourse. The hon. gentleman may tell us that, if the manufacturers are prosperous, the workingmen would be prosperous. What are the facts? We find that, in 1860, when the policy of protection, advocated long by the Whig party of the United States, was adopted in its extremity by the Republican party then emerging into political life, the wages of the workingman in the United States were much less than in 1872 and 1873, just before the commencement of the present commercial depression. But, while his wages have advanced by 60 per cent., the price of all the commodities which he may have to consume, all his expenses have risen by 92 per cent., so that the workingman in the United States is 32 per cent. on wages worse off than he was before the adoption of protection to their manufacturing industries. Sir, it would be the worst day that ever dawned upon the workingman of this country if the policy that the hon. gentleman and his friends seem to rather shadow forth than boldly advocate became the avowed and settled policy of the nation. If we are to prosper, we must prosper first by being able to produce more at less cost; and next, by the policy of saving, spending less than we earn, and thus adding to the accumulated savings, and also to the accumulated capital of the country. That is the true policy, and our policy at the present time is to avoid as far as possible placing a burden of taxation upon the people, and to endeavour to make everything as cheap as the state of the revenue will permit.

Mr. TUPPER: Tea, for instance.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman says tea. The price of tea will not be sensibly increased by the tax imposed on it. Besides, Sir, the tax we impose upon tea is one that can easily be removed whenever we can afford it without disturbing the state of trade in the country. But the hon. gentleman objects to the tax on tea today, while last night he urged a tax on fuel. He would not, on any account, tax the tea that goes into the tea-pot, but he would tax the coal that boils the tea-pot. He is determined, at all hazards, to tax the loaf that goes with it. His forefathers and mine, I dare say, did without much tea, but they were never able to do without much bread. The hon. gentleman would tax—

An HON. MEMBER: Oatmeal.

Mr. MACKENZIE: An hon. gentleman behind me suggests oatmeal. Well perhaps so; but mark the extraordinary fallacies into which the hon. gentlemen have fallen. They object to tax what is undoubtedly a commodity necessary to life, but after all a luxury of life; but they insist upon taxing that which no man can do without—the article of bread. There is no bound, Sir, to the extravagant absurdities into which the hon. gentlemen have fallen when they advocate such a policy as the hon. gentleman only hints at after all. But I need not waste much time in exposing those fallacies; I may take another opportunity of doing so. I have merely called attention, therefore, to the two or three points the hon. gentlemen mentioned. I had thought he would make some argument or show some reason why the policy the Government propounded should not be accepted or received by this House. He has shown no such reasons. He says—and I agree with him—that it ought to be the policy of the Government to limit expenditures as much as possible. We have endeavoured to do that. But it is exactly two weeks ago since the hon. gentleman, from the same seat, denounces the Government because we proposed to limit the expenses that could be avoided. In one breath he denounced the Government because we propose as far as possible to limit the present expenditure of money, and in the next because we do not limit it more. Well, the hon. gentleman is ill to satisfy, and I can only say that I am exceedingly desirous to obtain his views as to the precise points where the further saving is to be made. If he will particularize on this point, and give his views where the expenditure can be cut, I will be glad to give them favourable consideration; but, in the meantime, if there is to be no further argument advanced in favour of the amendment he has moved, I do not think it will trouble the House much to vote down the amendment submitted for their consideration.

Mr. ROCHESTER said he had a few words to say with reference to the increased duty on malt. On looking at the blue-book, he found that during the past year we used 1,441,000 bushels of malt, and that of this amount 281,000 bushels were imported. There were about 68,000 bushels used in the distillation of whiskey, which was about one-twelfth of what was used in the brewing of beer. He thought the hon. the Finance Minister might have found some other article besides malt by which to raise the extra revenue required, for it seemed out of all proportion that a bushel of barley, weighing 48 pounds, and valued at 45 to 50 cents, should have to pay a duty of 72 cents. Even the teetotallers of the Dominion did not recognise the wisdom of the additional impost, for they were aware that its effect would be to advance the consumption of whiskey. In European countries, legislators were rather inclined to take off burdens on malt on the ground that beer was less obnoxious than whiskey; but the hon. the Finance Minister seemed to take an entirely opposite view of this important question. Besides, the distillation of whiskey involved the consumption of a quantity of coarse grain, which was mainly imported from the other side. Now, if there was a duty upon corn, the country would derive some benefit, and there was no reason why it should be admitted duty free when barley was taxed so heavily. The hon. the Premier had alluded to what he called the "dark ages" of protection. He was surprised to hear that remark made. He did not look upon the Americans as a benighted people. From 1861 up to the present, the Americans had been carrying on their Government under a protective tariff. During that time they experienced an internal war of immense magnitude; but, notwithstanding the disasters that had come upon them, let the House compare their position with ours. They were far ahead of Canada, and no country on the earth could be pointed to as having made more rapid strides than the United States during the past fifteen years. That was all owing to the fact that they had had the shrewdness and common sense to adopt a protective policy. They would tell Canadians in conversation that they would like a Reciprocity Treaty, but that it was impossible to try and consummate such a treaty. Such being the case, why did not Canada try and protect herself? Four millions of people could not compete with 40,000,000, especially when the latter had the benefit of protection. It was not to be wondered at that we were experiencing hard times under the present fiscal policy of the Government. He supposed that, notwithstanding this fact, they would hear hon. gentlemen opposite say, as they had heard the Premier say, that Canada did not require protection. Some would say that what he proposed was a retaliatory policy.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman looks very flourishing.

Mr. ROCHESTER said he was much obliged for the compliment. Twelve months ago he had brought up the subject of a duty on lumber. We manufactured lumber and sent it to the United States, but it was under a great disadvantage. The Americans placed $2 on a thousand feet, while we admitted American lumber free. This was a great injustice, and he hoped the Government would this year propose some remedy to place the Canadian lumber merchant at least on a footing with the American merchant. He was one of those who believed what was sauce for the goose was sauce for the gander; if protection was good for the United States, retaliation should be good for us. There was a great deal of difference between theory and practice, and the Americans had been practising protection for the last fifteen years and had found it successful, although they were a little under the cloud now, but not so much as Canada was.

Mr. COOK: Will the hon. gentleman explain how he proposes to deal with the lumber question in connection with protection?

Mr. MACKENZIE: By a bounty?

Mr. ROCHESTER said that, as far as he could learn, the Prohibitionists were of the opinion that the change proposed by the Finance Minister in the duty on malt was injurious to the temperance cause. From the revenue returns, it appeared that in 1874 there were manufactured 3,503,365 gallons of spirits, and in 1875, 3,977,221 gallons. Of beer made from sugar and not malt, there were in 1874, $25,570 worth, in 1875, $29,976 worth, and in 1876, $14,188 worth. Of beer made from malt there was made, in the year 1874, $354,765 worth; in 1875, $351,386; and in 1876, $327,709 worth. He did not wonder at such a decrease, when there was such a heavy tax upon malt. The tax was almost prohibitory.

Mr. ROCHESTER.

The brewery business was a lawful one and was recognized and licensed by the Government, and it ought to receive Government protection. A great deal of the difficulty which the brewers had to contend against was owing to the course pursued by the deputy-head of the Department of Inland Revenue. That officer did all he could to harass the brewers, and tried to injure their trade as much as possible. And the brewers durst not protest against the despotic conduct of the deputy-head, for, if they did, they would be hunted out of the country.

Mr. SPEAKER said the hon. gentleman had wandered from the question under discussion.

Mr. ROCHESTER apologised for having done so. He said last year there was a tax of 36 cents on a bushel of 36 lb. of malt, but now the rate was 72 cents. As the law stood at 36 cents it was inoperative, and he ventured to say that there was not a maltster in the Dominion but was liable to be fined for violation of the law. He said this distinctly and was prepared to prove it. It was impossible for maltsters to act up to the Excise Law. The Excise Law passed last Session was not in force, it being done away with by Orders in Council. So that hon. gentlemen sent to the House might just as well stop at home, so far as the Excise Department was concerned, and allow the deputy-head of the Department to make the laws.

Mr. SPEAKER called the hon. member to order.

Mr. ROCHESTER said he would have been glad could the Finance Minister have seen his way clear to put a little more on whiskey, instead of increasing the duty on malt 100 per cent. If the Finance Minister wished to make up this tax on malt, he could have put the difference on whiskey, and then there would have been quite a margin left between the duties in the United States and in Canada—large enough to prevent smuggling, which was really all the Finance Minister need care for. The Finance Minister would agree with him, and so would every hon. member of the House, that there were considerably less injurious properties in beer than in whiskey. Therefore it was wrong in principle to foster the trade in whiskey by increasing 100 per cent. the duty on beer. The Finance Minister ought to have advised with his friends, as he was neither a professional man nor a mercantile man, in order to discover if the tariff which he proposed would be for the benefit of the country or not.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the chair.

WAYS AND MEANS—CONCURRENCE—THE TARIFF.

DEBATE RESUMED.

Mr. DYMOND said it would be rather difficult to treat with gravity what he hoped he might, without discourtesy, call the serio-comic performance which had engaged their attention before recess. There was, it was true, a tragical element in the speech and resolution of the right hon. gentleman. It was, of course, their melancholy duty to mourn over the depressed manufactures and trade of this country, but even there they had had a gleam of satisfaction, for they were told that as a result of the policy of the Government, one, and that the most depressed, interest would, at all events, experience a measure of relief. They were told that the Conservative party, now in Opposition, would derive some pleasure from the continuation of the miseries of all the other interests and that they, like pawnbrokers or official assignees, would be the happier when everybody else was going to be ruined. But there was also a comic element in the speech and resolution. In the first place, there was a solemn declaration that the Government ought to enter upon a career of retrenchment. But from whom did that suggestion come? From a gentleman who, when a Minister of the Crown, managed in six years to increase the public expenditure from $13,500,000 to $23,500,000 or thereabouts; and who added four millions to the public expenditure in the last Session during which he had any control over the public affairs. And to whom were these remarks addressed? Why, to the first Government that since Confederation had managed to reduce instead of increasing the expenditure; a Government which with all the added debt necessarily incurred, and with all the increased expenditure that had taken place in the North-West Territories, with all the expenditure arising from the establishment of that great institution, the Supreme Court, was to-day able to meet all demands made upon it, with a sum not greater than the right hon. gentleman required when he left office three years ago. He would further remark in this connection that the amendment emanated from a gentleman who, during the last ten days, had been engaged from night to night in voting the sums of money required for ordinary expenditure, which he now desired to see reduced, without, so far as he (Mr. Dymond) could remember, lifting his voice in one single protest against the want of economy of which the hon. gentleman now complained. The next comic point in this amendment and speech was the appearance of the protectionist hobby; and from whom did that come? Why, from a gentleman, who in 1872, when he held the reins of power, and when he wished to gain a fresh lease of power, solemnly assured the manufacturers and the farmers of Canada that he was going to give them protection, but who, so long as he was able to give effect to his pledges, after he had carried the elections and no longer needed a cry to catch the ear of the country or to make capital out of protection, never raised his voice or said one word in that House in favour of granting protection either to the manufacturer or to the agriculturist. However, regarding the amendment in the light he had mentioned, he should be excused if he wandered away from that resolution. It was very difficult to solve the old problem as to how many angels could sit upon the point of a needle, and he did not fancy that it would be any more easy task, even for hon. gentleman on the other side of the House to take their stand on this poor little hantling resolution. It seemed to him that not only might they treat this resolution in the spirit of badinage or jest, but they must treat it,—and he used the words strictly in their parliamentary sense,—as an insult to the House and country, seeing from whom it came. It was not merely the peddling question of whether two cents or more per pound should be placed on tea or not, that they had to discuss; and they had not merely come there to settle in what way they should administer to the wants of the Treasury, but also, to what extent they should grant their confidence to the Government of the day. Whenever, as he understood it, they were asked to vote supplies and place sums of money at the control of the Government, and especially when they were asked to increase the burden of taxation, then he ventured to say it became more particularly their duty to ask themselves whether the hon. gentlemen who demanded this service at their hands were deserving of their confidence. It might not be imperative upon gentlemen on the Ministerial side of the House to seek further information before voting these taxes, and it was perfectly right and proper that they should express their confidence in the Government by doing so, because they had never expressed any other sentiments in this relation since these hon. gentlemen entered the management of public affairs; but a proposition of this kind came with ill grace from the right hon. gentleman opposite. What was this right hon. gentleman doing? It was true he talked about tea and beer, as he had tried to talk about cigars and tobacco and the other items in the list, and the reason that he did not go further than tea or beer, was, as he said, that he did not know or understand anything about the other interests involved; but the right hon. gentleman had also inferred, or implied, if he had not expressed in direct terms by his resolution, that, if this Government would only carry out the policy he had indicated, namely, a policy of protection to our manufactures and agricultural interests, they should have his confidence, and as much money as they desired. In one word dissatisfaction was expressed, while in the next breath general confidence was implied. And from whom did this expression of confidence come? They had the right, whenever leaders of parties spoke in public, whether in that House or on the platform, at the festive board, or at a picnic, to expect that, being humble followers or observers of those gentlemen, they should be able to depend on their statements and shape their course accordingly. The right hon. gentleman might not, it was true, in anything he said, inspire some of them with great admiration or win their confidence; but there the gentleman stood, to answer for his own works to the country and he was bound to make good on the floor of the House the accusations he preferred outside of it. The hon. gentleman was not to go to one place and denounce the Government as guilty of every political crime that had ever been recorded even against himself, and then to come down to the House and place on the table a resolution which, if carried, would imply that, if only in one single particular of their public policy the Government would accept his counsels, then he would take them to his expansive bosom, and cry: "Take my blessing, and stay in office as long as you please." He must trouble the House, at greater length than he desired; while he called the right hon. gentleman into the witness-box and used him as a witness, to show why he (Mr. Dymond) could not agree that the Government should receive the assistance they asked until he discovered whether the charges made against them were true or false. If true, they must not grant the money asked, and, if false, the Government were entitled at the hands of the House to a verdict of acquittal. The right hon. gentleman had first entered on the war-path several months ago, when there was an election in West Toronto. As the gentleman then returned was his (Mr. Dymond's) representative, he naturally felt a strong interest in the course he took in the House, and he had felt a melancholy interest too in that hon. gentleman's election. He admitted that the Opposition had then gained a very unexpected victory; and on the occasion of the subsequent rejoicings, the right hon. member for Kingston had said: "Gentlemen, you have done an honour to yourselves, and I may say a personal favour to me in returning my old and staunch friend and colleague, Mr. John Beverley Robinson to help me down at Ottawa to fight the beasts at Ephesus." He was glad to find that there were some beasts whose claws had been cut, and whose teeth had been drawn; and he congratulated the House, in the face of that terrible prophecy, that they were able to write over the seat of that hon. gentleman, what an old showman used to write over the door of one of his cages: "This creature is perfectly harmless." But there was another great jubilation at Montreal soon afterwards, when the right hon. gentleman said:

"The people would rise in their might and say to Mr. Mackenzie, 'Sir, in your two short years of Government, you have committed more sins of omission and commission than were charged against John A. during the last twenty years.'"

And later on, in his speech on that occasion, the right honourable gentleman proceeded to say:

"If you look back at all the charges brought against the Government with which I have been connected since 1854—for twenty years—if there had ever been such charges of corruption or incapacity, and of mal-administration against me as have been formulated, established and proved during these two years against the Administration of Mr. Mackenzie, what would you have said?"

Now, here was a declaration as clear as possible that, in two years, there had been "formulated, established and proved" against the hon. the leader of the Government charges in excess of any that had even been alleged against the right hon. gentleman opposite.

MR. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. gentleman to keep to the question.

MR. GIBBS (South Ontario) said he thought he was only speaking the sentiments of the House when he asked that the hon. gentleman should be allowed the greatest possible latitude in his speech, and that hon. members who followed might have the same consideration shown them. It was, however, especially necessary in the case of the hon. member addressing the House, as his speech would appear in the Globe to-morrow.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I hope that the hon. member will not only be allowed the utmost latitude, but the greatest possible longitude also.

MR. SPEAKER said he knew that a great deal of latitude was allowed in all discussions on the Budget Speech, and questions of policy, and the general conduct of Government. If it was the sentiment of the House that the hon. member should proceed, he would allow hon. gentlemen following the same freedom, provided they adhered to the forms of debate.

MR. DYMOND said he understood that the question involved the placing of additional sums of money in the hands of the Government, and he thought it entirely competent and regular for him to show why it might be impossible for him to vote for the resolution introduced by the hon. gentleman opposite. If he said anything out of order, he hoped hon. gentlemen would rise and stop him, and that Mr. Speaker would not find it necessary to do so. When he was interrupted, he was calling attention to the fact that the Government had been charged with committing more sins during the first two years of their term of office than had ever been alleged against their predecessors in twenty years. From his observation of what had been said and alleged against the right hon. gentleman opposite and his colleagues, he confessed he could not imagine any more shocking and terrible accusations than in past times had been formulated against them. It was necessary, for the sake of the comparison, to recall some of the accusations made against the late Administration. In doing so, he would not go to any mean authority, but would first cite an ex-Privy Councillor as to the course and conduct of the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues when in office. In a certain pamphlet, published five years ago, the Hon. Wm. McDougall said, addressing a member of the Government:

"The authority of the Dominion has at length been established over that vast region (the North-West), and can only be endangered by treason or incapacity at Ottawa. The latter we know reigns supreme in every department; the former is more than suspected in yours. When I use the word 'treason,' I desire that you will understand it in its widest sense. Treason, not to the lawful Sovereign of this Dominion only, but treason to the people of Canada; treason to the interests, civil and religious, of the people of the North-West; treason to human progress, freedom and civilization in every Province of the Dominion."

This gentleman, fresh from the Privy Council himself, charged the right hon. gentleman with treason. Now, he (Mr. Dymond) did not know of any charge as serious as that one having been formulated, whatever might have been alleged, against the present Administration. What was the next charge?

"Before leaving Ottawa," wrote Mr. McDougall, "I took the precaution to obtain copies of all the despatches, draft agreements and other documents relating to the North-West, which, I have since found, was a wise precaution. I knew by experience that it would be unsafe to rely upon official promptitude or perspicacity at Ottawa; or to assume that the proper Minister would be found at the Capital in any emergency that might happen. And I knew—what this case has conclusively established—that you and the majority of your colleagues would not hesitate to garble or suppress important State papers, even when demanded by Parliament, if their production was likely to expose or embarrass the Government."

There was the direct charge that the hon. gentlemen opposite were actually capable of suppressing or garbling important State papers, the production of which was likely to embarrass the Government. It was hardly necessary to remind the House of a further charge that "$8,000,000 were thrown into the sea," as the pamphlet read, "at the instance of Quebec and Mr. Mitchell."

Mr. MITCHELL: I would simply say, do not spare Mr. Mitchell, and I will call the Government to my support in reference to that question promptly.

Mr. DYMOND said he was not making those allegations himself, but on the authority of a gentleman who, above all other men, ought to have known whether he was stating the truth or not. On a memorable occasion, the 2nd April, 1873, the hon. gentleman who now filled the position of Postmaster General, formulated a serious charge against the late Government. On the second of April, 1873, the hon. Mr. Huntington moved as follows:—

"That in anticipation of the legislation of last Session as to the Pacific Railway, an agreement was made between Sir Hugh Allan, acting for himself and certain other Canadian promoters, and G. W. McMullen, acting for certain United States capitalists, whereby the latter agreed to furnish all the funds necessary for the construction of the contemplated Railway, and to give the former a certain percentage of interest in consideration of their interest and position, the scheme agreed on being, ostensibly, that of a Canadian Company, with Sir Hugh Allan at its head; that the Government were aware that negotiations were pending between these parties; that subsequently an understanding was come to between the Government and Sir Hugh Allan and Mr. Abbott, M.P., that Sir Hugh Allan and his friends should advance a large sum of money for the purpose of aiding the elections of Ministers and their supporters at the ensuing general election, and that he and his friends should receive the contract for the construction of the Railway; that accordingly Sir Hugh Allan did advance a large sum of money for the purpose mentioned, and at the solicitation, and under the pressing instances of Ministers, &c."

Reading the plain and simple statement embodied in that resolution, and remembering the confessions ultimately extorted from the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues, he would like to ask whether anything had been even "formulated," not to say "established and proved," against the present Administration of one-tenth the criminality for which the late Government were herein indicted. Resuming the examination of the right hon. gentleman, he now came to one of his charges of a more general nature. Alleging the general neglect of public business by the present Ministers, the right hon. gentleman said:

"Gentlemen, the roar of discontent is increasing in volume, and increasing in intensity; it is complained that the business of the country is neglected, and it is no use to go to Ottawa on public business, for one Minister is attending to his farm, and another to his new wife, and another is making speeches here and a third is making speeches there; and the business of the country is neglected and no business is done at all."

If this were true, then how could the right hon. gentleman allow the Government to shape the fiscal policy of the country; if it were false, how could he dare to present a policy of his own for the adoption of the House? But he would come to another charge. The right hon. gentleman, in the same speech, said:—

"This Government have introduced the system of pensioning in the most obnoxious way. It is highly improper, as under the present system, to superannuate able-bodied men, merely to make vacancies for a throng of office-seekers, depriving the country of the services of efficient men, very probably replaced by inferior persons, besides the loss of two-thirds of his salary."

Mr. BUNSTER rose to a point of order. Mr. Speaker ruled the other day that no hon. gentleman should read his speech.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has a right to read extracts, and very copious extracts.

Mr. DYMOND: I am reading from the speech of the right hon. member of whom the hon. member for Vancouver is a follower, and I am sure an admirer.

Mr. BUNSTER: That is a gratuitous assumption of the hon. member for North York.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. DYMOND said he would next come to an accusation of a still more definite character. Speaking of a certain Senator, the President of a leading bank, the right hon. gentleman made use of the following language, which if true, ought certainly not to be passed over unnoticed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: "I know a bank."

Mr. DYMOND said he hoped the right hon. gentleman did know a bank. The other day he heard a story of a gentleman who was asked in which of the several banks he had most confidence. The answer was that "he did not know much about the banks, but he did know that he had more confidence in any one of them than they all put together had in him."

Several HON. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. DYMOND read the following from the speech of the right hon. member for Kingston:—

[Mr. Simpson] "may not have spent his own money, but he has a bank, and he spent the bank's money, and, gentlemen, you see the bank has got its reward. The result proves that he has been rewarded. Gentlemen, in order to be sustained by certain banks, the Government promised to make certain deposits in certain banks; and it did make these deposits, large deposits, for the banks were obliged to recoup themselves for the amount spent in elections."

The House knew that not only had Senator Simpson purged himself of that accusation on his oath, but, more than that, although the right hon. gentleman had been sitting in the House nearly two whole Sessions since the accusation was made, he had not dared to formulate any resolution in the House on the matter. The next occasion upon which the right hon. gentleman came out as an accuser was at the village of Cooksville, in the county of Peel, when he said:

"They (Mr. Mackenzie's Government) came in with an affectation of purity; yet it would be found that there was not a single act of theirs which was not liable to be imputed with dishonesty. There had not been a single measure that was directed straightforwardly to the public service but there was always some idea of helping a friend, or bribing a foe."

Mr. TUPPER: Hear, hear.

Mr. DYMOND said possibly the hon. member for Cumberland thought this was the natural course for a Government to pursue, and that it was highly patriotic. He believed the hon. member had stated on one occasion that the Pacific scandal had been originated in the most patriotic motives. He (Mr. Dymond) was not charging hon. gentlemen with dishonesty or insincerity, or with having no faith in their own accusations, but he charged them with wanting the moral courage to come down to the floor of the House and formulate the accusations, where at least they might be fairly tried. He was inclined to think that the next occasion when the right hon. gentleman spoke was at Cookstown, in the county of Simcoe. On that occasion he said:

"The moment the present Government came in, there was a rush from east, west, north and south of hungry applicants for office . . . and Mr. Mackenzie was obliged to yield to satisfy these long-expectant office-seekers by appointing them when they were not needed, and he turned out many a man who was just as fit for his duty the day he was turned out as he was the day he went into the office; and gave him a superannuation allowance, in order that one of his (Mr. Mackenzie's) political friends might be provided for."

He asked, where was the resolution embodying that assertion. Was it on a mere motion for papers, was it on mere accusations flung across the House, was it on mere stump orations that charges of this kind were to be made against the Government of the country? At this very same picnic at Cookstown the hon. gentleman was even more lively than usual. He was in the good Conservative county of Simcoe, where he shed a tear over the retirement from public life of his old friend, Mr. Thomas Ferguson, and where he congratulated the electors on the way in which the "beasts at Ephesus" were fought by the hon. gentleman who now represented them. The right hon. gentleman said on that occasion, in addition to what had been already quoted:

"Let any Conservative try to get a contract, let any Conservative apply for an office and they would not get it. The latter he did not object to because he did not appoint his political enemies to office, and he did not expect Mr. Mackenzie would do so either. But when there was public money to be expended on public works to be erected, it was the duty of the Government to see that the most efficient contractor should be got, and at the lowest price. They would see, if they looked at the records of the contracts that had been given by the present Government for the last three years, that the principle, which was not only a principle of honour and economy, but a principle of the law of our land, that the contract should be given to the lowest tenderer who gave the proper security, had been broken systematically and continuously. It was a principle of the present Government to make the first question of the Board of Works concerning a contractor, 'How did he vote at the last election?' A man might offer to build miles of railway or portions of a canal at half price, and by some hocus pocus he was found out to be a Conservative although he was the lowest tenderer. Mr. Mackenzie, the head of the Government, would tell Mr. Mackenzie, the head of the Public Works, that the contract must not be given to that man, but to another who was true to the cause."

There was a distinct accusation that this was not only the policy of the Department, but of the First Minister himself; not merely of the Minister of Public Works, but of the Premier of Canada; the gentleman at the head of this Government, whom the hon. gentlemen opposite were willing to trust with power, Session after Session, if the Government would only re-adjust the tariff in the interest of the manufacturers and agriculturists. Once more, was this accusation true, or was it false? If true, the Government ought not to be trusted another hour, and the hon. gentleman was insulting their common sense when he brought down a proposition which either implied or inferred confidence; but, whether the accusation were true or false, it was unworthy of the right hon. gentleman that he should make such charges out of the House, and yet make no attempt to substantiate them in his seat. A chance misstatement might, it was true, have been made at random. At these picnics people were apt to be a little wild, and the right hon. gentleman was, no doubt much elated by the reception he met with on many occasions. The right hon. gentleman was a curiosity in Western Canada. It was not his favourite hunting ground, and it was said that, if it were not for the Grits who went to hear him, he would not have been nearly so well attended. But from Cookstown the hon. member for Kingston went to Norfolk and reaffirmed his statements. He said:

"I shall say then in Parliament as I do now, that the Palen contract at Ottawa, the distributing warehouse contract at Montreal, the Denison, Belden & Co. contract on the Welland canal, and the steel rails operation fully justify my statements."

Several HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. DYMOND said he was glad to hear so many hon. gentlemen on the other side say "Hear." It looked as if hon. gentlemen were waking up to a sense of their duty, and he hoped they would not have occasion to be ashamed of their leader, or go back on him as the Conservatives of Ontario had recently been reported to have done on their chief. Hon. members opposite had great confidence in the right hon. gentleman, and they no doubt believed the time had come when he should make good his asseverations. He had one more charge to read before he sat down.

Several HON. MEMBERS: Don't sit down.

Mr. DYMOND said the charge he was going to read referred to a gentleman who was for many years a follower of the right hon. gentleman, but now a Minister of the Crown and a member of another branch of the Legislature—Mr. Scott. At Fergus, the right hon. gentleman had said Mr. Scott had "sold himself like a beast in the market," and referring to this same matter at Simcoe, the right hon. gentleman said:

"It is said that I reviled Mr. Richard Scott and stated that he had been bought. That is a very grave charge, gentlemen, but it is a true one."

If that was said seriously, let them discuss it gravely; if it was true, let them deal with it as it deserved. The extracts he had read were taken from the right hon. gentleman's own organ, with a view to their accuracy. The position he (Mr. Dymond) took was that the right hon. member should prove his sincerity by formulating the same charges in the House that he had made throughout the country. This would be the only fair and straightforward course to take in regard to the question before the House. He did not believe there was a single honourable man in the country who viewed with satisfaction the course the hon. gentleman was taking. There was not a single man who was proud of Canada and of her statesmen who approved of the hon. gentleman's silence now as compared with his freedom of speech outside the House.

Mr. BUNSTER said he hoped he would not detain the House by such an harangue as the hon. gentleman had just delivered. It appeared to him that the hon. gentleman from North York had not sufficient brains to deliver a speech of his own, and he was obliged therefore to quote from hon. gentlemen who had brains. Coming more to the subject under discussion, he would say that Canadian barley had a very high reputation in the United States of America, and every Canadian felt proud of it. Brewers coveted Canadian barley in order to make a good article of ale. It would seem as if the Finance Minister begrudged the poor lone widow her cup of tea. When he came to the House there was a free breakfast table, but now, thanks to the present Government, the import tax was five cents a pound. He did not think it creditable that the necessaries of life should be taxed in this way, when the luxuries were allowed to go free. This was owing to the fact that workmen had no voice in making the laws, and the rich men were bound to take care of their own luxuries. The hon. gentleman who had last spoken made a personal allusion to him, and said he was a slavish supporter of the right hon. member for Kingston.

Mr. DYMOND: Not a slavish supporter.

Mr. BUNSTER said the hon. gentleman would protect his own language, if he had any of his own. In coming to that House, his (Mr. Bunster's) determination was to support that party which would build the Canadian Pacific Railway and would make a Union of the Dominion, as they would perceive on reference to Morgan's "Parliamentary Companion." That was the party he wanted to follow, no matter who the leader might be; as long as that leader had the necessary brains to carry out the work, he would follow him. He was not going to support that man who went to England and said that British Columbia was not a fit country for a white man to live in. He utterly scouted such an idea, and claimed that British Columbia had a more genial climate than, and as hospitable a people as, any Province in the Dominion. British Columbia joined the Union for the purpose of securing the Pacific Railway. British Columbia did not expect to build the railroad herself, but thought that Canada, with the assistance of British gold, would be able to do so. It was hoped yet that Canada had sufficient honesty and integrity to build the road, and thus carry out her bargain with British Columbia. Whoever wanted to see Canada rise to be a great nation might well look to our neighbours for an example, who carried on the construction of their Pacific Railway during the war, and built it in five years. With reference to the tariff, it must ever be remembered that beer was the national British beverage. He was sorry to see the hon. member for North York throwing ridicule upon his own country's beverage. How did he know but he was suckled on it as an infant?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I suggest that the hon. member has made a mistake. It is generally at the end of life rather than at the beginning that men want their beer.

Mr. BUNSTER said the hon. member for North York had chosen to taunt the right hon. member for Kingston with not affording protection when he was in power; but he (Mr. Bunster) must truly say that he had found much more protection to the industries of this country during the régime of the right hon. member than he did now. Very few members of the House understood the American scheme of protection. When an

Mr. BUNSTER.

American exported anything upon the importation of which a duty was placed, be it ever so small, he immediately went to the Customs officers and got his drawback. Probably, if British Columbia had known that her industries would have been unprotected, and that the Pacific Railway would not have been built according to agreement, she would not have been so ready to join this grand Confederacy. The sooner their industries were protected, and the railway built, the better. It was not right to allow articles to come in from our neighbours free, while our local manufactures were taxed. The brewer had to pay a tax on malt to the Government, which was twice as much as the price of barley in Ontario; and this, too, when the malt was to supply the national British beverage. Besides the tax on malt, the brewers had to pay a license of $350 a year, and keep up an expensive establishment. The hon. member for North York said that the right hon. member for Kingston would not have spoken about Mr. Scott if he was present; but the hon. member for North York would not have spoken of the Hon. William Macdougall if that gentleman were in the House, for he would find him more than a match for him, either in the House or outside of it. He (Mr. Bunster) would ask all hon. gentlemen on the other side not to give the Government a slavish support on this question, but to give an independent vote, and attempt to revive the drooping industries of the country. He was surprised that the Government still refused to aid the crippled industries of the country, but proposed the most extraordinary tariff policy ever thought of. Whether it was intended to include the new malt tax or not he did not know, but he knew that the manufacture of malt, ale and porter was an industry of a very important nature, seeing that the duty on these articles furnished a very considerable proportion of the revenue of this country. The Finance Minister, to his utter astonishment, had said in his Budget Speech that he proposed to put one cent per pound more on malt, making the duty two cents a pound—just double what the farmer got for his barley, thereby injuring the farmer. He questioned if there were one-fourth of the members of this House, outside of the Government, that knew what that announcement meant, or if there was half that number who cared to enquire. He proposed, therefore, to give this House some information as shortly as possible as to what it really did mean. It meant one dollar per barrel additional duty on ale and porter. The present tax was one dollar per barrel, which the present Finance Minister proposed to double; besides which, brewers of an average annually of eight hundred barrels had also to pay a license equal to fifty cents per barrel, viz., $250 for a malt license and $100 for a brewer's license to the Dominion Government for the privilege of manufacturing; and a Provincial license of $150 for selling when made. These exactions when added together made two dollars and a half per barrel on strong ale and porter—a tax that exceeded that of any country in the world. The United States, with a debt of two thousand millions of dollars, created by the late war, only levied one dollar per barrel on ale and porter, and England, with her enormous public debt, caused by two hundred years of foreign wars, levied not more than half the tax of Canada, where there had been no war but the Fenian invasion. Another fact that should not be lost sight of was that in England an immense quantity of mild table beer was made out of the same malt after the strong ale was taken out, which assisted to pay the duty. That, however, in this country could not be sold at all. He found, by the Inland Revenue returns for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, pages 26 and 27, that there had been a great falling off on malt and malt liquor. For the fiscal year, ending June 3rd, 1875, the malt liquor Excise duties amounted to $29,976.56; and for the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1876, to $14,188.28, showing a decrease of $15,788.28. For the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1875, the malt duties amounted to $351,389.82; for the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1876, to $327,709.47, showing a decrease of $23,676.35, while on spirits, the receipts had increased by $122,671.96.

The deficiency on malt in round numbers was $40,000, and represented four million pounds of malt, or nearly five and a half million pounds of barley. Yet in the face of this, the Finance Minister thought it expedient to hamper this industry still more. It seemed to him a strange policy to increase the tax to such an enormous extent on productions that were languishing, as was plainly shown by the above returns, while spirits, that could bear an additional amount without suffering, were allowed to remain as before. He had noticed that, when they entered a bar-room for a drink, the bar-keeper generally placed down a decanter or bottle of whiskey before them, and said: "Which will you have, rye or proof?" But he had often stopped them by asking for a glass of ale. He mentioned this to show that the bar-keeper knew there were far more profits to him in serving his customers with a glass of whiskey than with a good glass of ale. Even if this was not sufficient to show the unwise policy of such a course, the fact that ale, beer and porter, brewed entirely from malt, were perishable in their nature, so that brewers lost heavily every year by the souring and utter destruction of their manufactures, on which they have paid duty, whilst spirits improved by keeping, and there was no loss entailed by having to hold them over, ought, in the opinion of reasonable people, to induce a more liberal policy in dealing with the article of malt. He again asked every independent member of this House to think of the great injustice he was doing the farmer and a large majority of his constituency, both in town and country, if this tax should become law. It was also strange that every increase was always made by Order in Council, and not by the representatives of the people, as it ought to be. He hoped the proposal would not carry, for, if it did, it would bring ruin on many, to the great disadvantage of this country, and to the injury of the Government for forcing such an obnoxious law on the people of this country.

Mr. McCALLUM said the hon. member for North York had said that this was the first Government which had ever cut down the expenses of the country. He did not think this was the case. If the Government wanted to practice economy, that was surely the time, when the Finance Minister had come down in his Budget Speech and tried to show that there were $3,000,000 of a deficit. Yet what were the facts? The expenditure in connection with the different Departments had been increased under the present Administration. He would lay before the House the returns of the Departments for the years 1872-73 and 1875-76. They showed the following results:

	1872-3.	1875-6.	Increase.
Gov.-Gen's. Office ..	$ 7,851	$10,971	$ 3,120
Privy Council.....	16,789	20,732	3,946
Justice .....	13,406	22,983	9,577

The Departmental contingencies showed an increase of $15,785, making the total increase of $173,848. Such were acts of the Administration who were eulogised by the hon. member for North York; it was unfortunate the hon. member praised them on that ground, and appealed to the people to support the Government because it was an economical one. He would not deal with the tea question further than to say that, if there was no other ground on which to condemn the Government, their action on that matter was sufficient, for it compelled the poor man to pay as much on his low-class teas as did the rich man on the superior qualities. When the present Government entered office, it was heralded from Halifax to the Pacific Ocean that they would govern the country with energy and economy. Let the people judge as to whether they had carried out their pledges. He could excuse the Government if they found themselves unable to reduce the expenditure, because it was difficult for them to keep down outside expenses. But when, in 1874, the Finance Minister announced that additional taxation was necessary, that was the time when the Government should have set their house in order. But they had not done so, and the Finance Minister now found there was a deficit. The hon. gentleman proposed to raise the requisite amount by going to Europe and floating another loan, but he questioned very much whether the hon. gentleman would be able to borrow money on as advantageous terms as last year. It was to be regretted that out of the whole list of imports there was no article on which they could place an additional tax, except tea—not a single article manufactured in the country by which protection might have been given to the manufactures and agricultural products. The Government came down to taking the additional taxation required out of the teapot, and taxing the poor man's beer. The Finance Minister had not even told the House how much he expected to derive from that source, an estimate which was necessary in order that they might judge the probable financial position of the country twelve months hence. He would have pleasure in supporting the resolution of the hon. member for Kingston if for no other reason than that the Finance Minister had told the House he had nothing to do with the prosperity of the country in advising the Crown,—that they were only flies on the wheel, besides the other sins of omission and commission of the hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. McCARTHY said he rose to address the House not upon the principles of free trade or protection, which he thought might more properly come up at a later stage in the Session, when they might be treated, as would probably be the case, more upon their merits than they could be on this occasion, when they should confine themselves to some extent, at all events in his opinion, to the conduct of the Administration of the day. He did not pretend to answer the observations which had fallen from the hon. gentleman from North York. He was not going to say that this hon. gentleman had done wrong in introducing those extracts from the papers which he had read to the House, because, with the general consent of both sides of the House that hon. gentleman was encouraged to go on and detail the old and stale slanders of which they had heard so much. The hon. member from North York ventured in his place in the House to cast defiance at and challenge the hon. members sitting on that side of the House to formulate charges against the Government, but he could tell that hon. gentleman that perhaps it was better to formulate charges, even on the stump, than from behind the editorial "we" of a public newspaper, and if that gentleman would only formulate the charges which he believed he (Mr. Dymond) had made in that way, then he would be in a position to turn round and lecture on this head the gentlemen who sat on the Opposition benches. However, this was a small matter, and perhaps that hon. gentleman's speech had better be left unnoticed, because surely this great country was not going to send gentlemen to its legislative halls to have matters such as the hon. gentleman had referred to discussed. Surely the people of this country expected that questions with regard to the tariff and trade of the Dominion would be debated upon their merits, and not in the manner exhibited by the hon. member for North York, by retailing slanders and by recriminations cast from one side against the other. Surely it was proper that they should deal with these questions on their merits, and this he would endeavour to do in making the few observations he proposed to present to the House. He agreed, as all must do, with the Finance Minister in the statement that hon. gentleman had made when introducing his Budget—that it was a matter for extreme regret, that here, in the tenth year of the history of the Dominion, he had to come down and announce a deficit of such an enormous proportion as he then mentioned; and this matter required at the hands of the representatives of the people of this country the most serious consideration. After only ten years of existence, and after eight or nine years of prosperity, the Finance Minister came down and informed them that one tenth of our revenue was gone, and announced to the people of Canada that they were no longer able under his Administration to obtain such a revenue as would meet the ordinary expenditure of the country. In the sentiment of regret, with which this information was accompanied, they must all concur; they must all feel that, in view of the great number of gigantic works to which this country stood pledged, anything which was calculated to affect our credit and our standing was a calamity; and under these circumstances, as had been observed by an hon. gentleman, that the next time that the Minister of Finance went upon the London money market, he would not be able to present there the statement which he had made two years ago, and show that Canada had always a revenue not only sufficient to meet her expenditure, but also a surplus, out of which she was able to construct large public works and reduce her public debt. On the next occasion that the hon. gentleman went to London, making, unfortunately for the country, another of his annual trips in order to borrow money, he would have to tell the brokers and moneyed men that the position of Canada was now reversed; and that she to-day occupied a position similar to that of a bankrupt. This was a subject for deep regret; and a subject which should attract the attention of the whole House as beyond doubt it attracted the attention of the people of this country. Who was responsible for this state of things and for that deficit? The Finance Minister treated this grave matter in a light jaunty style, as if it did not call for any serious consideration, and as if this was no matter for concern. The hon. gentleman, it was true, had stated—but his tone almost belied his words—that it was a matter for regret; but, if there was any person responsible more than another for this condition of things, it was the Finance Minister, and he thought that he would be able to show that this hon. gentleman was doubly responsible in this case, because he had led the country blindly, or else foolishly, into the position in which we to-day found ourselves. Who had prophesied, who had foretold the depression which was going to come upon the people of Canada? Who, several years ago, predicted that the period of inflation was gone by, and that a period of depression and inaction had arrived, if it was not the Finance Minister? And yet, although this was so, he thought he would be able to show to the House, with the aid of figures and details, which he trusted hon. members on both sides of the House would agree with him were not unfairly taken, that, notwithstanding that statement of the hon. gentleman, and notwithstanding that foreknowledge—if he might so speak—of which the hon. gentleman seemed to boast touching this subject, he had increased, and the Government of which he was a member had increased the expenditure, until it had resulted in the deficit which the hon. gentleman had communicated to the House this Session. He would not haggle with hon. gentlemen opposite, and he would not dispute the accuracy of the statement that the late Administration were to some extent responsible for the expenditures for the years 1873 and 1874. He was aware that hon. gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House were to some extent responsible in this regard, as he knew that the Estimates upon which the expenditures for these years were based had been prepared by the late Government. He had, on more than one occasion during the present Session, heard the observations which had fallen from the member for North York that evening; and he had heard hon. gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House taunted with having raised the expenditure from thirteen to twenty-three millions during the space of six or seven years. He could quite understand the motive for these declarations if the hon. gentlemen who made them were not addressing the intelligent representatives of an intelligent people; but he was hardly able to understand it in view of the statement made by the Finance Minister in one of his Budget speeches. He thought that these hon. gentlemen should be more candid, and that they should not impose, or endeavour to impose, on the credulity of the members of the House by levelling such taunts at the late Administration, and by making such allegations. In his Budget speech for 1875, the Finance Minister had thus accounted for the increase of expenditure in connection with the year 1873-4. He charged to the payment of the Public Debt, $500,000; to Prince Edward Island, increased charges, $600,000; to subsidies to New Brunswick and the increase of the debt of the old Province of Canada, $850,000; to the railroad system of the Dominion, $900,000; to statutory increase of indemnity to hon. members of this House, $400,000; to Election expenses, $200,000; to the North-West Mounted Police, $200,000; to Indians, $100,000; to the Post Office, $300,000; and to miscellaneous expenditure, $200,000, making a total of $4,250,000. There was not an hon. gentleman present who was not as well acquainted with these facts as was the hon. member for North York, and yet that hon. member had ventured to cast across the taunt that they who sat on the opposite side of the House to that of the hon. gentleman were responsible for that increase in the expenditure of this country. But, if permitted to give the figures, he believed he could prove that what he had stated was correct. Assuming, for the sake of argument, that the expenditure for 1873-4 was attributable to the hon. gentlemen on his side of the House, and comparing it with the expenditure for the year 1874-5, and more especially for the year 1875-6, with the aid of the Public Accounts, which had just been brought down by the hon. gentlemen opposite, the party of retrenchment, and economy—gentlemen who from Dan to Beersheba, had blazoned forth that their great policy was retrenchment, and that the gentlemen sitting on his side of the House were capable of nothing but extravagance and corruption,—he would establish that these hon. gentlemen had increased the public expenditure to the tune of $600,000 within the past two years; and, if he could do this, then he thought it but fair—and he did not desire to do it unless it could be accomplished fairly—that they should hear no more of the extravagance with which hon. gentlemen who sat on his side of the House were so frequently reproached. In making the calculation, in order to be perfectly just, he put out of view altogether the Public Debt and charges connected with this debt, such as the sinking fund and charges of management; these were charges, which he deemed to be not in the power of either party sitting on the Treasury benches to reduce or increase; and placing those on one side, he found that, in 1873-4, the expenditure of this country for ordinary purposes, and for charges on the revenue, amounted to $13,060,518; and that the similar expenditure for the year 1875-6 amounted to $13,365,812, or $305,000 more than for the year 1873-4. But this was not all, though it was bad enough. It was bad enough that gentlemen who entered office, pledged to economy, and who were in possession of the confidence of the people of this country because they had pledged themselves to retrenchment, should have, in the space of two short years, increased the burdens of the people with regard to ordinary expenditure and charges on revenue, $305,000; but he would also show that this sum was doubled when exceptional items, as ought to be done, were taken from both sides of the account. These exceptional items were: Election expenses, $153,163; Additional Session for the fall of 1873, $106,178; additional Census charges, $29,368; expenditure on Public Works, chargeable to capital, $345,181; Dominion Lands, $70,322; North-West Territories, $12,262; Ontario Boundary Survey, $2,430; Military Stores, $144,906; and Customs refunds, $69,330, thus making altogether $933,041.83 to be deducted as exceptional items from the thirteen millions which, as he had already stated, were chargeable for ordinary expenditure, and collection of revenue during the year 1873-4. On the other side there were also exceptional items, and he would not be dealing fairly with the House if he did not mention them, and if hon. gentlemen examined the Public Accounts, they would see that he stated the figures correctly. These items were: Public Works, chargeable to income, $122,940; Indian grants, $130,356; Mounted Police and Militia, $44,820.50; Boundary Survey, $54,811.58; Manitoba Settlers' Relief Fund, $83,405.58; Weights and Measures, $99,785, and Philadelphia Exhibition, amounting in all to $600,326.95, which ought in fairness to be deducted from the expenditure for the year 1875-6, and, deducting the bulk sums he had thus instanced, he found that the ordinary expenditure and charges on revenue, apart from those exceptional items, were increased during these two years by the sum of $638,201. If this was a fair statement—and he defied it to be contradicted, as he defied any hon. gentleman to show that it was unfair—then what was the result? The result was this: That the Finance Minister and the Government of which that hon. gentleman was a member, had increased the expenditure during the two years they had been in office by over $600,000, and partly owing to this was attributable the fact of the deficit which had this Session been announced to the House and to the country. He would like to know who was responsible for this deficit if not the Finance Minister, who was charged with the management of our financial affairs? Was it not an injury and a great injury to the people of this country, that a deficit should exist; and were not these hon. gentlemen responsible for it; and should they not, as ordinary prudent men of business would have done, foreseen what would be the result unless some change was made in the tariff? He would quote from what the Finance Minister had said in his speech on the tariff:—"I would beg to observe, that, on looking over the importations of the United States during the past sixty or seventy years, it will be found as a rule, that any rapid period of expansion must be invariably followed by a long period of comparative inaction;" and he went on to refer to the period between 1832 and 1836 as a period of expansion which was followed by fifteen years of depression, so much so that the revenue of the United States did not reach, from the year 1836 until 1851, the figures which were shown for the first mentioned of these years. And yet, knowing all this, and knowing still more—because the hon. gentleman had in his possession at that time the returns from the Customs for seven months of the year—he, two Sessions ago came down to the House, announced as his estimate that there would be received from the Customs a larger sum than had ever before been obtained, $15,500,000. These were his own figures, and these were his own Estimates, although receipts for the preceding year had barely exceeded $15,000,000. Aware that a period of inaction was prevailing, and having the necessary information in his possession showing it to be so, the Finance Minister came down to the House and estimated that the receipts would be $15,500,000 as would be found in page 162 of Hansard for the year 1875. As regarded the estimated receipts for 1875-76, he had shown that these false expectations were built upon the principal item in which the deficiency had taken place, the Customs returns, and therefore he need not refer to the other items of estimated revenue; and it had been announced in the speech of His Excellency the Governor-General on the opening of Parliament, so far back as 1874, that a period of depression was hanging over the people of this country; and in 1875, with the knowledge which the Finance Minister had shown he possessed—that this depression would not likely disappear for some time after the period of expansion with which we had been favoured—he came to the House and deliberately allowed the tariff to remain unchanged, so that, as the result, we had a deficit of $1,900,000 announced this Session. He desired to learn who was responsible for this, if the Government was not responsible? Passing from this subject, he would consider the other proceedings of that hon. gentleman touching matters more properly and more particularly related to the present discussion. He would allude briefly to the loan which the hon. gentleman had negotiated last year in England. This loan, as they all knew, was placed on the English market at the fixed sum of 91 per cent.; and they also knew that the hon. gentleman had departed from the usage, to some extent—his own usage, at all events—in not asking for tenders; and they had a right, he thought, and the people had a right, to require reasons to be given by the Finance Minister and the Government as to why this course was adopted when they perceived the disastrous results by which it had been followed. The hon.

Mr. McCARTHY.

gentleman had attempted at great length to justify his proceedings, and he had endeavoured to argue that this was the best possible mode of accomplishing his purpose; and he had sought to establish that, whether this was the case or not, at all events he had obtained as large a sum of money as could reasonably be expected under the circumstances. The hon. gentleman had said—and he (Mr. McCarthy) confessed that he was surprised to hear the assertion—that he had not fallen into the vulgar error of looking at the quotations current when he placed the loan on the market, and that he had not examined the casual statements of newspapers in this relation of that period; but that, although he was making the sale in the month of November, 1876, he based his transaction on the state of the money market during the previous months of July, August and September. Looking back over the quotations for these three months, the hon. gentleman in November, 1876, wisely, in his own opinion, came to the conclusion that 91 cents on the dollar ought to be expected for the bonds. He (Mr. McCarthy) did not think that any other person, with the exception of the Finance Minister—who had been across the water, and who moved in a superior atmosphere, since no gentleman on this side of the House had occupied the position of Minister of Finance—would have adopted such a course; and he confessed that he would not judge of the state of the money market in November by the quotations of July, August and September. He would refer to an authority in this respect, which he believed would place beyond question and settle the dispute as to the value of these debentures, because it was important that they should have the facts before them, and having the facts it would not be difficult to draw a reasonable and fair conclusion. He found in the London Times that, on the 1st of November, 1876, our debentures were quoted at 94½ and 95½, and business was stated to have been done at 95½; on the 3rd of November, they were quoted at 93 and 95, the dividend having in the meantime been paid, and sales had taken place at 93½ and 93¾ ex dividend; on the 4th November, they were quoted at 93½ and 94½, and business was done at 94¼, 94½ and 94¾, ex div.; and on the 6th of November, the Times, in its financial article, announced that this loan had been placed on the market. On the 8th of November, our stock had fallen, on account of the manner in which this loan was placed, to 91½ and 92½, business being done at 92¼ and 91¾, ex div.; and on the 9th of the same month, business was done at 92¾, ex div. If that was the fair quotation, then they had this established: That, when our debentures were offered for sale they were worth at retail 94¼, 94½ and 94¾, ex div.; and that in consequence of the large quantity placed on the market, they fell to 92¼ and 92¾. What did we get for the debentures? Had we means to squander or throw away, or were our funds to be managed with prudence and economy? While the loan was placed at 91 nominally, the people of this country realized less than 90, and it was not saying too much when he said that $250,000 was lost to Canada through this transaction of the Finance Minister. That hon. gentleman said it was necessary to put a price upon the loan; that even the Finance Minister of Canada could not go to London and make his own terms. Unfortunately for the House, they did not hear of what was being done in London—the extraordinary proceedings in that city were hidden from them. The hon. the Finance Minister said he could not call for tenders, as city treasurers and all public officials in this country in similar transactions were required to do, and get the best possible price for the stock. The hon. gentleman said: "You must put a value on it or you cannot sell at all." That might be so or not. Unfortunately, or rather fortunately, he had never occupied the distinguished position of Finance Minister and could not appreciate the difficulties with which the hon. gentleman had to contend on that occasion. But he would like to know, if it were necessary to fix a price, why the rate was so low? However, he was able to deny, from his own little experience, and from facts obtained from a work in the Library, that it was the practice to fix the price in such cases; and he would cite some loans, in support of this position, which had been made in the ordinary reasonable manner, and not in the manner in which the last Canadian loan was negotiated. At page 155 of "Fenn on the Funds," he found that the Intercolonial Railway and Rupert's Land loans were placed on the market and tenders called for. In the same work, it was shown that the Cape of Good Hope loan was made in the same way, as were also the loans of British Columbia, New South Wales and New Zealand, the latter placing the sum of £3,000,000 on the market by tender. These facts showed that the course taken by the hon. the Finance Minister was not the one universally followed, but was one open to many exceptions. It was hard to say where the quarter of a million lost by the transaction had gone. They had no check whatever. The hon. the Finance Minister excused himself from bringing down the names of the parties who took the debentures. Writing on the subject of the loan, the London correspondent of the Globe, writing on November 11th, said:—

"Hon. Mr. Cartwright has floated the new Dominion Loan very successfully, as you already have learned by cable. Messrs. Baring, Brothers & Co., and Messrs. Glyn, Mills, Currie & Co., financial agents of the Dominion in London, were authorized by Mr. Cartwright to receive applications for a loan of £2,500,000 sterling, in bonds of the Dominion bearing interest at the rate of four per cent. per annum. The loan was issued under authority of an Act of Parliament of the Dominion (39 Vic. cap. 1, sec. 4) passed last Session, and the object of the loan is partly to provide for debt maturing or redeemable in the course of next year, and partly for expenditure on public works. The principal of this loan of £2,500,000 is to be repaid in London in thirty years, and a cumulative sinking fund of ½ per cent. per annum will be employed in the purchase of the bonds or stock of the loan at or below par. Mr. Cartwright issued the loan through the financial agents of the Dominion at 91 per cent. Remarks were made in the city in disparagement of this course, and to the effect that Mr. Cartwright should have invited tenders for the new loan, fixing only the minimum price at which they would be accepted, but the best authorities in the city, viz., bankers not interested in the loan, are of opinion unambiguously that Mr. Cartwright acted very wisely in the steps he took, and that he has conducted the negotiation of the loan very ably and successfully."

The House was told by the hon.

the Finance Minister that Baring Bros. and Glyn, Mills & Co. actually bought some of those debentures—£500,000, or one-fifth of the amount. It would thus appear that the men who advised the price were those who bought; and if the hon. gentleman would consult the hon. the Minister of Justice he would be told that such a transaction would not for one moment be permitted to stand in any court of Ontario.

Mr. BLAKE: Oh, no.

Mr. McCARTHY said his hon. friend (Mr. Blake) had probably altered his opinion since he became a politician, but, if he gave a fair opinion, as a lawyer, in accordance with the decisions of the Courts, he would come to another conclusion.

Mr. BLAKE: I do not think I would.

Mr. McCARTHY said he was obliged to differ with the hon. gentleman. The Globe correspondent gave some further particulars on this interesting subject. He went on to say:—

“Applications were made at the price of issue for exactly three times more stock of the Dominion new loan than the Government of Canada proposed to issue. Thus the matter was promptly concluded, and the public immediately took up the loan. This, in the face of the discouraging rumours from the East, is very satisfactory; for, of the highest standing as the credit of the Dominion is, doubtless the prospect of an early war would have prevented investors from placing their money in any Colonial Government loan on good terms. Therefore Mr. Cartwright's policy is endorsed, by those who are best able to form a correct opinion, as the wisest that a Minister from the Dominion could, under all the circumstances of the case, have adopted, and, as the readers of the Globe know, it has been attended with complete success. The scrip of the new loan is quoted to-day at  $1\frac{1}{4}$  to  $2\frac{1}{4}$  premium.

That was, that the men who paid 5 per cent down as a deposit, and afterwards 10 per cent. on allotment, within three days realized  $1\frac{3}{4}$  to  $2\frac{1}{4}$  premium. And yet they were told that it was a transaction which the House and the country ought to sanction. He thought sufficient had been said on that point to call forth the amplest explanation. Indeed the hon. the Finance Minister anticipated there would be a little curiosity on the subject, and one-third of his Budget speech was taken up with a defence of what the hon. gentleman knew was almost indefensible. But in his quotations of the stocks from the journals, the hon. gentleman was too careful to give only those with the dividend that had accrued on the stock deducted or allowed for. He would now pass to the question more immediately before the House. They were asked by the Government, which had already imposed \$3,000,000 increased taxation to still further increase the burdens of the people. They were asked to do this by hon. members who were continually hurling accusations of extravagance, mismanagement and bad government at the Opposition side of the House. Although, during the seven or eight years of the late Administration, there was always a surplus; although, during that period, taxation was reduced, and notably on the articles of tea and coffee; and although the present Government had so heavily increased taxation, yet the House was asked to place a still further burden on the people. Before the House consented to such a step, they ought to demand an explanation why, with a falling revenue, they had increased the expenditure. He heartily concurred in the resolution of the hon. member for Kingston. It had been explained by the hon. the Finance Minister that the deficit was a temporary one, which would probably disappear next year; but he could tell the hon. gentleman that the wiser plan would be to reduce the expenditure during these hard times, instead of heaping on a tax to endeavour to bring about the necessary equilibrium. It would perhaps be said that the expenditure had been reduced. To some extent it had, but it should be explained why reductions were not made during the year in which the deficit actually occurred. He claimed that the expenditure had not been reduced all it might. There were several items higher now than in 1873-4, and in his humble judgment the Government had better try and make further reductions, instead of imposing additional taxation. According to the Estimate, there was more money to be expended in the collection of Excise than during the year

1873-4. There was less revenue to collect, but, under the administration of the party of economy and retrenchment, it cost more to collect it. It was said that his side of the House had not objected to any of the items which had gone through. That was true. Some of the items, and notably those connected with the administration of the Department of Justice, had been cut down. But there were other items to come to, and it was not too late for the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury Benches to reconsider their Estimates and bring them down to such a figure as would be more commensurate to the means and wants of the people. Speaking as an individual merely, and only for himself, he would like to know why there was still the enormous expenditure on the Militia service. The Government had destroyed the service by their economy. They had left a Major-General, an Adjutant-General, a Deputy Adjutant-General, brigade-majors, and a full staff of officers; but where were the men, the ammunition and the clothing? And they need only look at what took place in connection with the strike on the Grand Trunk Railroad the other day, to find out how efficient the service was under the administration of the present Minister of War. He was as strongly in favour of keeping the service in an efficient condition as any one; that as much money as could be afforded should be spent to make it the nucleus of a body of men who would be prepared to defend our soil in case of invasion. But he did not believe in the policy which left the officers without the men. They should either make the service efficient, or reduce the item altogether. They must remember that the deficit they had to meet according to the present Estimates was not $1,900,000. That deficit took place on the expenditure of 1875-6, which was the largest which had ever taken place, and which he trusted would remain the largest for many years to come. And the Government had come down in their ideas; they had reduced very considerably; and according to the Estimates submitted, if the receipts for the next fiscal year reached the same as for the past fiscal year, the deficit would not have been more than $500,000 or $600,000. Therefore it was not such an enormous sum as to require additional taxation. Now, there was another measure which appeared to him to be utterly useless, although it was a grand thing for filling offices. He referred to the Weights and Measures Act. There was $100,000 spent on that, in order that men might go about the country inspecting the weights and measures. Was there any intelligent man who saw any good in it?

Mr. WORKMAN: I do not think there is.

Mr. McCARTHY: Neither in the law itself nor in the administration of the law.

Mr. BLAKE: Ask the hon. member for Cumberland.

Mr. McCARTHY: I have heard a great deal about the hon. member for Cumberland.

Mr. BLAKE: It is his Bill.

Mr. McCARTHY said he did not think the people of this country desired to hear any more of these re-eminations. This is always what my hon. friend says: "Look how you did when you were in office; if we are doing wrong, you were as bad as we are."

Mr. BLAKE: I only said that it is his Bill.

Mr. McCARTHY said he understood what the hon. gentleman had said, and also his insinuation. The hon. gentleman says: "Although we keep it on the Statute-book, knowing the law to be wrong, yet it was placed there by the hon. member for Cumberland." He (Mr. McCarthy) believed the law would not be kept on the Statute-book for twenty-four hours if it was not for the consequent patronage. There was another matter on which he trusted hon. gentlemen opposite would bring pressure to bear on the Government, and that was regarding the Post Office. The expenses were increased to such an extent that it could only be the result of mismanagement. This year there was a deficit of $500,000 in that branch of the public service. It was very nice to have plenty of postal communication and to have letters delivered at their doors once or twice a day, but, if they could not afford it, they ought to deny themselves these luxuries, as the people of this country had had to deny themselves many other luxuries. This was an expense which ought to be brought more in equilibrium with the receipts derived from the post-office service. Not a dollar extra taxes was required to be put on the country; all the Government had to do was to cut and prune more than they had done. His right hon. friend's amendment contained a reference to another branch, and that was with reference to the re-adjustment of the tariff. He was aware that, not being a commercial man, his opinions had not the weight of those of hon. members who were directly interested in commerce, therefore he felt a little diffident about saying anything on this matter. Nevertheless, it was the question of the hour, and he was glad that party lines were being formed upon it, because they would not then have the "you're another" style of argument used so much on the floor of the House. He was not going to dispute the grand doctrine of free trade nor the philosophy of the hon. gentleman on the other side of the House who especially championed it, and whom he was afraid of very much when he addressed the House. But he did say that there were exceptional cases to every doctrine, and the position of this country at the present time was exceptional, and ought to be dealt with in that spirit. We formed a sparsely settled country, stretching from ocean to ocean, with a great people south of us, who put a duty of about 45 per cent. on what we sent to them. Whether free trade or protection was right or wrong these people were able not only to compete more than successfully with us, with a duty of 17½ per cent., but they were able to compete with British manufactures in England itself. Under these circumstances perhaps it would be only modest on their part—he did not mean on the part of the Finance Minister or of the philosophers, but of the independent members of the House—if they would just think it possible that the people on the other side of the lines might be right and the Free-traders wrong. He thought the Americans had just as good business men among them as we had—that, he did not think any hon. member would attempt to deny. It was very strange, if the Americans were crushed down by their protective tariff, that neither the Republican Party nor the Democratic Party, at the recent Election, made it a plank in their platform to do away with that system. Under these circumstances it could only be said that rightly or wrongly, the whole country had accepted the position and were willing to abide by this prohibitory tariff; and the result was they kept everybody else out and did their own trading—not only this but they were also doing our trading to a great extent. But, without going further in this direction he would ask why petroleum should be selected as an article that ought to be protected. Surely that was an article which Free-traders ought to delight in taking the duty off. Light was one of the necessities of life; we all used petroleum: Then why should it be protected? Why not put a duty upon coal if upon petroleum? The first Minister would say that would be putting a tax upon the fire that boiled the water that made the tea, and, therefore, ought not to be protected. But the same argument would apply to petroleum. He (Mr. McCarthy) could not see why some of the duty taken off petroleum should not be placed upon coal. The same revenue would be arrived at, and an important industry would be protected to that extent. He was not saying whether protection or free trade was right, but he was only suggesting the course which it seemed to him reasonable men should adopt. We had to raise a certain amount of taxation—$22,000,000 or $23,000,000 annually. He did not propose that one dollar more should be raised, but to so distribute it as to afford protection to the industries of the country. The First Minister had come down flat-footed for free trade and for simply taxing for revenue purposes. It was sufficient for any industry to ask to be protected for the Government to refuse to place a duty on that article and to induce them to place it upon something else.

Mr. MACKENZIE: What is incidental protection?

Mr. McCARTHY: As I understand, it is protecting industries while you raise the revenue necessary for carrying on the business of the country.

Mr. MACKENZIE: And we have done that.

Mr. McCARTHY: I understand the hon. gentleman to repudiate that doctrine.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is impossible to repudiate anything I am doing.

Mr. McCARTHY: The hon. gentleman is not doing that, if he will excuse me. When he places a duty on tea is he doing that? When he places a duty on malt is there any protection there? How is the hon. gentleman doing it? In every way in which the Government places a tax, their course is not to foster but obstinately to refuse to foster the industries of the country.

Mr. GIBBS (North Ontario) said he rose to address the House with a great deal of diffidence, feeling as he did that the question was one of great moment to the interests of this country, and having to follow a gentleman who had presented the subject in such a lucid yet succinct manner. When he first came to take a seat in this House, it was as a supporter of the right hon. member for Kingston, then to the right of the Speaker. The country was then in a prosperous condition. But, after an absence of three years, he found the condition of things entirely reversed. The hon. gentlemen who were then in Opposition, had gone across the floor of the House and were clothed in purple and fine linen, and, he presumed, faring sumptuously every day. He would not follow the hon. member for North York in going into the details which brought about that change. He would simply say that the riding which he represented thought it would give the hon. gentlemen opposite a trial, so loud had been their professions of purity and efficiency. Accordingly, it sent to the House a gentleman who gave the new Government a cordial and hearty support. After three years, however, the electors of North Ontario, and of South Ontario also, saw the emptiness of the pretensions of the hon. gentlemen opposite as well as their incapacity, and they now had reversed their decision of three years ago. Sir Francis Hincks, when on the Treasury benches, said that the hon. gentlemen were "a band of organized hypocrites." That was a very strong expression, but, viewed in the light of subsequent events, their course had shown that he was justified in making use of it. Another strong expression applied by the right hon. member for Kingston in connection with certain charges as to corrupt means used in the elections of 1872 was that, "if the House would give him a Committee, he would prove that the hon. gentlemen opposite had spent $2 for every $1 he or his friends had spent in elections." Under the light of subsequent events, that assertion also had been amply justified. If hon. gentlemen had any doubt upon this point, he would refer them to the Controverted Elections Court. The hon. gentlemen had not carried out their promises; they had violated every pledge; broken every promise and stultified themselves on almost every principle enunciated while in Opposition; and therefore they had lost the confidence of the country. If hon. gentlemen doubted this he would point to the reversals of judgments which constituency after constituency had given since the Government had been in office. Among those were: South Huron, Berthier, Chambly, South Norfolk, West Toronto, North Victoria, Two Mountains, Bellechasse, Charlevoix, London, East Toronto, North Ontario, South Ontario, Victoria (N. S.), Queen's (P.E.I.) and last, but not least, Kamouraska. Not only this, but he might cite those constituencies which the hon. gentlemen refused to open. He would refer them to Halifax and to Pictou, constituencies which the hon. gentlemen dared not open. Before he departed from this subject, he would refer again to Kamouraska. The First Minister had stated, in his Ministerial explanations as to change of the personnel of the Government, that the Hon. Mr. Pelletier refused to enter the Cabinet, but when pressed to reconsider, he consented on certain conditions. The hon. gentleman was then elevated to the Senate, as well as being appointed Minister of Agriculture, and it was fair to assume that the condition was his appointment to the Senate, he being afraid to go back to his constituency. He would refer to the discourteous attack made upon the hon. member for Cumberland by the hon. the Minister of Justice with reference to Confederation. The hon. the Minister of Justice need not have made reference to this, as the First Minister to his right and the hon. the Finance Minister to his left, and also the President of the Council had taken the same part in Confederation as the hon. member for Cumberland. It would do hon. gentlemen opposite credit as a party if they could rise to the dignity of their position and be led for once by such an illustrious precedent as that given by Mr. Gladstone in England, and he was safe in saying that the relative numbers of isolated elections which had gone against the Ministry within the last eighteen months were proportionately greater than those which had gone against Mr. Gladstone in England. If hon. gentlemen would follow Mr. Gladstone's course, and, instead of holding office for the sake of the emoluments, they would resign or appeal to the country, they would raise themselves to a very great extent in the opinion of the people of this country. The members of the present Government, when in Opposition, had advocated the elections being held on the same day, but, when they came into power, the thirteen Ministers went to the country on different days, in order that they might be able to go to each other's assistance, thereby, in their very first act, violating one of the planks in their platform. But that was very trifling compared with what followed. Before the late Government resigned, the present First Minister and others stated that, because of certain moneys which had been proved to have been given by Sir Hugh Allan and others into the hands of the right hon. member for Kingston, the election which had taken place had resulted in the return of a tainted House, that the members of the House were impure, and the hon. gentleman in his speech at Sarnia, said :

"I may say in general terms that our policy will be the carrying out in office what we advocated out of office, and, until we have a pure election law, we cannot have a pure Parliament."

In the face of that assertion, these hon. gentlemen went to the country without passing an Election Law. If they had been sincere, they should, before the general election of 1874, have called the House together and passed their Election Law. If the Premier's statement was taken, this was an impure House. He would not say that hon. gentlemen held seats in this House by improper or impure means, but the Controverted Election Courts had exhibited in a very extraordinary manner the fact that several gentlemen on the other side had so obtained their elections, and an inference might be drawn, without being offensive, that other protests might have been followed by like results. But, in a party point of view, they were wise in their generation. It was because hon. gentlemen found there was a wave of public opinion, caused by the slanders and accusations made against their predecessors, before the country had the opportunity of forming a sober second thought, that they decided, in the hope of holding office for five years instead of three, to go to the country before passing an Election Law. When these gentlemen got possession of the reins of power, they found that the late Government had gathered together the different Provinces of this country into one complete Dominion, so far as it was complete to-day, that they had assimilated the different laws, currencies, and other matters, and that they had left everything in proper working order ready to their hands. A flowing revenue, a contented and prosperous people, manufactories flourishing and almost every interest in the country prospering satisfactorily; all they required to do, was to look around them, to behold a development and a prosperity in this Dominion unsurpassed in any country, or people, in the world. This was a very brief view of what this country was when it was handed over to the tender mercies of hon. gentlemen opposite. Now, having very briefly looked at the picture presented then, let them also briefly look on the picture of to-day;

What did they see?—depression in every branch of trade, commerce paralyzed, the country strewn with the wreck of our manufactories, tens of thousands of artisans and others idle for want of remunerative employment, bankruptcy stalking over the land, imports falling off, an empty Treasury, a deficit of five millions in three years—one universal wail throughout the Dominion, from the Atlantic to the Pacific. But there was not time to enlarge. He could only ask hon. gentlemen to look around them and see what was the picture the country presented to-day. Why, it was the very antipodes of what the Dominion presented three short years ago. The only thing in which an increase had taken place, as far as he was aware, was in the extravagant expenditure in every branch of the public service. The hon. the First Minister was always great on the cost of Civil Government, as a test of Ministerial economy. Take, for example, a speech he delivered to the party in London, on the 25th of October, 1870, a report of which was found in the Globe of the day following:—

“When the Government was first formed in '67-68, the offices were filled with a great army of employes, but, notwithstanding, the entire expenses of the Civil Government, including the Governor-General's salary, and those of the Lieutenant-Governors, were $594,445.82. What was it now? The very same items now reached $661,675.82—an increase of nearly $70,000 in two years, in consequence, as he firmly believed, of the naturally bad system of Government that existed under a coalition.”

What, he asked, had this Government done in the way of reforming this extravagance? The records showed the cost of Civil Government then to have been as follows:

1870 (According to the First Minister) .....	$661,675
1873 (Public Accounts, p. 70) .....	750,874
1876 (do do 82) .....	841,995

So that not only had this Reform Government failed to cut down the extravagance that they said ran riot under the régime of the hon. member for Kingston, but as compared with those of 1873—the last year of the late Government—the figures for 1876 showed an increase of nearly $100,000. Did this increase arise from “the naturally bad system of Government” that existed under the present Mackenzie-Cauchon Coalition? When the Minister of Public Works was leader of the Opposition, he complained loudly of the extravagant salaries paid to the departmental officers in Ottawa, and also of the excessive number of officers. For instance, in a speech delivered at St. Catharines on the 15th of November, 1870, and reported in the Globe of the day following, he said:

“Why, the Ministry were packing the public buildings from attic to cellar—two or three in every room—till one could hardly find his way through them. The last time he was at Ottawa he found four men at the door waiting for the little man's behests inside.”

He attributed the enormous cost of the Departments to the corruption of the then Government, as he had said at London on the 23rd of October of that year:

“A coalition was one of those systems that produced this state of things (corruption) as its natural fruit; in fact one might as well expect pure water from a foul spring as anything better than extravagance and corruption from a coalition.”

Well, this Government had been in office since the 5th November, 1873, and what had been done to bring about reform in this connection? The Public Accounts showed the departmental salaries to have been as follows for the years mentioned:—

Instead of reducing the salaries, then, this Reform Premier had increased them by $103,000 a year since June, 1873. He boasted, and the faithful organs repeated the boast, that he discharged a large number of the persons appointed by the late Government between 30th June, 1873, and 5th November of that year. Where was the reduction? He must have supplanted the discharged ones with sound Reform aspirants, for the salaries in 1874 were $70,000 more than 1873, and those of 176 $35,000 more than in 1874. Where was the reform? The hon. gentleman had proved himself to have been a true prophet; when coalitions were formed upon certain principles, and especially when being so they denied that they were coalitions, the hon. gentleman's words in this connection applied with perfect accuracy. Under the present régime, public expenditure had increased, and principles which had been enunciated in Opposition had been utterly disregarded on their attainment of office. It had been properly asked why coal oil had been selected to receive particular attention from the House, in connection with the Budget. He admitted that in the manner in which the coal oil interest had been managed of late years, was such as to require legislation; but it was to be remembered that, when the hon. member for Stanstead last year moved the partial repeal of the duty, the Government denied his motion, although the Finance Minister now acknowledged that in consequence of their policy in this regard the country had lost some $1,200,000. Still this sum was so insignificant that it was not worth while to derange the tariff last Session. But, if it was proper to remodel the tariff this year, why did he not do it last year and thus save the country this large loss now admitted in his speech. Some persons indeed were wicked enough to insinuate that had this industry not been connected with the county of Lambton, the duty on coal oil would have been previously removed. It might be said, and indeed had been said, that asking to have this excessive duty on coal oil reduced last year was contrary to the protective principles of government on his side of the House, but they did not advocate the imposition or continuance of excessive duties that would bring about a monopoly and the creation of rings. They only desired to secure a sufficient revenue, and yet to so arrange the tariff as to benefit Canadian industries. It had been said that the resolution of the hon. member for Kingston before the House was of too general a character; but it was not the duty of the Opposition to frame the policy of the Government. If the members of the Administration felt that they were not equal to the task, and he ventured to say that this was the case—the Opposition would readily change places, and perform that duty to the satisfaction of the country. He rejoiced that the time had come when party lines would be distinctly drawn and the respective policies of the two great parties in the country would be clear and tangible. Under the Government of the hon. member for Kingston the country had been favoured with general prosperity, but under the existing régime, it was visited with wide-spread depression, and a deficit for the first time in the history of this Dominion. It seemed to him, that in order to be true to their past policy, the hon. gentlemen opposite had doggedly determined to disregard the cry of distress which arose from the manufacturing interests, and the general needs of the country. Though circumstances in the country south of the Dominion had greatly changed, to the detriment of Canadian interests, the members of the Government refused to render aid to our industries, and, quietly folding their arms, looked on and said: "If you must go to the wall, go; it is not part of our duty to step in and show a disposition to meet the wishes of the country and alleviate this state of things." The Government was evidently resolved to impose direct taxation as far as this was possible; and, although many Canadians were idle and work difficult to be obtained, they continued making large appropriations to promote immigration as if they were completely blind to the altered circumstances in which the country was placed. Their fiscal policy was crushing out Canadian interests, and forcing citizens, artisans and workmen to abandon Canada for the adjoining Republic. The late Government relieved the country of two millions of taxation on tea, coffee, and other articles, but the first act of the present Cabinet was to re-impose duties on these articles, and that, too, in the most objectionable manner possible. The duty on black tea was now, he believed, five cents per pound, and six cents per pound on green tea, which, it was worthy of mention, was most largely used by the poor man. Our merchants, in consequence of adopting the specific instead of the ad valorem principle of imposing the duties on tea, which prevailed under this Government, were driven from our own cities to establish themselves in New York. Truly "Whom the gods would destroy they first make mad." A gentleman who had been engaged in this business in Montreal, had informed him the other day, that since his establishment in New York, he had sold more tea to Canadians, in four months, than he had sold during three years in Montreal. The hon. gentlemen of the Administration appeared to be very obtuse and incapable of reading the signs of the times, when they persisted in following the fatal course they had laid down to themselves. They marred and retarded the welfare and prosperity of the Dominion, and hence, he thought, they ought to be deprived of control of the administration of its affairs. He believed that the hon. the Minister of Finance dreaded contemplated changes in the tariff. It was true that the hon. gentleman, in 1874, had tried his hand at an adjustment of duties, and his essay had aroused such a wave of indignation throughout the country, that, in a fit of desperation, the hon. gentleman had been driven to commit the crime of infanticide, by strangling the unhappy child he had brought to light. The country demanded some alteration of the tariff, and he simply added 2½ per cent. to the tariff of his predecessor, and the year following, when still greater pressure was brought to bear, when the hon. gentleman was supposed to be in an interesting condition, and it was thought he would be delivered of a proper child, the country was again disappointed. This year the people were not so sanguine, but still they hoped, owing to the amount of pressure exerted on the Government from many quarters, the hon. gentleman would produce something, but they found out that the mountain had been in labour and brought forth a mouse. It was their intention to give the poor people light at a moderate price, but, as pointed out by the hon. member for Kingston, what they saved on light was taken away by what they lost on tea. The hon. the First Minister said that while the Opposition desired cheap tea they were inclined to tax the coal which boiled the kettle. Like many other hon. members, this gentleman could not take a broad view of the requirements of the Dominion and recognise that concessions should be made in some quarters, in order that there should be general prosperity. Speaking for the manufacturers of Western Ontario, he could say they were quite willing to submit to a duty on coal in order to obtain a corresponding benefit, by having a duty put upon foreign manufactures. Those who read the Globe knew that in one issue the farmers' interest would be upheld, and that protection only meant increased prices for articles consumed by them; and that in the next, the mechanics would be warned that protection to breadstuffs would result in increased prices of bread, without assisting in the least manufacturing interests. He had been a manufacturer for a number of years, and had employed a large number of men, and he had never yet heard the labourer or mechanic complain of the high price of bread; those classes knew that the high price of bread meant an increased consumption of manufactured goods, and consequently a good day's pay for a good day's work. With reference to the attack on the Washington Treaty, he might say that the people were no longer satisfied with the simple statement that they were doing no worse than before. Simple assertions could not be supposed to take the place of facts, and the people would be content with that treaty, until it was shown, unmistakably and irrefutably, which had never been done yet, that it was opposed to the interests of the Dominion. He had, as stated, spent a couple of days in the constituency of Bothwell, where the subject of protection versus free trade had been discussed by certain ministerialists; and, although the ministerial candidate was successful, the people had confessed to being in favour of protection, and there was little reason to doubt that at the next election a marked change would be witnessed in that as in other constituencies. It was unfair and unjust that a nation of 40,000,000 inhabitants should be allowed to bring grain into our markets free, and that our farmers should be denied access to their markets unless they paid a duty of 20 cents per bushel. Fair competition was impossible under the circumstances, and no arguments that could be adduced by the other side could make people of common sense believe that such an arrangement was just. Some hon. members might be sincere in their convictions that free trade principles in grains, &c., were best adapted for Canada, and that putting duties thereon would not increase prices here. Then it followed that no possible harm could follow, but the majority of the people believed that protection was essentially necessary to our prosperity, and the latter should have at least the benefit of the doubt, and the duty imposed. American products should be taxed until the United States either abolished their duty on Canadian grain or agreed to a Reciprocity Treaty. It had been the policy of the Government to spend large sums of money for the enlargement and improvement of our canals. The effect of this would be not to benefit the Dominion, but was directly in the interest of the Western States. We were expending large amounts in this way to reduce the freight from those States, and so enable the Americans to compete still more successfully with the Canadian farmers. We could secure the carrying trade just as well when the western grain passed in bond as now. Some hon. gentlemen said if we placed a duty on American wheat the price of bread would be enhanced. Well, he held that the effect would be to secure the Canadian markets for Canadians. If the American wheat was excluded, we would be able to supply the Maritime Provinces without any material addition to the cost, while, at the same time, the farmers and millers of Ontario would be greatly benefitted, The American people were no fools; they were as smart in business matters as the people in this Dominion, and, they know how to make or save a dollar just as well as Canadians. The Americans understood their business and what was to their interests just as well as Canadians did. He knew it was the argument of the hon. the Premier that the price of wheat in this country was wholly regulated by the price of grain in Liverpool. If that was the case, how was it that American wheat and flour displaced such a large amount of Canadian produce. It was well known that every bushel of wheat or barrel of flour the Americans were permitted to bring here compelled a like quantity of Canadian wheat and flour to be shipped out of this country at a loss to the exporter. It was simply a question of time how long a man could exist who became an exporter of flour to England, and it was simply impossible to do it, although there might be exceptions to the rule, as there was to any rule. There was a feeling going through the country, which was growing and would continue to grow, that fair play was needed in our fiscal policy. That would be the issue upon which elections would be fought in the future—very largely at all events in the Province of Ontario—as to whether the Government were willing to adopt a policy which would enable Canadians to offer Americans something in exchange for reciprocity, for Americans would never be willing to adopt reciprocity under the present system. They had all the benefits of reciprocity now without giving anything in return. With respect to the Washington Treaty.

It must not be forgotten that the Maritime Provinces in the main asked for it, so that they might get access to the United States for their fish, and we granted it, although we did not thereby get reciprocity in wheat and flour, as we thought we should have done; but it would have been a dog-in-the-manger policy to refuse the Maritime Provinces the opportunity of reaching the American markets for their fish because we could not at the same time get what we desired.

Mr. GOUDGE: Who in the Province of Nova Scotia was favourable to the Washington Treaty?

Mr. GIBBS: I say the members from Nova Scotia mostly voted for the passage of that treaty.

Mr. GOUDGE: Who were they?—name them.

Mr. TUPPER: I will tell the hon. member for Hants: Every member but three, and those three were defeated when they went back to their constituents.

Mr. GIBBS said he was much obliged to the hon. member for Cumberland, as he did not remember the names of the Nova Scotia members; but he knew it was a fact that, when the right hon. member for Kingston returned from Washington, he was endorsed by the whole Province of Nova Scotia and by this House. With reference to the National Policy, the hon. the Premier and the hon. member for Waterloo had stated repeatedly in the House and the country that the duty was taken off wheat, coal and flour by the late Government, and the hon. member for Cumberland showed the House the other evening that that was not correct. He took it that hon. members, from their high position, should make ingenuous statements, but this statement was a disingenuous one, and calculated and intended to convey to the country an incorrect impression as to the facts. The duties were not repealed through any action of the late Government, but in spite of them; they were repealed because a majority of the members of the House, irrespective of party lines, were in favour of this being done, and the late Government did all they could to prevent it.

The hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches were opposed to a National Policy, whereby our manufacturing, commercial and agricultural interests, would be fostered; that was the difference between them and the hon. gentlemen of the Opposition, but the time had come when something like fair play was required. Their policy was one which would meet with the condemnation of the country, and therefore, it might be to the advantage of the Opposition that the Government persisted in pursuing their suicidal policy; but gentlemen on his side of the House would prefer to see the interests of the country advanced, rather than a party advantage gained. He would say a few words with reference to the Pacific Scandal. He said in 1874, and he repeated the assertion now, that sums of money were improperly used, which he did not attempt to justify, but if anything could have justified it, it was the knowledge the hon. member for Kingston had of the vast sums the Government opposite were spending improperly. But it did not lie in the mouths of hon. gentlemen opposite to talk about corruption. The chief of the party wrote the famous "Big Push" letter, and this was illustration enough of the insincerity of the party in their assumption of purity. A gentleman of his acquaintance said to him, that there was but one thing required to complete their degradation, and to fill up their cup of iniquity, and that was to take George Washington McMullen into the Cabinet or give him a seat in the Senate. Speaking of the "Scandal," it was natural to refer to the Pacific Railway. The policy of his right hon. friend from Kingston as to that railway was denounced, and if his memory served him right one of the very provisions denounced in the old charter, viz: that it should not be built other than by a company and not by the Government, had been introduced by the Minister of Justice.

Mr. BLAKE: The late Minister of Justice—Mr. Dorion.

Mr. GIBBS said if the hon. gentlemen were going to complete the road as a Government work it would cause a strain which this country could not bear; it would involve the country in a debt which would bring about a continuous deficit. He wanted to say a little more about protection and taxation, and it could not be repeated too often. What we required was a revenue which would enable the business of the country to be carried on, and at the same time would bring about a healthful state in our manufactures and industries generally. To do this it would not be necessary to raise the taxes one iota. It was not proposed to increase the aggregate taxation, but so to adjust the tariff as to assist manufactures, commerce and agriculture. The Finance Minister had said that the per capita business of this country was larger than in the United States. He doubted this statement, but, admitting that it was true, it must be remembered that a large portion of the inhabitants in the Southern States were neither producers nor consumers. There was one fact especially which would show that the state of our trade and commerce was not so good as in the United States, and that was the number of bankruptcies last year, as reported by Dun, Wiman & Co. The failures in the United States were one to every sixty-three trades, while in Canada they were one to every thirty-two. In other words, there were twice as many failures, relatively, in Canada, as in the United States, and relatively for 60 per cent. more than in the United States. This was a proof that the United States, with their exorbitant protection, had been able to hold their own. He had a firm faith that the National Policy could be inaugurated and successfully carried through; and until that policy was the ruling policy of this country, our industries would never assume that importance which they deserved. He should vote for the amendment of the hon. the member for Kingston.

Mr. GREENWAY said he hoped the House would bear with him while he offered a few remarks which applied peculiarly to himself, in order that he might set himself right upon the question before the House. He had a lively recollection of the question involved in the amendment which the right hon. member for Kingston had chosen to propose. In entering the House, he desired to divest himself as much as possible of any party prejudices he might entertain. He was one of those who held that, in the history of this country, it had happened sometimes that the interests of the people had been sacrificed to the interests of the party, and that occasionally there had been too much recrimination, too much accusing each other of faults, meanwhile forgetting the interests of the country in which we all prided ourselves. No other evidence was required than some of the scenes which had been witnessed in the House to determine that the view he entertained was a correct one. The question under discussion was one on which he had committed himself to his constituents long before it became a party question in this country. It was one upon which he happened to address his constituents upon various occasions, and for that reason he was in a position to set himself right with respect to his vote on that question. He entered the House as an Independent member desirous of deciding questions on their merits, and supporting measures which he considered were in the interests of the country, emanating from what source they might. He was introduced as an Independent member and so voted during the Session of 1875. A few days before the tariff question came before the House in the Session of 1876, he had the opportunity of addressing upon it a very large number of his constituents of both political creeds. This was before it had become a party question, and before it was understood which side the Government was going to take upon it. He found that that large assemblage were Free-traders without a dissenting voice. That view he advocated before the meeting, and thoroughly committed himself to it, believing that it was the proper view for any one having the interests of the country at heart to hold. He found it very difficult to understand how the hard times, which bore so heavily upon some people, were going to be improved by placing additional burdens upon them. Thus committed on the question, he felt it to be his duty, when the right hon. member for Kingston proposed his amendment last Session, to vote against it, as it involved, in his estimation, if anything, the principle of protection. Outside of the House his motives were impugned; he was read out of the party with which he had acted previously, and he was denounced as a traitor because he did not choose to become a traitor to the principles of a life-long profession. It was said that he had sold himself to the Government, that the Government had offered him a position for his vote on that particular occasion, and as soon as the Session of 1876 was over he was to step down and out, to receive his reward for being a traitor, and make room for some other gentleman. Time had shown whether the accusation brought against him on that occasion was correct or not. He desired now to meet the question as he met it then. He desired to record his vote as he believed in the interests of the country in such a way that he would be enabled to give his constituents an intelligent reason for the vote he had given. The views expressed by the hon. the Premier during the debate were the views which he (Mr. Greenway) held, and for that reason he felt it to be his duty again to vote against the amendment of the right hon. member for Kingston, as he believed it involved the same principle as was involved last Session. The only pledge he made to his constituents when elected was, that he would endeavour to record his vote so that he would be enabled to give a reason why he did so. If he advocated free-trade principles on behalf of the agricultural constituency which he represented, and which was one of the finest in the Dominion, his constituents believed in the same principles. They had been told that the farmers were misled. He could tell the hon. member for Kingston and the House, that the farmers understood what they wanted, and that they did not want the articles which they consumed increased in price by the action of the Government, especially in such hard times as these. He agreed with the hon. member for North York that it was a very small matter to talk about the two cents duty on tea. There never was a time in the history of the country when tea was cheaper than at present. He had made the remark when the question was discussed of the probable changes of the tariff that tea was an article which would bear a slight taxation better than anything else that could be named; the additional tax of two cents per pound would not increase the burdens of the people. It might affect the profit in a very slight degree of the retailer, but it would not increase the price to the consumer, any more than the one cent per pound duty upon malt would make a glass of beer more than five cents; the hon. member for Carleton had declared that the duty on malt almost amounted to prohibition. If it went a little further, even as far as prohibition, it would receive from him a hearty support. He would not attempt to discuss the other changes in the tariff, being a novice in Parliament, further than to say that he thought the action of the Government in regard to coal oil was a step in the right direction, and the people, especially those of the country districts, who could buy that necessary article for about one-half the price to-day that it was about a month ago, would appreciate the action of the Government in that particular. He had only to add that his vote on this occasion would be recorded in the same way as it was last Session, and he hoped he would not record his vote for any measure for which he would not be able to give a satisfactory account to his constituents.

Mr. CHARLTON moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion to adjourn debate agreed to.

House adjourned at Fifteen minutes after
Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, 5th March, 1877.

The Speaker took the chair at Three o'clock.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 61) To incorporate the Canadian Securities Company (Limited).—(Mr. Casgrain.)

Bill (No. 62) Respecting the Northern Railway of Canada.—(Mr. Macdonald, Toronto.)

Bill (No. 63) To authorize municipalities to pass by-laws to provide means of escape for persons falling into the water in the vicinity of wharves and docks.—(Mr. Cook.)

Bill (No. 64) To amend the Acts relating to the Supreme and Exchequer Courts.—(Mr. Blake.)

ISSUE OF WRITS DURING THE SESSION.

SPEAKER'S RULING.

Mr. SPEAKER: Some doubt having been expressed as to the duty of the Speaker in case of vacancies occurring when the House is in Session, I felt it my duty to look into the matter, and I find that not only is our law peremptory, leaving to the Speaker no discretion whatever, requiring him absolutely to issue his warrant as soon as practicable after the fact of a vacancy is made known to him, but I find there was a misconception on the part of some hon. members as to the law in England. The law generally in regard to vacancies is that, during the Session, a writ must always be moved for in the House. During the recess, "when vacancies occur by death, by elevation to the Peerage, or the acceptance of office, the law provides for the issue of writs without the immediate authority of the House," but only in these three cases, and not in the case of the acceptance of the nominal office of Steward of the Children Hundreds—the only mode by which members can avoid their seats, not having the power, as in our case, of resigning. But I find there was a mistake, or, rather, a misapprehension, as to what the provisions of the Controverted Elections Act of the Imperial Parliament on this subject are. The hon. member for Kingston seemed to be of the opinion that the provision in our Act was virtually a transcript of the provision in the Imperial Act as to the duty of the Speaker, but in that he was entirely mistaken. The British Controverted Elections Act is very much the same as to the duty of the Judges. It provides that the Judges are to forward their judgment to the Speaker, and so on, but the duty of the Speaker is defined by the 13th Section:—

"The House of Commons, on being informed by the Speaker of such Certificate and Report or Reports, if any, shall order the same to be entered in their Journals, and shall give the necessary directions for confirming or altering the Return, or for issuing a writ for a new election, or for carrying the determination into execution, as circumstances may require."

Our Statute makes that the express duty of the Speaker, so there is an essential difference.

Mr. CAUCHON: That says it is by the direction of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: But we have a Statute which makes it imperative for me to issue my warrant. The English Act is entirely different.

PRIVATE BILLS.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

The following Bills were severally considered in Committee of the Whole, and reported:—

Bill (No. 13) To incorporate The Dominion of Canada Civil Service Mutual Benefit Association.—(Mr. Wood.)

Bill (No. 17) To extend the provisions of Section 56, of the Act 24 Victoria, Chapter 5, intituled: An Act relating to Banks and Banking, to the Bank of British North America.—(Mr. Fraser.)

CONSTRUCTION OF BRANCH LINE OF RAILWAY.

QUESTION.

Mr. BLANCHET asked whether it was the intention of the Government to include in the Supplementary Estimates a sum of money for the construction of a branch line of railway from St. Charles, county of Bellechasse, to St. Joseph de Lévis, in order to avoid the detour by the Chaudière.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is not the intention of the Government to ask for any grant of money from this House for such a purpose.

THE FORM OF PUTTING QUESTIONS.

Mr. SPEAKER remarked that there was no necessity for placing the clause, "in order to avoid the detour by the Chaudière," in the question. Members, in proposing questions, should avoid including in them debateable matter.

Mr. BLANCHET said the clause mentioned was essential. The detour to which he alluded was well known.

Mr. BLAKE: The hon. gentleman should remember that the longest way round is the shortest way home.

Mr. MASSON said the clause to which reference was made included a point of fact.

Mr. SPEAKER: With regard to these questions, the Clerk in the British House of Commons is instructed to alter them without the consent of the member, if that cannot be obtained, in order to make them conform to the rule, which excludes from them debateable matter. I think it desirable to conform as strictly as possible to so wholesome a practice.

Mr. PALMER said this question of order was of very considerable consequence. Rule 29 stated in such relation, that "no argument or opinion is to be offered, nor any facts stated, except so far as may be necessary to explain the same." He contended that it was entirely useless to ask questions, unless members could state in them such facts as were necessary to explain the object they had in view to the Government and the House.

Mr. SPEAKER said it was not at all necessary to have asked more than whether it was the intention of the Government to build a branch line from one point to another. In going beyond that, a statement open to debate was made. If, however, a member of the Government, whose duty it was to give the answer, said that he did not quite understand what a question meant, then an hon. member might explain what he meant, but no more. The inexpediency and impropriety of putting on the paper questions containing statements and assertions open to discussion was very obvious. Therefore, the rule, that nothing of a debateable or argumentative character should be allowed in questions was strictly observed.

Mr. BLANCHET said he thought that his question had been framed in accordance with the rule mentioned. If the few words to which the Speaker had alluded had been omitted, the question would have been of no interest whatever to the public. If the detour he had instanced were avoided it would be in the interests of trade and of the public.

Mr. SPEAKER: That is a point open to argument.

Mr. BLANCHET: Not at all; it is a fact.

Mr. SPEAKER: My view does not agree with the opinions of the hon. members from St. John and Bellechasse.

Mr. MASSON said that if the rule mentioned were enforced the scope of action on the part of hon. members would be too greatly limited.

Mr. SPEAKER: This matter may, perhaps, be again brought before the House.

REEF NEAR RIVIÈRE DU LOUP.

QUESTION.

Mr. POULIOT asked whether it was the intention of the Government to place a light-ship on the reef lying between Rivière du Loup and the Brandy Pots.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland): It is not the intention of the Government to place a light-ship at the point named.

THE DUFFERIN IMPROVEMENTS IN QUEBEC.

QUESTION.

Mr. CARON asked whether it was the intention of the Government to ask for a sum of money to begin the improvements known as the Dufferin improvements in the city of Quebec.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I do not know what are called the Dufferin improvements; but, assuming that the improvements spoken of refer to the proposed changes of gateways and fortifications,

I have only to say that it is not the intention of the Government to ask for any money for that purpose at present.

FOG WHISTLE AT COFFIN'S ISLAND.

QUESTION.

Mr. FORBES asked whether the Government intended erecting a fog whistle at Coffin's Island at the entrance of Liverpool Bay, Nova Scotia, during the coming summer, or when.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland): The Government do not now intend to erect a fog whistle at the place mentioned. I may say, however, that the Government are impressed with the importance of having one there, but they are not at present prepared to build it.

THE VETERANS OF 1812-15.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. DELORME, in the absence of Mr. ST. JEAN, moved for a return showing the names of all the veterans who have proved their right to partake in the grant of $50,000 voted last Session by Parliament in favour of Militiamen of 1812 and 1815, and the action taken in each case during the current financial year.

Mr. VAIL: A return containing the names of these veterans is already prepared, and will be shortly laid on the table of the House.

Motion agreed to.

MANITOBA LANDS.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. SHULTZ moved for a return of all lands surrendered by the Dominion Government to Manitoba for road purposes. He said he had occasion to bring up the matter of main lines of roads in Manitoba last Session in a somewhat different way. He had then pointed out the peculiar position in which the new Canadian and other settlements were placed in relation to the navigable streams and existing highways of the Province, and explained that, owing to the reservations made by the Government for the children of half-breed heads of families under the Act granting 1,500,000 acres for that purpose, these new settlements were separated from the highways and rivers by a tract which, in its present state, was often impassable in wet weather, and dangerous to life to traverse during a winter storm. As the roads through Dominion lands had been turned over by the Dominion Government to the Local Government, it might be asked why, since the Local Government had accepted this trust, they did not improve them so as to be of use to the settlements to which they ran. A very natural and simple explanation was to be found in the fact that the Local Government seemed to have no money to spare for this purpose. It must be remembered that Manitoba stood alone in the fact that she of all the Provinces did not control her public lands. He thought the responsibility of providing through these lands at least main lines of roads rested with the Government of the Dominion, and even if that general principle were not admitted, it was obvious that the Dominion could not shirk the responsibility of making roads through lands which six years ago were granted to the half-breed children. The owners of these lands were minors, and no aid towards roads was possible from them. The settlements beyond, scattered and hemmed in by the railway reserve, were powerless in themselves for this purpose, and hence he felt himself perfectly justified in urging, as he did now urge, that a sum of money should be appropriated for this purpose. The expense need not be very great, and, if given to the local municipalities where they existed, or to responsible parties in the townships where they did not, the money would be expended where most necessary. In one part of the country where this need was felt the Government would itself find the advantage of a good road to the Provincial Penitentiary. Such a road, with a telegraphic communication with the Penitentiary, would serve as a nucleus of other roads on the west side of the Red River. He believed it to be an act of simple justice to the settlements lying east and west of Red River, hemmed in, hampered and weakened as they were by the railway reserve, to grant a sum of money adequate to the building of at least main lines of road. Having said this much in reference to the matter of roads, he would venture to touch upon a matter indirectly connected with that subject. It had been explained that the new settlements of which he had spoken had been formed in their present position in the emergency of the resolution which had been made to supply the 1,400,000 acres granted to the half-breed minors. The failure up to this time to distribute these lands to those who were to receive them had increased the disadvantages of the new settlements, while it had been entirely unfair to the parties themselves. There would seem no good reason for any longer delay in the distribution of these lands, and he would urge that not only should such distribution be made at once, but that his hon. friend the Minister of the Interior should not wait for the tedious process of the issue of patents, but that, immediately on the clearing of the settlements, lists should be published in the local papers, thus placing the recipient—who might, in the six years that had elapsed since the Act was passed, have come of age—in a position to at once occupy his land, while at the same time allowing the parents of the younger ones to at once take steps to preserve for their children such wood as might have been left on these lands. He would respectfully urge on the Minister of the Interior the necessity for a settlement of all the questions which were vexatious alike to immigrants and to old settlers, and damaging to the best interests of Manitoba.

Motion agreed to.

SEIZURE OF A DISTILLING APPARATUS.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. MASSON moved for copies of all correspondence relating to the seizure in December last of certain distilling apparatus, the property of François Meloche and Ferdinand Lavoie, of St. Anne, county Jacques Cartier, including all instructions to, and reports from the Revenue Officers relating to same.

Mr. LAFLAMME: I must inform the hon. member that no such property as belonged to the two individuals he has mentioned, was ever seized in the county of Jacques Cartier. One still, however, was seized in the parish of Ste. Anne, but it belonged to a different man. The only correspondence in the possession of the Department in this regard, is a letter received from an informer, and it is against the rules of the Department to communicate such information to the House until the investigation is finished.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

SECRET SERVICE FUNDS.

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE.

Mr. CHARLTON moved:

“That the following items of expenditure of Secret Service Funds be referred to the Committee on Public Accounts, viz.: the item of $15,086.41 for the year 1868, the item of $33,103.88 for the year 1869, the item of $10,208.54 for the year 1870, and the item of $75,000 for the year 1871.”

He said the facts which had recently come to the knowledge of the House in connection with the Secret Service Fund would render it apparent that it was proper to refer those items to the Committee in the same manner and upon the same basis as it would have been proper to have referred them in the respective years when the expenditure was made, leaving the Committee to deal with them in the same manner as might then have been done.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD called the attention of the Government to the character of this motion. It was one such as had never been made in England, and he thought it the duty of the Government to resist it. As far as the late Government was concerned, it was perfectly indifferent as to whether the motion passed or not, but, as far as his hon. friend at the head of the Government was concerned, it was his (Mr. Mackenzie's) duty to see that the powers of the Government, no matter whose hands they were in, were not infringed upon, or the public service in any way prejudiced. If, however, the hon. gentleman thought the motion a proper one to pass, he (Sir John A. Macdonald) would make no objection to it.

Mr. MACKENZIE said it had been the practice of the House, when any member wished to refer an item in previous Public Accounts to the Committee, to make a motion for that purpose. The only reason the hon. gentleman suggested why the Government should consider whether the question should not properly be resisted was the character of the items. Well, the character of the item was this: a certain sum was asked from Parliament, which was given, willingly or unwillingly, for the purpose of conducting a secret detective system, or something of the kind, during the time of the trouble on the frontier. It would be recollected that, early in the Session of 1872, he (Mr. Mackenzie) called the attention of the Public Accounts Committee to the necessity of having the same system of supervision here that was in operation in England. He could see no reason why the Parliament of Canada should not in the same manner audit this particular account; and he therefore took the necessary steps to bring the matter before the Committee. The hon. gentleman then at the head of the Administration (Sir John A. Macdonald) took his stand before the Committee, and declared he would not divulge any further information about the fund. At the same time, the hon. gentleman stated that the system he (Mr. Mackenzie) advocated should be put in operation in the future—that all future payments should be audited in the way described in the English parliamentary books. He was surprised when, a few months afterwards, the hon. gentleman characterized his statement in very strong terms at a public meeting at the town of St. Thomas, and he (Mr. Mackenzie) was obliged to take the parliamentary authorities down to a subsequent meeting there in order to show that he was neither ignorant nor untruthful, as the hon. gentleman charged. So the matter continued. They had no further information from that date until very recently that any portion of the money had been expended. It was only a little over a year ago that it came to his knowledge, in a way already known to the House, that a considerable portion of this money was lying to the credit of the hon.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

gentleman opposite at one of the banks, and had been there, entirely unknown to the officers of the Crown, for over three years. As soon as he obtained this information, he took steps to have the resolution of the House, which was passed in 1872, carried into effect. He failed to accomplish that. Those facts had been brought before Parliament and the country. He knew nothing of the motion of the hon. member for North Norfolk, and he did not know why that hon. gentleman wished to bring the matter before the Committee, unless it was to discuss the whole question of Secret Service Estimates and the mode of their disposal. While he was bound as Minister of the Crown, as leader of the Government, not only to protect the policy of his own Administration, but bound to protect the policy of the Administration of the country or Government in the abstract, he had never agreed with the policy that the hon. gentleman opposite and his Administration adopted in regard to this matter. He was, therefore, not concerned in protecting the mode of disposing of this money, of which he did not approve. It was a fair matter of argument whether that was best, proper or improper, and that being the case he could see no such grounds on which the Administration should resist a motion of this kind. In saying that much, he said nothing at all about what he might feel called upon to do at subsequent stages of any inquiry that might result from the motion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said, that, on behalf of the late Government and himself, he had not the slightest objection to the matter being referred to the Committee, and that the whole subject of the mode of audit in England should be gone into.

Mr. BLAKE said the Committee on Public Accounts could, in each of the years named, have initiated an investigation into the items and decided the principle upon which that investigation should take place. No such investigation took place, and circumstances had transpired which the hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) admitted might fairly call for an enquiry into items which were not enquired into, although referred. All that the motion would do would be to give the Committee for this year the same power with reference to those items that the Committees of previous years had.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD : Certainly.

Mr. BLAKE : Then, I want to know on what principle the hon. gentleman said the Government ought to resist the motion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the Premier himself was a member of the Public Accounts Committee in the years in which this item appeared in the Public Accounts, and he had not thought it his duty in the public interest to go into an investigation of it. He (Mr. Mackenzie) pressed each year an investigation in regard to all those items with reference to which he thought there ought to be an enquiry, but he had not pressed for an investigation into this item. The reason he (Sir John A. Macdonald) supposed was from a sense that the subject was not one that could be fairly discussed openly in Committee. The general principle of such a motion was wrong, and owing to the peculiar nature of the subject-matter he thought the Government ought to resist it. As far as the late Government or individuals of it was concerned, they were perfectly indifferent about the matter.

Mr. YOUNG said he thought the case was somewhat altered now from what it was when brought before the Public Accounts Committee in 1872. The general belief then was, from the statements of the hon. gentleman opposite, that the whole of the fund had been expended. The hon. gentleman always spoke in the past tense in reference thereto, and it was well known that, in taking up the subject at that time, the Committee made a unanimous deliverance upon it. Whilst the hon. gentleman declined, and possibly with some propriety, to give information as to how the fund had been expended in the past, the Committee were unanimously of opinion that a different course should be pursued in the future, and that to some extent the English practice should be followed. He found, since looking up the record, that in England they were extremely careful with regard to Secret Service expenditure and that it was quite a mistake to suppose that it was not audited. The plan was for the Secretary of State to make an order on the Treasury Department for any portion of the vote, and the latter made an order on the Auditor-General for the amount. Whenever any Foreign Minister received any of the money he had to give a receipt to the Secretary of State, which was a voucher that, so far as he was concerned, the amount had been properly expended. The Foreign Ministers, in whose hands the money was placed, were required to go before a Board of the Exchequer within one year after their return to England, and make oath that it had not been used for improper purposes. There was in this way a practical audit. Although the details were not given, there was a supervision which amounted to a guarantee to the public that the money had been properly used. The system in Canada was different from this. As he understood it, the whole amount went into the hands of the Ministry of the day. No person was sworn as to how the money was expended, and in other respects the English practice was not conformed to. Until he saw the motion of his hon. friend from North Norfolk he was not aware that he proposed to refer the matter to the Committee on Public Accounts. As the Committee had decided in 1872 that no amount should be expended thereafter without there being some audit as prescribed by the resolution, and as an amount of $6,600 had been expended in regard to which no statement was made, it appeared to him that the motion was one which ought to be made in the interests of the country. At any rate, every one would agree with him that they ought to have some definite way of auditing the Secret Service Fund. The total amount used for the purpose so far was $130,000, and he thought that they should, at least, lay down for the future some general rule which should be satisfactory to both sides of the House and the country that the money was devoted solely to the purpose for which it was intended when voted by the House.

Motion agreed to.

SMELT FISHERIES IN BATHURST HARBOUR.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

Mr. MITCHELL moved for copies of all Orders in Council, Rules and Regulations made in relation to the smelt fisheries in the harbour of Bathurst, together with all the correspondence between the Department of Marine and Fisheries and the Inspector of Fisheries and other officers of the Department, also with all persons interested in said Fisheries.

Motion agreed to.

POST OFFICES AT NOTRE DAME DE GRACE AND STE. CUNÉGONDE.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. DESJARDINS moved for copies of all petitions respecting the establishment of a Post Office at Notre Dame de Grâce near Montreal, and of another at Ste. Cunégonde, part of the territory of the town of St. Henri in the County of Hochelaga, recently erected into a separate municipality; also of all correspondence between the parties interested and the Department at Ottawa, including the reports of the Post Office Inspector in Montreal in relation thereto. He said that the Post Office Department, to his knowledge, had not considered it desirable to grant a post office—which had been petitioned for—to this important municipality. Nevertheless, if he was well informed, on petition last year of a certain number of residents of Côte St. Antoine, which was situated near the toll-gate at Montreal, a post office had been immediately granted. The municipality of Notre Dame de Grâce was located some two or three miles from any centre of communication, and at present its residents were obliged to post their letters either at Montreal or St. Henri, occasioning serious inconvenience. If he had been properly instructed, the Post Office Inspector of Montreal had reported in favour of establishing a post office at this place, and it had been hoped that the Postmaster-General would also grant the municipality in question gratuitous land and house to house distribution. He trusted that simple justice would be done in the premises.

Mr. YOUNG.

Motion agreed to.

INSOLVENT ESTATES.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

Mr. YOUNG moved for any returns which may be in position of the Government relating to the number of failures, the assets and liabilities of Insolvent Estates, and more particularly of the number and character of the compromises which have taken place throughout Canada during the last twelve months. He said he was not sure whether the Department was in a position to bring down the returns. He understood that, last year, efforts were made to collect all cases of insolvency and the amount of the estates involved, and the amount paid in the shape of dividends. If the Department was not in a position to bring down a report this year, he trusted that the system would be perfected so that full returns might be made next year of all such cases as took place throughout the country. He believed one of the Mercantile Agencies published a statement of the kind he referred to, which was said to be tolerably correct; but it was easy to see that an official statement from the official assignees of the number of insolvencies, &c., would be a great advantage to the trading community. He did not know whether it was practicable to get a statement of the number of compromises which took place; but, if it was possible, he would strongly urge that steps be taken to get the return. The number of compromises throughout the country was very great, and they occurred very frequently; and he felt convinced that a great deal of injury was being done by them to solvent traders. In fact, the large number of compromises had a demoralizing effect upon the business of the country. If it were possible to put some restrictions upon them he would sustain such action. In the case of a person failing, his stock might be sold, and, as a rule, he went out of business; but the man who compromised continued in business and unfairly competed with solvent tradesmen.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) said the official assignees throughout the country had been asked to send to the Department the very full information asked for in the motion. Very few of them had sent returns, and the returns that were sent were very imperfect and had to be sent back to be corrected. At present there was very little information which could be brought down. However, what returns were made from time to time would be brought down without any further motion.

Motion agreed to.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY EMPLOYÉES IN NORTH- UMBERLAND.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. MITCHELL moved for a return of the resident employés on the Intercolonial Railway within the County of Northumberland, the date of their employment, when they were located or stationed in their present positions, the nationalities of the several individuals, and the number of them which were at the time of their appointment residents of the said County, with the rate of wages which they respectively receive. He said the impression prevailed in the county which he represented, that the persons residing there received very little consideration at the hands of the Government in the appointments on the Intercolonial Railway, even in that part located in the county of Northumberland. He had not given an ardent support to the Government, and he really believed this was the reason that his constituents were not fairly treated. Of course, he did not imagine that the Government would oppose the motion. He cared very little whether they did or not.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I suppose my hon. friend only wants a return of the regular staff, not the labouring men.

Mr. MITCHELL: Just the regular staff.

Motion agreed to.

APPOINTMENT OF OFFICIALS.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. McCARTHY moved for the names of persons appointed to office between the 1st of January and the 7th of November, 1873, the names of the officials whose salaries were increased during the same period; the names of those so appointed whose appointments were cancelled subsequent to the 7th November; a statement showing whether the positions which were filled up by those whose appointments were cancelled have remained unfilled or have been since filled up, and, if so, when and by whom; and whether the salaries of those officials which were increased during the period named have been since reduced or increased, and showing the reduction or increase in each office respectively? He said he made the motion in consequence of a statement that the First Minister made at a meeting held in Whitby during the election in South Ontario in 1876. The hon. gentleman stated that:

"The new appointments during that time (from 1st January, 1873, to 1st July, 1873,) were 230 in number, with annual salaries amounting to $110,836; while the salaries of 360 other officers were increased to an amount of $38,881, being altogether during that six months, a total increase to the burdens of the people from these officers, of $149,717. But that was nothing to what was done afterwards. After July 1st, they knew tolerably well that their period for making appointments was fast drawing to a close, and so they exerted themselves with redoubled vigilance to discharge this portion of their duty. . . . During this time, up to November 7th—you will recollect they resigned on November 6th—during this interesting period in the history of that Administration, they made 374 new appointments, with salaries of $147,353; increased 973 salaries at a cost of $104,841, being a total of $252,214. We took the liberty to cancel $52,286 worth of these appointments. I do not include in these appointments those that were made to fill vacancies, for they have to be made any way. Of these there were 54, with salaries of $35,312."

That statement was very possibly literally true, and yet perhaps it at the same time had the effect of creating a false impression not merely on the persons present at the meeting, but on the whole country, for of course a speech by such a distinguished gentleman as the First Minister of the Crown would be read generally. He (Mr. McCarthy) desired to see whether, as a matter of fact, these appointments were properly or improperly made. If they were improperly made, then he supposed it would be the duty of the Government, on obtaining the reins of power, to have them cancelled. If they were properly made, then it was no great credit to the Government for having them cancelled and the places simply filled with different persons. The extract he had quoted was taken from the Globe newspaper, and he presumed was an accurate report of what was said. He was surprised to see on looking at the Public Accounts that, while the expenditure for salaries in 1874, the first year in which any new appointments could be made, was $883,685; for the subsequent year it was $909,265. He could not understand how the old Government had increased the burdens of the people as had been stated by the First Minister, in face of these figures, which went to show that the amount had increased under his Administration. A great deal had been heard about the importance and necessity of hon. gentlemen who made statements outside the House being prepared to substantiate them inside the House, and the First Minister had been one of the foremost in urging this rule.

NEW BRUNSWICK ORANGE INCORPORATION ACT.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved for a return of copies of all correspondence and proceedings in Council regarding the Orange Incorporation Act of New Brunswick, passed in the Legislature of that Province in 1875.

Mr. BLAKE said he supposed the hon. gentleman meant any Orders in Council, and not "proceedings in Council." There was no correspondence except the letter of the Lieutenant-Governor, and there were also the general Orders in Council dealing with this Act and a number of other Acts. There was no objection to the motion, with the amendment he had suggested. However, within forty-eight hours a return was expected which would contain the information asked for. Perhaps, therefore, the motion had better be withdrawn.

Mr. MCCARTHY.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: This Act was not reserved?

Mr. BLAKE: No.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

POST-OFFICE AND CUSTOM-HOUSE BUILDINGS.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. APPLEBY moved for a return shewing the number of Post Office and Custom House buildings owned by the Dominion, designating those built since 1867; the names of the cities and towns where the same are situate, with the population of each at the last census, and the amount of Customs, Post Office and Inland Revenue respectively collected at each place during the year 1875 and 1876.

VOLUNTEER MILITIA.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. BOWELL moved for a return giving the names of all the Deputy Adjutant-Generals and Brigade-Majors on the staff of the Volunteer Militia Force of Canada on the first day of January, 1876; the Districts in which they were stationed; the date of their appointments respectively; the length of time they had each served; the names of those who have been removed from the staff; the date of such removal; and the names of those officers who have been appointed Deputy-Adjutant-Generals and Brigade-Majors since the first of January 1876; and the length of time they have served in the Volunteer Force of Canada before such appointments were made.

MAILS IN THE COUNTIES OF BEAUCE AND DORCHESTER.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. BLANCHET, in the absence of Mr. ROULEAU, moved for copies of all the correspondence having reference to the change of mail conductors for the counties of Dorchester and Beauce since the first of January, 1875; and also the names of those parties from whom such contract was taken away since that date, before the term for which they held such contract had expired; and also the names of those parties who took their places.

Mr. HUNTINGTON asked the hon. member to amend his motion so as to make its terms more explicit.

Mr. BLANCHET said the hon. member for Dorchester placed the motion on the notice paper, no doubt, on account of the change which had taken place in the mode of transporting the mails from Quebec to the County of Beauce. The Kennebec Railway was opened for traffic in July, 1875, when the Government adopted that means for conveying the mails, a mail conductor being appointed on the trains. The hon. member for Dorchester desired to obtain the names of the party who had the contracts and the name or names of the party or parties who were appointed mail conductors on the Kennebec Railway.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said the information would be furnished.

Motion as amended, agreed to, as follows:—

Resolved—That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency, for copies of all the correspondence having reference to the change of Mail Conductors on the Kennebec Railway since the first of January, 1875; and also the names of those parties from whom contracts were taken away since that date, before the term for which had expired; and also the names of those parties who took their places.

ARICHAT WEST BREAKWATER.

MOTION FOR REPORTS AND PLANS.

Mr. FLYNN moved for copies of reports and plans of breakwater at Arichat West, in the county of Richmond. He said the south-east end of the island which formed the harbour of Arichat was connected by a narrow neck of land with the mainland. Some years ago a heavy gale swept it away and the harbour was entirely exposed. In 1865 the matter was brought to the attention of the Local Government, and a sum was appropriated for the purpose of erecting a breakwater from the island to the mainland so as to form a harbour again. The work was commenced in 1865, and 500 feet of the breakwater, or less than one-half of the width of the gap, was completed at the time of Confederation. The work then passed into the hands of the Dominion Government, and he could not understand why they had left it unfinished for so long a period. Some years ago he brought the subject before the notice of the Minister of Public Works, and an engineer was subsequently sent down to survey and report on the work. That officer submitted a report in the autumn of 1875, estimating the cost of completing the breakwater at about $12,000. Neither last Session nor this Session was any sum placed in the Estimates on that account. The work should be finished at once to prevent the harbour from being destroyed. Before the land was carried away the water in the harbour was of sufficient depth to accommodate vessels of 500 or 600 tons burthen, but, according to the Engineer's report, the depth had been reduced to twelve feet. Arichat West was a place of considerable importance, owning about forty vessels, aggregating 8,000 tons, which were engaged in fishing and general business. It was also in the direct line between the Strait of Canso and Cape Canso, and was used as a place of shelter by vessels plying between those points. He thought a less sum than that estimated by the Engineer would be sufficient to complete the breakwater, and he hoped the First Minister would place an amount on that account in the Supplementary Estimates.
